But the protective feature of the bill, which sat hardest upon the Southern members, and, at one time, seemed to put an end to the "compromise," was a proposition, by Mr. Clay, to substitute home valuations for foreign on imported goods; and on which home valuation, the duty was to be computed. This was no part of the bill concocted by Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun; and, when offered, evidently took the latter gentleman by surprise, who pronounced it unconstitutional, unequal, and unjust; averred the objections to the proposition to be insurmountable; and declared that, if adopted, would compel him to vote against the whole bill. On the other hand, Mr. Clayton and others, declared the adoption of the amendment to be indispensable; and boldly made known their determination to sacrifico the bill, if it was not adopted. A brief and sharp debate took place, in the course of which Mr. Calhoun declared his opiaions to remain unaltered, and Mr. Clayton moved to lay the bill upon the table. Its fate seemed, at that time, to be sealed; and certainly would have been, if the vote on its passage had then been taken; but an adjournment was moved, and carried; and, on the next day, and after further debate, and the question on Mr. Clay's proposition about to be taken, Mr. Calhoun declared that it had become necessary for him to determine whether he would vote for or against it; said he would vote for it, otherwise the bill would be lost. He then called upon the reporters in the gallery to notice well what he said, as he intended his declaration to be part of the proceedings: and that he voted upon the conditions: first, that no valuation should be alopted, w in different hemselves valuation. immediately ditions, whi mere salv him by the ral senator and motive which wou words. Hopted, which would make the duties unequal in different parts; and secondly, that the duties themselves should not become an element in the valuation. The practical sense of General Smith immediately exposed the futility of these conditions, which were looked upon, on all sides, as a mere salvo for an inevitable vote, extorted from him by the exigencies of his position; and several senators reminded him that his intentions and motives could have no effect upon the law, which would be executed according to its own words. The following is the debate on this point, very curious in itself, even in the outside view it gives of the manner of affecting great national legislation; and much more so in the inside view of the manner of passing this particular measure, so lauded in its day; and to understand which, the outside view must first be seen. It appears thus, in the prepared debates:

"Mr. Clay now rose to propose the amendment, of which he had previously given notice. The object was, that, after the period prescribed by the bill, all duties should thereafter be assessed on a valuation made at the port in which the goods are first irand under 'such regulations as may be prescribed by law.' Mr. U said it would be seen, by this amendment, that, in place of having a foreign valuation, it was intended to have a home one. It was believed by the friends of the protective system, that such a regulation was necessary. It was believed by many of the friends of the system, that, after the period of nine and a half years, the most of our manufactures will be sufficiently grown to be able to support themselves under a duty of twenty per cent., if properly laid; but that, under a system of foreign valuation, such would not be the case. They say that it would be more detrimental to their interests than the lowest scale of duties that could be imposed; and you propose to fix a standard of duties. They are willing to take you at your word, provided you regulate this in a way to do them justice.

"Mr. Smith opposed the amendment, on the ground that it would be an increase of duties; that it had been tried before; that it would be impracticable, unequal, unjust, and productive of confusion, inasmuch as imported goods were constantly varying in value, and were well known to be, at all times, cheaper in New-York than in the commercial cities south of it. This would have the effect of drawing all the trade of the United States to New-York.

"Mr. Clay said he did not think it expedient, m deciding this question, to go forward five or six years, and make that an obstacle to the passage of a great national measure, which is not to go into operation until after that period. The honorable senator from Maryland said that the measure would be impracticable. Well, sir, if sion, it would ultimately assume such a shape

so, it will not be adopted. We do not adopt it now, said Mr. C.; we only adopt the principle, leaving it to future legislation to adjust the details. Besides, it would be the restoration of an ancient principle, known since the foundation of the government. It was but at the last session that the discriminating duty on goods coming from this side, and beyond the Cape of Good Hope, ten per cent. on one, and twenty per cent. on the other, was repealed. On what principle was it, said he, that this discrimination ever prevailed? On the principle of the home value. Were it not for the fraudulent invoices which every gentleman in this country was familiar with, he would not urge the amendment; but it was to detect and prevent these frauds that he looked upon the insertion of the clause as essentially necessary.

"Mr. Smith replied that he had not said that the measure was impracticable. He only intended to say that it would be inconvenient and unjust. Neither did he say that it would be adopted by future Congress; but he said, it the principle was adopted now, it would be an entering wedge that might lead to the adoption of the measure. We all recollect, said Mr. S., that appropriations were made for surveys for internal improvements; and that these operated as entering wedges, and led to appropriations for roads and canals. The adoption of the prinple contended for, by the senator from Kentucky, would not, in his (Mr. S.'s) opinion, prevent frauds in the invoices. That very principle was the foundation of all the frauds on the revenue of France and Spain, where the duties were asrding to the value of the goods in the entered. He again said that the sessed s effect of the amendment would be to draw the principal commerce of the country to the great city of New-York, where goods were cheaper.
"Mr. Forsyth understood, from what had fallen from the senator from Kentucky, that this was a vital question, and on it depended the success of this measure of conciliation and compromise, which was said to settle the distracted condition of the country. In one respect, it was said to be a vital question; and the next was, it was useful; and a strange contradiction followed: that the fate of this measure, to unite the jarrings of brother with brother, depended on the adoption of a principle which might or might not be adopted. He considered the amendment wrong in principle, because it would be both unequal and unjust in its operation, and because it would raise the revenue: as the duties would be assessed, not only on the value of the goods at the place whence imported, but on their value at the place of importation. He would, however, vote for the bill, even if the amendment were incorporated in it, provided he had the assurances, from the proper quarter, that it would effect the conciliation and compromise it was intended for.

as to reconcile all parties to its adoption, and more that the senator from Kentucky had felt it tend to end the agitation of this unsettled question. If there be any member of this Congress (Mr. C. said), who says that he will take this bill now for as much as it is worth, and that he will, at the next Congress, again open the question, for the purpose of getting a better bill, of bringing down the tariff to a lower standard, without considering it as a flual measure of compromise and conciliation, calculated also to give stability to a man of business, the bill, in his eyes, would lose all its value, and he should be constrained to vote against it.

"It was for the sake of conciliation, of nine years of peace, to give tranquility to a disturbed and agitated country, that he had, even at this late period of the session, introduced this measure, which, his respect for the other branch of the legislature, now sitting in that building, and who had a measure, looking to the same end, before them, had prevented him from bringing forward at an earlier period. But, when he had seen the session wearing away, without the prospect of any action in that other body, he felt himself compelled to come forward, though contrary to his wishes, and the advice of some of his best friends, with whom he had acted in the most perilous times. "Mr. Calhoun said, he regretted, exceedingly. that the senator from Kentucky had felt it his duty to move the amendment. According to his present impressions, the objections to it were insurmountable; and, unless these were remove.l, he should be compelled to vote against the whole bill, should the amendment be adopted. The measure proposed was, in his opinion, unconstitutional. The constitution expressly provided that no preference should be given, by any regulation of commerce, to the ports of one State over those of another; and this would be the effect of adopting the amendment. Thus, great injustice and inequality must necessarily result from it; for the price of goods being cheaper in the Northern than in the Southern cities, a home valuation would give to the former a preference in the payment of duties. Again, the price of goods being higher at New Orleans and Charleston than at New-York, the freight and insurance also being higher, together with the increased expenses of a sickly climate, would give such advantages in the amount of duties to the Northern city, as to draw to it much of the trade of the Southern ones. In his view of the subject, this was not all. He was not merchant enough to say what would be the extent of duties under this system of home valuation; but, as he understood it, they must, of consequence, be progressive. For instance, an article is brought into New-York, value there 100 dollars. Twenty per cent. on that would raise the value of the article to one hundred and twenty dollars, on which value a duty of twenty per cent. would his duty to offer this amendment, as he was willing to leave the matter to the decision of a future Congress, though he did not see how they could get over the insuperable constitutional objections he had glanced at. Mr. C. appealed to the senator from Kentucky, whether, with these views, he would press his amendment, when he had eight or nine years in advance before it could take effect. He understood the argument of the senator from Kentucky to be an admission that the amendment was not now absolutely necessary. With respect to the apprehension of frauds on the revenue, Mr. C. said that every future Congress would have the strongest disposition to guard against them. The very reduction of duties, he said, would have that effect; it would strike at the root of the evil. Mr. C. said he agreed with the senator from Kentucky, that this bill will be the final effort at conciliation and compromise; and he, for one, was not disposed. if it passed, to violate it by future legislation.

"Mr. Clayton said that he could not vote for this bill without this amendment, nor would he admit any idea of an abandonment of the protective system; while he was willing to pass this measure, as one of concession from the stronger to the weaker party, he never could agree that twenty per cent. was adequate protection to our domestic manufactures. He had been anxious to do something to relieve South Carolina from her present perilous position; though he had never been driven by the taunts of Southern gentlemen to do that, which he now did, for the sake of conciliation. I vote for this bill, said Mr. C., only on the ground that it may save

South Carolina from herself.

"Here Mr. C. yielded the floor to Mr. Calhoun, who said. He hoped the gentleman would not touch that question. He entreated him to believe that South Carolina had no fears for herself. The noble and disinterested attitude sho had assumed was intended for the whole nation. while it was also calculated to relieve herself, as well as them, from oppressive legislation. It was not for them to consider the condition of South Carolina only, in passing on a measure of

"Mr. Clayton resumed. Sir, said he, I must be permitted to explain, in my own way, the reasons which will govern me in the vote I am about to give. As I said before, I never have permitted the fears of losing the protective system, as expressed by the senator from Georgia, when he taunted us with the majority that they would have in the next Congress, when they would get a better bill, to influence my opinion upon this occasion. That we have been driven by our fears into this act of concession, I will not admit. Sir, I tell gentlemen that they may never get such another offer as the present; for, though they may think otherwise, I do not believe that the people of this country will ever be It would, therefore, be impossible to say to what brought to consent to the abandonment of the extent the duties would run up. Does any man believe that fifty per cent. is an adequate protection on woullens? No, sir; the protection is brought down to twenty per cent.; and when gentlemen come to me and say that this is a compromise, I answer, with my friend from Maine, that I will not vote for it, unless you will give me the fair twenty per cent.; and this cannot be done without adopting the principle of a home valuation. I do not vote for this bill because I think it better than the sariff of 1832, no because I fear nullification or secession; but from a motive of concession, yielding my own opinions. But if Southern gentle-men will not accept this measure in the spirit for which it was tendered, I have no reason to vote for it. I voted, said Mr. C., against the bill of 32, for the very reason that Southern gentlemen de ared that it was no concession; and I may you against this for the same reasons. thought it bad policy to pass the bill of '32. thought it a bad bargain, and I think so now. I have no fear of nullification or secession; I am got to be intimidated by threats of Southern gentlemen, that they will get a better bill at the next session. "Rebellion made young Harry Percy's spurs grow cold." I will vote for this measure as one of conciliation and compromise; but if the clause of the senator from Kentucky is not inserted, I shall be compelled to vote against it. The protective system never can be abandoned; and I, for one, will not now, or at any time, admit the idea.

Mr. Dallas was opposed to the proposition from the committee, and agreed with Mr. Calhoun. He would state briefly his objection to the proposition of the committee. Although he was from a State strongly disposed to maintain the prote-tive poliey, he labored under an impression, that if any thing could be done to conciliate the Southern States, it was his duty to go for a measure for that purpose; but he should not go beyond it. lle could do nothing in this way, as representing his particular district of the country, but only for the general good. He could not agree to incorporate in the bill any principle which he thought erroneous or improper. He would sanction nothing in the bill as an abandonment of the principle of protection. Mr. D. then made a few remarks on home and foreign valuation, to show the ground of his objections to the amendment of Mr. Clay, though it did not prevent his strong desire to compromise and conciliation.

"Mr. Clay thought it was premature to agitate now the details of a legislation which might take place nine years hence. The senator from South Carolina had objected to the amendment on constitutional grounds. He thought he could satisfy him, and every senator, that there was no objection from the constitution.

"He asked if it was probable that a valuation in Liverpool could escape a constitutional objection, if a home valuation were unconstitutional? There was a distinction in the foreign value, and the thing valued. An invoice might be made if articles at one price in one port of England, and in another port at another price. The price, too, must vary with the time. But all this could not affect the rule. There was a distinction which gentlemen did not observe, between the value and the rule of valuation; one of these might vary, while the other continued always the same. The rule was uniform with regard to direct taxation; yet the value of houses and lands of the same quality are very different in different places. One mode of home valuation was, to give the government, or its officers, the right to make the valuation after the one which the importer had given. It would prevent fraud, and the rule would not violate the constitution. It was an error that it was unconstitutional; the constitution said nothing about it. It was absurd that all values must be established in foreign countries; no other country on earth should assume the right of judging. Objections had been made to leaving the business of valuation in the hands of a few executive officers; but the objections were at least equally great to leaving it in the hands of foreigners. He thought there was nothing in the constitutional objection, and hoped the measure would not be embarrassed by such objections.

"Mr. Calhoun said that he listened with great care to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, and other gentlemen, who had advocated the same side, in hopes of having his objection to the mode of valuation proposed in the amendment removed; but he must say, that the difficulties he first expressed still remained. Pasing over what seemed to him to be a constitutional objection, he would direct his observation to what appeared to him to be its unequal operation. If by the home valuation be meant the foreign price, with the addition of freight, insurance, and other expenses at the port of destination, it is a mifest that as these are unequal between the several ports in the Union-for instance, between the ports New-York and New Orleans-the duty must also be unequal in the same degree, if laid on value thus estimated. But if, by the home valuation be meant the prices current at the place of importation, then, in addition to the inequality already stated, there would have to be added the additional inequality resulting from the different rates of profits, and other circumstances, which must necessarily render prices very unequal in the several ports of this widely-extended country. There would, in the same view, be another and a stronger objection, which he alluded to in his former remarks, which remained unanswered-that the duties themselves constitute part of the elements of the current prices of the imported articles; and that, to impose a duty on a valuation ascertained by the current prices, would be to impose, in reality, a duty upon a duty, and must necessarily produce that increased progression in duties, which he had already attempted to illus-in the thing valued. An invoice might be made "He knew it had been stated, in reply, that if articles at one price in one port of England, a system which would produce such absurd results could not be contemplated; that Congress, under the power of regulating, reserved in the amendment, would adopt some mode that would obviate these objections; and, if none such could be devised, that the provisions of the amendment would be simply useless. His difficulty was not removed by the answer to the objection. He was at a loss to understand what mode could be devised free from objection; and, as he wished to be candid and explicit, he felt the difficulty, as an honest man, to assent to a general measure, which, in all the modifications under which he had viewed it, was objectionable. He again repeated, that he regretted the amendment had been offered, as he felt a solicitude that the present controversy should be honorably and fairly terminated. It was not his wish that there should be a feeling of victory on either side. But, in thus expressing his solicitude for an adjustment, he was not governed by motives derived from the attitude which South Carolina occupied, and which the senator from Delaware stated to influence him. He wished that senator, as well as all others, to understand that that gallant and patriotic State was far from considering her situation as one requiring sympathy, and was equally far from desiring that any adjustment of this question should take place with the view of relieving her, or with any other motive than a regard to the general interests of the country. So far from requiring commiseration, she regarded her position with very opposite light, as one of high responsibility, and exposing her to no inconsiderable danger; but a position voluntarily and firmly assumed, with a full view of consequences, and which she was determined to maintain till the oppression under which she and the other Southern States were suffering was removed.

"In wishing, then, to see a termination to the present state of things, he turned not his eyes to South Carolina, but to the general interests of the country. He did not believe it was possible to maintain our institutions and our liberty, under the continuance of the controversy which had for so long a time distracted us, and brought into conflict the two great sections of the country. He was in the last stage of madness who did not see, if not terminated, that this admirable system of ours, reared by the wisdom and virtue of our ancestors-virtue, he feared, which had fled forever-would fall under its shocks. It was to arrest this catastrophe, if possible, by restoring peace and harmony to the Union, that governed him in desiring to see an adjustment of the question.

"Mr. Clayton said, this point had been discussed in the committee; and it was because this amendment was not adopted that he had withheld his assent from the bill. They had new but seven business days of this session remaining; and it would require the greatest unanimity, both in that body and in the other House, to pass any bill on this subject. Were gentle-

Union, and representing opposite interests, to agree to combine together, there would hardly be time to pass this bill into a law; yet if he saw that it could be done, he would gladly go on with the consideration of the bill, and with the determination to do all that could be done. The honorable member from South Carolina had found insuperable obstacles where he (Mr. C.) had found none. On their part, if they agreed to this bill, it would only be for the sake of conciliation; if South Carolina would not accept the measure in that light, then their motive for arrangement was at an end. He (Mr. C.) apprehended, however, that good might result from bringing the proposition forward at that time. It would be placed before the view of the people, who would have time to reflect and make up their minds upon it against the meeting of the next Congress. He did not hold any man as pledged by their action at this time. If the arrangement was found to be a proper one, the next Congress might adopt it. But, for the reasons he had already stated, he had little hope that any bill would be passed at this session; and, to go on debating it, day after day, would only have the effect of defeating the many private bills and other business which were waiting the action of Congress. He would therefore propose to lay the bill for the present on the table; if it were found, at a future period, before the expiration of the session, that there was a prospect of overcoming the difficulties which now presented themselves, and of acting upon it, the bill might be again taken up. If no other gen-tleman wished to make any observations on the amendment, he would move to lay the bill on the

"Mr. Bibb requested the senator from Delaware to withdraw his motion, whilst he (Mr. B.) offered an amendment to the amendment, having for its object to get rid of that interminable series of duties of which gentlemen had spoken. "Mr. Clayton withdrew his motion.

"Mr. Bibb proceeded to say, that his design was to obviate the objection of the great increase that would arise from a system of home valuation. He hoped that something satisfactory would be done this session yet. He should vote for every respectable proposition calculated to settle the difficulty. He hoped there would be corresponding concessions on both sides; he wished much for the harmony of the country. It was well known that he (Mr. B.) was opposed to any tariff system other than one for revenue, and such incidental protection as that might afford. His hope was to strike out a middle course; otherwise, he would concur in the motion that had been made by the senator from Delaware [Mr. Clayton]. Mr. B. then submitted his amendment, to insert the words, before pay-accordingly.

"Mr. Tyler was opposed to the principle of this home valuation. The duties would be taken into consideration in making the valuations; and thus, after going down hill for nine and a half years, we would as suddenly rise up again to prohibition. He complained that there were not merchants enough on this floor from the South; and, in this respect, the Northern States had the advantage. But satisfy me, said Mr. T., that the views of the senator from South Carolina [Mr. Calhoun] are not correct, and I shall vote for the proposition.

"Mr. Moore said he would move an amendment which he hoped would meet the views of the gentlemen on the other side; it was to this effect:

" Provided, That no valuation he adopted that will operate unequally in different ports of the United States.

"Mr. Calhoun also wished that the amendment would prevail, though he felt it would be ineffectual to counteract the inequality of the system. But he would raise no cavilling objections; he wished to act in perfect good hith; and he only wished to see what could be done.

"Mr. Moore said he had but two motives in offering the amendment to the amendment of the senator. The first was, to get rid of the constitutional objections to the amendment of the senator from Kentucky; and the second was, to do justice to those he had the honor to represent. The honorable gentleman said that Mobile and New Orleans would not pay higher duties, because the goods imported there would he of more value; and this was the very reason, Mr. M. contended, why the duties would be higher. Did not every one see that if the same article was valued in New-York at one hundred dollars, and in Mobile at one hundred and thirtyfive dollars, the duty of twenty per cent. would be higher at the latter place? Ho had nothing but the spirit of compromise in view, and hoped gentlemen would meet him in the same spirit. lle would now propose, with the permission of the senator from Maine, to vary his motion, and offer a substitute in exact conformity with the language of the constitution. This proposition being admitted by general consent, Mr. Moore modified his amendment accordingly. (It was an affirmation of the constitution, that all duties should be uniform, &c).

'Mr. Forsyth supported the amendment of the senator from Alabama, and hoped it would meet the approbation of the Senate. It would get rid of all difficulty about words. No one, he presumed, wished to violate the constitution; and consistent with the constitution, it would prevail; if not, it would not be adopted.

"Mr. Holmes moved an adjournment.

"Mr. Moore asked for the yeas and mays on the motion to adjourn, and they were accordingly ordered, when the questien was taken and decided in the affirmative-Yeas 22, nays 19, as follows:

"YEAS .- Messrs. Bell, Clayton, Dallas, Dickerson, Ewing, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Holmes, Johnston, Kane, Knight, Naudain, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Silsbee, Smith, Tipton, Tom-linson, Waggaman, Webster, Wilkins.—22. "Nays.—Messrs. Bibb, Black, Buckner, Calhoun, Clay, Dudley, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, King, Miller, Moore, Poindexter, Sprague, Rives, Troup, Tyler, White, Wright.—19. "The Senate then, at half-past four o'clock, adjourned.

" Friday, February 22.

"Mr. Smith (of Md.) said, the motion to amend by the word 'uniform' was unnecessary. That was provided for by the constitution. 'All duties must be uniform.' An addition to the cost of goods of forty, fifty, or sixty per cent. would be uniform, but would not prevent fraud, nor the certainty of great inequality in the valuation in the several ports. The value of goods at New Orleans particularly, and at almost every other port, will be higher than at New-York. I have not said that such mode was unconstitutional, nor have I said that it was impracticable; few things are so. But I have said, and do now say, that the mode is open to fraud, and more so than the present. At present the merchant enters his goods, and swears to the truth of his invoice. One package in every five or ten is sent to the public warehouse, and there carefully examined by two appraisers on oath. If they find fraud, or suspect fraud, then all the goods belonging to such merchants are sent to the appraisers; and if frauds be discovered, the goods are forfeited. No American merchant has ever been convicted of such fraud. Foreigners have even been severely punished by loss of their property. The laws are good and sufficiently safe as they now stand on our statutes. I wish no stronger; we know the one, we are ignorant how the other will work. Such a mode of valuation is unknown to any nation except Spain, where the valuation is arbitrary; and the goods are valued agreeably to the amount of the bribe given. This is perfectly understood and practised. It is in the nature of such mode of valuation to be arbitrary. No rule can be established that will make such mode uniform throughout the Union, and some of the small ports will value low to bring business to their towns. A scene of connivance and injustice will take place that no law can prevent.

"The merchant will be put to great inconvenience by the mode proposed. All his goods must be sent to the public warehouses, and there If the measure of the senator from Kentucky was opened piece by piece; by which process they will sustain essential injury. The goods will be detained from the owners for a week or a month, or still more, unless you have one or two hundred appraisers in New-York, and proportionately in other ports; thus increasing patronage; and with such a host, can we expect either uniformity or equality in the valuation? All will not be honest, and the Spanish mode will be adopted. One set of appraisers, who value low, will have a priority. In fact, if this mode should ever be adopted, it will cause great discontent, and must soon be changed. As all understand the cause to be to flatter the manufacturers with a plan which they think will be beneficial to them, but which, we all know, can never be realized, it is deception on its face, as is almost the whole of the bill now under our consideration. "Remember, Mr. President, that the senators from Kentucky and South Carolina [Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun], have declared this bill (if it should become a law), to be permanent, and that no honorable man who shall vote for it can ever attempt a change; yet, sir, the pressure against it will be such at the next session that Congress will be compelled to revise it; and as the storm may then have passed over Congress, a new Congress, with better feelings, will be able to act with more deliberation, and may pass a law that will be generally approved. Nearly all agree that this bill is a bad bill. A similar opinion prevailed on the passage of the tariff of 1828, and yet it passed, and caused all our present danger and difficulties. All admit that the act of 1828, as it stands on our statutes, is constitutional. But the senator [Mr. Calhoun] has said that it is unconstitutional, because of the motive under which it passed; and he said that that motive was protection to the manufacturers. How, sir, I ask, are we to know the motives of men l I thought then, and think now, that the approaching election for President tended greatly to the enactments of the acts of 1824 and 1828; many of my friends thought so at the time. I have somewhere read of the minister of a king or emperor in Asia, who was anxious to be considered a man of truth, and always boasted of his veracity. He hypocritically prayed to God that he might always speak the truth. A genii appeared and told him that his prayer had been heard, touched him with his spear, and said, hereafter you will speak truth on all occasions. The next day he waited on his majesty and said, Sire, I intended to have assassinated you yesterday, but was prevented by the nod of the officer behind you, who is to kill you to-morrow. The result I will not mention. Now, Mr. President, if the same genii was to touch with his spear each of the senators who voted for the act of 1828, and an interrogator was appointed, he would ask, what induced you to give that vote? Why, sir, I acted on sound principles. I believe it is the duty of every good government to promote the manufactures of the nation; all historians enlo-

gize the kings who have done so, and consure those kings who have neglected them. I refer you to the history of Alfred. It is known that the staple of England was wool, which was sent to Flanders to be exchanged for cloths. The civil wars, by the invasions of that nation, kept them long dependent on the Flemings for the cloths they wore. At length a good king governed; and he invited Flemish manufacturers to England, and gave them great privileges. They taught the youth of England, the mann-facture succeeded, and now England supplies all the world with woollen cloth. The interrogator asked another the same question. His answer might have been, that he thought the passing of the law would secure the votes of the manufacturers in favor of his friend who wanted to be the President. Another answer might have been, a large duty was imposed on an article which my constituents raised; and I voted for it, although I disliked all the residue of the bill. Sir, the motives, no doubt, were different that induced the voting for that bill, and were, as we all know, not confined to the protective system. Many voted on political grounds, as many will on this bill, and as they did on the enforcing bill. We cannot declare a bill unconstitutional, because of the motives that may govern the voters. It is idle to assign such a cause for the part that is now acting in South Caroli-I know, Mr. President, that no argument will have any effect on the passage of this bill. The high contracting parties have agreed. But I owed it to myself to make these remarks.

"Mr. Webster said, that he held the home valuation to be, to any extent, impracticable; and that it was unprecedented, and unknown in any legislation. Both the home and foreign valuation ought to be excluded as far as possible, and specific duties should be resorted to. This keeping out of view specific duties, and turning us back to the principle of a valuation was, in his view, the great vice of this bill. In England five out of six, or nine out of ten articles, pay specific duties, and the valuation is on the remnant. Among the articles which pay ad valorem duties in England are silk goods, which are imported either from India, whence they are brought to one port only; or from Europe, in which case there is a specific and an ad valorem duty; and the officer has the option to take either the one or the other. He suggested that the Senate, before they adopted the act valorem principle, should look to the effects on the importation of the country.

"He took a view of the iron trade, to show that evil would result to that branch from a substitution of the ad valorem for the specific system of duties. He admitted himself to be unable to comprehend the elements of a home valuation, and mentioned cases where it would be impossible to find an accurate standard of valuation of this character. The plan was impracticable and illusory.

as tending to a violation of the constitution of the United States, and cited the following clause: 'Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.' All uniformity of duties and imposts, he contended, would be destroyed by this amendment. No human judgment could fix the value of the same goods at the same rate, in all the various ports of the United States. If the same individual value? the goods in every port, and every cargo in every port, he would commit innumerable erfors and mistakes in the valuation; and, according to the diversity of these errors and mistakes, would be the diversity in the amount of duties and imposts laid and collected in the dif-

"Mr. B. objected to the home valuation, because it would be injurious and almost fatal to the southern ports. He confined his remarks to New Orleans. The standard of valuation would be fifteen or twenty per cent. higher in New Orleans than in New-York, and other northern ports. All importers will go to the northeastern cities, to evade high duties at New Orleans; and that great emporium of the West will be doomed to sink into a mere exporting city, while all the money which it pays for exports must be carried off and expended elsewhere for imports. Without an import trade, no city can flourish, or even furnish a good market for exports. It will be drained of its effective cash, and deprived of its legitimate gains, and must languish far in the rear of what it would be, if enriched with the profits of an import trade. As an exporter, it will buy; as an importer, it will sell. All buying, and no selling, must mapoverish cities as well as individuals. New Orleans is now a great exporting city; she exports more domestic productions than any city in the Union; her imports have been increasing, for some years; and, with fair play, would soon become next to New-York, and fornish the whole valley of the Mississippi with its immense supplies of foreign goods; but, under the influence of a home valuation, it must lose a greater part of the import trade which it now possesses. In that loss, its wealth must decline; its capacity to purchase produce for exportation must deline; and as the western produce must go there, at all events, every western farmer will suffer a lecline in the value of his own productions, in proportion to the decline of the ability of New paly for the sake of concession. The senator citizen that he pleaded the cause of New Orleans, and objected to this measure of home valuation, which was to have the most baneful effect upon her prosperity.

"Mr. B. further objected to the home valuation, on account of the great additional expense it would create; the amount of patronage it would confer; the rivalry it would beget between importing cities; and the injury it would occasion to merchants, from the detention and handling of their goods; and concluded with saying, that the home valuation was the most obnoxious feature ever introduced into the tariff acts; that it was itself equivalent to a separate tariff of ten per cent.; that it had always been resisted, and successfully resisted by the anti-tariff interest, in the highest and most palmy days of the American system, and ought not now to be introduced when that system is admitted to be nodding to its fall; when its death is actually fixed to the 30th day of June, 1842, and when the restoration of harmonious feelings is proclaimed to be the whole object of this bill.

"Mr. B. said this was a strange principle to bring into a bill to reduce duties. It was an increase, in a new form—an indefinable form and would be tax up so tax, as the whole cost of getting the goods ready for a market valuation here, would have to be included: original cost, freight, insurance, commissione duties here. It was new protection, in a new form, and in an extraor dinary form, and such as never could be carried before. It had often been attempted, as as a part of the American system, but never received countenance before.

"Mr. Calhoun rose and said:

"As the question is now about to be put on the amendment offered by the senator from Kentucky, it became necessary for him to determine whether he should vote for or against it. He must be permitted again to express his regret that the senator had thought proper to move it. His objection still remained strong against it; but, as it seemed to be admitted, on all hands, that the fate of the bill depended on the fate of the amendment, feeling, as he did, a solicitude to see the question terminated, he had made up his mind, not, however, without much hesitation, not to interpose his vote against the adoption of the amendment; but, in voting for it, he wished to be distinctly understood, he did it upon two conditions: first, that no valuation would be adopted that should come in conflict with the provision in the constitution which declares that duties, excises, and imposts shall be uniform; and, in the next place, that none would be adopted which would make the duties themselves a part of the element of a home valuation. He felt himself justified in concluding that none such would be adopted; as it had been declared by the supporters of the amendment, that no such regulation was contemplated; and, in fact, he could not imagine that any such could be contemplated, whatever interpretation might be Vrleans to purchase it. of the home market. The first could scarcely be contemplated, as it would be in violation of the constitution itself; ner the latter, as it would, by necessary consequence, restore the very duties, which it was the object of this bill to reduce, and would involve the glaring absurdity of imposing duties on duties, taxes on taxes. He wished the reporters for the public press to notice particularly what he said, as he intended his declaration to be part of the proceedings.

"Believing, then, for the reasons which he had stated, that it was not contemplated that any regulation of the home valuation should come in conflict with the provisions of the constitution which he had cited, nor involve the absurdity of laying taxes upon taxes, he had made up his mind to vote in favor of the amendment.

"Mr. Smith said, any declaration of the riews and motives, under which any individual senator might now vote, could have no influence, in 1842; they would be forgotten long before that time had arrived. The law must rest upon the interpretation of its words alone.

"Mr. Calhoun said he could not help that; he should endeavor to do his duty.

"Mr. Clayton said there was certainly no ambiguity whatever in the phraseology of the amendment. In advocating it, he had desired to deceive no man; he sincerely hoped no one would suffer himself to be deceived by it.

"Mr. Wilkins said, if it had been his intention to have voted against the amendment, he should have remained silent; but, after the explicit declaration of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Calhoun] of the reason of his vote, and believing, himself, that the amendment would have a different construction from that given it by the gentleman, he [Mr. W.] would as expressly state, that he would vote on the question, with the impression that it would not hereafter be expounded by the declaration of any senator on this floor, but by the plain meaning of the words in the text.

"The amendment of Mr. Clay, fixing the principle of home valuation as a part of the bill, was

"Yeas,—Messis, Beil, Black, Bibb, Calhoun, Chambers, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Foot, Freling-huysen, Hill, Holmes, Johnson, King, Knight, Miller, Moore, Naudain, Poindexter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Sprague, Tomlinson, Tyler, Wilkins.—26.

"NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Buckner, Dallas, Dickerson, Dudley, Forsyth, Grundy, Kane, Robinson, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, Waggaman, Webster, White, Wright .-- 16."

And thus a new principle of protection, never before engrafted on the American system, and to get at which the constitution had to be violated in the article of the uniformity of duties, was established! and established by the aid of those who declared all protection to be unconstitutional, and just cause for the secession of a State from the Union! and were then acting on that assumption.

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

REVENUE COLLECTION, OR FORCE BILL.

THE President in his message on the South Carolina proceedings had recommended to Congress the revival of some acts, heretofore in force. to enable him to execute the laws in that State: and the Senate's committee on the Judiciary had reported a bill accordingly early in the session. It was immediately assailed by several members as violent and unconstitutional, tending to civil war, and denounced as "the bloody bill" -"the force bill," &c. Mr. Wilkins of Pennsylvania, the reporter of the bill, vindicated it from this injurious character, showed that it was made out of previous laws, and contained nothing novel but the harmless contingent authority to remove the office of the customs from one building to another in the case of need. IIe

"The Judiciary Committee, in framing it, had been particularly anxious not to introduce any novel principle—any which could not be found on the statute book. The only novel one which the bill presented was one of a very simple nature. It was that which authorized the President, under the particular circumstances which were specified in the bill, to remove the customhouse. This was the only novel principle, and care was taken that in providing for such removal no authority was given to use force.

"The committee were apprehensive that some collision might take place after the 1st of February, either between the conflicting parties of the citizens of South Carolina, or between the officers of the federal government and the citizens. And to remove, as far as possible, all chance of such collision, provision was made that the collector might, at the moment of imminent danger, remove the custom-house to a place of security; or, to use a plain phrase, put it out of harm's way. He admitted the importance of this bill; but he viewed its importance as arising not out of the provisions of the bill itself, but out of the state of affairs in South Carolina, to which the bill had reference. la this view, it was of paramount importance.

"It had become necessary to legislate on this subject; whether it was necessary to pass the bill or not, he would not say; but legislation, in reference of Februar must be do adopt e vent those foresee as which Sourcessume.

But if we go a hair's breadth towards enforcing that system, they present secession. We have secession on one hand, and nullification on the other. The senator from South Carolina admitted the other day that no such thing as constitutional secession could exist. Then civil war, disunion, and anarchy must accompany secession. No one denies the right of revolution. That is a natural, indefeasible, inherent right—a right which we have exercised and held ont, by our example, to the civilized world. Who denies it? Then we have revolution by force, not constitutional secession. That violence must come by secession is certain. Another law passed by the legislature of South Carolina, is entitled a bill to provide for the safety of the people of South Carolina. It advises them to put on their armor. It puts them in military array; and those of the feudal system, so far as they apply to the citizens of Carolina. But with its operations on their own citizens he had nothing to do. Resistance was just as inevitable as the arrival of the day on the calendar. In addition to these documents, what did rumor say-rumor, which often falsifies, but sometimes utters truth. If we judge by newspaper and other reports, more men were now ready to take up arms in Carolina, than there were during the revolutionary struggle. The whole State was at this moment in arms, and its citizens are ready to be embattled the moment any attempt was made to enforce the revenue laws. The city of Charleston wore the appearance of a military depot.".

The Bill was opposed with a vehemence rarely witnessed, and every effort made to render it odious to the people, and even to extend the odium to the President, and to all persons instrumental in bringing it forward, or urging it through. Mr. Tyler of Virginia, was one of its warmest opposers, and in the course of an elaborate speech, said:

"In the course of the examination I have made into this subject, I have been led to analyze certain doctrines which have gone out to the reference to South Carolina, previous to the 1st of the Executive; but whenever he had done any act in violation of the constitutional rights of the citizen, or trenching on the rights of the Senate, I have been found in opposition to him. When he appointed corps of editors to office, I thought it was my duty to oppose his course. When he appointed a minister to a foreign court without the sanction of the law, I also went against him, because, on my conscience, I believed that the act was wrong. Such was my course, acting, as I did, under a sense of the duty I owed to my constituents; and I will now cay, I care not how loudly the trumpet may be sounded, nor how low the priests may bend their knees before the object of their idolatry, I will be at the side of the President, crying in his ear, 'Remember, Philip, thou art mortal!'

"I object to the first section, because it confers on the President the power of closing old ports of entry and establishing new ones. It has been rightly said by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Bibb] that this was a prominent cause which led to the Revolution. The Boston port bill, which removed the custom-house from Boston to Salem, first roused the people to resistance. To guard against this very abuse, the constitution had confided to Congress the power to regulate commerce; the establishment of ports of entry formed a material part of this for what purpose but for the use of force? The power, and one which required legislative enact-provisions of these laws are infinitely worse than those of the feudal system, so far as they apply its legislative powers. If it may one, it may all; and thus, a majority here can, at their pleasure, change the very character of the government. The President might come to be invested with authority to make all laws which his discretion might dictate. It is vain to tell me (said Mr. T.) that I imagine a case which will never exist. I tell you, sir, that power is cumulative, and that patronage begets power. The reasoning is unanswerable. If you can part with your power in one instance, you may in another and another. You may confer upon the President the right to declare war; and this very provision may fairly be considered as investing him with authority to make war at his mere will and pleasure on cities, towns, and villages. The prosperity of a city depends on the position of its custom-house and port of entry. Take the case of Norfolk, Richmond, and Fredericksburg, in my own State; who doubts but that to remove the custom-house from Norfolk to Old Point Comfort, of Richmond to the mouth of Chickahominy, or of Fredericksburg to Tappahannock or Urbanna, would utterly annihilate those towns? I have no tongue to express my sense of the probable injustice of the measure. Sir, it involves the innocent with the guilty. Take the case of Charleston; what if ninety-nine merchants were ready and willing to comply with your revenue world over the signature of the President. I laws, and that but one man could be found to know that my language may be seized on by resist them; would you run the hazard of those who are disposed to carp at my course destroying the ninety-nine in order to punish and to misrepresent me. Since I have held a one? Trade is a delicate subject to touch; place on this floor. I have not courted the smiles once divert it out of its regular channels, and

This measure may involve the actua property of every man, woman, and child in that city; and this, too, when you have a redundancy of millions in your treasury, and when no interest can sustain injury by awaiting the actual occurrence of a case of resistance to your laws, before you would have an opportunity to legislate.

"He is further empowered to employ the land and naval forces, to put down all 'aiders and abettors.' How far will this authority extend? Suppose the legislature of South Carolina should happen to be in session: I will not blink the question, suppose the legislature to be in session at the time of any disturbance, passing laws in furtherance of the ordinance which has been adopted by the convention of that State; might they not be considered by the President as aiders and abettors? The President might not, perhaps, march at the head of his troops, with a flourish of drums and trumpets, and with bayonets fixed, into the state-house yard, at Columbia; but, if he did so, he would find a precedent for it in English history.

"There was no ambiguity about this measure. The prophecy had already gone forth; the President has said that the laws will be obstructed. The President had not only foretold the coming difficulties, but he has also assembled an army. The city of Charleston, if report spoke true, was now a beleagured city; the cannon of Fort Pinckney are pointing at it; and although they are now quietly sleeping, they are ready to open their thunders whenever the voice of authority shall give the command. And shall these terrors be let loose because some one man may refuse to pay some small modicum of revenue, which Congress, the day after it came into the treasury, might vote in satisfaction of some unfounded claim? Shall we set so small a value upon the lives of the people? Let us at least wait to see the course of measures. We can never be too tardy in commencing the work of blood.

"If the majority shall pass this bill, they must do it on their own responsibility; I will have no part in it. When gentlemen recount the blessings of union; when they dwell upon the past, and sketch out, in bright perspective. the future, they awaken in my breast all the pride of an American; my pulse beats responsive to theirs, and I regard union, next to freedom, as the greatest of blessings. Yes, sir, 'the federal Union must be preserved.' But how? Will you seek to preserve it by force? Will you appease the angry spirit of discord by an oblation of blood? Suppose that the proud and haughty spirit of South Carolina shall not bend to your high edicts in token of fealty; that you make war upon her, hang her Governor, her legislators, and judges, as traitors, and reduce her to the condition of a conquered province— have you preserved the Union? This Union consists of twenty-four States; would you have preserved the Union by striking out one of the States—one of the old thirteen? Gentlemen another Jersey prison-ship; let him state, then,

When the light of one of these stars shall have been extinguished, will the flag wave over us, under which our fathers fought ? If we are to go on striking out star after star. what will finally remain but a central and a burning sun, blighting and destroying every germ of liberty? The flag which I wish to wave over me, is that which floated in triumph at Saratoga and Yorktown. It bore upon it thirteen States, of which South Carolina was one. Sir, there is a great difference between preserving Union and preserving government; the Union may be annihilated, yet government preserved; but, under such a government, no man ought to desire to live."

> Mr. Webster, one of the committee which reported the bill, justly rebuked all this vitupera. tion, and justified the bill, both for the equity of its provisions, and the necessity for enacting them. He said:

"The President, charged by the constitution with the duty of executing the laws, has sent us a message, alleging that powerful combinations are forming to resist their execution; that the existing laws are not sufficient to meet the crisis; and recommending sundry enactments as necessary for the occasion. The message being referred to the Judiciary Committee, that committee has reported a bill in compliance with the President's recommendation. It has not gone beyond the message. Every thing in the bill, every single provision, which is now complained of, is in the message. Yet the whole war is raised against the bill, and against the committee, as if the committee had originated the whole matter. Gentlemen get up and address us, as if they were arguing against some measure of a factious opposition. They look the same way, sir, and speak with the same vehemence, as they used to do when they raised their patriotic voices against what they called a coalition.

"Now, sir, let it be known, once for all, that this is an administration measure; that it is the President's own measure; and I pray gentlemen to have the goodness, if they call it hard names, and talk loudly against its friends, not to overlook its source. Let them attack it if they choose to attack it, in its origin.

"Let it be known, also, that a majority of the committee reporting the bill are friends and supporters of the administration; and that it is maintained in this house by those who are among his steadfast friends, of long standing.

"It is, sir, as I have already said, the President's own measure. Let those who oppose it, oppose it as such. Let them fairly acknowledge its origin, and meet it accordingly.

principles of the alien and sedition laws, "The honorable member from Virginia [Mr. Tyler], finds out a resemblance between this bill and the Boston port bill. Sir, if one of these be imitated from the other, the imitation is the President's. The bill makes the President, he says, sole judge of the constitution. Does he mean to say that the President has recommended a measure which is to make him sole judge of the constitution? The bill, he declares, sacrifices every thing to arbitrary power he will lend no aid to its passage-he would rather 'be a dog, and bay the moon, than such a Roman.' He did not say 'the old Roman.' Yet the gentleman well knows, that if any thing is sacrificed to arbitrary power, the sacrifice has been demanded by the 'old Roman,' as he and others have called him; by the President whom he has supported, so often and so ably, for the chief magistracy of the country. He savs, too, that one of the sections is an English Botany Bay law, except that it is much worse. This section, sir, whatever it may be, is just what the President's message recommended. Similar observations are applicable to the remarks of both the honorable gentlemen from North Carolina. It is not necessary to particularize those remarks. They were in the same

"Therefore, sir, let it be understood, let it be known, that the war which these gentlemen choose to wage, is waged against the measures of the administration, against the President of their own choice. The controversy has arisen between him and them, and, in its progress, they will probably come to a distinct understanding.

"Mr. President, I am not to be understood as admitting that these charges against the bill are just, or that they would be just if made against the message. On the contrary, I think them wholly unjust. No one of them, in my opinion, can be made good. I think the bill, or some similar measure, had become indispensable, and that the President could not do otherwise than to recommend it to the consideration of Congress. He was not at liberty to look on and be silent, while dangers threatened the Union, which existing laws were not competent, in his judgment, to avert.

"Mr. President, I take this occasion to say, that I support this measure, as an independent member of the Senate, in the discharge of the dictates of my own conscience. I am no man s leader; and, on the other hand. I follow no lead, but that of public duty, and the star of the constitution. I believe the country is in considerable danger; I believe an unlawful combination threatens the integrity of the Union. I believe the crisis calls for a mild, temperate, forbearing, but inflexibly firm execution of the laws. And, under this conviction, I give a hearty support to the administration, in all measures which I deem to be fair, just, and necessary. And in supporting these measures, I mean to take my fair share of responsibility, to support them frankly and fairly, without reflections on the past, and without mixing other topics in their discussion.

"Mr. President, I think I understand the sentiment of the country on this subject. think public opinion sets with an irresistible force in favor of the Union, in favor of the measures recommended by the President, and against the new doctrines which threaten the dissolution of the Union. I think the people of the United States demand of us, who are intrusted with the government, to maintain that government; to be just, and fear not; to make all and suitable provisions for the execution of the laws, and to sustain the Union and the constitution against whatsoever may endanger them. For one, I obey this public voice; I comply with this demand of the people. I support the administration in measures which I believe to be necessary; and, while pursuing this course, I look unhesitatingly, and with the utmost confidence, for the approbation of the

The support which Mr. Webster gave to all the President's measures in relation to South Carolina, and his exposure of the doctrine of nullification, being the first to detect and denounce that heresy, made him extremely obnoxious to Mr. Calhoun, and his friends; and must have been the main cause of his exclusion from the confidence of Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun in the concoction of their bill, called a compromise. His motives as well as his actions were attacked, and he was accused of subserviency to the President for the sake of future favor. At the same time all the support which he gave to these measures was the regular result of the principles which he laid down in his first speeches against nullification in the debate with Mr. Hayne, and he could not have done less without being derelict to his own principles then avowed. It was a proud era in his life, supporting with transcendent ability the cause of the constitution and of the country, in the person of a chief magistrate to whom he was politically opposed bursting the bonds of party at the call of duty, and displaying a patriotism worthy of admiration and imitation. General Jackson felt the debt of gratitude and admiration which he owed him; the country, without distinction of party, felt the same; and the universality of the feeling was one of the grateful instances of popular applause and justice when great talents are seen exerting themselves for the good of the country. He was the colossal figure on the political stage during that eventful time; and his labors, splendid in their day, survive for the benefit of distant posterity.

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

MR. CALHOUN'S NULLIFICATION RESOLUTIONS.

SIMULTANEOUSLY with the commencement of the discussions on the South Carolina proceedings, was the introduction in the Senate of a set of resolutions by Mr. Calhoun, entitled by him, "Resolutions on the powers of the government;" but all involving the doctrine of nullification; and the debate upon them de iving its point and character from the discussion of that doctrine. The following were the resolutions:

"Resolved, That the people of the several States composing these United States are united as parties to a constitutional compact, to which the people of each State acceded as a separate sovereign community, each binding itself by its own particular ratification; and that the Union, of which the said compact is the bond, is a union between the States ratifying the same.

"Resolved, That the people of the several States, thus united by the constitutional compact, in forming that instrument, and in creating a general government to carry into effect the objects for which they were formed, delegated to that government, for that purpose, certain definite powers, to be exercised jointly, reserving at the same time, each State to itself, the residuary mass of powers, to be exercised by its own separate government; and that whenever the general government assumes the exercise of powers not delegated by the compact, its acts are unauthorized, and are of no effect; and that the same government is not made the final judge of the powers delegated to it, since that would make its discretion, and not the constitution, the measure of its powers; but that, as in all other cases of compact among sovereign parties, without any common judge, each has an equal right to judge for itself, as well as of the infraction as of the mode and measure of redress.

"Resolved, That the assertions that the people of these United States, taken collectively as individuals, are now, or ever have been, united on the principle of the social compact, and as such are now formed into one nation or people, or that they have ever been so united in any one stage of their political existence; that the people of the several States composing the Union have not, as members thereof, retained their sovereign. ty; that the allegiance of their citizens has been transferred to the general government; that they have parted with the right of punishing treason through their respective State governments; and that they have not the right of judg. ing in the last resort as to the extent of the powers reserved, and, of consequence, of those delegated; are not only without foundation in truth, but are contrary to the most certain and plain historical facts, and the clearest deductions of reason; and that all exercise of power on the part of the general governm. t, or any of its departments, claiming authority from so erroneous assumptions, must of necessity be unconstitutional, must tend directly and inevitably to subvert the sovereignty of the States, to destroy the federal character of the Union, and to rear on its ruins a consolidated government, without constitutional check or limitation, and which must necessarily terminate in the loss of liberty

To which Mr. Grundy offered a counter set, as follows:

"I. Resolved, That by the constitution of the United States, certain powers are delegated to the general government, and those not delegated, or prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

to the States respectively, or to the people.

"2. Resolved, That one of the powers expressly granted by the constitution to the general government, and prohibited to the States, is that of laying duties on imports.

"3. Resolved, That the power to lay imposts is by the constitution wholly transferred from the State authorities to the general government, without any reservation of power or right on the part of the State.

"4. Resolved, That the tariff laws of 1828 and 1832 are exercises of the constitutional power possessed by the Congress of the United States, whatever various opinions may exist as to their policy and justice.

"5. Resolved, That an attempt on the part of a State to annul an act of Congress passed upon any subject exclusively confided by the constitution to Congress, is an encroachment on the rights of the general government.

"6. Resolved, That attempts to obstruct or prevent the execution of 'e several acts of Congress imposing duties on imports, whether by ordinances of conventions or legislative enaciments, are not warranted by the constitution, and are dangerous to the political institutions of the country."

and the kindred subjects of the "force bill" and the "revenue collection bill," that Mr. Calhoun first publicly revealed the source from which he obtained the seminal idea of nullification as a remedy in a government. The Virginia resolations of '98-'99, were the assumed source of the power itself as applicable to our federal and State governments; but the essential idea of nul-Effection as a peaceful and lawful mode of arresting a measure of the general government by the action of one of the States, was derived from the nto power of the tribunes of the people in the Roman government. I had often heard him talk of that tribunitian power, and celebrate it as the perfection of good government-as being for the benefit of the weaker part, and operating negafively to prevent oppression, and not positively to do injustice-but I never saw him carry that idea into a public speech but once, and that was on the discussion of his resolutions of this session; for though actually delivered while the "force bill" was before the Senate, yet all his doctrinal argument on that bill was the amplification of his nullification resolutions. On that occasion he traced the Roman tribunitian power, and considered it a cure for all the disorders to which the Roman state had been subject, and the cause to which all her subsequent greatness was to be attributed. This remarkable speech was delivered February 15th, 1833, and after depicting a government of the majority-a majority unchecked by a right in the minority of staying their measures-to be unmitigated despotism, he then proceeded to argue in favor of the excellence of the reto and the secession power; and thus delivered himself:

"He might appeal to history for the truth of these remarks, of which the Roman furnished the most familiar and striking. It was a wellknown fact, that, from the expulsion of the Tarquins, to the time of the establishment of the triounitian power, the government fell into a state of the greatest disorder and distraction, and, he might add, corruption. How did this happen? The explanation will throw important light on the subject under consideration. The community was divided into two parts, the patricians and the plebeians, with the powers of the state principally in the hands of the former, without adequate check to protect the rights of the latter. The result was as might be expected. The patricians converted the powers of the government into the means of making money, to enrich themselves and their dependants. They,

and condition of the country. This requires explanation. At that period, according to the laws of nations, when one nation conquered another, the lands of the vanquished belonged to the victors; and, according to the Roman law the lands thus acquired were divided into parts, one allotted to the poorer class of the people, and the other assigned to the use of the treasury, of which the patricians had the distribution and administration. The patricians abused their power, by withholding from the people that which ought to have been allotted to t'um, and by converting to their own use that which ought to have gone to the treasury. In a word, they took to themselves the entire spoils of victory, and they had thus the most powerful motive to keep the state perpetually involved in war, to the utter impoverishment and oppression of the people. After resisting the abuse of power, by all peaceable means, and the oppression becoming intolerable, the people at last withdrew from the city; they, in a word, seceded; and, to induce them to reunite, the patricians conceded to the plebeians, as the means of protecting their separate interesta the very power which he contended is necessary to protect the rights of the States, but which is now represented as necessarily leading to disunion. They granted to the people the right of choosing three tribunes from among themselves, whose persons should be sacred, and who should have the right of interposing their veto, not only against the passage of laws, but even against their execution; a power which those who take a shallow insight into human nature would pronounce inconsistent with the strength and unity of the state, if not utterly impracticable. Yet, so far from that being the effect, from that day the genius of Rome became ascendant, and victory followed her steps till she had established an almost universal dominion.

"How can a result so contrary to all anticipation be explained? The explanation appeared to him to be simple. No measure or movement could be adopted without the concurring consent of both the patricians and plebeians, and each thus became dependent on the other. and, of consequence, the desire and objects of neither could be effected without the concurrence of the other. To obtain this concurrence, each was compelled to consult the good will of the other, and to elevate to office not simply those who might have the confidence of the order to which he belonged, but also that of the other. The result was, that men possessing those qualities which would naturally command confidence, moderation, wisdom, justice, and patriotism, were elevated to office; and these, by the weight of their authority and the prudence of their counsel, together with that spirit of unanimity necessarily resulting from the con-curring assent of the two orders, furnishes the real explanation of the power of the Roman in a word, had their American system, growing state, and of that extraordinary wisdom, modeout of the peculiar character of the government ration, and firmness, which in so remarkable a degree characterized her public men. He might illustrate the truth of the position which he had laid down, by a reference to the history of all free states, ancient and modern, distinguished for their power and patriotism; and conclusively show not only that there was not one which had not some contrivance, under some form, by which the concurring assent of the different portions of the community was made necessary in the action of government, but also that the virtue, patriotism, and strength of the state were in direct proportion to the strength of the means of securing such assent. In estimating the operation of this principle in our system, which depends as he had stated, on the right of interposition on the part of the State, we must not omit to take into consideration the amending power, by which new powers may be granted, or any derangement of the system be corrected, by the concurring assent of threefourths of the States; and thus, in the same degree, strengthening the power of repairing any derangement occasioned by the executive action of a State. In fact, the power of interposition, fairly understood, may be considered in the light of an appeal against the usurpations of the general government, the joint agent of all the States, to the States themselves, to be deeided, under the amending power, affirmatively, in favor of the government, by the voice of three-fourths of the States, as the highest power known under the system.

"Mr. C. said that he knew the difficulty, in our country, of establishing the truth of the principle for which he contended, though resting upon the clearest reason, and tested by the universal experience of free nations. He knew that the governments of the several States would be cited as an argument against the conclusion to which he had arrived, and which, for the most part, were constructed on the principle of the absolute majority; but, in his opinion, a satisfactory answer could be given; that the objects of expenditure which fell within the sphere of a State government were few and inconsiderable; so that, be their action ever so irregular, it could occasion but little derangement. If, instead of being members of this great confederacy, they formed distinct communities, and were compelled to raise armies, and incur other expenses necessary for their defence, the laws which he had laid down as necessarily controlling the action of a State, where the will of an absolute and unchecked majority prevailed, would speedily disclose themselves in faction, anarchy, and corruption. Even as the case is, the operation of the causes to which he had referred were perceptible in some of the larger and more populous members of the Union, whose governments had a powerful central action, and which already showed a strong tendency to that moneyed action which is the invariable forerunner of corruption and convulsions.

"But to return to the general government; we have now sufficient experience to ascertain that the tendency to conflict in this action is between Southern and other sections. The latter, having a decided majority, must habitually be possessed of the powers of the government, both in this and in the other House; and, being governed by that instinctive love of power so natural to the human breast, they must become the advocates of the power of government, and in the same degree opposed to the limitations; while the other and weaker section is as necessarrly thrown on the thie of the limitations. In one word, the one section is the natural guardian of the delegated powers, and the other of the reserved; and the struggle on the side of the former will be to enlarge the powers, while that on the opposite side will be to restrain them within their constitutional limits. The contest will, in fact, be a contest between power and liberty, and such he considered the present; a contest in which the weaker section, with its peculiar labor, productions, and situation, has at stake all can be dear to freemen. Should they be able to maintain in their full vigor their reserved rights, liberty and prosperity will be their portion; but if they yield, and permit the stronger interest to consolidate within itself all the powers of the government, then will its fate be more wretched than that of the aborigines whom they have expelled, or of their slaves. In this great struggle between the delegated and reserved powers, so far from repining that his lot and that of those whom he represented is cast on the side of the latter, he rejoiced that such is the fact; for though we participate in but few of the advantages of the government, we are compensated, and more than compensated, in not being so much exposed to its corruption. Nor did he repine that the duty, so difficult to be discharged, as the defence of the reserved powers against, apparently, such fearful odds, had been assigned to them. To discharge successfully this high duty requires the highest qualities, moral and intellectual; and, should you perform it with a zeal and ability in proportion to its magnitude, instead of being mere planters, our section will become distinguished for its patriots and statesmen. But, on the other hand, if we prove unworthy of this high destiny, if we yield to the steady encroachment of power, the severest and most debasing calamity and corruption will overspread the land. Every Southern man, true to the interests of his section, and faithful to the duties which Providence has allotted him, will be for ever excluded from the honors and emoluments of this government, which will be reserved for those only who have qualified themselves, by political prostitution, for admission into the Magdalen Asylum."

In this extract from that remarkable speech, the first one in which Mr. Calhoun defended nullification and secession in the Senate, and in which every word bears the impress of intense thought, there is distinctly to be seen his opin-

"Among the few exceptions in the Asiatic nations, the government of the twelve tribes of Israel, in its early period, was the most striking. Their government, at first, was a mere confederation, without any central power, till a military chieftain, with the title of king, was placed at its head, without, however, merging the original organization of the twelve distinct tribes. This was the commencement of that central action among that peculiar people, which, in three generations, terminated in a permanent division of their tribes. It is impossible even for a careless reader to peruse the history of that event without being forcibly struck with the analogy in the causes which led to their separation, and those which now threaten us with a similar calamity. With the establishment of the central power in the king commenced a system of taxation, which, under king Solomon, was greatly increased, to defray the expense of rearing the temple, of enlarging and embellishing Jerusalem, the scat of the central government, and the other profuse expenditures of his magnificent reign. Increased taxation was followed by its natural consequences-discontent and complaint, which before his death began to excite resistance. On the succession of his son, Rehoboam, the ten tribes, headed by Jeroboam, demanded a reduction of the taxes; the temple being finished, and the embellishment of Jerusalem completed, and the money which had been raised for that purpose being no longer required, or, in other words, the debt being paid, they demanded a reduction of the duties—a repeal of the tariff. The demand was taken under consideration, and, after consulting the old men (the counsellors of opinion of the younger politicians, who had since grown up, and knew not the doctrines of their fathers. He hearkened unto their counsel, and refused to make the reduction; and the secession of the ten tribes, under Jeroboam, followed. The tribes of Judah and Benjamin, which had received the disbursements, alone remained to the house of David."

This example also had a practical application, and a squint at the Virginia resolutions of '98-'99, and at the military chieftain then at the head of our government, with a broad intimation of what was to happen if the taxes were not reduced; and that happened to be secession. And all this, and the elaborate speech from which it is taken, and many others of the same character at the same time, was delivered at a time when the elections had decided for a reduction of the taxes-when a bill in the House was under consideration for that purpose-and when his own "compromise" bill was in a state of concection, and advanced to a stage to assure its final passing. Strong must have been Mr. Calhoun's desire for his favorite remedy, when he could contend for it under such circumstances-under circumstances which showed that it could not be wanted for the purpose which he then avowed. Satisfied of the excellence, and even necessity in our system, of this remedy, the next question was to create it, or to find it; create it, by an amendment to the constitution; or find it already existing there; and this latter was done by a new reading of the famous Virginia resolutions of '98-'99. The right in any State to arrest an act of Congress, and to stay it until three fourths of the States ordered it to proceed, and with a right forcibly to resist if any attempt was made in the mean time to enforce it, with the correlative right of secession and permanent separation, were all found by him in these resolutions-the third especially, which was read, and commented upon for the purpose. Mr. Rives, of Virginia, repulsed that interpretation of the act of his State, and showed that an appeal to public opinion was all that was intended; and quoted the message of Governor Monroe to show that the judgment of the federal court, under one of the acts declared to be unconstitutional, was carried into effect in the capital of Virginia with the order and tranquillity of any other judgment. He said:

been so frequently referred to, in the course of this debate, as an example to justify the present proceedings of South Carolina, that I may be excused for saying something of them. What, then, was the conduct of Virginia, in the memorable era of '98 and '99 ? She solemnly protested against the alien and sedition acts, as 'palpable and alarming infractions of the constitution;' she communicated that protest to the other States of the Union, and earnestly appealed to them to unite with her in a like declaration, that this deliberate and solemn expression of the opinion of the States, as parties to the constitutional compact, should have its proper effect on the councils of the nation, in procuring a revision and repeal of the obnoxious acts. This was 'the head and front of her offending'-no more. The whole object of the proceedings was, by the peaceful force of public opinion, embodied through the organ of the State legislatures, to obtain a repeal of the laws in question, not to oppose or arrest their execution, while they remained unrepealed. That this was the true spirit and real purpose of the proceeding, is abundantly manifested by the whole of the able debate which took place in the legislature of the State, on the occasion. All the speakers, who advocated the resolutions which were finally adopted, distinctly placed them on that legiti-mate, constitutional ground. I need only refer to the emphatic declaration of John Taylor, of Caroline, the distinguished mover and able champion of the resolutions. He said 'the appeal was to public opinion; if that is against us, we must yield.' The same sentiment was avowed and maintained by every friend of the resolutions, throughout the debate.

"But, sir, the real intentions and policy of Virginia were proved, not by declarations and speeches merely, but by facts. If there ever was a law odious to a whole people, by its daring violation of the fundamental guaranties of public liberty, the freedom of speech and freedom of the press, it was the sedition law to the people of Virginia. Yet, amid all this indignant dissatisfaction, after the solemn protest of the legislature, in '98, and the renewal of that protest, in '99, this most odious and arbitrary law was peaceably carried into execution, in the capital of the State, by the prosecution and punishment of Callender, who was fined and imprisoned for daring to canvass the conduct of our public men (as Lyon and Cooper had been elsewhere), and was still actually imprisoned, when the legislature assembled, in December, 1800. Notwithstanding the excited sensibility of the public mind, no popular turnult, no legis-lative interference, disturbed, in any manner, the full and peaceable execution of the law. The Senate will excuse me, I trust, for calling their attention to a most forcible commentary on the true character of the Virginia proceedings of '98 and '99 (as illustrated in this transaction), which was contained in the official communication of legislature, at its assembling, in December, 1800. After referring to the distribution which had been ordered to be made among the people, of Mr. Madison's celebrated report, of '99, he says 'In connection with this subject, it is proper to add, that, since your last session, the sedition law, one of the acts complained of, has been carried into effect, in this commonwealth, by the decision of a federal court. I notice this event. not with a view of censuring or criticising it. The transaction has gone to the world, and the impartial will judge of it as it deserves. I notice it for the purpose of remarking that the decision was executed with the same order and tranquil submission, on the part of the people, as could have been shown by them, on a similar occasion, to any the most necessary, constitutional, and popular acts of the government."

Mr. Webster, in denying the derivation of nullification and secession from the constitution. said:

"The constitution does not provide for events which must be preceded by its own destruction. Secession, therefore, since it must bring these consequences with it, is revolutionary. And nullification is equally revolutionary. What is revolution? Why, sir, that is revolution which overturns, or controls, or successfully resists the existing public authority; that which arrests the exercise of the supreme power; that which introduces a new paramount authority into the rule of the state. Now, sir, this is the precise object of nullification. It attempts to supersede the supreme legislative authority. It arrests the arm of the Executive Magistrate. It interrupts the exercise of the accustomed judicial power. Under the name of an ordinance, it declares null and void, within the State, all the revenue laws of the United States. Is not this revolutionary? Sir, so soon as this ordinance shall be carried into effect, a revolution will have commenced in South Carolina. She will have thrown off the authority to which her citizens have, heretofore, been subject. She will have declared her own opinions and her own will to be above the laws, and above the power of those who are intrusted with their administration. If she makes good these declarations, she is revolutionized. As to her, it is as distinctly a change of the supreme power as the American Revolution, of 1776. That revolution did not subvert government, in all its forms. It did not subvert local laws and municipal administrations. It only threw off the dominion of a power claiming to be superior, and to have a right, in many important respects, to exercise legislative authority. Thinking this authority to have been usurped or abused, the American colonies, now the United States, bade it defiance, and freed themselves from it, by means of a revolution. But that revolution left them with their own municipal laws still, and the forms of local Mr. Monroe, then Governor of the State to the government. If Carolina now shall effectually

In other words, she will achieve, as to herself, a precisely the evil experienced under the old confederation, and for remedy of which this

The speaker then proceeded to show what nullification was, as reduced to practice in the ordinance, and other proceedings of South Carolina; and said:

"But, sir, while practical nullification in South Carolina would be, as to herself, actual and distinct revolution, its necessary tendency must also be to spread revolution, and to break up the constitution, as to all the other States. If strikes a deadty blow at the vital principle of the whole Union. To allow State resistance to the laws of Congress to be rightful and proper, to admit nullification in some States, and yet not expect to see a dismemberment of the entire government, appears to me the wildest illusion and the most extravagant folly. The gentheman seems not conscious of the direction or the rapidity of his own course. The current of his opinions sweeps him along, he knows not whither. To begin with nullification, with the arowed intent, nevertheless, not to proceed to secession, dismemberment, and general revolution, is as if one were to take the plunge of Niagara, and cry out that he would stop halfway down. In the one case, as in the other, the rush adventurer must go to the bottom of the dark abyss below, were it not that that abyss has no discovered bottom.

"Nullification, if successful, arrests the power of the law, absolves citizens from their duty, subverts the foundation both of protection and obedience, dispenses with oaths and obligations of allegiance, and elevates another authority to supreme command. Is not this revolution? And it raises to supreme command four-andtwenty distinct powers, each professing to be under a general government, and yet each setting its laws at defiance at pleasure. Is not this anarchy, as well as revolution? Sir, the constitution of the United States was received as a whole, and for the whole country. If it cannot stand altogether, it cannot stand in parts; and, if the laws cannot be executed every where, they cannot long be executed any where. The gentleman very well knows that all duties and imposts must be uniform throughout the country. He knows that we cannot have one rule or one law for South Carolina, and another for other States. He must see, therefore, and does see-every man sees-that the only alternative is a repeal of the laws throughout the whole Union, or their execution in Carolina as well as elsewhere. And this repeal is demanded, because a single State intervery text of his doctrine, is, that no act of Congress can bind all the States, the constitutionality of which is not admitted by all; or, in other words, that no single State is bound, against its own dissent, by a law of imposts. This was precisely the evil experienced under the old confederation, and for remedy of which this constitution was adopted. The leading object in establishing this government, an object forced on the country by the condition of the times, and the absolute necessity of the law, was to give to Congress power to lay and collect imposts without the consent of particular States. The revolutionary debt remained unpaid; the national treasury was bankrupt; the country was destitute of credit; Congress issued its requisitions on the States, and the States neglected them; there was no power of coercion but war; Congress could not lay imposts, or other taxes, by its own authority; the whole general government, therefore, was little more than a name. The articles of confederation, as to purposes of revenue and finance, were nearly a dead letter. The country sought to escape from this condition, at once feeble and disgraceful, by constituting a government which should have power of itself to lay duties and taxes, and to pay the public debt, and provide for the general welfare; and to lay these duties and taxes in all the States, without asking the consent of the State governments. This was the very power on which the new constitution was to depend for all its ability to do good; and, without it, it can be no government, now or at any time. Yet, sir, it is precisely against this power, so absolutely indispensable to the very being of the government, that South Carolina directs her ordinance. She attacks the government in its authority to raise revenue, the very mainspring of the whole system; and, if she succeed, every movement of that system must inevitably cease. It is of no avail that she declares that she does not resist the law as a revenue law, but as a law for protecting manufactures. It is a revenue law; it is the very law by force of which the revenue is collected; if it be arrested in any State, the revenue ceases in that State; it is, in a word, the sole reliance of the government for the means of maintaining itself and performing its duties."

Mr. Webster condensed into four brief and pointed propositions his opinion of the nature of our federal government, as being a Union in contradistinction to a League, and as acting upon individuals in contradistinction to States, and as being, in these features discriminated from the old confederation.

6.2. That no State authority has power to dissolve these relations; that nothing can dissolve them but revolution; and that, consequently, there can be no such thing as secession without revolution.

"3. That there is a supreme law, consisting of the constitution of the United States, acts of Congress passed in pursuance of it, and treaties; and that, in cases not capable of assuming the character of a suit in law or equity, Congress must judge of, and finally interpret, this supreme law, so often as it has occasion to pass acts of legislation; and, in cases capable of assuming, and actually assuming, the character of a snit, the Supreme Court of the United States is the final interpreter.

"4. That an attempt by a State to abrogate, annul, or nullify an act of Congress, or to arrest its operation within her limits, on the ground that, in her opinion, such law is unconstitutional, is a direct usurpation on the just powers of the general government, and on the equal rights of other States; a plain violation of the constitution, and a proceeding essentially revolutionary in its character and tondency."

Mr. Webster concluded his speech, an elaborate and able one, in which he appeared in the high character of patriot still more than that of orator, in which he intimated that some other cause, besides the alleged one, must be at the bottom of this desire for secession. He was explicit that the world could hardly believe in such a reason, and that we ourselves who hear and see all that is said and done, could not believe it. He concluded thus:

"Sir, the world will scarcely believe that this whole controversy, and all the desperate measures which its support requires, have no other foundation than a difference of opinion, upon a provision of the constitution, between a majority of the people of South Carolina, on one side, and a vast majority of the whole people of the United States on the other. It will not credit the fact, it will not admit the possibility, that, in an enlightened age, in a free, popular republic, under a government where the people govern, as they must always govern, under such systems, by majorities, at a time of unprecedented happiness, without practical oppression, without evils, such as may not only be pretended, but felt and experienced; evils not slight or temporary, but deep, permanent, and intolera-ble; a single State should rush into conflict with all the rest, attempt to put down the power of the Union by her own laws, and to support those laws by her military power, and thus break up and destroy the world's last hope. And well the world may be incredulous. South) will, in fact, be a contest between power

We, who hear and see it, can ourselves hardly yet believe it. Even after all that had preceded it, this ordinance struck the country with amazement. It was incredible and inconceivable, that South Carolina should thus plunge headlong into resistance to the laws, on a matter of opinion, and on a question in which the preponderance of opinion, both of the present day and of all past time, was so overwhelming ly against her. The ordinance declares that Congress has exceeded its just power, by laying duties on imports, intended for the protection of manufactures. This is the opinion of South Carolina; and on the strength of that opinion she nullifles the laws. Yet has the rest of the country no right to its opinions also? Is one State to sit sole arbitress? She maintains that those laws are plain, deliberate, and palpable violations of the constitution; that she has a sovereign right to decide this matter; and, that, having so decided, she is authorized to resist their execution, by her own sovereign power; and she declares that she will resist it, though such resistance should shatter the Union into

Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, had been still more explicit, in the expression of the belief already given (in the extract from his speech contained in this work), that the discontent in South Carolina had a root deeper than that of the tariff; and General Jackson intimated the same thing in his message to the two Houses on the South Carolina proceedings, and in which he alluded to the ambitious and personal feelings which might be involved in them. Certainly it was absolutely incomprehensible that this doctrine of nullification and secession, prefigured in the Roman secession to the sacred mount, and the Jewish disruption of the twelve tribes, should be thus enforced, and impressed, for that cause of the tariff alone; when, to say nothing of the intention of the President, the Congress and the country to reduce it, Mr. Calhoun himself had provided for its reduction, satisfactorily to himself, in the act called a "compromise;" to which he was a full contracting party. It was impossible to believe in the soleness of that reason, in the presence of circumstances which annulled it: and Mr. Calhoun himself, in a part of his speech which had been quoted, seemed to reveal a glimpse of two others-slavery, about which there was at that time no agitation-and the presidency, to which patriotic Southern men could not be elected. The glimpse exhibited of the first of these causes, was in this sentence; " The contest (between the North and the

Here is a distinct declaration that there was then a contest between the two sections of the Union, and that that contest was between power and liberty, in which the freedom and the slave property of the South were at stake. This declaration at the time attracted but little attention, there being then no sign of a slavery agitation; but to close observers it was an ominous revelation of something to come, and an apparent laying an anchor to windward for a new agitation on a new subject, after the tariff was done with. The second intimation which he gave out, and which referred to the exclusion of the patriotic men of the South from the presidency was in this serience: " Every Southern man, true to the interests of his section, and faithful to the duties which Providence has allotted him, will be forever excluded from the honors and emoluments of this government, which will be reserved for those only who have qualified themselves, by political prostitution, for admission into the Magdalen asylum." This was bitter; and while revealing his own feelings at the prospect of his own failure for the presidency (which from the brightness of the noon-day sun was dimning down to the obscurity of dark night), was, at the same time, unjust, and contradicted by all history, previous and subsequent, of our national elections; and by his own history in connection with them. The North had supported Southern men for President-a long succession of them-and even twice concurred in dropping a Northern President at the end of a single term, and taking a Southern in his place He himself had had signal proofs of good will from the North in his two elections to the vice-presidency; in which he had been better supported in the North than ia the South, getting the whole party vote in the former while losing part of it in the latter. It was evident then, that the protective tariff was not the sole, or the main cause of the South Carolina discontent; that nullification and secession were to continue, though their ostensible cause ceased; that resistance was to continue on a new ground, upon the same principle, until a new and impossible point was attained. This

"He had said, that as far as this subject was concerned, he believed that peace and harmony would follow. But there is another connected with it, which had passed this House, and which had just been reported as having passed the other, which would prevent the return of quiet. He considered the measure to which he referred as a virtual repeal of the constitution; and, in fact. worse than a positive and direct repeal; as it would leave the majority without any shackles on its power, while the minority, hoping to shelter itself under its protection, and having still some respect left for the instrument, would be trammelled without being protected by its provisions. It would be idle to attempt to disguise that the bill will be a practical assertion of one theory of the constitution against another-the theory advocated by the supporters of the bill, that ours is a consolidated government, in which the States have no rights, and in which, in fact, they bear the same relation to the whole community as the counties do to the States; und against that view of the constitution which considers it as a compact formed by the States as separate communities, and binding between the States, and not between the individual citiz as. No man of candor, who admitted that our constitution is a compact, and was formed and is binding in the manner he had just stated, but must acknowledge that this bill utterly overthrows and prostrates the constitution; and that it leaves the government under the control of the will of an absolute majority.

"If the measure be acquiesced in, it will be the termination of that long controversy which began in the convention, and which has been continued under various fortunes until the present day. But it ought not-it will notcannot be acquiesced in-unless the South is dead to the sense of her liberty, and blind to those dangers which surround and menace them; she never will cease resistance until the act is erased from the statute book. To suppose that the entire power of the Union may be placed in the hands of this government, and that all the various interests in this widely extended country muy be safely placed under the will of an unchecked majority, is the extreme of folly and madness. The result would be inevitable, that power would be exclusively centered in the dominant interest north of this river, and that all the south of it would be held as subjected provinces, to be controlled for the exclusive benefit of the stronger section. Such a state of things could not endure; and the constitution and liberty of the country would fall in the contest, if permitted to continue.

new and impossible point was attained. This "He trusted that that would not be the case, was declared by Mr. Calhoun in his place, on the but that the advocates of liberty every where, as well in the North as in the South; that those who maintained the doctrines of '98, and the sovereignties of the States; that the republican party throughout the country would rally against this attempt to establish, by law, doctrines which must subvert the principles on which free institutions could be maintained."

Here was a new departure, upon a new point. as violent as the former complaint, looking to the same remedy, and unfounded and impossible. This force bill, which was a repeal of the constitution, in the eyes of Mr. Calhoun, was a mere revival of formerly existing statutes, and could have no operation, if resistance to the tariff laws ceased. Yet, nullification and secession were to proceed until it was erased from the statute book; and all the morbid views of the constitution, and of the Virginia resolutions of '98 and '99, were to hold their places in Mr. Calhoun's imagination, and dominate his conduct in all his political action, until this statute was erased. But it is due to many of his friends and followers, to say that, while concurring in his complaints against the federal government, and in his remedies, they dissented from his source of derivation of these remedies. He found them in the constitution, shown to be there by the '98-'99 Virginia resolutions; the manly sense of McDuffle, and some others, rejected that sophistry, and found their justification wholly in the revolutionary right of selfdefence from intolerable oppression.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

SECRET HISTORY OF THE "COMPROMISE" OF 1833.

Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Clay were early, and long, rival aspirants for the Presidency, and antagonistic leaders in opposite political systems; and the coalition between them in 1833 was only a hollow truce (embittered by the humiliations to which Mr. Calhoun was subjected in the protective features of the "compromise") and only kept alive for a few years by their mutual interest with respect to General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren. A rupture was foreseen by every observer; and in a few years it took place, and in open Senate, and in a way to give the key to the secret motives which led to that compromise.

It became a prestion between them which had the upper hand of the other-in their own language-which was master of the other-on that occasion. Mr. Calhoun declared that he had Mr. Clay down-had him on his back-was his master. Mr. Clay retorted: He my master! 1 would not own him for the meanest of my slaves. Of course, there were calls to order about that time; but the question of mastery, and the causes which produced the passage of the uct. were still points of contestation between them, and came up for altereation in other forms. Mr. Calhoun claimed a controling influence for the military attitude of South Carolina, and its intimidating effect upon the federal government. Mr. Clay ridiculed this idea of intimidation, and said the little boys that muster in the streets with their tiny wooden swords, had as well pretend to terrify the grand army of Bonaparte: and afterwards said he would tell how it happened, which was thus: His friend from Delaware (Mr. John M. Clayton), said to him one day-these South Carolinians act very badly, but they are good fellows, and it is a pity to let Jackson hang them. This was after Mr. Clay had brought in his bill, and while it lingered without the least apparent chance of passing-paralyzed by the vehement opposition of the manufacturers: and he urged Mr. Clay to take a new move with his bill-to get it referred to a committee-and by them got into a shape in which it could pass, Mr. Clay did so-had the reference made-and a committee appointed suitable for the measure -some of strong will, and earnest for the bill, and some of gentle temperament, inclined to easy measures on hard occasions. They were: Messrs. Clay, Calhoun, Clayton, Dallas, Grundy, Rives.

This was the movement, and the inducing cause on one side: now for the cause on the other. Mr. Letcher, a representative from Kentucky, was the first to conceive an idea of some compromise to release South Carolina from her position; and communicated it to Mr. Clay; who received it at first coolly and doubtfully. Afterwards, beginning to entertain the idea, he mentioned it to Mr. Webster, who repulsed it entirely, saying—"It would be yielding great principles to faction; and that the time had come to test the strength of the constitution and the government." After that he was no more consulted. Mr. Clay drew up his bill, and

He objected decidedly to parts of the bill; and said, if Mr. Clay knew his reasons, he certainly would yield the objectionable parts. Mr. Letcher undertook to arrange an interview;-which was effected-to take place in Mr. Clay's roota. The meeting was cold, distant and civil. Mr. Clay rose, bowed to his visitor, and asked him to take a seat. Mr. Letcher, to relieve the embarrassment, immediately opened the business of the interview: which ended without results. Mr. Clay remained inflexible, saying that if he gave up the parts of the bill objected to, it could not be passed; and that it would be better to give it up at once. In the mean time Mr. Letcher had seen the President, and sounded him on the subject of a compromise: the President answered, he would have no negotiation, and would execute the laws. This was told by Mr. Letcher to Mr. McDuffle, to go to Mr. Calhoun. Soon after, Mr. Letcher found himself required to make a direct communication to Mr. Calhoun. Mr. Josiah S. Johnson, senator from Louislana, came to his room in the night, after he had gone to bed-and informed him of what he had just learnt: -which was, that General Jackson would admit of no further delay, and was determined to take at once a decided course with Mr. Calhoun (an arrest and trial for high treason being understood). Mr. Johnson deemed it of the utmost moment that Mr. Calhoun should be instantly warned of his danger; and urged Mr. Letcher to go and apprise him. He went-found Mr. Calhoun in bed-was admitted to him-informed him. "He was evidently disturbed." Mr. Letcher and Mr. Clay were in constant communication with Mr. Clayton.

After the committee had been appointed, Mr. Clayton assembled the manufacturers, for without their consent nothing could be done; and is the meeting with them it was resolved to pass the bill, provided the Southern senators, including the nullifiers, should vote both for the amendments which should be proposed, and for the passage of the bill itself-the amendments being the same afterwards offered in the Senate by Mr. Clay, and especially the home valuation feature. When these amendments, thus agreed upon by the friends of the tariff, were proposed in the committee, they were voted down; and not carried back to the senate without alteration. But Mr. Clayton did not give up. Moved by a feeling of concern for those who were in peril, and for the state of the country, and for the safety of the protective system of which he was the decided advocate, he determined to have the same amendments, so agreed upon by the friends of the tariff and rejected by the committee, offered in the Senate; and, to help Mr. Clay wit: the manufacturers, he put them into his hands to be so offered-notifying Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Clay that unless the amendments were adopted, and that by the Southern vote, every nullitler inclusively, that the bill should not pass-that he himself would move to lay it on the table. His reasons for making the nullifleation vote a sine qua non both on the amendments and on the bill, and for them all, separately and collectively, was to cut them off from pleading their unconstitutionality after they were passed; and to make the authors of disturbanco and armed resistance, after resistance, parties upon the record to the measures, and every part of the measures, which were to pacify them. Unless these leaders were thus bound, he looked upon any pacification as a hollow truce, to be succeeded by some new disturbance in a short time; and therefore he was peremptory with both Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun, denouncing the sacrifice of the bill if his terms were not complied with; and letting them know that he had friends enough bound to his support. They wished to know the names of the senators who were to stand by him in this extreme coursewhich he refused to give; no doubt restrained by an injunction of secrecy, there being many men of gentle temperaments who are unwilling to commit themselves to a measure until they sec its issue, that the celat of success may consecrate what the gloom of defeat would damn. Being inexorable in his claims, Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun agreed to the amendments, and all voted for them, one by one, as Mr. Clay offered them, until it came to the last-that revolting measure of the home valuation. As soon as it was proposed, Mr. Calhoun and his friends met it with violent opposition, declaring it to be unconstitutional, and an insurmountable obstacle to their votes for the bill if put into it. It was then late in the day, and the last day but one of the session, and Mr. Clayton found himself being able to agree upon any thing, the bill was in the predicament which required the execution of his threat. He executed it, and moved to lay it on the table, with the declaration that it was to be there. Mr. Clay went to him and besough, but to withdraw the motion; but in vain. He remained inflexible; and the bill then appeared to be dead. In 'his extremity, the Calhoun wing retired to the colonnade behind the Vice-President's chair, and held a brief consultation among themselves: and presently Mr. Bibb, of Kentucky, came out, and went to Mr. Clayton and asked him to withdraw his motion to give him time to consider the amendment. Seeing this sign of yielding, Mr. Clayton withdrew his motion-to be renewed if the amendment was not voted for. A friend of the parties immediately moved an adjournment, which was carried; and that night's reflections brought them to the conclusion that the amendment must be passed; but still with the belief, that, there being enough to pass it without him, Mr. Calhoun should be spared the humiliation of appearing on the record in its favor. This was told to Mr. Clayton, who declared it to be impossible—that Mr. Calhoun's vote was indispensable, as nothing would be considered secured by the passage of the bill unless his vote appeared for every amendment separately, and for the whole bill collectively. When the Senate met, and the bill was taken up, it was still unknown what he would do; but his friends fell in, one after the other, yielding their objections upon different grounds, and giving their assent to this most flagrant instance (and that a new one), of that protective legislation, against which they were then raising troops in South Carolina! and limiting a day, and that a short one, on which she was to be, ipso facto, a seceder from the Union. Mr. Calhoun remained to the last, and only rose when the vote was ready to be taken. and prefaced a few remarks with the very notable declaration that he had then to "determine" which way he would vote. He then declared in favor of the amendment, but upon conditions which he desired the reporters to note; and which being futile in themselves, only showed the desperation of his condition, and the state of impossibility to which he was reduced. Several senators let him know immediately the futility of his conditions; and without saying more, he voted on ayes and noes for the amendment; and afterwards for the whole bill. And this concluding scene appears quite correctly originate, and which address themselves to the reported in the authentic debates. And thus the question of mastery in this famous "con. promise," mooted in the Senate by Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun as a problem between themselves. is shown by the inside view of this bit of history to belong to neither of them, but to Mr. John M. Clayton, under the instrumentality of Gen. Jackson, who, in the presidential election, had unhorsed Mr. Clay and all his systems; and in his determination to execute the laws upon Mr Calhoun, had left him without remedy, except in the resource of this "compromise." Upon the outside history of this measure which I have compiled, like a chronicler, from the documentary materials, Mr. Calhorn and Mr. Clay appear as master spirits, appeasing the storm which they had raised; on the inside view they appear as subaltern agents dominated by the necessities of their condition, and providing for themselves instead of their country-Mr. Clay, in saving the protective policy, and preserving the support of the manufacturers; and Mr. Calhoun, in saving himself from the perils of his condition: and both, in leaving themselves at liberty to act together in future against General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

COMPROMISE LEGISLATION; AND THE ACT, 80 CALLED, OF 1833.

This is a species of legislation which wears a misnomer-which has no foundation in the constitution-and which generally begets more mischief than it assumes to prevent; and which, nevertheless, is very popular-the name, though fictitious, being generally accepted for the reality. There are compromises in the constitution, founded upon what gives them validity, namely, mutual consent; and they are sacred. All compromises are agreements, made voluntarily by independent parties - not imposed by one upon another. They may be made by compact-not by votes. The majority cannot subject the minority to its will, except in the present decision -cannot bind future Congresses-cannot claim any sanctity for their acts beyond that which grows out of the circumstances in which they moral sense q f justice or 1 from the inh act of 1820, c one of the m this species tional contro it divided a ly, between States. moral sense of their successors, and to reasons of justice or policy which should exempt an act from the inherent fate of all legislation. The act of 1820, called the Missouri Compromise, is one of the most respectable and intelligible of this species of legislation. It composed a national controversy, and upon a consideration. It divided a great province, and about equally between slaveholding and non-slaveholding States. It admitted a State into the Union; and that State accepted that admission upon the condition of fidelity to that compromise. And being founded in the material operation of a line drawn upon the earth under an astronomical law, subject to no change and open to all observation, visible and tangible, it became an object susceptible of certainty, both in its breach and in its observance. That act is entitled to respect, especially from the party which imposed it upon the other; and has been respected; for it has remained inviolate for thirty yearsneither side attempting to break or abolish iteach having the advantage of it-and receiving all the while, like the first magna charta, many confirmations from successive Congresses, and from State legislatures.

The act of 1833, called a "compromise," was a breach of all the rules, and all the principles of legislation-concocted out of doors, managed by politicians dominated by an outside increst -kept a secret-passed by a majority pledged to its support, and pledged against any amendment except from its managers; -and issuing from the conjunction of rival politicians who had lately, and long, been in the most violent state of legislative as well as political antagonism. It comprised every title necessary to tamp a vicious and reprehensible act-bad in the matter-foul in the manner-full of abuseand carried through upon the terrors of some, the interests of others, the political calculations of many, and the dupery of more; and all upon a plea which was an outrage upor representative government-upon the actual government -and upon the people of the States. That plea was, that the elections (presidential and congressional), had decided the fate of the protective system-had condemned it-had sentenced it to death-and charged a new Congress with the execution of the sentence; and, therefore,

-and laid away for nine years and a half under the sanction of a, so called, compromise-intangible to the people-safe in its existence during all that time; and trusting to the chapter of accidents, and the skill of management, for its complete restoration at the end of the term This was an outrage upon popular representation-an estoppel upon the popular will-the arrest of a judgment which the people had given -the usurpation of the rights of ensuing Congresses. It was the conception of some rival politicians who had lately distracted the country by their contention, and now undertook to compose 't by their conjunction; and having failed in the game of agitation, threw it up for the game of pacification; and, in this new character, undertook to settle and regulate the affairs of their country for a term only half a year less than the duration of the siege of Troy; and long enough to cover two presidential elections. This was a bold pretension. Rome had existed above five hunth id years, and citizens had become masters of armies, and the people humbled to the cry of panem et circenses-bread and the circus-before two or three rivals could go together in a corner, and arrange the affairs of the republic for five years: now this was done among us for double that time, and in the fortyfourth year of our age, and by citizens neither of whom had headed, though one had raised, an army. And now how could this be effected, and in a country so vast and intelligent? I answer: The inside view which I have given of the transaction explains it. It was an operation upon the best, as well as upon the worst feelings of our nature-upon the patriotic alarms of many, the political calculations of others, the interested schemes of more, and the proclivity of multitudes to be deceived. Some political rivals finding tariff no longer available for political elevation, either in its attack or defence; and, from a ladder to climb on, become a stumbling-block to fall over, and a pit to fall into, agree to lay it aside for the term of two presidential elections; upon the pretext of quicting the country which they had been disturbing; but in reality to get the crippled hobby out of the way, and act in concert against an old foe in power, and a new adversary, lately supposed to have been killed off, but now appearing high that it should be taken out of the hands of that in the political firmament, and verging to its zenew Congress, withdrawn from it before it met | nith. That new adversary was Mr. Van Buren.

just elected Vice-President, and in the line of old precedents for the presidency; and the main object to be able to work against him, and for themselves, with preservation to the tariff, and extrication of Mr. Calhoun. The masses were nlarmed at the cry of civil war, concerted and spread for the purpose of alarm; and therefore ready to hail any scheme of deliverance from that calamity. The manufacturers saw their advantage in saving their high protecting duties from immediate reduction. The friends of Mr. Clay believed that the title of pacificator, which he was to earn, would win for him a return of the glory of the Missouri compromise. Mr. Calhoun's friends saw, for him, in any arrangement, a release from his untenable and perilous position. Members of gentle temperaments in both Houses, saw relief in middle courses, and felt safety in the very word "compromise," no matter how fictitious and fallacious. The friends of Mr. Van Buren saw his advantage at getting the tariff out of his way also; and General Jackson felt a positive relief in being spared the dire necessity of enforcing the laws by the sword and by criminal prosecutions. All these parties united to pass the act; and after it was passed, to praise it; and so it passed easily, and was ushered into life in the midst of thundering applause. Only a few of the well-known senators voted against it-Mr. Webster, Mr. Dickerson, General Samuel Smith, Mr. Benton.

My objections to this bill, and its mode of being passed, were deep and abiding, and went far beyond its own obnoxious provisions, and all the transient and temporary considerations connected with it. As a friend to popular representative government, I could not see, without insurmountable repugnance, two citizens set themselves up for a power in the State, and undertake to regulate, by their private agreement (to be invested with the forms of law), the public affairs for years to come. I admit no man to stand for a power in our country, and to assume to be able to save the Union. Its safety does not depend upon the bargains of any two men. Its safety is in its own constitution-in its laws-and in the affections of the people; and all that is wanted in public men is to administer the constitution in its integrity, and to enforce the laws without fear or affection. A compromise made with a State in arms, is a capitulation to that State; and in this light, Mr. and that against the laws of the United States;

Calhoun constantly presented the act of 1833 and if it had emanated from the government, he would have been right in his fact, and in his inductions; and all discontented States would have been justified, so far as successful precedent was concerned, in all future interpositions of its fiat to arrest the action of the federal government. But it did not emanate from the government. It (the government) was proceeding wisely, justly, constitutionally in settling with South Carolina, by removing the cause of her real grievance, and by enforcing the laws against their violators. It (the constituted government) was proceeding regularly in this way, with a prospect of a successful issue at the actual session, and a certainty of it at the next one, when the whole subject was taken out of its hands by an arrangement between a few members. The injury was great then, and of permanent evil example. It remitted the government to the condition of the old confederation, acting upon sovereignties instead of individuals. It violated the feature of our Union which discriminated it from all confederacies which ever existed, and which was wisely and patriotically put into the constitution to save it from the fate which had attended all confederacies, ancient and modern. All these previous confederacies in their general or collective capacity, acted upon communities. and met organized resistance as often as they decreed any thing disagreeable to one of its strong members. This opposition could only be subdued by force; and the application of force has always brought on civil war; which has ended in the destruction of the confederacy. The framers of our constitutional Union knew all this, and had seen the danger of it in history, and felt the danger of it in our confederation: and therefore established a Union instead of a LEAGUE-to be sovereign and independent within its sphere, acting upon persons through its own laws and courts, instead of acting on communities through persuasion or force. It was the crowning wisdom of the new constitution; and the effect of this compromise legislation, was to destroy that great feature of our Union-to bring the general and State governments into conflict -and to substitute a sovereign State for an offending individual as often as a State chose to make the cause of that individual her own. A State cannot commit treason, but a citizen can.

Our whole frame of government is unhinged when the federal government shifts from its foundation, and goes to acting upon States instead of indiriduals; and, therefore, the "compromise," as it was called, with South Carolina in 1833 was in violation of the great Union principle of our government-remitting it to the imbecility of the old confederation, giving inducement of the Vashville convention of the present year (1850); and which has only to be followed up to see the States of this Union, like those of the Mexican republic, issuing their pronunciamientos at every discontent; and bringing the general government to a fight, or a capitulation, as often as they please.

1 omit all consideration of the minor vices of the act-great and flagrant in themselves, but subordinate in comparison to the mischiefs done to the frame of our government. At any other time these vices of matter, and manner, would have been crushing to a bill. No bill containing a tithe of the vices, crowded into this one, could ever have got through Congress before. The overthrow of the old revenue principle, that duties were to be levied on luxuries, and not on necessaries-substitution of universal ad valorems to the exclusion of all specific duties-the substitution of the home for the foreign valuation -the abolition of all discrimination upon articles in the imposition of duties-the preposterous stipulation against protection, while giving protection, and even in new and unheard of forms; all these were flagrant vices of the bill, no one of which could ever have been carried through in a bill before; and which perished in this one before they arrived at their period of operation. The year 1842 was to have been the jubilee of all these inventions, and set them all off in their career of usefulness; but that year saw all these fine anticipations fail! saw the high protective policy re-established, more burthensome than ever: but of this hereafter. Then the vices in the passage of the bill, being a political, not a legislative action-dominated by an outside interest of manufacturers-and openly carried in the Senate by a douceur to some men, not in Kendal Green," but Kendal cotton. Yet it was received by the country as a deliverance, benefactors; and their work declared by legislatures to be sacred and inviolable, and every citizen doomed to political outlawry that did not give in his adhesion, and bind himself to the perpetuity of the act. I was one of those who refused this adhesion-who continued to speak of the act as I thought-and who, in a few years, saw it sink into neglect and oblivion-die without the solace of pity or sorrow-and go into the grave without mourners or witnesses, or a stone to mark the place of its interment.

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

VIRGINIA RESOLUTIONS OF '98-'99-DISABUSED OF THEIR SOUTH CAROLINA INTERPRETATION-1. UPON THEIR OWN WORDS-2, UPON CONTEM PORANEOUS INTERPRETATION.

THE debate in the Senate, in 1830, on Mr. Foot's resolutions, has been regarded as the dawn of those ideas which, three years later, under the name of "nullification," but with the character and bearing the seeds of disorganization and eivil war, agitated and endangered the Union. In that debate, Mr. Hayne, as heretofore stated, quoted the third clause of the Virginia resolutions of 1798, as the extent of the doctrines he intended to avow. Though Mr. Webster, at the time, gave a different and more portentous interpretation to Mr. Hayne's course of argument, I did not believe that Mr. Hayne purposed to use those resolutious to any other effect than that intended by their authors and adopters; and they, I well knew, never supposed any right in a State of the Union, of its own motion, to annul an act of Congress, or resist its operation. Soon after the discussion of 1830, however, nullification assumed its name, with a clear an unciation of its purpose, namely, to maintain an inherent right in a State to annul the acts of the federal government, and resist their operation, in any case in which the State might judge an act of Congress to exceed the limits of the constitution. And to support this disorganizing doctrine, tho resolutions of 1798, were boldly and perseveringly appealed to, and attempted to be wrested from their real intent. Ner is this effort yet abandoned; nor can we expect it to be whilst and the ostensible authors of it greeted as public | nullification still exists, either avowed or covert.

The illustrious authorship of the Resolutions of 1798; the character and reputation of the legisfators who adopted them; their general acceptance by the republican party, the influence they exercised, not only on questions of the day, but on the fate of parties, and in shaping the government itself, all combine to give them importance, and a high place in public esteem; and would go far to persuade the country that nullification was right, if they were nullification. In connection, therefore, with the period and events in which nullification had its rise, the necessity is imposed of an examination into the scope and objects of those resolutions; and the same reasons that have made, and make, the partisans of nullification so urgent to identify their fallacies with the resolutions, must make every patriot solicitous for the vincication of them and their author and adopters from any such affinity.

Fortunately, the material is at hand, and abundant. The resolutions are vindicated on their text alone; and contemporaneous authentie interpretation, and the reiterated, earnest—even indignant—disclaimers of the illustrious author himself, utterly repudiate the intent that nullification attempts to impute to them. I propose, therefore, to treat them in these three aspects:

I. Vindicated on their text.

The clause of the resolutions, chiefly relied on as countenancing nullification, is the third resolution of the series, and is as follows:

"That this assembly doth explicitly and peremptorily declare that it views the powers of the federal government, as resulting frem the compact, to which the States are parties, as limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact; and that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers not granted by the said compact, the States, who are the parties thereto, have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to them."

The right and duty of interposition is certainly here claimed for the States, in case of a "deliberate, palpable, and dangerous assumption of powers, by the federal government;" but, iooking alone to the words of the text, it is an unreasonable inference, that forcible or nullifying interposition is meant. The word does not import resistance, but rather the contrary; and can only be understood in a hostile sense, when the connection in which it is used necessarily implies force. Such is not the case in this resolution; and no one has a right to suppose that, if its authors had intended to assert a principle of such transcendent importance, as that the States were severally possessed of the right to annul an act of Congress, and resist its execution, they would not have used words to declare that meaning explicitly, or, that they would intimate covertly a doctrine they dared not avon.

The constitution itself suggests several modes of interposition, competent for either the States or the people. It provides for the election (by a mixed system, popular and State), at brief in. tervals, of all the functionaries of the federal government; and hence, the interposition of the will of the States and people to effect a change of rulers; hence, of policy. It provides that freedom of speech and the press, shall not be abridged, which is equivalent to a provision that those powerful means be perpetually interposed to affect the public conscience and sentimentto counsel and alarm the public servants; to influence public policy-to restrain and remedy government abuses. It recognizes the right, and provides that it shall not be abridged, of the people "to assemble and petition the government for the redress of grievances;" hence, cortemplating that there may be grievances on the part of the government, and suggesting a means of meeting and overcoming them. Finally, it provides that, on the application of a designated proportion of the States, Congress shall cause a convention to be called, to provide, in the constitution itself, should it be judged necessary, additional securities to the States and the people, and additional restraints on the government.

To act on the sentiments of the country then; to bring to their aid the potent engines of the press and public harangues; to more the people to petition and remonstrance ag not the obnoxious measures; to draw the attention of other States to the abuses complained of, and to the latitudinous construction the federal authorities were giving to their powers; and thus bring those States, in like manner, to act on their senators and representatives, and on the public voice, so as to produce an immediate remedy, or to co-operate in calling a convention ts of the country the potent engines rangues; to more monstrance age inst draw the attention complained of, and tion the federal aupowers; and thus manner, to act on tatives, and on the luce an immediate alling a convention to provide further securities—one or both; these alone are the modes of "interposition" the Virginia resolutions of 1798 contemplated; all they processed; all they attempted; all that the resolutions, or their history, warrant to be imputed to them. These modes of interposition are all consistent with peace and order; with obedience to the haws, and respect to the lawful authorities; the very means, as was well argued by the supporters of the resolutions, to prevent civil strife, insubordination, or revolution; in all respects, the antipodes of nullification.

To enlarge somewhat on the force of the words of the resolutions: The right and duty of "the States" to interpose, certainly does not mean the right of "a State" to nullify and set at nought. The States-less than the whole number-have a right to interpose, secured, as already shown, in the constitution; and this, not only persuasively, but peremptorily; to compel the action they may desire; and it is demonstrable, that it was this constitutional provision that the Virginia legislature had in mind, as a last resort. The resolutions do not speak any where of the right of a State; but use the plural number. States. Virginia exercises the right that pertains to a State-all the right that, in the premises, she pretends to-in passing the resolutions, declaring her views, and inviting the like action of her co-States. Instead, therefore, of the resolutions being identical with nullification, the two doctrines are not merely hostile, but exactly opposites; the sum of the Virginia doctrine being, that it belongs to a State to take, as Virginia does in this instance, the initiative in impeaching any objectionable action of the federal government, and to ask her co-States to co-operate in procuring the repeal of a law, a change of policy, or an amendment of the constitution-according as one or the other, or all, may be required to remedy the evil complained of; whereas, nullification claims, that a single State may, of its own motion, nullify any act of the federal government it objects to, and stay its operation, until three fourths of all the States come to the aid of the national authority, and re-enact the nullified measure. One submits to the law, t'll a majority repeal it, or a convention provides a constitutional remedy for it; the other undertakes to annul the law, and suspend its operation, so long as three fourths of the States are not brought into active co-operation to declare it valid. The resolutions maintain the government in all its functions, only seeking to call into use the particular function of repeal or amendment: nullification would stop the functions of government, and arrest laws indefinitely; and is incapable of being brought to actual experiment, in a single instance, without a subversion of authority, or civil war. To this essential, radical, antagonistic degree do the Virginia resolutions and the doctrine of nullification differ, one from the other; and thus unjustly are the Virginia republicans, of 1798, accused of planting the seeds of dissolution-a "deadly poison," as Mr. Madison, himself, emphatically calls the doctrine of nullification-in the institutions they had so labored to construct.

II. Upon their contemporaneous interpretation.

The contemporaneous construction of the resolutions is found in the debates on their adoption; in the responses to them of other State legislatures; and in the confirmatory report prepared by the same author, and adopted by the Virginia general assembly, in January, 1800; and by the conduct of the State, in the case of Callender. And it is remarkable (when we consider the uses to which the resolutions have subsequently been turned), that, while the friends of the resolutions nowhere claim more than a declaratory right for the legislature, and deny all idea of force or resistance, their adversaries, in the heat of debate, nor the States which manifested the utmost bitterness in their responses, have not attributed to the resolutions way doctrine like that of nullification. Both in the debates and in the State responses, the opponents of the resolutions denounce them as inflamatory, and "tending" to produce insubordination, and whatever other evil could then be thought of, concerning them; but no one attributes to them the absurdity of claiming for the State a right to arrest, of its own motion, the operation of the acts of Congress.

The principal speakers, in the Virginia legislature, in opposition to the resolutions, were: Mr. George Keith Taylor, Mr. Magili, Mr. Brooke, Mr. Cowan, Gen. Henry Lee, and Mr. Cureton. Nearly the whole debate turned, not on the abstract propriety or expediency of such resolutions, on the question whether the acts of Congress, which were specially complained of, were, in fact, unconstitutional. It was admitted, indeed, by Gen. Lee, who spoke elaborately and argumentatively against the resolutions, that, if the acts were unconstitutional, it was "proper to interfere;" but the extreme notions of the powers of the federal government that then prevailed in the federal party, led them to contend that those powers extended to the acts in question, though, at this day, they are universally acknowledged to be out of the pale of federal legislation. Beyond the discussion of this point, and one or two others not pertinent to the present matter, the speakers dwelt only on the supposed "tendency" of such declarations to excite the people to insubordination and nonsubmission to the law.

Mr. George K. Taylor complained at the commencement of his speech, that the resolutions "contained a declaration, not of opinion, but of fact;" and he apprehended that "the consequences of pursuing the advice of the resolutions would be insurrection, confusion, and anarchy;" but the legal effect and character that he attributed to the resolutions, is shown in his concluding sentence, as follows:

"The members of that Congress which had passed those laws, had been, so far as he could understand, since generally re-elected; therefore he thought the people of the United States had decided in favor of their constitutionality, and that such an attempt as they were then making to induce Congress to repeal the laws would be nugatory."

Mr. Brooke thought resolutions "declaring laws which had been made by the government of the United States to be unconstitutional, null and void," were "dangerous and improper;" that they had a "tendency to inflame the public mind;" to lessen the confidence that ought to subsist between the representatives of the people in the general government and their constituents; and to "sap the very foundations of the government, by producing resistance to its laws." But that he did not apprehend the resolutions to be, or to intend, any thing beyond an expression of sentiment, is evident from his further declaration, that he was opposed to the resolutions, and equally opposed to any modification of them, that should be "intended as an expression of the general sentiment on the subject, because he conceived 't to be an improper mode by which to express the wishes of the people of the State on the subject,"

General Lee thought the alien and sedition laws "not unconstitutional;" but if they were unconstitutional ho "admitted the right of interposition on the part of the general assembly." But he thought these resolutions showed "indecorum and hostility," and were "not the likeliest way to obtain a repeal of the laws." He "suspected," in fact, that " the repeal of the laws was not the leading point in view," but that they "covered" the objects of "promotion of disunion and separation of the States." The resolutions "struck him as recommending resistance. They declared the laws null and void. Our citizens thus thinking would disobey the laws." His plan would be, if he thought the laws unconstitutional, to let the people petition. or that the legislature come forward at once "with a proposition for amending the doubtful parts of the constitution;" or with a "respectful or friendly memorial, urging Congress to repeal the laws." But he "admitted" the only right which the resolutions assert for the State. namely, the right "to interpose." The remarks of the other opponents to the resolutions were to the same effect.

On behalf of the resolutions, the principal speakers were, Mr. John Taylor, of Caroline, who had introduced them, Mr. Ruffin, Mr. Mercer, Mr. Pope, Mr. Foushee, Mr. Daniel, Mr. Peter Johnston, Mr. Giles, Mr. James Barbon.

They obviated the objection of the speakers on the other side, that the resolutions "contained a declaration, not of opinion, but of fact." by striking out the words which, in the original draft, declared the acts in question to be "null void, and of no force or effect;" so as to make it manifest, as the advocates of the resolutions maintained, that they intended nothing beyond an expression of sentiment. They, obviated another objection which appeared in the original draft, which asserted the States alone to be the parties to the constitution, by striking out the word "alone." They thoroughly and successfully combated both the "suspicion" that they hid any ulterior object of dissension or disunion, and the "apprehension" that the resolutions would encourage insubordination among the people, They acceded to and affirmed, that their object was to obtain a repeal of the offensive measurer; that the resolutions might ultimately lead to a

Says Mr. Taylor, of Caroline:

"If Congress should, as was certainly possible, logislate unconstitutionally, it was evident that in theory they have done wrong, and it only remained to consider whether the constitution is so defective as to have established limitations and reservations, without the means of enforcing them in a mode by which they could be made practically useful. Suppose a clashing of opinion should exist between Congress and the States, respecting the true limits of their constitutional territories, it was easy to see, that if the right of decision had been vested in either party, that party, deciding in the spirit of party, would inevitably have swallowed up the other. The constitution must not only have foreseen the possibility of such a clashing, but also the consequence of a preference on either side as to its construction. And out of this foresight must have arisen the fifth article, by which two thirds of Congress may call upon the States for an explanation of any such controversy as the present; and thus correct an erroneous construction of its own acts by a minority of the States, whilst two thirds of the States are also allowed to compel Congress to call a convention, in case so many should think an amendment necessarv for the purpose of checking the unconstitut onal acts of that body. is the creature of the States and the people; but neither the States nor the people are the creatures of Congress. It would be eminently absurd, that the creature should exclusively construe the instrument of its own existence; and therefore this construction was reserved indiscriminately to one or the other of those powers, of which Congress was the joint work; namely, to the people whenever a convention was resorted to, or to the States whenever the operation should be carried on by three fourths.

"Mr. Taylor then proceeded to apply these observations to the threats of war, and the apprehension of civil commotion, 'towards which the resolutions were said to have a tendency.' Are the republicans, said he, possessed of fleets and armies? If not, to what could they appeal for descree and support? To nothing, except public opinion. If that should be against them, they must yield; if for them, did gentlemen mean to say, that public will should be assailed And against a State which was pursuing the only possible and ordinary mode of ascertaining the opinion of two thirds of the States, by declaring its own and asking theirs?"

"He observed that the resolutions had been objected to, as couched in language too strong and offensive; whilst it had also been said on the same this he replied that he was not surprised to hear the enemies of the resolutions recommending measures which were either feeble or rash. Timidity only served to invite a repetition of injury, whilst an unconstitutional resort to arms would not only justly exasperate all good men, but invite those who differed from the friends of the resolutions to the same appeal, and produce a civil war. Hence, those who wished to preserve the peace, as well as the constitution, had rejected both alternatives, and chosen the middle way. They had uttered what they conceived to be truth, and they had pursued a system which was only an appeal to public opinion; because that appeal was warranted by the constitution and by principle."

Mr. Mercer, in reply to Mr. G. K. Taylor,

"The gentleman from Prince George had told the committee that the resolutions were calculated to rouse the people to resistance, to excite the people of Virginia against the federal government. Mr. Mercer did not see how such consequences could result from their adoption. They contained nothing more than the sentiment which the people in many parts of the State had expressed, and which had been conveyed to the legislature in their memorials and resolutions then lying on the table. He would venture to say that an attention to the resolutions from the committee would prove that the qualities attempted to be attached to them by the gentleman could not be found.'

"The right of the State government to interfere in the manner proposed by the resolutions, Mr. Mercer contended was clear to his mind. The State believed some of its rights had been invaded by the late acts of the general government, and proposed a remedy whereby to obtain a repeal of them. The plan contained in the resolutions appeared to Mr. Mercer the most advisable. Force was not thought of by any one. . . . The States were equally concerned, as their rights had been equally invaded; and nothing seemed more likely to produce a temper in Congress for a repeal."

"The object (of the friends of the resolutions), in addressing the States, is to obtain a similar declaration of opinion, with respect to several late acts of the general government, and thereby to obtain a repeal."

Mr. Barbour, likewise, in reply to Mr. G. K.

"The gentleman from Prince George had remarked that those resolutions invited the people to insurrection and to arms; but, if he could conceive that the consequences foretold would grow out of the measure, he would become its side, that if the laws were unconstitutional, the bitterest enemy." The resolutions people ought to fly to arms and resist 'hem.' To were "addressed, not to the people but to the sister States; praying, in a pacific way, their co-operation, in arresting the tendency and effect of unconstitutional laws.

"For his part, he was for using no violence. It was the peculiar blessing of the American people to have redress within their reach, by constitutional and peaceful means."

On the same point, Mr. Daniel spoke as follows:

"If the other States think, with this, that the laws are unconstitutional, the laws will be repealed, and the constitutional question will be settled by this declaration of a majority of the States." . . . "If, on the contrary, a sufficient majority of the States should declare their opinion, that the constitution gave Congress authority to pass these laws, the constitutional question would still be settled; but an attempt might be made so to amend the constitution as to take from Congress this authority."

And, finally, Mr. Taylor of Caroline, in closing the debate, and in explanation of his former remarks in respect to calling a convention, said:

"He would explain, in a few words, what he had before said. That the plan proposed by the resolutions would not eventuate in war, but might in a convention. He did not admit, or contemplate, that a convention would be called. He only said, that if Congress, upon being addressed to have these laws repealed, should persist, they might, by a concurrence of three fourths of the States, be compelled to call a convention."

It is seen, then, by these extracts, that the opposers of the resolutions did not charge upon them, nor their supporters in any manner contend for, any principle like that of nullification; that, on the contrary, the supporters of the resolutions, so far from the absurd proposition that each State could, for itself, annul the acts of Congress, and to that extent stop the operation of the federal government, they did not recognize that power in a majority of the States, nor even in all the States together, by any extraconstitutional combination or process, or to annul a law otherwise than through the prescribed forms of legislative repeal, or constitutional amendment.

The resolutions were, however, vigorously assailed by the federal party throughout the Union, especially in the responses of several of the States; and at the ensuing session of the Virginia legislature, those State responses were sent to a committee, who made an elaborate examination of the resolutions, and of the objectiplated such a doctrine as Nullification; but tions that had been made to them, concluding by a justification of them in all particulars and reiterating their declarations. This report was adopted by the general assembly and is a part of the contemporaneous and authentic interpretation of the resolutions. The report says:

"A declaration that proceedings of the federa government are not warranted by the constitu tion, is a novelty neither among the citizens nor among the legislatures of the States.

"Nor can the declarations of either, whether affirming or denying the constitutionality of measures of the federal government, or whether made before or after judicial decisions thereon, be deemed, in any point of view, an assumption of the office of judge. The declarations in such cases, are expressions of opinion, unaccompanied by any other effect than what they may produce on opinion, by exciting reflection. The expositions of the judiciary, on the ether hand, are carried into immediate effect by force."

Again: "In the example given by the State, of declaring the alien and sedition acts to be unconstitutional, and of communicating the declaration to other States, no trace of improper means has appeared. And if the other States had concurred in making a like declaration, supported too, by the numerous applications flow. ing immediately from the people, it can scarcely be doubted, that these simple means would have been as sufficient, as they are unexceptionable.

"It is no less certain that other means might have been employed, which are strictly within the limits of the constitution. The legislatures of the States might have made a direct representation to Congress, with a view to obtain a rescinding of the two offensive acts; or they might have represented to their respective senators in Congress their wish, that two-thirds thereof would propose an explanatory amendment to the constitution; or two-thirds of themselves, if such had been their option, might, by an application to Congress, have obtained a convention for the same object.

"These several means, though not equally eligible in themselves, nor probably to the States, were all constitutionally open for consideration. And if the general assembly, after declaring the two acts to be unconstitutional, the first and most obvious proceeding on the subject, did not undertake to point out to the other States a choice among the farther measures that might become necessary and proper, the resource will not be misconstrued by liberal minds into any culpable imputation."

uable, not only for hat the Resolutions s, had ever contems Nullification; but also for their precise definition and enumeration of the powers which, in the premises, were really claimed for the States, by the Statelights Republicans of that day. They are all distinctly laid down:

1. By a solemn declaration of opinion, calculated to operate on the public sentiment, and to induce the co-operation of other States in like declarations.

2 To make a direct representation to Congress, with a view to obtain a repeal of the acts complained of.

3. To represent to their respective senators their wish that two-thirds thereof would propose an explanatory amendment to the constitution.

4. By the concurrence of two-thirds of the Stales to cause Congress to call a convention for the same object.

These are the entire list of the remedial powers suspected, by the Resolutions of 1798, and their author and adopters, to exist in the States with reference to federal enactments. Their variant character from the peremptory arrest of acts of Congress proposed by nullification, is well illustrated in the comparison made in the report between expressions of opinion like those of the resolutions, and the compulsory operation of a judicial process. Supposing, savs the report, "that it belongs to the judiciary of the United States, and not the State legislatures, to declare the meaning of the federal constitution," yet the declarations either of a State, or the people, "whother affirming or denying the constitutionality of measures of the federal government, or whether made before or after judicial decisions thereon," cannot "be deemed in any point of view an assumption of the office of the judge;" because, "the declarations in such cases are expressions of opinions uaaccompanied with any other effect than what they may produce on opinion, by exciting reflection;"-whereas, "the expositions of the judiciary are carried into immediate effect by force."

The Republicans who adopted the Resolutions of 1798, never contemplated carrying their expositions into effect by force; never contemplated imparting to them the character of decisions, or decrees, or the legal determination of a question; or of arresting by means of them the operation of the acts they condemned. The worst

the enemies of the resolutions undertook to say of them, was that they were intemperate, and might mislead the people into disobedience of the laws. This was successfully combated; but had it been true-had the authors of the resolutions even intended any thing so base, it would still have been nothing comparable to the crime of State nullification; of placing the State itself in hostile array to the federal government. Insubordination of individuals may usually be overcome by ordinary judicial process, or by the posse of the county where it occurs; or even if so extensive as to require the peace-officers to be aided by the military, it is still but a matter of police, and in our country cannot endanger the existence of the government. But the array of a State of the Union against the federal authority, is war-a war between powers-both sovereign in their respective spheres—and that could only terminate in the destruction of the one, or the subjugation and abasement of the other.

But neither the one or the other of these crimes was contemplated by the authors of the Resolutions of 1798. The remedies they claimed a right to exercise are all pointed out in the constitution itself; capable of application without disturbing the processes of the law, or suggesting an idea of insubordination; remedies capable of saving the liberties of the people and the rights of the States, and bringing back the federal government to its constitutional track, without a jar or a check to its machinery; remedies felt to be sufficient, and by crowning experience soon proven to be so. It is due to the memory of those men and those times that their acts should no longer be misconstrued to cover a doctrine synonymous with disorganization and civil war. The conduct both of the government, and the people, on the occasion of these resolutions, show how far they were from any nullifying or insubordinate intention; and this furnishes us with another convincing proof of the contemporaneous interpretation of the resolutions. So far (as Mr. Madison justly says.)* was the State of Virginia from countenancing the nullifying doctrine, that the occasion was viewed as a proper one for exemplifying its devotion to public order, and acquiescence in laws which it deemed unconstitutional, while those laws were not repealed. The language of the Governor of Madison, in May and June of 1800, will attest the trinciples and feelings which dictated the course pursued on the occasion, and whether the people understood the resolutions in any inflammatory or vicious sense.

On the 15th May, 1800, Governor Monroe writes to Mr. Madison as follows:

"Besides, I think there is cause to suspect the sedition law will be carried into effect in this State at the approaching federal court, and I ought to be there (Richmond) to aid in preventing trouble. I think it possible an idea may be entertained of opposition, and by means whereof the fair prospect of the republican party may be overcast. But in this they are deceived, as certain characters in Richmond and some neighboring counties are already warned of their danger, so that an attempt to excite a hotwater insurrection will fail."

And on the 4th of June, 1800, he wrote again, as follows:

"The conduct of the people on this occasion was exemplary, and does them the highest honor. They seemed aware that the crisis demanded of them a proof of their respect for law and order, and resolved to show they were equal to it. I am satisfied a different conduct was expeated from them, for every thing that could was done to provoke it. It only remains that this business be closed on the part of the people, as it has been so far acted; that the judge, after finishing his career, go off in peace, without experiencing the slightest insult from any one; and that this will be the case I have no doubt."

Governor Monroe was correct in the supposition that the sedition law would be carried into effect, at the approaching session of the federal court, and he was also right in the anticipation that the people would know how to distinguish between the exercise of means to procure the repeal of an act, and the exercise of violence to stop its operation. The act was enforced; was "carried into effect" in their midst, and a fellow-citizen incarcerated under its odious provisions, without a suggestion of official or other interference. Thus we have the contemporaneous interpretation of the resolutions exemplified and set at rest, by the most powerful of arguments: by the impressive fact, that when the public indignation was at its height, subsequent to the resolutions of 1798, and subsequent to the report of '99, and when both had been universally disseminated and read, and they had had, with the debates upon them, their entire influ- these resolutions, derived from the words of

This fact, so creditable to the people of Virginia, is thus noted in the annual message of Governor Monroe, to the general assembly, at their next meeting, December.

> "In connection with this subject [of the reso-Intions] it is proper to add, that, since your last session, the sedition law, one of the acts complained of, has been carried into effect in this commonwealth by the decision of a federal court. I notice this event, not with a view of censuring or criticising it. The transaction has gone to the world, and the impartial will judge of it as it deserves. I notice it for the purpose of remarking that the decision was executed with the same order and tranquil submission on the part of the people, as could have been shown by them on a similar occasion, to any the most necessary, constitutional and popoular acts of the govern-

> Governor Monroe then adds his official and personal testimony to the proper intent and character of the proceedings of '98, '9, as follows:

> "The general assembly and the good people of this commonwealth have acquitted themselves to their own consciences, and to their brethren in America, in support of a cause which they deem a national one, by the stand which they made, and the sentiments they expressed of these acts of the general government; but they have looked for a change in that respect to a change in the public opinion, which ought to be free; not to measures of violence, discord and disunion, which they abhor."

The contemporary opponents of the Resolutions of 1798 said all the evil of them, and represented them in every odious light, that persevering, keen and enlightend opposition could discover or imagine. Their defenders successfully repelled the charges then made against them; but could not vindicate them from intending the modern doctrine of Nullification, because that doctrine had not then been ' vented, and the ingenuity of their adversaria * conceive of that ground of attack. Gle author, however-the illustric vns still alive, when this new perv lutions had been invented, and when they were quoted to sustain doctrines synonymous with disorganization and disunion. He was still alive, in retirement on his farm. His modesty and sense of propriety hindered him from carrying the prestige and influence of his name into the politics of the day; but his vigorous mind still watched with anxious and patriotic interest the current of public affairs, and recoiled with instinctive horror both from the doctrine and attempted practice of Nullification, and the attempted connection of his name and acts with the origination of it. He held aloof from the public contest; but his sentiments were no secret. His private correspondence, embracing in its range distinguished men of all sections of the Union and of all parties, was full of the subject, from the commencement of the Nullification excitement down to the time of his death: sometimes at length, and argumentatively; sometimes with a brief indignant disclaimer; always carnestly and unequivocally. Some of these letters, although private, were published during Mr. Madison's lifetime, especially an elaborate one to Mr. Edward Everett; and many of the remainder have recently been put into print, through the liberality of a patrotic citizen of Washington (Mr. J. Maguire), but only for private distribution, and hence not accessible to the public. They are a complete storehouse of material, not only for the vindication of Madison and his compeers, from the doctrine of Nullification, but of argument and reasons against Nullification and every kindred suggestion.

From the letter to Mr. Everett, published in the North American Review, shortly after it was written (August, 1830), the following ertracts are taken:

"It (the constitution of the United States) was formed by the States, that is, by the people in each of the States, acting in their highest severeign capacity; and formed consequently by the same authority which formed the State constitutions.

"Being thus derived from the same source at the constitutions of the States, it has, within each State, the same authority as the constitution of the State, and is as much a constitution in the strict sense of the term within its prescribed sphere, as the constitutions of the States are within their respective spheres; but with this obvious and essential difference, that being a compact among the States in their highest sovereign capacity, and constituting the people thereof one people for certain purposes, it cannot be altered or annulled at the will of the States individually, as the constitution of a State may be at its individual will."

"Nor is the government of the United States, created by the constitution, less a government in the strict sense of the term, within the sphere of its powers, than the governments created by the constitutions of the States are, within their several spheres. It is like them organized into legislative, executive and judiciary departments. It operates, like them, directly on persons and things. And, like them, it has at command a physical force for executing the powers committed to it.

"Between these different constitutional governments, the one operating in all the States, the others operating separately in each, with the aggregate powers of government divided between them, it could not escape attention, that controversies would arise concerning the boundaries of invisitation"

"That to have left a final decision, in such cases, to each of the States, could not fail to make the constitution and laws of the United States different in different States, was obvious, and not less obvious that this diversity of independent decisions, must altogether distract the government of the Union, and speedily put an end to the Union itself."

"To have made the decision under the authority of the individual States, co-ordinate in all cases, with decisions under the authority of the United States, would unavoidably produce collisions incompatible with the peace of society."

"To have referred every clashing decision, under the two authorities, for a final decision, to [•] Mr. Madison did not introduce the Resolutions into the Viginia legislature. He was not a member of that body in 1798. The resolutions were reported by John Taylor, of Caroline. Mr. Madison, however, was always reputed to be their author, and in a letter to Mr. James Robertson, written in March, 1831, he distinctly avows it. He was both the author and rejorter of the 7°, port and Resolution of 1799-1500.

the States as parties to the constitution, would be attended with delays, with inconveniences and expenses, amounting to a prohibition of the expedient."

"To have trusted to 'negotiation' for adjusting disputes between the government of the United States and the State governments, as between independent and separate sovereignties, would have lost sight altogether of a constitution and government of the Union, and opened a direct road, from a failure of that resort, to the ultima ratio, between nations wholly independent of, and alien to each other. . Although the issue of negotiation might sometimes avoid this extremity, how often would it happen among so many States, that an unaccommodating spirit in some would render that resource unavailing?"

After thus stating, with other powerful reasons, why all those fanciful and impracticable theories were rejected in the constitution, the letter proceeds to show what the constitution does adopt and rely on, "as a security of the rights and powers of the States," namely:

"1. The responsibility of the senators and representatives in the legislature of the United States to the legislatures and people of the States: 2. The responsibility of the President to the people of the United States; and, 3. The liability of the executive and judicial functionaries of the United States to impeachment by the representatives of the people of the States in one branch of the legislature of the United States, and trial by the representatives of the States, in the other branch.

And then, in order to mark how complete these provisions are for the security of the States, shows that while the States thus hold the functionaries of the United States to these several responsibilities, the State functionaries, on the other hand, in their appointment and responsibility, are "altogether independent of the agency or authority of the United States."

Of the doctrine of nullification, "the expedient ately advanced," the letter says:

"The distinguished names and high authorities which appear to have asserted and given a practical scope to this doctrine, entitle it to a respect which it might be difficult otherwise to feel for it."

"The resolutions of Virginia, as vindicated in the report on them, will be found entitled to an exposition, showing a consistency in their parts, and an inconsistency of the whole with the doctrine under consideration."

"That the legislature could not have intended to sanction any such doctrine is to be inferred from the debates in the House of Delegates The tenor of the debates, which were ably conducted, discloses no reference whatever to a contitutional right in an individual State to arrest by force a law of the United States.'

"If any further light on the subject could be needed, a very strong one is reflected in the answers to the resolutions, by the States which protested against them. Had the resolutions been regarded as avowing and maintaining a right, in an individual State, to arrest by force the execution of a law of the United States, it must be presumed that it would have been a conspicuous object of their denuncia-

In a letter to Mr. Joseph C. Cabell, May 31. 1830, Mr. Madison says:

"I received yesterday yours of the 26th. Having never concealed my opinions of the nullifying doctrines of South Carolina, I did not regard the allusion to it in the Whig, especially as the manner of the allusion showed that I did not obtrude it. I have latterly been drawn into a correspondence with an advocate of the doctrine, which led me to a review of it to some extent, and particularly to a vindication of the proceedings of Virginia in 1798, '99, against the misuse made of them. To Mr. James Robertson, March 27, 1831. Mr. Madison writes as follows:

"The veil which was originally over the draft of the resolutions offered in 1798 to the Virginia Assembly having been long since removed, I may say, in answer to your inquiries, that it was penned by me."

"With respect to the terms following the term 'unconstitutional,' viz., 'not law, but null, void, and of no force or effect,' which were stricken out of the seventh resolution, my memory cannot say positively whether they were or were not in the original draft, and no copy of it appears to have been retained. On the presumption that they were in the draft as it went from me, I am confident that they must have been regarded only as giving accumulated emphasis to the declaration, that the alien and sedition acts had, in the opinion of the assembly, violated the constitution of the United States, and not that the addition of them could annul the acts or sanction a resistance of them The resolution was expressly declaratory, and proceeding from the legislature only, which was not even a party to the constitution, could be declaratory of opinion only."

Cabell, Sept. 16, 1831:

"I congratulate you on the event which restores you to the public councils, where your services will be valuable, particularly in defending the constitution and Union against the false dectrines which assail them. That of nullification seems to be generally abandoned in Virginia, by those who had most leaning towards it. But it still flourishes in the hot-bed where it spring up."

"I know not whence the idea could proceed that I concurred in the doctrine, that although a State could not nullify a law of the Union, it had a right to seeede from the Union. Both spring from the same poisonous root."

To Mr. N. P. Trist, December, 1831:

"I cannot see the advantage of this perseverance of South Carolina in claiming the authority of the Virginia proceedings in 1798, '99, as asserting a right in a single State to nullify an act of the United States. Where, indeed, is the fairness of attempting to palm on Virginia an intention which is contradicted by such a variety of contradictory proofs; which has at no intervening period, received the slightest countenance from her, and which with one voice she now disclaims?"

"To view the doctrine in its true character, it must be recollected that it asserts a right in a single State to stop the execution of a federal law, until a convention of the States could be brought about by a process requiring an uncertain time; and, finally, in the convention, when formed, a vote of seven States, if in favor of the veto, to give it a prevalence over the vast majority of seventeen States. For this preposterous and anarchical pretension there is not a shadow of countenance in the constitution; and well that there is not, for it is certain that, with such a deadly poison in it, no constitution could be sure of lasting a year."

To Mr. C. E. Haynes, August 26, 1832:

"In the very crippled and feeble state of my health, I cannot undertake an extended answer to your inquiries, nor should I suppose it necessary if you have seen my letter to Mr. Everett, ia August, 1830, in which the proceedings of Virginia, in 1798-'99, were explained, and the novel dectrine of nullification adverted to.

"The distinction is obvious between such interpositions on the part of the States against unjustifiable acts of the federal government as are within the provisions and forms of the constitution. These provisions and forms certainly do not embrace the nullifying process proclaimed in South Carolina, which begins with a single State, and ends with the ascendency of a minority of States over a majority; of seven over seventeen; a federal law, during the process, being arrested within the nullifying State; and, if a revenue law, frustrated through all the States."

To Mr. Trist, December 23, 1832:

"If one State can, at will, withdraw from the others, the others can, at will, withdraw from her, and turn her nodentem rodentem out of the Union. Until of late, there is not a State that would have abhorred such a doctrine more than South Carolina, or more dreaded an application of it to herself. The same may be said of the doctrine of nullification which she now preaches as the only faith by which the Union can be saved."

In a letter to Mr. Joseph C. Cabell, December 28, 1832:

"It is not probable that (in the adoption of the resolutions of 1798), such an idea as the South Carolina nullification had ever entered the thoughts of a single member, or even that of a citizen of South Carolina herself."

To Andrew Stevenson, February 4, 1823:

"I have received your communication of the 29th altimo, and have read it with much pleasure. It presents the doctrine of nullification and secession in lights that must confound, if failing to convince their patrons. You have done well in rescuing the proceedings of Virginia in 1798–'99, from the many misconstructions and misapplications of them."

"Of late, attempts are observed to shelter the heresy of secession under the case of expatriation, from which it essentially differs. The expatriating party removes only his person and his movable property, and does not incommode those whom he leaves. A seceding State mutilates the domain, and disturbs the whole system from which it separates itself. Pushed to the extent in which the right is sometimes asserted, it might break into fragments every single community."

To Mr. Stevenson, February 10, 1833, in reference to the South Carolina nullifying ordinance:

"I consider a successful resistance to the laws as now attempted, if not immediately mortal to the Union, as at least a mortal wound to it."

To "a Friend of the Union and State zights," 1833:

"It is not usual to answer communications without proper names to them. But the ability and motives disclosed in the essays induce me to say, in compliance with the wish expressed, that I do not consider the proceedings of Virginia, in 1798–'99, as countenancing the doctrine that a State may, at will secode from its constitutional compact with the other States."

To Mr. Joseph C. Cabell, April 1, 1833:

"The attempt to prove me a nullifier, by a misconstruction of the resolutions of 1798-799, though so often and so lately corrected, was, I observe, renewed some days ago in the 'Richmond Whig,' by an inference from an erasure in the House of Delegates from one of those resolutions, of the words 'are null, void and of no effect,' which followed the word 'unconsti-tutional.' These words, though synonymous with 'unconstitutional,' were alleged by the critic to mean nullification; and being, of course, ascribed to me, I was, of course, a nullifier. It seems not to have occurred, that if the insertion of the words could convict me of being a nullifier, the erasure of them (unanimous, I believe), by the legislature, was the strongest of protests The vote, in against the doctrine. that case seems not to have engaged the attention due to it. It not merely deprives South Carolina of the authority of Virginia, on which she has relied and exulted so much in support of her cause, but turns that authority pointedly

From a memorandum "On Nullification," written in 1835-'36:

"Although the legislature of Virginia declared, at a late session, almost unanimously, that South Carolina was not supported in her doctrine of nullification by the resolutions of 1798, it appears that those resolutions are still appealed to as expressly or constructively favoring the doctrine.'

"And what is the text in the proceedings of Virginia which this spurious doctrine of nullification claims for its patronage? It is found in the third of the resolutions of 1798." "Now is there any thing here from which a 'single' State can infer a right to arrest or annul an act of the general government, which it may deem unconstitutional? So far from it, that the obvious and proper inference precludes such a right."

"In a word, the nullifying claims, if reduced to practice, instead of being the conservative principle of the constitution, would necessarily, and it may be said, obviously, be a deadly poison."

"The true question, therefore, is, whether there be a 'constitutional' right in a single State to nullify a law of the United States? We have seen the absurdity of such a claim, in its naked and suicidal form. Let us turn to it, as modified by South Carolina, into a right in every State to resist within itself the execution of a federal anw, deemed by it to be unconstitutional, and to demand a convention of the States to decide the question of constitutionality, the annulment of the law to continue in the mean time, and to be permanent unless three fourths of the States concur in overruling the annulment.

"Thus, during the temporary nullification of the law, the results would be the same as those proceeding from an unqualified nullification, and the result of a convention might be that seven porary results permanent. It follows, that any State which could obtain the concurrence of hix others, might abrogate any law of the United States whatever, and give to the constitution. constructively, any shape they pleased, in opposition to the construction and will of the other seventeen.* Every feature of the constitution might thus be successively changed; and after a scene of unexampled confusion and distraction, what had been unanimously agreed to as a whole, would not, as a whole, be agreed to by a single party."

To this graphic picture of the disorders which even the first stages of nullification would necessarily produce, drawn when the graphic limner was in the eighty-sixth and last year of his life. the following warning pages, written only a few months earlier, may be properly appended:

"What more dangerous than nullification, or more evident than the progress it continues to make, either in its original shape or in the disguises it assumes? Nullification has the effect of putting powder under the constitution and Union, and a match in the hand of every party to blow them up, at pleasure. And for its progress, hearken to the tone in which it is now preached; cast your eyes on its increasing minorities in most of the Southern States, without a decrease in any one of them. Look at Virginia herself, and read in the gazettes, and in the proceedings of popular meetings, the figure which the anarchical principle now makes, in contrast with the scouting reception given to it but a short time ago.

"It is not probable that this offspring of the discontents of South Carolina will ever approach success in a majority of the States. But a susceptibility of the agion in the Southern States is visible; e danger not to be concealed, that the sy , hy arising from known causes, and the incolcated impression of a permanent incompatibility of interests between the South and the North, may put it in the power of por alar leaders, aspiring to the highest stations, to unite the South, on some critical occasion, in a course that will end in creating a new theatre of great though inferior extent. In pursuing this course, the first and most obvious step is nullification, the next, secession, and the last, a farewell separation. How near has this course been lately exemplified! and the danger of its recurrence, in the same or some other quarter, may be increased by an increase of restless aspirants, and by the increasing impracti-cability of retaining in the Union a large and cemented section against its will. It may, indeed, happen, that a return of danger from abroad, or a revived apprehension of danger at home, may aid in binding the States in one political system, or that the geographical and commercial ligatures may have that effect, or that the present discord of interests between the North and the South may give way to a less diversity in the application of labor, or to the mutual advantage of a safe and constant interchange of the different products of labor in different sections. All this may happen, and with the exception of foreign hostility, hoped for. But, in the mean time, local prejudices and ambitious leaders may be but too successful in finding or creating occasions for the nullifying experiment of breaking a more beautiful China vase* than the British empire ever was, into parts which a miracle only could reunite."

Incidentally, Mr. Madison, in these letters, vindicates also his compeers, Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Monroe. In the letter to Mr. Cabell, of May 31, 1830, he says:

"You will see, in vol. iii., page 429, of Mr. Jefferson's Correspondence, a letter to W. C. Nicholas, proving that he had nothing to do with the Kentucky resolutions, of 1799, in which the word 'nullification' is found. The resolutions of that State, in 1798, which were drawn by him, and have been republished with the proceedings of Virginia, do not contain this or any equivalent word."

In the letter to Mr. Trist, of December, 1831, after developing at some length the inconsistencies and fatuity of the "nullification prerogative," Mr. Madison says:

"Yet this has boldly sought a sanction, under the name of Mr. Jefferson, because, in his letter to Mr. Cartwright, he held out a convention of the States as, with us, a peaceful remedy, in cases to be decided in Europe by intestine wars. Who can believe that Mr. Jefferson referred to a convention summoned at the pleasure of a single State, with an interregnum during its deliberations; and, above all, with a rule of decision subjecting nearly three fourths to one fourth? No man's creed was more opposed to such an inversion of the republican order of things."

In a letter to Mr. Townsend of South Carolina, December 18, 1831:

"You ask 'whether Mr. Jefferson was really the author of the Kentucky resolutions, of 1799;' [in which the word 'nullify' is used, though not in the sense of South Carolina nullification.] The inference that he was not is as conclusive as it is obvious, from his letter to Col. Wilson Cary Nicholas, of September 5, 1799, in which he expressly declines, for reasons stated, preparing any thing for the legislature of that year.

"That he (Mr. Jefferson) ever asserted a right in a single State to arrest the execution of an act of Congress-the arrest to be valid and permanent, unless reversed by three fourths of the States-is countenanced by nothing known to have been said or done by him. In his letter to Major Cartwright, he refers to a convention as a peaceable remedy for conflicting claims of power in our compound government; but, whether he alluded to a convention as prescribed by the constitution, or brought about by any other mode, his respect for the will of majorities, as the vital principle of republican government, makes it certain that he could not have meant a convention in which a minority of seven States was to prevail over seventeen, either in amending or expounding the constitution."

In the letter (before quoted) to Mr. Trist, December 23, 1832:

"It is remarkable how closely the nullifiers, who make the name of Mr. Jefferson the pedestal for their colossal heresy, shut their eyes and lips whenever his authority is ever so clearly and emphatically against them. You have noticed what he says in his letters to Monroe and Carrington, pages 43 and 302, vol. ii., with respect to the powers of the old Congress to coerce delinquent States, and his reasons for preferring for the purpose a naval to a military force; and, morcover, that it was not necessary to find a right to coerce in the federal articles, that being inherent in the nature of a compact."

In another letter to Mr. Trist, dated August 25, 1834:

"The letter from Mr. Monroe to Mr. Jefferson, of which you inclose an extract, is important. I have one from Mr. Monroe, on the same occasion, more in detail, and not less emphatic in its anti-nullifying language."

In the notes "On Nullification," written in 1835-'6:

"The amount of this modified right of nullification is, that a single State may arrest the operation of a law of the United States, and institute a process which is to terminate in the ascendency of a minority over a large majority. And this new-fangled theory is attempted to be fathered on Mr. Jefferson, the apostle of republicanism, and whose own words declare, that 'acquiescence in the decision of the majority is the vital principle of it.' Well may the friends of Mr. Jefferson disclaim any sanction to it, or to any constitutional right of nullification from his opinions."

In a paper drawn by Mr. Madison, in September, 1829, when his anxieties began first to be disturbed by the portentous approach of the nullification doctrine, he concludes with this carnest admonition, appropriate to the time when it was written, and not less so to the present time, and to posterity:

"In all the views that may be taken of questions between the State governments and the general government, the awful consequences of a final rupture and dissolution of the Union should never for a moment be lost sight of. Such a prospect must be deprecated—must be shuddered at by every friend of his country, to liberty, to the happiness of man. For, in the event of a dissolution of the Union, an impossibility of ever renewing it is brought home to every mind by the difficulties encountered in establishing it. The propensity of all communities to divide, when not pressed into a unity by external dangers, is a truth well understood. There is no instance of a people inhabiting even a small island, if remote from foreign danger, and sometimes in spite of that pressure, who are not divided into alien, rival, hostile tribes. The happy union of these States is a wonder; their constitution a miracle; their example the hope of liberty throughout the world. Wo to the ambition that would meditate the destruction of either."

These extracts, voluminous as they are, are far from exhausting the abundant material which these admirable writings of Mr. Madison contain, on the topic of nullification. They come to us, for our admonition and guidance, with the solenmity of a voice from the grave; and I leave them, without comment, to be pondered in the hearts of his countrymen. Notwithstanding the advanced age and growing bodily infirmities of Mr. Madison, at the time when these letters were written, his mind was never more vigorous nor more luminous. Every generous mind must sympathize with him, in this necessity, in which he felt himself in his extreme age, and when done, not only with the public affairs of the country, but nearly done with all the affairs of the world, to defend himself and associates from the attempt to fasten upon him and them, in spite of his denials, a criminal and anarchical design-wicked in itself, and subversive of the government which he had labored so hard to found, and utterly destructive to that particular feature considered the crowning merit of the constitution; and which wise men and patriotic had specially devised to save our Union from the fate of all leagues. We sympathize with | view of their duty, and believe it to be the only

him in such a necessity. We should feel fo. any man, in the most ordinary case, to whose words a criminal intention should be imputed in deflance of his disclaimers; but, in the case of Mr. Madison-a man so modest, so pure, se just-of such dignity and gravity, both for his age, his personal qualities, and the exalted offices which he had held; and in a case which went to civil war, and to the destruction of a government of which he was one of the most faithful and zealous founders-in such a case, an attempt to force upon such a man a meaning which he disavows, becomes not only outrageous and odious, but criminal and impious. And if, after the authentic disclaimers which he has made in his advanced age, and which are now published. any one continues to attribute this heresy to him, such a person must be viewed by the public as having a mind that has lost its balance! or, as having a heart void of social duty, and fatally bent on a crime, the guilt of which must be thrown upon the tenants of the tombspeechless, but not helpless! for, every just man must feel their cause his own | and rush to a defence which public duty, private honor, patriotism, filial affection, and gratitude to benefactors impose on every man (born wheresoever he may have been) that enjoys the blessings of the government which their labors gave us.

THE AUTHOR'S OWN VIEW OF THE NATURE OF OUR GOVERNMENT, AS BEING A UNION IN CON-TRADISTINCTION TO A LEAGUE: PRESENTED IN A SUBSEQUENT SPEECH ON MISSOURI RESO. LUTIONS.

I po not discuss these resolutions at this time. That discussion is no part of my present object. I speak of the pledge which they contain, and call it a mistake; and say, that whatever may be the wishes or the opinions of the people of Missouri on the subject of the extension or nonextention of slavery to the Territories, they have no idea of resisting any act of Congress on the subject. They abide the law, when it comes, be it what it may, subject to the decision of the ballot-box and the judiciary.

course consistent with the terms and intention of our constitution, and the only one which can save this Union from the fate of all the confederacies which have successively appeared and disappeared in the history of nations. Anarchy among the members, and not tyranny in the head, has been the rock on which all such confederacies have split. The authors of our present form of government knew the danger of this rock, and they endeavored to provide against it. They formed a Union-not a league-a federal legislature to act upon persons, not upon States; and they provided peaceful remedies for all the questions which could arise between the people and the government. They provided a federal judiciary to execute the federal laws when found to be constitutional; and popular elections to repeal them whon found to be bad. They formed a government in which the law and the popular will, and not the sword, was to decide questions; and they looked upon the first resort to the sword for the decision of such questions as the death of the Union.

The old confederation was a league, with a legislature acting upon sovereignties, without power to enforce its decrees, and without union except at the will of the parties. It was powerless for government, and a rope of sand for union. It was to escape from that helpless and tottering government that the present constitution was formed; and no less than ten numbers of the federalist-from the tenth to the twentieth -were devoted to this defect of the old system, and the necessity of the new one. I will read some extracts from these numbers—the joint product of Hamilton and Madison-to show the difference between the league which we abandoned and the Union which we formed-the dangers of the former and the benefits of the latter-that it may be seen that the resolutions of the general assembly of Missouri, if carried out to their conclusions, carry back this Union to the league of the confederation-make it a rope of sand, and the sword the arbiter between the federal head and its members.

Mr. B. then read as follows:

"The great and radical vice, in the structure of the existing confederation, is in the principle of legislation for States or governments, in their corporate or collective capacities, and as contradistinguished from the individuals of which they consist. Though this principle does not run through all the powers delegated to the Union, yet it prevades and governs those on which the efficacy of the rest depends. The consequence of this is, that, though in theory constitutionally binding on the members of the Union, yet in practice they are mere recommendations, which the States observe or disregard at their option. Government implies the power of making laws. It is essential to the idea of a law that it be attended with a sanction, or, in other words, a penalty or punishment for disobedience. This penalty, whatever it may be, can only be inflicted in two ways-by the agency of the courts and ministers of justice, or by military force; by the coercion of the magistracy, or by the coercion of arms. The first kind can evidently apply only to men; the last kind must of necessity be employed against bodies politic, or communities, or States. It is evident there is no process of a court by which their observance of the laws can, in the last resort, be enforced. Sentences may be denounced against them for violations of their duty; but these sentences can only be carried into execution by the sword. In an association where the general authority is confined to the collective bodies of the communities that compose it, every breach of the laws must involve a state of war; and military execution must become the only instrument of civil obedience. Such a state of things can certainly not deserve the name of government, nor would any prudent man choose to commit his happiness to it."

Of the certain destruction of the Union when the sword is once drawn between the members of a Union and their head, they speak thus:

"When the sword is once drawn, the passions of men observe no bounds of moderation. The suggestions of wounded pride, the instigations of irritated resentment, would be apt to carry the States, against which the arms of the Union were exerted, to any extremes necessary to avenge the affront, or to avoid the disgrace of submission. The first war of this kind would probably terminate in a dissolution of the Union."

Of the advantage and facility of the working of the federal system, and its peaceful, efficient, and harmonious operation—if the federal laws are made to operate upon citizens, and not upon States—they speak in these terms:

distinguished from the individuals of which they

"But if the execution of the laws of the naconsist. Though this principle does not run tional government should not require the intervention of the State legislatures; if they were to pass into immediate operation upon the citizens themselves, the particular governments could not interrupt their progress without an open and violent exertion of unconstitutional power. They would be obliged to act, and in such manner as would leave no doubt that they had encroached on the national rights. An experiment of this nature would always be hazardous in the face of a constitution in any degree competent to its own defence, and of a people enlightened enough to distinguish between a legal exercise and an illegal usurpation of authority. The success of it would require not merely a factious majority in the legislature, but the concurrence of the courts of justice, and of the body of the people. If the judges were not embarked in a conspiracy with the legislature, they would pronounce the resolutions of such a majority to be contrary to the supreme law of the land, unconstitutional and void. If the people were not tainted with the spirit of their State representatives, they, as the natural guardians of the constitution, would throw their weight into the national scale, and give it a decided preponderance in the contest."

Of the ruinous effects of these civil wars among the members of a republican confederacy, and their disastrous influence upon the cause of civil liberty itself throughout the world, they

"It is impossible to read the history of the petty republics of Greece and Italy, without feeling sensations of disgust and horror at the distractions with which they were continually agitated, and at the rapid succession of revolutions by which they were kept continually vibrating between the extremes of tyranny and anarchy. From the disorders which disfigure the annals of those republics, the advocates of despotisin have drawn arguments, not only against the forms of republican government, but against the very principles of civil liberty. They have decried all free government as inconsistent with the order of society, and have indulged themselves in malicious exultation over its friends and partisans."

And again they say:

thus speak:

"It must carry its agency to the persons of the citizens. It must stand in need of no intermediate legislation; but must itself be empowered to employ the arm of the ordinary magistrate to execute its own resolutions. The majesty of the national authority must be manifested through the medium of the courts of justice."

After reading these extracts, Mr. B. said: It was to get rid of the evils of the old confederation that the present Union was formed: and, having formed it, they who formed it undertook to make it perpetual, and for that purpose had recourse to all the sanctions held sacred among men-commands, prohibitions. oaths. The States were forbid to form compacts or agreements with each other; the constitution and the laws made in pursuance of it. were declared to be the supreme law of the land; and all authorities, State and federal 'egislative, executive, and judicial, were to be sworn to support it. The resolutions which have been read contradict all this; and the General Assembly mistook their own powers as much as they mistook the sentiments of the people of Missouri when they adopted them.

CHAPTER XC.

PUBLIC LANDS:--DISTRIBUTION OF PROCEEDS

MR. CLAY renewed, at this session, 1832-'33, the bill which he had brought in the session before and which had passed the Senate, to divide the net proceeds of the sales of public lands among the States, to be applied to such purposes as the legislatures of the respective States should think proper. His principal arguments, in favor of the bill, were: first, the aid which the distribution would give to the States, in developing their resources and promoting their prosperity; secondly, the advantage to the federal government, in settling the question of the mode of disposing of the public lands. He explained his bill, which, at first, contained a specification of the objects to which the States should apply the dividends they received, which was struck out, in the progress of the bill, and stated its provisions to be:

"To set apart, for the benefit of the new States, twelve and a half per cent., out of the aggregate proceeds, in addition to the five per cent., which was now allowed to them by empact, before any division took place among the benefit of the new per cent., out of the dition to the five per wed to them by comook place among the States generally. It was thus proposed to assign, in the first place, seventeen and a half per nent to the new States, and then to divide the whole of the residue among the twenty-four states. And, in order to do away any inequality among the new States, grants are specifically made by the bill to those who had not received, heretofore, as much lands as the rest of the new states, from the general government, so as to nut all the new States on an equal footing. This twelve and a half per cent., to the new States, 10 be at their disposal, for either education or internal improvement, and the residue to be at the disposition of the States, subject to no other limitation than this: that it shall be at their option to apply the amount received either to the purposes of education, or the colonization of free people of color, or for internal improvements, or in debts which may have been contracted for internal improvements. And, with respect to the duration of this scheme of distribution proposed by the bill, it is limited to five vears, unless hostilities shall occur between the inited States and any foreign power; in which event, the proceeds are to be applied to the carrying on such war, with vigor and effect, against any common enemy with whom we may be brought in contact. After the conclusion of peace, and after the discharge of the debt created by any such war, the aggregate funds to return to that peaceful destination to which it was the intention of the bill that they should now be directed, that is, to the improvement of the moral and physical condition of the country, and the promotion of the public happiness and prosperity."

He explained his ined a specification of tates should apply the vhich was struck out, , and stated its provi-

He then spoke of the advantages of settling the question of the manner of disposing of the public lands, and said:

"The first remark which seemed to him to be called for, in reference to this subject, was as to the expediency, he would say the necessity, of its immediate settlement. On this point, he was happy to believe that there was a unanimous concurrence of opinion in that body. However they might differ as to the terms on which the distribution of these lands should be made, they ill agreed that it was a question which ought to be promptly and finally, he ! .ed amicably, adjusted. No time more favorable than the preent moment could be selected for the settlement of this question. The last session was much ess favorable for the accomplishment of this bject; and the reasons were sufficiently obvious, without any waste of time in their specifiation. If the question were not now settled, out if it were to be made the subject of an anhual discussion, mixing itself up with all the neasures of legislation, it would be felt in its nfluence upon all, would produce great dissenions both in and out of the House, and affect stensively all the great and important objects had, in the several States, some experience on that subject; and, without going into any de-tails on the subject, he would merely state that it was known, that, for a long period, the small amount of the public domain possessed by some of the States, in comparison with the quantity possessed by the general government, had been a cause of great agitation in the public mind, and had greatly influenced the course of legislation. Persons coming from the quarter of the State in which the public land was situated, united in sympathy and interest, constituted always a body who acted together, to promote their common object, either by donations to settlers, or reduction in the price of the public lands, or the relief of those who are debtors for the public domain; and were always ready, as men always will be, to second all those measures which look towards the accomplishment of the main object which they have in view. So, if this question were not now settled, it would be a source of inexpressible difficulty hereafter, influencing all the great interests of the country, in Congress, affecting great events without, and perhaps adding another to these unhappy causes of division, which unfortunately exist at this moment."

In his arguments in support of his bill, Mr. Clay looked to the lands as a source of revenuo to the States or the federa' government, from their sale, and not from .heir settlement and cultivation, and the revenue to be derived from the wealth and population to which their settlement would give rise; and, concluding with an encomium on his bill under the aspect of revenue from sales, he said:

"He could not conceive a more happy disposition of the proceeds of the public lands, than that which was provided by this bill. It was supposed that five years would be neither too long nor too short a period for a var experiment. In case a war should break out, we may withdraw from its peaceful destination a sum of from two and a half to three and a half millions of doilars per annum, and apply it to a vigorous prosecution of the war-a sum which would pay the interest on sixty millions of dollars, which might be required to sustain the war, and a sum which is constantly and progressively increasing. It proposes, now that the general government has no use for the money, now that the surplus treasure is really a source of vexatious embarrassment to us, and gives rise to a succession of projects, to supply for a short time a fund to the States which want our assistance, to advance to them that which we do not want, and which they will apply to great beneficial national purposes; and, should war take place, to divert it to the vigorous support of the war; and, when it ceases, to apply it again to its peaceful purthich might be before that body. They had poses. And thus we may grow, from time to time, with a fund which will endure for centuries, and which will augment with the growth of the nation, aiding the States in seasons of peace, and sustaining the general government in periods of war."

Mr. Calhoun deprecated this distribution of the land money as being dangerous in itself and unconstitutional, and as leading to the distribution of other revenue—in which he was prophetic. He said:

"Ile could not yield his assent to the mode which this bill proposed to settle the agitated question of the public lands. In addition to several objections of a minor character, he had an insuperable objection to the leading principle of the bill, which proposed to distribute the proceeds of the lands among the States. He believed it to be both dangerous and unconstitutional. He could not assent to the principle, that Congress had a right to denationalize the public funds. He agreed that the objection was not so decided in case of the proceeds of lands, as in that of revenue collected from taxes or duties. The senator from Ohio had adduced evidence from the deed of cession, which certainly countenanced the idea that the proceeds of the lands might be subject to the distribution proposed in the bill; but he was far from being satisfied that the argument was solid or conclusive. If the principle of distribution could be confined to the proceeds of the lands, he would acknowledge that his objection to the principle would be weakened.

" He dreaded the force of precedent, and he foresaw that the time would come when the example of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands would be urged as a reason for distributing the revenue derived from other sources. Nor would the argument be devoid of plausibility. If we, of the Atlantic States, insist that the revenue of the West, derived from lands, should be equally distributed among all the States, we must not be surprised if the interior States should, in like manner, insist to distribute the proceeds of the customs, the great source of revenue in the Atlantic States. Should such a movement be successful, it must be obvious to every one, who is the least acquainted with the workings of the human heart, and the nature of government, that nothing would more certainly endanger the existence of the Union. The revenue is the power of the State, and to distribute its revenue is to dissolve its power into its original elements."

Attempts were made to postpone the bill to the next session, which failed; and it passed the Senate by a vote of 24 to 20.

The bill went to the House and received amendments, which did not obtain the concurrence of the Senate until midnight of the first of March, which, being the short session, was within twenty-four hours of the constitutional termination of the Congress, which was limited to the 3d-which falling this year on Sunday the Congress would adjourn at midnight of the 2nd. Further efforts were made to postpone it, and upon the ground that, in a bill of that magnitude and novelty, the President was on titled to the full ten days for the consideration of it which the constitution allowed him, and he would have but half a day; for if passed that night it could only reach him in the fornoon of the next day-leaving him but half; day for his consideration of the measure, where the constitution allowed him ten; and that half day engrossed with all crowded business of a expiring session. The next evening, the President attended, as usual, in a room adjoining the Senate chamber, to be at hand to sign bills and make nominations. It was some hours in the night when the President sent for me, and with drawing into the recess of a window, told me that he had a veto message ready on the land bill, but doubted about sending it in, lest then should not be a full Senate; and intimated his apprehension that Mr. Calhoun and some of his friends might be absent, and endanger the bill: and wished to consult me upon that point, I told him I would go and reconnoitre the chamber. and adjacent rooms; did so-found that Mr. Calhoun and his immediate friends were absent -returned and informed him, when he said he would keep the bill until the next session and then return it with a fully considered message -his present one being brief, and not such u to show his views fully. I told him I thought he ought to do so-that such a measure ought not to be passed in the last hours of a session in a thin Senate, and upon an imperfect view of his objections; and that the public good required it to be held up. It was so; and during the long vacation of nine months which intervened before the next session, the opposition press and orators kept the country filled with denunciations of the enormity of his conduct in "pock-cling" the bill—as if it had been a case of "flat burglary," instead of being the exercise of a constitutional right, rendered most just and proper under the extraordinary circumstances which had attended the passage, and intended return of the bill. At the commencement of the ensuing session he returned the bill, with his well-considered objections, in an ample message, which, after going over a full history of the derivation of the lands, came to the following conclusions:

"1. That one of the fundamental principles, on which the confederation of the United States was originally based, was, that the waste lands of the West, within their limits, should be the common property of the United States.

"2 That those lands were ceded to the United States by the States which claimed them, and the cessions were accepted, on the express condition that they should be disposed of for the common benefit of the States, according to their respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and for no other purpose whatsever.

"3. That, in execution of these solemn compacts, the Congress of the United States did, under the confederation, proceed to sell these lands, and put the avails into the common treasury; and, under the new constitution, did repeatedly pledge them for the payment of the public debt of the United States, by which pledge each State was expected to profit in proportion to the general charge to be made upon it for that object.

These are the first principles of this whole subject, which, I think, cannot be contested by any one who examines the proceedings of the revolutionary Cougress, the sessions of the several States, and the acts of Congress, under the new constitution. Keeping them deeply impressed upon the mind, let us proceed to examine how far the objects of the cessions have becompleted, and see whether those compacts are not still obligatory upon the United States.

"The debt, for which these lands were pledged by Congress, may be considered as paid, and they are consequently released from that lien. But that pledge formed no part of the compacts with the States, or of the conditions upon which the essions were made. It was a contract between new parties—between the United States and their creditors. Upon payment of the debt, the compacts remain in full force, and the obligation of the United States to dispose of the lands for the common benefit, is neither destroyed nor impaired. As they cannot now be executed in that mode, the only legitimate question which can arise is, in what other way are these lands to be hereafter disposed of for the common benefit of the several States, 'according to their respective and usual proportion in the general charge and expenditure?' The cessions of Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, in express terms, and all the rest impliedly, not only provide thus specifically the proportion, according to which each State shall profit by the proceeds of the land sales, but they proceed to declare that they shall be 'faithfully and bond fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever.' This is the fundamental law of the land, at this moment, growing out of compacts which are older than the constitution, and formed the corner stone on which the Union itself was erected.

"In the practice of the government, the proceeds of the public lands have not been set apart as a separate fund for the payment of the public debt, but have been, and are now, paid into the treasury, where they constitute a part of the aggregate of revenue, upon which the government draws, as well for its current expenditures as for payment of the public debt. In this manner, they have heretofore, and do now, lessen the general charge upon the people of the several States, in the exact proportions

"These general charges have been composed, not only of the public debt and the usual expenditures attending the civil and military administrations of the government, but of the amounts paid to the States, with which these compacts were formed; the amounts paid the Indians for their right of possession; the amounts paid for the purchase of Louisiana and Florida; and the amounts paid surveyors, registers, receivers, clerks, &c., employed in preparing for market, and selling, the western domain. From the origin of the land system, down to the 30th September, 1832, the amount expended for all these purpose has been about $49,701,280 and the amount received from the sales, deducting payments on account of roads, &c., about $38,-386,624. The revenue arising from the public lands, therefore, has not been sufficient to meet the general charges on the treasury, which have grown out of them, by about $11,314,656. Yet, in having been applied to lessen those charges, the conditions of the compacts have been thus far fulfilled, and each State has profited according to its usual proportion in the general charge and expenditure. The annual proceeds of land sales have increased, and the charges have diminished; so that, at a reduced price, those lands would now defray all current charges growing out of them, and save the treasury from further advances on their account. Their original intent and object, therefore, would be accomplished, as fully as it has hitherto been, by reducing the price, and hereafter, as heretofore, bringing the proceeds into the treasury. Indeed, as this is the only mode in which the objects of the original compact can be attained, it may be considered, for all practical purposes, that it is one of their requirements.

"The bill before me begins with an entire subversion of every one of the compacts by which the United States became possessed of their western domain, and treats the subject as if they never had existence, and as if the United States were the original and unconditional owners of all the public lands. The first section directs.

"That, from and after the 31st day of December, 1832, there shall be allowed and paid to each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Alabama, Missouri, Mississippi, and Louisiana, over and above what each of the said States is entitled to by the terms of the compacts entered into between them, respectively, upon their admission into the Union and the United States, the sum of twelve and a half per centum upon the net amount of the saies of the public lands, which, subsequent to the day afosesaid, shall be made within the several limits of the said States; which said sum of twelve and a half per centum shall be applied to some object or objects of internal improvement or education, within the said States, under the direction of their several legislatures."

This twelve and a half per centum is to be taken out of the net proceeds of the land sales, before any apportionment is made; and the same seven States, which are first to receive this proportion, are also to receive their due proportion of the residue, according to the ratio of general distribution.

"Now, waiving all considerations of equity or policy, in regard to this provision, what more need be said to demonstrate its objectionable character, than that it is in direct and undisguised violation of the pledge given by Congress to the States, before a single cession was made; that it abrogates the condition upon which some of the States came into the Union; and that it sets at nought the terms of cession spread upon the face of every grant under which the title to that portion of the public land is held by the federal government?

"In the apportionment of the remaining seven eighths of the proceeds, this bill, in a manner equally undisguised, violates the conditions upon which the United States acquired title to the ceded lands. Abandoning altogether the ratio of distribution, according to the general charge and expenditure provided by the compacts, it adopts that of the federal representative population. Virginia, and other States, which ceded their lands upon the express condition that they should receive a benefit from their sales, in proportion to their part of the general charge, are, by the bill, allowed only a portion of seven eighths of their proceeds, and that not in the proportion of general charge and expenditure, but in the ratio of their federal representative population.

"The constitution of the United States did not delegate to Congress the power to abrogate these compacts. On the contrary, by declaring that nothing in it shall be so construed as to public revenue. This bill proposes to raise from prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State, it virtually provides that these compacts, and the rights they secure, shall remain untouched by the legislative power, which shall only make all 'needful rules and regulations' for carrying them into effect. All beyond this, would seem to be an assumption of undelegated power.

"These ancient compacts are invaluable monn. ments of an age of virtue, patriotism, and disinterestedness. They ex. It the price that great States, which had won liberty, were willing to pay for that Union, wit , it which, they plainly saw, it could not be preserved. It was not be territory or State power that our revolutionary fathers took up arms; it was for individual liberty, and the right of self-government. The expulsion, from the continent, of British armies and British power was to them a barren conquest, if, through the collisions of the redeemed States, the individual rights for which ther fought should become the prey of petty military tyrannies established at home. To avert such consequences, and throw around liberty the shield of union, States, whose relative strength, at the time, gave them a preponderating power, magnanimously sacrificed domains which would have made them the rivals of empires, only stipulating that they should be disposed of for the common benefit of themselves and the other confederated States. This enlightened policy produced union, and has secured liberty. It has made our waste lands to swarm with a busy people, and added many powerful States to our confederation. As well for the fruits which these noble works of our ancestors have produced, as for the devotedness in which ther originated, we should hesitate before we demolish them.

"But there are other principles asserted in the bill, which would have impelled me to with hold my signature, had I not seen in it a viola. tion of the compacts by which the United States acquired title to a large portion of the public lands. It reasserts the principle contained in the bill authorizing a subscription to the stock of the Maysville, Washington, Paris, and Lerington Turnpike Road Company, from which! was compelled to withhold my consent, for ressons contained in my message of the 27th May 1830, to the House of Representatives. The leading principle, then asserted, was, that Congress possesses no constitutional power to appropriate any part of the moneys of the United States for objects of a local character within the States. That principle, I cannot be mistaken in supposing, has received the unequivocal sanction of the American people, and all subsequent reflection has but satisfied me more thoroughly that the interests of our people, and the purity of our government, if not its existence, depend on its observance. The public lands are the common property of the United States, and the moneys arising from their sales are a part of the

The former appropriation is expressly for internal improvements or education, without qualification as to the kind of improvements, and, therefore, in express violation of the principle maintained in my objections to the turnpike road bill, above referred to. The latter appropriation is more broad, and gives the money to be applied to any local purpose whatsoever. It will not be denied, that, under the provisions of the bill, a portion of the money might have been applied to making the very road to which the bill of 1830 had reference, and must, of course, come within the scope of the same principle. If the money of the United States cannot be applied to local purposes through its own agents, as little can it be permitted to be thus expended through the agency of the State governments.

"It has been supposed that, with all the reductions in our revenue which could be speedily effected by Congress, without injury to the substantial interests of the country, there might be, for some years to come, a surplus of moneys in the treasury; and that there was, in principle, no objection to returning them to the people by whom they were paid. As the literal accomplishment of such an object is obviously impracticable, it was thought admissible, as the nearest approximation to it, to hand them over to the State governments, the more immediate representatives of the people, to be by them applied to the benefit of those to whom they properly belonged. The principle and the object was, to return to the people an unavoidable surplus of revenue which might have been paid by them under a system which could not at once be abandoned; but even this resource, which at one time seemed to be almost the only alternative to save the general government from grasping unlimited power over internal improvements, was suggested with doubts of its constitutionality.

"But this bill assumes a new principle. Its object is not to return to the people an unavoidable surplus of revenue paid in by them, but to create a surplus for distribution among the States. It seizes the entire proceeds of one source of revenue, and sets them apart as a surplus, making it necessary to raise the money for supporting the government, and meeting the general charges, from other sources. It even throws the entire land system upon the customs for its support, and makes the public lands a perpetual charge upon the treasury. It does not return to the people moneys accidentally or unavoidably paid by them to the government by which they are not wanted; but compels the people to pay moneys into the treasury for the mere purpose of creating a surplus for distribution to their

State governments. If this principle be once admitted, it is not difficult to perceive to what consequences it may lead. Already this bill, by throwing the land system on the revenues from imports for support, virtually distributes among the States a part of those revenues. The proportion may be increased from time to time, without any departure from the principle now asserted, until the State governments shall derive all the funds necessary for their support from the treasury of the United States; or, if a sufficient supply should be obtained by some States and not by others, the defleient States might complain, and, to put an end to all further difficulty, Congress, without assuming any new principle, need go but one step further, and put the salaries of all the State governors, judges, and other officers, with a sufficient sum for other expenses, in their general appropriation bill.

"It appears to me that a more direct road to consolidation cannot be devised. Money is power, and in that government which pays all the public officers of the States, will all political power be substantially concentrated. The State governments, if governments they might be called, would lose all their independence and dignity. The economy which now distinguishes them would be converted into a profusion, limited only by the extent of the supply. Being the dependants of the general government, and looking to its treasury as the source of all their emoluments, the State officers, under whatever names they might pass, and by whatever forms their duties might be prescribed, would, in effect, be the mero stipendaries and instruments of the central power.

"I am quite sure that the intelligent people of our several States will be satisfied, on a little reflection, that it is neither wise nor safe to release the members of their local legislatures from the responsibility of levying the taxes necessary to support their State governments, and vest it in Congress, over most of whose members they have no control. They will not think it expedient that Congress shall be the fax-gatherer and paymaster of all their State governments, thus amalgamating all their officers into one mass of common interest and common feeling. It is too obvious that such a course would subvert our well-balanced system of government, and ultimately deprive us of the blessings now derived from our happy union.

"However willing I might be that any unavoidable surplus in the treasury should be returned to the people through their State governments, I cannot assent to the principle that a surplus may be created for the purpose of distribution. Viewing this bill as, in effect, assuming the right not only to create a surplus for that purpose, but to divide the contents of the treasury among the States without limitation, from whatever source they may be derived, and asserting the power to raise and appropriate money for the support of every State government and institution, as well as for making every local improvement, however trivial, I cannot give it my assent.

"It is difficult to perceive what advantages would accrue to the old States or the new from the system of distribution which this bill proposes, if it were otherwise unobjectionable. It requires no argument to prove, that if three millions of dollars a year, or any other sum, shall be taken out of the treasury by this bill for distribution, it must be replaced by the same sum collected from the people through some other means. The old States will receive annually a sum of money from the treasury, but they will pay in a larger sum, together with the expenses of collection and distribution. It is only their proportion of seven eights of the proceeds of land sales which they are to receive, but they must pay their due proportion of the whole. Disguise it as we may, the bill proposes to them a dead loss in the ratio of eight to seven, in addition to expenses and other incidental losses. This assertion is not the less true because it may not at first be palpable. Their receipts will be in large sums, but their payments in small ones. The governments of the States will receive seven dollars, for which the people of the States will pay eight. The large sums received will be palpable to the senses; the small sums paid, it requires thought to identify. But a little consideration will satisfy the people that the effect is the same as if seven hundred dollars were given them from the public treasury, for which they were at the same time required to pay in taxes, direct or indirect, eight hundred.

"I deceive myself greatly if the new States would find their interests promoted by such a system as this bill proposes. Their true policy consists in the rapid settling and improvement of the waste lands within their limits. As a means of hastening those events, they have long been looking to a reduction in the price of public lands upon the final payment of the national debt. The effect of the proposed system would be to prevent that reduction. It is true, the bill reserves to Congress the power to reduce the price, but the effect of its details, as now arranged, would probably be forever to prevent its

"With the just men who inhabit the new States, it is a sufficient reason to reject this system, that it is in violation of the fundamental laws of the republic and its constitution. But if it were a mere question of interest or expediency, they would still reject it. They would not sell their bright prospect of increasing wealth and growing power at such a price. They would not place a sum of money to be paid into their treasuries, in competition with the settlement of their waste lands, and the increase of their population. They would not consider a small or large annual sum to be paid to their governments, and immediately expended, as an equivalent for that enduring wealth which is composed of flocks and herds, and cultivated that object of abiding interest, the settlement of their waste lands, and the increase of a hardy race of free citizens, their glory in peace and their defence in war.

"On the whole, I adhere to the opinion expressed by me in my annual message of 1832 that it is our true policy that the public lands shall cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue, except for the payment of those general charges which grow out of the acquisition of the lands, their survey, and sale. Although these expenses have not been met by the proceeds of sales heretofore, it is quite certain they will be hereafter, even after a considerable reduction in the price. By meeting in the treasury so much of the general charge as arises from that source, they will be hereafter, as they have been heretofore, disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, according to the compacts of cession. I do not doubt that it is the real interest of each and all the States in the Union, and particularly of the new States, that the price of these '-shall be reduced and graduated; and that, after they have been offer. ed for a certain number of years, the refuse, remaining unsold, shall be abandoned to the States and the machinery of our land system entirely withdrawn. It cannot be supposed the compacts intended that the United States should retain forever a title to lands within the States, which are of no value; and no doubt is entertained that the general interest would be best promoted by surrendering such lands to the States.

"This plan for disposing of the public lands impairs no principle, violates no compact, and deranges no system. Already has the price of those lands been reduced from two dollars per acre to one dollar and a quarter; and upon the will of Congress, it depends whether there shall be a further reduction. While the burdens of the East are diminishing by the reduction of the duties upon imports, it seems but equal justice that the chief burden of the West should be lightened in an equal degree at least. It would be just to the old States and the new, conciliate every interest, disarm the subject of all its dangers, and add another guaranty to the perpetuity of our happy Union."

Such was this ample and well-considered message, one of the wisest and most patriotic ever delivered by any President, and presenting General Jackson under the aspect of an immense clevation over the ordinary arts of men who run a popular career, and become candidates for popular votes. Such arts require addresses to popular interests, the conciliation of the interested passions, the gratification of cupidity, the favoring of the masses in the distribution of money or property as well as the enrichment of classes in undue advantages. General Jackson exhibits himself as equally elevated above all these arts-as far above seducing the masses with agrarian laws as above enriching the few with the plundering legislation of banks and tariffs; and the people felt this elevation, and did honor to themselves in the manner in which they appreciated it. Far from losing his popularity, he increased it, by every act of disdain which he exhibited for the ordinary arts of conciliating popular favor. His veto message, on this occasion was an exemplification of all the dain.

high qualities of the public man. He sat out with showing that these lands, so far as they were divided from the States, were granted as a common fund, to be disposed of for the benefit of all the States, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever; and that by the principles of our government and sound policy, those acquired from foreign governments could only be disposed of in the same manner. In addition to these great reasons of principle and policy, the message clearly points out the mischief which any scheme of distribution will inflict upon the new States in preventing reductions in the price of the public lands—in preventing donations to settlers -and in preventing the cession of the unsalable lands to the States in which they lie; and recurs to his early messages in support of the policy, now that the public debt was paid, of looking to settlement and population as the chief objects to be derived from these lands, and for that purpose that they be sold to settlers at cost.

Mr. Andrew Stevenson, who had been chosen Speaker of the House for the three succeeding Congresses, was re-elected by a great majority -indicating the administration strength, and his own popularity. The annual message was immediately sent in, and presented a gratifying view of our foreign relations—all nations being in peace and amity with us, and many giving fresh proofs of friendship, either in new treaties formed, or indemnities made for previous injuries. The state of the finances was then adverted to, and shown to be in the most favorable condition. The message said:

"It gives me great pleasure to congratulate you upon the prosperous condition of the finances of the country, as will appear from the report which the Secretary of the Treasury will, in due time, lay before you. The receipts into the Treasury during the present year will amount to more than thirty-two millions of dollars. The revenue derived from customs will, it is believed, be more than twenty-eight millions, and the public lands will yield about three millions. The expenditures within the year, for all objects, including two millions five hundred and seventytwo thousand two hundred and forty dollars and ninety-nine cents on account of the public debt, will not amount to twenty-five millions, and a large balance will remain in the Treasury after satisfying all the appropriations chargeable en the revenue for the present year."

The act of the last session, called the "compromise," the President recommended to observance, "unless it should be found to produce more revenue than the necessities of the government required." The extinction of the public debt presented, in the opinion of the President, the proper occasion for organizing a system of expenditure on the principles of the strictest economy consistent with the public interest; and the passage of the message in relation to hat point was particularly grateful to the old friends of an economical administration of the rovernment. It said:

"But, while I forbear to recommend any furher reduction of the duties, beyond that already provided for by the existing laws, I must earestly and respectfully press upon Congress the mportance of abstaining from all appropriations thich are not absolutely required for the public ning a new erainour government. The national debt, which has so long been a burden on the Treasury, will be finally discharged in the course of the ensuing year. No more money will afterwards be needed than what may be necessary to meet the ordinary expenses of the government. Now then is the proper moment to fix our system of expenditure on firm and durable principles; and I cannot too strongly urge the necessity of a rigid economy, and an inflexible determination not to enlarge the income beyond the real necessities of the government, and not to increase the wants of the government by unnecessary and profuse expenditures. If a contrary course should be pursued, it may happen that the revenue of 1834 will fall short of the demands upon it; and after reducing the tariff in order to lighten the burdens of the people, and providing for a still further reduction to take effect hereafter, it would be much to be deplored if, at the end of another year, we should find ourselves obliged to retrace our steps, and impose additional taxes to meet unnecessary expenditures."

The part of the message, however, which gave the paper uncommon emphasis, and caused it to be received with opposite, and violent emotions by different parts of the community, was that which related to the Ban!: of the United Statesits believed condition—and the consequent removal of the public deposits from its keeping. The deposits had been removed-done in vacation by the order of the President-on the ground of insecurity, as well as of misconduct in the corporation: and as Congress, at the previous session had declared its belief of their safety, this act of the President had already become a point of vehement newspaper attack upon him -destined to be continued in the halls of Congress. His conduct in this removal, and the reasons for it, were thus communicated:

"Since the last adjournment of Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury has directed the money of the United States to be deposited in certain State banks designated by him, and he will immediately lay before you his reasons for this direction. I concur with him entirely in the view he has taken of the subject; and, some months before the removal, I urged upon the department the propriety of taking that step. The near approach of the day on which the charter will expire, as well as the conduct of the bank, appeared to me to call for this measure upon the high considerations of public interest and public duty. The extent of its misconduct, however, although known to be great, was not at that time fully developed by proof. It was not until nterests, and authorized by the powers clearly late in the month of August, that I received delegated to the United States. We are beginestablishing beyond question that this great and powerful institution had been actively engaged in attemping to influence the elections of the public officers by means of its money; and that, in violation of the express provisions of its charter, it had, by a formal resolution, placed its funds at the disposition of its President, to be employed in sustaining the political power of the bank. A copy of this resolution is contained in the report of the government directors, before referred to; and however the object may be disguised by cautious language, no one can doubt that this money was in truth intended for electioneering purposes, and the particular uses to which it was proved to have been applied, abundantly show that it was so understood. Not only was the evidence complete as to the past application of the money and power of the bank to electioneering purposes, but that the resolu-tion of the board of directors authorized the same course to be pursued in future.

"It being thus established, by unquestionable proof, that the Bank of the United States was converted into a permanent electioncering engine, it appeared to me that the path of duty which the Executive department of the government ought to pursue, was not doubtful. As by the terms of the bank charter, no officer but the Secretary of the Treasury could remove the deposits, it seemed to me that this authority ought to be at once exerted to deprive that great corporation of the support and countenance of the government in such a use of its funds, and such an exertion of its power. In this point of the case, the question is distinctly presented, whether the people of the United States are to govern through representatives chosen by their unbiassed suffrages, or whether the money and power of a great corporation are to be secretly exerted to influence their judgment, and control their decisions. It must now be determined whether the bank is to have its candidates for all offices in the country, from the highest to the lowest, or whether candidates on both sides of political questions shall be brought forward as heretofore, and supported by the usual means.

" At this time, the efforts of the bank to control public opinion, through the distresses of some and the fears of others, are equally apparent, and, if possible, more objectionable. By a curtailment of its accommodations, more rapid than any emergency requires, and even while it retains specie to an almost unprecedented amount in its vaults, it is attempting to produce great embarrassment in one portion of the community, while, through presses known to have been sustained by its money, it attempts, by unfounded alarms, to create a panic in all.

"These are the means by which it seems to expect that it can force a restoration of the deposits, and, as a necessary consequence, extort from Congress a renewal of its charter. I am happy to know that, through the good sense of our people, the effort to get up a panic has proposition of amendment to the vote of the hitherto failed, and that, through the increased accommodations which the State banks have been enabled to afford, no public distress has followed the exertions of the bank; and it cannot be doubted that the exercise of its power, and the expenditure of its money, as well as its efforts to spread groundless alarm, will be met and rebuked as they deserve. In my own sphere of duty, I should feel myself called on, by the facts disclosed, to order a scire facias against the bank, with a view to put an end to the chartered rights it has so palpably violated, were it not that the charter itself will expire as soon as a decision would probably be obtained from the court of last resort.

"I called the attention of Congress to this subject in my last annual message, and informed them that such measures as were within the reach of the Secretary of the Treasury, had been taken to enable him to judge whether the public deposits in the Bank of the United States were entirely safe; but that as his single powers might be inadequate to the object, I recommended the subject to Congress, as worthy of their serious investigation: declaring it as my opinion that an inquiry into the transactions of that institution, embracing the branches as well as the principal bank, was called for by the eredit which was given throughout the country to many serious charges impeaching their character. and which, if true, might justly excite the apprehension that they were no longer a safe depository for the public money. The extent to which the examination, thus recommended, was gone into, is spread upon your journals, and is too well known to require to be stated. Such as was made resulted in a report from a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means, touching certain specified points only, concluding with a resolution that the government deposits might safely be continued in the Bank of the United States. This resolution was adopted at the close of the session, by the vote of a majority of the House of Representatives."

The message concluded with renewing the re commendation, which the President had annually made since his first election, in favor of 80 amending the constitution in the article of the presidential and vice-presidential elections, as to give the choice of the two first officers of the government to a direct vote of the people, and that "every intermediate agency in the election of those officers should be removed." This recommendation, like all which preceded it, remained without practical results. For ten years committees had reported amendments, and members had supported them, but without obtaining in Congress the requisite two thirds to refer the

This reich preceded it, remainscults. For ten years amendments, and mem-, but without obtaining two thirds to refer the ent to the vote of the people. Three causes combined always to prevent the concurrence of that majority: 1. The conservative spirit of many, who are unwilling, under any circumstances, to touch an existing institution. 2. The enemies of popular elections, who deem it unsafe to lodge the high power of the presidential election, directly in the Lands of the people. 3. The intriguers, who wish to manage these elections for their own benefit, and have no means of doing it except through the agency of intermediate bodies. The most potent of these agencies, and the one in fact which controls all the others, is the one of latest and most spontaneous growth, called "conventions"-originally adopted to supersede the caucus system of nominations, but which retains all the evils of that system, and others peculiar to itself. They are still attended by members of Congress, and with less responsibility to their constituents than when acting in a Congress caucus. A large proportion of the delegates are either self-appointed or so intriguingly appointed, and by such small numbers, as to constitute a burlesque upon popular representation. Delegates even transfer their functions, and make proxies-a prerogative only allewed to peers of the realm, in England, in their parliamentary voting, because they are legislators in their own right, and represent, each one, himself, as his own constituent body, and owing responsibility to no one. They meet in taverns, the delegates of some of the large States, attended by one or two thousand backers, supplied with money, and making all the public appliances of feasting and speaking, to conciliate or control votes, which ample means and determined zeal can supply, in a case in which a personal benefit is expected. The minority rules, that is to say, baffles the majority until it yields, and consents to a "compromise," accepting for that purpose the person whom the minority has held in reserve for that purpose; and this minority of one third, which governs two thirds, is itself usually governed by a few managers. And to complete the exclusion of the people from all efficient control, in the selection of a presidential candidate, an interlocutory committee is generally appointed out of its members to act from one convention to another-during the whole interval of four years between their periodical assemblages-to guide and conduct the public mind, in the different States, to the support of the person on whom they have secretly agreed. After the nomination is over, and the election effected, the managers in these nominations openly repair to the new President, if they have been successful, and demand rewards for their labor, in the shape of offices for themselves and connections. This is the way that presidential elections are now made in the United States; for, a party nomination is an election, if the party is strong enough to make it; and, if one is not, the other is; for, both parties act alike, and thus the mass of the people have no more part in selecting the person who is to be their President than the subjects of hereditary monarchs have in begetting the child who is to rule over them. To such a point is the greatest of our elections now sunk by the arts of "intermediate agencies;" and it may be safely assumed, that the history of free elective governments affords no instance of such an abandonment, on the part of legal voters, of their great constitutional privileges, and quiet sinking down of the millions to the automaton performance of delivering their votes as the few have directed.

CHAPTER XCII.

REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITS FROM THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

THE fact of this removal was communicated to Congress, in the annual message of the President; the reasons for it, and the mode of doing it, were reserved for a separate communication; and especially a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, to whom belonged the absolute right of the removal, without assignment of any reasons except to Congress, after the act was done. The order for the removal, as it was called-for it was only an order to the collectors of revenue to cease making their deposits in that bank, leaving the amount actually in it, to be drawn out of intervals, and in different sums, according to the course at the government disbursements-was issued the 22d of September, and signed by Roger B. Taney, Esq., the new Secretary of the Trensury, appointed in place of

Mr. Wm. J. Duane, who, refusing to make the reofterwood. Chief I write. moval, upon the request of the President, was himself removed. This measure (the ceasing to deposit the public moneys with the Bank of the United States) was the President's own measure, conceived by him, carried out by him, defended by him, and its fate dependent upon him. He had coadjutors in every part of the business, but the measure was his own; for this heroic civil measure, like a heroic military resolve, had to be the offspring of one great mind-self-acting and poised-seeing its way through all difflculties and dangers; and discerning ultimate triumph over all obstacles in the determination to conquer them, or to perish. Councils are good for safety, not for heroism-good for escapes from perils, and for retreats, but for action, and especially high and daring action, but one mind is wanted. The removal of the deposits was an act of that kind-high and daring, and requiring as much nerve as any enterprise of arms, in which the President had ever been engaged. His military exploits had been of his own conception; his great civil acts were to be the same; more impeded than promoted by councils. And thus it was in this case. The majority of his cabinet was against him. His Secretary of the Treasury refused to execute his will. A few only-a fraction of the cabinet and some friends-concurred heartily in the act: Mr. Taney, attorney general, Mr. Kendall, Mr. Francis P. Blair, editor of the Globe; and some few others.

He took his measures carefully and deliberately, and with due regard to keeping himself demonstrably, as well as actually right. Observation had only confirmed his opinion, communicated to the previous Congress, of the misconduct of the institution, and the insecurity of the public moneys in it: and the almost unanimous vote of the House of Representatives to the contrary, made no impression upon his strong conviction. Denied a legislative examination into its affairs, he determined upon an executive one, through inquiries put to the government directors, and the researches into the state of the books, which the Secretary of the Treasury had a right to make. Four of those directors, namely, Messrs. Henry D. Gilpin, John T. Sullivan, Peter Wager, and Hugh McEldery, made two reports to the President, according to the duty assigned them, in which they showed ted to us, contained very little information rela-great misconduct in its management, and a great perversion of its funds to undue and political purposes. Some extracts from these reports will show the nature of this report, the names of persons to whom money was paid being omitted, as the only object, in making the extracts is to show the conduct of the bank, and not to disturb or affect any individuals.

"On the 30th November, 1830, it is stated on the minutes, that 'the president submitted to the board a copy of an article on banks and currency, just published in the American Quarterly Review of this city, containing a favorable notice of this institution, and suggested the expediency of making the views of the author more extensively known to the public than they can be by means of the subscription list.' Where-upon, it was, on motion, Resolved, That the president be authorized to take such measures. in regard to the circulation of the contents of the said article, either in whole or in part, as he may deem most for the interests of the bank! On the 11th March, 1831, it again appears by the minutes that 'the president stated to the board, that, in consequence of the general desire expressed by the directors, at one of their meetings of the last year, subsequent to the adjournment of Congress, and a verbal understanding with the board, measures had been taken by him, in the course of that year, for furnishing numerous copies of the reports of General Smith and Mr. McDuffie on the subject of this bank, and for widely disseminating their contents through the United States; and that he has since, by virtue of the authority given him by a resolution of this board, on the 30th day of November last, caused a large edition of Mr. Gallatin's essay on banks and currency to be published and circulated, in like manner, at the expense of the bank. He suggested, at the same time, the propriety and expediency of extending still more widely a knowledge of the concerns of this institution, by means of the republication of other valuable articles, which had issued from the daily and periodical press.' Whereupon, it was, on motion, 'Resolved, That the president is hereby authorized to cause to be prepared and circulated, such documents and papers as may communicate to the people information, in regard to the nature and operations of the bank.

"In pursuance, it is presumed, of these resolutions, the item of stationary and printing was increased, during the first half year of 1831, to the enormous sum of $29,979 92, exceeding that of the previous half year by $23,000, and exceeding the semi-annual expenditure of 1829, upwards of $26,000. Among other sums, was one of $7,801, stated to have been paid on orders of the president, under the resolution of 11th March, 1831, and the orders themselves were the only vouchers of the expenditure which we found on file. Some of the orders, to the amount of about $1,800, stated that the expenditure was for distributing General Smith's and Mr. McDuffie's reports, and Mr. Gallatin's pamphlet; but the rest stated generally that it was made under the resolution of 11th of March, 1831. There were also numerous bills and receipts for expenditures to indious bills and some straightful of the straightful o for 11,000 extra papers; of the American Sentinel, $125 74 for printing, folding, packing, and postage on 3,000 extras; $1,830 27 for upwards of 50,000 copies of the National Gazette, and supplements containing addresses to members of State legislatures, reviews of Mr. Benton's speech, abstracts of Mr. Gallatin's article from the American Quarterly Review, and editorial article on the project of a Treasury Bank; $1,447 75 for 25,000 copies of the reports of Mr. McDuffle and General Smith, and for 25,000 copies of the address to members of the State legislatures, agreeably to order; $2,850 for 01,000 copies of 'Gallatin on Banking,' and 2,000 copies of Professor Tucker's article.

"During the second half year of 1831, the item of stationery and printing was $13,224 87, of which $5,010 were paid on orders of the president, and stated generally to be under the resolution of 11th March, 1831, and other sums were paid to individuals, as in the previous account, for printing and distributing documents.

"During the first half year of 1832, the item of stationery and printing was $12,134 16, of which $2,150 was stated to have been paid on orders of the president, under the resolution of 11th March, 1831. There are also various individual payments, of which we noticed $106 38 for one thousand copies of the review of Mr. Benton's speech; $200 for one thousand copies of the Saturday Courier; $1,176 for twenty thousand copies of a pamphlet concerning the bank, and six thousand copies of the minority report relative to the bank; $1,800 for three hundred copies of Clarke & Hall's bank book. During the last half year of 1832, the item of stationery and printing rose to $26,543 72, of which $6,350 are stated to have been paid on orders of the president, under the resolution of 11th March, 1831. Among the specified charges we observe $821 78 for printing a review of the veto; $1,371 04 for four thousand copies of Mr. Ewing's speech, bank documents, and review of and minority reports; $295 for fourteen thous sand extras of The Protector, containing bank documents; $2,583 50 for printing and distributing reports, Mr. Webster's speech, &c. $150 12 for printing the speeches of Messrs. Clay, Ewing, and Smith, and Mr. Adams's report; $1,512.75 to Mr. Clark, for printing Mr. Webster's speech and articles on the veto, and $2,422.65 for fifty-two thousand five hundred copies of Mr. Webster's speech. There is also a charge of $4,040 paid on orders of the president, stating that it is for expenses in measures for protecting the bank against a run on the Western branches.

"During the first half year of 1833, the item of stationery and printing was $9,093 59, of which $2,600 are stated to have been paid on orders of the president, under the resolution of 11th March, 1831. There is also a charge of $800 for printing the report of the exchange

These various items, amounting to about $80,000, all explain themselves by their names and dates-every name of an item referring to a political purpose, and every date corresponding with the impending questions of the recharter and the presidential election; and all charged to the expense account of the bank-a head of account limited, by the nature of the institution, so far as printing was concerned, to the printing necessary for the conducting of its own business; yet in the whole sum, making the total of $80,000, there is not an item of that kind included. To expose, or correct these abuses, the government directors submitted the following resolution to the board:

"Whereas, it appears by the expense account of the bank for the years 1831 and 1832, that upwards of $80,000 were expended and charged under the head of stationery and printing during that period; that a large proportion of this sum was paid to the proprietors of newspapers and periodical journals, and for the printing, distribution, and postage of immense numbers of pamphlets and newspapers; and that about $20,000 were expended under the resolutions of 30th November, 1830, and 11th March, 1831, without any account of the manner in which, or the persons to whom, they were disbursed: and whereas it is expedient and proper that the particulars of this expenditure, so large and unusual, which can now be ascertained only by the examinaton of numerous bills and receipts, should be so stated as to be readily submitted to, and examined by, the board of directors and the stockholders: Therefore, Resolved, That the the vete; $4,106 13 for sixty-three thousand cashier furnish to the board, at as early a day copies of Mr. Webster's speech, Mr. Adams's as possible, a full and particular statement of and Mr. McDuffie's reports, and the majority all these expenditures, designating the sums of money paid to each person, the quantity and names of the documents furnished by him, and his charges for the distribution and postage of the same; together with as full a statement as may be of the expenditures under the resolutions of 30th November, 1830, and 11th March, 1831. That he ascertain whether expenditures of the same character have been made at any of the offices, and if so, procure similar statements thereof, with the authority on which they were made. That the said resolutions be reseinded, and no further expenditures made under the same."

This resolution was rejected by the board, and in place of it another was adopted, declaring perfect confidence in the president of the bank, and directing him to continue his expenditures under the two resolves of November and March according to his discretion; -thus continuing to him the power of irresponsible expenditure, both in amount and object, to any extent that he pleased. The reports also showed that the government directors were treated with the indignity of being virtually excluded, both from the transactions of the bank, and the knowledge of them; and that the charter was violated to effect these outrages. As an instance, this is given: the exchange committee was in itself, and even confined to its proper duties, that of buying and selling exchange, was a very important one, having the application of an immense amount of the funds of the bank. While confined to its proper duties, it was changed monthly, and the directors served upon it by turns; so that by the process of rotation and speedy renewal, every member of the directory was kept well informed of the transactions of this committee, and had their due share in all its great operations. But at this time-(time of the renewed charter and the presidential election)—both the duties of the committee, and its mode of appointment were altered; discounting of notes was permitted to it, and the appointment of its members was invested in Mr. Biddle; and no government director was henceforth put upon it. Thus, a few directors made the loans in the committee's room, which by the charter could only be made by seven directors at the board; and the government directors, far from having any voice in these exchange loans, were ignorant of them until afterwards found on the most of the loans to members of Congress were made, and under whose operations the greatest losses were eventually incurred. The report of the four directors also showed other great misconduct on the part of the bank, one of which was to nearly double its discounts at the approaching termination of the charter, running them up in less than a year and a half from about forty-two and a half to about seventy and a half millions of dollars. General Jackson was not the man to tolerate these illegalities, corruptions and indignities. He, therefore, determined on ceasing to use the institution any longer as a place of deposit for the public moneys; and accordingly communicated his intention to the cabinet, all of whom had been requested to assist him in his deliberations on the subject. The major part of them dissented from his design; whereupon he assembled them on the 22nd of September, and read to them a paper, of which the following are the more essential parts:

"Having carefully and anxiously considered all the facts and arguments which have been submitted to him, relative to a removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, the President deems it his duty to communicate in this manner to his cabinet the final conclusions of his own mind, and the reasons on which they are founded, in order to put them in durable form, and to prevent miscon-

"The President's convictions of the dangerous tendencies of the Bank of the United States. since signally illustrated by its own acts, were so overpowering when he entered on the duties of chief magistrate, that he felt it his duty, notwithstanding the objections of the friends by whom he was surrounded, to avail himself of the first occasion to call the attention of Congress and the people to the question of its recharter. The opinions expressed in his annual message of December, 1829, were reiterated in those of December, 1830 and 1831, and in that of 1830, he threw out for consideration some suggestions in relation to a substitute. At the session of 1831-'32 an act was passed by a majority of both Houses of Congress rechartering the present bank, upon which the President felt it his duty to put his constitutional veto. In his message, returning that act, he repeated and enlarged upon the principles and views briefly asserted in his annual messages, declaring the bank to be, in his opinion, both inexpedient and unconstitutional, and announcing to his countrymen, very unequivocally, his firm determination books. It was in this exchange committee that | never to sanction, by his approval, the continuance of t any other the motiv at that se leading q the Unite all steps cure from decision.

"There are strong reasons for believing that the motive of the bank in asking for a recharter at that session of Congress, was to make it a leading question in the election of a President of the United States the ensuing November, and all steps deemed necessary were taken to procure from the people a reversal of the President's decision.

"Although the charter was approaching its termination, and the bank was aware that it was the intention of the government to use the public deposit as fast as it has accrued, in the paynent of the public debt, yet did it extend its loans from January, 1831, to May, 1832, from $12,402,304 24 to $70,428,070 72, being an increase of $28,025,766 48, in sixteen months. It is confidently believed that the leading object of this immense extension of its loans was to bring as large a portion of the people as possible under its power and influence; and it has been disclosed that some of the largest sums were granted on very unusual terms to the conductors of the public press. In some of these cases, the motive was made manifest by the nominal or insufficient security taken for the loans, by the arge amounts discounted, by the extraordinary time allowed for payment, and especially by the subsequent conduct of those receiving the ac-

"Having taken these preliminary steps to obtain control over public opinion, the bank came into Congress and asked a new charter. The object avowed by many of the advocates of the bank, was to put the President to the test, that the country might know his final determination relative to the bank prior to the ensuing election. Many documents and articles were printed and circulated at the expense of the bank, to bring the people to a favorable decision upon its pretensions. Those whom the bank appears to have made its debtors for the special occasion, were warned of the ruin which awaited them, should the President be sustained, and attempts were made to alarm the whole people by painting the depression in the price of property and produce, and the general loss, inconvenience, and distress, which it was represented would immediately follow the re-election of the President in opposition to the bank.

"Can it now be said that the question of a recharter of the bank was not decided at the election which ensued? Had the veto been equivocal, or had it not covered the whole ground—if it had merely taken exceptions to the details of the bill, or to the time of its passage -if it had not met the whole ground of constitutionality and expediency, then there might have been some plausibility for the allegation that the question was not decided by the people. It was to compel the President to take his stand, that the question was brought forward at that particular time. He met the challenge, willingly sought to force him, and frankly declared his unalterable opposition to the bank as being both unconstitutional and inexpedient. On that ground the case was argued to the people, and now that the people have sustained the President, notwithstanding the array of influence and power which was brought to bear upon him, it is too late, he confidently thinks, to say that the question has not been decided. Whatever may be the opinions of others, the President considers his re-election as a decision of the people against the bank. In the concluding paragraph of his veto message he said:

"I have now done my duty to my country. If sustained by my fellow-citizens, I shall be grateful and happy; if not, I shall find in the motives which impel me, ample grounds for contentment and peace.'

"He was sustained by a just people, and he desires to evince his gratitude by carrying into effect their decision, so far as it depends upon him.

" Of all the substitutes for the present bank, which have been suggested, none seems to have united any considerable portion of the public in its favor. Most of them are liable to the same constitutional objections for which the present bank has been condemned, and perhaps to all there are strong objections on the score of expediency. In ridding the country of an irresponsible power which has attempted to control the government, care must be taken not to unito the same power with the executive branch. To give a President the control over the currency and the power over individuals now possessed by the Bank of the United States, even with the material difference that he is responsible to the people, would be as objectionable and as dangerous as to leave it as it is. Neither the one nor the other is necessary, and therefore ought not to be resorted to.

"But in the conduct of the bank may be found other reasons, very imperative in their character, and which require prompt action. Developments have been made from time to time of its faithlessness as a public agent, its misapplication of public funds, its interference in elections, its efforts, by the machinery of committees, to deprive the government directors of a full knowledge of its concerns, and above all, its flagrant misconduct as recently and unexpectedly dis-closed, in placing all the funds of the bank, including the money of the government, at the disposition of the president of the bank, as means of operating upon public opinion and procuring a new charter without requiring him to render a voucher for their disbursement. A brief recapitulation of the facts which justify these charges and which have come to the knowledge of the public and the President, will, he thinks, remove every reasonable doubt as to the course which it is now the duty of the President to pursue.

"We have seen that in sixteen months, ending in May, 1832, the bank had extended its loans more than $28,000,000, although it knew the took the position into which his adversaries government intended to appropriate most of its large deposit during that year in payment of the public debt. It was in May, 1832, that its loans arrived at the maximum, and in the preceding March, so sensible was the bank that it would not be able to pay over the public deposit when it would be required by the government, that it commenced a secret negotiation without the approbation or kr wledge of the government, with the agents, for about $2,700,000 of the three per cent, stocks held in Holland, with a view of inducing them not to come forward for payment for one or more years after notice should be given by the Treasury Department. This arrangement would have enabled the bank to keep and use during that time the public money set apart for the payment of these stocks.

"Although the charter and the rules of the bank, both, declare that 'not less than seven directors' shall be necessary to the transaction of business, yet. the most important business, eithat of granting discounts to any extent, is intrusted to a committee of five members who do not report to the board.

"To cut off all means of communication with the government, in relation to its most important acts, at the commencement of the present year, not one of the government directors was placed on any one committee. And although since, by an unusual remodelling of those bedies, some of those directors have been placed on some of the committees, they are yet entirely excluded from the committee of exchange, through which the greatest and most objectionable loans have been made.

"When the government directors made an effort to bring back the business of the bank to the board, in obedience to the charter and the existing regulations, the board not only over-ruled their attempt, but altered the rule so as to make it conform to the practice, in direct violation of one of the most important provisions of the charter which gave them existence.

"It has long been known that the president of the bank, by his single will, originates and executes many of the most important measures connected with the management and credit of the bank, and that the committee, as well as the board of directors, are left in entire ignorance of many acts done, and correspondence carried on, in their names, and apparently under their authority. The fact has been recently disclosed, that an unlimited discretion has been, and is now, vested in the president of the bank to expend its funds in payment for preparing and circulating articles, and purchasing pamphlets and newspapers, calculated by their contents to operate on elections and secure a renewal of its charter. "With these facts before him, in an official

"With these facts before him, in an official report from the government directors, the President would feel that he was not only responsible for all the abuses and corruptions the bank has committed, or may commit, but almost an ecomplice in a conspiracy against that government which he has sworn honestly to administer, if he did not take every step, within his constitutional and legal power, likely to be efficient in putting an end to these enormities. If it le possible, within the scope of human affairs, to find a reason for removing the government deposits, and leaving the bank to its own resource for the means of effecting its criminal designs, we have it here. Was it expected, when the moneys of the United States were directed to be placed in that bank, that they would be put under the control of one man, empowered to spend millions without rendering a voucher or specifying the object? Can they be considered safe, with the evidence before us that tens of thousands have been spent for highly improper. if not corrupt, purposes, and that the same mo-tive may lead to the expenditure of hundreds of thousands and even millions more? And can we justify ourselves to the people by longer lending to it the money and power of the government, to be employed for such purposes ?

"In conclusion, the President must be permitted to remark that he looks upon the pending question as of higher consideration than the mere transfer of a sum of money from one bank to another. Its decision may affect the character of our government for ages to come. Should the bank be suffered longer to use the public moneys, in the accomplishment of its purposes, with the proof of its faithlessness and corruption before our eyes, the patriotic among our citizens will despair of success in struggling against its power; and we shall be responsible for entailing it upon our country for ever. View. ing it as a question of transcendent importance. both in the principles and consequences it involves, the President could not, in justice to the responsibility which he owes to the country, refrain from pressing upon the Secretary of the Treasury his view of the considerations which impel to immediate action. Upon him has been devolved, by the constitution and the suffrages of the American people, the duty of superintending the operation of the Executive depart ments of the governments, and seeing that the laws are faithfully executed. In the performance of this high trust, it is his undoubted right to express to those whom the laws and his own choice have made his associates in the administration of the government, his opinion of their duties, under circumstances, as they arise. It is this right which he now exercises. Far be it from him to expect or require that any member of the cabinet should, at his request, order, or dictation, do any act which he believes unlawful, or in his conscience condemns. From them, and from his fellow-citizens in general, he desires only that aid and support which their resson approves and their conscience sanctions.

"The President again repeats that he begs his cabinet to consider the proposed measure as his own, in the support of which he shall require no one of them to make a sacrifice of opinion or principle. Its responsability has been assumed after the most mature deliberation and reflection, as necessary to preserve the morals of the Under these convictions, he feels that a measure so important to the American people cannot be commenced too soon; and he, therefore, names the first day of October next as a period proper for the change of the deposits, or sooner, provided the necessary arrangements with the State banks can be made."

I was in the State of Virginia, when the Globe newspaper arrived, towards the end of September, bringing this "paper," which the President had read to his cabinet, and the further information that he had carried his announced design into effect. I felt an emotion of the moral sublime at beholding such an instance of civic heroism. Here was a President, not bred up in the pelitical profession, taking a great step upon his own responsibility from which many of his advisers shrunk; and magnanimously, in the act itself releasing all from the peril that he encountered, and boldly taking the whole upon himself. I say peril; for if the bank should conquer, there was an end to the political prosrects of every public man concurring in the removal. He believed the act to be necessary; and believing that, he did the act-leaving the consequences to God and the country. I felt that a great blow had been struck, and that a great contest must come on, which could only be crowned with success by acting up to the spirit with which it had commenced. And I repaired to Washington at the approach of the session with a full determination to stand by the President, which I believed to be standing by the country; and to do my part in justifying his conduct, and in exposing and resisting the powerful combination which it was certain would be formed against him.

CHAPTER XCIII.

BANK PROCEEDINGS, ON SEEING THE DECISION OF THE PRESIDENT, IN RELATION TO THE RE-MOVAL OF THE DEPOSITS.

IMMEDIATELY on the publication in the Globe f the "Paper read to the Cabinet," the bank co-ordinate body. It summoned a meeting of the directors—appointed a committee—referred the President's "Paper" to it-ordered it to report-held another meeting to receive the report-adopted it (the government directors, Gilpin, Wager, and Sullivan voting against it)and ordered five thousand copies of the report to be printed. A few extracts from the report, entitled a Memorial to Congress, are here given, for the purpose of showing, First, The temper and style in which this moneyed corporation, deriving its existence from the national Congress, indulged itself, and that in its corporate capacity, in speaking of the President of the United States and his cabinet; and, next, to show the lead which it gave to the proceedings which were to be had in Congress. Under the first head, the following passages are given:

"The committee to whom was referred on the 24th of September, a paper signed 'Andrew Jackson, purporting to have been read to a cabinet on the 18th, and also another paper signed 'H. D. Gilpin, John T. Sullivan, Peter Wager, and Hugh McEldery, bearing date August 19th, 1833with instructions to consider the same, and report to the board whether any, and what steps may be deemed necessary on the part of the board in consequence of the publication of said letter and report,' beg leave to state-

"To justify this measure is the purpose of the paper signed 'Andrew Jackson.' Of the paper itself, and of the individual who has signed it, the committee find it difficult to speak with the plainness by which alone such a document, from such a source, should be described, without wounding their own self-respect, and violating the consideration which all American citizens must feel for the chief magistracy of their country. Subduing, however, their feelings and their language down to that respectful tone which is due to the office, they will proceed to examine the history of this measure, its character and the pretexts offered in palliation of it.

"1st. It would appear from its contents and from other sources of information, that the President had a meeting of what is called the cabinet, on Wednesday, the 18th September, and there read this paper. Finding that it made no impression on the majority of persons assembled, the subject was postponed, and in the mean time this document was put into the newspapers. It was obviously published for two reasons. The first was to influence the members of the cabinet by bringing to bear upon their immediate decision the first public impression excited by misrepresentations, which the objects of them sould not refute in time-the second was, by the same excitement, to affect the approaching elections in ook it into consideration in all the forms of a Pennsylvania, Maryland and New Jersey. Its assailants are what are called politicians (i. e., the assailants of the bank),"

Such is the temper and style in which the President of the United States is spoken of by this great moneyed corporation, in a memorial addressed to Congress. Erecting itself into a coordinate body, and assuming in its corporate capacity an authority over the President's act, it does not even condescend to call him President. It is "Andrew Jackson," and the name always placed between inverted commas to mark the higher degree of contempt. Then the corporation shrinks from remarking on the "paper" itself, and the "individual" who signed it, as a thing injurious to their own self-respect, and only to be done in consideration of the "office" which he fills, and that after "subduing" their feelingsand this was the insolence of the moneyed power in defeat, when its champion had received but forty-nine votes for the Presidency out of two for appropriations made by law. If the Treehundred and eighty-eight given in! What would it have been in victory? The lead which would it have been in victory? The lead which it gave to the intended proceedings in Congress, is well indicated in these two paragraphs, and official gazette, announcing the fate of the disthe specifications under them:

"The indelicacy of the form of those proceedings corresponds well with the substance of them, which is equally in violation of the rights of the bank and the laws of the country.

"The committee willingly leave to the Congress of the United States, the assertion of their own constitutional power, and the vindication of the principles of our government, against the most | der it, convert the whole free institutions of the violent assault they have ever yet encountered; and will now confine themselves to the more limited purpose of showing that the reasons assigned for this measure are as unfounded as the object itself is illegal."

The illegality of the proceeding, and the vindication of the constitution, and the principles of the government, from a most violent assault, are the main objects left by the bank to the Congress; the invalidity of the reasons assigned for the removal, are more limited, and lest the Congress might not discover these violations of law and constitution, the corporation proceeds to chumerate and establish them. It says:

"Certainly since the foundation of this government, nothing has ever been done which more deerly wounds the spirit of our free institutions. It, in thet, revolves itself into this—that whenever the raws proscribe extain duties to an gress as the umpire between them. Both Con officer, if that other, acting under the sanctions of his official cath and his private character, refuses to violate that law, the President of the United States may dismiss him and appoint another; and if he too should prove to be a "p. fractory subordinate,' to continue his removals until he at last discovers in the descending scale of degradation some irresponsible individual fit to be the tool of his designs. Lahappily, there are never wanting men who will think as there superiors wish them to think-men who regard more the compensation than the duties of the offlee-men to whom daily bread is sufficient consolation for daily shame.

"The present state of this question is a Scarful illustration of the danger of it. At this moment the whole revenue of this country is at the disposal—the absolute, uncontrolled disposal—of the President of the United States. The law declare that the public funds shall be placed in the Bank of the United States, unless the Secretary of the Treasury forbids it. The Secretary of the Treasury will not forbid it. The President dismisses him, and appoints somebody who will. So the laws declare that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, except on warrand urer refuses to draw his warrant for any disbursement, the President may dismiss him and missed Secretary to all who follow him, 'The agent cannot conscientiously perform the service and refuses to co-operate, and desires to reman to thwart the President's measures. To put an end to this difficulty between the head and the hands of the executive department, the constitution arms the chief magistrate with authority to remove the refractory subordinate.' The theory thus avowed, and the recent practice uncountry into the mere absolute will of a single individual. They break down all the restraints which the framers of the government hoped ther had imposed on arbitrary power, and place the whole revenue of the United States in the hands of the President.

"For it is manifest that this removal of the deposits is not made by the order of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is a perversion of languages to describe it. On the contrary, the reverse openly avowed. The Secretary of the Treasury. fused to remove them, believing, as his published letter declares, that the removal was unnecessary, unwise, viadictive, arbitrary and mi He was then diemiss of become he would note move them, and another was appointed because he would remove them. Now this is a palpable violation of the charter. In this case, they are deprived of it by the unlawful interference of t President, who 'assumes the responsbility, which, being interpreted, means, usurps the power of the Secretary.

The whole structure of the Treasury shows that the design of Congress was to make the Secretary as independent as possible of the President. The other Secretaries are merely executive officers; but the Secretary of the Treasury. the guardian of the public revenue, comes into more immediate sympathy with the representatives of the people who pay that revenue; and although, according to the general scheme of appointment, he is nominated by the President to the bearinget he is in fact the officer of Congress, not the other of the President.

"This independence of the Secretary of the Ireasury-if it be true in general-is more especially true in regard to the bank. It was in fact the leading principle in organizing the bank, that the Prezident should be excluded from all control of it. The question which most divided the House of Representives was, whether there should be any government directors at all; and although this was finally adopted, yet its tendency to create executive influence over the bank was qualifled by two restrictions: first, that no more than three directors should be appointed from any one State; and, second, that the president of the bank should not be, as was originally designed by the Secretary of the Treasury, chosen from among the government directors. Accordingly, by the charter, the Secretary of the Treasury is every thing—the President comparatively nothing. The Secretary has the exclusive supervision of all the relations of the bank with the government."

These extracts are sufficient to show that the corporation charged the President with illegal and unconstitutional conduct, subversive of the principles of our government, and dangerous to our liberties in causing the deposits to be removed-that they looked upon this illegal, unconstitutional, and dangerous conduct as the principal wrong-and left to Congress the assertion of its own constitutional power, and the vindication of the principles of the government from the assault which they had received. And this in a memorial addressed to Congress, of which five thousand copies, in pamphlet form, were printed, and the members of Congress liberally supplied with copies. It will be seen, when we come to the proceedings of Congress, how far the intimations of the memorial in Congress to do it, was complied with by that

CHAPTER XCIV.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY TO CONGRESS ON THE REMOVAL OF THE DE-

By the clause in the charter authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to remove the deposits, that officer was required to communicate the fact immediately to Congress, if in session, if not, at the first meeting; together with his reasons for so doing. The act which had been done was not a "removal," in the sense of that word; for not a dollar was taken from the Bank of the United States to be deposited elsewhere; and the order given was not for a "removal," but for a cessation of deposits in that institution, leaving the public moneys which were in it to be drawn out in the regular course of expenditure. An immediate and total removal might have been well justified by the misconduct of the bank; a cessation to deposit might have been equally well justified on the ground of the approaching expiration of the charter, and the propriety of providing in time for the new places of deposit which that expiration would render necessary. The two reasons put together made a clear case, both of justification and of propricty, for the order which had been given; and the secretary, Mr. Taney, well set them forth in the report which he made, and which was laid before Congress on the day after its meeting. The following are extracts from it:

"The Treasury department being intrusted with the administration of the finances of the country, it was always the duty of the Secretary, in the absence of any legislative provision on the subject, to take care that the public money was deposited in safe keeping, in the hands of faithful agents, and in convenient places, ready to be applied according to the wants of the government. The law incorporating the bank has reserved to him, in its full extent, the power ho before possessed. It does not confer on him a new power, but reserves to him his former authority, without any new limitation. The obligation to assign the reasons for his direction to deposit the money of the United States elsethowing what ought to be done, and leaving where, cannot be considered as a restriction of the power, because the right of the Secretary to designate the place of deposit was always necessarily subject to the control of Congress. And as the Secretary of the Treasury presides over one of the executive departments of the government, and his power over this subject forms a part of the executive duties of his office, the manner in which it is exercised must be subject to the supervision of the officer to whom the constitution has confided the whole executive power, and has required to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

"The faith of the United States is, however, pledged, according to the terms of the section above stated, that the public money shall be deposited in this bank, unless 'the Secretary of the Treasury shall otherwise order and direct.' And as this agreement has been entered into by Congress, in behalf of the United States, the place of deposit could not be changed by a legislative act, without disregarding a pledge, which the legislature has given; and the money of the United States must therefore continue to be deposited in the bank, until the last hour of its existence, unless it shall be otherwise ordered by the authority mentioned in the charter. The power over the place of deposit for the public money would seem properly to belong to the legislative department of the government, and it is difficult to imagine why the authority to withdraw it from this bank was confided exclusively to the Executive. But the terms of the charter appear to be too plain to admit of question; and although Congress should be satisfied that the public money was not safe in the care of the bank, or should be convinced that the interests of the people of the United States imperiously demanded the removal, yet the passage of a law directing it to be done, would be a breach of the agreement into which they have entered.

"In deciding upon the course which it was my duty to pursue in relation to the deposits, I did not feel myself justified in anticipating the renewal of the charter on either of the above-mentioned grounds. It is very evident that the bank has no claim to renewal, founded on the justice of Congress. For, independently of the many serious and insurmountable objections, which its own conduct has furnished, it cannot be supposed that the grant to this corporation of exclusive privileges, at the expense of the rest of the community, for twenty years, can give it a right to demand the still further enjoyment of its profitable monopoly. Neither could I act upon the assumption that the public interest required the recharter of the bank, because I am firmly persuaded that the law which created this corporation, in many of its provisions, is not warranted by the constitution, and that the existence of such a powerful moneyed monopoly, is dangerous to the liberties of the people, and to the purity of our political institutions.

"The manifestations of public opinion, instead of being favorable to a renewal, have been decidedly to the contrary. And I have always regard- I the present Chief Magistrate was re-elected.

ed the result of the last election of the President of the United States, as the declaration of a majority of the people that the charter ought not to be renewed. It is not necessary to state here what is now a matter of history. The question of the renewal of the charter was introduced into the election by the corporation itself. Its voluntary application to Congress for the renew. al of its charter four years before it expired, and upon the eve of the election of President, was understood on all sides as bringing forward that question for incidental decision, at the then approaching election. It was accordingly argued on both sides, before the tribunal of the people. and their verdict pronounced against the bank by the election of the candidate who was known to have been always inflexibly opposed to it.

"The monthly statement of the bank, of the 2d September last, before referred to, shows that the notes of the bank and its branches, then in circulation, amounted to $18,413,287 07, and that its discounts amounted to the sum of $62,653,359 59. The immense circulation above stated, pervading every part of the United States. and most commonly used in the business of commerce between distant places, must all be with. drawn from circulation when the charter expires. If any of the notes then remain in the hands of individuals, remote from the branches at which they are payable, their immediate de-preciation will subject the holders to certain loss. Those payable in the principal commercial cities would, perhaps, retain nearly their nominal value; but this would not be the case with the notes of the interior branches, remote from the great marts of trade. And the statements of the bank will show that a great part of its circulation is composed of notes of this description. The bank would seem to have taken pains to introduce into common use such a description of paper as it could depreciate, or raise to its par value, as best suited its own views; and it is of the first importance to the interests of the public that these notes should all be taken out of circulation, before they depreciate in the hands of the individuals who hold them; and they ought to be withdrawn gradually, and their places supplied, as they retire, by the currency which will become the substitute for them. How long will it re quire, for the ordinary operations of commerce, and the reduction of discounts by the bank, to withdraw the amount of circulation before mentioned, without giving a shock to the currency, or producing a distressing pressure on the com-munity? I am convinced that the time which remained for the charter to run, after the 1st of October (the day on which the first order for removal took effect), was not more than was proper to accomplish the object with safety to the community.

"There is, however, another view of the subject, which in my opinion, made it impossible further to postpone the removal. About the 1st of December, 1832, it had been ascertained that that his decision against the bank had thus been sanctioned by the people. At that time the discounts of the bank amounted to $61,571,625 66. Although the issue which the bank took so much pains to frame had now been tried, and the decision pronounced against it, yet no steps were taken to prepare for its approaching end. On the contrary, it proceeded to enlarge its discounts, and, on the 2d of August, 1833, they amounted to $64,160,349 14, being an increase of more than two and a half millions in the eight months immediately following the decision against them. And so far from preparing to arrange its affairs with a view to wind up its business, it seemed from this course of conduct, to be the design of the bank to put itself in such an attitude, that, at the close of its charter, the country would be compelled to submit to its renewal, or to bear all the consequences of a currency suddenly deranged, and also a severe pressure for the immense outstanding claims which would then be due to the corporation. While the bank was thus proceeding to enlarge its discounts, an agent was appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury to inquire upon what terms the State banks would undertake to perform the services to the government which have heretofore been renderel by the Bank of the United States; and also to ascertain their condition in four of the principal commercial cities, for the purpose of enabling the department to judge whether they would be safe and convenient depositories for the public money. It was deemed necessary that suitable fiscal agents should be prepared in due season, and it was proper that time should be allowed them to make arrangements with one another throughout the country, in order that they might perform their duties in concert, and in a manner that would be convenient and acceptable to the public. It was essential that a change so important in its character, and so extensive in its operation upon the financial concerns of the country, should not be introduced without timely prepara-

"The United States, by the charter, reserved he right of appointing five directors of the bank. It was intended by this means not only to proride guardians for the interests of the public in the general administration of its affairs, but also to have faithful officers, whose situation would enable them to become intimately acquainted with all the transactions of the institution, and whose duty it would be to apprize the proper authorities of any misconduct on the part of the corporation likely to affect the public interest. The fourth fundamental article of the constitution of the corporation declares that not less than seven directors shall constitute a board for the transaction of business. At these meetings of the board, the directors on the part of the United States had of course a right to be present; and, consequently, if the business of the corporation had been transacted in the manner which the law requires, there was abundant security that nothing could be done, injuriously affecting the interests of the people, without being immediately communicated to the public servants, who were authorized to apply the remedy. And if the corporation has so arranged its concerns as to conceal from the public directors some of its most important operations, and has thereby destroyed the safeguards which were designed to secure the interests of the United States, it would seem to be very clear that it has forfeited its claim to confidence, and

"Instead of a board constituted of at least seven directors, according to the charter, at which those appointed by the United States have a right to be present, many of the most important money transactions of the bank have been, and still are, placed under the control of a committee, denominated the exchange committee, of which no one of the public directors has been allowed to be a member since the commencement of the present year. This commit-tee is not even elected by the board, and the public directors have no voice in their appointment. They are chosen by the president of the bank, and the business of the institution, which ought to be decided on by the board of directors, is, in many instances, transacted by this committee; and no one had a right to be present at their proceedings but the president, and those whom he shall please to name as members of this committee. Thus, loans are made, unknown at the time to a majority of the board, and paper discounted which might probably be rejected at a regular meeting of the directors. The most important operations of the bank are sometimes resolved on and executed by this committee; and its measures are, it appears, designedly, and by regular system, so arranged, as to conceal from the officers of the government transactions in which the public interests are deeply involved. And this fact alone furnishes evidence too strong to be resisted, that the concealment of certain important operations of the corporation from the officers of the government is one of the objects which is intended to be accomplished by means of this committee. The plain words of the charter are violated, in order to deprive the people of the United States of one of the principal securities which the law had provided to guard their interests, and to render more safe the public money intrusted to the care of the bank. Would any individual of ordinary discretion continue his money in the hands of an agent who violated his instructions for the purpose of hiding from him the manner in which he was conducting the business confided to his charge? Would he continue his property in his hands, when he had not only ascertained that concealment had been practised towards him, but when the agent avowed his determination to continue in the same course, and to withhold from him, as far as he could, all knowledge of the manner in which he was employing his funds? If an individual would not be expected to continue his confidence under such circumstances, upon what principle could a different line of conduct be required from the officers of the United States, charged with the care of the public interests? The public money is surely entitled to the same care and protection as that of an individual; and if the latter would be bound, in justice to himself, to withdraw his money from the hands of an agent thus regardless of his duty, the same principle requires that the money of the United States should, under the like circumstances, be withdrawn from the hands of their fiscal agent.

Having shown ample reasons for ceasing to make the public deposits in the Bank of the United States, and that it was done, the Secretary proceeds to the next division of his subject, naturally resulting from his authority to remove, though not expressed in the charter; and that was, to show where he had ordered them to be placed.

"The propriety of removing the deposits being thus evident, and it being consequently my duty to select the places to which they were to be removed, it became necessary that arrangements should be immediately made with the new depositories of the public money, which would not only render it safe, but would at the same time secure to the government, and to the community at large, the conveniencies and facilities that were intended to be obtained by incorporating the Bank of the United States. Measures were accordingly taken for that purpose, and copies of the contracts which have been made with the selected banks, and of the letters of instructions to them from this department, are herewith subinitted. The contracts with the banks in the interior are not precisely the same with those in the Atlantic cities. The difference between them arises from the nature of the business transacted by the banks in these different places. The State banks selected are all institutions of high character and undoubted strength, and are under the management and control of persons of unquestioned probity and intelligence. And, in order to insure the safety of the public money, each of them is required, and has agreed, to give security whenever the amount of the deposit shall exceed the half of the amount of the capital actually paid in; and this department has reserved to itself the right to demand security whenever it may think it advisable, although the amount on deposit may not be equal to the sum above stated. The banks selected have also severally engaged to transmit money to any point at which it may be required by the direction of this department for the public service, and to perform all the services to the government which were heretofore rendered by the Bank of the United States. And, by agreements among themselves to honor each other's notes and drafts, they are providing a general currency at least as sound as that of the Bank of the United States, and will afford facilities to commerce and in the business of domestic exchange, quite equal to any which the community heretofore enjoyed. There has not been yet sufficient time to perfect these arrangements, but enough has already been done to show that, even on the score of expediency, a Bank of the United States is not necessary, either for the fiscal operations of the government, or the public convenience; and that every object which the charter to the present bank was designed to attain, may be as effectually accomplished by the State banks. And, if this can be done, nothing that is useful will be lost or endangered by the change, while much that is desirable will be gained by it. For no one of these corporations will possess that absolute and almost unlimited dominion over the property of the citizens of the United States which the present bank holds, and which enables it at any moment, at its own pleasure, to bring distress upon any portion of the community whenever it may deem it useful to its interest to make its power felt. The influence of each of the State banks is necessarily limited to its own immediate neighborhood, and they will be kept in cheek by the other local banks. They will not therefore, be tempted by the consciousness of power to aspire to political influence, nor likely to interfere in the elections of the public servants. They will, moreover, be managed by persons who reside in the midst of the people who are to be immediately affected by their measures; and they cannot be insensible or indifferent to the opinions and peculiar interests of those by whom they are daily surrounded, and with whom they are constantly associated. These circumstances always furnish strong safeguards against an oppressive exercise of power, and forcibly recommend the employment of State banks in preference to a Bank of the United States, with its numerous and distant branches.

"In the selection, therefore, of the State banks as the fiscal agents of the government, no disadvantages appear to have been incurred on the score of safety or convenience, or the general interests of the country, while much that is valuable will be gained by the change. I am however, well aware of the vast power of the Bank of the United States, and of its ability to bring distress and suffering on the country. This is one of the evils of chartering a bank with such an amount of capital, with the right of shooting its branches into every part of the Union, so as to extend its influence to every neighborhood. The immense loan of more than twenty-eight millions of dollars suddenly poured out, chiefly in the Western States, in 1831, and the first four months in 1832, sufficiently attests that the bank is sensible of the power which its money gives it, and has placed itself in an attitude to make the people of the United States feel the weight of its resentment, if they presume to disappoint the wishes of the corporation. Thus the keeping of the public moneys went to the local banks, the system of an independent treasury being not then established; and the notes of these banks necessarily required their notes to be temporarily used in the federal payments, the gold currency not being at that time revived. Upon these local banks the federal government was thrown-first, for the safe keeping of its public moncys; secondly, to supply the place of the nineteen millions of bank notes which the national had in circulation; thirdly, to relieve the community from the pressure which the Bank of the United States had already commenced upon it, and which, it was known, was to be pushed to the ultimate point of oppression. But a difficulty was experienced in obtaining these local banks, which would be incredible without understanding the cause. Instead of a competition among them to obtain the deposits, there was holding off, and an absolute refusal on the part of many. Local banks were shy of receiving them-shy of receiving the greatest possible apparent benefit to themselves-shy of receiving the aliment upon which they lived and grow! and why this so great apparent contradiction? It was the fear of the Bank of the United States! and of that capacity to destroy them to which Mr. Biddle had testified in his answers to the Senate's Finance Committee; and which capacity was now known to be joined to the will; for the bank placed in the same category all wile should be concerned in the removal—both the govern-received what it lost. But a competent number were found; and this first attempt to prevent a removal, by preventing a reception of the deposits elsewhere, entirely failed.

CHAPTER XCV.

NOMINATION OF GOVERNMENT DIRECTORS, AND THEIR REJECTION.

By the charter of the bank, the government was entitled to five directors, to be nominated annually by the President, and confirmed by the Senate. At the commencement of the session of 1833-'34, the President nominated the five, four of them being the same who had served during the current year, and who had made the report on which the order for the removal of the deposits was chiefly founded. This drew upon them the resentment of the bank, and caused them to receive a large share of reproach and condemnation in the report which the committee of the bank drew up, and which the board of directors adopted and published. When these nominations came into the Senate it was soon perceived that there was to be opposition to these four; and for the purpose of testing the truth of the objections. Mr. Kane, of Illinois, submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the nominations of H. D. Gilpin, John T. Sullivan, Peter Wager, and Hugh McEldery, be recommitted to the Committe on Finance, with instructions to inquire into their several qualifications and fitness for the stations to which they have been nominated; also into the truth of all charges preferred by them against the board of directors of the Bank of the United States, and into the conduct of each of the said nominees during the time he may have acted as director of the said bank; and that the said nominees have notice of the times and places of meetings of said committee, and havleave to attend the same."

Which was immediately rejected by the following vote:

"YEAS.-Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, Linn, McKenn, Moor, Morris, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright.—20.

And this resolution being rejected, requiring a two-fold examination—one into the character and qualifications of the nominees, the other into the truth of their representations against the bank, it was deemed proper to submit another, limited to an inquiry into the character and fitness of the nominees; which was rejected by the same vote. The nominations were then voted upon separately, and each of the four was rejected by the same vote which applied to the first one, to wit, Mr. Gilpin: and which was as follows:

"Yeas.—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, Linn, McKean, Moore, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright.—20.

These rejections being communicated to the President, he immediately felt that it presented a new case for his energy and decision of conduct. The whole of the rejected geatlemen had been confirmed the year before-had all acted as directors for the current year-and there was no complaint against them except from the Bank of the United States; and that limited to their conduct in giving information of transactions in the bank to President Jackson at his written request. Their characters and fitness were above question. That was admitted by the Senate, both by its previous confirmation for the same places, and its present refusal to inquire into those points. The information which they had given to the President had been copied from the books of the bank, and the transactions which they communicated had been objected to by them at the time as illegal and improper; and its truth, unimpeachable in itself, was unimpeached by the Senate in their refusal to inquire into their conduct while directors. It was evident then that they had been rejected for the report which they made to the President; and this brought up the question, whether it was right to punish them for that act? and whether the bank should have the virtual nomination of the government directors by causing those to be rejected which the government nominated? and permitting none is serve but those whose conduct should be subordinate to the views and policy of the bank? These were questions, first, for the Senate, and then for the country; and the President determined to bring it before both in a formal mes sage of re-nomination. He accordingly sent back the names of the four rejected nominations in a message which contained, among others, these passages:

"I disclaim all pretension of right on the part of the President officially to inquire into, or call in question, the reasons of the Senate for reject. ing any nomination whatsoever. As the President is not responsible to them for the reasons which induce him to make a nomination, so they are not responsible to him for the reasons which induce them to reject it. In these respects, each is independent of the other and both responsible to their respective constituents. Nevertheless, the attitude in which certain vital interests of the country are placed by the rejection of the gentlemen now re-nominated require of me, frankly, to communicate my views of the consequences which must necessarily follow this act of the Senate, if it be not reconsidered.

"The characters and standing of these gentlemen are well known to the community, and eminently qualify them for the offices to which I propose to appoint them. Their confirmation by the Senate at its last session to the same offices is proof that such was the opinion of them entertained by the Senate at that time; and unless some thing has occurred since to change it, this act may now be referred to as evidence that their talents and pursuits justified their selec-

"The refusal, however, to confirm their nominations to the same offices, shows that there is something in the conduct of these gentlemen during the last year which, in the opinion of the Senate, disqualifies them; and as no charge has been made against them as men or citizens, nothing which impeaches the fair private character they possessed when the Senate gave them their sanction at its last session, and as it moreover appears from the journal of the Senate recently transmitted for my inspection, that it was deemed unnecessary to inquire into their qualifications or character, it is to be inferred that the change in the opinion of the Senate has arisen from the official conduct of these gentlemen. The only circumstances in their official conduct which have been deemed of sufficient importance to attract public attention are the two reports made by them to the executive department of the gorernment, the one bearing date the 22d day of April, and the other the 19th day of August last; both of which reports were communicated to the Senate by the Secretary of the Treasury with his reasons for removing the deposits.

On the contrary, they have insisted that they were authorized to use the money of the bank in the manner stated in the two reports, and have not denied that the charges there made against the corporation are substan-

"It must be taken, therefore, as admitted that the statements of the public directors, in the rerorts above mentioned, are correct: and they disclose the most alarming abuses on the part of the corporation, and the most strenuous exertious on their part to put an end to them. They prove that enormous sums were secretly lavished in a manner, and for purposes that cannot be justified; and that the whole of the immense capital of the bank has been virtually placed at the disposal of a single individual to be used, if he thinks proper, to corrupt the press, and to control the proceedings of the government by exercising an undue influence over elections. "The reports were made in obedience to my official directions; and I herewith transmit copies of my letter calling for information of the proceedings of the bank. Were they bound to disregard the call? Was it their duty to remain silent while abuses of the most injurious and dangerous character were daily practised? Were they bound to conceal from the constituted authorities a course of measures destructive to the best interests of the country, and intended gradually and secretly, to subvert the foundations of our government, and to transfer its powers from the hands of the people to a great moneyed corporation? Was it their duty to sit in silence at the board, and witness all these abuses without an attempt to correct them; or, in case of failure there, not to appeal to higher authority? The eighth fundamental rule authorizes any one of the directors, whether elected or appointed, who may have been absent when an excess of debt was created, or who may have dissented from the act, to exonerate himself from personal responsibility by giving notice of the fact to the President of the United States; thus recognizing the propriety of communicating to that officer the proceedings of the board in such cases. But, independently of any rgument to be derived from the principle recognized in the rule referred to, I cannot doubt or a moment that it is the right and the duty of every director at the board to attempt to correct all illegal proceedings, and in case of ailure, to disclose them; and that every one of hem, whether elected by the stockholders or ppointed by the government, who had know-edge of the facts, and concealed them, would be ustly amenable to the severest censure.

"But, in the case of the public directors, it as their peculiar and official duty to make the disclosures; and the call upon them for information could not have been disregarded without a flagrant breach of their trust. The directors appointed by the United States cannot be regarded in the light of the ordinary directors of a bank appointed by the stockholders, and charged with the care of their pecuniary interests in the corporation. They have higher and more important duties. They are public officers. They are placed at the hoard net merely to represent the stock held by the United States, but to observe the conduct of the corporation, and to watch over the public interests. It was foreseen that this great moneyed monopoly might be so managed as to endanger the interests of the country; and it was therefore deemed necessary, as a measure of precaution, to place at the board watchful sentinels, who should observe its conduct, and stand ready to report to the proper officers of the government every act of the board which might affect injuriously the interests of the people.

"It was, perhaps, scarcely necessary to present to the Senate these views of the powers of the Executive, and of the duties of the five directors appointed by the United States. But the bank is believed to be now striving to obtain for itself the government of the country, and is seeking, by new and strained constructions, to wrest from the hands of the constituted authorities the salutary control reserved by the charter. And as misrepresentation is one of its most usual weapons of attack, I have deemed it my duty to put before the Senate, in a manner not to be misunderstood, the principles on which "Entertaining, as I do, a solemn conviction of the truth of these principles, I must adhere to them, and act upon them, with constancy and firmness. "Aware, as I now am, of the dangerous machinations of the bank, it is more than ever my duty to be vigilant in guarding the rights of the people from the impending danger. And I should feel that I ought to forfeit the confidence with which my countrymen have honored me, if I did not require regular and full reports of every thing in the proceedings of the bank calculated to affect injuriously the public interests, from the public directors, and if the directors should fail to give the information called for, it would be my imperious duty to exercise the power conferred on me by the law of removing them from office, and of appointing others who would discharge their duties with more fidelity to the public. I can never suffer any one to hold office under me, who would connive at corruption, or who should fail to give the alarm when he saw the enemies of liberty endeavoring to sap the foundations of our free institutions, and to subject the free people of the United States to the dominion of a great moneyed corporation.

"Any directors of the bank, therefore, who might be appointed by the government, would be required to report to the Executive as fully as the late directors have done, and more frequently, because the danger is more imminent; and it would be my duty to require of them a full detail of every part of the proceedings of the corporation, or any of its officers, in order that I might be enabled to decide whether I should exercise the power of ordering a scire facias, which is reserved to the President by the charter, or adopt such other lawful measures as the interests of the country might require. It is too obvious to be doubted, that the misconduct of the corporation would never have been brought to light by the aid of a public proceed-

"The board, when called on by the government directors, refused to institute an inquiry or require an account, and the mode adopted by the latter was the only one by which the object could be attained. It would be absurd to admit the right of the government directors to give information, and at the same time deny the means of obtaining it. It would be but another mode of enabling the bank to conceal its proceedings, and practice with impunity its corruptions. In the mode of obtaining the information, therefore, and in their efforts to put an end to the abuses disclosed, as well as in reporting them, the conduct of the late directors was judicious and praiseworthy, and the honesty, firmness, and intelligence, which they have displayed, entitle them, in my opinion, to the gratitude of the country. "If the views of the Senate be such as I have supposed, the difficulty of sending to the Senate any other names than those of the late directors will be at once apparent. I cannot consent to place before the Senate the name of any one who is not prepared, with firmness and honesty, to discharge the duties of a public director in the manner they were fulfilled by those whom the Senate have refused to confirm. If, for performing a duty lawfully required of them by the Executive, they are to be punished by the subsequent rejection of the Senate, it would not only be useless but cruel to place men of character and honor in that situation, if even such men could be found to accept it. If they failed to give the required information, or to take proper measures to obtain it, they would be removed by the Executive. If they gave the information, and took proper measures to obtain it, they would, upon the next nomination, be rejected by the Senate. It would be unjust in me to place any other citizens in the predicament in which this unlooked for decision of the Senate has placed the estimable and honorable men who were directors during the last year.

"If I am not in error in relation to the principles upon which these gentlemen have been rejected, the necessary consequence will be that the bank will hereafter be without government must be deprived of their chief means of protection against its abuses; for, whatever conflicting opinions may exist as to the right of the directors appointed in January, 1833, to hold over until new appointments shall be made it is very obvious that, whilst their rejection by the Senate remains in force, they cannot with propriety, attempt to exercise such a power. In the present state of things, therefore, the corporation will be enabled effectually to accomplish the object it has been so lone endeavoring to attain. Its exchange committees, and its delegated powers to its president, may hereafter be dispensed with, without incurring the danger of exposing its proceedings to the public view. The sentinels which the law had placed at its board can no longer appear

"Justice to myself, and to the faithful offieers by whom the public has been so well and so honorably served, without compensation or reward, during the last year, has required of me this full and frank exposition of my motives for nominating them again after their rejection by the Senate. I repeat, that I do not question the right of the Senate to confirm or reject at their pleasure; and if there had been any reason to suppose that the rejection, in this case, had not been produced by the causes to which I have attributed it, or of my views of their duties, and the present importance of their rigid performance, were other than they are, I should have cheerfully acquiesced, and attempted to find others who would accept the unenviable trust. But I cannot consent to appoint directors of the bank to be the subservient instruments, or silent spectators, of its abuses and corruptions; nor can I ask honorable men to undertake the thankless duty, with the certain prospect of being rebuked by the Senate for its faithful performance, in pursuance of the lawful directions of the Executive."

This message brought up the question, virtually. Which was the nominating power, in the case of the government directors of the bank? was it the President and Senate? or the bank and the Senate? for it was evident that the four now nominated were rejected to gratify the bank, and for reasons that would apply to every director that would discharge his duties in the way these four had done-namely, as government directors, representing its stock, guarding its interest, and acting for the government in all cases which concerned the welfare of an institution whose notes were a national currency, whose coffers were the depository of the public moneys, and in which it had a direct interest of seven millions of dollars in its stock. And this question it was determined to try, and that definitively, in the persons of these four nominated directors, with the declared determination to nominate no others if they were rejected; and so leave the government without representation in the bank. This message of re-nomination was referred to the Senate's Committee of Finance, of which Mr. Tyler was chairman, and who made a report adverse to the renominations, and in favor of again rejecting the nominees. The points made in the report were, first, the absolute right of the Senate to reject nominations; secondly, their privilege to give no reasons for their rejections (which the President had not asked); and, thirdly, against the general impolicy of making re-nominations, while admitting both the right and the practice in extrordinary occasions. Some extracts will show its character: thus:

"The President disclaims, indeed, in terms, all right to inquire into the reasons of the Senate for rejecting any nomination; and yet the message immediately undertakes to infer, from facts and circumstances, what those reasons, which influenced the Senate in this case, must have been; and goes on to argue, much at large, against the validity of such supposed reasons. The committee are of opinion that, if, as the President admits, he cannot inquire into the reasons of the Senate for refusing its assent to nominations, it is still more clear that these reasons cannot, with propriety, be assumed, and made subjects of comment.

"In cases in which nominations are rejected for reasons affecting the character of the persons nominated, the committee think that no inference is to be drawn except what the vote shows; that is to say, tha: the Senate withholds its advice and consent from the nominations. And the Senate, not being bound to give reasons for its votes in these cases, it is not bound, nor would it be proper for it, as the committee think, to give any answer to remarks founded on the presumption of what such reasons must have been in the present case. They feel themselves, therefore, compelled to forego any response whatever to the message of the President, in this particular, as well by the reasons before assigned, as out of respect to that

The President acts upon his own views of public policy, in making nominations to the Senate; and the Senate does no more, when it confirms or rejects such nominations.

"For either of these co-ordinate departments of the other, would not, and could not, fail, in the end, to break up all harmonious intercourse between them. This your committee would deplore as highly injurious to the best interests of the country. The President, doubtless, asks himself, in the case of every nomination for office, whether the person be fit for the office; whether he be actuated by correct views and motives; and whether he be likely to be influenced by those considerations which should alone govern him in the discharge of his duties -is he honest, capable, and faithful? Being satisfied in these particulars, the President submits his name to the Senate, where the same inquiries arise, and its decision should be presumed to be dictated by the same high considerations as those which govern the President in originating the nomination.

"For these reasons, the committee have altogether refrained from entering into any discussion of the legal duties and obligations of directors of the bank, appointed by the President and Senate, which forms the main topic of the

"The committee would not feel that it had fully acquitted itself of its obligations, if it did not avail itself of this occasion to call the attention of the Senate to the general subject of renomination.

"The committee do not deny that a right of renomination exists; but they are of opinion that, in very clear and strong cases only should the Senate reverse decisions which it has deliberately formed, and officially communicated to the President.

"The committee perceive, with regret, an intimation in the message that the President may not see fit to send to the Senate the names of any other persons to be directors of the bank, except those whose nominations have been ulready rejected. While the Senate will exercise its own rights according to its own views of its duty, it will leave to other officers of the government to decide for themselves on the manner they will perform their duties. The committee know no reasons why these offices should not be filled; or why, in this case, no further nomination should be made, after the Seunte has exercised its unquestionable right of rejecting particular persons who have been nominated, any more than in other cases. The Senate will be ready at all times to receive and consider any such nominations as the President may present to it.

"The committee recommend that the Senate do not advise and consent to the appointment of the persons thus renominated."

While these proceedings were going on in the Senate, the four rejected gentlemen were paying some attention to their own case; and, in a "memorial" addressed to the Senate and to the House of Representatives, answered the to enter into the consideration of the motives charges against them in the Directors' Report, and vindicated their own conduct in giving the information which the President requested—reasserted the truth of that information; and gave further details upon the manner in which they had been systematically excluded from a participation in conducting the main business of the bank, and even from a knowledge of what was done. They said:

"Selected by the President and Senate as government directors of the Bank of the United States, we have endeavored, during the present year, faithfully to discharge the duties of that responsible trust. Appointed without solicitation, deriving from the offlee no emolument, we have been guided in our conduct by no views but a determination to uphold, so far as was in our power, those principles which we believe actuated the people of the United States in establishing a national bank, and in providing by its charter that they should be represented at the board of directors. We have regarded that institution, not merely as a source of profit to individuals, but as an organ of the government, established by the nation for its own benefit. We have regarded ourselves, not as mere agents of those whose funds have been subscribed towards the capital of the bank, but as officers appointed on behalf of the American people. We have endeavored to govern all our conduct as faithful representatives of them. We have been deterred from this by no preconcerted system to deprive us of our rights, by no impeachment of our motives, by no false views of policy, by no course of management which might be supposed to promote the interests of those concerned in the institution, at the danger or sacrifice of the general good. We have left the other directors to govern themselves as they may think best for the interests of those by whom they were chosen. For ourselves, we have been determined, that where any differences have arisen, involving on the one hand that open and correct course which is beneficial to the whole community, and, on the other, what are supposed to be the interests of the bank, our efforts should be steadily directed to uphold the former, our remonstrances against the latter should be resolute and constant; and, when they proved unavailing, our appeal should be made to those who were more immediately intrusted with the protection of the public welfare.

"In pursuing this course we have been met by an organized system of opposition, on the part of the majority. Our efforts have been thwarted, our motives and actions have been misropresented, our rights have been denied, and the limits of our duties have been gratuitously pointed out to us, by those who have sought to curtail them to meet their own policy, not that which we believe led to the creation of the offices we hold. Asserting that injury has been done to them by the late measure of the Secretary of the Treasury, in removing the public deposits, an elaborate statement has been prepared and widely circulated; and taking that as their basis, it has been resolved by the majority to present a memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives. We have not and do not interfere in the controversy which exists between the majority of the board and the executive department of the government: but unjustly assailed as we have been in the statement to which we have referred, we respectfully claim the same right of submitting our conduct to the same tribunal, and asking of the assembled representatives of the American people that impartial hearing, and that fair protection, which all their officers and all citizens have a right to demand. We shall endeavor to present the view we have taken of the relation in which we are placed, as well towards the institution in question as towards the government and people of the United States. to prove that from the moment we took our seats among the directors of the bank, we have been the objects of a systematic opposition; our rights trampled upon, our just interfer. ence prevented, and our offices rendered utterly useless, for all the purposes required by the charter; and to show that the statements by the majority of the board, in the document to which we refer, convey an account of their proceedings and conduct altogether illusory and incorrect."

The four gentlemen then state their opinions of their rights, and their duties, as government directors-that they were devised as instruments for the attainment of public objectsthat they were public directors, not elected by stockholders, but appointed by the President and Senate-that their duties were not merely to represent a moneyed interest and promote the largest dividend for stockholders, but also to guard all the public and political interest of the government in an institution so largely sharing its support and so deeply interested in its safe and honorable management. And in support of this opinion of their duties ther quoted the authority of Gen. Hamilton, founder of the first bank of the United States; and that of Mr. Alexander Dallas, founder of the second and present bank; showing that each of them, and at the time of establishing the two banks respectively, considered the government directors as public officers, bound to watch over the operations of the bank, to oppose all malpratices, and to report them to the government whenever they occurred. And they thus quoted the opinions of those two gentlemen:

Hamilton, founder United States; and that s, founder of the second wing that each of them, blishing the two banks the government direcound to watch over the to oppose all malprae em to the government l. And they thus quoted wo gentlemen:

"In the celebrated report of Alexander Hamilton, in 1790, that eminent statesman and fuancier, although then impressed with a persussion that the government of the country might well leave the management of a national bank to 'the keen, steady, and, as it were, magnetic sense of their own interest,' existing among the private stockholders, yet holds the following remarkable and pregnant language: If the paper of a bank is permitted to insinuate itself into all the revenues and receipts of a country; if it is even to be tolerated as the substitute for gold and silver, in all the transactions of business; it becomes, in either view, a national concern of the first magnitude. As such, the ordinary rules of prudence require that the government should possess the means of ascertaining, whenever it thinks fit, that so delicate a trust is executed with fidelity and care. A right of this nature is not only desirable, as it respects the government, but it ought to be equally so to all those concerned in the institution, as an additional title to public and private confidence, and as a thing which can only be formidable to practices that imply mismanagement.'

"In the letter addressed by Alexander James Dallas, the author of the existing bank, to the chairman of the committee on a national currency, in 1815, the sentiments of that truly distinguished and patriotic statesman are ex-plicitly conveyed upon this very point. 'Nor can it be doubted,' he remarks, 'that the department of the government which is invested with the power of appointment to all the important offices of the State, is a proper department to exercise the power of appointment in relation to a national trust of incalculable magnitade. The national bank ought not to be regarded simply as a commercial bank. It will not operate on the funds of the stockholders alone, but much more on the funds of the nation, Its conduct, good or bad, will not affect the corporate credit and resources alone, but much more the credit and resources of the government. In fine, it is not an institution created for the purposes of commerce and profit alone, but much more for the purposes of national policy, as an auxiliary in the exercise of some of the highest powers of the government. Under such circumstances, the public interests cannot be too cautiously guarded, and the guards proposed can never be injurious to the commercial interests of the institution. The right to inspect the general accounts of the bank, may be employed to detect the evils of a mal-administration, but an interior agency in the direction of its affairs will best serve to prevent them.' This last sentence, extracted from the able document of Secretary Dallas, developes at a glance what had been the experience of the American government and people, in the period which elapsed between the time of Alexander ceived that 'a right to inspect the general accounts of the bank,' would enable government 'to detect the evils of a mal-administration,' and their detection he thought suffic 't. He was mistaken: at least so thought agress and their constituents, in 1815. Hence the inflexible spirit which prevailed at the organization of a new bank, in establishing 'an interior agency in the direction of its affairs,' by the appointment of public officers, through whom the evils of a mal-administration might be carefully watched and prevented."

The four gentlemen also showed, in their memorial, that when the bill for the charter of the present bank was under consideration in the Senate, a motion was made to strike out the clause authorizing the appointment of the government directors; and that that motion was resisted, and successfully, upon the ground that they were to be the guardians of the public interests, and to secure a just and honorable administration of the affairs of the bank; that they were not mere bank directors, but government officers, bound to watch over the rights and interests of the government, and to secure a safe and honest management of an institution which bore the name of the United States-was created by it-and in which the United States had so much at stake in its stock, in its deposits, in its circulation, and in the safety of the community which put their faith in it. Having vindicated the official quality of their characters, and shown their duty as well as their right to inform the government of all mal-practices, they entered upon an examination of the information actually given, showing the truth of all that was communicated, and declaring it to be susceptible of proof, by the inspection of the books of the institution, and by an examination of its directors and clerks,

"We confidently assert that there is in it no statement or charge that can be invalidated; that every one is substantiated by the books and records of the bank; that no real error has been pointed out in this elaborate attack upon us by the majority. It is by suppressing facts well known to them, by misrepresenting what we say, by drawing unjust and unfair inferences from particular sentences, by selecting insulated phrases, and by exhibiting partial statements; by making unfounded insinuations, and by unworthily impeaching our motives, that they endeavor to controvert that which they are unable to refute. When the expense account shall be truly and fully exhibited to any tribunal, if Hamilton and that immediately preceding the it shall be found that the charges we have formation of the present bank. Hamilton conboard shall be laid open, if it shall be found the resolutions we have quoted are not recorded; we shall acknowledge that we have been guilty of injustice and of error, but not till then.

"We have thus endeavored to present to the assembled representatives of the American people, a view of the course which, for nearly a year, the majority in a large moneyed institution, established by them for their benefit, have thought proper to pursue towards those who have been placed there, to guard their interests and to watch and control their conduct. We have briefly stated the systematic series of actions by which they have endeavored to deprive them of every right that was conferred on them by the charter, and to assume to themselves a secret, irresponsible, and unlimited power. We have shown that, in endeavoring to vindicate or to save themselves, they have resorted to accusations against us, which they are unable to sustain, and left unanswered charges which, were they not true, it would be 'easy to repel. We have been urged to this from no desire to enter into the lists with an adversary sustained by all the resources which boundless wealth affords. We have been driven to it by the nature and manner of the attack made upon us, in the document on which the intended memorial to Congress is founded."

But all their representations were in vain. Their nominations were immediately rejected, a second time, and the scal of secrecy preserved inviolate upon the reasons of the rejection. The "proceedings" of the Senate were allowed to be published; that is to say, the acts of the Senate, as a body, such as its motions, votes reports, &c., but nothing of what was said pending the nominations. A motion was made by Mr. Wright to authorize the publication of the debates, which was voted down; and so differently from what was done in the case of Mr. Van Buren. In that case, the debates on the nomination were published; the reasons for the rejection were shown; and the public were enabled to judge of their validity. In this case no publication of debates was allowed; the report presented by Mr. Tyler gave no hint of the reasons for the rejection; and the act remained where that report put it-on the absolute right to reject, without the exhibition of any reason.

And thus the nomination of the government directors was rejected by the United States Senate, not for the declared, but for the known reason of reporting the misconduct of the bank bation."

to the President, and especially as it related to the appointment and the conduct of the exchange committee. A few years afterwards a committee of the stockholders, called the "Committee of Investigation," made a report upon the conduct and condition of the bank, in which this exchange committee is thus spoken of: "The mode in which the committee of exchange transacted their business, shows that there really existed no check whatever upon the officers, and that the funds of the bank were almost entirely at their disposition. That committee met daily, and were attended by the cashier, and at times, by the president. They exercised the power of making the loans and settlements, to full as great an extent as the board itself. They kept no minutes of their proceedings-no book in which the loans made, and business done, were entered; but their decisions and directions were given verbally to the officers, to be by them carried into ex. ecution. The established course of business seems to have been, for the first teller to pay on presentation at the counter, all checks, notes, or due bills having indorsed the order, or the initials, of one of the cashiers, and to place these as vouchers in his drawer, for 50 much cash, where they remained, until just before the regular periodical counting of the cash by the strucing committee of the board on the state of the bank. These vouchers were then taken out, and entered as 'bills receivable,' in a small memorandum-book, under the charge of one of the clerks. These bills were not discounted, but bore interest semi-annually, and were secured by a pledge of stock, or some other kind of property. It is evidently impossible under such circumstances, to ascertain or be assured, in regard to any particular loan or settlement, that it was authorized by a majority of the exchange committee. It can be said, however, with entire certainty, that the very large business transacted in this way does not appear upon the face of the discount books-was never submitted to the examination of the members of the board at its regular meetings, nor is any where entered on the minutes as having been reported to that body for their information or appro-

CHAPTER XCVI.

SECRETARY'S REPORT ON THE REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITS,

Is the first days of the session Mr. Clay called the attention of the Senate to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating the fact that he had ordered the public deposits to cease to be made in the Bank of the United States, and giving his reasons for that act, and said:

"When Congress, at the time of the passage of the charter of the bank, made it necessary that these reasons should be submitted, they must have had some purpose in their mind. It must have been intended that Congress should look into these reasons, determine as to their validity; and approve or disapprove them, as might be thought proper. The reasons had now been submitted, and it was the duty of Congress to decide whether or not they were sufficient to justify the act. If there was a subject which, more than any other, seemed to require the prompt action of Congress, it certainly was that which had reference to the custody and car" of the public treasury. The Senate, therefore, could not, at too early a period, enter on the quosation—what was the actual condition of the treasury?

"It was not his purpose to go into a discussion, but he had risen to state that it appeared to him to be his duty as a senator, and he hoped that other senators took similar views of their duty, to look into this subject, and to see what was to be done. As the report of the Secretary of the Treasury had declared the reasons which had led to the removal of the public deposits, and as the Senate had to judge whether, on investigation of these reasons, the act was a wise one or not, he considered that it would not be right to refer the subject to any committee, but that the Senate should at once act on it, not taking it up in the form of a report of a committee, but going into an examination of the reasons as they had been submitted!

Mr. Benton saw two objections to proceeding as Mr. Clay proposed—one, as to the form of his proposition—the other, as to the place a which it was made. The report of the Secretary, charging acts of misconduct as a cause of removal, would require an investigation into their truth. The House of Representatives seing the grand inquest of the nation, and roperly chargeable with all inquiries into abuses, would be the proper place for the consideration of the Secretary's report—though he admitted that the Senate could also make the inquiry if it pleased; but should do it in the proper way, namely, by inquiring into the truth of the allegations against the bank. He said:

"He requested the Senate to bear in mind that the Secretary had announced, among other reasons which he had assigned for the removal of the deposits, that it had been caused by the misconduct of the bank, and he had gone into a variety of specifications, charging the bank with interfering with the liberties of the people in their most vital elements-the liberty of the press, and the purity of elections. The Secretary had also charged the bank with dishonoring its own paper on several occasions, and that it became necessary to compel it to receive paper of its own branches. then, were grave charges of misconduct, and he wished to know whether, in the face of such charges, this Congress was to go at once, without the previous examination of a committee, into action upon the subject?

"He desired to know whether the Senate were now about to proceed to the consideration of this report as it stood, and, without receiving any evidence of the charges, or taking any course to establish their truth, to give back the money to this institution? He thought it would be only becoming in the bank itself to ask for a committee of scrutiny into its conduct, and that the subject ought to be taken up by the House of Representatives, which, on account of its numbers, its character as the popular branch, and the fact that all money bills originated there, was the most proper tribunal for the hearing of this case. He did not mean to deny that the Senate had the power to go into the examination. But to fix a day now for the decision of so important a case, he considered as premature. Were the whole of the charges to be blown out of the paper by the breath of the Senate? Were they to decide on the question, each senator sitting there as witness and juror in the case? He did not wish to stand there in the character of a witness, unless he was to be examined on oath either at the bar of the Senate, or before a committee of that body, where the evidence would be taken down. He wished to know the manner in which the examination was to be conducted; for he regarded this motion as an admission of the truth of every charge which had been made in the report, and as a flight from investigation."

Mr. Clay then submitted two resolutions in relation to the subject, the second of which after debate, was referred to the committee on finance. They were in these words:

"1st. That, by dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury, because he would not, contrary to his sense of his own duty, remove the money of the United States in deposit with the Bank of the United States and its branches, in conformity with the President's opinion, and by appointing his successor to effect such removal, which has been done, the President has assumed the exercise of a power over the Treasury of the United States, not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and daugerous to the liberties of the people.

"2d. That the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for the removal of the money of the United States deposited in the Bank of the United States and its branches, communicated to Congress on the 3d day of December, 1833, are unsatisfactory and insuffl-

The order for the reference to the fluance committee was made in the Senate at four o'clock in the ufternoon of one day; and the report upon it was made at noon the next day; a very elaborate argumentative paper, the reading of which by its reporter (Mr. Webster) consumed one hour and a quarter of time. It recommended the adoption of the resolution; and 6000 copies of the report were ordered to be printed. Mr. Forsyth, of Georgia, complimented the committee on their activity in getting out a report of such length and labor, in so short a time, and in the time usually given to the refreshment of dinner and sleep. He said:

" Certainly great credit was due to the committee on finance for the zeal, ability, and industry with which the report had been brought out. He thought the reference was made yesterday at four o'clock; and the committee could hardly have had time to agree on and write out so long a report in the short space of time intervening since then. It was possible that the subject might have been discussed and well understood in the committee before, and that the chairman had time to embody the sentiments of the various members of the committee previous to the reference. If such was the case, it reminded him of what had once happened in one of the courts of justice of the State of Georgia. A grave question of constitutional law was presented before that court, was argued for days with great ability, and when the argument was concluded, the judge drew from his coat pocket a written opinion, which he read, and ordered to be recorded as the opinion of the court. It appeared, therefore, that unless the senator from Massachusetts carried the opinion of the committee in his coat pocket, he could not have presented his report with the unexampled dispatch that had been witnessed."

Mr. Webster, evidently nettled at the sage castic compliment of Mr. Forsyth, replied 14 him in a way to show his irritated feelings, but without showing how he came to do so much work in so short a time. He said:

"Had the gentleman come to the Senate this morning in his usual good humor, he would have been easily satisfied on that point. He will recollect that the subject now under dis-cussion was deemed, by every body, to be peculiarly fitted for the consideration of the committee on finance; and that, three weeks ago, I had intimated my intention of moving for such a reference. I had, however, delayed the motion, from considerations of courtesy to other gentlemen, on all sides. But the general subject of the removal of the deposits, had been referred to the committee on finance, by reference of that part of the President's message: and various inemorials, in relation to it, had also been referred. The subject has undergone an ample discussion in committee. I had been more than once instructed by the committee to move for the reference of the Secretary's letter but the motion was postponed, from time to time, for the reasons I have before given. Ilad the gentleman from Georgia been in the Senate yesterday, he would have known that this particular mode of proceeding was adopted, as was then well understood, for the sole purpose of facilitating the business of the Senate, and of giving the committee an opportunity to express an opinion, the result of their consideration If the gentleman had heard what had passed yesterday, when the reference was made, he would not have expressed surprise."

The fact was the report had been drawn by the counsel for the bank, and differed in no way in substance, and but little in form, from the report which the bank committee had made (a) the paper, "purporting to have been signed by Andrew Jackson, and read to what was called a cabinet." But the substance of the resolution (No. 2, of Mr. Clay's), gave rise to more serious objections than the marvellous activity of the committee in reporting upon it with the elaboration and rapidity with which they had done. It was an empty and inoperative expression of opinion, that the Secretary's reason were "unsatisfactory and insufficient;" without any proposition to do any thing in consequence of that dissatisfaction and insufficiency; and consequently, of no legislative avail, and of no import except to bring the opinion of senator. thus imposingly pronounced, against the act of the Secretary. to any mode of doing business-and led to no action; -neither to a restoration of the deposits nor to a condemnation of their keeping by the State banks. Certainly the charter, in ordering the Secretary to report, and to report at the first practicable moment, both the fact of a removal, and the reasons for it, was to enable Congress to act-to do something-to legislate upon the subject-to judge the validity of the reasons-and to order a restoration if they were found to be untrue or insufficient; or to condemn the new place of deposit, if it was deemed insecure or improper. All this was too obvious to escape the attention of the democratic memlers who inveighed against the futility and irrelevance of the resolve, unfit for a legislative body, and only suitable for a town meeting; and answering no purpose as a senatorial resolve but that of political effect against public men. On this point Mr. Forsyth said:

"The subject had then been taken out of the hands of the Senate, and sent to the committee on finance; and for what purpose was it sent thither? Did any one doubt what would be the opinion of the committee on finance? Would such a movement have been made, had it not been intended thereby to give strength to the course of the opposition? He was not in the Senate when the reference was yesterday made, but he had supposed that it was made for the purpose of some report in a legislative form, but it has come back with an argument, and a recommendation of the adoption of the resolution of the senator from Kentucky; and when the resolutions were adopted, would they not still be sent back to that committee for examination? Why had not the committee, who seemed to know so well what would be the opinion of the Senate, imbodied that opinion in a legislative form ?"

To the same effect spoke many members, and among others, Mr. Silas Wright, of New-York, who said:

"He took occasion to say, that with regard to the reference made yesterday, he was not so unfortunate as his friend from Georgia, to be absent at the time, and he then, while the motion was pending, expressed his opinion that a reference at four o'clock in the afternoon, to be returned with a report at twelve the next day, would materially change the aspect of the case before the Senate. He was also of opinion, that the natural effect of sending this proposition to the committee on finance would be, to have it returned with a recommendation for some legislative action. In this, however, he had been disappointed, the proposition had been brought back to the Senate in the same form as sent to the committee, with the exception of the very able argument read that morning."

Mr. Webster felt himself called upon to answer these objections, and did so in a way to intimate that the committee were not "green" enough,—that is to say, were too wise—to propose any legislative action on the part of Congress in relation to this removal. He said:

"There is another thing, sir, to which the gentleman has objected. He would have pre-ferred that some legislative recommendation should have accompanied the report-that some law, or joint resolution, should have been recommended. Sir, do we not see what the gentleman probably desires? If not, we must be green politicians. It was not my intention, at this stage of the business, to propose any law, or joint resolution. I do not, at present, know the opinions of the committee on this subject. On this question, at least, to use the gentleman's expression, I do not earry their opinions in my coat pocket. The question, when it arrives, will be a very grave one-one of deep and solemn import-and when the proper time for its discussion arrives, the gentleman from Georgia will have an opportunity to examine it. The first thing is, to ascertain the judgment of the Senate, on the Secretary's reasons for his act."

The meaning of Mr. Webster in this replythis intimation that the finance committee had got out of the sap, and were no longer "green" -was a declaration that any legislative measure they might have recommended, would have been rejected in the House of Representatives, and so lost its efflency as a senatorial opinion; and to avoid that rejection, and save the effect of the Senate's opinion, it must be a single and not a joint resolution; and so confined to the Senate alone. The reply of Mr. Webster was certainly candid, but unparliamentary, and at war with all ideas of legislation, thus to refuse to propose a legislative enactment because it would be negatived in the other branch of the national legislature. Finally, the resolution was adopted, and by a vote of 28 to 18; thus:

"YEAS.—Messrs. Bibb, Black, Calhonn, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Marigum, Nandain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster. McKean, Moore, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright.'

The futility of this resolve was made manifest soon after its passage. It was nugatory, and remained naked. It required nothing to be done, and nothing was done under it. It became ridiculous. And eventually, and near the end of the session, Mr. Clay proposed it over again, with another resolve attached, directing the return of the deposits to the Bank of the United States; and making it joint, so as to require the consent of both houses, and thus lead to legislative action. In submitting his resolution in this new form he took occasion to allude to their fate in the other branch of the legislature, where rejection was certain, and to intimate censure upon the President for not conforming to the opinion of the Senate in its resolves; as if the adverse opinion of the House (from its recent election, its superior numbers, and its particular charge of the revenue), was not more than a counterpoise to the opinion of the Senate. In this sense, he stood up, and said:

"Whatever might be the fate of these resolutions at the other end of the capitol, or in another building, that consideration ought to have no influence on the course of this body. The Senate owed it to its own character, and to the country, to proceed in the discharge of its duties, and to leave it to others, whether at the other end of the capitol or in another building, to perform their own obligations to the country, according to their own sense of their duty, and their own convictions of responsibility. them it ought to be left to determine what was their duty, and to discharge that duty as they might think best. For himself, he should be ashamed to return to his constituents without having made every lawful effort in his power to cause the restoration of the public deposits to the United States Bank. While a chance yet remained of effecting the restoration of the reign of the constitution and the laws, he felt that he should not have discharged this duty if he failed to make every effort to accomplish that desirable object.

"The Senate, after passing the resolution which they had already passed, and waiting two months to see whether the Executive would conform his course to the views expressed by this branch of the legislature; after waiting all this time, and perceiving that the error, as the Senate had declared it to be, was still persevered in, and seeing the wide and rapid sweep of ruin over every section of the country, there was still one measure left which might arrest the evil, and that was in the offering of these if they passed here, to send them to the other House; and, should they pass them, to present to the President the plain question, if he will return to the constitutional track; or, in opposition sition to the expressed will of the legislature retain the control over the millions of public money which are already deposited in the local banks, and which are still coming in there."

Mr. Benton replied to Mr. Clay, showing the propriety of these resolutions if offered at the commencement of the session-their inutility now, so near its end; and the indelicacy in the Senate, in throwing itself between the bank and the House of Representatives, at a moment when the bank directors were standing out in contempt against the House, refusing to beexamined by its committee, and a motion actually depending to punish them for this contempt. For this was then the actual condition of the corporation; and, for the Senate to pass a resolution to restore the deposits in these circum. stances, was to take the part of the bank against the House-to justify its contumacy-and to express an opinion in favor of its re-charter: as all admitted that restoration of the deposits was wrong unless a re-charter was granted Mr. B. said:

"He deemed the present moment to be the most objectionable time that could have been selected for proposing to restore the public deposits to the United States Bank. Such a proposition might have been a proper proceeding at the commencement of the session. A joint resolution, at that time, would have been the proper mode; it could have been followed by action; and, if constitutionally passed, would have compelled the restoration of these deposits. But the course was different. A separate resolution was brought in, and passed the Senate; and there it stopped. It was a nugatory resolution, leading to no action. It was such a one as a State legislature, or a public meeting might adopt, because they had no power to legislate on the subject. But the Senate had the power of legislation; and, six months ago, when the separate resolution was brought in the Senate, if it intended to act legislatively on the subject at all, ought to have proceeded by joint resolution, or by bill, at that time. But it thought otherwise. The separate resolution was adopted; after adoption, no instruction was given to a committee to bring in a bill; nothing was done to give legislative effect to the decision of the Senate; and now, at the end of sir months, the first attempt is made to move in our legislative capacity, and to pass a joint resolution-equivalent to a statute-to compel the restoration of these deposits. This is the state resolutions—to present them to this body; and, of the proceeding; and, Mr. B. must be permit ted to say, and to give his reasons for saying, that the time selected for this first step, in our legislative capacity, in a case so long depending, is most inappropriate and objectionable. Mr. B. would not dwell upon the palpable objections to this proceeding, which must strike every mind. The advanced stage of the session—the propositions to adjourn—the quantity of business en hand—the little probability that the House and the President would concur with the Senate, or that two thirds of the two Houses could be brought to pass the resolution, if the President declined to give it his approbation. These palpable objections must strike every mind and make it appear to be a useless consumption of time for the Senate to pass the resolution.

Virtually, it included a proposition to recharter the bank; for the most confidential friends of that institution admitted that it was improper to restore the deposits, unless the bank charter was to be continued. The proposition to restore them, virtually included the proposition to re-charter; and that was a proposition which, after having been openly made on this floor, and leave asked to bring in a bill to that effect, had been abandoned, under the clear conviction that the measure could not pass. Passing from these palpable objections, Mr. B. proceeded to state another reason, of a different kind, and which he held to be imperative of the course which the Senate should now pursue: he alluded to the state of the questions at this moment depending between the Bank of the United States and the House of Representatives, and the nature of which exacted from the Senate the observance of a strict neutrality, and an absolute non-interference between those two bodies. The House of Representatives had ordered an inquiry into the affairs and conduct of the bank. The points of inquiry indicated misconduct of the gravest import, and had been ordered by the largest majority, not less than three or four to one. That inquiry was not yet finished; it was still depending; the committee appointed to conduct it remains organized, and as only reported in part. That report is before the Senate and the public; and shows that the directors of the Bank of the United States have resisted the authority of the House-have made an issue of power between itself and the House-for the trial of which issue a resolution is now depending in the House, and is made the order of the day for Tuesday next.

"Here, then, are two questions depending between the llouse and the bank; the first, an inquiry into the misconduct of the bank; the second, a proposition to compel the bank to submit to the authority of the House. Was it right for the Senate to interpose between those bodies, while these questions were depending? Was it right to interfere on the part of the bank? Was it right for the Senate to leap into the arena, throw itself between the contending parties, take sides with the bank, and there was no cause for inquiry into the conduct of the bank, and no ground of censure for resisting the authority of the House? Such would, doubtless, be the effect of the conduct of the Senate, if it should entertain the proposition which is now submitted to it. That proposition is one of honor and confidence to the bank. It proceeds upon the assumption that the bank is right, and the House is wrong, in the questions now depending between them; that the bank has done nothing to merit inquiry, or to deserve censure; and that the pubhe moneys ought to be restored to her keeping, without waiting the end of the investigation which the House has ordered, or the decision of the resolution which affirms that the bank has resisted the authority of the House, and committed a contempt against it. This is the full and fair interpretation—the clear and speaking effect—of the measure now proposed to the Senate. Is it right to treat the Ilouse thus? Will the Senate, virtually, intelligibly, and practically, acquit the bank, when the bank will not acquit itself?-will not suffer its innocence to be tested by the recorded voice of its own books, and the living voice of its own directors? These directors have refused to testify; they have refused to be sworn; they have refused to touch the book; because, being directors and corporators, and therefore parties, they cannot be required to give evidence against themselves. And this refusal, the public is gravely told, is made upon the advice of eminent coursel. What counsel? The counsel of the law, or of fear? Certainly, no lawyer-not even a junior apprentice to the law-could give such advice. right to stand mute, does not extend to the privilege of refusing to be sworn. The right does not attach until after the oath is taken, and is then limited to the specific question, the answer to which might inculpate the witness, and which he may refuse to answer, because he will say, upon his oath, that the answer will criminate himself. But these bank directors refuse to be sworn at all. They refuse to touch the book; and, in that refusal, commit a flagrant contempt against the House of Representatives, and do an act for which any citizen would be sent to jail by any justice of the peace, in America. And is the Senate to justify the directors for this contempt? to get between them and the House? to adopt a resolution beforehand before the day fixed for the decision of the contempt, which shall throw the weight of the Senate into the scale of the directors against the House, and virtually declare that they are right in refusing to be sworn?'

The resolutions were, nevertheless, adopted, and by the fixed majority of twenty-eight to eighteen, and sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence, where they met the fate which all knew they were to receive. The virtually declare to the American people that House did not even take them up for consideration, but continued the course which it had began at the commencement of the session; and which was in exact conformity to the legislative course, and exactly contrary to the course of the Senate. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the memorial of the bank, and that of the government directors, were all referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; and by that committee a report was made, by their chairman, Mr. Polk, sustaining the action of the Secretary, and concluding with the four following resolutions:

"1. Resolved, That the Bank of the United States ought not to be re-chartered.

"2. Resolved, That the public deposits ought not to be restored to the Bank of the United States.

"3. Resolved, That the State banks ought to be continued as the places of deposit of the public money, and that it is expedient for Congress to make further provision by law, prescribing the mode of selection, the securities to be taken, and the manner and terms on which they are to be employed.

"4. Resolved, That, for the purpose of ascertaining, as far as practicable, the cause of the commercial embarrassment and distress complained of by numerous citizens of the United States, in sundry memorials which have been presented to Congress at the present session, and of inquiring whether the charter of the Bank of the United States has been violated; and, also, what corruptions and abuses have existed in its management; whether it has used its corporate power or money to control the press, to interfere in politics, or influence elections; and whether it has had any agency, through its management or money, in producing the existing pressure; a select committee be appointed to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the said bank, who shall report whether the provisions of the charter have been violated or not; and, also, what abuses, corruptions, or malpractices have existed in the management of said bank; and that the said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers, and to summon and examine witnesses, on oath, and to examine into the affairs of the said bank and branches; and they are further authorized to visit the principal bank, or any of its branches, for the purpose of inspecting the books, correspondence, accounts, and other papers connected with its management or business; and that the said committee be required to report the result of such invesjority. The first one, being that upon the question of the recharter, was carried by majority of more than fifty votes-134 to 82; showing an immense difference to the prejudice of the bank since the veto session of 1832. The names of the voters on this great question, so long debated in every form in the halls of Congress, the chambers of the State legislatures. and in the forum of the people, deserve to be commemorated-and are as follows:

The second and third resolutions were carried by good majorities, and the fourth overwhelmingly-175 to 42. Mr. Polk immediately moved the appointment of the committee, and that it consist of seven members. It was appointed accordingly, and consisted of Messrs. Francis Thomas of Maryland, chairman; Everett of Massachusetts; Muhlenberg of Pennsylvania; Joha Y. Mason of Virginia; Ellsworth of Connecticut; Mann of New-York; and Lytle of Ohio. The proceedings of this committee, and the reception it met with from the bank, will be the subject of a future and separate chapter. Under the third resolution the Committee of Ways and Means soon brought in a bill in conformity to its provisions, which was passed by a majority of 22, that is to say, by I12 votes against 90. And thus all the conduct of the President in relation to the bank, received the full sanction of the popular representation; and presented the singular spectacle of full support in one House, and that one specially charged with the subject, while meeting condemnation in the other.

CHAPTER XCVII.

CALL ON THE PRESIDENT FOR A COPY OF THE "PAPER READ TO THE CABINET."

In the first days of the session Mr. Clay submitted a resolution, calling on the President to inform the Senate whether the "paper," published as alleged by his authority, and purporting to have been read to the cabinet in relation to the removal of the deposits, "be genuine or not;" and if it be "genuine," requesting him to cause a copy of it to be laid before the Senate. Mr. Forsyth considered this an unusual call, and wished to know for what purpose it was made. He presumed no one had any doubt of the authenticity of the published copy. He certainly had not. Mr. Clay justified his call on the ground that the "paper" had been publishedhad become public—and was a thing of general notoriety. If otherwise, and it had remained a confidential communication to his cabinet, he certainly should not ask for it; but not answering as to the use he proposed to make of t, Mr. Forsyth returned to that point, and said he could imagine that one branch of the legislature under certain circumstances might have a right to call for it; but the Senate was not that branch. If the paper was to be the ground of a criminal charge against the President, and upon which he is to be brought to trial, it should come from the House of Representatives, with the charges on which he was to be tried. Mr. Clay rejoined, that as to the uses which were to be made of this "paper" nothing seemed to run in the head of the Senator from Georgia but an impeachment. This seemed to be the only idea he could connect with the call. But there were many other purposes for which it might be used, and he had never intended to make it the ground of impeachment. It might show who was the real author of the removal of the deposits-whether the President, or the Secretary of the Treasury? and , hether this latter might not have been a mere automaton. Mr. Benton said there was no parliamentary use that could be made of it, and no such use had been, or could be specified. Only two uses can be made of a paper that may be rightfully called for-one for legislation; the other for impeachment; and not even in the latter case when self-crimination was intended. No legislative use is intimated for this one; and the criminal use is disavowed, and is obliged to be, as the Senate is the tribunal to try, not the inquest to originate impeachments. But this paper cannot be rightfully called for. It is a communication to a cabinet; and communications to the cabinet are the same whether in writing, or in a speech. It is all parol. Could the copy of a speech made to the cabinet be called for? Could an account of the President's conversation with his cabinet be called for? Certainly not! and there is no difference between the written and the spoken communication-between the set speech and a conversation-between a thing made public, or kept secret. The President may refuse to give the copy; and certainly will consult his rights and his self-respect by so refusing. As for the contents of the paper, he has given them to the country, and courts the judgment of the country upon it. He avows his act-gives his reasons—and leaves it to all to judge. He is not a man of concealments, or of irresponsibility. He gave the paper to the public instantly, and authentically, with his name fully signed to it; and any one can say what they please of it. If it is wanted for an invective, or philippic, there it is! ready for use, and seeking no shelter for want of authenticity. It is given to the world, and is expected to stand the test of all examination. Mr. For yth asked the yeas and nays on Mr. Clay's call; they were ordered; and the resolution passed by 23 to 18. The next day the President replied to it, and to the effect that was generally foreseen. He declared the Executive to be a co-ordinate branch of the government, and denied the right of the Senate to call upon him for any copies of his communications to his cabinet-either written or spoken. Feeling his responsibility to the American people, he said he should be always ready to explain to them his conduct; knowing the constitutional rights of the Senate, he should never withhold from it any information in his power to give, and necessary to the discharge of its duties. This was the end of the call; and such an end was the full proof that it ought not to have been made. No act could be predicated upon it-no action taken on its communication-none upon the refusal, either of censure or coercion. The President stood upon his rights; and the Senate could not, and did not, say that he was wrong. The call was a wrong step, and gave the President an easy and a graceful victory.

CHAPTER XCVIII.

MISTAKES OF PUBLIC MEN:—GREAT COMBINATION AGAINST GENERAL JACKSON:—COMMENCEMENT OF THE PANIC.

In the year 1783, Mr. Fox, the great parliamentary debater was in the zenith of his power and popularity, and the victorious leader in the House of Commons. He gave offence to the King, and was dismised from the ministry, and immediately formed a coalition with Lord North; and commenced a violent opposition to the acts of the government. Patriotism, love of liberty, hatred of misrule and oppression, were the avowed objects of his attacks; "but every one saw (to adopt the language of history), that the real difficulty was his own exclusion from office; and that his coalition with his old enemy and all these violent assaults, were only to force himself back into power: and this being seen his efforts became unavailing, and distasteful to the public; and he lost his power and influence with the people, and sunk his friends with him. More than one hundred and sixty of his support. ers in the House of Commons, lost their places at the ensuing election, and were sportively called "Fox's Martyrs;" and when they had a procession in London, wearing the tails of foxes in their hats, and some one wondered where so many tails of that animal had come from, Mr. Pitt slyly said a great many foxes had been lately taken: one, upon an average, in every borough. Mr. Fox, young at that time, lived to recover from this prostration; but his mistake was one of those of which history is full, and the lesson of which is in vain read to succeeding genera. tions. Public men continue to attack their adversaries in power, and oppose their measures. while having private griefs of their own to redress, and personal ends of their own to accomplish; and the instinctive sagacity of the people always sees the smister motive, and condemns the conduct founded upon it.

Mr. Clay, Mr. Calhoun, and Mr. Webster were now all united against General Jackson with all their friends, and the Bank of the United States. The two former had their private griefs: Mr. Clay in the results of the election, and Mr. Calhoun in the quarrel growing out of the discovery of his conduct in Mr. Monroe's cabinet: and it would have been difficult so to have conducted their opposition, and attack, as to have avoided the imputation of a personal motive, But they so conducted it as to authorize and suggest that imputation. Their movements all took a personal and vindictive, instead of a legislative and remedial, nature. Mr. Taney's reasons for removing the deposits were declared to be "unsatisfactory and insufficient "-being words of reproach, and no remedy; nor was the remedy of restoration proposed until driven into it The resolution, in relation to Gen. Jackson, was still more objectionable. The Senate had nothing to do with him personally, yet a resolve was proposed against him entirely personal, charging him with violating the laws and the constitution; and proposing no remedy for this imputed vilation, nor for the act of which it was the subject. It was purely and simply a personal arsure-a personal condemnation that was proposed; and, to aggravate the proposition, it cam emnation that was proe the proposition, it came from the suggestion of the bank directors' memorial to Congress.

The combination was formidable. The bank itself was a great power, and was able to carry distress into all the business departments of the country; the political array against the President was unprecedented in point of number, and great in point of ability. Besides the three eminent chiefs, there were, in the Senate: Messrs. Bibb of Kentucky; Ezekiel Chambers of Maryland; Clayton of Delaware; Ewing of Ohio; Freelinghuyeen of New Jersey; Watkins Leigh of Virginia; Mangum of North Carolina; Poindexter of Mississippi; Alexander Porter of Louisiana; William C. Preston of South Carolina; Southard of New Jersey; Tyler of Virginia. la the House of Representatives, besides the ex-President, Mr. Adams, and the ominent jurist from Pennsylvania, Mr. Horace Binney, there was a long catalogue of able speakers: Messrs. Archer of Virginia; Bell of Tennessee; Burgess of Rhode Island; Rufus Choate of Massachusetts; Corwin of Ohio; Warren R. Davis of South Carolina; John Davis of Massachusetts; Edward Everett of Massachusetts; Millard Fillmore of New-York, afterwards President; Rohert P. Letcher of Kentucky; Benjamin Hardin of Kentucky; McDuffie of South Carolina; Peyton of Tennessee; Vance of Ohio; Wilde of Georgia; Wise of Virginia: in all, above thirty able speakers, many of whom spoke many times; besides many others of good ability, but without extensive national reputations. The business of the combination was divided—distress and panic the object—and the parts distributed, and separately cast to produce the effect. The bank was to make the distress-a thing easy for it to do, from its own moneyed power, and its power over other moneyed institutions and money dealers; also to get up distress meetings and memorials, and to lead the public press: the politicians were to make the panic, by the alarms which they created for the safety of the laws, of the constitution, the public liberty, and the pubic money: and most zealously did each division of the combination perform its part, and for the ong period of three full months. The decision of the resolution condemning General Jackson, on which all this machinery of distress and panio was hung, required no part of that time. There was the same majority to vote it the first day as the last; but the time was wanted to get up the alarm and the distress; and the vote, when taken, was not from any exhaustion of the means of terrifying and agonizing the country, but for the purpose of having the sentence of condemnation ready for the Virginia elections-ready for spreading over Virginia at the approach of the April elections. The end proposed to themselves by the combined parties, was, for the bank, a recharter and the restoration of the deposits; for the politicians, an ascent to power upon the overthrow of Jackson.

.The friends of General Jackson saw the advantages which were presented to them in the unhallowed combination between the moneyed and a political power-in the personal and vindictive character which they gave to the proceedings-the private griefs of the leading assailants-the unworthy objects to be attained -and the cruel means to be used for their attainment. These friends were also numerous, zealous, able, determined; and animated by the consciousness that they were on the side of their country. They were, in the Senate :-Messrs. Forsyth of Georgia; Grundy of Tennessee; Hill of New Hampshire; Kane of Illinois; King of Alabama; Rives of Virginia; Nathaniel Tallma ge of New York; Hugh L. White of Tennessee; Wilkins of Pennsylvania; Silas Wright of New-York; and the author of this THIRTY YEARS' VIEW. In the House, were :- Messrs. Beardsley of New-York; Cambreleng of New-York; Clay of Alabama; Gillett of New-York; Hubbard of New Hampshire; McKay of North Carolina; Polk of Tennessee; Francis Thomas of Maryland; Vanderpoel of New-York; and Wayne of Georgia.

Mr. Clay opened the debate in a prepared speech, commencing in the style which the rhetoricians call ex abruptu—being the style of opening which the occasion required—that of rousing and alarming the passions. It will be found (its essential parts) in the next chapter.

CHAPTER XCIX.

MR. CLAY'S SPEECH AGAINST PRESIDENT JACK-SON ON THE REMOVAL OF THE DEPOSITS—EX-TRACTS,

"MR. CLAY addressed the Senate as follows: We are, said he, in the midst of a revolution. hitherto bloodless, but rapidly tending towards a total change of the pure republican character of the government, and to the concentration of all power in the hands of one man. The powers of Congress are paralyzed, except when exerted in conformity with his will, by frequent and an extraordinary exercise of the executive veto, not anticipated by the founders of the constitution, and not practised by any of the predecessors of the present Chief Magistrate. And, to cramp them still more, a new expedient is springing into use, of withholding altogether bills which have received the sanction of both Houses of Congress, thereby cutting off all opportunity of passing them, even if, after their return, the members should be unanimous in their favor. The constitutional participation of the Senate in the appointing power is virtually abolished, by the constant use of the power of removal from office without any known cause, and by the appointment of the same individual to the same office, after his rejection by the Senate. How often have we, senators, felt that the check of the Senate, instead of being, as the constitution intended, a sal :tary control, was an idle ceremony? How often, when acting on the case of the nominated successor, have we felt the injustice of the removal? How often have we said to each other, well, what can we do? the office cannot remain vacant without prejudice to the public interests; and, if we reject the proposed substitute, we cannot restore the displaced, and perhaps some more unworthy man may be nominated.

"The judiciary has not been exempted from the prevailing rage for innovation. Decisions of the tribunals, deliberately pronounced, have been contemptuously disregarded, and the sanctity of numerous treaties openly violated. Our Indian relations, coeval with the existence of the government, and recognized and established by numerous laws and treaties, have been subverted; the rights of the helpless and unfortunate aborigines trampled in the dust, and they brought under subjection to unknown laws, in which they have no voice, promulgated in an unknown language. The most extensive and most valuable public domain that ever fell to the lot of one nation is threatened with a total sacrifice. The general currency of the country, the life-blood of all its business, is in the most imminent danger of universal disorder and confusion. The power of internal improvement lies srushed beneath the veto. The system of protection of American industry was snatched from impending destruction at the last session; but we are now coolly told by the Secretary of the Treasury, without a blush, 'that it is understood to be conceded on all hands that a tariff for protection merely is to be finally abandoned.' By the 3d of March, 1837, if the progress of importance on time, there will be searcely a vestige remaining of the government and its police, as they existed prior to the 3d of March, 1829, In a term of years, a little more than equal to that which was required to establish our liberties, the government will have been transformed into an elective monarchy—the worst of all forms of government.

"Such is a melancholy but faithful picture of the present condition of our public affairs. It is not sketched or exhibited to excite, here or elsewhere, irritated feeling; I have no such purpose. I would, on the contrary, implore the Senate and the people to discard all passion and prejudice, and to look calmly but resolutely upon the actual state of the constitution and the country. Although I bring into the Senate the same unabated spirit, and the same firm determination, which have ever guided me in the support of civil liberty, and the defence of our constitution, I contemplate the prospect before us with feelings of deep humiliation and profound mortifleation.

"It is not among the least unfortunate symptoms of the times, that a large proportion of the good and enlightened men of the Union, of all parties, are yielding to sentiments of despondency. There is, unhappily, a feeling of distrust and insecurity pervading the community. Many of our best citizens entertain serious apprehensions that our Union and our institutions are destined to a speedy overthrow. Sir, I trust that the hopes and confidence of the country will revive. There is much occasion for manly independence and patriotic vigor, but none for despair. Thank God, we are yet free; and, if we put on the chains which are forging for us, it will be because we deserve to wear them. We should never despair of the republic. If our ancestors had been capable of surrendering themselves to such ignoble sentiments, our independence and our liberties would never have been achieved. The winter of 1776-77, was one of the gloomiest periods of our revolution; but on this day, fifty-seven years ago, the father of his country achieved. glorious victory, which diffused joy, and gladness, and animation throughout the States. On the one hand a civil war, which, light might spread its flames largest sections of the linion. On the other, a cherished system of policy, essential to the successful prosecution of the industry of our countrymen, was exposed to imminent danger of destruction. Means were happily applied by Congress to avert both calamities, the country was reconciled, and our Union once more became a band of friends and brothers. And I shall be greatly disappointed, if we do not find those who were denounced as being unfriendly to the continuance of our confederacy, among the foremost to fly to its preservation, and to resist all executive encroach-

"Mr. President, when Congress adjourned at the termination of the last session, there was one remnant of its powers—that over the purse—left untouched. The two most important powers of civil government are those of the sword and purse; the first, with some restric-tions, is confided by the constitution to the Executive, and the last to the legislative department. If they are separate, and exercised by different responsible departments, civil liberty is safe; but if they are united in the hands of the same individual, it is gone. That clearsighted and revolutionary orator and patriot, Patrick Henry, justly said, in the Virginia convention, in reply to one of his opponents, 'Let him candidly tell me where and when did freedom exist, when the sword and purse were given up from the people? Unless a miracle in human affairs interposed, no nation ever retained its liberty after the loss of the sword and the purse. Can you prove, by any argumentative deduction, that it is possible to be safe without one of them? If you give them

"Up to the period of the termination of the last session of Congress, the exclusive constitutional power of Congress over the treasury of the United States had never been contested. Among its earliest acts was one to establish the treasury department, which provided for the appointment of a treasurer, who was required to give bond and security, in a very large amount, 'to receive and keep the moneys of the United States, and disburse the same upon warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, countersigned by the Comptroller, recorded by the Register, and not otherwise. Prior to the establishment of the present Bank of the United States, no treasury or place had been provided or designated by law for the safe keeping of the public moneys, but the treasurer was left to his own discretion and responsibility. When the existing bank was established it was provided that the public moneys should be exposited with it, and, consequently, that bank became the treasury of the United States; for, whatever place is designated by law for the keeping of the public money of the United States, under the care of the treasurer of the United States, is, for the time being, the treasury. Its safety was drawn in question by the

a little more than a year ago to investigate its ability. He reported to the Executive that it was perfectly safe. His apprehensions of its solidity were communicated by the President to Congress, and a committee was appointed to examine the subject; they, also, reported in favor of its security. And, finally, among the last acts of the House of Representatives, price to the close of the last session, was the adojtion of a resolution, manifesting its entire confidence in the ability and solidity of the bank.

"After all these testimonies to the perfect safety of the public moneys in the place appointed by Congress, who could have supposed that the place would have been changed? Who could have imagined that, within sixty days of the neeting of Congress, and, as it were, in utter contempt of its authority, the change should have been ordered? Who would have dreamed that the treasurer should have thrown away the single key to the treasury, over which Congress held ample control, and accepted, in lieu of it, some dozens of keys, over which neither Congress nor he has any adequate control? Yet, sir, all this has been done; and it is now our soleinn duty to inquire, 1st. By whose authority it has been ordered; and, 2d. Whether the order has been given in conformity with the constitution and laws of the United States.

"I agree, sir, and I am very happy whenever I can agree with the President, as to the immense importance of these questions. He says, in the paper which I hold in my hand, that he looks upon the pending question as involving higher considerations than the 'mere transfer of a sum of money from one bank to another. Its decision may affect the character of our government for ages to come.' And, with him, I view it as 'of transcendent importance, both in the principles and the consequences it involves.' It is a question of all time, for posterity as well as for us-of constitutional government or monarchy-of liberty or slavery. As I regard it, I hold the bank as nothing, as perfectly insignificant, faithful as it has been in the performance of all its duties. I hold a sound currency as nothing, essential as it is to the prosperity of every branch of business, and to all conditions of society, and efficient as the agency of the bank has been in providing the country with a currency as sound as ever existed, and unsurpassed by any in Christendom. I consider even the public faith, sacred and inviolable as it ever should be, as comparatively nothing. All these questions are merged in the greater and mightier question of the constitutional distribution of the powers of the government, as affected by the recent executive innovation. The real inquiry is, shall all the barriers which have been erected by the caution and wisdom of our ancestors, for the preservation of civil liberty, be prostrated and trodden under foot, and the sword and the purse be Chief Magistrate, and an agent was appointed at once united in the hands of one mau? Shall the power of Congress over the treasury of the United States, hitherto never contested, be wrested from its possession, and be henceforward wielded by the Chief Magistrate? Entertaining these views of the magnitude of the question before us, I shall not, at least to-day, examine the reasons which the President has assigned for his act. If he has no power to perform it, no reasons, however cogent, can justify the deed. None can sanctify an illegal or unconstitutional act.

"The question is, by virtue of whose will, power, dictation, was the removal of the de-posits effected? By whose authority and determination were they transferred from the Bank of the United States, where they were required by the law to be placed, and put in banks which the law had never designated? And I tell gentlemen opposed to me, that I am not to be answered by the exhibition of a formal order bearing the signature of R. B. Tuney, or any one else. I want to know, not the amanuensis or clerk who prepared or signed the official form, but the authority or the individual who dictated or commanded it; not the hangman who executes the culprit, but the tribunal which pronounced the sentence. want to know that power in the government, that original and controlling authority, which required and commanded the removal of the deposits. And, I repeat the question, is there a senator, or intelligent man in the whole country, who entertains a solitary doubt?

"Hear what the President himself says in his manifesto read to his cabinet: 'The President deems it his duty to communicate in this manner to his cabinet the final conclusions of his own mind, and the reasons on which they are founded.' And, at the conclusion of this paper, what does he say? 'The President again repeats that he begs his cabinet to consider the proposed measure as his own, in the support of which he shall require no one of them to make a sacrifice of opinion or principle. Its responsibility has been assumed, after the most mature deliberation and reflection, as necessary to preserve the morals of the people, the freedom of the press, and the purity of the elective franchise, without which all will unite in saying that the blood and treasure expended by our forefathers, in the establishment of our happy system of government, will have been vain and fruitless. Under these convictions, he feels that a measure so important to the American people cannot be commenced too soon; and he therefore names the 1st day of October next as a period proper for the change of the deposits, or sooner, provided the necessary arrangements with the State banks can be made.' Sir, is there a senator here who will now tell me that the removal was not the measure and the act of the President?

"Thus is it evident that the President, neither by the act creating the treasury department, | not violate his conscientious obligations, and by the public treasury. Has he any by the constitution? None, none. We have already seen that the constitution positively forbids any money from being drawn from the treasury but in virtue of a previous act of appropriation. But the President himself says that 'upon him has been devolved, by the constitution, and the suffrages of the American people. the duty of superintending the operation of the executive departments of the government, and seeing that the laws are faithfully executed. If there existed any such double source of executive power, it has been seen that the treasury department is not an executive department; but that, in all that concerns the public treasury, the Secretary is the agent or representative of Congress, acting in obedience to their will, and maintaining a direct intercourse with them. By what authority does the President derive power from the mere result of an election? In another part of this same cabinet paper he refers to the suffrages of the people as a source of power independent of a system in which power has been most carefully separated, and distributed between three separate and independent departments. We have been told a thousand times, and all experience assures us, that such a division is indispensable to the existence and preservation of freedom. We have established and designated offices, and appointed officers in each of those departments, to execute the duties respectively allotted to them. The President it is true, presides over the whole; specific dutics are often assigned by particular laws to him alone, or to other officers under his superintendence. His parental eye is presumed to survey the whole extent of the system in all its movements; but has he power to come into Congress, and to say such laws only shall you pass; to go into the courts, and prescribe the decisions which they may pronounce; or even to enter the offices of administration, and, where duties are specifically confided to those officers. to substitute his will to their duty? Or, has he a right, when those functionaries, deliberating upon their own solemn obligations to the people, have moved forward in their assigned spheres, to arrest their lawful progress, because they have dared to act contrary to his pleasure? No, sir; no, sir. His is a high and glorious station, but it is one of observation and superintendence. It is to see that obstructions in the forward movement of government, unlawfully interposed, shall be abated by legitimate and competent means.

"Such are the powers on which the President relies to justify his seizure of the treasury of the United States. I have examined them, one by one, and they all fail, utterly fail, to bearout the act. We are brought irresistibly to the conclusions, 1st, That the invasion of the public treasury has been perpetrated by the remoni of one Secretary of the Treasury, who would nor by the bank charter, has any power over the appointment of another, who stood read

"And now let us glance at some of the tremendous consequences which may ensue from this high-handed measure. If the Presider anay, in a case in which the law has assigned a specific duty exclusively to a designated officer, command it to be executed, contrary to his own judgment, under the penalty of an expulsion from office, and, upon his refusal, may appoint some obsequious tool to perform the required act, where is the limit to his authority? Has he not the same right to interfere in every other case, and remove from office all that he can remove, who hesitate or refuse to do his bidding contrary to their own solemn convictions of their duty? There is no resisting this inevit-able conclusion. Well, then, how stands the matter of the public treasury? It has been seen that the issue of warrants upon the treasury is guarded by four independent and hitherto responsible checks, each controlling every other, and all bound by the law, but all holding their offices, according to the existing practice of the government, at the pleasure of the President. The Secretary signs, the Comptroller countersigns, the Register records, and the Treasurer pays the warrant. We have seen that the President has gone to the first and highest link in the chain, and coerced a conformity to his will. What is to prevent, whenever he desires to draw money from the public treasury, his applying the same penalty of expulsion, under which Mr. Duane suffered, to every link of the chain, from the Secretary of the Treasury down, and thus to obtain whatever he demands? What is to prevent a more compendious accomplishment of his object, by the agency of transfer drafts, drawn on the sole authority of the Secretary, and placing the money at once wherever,

or in whatsoever hands, the President pleases?
"What security have the people against the lawless conduct of any President? Where is the boundary to the tremendous power which he has assumed? Sir, every barrier around the public treasury is broken down and annihilated. From the moment that the President pronounced the words, 'This measure is my own; I take upon myself the responsibility of it,' every safeguard around the treasury was prostrated, and henceforward it might as well be at the Hermitage. The measure adopted by the President is without precedent. I beg pardon—there is one; but we must go down for it to the commencement of the Christian era. It will be recollected by those who are conversant with Roman history, that, after Pompey was compelled to retire to Brundusium, Cæsar, who had been anxious to give him battle, returned to Rome, 'having the commencement of the present session of Congress, without the usual allowance of any days of gracel—in sixty days, without blood-shed.' The biographer proceeds:

" 'Finding the city in a more settled condition than he expected, and many senators there, he addressed them in a mild and gracious manner as the President addressed his late Secretary of the Treasury], and desired them to send depaties to Pompey with an offer of honorable terms of pence,' &c. As Metellus, the tribune, opposed his taking money out of the public treasury, and cited some laws against it-[such, Sir, I suppose, as I have endeavored to cite on this occasion |-Cæsar said 'Arms and laws do not flourish together. If you are not pleased at what I am about, you have only to withdraw. [Leave the office, Mr. Duane | War, indeed, will not tolerate much liberty of speech. When I say this, I am renouncing my own right; for you, and all those whom I have found exciting a spirit of faction against me, are at my disposal.' Having said this, he approached the doors of the treasury, and, as the keys were not produced he sent for workmen to break them open. Metellus again opposed him, and gained credit with some for his firmness; but Cresar, with an elevated voice, threatened to put him to death if he gave him any further trouble. 'And you know very well, young man,' said he, 'that this is harder for me to say than to do.' Metellus, terrified by the menace, retired, and Cresar was afterwards easily and readily supplied with every thing necessary for that war.

"Mr. President (said Mr. C.) the people of the United States are indebted to the President for the boldness of this movement; and as one, among the humblest of them, I profess my obligations to him. He has told the Senate, in his message refusing an official copy of his cabinet paper, that it has been published for the information of the people. As a part of the people, the Senate, if not in their official character, have a right to its use. In that extraordinary paper he has proclaimed that the measure is his own and that he has taken upon himself the responsibility of it. In plain English, he has proclaimed an open, palpable and daring usurpation!

"For more than fifteen years, Mr. President, I have been struggling to avoid the present state of things. I thought I perceived, in some proceedings, during the conduct of the Seminole war, a spirit of defiance to the constitution and to all law. With what sincerity and truthwith what earnestness and devotion to civil liberty, I have struggled, the Searcher of all hu-man hearts best knows. With what fortune, the bleeding constitution of my country now fatally attests.

"I have, nevertheless, persevered; and, under every discouragement, during the short time that I expect to remain in the public councils, I will persevere. And if a bountiful Providence reduced Italy,' says the venerable biographer, I will persevere. And if a bountiful Providence in sixty days—[the exact period between the would allow an unworthy sinner to approach lay of the removal of the deposits and that of the throne of grace, I would be seech Ilim, as the greatest favor He could grant to me here below, to spare me until I live to behold the people, rising in their majesty, with a peaceful and constitutional exercise of their power, to expel the Goths from Rome; to rescue the public treasury from pillage, to preserve the constitution of the United States; to uphold the Union against the danger of the concentration and consolidation of all power in the hands of the Executive; and to sustain the liberties of the people of this country against the imment perils to which they now stand exposed.

"And now, Mr. President, what, under all these circumstances, is it our duty to do? Is there a senator who can hesitate to affirm, in the language of the resolutions, that the President has assumed a dangerous power over the treasury of the United States, not granted to him by the constitution and the laws; and that the reasons assigned for the act by the Sccretary of the Treasury are insufficient and unsafer.

"The eyes and the hopes of the American people are anxiously turned to Congress. They feel that they have been deceived and insulted; their confidence abused; their interests betrayed; and their liberties in danger. They see a rapid and alarming concentration of all power in one man's hands. They see that, by the exercise of the positive authority of the Executive, and his negative power exerted over Congress, the will of one man alone prevails, and governs the republic. The question is no longer what laws will Congress pass, but what will the Exccutive not ve o? The President, and not Congress, is addressed for legislative action. We have seen a corporation, charged with the execution of a great national work, dismiss an experienced, faithful, and zealous president, afterwards testify to his ability by a voluntary resolution, and reward his extraordinary services by a large gratuity, and appoint in his place an executive favorite, totally inexperienced and incompetent, to propitiate the President. We behold the usual incidents of approaching tyranny. The land is filled with spies and informers, and detraction and denunciation are the orders of the day. People, especially official incumbents in this place, no longer dare speak in the fearless tones of manly freemen, but in the cautious whispers of trembling slaves. The premonitory symptoms of despetism are upon us; and if Congress do not apply an instantaneous and effective remedy, the fatal collapse will soon come on, and we shall die-ignobly die-base, mean, and abject slaves; the scorn and con-tempt of mankind; unpitied, unwept, unmourn-

MR. BENTON'S SPEECH IN REPLY TO MR. CLAY-EXTRACTS.

MR. CLAY had spoken on three successive days. being the last days of the year 1833. Mr. Benton followed him,-and seeing the advantage which was presented in the character of the resolve, and that of the speech in support of it. all bearing the impress of a criminal proceeding, without other result than to procure a sentence of condemnation against the President for violating the laws and the constitution, endangering the public liberty and establishing a tyranny,-he took up the proceeding in that sense; and immediately turned all the charges against the resolution itself and its mover, as a usurpation of the rights of the House of Representatives in originating an impeachment, and a violation of law and constitution in trying it ex parte; and "The first of these resolutions contained impeachable matter, and was in fact, though not in form, a direct impeachment of the President of the United States. He recited the constitu-tional provision, that the President might be impeached-1st, for treason; 2d, for bribery; 3d, for high crimes; 4th, for misdemennors; and said that the first resolution charged both a high crime and a misdemeanor upon the Presi dent; a high crime, in violating the laws and constitution, to obtain a power over the public treasure, to the danger of the liberties of the people; and a misdemeanor, in dismissing the late Secretary of the Treasury from office. Mr. B. said that the terms of the resolution were sufficiently explicit to define a high crime, within the meaning of the constitution, without having recourse to the arguments and declarations used by the mover in illustration of his meaning; but, if any doubt remained on that head, it would be removed by the whole tenor of the argument, and especially that part of it which compared the President's conduct to that of Cæsar, in seizing the public treasure, to aid him in putting an end to the liberties of his country; and every senator, in voting upon it, would vote as directly upon the guilt or innocence of the President, as if he was responding to the question of guilty or not guilty, in the concluding sentence of a formal impeachment.

"We are, then, said Mr. B., trying an impeachment! But how? The constitution gives to the House of Representatives the sole power to originate impeachments; yet we originate this impeachment ourselves. The constitution gives the accused a right to be present; but he

Mr. B., trying an im-The constitution gives entatives the sole power ents; yet we originate elves. The constitution at to be present; but he is not here. It requires the Senate to be sworn as judges; but we are not so sworn. It requires the Chief Justice of the United States to preside when the President is tried; but the thief Justice is not presiding. It gives the House of Representatives a right to be present, and to manage the prosecution; but neither the House nor its managers are here. It requires the forms of criminal justice to be strictly observed; yet all these forms are neglected and jolated. It is a proceeding in which the First Magistrate of the republic is to be tried without being heard, and in which his accusers are to act as his judges !

"Mr. B. called upon the Senate to consider well what they did before they proceeded further in the consideration of this resolution. He called upon them to consider what was due to the House of Representatives, whose privilege was invaded, and who had a right to send a message to the Senate complaining of the pro-reeding, and demanding its abandonment. He conjured them to consider what was due to the President, who was thus to be tried in his absence for a most enormous crime; what was due to the Senate itself, in thus combining the incompatible characters of accusers and judges, and which would itself be judged by Europe and America. He dwelt particularly on the figure which the Senate would make in going on with the consideration of this resolution. It accused the President of violating the constitution; and itself committed twenty violations of the same constitution in making the accusation! It accused him of violating a single law, and itself violated all the laws of criminal justice in prosecuting him for it. It charged him with designs dangerous to the liberties of the citizens, and immediately trampled upon the rights of all citizens, in the person of their Chief Magistrate.

"Mr. B. descanted upon the extraordinary organization of the Senate, and drew an argument from it in favor of the reserve and deco-rum of their proceedings. The Senate were lawgivers, and ought to respect the laws already made; they were the constitutional advisers of the President, and should observe, as nearly as possible, the civil relations which the office of adviser presumes; they might be his judges, and should be the last in the world to stir up an accusation against him, to prejudge his guilt, or to attack his character with defamatory language. Decorum, the becoming ornament of every func-tionary, should be the distinguishing trait of an American senator, who combines, in his own office, the united dignities of the executive, the legislative, and the judicial character. In his judicial capacity especially, he should sacrifice to decorum and propriety; and shun, as he would the contagious touch of sin and pestilence, the slightest approach to the character of prosecutor. He referred to British parliamentary law to show that the Lords could not join but here the Senate was sole accuser, and had nothing from the House of Representatives to join; but made the accusation out and out, and tried it themselves. He said the accusation was a double one-for a high crime and a misdemeanor-and the latter a more flagrant proceeding than the former; for it assumed to know for what cause the President had dismissed his late Secretary, and undertook to try the President for a thing which was not triable or impeachable.

"From the foundation of the government, it had been settled that the President's right to dismiss his secretaries resulted from his constitutional obligation to see that the laws were faithfully executed. Many Presidents had dismissed secretaries, and this was the first time that the Senate had ever undertaken to found an impeachment upon it, or had assumed to know the reasons for which it was done.

"Mr. B. said that two other impeachments seemed to be going on, at the same time, against two other officers, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasurer; so that the Senate was brimful of criminal business. The Treasurer and the Secretary of the Treasury were both civil officers, and were both liable to impeachment for misdemeanors in office; and great misdemeanors were charged upon them. They were, in fact, upon trial, without the formality of a resolution; and, if hereafter impeached by the House of Representatives, the Senate, if they believed what they heard, would be ready to pronounce judgment and remove them from office, without delay or further examination. "Mr. B. then addressed himself to the Vice-President (Mr. Van Buren), upon the novelty of the scene which was going on before him, and the great change which had taken place since he had served in the Senate. He commended the peculiar delicacy and decorum of the Vice-President himself, who, in six years' service, in high party times, and in a decided opposition, never uttered a word, either in open or secret session, which could have wounded the feelings of a political adversary, if he had been present and heard it. He extelled the decorum of the opposition to President Adams' administration. If there was one brilliant exception, the error was redeemed by classic wit, and the heroic readiness with which a noble heart bared its bosom to the bullets of those who felt aggrieved. Still addressing himself to the Vice-President. Mr. B. said that if he should receive some hits in the place where he sat, without the right to reply, he must find consolation in the case of his most illustrious predecessor, the great apostle of American liberty (Mr. Jefferson), who often told his friends of the manner in which he had been cut at when presiding over the Senate, and personally annoyed by the inferior-no, young and inconsiderate-members of the federal party.

"Mr. B. returned to the point in debate. The President, he repeated, was on trial for a high n an accusation, because they were to try it; crime, in seizing the public treasure in violation of the laws and the constitution. Was the charge true? Does the act which he has done deserve the definition which has been put upon it? He had made up his own mind that the public deposits ought to be removed from the Bank of the United States. He communicated that opinion to the Secretary of the Treasury; the Secretary refused to remove them; the President removed him, and appointed a Secretary who gave the order which he thought the occasion required. All this he did in virtue of his constitutional obligation to see the laws faithfully executed; and in obedience to the same sense of duty which would lead him to dismiss a Secretary of War, or of the Navy, who would refuse to give an order for troops to march, or a fleet to sail. True, it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to direct the removal of the deposits; but the constitution makes it the duty of the President to see that the Secretary performs his duty; and the constitution is as much above law as the President is above the Secretary.

"The President is on trial for a misdemeanor—for dismissing his Secretary without sufficient cause. To this accusation there are ready answers: first, that the President may dismiss his Secretaries without cause; secondly, that the Senate has no cognizance of the case; thirdly, that the Senate cannot assume to know for what cause the Secretary in question was dis-

"The Secretary of the Treasury is on trial. In order to get at the President, it was found necessary to get at a gentleman who had no voice on this floor. It had been found necessary to assail the Secretary of the Treasury in a manner heretofore unexampled in the history of the Senate. His religion, his politics, his veracity, his understanding, his Missouri restriction vote, had all been arraigned. Mr. B. said he would leave his religion to the constitution of the United States, Catholic as he was, and although 'the Presbyterian might cut off his head the first time he went to mass;' for he could see no other point to the anecdote of Cromwell and the capitulating Catholies, to whom he granted the free exercise of their religion, only he would cut off their heads if they went to mass. His understanding he would leave to himself. head which could throw the paper which was taken for a stone on this floor, but which was, in fact, a double-headed chain-shot fired from a forty-eight pounder, carrying sails, masts, rigging, all before it, was a head that could take care of itself. His veracity would be adjourned to the trial which was to take place for misquoting a letter of Secretary Crawford, and he had no doubt would end as the charge did for suppressing a letter which was printed in extenso among our documents, and withholding the name and compensation of an agent; when that name and the fact of no compensation was lying on the table. The Secretary of the Treatury was arraigned for some incidental vote on the Missouri restriction, when he was a member of the Maryland legislature. Mr. B. did not know what that vote was; but he did know that a certain gentleman, who lately stood in the relation of sergeant to another gentleman, in a certain high election, was the leader of the forest which deforced Missouri of her place in the Union for the entire session which he first attended (not served) in the Congress of the United States. His politics could not be severely tried in the time of the alien and sedition law, when he was scarce of age; but were well tried during the late war, when he sided with his country, and received the constant dennnciations of that great organ of federalism, the Federalism ral Republican newspaper. For the rest, Mr. B. admitted that the Secretary had voted for the elder Adams to be President of the United States, but denied the right of certain persons to make that an objection to him. Mr. B. dismissed these personal charges, for the present and would adjourn their consideration until his (Mr. Taney's) trial came on, for which the senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay), stood pledged; and after the trial was over, he had no doubt but that the Secretary of the Treasury, although a Catholic and a federalist, would be found to maintain his station in the first : nk of American gentlemen and American patriots.

"Mr. B. took up the serious charges against the Secretary: that of being the mere instrument of the President in removing the deposits, and violating the constitution and laws of the land. How far he was this mere instrument making up his mind, in three days, to do what others would not do at all, might be judged by every person who would refer to the opposition papers for the division in the cabinet about the removal of the deposits; and which constantly classed Mr. Taney, then the Attorney General, on the side of removal. This classification was correct, and notorious, and ought to exempt an honorable man, if any thing could exempt him, from the imputation of being a mere instrument in a great transaction of which he was a prime counsellor. The fact is, he had long since, in his character of legal adviser to the President, advised the removal of these deposits; and when suddenly and unexpectedly called upon to take the office which would make it his duty to act upon his own advice, he accepted it from the single sense of honor and duty; and, that he might not seem to descrt the President in flinching from the performance of what he had re-commended. His personal honor was clean; his personal conduct magnanimous; his official deeds would abide the test of law and truth.

"Mr. B. said he would make short work of long accusations, and demolish, in three minutes, what had been concocting for three months, and delivering for three days in the Senate. usation against the So-retary. The first was the clause in the bank charter, which invested the Secretary with the power of transferring the public funds from place place. It was the 15th section of the charter: he would read it. It enacted that whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, the bank should give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, within the United States, or territories thereof; and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, &c.

"Here is authority to the Secretary to transfor the public moneys from place to place, limitel only by the bounds of the United States and its territories; and this clause of three lines of law puts to flight all the nonsense about the United States Bank being the treasury, and the Treasurer being the keeper of the public moneys, with which some politicians and newspaper writers have been worrying their brains for the last three months. In virtue of this clause, the Secretary of the Treasury gave certain transfer drafts to the amount of two millions and a quarter; and his legal right to give the draft was just as clear, under this clause of the bank charter, as his right to remove the deposits was under another clause of it. The transfer is made by draft; a payment out of the treasury is made upon a warrant; and the difference between a transfer draft and a treasury warrant was a thing necessary to be known by every man who aspired to the office of illuminating a nation, or of conducting a criminal prosecution, or even of understanding what he is talking about. They have no relation to each other. The warrant takes the money out of the treasury : the draft transfers it from point to point, for the purpose of making payment: and all this attack upon the Secretary of the Treasury is simply upon the blunder of mistaking the draft for the warrant.

"The senator from Kentucky calls upon the people to rise, and drive the Goths from the capitol. Who are those Goths? They are General Jackson and the democratic party,—he just elected President over the senator himself, and the party just been made the majority in the House—all by the vote of the people. It is their act that has put these Goths in possession of the capitol to the discomfiture of the seator and his friends; and he ought to be quite sure that he felt no resentment at an event iodisastrous to his hopes, when he has indulged himself with so much license in vituperating those whom the country has put over him.

"The senator from Kentucky says the eyes and the hopes of the country are now turned apple Congress. Yes, Congress is his word, and I hold him to it. And what do they see? They see one House of Congress—the one to which the constitution gives the care of the curse, and the origination of impeachments, and thich is fresh from the popular elections: they see that body with a majority of above fifty in avor of the President and the Secretary of the Ireasury, and approving the act which the sonator condemns. They see that popular approbation in looking at one branch of Congress, and the one charged by the constitution with the inquisition into federal grievances. In the other branch they see a body far removed from the people, neglecting its proper duties, seizing upon those of another branch, converting itself into a grand inquest, and trying offences which itself prefers; and in a spirit which bespeaks a zeal quickened by the sting of personal mortiflention. He says the country feels itself deceived and betrayed—insulted and wronged—its liberties endangered-and the treasury robbed: the representatives of the people in the other House, say the reverse of all this—that the President has saved the country from the corrupt dominion of a great corrupting bank, by taking away from her the public money which she was using in bribing the press, subsidizing members, purchasing the venal, and installing herself in supreme political power.

"The senator wishes to know what we are to do? What is our duty to do? I answer, to keep ourselves within our constitutional duties—to leave this impeachment to the House of Representatives—leave it to the House to which it belongs, and to those who have no private griefs to avenge—and to judges, each of whom should retire from the bench, if he happened to feel in his heart the spirit of a prosecutor instead of a judge. The Senate now tries General Jackson; it is subject to trial itself—to be tried by the people, and to have its sentence reversed."

The corner-stone of Mr. Clay's whole argument was, that the Bank of the United States was the treasury of the United States. This was his fundamental position, and utterly unfounded, and shown to be so by the fourteenth article of what was called the constitution of the bank. It was the article which provided for the establishment of branches of the mother institution, and all of which except the branch at Washington city, were to be employed, or not employed, as the directors pleased, as depositories of the public money; and consequently were not made so by any law of Congress. The article said:

"The directors of said corporation shall establish a competent office of discount and deposit in the District of Columbia, whenever any law of the United States shall require such an establishment; also one such office of discount and deposit in any State in which two thousand shares shall have been subscribed, or may be held, whenever, upon application of the legislature of such State, Congress may, by law, require the same: Provided, The directors aforesaid shall not be bound to establish such office before the whole of the capital of the bank shall have been paid up. And it shall be lawful for the directors of the said corporation to establish offices of discount and deposit wheresoever they shall think fit, within the United States or the territories thereof, to such persons, and under such regulations, as they shall deem proper, not being contrary to law, or the constitution of the bank. Or, instead of establishing such offices, it shall be lawful for the directors of the said corporation, from time to time, to employ any other bank or banks, to be first approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, at any place or places that they may deem safe and proper, to manage and transact the business proposed as aforesaid, other than for the purposes of discount, to be managed and transacted by such officers, under such agreements, and subject to such regulations, as they shall deem just and proper.

"Mr. B. went on to remark upon this article, that it placed the establishment of but one branch in the reach or power of Congress, and that one was in the District of Columbia -- in a district of ten miles square-leaving the vast extent of twenty-four States, and three Territories, to obtain branches for themselves upon contingencies not dependent upon the will or power of Congress; or requiring her necessities, or even her convenience, to be taken into the account. A law of Congress could obtain a branch in this district; but with respect to every State, the establishment of the branch depended, first, upon the mere will and pleasure of the bank; and, secondly, upon the double contingency of a subscription, and a legislative act, within the State. If then, the mother bank does not think fit, for its own advantage, to establish a branch; or, if the people of a State do not acquire 2,000 shares of the stock of the bank, and the legislature, therefore, demand it, no branch will be established in any State, or any Territory of the Union. Congress can only require a branch, in any State, after two contingencies have happened in the State; neither of them having the slightest reference to the necessities, or even convenience, of the federal government. "Here, then, said Mr. B., is the Treasury established for the United States! A Treasury which is to have an existence but at the will of the bank, or the will of a State legislature, and a few of its citizens, enough to own 2,000 shares of stock worth $100 a share! A Treasury which Congress has no hand in establishing, and cannot preserve after it is established; for the mother bank, after establishing her branches, may shut them up, or withdraw them. Such a thing has already happened. Branches in the West have been, some shut up, some withdrawn; and, in these cases, the Treasury was broken up, according to the new-fangled conception of a national Treasury. No! said Mr. B., the Federal bank is no more the Treasury of the United States than the State banks are. One is just as much the Treasury as the other; and made so by this very 14th fundamental article of the the alternative! Where branches are not en tablished, the State banks are to be employed!

"The Bank of the United States is to select the State bank; the Secretary of the Treasury is to approve the selection; and if he does so the State bank so selected, and so approved becomes the keeper of the public moneys; it becomes the depository of the public moneys; it transfers them; it pays them out; it does every thing except make discounts for the mother bank and issue notes; it does everything which the federal government wants done; and that is nothing but what a bank of deposit can do. The government makes no choice between State banks and branch banks. They are all one to her. They stand equal in her eyes; they stand equal in the charter of the bank itself; and the horror that has now broken out against the State banks is a thing of recent conception-a very modern impulsion; which is rebuked and condemned by the very authority to which it traces its source. Mr. B. said, the State banks were just as much made the federal treasury by the bank charter, as the United States Bank itself was: and that was sufficient to annihilate the argument which now sets up the federal bank for the federal treasury. But the fact was that neither was made the Treasury; and it would be absurd to entertain such an idea for an instant; for the federal bank may surrender her charter, and cease to exist-it can do so at any moment it pleases-the State banks may expire upon their limitation; they may surrender; they may be dissolved in many ways. and so cease to exist; and then there would be no Treasury! What an idea, that the existence of the Treasury of this great republic is to depend, not upon itself, but upon corporations which may cease to exist, on any day, by their own will, or their own crimes."

The debates on this subject brought out the conclusion that the treasury of the United States had a legal, not a material existence—that the Treasurer having no buildings, and keepers, to hold the public moneys, resorted (when the treasury department was first established), w the collectors of the revenue, leaving the money in their hands until drawn out for the public service-which was never long, as the revenue were then barely adequate to meet the daily expenses of the government; afterwards to the first Bank of the United States-then to lead banks; again to the second bank; and uor again to local banks. In all these cases the keepers of the public moneys were nothing but keepers, being the mere agents of the Secretary of the treasury in holding the moneys which h had no means of holding himself. From the constitution of the bank. Look at it! Look at discussions came the train of ideas which led the estal -that is the erec moneys.

CONDEMNATION OF PRESIDENT JACKSON-MR. CALHOUN'S SPEECH-EXTRACTS.

Ir was foreseen at the time of the coalition between Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Clay, in which they came together-a conjunction of the two political poles-on the subject of the tariff, and laid it away for a term to include two presidential elections-that the effect would be (even if it was not the design), to bring them together upon all other subjects against General Jackson. This expectation was not disappointed. Early in the debate on Mr. Clay's condemnatory resolution, Mr. Calhoun took the floor in its support; and did Mr. Clay the honor to adopt his leading ideas of a revolution, and of a robbery of the treasury. He not only agreed that we were in the middle of a revolution, but also asserted, by way of consolation to those who loved it, that revolutions never go backwards-an aphorism destined, in this case, to be deceived by the event. In the pleasing anticipation of this aid from Mr. Calhoun and his friends, Mr. Clay had complacently intimated the expectation of this aid in his opening speech; and in that intimation there was no mistake. Mr. Calhoun responded to it thus:

"The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Clay] anicipates with confidence that the small party, ors and disunionists, will be found, on this rying occasion, standing in the front rank, and panfully resisting the advance of despotic power. (said Mr. C.) heard the anticipation with pleaure, not on account of the compliment which it mplied, but the evidence which it affords that he cloud which has been so industriously thrown ver the character and motive of that small but atriotic party begins to be dissipated. The Seator hazarded nothing in the prediction. That arty is the determined, the fixed, and sworn nemy to usurpation, come from what quarter nd under what form it may-whether from the tecutive upon the other departments of this overnment, or from this government on the vereignty and rights of the States. The resoposition at the last session, under so many difficulties and dangers, in defence of the States against the encroachments of the general government, furnished evidence not to be mistaken. that that party, in the present momentous struggle, would be found arrayed in defence of the rights of Congress against the encroachments of the President. And let me tell the Senator from Kentucky (said Mr. C.) that, if the present struggle against executive usurpation be successful, it will be owing to the success with which we, the nulliflers-I am not afraid of the word-maintained the rights of the States against the encroachment of the general government at the last session."

This assurance of aid was no sooner given than complied with. Mr. Calhoun, and all his friends came immediately to the support of the resolution, and even exceeded their author in their zeal against the President and his Secretary. Notwithstanding the private grief which Mr. Calhoun had against General Jackson in the affair of the "correspondence" and the "exposition"-the contents of which latter were well known though not published-and notwithstanding every person was obliged to remember that grief while Mr. Calhoun was assailing the General, and alleging patriotism for the motive, and therefore expected that it should have imposed a reserve upon him; yet, on the contrary he was most personally bitter, and used language which would be incredible, if not found, as it is, in his revised reports of his speeches. Thus, in enforcing Mr. Clay's idea of a robbery of the treasury after the manner of Julius Cæsar, he said:

"The senator from Kentucky, in connection with this part of his argument, rend a striking passage from one of the most pleasing and instructive writers in any language [Plutarch], the description of Cæsar forcing himself, sword in hand, into the treasury of the Roman common-wealth. We are at the same stage of our political revolution, and the analogy between the two cases is complete, varied only by the character of the actors and the circumstances of the times. That was a case of an intrepid and bold warrior, as an open plunderer, seizing forcibly the treasury of the country, which, in that republic, as well as ours, was confined to the custody of the legislative department of the government. The actors in our case are of a different character-artful, cunning, and corrupt politicians, and not fearless warriors. They have entered the treasury, not sword in hand, as public plunderers, but, with the false keys of sophistry, as pilferers, under the silence of midnight. tion and fortitude with which it maintained its | The motive and the object are the same, varied in like manner by circumstances and character. With money I will get men, and with men money,' was the maxim of the Roman plunderer. With money we will get partisans, with partisans votes, and with votes money, is the maxim of our public pilferers. With men and money Cæsar struck down Roman liberty, at the fatal battle of Pharsalia, never to rise again; from which disastrous hour all the powers of the Roman republic were consolidated in the person of Cæsar, and perpetuated in his line. With money and corrupt partisans a great effort is now making to choke and stifle the voice of American liberty, through all its natural organs; by corrupting the press; by overawing the other departments; and, finally, by setting up a new and polluted organ, composed of office-holders and corrupt partisans, under the name of a national convention, which, counterfeiting the voice of the people, will, if not resisted, in their name dictate the succession; when the deed will be done, the revolution be completed, and all the powers of our republic, in like manner, be consolidated in the President, and perpetuated by his dictation."

On the subject of the revolution, "bloodless as yet," in the middle of which we were engaged, and which was not to go backwards, Mr. Calhoun said:

"Viewing the question in its true light, as a struggle on the part of the Executive to seize on the power of Congress, and to unite in the President the power of the sword and the purse, the senator from Kentucky [Mr. Clay] said truly, and, let me add, philosophically, that we are in the midst of a revolution. Yes, the very existence of free governments rests on the proper distribution and organization of power; and, to destroy this distribution, and thereby concentrate power in any one of the departments, is to effect a revolution. But while I agree with the senator that we are in the midst of a revolution, I cannot agree with him as to the time at which it commenced, or the point to which it has progressed. Looking to the distribution of the powers of the general government, into the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, and confining his views to the encroachment of the executive upon the legislative, he dates the commencement of the revolution but sixty days previous to the meeting of the present Congress. I (said Mr. C.) take a wider range, and date it from an earlier period. Besides the distribution among the departments of the general government, there belongs to our system another, and a far more important division or distribution of power-that between the States and the general government, the reserved and delegated rights, the maintenance of which is still moreessential to the preservation of our institutions. Taking this wide view of our political system, the revolution, in the midst of which we are, began, not as supposed by the senator from Kentucky, shortly before the commencement of the present session, but many years ago, with the commencement of the restrictive system, and terminated its first stage with the passage of the force bill of the last session, which absorbed all the rights and sovereignty of the States, and consoldated them in this government. Whilst this process was going on, of absorbing the reserved powers of the States, on the part of the general government, another commenced, of concentrating in the executive the powers of the other two—the legislative and judicial departments of the government; which constitutes the second stage of the revolution, in which we have advanced almost to the termination."

Mr. Calhoun brought out in this debate the assertion, in which he persevered afterwards until it produced the quarrel in the Senate between himself and Mr. Clay, that it was entirely owing to the military and nullifying attitude of South Carolina that the "compromise" act was passed and that Mr. Clay himself would have been prostrated in the attempt to compromise. He thus, boldly put forward that pretension:

"To the interposition of the State of South Carolina we are indebted for the adjustment of the tariff question; without it, all the influence of the senator from Kentucky over the manufacturing interest, great as it deservedly is, would have been wholly incompetent, if he had even thought proper to exert it, to adjust the question. The attempt would have prostrated him, and those who acted with him, and not the system. It was the separate action of the State that gave him the place to stand upon, created the necessity for the adjustment, and disposed the minds of all to compromise."

The necessity of his own position, and the indispensability of Mr. Calhoun's support, restrained Mr. Clay, and kept him quiet under this cutting taunt; but he took ample satisfaction for it some years later, when the triumph of General Jackson in the "expunging resolution," and the decline of their own prospects for the Presidency, dissolved their coalition, and remitted them to their long previous antagonistic feelings. But there was another point in which Mr. Calhoun intelligibly indicated what wa fully believed at the time, namely, that the basis of the coalition which ostensibly had for its object the reduction of the tariff, was in reality: political coalition to act against General Jackson and to the success of which it was essential that their own great bone of contention was to be laid aside, and kept out of the way, while the coaltion was in force. wn position, and the in houn's support, restrainhim quiet under this took ample satisfaction , when the triumph of "expunging resolution," r own prospects for the their coalition, and reong previous antagonistic s another point in which ly indicated what wa ne, namely, that the basis ostensibly had for its ob he tariff, was in reality: against General Jackson hich it was essential that contention was to be laid the way, while the coalwas to enable them to mite their forces against the "encroachments and corruptions of the Executive" that the tariff was then laid away; and although the removal of the deposits was not then foreseen, as the first ocasion for this conjunction, yet there could have been "10 failure of finding occasions, enough for the same purpose when the will was so strong-as subsequent events so fully proved. General Jackson could do but little during the remainder of his Presidency which was not found to be "unconstitutional, illegal, corrupt, usurping, and dangerous to the liberties of the people;" and as such, subject to the combined attack of Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun and their respective friends. All this was as good as told, and with an air of self-satisfaction at the foresight of it, in these paragraphs of Mr. Calhoua's speech:

"Now, I put the solemn question to all who hear me: if the tariff had not then been adjusted-if it was now an open question-what hope of successful resistance against the usurpations of the Executive on the part of this or any other branch of a government, could be entertained? Let it was be said that this is the reunforeseen contingency. sult of accident It was clearly perceived, and openly stated, that 110 successful resistance could be made to the corruption and encroachments of the Executive, while the tariff question remained open, while it separated the North from the South, and wasted the energy of the honest and patriotic portions of the community against each other, the joint effort of which is indispensably necessary to expel those from authority who are converting the entire powers of government into a corrupt electioneering machine; and that, without separate State interposition, the adjustment was im-possible. The truth of this position rests not upon the accidental state of things, but on a profound principle growing out of the nature of overnment, and party struggles in a free State. llistory and reflection teach us, that when great interests come into conflict, and the passions and the prejudices of men are aroused, such struggles can never be composed by the influence of iny individuals, however great; and if there be not somewhere in the system some high constitutional power to arrest their progress, and compel the parties to adjust the difference, they go n till the State falls by corruption or violence. "I will (said Mr. C.) venture to add to these emarks another, in connection with the point inder consideration, not less true. We are not aly indebted to the cause which I have stated or our present strength in this body against he present usurpation of the Executive, but if

ought to have done, without the odious bill thich accompanied it—if those who led in the compromise had joined the State-rights party in their resistance to that unconstitutional measure, and thrown the responsibility on its real authors, the administration, their party would have been so prostrated throughout the entire South, and their power, in consequence, so reduced, that they would not have dared to attempt the present measure; or, if they had, they would have been broken and defeated."

Mr. Calhoun took high ground of contempt and scorn against the Secretary's reasons for removing the deposits, so far as founded in the misconduct of the bank directors-declaring that he would not condescend to notice themrepulsing them as intrusive—and shutting his eyes upon these accusations, although heinous in their nature, then fully proved; and since discovered to be far more criminal than then suspected, and such as to subject their authors. a few years afterwards, to indictments in the Court of General Sessions, for the county of Philadelphia, for a "conspiracy to cheat and defraud the stockholders;"-indictments on which they were saved from jury trials by being "habeas corpus'd" out of the custody of the sheriff of the county, who had arrested them on bench warrants. Mr. Calhoun thus repulsed all notice of these accusations:

"The Secretary has brought forward many and grievous charges against the bank. I will not condescend to notice them. It is the conduct of the Secretary, and not that of the bank, which is immediately under examination; and he has no right to drag the conduct of the bank into the issue, beyond its operations in regard to the deposits. To that extent I am prepared to examine his allegations against it; but beyond that he has no right—no, not the least—to arraign the conduct of the bank; and I, for one, will not, by noticing his charges beyond that point, sanction his authority to call its conduct in question. But let the point in issue be determined, and I, as far as my voice extends, will give to those who desire it the means of the freest and most unlimited inquiry into its conduct."

But, while supporting Mr. Clay generally in his movement against the President, Mr. Calhoun disagreed with him in the essential averment in his resolve, that his removal of Mr. Duane because he would not, and the appointment of Mr. Taney because he would, remove them was a usurpation of power. Mr. Calhoun held it to be only an "abuse;" and upon that point he procured a modification of his resolve from Mr. Clay, nothwithstanding the earnestness of his speech on the charge of usurpation. And he thus stated his objection:

"But, while I thus severely condemn the conduct of the President in removing the former Secretary and appointing the present, I must say, that in my opinion it is a case of the abuse, and not of the usurpation of power. I cannot doubt that the resident has, under the constitution, the rigin of removal from office; nor can I doubt that the power of removal, wherever it exists, does, from necessity, involve the power of general supervision; nor can I doubt that it might be constitutionally exercised in reference to the deposits. Reverse the present case; suppose the late Secretary, instead of being against, had been in favor of the removal; and that the President, instead of being for, had been against it, deeming the removal not only inexpedient, but, under circumstances illegal; world any man doubt that, under such circumstances, he had a right to remove his Secretary, if it were the only means of preventing the removal of the deposits? Nay, would it not be his indispensable duty to have removed him? and, had he not, would not he have been universally and justly held responsible?"

In all the vituperation of the Secretary, as being the servile instrument of the President's will, the members who indulged in that species of attack were acting against public and recorded testimony. Mr. Taney was complying with his own sense of public duty when he ordered the removal. He had been attorney-general of the United States when the deposit-removal question arose, and in all the stages of that question had been in favor of the removal; so that his conduct was the result of his own judgment and conscience; and the only interference of the President was to place him in a situation where he would carry out his convictions of duty. Mr. Calhoun, in this speech, absolved himself from all connection with the bank, or dependence upon it, or favors from it. Though its chief author, he would have none of its accommodations: and said:

"I am no partisan of the bank; I am connected with it in no way, by moneyed or political ties. I might say, with truth, that the bank owes as much to me as to any other individual in the country; and I might even add that, had it not been for my efforts, it would not have been chartered. Standing in this relation to the institution, a high sense of delicacy, a regard to independence and character, has restrained me from any connection with the institution whatever, except some trifling accommodations, in the way of ordinary business, which were not of the slightest importance either to the bank or myself."

Certainly there was no recessity for Mr. Cal. houn to make this disclaimer. His character for pecuniary integrity placed him above the suspicion of a venul motive. His errora came from a different source—from the one that Casar thought excusable when empire was to be attained. Mr. Clay also took the opportunity to disclaim any present connection with, or past favors from the bank; and,

"Begged permission to trespass a few moments longer on the Senate, to make a statement concerning himself personally. He had heard that one high in office had allowed himself to assert that a dishonorable connection had subsisted between him (Mr. C.), and the Rank of the United States. When the present charter was granted, he voted for it; and, having done so, he did not feel himself at liberty to subscribe, and he did not subscribe, for a single there in the stock of the bank, although he confidently anticipated a great rise in the value of the stock. A few years afterwards, during the presidency of Mr. Jones, is was thought by some of his friends at Philadelphia, expedient to make him (Mr. C.), a director of the Bank of the United States; and he was made a director without any consultation with him. For that purpose five shares were purchased for him, by a friend, for which he (Mr. C.), afterwards paid When he ceased to be a director, a short time subsequently, he disposed of those shares. Ile does not now own, and has not for many years been the proprietor of, a single share.

"When Mr. Cheves was appointed president of the bank, its affairs in the States of Kentucky and Ohio were in great disorder; and his (Mr. C.'s), professional services were engaged during several years for the bank in those States. Ilbrought a vast number of suits, and transacted a great amount of professional business for the bank. Among other suits was that for the recovery of the one hundred thousand dollar, seized under the authority of a law of Ohio which he carried through the inferior and supreme courts. He was paid by the bank the usual compensation for these services, and m more. And he ventured to assert that no professional fees were ever more honestly and farly earned. He had not, however, been the counsel for the bank for upwards of eight year past. He does not owe the bank, or any one of its branches, a solitary cent. About twelve or fifteen years ago, owing to the failure of a highly estimable (now deceased), friend, a large amount of debt had been, as his indorser, throm upon him (Mr. C.), and it was principally dat to the Bank of the United States. But it was not every member who could thus absolve himself from bank connection, favor, or dependence. The list of congressional borrowers, or retainers, was large-not less than fifty of the former at a time, and a score of the latter; and even after the failure of the bank and the assignment of its effects, and after all possible liquidations had been effected by taking property at "high valuation," allowing large v for "professional services," and liberal resorts to the "profit and loss" account, there remained many to be sued by the assignees to whom their notes were passed; and some of such early date as to be met by a plea of the statute of limitations in bar of the stale demand. Mr. Calhoun concluded with a "lift to the panic" in a reference to the "fearful crisis" in which we were involved-the dangers ahead to the liberties of the country-the perils of our institutions-and a hint at his permanent remedy-his panacea for all the diseases of the body politic-dissolution of the Union. He ended

"We have (said Mr. C.), arrived at a fearful crisis; things cannot long remain as they are. It behooves all who love their country, who have affection for their offspring, or who have any stake in our institutions, to pause and refect. Confidence is daily withdrawing from the general government. Alienation is hourly going on. These will necessarily create a state of things inimical to the existence of our institutions, and, if not speedily arrested, convulor despotism; when a thick cloud will be thrown over the cause of liberty and the future prospects of our country."

CHAPTER CIL.

PUBLIC DISTRESS.

From the moment of the removal of the deposts, it was seen that the plan of the Bank of the

the business of the country and the alarms of the people. For this purpose, loans and accommodations were to cease at the mother bank and all its branches, and in all the local banks over which the national bank had control; and at the same time that discounts were stopped, curteilments were made; and all business men called on for the payment of all they owed, at the same time that all the usual sources of supply were stopped. This pressure was made to fall upon the business community, especially upon large establishments employing a great many operatives; so as to throw as many laboring people as possible out of employment. At the same time, politicians engaged in making panic, had what amounts they pleased, an instance of a loan of $100,000 to a single one of these agitators, being detected; and a loan of $1,100,000 to a broker, employed in making distress, and in relieving it in favored cases at a usury of two and a half per centum per month. In this manner, the business community was oppressed, and in all parts of the Union at the same time: the organization of the national bank, with branches in every State, and its control over local banks, being sufficient to enable it to have its policy carried into effect in all places, and at the same moment. The first step in this policy was to get up distress meetingsa thing easily done--and then to have these meetings properly officered and conducted. Men who had voted for Jackson, but now renounced him, were procured for president, vice-presidents, secretaries, and orators; distress orations were delivered; and, after sufficient exercise in that way, a memorial and a set of resolves, prepared for the occasion, were presented and adopted. Af adoption, the old way of sending by the mail was discarded, and a deputation selected to proceed to Washington and make delivery of their lugubrious document. These memorials generally came in duplicate, to be presented, in both Houses at once, by a senator from the State and the representative from the district. These, on presenting the petition, delivered a distress harangue on its contents, often supported by two or three adjunct speakers, although there was a rule to forbid any thir being said on such occasions, except to make a brief statement of the contents. Now United States was to force their return, and they were read in violation of the rule, and with it a renewal of its charter, by operating on spoke upon in violation of the rule, and printed never to be read again, and referred to a committee, never more to be seen by it; and bound up in volumes to encumber the shelves of the public documents. Every morning, for three months, the presentation of these memorials, with speeches to enforce them, was the occupation of each House; all the memorials bearing the impress of the same mint, and the orations generally cast a. the same pattern. These harangues genera. ave, in the first place, some topographical or a corical notice of the county or town from which it came-sometimes with a hint of its revolutionary services-then a description of the felicity which it enjoyed while the bank had the deposits; then the ruin which came upon it, at their loss; winding up usually with a great quantity of indignation against the man whose illegal and cruel conduct had occasioned such destruction upon their business. The meetings were scretimes held by young men; sometimes by old men; sometimes by the laboring, sometimes by the mercantile class; sometimes miscellaneous, and irrespective of party; and usually sprinkled over with a smart number of former Jackson-men, who had abjured him on account of this conduct to the bank. Some passages will be given from a few of these speeches, as specimens of the whole; the quantity of which contributed to swell the publication of the debates of that Congress to four large volumes of more than one thousand pages each. Thus, Mr. Tyler of Virginia, in presenting a memorial from Culpeper county, and hinting at the military character of the county,

"The county of Culpeper, as he had before observed, had been distinguished for its whiggism from the commencement of the Revolution; and, if it had not been the first to hoist the revolutionary banner, at the tap of the drum, they were second to but one county, and that was the good county of Hanover, which had expressed the same opinion with them on this all-important subject. He presented the memorial of these sons of the whigs of the Revolution, and asked that it might be read, referred to the appropriate committee, and printed."

Mr. Robbins of Rhode Island, in presenting memorials from the towns of Smithfield and Cumberland in that State:

"A small river runs through these towns, called Blackstone River; a narrow stream, of no great volume of water, but perennial and unfailing, and possessing great power from the fred labor—the notes of joy in their hours of no labor—the notes of joy in their hours of notes.

quency and greatness of its falls. Prior to 1791, this power had always run to waste, except here and there a saw mill or a grist mill to supply the exigencies of a sparse neighborhood and one inconsiderable forge. Since that period from time to time, and from place to place, that power, instead of running to waste, has been applied to the use of propelling machinery, till the valley of that small river has become the Manchester of America. That power is so unlimited, that scarcely any limitation can be fixed to its capability of progressive increase in its applicatio ... That valley, in these towns, already has in it over thirty different establishments; it has in it two millions of fixed capital in those establishments; it has expended in it annually in the wages of manual labor, five hundred thousand dollars; it has in it one hundred thousand spindles in operation. I should say it had-for one half of these spindles are already suspended and the other half soon must be suspended, if the present state of things continues. On the bank of that river, the first cotton spindle was established in America. The invention of Ark wright, in 1791, escaped from the jealous proh. bitions of England, and planted itself there. It was brought over by a Mr. Slater, who had been a laboring manufacturer in England, but who was not a machinist. He brought it over, not in models, but in his own mind, and fortunately he was blessed with a mind capacious of such things, and which by its fair fruits, has made him a man of immense fortune, and one of the greatest ben actors to his adopted country. There he made the first essays that laid the foundation of that system which has spread so far and wide in this country, and risen to such a height that it makes a demand annually for two hundred and fifty thousand bales of cotton -about one fourth of all the cotton crop of all our cotton-growing States; makes for those States, for their staple, the best market in the world, except that of England: it was rapidly becoming to them the best market in the world not excepting that of England; still better, it was rapidly becoming for them a market to weigh down and preponderate in the scale against all the other markets of the world taken to gether. Now, all those prospects are blasted by one breath of the Executive administration of this country. Now every thing in that valley, every thing in possession, every thing in propect, is tottering to its fall. One half of those one hundred thousand spindles are, as I before stated, already stopped; the other half are still continued, but at a loss to the owners, and pure ly from charity to the laborers; but this charity has its limit; and regard to their own safety will soon constrain them to stop the other half Five months ago, had one travelled through the valley and witnessed the scenes then displayed there—their numerous and dense populational industrious, and thriving, and contented-hi heard the busy hum of industry in their hom

"The county of Franklin was one of the most pectable and wealthy in the great State of Pennsylvania. It was situated in a rich limestone valley, and, in its main character, was agricultural. He had the pleasure, last year, to pass through it, and see it for the first time, when its rich fields of wheat and rye were ripening, and, certainly, he little thought then, that he should, at this time have to present to the Senate such undeniable proofs of their actual, severe and pressing distress. As he had said, the inhabitants of Franklin county were principally agriculturists, and, of these, the majority were the tillers of their own land. They were interested, also, in manufactures to a great extent; they had ten or tweive forges, and upwards of four thousand persons engaged in the manufacture of iron, dependent for their daily bread on the product of their own labor. The hands employed in this business were a peculiar race—miners, colliers, &c.—and, if other employment was to be afforded them, they would find themselves unsuited for it. These manufactories had been depressed, from causes so well explained, and so well understood, that nobody could now doubt them. They were precisely in the situation of the cotton factories he had adverted to some days ago. There was no demand for their products. The consignee did not receive them —he did not hope to dispose of them, and would not give his paper for them. It was well known that, when a manufactured article was sent to the cities, the manufacturer expected to obtain in advance on them, which he got cashed. This shole operation having stopped, in consequence of the derangement of the currency, the source f business was dried up. There were other nanufactories in that county that also felt the ressure—paper factories and manufactories of traw paper, which increased the gains of agriulture. These, too, have been under the neceslabor and property. He had ascertained the prices of produce as now, and in November last, in the State of Pennysylvania, and from these, it would be seen that, in the interior region, on the threshing floors, they had not escaped the evils which had affected the prices of corn and rye at Chambersburg. They were hardly to be got rid of at any price. The loss on wheat, the great product of the county, was thirty cents. Clover seed, another great product, had fallen from six dollars per bushel to four dollars. This downfall of agricultural produce described the effect of the measure of the Executive better than all the evidences that had been hitherto offered. These memorialists, for themselves, were sick, sick enough of the Executive experi-

"With but very few of them am I personally acquainted-and must rely, in what I say of them, upon what I know of those few, and upon the information received from others, which I regard as sure and safe. And on these, I venture to assure the Senate, that no meeting of young men can be collected, in any portion of our " le country, on any occasion, containing .atelligence-more virtuous purposemore manly and honorable feeling more decided and energetic character What they say, they think. What they resolve they will accomplish. Their proceedings were ardent and animated-their resolutions are dr 'n with spirit; but are such as, I think, m be properly received and respected by the Senate. They relate to the conduct of the Executiveto the present condition of the country—to the councils which now direct its destinies. They admit that older and more mature judgments may better understand the science of government and its practical operations, but they act upon a feeling just in itself, and valuable in its effects, that they are fit to form and express opinions on public measures and public principles, which shall be their own guide in their present and future conduct; and they express a confident reliance on the moral and physical vigor and untamable love of freedom of the young men of the United States to save us from despotism, open and avowed, or silent, insidious, and deceitful. They were attracted, or rather urged, sir, to this meeting, and to the expression of their feelings and opinions, by what they saw around, and knew of the action of the Executive upon the currency and prosperity of the country. They have just entered, or are about entering, on the busy occupations of manhood, and are suddenly surprised by a state of things around them, new to their observation and exty of dismissing many of those employed by perience. Calamity had been a stranger in their pathway. They have grown up through their becutive interference home to every man's boyhood in the enjoyments of present comfort,

In this state they saw the public prosperity, with which alone they were familiar, blasted, and for the time destroyed. The whole scene, their whole country, was changed; they witnessed fortunes falling, homesteads ruined, merchants failing, artisans broken, mechanics impoverished, all the employments on which they were about to enter, paralyzed; labor denied to the needy, and reward to the industrious; losses of millions of property and gloom settling where joy and happiness before existed. They felt the sirocco pass by, and desolate the plains where peace, and animation, and happiness exulted."

"If there was any spot in the Union, likely to be exempt from the calamities that had aftlicted the others, it would be the region about Lexington and its immediate neighborhood. Nowhere, to no other country, has Providence been more bountiful in its gifts. A country so rich and fertile that it yielded in fair and good seasons from sixty to seventy bushels of corn to the acre. It was a most beautiful countryall the land in it, not in a state of cultivation, was in parks (natural meadows), filled with flocks and herds, fattening on its luxuriant grass. But in what country, in what climate, the most favored by Heaven, can happiness and prosperity exist against bad government, against misrule, and against rash and ill-advised experi-ments? On the mountain's top, in the mountain's cavern, in the remotest borders of the country, every where, every interest has been affected by the mistaken policy of the Executive. While he admitted that the solicitude of his neighbors and friends was excited in some degree by the embarrassments of the country, yet they felt a deeper solicitude for the restoration of the rightful authority of the constitution and the laws. It is this which excites their apprehensions, and creates all their alarm. He would not, at this time, enlarge further on the subject of this memorial. He would only remark, that hemp, the great staple of the part of the country from whence the memorial came, had fallen twenty per cent. since he left home, and that Indian corn, another of its greatest staples, the most valuable of the fruits of the earth for the use of man, which the farmer converted into most of the articles of his consumption, furnishing him with food and raiment, had fallen to an equal extent. There were in that county six thousand fat bullocks now remaining unsold, scarcely one to be purchased. They were not sold, because the butchers could not obtain from the banks the usual facilities in the way of discounts; they could not obtain funds in anticipation of their sales wherewith to purchase; and now $100,000 worth of this species of property remains on hand, which, if sold, would have been scattered through the country by the graziers, producing all the advantages to be derived from so large a circulation. Every farmer was too well aware of these facts one moment to doubt them. We are, said Mr. C. not a complaining people. We think not so much of distress. Give us our laws—guarantee to us our constitution—and we will be content with almost any form of government."

"Those members of the Senate, said Mr. W. who have travelled from Boston to Salem, or to Nahant, will remember the town of Lynn. lt is a beautiful town, situated upon the sea is highly industrious, and has been hitherto prosperous and flourishing. With a population of eight thousand souls, its great business is the manufacture of shoes. Three thousand persons men, women, and children, are engaged in this manufacture. They make and sell, ordinarily two millions of pairs of shoes a year, for which at 75 cents a pair, they receive one million five hundred thousand dollars. They consume half a million of dollars worth of leather, of which they buy a large portion in Philadelphia and Baltimore, and the rest in their own neighborhood. The articles manufactured by them are sent to all parts of the country, finding their way into every principal port, from Eastport round to St. Louis. Now, sir, when I was last among the people of this handsome town all was prosperity and happiness. Their business was not extravagantly profitable; they were not growing rich over fast, but they were comfortable, all employed, and all satisfied and contented. But, sir, with them, as with others, most serious change has taken place. They find their usual employments suddenly arrested from the same cause which has smitten other parts of the country with like effects; and they have sent forward a memorial, which I have now the honor of laying before the Senate This memoral, sir, is signed by nine hundred of the legal voters of the town; and I understand the largest number of votes known to have been given is one thousand. Their memorial is short; it complains of the illegal removal of the deporits, of the attack on the bank, and of the effect of these measures on their business."

And thus Mr. Kent, of Maryland, in presenting petitions from Washington county in that State:

But, sir, in that short period, the picture is reversed. Their rich and productive lands, which last fall were sought after with avidity at high prices, they inform us, have fullen 25 per cent., and no purchasers are to be found even at that reduced price. Wheat, the staple of that re ion of the country, was never much lower, if as low. Flour is quoted in Alexandria at $3 75, where a large portion of their crops seek a market. These lonest, industrious people cannot withstand the cruel and ruinous consequences of this desperate and unnecessary experiment. The country cannot bear it, and unless speedy relief is afforded, the result of it will be as disastrous to those who projected it, as to the country at large, who are afflicted with it."

And thus Mr. Webster, presenting a petition from the master builders of Philadelphia, sent on by a large deputation:

"I rise, sir, to perform a pleasing duty. It is to lay before the Senate the proceedings of a meeting of the building mechanics of the city and county of Philadelphia, convened for the surpose of expressing their opinions on the present state of the country, on the 24th of February. This meeting consisted of three thousand persons and was composed of carpenters, masons, rickmakers, bricklayers, painters and glaziers lime burners, plasterers, lumber merchants and others, where occupations are connected with the building of houses. I am proud, sir, that so respectable, so important, and so substantial a class of mechanics, have intrusted me with the presentment of their opinions and feelings repecting the present distress of the country, to the Senate. I am happy if they have seen, in the course pursued by me here, a policy favorble to the protection of their interest, and the properity of their families. These intelligent ad sensible men, these bighly useful citizens, ave witnessed the effect of the late measures government upon the r own concerns; and he resolutions which I have now to present, ally express their convictions on the subject. hey propose not to reason, but to testify; they peak what they do know.

"Sir, listen to the statement; hear the facts. ersons are ordinarily employed in building

quite a considerable town. They further state, that the average number of houses, which this body of mechanics has built, for the last five years, is twelve hundred houses a year. The average cost of these houses is computed at two thousand dollars each. Here is a business, then, sir, of two millions four hundred thousand dollars a year. Such has been the average of the last five years. And what is it now? Sir, the committee state that the business has fallen off seventy-five per cent. at least; that is to say, that, at most, only one-quarter part of their usual employment now remains. This is the season of the year in which building contracts are made. It is now known what is to be the business of the year. Many of these persons, who have heretofore had, every year, contracts for several houses on hand, have this year no contract at all. They have been obliged to dismiss their hands, to turn them over to any scraps of employment they could find, or to leave them in idleness, for want of any employ-

"Sir, the agitations of the country are not to be hushed by authority. Opinions, from however high quarters, will not quiet them. The condition of the nation calls for action, for measures, for the prompt interposition of Congress; and until Congress shall act, be it sooner or be it later, there will be no content, no repose, no restoration of former prosperity. Whoever supposes, sir, that he, or that any man, can quiet the discontents, or hush the complaints of the people by merely saying, "peace, be still!" mistakes, shockingly mistakes, the real condition of things It is an agitation of interests, not of opinions; a severe pressure on men's property and their means of living, not a barren contest about abstract sentiments. Even, sir, the voice of party, often so sovereign, is not of power to subdue disco tents and stifle complaints. The people, sir, feel great interests to be at stake, and they are rousing themselves to protect those interests. They consider the question to be, whether the government is made for the people, or the people for the government. They hold the former of these two propositions, and they mean to prove it.

"Mr. President, this measure of the Secretary has produced a degree of evil that cannot be borne. Talk about it as we will, it cannot be A tottering state of credit, eramped means, loss of property and loss of employment, doubts of the condition of others, doubts of their own condition, constant fear of failures and new explosions, an awful dread of the future-sir when a consciousness of all these things accompanies a man, at his b. .kfast, his dinner and his supper: when it attends him through his hours, both of labor and rest; when it even disturbs and haunts his dreams, and when he feels, too, that that which is thus gnawing upon him he committee state, sir, that eight thousand is the pure result of foolish and rash measures of government, depend upon it he will not ouses, in the city and county of Philadelphia; bear it. Mr. Clay rose to second the motion of Mr Webster to refer and print this memorial; and, after giving it as his opinion that the property of the country had been reduced four hundred millions of dollars in value, by the measures of the government, thus apostrophized the Vice-President (Mr. Van Buren), charging him with a message of prayer and supplication to President Juckson:

"But there is another quarter which possesses sufficient power and influence to relieve the publie distresses. In twenty-four hours, the executive brench could adopt a measure which would afford an efficacious and substantial remedy, and re-establish confidence. And those who, in this chamber, support the administration, could not render a better service than to repair to the executive mansion, and, placing before the Chief Magistrate the naked and undisguised truth, prevail upon him to retrace his steps and abandon his fatal experiment. No one, sir, can perform that duty with more propriety than your-self. [The Vice-President.] You can, if you will, induce him to change his course. To you, then, sir, in no unfriendly spirit, but with feelings softened and subdued by the deep distress which pervades every class of our countrymen, I make the appeal. By your official and per-sonal relations with the President, you maintain with him an intercourse which I neither enjoy nor covet. Go to him and tell him, without exaggeration, but in the language of truth and sincerity, the actual condition of his bleeding country. Tell him it is nearly ruined and undone by the measures which he has been induced to put in operation. Tell him that his experiment is operating on the nation like the philosopher's experiment upon a convulsed animal, in an exhausted receiver, and that it must expire, in agony, if he does not pause, give it free and sound circulation, and suffer the energies of the people to be revived and restored. Tell him that, in a single city, more than sixty bankruptcies, involving a loss of upwards of fifteen millions of dollars, have occurred. Tell him of the alarming decline in the value of all property, of the depreciation of all the products of industry, of the stagnation in every branch of business. and of the close of numerous manufacturing establishments, which, a few short months ago, were in active and flourishing operation. Depict to him, if you can find language to portray, the heart rending wretchedness of thousands of the working classes cast out of employment. Tell him how much more true glory is to be won by retracing false steps. than by blindly rushing on until his country is overwhelmed in bankruptcy and ruin. Tell him of the ardent attachment, the unbounded devotion, the enthusiastic gratitude, towards him, so often signally manifested by the American perple, and that they deserve, at his hands, better treatment. Tell him to guard himself against the possibility of an odious comparison with that worst of the Roman emperors, who, contemplating with indifference the conflagration of the mistress of the world, regaled himself during the terrific scene in the throng of his dancing courtiers. If you desire to secure for yourself the reputation of a public benefactor, describe to him truly the universal distress already produced, and the certain ruin which must ensue from perseverance in his measures. Tell him that he has been abused, deceived, betrayed, by the wicked counsels of unprincipled men around him. Inform him that all efforts in Congress to alleviate or terminate the public distress are paralyzed and likely to prove totally unavailing, from his influence upon a large portion of the members, who are unwilling to withdraw their support, or to take a course repugnant to his wishes and feelings. Tell him that, in his bosom alone, under actual circumstances, does the power abide to relieve the country; and that, unless he opens it to conviction, and corrects the errors of his administration, no human imagination can conceive, and no human tongue can express the awful consequences which may follow. Entreat him to pause, and to reflect that there is a point beyond which human endurance cannot go; and let him not drive this brave, generous, and patriotic people to madness and despair."

During the delivery of this apostrophe, the Vice-President maintained the utmost decorm of countenance, looking respectfully, and eva innocently at the speaker, all the while, as if treasuring up every word he said to be faithfully repeated to the President. After it, was out, and the Vice-President had called some senate to the chair, he went up to Mr. Clay, and asked him for a pinch of his fine maccoboy snuff (she often did); and, having received it, walked away. But a public meeting in Philadelphi took the performance seriously to heart, as adopted this resolution, which the indefatigable Hezekiah Niles "registered" for the informatia of posterity:

Mr. Benton replied to these distress petitions, and distress harangues, by showing that they were nothing but a reproduction, with a change of names and dates, of the same kind of speeches and petitions which were heard in the year 1811, when the charter of the first national bank was expiring, and when General Jackson was not President-when Mr. Taney was not Secretary of the Treasury-when no deposits had been removed, and when there was no quarrel between the bank and the government; and he read copiously from the Congress debates of that day to justify what he said; and declared the two scenes, so far as the distress was concerned, to be identical. After reading from these petitions and speeches, he proceeded to say:

"All the machinery of alarm and distress was in as full activity at that time as at present, and with the same identical effects. Town meetings -memorials-resolutions-deputations to Congress-alarming speeches in Congress. The rice of all property was shown to be depressed. llemp sunk in Philadelphia from $350 to $250 per ton; flour sunk from $11 a barrel to $775; all real estate fell thirty per cent.; five hundred houses were suspended in their erection; the rent of money rose to one and a half per month on the best paper. Confidence destroyedmanufactories stopped-workmen dismissedand the ruin of the country confidently predicted. This was the scene then; and for what object? Purely and simply to obtain a recharter of the bank—purely and simply to force a re-charter from the alarm and distress of the country; for there was no removal of deposits then to be complained of, and to be made the scape-goat of a studied and premeditated attempt to operate upon Congress through the alarms of the people and the destruction of their property. There was not even a curtailment of discounts then. The whole scene was fictitious; but it was a case in which fiction does the mischief of truth. A false alarm in the money market produces all the effects of real danger; and thus, as much distress was proclaimed in Congress in 1811—as much distress was proved to exist, and really did exist—then as now;

without a single cause to be alleged then, which is alleged now. But the power and organization of the bank made the aiarm then; its power and organization make it now; and fletitious on both occasions; and men were ruined then, as now, by the power of imaginary danger, which in the moneyed world, has all the ruinous effects of real danger. No deposits were removed then, and the reason was, as assigned by Mr. Gallatin to Congress, that the government had borrowed more than the amount of the deposits from the bank; and this loan would enable her to protect her interest in every contingency. open object of the bank then was a recharter. The knights entered the lists with their visors off-no war in disguise then for the renewal of a charter under the tilting and jousting of a masquerade sentile for recovery of deposits.

This was a complete reply, to which no one could make any answer; and the two distresses all proved the same thing, that a powerful national bank could make distress when it pleased; and would always please to do it when it had an object to gain by it—either in forcing a recharter or in reaping a harvest of profit by making a contraction of debts after having made an expansion of credits.

It will be difficult for people in after times to realize the degree of excitement, of agitation and of commotion which was produced by this organized attempt to make panie and distress. The great cities especially were the scene of commotions but little short of frenzy-public meetings of thousands, the most inflammatory harangues, cannon firing, great feasts-and the members of Congress who spoke against the President received when they travelled with public honors, like conquering generals returning from victorious battle fields—met by masses, saluted with acclamations, escorted by processions, and their lodgings surrounded by thousands ealling for a view of their persons. The gaining of a municipal election in the city of New-York put the climax upon this enthusiasm; and some instances taken from the every day occurrences of the time may give some faint idea of this extravagant exaltation. Thus:

"Mr. Webster, on his late journey to Boston, was received and parted with at Philadelphia, New-York, Providence, &c., by thousands of the people."

"Messrs. Poindexter, Preston and McDuffie visited Philadelphia the beginning of this week, and received the most flattering attention of the citizens—thousands having waited upon to honor them; and they were dined, &c., with great enthusiasm."

"A very large public meeting was held at the Musical Fund Hall, Philadelphia, on Monday afternoon last, to compliment the 'whigs' of New-York on the late victory gained by them. Though thousands were in the huge room, other thousands could not get in! It was a complete jam.' John Sergeant was called to the chair, and delivered an address of 'great power and ability'—'one of the happiest efforts' of that distinguished man. Mr. Preston of the Senate, and Mr. McDuffle of the House of Representa-tives, were present. The first was loudly called for, when Mr. Sergeant had concluded, and he addressed the meeting at considerable length. Mr. McDullie was then as loudly named, and he also spoke with his usual ardency and power, in which he paid a handsome compliment to Mr. Sergeant, who, though he had differed in opinion with him, he regarded as a 'sterling patriot,' &c. Each of these speeches were received with hearty and continued marks of approbation, and often interrupted with shouts of applause. The like, it is said, had never before been witnessed in Philadelphia. The people were in the highest possible state of enthusiasm." " An immense multitude of people partook of a collation in Castle Garden, New-York, on Tnesday afternoon, to celebrate the victory gained in the 'three days.' The garden was dressed with flags, and every thing prepared on a grand scale. Pipes of wine and barrels of beer were present in abundance, with a full supply of entables. After partaking of refreshments (in which a great deal of business was done in a short time, by the thousands employed -for many mouths, like many hands, make quick work!) the meeting was organized, by appointing Benjamin Wells, carpenter, president, twelve vice-presidents, and four secretaries, of whom there was one cartman, one sail maker, one grocer, one watchmaker, one ship carpenter, one potter, one mariner, one physician, one printer, one surveyor, four merchants, &c. The president briefly, but strongly, addressed the multitude, as did several other gentlemen. A committee of congratulation from Philadelphia was presented to the people and received with shouts. When the time for adjournment arrived, the vast multitude, in a solid column, taking a considerable circuit, proceeded to Greenwich-street, where Mr. Webster was dining with a friend. Loudly called for, he came forward, and was instantly surrounded by a dense mass of merchants and cartmen, sailors and mechanics, professional men and laborers, &c., seizing him by his hands. He was asked to say a few words to the people, and did so. He exhorted them to perseverance in support of the constitution, and, as a dead silence prevailed, he was heard by thousands. He thanked them, and ended by hoping that God would bless them all."

Saturday Messrs. Webster, Preston and Binney were expected at Baltimore; and, though raining hard, thousands assembled to meet them.

mass, and speeches exacted. A reverend minister of the Gospel, in excuse of such a gathering on the Sabbath, said that in revolutionary times there were no Sabbaths. They were conducted to the hotel, where 5,000 well-dressed citizens received them with enthusiasm."

" Mr. McDullle reached Baltimore in the afternoon of Saturday last, on his return to Wash. ington, and was received by from 1,500 to 2,000 people, who were waiting on the wharf for the purpose. He was escorted to the City llotel and, from the steps, addressed the crowd (now increased to about 3,000 persons), in as earnest a speech, perhaps, as he ever pronounced—and the manner of his delivery was not less forcible than the matter of his remarks. Mr. Mcl. spoke for about half an hour; and, while at one moment he produced a roar of laughter, in the next he commanded the entire attention of the andience, or elicited loud shouts of applause.

"The brief addresses of Messrs. Webster, Binney, McDuffle, and Preston, to assembled multitudes in Baltimore, and the manner in which they were received, show a new state of feelings and of things in this city. When Mr. McDuffle said that ten days after the entrance of soldiers into the Senate chamber, to send the senators home, that 200,000 volunteers would be in Washington, there was such a shout as we have seldom before heard."

"There was a mighty meeting of the people and such a feast as was never before prepared in the United States, held near Philadelphia, on Tuesday last, as a rallying 'to support the constitution,' and 'in honor of the late whig victory at New-York,' a very large delegation from that city being in attendance, bringing with them their frigate-rigged and highly-finished boat called the 'Constitution,' which had been passed through the streets during the 'three days.' The arrival of the steamboat with this delegation on board, and the procession that was then formed, are described in glowing terms. The whole number congregated was supposed not to be less than fifty thousand, multitudes attending from adjacent parts of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, &c. Many cattle and other animals had been roasted whole, and there were 200 great rounds of beef, 400 hams, as many beeves' tongues, &c., and 15,000 loaves of break with crackers and cheese, &c., and equal supplies of wine, beer, and eider. This may give some idea of the magnitude of the feast. John Sergeant presided, assisted by a large number of vicepresidents, &c. Strong bands of music played at intervals, and several salutes were fired from the miniature frigate, which were returned by heavy artillery provided for the purpose."

Notices, such as these, might be cited in any number; but those given are enough to show to what a degree people can be excited, when a grat moneyed power, and a great political party, com-Sunday they arrived, and were met by a dense bine for the purpose of exciting the passions SENATOR

CHAPTER CIII.

EENATORIAL CONDEMNATION OF PRESIDENT JACKSON: HIS PROTEST; NOTICE OF THE EX-PUNGING RESOLUTION.

MR. CLAY and Mr. Calhoun were the two leading spirits in the condemnation of President Jackson. Mr. Webster did not speak in favor of their resolution, but aided it incidentally in the delivery of his distress speeches. The resolution was theirs, modified from time to time by themselves, without any vote of the Senate, and by virtue of the privilege which belongs to the mover of any motion to change it as he pleases, until the Senate, by some action upon it, makes it its own. It was altered repeatedly, and up to the last moment; and after undergoing its final mutation, at the moment when the yeas and havs were about to be called, it was passed by the same majority that would have voted for it on the first day of its introduction. The yeas were: Messrs. Bibb of Kentucky; Black of Mississippi; Calhoun; Clay; Clayton of Delaware; Ewing of Ohio; Frelinghuysen of New Jersey; Kent of Maryland; Knight of Rhode Island; Leigh of Virginia; Mangum of North Crolina; Naudain of Delaware; Poindexter of Mississippi; Porter of Louisiana; Prentiss of Verment; Preston of South Carolina; Robbins of Rhode Island; Silsbee of Massachusetts; Nathan Smith of Connecticut; Southard of New Jersey; Sprague of Maine; Swift of Vermont; Tomlinson of Connecticut; Tyler of Virginia; Waggaman of Louisiana; Webster.-26. The pays were: Messrs. Benton; Brown of North Carolina; Forsyth of Georgia; Grundy of Tenpessee; Hendricks of Indiana; Hill of New Hampshire; Kane of Illinois; King of Alabama; King of Georgia; Linn of Missouri; Mc-Kean of Pennsylvania; Moore of Alabama; lorris, of Ohio; Robinson of Illinois; Shepry of Maine; Tallmadge of New York; Tipton Indiana; Hugh L. White of Tennessee; Wilkins of Pennsylvania; Silas Wright of New York. -20. And thus the resolution was passed, and was nothing but an empty fulmination -a mere personal censure-having no relation to any business or proceeding in the Senate; and evidently intended for effect on the people. To increase this effect, Mr. Clay proposed a resolve that the Secretary should count the names of the signers to the memorials for and against the act of the removal, and strike the balance between them, which he computed at an hundred thousand: evidently intending to add the effect of this popular voice to the weight of the senatorial condemnation. The number turned out to be unexpectedly small, considering the means by which they were collected.

When passed, the total irrelevance of the resolution to any right or duty of the Senate was made manifest by the insignificance that attended its decision. There was nothing to be done with it, or upon it, or under it, or in relation to it. It went to no committee, laid the founds. tion for no action, was not communicable to the other House, or to the President; and remained an intrusive fulmination on the Senace Journal; put there not for any legislative purpose, but purely and simply for popular effect. Great reliance was placed upon that effect. It was fully believed-notwithstanding the experience of the Senate, in Mr. Van Buren's case—that a senatorial condemnation would destroy whomsoever it struck-even General Jackson. Vaincalculation! and equally condemned by the lessons of history, and by the impulsions of the human heart. Fair play is the first feeling of the masses; a fair and impartial trial is the law of the heart, as well as of the land; and no condemnation is tolerated of any man by bis coemies. All such are required to retire from the box and the bench, on a real trial: much more to refrain from a simulated one; and above all from instigating one. Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Clay were both known to have their private griefs against General Jackson, and also to have been in vehement opposition to each other, and that they had "compromised" their own bone of contention to be able to act in conjunction against him. The instinctive sagacity of the people saw all this; and their innate sense of justice and decorum revolted at it; and at the end of these proceedings, the results were in exact contradiction to the calculation of their effect. General Jackson was more popular than ever; the leaders in the movement against him were nationally crippled; their friends, in many instances, were politically destroyed in their States. It was a second edition of "Fox's martyrs."

During all the progress of this proceedingwhile a phalanx of orators and speakers were daily fulminating against him-while many hundred newspapers incessantly assailed himwhile public meetings were held in all parts, and men of all sorts, even beardless youths, harangued against him as if he had been a Nero -while a stream of committees was pouring upon him (as they were called), and whom he soon refused to receive in that character; during the hundred days that all this was going on, and to judge from the imposing appearance which the crowds made that came to Washington to bring up the "distress," and to give countenance to the Senate, and emphasis to its proceedings, and to fill the daily gallery, applauding the speakers against the President-saluting with noise and confusion those who spoke on his side: during all this time, and when a nation seemed to be in arms, and the earth in commotion against him, he was tranquil and quiet, confident of eventual victory, and firmly relying upon God and the people to set all right. I was accustomed to see him often during that time, always in the night (for I had no time to quit my seat during the day); and never saw him appear more truly heroic and grand than at this time. He was perfectly mild in his language, cheerful in his temper, firm in his conviction; and confident in his reliance on the power in which he put his trust. I have seen him in a great many situations of peril, and even of desperation, both civil and military, and always saw him firmly relying upon the success of the right through God and the people; and never saw that confidence more firm and steady than now. After giving him an account of the day's proceedings, talking over the state of the contest, and ready to return to sleep a little, and prepare much, for the combats of the next day, he would usually say: "We shall whip them yet. The people will take it up after a while." But he also had good defenders present, and in both Houses, and men who did not confine themselves to the defensive -did not limit themselves to returning blow for blow-but assailed the assailants-boldly tharging upon them their own illegal conduct- from closing its doors by running wagons with

Our labors were great and incessant for we had superior numbers, and great ability to contend against. I spoke myself above thirty times; others as often; all many times: and all strained to the utmost; for we felt that the cause of Jackson was that of the country-his defeat that of the people-and the success of the combination, the delivering up of the government to the domination of a moneyed power which knew no mode of government but that of corruption and oppression. We contended strenuously in both Houses; and as courageously in the Senate against a fixed majority as if we had some chance for success; but our exertions were not for the Senate, but for the people-not to change senatorial votes, but to rouse the masses throughout the land; and while borne down by a majority of ten in the Senate, we looked with pride to the other end of the building; and derived confidence from the contemplation of a majority of fifty, fresh from the elections of the people, and strong in their good cause. It was a scene for Mons. De Tocqueville to have looked on to have learnt which way the difference lay between the men of the direct vote of the people, and those of the indirect vote of the General Assembly, "filtrated" through the "refining" process of an intermediate body.

But although fictitious and forged, yet the distress was real, and did an immensity of mischief. Vast numbers of individuals were ruined, or crippled in their affairs; a great many banks were broken-a run being made upon all that would not come into the system of the mtional bank. The deposit banks above all were selected for pressure. When all was over, and the Senate's sentence had been sent out to do its office among the people, General Jackson felt that the time had come for him to speak; and did so in a "Protest," addressed to the Senate, and remarkable for the temperance and moderation of its language. He had considered the proceeding against him, from the beginning, as illegal and void-as having no legislative aim or object-as being intended merely for censure; and, therefore, not coming within any power or duty of the Senate. He deemed it extra-judicial and unparliamentary, legally no more than the act of a town meeting, while invested with the forms of a legal proceeding; and intended to act upon the public mind with the force of a sentence of conviction on an impeachment, while in reality but a personal act against him in his personal, and not in his official character. This idea he prominently put forth in his "Protest;" from which some passages are here given:

"The resolution in question was introduced, discussed, and passed, not as a joint, but as a separate resolution. It asserts no legislative power, proposes no legislative action; and neither possesses the form nor any of the attributes of a legislative measure. It does not appear to have been entertained or passed, with my view or expectation of its issuing in a law prjoint resolution, or in the repeal of any law or joint resolution, or in any other legislative

"Whilst wanting both the form and substance f a legislative measure, it is equally manifest, hat the resolution was not justified by any or he executive powers conferred on the Senate. hese powers relate exclusively to the considertion of treaties and nominations to office; and hey are exercised in secret session, and with loved doors. This resolution does not apply any treaty or nomination, and was passed in late to the officers of the Senate, to their chamber, and other appurtenances, or to subjects of order, and other matters of the like nature-in all which either House may lawfully proceed without any co-operation with the other, or with the President.

"Nor does this proceeding in any way belong

"On the contrary the whole phraseology and sense of the resolution seem to be judicial. Its essence, true character, and only practical effect, are to be found in the conduct which it charges upon the President, and in the judgment which it pronounces on that conduct. The resolution, therefore, though discussed and adopted by the Senate in its legislative capacity, is, in its office, and in all its characteristics, essentially judicial.

"That the Senate possesses a high judicial power, and that instances may occur in which the President of the United States will be amenable to it, is undeniable. But under the provisions of the constitution, it would seem to be equally plain that neither the President nor any other officer can be rightfully subjected to the operation of the judicial power of the Senate except in the cases and under the forms prescribed by the constitution.

"The constitution declares that 'the President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors' -that the House of Representatives 'shall have the sole power of impeachment'-that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments'-that 'when sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation'-that when the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside'—that no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present' -and that 'judgment shall not extend further than to remove from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust or profit, under the United States.'

"The resolution above quoted, charges in substance that in certain proceedings relating to the public revenue, the President has usurped authority and power not conferred upon him by the constitution and laws, and that in doing so he violated both. Any such act constitutes a high crime—one of the highest, indeed, which the President can commit-a crime which justly exposes him to impeachment by the House of Representatives, and upon due conviction, to removal from office, and to the complete and immutable disfranchisement prescribed by the con-

"The resolution, then, was in substance an impeachment of the President; and in its passage amounts to a declaration by a majority of the Senate, that he is guilty of an impeachable offence. As such it is spread upon the journals of the Senate—published to the nation and to the world—made part of our enduring archives -and incorporated in the history of the age. that class of incidental resolutions which re- | The punishment of removal from office and future disqualification, does not, it is true, follow this decision; nor would it have followed the like decision, if the regular forms of proceeding lad been pursued, because the requisite number did not concur in the result. But the moral influence of a solemn declaration, by a majority of the Senate, that the accused is guilty of the offence charged upon him, has been as effectually secured, as if the like declaration had been made upon an impeachment expressed in the same terms. Indeed, a greater practical effect has been gained, because the votes given for the resolution, though not sufficient to authorize a judgment of guilty on an impeachment, were numerous enough to carry that resolution.

"That the resolution does not expressly allege that the assumption of power and authority, which it condemns, was intentional and corrupt, is no answer to the preceding view of its character and effect. The act thus condemned, necessarily implies volition and design in the individual to whom it is imputed, and being unlawful in its character, the legal conclusion is, that it was prompted by improper motives, and committed with an unlawful intent. The charge is not of a mistake in the exercise of supposed powers, but of the assumption of powers not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both, and nothing is suggested to excuse or palliate the turpitude of the act. In the absence of any such excuse, or palliation, there is room only for one inference; and that is, that the intent was unlawful and corrupt. Besides, the resolution not only contains no mitigating suggestion, but on the contrary, it holds up the act complained of as justly obnoxious to censure and reprobation; and thus as distinctly stamps it with impurity of motive, as if the strongest epithets had been used. "The President of the United States, there-served. "The impeachment, instead of being preferred and prosecuted by the House of Representatives, originated in the Senate, and was prosecuted without the aid or concurrence of the other House. The oath or affirmation prescribed by the constitution, was not taken by the senators; the Chief Justice did not preside; no notice of the charge was given to the accused; and no opportunity afforded him to respond to the accusation, to meet his accusers face to face, to cross-examine the witnesses, to procure counteracting testimony, or to be heard in his defence. The safeguards and formalities which the constitution has connected with the power of impeachment, were doubtless supposed by the framers of that instrument, to be essential to the protection of the public servant, to the attainment of justice, and to the order, impartiality, and dignity of the procedure. These fore, has been by a majority of his constitutional triers, accused and found guilty of an impeach-able offence; but in no part of this proceeding have the directions of the constitution been obcally disregarded, in the commencement and conduct of these proceedings, but in their result, I find myself convicted by less than two-thirds of the members present, of an impeachable offence.

Having thus shown the proceedings of the Senate to have been extra-judicial and the mere fulmination of a censure, such as might come from a "mass meeting," and finding no warrant in any right or duty of the body, and intended for nothing but to operate upon him personally, he then showed that senators from three States had voted contrary to the sense of their respective State legislatures. On this point he said:

"There are also some other circumstances connected with the discussion and passage of the resolution, to which I feel it to be, not only my right, but my duty to refer. It appears by the journal of the Senate, that among the twenty-six senators who voted for the resolution on its final passage, and who had supported it in debate, in its original form, were one of the senators from the State of Maine, the two senators from New Jersey, and one of the senators from Ohio. It also appears by the same journal, and by the files of the Senate, that the legislatures of these States had severally expressed their opinions in respect to the Executive proceedings drawn in question before the Senate.

"It is thus seen that four senators have declared by their votes that the President, in the late Executive proceedings in relation to the revenue, had been guilty of the impeachable of fence of 'assuming upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both,' whilst the legislatures of their respective States had deliberately approved those very proceedings, as consistent with the constitution, and demanded by the public good. If these four votes had been given a accordance with the sentiments of the legislatures, as above expressed, there would have been but twenty-four votes out of forty-six for censuring the President, and the unprecedented reord of his conviction could not have been placed upon the journals of the Senate.

"In thus referring to the resolutions and instructions of State legislatures, I disclaim and repudiate all authority or design to interfere with the responsibility due from members of the senate to their own consciences, their constituent and their country. The facts now stated below to the history of these proceedings, and are important to the just development of the principles and interests involved in them, as well as to the proper vindication of the Executive department; and with that view, and that view only, are they here made the topic of remark."

And it concluded with an affecting appeal to his private history for the patriotism and integrity of his life, and the illustration of his conduct in relation to the bank, and showed his reliance on God and the People to sustain him; and looked with confidence to the place which justice would assign him on the page of history. This moving peroration was in these words:

"The resolution of the Senate contains an imputation upon my private as well as upon my public character; and as it must stand for ever on their journals, I cannot close this substitute for that defence which I have not been allowed to present in the ordinary form, without remarking, that I have lived in vain, if it be necessary to enter into a formal vindication of my character and purposes from such an imputation. In vain do l bear upon my person, enduring memorials of that contest in which American liberty was purchased; in vain have I since perilled property, fame, and life, in defence of the rights and privileges so dearly bought: in vain am I now, without a personal aspiration, or the hope of individual advantage, encountering responsibilities and dangers, from which, by mere inetivity in relation to a single point, I might have been exempt-if any serious doubts can e entertained as to the purity of my purposes ad motives. If I had been ambitious, I should ave sought an alliance with that powerful inuitution, which even now aspires to no divided mpire. If I had been venal, I should have old myself to its designs. Had I preferred ersonal comfort and official ease to the performace of my arduous duty, I should have ceased molest it. In the history of conquerors and surpers, never, in the fire of youth, nor in the igor of manhood, could I find an attraction to are me from the path of duty; and now, I shall carcely find an inducement to commence the reer of ambition, when gray hairs and a deying frame, instead of inviting to toil and bate, call me to the contemplation of other forlds, where conquerors cease to be honored,

. With this view, and for the reasons which and usurpers explate their crimes. The only have been stated, I do hereby solemnly protest ambition I can feel, is to acquit myself to Him against the aforementioned proceedings of the to whom I must soon render an account of my stewardship, to serve my fellow-men, and live respected and honored in the history of my country. No; the ambition which leads me on, is an anxious desire and a fixed determination, to return to the people, unimpaired, the sacred trust they have confided to my chargeto heal the wounds of the constitution and preserve it from further violation; to persuade my countrymen, so far as I may, that it is not in a splendid government, supported by powerful monopolies and aristocratical establishments, that they will find happiness, or their liberties their liberties, and fatal to the constitution of protected, but in a plain system, void of pomp -protecting all, and granting favors to nonedispensing its blessings like the dews of heaven, unseen and unfelt, save in the freshness and beauty they contribute to produce. It is such a government that the genius of our people requires-such a one only under which our States may remain for ages to come, united, prosperous, and free. If the Almighty Being who has hitherto sustained and protected me, will but vouchsafe to make my feeble powers instru-mental to such a result, I shall anticipate with pleasure the place to be assigned me in the history of my country, and die contented with the belief, that I have contributed in some small degree, to increase the value and prolong the duration of American liberty.

"To the end that the resolution of the Senate may not be hereafter drawn into precedent, with the authority of silent acquiescence on the part of the Executive department; and to the end, also, that my motives and views in the Executive proceeding denounced in that resolution may be known to my fellow-citizens, to the world, and to all posterity, I respectfully request that this message and protest may be entered at length on the journals of the Senate."

No sooner was this Protest read in the Senate than it gave rise to a scene of the greatest excitement. Mr. Poindexter, of Mississippi, immediately assailed it as a breach of the privileges of the Senate, and unfit to be received by the body. He said: "I will not dignify this paper by considering it in the light of an Executive message: it is no such thing. I regard it simply as a paper, with the signature of Andrew Jackson; and, should the Senate refuse to receive it, it will not be the first paper with the same signature which has been refused a hearing in this body, on the ground of the abusive and vituperative language which it contained. This effort to denounce and overawe the deliberations of the Senate may properly be regarded as capping the climax of that systematic plan of operations which had for several years been in progress, designed to bring this body into disrepute among the people, and thereby remove the only existing barrier to the arbitrary encroachments and usurpations of Executive power:"--- and he moved that the paper, as he called it, should not be received. Mr. Benton deemed this a proper occasion to give notice of his intention to move a strong measure which he contemplated-an expunging resolution against the sentence of the Senate:-a determination to which he had come from his own convictions of right, and which he now announced without consultation with any of his friends. He deemed this movement too bold to be submitted to a council of friends-too daring to expect their concurrence; -- and believed it was better to proceed without their knowledge, than against their decision. He, therefore, delivered his notice ex abruptu, accompanied by an earnest invective against the conduct of the Senate; and committed himself irrevocably to the prosecution of the "expunging resolution" until he should succeed in the effort. or terminate his political life: He said:

"The public mind was now to be occupied with a question of the very first moment and importance, and identical in all its features with the great question growing out of the famous resolutions of the English House of Commons in the case of the Middlesex election in the year 1768; and which engrossed the attention of the British empire for fourteen years before it was settled. That question was one in which the House of Commons was judged, and condemned, for adopting a resolution which was held by the subjects of the British crown to be a violation of their constitution, and a subversion of the rights of Englishmen: the question now before the Senate, and which will go before the American people, grows out of a resolution in which he (Mr. B.) believed that the constitution had been violated-the privileges of the House of Representatives invaded-and the rights of an American citizen, in the person of the President, subverted. The resolution of the House of Commons, after fourteen years of annual motions, was expunged from the Journal of the House; and he pledged himself to the American people to commence a similar series of motions with respect to this resolution of the Senate. He had made up his mind to do so without consultation with any human being, and without deigning to calculate the chances or the time of success. He rested under the firm conviction that the resolution of the Senate, which had drawn from the President the calm, temperate, and dignified protest, which had been read at the table, was a resolution which ought to be expunged from the Journal of the Senate; and respect of an address to their understanding if any thing was necessary to stimulate his and he that wishes to be heard in this got sense of duty in making a motion to that effect and in encouraging others after he was gone, in following up that motion to success, it would be found in the history and termination of the simlar motion which was made in the English House of Commons to which he had referred. That motion was renewed for fourteen years-from 1768 to 1782-before it was success? l. Fer the first seven years, the lofty and indignant majority did not condescend to reply to the motion. They sunk it under a dead vote as often as presented. The second seven year they replied; and at the end of the term, and on the assembling of a new Parliament, the veteran motion was carried by more than two to one; and the gratifying spectacle was beheld of a public expurgation, in the face of the asembled Commons of England, of the obnoxious resolution from the Journal of the House. The elections in England were septennial, and it took two terms of seven years, or two general elections, to bring the sense of the kingdom to bear upon their representatives. The elections of the Senate were sexennial, with intercalary exits and entrances, and it might take a less or a longer period, he would not presume to sar which, to bring the sense of the American people to bear upon an act of the American Senate Of that, he would make no calculation; but the final success of the motion in the English House of Commons, after fourteen years' perseverance, was a sufficient encouragement for him to begin and doubtless would encourage others to continue, until the good work should be crowned with success; and the only atonement made which it was in the Senate's power to make to the violated majesty of the constitution, the invaded privileges of the House of Representatives and the subverted rights of an American citizen

"In bringing this great question before the American people, Mr. B. should consider himself as addressing the calm intelligence of m enlightened community. He believed the body of the American people to be the most enlightened community upon earth; and, without the less disparagement to the present Schate, he must be permitted to believe that many such Senate might be drawn from the ranks of the people and still leave no dearth of intelligence behind To such a community-in an appeal, on a great question of constitutional law, to the under standings of such a people-declamation, pasion, epithets, opprobrious language, would stand for nothing. question, or being heard, would wish to be heeled, will have occasion to be clear and correct in his facts; close and perspicuous in his application of law; fair and candid in his conclusions and inferences; temperate and decorous in his language; and scrupulously free from every taint of vengeance and malice. Soenaly impressed with the truth of all these convictions, it was the intention of himself (Mr. B) whatever the example or the provocation might be-never to forget his place, his subject, his audience, and his object-never to forget that he was speaking in the American Senate, on a question of violated constitution and outraged individual right, to an audience comprehending the whole body of the American people, and for the purpose of obtaining a righteous decision from the calm and sober judgment of a higi ninded, intelligent, and patriotic com-

"The question immediately before the Senate was one of minor consequence; it might be called a question of small import, except for the effect which the decision might have upon the Senate itself. In that point of view, it might be a question of some moment; for, without reference to individuals, it was essential to the cause of free governments, that every department of the government, the Senate inclusive, should so act as to preserve to itself the respect and the confidence of the country. The immediate question was, upon the rejection of the President's message. It was moved to reject it-to reject it, not after it was considered, but before it was considered! and thus to tell the American people that their President shall not be heard-should not be allowed to plead his defence-in the presence of the body that condemned him-neither before the condemnation, nor after it! This is the motion: and certainly no enemy to the Senate could wish it to miscarry. The President, in the conclusion of his message, has respectfully requested that his defence might be entered upon the Journal of the Senate-upon that same Journal which contains the record of his conviction. This is the request of the President. Will the Senate deny it? Will they refuse this act of sheer justice and common decency? Will they go further, and not only refuse to place it on the Journal, but refuse even to suffer it to remain in the Senate? Will they refuse to permit it to remain on file, but send it back, or throw it out of doors, without condescending to reply to it? For that is the exact import of the motion now made! Will senators exhaust their minds, and their bodies also, in loading this very com-unication with epithets, and then say that it shall not be received? Will they receive memorials, resolutions, essays, from all that choose to abuse the President, and not receive a word of defence from him? Will they continue the spectacle which had been presented here for three months—a daily presentation of attacks tack him, young and old, boys and men-attacks echoing the very sound of this resolution, and which are not only received and filed here, but printed, which, possibly, the twenty-six could not unite here, nor go to trial upon any where! He remarked, in the third place, upon the effect produced in the character of the resolution, and affirmed that it was nothing. He said that the same charge ran through all three. They all three imputed to the President a violation of the constitution and laws of the country-of that constitution which he was sworn to support, and of those laws which he was not only bound to observe himself, but to cause to be

"A violation of the constitution and of the laws, Mr. B. said, were not abstractions and metaphysical subtleties. They must relate to persons or things. The violations cannot rest in the air; they must affix themselves to men or to property; they must connect themselves with the transactions of real life. They cannot be ideal and contemplative. In omitting the specifications relative to the dismission of one Secretary of the Treasury, and the appointment of another, what other specifications were adopted or substituted? Certainly none! What others were mentally intended? Surely none! What others were suggested? Certainly none! The general charge then rests upon the same specification; and so completely is this the fact, that no supporter of the resolutions has thought it necessary to make the least alteration in his speeches which supported the original resolution, or to say a single additional word in favor of the altered resolution as finally passed. The omission of the specification is then an omission of form and not of substance; it is a change of words and not of things; and the substitution of a derogation of the laws and constitution, for dangerous to the liberties of the people, is a still more flagrant instance of change of words without change of things. It is tautologous and nonsensical. It adds nothing to the general charge, and takes nothing from it. It neither explains it nor qualifies it. In the technical sense it is absurd; for it is not the case of a statute in derogation of the common law, to wit, repealing a part of it; in the common parlance understanding, it is ridiculous, for the President is not even charged with defaming the constitution and the laws; and, if he was so charged, it would present a curious trial of scandalum magnatum for the American Senate to engage in. No! said Mr. B., this derogation clause is an expletion! It is put in to fill up! The regular impeaching clause of dangerous to the liberties of the people, had to be taken out. There was danger, not in the people certainly, but to the character of the resolution, if it staid in. It identified that resolution as an impeachment, and, therefore, constituted a piece of internal evidence which it was necessary to withdraw; but in withdrawing which, the chaupon the President from all that choose to at- racter of the resolution was not altered. The charge for violating the laws and the constitution still stood; and the substituted clause was nothing but a stopper to a vacuum-additional sound without additional sense, to fill up a blank and round off a sentence.

"After showing the impeaching character of the Senate's resolution, from its own internal evidence, Mr. B. had recourse to another description of evidence, scarcely inferior to the resolutions themselves, in the authentic interpretations of their meaning He alluded to the speeches made in support of them, and which had resounded in this chamber for three months. and were now circulating all over the country in every variety of newspaper and pamphlet form. These speeches were made by the friends of the resolution to procure its adoption here, and to justify its adoption before the country. Let the country then read, let the people read, what has been sent to them for the purpose of justifying these resolutions which they are now to try! They will find them to be in the character of prosecution pleadings against an accused man, on his trial for the commission of great crimes! Let then look over these speeches, and mark the passages; they will find language ransacked, history runmaged, to find words sufficiently strong, and examples sufficiently odious, to paint and exemplify the enormity of the crime of which the President was alleged to be guilty. After reading these passages, let any one doubt, if he can, as to the character of the resolution which was adopted. Let him doubt, if he can, of the impeachable nature of the offence which was charged upon the President. Let him doubt, if he can, that every Senator who voted for that resolution, voted the President to be guilty of an impeachable offence—an offence, for the trial of which this Senate is the appointed tribunal—an offence which it will be the immediate duty of the Rouse of Representatives to bring before the Senate, in a formal impeachment, unless they disbelieve in the truth and justice of the resolution which has been adopted.

"Mr. B. said there were three characters in which the Senate could act; and every time it acted it necessarily did so in one or the other of these characters. It possessed executive, legislative, and judicial characters. As a part of the executive, it acted on treaties and nominations to office; as a part of the legislative, it assisted in making laws; as a judicial tribunal, it decided impeachments. Now, in which of these characters did the Senate act when it adopted the resolution in question? Not in its executive character, it will be admitted; not in its legislative character, it will be proved: for the resolution was, in its nature, wholly foreign to legislation. It was directed, not to the formation of a law, but to the condemnation of the President. It was to condemn him for dismissing one Secretary, because he would not do a thing, and appointing another that he might do it; and

Mr. Duane could not be restored by law, no Mr. Taney be put out by law. It was to convict the President of violating the constitution and the laws; and surely these infractions are not to be amended by laws, but avenged by trial and punishment. The very nature of the resolution proves it to be foreign to all logislation; its form proves the same thing; for it is no joint, to require the action of the House of Res resentatives, and thus ripen life law; nor is followed by an instruction to a committee report a bill in conformity to it. No such is struction could even now be added without one mitting an absurdity of the most ridiculous character. There was another resolution, with which this must not be confounded, and upon which an instruction to a committee might have been bottomed; it was the resolution which declared the Secretary's reasons for removing the deposits to be insufficient and unsutiale. tory; but no such instruction has been bettern ed even upon that resolution; so that it is endent that no legislation of any kind was intended to follow either resolution, even that to which legislation might have been appropriate, much less that to which it would have been an absurdity. Four months have elapsed since the reselutions were brought in. In all that time, there has been no attempt to found a legislative act upon either of them; and it is too late now to assume that the one which, in its nature and in its form, is wholly foreign to legislation, is a legislative act, and adopted by the Senate in its legislative character. No! This resolution is judicial; it is a judgment pronounced upon an imputed offence; it is the declared sense of a majority of the Senate, of the guilt of the President of a high crime and misdemeanor. It is in substance, an impeachment—an impeachment in violation of all the forms prescribed by the constitution—in violation of the privileges of the House of Representatives—in subversion of the rights of the accused, and the record of which ought to be expunged from the Journal of the Senate.

"Mr. B. said the selection of a tribunal for the trial of impeachments was felt, by the convention which framed the constitution, as one of the most delicate and difficult tasks which they had to perform. Those great men were well read in history, both ancient and modern and knew that the impeaching power-the usual mode for trying political men for political of fences-was often an engine for the gratification of factious and ambitious feelings. An impeachment was well known to be the beaten road for running down a hated or successful political rival. After great deliberation-after weighing all the tribunals, even that of the Supreme Court—the Senate of the United States was fixed upon as the body which, from its constitution, would be the most impartial, neutral, and equitable, that could be selected, and, with the check of a previous inquisition, and present certainly this was not matter for legislation; for | ment of charges by the House of Represent tires, would be the safest tribunal to which could be confided a power so great in itself, and so susceptible of being abused. The Senate was selected; and to show that he had not overstated the difficulties of the convention in making the selection, he would take leave to read a passage from a work which was canonical on this subject, and from an article in that work which was written by the gentleman whose authority would have most weight on this occasion. He spoke of the Federalist, and of the article writa by General Hamilton on the impeaching power: "A well-constituted court for the trial of impeachments is an object not more to be desired than difficult to be obtained, in a government wholly elective. The subjects of its jurisdiction are those offences which proceed from the misconduct of public men; or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust. They are of a nature which may, with peculiar propriety, be denominated political, as they relate chiefly to injuries dono immediately to so-ciety itself. The prosecution of them, for this reason, will seldom fail to agitate the passions of the whole community, and to divide it into parties more or less friendly or inimical to the accused. In many cases, it will connect itself with the pre-existing factions, and will enlist all their animosities, partialities, influence, and interest, on one side or on the other; and, in such cases, there will always be the greatest danger that the decision will be regulated more by the comparative strength of parties, than by the real demonstrations of innocence or guilt. The delicacy and magnitude of a trust which so deeply concerns the political reputation and existence of every man engaged in the administration of public affairs, speak for themselves. The difficulty of placing it rightly in a government resting entirely on the basis of periodical elections, will as readily be perceived, when it is considered that the most conspicuous characters in it will, from that circumstance, be too often the leaders or the tools of the most cunning or the most numerous faction; and, on this account, can hardly be expected to possess the requisite neutrality towards those whose con-act may be the subject of scrutiny.

"'The division of the powers of impeachment between the two branches of the legislature, as-igning to one the right of accusing, to the other he right of trying, avoids the inconvenience of making the same persons both accusers and judges; and guards against the danger of perecution from the prevalency of a factious spirit

a either of those branches.'
"Mr. B. said there was much matter for eluidation of the present object of discussion in he extract which he had read. Its definition f an impeachable offence covered the indentical harge which was contained in the resolution dopted by the Senate against the President. he offence charged upon him possessed every

Hamilton. It imputes misconduct to a public man, for the abuse and violation of a public trust. The discussion of the charge has agitated the passions of the whole community; it has divided the people into parties, some friendly, some inimical, to the accused; it has connected itself with the pre-existing parties, enlisting the whole of the opposition parties under one banner, and calling forth all their animosities—all their partialities-all their influence-all their interest; and, what was not foreseen by General Hamilton, it has called forth the tremendous moneyed power, and the pervading organization of a great moneyed power, wielding a mass of forty millions of money, and sixty millions of debt; wielding the whole in aid and support of this charge upon the President, and working the double battery of seduction, on one hand, and oppression on the other, to put down the man against whom it is directed! This is what General Hamilton did not foresee; but the next feature in the picture he did foresee, and most accurately describe, as it is now seen by us all. He said that the decision of these impeachments would ofter be regulated more by the comparative strength of parties than by the guilt or innocence of the accused. How prophetic! Look to the memorials, resolutions, and petitions, sent in here to criminate the President, so clearly marked by a party line, that when an exception occurs, it is made the special subject of public remark. Look at the vote in the Senate, upon the adoption of the resolution, also as clearly defined by a party line as any party question can ever be expected to be.

"To guard the most conspicuous characters from being persecuted—Mr. B. said he was using the language of General Hamilton-to guard the most conspicuous characters from being persecuted by the leaders or the tools of the most cunning or the most numerous faction -the convention had placed the power of trying impeachments, not in the Supreme Court, not even in a body of select judges chosen for the occasion, but in the Senate of the United States, and not even in them without an intervening check to the abuse of that power, by associating the House of Representatives, and forbidding the Senate to proceed against any officer until that grand inquest of the nation should demand his trial. How far fortunate, or otherwise, the convention may have been in the selection of its tribunal for the trial of impeachments, it was not for him, Mr. B., to say. It was not for him to say how far the requisite neutrality towards those whose conduct may be under scrutiny, may be found, or has been found, in this body. But he must take leave to say, that if a public man may be virtually impeached-actually condemned by the Senate of an impeachable offence, without the intervention of the House of Representatives, then has the constitution failed at one of its most vital points and a ready means found for doing a thing lature of the impeachment defined by General | which had filled other countries with persecu

"Mr. B. called upon the Senate to recollect what was the feature in the famous court of the Star Chamber, which rendered that court the most odious that ever sat in England. It was not the mass of its enormitles-great as they were-for the regular tribunals which yet existed, exceeded that court, both in the mass and in the atrocity of their crimes and oppressions. The regular courts in the compass of a single reign-that of James the Second; a single judge in a single riding—Jeffries, on the Western Circuit—surpassed all the enormities of the Star Chamber, in the whole course of its existence. What then rendered that court so intolerably odious to the English people? Sir, said Mr. B., it was because that court had no grand jury-because it proceeded without presentment, without indictment-upon information alone-and thus got at its victims without the intervention, without the restraint, of an accusing body. This is the feature which sunk the Star Chamber in England. It is the feature which no criminal tribunal in this America is allowed to possess. The most inconsiderable offender, in any State of the Union, must be charged by a grand jury before he can be tried by the court. In this Senate, sitting as a high court of impeachment, a charge must first be presented by the House of Representatives, sitting as the grand inquest of the nation. But if the Senate can proceed, without the intervention of this grand inquest, wherein is it to differ from the Star Chamber, except in the mere execution of its decrees? And what other execution is now required for delinquent public men, than the force of public opinion? No! said Mr. B., we live in an age when public opinion over public men, is omnipotent and irreversible !-- when public sentiment annihilates a public man more effectually than the scaffold. To this new and omnipotent tribunal, all the public men of Europe and America are now happily subject. The flat of public opinion has superseded the axe of the executioner. Struck by that opinion, kings and emperors in Europe, and the highest functionaries among ourselves, fall powerless from the political stage, and wanphantoms over the land. Should be give examples? It might be invidious; yet all would recollect an eminent example of a citizen, once sitting at the head of this Scratch Turn, or der, while their bodies live, as shadows and sitting at the head of this Senate, afterwards falling under a judicial prosecution, from which he escaped untouched by the sword of the law, yet that eminent citizen was more utterly annihilated by public opinion, than any execution of a capital sentence could ever have accomplished upon his name.

"What occasion then has the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, for the power of execution? The only effect of a regular impeachment now, is to remove from office, and disqualification for office. An irregular impeachment will be tantamount to removal and dis qualification, if the justice of the sentence is confided in by the people. If this condemnation of the President had been pronounced in the first term of his administration, and the people had believed in the truth and justice of the sentence, certainly President Jackson would not have been elected a second time; and every object that a political rival, or a political party could have wished from his removal from office and disqualification for office, would have been accomplished. Disqualification for office—loss of public favor-political death-is now the object of political rivalship; and all this can be accomplished by an informal, as well as by formal impeachment, if the sentence is only confided in by the people. If the people believed that the President has violated the constitution and the laws, he ceases to be the object of their respect and their confidence; he loses their favor; he dies a political death; and that this might be the object of the resolution, Mr. B. would leave to the determination of those who should read the speeches which were delivered in support of the measure, and which would constitute a public and lasting monument of the temper in which the resolution was presented, and the object intended to be accomplished by it.

"It was in vain to say there could be no object, at this time, in annihilating the political influence of President Jackson, and killing him off as a public man, with a senatorial conviction for violating the laws and constitution of the country. Such an assertion, if ventured upon by any one, would stand contradicted by facts of which Europe and America are witness s Does he not stand between the country and the bank? Is he not proclaimed the sole obstacle to the recharter of the bank; and in its recharter is there not wrapped up the destinies of a political party, now panting for power? Remove this sole obstacle—annihilate its influence—kill off President Jackson with a sentence of condemnation for a high crime and misdemeanor, and the charter of the bank will be renewed, and in its renewal, a political party, now thundering at the gates of the capitol, will leap into power Here then is an object for desiring the extinction of the political influence of President Jackson An object large enough to be seen by all Ameri ca! and attractive enough to enlist the combined interest of a great moneyed power, and of a great political party."

Thus spoke Mr. Benton; but the debate of the protest went on; and the motion of M. Poindexter, digested into four different propo sitions, after undergoing repeated modification upon consultations among its friends, and after much acrimony on both sides, was adopted by the fixed majority of twenty-seven. of the Senate, that body virtually affirmed the impeachment character of the condemnatory resolutions, and involved itself in the predicament of voting an impeachable matter without observing a single rule for the conduct of impeachments. The protest placed it in a dilemma. it averred the Senate's judgment to be without authority-without any warrant in the constitution-any right in the body to pronounce it. To receive that protest, and enter it on the journal, was to record a strong evidence against themselves; to reject it as a breach of privilege was to claim for their proceeding the immunity of a regular and constitutional act; and as the proceeding was on criminal matter, amounting to a high crime and misdemeanor. on which matter the Senate could only act in its judicial capacity; therefore it had to claim the immunity that would belong to it in that capacity; and assume a violation of privilege. Certainly if the Senate had tried an impeachment in due form, the protest, impeaching its justice, might have been a breach of privilege; but the Senate had no privilege to vote an impeachable matter without a regular impeachment; and therefore it was no breach of privilege to impugn the act which they had no privilege to commit.

CHAPTER CIV.

MR. WEBSTER'S PLAN OF RELIEF.

r has already been seen that Mr. Webster took direct part in promoting the adoption of the solutions against General Jackson. He had o private grief to incite him against the Presient; and, as first drawn up, it would have en impossible for him, honored with the titles "expounder and defender of the constituon," to have supported the resolve: bearing ainly on its face impeachable matter. After veral modifications, he voted for it; but, from e beginning, he had his own plan in view, hich was entirely different from an attack on e President; and solely looked to the advange of the bank, and the relief of the distress, a practical and parliamentary mode of legision. He looked to a renewal of the bank arter for a short term, and with such modifi-Vol. I.—28

cations as would tend to disarm opposition, and to conciliate favor for it. The term of the renewal was only to be for six years: a length of time well chosen; because, from the shortness of the period, it would have an attraction for all that class of members-always more or less numerous in every assembly-who, in every difficulty, are disposed to temporize and compromise; while, to the bank, in carrying its existence beyond the presidential term of General Jackson, it felt secure in the future acquisition of a full term. Besides the attraction in the short period, Mr. Webster proposed another amelioration, calculated to have serious effect; it was to give up the exclusive or monopoly feature in the charter-leaving to Congress to grant any other charter, in the mean time, to a new company, if it pleased. The objectionable branch bank currency of petty drafts was also given up. Besides this, and as an understanding that the corporation would not attempt to obtain a further existence beyond the six years, the directors were to be at liberty to begin to return the capital to the stockholders at any time within the period of three years, before the expiration of the six renewed years The deposits were not to be restored until after the first day of July; and, as an agreeable concession to the enemies of small paper currency the bank was to issue, or use, no note under the amount of twenty dollars. He had drawn up a bill with these provisions, and asked leave to bring it in; and, asking the leave, made a very plausible business speech in its favor: the best perhaps that could have been devised. In addition to his own weight, and the recommendations in the bill, it was understood to be the preference of Mr. Biddle himself-his own choice of remedies in the difficulties which surrounded his institution. But he met opposition from quarters not to be expected: from Mr. Clay, who went for the full term of twenty years; and Mr. Calhoun, who went for twelve. It was difficult to comprehend why these two gentlemen should wish to procure for the bank more than it asked, and which it was manifestly impossible for it to gain. Mr. Webster's bill was the only one that stood the least chance of getting through the two Houses; and on that point he had private assurances of support from friends of the administration, if all the friends of the bank stood firm In favoring this charter for twelve years, Mr. Calhoun felt that an explanation of his conduct was due to the public, as he was well known to have been opposed to the renewed charter, when so vehemently attempted, in 1832; and also against banks generally. His explanation was, that he considered it a currency question, and a question between the national and local banks; and that the renewed charter was to operate against them; and, in winding itself up, was to cease for ever, having ilrst established a safe currency. His frequent expression was, that his plan was to "unbank the banks:" a process not very intelligibly explained at the time, and on which he should be allowed to speak for himself. Some passages are, therefore, given from his speech:

"After a full survey of the whole subject, I can see no means of extricating the country from its present danger, and to arrest its further increase, but a bank, the agency of which, in some form, or under some authority, is indispensable. The country has been brought into the present diseased state of the currency by banks, and must be extricated by their agency. We must, in a word, use a bank to unbank the banks, to the extent that may be necessary to restore a safe and stable currency-just as we apply snow to a frozen limb, in order to restore vitality and circulation, or hold up a burn to the flame to extract the inflammation. All must see that it is impossible to suppress the banking system at once. It must continue for a time. Its greatest enemies, and the advocates of an exclusive specie circulation, must make it a part of their system to tolerate the banks for a longer or a shorter period. To suppress them at once, would, if it were possible, work a greater revolution: a greater change in the relative condition of the various classes of the community than would the conquest of the country by a savage enemy. What, then, must be done? I answer, a new and safe system must gradually grow up under, and replace, the old; imitating, in this respect, the beautiful process which we sometimes see, of a wounded or diseased part in a living organic body, gradually superseded by the nealing process of nature.

"How is this to be effected? How is a bank to be used as the means of correcting the excess of the banking system? And what bank is to be selected as the agent to effect this salutary change? I know, said Mr. C., that a diversity of opinion will be found to exist, as to the agent to be selected, among those who agree on every other point, and who, in particular, agree on the necessity of using some bank as the means of effecting the object intended; one preferring a simple recharter of the existing bank-another, the charter of a new bank of the United States and a fourth, the use of the State banks, as the agent. I wish, said Mr. C., to leave all these as open questions, to be carefully surveyed and compared with each other, calmly and dispassionately, without prejudice or party feeling; and that to be selected which, on the whole, shall appear to be best-the most safe; the most efficient; the most prompt in application, and the least liable to constitutional objection. It would, however, be wanting in candor on my part, not to declare that my impression is, that a new Bank of the United States, ingrafted upon the old, will be found, under all the circumstances of the case, to combine the greatest advantages, and to be liable to the fewest objections; but this impression is not so firmly fixed as to be inconsistent with a calm review of the whole ground, or to prevent my yielding to the conviction of reason, should the result of such review prove that any other is preferable. Among its peculiar recommendations, may be ranked the consideration, that, while it would afford the means of a prompt and effectual application for mitigating and finally removing the existing distress, it would, at the same time open to the whole community a fair opportunity of participation in the advantages of the institution, be they what they may.

"Let us then suppose (in order to illustrate and not to indicate a perference) that the present bank be selected as the agent to effect the intended object. What provisions will be necessary? I will suggest those that have on curred to me, mainly, however, with a view of exciting the reflection of those much more miliar with banking operations than myself and who, of course, are more competent to form correct judgment on their practical effect.

"Let, then, the bank charter be renewed for twelve years after the expiration of the present term, with such modifications and limitations may be judged proper, and that after that period it shall issue no notes under ten dollars; that government shall not receive in its dues any sum less than ten dollars, except in the legal coins of the United States; that it shall not receive in its dues the notes of any bank the issues notes of a denomination less than for dollars; and that the United States But shall not receive in payment, or on deposit the notes of any bank whose notes are not received. able in dues of the government; nor the note of any bank which may receive the notes of any bank whose notes are not receivable by the ernment. It is unnecessary for me to state, that at preent the standard value of gold is several per cent less than that of silver, the necessary effeet of which has been to expel gold entirely from our circulation, and thus to deprive us of scoin so well calculated for the circulation of a country so great in extent, and having so vast an intercourse, commercial, social, and political, between all its parts, as ours. As an additional recommendation to raise its relative value, gold has, of late, become an important product of three considerable States of the Union, Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia-to the industry of which, the measure proposed would give a strong impulse, and which in turn would greatly increase the quantity produced.

"Such are the means which have occurred to me. There are members of this body far more competent to judge of their practical operation than myself, and as my object is simply to suggest them for their reflection, and for that of others who are more familiar with this part of the subject, I will not at present enter into an inquiry as to their efficiency, with a view of determining whether they are fully adequate to effect the object in view or not. There are doubtless others of a similar description, and perhaps more efficacions, that may occur to the experienced, which I would freely embrace, as my object is to adopt the best and most efficient. And it may be hoped that, if on experience it should be found that neither these provisions nor any other in the power of Congress, are fully adequate to effect the important reform which I have proposed, the co-operation i the States may be afforded, at least to the extent of suppressing the circulation of notes under five dollars, where such are permitted to to issued under their authority."

The ultimate object proposed to be accomblished by Mr. Calhoun in this process of "unanking the banks," was to arrive eventually ad by slow degrees, at a metallic currency, and he revival of gold. This had been my object, nd so declared in the Senate, from the time of he first opposition to the United States Bank. le had talked his plan over to myself and others: e had talked over ours to him. There was a oint at which we all agreed—the restoration of a etallic currency; but differed about the means he expecting to attain it slowly and eventuly, through the process which he mentioned; id we immediately, through the revival of the ld currency, the extinction of the Bank of the nited States, the establishment of an indepenat treasury, and the exclusion of all paper oney from the federal receipts and payments. ying hold of the point on which we agreed, nd which was also the known policy of the ter, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Sile

President), Mr. Calhoun appealed to Mr. Silsa Wright and myself and other friends of the administration, to support his plan. He said:

"If I understand their views, as expressed by the senator from Missouri, behind me (Mr. Benton) - the senator from New-York (Mr. Wright); and other distinguished members of the party, and the views of the President, as expressed in reported conversations, I see not liow they can reject the measure (to wit: his plan). They profess to be the advocates of a metallic currency. I propose to restore it by the most effectual measures that can be devised; gradually and slowly, and to the extent that experience may show that it can be done consistently with due regard to the public interest. Further, no one can desire to go.'

The reference here made by Mr. Calhoun to the views of the senator from Missouri was to conversations held between them; in which each freely communicated his own plan. Mr. Benton had not then brought forward his proposition for the revival of the gold currency; but did so, (in a speech which he had studied), the moment Mr. Calhoun concluded. That was a thing understood between them. Mr. Calhoun had signified his wish to speak first; to which Mr. Benton readily assented: and both took the opportunity presented by Mr. Webster's motion, and the presentation of his plan, to present their own respectively. Mr. Benton presented his the moment Mr. Calhoun sat down, in a much considered speech, which will be given in the next chapter; and which was the first of his formal speeches in favor of reviving the gold currency. In the mean time, Mr. Webster's plan lingered on the motion for leave to bring in his bill. That leave was not granted. Things took a strange turn. The friends of the bank refused m a body to give Mr. Webster the leave asked: the enemies of the bank were in favor of giving him the leavechiefly, perhaps, because his friends refused it. In this state of contrariety among his friends, Mr. Webster moved to lay his own motion on the table; and Mr. Forsyth, to show that this balk came from his own side of the chamber. asked the yeas and nays; which were granted and were as follows:

"YEAS.-Messrs Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, King of Georgia, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Poindexbee, Smith, Southard, Sprague, Swift, Tomlinaon, Waggaman, Webster.

"Nays.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Forsyth, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, Morris, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wilkins, Wright."

The excuse for the movement-for this unexpected termination to Mr. Webster's motion -was that the Senate might proceed with Mr. Clay's resolution against General Jackson, and come to a conclusion upon it. It was now time for that conclusion. It was near the last of March, and the Virginia elections came on in April: but the real cause for Mr. Webster's motion was the settled opposition of his political friends to his pisn; and that was proved by its subsequent fate. In his motion to lay his application on the table, he treated it as a temporary disposition of it-the application to be renewed at some future time: which it never was.

CHAPTER CV.

REVIVAL OF THE GOLD CURRENCY-MR. BEN-TON'S SPEECH.

MR. BENTON said it was now six years since he had begun to oppose the renewal of the charter of this bank, but he had not, until the present moment, found a suitable occasion for showing the people the kind of currency which they were entitled to possess, and probably would possess, on the dissolution of the Bank of the United States. This was a view of the subject which many wished to see, and which he felt bound to give; and which he should proceed to present, with all the brevity and perspicuity of which he was master.

1. In the first place, he was one of those who believed that the government of the United States was intended to be a hard money government: that it was the intention, and the declaration of the constitution of the United States. that the federal currency should consist of gold and silver; and that there is no power in Congress to issue, or to authorize any company of individuals to issue, any species of federal paper currency whatsoever.

Every clause in the constitution, said Mr. B.

early statute of Congress which interprets the meaning of these clauses and every historic recollection which refers to them, go hard is hand, in giving to that instrument the meaning which this proposition ascribes to it. The power granted to Congress to coin money is an authority to stamp metallic money, and is not an authority for emitting slips of paper containing promises to pay money. The authority granted to Congress to regulate the value of coin, is an authority to regulate the value of the metallic money, not of paper. The prohibition upon the States against making any thing but gold and silver a legal tender, is a moral prohibition, founded in virtue and honesty, and is just as binding upon the federal government as upon the State governments; and that without a written prohibition; for the difference in the nature of the two governments is such, that the States may do all things which they are not forbid to do: and the federal government can do nothing which it is not authorized by the constitution to do. The power to punish the erime of counterfeiting is limited to the current coin of the United States, and to the securities of the United States; and cannot be extended to the offence of forging paper money, but by that unjustifiable power of construction which founds an implication upon an implication, and hangs one implied power upon another. The word currency is not in the constitution, nor any word which can be made to cover a circu lation of bank notes. Gold and silver is the only thing recognized for money. It is the money, and the only money, of the constitution; and every historic recollection, as well as ever phrase in the constitution, and every early statute on the subject of money, confirms that idea. People were sick of paper money about the time that this constitution was formed The Congress of the confederation, in the time of the Revolution, had issued a currency of paper money. It had run the full career of that con rency. The wreck of two hundred millions of paper dollars lay upon the land. The framer of that constitution worked in the midst that wreck. They saw the havor which pape money had made upon the fortunes of individals, and the morals of the public. They deta mined to have no more federal paper mong They created a hard money government; is which bears upon the subject of money—every intended the new government to recognize

Legislative enactment, continued Mr. B., came quickly to the aid of constitutional intention and historic recollection. The fifth statute passed at the first session of the first Congress that ever sat under the present constitution, was full and explicit on this head. It defined the kind of money which the federal treasury should receive. The enactments of the statute are remarkable for their brevity and comprehension, as well as for their clear interpretation of the constitution; and deserve to be repeated and remembered. They are: That the fees and duties payable to the federal government shall be received in gold and silver coin only: the gold coins of France, Spain, Portugal, and England, and all other gold coins of equal fineness, at eighty-nine cents for every pennyweight; the Mexican dollar at one hundred cents; the crown of France at one hundred and eleven cents; and all other silver coins of equal fineness, at one hundred and eleven cents per ounce. This statute was passed the 30th day of July, 1789-just one month after Congress had commenced the work of legislation. It shows the sense of the Congress composed of the men, in great part, who had framed the constitution, and who, by using the word only, clearly expressed their intention that gold and silver alone was to constitute the currency of the new govern-

In support of this construction of the constition, Mr. B. referred to the phrase so often used by our most aged and eminent statesmen, that this was intended to be a hard money government. Yes, said Mr. B., the framers of the constitution were hard money men; but the thief expounder and executor of that constitution was not a hard money man, but a paper ystem man! a man devoted to the paper system f England, with all the firmness of conviction, and all the fervor of enthusiasm. God forbid. aid Mr. B., that I should do injustice to Gen. Hamilton—that I should say, or insinuate, aught o derogate from the just fame of that great han! He has many titles to the gratitude and dmiration of his countrymen, and the heart ould not be American which could dishonor or sparage his memory. But his ideas of government did not receive the sanction of general approbation; and of all his political tenets, his attachment to the paper system was mort strongly opposed at the time, and has produced the most lasting and deplorable results upon the country. In the year 1791, this great man, then Secretary of the Treasury, brought forward his celebrated plan for the support of public credit-that plan which unfolded the entire scheme of the paper system, and immediately developed the great political line between the federalists and the republicans. The establishment of a national bank was the leading and predominant feature of that plan; and the original report of the Secretary, in favor of establishing the bank, contained this fatal and deplorable recommendation:

"The bills and notes of the bank, originally made payable, or which shall have become payable, on demand, in gold and silver coin, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States."

This fatal recommendation became a clause in the charter of the bank. It was transferred from the report of the Secretary to the pages of the statute book; and from that moment the moneyed character of the federal government stood changed and reversed. Federal bank notes took the place of hard money; and the whole edifice of the new government slid, at once, from the solid rock of gold and silver money, on which its framers had placed it, into the troubled and tempestuous ocean of a paper currency.

Mr. B. said it was no answer to this most serious charge of having changed the moneyed character of the federal government, and of the whole Union, to say that the notes of the Bank of the United States are not made a legal tender between man and man. There was no necessity, he said, for a statute law to that effect; it was sufficient that they were made a legal tender to the federal government; the law of necessity, far superior to that of the statute book, would do the rest. A law of tender was not necessary; a forced, incidental tender, resulted as an inevitable consequence from the credit and circulation which the federal government gave them. Whatever was received at the custom-houses, at the land-offices, at the post-offices, at the marshals' and district attorneys' offices, and in all the various dues to the federal government, must be received and will be received by the people. It becomes the actual and practical currency of the land. People must take it, or get *hing; and thus the federal government, establisheding a paper currency for itself, establishes *also for the States and for the people; and every body must use it from necessity, whether compelled by law or not.

Mr. B. said it was not to be supposed that the objection which he now took to the unconstitutionality of the clause which made the notes of the federal bank a legal tender to the federal government, was an objection which could be overlooked, or disregarded, by the adversaries of the bank in 1791. It was not overlooked, or disregarded; on the contrary, it was denounced, and combated, as in itself a separate and distinct breach of the constitution, going the whole length of emitting paper money; and the more odious and reprehensible because a privileged company was to have the monopoly of the emission. The genius of Hamilton was put in requisition to answer this objection; and the best answer which that great man could give it, was a confession of the omnipotence of the objection, and the total impossibility of doing it away. His answer surrendered the whole question of a currency. It sunk the notes of the bank, which were then to be tendered to the federal government, to the condition of supplies furnished to the government, and to be consumed by it. The answer took refuge under the natural power, independent of all constitutions, for the tax receiver to receive his taxes in what articles he pleased. To do justice to General Hamilton, and to detect and expose the true character of this bank paper, Mr. B. read a clause from Gen. Hamilton's reply to the cabinet opinions of Mr. Jefferson, and the Attorney General Randoiph, when President Washington had the charter of the first bank under advisement with his Secretaries. It was the clause in which General Hamilton replied to the objection to the constitutionality of making the notes of the bank receivable in payment of public dues. "To designate or appoint the money or thing in which taxes are to be paid, is not only a proper, but a necessary exercise of the power of collecting them. Accordingly, Congress, in the law concerning the collection of the duties, imposts, and tonnage, has provided that they shall be payable in gold and silver. But, while it was an indispensable part of the work to say in what they should be paid, the choice of the specific thing was a mere matter of discretion. The payment might have been required in the commodities themselves. Taxes in kind, however ill judged, are not without precedents, even in the United States; or it might have been in the paper money of the several States; or in the bills of the Bank of North America, New-York, and Massachusetts, all, or either of them; it might have been in bills issued under the authority of the United States. No part of this, it is presumed, can be disputed. The appointment of the money or thing in which the taxes are to be paid, is an incident of the power of collection, And among the expedients which may be adopt. ed, is that of bills issued under the authority of the United States." Mr. B. would read no further, although the argument of General Hamilton extended through several pages. The nature of the argument is fully disclosed in what is read. It surrenders the whole question of a paper currency. Neither the power to furnish: currency, or to regulate currency, is pretended to be claimed. The notes of the new bank are put upon the footing, not of money, but of commodities-things-articles in kind-which the tar receiver may accept from the tax payer; and which are to be used and consumed by the tar receiver, and not to be returned to the people much less to be diffused over the country in plac. of money. This is the original idea and conception of these notes. It is the idea under which they obtained the legal capacity of receivability in payment of public dues; and from this humble conception, this degraded assimilation to corn and grain, to clothes and provisions they have, by virtue of that clause in the charter, crept up to the character of money-become the real, practical currency of the land-driver the currency of the constitution from the land -and so depraved the public intellect as now to be called for as money, and proclaimed to be indispensable to the country, when the author of the bank could not rank it higher than an erpedient for paying a tax.

2. In the next place, Mr. B. believed that is quantity of specie derivable from foreign commerce, added to the quantity of gold derivals from our own mines, were fully sufficient, it is expelled from the country by unwise laws, is furnish the people with an abundant circulates of gold and silver coin, for their common comm

vable from foreign comuantity of gold derivable

The truth of these propositions, Mr. B. held to be susceptible of complete and ready proof. He spoke first of the domestic supply of native gold, and said that no mines had ever developed more rapidly than these had done, or promised more abundantly than they now do. In the vear 1824 they were a spot in the State of North Carolina; they are now a region spreading into six States. In the year 1824 the product was $5,000; in the last year the product, in coined gold, was $868,000; in uncoined, as much more; and the product of the present year computed at two millions; with every prospect of continued and permanent increase. The probability was that these mines alone, in the lapse of a few years, would furnish an abundant supply of gold to establish a plentiful circulation of that metal, if not expelled from the country by unwise laws. But the great source of supply, both for gold and silver, Mr. B. said, was in our toreign commerce. It was this foreign commerce which filled the States with hard money immediately after the close of the Revolutionary War, when the domestic mines were unknown; and it is the same foreign commerce which, even now, when federal laws discourage the importation of foreign coins and compel their exportation is bringing in an annual supply of seven or eight millions. With an amendment of the laws which now discourage the importation of foreign coins, and compel their exportation, there could be no delay in the rapid accumulation of a sufficient stock of the precious metals to supply the largest circulation which the common business of the country could require.

Mr. B. believed the product of foreign mines, and the quantity of gold and silver now in exstence, to be much greater than was commonly upposed; and, as a statement of its amount would establish his proposition in favor of an dequate supply of these metals for the common arrency of the country, he would state that mount, as he found it calculated in approved torks of political economy. He looked to the have great sources of supply: 1. Mexico and outh America; 2. Europe and Northern Asia; The coast of Africa. Taking the discovery the New World as the starting point from shich the calculation would commence, and the —making a total product of seven thousand two hundred and thirty-six millions, in the short space of three centuries and a half. To this is to be added the quantity existing at the time the New World was discovered, and which was computed at $2,300,000,000. Upon all these data, the political economists, Mr. B. said, after deducting $2,000,000,000 for waste and consumption, still computed the actual stock of gold and silver in Europe, Asia, and America, in 1832, at about seven thousand millions of dollars; and that quantity constantly and rapidly increasing.

Mr. B. had no doubt but that the quantity of gold and silver in Europe, Asia, and America, was sufficient to carry on the whole business of the world. He said that states and empires -far greater in wealth and population than any now existing-far superior in public and private magnificence-had carried on all the business of private life, and all the affairs of national government, upon gold and silver alone; and that before the mines of Mexico and Peru were known, or dreamed of. He alluded to the great nations of antiquity-to the Assyrian and Persian empires; to Egypt, Carthage, Rome; to the Grecian republics; the kingdoms of Asia Minor; and to the empire, transcending all these put together -the Saracenic empire of the Caliphs, which, taking for its centre the eastern limit of the Roman world, extended its dominion as far west as Rome had conquered, and further east than Alexander had marched. These great nations, whose armies crushed empires at a blow, whose monumental edifices still attest their grandeur, had no idea of bank credits and paper money. They used gold and silver alone. Such degenerate phrases as sound currency, paper medium, circulating media, never once sounded in their heroic ears. But why go back, exclaimed Mr. B., to the nations of antiquity? Why quit our own day? Why look beyond the boundaries of Europe? We have seen an empire in our own day, of almost fabulous grandeur and magnificence, carrying on all its vast undertakings upon a currency of gold and silver, without deigning to recognize paper for money. I speak, said Mr. B., of France-great and imperial France-and have my eye upon that first year of the consulate, when a young and victorious general, just transferred from the camp to a council, announced to his astonished ministers that specie payments should commence in France by a given day !- in that France which, for so many years, had seen nothing but a miserable currency of depreciated mandats and assignats! The annunciation was heard with the inward contempt, and open distrust, which the whole tribe of hack politicians every where feel for the statesmanship of military men. It was followed by the success which it belongs to genius to inspire and to command. Specie payments commenced in France on the day named; and a hard money currency has been the sole currency of France from that day to this.

Such, said Mr. B., is the currency of France; a country whose taxes exceed a thousand millions of francs-whose public and private expenditures require a circulation of three hundred and fifty millions of dollars-and which possesses that circulation, every dollar of it, in gold and silver. After this example, can any one doubt the capacity of the United States to supply itself with specie? Reason and history forbid the doubt. Reason informs us that hard money flows into the vacuum the instant that small bank notes are driven out. France recovered a specie circulation within a year after the consular government refused to recognize paper for money. England recovered a gold circulation of about one hundred millions of dollars within four years after the one and two pound notes were suppressed. Our own country filled up with Spanish milled dollars, French crowns, doubloons, half joes, and guineas, as by magic, at the conclusion of the Revolutionary War, and the suppression of the continental bills. The business of the United States would not require above sixty or seventy millions of gold and silver for the common currency of the people, and the basis of large bank notes and bills of exchange. Of that sum, more than one third is now in the country, but not in circulation. The Bank of the United States hoards above ten millions. At the expiration of her charter, in 1836, that sum will be paid out in redemption of its notes-will go into the hands of the peopleand, of itself, will nearly double the quantity of silver now in circulation. Our native mines will be yielding, annually, some millions of gold; foreign commerce will be pouring in her accus- reney within just and proper limits. It will tomed copious supply; the correction of the en roneous value of gold, the liberal admission or foreign coins, and the suppression of small notes will invite and retain an adequate metallic currency. The present moment is peculiarly fa. vorable for these measures. Foreign exchanges are now in our favor; silver is coming here, al. though not current by our laws; both gold and silver would flow in, and that immediately, to an immense amount, if raised to their proper value, and put on a proper footing, by our laws Three days' legislation on these subjects would turn copious supplies of gold and silver into the country, diffuse them through every neighbor. hood, and astonish gentlemen when they get home at midsummer, at finding hard money where they had left paper.

3. In the third place, Mr. B. undertook to afficm, as a proposition free from dispute or contestation, that the value now set upon gold, by the laws of the United States, was unjust and erroneous; that these laws had expelled gold from circulation; and that it was the bounden duty of Congress to restore that coin to circulation, by restoring it to its just value.

That gold was undervalued by the laws of the United States, and expelled from circulation, was a fact, Mr. B. said, which every body knew; but there was something else which every body did not know; which few, in reality, had an opportunity of knowing, but which was necessary to be known, to enable the friends of gold to go to work at the right place to effect the recovery of that precious metal which their fathers once possessed-which the subjects of European kings now possess-which the citizens of the young republics to the South all possess-which even the free negroes of San Domingo possess-but which the yeomanry of this America have been deprived of for more than twenty years, and will be deprived of for ever, unless they discover the cause of the evil, and apply the remedy to its root.

I have already shown, said Mr. B., that the plan for the support of public credit which Gene ral Hamilton brought forward, in 1791, was a plan for the establishment of the paper system in our America. We had at that time a gold currency which was circulating freely and fully all over the country. Gold is the antagonists paper, and, with fair play, will keep a paper cur-

keep down the small notes; for, no man will carry a five, a ten, or a twenty dollar note in his pocket, when he can get guineas, eagles, half eagles, doubloons, and half joes to carry in their place. The netes of the new Bank of the United States, which bank formed the leading feature in the plan for the support of public credit, had already derived one undue advantage over gold, in being put on a level with it in point of legal tender to the federal government, and universal acceivability in all payments to that government: they were now to derive another, and a still greater undue advantage over gold, in the law for the establishment of the national mint; an institution which also formed a feature of the plan for the support of public credit. It is to that plan that we trace the origin of the erroneous valuation of gold, which has banished that metal from the country. Mr. Secretary Hamilton, in his proposition for the establishment of a mint, recommended that the relative value of gold to silver should be fixed at fifteen for one; and that recommendation became the law of the land; and has remained so ever since. At the same time, the relative value of these metals in Spain and Portugal, and throughout their vast dominions ia the new world, whence our principal supplies of gold were derived, was at the rate of sixteen for one; thus making our standard six per cent. below the standard of the countries which chiefly produced gold. It was also below the English standard, and the French standard, and below the standard which prevailed in these States, before the adoption of the constitution, and which was actually prevailing in the States, at the time that this new proportion of fifteen to one was established.

Mr. B. was ready to admit that there was some ricety requisite in adjusting the relative value of two different kinds of money—gold and silver for example—so as to preserve an exact equipose between them, and to prevent either from expelling the other. There was some nicety, but no insuperable or even extraordinary difficulty, in making the adjustment. The nicety of the question was aggravated in the year '92, by the difficulty of obtaining exact knowledges of the relative value of these metals, at that ime, in France and England; and Mr. Gallatin as since shown that the information which was hear relied upon was clearly erroneous. The conequence of any mistake in fixing our standard, was also well known in the year '92. Mr. Secretary Hamilton, in his proposition for the establishment of a mint, expressly declared that the consequence of a mistake in the relative value of the two metals, would be the expulsion of the one that was undervalued. Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, in his cotemporaneous report upon foreign coins, declared the same thing. Mr. Robert Morris, financier to the revolutionary government, in his proposal to establish a mint, in 1782, was equally explicit to the same effect. The delicacy of the question and the consequence of a mistake, were then fully understood forty years ago, when the relative value of gold and silver was fixed at fifteen to one. But, at that time, it unfortunately happened that the paper system, then omnipotent in England, was making its transit to our America; and every thing that would go to establish that system-every thing that would go to sustain the new-born Bank of the United Statesthat eldest daughter and spem gregis of the paper system in America-fell in with the prevailing current, and became incorporated in the federal legislation of the day. Gold, it was well known, was the antagonist of paper; from its intrinsic value, the natural predilection of all mankind for it, its small bulk, and the facility of carrying it about, it would be preferred to paper, either for travelling or keeping in the house; and thus would limit and circumscribe the general circulation of bank notes, and prevent all plea of necessity for issuing smaller notes. Silver, on the contrary, from its inconvenience of transportation, would favor the circulation of bank notes. Hence the birth of the doctrine, that if a mistake was to be committed, it should be on the side of silver! Mr. Secretary Hamilton declares the existence of this feeting when, in his report upon the establishment of a mint, he says: "It is sometimes observed, that silver ought to be encouraged, rather than gold, as being more conducive to the extension of bank circulation, from the greater difficulty and inconvenience which its greater bulk, compared with its value, occasions in the transportation of it." This passage in the Secretary's report, proves the existence of the feeling in favor of silver against gold, and the cause of that feeling. Quotations might be made from the speeches of others to show that they acted upon that feeling; but it is due to General Hamilton to say that he disclaimed such a motive for himself, and expressed a desire to retain both metals in circulation, and even to have a gold dollar.

The proportion of fifteen to one was established. The 11th section of the act of April, 1792, enacted that every fifteen pounds weight of pure silver, should be equal in value, in all payments, with one pound of pure gold; and so in proportion for less quantities of the respective metals. This act was the death warrant to the gold curveney. The diminished circulation of that coin soon began to be observable; but it was not immediately extinguished. Several circumstances wlayed, but could not prevent that catastrophe. 1. The Plank of the United States then issued no note of less denomination than ten dollars. and but few of them. 2. There were but three other banks in the United States, and they issued but few small notes; so that a small note currency did not come directly into conflict with gold. 3. The trade to the lower Mississipi continued to bring up from Natchez and New Orleans, for nany years, a large supply of doubloons; and long supplied a gold currency to the new States in the West. Thus, the absence of a small note currency, and the constant arrivals of doubloons from the lower Mississippi, deferred the fate of the gold currency; and it was not until the lapse of near twenty years after the adoption of the erroneous standard of 1792, that the circulation of that metal, both foreign and domestic, became completely and totally extinguished in the United States. The extinction is now complete, and must remain so until the laws are altered.

In making this annunciation, and in thus standing forward to expose the error, and to demand the reform of the gold currency, he (Mr. B.) was not setting up for the honors of a first discoverer, or first inventor. Far from it. He was treading in the steps of other, and abler men, who had gone before him. Four Secretaries of the Treasury, Gallatin, Dallas, Crawford, Ingham, had, each in their day, pointed out the error in the gold standard, and recommended its correction. Repeated reports of committees, in both Houses of Congress, had done the same thing. Of these reports he would name those of the late Mr. Lowndes of South Carolina; of Mr. Sanford, late a senator from New-York; of Mr. Campbell P. White, now a representative from the city of New-York.

Mr. B. took pleasure in recalling and presenting to public notice, the names of the eminent men who had gone before him in the exploration of this path. It was due to them, now that the good cause seemed to be in the road to success, to yield to them all the honors of first explorers; it was due to the cause also, in this hour of final trial, to give it the high sanction of their names and labors.

Mr. B. would arrest for an instant the current of his remarks, to fix the attention of the Senate upon a reflection which must suggest it. self to the minds of all considerate persons. He would ask how it could happen that so many men, and such men as he had named, taboring for so many years, in a cause so just, for an object so beneficial, upon a state of facts so undeniable, could so long and so uniformly fail of success? How could this happen? Sir. exclaimed Mr. B., it happened because the policy of the Bank of the United States required it to happen! The same policy which required gold to be undervalued in 1792, when the first bank was chartered, has required it to be undervalued ever since, now that a second bank has been established; and the same strength which enabled these banks to keep themselves up, also enabled them to keep gold down. This is the answer to the question; and this the secret of the failure of all these eminent men in their laudable efforts to raise gold again to the dignity of money, This is the secret of their failure; and this secret being now known, the road which leads to the reformation of the gold currency lies uncovered and revealed before us: it is the road which leads to the overthrow of the Bank of the United States-to the sepulchre of that institution: for, while that bank lives, or has the hope of life, gold cannot be restored to life. Here then lies the question of the reform of the gold currency. If the bank is defeated, that currency is reformed; if the bank is victorious, gold remains degraded; to continue an article of merchandise in the hands of the bank, and to be expelled from circulation to make room for its five, its ten, and its twenty dollar notes. In the people then, who are in favor of restoring gold to circulation, go to work in the right place, and put down the power that first put down gold, and which will never suffer that coin to rise while it has power to prevent it.

These advantages had been too well known, from the earliest ages of the world, to be a subject of discussion in the nineteenth century; but, as it was the policy of the paper system to disparage that metal, and as that system, in its forty years' reign over the American people, had nearly destroyed a knowledge of that currency, he would briefly enumerate its leading and prominent advantages. 1. It had an intrinsic value, which gave it curreney all over the world, to the full amount of that value, without regard to laws or circumstances. 2 It had a uniformity of value, which made it the safest standard of the value of property which the wisdom of man had ever yet discovered. 3. Its portability; which made it easy for the traveller to carry it about with him. 4. Its indestructibility; which made it the safest money that people could keep in their houses. 5. Its inherent purity; which made it the hardest money to be counterfeited, and the easiest to be detected, and, therefore, the safest money for the people to handle. 6. Its superiority over all other money; which gave to its possessor the choice and command of all other money. 7. Its power over exchanges; gold being the currency which contributes most to the equalization of exchange, and keeping down the rate of exchange to the lowest and most uniform point. 8. Its power over the paper money; gold being the natural enemy of that system, and, with fair play, able to hold it in check. 9. It is a constitutional currency and the people have a right to demand it, for their currency, as long as the present constitution is permitted to exist.

Mr. B. said, that the false valuation put upon gold had rendered the mint of the United States, so far as the gold coinage is concerned, a most ridiculous and absurd institution. It has coined, and that at a large expense to the United States, 2.262,717 pieces of gold, worth $11,852,890; and where are these pieces now? Not one of hem to be seen! all sold, and exported! and o regular is this operation that the director f the mint, in his latest report to Congress, ays that the new coined gold frequently repains in the mint, uncalled for, though ready for elivery, until the day arrives for a packet to ail to Europe. He calculates that two millions the whole of which, without a reform of the gold standard, will be conducted, like exiles, from the national mint to the sea-shore, and transported to foreign regions, to be sold for the benefit of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. B. said this was not the time to discuss the relative value of gold and silver, nor to urge the particular proportion which ought to be established between them. That would be the proper work of a committee. At present it might be sufficient, and not irrelevant, to say that this question was one of commerce-that it was purely and simply a mercantile problem -as much so as an acquisition of any ordinary merchandise from foreign countries could be. Gold goes where it finds its value, and that value is what the h. vs of great nations give it. In Mexico and South America—the countries which produce gold, and from which the United States must derive their chief supply—the value of gold is 16 to 1 over silver; in the island of Cuba it is 17 to 1; in Spain and Portugal it is 16 to 1; in the West Indies, generally, it is the same. It is not to be supposed that gold will come from these countries to the United States, if the importer is to lose one dollar in every sixteen that he bings; or that our own gold will remain with us, when an exporter can gain a dollar upon every fifteen that he carries out. Such results would be contrary to the laws of trade; and therefore we must place the same value upon gold that other nations do, if we wish to gain any part of theirs, or to regain any part of our own. Mr. B. said that the case of England and France was no exception to this rule. They rated gold at something less than 16 for 1, and still retained gold in circulation; but it was retained by force of peculiar laws and advantages which do not prevail in the United States. In England the circulation of gold was aided and protected by four subsidiary laws, neither of which exist here: one which prevented silver from being a tender for more than forty shillings; another which required the bank of England to pay all its notes in gold; a third which suppressed the small note circulation; a fourth which alloyed their silver nine per cent. below the relative value of gold. In France the relative proportion of the two metals was also below what it was in Spain, Portugal, Mexico, and South America, and still a plentiful supply native gold will be coined annually hereafter; of gold remained in circulation; but this result was aided by two peculiar causes; first, the total absence of a paper currency; secondly, the proximity of Spain, and the inferiority of Spanish manufactures, which gave to France a ready and a near market for the sale of her fine fabrics, which were paid for in the gold of the New World. In the United States, gold would have none of these subsidiary helps; on the contrary it would have to contend with a paper currency, and would have to be obtained, the product of our own mines excepted, from Mexico and South America. where it is rated as sixteen to one for silver. All these circumstances, and many others, would have to be taken into consideration in fixing a standard for the United States. Mr. B. repeated that there was nicety, but no difficulty, in adjusting the relative value of gold and silver so as to retain both in circulation. Several nations of antiquity had done it; some modern nations also. The English have both in circulation at this time. The French have both, and have had for thirty years. The States of this Union also had both in the time of the confederation; and retained them until this federal government was established, and the paper system adopted. Congress should not admit that it cannot do for the citizens of the United States, what so many monarchies have done for their subjects. Gentlemen, especially, who decry military chieftains, should not confess that they themselves cannot do for America, what a military chieftain did for France.

Mr. B. made his acknowledgments to the great apostle of American liberty (Mr. Jefferson), for the wise, practical idea, that the value of gold was a commercial question, to be settled by its value in other countries. He had seen that remark in the works of that great man, and treasured it up as teaching the plain and ready way to accomplish an apparently difficult object; and he fully concurred with the senator from South Carolina [Mr. Calhoun], that gold, in the United States, ought to be the preferred metal; not that silver should be expelled, but both retained; the mistake, pf any, to be in favor of gold, instead of being against it.

IV. Mr. B. believed that it was the intention and declared meaning of the constitution, that foreign coins should pass currently as money, and at their full value, within the United States; that it was the duty of Congress to promote the circulation of these coins by giving them their of the action of this federal government, all of the action of the action of the action of this federal government, all of the action of t full value; that this was the design of the States in conferring upon Congress the exclusive power of regulating the value of these coins; that all the laws of Congress for preventing the circulation of foreign coins, and underrating their value, were so many breaches of the constitution, and so many mischiefs inflieted upon the States; and that it was the bounden duty of Congress to repeal all such laws; and to restore foreign coins to the same free and favored circulation which they possessed when the federal constitution was adopted.

In support of the first branch of his first position Mr. B. quoted the words of the constitution which authorized Congress to regulate the value of foreign coins; secondly, the clause in the constitution which authorized Congress to provide for punishing the counterfeiting of current coin, in which term, foreign coin was included; thirdly, the clause which prohibited the States from making any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; a clause which did not limit the prohibition to domestic coins, and therefore included foreign ones These three clauses, he said, were concurrent and put foreign coin and domestic coin upon the same precise footing of equality, in every particular which concerned their current circulation their value, and their protection from counterfeiters. Historical recollections were the next evidence to which Mr. B. referred to sustain his position. He said that foreign coins were the only coins known to the United States at the adoption of the constitution. No mint had been established up to that time. The coins of other nations furnished the currency, the exclusive metallic currency, which the States had used from the close of the Revolutionary War up to the formation of this federal government, is was these foreign coins then which the framen of the constitution had in view when they is serted all the clauses in the constitution which bear upon the value and current circulation d coin; its protection from counterfeiters, and the prohibitory restriction upon the States with respect to the illegality of tenders of any thing ercept of gold and silver. To make this point still plainer, if plainer it could be made, Mr. B. # verted to the early statutes of Congress which related to foreign coins. He had seen no les than nine statutes, passed in the first four year acted for the purpose of regulating the value, protecting the purity, and promoting the circulation of these coins. Not only the well-known coins of the principal nations were provided for in these statutes, but the coins of all the nations with whom we traded, how rare or small might le the coin, or how remote or inconsiderable might be the nation. By a general provision of the act of 1789, the gold coins of all nations, which equalled those of England, France, Spain and Portugal, in fineness, were to be current at soceats the pennyweight; and the silver coins of all nations, which equalled the Spanish dollar in fineness, were to be current at 111 cents the ounce. Under these general provisions, a great influx of the precious metals took place; doubloons, guineas, half joes, were the common and familiar currency of farmers and laborers, as well as of merchants and traders. Every substantial citizen then kept in his house a pair of small scales to weigh gold, which are now used by his posterity to weigh physic. It is a great many years - a whole generation has grown up-since these scales were used for their original purpose; nor will they ever be needed again for that use until the just and wise laws of '89 and '90, for the general circulation of foreign coins, shall again be put in force. These early statutes, added to historical recollections, could leave no doubt of the true meaning of the constitution, and that foreign coins were intended to be for ever current within the United States.

With this obvious meaning of the constitution, and the undeniable advantage which redounded to the United States from the acquisition of the precious metals from all foreign nations, the inquiry naturally presents itself, to know for what reason these coins have been outlawed by the Congress of the United States, and driven from circulation? The inquiring mind wishes to know how Congress could be brought, in a few short years after the adoption of the constitution, to contradict that instrument in a vital particular—to repeal the nine statutes which they had passed in favor of foreign coin-and to illegalize the circulation of that coin whose value they were to regulate, and whose purity to protect?

Sir, said Mr. B., I am unwilling to appear lways in the same train, tracing up all the mischiefs—the introduction of the paper sys tem, and the first establishment of a federal bank among us. But justice must have its sway; historical truth must take its course; facts must be told; and authentic proof shall supply the place of narrative and assertion. We ascend, then, to the year '91-to the exhibition of the plan for the support of public credit-and see in that plan, as one of its features, a proposition for the establishment of a national mint; and in that establishment a subsidiary engine for the support of the federal bank. We have already seen that in the proposition for the establishment of the mint, gold was largely undervalued; and that this undervaluation has driven gold from the country and left a vacuum for the circulation of federal bank notes; we are now to see that the same mint establishment was to give further aid to the circulation of these notes, by excluding foreign coins, both gold and silver, from circulation, and thus enlarging the vacuum which was to be filled by bank paper. This is what we are now to see; and to see it, we will look at the plan for the support of public credit, and that feature of the plan which proposes the establishment of a national mint.

Mr. B. would remark, that four points were presented in this plan: 1. The eventual abolition of the currency of foreign coins; 2. The reduction of their value while allowed to circulate; 3. The substitution of domestic coins; and, 4. The substitution of bank notes in place of the uncurrent and undervalued foreign coins. Such were the recommendations of Secretary Hamilton; and legislative enactments quickly followed to convert his recommendations into law. The only power the constitution had given to Congress over foreign coins, was a power to regulate their value, and to protect them from debasement by counterfeiters. It was certainly a most strange construction of that authority, first, to underrate the value of these coins, and next, to prohibit their circulation! Yet both things were done. The mint went into operation in 1794; foreign coins were to cease to be a legal tender in 1797; but, at the end of that time, the contingencies on which the Sccretary calculated, to enable the country to do without foreign coins, had not occurred; the substitutes had not appeared; the mint had not vils of our currency to the same fountain of supplied the adequate quantity of domestic coin, nor had the circulation of bank notes become sufficiently familiar to the people to supersede gold. The law for the exclusion of foreign coins was found to be impracticable; and a suspension of it for three years was enacted. At the end of this time the evil was found to be as great as ever; and a further suspension of three years was made. This third term of three years also rolled over, the supply of domestic coins was still found to be inadequate, and the people continued to be as averse as ever to the bank note substitute. A fourth suspension of the law became necessary, and in 1806 a further suspension for three years was made; after that a fifth, and finally a sixth suspension, each for the period of three years; which brought the period for the actual and final cessation of the circulation of foreign coins, to the month of November, 1819. From that time there was no further suspension of the prohibitory act. An exception was continued, and still remains, in favor of Spanish milled dollars and parts of dollars; but all other foreign coins, even those of Mexico and all the South American States, have ceased to be a legal tender, and have lost their character of current money within the United States. Their value is degraded to the mint price of bullion; and thus the constitutional currency becomes an article of merchandise and exportation. Even the Spanish milled dollar, though continued as a legal tender, is valued, not as money, but for the pure silver in it, and is therefore undervalued three or four per cent. and becomes an article of merchandise. The Bank of the United States has collected and sold 4,450,000 of them. Every money dealer is employed in buying, selling, and exporting them. The South and West, which receives them, is stripped of them.

Having gone through this narrative of facts, and shown the exclusion of foreign coins from circulation to be a part of the paper system, and intended to facilitate the substitution of a bank note currency, Mr B. went on to state the injuries resulting from the measure. At the head of these injuries he was bound to place the violation of the constitution of the United States, which clearly intended that foreign coins should circulate among us, and which, in giving Congress authority to regulate their value, and to protect them from counterfeiters, could never have intended to stop their circulation, and to abandon them to debasement. 2. He denounced this exclusion of foreign coins as a fraud, and, fraud of the most injurious nature, upon the people of the States. The States had surrendered their power over the coinage to Congress: they made the surrender in language which clearly implied that their currency of foreign coins was to be continued to them; yet that currency is suppressed; a currency of intrinsic value, for which they paid interest to nobody, is suppressed; and a currency without intrinsic value, a currency of paper subject to every flue. tuation, and for the supply of which corporate bodies receive interest, is substituted in its place. 3. He objected to this suppression as depriving the whole Union, and especially the Western States, of their due and necessary supply of hard money. Since that law took effect, the United States had only been a thoroughfare for fereign coins to pass through. All that was brought into the country, had to go out of the country. It was exported as fast as imported. The cuetom-house books proved this fact. They preved that from 1821 to 1833, the imports of specie were $89,428,462; the exports, for the same time, were $88,821,433; lacking but three quarters of a million of being precisely equal to the imports! Some of this coin was recoined be fore it was exported, a foolish and expensive operation on the part of the United States; but the greater part was exported in the same form that it was received. Mr. B. had only been able to get the exports and imports from 1821; if he could have obtained those of 1820, and the concluding part of 1819, when the prohibitory law took effect, the amount would have been about ninety-six millions of dollars; the whole d which was lost to the country by the prohibitory law, while much of it would have been saved, and retained for home circulation if it had not been for this law. The loss of this great sum in specie was an injury to the whole Union, but especially to the Western States whose sole resource for coin was from foreign countries; for the coinage of the mint out never flow into that region; there was nothing in the course of trade and exchanges, to carry money from the Atlantic States to the West and the mint, if it coined thousands of million could not supply them. The taking effects the law in the year 1819, was an aggravatia of the injury. It was the most unfortunate

The loss of the as an injury to the whole to the Western State for coin was from foreign oinage of the mint coul egion; there was nothing e and exchanges, to carry intic States to the West ned thousands of million em. The taking effect of 1819, was an aggravation the most unfortunate at

country. The Western banks, from their exertions to aid the country during the war, had stretched their issues to the utmost limit; their notes had gone into the land offices; the federal government turned them over to the Bank of the United States; and that bank demanded specie. Thus, the necessity for specie was increased at the very moment that the supply was diminished; and the general stoppage of the Western banks, was the inevitable and patural result of these combined circumstances. Having shown the great evils resulting to the country from the operation of this law, Mr. B. called upon its friends to tell what reason could now be given for not repealing it? He affirmed that, of the two causes to which the law owed its origin, one had failed in toto, and the other had succeeded to a degree to make it the curse and the nuisance of the country. One reason was to induce an adequate supply of foreign coins to be brought to the mint, to be recoined; the other to facilitate the substitution of a ank note currency. The foreign coins did not go to the mint, those excepted which were imported in its own neighborhood; and even these were exported nearly as fast as recoined. The authority of the director of the mint had already been quoted to show that the new coined gold was transferred direct from the national mint to the packet ships, bound to Europe. The custom-house returns showed the large exportation of domestic coins. They would be found under the head of "Domestic Manufactures Exported;" and made a large figure in the list of these exports. In the year 1832, it amounted to $2,058,474, and in the year 1833, to $1,410,941; and every year it was more or less; so that the national mint had degenerated into a domestic manufactory of gold and silver, for exportation to foreign countries. But the coins imported at New Oreans, at Charleston, and at other points renote from Philadelphia, did not go there to be ecoined. They were, in part, exported direct rom the place of import, and in part used by he people as current money, in disregard of he prohibitory law of 1819. But the greater art was exported-for no owner of foreign oin could incur the trouble, risk, and expense, sending it some hundred or a thousand miles Philadelphia, to have it recoined; and then curring the same expense, risk and trouble (lying out of the use of the money, and receiving no interest all the while), of bringing it back to be put into circulation; with the further risk of a deduction for want of standard fineness at the mint, when he could sell and export it upon the spot. Foreign coins could not be recoined, so as to supply the Union, by a solitary mint on the Atlantic coast. The great West could only be supplied from New Orleans. A branch of the mint, placed there, could supply the West with domestic coins. Mexico, since she became a free country, has established seven mints in different places, because it was troublesome and expensive to carry bullion from all parts of the country to be coined in the capital; and when coined there, there was nothing in the course of trade to carry them back into the country; and the owners of it would not be at the expense and trouble of carrying it back, and getting it into circulation, being the exact state of things at present in the gold mines of the Southern States. The United States, upon the same principles and for the same reasons, should establish branches of the mint in the South, convenient to the gold mine region, and at New Orleans, for the benefit of that city and the West. Without a branch of the mint at New Orleans, the admission of foreign coins is indispensable to the West; and thus the interest of that region joins itself to the voice of the constitution in demanding the immediate repeal of all laws for illegalizing the circulation of these coins, and for sinking them from their current value as money, to their mint value as bullion. The design of supplying the mint with foreign coins. for recoinage, had then failed; and in that respect the exclusion of foreign coins has failed in one of its objects-in the other, that of making room for a substitute of bank notes, the success of the scheme has been complete, excessive, and deplorable.

Foreign coins were again made a legal tender, their value regulated and their importation encouraged, at the expiration of the charter of the first Bank of the United States. This continued to be the case until after the present Bank of the United States was chartered; as soon as that event happened, and bank policy again became predominant in the halls of Congress, the circulation of foreign coins was again struck at and, in the second year of the existence of the bank, the old act of 1793, for rendering these coins uncurrent, was carried into final and complete effect. Since that time, the bank has enjoyed all her advantages from this exclusion. The expulsion of these coins has created a vacuum, to be filled up by her small note circulation; the traffic and trade in them has been as large a source of profit to her as of loss to the country. Gold coin she has sold at an advance of five or six per cent.; silver coin at about two or three per cent.; and, her hand being in, she made no difference between selling domestic coin and foreign coin. Although forbid by her charter to deal in coin, she has employed her branches to gather $40,040,000 of coin from the States; a large part of which she admits that she has sold and transported to Europe, For the sale of the foreign coin, she sets up the lawyer-like plea, that it is not coin, but bullion! resting the validity of the plea upon English statute law! while, by the constitution of the United States, all foreign coins are coin; while, by her own charter, the coins, both gold and silver, of Great Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal, and their dominions, are declared to be coin; and, as such, made receivable in payment of the specie proportion of the bank stock-and, worse yet! while Spanish dollars, by statute, remain the current coin of the United States, the bank admits the sale of 4,450,142 of these identical Spanish milled dollars!

Mr. B. then took a rapid view of the present condition of the statute currency of the United States-of that currency which was a legal tender-that currency with which a debtor had a right by law to protect his property from execution, and his body from jail, by offering it as a matter of right, to his creditor in payment of his debt. He stated this statute currency to be: 1st. Coins from the mint of the United States; 2dly. Spanish milled dollars, and the parts of such dollars. This was the sum total of the statute currency of the United States; for happily no paper of any bank. State or federal. could be made a legal tender. This is the sum total out of which any man in debt can legally pay his debt: and what is his chance for making payment out of this brief list? Let us see. Coinage from the mint: not a particle of gold, nor a single whole dollar to be found; very few half dollars, except in the neighborhood of the mint, and in the hands of the Bank of the United | tion among the people; while the gold and al

States and its branches; the twenty, ten, and five cent pieces scarcely seen, except as a curiosity, in the interior parts of the country, So much for the domestic coinage. Now for the Spanish milled dollson-how do they stand in the United States ? Nearly as scarce as our own dollars; for, there has been none coined since Spain lost her dominion over her colonies in the New World; and the coinage of these colonies, now independent States, neither is in law, nor in fact, Spanish milled. That term belongs to the coinage of the Spanish crown with a Spanish king's head upon the face of it; although the coin of the new States, the silver dollars of Mexico, Central America, Peru, and Chili, are superior to Spanish dollars, in value because they contain more pure silver, still they are not a tender; and all the france from France, in a word, all foreign coin except Spanish milled dollars, the coinage of which has ceased, and the country stripped of all that were in it, by the Bank of the United States are uncurrent, and illegal as tenders: so that the people of the United States are reduced to so small a list, and so small a supply of statute currency, out of which debts can legally be paid, that it may be fairly assumed that the whole debtor part of the community lie at the mercy of their creditors, to have their bodies sent to jail, or their property sold for nothing at any time that their creditors please. To such a condition are the free and high-mindel inhabitants of this country reduced! and reduced by the power and policy of the first and second Banks of the United States, and the controlling influence which they have exercised over the moneyed system of the Union, from the year 1791 down to the present day,

Mr. B. would conclude what he had to us. on this head, with one remark; it was this that while the gold and silver coin of all the monarchs of Europe were excluded from circulation in the United States, the paper notes of their subjects were received as current money The Bank of the United States was, in a great degree, a foreign institution. Mr. B. expressed his satisfaction at findninion over her colnd the coinage of these t States, neither is in milled. That term ing so many points of concurrence between his sentiments on currency, and those of the senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun). Reform of the gold currency-recovery of specie -vils of excessive banking-and the eventual suppression of small notes-were all points in which they agreed, and on which he hoped they should be found acting together when these measures should be put to the test of legislatire action. He regretted that he could not concur with that senator on the great points to which all the others might be found to be subordinate and accessorial. He alluded to the prolonged existence of the Bank of the United States! and especially to the practical views which that senator had taken of the beneficial rieration of that institution, first, as the regulator of the local currencies, and next, as the supplier of a general currency to the Union. On both these points, he differed-immeasurably differed-from that senator; and dropping il other views of that bank, he came at once o the point which the senator from South Caolins marked out as the true and practical nestion of debate; and would discuss that pestion simply under its relation to the curency; he would view the bank simply as the gulator of local currencies and the supplier a national currency, and would give his reaous for differing - irreconcilably differing om the senator from South Carolina on these oints.

Mr. B. took three distinct objections to the ank of the United States, as a regulator of rrency: 1, that this was a power which beaged to the government of the United States: that it could not be delegated; 3, that it ght not be delegated to any bank.

 The regulation of the currency of a nation, B. said, was one of the highest and most licate acts of sovereign power. It was preely equivalent to the power to create curcy; for, a power to make more or less, was, effect, a power to make much or none. It to the sovereign; and, where a paper currency was tolerated, the coining power was swallowed up and superseded by the manufactory which emitted paper. In the present state of the currency of the United States, the federal bank was the mint for issuing moncy; the federal mint was a manufactory for preparing gold and silver for exportation. The States, in the formation of the constitution, gave the coining power to Congress; with that power, they gave authority to regulate the currency of the Union, by regulating the value of gold and silver, and preventing at · but metallic money from being mad payment of debts. It is by the se powers that the federal gove regulate the currency of the Union; and all the departments of the government are required to act their parts in effecting the regulation: the Congress, as the department that passes the law; the President, as the authority that recommends it, approves it, and sees that it is faithfully executed; tho judiciary, as standing between the debtor and creditor, and preventing the execution from being discharged by any thing but gold and silver and that at the rate which the legislative department has fixed. This is the power, and sole power, of regulating currency which the federal constitution contains; this power is vested in the federal government, not in one department of it, but in the joint action of the three departments; and while this power is exercised by the government, the currency of the whole Union will be regulated, and the regulation effected according to the intention of the constitution, by keeping all the local banks up to the point of specie payment; and thereby making the value of their notes equivalent to specie.

2. This great and delicate power, thus involving the sacred relations of debtor and creditor, and the actual rise or fall in the value of every man's property, Mr. B. undertook to affirm, could not be delegated. It was a trust from the State governments to the federal government. The State governments divested themselves of this power, and invested the federal government with it, and made its exercise depend upon the three branches of the new gov ernment; and this new government could no more delegate it, than they could delegate any other great power which they were bound to the coining power; a power that belonged execute themselves. lating power, Mr. B. said, was heard of when the first bank was chartered, in the year 1791. No person whispered such a reason for the establishment of a bank at that time; the whole conception is newfangled-an afterthoughtgrowing out of the very cvils which the bank itself has brought upon the country, and which are to be cured by putting down that great bank; after which, the Congress and the judiciary will easily manage the small banks, by holding them up to specie payments, and excluding every unsolid note from revenue payments.

3. Mr. B. said that the government ought not to delegate this power, if it could. It was too great a power to be trusted to any banking company whatever, or to any authority but the highest and most responsible which was known to our form of government. The government itself ceased to be independent—it ceases to be safe-when the national currency is at the will of a company. The government can undertake no great enterprise, neither of war nor peace, without the consent and co-operation of that company; it cannot count its revenues for six months ahead without referring to the action of that company-its friendship or its enmityits concurrence or opposition-to see how far that company will permit money to be plenty, or make it scarce; how far it will let the moneyed system go on regularly, or throw it into disorder; how far it will suit the interests, or policy, of that company to create a tempest, or to suffer a calm, in the moneyed ocean. The people are not safe when a company has such a power. The temptation is too great-the opportunity too easy-to put up and put down prices; to make and break fortunes; to bring the whole community upon its knees to the Neptunes who preside over the flux and reflux of paper. All property is at their mercy. The price of real estate-of every growing cropof every staple article in market-is at their command. Stocks are their playthings-their gambling theatre-on which they gamble daily, with as little secrecy, and as little morality. and far more mischief to fortunes, than common gamblers carry on their operations. The philosophic Voltaire, a century ago, from his retreat in Ferney, gave a lively description of this operation, by which he was made a winner, without he, who is a director in the Bank of France. who writes to me when they are going to make money plenty, and make stocks rise, and then I give orders to my broker to sell; and he writes to me when they are going to make money scarce, and make stocks fall, and then I write to my broker to buy; and thus, at a hundred leagues from Paris, and without moving from my chair, I make money. This, said Mr. B., is the operation on stocks to the present day; and it cannot be safe to the holders of stock that there should be a moneyed power great enough in this country to raise and depress the prices of their property at pleasure. The great cities of the Union are not safe, while a company, in any other city, have power over their moneyed system, and are able, by making money scarce or plenty-by exciting panies and alarms-to not up, or put down, the price of the staple articles in which they deal. Every commercial city, for its own safety, should have an independent moneyed system-should be free from the control and regulation of a distant, possibly a rivalcity. in the means of carrying on its own trade Thus, the safety of the government, the safety of the people, the interest of all owners of property -of all growing crops—the holders of all stock -the exporters of all staple articles-require that the regulation of the currency should be kept out of the hands of a great banking conpany; that it should remain where the constitu tion placed it-in the hands of the federal p vernment-in the hands of their representative who are elected by them, responsible to the may be exchanged by them, who can pass a law for regulating currency which will not be upon themselves as well as upon their consis ents. This is what the safety of the communi requires; and, for one, he (Mr. B.) would if he could, delegate the power of regulating currency of this great country to any banks company whatsoever. It was a power too mendous to be trusted to a company. I States thought it too great a power to be true to the State governments; he (Mr. B.) the so too. The States confided it to the federal vernment; he, for one, would confine it w federal government, and would make that vernment exercise it. Above all, he would confer it upon a bank which was itself regulation; and on this point he called the crouble of playing. I have a friend, said the Senate to recollect the question, appear

Mr. B. took up the second point on which he disagreed with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Calhoun], namely, the capacity of the Bank of the United States to supply a general currency to the Union. In handling this question he would drop all other inquiries-lay aside every other objection—overlook every consideration of the constitutionality and expediency of the bank, and confine himself to the strict question of its ability to diffuse and retain in circulation a paper currency over this extended Union. lle would come to the question as a banker would come to it at his table, or a merchant in his counting-room, looking to the mere operation of a money system. It was a question for wise men to think of, and for abler men than himself to discuss. It involved the theory and the science of banking-Mr. B. would say the philosophy of banking, if such a term could be applied a moneyed system. It was a question to be studied as the philosopher studies the laws which overn the material world—as he would study he laws of gravitation and attraction which overn the movements of the planets, or draw he waters of the mountains to the level of the cean. The moneyed system, said Mr. B., has its aws of attraction and gravitation—of repulsion nd adhesion; and no man may be permitted to dulge the hope of establishing a moneyed sysem contrary to its own laws. The genius of an has not yet devised a bank—the historic age is yet to be written which tells of a bank which has diffused over an extensive country, nd retained in circulation, a general paper curncy. England is too small a theatre for a mplete example; but even there the impossility is confessed, and has been confessed for a century. The Bank of England, in her greatest day of pre-eminence, could not furnish a general currency for England alone-a territory not larger than Virginia. The country banks furnished the local paper currency, and still furnish it as far as it is used. They carried on their banking upon Bank of England notes, until the gold currency was restored; and local paper formed the mass of local circulation. The notes of the Bank of England flowed to the great commercial capitals, and made but brief sojourn in the counties. But England is not a fair example for the United States; it is too small; a fairer example is to be found nearer home, in our own country, and in this very Bank of the United States which is now existing, and in favor of which the function of supplying a general currency to this extended confederacy is claimed. We have the experiment of this bank, not once, but twice made; and each experiment proves the truth of the laws which govern the system. The theory of bank circulation, over an extended territory, is this, that you may put out as many notes as you may in any one place, they will immediately fall into the track of commerceinto the current of trade-into the course of exchange-and follow that current wherever it leads. In these United States the current sets from every part of the interior, and especially from the South and West into the Northeastinto the four commercial cities north of the Potomac; Baltimore, Philadelphia, New-York, and Boston: and all the bank notes which will pass for money in those places, fall into the current which sets in that direction. When there, there is nothing in the course of trade to bring them back. There is no reflux in that current! It is a trade-wind which blows twelve months in the year in the same direction. This is the theory of bank circulation over extended territory; and the history of the present bank is an exemplification of the truth of that theory. Listen to Mr. Cheves. Read his report made to the stockholders at their triennial meeting in 1822. He stated this law of circulation, and explained the inevitable tendency of the branch bank notes to flow to the Northeast; the impossibility of preventing it; and the resolution which he had taken and executed, to close all the Southern and Western branches, and prevent them from issuing any more notes. Even while issuing their own notes, they had so far forgot their charter as to carry on operations, in part, upon the notes of the local banks-having collected those notes in great quantity, and loaned them out. This was reported by the investigating committee of 1819, and made one of the charges of misconduct against the bank at that time. To counteract this tendency, the bank applied to Congress for leave to issue their bank notes on terms which would have made them a mere local currency. Congress refused it; but the bank is now attempting to do it herself, by refusing to take the notes received in payment of the federal revenue, and sending it back to be paid where issued. Such was the history of the branch bank notes, and which caused that currency to disappear from all the interior, and from the whole South and West, so soon after the bank got into operation. The attempt to keep out branch notes, or to send the notes of the mother bank to any distance, being found impracticable, there was no branch currency of any kind in circulation for a period of eight or nine years, until the year 1827, when the branch checks were invented, to perform the miracle which notes could not. Mr. B. would say nothing about the legality of that invention; he would now treat them as a legal issue under the charter; and in that most favorable point of view for them, he would show that these branch checks were nothing but a quack remedy-an empirical contrivance—which made things worse. By their nato g were as strongly attracted to the Northe the branch notes had been ; by their terms iney were still more strongly attracted, for they bore Philadelphia on their face I they were payable at the mother bank! and, of course, would naturally flow to that place for use or payment. This was their destiny. and most punctually did they fulfil it. Never did the trade-winds blow more truly-never did the gulf stream flow more regularly—than those checks flowed to the Northeast! The average of four years next ensuing the invention of these checks, which went to the mother bank, or to the Atlantic branches north of the Potomac, including the branch notes which flowed with them, was about nineteen millions of dollars per annum! Mr. B. then exhibited a table to prove what he alleged, and from which it appeared that the flow of the branch paper to the Northeast was as regular and uniform as an operation of nature; that each city according to its commercial importance, received a greater or less proportion of this inland paper gulf stream; and that the annual variation was so slight as only to prove the regularity of the laws by which it was governed. The following is the table which he exhibited. It was one of the tabular statements obtained by the investigating committee in 1832:

After exhibiting this table, and taking it for complete proof of the truth of the theory which he had laid down, and that it demonstrated the impossibility of keeping up a circulation of the United States Bank paper in the remote and interior parts of the Union, Mr. B. went on to say that the story was yet but half told-the mischief of this systematic flow of national currency to the Northeast, was but half disclosed: another curtain was yet to be lifted-another vista was yet to be opened-and the effect of the system upon the metallic currency of the States was to be shown to the people and the States. This view would show, that as fast a the checks or notes of any branch were taken up at the mother bank, or at the branches north of the Potomac, an account was opened against the branch from which they came. The branch was charged with the amount of the notes or checks taken up; and periodically served with a copy of the account, and commanded to send on specie or bills of exchange to redeem them. When redeemed, they were remitted to the branch from which they came; while on the road they were called notes in transitu; and when arrived the were put into circulation again at that placefell into the current immediately, which carried them back to the Northeast-there taken m again, charged to the branch—the branch required to redeem them again with specie or bill of exchange; and then returned to her, to be again put into circulation, and to undergo again and again, and until the branch could no longer redeem them, the endless process of flowing the Northeast. The result of the whole was a and for ever will be, that the branch will have to redeem its circulation till redemption is in

possible; until it has exhausted the country of its specie; and then the country in which the branch is situated is worse off than before she had a branch; for she had neither notes nor specie left. Mr. B. said that this was too important a view of the case to be rested on argument and assertion alone; it required evidence to vanquish incredulity, and to prove it up; and that evidence was at hand. He then referred to two tables to show the amount of hard money which the mother bank, under the operation of this system, had drawn from the States in which her branches were situated. All the tables were up to the year 1831, the period to which the last investigating committee had brought up their inquiries. One of these statements showed the amount abstracted from the whole Union; it was $40,040,622 20; another showed the amount taken from the Southern and Western States; it was $22,523,387 94; another showed the amount taken from the branch at New Orleans; it was $12,815,798 10. Such, said Mr. B., has en the result of the experiment to diffuse a national paper currency over this extended Union. Twice in eighteen years it has totally failed, leaving the country exhausted of its specie, and destitute of paper. This was proof enough, but there was still another mode of proving the same thing; it was the fact of the present amount of United States Bank notes in circulation. Mr. B. had heard with pain the assertion made in so many memorials presented to the Senate, that there was a great scarcity of currency; that the Bank of the United States had been obliged to contract her circulation in consequence of the removal of the deposits, and that her notes had become so scarce that none could be found; and strongly contrasting the present dearth which now prevails with the abundant plenty of these notes which reigned over a happy land before that fatal measure came to blast a state of unparalleled prosperity. The fact was, Mr. B. said, that the actual circulation of the bank is greater now than it was before the removal of the deposits; greater than it has been in any month but one for upwards of a rear past. The discounts were diminished, he aid, but the circulation was increased.

Mr. B. then exhibited a table of the actual irculation of the Bank of the United States for hewhole year 1833, and for the two past months the present year; and stated it to be taken from the monthly statements of the bank, as printed and laid upon the tables of members. It was the net circulation—the quantity of notes and checks actually out—excluding all that were on the road returning to the branch banks, called notes in transitu, and which would not be counted till again issued by the branch to which they were returned.

The following is the table :

| January, 1 | 833, | . $17,666,444 |

| February, | "'. | . 18,384,050 |
| March, | " . | . 18,083,205 |

| February, | "'. | . 19,260,472 |

By comparing the circulation of each month, as exhibited on this table, Mr. B. said, it would be seen that the quantity of United States Bank notes now in circulation is three quarters of a million greater than it was in October last, and a million and a half greater than it was in January, 1833. How, then, are we to account for this cry of no money, in which so many respectable men join? It is in the single fact of their flow to the Northeast. The pigeons, which lately obscured the air with their numbers, have all taken their flight to the North! But pigeons will return of themselves, whereas these bank notes will never return till they are purchased with gold and silver, and brought back. Mr. B. then alluded to a petition from a meeting in his native State, North Carolina, and in which one of his esteemed friends (Mr. Carson) late a member of the House of Representatives, was a principal actor, and which stated the absolute disappearance of United States Bank notes from all that region of country. Certainly the petition was true in that statement; but it is equally true that it was mistaken in supposing that the circulation of the bank was diminished. The table which he had read had shown the contrary; it showed an increase, instead of a diminution, of the circulation. The only difference was that it had all left that part of the country, and that it would do for ever! If a hundred millions of United States Bank notes were carried to the upper parts of North Carolina, and put into circulation, it would be but a short time before the whole would have fallen into the current which sweeps the paper of that bank to the Northeast. Mr. B. said there were four other classes of proof which he could bring in, but it would be a consumption of time, and a work of supererogation. He would not detail them, but state their heads: 1. One was the innumerable orders which the mother bank had forwarded to her branches to send on specie and bills of exchange to redeem their circulation-to pour in reinforcements to the points to which their circulation tends; 2. Another was in the examination of Mr. Biddle, president of the bank, by the investigating committee, in 1832, in which this absorbing tendency of the branch paper to flow to the Northeast was fully charged and admitted; 3. A third was in the monthly statement of the notes in transitu, which amount to an average of four millions and a half for the last twelve months, making fifty millions for the year; and which consist, by far the greater part, of branch notes and checks redeemed in the Northeast, purchased back by the branches, and on their way back to the place from which they issued; and, 4. The last class of proof was in the fact, that the branches north of the Potomac, being unable or unwilling to redeem these notes any longer, actually ceased to redeem them last fall, even when taken in revenue payment to the United States, until coerced by the Secretary of the Treasury; and that they will not be redeemed for individuals now, and are actually degenerating into a mere local currency. Upon these proofs and arguments, Mr. B. rested his case, and held it to be fully established, first, by argument, founded in the nature of bank circulation over an extended territory; and secondly, by proof, derived from the operation of the present bank of the United States, that neither the present bank, nor any one that the wisdom of man can devise, can ever succeed in diffusing a general paper circulation over the States of this Union.

VI. Dropping every other objection to the fact to be, as the bank alleged it to be, that she bank—looking at it purely and simply as a supplier of national currency-he, Mr. B., could not consent to prolong the existence of the present bank. Certainly a profuse issue of paper at all points-an additional circulation of even a few millions poured out at the destitute pointswould make currency plenty for a little while but for a little while only. Nothing permanent would result from such a measure. On the contrary, in one or two years, the destitution and distress would be greater than it now is. At the same time, it is completely in the power of the bank, at this moment, to grant relief, full adequate, instantaneous relief! In making this assertion, Mr B. meant to prove it; and to prove it, he meant to do it in a way that it should reach the understanding of every candid and impartial friend that the bank possessed; for he meant to discard and drop from the inquiry, all his own views upon the subject; to leave out of view every statement made, and every opinion entertained by himself, and his friends, and proceced to the inquiry upon the evidence of the bank alone-upon that evidence which flowed from the bank directory itself, and from the most zealous, and best informed of its friends en this floor. Mr. B. assumed that a mere cessation to curtail discounts, at this time, would be a relief-that it would be the salvation of those who were pressed-and put an end to the cry of distress; he averred that this curtail. ment must now cease, or the bank must find a new reason for carrying it on; for the old reason is exhausted, and cannot apply. Mr. B. then took two distinct views to sustain his position; one founded in the actual conduct and present condition of the bank itself, and the other in a comparative view of the conduct and condition of the former Bank of the United States, at the approaching period of its dissolution.

I. As to the conduct and condition of the present bank.

Mr. B. appealed to the knowledge of all present for the accuracy of his assertion, when he said that the bank had now reduced her discounts, dollar for dollar, to the amount of public deposits withdrawn. The adversaries of the bank said the reduction was much larger than the abstraction; but he dropped that, and confined himself strictly to the admissions and declarations of the bank itself. he knowledge of all preof his assertion, when he d now reduced her disr, to the amount of pubn. The adversaries of the n was much larger than e dropped that, and corto the admissions and de itself. Taking then the c alleged it to be, that she own her business in pro portion to the capital taken from her, it followed of course that there was no reason for reducing her business any lower. Her relative position -her actual strength-was the same now that it was before the removal; and the old reason could not be available for the reduction of another dolla .. Next, as to her condition. Mr. B. undertook to affirm, and would quickly prove. that the general condition of the bank was better now than it had been for years past; and that the bank was better able to make loans, or to increase her circulation, than she was in any of those past periods in which she was so lavishly accommodating the public. For the proof of this, Mr. B. had recourse to her specie fund, always the true test of a bank's ability. and showed it to be greater now than it had been for two years past, when her loans and circulation were so much greater than they are now. He took the month of May, 1832, when the whole amount of specie on hand was $7,890, 347 59; when the net amount of notes in circilation was $21,044,415; and when the total discounts were $70,428,070 72: and then contrasted it with the condition of the bank at this time, that is to say, in the month of February last, when the last return was made; the items stands thus: specie, $10,523,385 69; net amount of notes in circulation, $19,260,472; total discounts, $54,842,973 64. From this view of figures, taken from the official bank returns, from which it appeared that the specie in the bank was nearly three millions greater than it was in May, 1832, her net circulation nearly two millions less, and her loans and discounts nowards of fifteen millions less; Mr. B. would submit it to all candid men to say whether the bank is not more able to accommodate the community now than she was then ? At all events, he would demand if she was not now able to ease pressing them?

II. As to the comparative condition and conact of the first Bank of the United States at he period of its approaching dissolution.

Mr. B. took the condition of the bank from ir. Gallatin's statement of its affairs to Conress, made in January, 1811, just three months efore the charter expired; and which showed e discounts and loans of the bank to be $14, 78,294 25, her capital being $10,000,000; so at the amount of her loans, three months bere her dissolution, was nearly in proportion—near enough for all practical views-to the proportion which the present loans of the Bank of the United States bear to its capital of thirtyfive millions. Fifty per cent. upon the former would give fifteen millions; fifty per cent. upon the latter would give fifty-two millions and a half. To make the relative condition of the two banks precisely equal, it will be sufficient that the loans and discounts of the present bank shall be reduced to fifty-two millions by the month of January, 1836; that is to say, it need not make any further sensible reduction of its loans for nearly two years to come. Thus, the mere imitation of the conduct of the old bank wil be a relief to the community. A mere cessation to curtail, will put an end to the distress, and let the country go on, quietly and regularly, in its moneyed operations. If the bank will not do this-if it will go on to curtail-it is bound to give some new reason to the country. The old reason, of the removal of the deposits, will no longer answer. Mr. B. had no faith in that reason from the beginning, but he was now taking the bank upon her own evidence, and trying her upon her own reasons, and he held it to be impossible for her to go on without the production of a reason. The hostility of the government-rather an incomprehensible, and altogether a gratuitous reason, from the beginning-will no longer answer. The government in 1811 was as hostile to the old bank, as tho government now is to this one; and rather more so. Both Houses of Congress were then hostile to it, and hostile unto death! For they let it die! die on the day appointed by law for its death, without pity, without remorse, without the reprieve of one day. The government can do no worse now. The Secretary of the Treasury has removed the deposi's; and that account is settled by the reduction of an equal amount of loans and discounts. The rest depends upon the government; and the hostility of the government cannot go further than to kill the bank, and cannot kill it more dead than the old bank was killed in 1811. Mr. B. had a further comparison to draw between the conduct of the old bank, and the present one. The old bank permitted her discounts to remain at their maximum to the very end of her charter; she discounted sixty days' paper up to the last day of her existence; while this bank has commenced a furious curtailment two years and a half be fore the expiration of her charter. Again: the old bank had not an hour, as a corporation, to wind up her business after the end of her charter; this bank has the use of all her corporate faculties, for that purpose, for two years after the end of her charter. Again: the present bank pretends that she will have to collect the whole of her debts within the period limited for winding up her affairs; the old bank took upwards of twelve years after the expiration of her charter, to collect hers! She created a trust; she appointed trustees; all the debts and credits were put into their hands, the trustees proceeded like any other collectors, giving time to all debtors who would secure the debt, pay interest punctually, and discharge the principal by instalments. This is what the old bank did; and she did not close her affairs until the 16th of June, in the year 1823. The whole operation was conducted so gently, that the public knew nothing about it. The cotemporaries of the dissolution of the bank, knew nothing about its dissolution. And this is what the present bank may do, if it pleases. That it has not done so-that it is now grinding the community, and threatening to grind them still harder, is a proof of the dangerous nature of a great moneyed power; and should be a warning to the people who now behold its conductwho feel its gripe, and hear its threat-never to suffer the existence of such another power in our free and happy land.

VII. Mr. B. deprecated the spirit which seemed to have broken out against State banks; it was a spirit which augured badly for the rights of the States. Those banks were created by the States; and the works of the States ought to be respected; the stock in those banks was held by American citizens, and ought not to be injuriously assailed to give value to stock held in the federal bank by foreigners and aliens. The very mode of carrying on the warfare against State banks, has itself been an injury, and a just cause of complaint. Some of the most inconsiderable have been picked outtheir affairs presented in the most unfavorable light; and then held forth as a fair sample of the whole. How much more easy would it have been to have acted a more grateful, and a more equitable part! a part more just to the State governments which created those banks, and the American citizens who held stock in them! | which presented an argument in justification

Instead of hunting out for remote and incon siderable banks, and instituting a most dispar. aging scrutiny into their small affairs, and mak. ing this high Senate the conspicuous theatre for the exhibition of their insignificance, why not take the higher order of the State banks ?those whose names and characters are well known? whose stock upon the exchange of London and New-York, is superior to that of the United States Bank? whose individual deposits are greater than those of the rival branch. es of the Bank of the United States, scated in their neighborhood? whose bills of exchange are as eagerly sought for as those of the federal bank? which have reduced exchange below the rates of the federal bank? and which, in every particular that tries the credit, is superior to the one which is receiving so much homage and admiration? Mr. B. said there were plenty of such State banks as he had described; they were to be found in every principal city, from New Orleans to Boston. Some of them had been selected for deposit banks, others not; but there was no difficulty in making a selection of an ample number.

This spirit of hostility to the State banks Mr. B. said, was of recent origin, and seemed to keep pace with the spirit of attack upon the political rights of the States. When the first federal bank was created, in the year 1791, it was not even made, by its charter, a place of deposit for the public moneys. Mr. Jefferson preferred the State banks at that time; and so declared himself in his cabinet opinion to President Washington. Mr. Gallatin deposited 1 part of the public moneys in the State banks during the whole of the long period that he was at the head of the treasury. At the dissolution of the first Bank of the United States, he turned over all the public moneys which he held in deposit to these banks, takir heir obligation to pay out all the treasury warrants drawn upon them in gold and silver, if desired by the holder. When the present bank was chartcred in State banks stood upon an equal footing with the federal bank, and were placed upon an equiity with it as banks of deposit, in the very charter which created the federal bank. Mr. B. wm indamental article of the k-the article which pro hment of branches-un gument in justification d the removal of the deposits which the adversaries of that measure most pertinaciously decline to answer. The government wanted banks of deposit, not of circulation; and by that article, the State banks are made just as much banks of deposit for the United States as the Bank of the United States is. They are put upon exact equality, so far as the federal government is conerned; for she stipulates but for one single branch of the United States Bank, and that to be placed at Washington city. As for all other branches, their establishment was made to depend-not on the will, or power, of the federal government-not on any supposed or real neressity on her part to have the use of such branches-but upon contingencies over which the had no control; contingencies depending, one upon the mere calculation of profit and loss by the bank itself, the other upon the subscriptions of stock within a State, and the application of its legislature. In these contingencies, namely, if the Bank of the United States thought it to her interest to establish branches in the States, she might do it; or, if 2,000 shares of stock was subscribed for in a State, and therepon an application was made by the State leislature for the institution of a branch, then its stablishment within the State became obligaory upon the bank. In neither contingency ad the will, the power, or the necessities of he federal government, the least weight, conern, or consideration, in the establishment of he branch. If not established, and so far as he government is concerned, it might not be, hen the State banks, selected by the United tates Bank, and approved by the Secretary of e Treasury, were to be the banks of deposit r the federal moneys. This was an argument, r. B. said, in justification of the removal of the posits, and in favor of the use of the State aks which gentlemen on the opposite side of question-gentlemen who take so much ins to decry State banks—have been careful t to answer.

The evils of a small paper circulation, he conlered among the greatest grievances that could lict a community. The evils were innumere, and fell almost exclusively upon those who re least able to bear them, or to guard against m. If a bank stops payment, the holders of small notes, who are usually the working t of the community, are the last to find it basis for a superstructure of large notes; while out, and the first to suffer. If counterfeiting is perpetrated, it is chiefly the small notes which are selected for imitation, because they are most current among those who know the least about notes, and who are most easily made the dupes of imposition, and the victims of fraud. As the expeller of hard money, small notes were the bane and curse of a country. A nation is scarce, or abundant, in hard money, precisely in the degree in which it tolerates the lower denominations of bank notes. France tolerates no note less than $100; and has a gold and silver circulation of 350 millions of dollars. England tolerates no note of less than $25; and has a gold and silver circulation of 130 millions of dollars: in the United States, where $5 is the minimum size of the federal bank notes, the whole specie circulation, including what is in the banks, does not amount to thirty millions of dollars. To increase the quantity of hard money in the United States, and to supply the body of the people with an adequate specie cur rency to serve for their daily wants, and ordi nary transactions, the bank note circulation below twenty dollars, ought to be suppressed. If Congress could pass a law to that effect, it ought to bed one; but it cannot pass such a law: it has no constitutional power to pass it. Congress can, however, do something else, which will, in time, effectually put down such a currency. It can discard it, and disperage it. It can reject it from all federal payments. It can reject the whole circulation of any bank that will continue to issue small notes. Their rejection from all federal payments, would check their currency, and confine the orbit of their circulation to the immediate neighborhood of the is suing bank. The bank itself would find but little profit from issuing them—public sentiment would come to the aid of federal policy. The people of the States, when countenanced and sustained by the federal government, would indulge their natural antipathy and honest detestation of a small paper currency. They would make war upon all small notes. The State legislatures would be under the control of the people; and the States that should first have the wisdom to limit their paper circulation to a minimum of twenty dollar bills, would immediately fill up with gold and silver. The common currency would be entirely metallic; and there would be a broad and solid the States which continued to tolerate the small notes, would be afflicted with all the evils of a most pestilential part of the paper system,-small notes, part counterfeit, part uncurrent, half worn out; and all incapable of being used with any regard to a beneficial economy. Mr. B. went on to depict the evils of a small note currency, which he looked upon as the bane and curse of the laboring part of the community, and the repreach and opprobrium of any government that tolerated it. He sald that the government which suffered its currency to fall into such a state that the farmer, the artisan, the market man, the day laborer, and the hired servant, could only be paid in small bank notes, was a government which abdicated one of its most sacred duties; and became an accomplice on the part of the strong in the oppression of the weak.

Mr. B. placed great reliance upon the restoration of the gold currency for putting down a small note circulation. No man would choose to carry a bundle of small bank notes in his pocket, even new and clean ones, much less old, ragged, and filthy ones, when he could get gold in their place. A limitation upon the receivability of these notes, in payment of federal dues, would complete their suppression. Mr. B. did not aspire to the felicity of seeing as fine a currency in the United States as there is in France, where there was no bank note under five hundred francs, and where there was a gold and silver circulation at the rate of eleven dollars a head for each man, woman, and child, in the kingdom, namely, three hundred and fifty millions of dollars for a population of thirty-two millions of souls; but he did aspire to the comparative happiness of seeing as good currency established for ourselves, by ourselves, as our old fellowsubjects-the people of old England-now possess from their king, lords, and commons. They -- he spoke of England proper-had no bank note less than five pounds sterling, and they possessed a specie circulation (of which threefourths was gold) at the rate of about nine dollars a head, men, women, children (even paupers) included; namely, about one hundred and thirty millions for a population of fourteen millions. He, Mr. B., must be allowed to aspire to the happiness of possessing, and in his sphere to labor to acquire, as good a circulation as these English have; and that would be an immeasurable improvement upon our present condition. We have local hank notes of one, two three, four dollars; we have federal bank notes of five and ten dollars—the notes of those Eng. lish who are using gold at home while we are using their paper here: -we have not a particle of gold, and not more silver than at the rate of about two dollars a head, men, women, children (even slaves) included; namely, about thirty millions of silver for a population of thirteen millions. Mr. B. believed there was not upon the face of the earth, a country whose actual currency was in a more deplorable condition than that of the United States was at present: the bitter fruit of that fatal paper system which was brought upon us, with the establishment of the first Bank of the United States in 1791, and which will be continued upon us until the citadel of that system—the Bastile of paper money, the present Bank of the United States,-shall cease to exist.

Mr. B. said, that he was not the organ of the President on this floor-he had no authority from the President to speak his sentiments to the Senate. Even if he knew them, it would be unparliamentary, and irregular, to state them. There was a way for the Senate to communicate with the President, which was too weil known to every gentleman to require any indication from him. But he might be permitted to suggest-in the absence of all regular information -that if any Senator wished to understand and to comment upon, the President's opinions on currency, he might, perhaps, come something nearer to the mark, by commenting on what he (Mr. B.) had been saying, than by having recourse to the town meeting reports of inimical bank committees.

esentatives had appointed its members to investigate hk of the United Statesconsisting of Mr. Franci i; Mr. Edward Everette Henry A. Muhlenberg of Pennsylvania; Mr. John Y. Mason, of Virginia; Mr. W. W. Ellaworth, of Connecticut; Mr. Abijah Mann, Jr. of New-York; Mr. Robert T. Lytle, of Ohio. The authority under which the committee acted, required them to ascertain: 1. The causes of the commercial embarrassment, and the public distress complained of in the numerous distress memorials presented to the two llouses during the session; and whether the hank had been any way instrumental, through its management or money, in producing the distress and embarrassment, of which so much complaint was made. 2. To inquire whether the charter of the bank had been violated; and what corruptions and abuses, if any, had existed in its management. 3. To inquire whether the bank had used its corporate power, or money, to control the press, to interpose in politics, or to infuence elections. The authority conferred upon the committee was ample for the execution of hese inquiries. It was authorized to send for persons and papers; to summon and examine ritnesses on oath; to visit, if necessary, the rincipal bank, and its branches; to inspect the ooks, correspondence and accounts of the bank, nd other papers connected with its managenent. The right of the House to make this nvestigation was two-fold: first, under the wenty-third article of the charter: secondly, the founder of the corporation; to whom clongs, in law language, the right to "visit" he institution it has founded; which "visitg" is for examination—as a bishop "viss" his diocese—a superintendent "visits" the orks and persons under his care; not to see hem, but to examine into their management ad condition. There was also, a third right of ramination, resulting from the act of the corpration; it was again soliciting a re-charter, d was bound to show that the corporators dused their actual charter fairly and legally fore it asked for another. And, fourthly, there as a further right of investigation, still resultfrom its conduct. It denied all the accusans brought against it by the government dictors, and brought before Congress by the cretary of the Treasury; and joined issue upon ose accusations in a memorial addressed to e two Houses of Congress. To refuse examinan under these circumstances would be shrinkfrom the issue which itself had joined. The mmittee proceeded to Philadelphia, and soon found that the bank did not mean to submit to an examination. Captious and special pleading objections were made at every step, until attempts on one side and objections on the other ended in a total refusal to submit their books for inspection, or themselves for an examination. The directors had appointed a company of seven to meet the committee of the House-a procedure unwarranted by any right or usage, and offensive in its pretentious equality; but to which the committee consented, at first, from a desire to do nothing to balk the examination. That corporation committee was to sit with them, in the room in the bank assigned for the examination; and took care always to preoccupy it before the House committee arrived; and to act as if at home, receiving guests. The committee then took a room in a hotel, and asked to have the bank books sent to them; which was refused. They then desired to have the books subjected to their inspection in the bank itself; in which request they were bailled, and defeated. The bank committee required written specification of their points of inquiry, either in examining a book, or asking a question—that it might judge its legality; which they confined to mere breaches of the charter. And when the directors were summoned to answer questions, they refused to be sworn, and excused themselves on the ground of being parties to the proceeding. Some passages from the committee's report will show to what extent this higgling and contumacy was carried by this corporation-deriving its existence from Congress, and endeavoring to force a renewed charter from it while refusing to show how it had used the first one. Thus:

"On the 23d of April, their chairman addressed to the President of the bank, a communication, inclosing a copy of the resolution of the House of Representatives, and notifying him of the readiness of the committee to visit the bank on the ensuing day, at any hour agreeable to him. In reply, the President informed the committee that the papers' thus received should be submitted to the board of directors, at a special meeting to be called for that purpose. It appears, in the journal of the proceedings of the committee, herewith presented to the House, that this was done, and that the directors appointed a committee of seven of their board, to receive the committee of the House of Representatives, and to offer for their inspection such books and papers of the bank, as may be necessary to exhibit the proceedings of the corporation, according to the requirement of the charter. In the letter of John Sergeant, Esq., as chairman of the committee of directors communicating the proceedings of the board, he says that he was directed to inform the chairman of this committee that the committee of the directors will immediately direct the necessary arrangements to be made for the accommodation of the committee of the House of Representatives, and would attend at the bank to real votem the next day, at eleven o'clock. Your committee attended, and were received by the committee of directors.

"Up to this period, nothing had occurred to justify the belief that a disposition was felt, on the part of the managers of the bank, to embarrass the proceedings of the committee, or have them conducted differently from those of the two preceding committees of investigation. On assembling, however, the next morning, at the bank, they found the room which had been offered for their accommodation, preoccupied by the committee of the board, with the president of the bank, as an ex officio member, claiming the right to be present at the investigations and examinations of this committee. This proceeding the committee were not prepared to expect. When the appointment of the committee of seven was first made, it was supposed that that measure, however designed, was not well calculated to facilitate the examination. "With a previous determination to be present when their books were to be inspected, they could have waited to avow it until these books were called for, and the attempt made to inspect them in their absence. These circumstances are now reviewed, because they then excited an apprehension, which the sequel formed into conviction, that this committee of directors had been appointed to supervise the acts and doings of your committee, and to limit and restrain their proceedings, not according to the directions contained in the resolution of the House, but the will and judgment of the board of directors. Your committee have chosen to ascribe this claim of the committee of directors to sit conjointly with them, to the desire to prevent them from making use of the books and papers, for some of the purposes pointed out by the resolution of the House. They are sensible that this claim to be present at all examinations, avowed prematurely, and subsequently persisted in with pe-culiar pertinacity, could be attributed to very different motives; but respect for themselves, and respect for the gentlemen who compose the committee of directors, utterly forbids the ascription to them of a feeling which would merit compassion and contempt much more than resentment.

"This novel position, voluntarily and deliberately taken by the committee of the directors, predicated en an idea of equality of rights with your committee, under your esolution, rendered it probable, and in some measure necessary, that your committee should express its opinions of the relative rights of the corporation and the House of Representatives. To avoid all misunderstanding and future misrepresentations, i was desirable that each question should be decided separately. Contemplating an extended investigation, but unwilling that an apprehensishould exist of improper disclosures being made of the transactions of the bank and its customers your committee, following the example of the committee of 1832, adopted a resolution declaring that their proceedings should be confidential until otherwise ordered by the committee, and also a resolution that the committee would conduct its investigations 'without the presence of any person not required or invited to attent A copy of these resolutions was furnished to the committee of directors, in the hope that the exclusive control of a room at the bank, during it hours of business, would thereafter be conceded to your committee, while the claim of the committee of directors to be present when the book were submitted for inspection, should be postponed for decision, when the books were called for and produced by them.

"On the 28th ult. this committee assembled at the banking house, and again found the room they expected to find set apart for their use preoccupied by the committee of directors, and others, officers of the bank. And instead d such assurances as they had a right to expen they received copies of two resolutions adopted by the board of directors, in which they were given to understand that their continued occupation of the room must be considered a targ and not a matter of right; and in which the board indulge in unjust commentaries on the resolution of the House of Representatives; and intimate an apprehension that your committee design to make their examinations secret, partial, unjust, oppressive and contrary to comm right.

On receiving this offensive communication manifestly intended to bring on a quarrel the committee adopted a resolution to sit in a ros of their hotel, and advised the bank accordingly and required the president and directors to sub mit the books to their inspection in the row so chosen, at a day and hour named. To this the directors answered that they could not me ply; and the committee, desirous to do all the could to accomplish the investigation committee to them, then gave notice that they would atten at the bank on a named day and hour to inste the books in the bank itself-either at h counter, or in a room. Arriving at the pointed time, and asking to see the books, the were positively refused, reasons in writing bit assigned for the refusal. They then make written request to see certain books speciful and for a specified purpose, namely, to ascert

They then make see certain books specifical purpose, namely, to ascerti the truth of the report of the government directors in using the money and power of the bank in politics, in elections, or in producing the distress. The manner in which this call was treated must be given in the words of the report itself; thus:

"Without giving a specific answer to these calls for books and papers, the committee of directors presented a written communication, which was said to be 'indicative of the mode of proceeding deemed right by the bank.'

proceeding deemed right by the bank."

"The committee of the board in that communication, express the opinion, that the inquiry can only be rightfully extended to alleged violations of the charter, and &eny virtually the right of the House of Representatives to authorize the inquiries required in the resolution.

"They also required of the committee of investigation, 'when they asked for books and papers, to state specifically in writing, the purposes for which they are proposed to be inspected; and if it be to establish a violation of the charter, then to state specifically in writing, what are the alleged or supposed violations of charter, to which the evidence is alleged to be

"To this extraordinary requirement, made n the supposition that your committee were harged with the duty of crimination, or proseution for criminal offence, and implying a right n the part of the directors to determine for that purposes the inspection should be made, and what books or papers should be submitted o inspection, your committee replied, that they rere not charged with the duty of criminating he bank, its directors, or others; but simply o inquire, amongst other things, whether any rescution in legal form should be instituted, nd from the nature of their duties, and the intructions of the House of Representatives, they rere not bound to state specifically in writing ny charges against the bank, or any special prose for which they required the production the books and papers for inspection."

The committee then asked for copies of the counts and entries which they wished to see, at were answered that it would require the bor of two clerks for ten months to make them it; and so declined to give the copies. The comittee finding that they could make nothing out books and papers, determined to change their amination of things into that of persons; and that purpose had recourse to the subpoenas, mished by the House; and had them served the United States marshal on the president d directors. This subpoena, which contained clause of duces tecum, with respect to the oks, was so far obeyed as to bring the directors.

tora in person before the committee; and so far disobeyed as to bring them without the books, and so far exceeded as to bring them with a written refusal to be sworn—for reasons which they atated. But this part deserves to be told in the language of the report; which says:

"Believing they had now exhausted, in their efforts to execute the duty devolved upon them, all reasonable means depending solely upon the provisions of the bank charter, to obtain the inspection of the books of this corporation, your committee were at last reluctantly compelled to resort to the subpœnas which had been furnished to them under the seal of this House, and attested by its clerk. They, thereby, on the 9th inst, directed the marshal of the eastern district of Pennsylvania to summon Nicholas Biddle, president, and thirteen other persons, directors of the bank, to attend at their committee room, on the next day, at twelve o'clock, at noon, to testify concerning the matters of which your committee were authorized to inquire, and to bring with them certain books therein named for inspection. The marshal served the summons in due form of law, and at the time appointed, the persons therein named appeared before the committee and presented a written communication signed by each of them, as the answer of each to the requirements of the subpoons, which is in the appendix to this report. In this paper they declare 'that they do not produce the books required, because they are not in the custody of either of us, but as has been heretofore stated, of the board,' and add, considering that as corporators and directors, we are parties to the proceeding-we do not consider ourselves bound to testify, and therefore respectfully decline to do so."

This put an end to the attempted investigation. The committee returned to Washington -made report of their proceedings, and moved: "That the speaker of this House do issue his warrant to the sergeant-at-arms, to arrest Nicholas Biddle, president-Manuel Eyre, Lawrence Lewis, Ambrose White, Daniel W. Cox, John Holmes, Charles Chauncey, John Goddard, John R. Neff, William Platt, Matthew Newkirk, James C. Fisher, John S. Henry, and John Sergeant, directors-of the Bank of the United States, and bring them to the bar of this House to answer for the contempt of its lawful authority." This resolve was not acted upon by the House; and the directors had the satisfaction to enjoy a negative triumph in their contempt of the House, flagrant as that contempt was upon its own showing, and still more so upon its contrast with the conduct of the same bank (though under a different set of directors), in the year 1819. A committee of investigation was then appointed, armed with the same powers which were granted to this committee of the year 1834, and the directors of that time readily submitted to every species of examination which the committee chose to make. They visited the principal bank at Philadelphia, and several of its branches. They had free and unrestrained access to the books and papers of the bank. They were furnished by the officers with all the copies and extracts they asked for. They summoned before them the directors and officers of the bank, examined them on oath, took their testimony in writing-and obtained full answers to all their questions, whether they implied illegalities violative of the charter, or abuses, or mismanagement. :-- 'akes and errors.

CHAPTER CVII.

MR. TANEY'S REPORT ON THE FINANCES—EXPO-SURE OF THE DISTRESS ALARMS—END OF THE PANIC.

ABOUT the time when the panic was at its height, and Congress most heavily assailed with distress memorials, the Secretary of the Treasury was called upon by a resolve of the Senate for a report upon the finances-with the full belief that the finances were going to ruin, and that the government would soon be left without adequate revenue, and driven to the mortifying resource of loans. The call on the Secretary was made early in May, and was answered the middle of June; and was an utter disappointment to those who called for it. Far from showing the financial decline which had been expected, it showed an increase in every branch of the revenue! and from that authentic test of the national condition, it was authentically shown that the Union was prosperous! and that the distress, of which so much was heard, was confined to the victims of the United States Bank, so far as it was real; and that all beyond that was fictitious and artificial—the result of the machinery for organizing panic, oppressing debtors, breaking up labor, and alarming the timid. When the report came into the Senate, the reading of it was commenced at the table of the Secretary, and had not proceeded far when Mr.

Webster moved to cease the reading, and send it to the Committee on Finance—that committee in which a report of that kind could not er. pect to find either an early or favorable notice. We had expected a motion to get rid of it, in some quiet way, and had prepared for whatere might happen. Mr. Taney had sent for me, the day before it came in; read it over with me: showed me all the tables on which it was founded; and prepared me to sustain and emblazon it: for it was our intention that such , report should go to the country, not in the quiet, subdued tone of a State paper, but with all the emphasis, and all the challenges to pub. lic attention, which the amplifications, the ani mation, and the fire and freedom which the speaking style admitted. The instant, then that Mr. Webster made his motion to stop the reading, and refer the report to the Finance Committee, Mr. Benton rose, and demanded that the reading be continued: a demand which he had a right to make, as the rules gave it to every member. He had no occasion to hear it read, and probably heard nothing of it; butthe form was necessary, as the report was to be the text of his speech. The instant it was done he rose and delivered his speech, seizing the circumstance of the interrupted reading to furnish the brief exordium, and to give a fresh and ir. promptu air to what he was going to say. Mr. Benton rose, and said that this report was of a nature to deserve some attention be fore it left the chamber of the Senate, and wen to a committee, from which it might not re turn in time for consideration at this session It had been called for under circumstance which attracted attention, and disclosed information which deserved to be known, It was called for early in May, in the crisis of the alarm operations, and with confident assertion that the answer to the call would prove the distress and the suffering of the country, I was confidently asserted that the Secretary the Treasury had over-estimated the revenue of the year; that there would be a great falls off-a decline-a bankruptcy; that confiden was destroyed-enterprise checked-indust paralyzed-commerce suspended! that the ful act of one man, in one dire order, had chur the face of the country, from a scene of un alleled prosperity to a scene of unparalle

Such were the assertions and predictions under which the call was made, and to which the public attention was attracted by every device of theatrical declamation from this floor. Well, the answer comes. The Secretary sends in his report, with every statement called for. It is a report to make the patriot's heart rejoice! full of high and gratifying facts; replete with rich information; and pregnant with evidences of national prosperity. How is it received-how received by those who called for it? With downcast looks, and wordless tongues! A motion is even made to stop the reading! to stop the reading of such a report! called for under auch circumstances; while whole days are given up to reading the monotonous, tautologous, and ndless repetitions of distress memorials, the cho of our own speeches, and the thousandth dition of the same work, without emendation or correction! All these can be read, and brinted, too, and lauded with studied eulogium, nd their contents sent out to the people, reighted upon every wind; but this official eport of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon he state of their own revenues, and of their wn commerce, called for by an order of the enate, is to be treated like an unwelcome and orthless intruder; received without a wordot even read-slipped out upon a motionsposed of as the Abbé Sieyes voted for the eath of Louis the Sixteenth: mort sans phrase! eath, without talk! But he, Mr. B., did not can to suffer this report to be dispatched in is unceremonious and compendious style. It d been called for to be given to the people, d the people should hear of it. It was not hat was expected, but it is what is true, and hat will rejoice the heart of every patriot in merica. A pit was dug for Mr. Tarey; the gers of the pit have fallen into it; the fault not his; and the sooner they clamber out, the tter for themselves. The people have a right know the contents of this report, and know

America, whose heart is so constructed as to grieve over the prosperity of his country, let hlm prepare himself for sorrow; for the proof is forthcoming, that never, since America had a place among nations, was the prosperity of the country equal to what it is at this day!

Mr. B. then requested the Secretary of the Senate to send him the report, and comparative statements; which being done, Mr. B. opened the report, and went over the heads of it to show that the Secretary of the Treasury had not over-estimated the revenue of the year, as he had been charged, and as the report was expected to prove : that the revenue was, in fact, superior to the estimate; and that the importations would equal, if not exceed, the highest amount that they had ever attained.

To appreciate the statements which he should make, Mr. B. said it was necessary for the Senate to recollect that the list of dutiable articles was now greatly reduced. Many articles were now free of duty, which formerly paid heavy duties; many others were reduced in duty; and the fair effect of these abolitions and reductions would be a diminution of revenue even without a diminution of imports; yet the Secretary's estimate. made at the commencement of the session, was more than realized, and showed the gratifying spectacle of a full and overflowing treasury, instead of the empty one which had been predicted; and left to Congress the grateful occupation of further reducing taxes, instead of the odious task of borrowing money, as had been so loudly anticipated for six months past. The revenue accruing from imports in the first quarter of the present year, was 5,344,540 dollars; the payments actually made into the treasury from the custom-houses for the same quarter, were 4,435,386 dollars; and the payments from lands for the same time, were 1,398,206 dollars. The two first months of the second quarter were producing in a full ratio to the first quarter: and the actual amount of available funds in the treasury on the 9th day of this month, was eleven millions, two hundred aud forty-nine thousand, four hundred and twelve dollars. The two last quarters of the year were always the most productive. It vas the time of the largest importations of foreign goods which pay most duty-the woollens-and the season, also, for the largest sale of public lands. It is well bem they shall; and if there is any man in this lieved that the estimate will be more largely ex ceeded in those two quarters than in the two first; and that the excess for the whole year, over the estimate, will be full two millions of dollars. This, Mr. B. said, was one of the evidences of public prosperity which the report contained, and which utterly contradicted the idea of distress and commercial embarrassment which had been propagated, from this chamber, for the last six months.

Mr. B. proceeded to the next evidence of commercial prosperity; it was the increased importations of foreign goods. These imports, judging from the five first months, would be seven millions more than they were two years ago, when the Bank of the United States had seventy millions loaned out; and they were twenty millions more than in the time of Mr. Adams's administration. At the rate they had commenced, they would amount to one hundred and ten millions for the year. This will exceed whatever was known in our country. The imports, for the time that President Jackson has served, have regularly advanced from about $74,000,000 to $108,000,000. The following is the statement of these imports, from which Mr. B. read:

Mr. B. said that the imports of the last year were greater in proportion than in any previous year; a temporary decline might reasonably have been expected; such declines always take place after excessive importations. If it had occurred now, though naturally to have been expected, the fact would have been trumpeted forth as the infallible sign—the proof positive—of commercial distress, occasioned by the fatal removal of the deposits. But, as there was no decline, but on the contrary, an actual increase, he must claim the evidence for the other side of the account, and set it down as proof positive that commerce is not destroyed; and, consequently, that the removal of the deposits did not destroy commerce.

The next evidence of commercial prosperity which Mr. 73. would exhibit to the Senate, was in the incomed, and increasing number of ship arrivals from foreign ports. The number of arrivals for the month of May, in New-York, was two hundred and twenty-three, exceeding by thirty-six those of the month of April and showing not only a great art arr increating activity in the common of that great emporium—he would not say of the United States, or even of North America—but he would call it that great emporium of the two Americas, and of the New World; for the good imported to that place, were thence distributed to every part of the two Americas, from the Canadian lakes to Cape Horn.

A third evidence of national prosperity was in the sales of the public lands. Mr. B. had on a former occasion, adverted to these sales so far as the first quarter was concerned; and had shown, that instead of falling off, as had been predicted on this floor, the revenue from the sales of these lands had actually doubled and more than doubled, what they were is the first quarter of 1833. The receipts for lands for that quarter, were $668,526; for the first quarter of the present year they were $1,398,206; being two to one, and $60,000 over! The receipts for the two first months of the second quarter, were also known and would carry the revenue from lands, for the first five months of this year, to two million of dollars; indicating five millions for the whole year; an enormous amount, from which the people of the new States ought to be is some degree, relieved, by a reduction in the price of lands. Mr. B. begged in the most enphatic terms, to remind the Senate, that at the commencement of the session, the sales of the public lands were selected as one of the crite rions by which the ruin and desolation of the country were to be judged. It was then are dicted, and the prediction put forth with the holdness of infallible prophecy, that there moval of the deposits would stop the sales of the public lands; that money would disappea and the people have nothing to buy with; th the produce of the earth would rot upon the hands of the farmer. Having proved the general prosperity of the country from these infallible data-flourishing revenue-flourishing commerce-increased arrirals of ships—and increased sales of public lands, Mr. B. said that he was far from denying that actual distress had existed. He had admitted the fact of that distress heretofore, not to the extent to which it was charged, but to a sufficient extent to excite sympathy for the sufferers; and he had distinctly charged the whole distress that did exist to the Bank of the United States, and the Senate of the United States-to the screw-and-pressure operations of the bank, and the alarm speeches in the Senate. He had made this charge; and made it under a full sense of the moral responsibility which he owed to the people, in affirming any thing so disadvantageous to others, from this elevated theatre. He had, therefore, iven his proofs to accompany the charge; and he had now to say to the Senate, and through the Senate to the people, that he found new proofs for that charge in the detailed stateents of the accruing revenue, which had been alled for by the Senate, and furnished by the ecretary of the Treasury.

Mr. B. said he must be pardoned for repeatng his request to the Scnate, to recollect how ften they had been told that trade was parazed; that orders for foreign goods were counrmanded; that the importing cities were the letures of desolation; their ships idle; their harves deserted; their mariners wandering and down. Now, said Mr. B., in looking er the detailed statement of the accruing renue, it was found that there was no decline commerce, except at places where the policy d power of the United States Bank was preminant! Where that power or policy was edominant, revenue declined; where it was predominant, or the policy of the bank not erted, the revenue increased; and increased t enough to make up the deficiency at the er places. Mr. B. proceeded to verify this tement by a reference to specified places. as, at Philadelphia, where the bank holds its of empire, the revenue fell off about one d; it was $797,316 for the first quarter of 3, and only $542,498 for the first quarter of . At New-York, where the bank has not able to get the upper hand, there was an nue there, for the first quarter of 1833, was $3,122,166; for the first of 1834, it was $3,249,786. At Boston, where the bank is again predominant, the revenue fell off about one third; at Salem, Mass., it fell off four fifths. At Baltimore, where the bank has been defeated, there was an increase in the revenue of more than $70,000. At Richmond, the revenue was doubled, from $12,034 to $25,810. At Charleston, it was increased from $69,503 to $102,810. At Petersburg, it was slightly increased; and throughout all the region south of the Potomac, there was either an increase, or the slight falling off which might result from diminished duties without diminished importations. Mr. B. said he knew that bank power was predominant in some of the cities of the South; but he knew, also, that the bank policy of distress and oppression had not been practised there. That was not the region to be governed by the scourge. The high mettle of that region required a different policy: gentleness, conciliation, coaxing! If the South was to be gained over by the bank, it was to be done by favor, not by fear. The seourge, though so much the most congenial to the haughty spirit of the moneyed power, was only to be applied where it would be submitted to; and, therefore, the whole region south of the Potomac, was exempted from the lash.

Mr. B. here paused to fix the attention of the Senate upon these facts. Where the power of the bank enabled her to depress commerce and sink the revenue, and her policy permitted her to do it, commerce was depressed; and the revenue was sunk, and the prophecies of the distress orators were fulfilled; but where her power did not predominate, or where her policy required a different course, commerce increased, and the revenue increased; and the result of the whole is, that New-York and some other anti-bank cities have gained what Philadelphia and other bank cities have lost; and the federal treasury is just as well off, as if it had got its accustomed supply from every place.

s, at Philadelphia, where the bank holds its of empire, the revenue fell off about one d; it was $797,316 for the first quarter of and only $542,498 for the first quarter of the real commercial distress which has been felt. But at one point, at New Orleans, there was further evidence to convict her of wanton and table to get the upper hand, there was an ease of more than $120,000; the reverties the reports, but it was in the weekly returns of the bank; and showed that, in the beginning of March, that institution had carried off from her branch in New Orleans, the sum of about $800,000 in specie, which it had been collecting all the winter, by a wanton curtailment, under the pretext of supplying the amount of the deposits taken from her at that place. $800,000 dollars were collected from the New Orleans merchants in the very crisis of the arrival of Western produce. The merchants were pressed to pay debts, when they ought to have been accommodated with loans. The price of produce was thereby depressed; the whole West suffered from the depression; and now it is proved that the money was not wanted to supply the place of the deposits, but was sent to Philadelphia, where there was no use for it, the bank having more than she can use; and that the whole operation was a wanton and wicked measure to coerce the West to cry out for a return of the deposits, and a renewal of the charter, by attacking their commerce in the market of New Orleans. This fact, said Mr. B., would have been proved from the books of the bank, if they had been inspected. Failing in that, the proof was intelligibly found in the weekly returns.

Mr. B. took up another table to prove the prosperity of the country: it was in the increase of specie since the programme for the distress had been published. That programme dated from the first day of October last, and the clear increase since that time is the one half of the whole quantity then in the United States. The imports had been $11,128,291; the exports only $998,761.

Mr. B. remarked, upon this statement, that it presented a clear gain of more than ten millions of dollars. He was of opinion that two millions ought to be added for sums not entered at the custom-house, which would make twelve millions; and added to the six millions of 1833, would give eighteen millions of specie of clear gain to the country, in the last twenty months. This, he said was prosperity. It was wealth itself; and besides, it showed that the country was not in debt for its large importations, and that a larger proportion of foreign imports now consisted of specie than was ever known before. Mr. B. particularized the imports and exports of gold; how the former had increased, and the latter diminished, during the last few months; and said that a great amount of gold, both foreign and domestic, was now waiting in the country to see if Congress would raise gold to its fair value. If so raised, this gold would remain, and enter into circulation; if not, it would immediately go off to foreign countries; for gold was not a thing to stay where it was undervalued. He also spoke of silver, and said that it had arrived without law, but could not re main without law. Unless Congress passed an act to make it current, and that at full value as money, and not at the mint value, as bullion, it would go off.

Mr. B. had a further view to give of the prosperity of the country, and further evidence to show that all the distress really suffered was factitious and unnatural. It was in the great increase of money in the United States, during the last year and a half. He spoke of money: not paper promises to pay money, but the thing itself-real gold and silver-and affirmed that there was a clear gain of from eighteen to twenty millions of specie, within the time that he had mentioned. He then took up the custom-house returns to verify this important statement and to let the people see that the country was never so well off for money as at the very time that it was proclaimed to be in the lewest state of porerty and misery. He first showed the imports and exports of specie and bullion for the year ending the 30th of September, 1833. It was a follows:

Year ending September 30, 1833.

Mr. B. having read over this statement, a marked upon it, that it presented a clear balant of near five millions of specie in favor of the United States on the first day of October as without counting at least another million who was brought by passengers, and not put up the custom-house books. tors in the country, to date the ruin and desolation of the country.

Mr. B. then showed a statement of the imports and exports of specie and bullion, from the first of October, 1833, to the 11th of June, instant

Mr. B. recapitulated the evidences of national prosperity-increased imports-revenue from customs exceeding the estimate-increased rerenue from public lands-increased amount of specie-above eleven millions of available funds now in the treasury-domestic and foreign commerce active-the price of produce and property fair and good-labor every where finding employment and reward-more money in the country than ever was in it at any one time before-the numerous advertisements for the purchase of slaves, in the papers of this city, for the Southern market, which indicated the high price of Southern products-and affirmed his conscientious belief, that the country was more prosperous at this time than at any period of is existence; and inveighed in terms of strong indignation against the arts and artifices, which for the last six months had disturbed and agitated the country, and done serious mischief to many individuals. He regretted the miscarriage of the attempt to examine the Bank of the United States, which he believed would have completed the proof against that institution for its share in getting up an unnatural and factitious scene of distress, in the midst of real prosperity. But he did not limit his invective to the bank, but came directly to the Senate. and charged a full share upon the theatrical distress speeches, delivered upon the floor of the Senate, in imitation of Volney's soliloquy over the ruins of Palmyra. He repeated some passages from the most affecting of these lamentations over the desolation of the country, such as the Senate had been accustomed to hear about the time of the New-York and Virginia elections. "The canal a solitude! The lake a lesert waste of waters! That populous city lately resounding with the hum of busy multitudes, now silent and sad! A whole nation, in he midst of unparalleled prosperity, and Aradian felicity, suddenly struck into poverty, and lunged into unutterable woe! and all this by the ireful act of one wilful man!" Such, said Mr. B., ere the lamentations over the ruins, not of the true condition you have just seen exhibited in the faithful report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Not even the "baseless fabric of a vision" was ever more destitute of foundation, than those lamentable accounts of desolation. The lamentation has ceased; the panic has gone off; would to God he could follow out the noble line of the poet, and say, "leaving not a wreck behind." But he could not say that. There were wrecks! wrecks of merchants in every city in which the bank tried its cruel policy, and wrecks of banks in this district, where the panic speeches fell thickest and loudest upon the ears of an astonished and terrified community!

But, continued Mr. B., the game is up; the alarm is over; the people are tired of it; the agitators have ceased to work the engine of alarm. A month ago he had said it was "tho last of pea-time" with these distress memorials; he would now use a bolder figure, and say, that the Secretary's report, just read, had expelled forever the ghost of alarm from the chamber of the Senate. All ghosts, said Mr. B., are afraid of the light. The crowing of the cock—the break of day-remits them all, the whole shadowy tribe, to their dark and dreary abodes. How then can this poor ghost of alarm, which has done such hard service for six months past, how can it stand the full light, the broad glare, the clear sunshine of the Secretary's report? "Alas, poor ghost!" The shade of the "noble Dane" never quit the stage under a more inexorable law than the one which now drives thee away! This report, replete with plain facts, and luminous truths, puts to flight the apparition of distress, breaks down the whole machinery of alarm, and proves that the American people are, at this day, the most prosperous people on which the beneficent sun of heaven did ever such as the Senate had been accustomed to hear about the time of the New-York and Virginia elections. "The canal a solitude! The lake a desert waste of waters! That populous city ately resounding with the hum of busy multifudes, now silent and sad! A whole nation, in formed him that an attempt had just been made to get up a distress meeting in the town of St. Louis; but without effect. The officers were obtained, and according to the approved rule of lireful act of one wilful man!" Such, said Mr. B., rere the lamentations over the ruins, not of the ladmor in the desert, but of this America, whose could not be played in that town. The actors would not mount the stage.

Mr. B. spoke of the circulation of the Bank of the United States, and said that its notes might be withdrawn without being felt or known by the community. It contributed but four millions and a quarter to the circulation at this time. He verified this statement by showing that the bank had twelve millions and a quarter of specie in its vaults, and but sixteen millions and a half of notes in circulation. The difference was four millions and a quarter; and that was the precise amount which that gigantic institution now contributed to the circulation of the country! Only four millions and a quarter. If the gold bill passed, and raised gold sixteen to one, there would be more than that amount of gold in circulation in three months. The foreign coin bill, and the gold bill, would give the country many dollars in specie, without interest, for each paper dollar which the bank issues, and for which the country pays so dearly. The dissolution of the bank would turn out twelve millions and a quarter of specie, to circulate among the people; and the sooner that is done the better it will be for the country.

The Bank is now a nuisance, said Mr. B. With upwards of twelve millions in specie, and less than seventeen millions in circulation, and only fifty-two millions of loans, it pretends that it cannot lend a dollar, not even to business men, to be returned in sixty days; when, two years ago, with only six millions of specie and twentytwo millions of circulation, it ran up its loans to seventy millions. The president of the bank then swore, that all above six millions of specie was a surplus! How is it now, with near double as much specie, and five millions less of notes out, and twelve millions less of debt? The bank needs less specie than any other banking institution, because its notes are receivable, by law, in all federal payments; and from that circumstance alone would be current, at par, although the bank itself might be wholly unable to redeem them. Such a bank is a nuisance. It is the dog in the manger. It might lend money to business men, at short dates, to the last day of its existence; yet the signs are for a new pressure; a new game of distress for the fall elections in Pennsylvania, New-York, and Ohio. If that game should be attempted, Mr. B. said, the bank was full of money; without pretext for the deposit farce is over; without the aid of panic speeches, for the Senate will not be in

Mr. B. said, that among the strange events which took place in this world, nothing could be more strange than to find, in our own country, and in the nineteenth century, any practical illustration of the ancient doctrine of the metempsychosis. Stranger still, if that doctrine should be so far improved, as to take effect in soulless bodies; for, according to the founders of the doctrine, the soul alone could transmi. grate. Now, corporations had no souls; that was law, laid down by all the books: that all corporations, moneyed ones especially, and above all, the Bank of the United States, was most soulless. Yet the rumor was, that this bank intended to attempt the operation of effecting a transfer of her soul; and after submitting to death in her present form, to rise up in a new one. Mr. B. said he, for one, should be read; for the old sinner, come in the body of what beast it might. No form should deceive him not even if it condescended, in its new shape, to issue from Wall-street instead of Chestnut! A word more, and Mr. B. was done. It was a word to those gentlemen whose declarations, many ten thousand times issued from this floor. had deluded a hundred thousand people to send memorials here, certifying what those gentlemen so incontinently repeated, that the removal of the deposits had made the distress, and nothing but the restoration of the deposits, or the renewal of the charter, could remove the distress! Well! the deposits are not restored, and the charter is not renewed; and yet the distress is gone! What is the inference? Why that gentlemen are convicted, and condemned, upon their own argument! They leave this chamber top home, self-convicted upon the very test which they themselves have established; and after hav ing declared, for six months, upon this floor, that the removal of the deposits made the dis tress, and nothing but their restoration, or the renewal of the bank charter, could relieve it and that they would sit here until the dog-days and the winter solstice, to effect this restoration or renewal: they now go home in good timefor harvest, without effecting the restoration or the renewal; and find every where, as they go the tt would have to be done withou excuse, for evidences of the highest prosperity which ex

Yes! repeated and exclaimed Mr. B. with great emphasis, the deposits are not restored—the charter is not renewed—the distress is gone—and the distress speeches have reased! No more lamentation over the desolation of the land now; and a gentleman who should undertake to entertain the Senate again in that vein, in the face of the present national prosperity—in the face of the present report from the Secretary of the Treasury—would be stared at, as the Trojans were accustomed to stare at the frantic exhibitions of Priam's distracted daughter, while vaticinating the downfall of Troy in the midst of the heroic exploits of Hector.

At the conclusion of this speech Mr. Webster spoke a few words, signifying that foreigners might have made the importations which kept up the revenue; and Mr. Chambers, of Maryland, spoke more fully, to show that there was not time yet for the distress to work its effect nationally. Mr. Webster then varied his motion, and, instead of sending the Secretary's report to the Finance Committee, moved to lay it upon the table: which was done: and being printed, and passed into the newspapers, with the speech to emblazon it, had a great effect in bringing the panie to a close.

CHAPTER CVIII.

REVIVAL OF THE GOLD CURRENCY.

A MEASURE of relief was now at hand, before which the machinery of distress was to balk, and cease its long and cruel labors: it was the passage of the bill for equalizing the value of gold and silver, and legalizing the tender of foreign coins of both metals. The bills were brought forward in the House by Mr. Campbell P. White of New-York, and passed after an animated contest, in which the chief question was as to the true relative value of the two metals, varied by some into a preference for national bank paper. Fifteen and five-eighths to one was the ratio of nearly all who seemed best calculated, from their pursuits, to understand the subject. The thick array of speakers was on that side; and the eighteen banks of the city of New-York, with Mr. Gallatin at their head, favored that proportion. The difficulty of adjust ing this value, so that neither metal should expel the other, had been the stumbling block for a great many years; and now this difficulty seemed to be as formidable as ever. Refined calculations were gone into: scientific light was sought: history was rummaged back to the times of the Roman empire: and there seemed to be no way of getting to a concord of opinion either from the lights of science, the voice of history, or the result of calculations. The author of this View had (in his speeches on the subject), taken up the question in a practical point of view, regardless of history, and calculations, and the opinions of bank officers; and looking to the actual, and equal, circulation of the two metals in different countries, he saw that this equality and actuality of circulation had existed for above three hundred years in the Spanish dominions of Mexico and South America, where the proportion was 16 to onc. Taking his stand upon this single fact, as the practical test which solved the question, all the real friends of the gold currency soon rallied to it. Mr. White gave up the bill which he had first introduced, and adopted the Spanish ratio. Mr. Clowney of South Carolina, Mr. Gillet and Mr. Cambreleng of New-York, Mr. Ewing of Indiana, Mr. McKim of Maryland, and other speakers, gave it a warm support. Mr. John Quincy Adams would vote for it, though he thought the gold was over-valued; but if found to be so, the difference could be corrected hereafter. The principal speakers against it and in favor of a lower rate, were Messrs. Gorham of Massachusetts; Selden of New-York; Binney of Pennsylvania; and Wilde of Georgia. And, eventually the bill was passed by a large majority-145 to 36. In the Senate it had an easy passage. Mr. Calhoun and Webster supported it: Mr. Clay opposed it: and on the final vote there were but seven negatives: Messrs. Chambers of Maryland; Clay; Knight of Rhode Island; Alexander Porter of Louisiana; Silsbee of Massachusetts; Southard of New Jersey; Sprague of Maine.

The good effects of the bill were immediately seen. Gold began to flew into the country through all the channels of commerce: old chests gave up their hordes: the mint was busy: and in a few months, and as if by magic, a currency banished from the country for thirty years, overspread the land, and gave joy and confidence to all the pursuits of industry. But this joy was not universal. A largo interest connected with the Bank of the United States, and its subsidiary and subaltern institutions, and the whole paper system, vehemently opposed it; and spared neither pains nor expense to check its circulation, and to bring odium upon its supporters People were alarmed with counterfeits. Gilt counters were exhibited in the markets, to alarm the ignorant. The coin itself was burlesqued, in mock imitations of brass or copper, with grotesque figures, and ludicrous inscriptions -the "whole log" and the "better currency," being the favorite devices. Many newspapers expended their daily wit in its stale depreciation. The most exalted of the paper money party, would recoil a step when it was offered to them, and beg for paper. The name of "Gold humbug" was fastened upon the person supposed to have been chiefly instrumental in bringing the derided coin into existence; and he, not to be abashed, made its enlogy a standing theme-vaunting its excellence, boasting its coming abundance, to spread over the land, flow up the Mississippi, shine through the interstices of the long silken purse, and to be locked up safely in the farmer's trusty oaken chest. For a year there was a real war of the paper against gold. But there was something that was an overmatch for the arts, or power, of the paper system in this particular, and which needed no persuasions to guide it when it had its choice: it was the instinctive feeling of the masses! which told them that money which would jingle in the pocket was the right money for them-that hard money was the right money for hard hands-that gold was the true currency for every man that had any thing true to give for it, either in labor or property: and upon these instinctive feelings gold became the avidious demand of the vast operative and producing classes.

CHAPTER CIX.

REJECTION OF MR. TANEY, NOMINATED FOR SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

A PRESENTIMENT of what was to happen induced the President to delay, until near the end of the session, the nomination to the Senate of

Mr. Taney for Secretary of the Treasury. He had offended the Bank of the United States tog much to expect his confirmation in the present temper of the Senate. He had a right to hold back the nomination to the last day of the session, as the recess appointment was valid to its end; and he retained it to the last week, not being willing to lose the able and faithful ser. vices of that gentleman during the actual session of Congress. At last, on the 23d of June. the nomination was sent in, and immediately rejected by the usual majority in all cases in which the bank was concerned. Mr. Taney. the same day resigned his place; and Mr. McClintock Young, first clerk of the treasury, remained by law acting Secretary. Mr. Benjamin Franklin Butler, of New-York, nominated for the place of attorney-general, was confirmed -he having done nothing since he came into the cabinet to subject him to the fate of his predecessor, though fully concurring with the President in all his measures in relation to the

BENATORIAL INVESTIGATION OF THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

This corporation had lost so much ground in the public estimation, by repulsing the investigation attempted by the House of Representatives, that it became necessary to retrieve the loss by some report in its favor. The friends of the institution determined, therefore, to have an investigation made by the Senate-by the Finance Committee of that body. In conformity to this determination Mr. Southard, on the last day of the session moved that that committee should have leave to sit during the recess of the Senate to inquire whether the Bank of the United States had violated its charter-whetherit was a safe depository of the public moneysand what had been its conduct since 1832 in regard to extension and curtailment of loans, and its general management since that time. The committee to whom this investigation was committed, consisted of Messrs. Webster, Tyler Eving, Mangum, and Wilkins. Of this committee all, except the last named, were the opponents of the administration, friends of the

The his investigation was com-Messrs. Webster, Tyler Wilkins. Of this comlast named, were the opinistration, friends of the lank, its zealous advocates in all the questions between it and the government, speaking ardently in its favor, and voting with it on all questions during the session. Mr. Wilkins very properly refused to serve on the committee; and Mr. King of Alabama, being proposed in his place, also, and with equal propriety, refused to serve. This act of the Senate in thus undertaking to examine the bank after a repulse of the committee of the House of Representatives and still standing out in contempt of that House, and by a committee so composed. and so restricted, completed the measure of mortification to all the friends of the American Senate. It was deemed a cruel wound given to itself by the Senate. It was a wrong thing, done in a wrong way, and could have no result but to lessen the dignity and respectability of the Senate. The members of the committee were the advocates of the bank, and its public defenders on all the points to be examined. This was a violation of parliamentary law, as vell as of the first principles of decency and propriety-the whole of which require criminatory investigations to be made, by those who make the accusations. It was to be done in vacation; for which purpose the committee was to sit in the recess-a proceeding without preedent, without warrant from any word in the constitution—and susceptible of the most abuseful and factious use. The only semblance of precedent for it was the committee of the House in 1824, on the memorial of Mr. Ninian Edyards against Mr. Crawford in that year; but that was no warrant for this proceeding. It ras a mere authority to an existing commitce which had gone through its examination, and made its report to the House, to continue ts session after the House adjourned to take he deposition of the principal witness, detained sickness, but on his way to the examination. his deposition the committee were to take, ublish, and he dissolved; and so it was done cordingly. And even this slight continuation a committee was obtained from the House ith difficulty, and under the most urgent cirmstances. Mr. Crawford was a candidate for e presidency; the election was to come on fore Congress met again; Mr. Edwards had de criminal charges against him; all the tesnony had been taken, except that of Mr. Edards himself; and he had notified the committee that he was on his way to appear before them in obedience to their summons. And it was under these circumstances that the existing committee was authorized to remain in session for his arrival-to receive his testimonypublish it-and dissolve. No perambulation through the country-no indefinite session-no putting members upon Congress per diems and mileage from one session to another. Wrongful and abuseful in its creation, this peripatetic committee of the Senate was equally so in its composition and object. It was composed of the advocates of the bank, and its object evidently was to retrieve for that institution a part of the ground which it had lost; and was so viewed by the community. The clear-sighted masses saw nothing in it but a contrivance to varnish the bank, and the odious appellation of "whitewashing committee" was fastened upon it.

CHAPTER CXI.

DOWNFALL OF THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

WHEN the author of the Æneid had shown the opening gradeur of Rome, he deemed himself justified in departing from the chronological order of events to look ahead, and give a glimpse of the dead Marcellus, hope and heir of the Augustan empire; in the like manner the writer of this View, after having shown the greatness of the United States Bank-exemplifled in her capacity to have Jackson condemned -the government directors and a secretary of the treasury rejected-a committee of the House of Representatives repulsed—the country convulsed and agonized—and to obtain from the Senate of the United States a committee to proceed to the city of Philadelphia to "wash out its foul linen;"-after seeing all this and beholding the greatness of the moneyed power at the culminating point of its domination, I feel justified in looking ahead a few years to see it in its altered phase-in its ruined and fallen estate. And this shall be done in the simplest form of exhibition; namely: by copying some announcements from the Philadelphia papers of the day. Thus: 1. "Resolved (by the stockholders), that it is expedient for the Bank of the United States to make a general assignment of the real and personal estate, goods and chattels, rights and credits, whatsoever, and wheresover, of the said corporation, to five persons, for the payment or securing of the debts of the same-agreeably to the provisions of the acts of Assembly of this commonwealth (Pennsylvania)." 2. "It is known that measures have been taken to rescue the property of this shattered institution from impending peril, and to recover as much as possible of those enormous bounties which it was conceded had been paid by its late managers to trading politicians and mercenary publishers for corrupt services, rendered to it during its charter-seeking and electioneering campaigns." "The amount of the suit instituted by the Bank of the United States against Mr. N. Biddle is $1,018,000, paid out during his administration, for which no vouchers can be found." 4. "The United States Bank is a perfect wreck, and is seemingly the prey of the officers and their friends, which are making away with its choicest assets by selling them to each other, and taking pay in the depreciated paper of the South." "Besides its own stock of 35,000,000, which is sunk, the bank carries down with it a great many other institutions and companies, involving a loss of about 21,000,000 more-making a loss of 56,000,000—besides injuries to individuals." 6. "There is no price for the United States Bank stock. Some shares are sold, but as lottery tickets would be. The mass of the stockholders stand, and look on, as passengers on a ship that is going down, and from which there is no escape." 7. "By virtue of a writ of venditioni exponas, directed to the sheriff of the city and county of Philadelphia, will be exposed to public sale to the highest bidder, on Friday, the 4th day of November next, the marble house and the grounds known as the Bank of the United States, &c." 8. "By virtue of a writ of levari facias, to me directed, will be exposed to public sale the estate known as 'Andalusia,' ninety-nine and a half acres, one of the most highly improved places in Philadelphia; the mansion-house, and out-houses and offices, all on the most splendid scale; the green-houses, hothouses, and conservatories, extensive and useful; taken as the property of Nicholas Biddle." 9.

To the honorable Court of General Sessions, Bank of the United States have been brought. The grand jury for the county of Philadelphia, a close. To get rid of the charges against the

respectfully submit to the court, on their oaths and affirmations, that certain officers connected with the United States Bank, have been guilty of a gross violation of the law-colluding together to defraud those stockholders who had trusted their property to be preserved by them. And that there is good ground to warrant prosecution of such persons for criminal offences which the grand jury do now present to the court, and ask that the attorney-general be directed to send up for the action of the grand jury, bills of indictment against Nicholas Biddle. Samuel Jaudon, John Andrews, and others, to the grand jury unknown, for a conspiracy to defraud the stockholders in the Bank of the United States of the sums of, &c." 10. Bills of indictment have been found against Nicholas Biddle, Samuel Jaudon and John Andrews, ac. cording to the presentment of the grand jury; and bench warrants issued, which have been executed upon them." 11. "Examination of Nicholas Biddle, and others, before Recorder Vaux. Yesterday afternoon the crowd and excitement in and about the court-room when the examination was to take place was even greater than the day before. The court-room doors were kept closed up to within a few minutes of four o'clock, the crowd outside blocking up every avenue leading to the room. When the doors were thrown open it was immediately filled to overflowing. At four the Recorder took his seat, and announcing that he was ready to proceed, the defendants were called, and sererally answered to their names, &c." 12, "01 Tuesday, the 18th, the examination of Nichola Biddle and others, was continued, and concluded; and the Recorder ordered, that Nichola Biddle, Thomas Dunlap, John Andrews, Samuel Jaudon, and Joseph Cowperthwaite, each enter into a separate recognizance, with two or more sufficient sureties, in the sum of $10,000, for their appearance at the present session of the court of general sessions for the city and county of Philadelphia, to answer the crime of which they thus stand charged." 13. "Nicholas Biddle and those indicted with him have been carried upon writs of habeas corpus before the Judge Barton, Conrad, and Doran, and discharged from the custody of the sheriff." 14. CHAPTER CXII.

DEATH OF JOHN RANDOLPH, OF ROANOAKE.

Is died at Philadelphia in the summer of 1833 the scene of his early and brilliant apparition on the stage of public life, having commenced is parliamentary career in that eity, under the ist Mr. Adams, when Congress sat there, and then he was barely of an age to be admitted nto the body. For more than thirty years he ras the political meteor of Congress, blazing ith undiminished splendor during the whole me, and often appearing as the "planetary lague" which shed, not war and pestilence on ations, but agony and fear on members. His reasm was keen, refined, withering-with a reat tendency to indulge in it; but, as he beered, as a lawful parliamentary weapon to effect me desirable purpose. Pretension, meanness, ce, demagogism, were the frequent subjects of exercise of his talent; and, when confined to em, he was the benefactor of the House. Wit d genius all allowed him; sagacity was a ality of his mind visible to all observers-and hich gave him an intuitive insight into the ect of measures. During the first six years Mr. Jefferson's administration, he was the furat" of his party, brilliant in the charge, d always ready for it; and valued in the ncil, as well as in the field. He was long chairman of the Committee of Ways and ans—a place always of labor and responsity, and of more then than now, when the ments of revenue were less abundant; and man could have been placed in that situation ing Mr. Jefferson's time whose known sagacity was not a pledge for the safety of his lead in the most sudden and critical circumstances. He was one of those whom that eminent statesman habitually consulted during the period of their friendship, and to whom he carefully communicated his plans before they were given to the public. On his arrival at Washington at the opening of each session of Congress during this period, he regularly found waiting for him at his established lodgings-then Crawford's. Georgetown-the card of Mr. Jefferson, with an invitation for dinner the next day; a dinner at which the leading measures of the ensuing session were the principal topic. Mr. Jefferson did not treat in that way a member in whose sagacity he had not confidence.

It is not just to judge such a man by ordinary rules, nor by detached and separate incidents in his life. To comprehend him, he must be judged as a whole-physically and mentally-and under many aspects, and for his entire life. He was never well-a chronic victim of ill health from the eradle to the grave. A letter from his most intimate and valued friend, Mr. Macon, written to me after his death, expressed the belief that he had never enjoyed during his life one day of perfect health-such as well people enjoy. Such life-long suffering must have its effect on the temper and on the mind; and it had on his-bringing the temper often to the querulous mood, and the state of his mind sometimes to the question of insanity; a question which became judicial after his death, when the validity of his will came to be contested. I had my opinion on the point, and gave it responsibly, in a deposition duly taken, to be read on the trial of the will; and in which a belief in his insanity, at several specified periods, was fully expressed—with the reasons for the opinion. I had good opportunities of forming an opinion, living in the same house with him several years, having his confidence, and sceing him at all hours of the day and night. It also on several occasions became my duty to study the question, with a view to govern my own conduct under critical circumstances. Twice he applied to me to carry challenges for him. It would have been inhuman to have gone out with a man not in his right mind, and critical to one's self, as any accident on the ground might seriously compromise the second. My opinion was fixed, of occasional temporary aberrations of mind; and during such periods he would do and say strange things-but always in his own way-not only method, but genius in his fantasies: nothing to bespeak a bad heart, but only craltation and excitement. The most brilliant talk that I ever heard from him came forth on such occasionsn flow for hours (at one time seven hours), of copious wit and classic allusion --- perfect seattering of the diamonds of the mind. I heard a friend remark on one of these occasions, " he has wasted intellectual lewelry enough here this evening to equip many speakers for great orations." I once sounded him on the delicate point of his own opinion of himself:-of course when he was in a perfectly natural state, and when he had said something to permit an approach to such a subject. It was during his last visit to Washington, two winters before he died. It was in my room, in the gloom of the evening light, as the day was going out and the lamps not lit-no one present but ourselves-he reclining on a sofa, silent and thoughtful, speaking but seldom, and I only in reply, I heard him repeat, as if to himself, those lines from Johnson, (which in fact I had often heard from him before), on "Senility and Imbecility," which show us life under its most melancholy form.

"In life's hast scenes what prodigies surprise, Fears of the brave, and follow of the wise! From Mariborough's eyes the streams of dotage flow, And Switt expires, a driveller and a show,"

When he had thus repeated these lines, which he did with deep feeling, and in slow and measured cadence, I deemed it excusable to make a remark of a kind which I had never ventured on before; and said: Mr. Randolph I have several times heard you repeat these lines, as if they could have an application to yourself, while no person can have less reason to fear the fate of Swift. I said this to sound him, and to see what he thought of himself. His answer was: "I have lived in execut of insanity." That answer was the opening of a scaled book-revealed to me the source of much mental agony that I had seen him undergo. I did deem him in danger of the fate of Swift, and from the same cause as judged by his latest and greatest biographer, Sir Walter Scott.

His parliamentary life was resplendent in talent—clevated in moral tone—always moving on the lofty line of honor and patriotism, and scorning every thing mean and selfish. He was the indignant enemy of personal and plund; legislation, and the very scourge of intrigue and corruption. He reverenced an honest manin the humblest garb, and scorned the dishogest though plated with gold. An opinion was tire pagated that he was fickle in his friendships Certainly there were some capricious change, but far more instances of steadfast adherence. His friendship with Mr. Macon was historic Their names went together in life - live together in death-and are honored together, most be those who knew them best. With Mr. Taze well, his friendship was still longer than that with Mr. Macon, commencing in boyhood, and only ending with life. So of many others; and pre-eminently so of his neighbors and constituents-the people of his congressional districtaffectionate as well as faithful to him; election him as they did, from boyhood to the grave No one felt more for frience, or was more solcitous and anxious at the side of the sick and dying bed. Love of wine was attributed to him; and what was mental excitement, was me ferred to deep potations. It was a great error I never saw him affected by wine-not even to the slightest departure from the habitual and scrupulous decorum of his manners. His tenper was naturally gay and social, and so is dulged when suffering of mind and body per mitted. He was the charm of the dinner-table where his cheerful and sparkling wit delighted every ear, lit up every countenance, and detaine every guest. He was charitable; but chos to conceal the hand that ministered relief ! have often seen him send little children out give to the poor.

He was one of the large slaveholders of 7s ginia, but disliked the institution, and what let alone, opposed its extension. Thus, in 18s when as chairman of the committee which a ported upon the Indiana memorial for a temperary dispensation from the anti-slavery part the ordinance of 1787, he puts the queen upon a statesman's ground; and reports again it, in a brief and comprehensive argument:

But he was against foreign imreference with his rights, his feelings, or his uties; and never failed to resent and rebuke ch interference. Thus, he was one of the ost zealous of the opposers of the proposed lissouri restriction; and even voted against the visional line of "thirty-six thirty." In the louse, when the term "slaveholder" would be proachfully used, he would assume it, and retos member, not in the parliamentary phrase colleague, but in the complimentary title of ny fellow-slaveholder." And, in London, when consignees of his tobacco, and the slave facs of his father, urged him to liberate his wes, he quieted their intrusive philanthropy, the spot, by saying, "Yes: you buy and set to the amount of the money you have receivfrom my father and his estate for these slaves, I will set free an equal number."

In his youth and later age, he fought duels: his middle life, he was against them; and, a while, would neither give nor receive a llenge. He was under religious convictions the contrary, but finally yielded (as he beed) to an argument of his own, that a duel private war, and rested upon the same s as public war; and that both were allowwhen there was no other redress for inand injuries. That was his argument; thought his relapse came more from feelthan reason; and especially from the death lecatur, to whom he was greatly attached, whose duel with Barron long and greatly ted him. He had religious impressions, and n of piety which showed itself more in prithan in external observances. He was hal in his reverential regard for the divinity r religion; and one of his beautiful expreswas, that, "If woman had lost us parashe had gained us heaven." The Bible and Shakespeare were, in his latter years, his constant companions-travelling with him on the road-remaining with him in the chamber The last time I saw him (in that last visit to Washington, after his return from the Russian mission, and when he was in full view of death) I heard him read the chapter in the Revelations (of the opening of the seals), with such power and beauty of voice and delivery, and such depth of pathos, that I felt as if I had never heard the chapter read before. When he had got to the end of the seal, he stopped the readless, laid the book (open at the place) on his breast, as he lay on his bed, and began a discourse upon the beauty and sublimity of the Scriptura writings, compared to which he considered all 1 aman compositions vain and empty. Go g over the images presented by the opening of the seals, he averred that their divinity was in their sublimity—that no human power could take to same images, and inspire the same awe nd ror, and sink ourselves into such noth the presence of the "wrath of the La '-that he wanted no proof of their divine in but the sublime feelings which they inspire

CHAPTER CILL.

DEATH OF MR. WRET.

HE died at the age of sixty-two, after having reached a place in the first line at the Virginia bar, where there were such lawye as Wickham, Tazewell, Watkins Leigh; and a place in the front rank of the bar of the Supreme Court, where there were such jurists as Webster and Pinkuey; and after having attained the high honor of professional preferment in the appointment of Attorney General of the United States under the administration of Mr. Monroe. His life contains instructive lessons. Born to no advantages of wealth or position, he raised himself to what he became by his own exertions. In danger of falling into a fatul habit in early life, he retrieved himself (touched by the noble generosity of her who afterwards became his admired and beloved wife), from the brink of the abyss, and became the model of every domestic virtue: with genius to shine without labor, he yet considered genius nothing without labor, and gave through life a laborious application to the study of the law as a science, and to each particular case in which he was ever employed. The elegant pursuits of literature occupied the moments taken from professional studies and labors, and gave to the reading publie several admired productions, of which the long-desired and beautiful "Life of Patrick Henry," was the most considerable: a grateful commemoration of Virginia's greatest orator, which has been justly repaid to one of her first class orators, by Mr. Kennedy of Maryland, in his classic "Life of William Wirt." How grateful to see citizens, thus engaged in laborious professions, snatching moments from their daily labors to do justice to the illustrious dead-to enlighten posterity by their history, and encourage it by their example. Worthy of his political and literary eminence, and its most shining and crowning ornament, was the state of his domestic relations-exemplary in every thing that gives joy and decorum to the private family, and rewarded with every blessing which could result from such relations. But, why use this feeble pen, when the voice of Webster is at hand? Mr. Wirt died during the term of the Supreme Court, his revered friend, the Chief Justice Marshall, still living to preside, and to give, in touching language, the order to spread the proceedings of the bar (in relation to his death) upon the records of the court. At the bar meeting, which adopted these proceedings, Mr. Webster thus paid the tribute of justice and affection to one with whom professional rivalry had been the source and cement of personal friendship:

"It is announced to us that one of the oldest, one of the ablest, one of the most distinguished members of this bar, has departed this mortal life. William Wirt is no more! He has this day closed a professional career, among the longest and the most brilliant, which the distinguished members of the profession in the United States have at any time accomplished. Unsullied in every thing which regards professional honor and integrity, patient of labor, and rich in those stores of learning, which are the reward of patient labor and patient labor only; and if equalled, vet certainly allowed not to be excelled, in fervent, animated and persuasive eloquence, he has left an example which those who seek to raise themselves to great heights of professional emisence, will, hereafter emulously study. Fortunate, indeed, will be the few, who shall imit it successfully!

COMMENCEMENT OF THE SESSION 1834—'85; PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Towards the close of the previous session, Mr. Stevenson had resigned the place of speaker of the House of Representatives in consequence of his nomination to be minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to the court of St. James -a nomination then rejected by the Senate, but subsequently confirmed. Mr. John Bell of Tennessee, was elected speaker in his place, his principal competitor being Mr. James K. Polk of the same State: and, with this difference in its organization, the House met at the usual time-the first Monday of December. The Cabinet then stood: John Forsyth, Secretary of State, in place of Louis McLane, resigned; Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury; Lewis Cass, Secretary at War; Mahlon Dickerson, Secretary of the Navy; William T. Barry, Post Master General; Benjamin Franklin Butler, Attorney General. The condition of our affairs with France, was the prominent feature of the message, and presented the relations of the United States with that power under a serious aspect. The indemnity stipulated in the treaty of 1831 had not been paid-no one of the instalments; -and the President laid the subject before Congress for its consideration, and action, if deemed

"I regret to say that the pledges made through the minister of France have not been redeemed. The new Chambers met on the 31st July last, and although the subject of fulfilling treaties was alluded to in the speech from the throne, no attempt was made by the King or his Cabinet to procure an appropriation to earry it into execution. The reasons given for this omission, although they might be considered sufficient in an ordinary case, are not consistent with the expectations founded upon the assurances given here, for there is no constitutional obstacle to entering into legislative business at the first meeting of the Chambers. This point, however, might have been overlooked, had not the Chambers, instead of being called to meet at so early a day that the result of their deliberations might be communicated to me before the meeting of Congress, been prorogued to the 29th of the present month-a period so late that their decision can scarcely be made known to the present Congress prior to its dissolution. To avoid this delay, our minister in Paris, in virtue of the assurance given by the French minister in the United States, strongly urged the convocation of the Chambers at an earlier day, but without success. It is proper to remark, however, that this refusal has been accompanied with the most positive assurances, on the part of the Executive government of France, of their intention to press the appropriation at the ensuing session of the Chambers.

"If it shall be the pleasure of Congress to await the further action of the French Chambers, no further consideration of the subject will, at this session, probably be required at your hands. But if, from the original delay in asking for an appropriation; from the refusal of the Chambers to grant it when asked; from the omission to bring the subject before the Chambers at their last session; from the fact that, including that session, there have been five different occasions when the appropriation might have been made; and from the delay in convoking the Chambers until some weeks after the meeting of Congress, when it was well known that a communication of the whole subject to Congress at the last session was prevented by assurances that it should be disposed of before its present meeting, you should feel yourselves constrained to doubt whether it be the intention of the French government in all its branches to carry the treaty into effect, and think that such measures as the occasion may be deemed to call for should be now adopted, the important question arises, what those measures shall be."

The question then, of further delay, waiting on the action of France, or of action on our own part, was thus referred to Congress; but under the constitutional injunction, to recommend to that body the measures he should deem necessary, and in compliance with his own sense of duty, and according to the frankness of his temper, he fully and categorically gave his own opinion of what ought to be done; thus:

"It is my conviction that the United States ought to insist on a prompt execution of the treaty; and, in case it be refused, or longer delayed, take redress into their own hands. After the delay, on the part of France, of a quarter of a century, in acknowledging these claims by treaty, it is not to be tolerated that another quarter of a century is to be wasted in negotiating about the payment. The laws of nation provide a remedy for such occasions. It is a well-settled principle of the international coal that where one nation owes another a liquidated debt, which it refuses or neglects to pay the aggrieved party may seize on the property to longing to the other, its citizens or subject sufficient to pay the debt, without giving just cause of war. This remedy has been repeated resorted to, and recently by France herself towards Portugal, under circumstances less unquestionable."

"Since France, in violation of the pleim given through her minister here, has delaye her final action so long that her decision not probably be known in time to be commun cated to this Congress, I recommend that also be passed authorizing reprisals upon Fread property, in case provision shall not be made in the payment of the debt at the approachin session of the French Chambers. That Government, by a ing only what it has itself acknowledged to just, will be able to spare the United States the necessity of taking redress into their own hand and save the property of French citizens for that seizure and sequestration which America citizens so long endured without retaliation redress. In making this recommendation, and in lost ing to its possible result as producing was at tween the two countries, the President show himself fully sensible to all the considerate which should make such an event deploral between powers of ancient friendship, and the harmony and friendship desirable for the at of the progress and maintenance of liberal litical systems in Europe. This state of our relations with France gave rise to some animated proceedings in our Congress, which will be noticed in their proper place. The condition of the finances was shown to be good-not only adequate for al! the purposes of the government and the complete extinguishment of the remainder of the public debt, but still leaving a balance in the treasury equal to one fourth of the annual income at the end of the year. Thus:

"According to the estimate of the Treasury Department, the revenue accruing from all sources, during the present year, will amount to thousand seven hundred and seventeen dollars, which with the balance remaining in the Treasury on the first of January last, of eleven milions seven hundred and two thousand nine hundred and five dollars, produces an aggregate of thirty-two millions three hundred and twentyseven thousand six hundred and twenty-three dollars. The total expenditure during the year or all objects, including the public debt, is estimated at twenty-five millions five hundred and nnety-one thousand three hundred and ninety dollars, which will leave a balance in the Treaury on the first of January, 1835, of six milions seven hundred and thirty-six thousand wo hundred and thirty-two dollars. In this palance, however, will be included about one nillion one hundred and fifty thousand dollars f what was heretofore reported by the departnent as not effective."

This unavailable item of above a million of ollars consisted of local bank notes, received payment of public lands during the years of eneral distress and bank suspensions from 1819 1822; and the banks which issued them havg failed they became worthless; and were nally dropt from any enumeration of the connts of the treasury. The extinction of the ublic debt, constituting a marked event in our nancial history, and an era in the state of the easury, was looked to by the President as the och most proper for the settlement of our pubtful points of future policy, and the inguration of a system of rigorous economy: to hich effect the message said:

"Free from public debt, at peace with all the orld, and with no complicated interests to con-

clearly in the wrong, the march of liberal prin- tory the most favorable for the settlement of ciples shall be impeded, the responsibility for those principles in our domestic policy, which that result, as well as every other, will rest on shall be best calculated to give stability to our republic, and secure the blessings of freedom to our citizens. While we are felicitating ourselves, therefore, upon the extinguishment of the national debt, and the prosperous state of our finances, let us not be tempted to depart from those sounds maxims of public policy, which enjoin a just adaptation of the revenue to the expenditures that are consistent with a rigid economy, and an entire abstinence from all topics of legislation that are not clearly within the constitutional powers of the Government, and suggested by the wants of the country. Properly regarded, under such a policy, every diminution of the public burdens arising from taxation, gives to individual enterprise increased power, and furnishes to all the members of our happy confederacy, new motives for patriotic affection sources, during the present year, will amount to and support. But, above all, its most important twenty millions six hundred and twenty-four effect will be found in its influence upon the character of the Government, by confining its action to those objects which will be sure to secure to it the attachment and support of our fellowcitizens."

> The President had a new cause of complaint to communicate against the Bank of the United States, which was the seizure of the dividends due the United States on the public stock in the institution. The occasion was, the claim for damages which the bank set up on a protested bill of exchange, sold to it on the faith of the French treaty; and which was protested for non-payment. The case is thus told by the President:

"To the needless distresses brought on the country during the last session of Congress, has since been added the open seizure of the dividends on the public stock, to the amount of $170,041, under pretence of paying damages, cost, and interest, upon the protested French bill. This sum constituted a portion of the estimated revenues for the year 1834, upon which the appropriations made by Congress were based. It would as soon have been expected that our collectors would seize on the customs, or the receivers of our land offices on the moneys arising from the sale of public lands, under pretences of claims against the United States, as that the bank would have retained the dividends. Indeed, if the principle be established that any one who chooses to set up a claim against the United States may, without authority of law, seize on the public property or money wherever he can find it, to pay such claim, there will remain no assurance that our revenue will reach the treasury, or that it will be applied after the appropriation to the pur-It in our intercourse with foreign powers, the poses designated in the law. The paymasters sent may be hailed as the epoch in our hisunder like pretences, apply to their own use moneys appropriated to set in motion the public force, and in time of war leave the country without defence. This measure, resorted to by the Bank, is disorganizing and revolutionary, and, if generally resorted to by private citizens in like cases, would fill the land with anarchy and violence."

The money thus seized by the bank was retained until recovered from it by due course of law. The corporation was sued, judgment recovered against it, and the money made upon a writ of execution; so that the illegality of its conduct in making this seizure was judicially established. The President also communicated new proofs of the wantonness of the pressure and distress made by the bank during the preceding session-the fact coming to light that it had shipped about three millions and a half of the specie to Europe which it had squeezed out of the hands of the people during the panic;and also that, immediately after the adjournment of Congress, the action of the bank was reversed-the curtailment changed into extension; and a discount line of seventeen millions rapidly ran out.

"Immediately after the close of the last session, the bank, through its president, announced its ability and readiness to abandon the system of unparalleled curtailment, and the interruption of domestic exchanges, which it had practised upon from the 1st of August, 1833, to the 30th of June, 1834, and to extend its accommodations to the community. The grounds assumed in this annunciation amounted to an acknowledgment that the curtailment, in the extent to which it had been carried, was not necessary to the safety of the bank, and had been persisted in merely to induce Congress to grant the prayer of the bank in its memorial relative to the removal of the deposits, and to give it a new charter. They were substantially a confession that all the real distresses which individuals and the country had endured for the preceding six or eight months, had been needlessly produced by it, with the view of effecting, through the sufferings of the people, the legislative action of Congress. It is a subject of congratulation that Congress and the country had the virtue and firmness to bear the infliction; that the energies of our people soon found relief from this wanton tyranny, in vast importations of the precious metals from almost every part of the world; and that, at the close of this tremendous effort to control our government, the bank found itself powerless, and no longer able to loan out its surplus means. The community had learned to manage its affairs without its assistance, and trade had already found new auxiliaries; so that, on the 1st of October last the extraordinary spectacle was presented of a national bank, more than one half of whose capital was either lying unproductive in vaults, or in the hands of foreign bankers.

Certainly this was a confession of the whole criminality of the bank in making the distress: but even this confession did not prevent the Senate's Finance Committee from making an honorable report in its favor. But there is something in the laws of moral right above the powers of man, or the designs and plans a banks and politicians. The greatest calamit of the bank-the loss of thirty-five millions of stock to its subscribers-chiefly dates from the period and this conduct. Up to this time in waste and losses, though great, might still have been remediable; but now the incurable course was taken. Half its capital lying idle! Good borrowers were scarce; good indorsers still more so; and a general acceptance of stocks in lieu of the usual security was the fatal resort. First, it own stock, then a great variety of stocks were taken; and when the bank went into liquidation, its own stock was gone! and the others in every imaginable degree of depreciation, from under par to nothing. The government had directors in the bank at that time, Messrs. Charles McAllister, Edward D. Ingraham, and — Elmaker; and the President was under no mistake in any thing he said. The message recurs to the fixed policy of the President in selling the public stock in the bank, and says:

"I feel it my duty to recommend to you the a law be passed authorizing the sale of the pulie stock; that the provision of the charter, quiring the receipt of notes of the bank in pament of public dues, shall, in accordance with the power reserved to Congress in the less section of the charter, be suspended until the bank pays to the treasury the dividends with held; and that all laws connecting the government or its officers with the bank, directly a indirectly, be repealed; and that the institution be left hereafter to its own resources at means."

The wisdom of this persevering recommendation was, fortunately, appreciated in times save the United States from the fate of the stockholders. The attention of Congress was again called to the regulation of the deposits State banks. As yet there was no law upon the subject. It was the custody, more or less resorted to, ander every administration of the federal govemment, and never called illegal except under President Jackson; but it was a trust of a kind to require regulation by law; and he, therefore, cornestly recommended it. The message said:

"The attention of Congress is earnestly inrited to the regulation of the deposits in the State banks, by law. Although the power now exercised by the Executive department in this behalf is only such as was uniformly exerted through every administration from the origin of the government up to the establishment of the present bank, yet it is one which is susceptible of regulation by law, and, therefore, ought so to be regulated. The power of Congress to direct in what places the Treasurer shall keep the moneys in the Treasury, and to impose restricions upon the Executive authority, in relation their custody and removal, is unlimited, and sexercise will rather be courted than discourged by those public officers and agents on whom ests the responsibility for their safety. The increase of the gold currency was a subject congratulation, and the purification of paper the suppression of small notes a matter of mest recommendation with the President-the ter addressed to the people of the States, and ry way worthy of their adoption. He said:

The progress of our gold coinage is creditato the officers of the mint, and promises in a rt period to furnish the country with a and and portable currency, which will much inish the inconvenience to travellers of the nt of a general paper currency, should the te banks be incapable of furnishing it. The message contained the standing recommendation for reform in the presidential election. The direct vote of the people, the President considered the only safeguard for the purity of that election, on which depended so much of the safe working of the government. The message

"I trust that I may be also pardoned for renewing the recommendation I have so often submitted to your attention in regard to the mode of electing the President and Vice-President of the United States. All the reflection I have been able to bestow upon the subject, increases my conviction that the best interests of the country will be promoted by the adoption of some plan which will secure, in all contingencies, that important right of sovereignty to the direct control of the people. Could this be attained, and the terms of those officers be limited to a single period of either four or six years, I think our liberties would possess an additional safe-

CHAPTER CXVI.

REPORT OF THE BANK COMMITTEE,

EARLY in the session the Finance Committee of the Senate, which had been directed to make an examination into the affairs of the Bank of the United States, made their report—an elaborate paper, the reading of which occupied two hours and a half,—for this report was honored with a reading at the Secretary's table, while but few of the reports made by heads of departments, and relating to the affairs of the whole Union, received that honor. It was not only read through, but by its author-Mr. Tyler, the second named of the committee; the first named, or official chairman, Mr. Webster, not having acted on the committee. The report was a most elaborate vindication of the conduct of the bank at all points; but it did not stop at the defence of the institution, but went forward to the crimination of others. It dragged in the names of General Jackson, Mr. Van Buren, and Mr. Benton, laying hold of the circumstance of their comptly and as cheaply as they have here- | having done ordinary acts of duty to their friends and constituents in promoting their application for branch banks, to raise false implications against them as having been in favor of the institution. If such had been the fact, it did not come within the scope of the committee's appointment, nor of the resolution under which they acted, to have reported upon such a circumstance: but the implications were untrue: and Mr. Benton being the only one present that had the right of speech, assailed the report the instant it was read-declaring that such things were not to pass uncontradicted for an instant -that the Schate was not to adjourn, or the galleries to disperse without hearing the contradiction. And being thus suddenly called up by a sense of duty to himself and his friends, he would do justice upon the report at once, exposing its numerous fallacies from the moment they appeared in the chamber. He commenced with the imputations upon himself, General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, and scornfully repulsed the hase and gratuitous assumptions which had been made. He said:

"His own name was made to figure in that report-in very good company to be sure, that of President Jackson, Vice-President Van Buren and Mr. senator Grundy. It seems that we have all been detected in something that deserves exposure-in the offence of aiding our respective constituents, or fellow-citizens in obtaining branch banks to be located in our respective States; and upon this detection, the assertion is made that these branches were not extended to these States for political effect, when the charter was nearly run out, but in good faith, and upon our application, to aid the business of the country. Mr. B. said, it was true that he had forwarded a petition from the merchants of St. Louis, about 1826 or '27, soliciting a branch at that place: and he had accompanied it by a letter, as he had been requested to do, sustaining and supporting their request; and bearing the testimony to their characters as men of business and property which the occasion and the truth required. He did this for merchants who were his political enemies, and he did it readily and cordially, as a representative ought to act for his constituents, whether they are for him, or against him, in the elections. So far so good; but the allegation of the report is, that the branch at St. Louis was established upon this petition and this letter, and therefore was not established with political views, but purely and simply for business purposes. Now, said Mr. B. I have a question to put to the sonator from Virginia (Mr. Tyler), who has made the report for the committee: It is this: whether the president or directors of the bank had informed him that General Cadwallader had been sent as an every form; its directors traversing the report upon its ability to sustain a branch?

"Mr. Tyler rose, and said, that he had heard nothing at the bank upon the subject of Gen, Cadwallader having been sent to St. Louis, or any report upon the place being made."

"Then, said Mr. Benton, resuming his speech the committee has been treated unworthily,scurvily,-basely,-by the bank! It has been made the instrument to report an untruth to the Senate, and to the American people; and neither the Senate, nor that part of the American people who chance to be in this chamber. shall be permitted to leave their places until that falsehood is exposed.

"Sir, said Mr B., addressing the Vice-President, the president, and directors of the Bank of the United States, upon receiving the merchants' petition, and my letter, did not send a branch to St. Louis! They sent an agent there, in the person of General Cadwallader, to examine the place, and to report upon its mercantile capabil. ities and wants; and upon that report, the decision was made, and made against the request of the merchants, and that upon the ground that the business of the place would not justife the establishment of a branch. The petition from the merchants came to Mr. B. while he was here, in his seat; it was forwarded from this place to Philadelphia; the agent made his visit to St. Louis before he (Mr. B.) returned; and when he got home, in the spring, or summer, the merchants informed him of what he occurred; and that they had received a letter from the directory of the bank, informing them that a branch could not be granted; and therethe whole affair, so far as the petition and the letter were concerned, died away. But, said Mr. R. it happened just in that time, that I made my first demonstration-struck my first blowagainst the bank; and the next news that I be from the merchants was, that another letter ha been received from the bank, without any ner petition having been sent, and without any new report upon the business of the place, informing them that the branch was to come! And come it did, and immediately went to work to gu men and presses, to govern the politics of the State, to exclude him (Mr. B.) from re-election to the Senate; and to oppose every candida from governor to constable, who was not in the bank. The branch had even furrished list to the mother bank, through some of in officers, of the names and residences of them tive citizens in every part of the State; and a these, and to their great astonishment at the familiarity and condescension of the high & rectory in Philadelphia, myriads of bank don ments were sent, with a minute description name and place, postage free. At the production of 1832, the State was delagated with these favors. At his own re-elections the Senate, the two last, the branch bank w in the field against him every where, and going to the houses of the members of the General Assembly after they were elected, in almost every county, over a State of sixty thousand square miles; and then attending the egislature as lobby members, to oppose him. of these things Mr. B. had never spoken in public before, nor should he have done it now, had it not been for the falsehood attempted to be palmed upon the Senate through the instrumentality of its committee. But having been driven into it, he would mention another circomstance, which also, he had never named in public before, but which would throw light upon the establishment of the branch in St. Louis, and the kind of business which it had to perform. An immense edition of a review of his speech on the veto message, was circulated through his State on the eve of his last election. It bore the impress of the bank foundry in Philadelphia, and was intended to let the people of Missouri see that he (Mr. B.) was a very un-it person to represent them: and afterwards it was seen from the report of the government directors to the President of the United States, that seventy-five thousand copies of that review were paid for by the Bank of the United States!"

The committee had gone out of their waydeparted from the business with which they were charged by the Senate's resolution-to bring up a stale imputation upon Gen. Jackson, for becoming inimical to Mr. Biddle, because he could not make him subscrvient to his purposes. The imputation was unfounded and gratuitous, and disproved by the journals of the Senate, which bore Gen. Jackson's nomination of Mr. Biddle for government director—and at the head those directors, thereby indicating him for resident of the bank—three several times, in as nany successive years, after the time alleged for his hostility and vindictiveness. This unjusifiable imputation became the immediate, the ext point of Mr. Benton's animadversion; and as thus disposed of:

"Mr. B. said there was another thing which ust be noticed now, because the proof to conund it was written in our own journals. He luded to the 'hostility' of the President of c United States to the bank, which made so rge a figure in that report. The 'vindictivess' of the President,-the 'hostility' of the resident, was often pressed into the service of at report—which he must be permitted to alify as an elaborate defence of the bank. hether used originally, or by quotation, it s the same thing. The quotation from Mr. nane was made to help out the argument of committee-to sustain their position-and ereby became their own. The 'vindictives' of the President towards the bank, is brought forward with imposing gravity by the committee; and no one is at a loss to under-stand what is meant! The charge has been made too often not to suggest the whole story as often as it is hinted. The President became hostile to Mr. Biddle, according to this tine story, because he could not manage him! because he could not make him use the institution for political purposes! and hence his revenge, his vindictiveness, his hatred of Mr. Biddle, and his change of sentiment towards the institution. This is the charge which has run through the bank presses for three years, and is alleged to take date from 1829, when an application was made to change the president of the Portsmouth branch. But how stands the truth, recorded upon our own journals? It stands thus: that for three consecutive years after the harboring of this deadly malice against Mr. Biddle, for not managing the institution to suit the President's political wishes—for three years, one after another, with this 'vindictive' hate in his bosom, and this diabolical determination to ruin the institution, he nominates this same Mr. Biddle to the Senate, as one of the government directors, and at the head of those directors! Mr. Biddle and some of his friends with him came in, upon every nomination for three successive years, after vengeance had been sworn against him! For three years afterwards he is not only named a director, but indicated for the presidency of the bank, by being put at the head of those who came recommended by the nomination of the President, and the sanction of the Senate! Thus was he nominated for the years 1830, 1831, and 1832; and it was only after the report of Mr. Clayton's committee of 1832 that the President ceased to nominate Mr. Biddle for government director! Such was the frank, confiding and friendly conduct of the President; while Mr. Biddle, conscious that he did not deserve a nomination at his hands, had himself also elected during each of these years, at the head of the stockholders' ticket. He knew what he was meditating and hatching against the President, though the President did not! What then becomes of the charge faintly shadowed forth by the committee, and publicly and directly made by the bank and its friends? False! False as hell! and no senator can say it without finding the proof of the falsehood recorded in our own journal!"

Mr. Benon next defended Mr. Taney from an unjustifiable and gratuitous assault made upon him by the committee—the more unwarrantable because that gentleman was in retirement—no more in public life—having resigned his place of Secretary of the Treasury the day he was rejected by the Senate. Mr. Taney, in his report upon the removal of the deposits, had repeated, what the government directors and a committee of the House of Representatives had committee of exchange, in making loans. The fact was true, and as since shown, to a far higher degree than then detected; and the Senate's committee were unjustifiable in defending it. But not satisfied with this defence of a criminal institution against a just accusation, they took the opportunity of casting censure upon Mr. Taney, and gaining a victory over him by making a false issue. Mr. Benton immediately corrected this injustice. He said:

"That he was not now going into a general answer to the report, but he must do justice to an abse: * gentleman-one of the purest men upon earth, both in public and private life, and who, after the manner he had been treated in this chamber, ought to be secure, in his retirement, from senatorial attack and injustice. The committee have joined a conspicuous issue with Mr. Taney; and they have carried a glorious bank victory over him, by turning off the trial upon a false point. Mr. Taney arraigned the legality of the conduct of the exchange committee, which, overleaping the business of such a committee, which is to buy and sell real bills of exchange, had become invested with the power of the whole board; transacting that business which, by the charter, could only be done by the board of directors, and by a board of not less than seven, and which they could not delegate. Yet this committee, of three, selected by the President himself, was shown by the report of the government directors to transact the most important business; such as making immense loans, upon long eredits, and upon questionable security; sometimes covering its operations under the simulated garb, and falsified pretext, of buying a bill of exchange; sometimes using no disguise at all. It was shown, by the same report, to have the exclusive charge of conducting the curtailment last winter; a business of the most important character to the country, having no manner of affinity to the proper functions of an exchange committee; and which they conducted in the most partial and iniquitous manner; and without even reporting to the board. All this the government directors communicated. All this was commented upon on this floor; yet Mr. Taney is selected! He is the one pitched upon; as if nobody but him had arraigned the illegal acts of this committee; and then he is made to arraign the existence of the committee, and not its misconduct! Is this right? Is it fair? Is it just thus to pursue that gentleman, and to pursue him unjustly? Can the vengeance of the bank never be appeased while he lives and moves on earth?"

After having vindicated the President, the Vice-President, Mr. Grundy, Mr. Taney, and first reported, of the illegal conduct of the bank | himself, from the unfounded imputations of the committee, so gratuitously presented, so unwarranted in fact, and so foreign to the purpose for which they were appointed, Mr. Benton laid hold of some facts which had come to light for the purpose of showing the misconduct of the bank, and to invalidate the committee's report. The first was the iransportation of species to London while pressing it out of the community here. He said:

"He had performed a duty, which ought not to be delayed an hour, in defending himself, the President, and Mr. Taney, from the sad injustice of that report; the report itself, with all its elaborate pleadings for the bank,-its errors of omission and commission,-would come up for argument after it was printed; and when, with God's blessing, and the help of better hands he would hope to show that it was the duty of the Senate to recommit it, with instructions to examine witnesses upon oath, and to bring out that secret history of the institution, which seems to have been a scaled book to the committee. For the present, he would bring to light two facts, detected in the intricate mazes of the monthly statements, which would fix at once, both the character of the bank and the character of the report; the bank, for its audacity, wickedness and falsehood; the report for its blindness, fatuity, and partiality.

"The bank, as all America knows (said Mr. B.), filled the whole country with the endless cry which had been echoed and re-cchoed from this chamber, that the removal of the deposits had laid her under the necessity of curtailine her debts; had compelled her to-call in her loans to fill the vacuum in her coffers produced by this removal; and thus to enable herself to stand the pressure which the 'hostility' of the government was bringing upon her. This was the assertion for six long months; and now ke facts confront this assertion, and reveal the truth to an outraged and insulted community

"The first fact (said Mr. B.), is the transfer of the moneys to London, to lie there idle, while squeezed out of the people here during the pane and pressure.

"The cry of distress was raised in December at the meeting of Congress; and during the month the sum of $129,764 was transferred to the bank to its agents, the Barings. This of waxed stronger till July, and until that the the monthly transfers were:

Making the sum of near three millions and a half transferred to London, to lie idle in the hands of an agent, while that very money was squeezed out of a few cities here; and the whole country, and the halls of Congress, with the deafening din of the cry, that .. o bank was forced to curtail, to supply the loss in her own collers from the removal of the deposits! And, worse yet! The bank had, in the hands of the same agents, a large sum when the transfers of these panic collections began; making in the whole, the sum of $4,261,201, on the first day of July last, which was lying idle in her agents' hands in London, drawing little or no interest there, while squeezed out of the hands of those who were paying bank interest here, near seven per cent.; and had afterwards to go into brokers' hands to borrow at one or two per cent. a month. Even now, at the last returns on the first day of this month, about two millions and a half of this money ($2,678,006) was still lying idle in the hands of the Barings! waiting till foreign exchange can be put up again to eight or ten per cent. The enormity of this conduct, Mr. B. said, was aggravated by the notorious fact, that the transfers of this money were made by sinking the price of exchange as low as five per cent. below par, when shippers and planters had bills to sell; and raising it eight per cent. above par when merchants and importers had to buy; thus double taxing the commerce of the country-double taxing the producer and consumer-and making a fluctuation of thirteen per cent. in foreign exchange, in the brief space of six months. And all this to make money scarce at home while charging that scarcity upon the President! Thus combining calumny and stock-jobbing with the diabolical attempt to ruin the country, or to rule it."

The next glaring fact which showed the enormous culpability of the bank in making the pressure and distress, was the abduction of about a million and a quarter of hard dollars from New Orleans, while distressing the business community there by refusal of discounts and the curtailment of loans, under pretence of making up what she lost there by the removal of the deposits. The fact of the abduction was letteded in the monthly reports still made to the Secretary of the Treasury, and was full proof the wantonness and wickedness of the presure, as the amount thus squeezed out of the ommunity was immediately transferred to Phiadelphia or New-York; to be thence shipped to ondon. Mr. Benton thus exposed this iniquity:

"The next fact, Mr. B. said, was the abduction f an immense amount of specie from New Orans, at the moment the Western produce was arriving there; and thus disabling the merchants from buying that produce, and thereby sinking its price nearly one half; and all under the false pretext of supplying the loss in its coffers, occasioned by the removal of the deposits.

"The falsehood and wickedness of this conduct will appear from the fact, that, at the time of the removal of the deposits, in October, the public deposits, in the New Orleans branch, were far less than the amount afterwards curtailed, and sent off; and that these deposits were not entirely drawn out, for many months after the curtailment and abduction of the money. Thus, the public deposits, in October, were:

"In the name of the Treasurer of the United States, $294,228 62 "In the name of public officers, 173,764 64

$467,993 26

"In all, less than half a million of dollars.
"In March, there was still on hand:

"In the name of the Treasurer, $40,266 28 "In the name of public officers, 63,671 80

"In all, upwards of one hundred thousand dollars; and making the actual withdrawal of deposits, at that brench, but $360,000, and that paid out gradually, in the discharge of government demands.

"Now, what was the actual curtailment, during the same period? It is shown from the monthly statements, that these curtailments, on local loans, were $788,904; being upwards of double the amount of deposits, miscalled removed; for they were not removed; but only paid out in the regular progress of government disbursement, and actually remaining in the mass of circulation, and much of it in the bank itself. But the specie removed during the same time! that was the fact, the damning fact, upon which he relied. This abduction was:

"In the month of November,
"In the month of March, $334,647 at the least

"Making near a million and a quarter of dollars, at the least. Mr. B. repeated, at the least; for a monthly statement does not show the accumulation of the month which might also be sent off; and the statement could only be relied on for so much as appeared a month before the abduction was made. Probably the sum was upwards of a million and a quarter of hard dollars, thus taken away from New Orleans last winter, by stopping accommodations, calling in loans, breaking up domestic exchange, creating panic and pressure, and sinking the price of all produce; that the mother bank might transfer funds to London, gamble in foreign exchange, spread desolation and terror through the land; and then charge the whole upon the President of the United States; and end with the grand consummation of bringing a new political party into power, and perpetuating its own charter."

Mr. Benton commented on the barefacedness of running out an immense line of discounts, so soon done after the rise of the last session of Congress, and so suddenly, that the friends of the bank, in remote places, not having had time to be informed of the "reversal of the bank screws," were still in full chorus, justifying the curtailment; and concluded with denouncing the report as ex parte, and remarking upon the success of the committee in finding what they were not sent to look for, and not finding what they ought to have found. He said:

"These are some of the astounding iniquities which have escaped the eyes of the committee, while they have been so successful in their antiquarian researches into Audrew Jackson's and Felix Grundy's letters, ten or twenty years ago, and into Martin Van Buren's and Thomas H. Benton's, six or eight years ago; letters which every public man is called upon to give to his neighbors, or constituents; which no public man ought to refuse, or, in all probability ever did refuse; and which are so ostentatiously paraded in the report, and so emphatically read in this chamber, with pause and gesture; and with such a sympathetic look for the expected smile from the friends of the bank; letters which, so far as he was concerned, had been used to make the committee the organ of a falsehood. And now, Mr. B. would be glad to know, who put the committee on the scent of those old musty letters; for there was nothing in the resolution, under which they acted, to conduct their footsteps to the silent covert of that small game."

Mr. Tyler made a brief reply, in defence of the report of the committee, in which he said:

"The senator from Missouri had denominated the report 'an elaborate defence of the bank.' He had said that it justified the bank in its course of curtailment, during the last winter and the early part of the summer. Sir, if the honorable senator had paid more attention to the reading, or had waited to have it in print, he would not have hazarded such a declaration. He would have perceived that that whole question was submitted to the decision of the Senate. The committee had presented both sides of the question-the view most favorable, and that most unfavorable, to the institution. It exhibited the measures of the Executive and those of the bank consequent upon them, on the one side, and the available resources of the bank on the other. The fact that its circulation of to the committee of exchange. He had si $19,000,000 was protected by specie to the that a false issue had been presented—that the amount of $10,000,000, and claims on the State banks exceeding $2,000,000, which were equal to specie-that its purchase of domestic exchange had so declined, from May to October, as to place at its disposal more than $5,000,000. something more than a doubt is expressed whether, under ordinary circumstances, the bank would have been justified in curtaining its discounts. So, too, in regard to a perseverance in its measures of precaution as long as it did a summary of facts is given to enable the Senate to decide upon the propriety of the course pursued by the bank. The effort of the committee has been to present these subjects fairly to the Senate and the country. They have sought 'nothing to extenuate,' nor have they 'set down ought in malice.' The statements are presented to the senator, for his calm and deliberate consideration-to each senator, to be weighed as becomes his high station. And what is the course of the honorable senator? The moment he (Mr. T.) could return to his seat from the Clerk's table, the gentleman pounces upon the report, and makes assertions which a careful perusal of it would cause him to know it does not contain. On one subject, the controversy relative to the bill of exchange and the damages consequent on its protest, the committee had expressed the opinion, that the gorernment was in error, and he, as a member of that committee, would declare his own conviction that that opinion was sound and maintain. able before any fair and impartial tribunal in the world. Certain persons started back with alarm, at the mere mention of a court of justice The trial by jury had become hateful in their eyes. The great principles of magna charle are to be overlooked, and the declarations contained in the bill of rights are become too oldfashioned to be valuable. Popular prejudices are to be addressed, and instead of an appeal to the calm judgment of mankind, every lurking prejudice is to be awakened, because a corportion, or a set of individuals, have believed themselves wronged by the accounting officers of the treasury, and have had the temerity and impedence to take a course calculated to bring that rights before the forum of the courts. Let the who see cause to pursue this course rejoice a they may please, and exult in the success which attends it. For one, I renounce it as unworth American statesmen. The committee had aldressed a sober and temperate but firm are ment, upon this subject, to the Senate; and standing in the presence of that august both and before the whole American people, he rest ed upon that argument for the truth of the opinion advanced. An opinion, for the honestrative which, on his own part, he would avouch, also the most solemn manner, under the unutterally obligations he was under to his Creator.

late Secretary of the Treasury (Managey) had never contended that the bank had no right to appoint a committee of exchange—that such a committee was appointed by all banks. In this last declaration the gentleman is correct. All banks have a committee to purchase exchange, But Mr. T. would admonish the gentleman to leware. He would find himself condemning him whom he wished to defend. Mr. Tanev's rery language is quoted in the report. He places the violation of the charter distinctly on the ground that the business of the bank is intrusted to three members on the exchange committee, when the charter requires that not less than seven shall constitute a board to do business. His very words are given in the report, so that he cannot be misunderstood; and the commenjary of the committee consists in a mere narrative of facts. Little more is done than to give ficts, and the honorable senator takes the alarm; and in his effort to rescue the late Secretary from their influence, plunges him still deeper into difficulty.

The senator had loudly talked of the committee having been made an instrument of, by the bank. For himself, he renounced the ascription. He would tell the honorable senator that he could not be made an instrument of by he bank, or by a still greater and more formidable power, the administration. He stood upon that the to accomplish the purposes for which he was sent there. In the consciousness of his own houesty, he stood firm and erect. He would worship alone at the shrine of truth and of honor. lt was a precious thing, in the eyes of some men, to bask in the sunshine of power. He rested only upon the support, which had never failed him, of the high and lofty feelings of his constituents. He would not be an instrument even in their hands, if it were possible for them to require it of him, to gratify an unrighteous motive."

CHAPTER CXVII.

FRENCH SPOLIATIONS BEFORE 1800.

hiese claims had acquired an imposing aspect y this time. They were called "prior" to the ear 1800; but how much prior was not shown, nd they might reach back to the establishment our independence. Their payment by the nited States rested upon assumptions which pastituted the basis of the demand, and on hich the bill was framed. It assumed, firsthat illegal seizures, detentions, captures, conmnations, and confiscations were made of the

'ates befor he' period rentioned. Secondly -That the note were committed to such orders and the r such eir matances, as gave the sufferers a bit to indea ity from the French governmen Thirdty that these claims had been annuited by the United States for public considerations. Fourthly-That this annulment gave these sufferers a just claim upon the United States for the amount of their losses. Upon these four assumptions the bill restedsome of them disputable in point of fact, and others in point of law. Of these latter was the assumption of the liability of the United States to become paymasters themselves in cases where failing, by war or negotiation, to obtain redress they make a treaty settlement, surrendering or abandoning claims. This is an assumption contrary to reason and law. Every nation is bound to give protection to the persons and property of their citizens; but the government is the judge of the measure and degree of that protection; and is not bound to treat for ever, or to fight for ever, to obtain such redress. After having done its hest for the indemnity of some individuals, it is bound to consider what is due to the whole community-and to not accordingly; and the unredressed citizens have to put with their losses if abandoned at the general settlement which, sooner or later, must terminate all national controversies. All this was well stated by Mr. Bibb, of Kentucky, in a speech on these French claims upon the bill of the present year. He said:

"He was well aware that the interests of individuals ought to be supported by their governments to a certain degree, but he did not think that governments were bound to push such interest to the extremity of war-he did not admit that the rights of the whole were to be jeoparded by the claims of individuals—the safety of the community was paramount to the claims of private citizens. He would proceed to see if the interests of our citizens had been neglected by this government. These claims have been urged from year to year, with all the earnestness and zeal due from the nation. But they went on from bad to worse, till negotiations were in vain. We then assumed a hostile position. During the year '98, more than twenty laws were passed by Congress upon this very subject-some for raising troops-some for providing arms and munitions of war-some for fitting out a naval force, and so on. Was this noglecting the claims of our citizens? We went as far as the interests of the nation would ssels and property of citizens of the United permit. We prosecuted these claims to the very verge of plunging into that dreadful war then desolating Europe. The government then issued its proclamation of neutrality and nonintercourse. Mr. B. next proceeded to show that France had no just claims upon us, arising from the guaranty. This guaranty against France was not considered binding, even by France herself, any further than was consistent with our relations with other nations; that it was so declared by ber minister; and, moreover, that she acknowledged the justice of our neutrality. These treaties had been violated by France, and the United States could not surely be bound by treaties which she had herself violated; and consequently, we were under no obligation on account of the guaranty. Mr. B. went on to show that, by the terms of the treaty of 1800, the debts due to our citizens had not been relinquished :- that as the guaranty did not exist, and as the claims had not been abandored, Mr. B. concluded that these claims ought not to be paid by this government. He was opposed to going back thirty-four years to sit in judgment on the constituted authorities of that time. There should be a stability in the government, and he was not disposed to question the judgment of the man (Washington) who has justly been called the first in war and the first in peace. We are sitting here to rejudge the decisions of the government thirtyfour years since,"

This is well stated, and the conclusion just and logical, that we ought not to go back thirty-four years to call in question the judgment of Washington's administration. He was looking to the latest date of the claims when he said thirty-four years, which surely was enough; but Washington's decision in his proclamation of neutrality was seven years before that time; and the claims themselves have the year 1800 for their period of limitation-not of commencement, which was many years before. This doctrine of governmental liability when abandoning the claims of citizens for which indemnity could not be obtained, is unknown in other countries, and was unknown in ours in the earlier ages of the government. There was a case of this abandonment in our early history which rested upon no "assumption" of fact, but on the fact itself; and in which no attempt was made to enforce the novel doctrine. It was the case of the slaves carried off by the British troops at the close of the Revolutionary War, and for which indemnity was stipulated in the treaty of peace. Great Britain refused that indemnity; and after vain efforts to obtain it by the Congress of the confederation, and after-| subject of discussion, and two only occurred to wards under Washington's administration the claim of indemnity, no longer resting upon , claim of the sufferers, but upon a treaty stipulation-upon an article in a treaty for their benefit-was abandoned to obtain a general advantage for the whole community in the commercial treaty with Great Britain. As these claims for French spoliations are still continued (1850), I give some of the speeches for and ngainst them fifteen years ago, believing that they present the strength of the argument on both sides. The opening speech of Mr. Web. ster presented the case:

"He should content himself with stating very briefly an outline of the grounds on which these claims are supposed to rest, and then leave the subject to the consideration of the Senate. Ile however, should be happy, in the course of the debate, to make such explanations as might he called for. It would be seen that the bill proposed to make satisfaction, to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars, to such citizens of the United States, or their legal representatives, as had valid claims for indemnity on the French government, rising out of illeral captures, detentions, and condemnations, made or committed on their property prior to the 30th day of September, 1800. This bill supposed two or three leading propositions to be

"It supposed, in the first place, that illeral seizures, detentions, captures, condemnations and confiscations, were made, of the vessels and property of the citizens of the United States, before the 30th September, 1800.

"It supposed, in the second place, that they acts of wrong were committed by such order and under such circumstances, as that the su' ferers had a just right and claim for indemnity from the hands of the government of France

"Going on these two propositions, the bill assumed one other, and that was, that all such claims on France as came within a prescribed period, or down to a prescribed period, had been annulled by the United States, and that this gave them a right to claim indemnity from the government. It supposed a liability in justo in fairness and equity, on the part of this government. ernment, to make the indemnity. These wen the grounds on which the bill was framed That there were many such confiscations no on doubted, and many such acts of wrong as were mentioned in the first section of the bill. The they were committed by Frenchmen, and under such circumstances as gave those who suffered wrong an unquestionable right to claim indep nity from the French government, nobody, be supposed, at this day, would question. Then were two questions which might be made the

'Why was it that the government of the United States had become responsible in law or equity to its citizens, for the chirs—for any indemnity for the wrongs committed on their commerce by the subjects of Transe before 1800?'

- To this question there was an answer, which, whether satisfactory or not, had at least the perit of being a very short one. It was, that, by a treaty between France and the United states, bearing date the 30th of September, 1800, in a political capacity, the government of the United States discharged and released the evernment of France from this indemnity. It sent upon the ground, which was sustained by the correspondence which had preceded the realy of 1800, that the disputes arising between the two countries should be settled by a egotiation. And claims and pretensions havng been asserted on either side, commissioners n the part of the United States were sent out assert and maintain the claims of indemnity hich they demanded; while commissioners apthe full extent of the stipulations made in '78. hich they said the United States had promised fulfil, and in order to carry into effect the paty of alliance of the same date, viz.: Feb-

CHAPTER CXVIII.

FRENCH SPOLIATIONS: SPEECH OF MR. WEIGHT, OF NEW-YORK,

"Mr. Wright underste, A the friends of this bill to put its merits upon the single and distinct ground that the government of the United States had released France from the ent of the claims for a consideration ec ly to the benefit of our govern ally equal in value to the claims the . r. W. said he should argue the several questions presented. upon the supposition that this was the extent to which the friends of the bill had gone, or were disposed to go, in claiming a liability on the part of the United States to pay the claimants; and, thus understood, he was ready to proceed to an examination of the strength of this position.

"His first duty, then, was to examine the relations existing between France and the United States prior to the commencement of the disturbances out of which these claims have arisen; and the discharge of this duty would compel a dry and uninteresting reference to the several treaties which, at that period, governed those relations.

"The seventeenth article of the treaty of amity and commerce of the 6th February, 1778, was the first of these references, and that article was in the following words:

was in the following words: "'Art. 17. It shall be lawful for the ships of war of either party, and privateers, freely to carry whithersoever they please the ships and goods taken from their enemies, without being obliged to pay any duty to the officers of the admiralty or any other judges; nor shall such prizes be arrested or seized when they come to or enter the ports of either party; nor shall the searchers or other officers of those places search the same, or make examination concerning the lawfulness of such prizes; but they may hoist sail at any time and depart and carry their prizes to the places expressed in their commissions, which the commanders of such ships of war shall be obliged to show; on the contrary, no shelter or refuge shall be given in their ports to such as shall have made prize of the subjects, people, or property of either of the parties; but if such shall come in, being forced by stress of weather, or the danger of the sea, all proper means shall be vigorously used, that they go out and retire from thence as soon as possible.'

"This article, Mr. W. said, would be found to be one of the most material of all the stipulations between the two nations, in an examination of the diplomatic correspondence during the whole period of the disturbances, from the breaking out of the war between France and England, in 1793, until the treaty of the 30th September, 1800. The privileges claimed by France, and the exclusions she insisted on as applicable to the other belligerent Powers, were fruitful sources of complaint on both sides, and constituted many material points of disagreement between the two nations through this entire interval. What these claims were on the part of France, and how far they were admitted by the United States, and how far controverted, will, Mr. W. said, be more properly considered in another part of the argument. As connected, however, with this branch of the relations, he thought it necessary to refer to the twentysecond article of the same treaty, which was in the following words:

"'Art. 22. It shall not be lawful for any foreign privateers, not belonging to subjects of the Most Christian King, nor citizens of the said United States, who have commissions from any other prince or State in enmity with either nation, to fit their ships in the ports of either the one or the other of the aforesaid parties, to sell what they have taken, or in any other manner whatsoever to exchange their ships, merchandises, or any other lading; neither shall they be allowed even to purchase victuals, except such as shall be necessary for their going to the next port of that prince or State from which they have commissions?

"Mr. W. said he now passed to a different branch of the relations between the two countries, as established by this treaty of amity and commerce, which was the reciprocal right of either to carry on a free trade with the enemies of the other, restricted only by the stipulations of the same treaty in relation to articles to be considered contraband of war. This reciprocal right is defined in the twenty-third article of the treaty, which is in the words following:

""Art. 23. It shall be lawful for all and singular the subjects of the Most Christian King, and the citizens, people, and inhabitants of the said United States, to sail with their ships with all manner of liberty and security, no distinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandises laden thereon, from any port to the places of those who now are or hereafter shall be at enmity with the Most Christian King, or the United States. It shall likewise be lawful for the subjects and inhabitants aforesaid to sail with the ships and merchandises aforementioned, and to trade with the same liberty and security from the places, ports, and havens of those who are enemies of both or either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever, not only goods; as likewise all other merchandises directly from the places of the enemy aforemen tioned to neutral places, but also from one play belonging to an enemy to another place belong. ing to an enemy, whether they be under the jurisdiction of the same prince, or under several And it is hereby stipulated that free ships shall also give a freedom to goods, and that ever thing shall be deemed to be free and exempt which shall be found on board the ships belone. ing to the subjects of either of the confederates, although the whole lading, or any part thereof should appertain to the enemies of either, contraband goods being always excepted. It is also agreed, in like manner, that the same liberty be extended to persons who are on board a free ship, with this effect, that although they beene mies to both or either party, they are not to be taken out of that free ship, unless they are soldiers and in actual service of the enemies.

blocked up, or invested.' "Mr. W. said this closed his references to this treaty, with the remark, which he wished carefully borne in mind, that the accepted public law was greatly departed from in this last article. provisions, in their broadest sense, materials for ships, rigging for ships, and indeed almost all the ricles of trade mentioned in the long exception in the article of the treaty, were articles contraand of war by the law of nations. This article, herefore, placed our commerce with France upon footing widely different, in case of a war between rance and any third power, from the rules which rould regulate that commerce with the other eligerent, with whom we might not have a imilar commercial treaty. Such was its effect as ompared with our relations with England, with hich power we had no commercial treaty whatwer, but depended upon the law of nations as or commercial rule and standard of intercourse. FMr. W. said he now passed to the treaty of hance between France and the United States, the same date with the treaty of amity and mmerce before referred to, and his first rerence was to the 11th article of this latter eaty. It was in the following words:
"Art. 11. The two parties guarante mutual-from the present time, and for ever, against other powers, to wit: The United States to Most Christian Majesty the present possesons of the Crown of France in America, as well those which it may acquire by the future treaof peace: And His Most Christian Majesty arantees on his part to the United States, their erty, sovereignty, and independence, absolute dunlimited, as well in matters of government commerce, and also their possessions, and the ditions or conquests that their confederation y obtain during the war, from any of the donions now or heretofore possessed by Great tain in North America, conformable to the h and sixth articles above written, the whole their possessions shall be fixed and assured to said States at the moment of the cessation beir present war with England.'

This article, Mr. W. said, was the most imtant reference he had made, or could make, ar as the claims provided for by this bill e concerned, because he understood the ads of the bill to derive the principal considion to the United States, which created their lity to pay the claims, from the guaranty he part of the United States contained in it. Senate would see that the article was a maland reciprocal guaranty, 1st. On the part he United States to France, of her possessin America; and 2d. On the part of France he United States, of their 'liberty, sovereignty, and independence, absolute and unlimited, as well in matters of government as commerce, and also their possessions,' &c.; and that the respective guarantees were 'for ever.' It would by-and-by appear in what manner this guaranty on the part of our government was claimed to be the foundation for this pecuniary responsibility for millions, but at present he must complete his references to the treaties which formed the law between the two nations and the rule of their relations to and with each other. He had but one more article to read, and that was important only as it went to define the one last cited. This was the 12th article of the treaty of alliance, and was as follows:

eri Art. 12. In order to fix more precisely the sense and application of the preceding article, the contracting parties declare that, in case of a rupture between France and England, the reciprocal guaranty declared in the said article shall have its full force and effect the moment such war shall break out; and if such rupture shall not take place, the mutual obligations of the said guaranty shall not commence until the moment of the cessation of the present war between the United States and England shall have ascertained their possessions.'

"These, said Mr. W., are the treaty stipulations between France and the United States, existing at the time of the commencement of the disturbances between the two countries, which gave rise to the claims now the subject of consideration, and which seem to bear most materially upon the points in issue. There were other provisions in the treaties between the two governments more or less applicable to the present discussion, but, in the course he had marked out for himself, a reference to them was not indispensable, and he was not disposed to occupy the time or weary the patience of the Senate with more of these dry documentary quotations than he found absolutely essential to a full and clear understanding of the points he proposed to examine.

"Mr. W. said he was now ready to present the origin of the claims which formed the subject of the bill. The war between France and England broke out, according to his recollection, late in the year 1792, or early in the year 1793, and the United States resolved upon preserving the same neutral position between those beligerents, which they had assumed at the commencement of the war between France and certain other European powers. This neutrality on the part of the United States seemed to be acceptable to the then French Republic, and her minister in the United States and her diplomatic agents at home were free and distinct in their expressions to this effect.

i. Still that Republic made broad claims under the 17th article of the treaty of amity and commerce before quoted, and her minister here assumed the right to purchase ships, arm them as privateers in our ports, commission officers for them, enlist our own citizens to man them and, thus prepared, to send them from our ports to cruise against English vessels upon our coast. Many prizes were made, which were brought into our ports, submitted to the admiralty jurisdiction conferred by the French Republic upon her consuls in the United States, condemned, and the captured vessels and cargoes exposed for sale in our markets. These practices were immediately and earnestly complained of by the British government as violations of the neutrality which our government had declared, and which we assumed to maintain in regard to all the belligerents, as favors granted to one of the belligerents, not demandable of right under our treaties with France, and as wholly inconsistent, according to the rules of international law, with our continuance as a neutral power. Our government so far yielded to these complaints as to prohibit the French from fitting out, arming, equipping, or commissioning privateers in our ports, and from enlisting our citizens to bear arms under the French flag.

"This decision of the rights of France, under the treaty of amity and commerce, produced warm remonstrances from her minister in the United States, but was finally ostensibly acquiesced in by the Republic, although constant complaints of evasions and violations of the rule continued to harass our government, and to occupy the attention of the respective diplomatists.

"The exclusive privilege of our ports for her armed vessels, privateers, and their prizes, granted to France by the treaty of amity and commerce, as has before been seen, excited the jealousy of England, and she was not slow in sending a portion of her vast navy to line our coast and block up our ports and harbors. The insolence of power induced some of her armed vessels to enter our ports, and to remain, in violation of our treaty with France, though not by the consent of our government, or when we had the power to enforce the treaty by their ejection. These incidents, however, did not fail to form the subject of new charges from the French ministers, of bad faith on our part, of partiality to England w the prejudice of our old and faithful ally, of permitted violations of the treaties, and of an inefficiency and want of zeal in the performance of our duties as neutrals. To give point to these complaints, some few instances occurred in which British vessels brought their prizes into our ports, whether in all cases under those casualties of stress of weather, or the dangers of the sea, which rendered the act in conformity with the treaties and the law of nations or not, is not perhaps very certain or very material, inasmuch as the spirit of complaint seems to have taken possession of the French negotiators, and these acts gave colorable ground to their remonstrances.

"Contemporaneously with these grounds of misunderstanding and hese collisions of interest between the beligerents, and between the interests of either of them and the preservation of our neutrality, the French began to discover carrying to an enemy contraband article.

the disadvantages to them, and the great alvantages to the British, of the different rules which governed the commerce between the two nations and the United States. The rule between u and France was the commercial treaty of which the articles above quoted form a part, and the rule between us and Great Britain, was that laid down by the law of nations. Mr. W. he would detain the Senate to point out but try of the differences between these rules of commerce and intercourse, because upon these two principally depended the difficulties which follow. ed. The first was, that, by the treaty between us and France, 'free ships shall also give a free dom to the goods; and every thing shall be deemed to be free and exempt which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the subjects of either of the confederates, although the who lading, or any part thereof, should appearate to the enemy of either, contraband goods being always excepted; while the law of nations, while was the rule between us and England, made in goods of an enemy a lawful prize, though found the vessel of a friend. Hence it followed to French property on board of an American rewas subject to capture by British cruisers will out indignity to our flag, or a violation to inte national law, while British property on board an American vessel could not be captured by French vessel without an insult to the flag the United States, and a direct violation of twenty-third article of the treaty of amity commerce between us and France, before mis red to.

"Mr. W. said the second instance of disadra tage to France which he proposed to mental was the great difference between the artis made contraband of war by the twenty-for article of the treaty of amity and commerce, fore read to the Senate, and by the law of tions. By the treaty, provisions of all his ship timber, ship tackle (guns only except and a large list of other articles of trade and merce, were declared not to be contraband war, while the same articles are expressly m contraband by the law of nations. Hence American vessel, clearing for a French portri a cargo of provisions or ship stores, was lan prize to a British cruiser, as, by the law of tions, carrying articles contraband of war to enemy, while the same vessel, clearing in British port, with the same cargo, could not captured by a French vessel, because the declared that the articles composing the ar should not be contraband as between the Uni States and France. on their return, too, they were equally out of canger from French eruisers, as, by the treaty, free ships made free the goods on board; while, they cleared from a port in France with a French cargo, they were lawful prize to the British, upon the principle of the law of nations, that the goods of an enemy are lawful prize, eren when found in the vessel of a friend.

Both nations were in constant and urgent vant of provisions from the United States; and his double advantage to England of having her ports open and free to our vessels, and of posesing the right to capture those bound to French ports, exasperated the French Republic evond endurance. Her ministers remonstrated nth our government, controverted our construcion of British rights, again renewed the accuations of partiality, and finally threw off the bligations of the treaty; and, by a solemn dere of their authorities at home, established the ule which governed the practice of the British misers. France, assuming to believe that the nited States permitted the neutrality of her ag to be violated by the British, vithout re-stance, declared that she would treat the flag all neutral vessels as that flag should permit self to be treated by the other belligerents. his opened our commerce to the almost indis-ininate plunder and depredation of all the owers at war, and but for the want of the prosions of the United States, which was too ongly felt both in England and France not to vern, in a great degree, the policy of the two tions, it would seem probable, from the docuentary history of the period, that it must have en swept from the ocean. Impelled by this ant, however, the British adopted the rule, at early day, that the provisions captured, alough in a strict legal sense forfeited, as being the law of nations contraband, should not confiscated, but carried into English ports, d paid for, at the market price of the same orisions, at the port of their destination. The me want compelled the French, when they me to the conclusion to lay aside the obligaas of the taxty, and to govern themselves, by solemn compacts with friendly powers t by the standards of wrong adopted by their mies, to adopt also the same rule, and instead confiscating the cargo as contraband of war, if visions, to decree a compensation gradud by the market value at the port of destina-

Such, said Mr. W., is a succinct view of the turbances between France and the United tes, and between France and Great Britain, of which grew what are now called the nch claims for spoliations upon our comce, prior to the 30th of September, 1800. er subjects of difference might have had a otc influence; but, Mr. W., said, he believed rould be admitted by all, that those he had ed were the principal, and might be ased as having given rise to the commercial gularities in which the claims commenced.

This state of things, without material change, continued until the year 1798, when our government adopted a course of measures intended to suspend our intercourse with France, until she should be brought to respect our rights. These measures were persevered in by the United States, up to September, 1800, and were terminated by the treaty between the two nations of the 30th of that month. Here, too, terminated ciaims which now occupy the attention of the

"As it was the object of the claimants to show a liability, on the part of our government, to pay their claims, and the bill under discussion assumed that liability, and provided, in part at least, for the payment, Mr. W. said it became his duty to inquire what the government had done to obtain indemnity for these claimants from France, and to see whether negligence on its part had furnished equitable or legal ground for the institution of this large claim upon the national treasury. The period of time covered by the claims, as he understood the subject, was from the breaking out of the war between France and England, in 1793, to the signing of the treaty between France and the United States, in September, 1800; and he would consider the efforts the government had made to obtain in-

"2d. From 1798 to the treaty of the 30th

September, 1800.
"During the first period, Mr. W. said, these efforts were confined to negotiation, and he felt safe in the assertion that, during no equal period in the history of our government, could there be found such untiring and unremitted exertions to obtain justice for citizens who had been injured in their properties by the unlawful acts of a foreign power. Any one who would read the mass of diplomatic correspondence between this government and France, from 1793 to 1798 and who would mark the frequent and extraordinary missions, bearing constantly in mind that the recovery of these claims was the only ground upon our part for the whole negotiation, would find it difficult to say where negligence towards the rights and interests of its citizens is imputable to the government of the United States, during this period. He was not aware that such an imputation had been or would be made; but sure he was that it could not be made with justice, or sustained by the facts upon the record. No liability, therefore, equitable or legal,

had been incurred, up to the year 1798.

"And if, said Mr. W., negligence is not imputable, prior to 1798, and no liability had then been incurred, how is it for the second period, from 1798 to 1800? The efforts of the former period were negotiation—constant, earnest, extraordinary negotiation. What were they for the latter period? His answer was, war; actual, open war; and he believed the statute book of the United States would justify him in the position. He was well aware that this point would be strenuously controverted, because the friends of the bill would admit that, if a state of war between the two countries did exist, it put an end to claims existing prior to the war, and not provided for in the treaty of peace, as well as to all pretence for claims to indemnity for injuries to our commerce, committed by our enemy in time of war. Mr. W. said he had found the evidences so numerous, to establish his position that a state of actual war did exist, that he had been quite at a loss from what portion of the testimony of record to make his selections, so as to establish the fact beyond reasonable dispute, and at the same time not to weary the Senate by tedions references to laws and documents. He had finally concluded to confine himself exclusively to the statute book, as the highest possible evidence, as in his judgment entirely conclusive, and as being susceptible of an arrangement and condensation which would convey to the Senate the whole material evidence, in a satisfactory manner, and in less compass than the proofs to be drawn from any other source. He had, therefore, made a very brief abstract of a few statutes, which he would read in his place :

"By an act of the 28th May, 1798, Congress authorized the capture of all armed vessels of France which had committed depredations upon our commerce, or which should be found hovering upon our coast for the purpose of commit-

ing such depredations.

"By an act of the 13th June, 1798, only sixteen days after the passage of the former act, Congress prohibited all vessels of the United States from visiting any of the ports of France or her dependencies, under the penalty of forfeiture of vessel and cargo; required every vessel clearing for a foreign port to give bonds (the owner, or factor and master) in the amount of the vessel and cargo, and good sureties in half that amount, conditioned that the vessel to which the clearance was to be granted, would not, voluntarily, visit any port of France or her dependencies; and prohibited all vessels of France, armed or unarmed, or owned, fitted, hired, or employed, by any person resident within the territory of the French Republic, or its dependencies, or sailing or coming therefrom, from entering or remaining in any port of the United States, unless permitted by the President, by special passport, to be granted by him in each

"By an act of the 25th June, 1798, only twelve days after the passage of the last-mentioned act, Congress authorized the merchant vessels of the United States to arm, and to defend themselves against any search, restraint, or seizure, by vessels sailing under French colors, to repel force by force to capture any French vessel attempting a search, restraint, or seizure, and to recapture any American merchant vessel which had been captured by the French.

"Here, Mr. W said, he felt constrained to make a remark upon the character of these seve- gress continued the non-intercourse between ral acts of Congress, and to call the attention the Senate to their peculiar adaptation to the measures which speedily followed in future acq of the national legislature. The first, author izing the capture of French armed vessels, va peculiarly calculated to put in martial prepara tion all the navy which the United States the possessed, and to spread it upon our coast. The second, establishing a perfect non-intercourse with France, was sure to call home our merchant vessels from that country and her dependencies, to confine within our own ports those vessels intended for commerce with France, and thus to withdraw from the reach of the Frend cruicers a large portion of the ships and proper ty of our citizens. The third, authorizing merchantmen to arm, was the greatest induce ment the government could give to its citizen to arm our whole commercial marine, and wa sure to put in warlike preparation as great portion of our merchant vessels as a desire of self-defence, patriotism, or cupidity, would am Could measures more eminently calculated in prepare the country for a state of war have be devised or adopted? Was this the intention those measures, on the part of the government and was that intention carried out into action Mr. W. said he would let the subsequent acts the Congress of the United States answer; for that purpose, he would proceed to read for his abstract of those acts:

"By an act of the 28th June, 1798, threeday after the passage of the act last referred Congress authorized the forfeiture and conde nation of all French vessels captured in pursance of the acts before mentioned, and provide for the distribution of the prize money, and the confinement and support, at the expense the United States, of prisoners taken in them

"By an act of the 7th July, 1798, nine da after the passage of the last-recited act, Con-declared that the United States are of ne freed and exonerated from the stipulations the treaties and of the consular conveni heretofore concluded between the United Sta and France; and that the same shall not her forth be regarded as legally obligatory on t government or citizens of the United States?

"By an act of the 9th July, 1798, two di after the passage of the act declaring void treaties, Congress authorized the capture, the public armed vessels of the United Sta of all armed French vessels, whether within jurisdictional limits of the United States or m the high seas, their condemnation as prizes, the sale, and the distribution of the prize more empowered the President to grant commission to private armed vessels to make the same tures, and with the same rights and power, public armed vessels; and provided for the keeping and support of the prisoners take, the expense of the United States.

"By an act of the 28th February, 1799, Conress provided for an exchange of prisoners with France, or authorized the President, at his discretion, to send to the dominions of France, without an exchange, such prisioners as might emain in the power of the United States.

"Mr. W. said he had now closed the refernces he proposed to make to the laws of Conress, to prove that war-actual war-existed etween the United States and France, from uly, 1798, until that war was terminated by he treaty of the 30th of September, 1800. He he hoped, before shown that the measures (Congress, up to the passage of the act of Con-ress of the 25th of June, 1798, and including lat act, were appropriate measures preparatory a state of war; and he had now shown a to-I suspension of the peaceable relations between e two governments, by the declaration of Condered binding and obligatory upon our govern-ent or its citizens. What, then, but war could interred from an indiscriminate direction to r public armed vessels, put in a state of pre-ration, by preparatory acts, to capture all med French vessels upon the high seas, and om granting commissions to our whole com-ercial marine, also armed by the operation of erious acts of Congress, authorizing them to ke the same captures, with regulations applible to both, for the condemnation of the prizes, e distribution of the prize money, and the de-tion, support, and exchange of the prisoners ken in the captured vessels? Will any man, d Mr. W., call this a state of peace? "[liere Mr. Webster, chairman of the select mmittee which reported the bill, answered, ertainly.'] Mr. W. proceeded. He said he was not ply read in the treatises upon national law, and should never dispute with that learned genman upon the technical definitions of peace war, as given in the books; but his appeal to the plain sense of every senator and ry citizen of the country. Would either call state of things which he had described, which he had shown to exist from the hest of all evidence, the laws of Congress ne, peace? It was a state of open and un-quised hostility, of force opposed to force, of

were in command of the means to carry on a maritime war. If it was peace, he should like to be informed, by the friends of the bill, what would be war. This was violence and bloodshed, the power of the one nation against the power of the other, reciprocally exhibited by physical force.

"Couple with this the withdrawal by Franco of her minister from this government, and her refusal to receive the American commission, consisting of Messrs. Marshall, Pinckney, and Gerry, and the consequent suspension of negotiations between the two governments, during the period referred to; and Mr. W. said, if the facts and the national records did not show a state of war, he was at a loss to know what state of things between nations should be called war.

"If, however, the Senate should think him wrong in this conclusion, and that the claims were not utterly barred by war, he trusted the facts disclosed in this part of his argument would be considered sufficient at least to protect the faith of the government in the discharge of its whole duty to its citizens; and that after it had carried on these two years of war, or, if not war, of actual force and actual fighting, in which the blood of its citizens had been shed, and their lives sacrificed to an unknown extent, for the single and sole purpose of enforcing these claims of individuals, the imputation of negligence, and hence of liability to pay the claims, would not be urged as growing out of this portion of the conduct of the government.

"Mr. W. said he now came to consider the treaty of the 30th September, 1800, and the reasons which appeared plainly to his mind to have induced the American negotiators to place that negotiation upon the basis, not of an existing war, but of a continued peace. That such was assumed to be the basis of the negotiation, he believed to be true, and this fact, and this fact only, so far as he had heard the arguments of the friends of the bill, was depended upon to prove that there had been no war. He had attempted to show that war in fact had existed, and been carried on for two years; and if he could now show that the inducement, on the part of the American ministers, to place the negotiation which was to put an end to the existing hostilities upon a peace basis, arose from no considerations of a national or political character, and from no ideas of consistency with the existing state of facts, but solely from a desire still to save, as far as might be in their power, the interests of these claimants, he should submit with great confidence that it did not lay in the mouths of the same claimants to turn round and claim this implied admission of an absence of war, thus made by the agents of the government out of kindness to them, and an excess of regard for their interests, as the basis of a liability to pay the damages which they had sustained, and which this diplomatic untruth, like all the previous steps of the government, upon the ocean, as far as our government failed to recover for them. What, then, Mr.

President, said Mr. W., was the subject on our part, of the constant and laborious negotiations carried on between the two governments from 1793 to 1798? The claims. What, on our part, was the object of the disturbances from 1798 to 1800-of the non-intercourse-of the sending into service our navy, and arming our merchant vessels-of our raising troops and providing armies on the land-of the expenditure of the millions taken from the treasury and added to our public debt, to equip and sustain these fleets and armies? The claims. Why were our citizens sent to capture the French, to spill their blood, and lay down their lives upon the high seas? To recover the claims. These were the whole matter. We had no other demand upon France, and, upon our part, no other cause of difference with her.

"What public, or national, or political object had we in the negotiation of 1800, which led to the treaty of the 30th September of that year? None, but to put an end to the existing hostilities, and to restore relations of peace and friendship. These could have been as well secured by negotiating upon a war as a peace basis. Indeed, as there were in our former treaties stipulations which we did not want to revive, a negotiation upon the basis of existing war was preferable. so far as the interests of the government were concerned, because that would put all questions, growing out of former treaties between the parties, for ever at rest. Still our negotiators consented to put the negotiation upon the basis of continued peace, and why? Because the adoption of a basis of existing war would have barred effectually and for ever all classes of the claims. This, Mr. W. said, was the only possible assignable reason for the course pursued by the American negotiators; it was the only reason growing out of the existing facts, or out of the interests, public or private, involved in the difficulties between the two nations. He therefore felt himself fully warranted in the conclusion, that the American ministers preferred and adopted a peace basis for the negotiation which resulted in the treaty of the 30th of September, 1800, solely from a wish, as far as they might be able, to save the interests of our citizens holding claims against France

"Did they, Mr. President, said Mr. W., succeed by this artifice in benefiting the citizens who had sustained injuries? He would let the treaty speak for itself. The following are extracts from the 4th and 5th articles:

"'Art. 4. Property captured, and not yet definitively condemned, or which may be captured before the exchange of ratifications (contraband goods destined to an enemy's port excepted), shall be mutually restored on the following proof of ownership.'

But this clause shall not extend to indemnities claimed on account of captures a contiscations.

"Here, Mr. W. said, was evidence from the treaty itself, that, by assuming a peace basis for the negotiation, the property of our merchants captured and not condemned was saved to them and that certain classes of claimants against the French government were provided for, and their rights expressly reserved. So much, therefore was gained by our negotiators by a departure from the facts, and negotiating to put an end to existing hostilities upon the basis of a continued peace. Was it, then, generous or just to permit these merchants, because our ministers did not succeed in saving all they claimed, to set up this implied admission of continued peace as the foundation of a liability against their own povernment to pay what was not recovered from France? He could not so consider it, and is felt sure the country never would consent to & responsible an implication from an act of excessive kindness. Mr. W. said he must not be m derstood as admitting that all was not, by the effect of this treaty, recovered from France which she ever recognized to be due, or ever it tended to pay. On the contrary, his best in pression was, from what he had been able w learn of the claims, that the treaty of Louisian provided for the payment of all the claims which France ever admitted, ever intended to pay, or which there was the most remote hope of m covering in any way whatever. He should in a subsequent part of h's remarks, have occasion to examine that treaty, the claims which were paid under it, and to compare the claims paid with those urged before the treaty of September

"Mr. W. said he now came to the consideration of the liability of the United States tobs claimants, in case it shall be determined by the Senate that a war between France and the United States had not existed to bar all ground of discither against France or the United States. The consideration d States is alleged to be the onerous obligations mu spon them by the treaties of amity and commerce and alliance of 1778, and the consular convention of 1778, and especially and principally by the erenteenth article of the treaty of amity and commerce, in relation to armed vessels, privateers, and prizes, and by the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance containing the mutual guarantees.

The release, Mr. W. said, was claimed to have been made in the striking out, by the Senate of the United States, of the second article of the treaty of 30th September, 1800, as that article was originally inserted and agreed upon by the respective negotiators of the two powers. as it stood at the time the treaty was signed. To cause this point to be clearly understood, it would be necessary for him to trouble the Senate with a history of the ratification of this treaty. The second article, as inserted by the negotiators, and as standing at the time of the signing ors, and as standing at the following words:

"Art. 2. The ministers plenipotentiary of the two powers not being able to agree, at preent, respecting the treaty of alliance of 6th February, 1778, the treaty of amity and comnerce of the same date, and the convention of 4th of November, 1788, nor upon the indemties mutually due or claimed, the parties will egotiate further upon these subjects at a covenient time; and, until they may have ereed upon these points, the said treaties and ouvention shall have no operation, and the retions of the two countries shall be regulated follows :

"The residuo of the treaty, Mr. W. said, was substantial copy of the former treaties of amity nd commerce, and alliance between the two ations, with such modifications as were desirble to both, and as experience under the former eaties had shown to be for the mutual interests both:

"This second article was submitted to the mate by the President as a part of the treaty, by the constitution of the United States the resident was bound to do, to the end that the eaty might be properly ratified on the part of eUnited States, the French government having eviously adopted and ratified it as it was signed the respective negotiators, the second article ing then in the form given above. "This rutification by the French Republic, thus qualified, was returned to the United States, and the treaty, with the respective conditional ratifications, was again submitted by the President of the United States to the Senate. That body 'resolved that they considered the said convention as fully ratified, and returned the same to the President for the usual promulgation;' whereupon he completed the ratification in the usual forms and by the usual publication.

with the addition, purporting that the conven-

"This, Mr. W. said, was the documentary history of this treaty and of its ratification, and here was the release of their claims relied upon by the claimants under the bill before the Senate. They contend that this second article of the treaty, as originally inserted by the negotiators, reserved their claims for future negotiation, and also reserved the subjects of disagreement under the treaties of amity and commerce, and of alliance, of 1778, and the consular convention of 1788; that the seventeenth article of the treaty of amity and commerce, and the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance, were particularly onerous upon the United States; that, to discharge the government from the enerous obligations imposed upon it in these two articles of the respective treaties, the Senate was induced to expunge the second article of the treaty of the 30th September above referred to, and, by consequence, to expunge the reservation of their claims as subjects of future negotiation between the two nations; that, in thus obtaining a discharge from the onerous obligations of these treaties, and especially of the two articles above designated, the United States was benefited to an amount beyond the whole value of the claims discharged. and that this benefit was the inducement to the expunging of the second article of the treaty, with a full knowledge that the act did discharge the claims, and create a legal and equitable obligation on the part of the government to pay

"These, Mr. W. said, he understood to be the assumptions of the claimants, and this their course of reasoning to arrive at the conclusion that the United States were liable to them for the amount of their claims. He must here raise a preliminary question, which he had satisfied himself would show these assumptions of the claimants to be wholly without foundation, so far as the idea of benefit to the United States was supposed to be derived from expunging this second article of the treaty of 1800. What, he must be permitted to ask, would have been the limbility of the United States under the 'onerous obligations' referred to, in case the Senate had ratified the treaty, retaining this second article? The binding force of the treaties of amity and commerce, and of alliance, and of the consular convention, was released, and the treaties and convention were themselves suspended by the very article in question; and the subjects of disagreement growing out of them were merely made matters of future negotiation 'at a convenient time.' What was the value or the burden of such an obligation upon the United States? for this was the only obligation from which our government was released by striking out the article. The value, Mr. W. said, was the value of the privilege, being at perfect liberty, in the premises, of assenting to or dissenting from a bad bargain, in a matter of negotiation between ourselves and a foreign power. This was the consideration passing to the United States, and, so far as he was able to view the subject, this was all the consideration the government had received, if it be granted (which he must by no means be understood to admit), that the striking out of the article was a release of the claims, and that such release was intended as a consideration for the benefits to accrue to the government from the act. "Mr. W. said he felt bound to dwell, for a moment, upon this point. What was the value of an obligation to negotiate 'at a convenient time?' Was it any thing to be valued? The 'convenient time, might never arrive, or if it did arrive, and negotiations were opened, were not the government as much at liberty as in any other case of negotiation, to refuse propositions which were deemed disadvantageous to itself? The treaties were suspended, and could not be revived without the consent of the United States: and, of consequence, the 'onerous obligations' comprised in certain articles of these treaties were also suspended until the same consent should revive them. Could he, then, be mistaken in the conclusion that, if the treaty of 1800 had been ratified with the second article forming a part of it, as originally agreed by the negotiators, the United States would have been as effectually released from the onerous obligations of the former treaties, until those obligations should again be put in force by their consent, as they were released when that article was stricken out, and the treaty ratified without it? In short, could be be mistaken in the position that all the inducement, of a national character, to expunge that article from the treaty, was to get rid of an obligation to negotiate 'at a convenient time?' And could it be possible that such an inducement would have led the Senate of the United States, understanding this consequence, to impose upon the government a liability to the amount of $5,000,000? He could not adopt so absurd a supposition; and he felt himself compelled to say that this view of the action of the government in the ratification of the treaty of 1800, in his mind, put an end to the pretence that the striking out of this article relieved the United States from obligations to onerous as to form a valuable consideration for the payments provided for in this bill. He could not view the obligation released—a mere obligation to negotiate—us onerous at all, or a forming any consideration whatever for a pecual ary liability, much less for a liability for millions.

"Mr. W. said he now proposed to consider whether the effect of expunging the second article of the treaty of 1800 was to release and claim of value-any claim which France had ever acknowledged, or ever intended to pay He had before shown, by extracts from the fourth and fifth articles of the treaty of 1840 that certain classes of claims were saved by that treaty, as it was ratifled. The claims so reserved and provided for were paid in pursuance of provisions contained in the treaty between France and the United States, of the 30th of April, 1803; and to determine what claims were thus paid, a reference to some of the articles of that treaty was necessary. The purchase of Louisiana was made by the United States for the sum of 80,000,000 of francs, 60,000,000 of which were to be paid into the French treasur, and the remaining 20,000,000 were to be applied to the payment of these claims. Three separate treaties were made between the parties, bearing all the same date, the first providing for the cession of the territory, the second for the parment of the 60,000,000 of francs to the French treasury, and the third for the adjustment and payment of the claims.
"Mr. W. said the references proposed were

All agreements and bargains concerning merchandise, which shall not be the property of American citizens, arc equally excepted from the benefit of the said convention, saving, however, to such persons their claims in like manner as if this treaty had not been made.

"From these provisions of the treaty, Mr. W. said, it would appear that the claims to be paid were of three descriptions, to wit:

"1. Claims for supplies.

*2. Claims for embargoes.

"3. Claims for captures made at sca, of a description defined in the last c'ause of the 4th and the first clause of the 5th article.

"llow far these claims embraced all which rance ever acknowledged, or ever intended to ay, Mr. W. said he was unable to say, as the me allowed him to examine the case had not ermitted him to look sufficiently into the docuents to make up his mind with precision upon his point. He had found, in a report made to he Serate on the 14th of January, 1831, in fa-or of this bill, by the honorable Mr. Livingston, hen a Senator from the State of Louisiana, the bllowing classification of the French claims, as sisted on at a period before the making of the

reaty of 1800, to wit:
"1. From the capture and detention of about

ty rescls.

12. The detention, for a year, of eighty other essels, under the Bordeaux embargo.

443. The non-payment of supplies to the West idia islands, and to continental France.

"'4. For depredations committed on our com-

"Ar. W. said the comperison of the two assifications of claims would show, at a single ew, that Nos. 2 and 3 in Mr. Livingston's list re provided for by the treaty of 1803, from hich he had read. Whether any, and if any, hat portions of Nos. 1 and 4 in Mr. Living-ston's list were embraced in No 3 of the provisions of the treaty, as he had numbered them he was unable to say; but this much he could say, that he had found nothing to satisfy his mind that parts of both those classes of claims were not so included, and therefore provided for and paid under the treaty; nor had he been able to find any thing to show that this treaty of 1803 did not provide for and pay all the claims which France ever acknowledged or ever in-tended to pay. He was, therefore, unprepared to admit, and did not admit, that any thing of value to any class of individual claimants was released by expunging the second original article from the treaty of the 30th September, 1800. On the contrary, he was strongly impressed with the belief that the adjustment of claims provided for in the treaty of 1803 had gone to the whole extent to which the French government had, at any period of the negotiations, intended to go.

"Mr. W. said this impression was greatly strengthened by the circumstance that the claims under the Bordeaux embargo were expressly provided for in this treaty, while he could see nothing in the treaty of 1800 which seemed to him to authorize the supposition that this class of claims was more clearly embraced within the reservations in that treaty than any class which had been admitted by the French government. "Another fact, Mr. W. said, was material to this subject, and should be borne carefully in mind by every senator. It was, that not a cent was paid by France, even upon the claims re served and admitted by the treaty of 1800, un til the sale of Louisiana to the United States, for a sum greater by thirty millions of francs than that for which the French minister was instructed to sell it. Yes, Mr. President, said Mr. W., the only payment yet made upon any portion of these claims has been virtually made by the United States; for it has been made out of the consideration money paid for Louisiana, after paying into the French treasury ten mil lions of francs beyond the price France herself placed upon the territory. It is a singular fact that the French negotiator was instructed to make the sale for fifty millions, if he could get no more; and when he found that, by yielding twenty millions to pay the claims, he could get eighty millions for the territory, and thus put ten millions more into the treasury of his nation than she had instructed him to ask for the whole, he yielded to the claims and closed the treaty. It was safe to say that, but for this speculation in the sale of Louisiana, not one dollar would have been paid upon the claims to this day. All our subsequent negotiations with France of a sir dar character, and our present relations with that country, growing out of private claims, justify this position. What then, would have been the value of claims, if such fairly exist. vhich were not acknowledged and provide r by the treaty of 1800, but were left for future negotiation 'at a convenient time?' Would they have been worth the five millions of dollars you propose to appropriate by this bill? Would they have been worth further negotiation? He thought they would not.

"Mr. W. said he would avail himself of this occasion, when speaking of the treaty of Louisiana and of its connection with these claims, to explain a mistake into which he had fallen, and which he found from conversation with severai gentlemen, who had been for some years members of Congress, had been common to them and to himself. The mistake to which he alluded was, the supposition that the claimants under this bill put their case upon the assumption that their claims had constituted part of the consideration for which Louisiana had been ceded to the United States; and that the consideration they contended the government had received, and upon which its liability rested, was the cession of that territory for a less sum, in money, than was considered to be its value, on account of the release of the French government from those private claims. He had rested under this misapprehension until the opening of the present debate, and until he commenced an examination of the case. He then found that it was an entire misapprehension; that the United States had paid, in money, for Louisiana, thirty millions of francs beyond the price which France had set upon it; that the claimants under this bill did not rest their claims at all upon this basis, and that the friends of the bill in the Senate did not pretend to derive the liability of the government from this source. Mr. W said he was induced to make this explanation in justice to himself, and because there might be some person within the hearing of his voice who might still be under the same misapprehension.

"He had now, Mr. W. said, attempted to establish the following propositions, viz.:

"1. That a state of actual war, by which he meant a state of actual hostilities and of force, and an interruption of all diplomatic or friendly intercourse between the United States and France, had existed from the time of the passage of the acts of the 7th and 9th of July, 1798, before referred to, until the sending of the negotiators, Ellsworth, Davie, and Murray, in 1800, to make a treaty which put an end to the hostilities existing, upon the best terms that could be obtained; and that the treaty of the 30th of September, 1800, concluded by these negotiators, was, in fact, and so far as private claims were concerned, to be considered as a treaty of peace, and to conclude all such claims, not reserved by it, as finally ratified by the two powers.

"2. That the treaty of amity and commerce, and the treaty of alliance of 1778, as well as the consular convention of 1788, were suspended by the 2d article of the treaty of 1800, and from that time became mere matters for negotiation between the parties at a convenient time;

that, therefore, the desire to get rid of these treaties, and of any 'onerous obligations' coptained in them, was only the desire to get rid of an obligation to negotiate 'at a convenient time;' and that such a consideration could not have induced the Senate of the United States to expunge that article from the treaty, if thereby that body had supposed it was imposing upon the country a liability to pay to its citizens the sum of five millions of dollars—a sum much larger than France had asked, in money, for a full discharge from the 'onerous obligations' relied upon.

"3. That the treaty of 1800 reserved and provided for certain portions of the claims; that payment, according to such reservations, was made under the treaty of 1803; and that it is at least doubtful whether the payment thus made did not cover all the claims ever admitted or ever intended to be paid by France; for which reason the expunging of the second article of the treaty of 1800, by the Senate of the United States, in all probability, released nothing which ever had, or which was ever likely to have value.

"Mr. W. said, if he had been successful in establishing either of these positions, there was an end of the claims, and, by consequence a defeat of the bill.

"The advocates of the bill conceded that two positions must be established, on their part, to sustain it, to wit:

"1. That the claims were valid claims against France, and had never been paid. And "2. That they were released by the govern-

"2. That they were released by the government of the United States for a full and value ble consideration passing to its benefit by mean of the release.

"If, then, a state of war had existed, it would not be contended that any claims of this character, not reserved or provided for in the treaty of peace, were valid claims after then tification of such a treaty. His first proposition, therefore, if sustained, would defeat the bill, by establishing the fact that the claims if not reserved in the treaty of 1800, were my valid claims.

"The second proposition, if sustained would establish the fact that, inasmuch as the valable consideration passing to the United State was alleged to grow out of the 'onerous obligations, in the treaty of amity and comment the treaty of alliance, and the consular conver tion; and inasmuch as these treaties, and a obligations, past, present, or future, 'onerous or otherwise, growing out of them, were se pended and made inoperative by the seem article of the treaty of the 30th of September 1800, until further negotiation, by the comm consent of both powers, should revive them to Senate of the United States could not have a pected, when they expunged this article for the treaty, that, by thus discharging the goven ment from an obligation to negotiate 'at aco venient time,' they were incurring against

"The third proposition, if sustained, would prove that all the claims ever acknowledged, or ever intended to be paid by France, were paid under the treaty of 1803, and that, therefore, as claims never admitted or recognized by France would scarcely be urged as valid claims against her, no valid claims remained; and, consequently, the expunging of the second article of the treaty of the 30th of September, 1800, released nothing which was valid, and nothing remained to be paid by the United States as a liability incurred or that modification of that treaty. Here Mr. W, said he would rest his reasoning as to these three propositions.

"But if the Senate should determine that he had been wrong in them all, and had failed to sustain either, he had still another proposition, which he considered conclusive and unanswerable, as to any valuable consideration for the rebase of these claims having passed to the United states in consequence of their discharge from the onerous obligations' said to have been contained in the former treaties. These onerous obligations,' and the only ones of which he had heard any thing in the course of the dehate, or of which he had found any thing in the documents, arose under the 17th article of the treaty of amity and commerce, and the 11th article of the treaty of alliance; and, in relation to both, he laid down this broad proposition, which would be fully sustained by the treaties themselves, and by every act and every expression on the part of the American negotiators, and the government of the United States, viz.:

"The obligations, liabilities, and responsibilities, imposed upon the government of the United States and upon France by the 17th article of the treaty of amity and commerce of 1778, and by the 11th article of the treaty of alliance of 1778, where mutual, reciprocal, and qual: each formed the consideration, and the only consideration, for the other; and, therefore, my release which discharged both powers from those liabilities, responsibilities, and obliations, must have been mutual, reciprocal, and qual; and the release of either must have brmed a full and valuable consideration for the elease of the other.'

"Mr. W. said he would not trouble the Senate y again reading the articles from the respective reaties. They would be recollected, and no one ould controvert the fact that, when the treaes were made, these articles were intended to entain mutual, reciprocal, and equal obligations. y the first we gave to France the liberty of ir ports for her armed vessels, privateers, and rizes, and prohibited all other powers from the joyment of the same privilege; and France gave to us the liberty of her ports for our armed vessels, privateers, and prizes, and guarded the privilege by the same prohibition to other powers; and by the second we guaranteed to France, for ever, her possessions in America, able consideration for the payment of private and France guaranteed to us, for ever, 'our lib-claims to the amount of five millions of dollars. erty, sovereignty, and independence absolute and unlimited, as well in matters of government as commerce.' Such were the obligations in their original inception. Will it be contended that they were not mutual, reciprocal, and equal, and that, in each instance, the one did not form the consideration for the other? Surely no one will take this ground.

"If, then, said Mr. W., the obligations imposed upon each government by these articles of the respective treaties were mutual, reciprocal, and equal, when undertaken, they must have remained equal until abrogated by war, or changed by treaty stipulation. No treaty, subsequent to those which contain the obligations. had affected them in any manner whatever. If, us he had attempted to show, war had existed from July, 1778, to 1800, that would not have rendered the obligations unequal, but would have abrogated them altogether. If, as the friends of the bill contend, there had been no war, and the treaties were in full force up to the signing of the convention of the 30th of September, 1800, what was the effect of that treaty, as originally signed by the negotiators, upon these mutual, reciprocal, and equal obligations? The second original article of that treaty will answer. It did not attempt to disturb their mutuality, reciprocity, or equality, but suspended them as they were, past, present, or future, and made all the subject of future negotiation at a convenient time.

"But, Mr. W. said, the Senate of the United States expunged this article of the trenty of 1800, and refused to advise and consent to ratify it as a part of the treaty; and hence it was contended the United States had discharged themselves from the 'onerous obligations' of these articles in the respective treaties, and had, by that act, incurred, to the claimants under this bill, the heavy liability which it recognizes. If the expunging of that article discharged the United States from obligations thus onerous, did it not discharge France from the fellow obligations? Was not the discharge, made in that manner, as mutual, reciprocal, and equal, as the obligations in their inception, and in all their subsequent stages up to that act? How, then, could it be contended that the discharge of the one was not a full and adequate consideration for the discharge of the other? Nothing upon the face of the treaties authorized the introduction of this inequality at this step in the official proceedings. Nothing in the record of the proceedings of the Scnate, when acting upon the article, indicates that they intended to pay five millions of dollars to render this mutual release equal between the two powers. The obligations and responsibilities were reserved as subjects of future negotiation, upon terms of equality, and the striking out of that reservation was but a mutual and reciprocal and equal release from the obligation further to negotiate. This much for the reciprocity of these obligations as derived from the action of the sovereign powers themselves.

"What was to be learned from the action of their respective negotiators? He did not doubt but that attempts had been made on the part of France to exhibit an inequality in the obliga-tions under the treaty, and to set up that inequality against the claims of our citizens; but had our negotiators ever admitted the inequality to exist, or ever attempted to compromise the rights of the claimants under this bill for such a consideration? He could not find that they had. He did not hear it contended that they had: and, from the evidence of their acts, remaining upon record, as a part of the diplomatic correspondence of the period, he could not suppose they had ever entertained the idea. He had said that the American negotiators had always treated these obligations as mutual, reciprockl, and equal; and he now proposed to read to the Senate a part of a letter from Messrs. Ellsworth, Davie, and Murray, addressed to the French negotiators, and come ming the project of a treaty, to justify his assertion. The letter was dated 20th August, 1800, and it would be recollected that its authors were the negotiators, on the part of the United States, of the treaty of the 30th of September, 1800. The extract is as follows:

"11. Let it be declared that the former treaties are renewed and confirmed, and shall have the same effect as if no misunderstanding between the two powers had intervened, except so far as they are derogated from by the present to pay to the other, within seven years, three millions of francs, in money or securities which may be issued for indemnities, and thereby to reduce the rights of the other as to privateers and prizes, to those of the most favored nation. And during the said term allowed for option, the right of both parties shall be limited by the line of the most favored nation.

"3. The mutual guaranty in the treaty of alliance shall be so specified and limited, that its future obligation shall be, on the part of France, when the United States shall be attacked, to furnish and deliver at her own ports military stores to the amount of one million of francs; and, on the part of the United States, when the French possessions in America, in any future war, shall be attacked, to furnish and deliver at their own ports a like amount in provisions. It shall, moreover, be optional for either party to exonerate itself wholly of its obligation, by paying to the other, within seven years, a gross sum of five millions of francs, in money or such securities as may be issued for indemnities.' 'Mr. W. asked if he needed further proofs that not only the American government but the American negotiators, treated these obligations under the treaty as, in all respects, mutual, po elprocal, and equal; and if the fallacy of the argument that the United States had obtained to itself a valuable consideration for the release of these private claims in the release of itself from these obligations, was not utterly and entirely disproved by these facts ? Was not the release of the obligations on the one side the release of them on the other? And was not the one release the necessary consideration for the other) How, then, could it be said, with any justice that we sought our release at the expense of the claimants? There was no reasonable ground for such an allegation, either from the acts of our government or of our negotiators. When the latter fixed a value upon our obligations as to the privateers and prizes, and as to the guaranty, in the same article they fixed the Fange price, to a franc, upon the reciprocal obligations of France; and when the former discharged our liability, by expunging the second article of the treaty of 1800, the same act discharged the copresponding liability of the French government.

"Here, then, Mr. W. said, muss end all letence of a valuable consideration for these claim passing to the United States from this source. The onerous obligations were mutual, reciprocal and equal, and the respective releases were mutual, reciprocal, and equal, and simultaneous and nething could be fairly drawn from the at which operated these mutual releases to benefit

"Mr. W. said he was, then, necessarily brought back to the proposition with which he started in the commencement of his argument, that if the United States were liable to pay these claimants, that limbility must rest upon the broad ground of a failure by the government after ordinary, and, in this instance, extraordnary efforts to collect the money. a release of the claims for a valuable considertion passing to the government had been erploded, and, if a liability was to be claimed on account of a failure to collect the money, upos what ground did it rest? What had the gor ernment done to protect the rights of these claimants 7 It had negotiated from 1793 m 1798, with a vigilance and zeal and talent almost unprecedented in the history of diplomar. It had sent to France minister after minister, and, upon several occasions, extraordinary missions composed of several individuals. Be tween 1798 and 1800, it had equipped fleet and armies, expended millions in warlike preparation, and finally sent forth its citizens n battle and death, to force the payment of the claims. Were we now to be told, that or failure in these efforts had created a liability against us to pay the money? That the same citizens who had been taxed to pay the er penses of these long negotiations, and of the war for the claims, were to be further taxed to pay such of the claims as we had tailed tool

But, Mr. President, said Mr. W., there is another view of this subject, placed upon this basis, which renders this bill of trilling importance in the comparison. If the failure to collect these claims has created the liability to pay them, that liability goes to the extent of the claims proved, and the interest upon them, not to a partial, and perhaps trifling, dividend. Who, then, would undertake to say what amount of claims might not be proved during the state of things he had described, from the braking out of the war between France and England, in 1793, to the execution of the treaty, in 1800? For a great portion of the period, the municipal regulations of France required the captured cargoes to be not confiscated, but paid for at the market value at the port to which the vessel was destined. Still the capture would be proved, the value of the cargo ascertained, before the commission which the bill proposes to establish; and who would adluce the proof that the same cargo was paid for by the French government ?

"This principle, however, Mr. W. said, went much further than the whole subject of the old French claims. It extended to all claims for spolintions upon our commerce, since the existence of the government, which we had failed to collect. Who could say where the liability would end? In how many cases had claims of his character been settled by treaty, what had een collected in each case, and what amount emained unpaid, after the release of the foreign overament? He had made an unsuccessful fort to answer these inquiries, so far as the les of the state department would furnish the normation, as he had found that it could only e collected by an examination of each indiviual claim; and this would impose a labor upon he department of an unreasonable character, nd would occupy more time than remained to mish the information for his use upon the preent occasion. He had, however, been favored y the Secretary of State with the amounts al-wed by the commissioners, the amounts paid, al the rate of pay upon the principal, in two cent cases, the Florida treaty, and the treaty ith Denmark. In the former instance, the yment was ninety-one and two thirds per atum upon the principal, while in the latter it is but thirty-one and one eighth per centum. sume that these two cases are the maximum d minimum of all the cases where releases we been given for partial payments; and begged the Senate to reflect upon the ounts unpaid which might be called from the tional treasury, if the principle were once adtted that a failure to collect creates a liability

That in his assumption that a liability of soft must go to the whole amount of the ims, he only took the ground contended for the friends of this bill, he would trouble the Senate with another extract from the report of Mr. Livingston, from which he had before read In speaking of the amount which should be appropriated. Mr. Livineston away.

propriated, Mr. Livingston says:

6 The only remaining inquiry is the amount; and on this point the committee have had some difficulty. Two modes of measuring the compensation suggested themselves:

" 1. The actual loss sustained by the peti-

" '2. The value of the advantages received, as the consideration, by the United States.

" The first is the one demanded by strict instice; and is the only one that satisfies the word used by the constitution, which requires just compensation, which cannot be said to have been made when any thing less than the full value is given. But there were difficulties which appeared insurmountable, to the adoption of this rule at the present day, arising from the multiplicity of the claims, the nature of the depredations which occasioned them, the loss of documents, either by the lapse of time, or the wilful destruction of them by the depredators The committee, therefore, could not undertake to provide a specific relief for each of the petitioners. But they have recommended the institution of a board, to enter into the investigation, and apportion a sum which the committee have recommended to be appropriated, pro rata, among the several claimants.

" 'The committee could not believe that the amount of compensation to the sufferers should be calculated by the advantages secured to the United States, because it was not, according to their ideas, the true measure. If the property of an individual be taken for public use, and the government miscalculate, and find that the object to which they have applied it has been injurious rather than beneficial, the value of the property is still due to the owner, who ought not to suffer for the false speculations which have been made. A turnpike or canal may be very unproductive; but the owner of the land which has been taken for its construction is not the less entitled to its value. On the other hand, he can have no manner of right to more than the value of his property, be the object to which it has been applied ever so beneficial.'

"Here, Mr. W. said, were two proposed grounds of estimating the extent of the liability of the government to the claimants; and that which graduated it by the value received by the government was distinctly rejected, while that making the amount of the claims the measure of liability, was as distinctly asserted to be the true and just standard. He hoped he had shown, to the satisfaction of the Senate, that the former rule of value received by the government would allow the claimants nothing at all, while he was compelled to say that, upon the broad principle that a failure to collect creates a liability to pay, he could not controvert the correctness of the conclusion that the liability must be commen-thought, successfully, the principle, but he could not the measure of damages when the principle was conceded. He would here conclude his remarks upon the points he had noticed, by the carnest declaration that he believed the passage of this bill would open more widely the doors of the public treasury than any legislation of which he had any knowledge, or to which Congress had ever yielded its assent.

"Mr. W. said he had a few observations to offer relative to the mode of legislation proposed, and to the details of the bill, and he would trouble the Senate no further.

"His first objection, under this head, was to the mode of legislation. If the government be liable to pay these claims, the claimants are citizens of the country, and Congress is as accessible to them as to other claimants who have demands against the treasury. Why were they not permitted, individually, to apply to Congress to establish their respective claims, as other claimants were bound to do, and to receive such relief, in each case, as Congress, in its wisdom, should see fit to grant? Why were these claims, more than others, grouped together, and attempted to be made a matter of national importance? Why was a commission to be established to ascertain their validity, a duty in ordinary cases discharged by Congress itself? Were the Senate sure that much of the importance given to these claims had not proceeded from this association, and from the formidable amount thus presented at one view? Would any gentleman be able to convince himself that, acting upon a single claim in this immense mass, he should have given it his favorable consideration? For his part, he considered the mode of legislation unusual and objectionable. His principal objections to the details were, that the second section of the bill prescribed the rules which should govern the commission in deciding upon the claims, among which 'the former treaties between the United States and France' were enumerated; and that the bill contained no declaration that the payments made under it were in full of the claims, or that the respective claimants should execute a release, as a condition of receiving their dividends.

"The first objection was predicated upon the fact that the bill covered the whole period from the making of the treaties of 1778, to that of the 30th September, 1800, and made the former treaties the rule of adjudication, when Congress, on the 7th July, 1798, by a deliberate legislative act, declared those treaties void, and no longer binding upon the United States or their citizens. It is a fact abundantly proved by the documents, that a large portion of the claims now to be paid, arose within the period last alluded to; and that treaties declared to be void should be made the law in determining what were and what wen not illegal captures, during the time that the were held to have no force, and when our ritizen were authorized by law to go upon the high regardless of their provisions, Mr. W. said, would seem to him to be an absurdity which the Senate would not legalize. He was fully aware that the first section of the bill purported to provide for 'valid claims to indemnity upon the French government, arising out of illegal captures, detentions, forcible seizures, illegal condemnations and confiscations; but it could not be over looked that illegal captures, condemnations, and confiscations, must relate entirely to the law which was to govern the adjudication; and that law was a void treaty which the claimants were not bound to observe, and did not observe was it not more than possible that a capture condemnation, or confiscation might, by compulsion, be adjudged illegal under the rule fixel by the bill, while that same capture, condemnation, or confiscation, was strictly legal under the laws which governed the commerce of the claim. ant when the capture was made? He must sar that it appeared clear to his mind that the rule of adjudication upon the validity of claims of this description, should, in all cases, be the same rule which governed the commerce out of which the claims have arisen.

"His second objection, Mr. W. said, was made more as a wish that a record of the intentions of the present Congress should be preserved upon the face of the bill, than from any idea that the provision suggested would afford the least protection to the public treasury. Every day's legislation showed the futility of the insertion in an act of Congress of a declaration that the appropriation made should be in full of a claim: and in this, as in other like cases, should this bill pass, he did not expect that it would be in practice, any thing more than an instalment upon the claims which would be sustained before the commission. The files of the state department would contain the record evidence of the balance, with the admission of the government in the passage of this bill, that an equal liability remained to pay that balance, whatever it might be. Even a release from the respective claimant he should consider as likely to have no other effect than to change their future applications from a demand of legal right, which they now assume to have, to one of equity and favor; and he was yet to see that the latter would not be as successful as the former. He must give his vote against the bill, whether modified in the particular or not, and he should do so under the most full and clear conviction, that it was a preposition fraught with greater dangers to the public treasury, than any law which had en

FRENCH SPOLIATIONS-MR. WEBSTER'S SPEECH,

"The que ition, sir, involved in this case, is essentially a judicial question. It is not a question of public policy, but a question of private right; a question between the government and the petimers: and, as the government is to be judge in its own case, it would seem to be the duty of its members to examine the subject with the most scrupulous good faith, and the most solicitous desire to do justice.

"There is a propriety in commencing the exmination of these claims in the Senate, because twas the Senate which, by its amendment of the treaty of 1800, and its subsequent ratification of that treaty, and its recognition of the treaty, and its recognition of the treaty and for wer cut off the petitioners from all hopes of reas from that quarter. The claims, as claims caust our own government, have their foundation in these acts of the Senate itself; and it were trainly be expected that the Senate will onsider the effects of its own proceedings, on rivate rights and private interests, with that ander and justice which belong to its high character.

"It ought not to be objected to these petioners, that their claim is old, or that they are or reviving any thing which has herectofore enabandoned. There has been no delay which not reasonably accounted for. The treaty by hich the claimants say their claims on France these captures and confiscations were released is concluded in 1800. They immediately apied to Congress for indemnity, as will be seen the report made in 1802, in the House of presentatives, by a committee of which a disguished member from Virginia, not now living fr. Gilesl, was chairman.

r. Giles], was chairman. In 1807, on the petition of sundry merchants d others, citizens of Charleston, in South Caina, a committee of the House of Representaes, of which Mr. Marion, of that State, was irman, made a report, declaring that the mittee was of opinion that the government the United States was bound to indemnify claimants. But at this time our affairs with European powers at war had become exceedr embarrassed; our government had felt if compelled to withdraw our commerce from ocean; and it was not until after the conion of the war of 1812, and after the general fication of Europe, that a suitable opportunity erred of presenting the subject again to the ous consideration of Congress. From that the petitioners have been constantly before and the period has at length arrived proper final decision of their case.

"Another objection, sir, has been urged against these claims, well calculated to diminish the favor with which they might otherwise be received, and which is without any substantial foundation in fact. It is, that a great portion of them has been bought up, as a matter of speculation, and it is now holden by these purchasers. It has even been said, I think, on the floor of the Senate, that nine tenths, or ninety hundredths, of all the claims are owned by speculators. "Such unfounded statements are not only wholly unjust towards these petitioners themselves, but they do great mischief to other interests. I have observed that a French gentleman of distinction, formerly a resident in this country, is represented in the public newspapers as having declined the offer of a seat in the French administration, on the ground that he could not support the American treaty; and he could not support the treaty because he had learned, or heard, while in America, that the claims were no longer the property of the original sufferers, but had passed into unworthy hands. If any such thing has been learned in the United States, it has been learned from sources entirely incorrect. The general fact is not so; and this prejudice, thus operating on a great national interest -an interest in regard to which we are in danger of being seriously embroiled with a foreign statewas created, doubtless, by the same incorrect and unfounded assertions which have been made relative to this other class of claims.

"In regard to both classes, and to all classes of claims of American citizens on foreign governments, the statement is at variance with the facts. Those who make it have no proof of it. On the contrary, incontrovertible evidence exists of the truth of the very reverse of this statement. The claims against France, since 1800, re now in the course of adjudication. They are 1, or very nearly all, presented to the proper to bunal. Proofs accompany them, and the runes of the tribunal require that, in each case, the true ownership should be fully and exactly set out, on oath; and be proved by the papers, vouchers, and other evidence. Now, sir, if any man is acquainted, or will make himself acquainted, with the proceedings of this tribunal, so far as to see who are the parties claiming the indemnity, he will see the absolute and enormous error of those who represent these claims to be owned, in great part, by speculators.

"The truth is, sir, that these claims, as well those since 1800 as before, are owned and possessed by the original sufferers, with such changes only as happen in regard to all other property. The original owner of ship and cargo his representative, where such owner is dead underwriters who have paid losses on account of captures and confiscations; and creditors of insolvents and bankrupts who were interested in the claims—these are the descriptions of persons who, in all these cases, own vastly the larger portion of the claims. This is true of the claims on Spain, as is most manifest from the proceedings of the commissioners under the Spanish treaty. It is true of the claims on France arising since 1800, as is equally manifest by the proceedings of the commissioners now sitting; and it is equally true of the claims which are the subject of this discussion, and provided for in this bill. In some instances claims have been assigned from one to another, in the settlement of family affairs. They have been transferred, in other instances, to secure or to pay debts; they have been transferred, sometimes, in the settlement of insurance accounts; and it is probable there are a few cases in which the necessities of the holders have compelled them to sell them. But nothing can be further from the truth than that they have been the general subjects of purchase and sale, and that they are now holden mainly by purchasers from the original owners. They have been compared to the unfunded debt. But that consisted in scrip, of fixed amount, and which passed from hand to hand by delivery. These claims cannot so pass from hand to hand. In each case, not only the value but the amount is uncertain. Whether there be any claim, is in each case a matter for investigation and proof; and so is the amount, when the justice of the claim itself is established. These circumstances are of themselves quite sufficient to prevent the easy and frequent transfer of the claims from hand to hand. They would lead us to expect that to happen which actually has happened; and that is, that the claims remain with their original owners, and their legal heirs and representatives, with such exceptions as I have already mentioned. As to the portion of the claims now owned by underwriters, it can hardly be necessary to say that they stand on the same equity and justice as if possessed and presented by the owners of ships and goods. There i no more universal maxim of law and justice. throughout the civilized and commercial world, than that an underwriter, who has paid a loss on ships or merchandise to the owner, is entitled to whatever may be received from the property. His right accrues by the very act of payment; and if the property, or its proceeds, be afterwards recovered, in whole or in part, whether the recovery be from the sea, from captors, or from the justice of foreign states, such recovery is for the benefit of the underwriter. Any attempt, therefore, to prejudice these claims, on the ground that many of them belong to insurance companies, or other underwriters, is at war with the first principles of justice.

"A short, but accurate, general view of the history and character of these claims is presented in the report of the Secretary of State, on the 20th of May, 1826, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate. Allow me, sir, to read the paragraphs:

"The Secretary can hardly suppose it to have been the intention of the resolution to require the expression of an argumentative opinion | the respective pretensions which were the

as to the degree of responsibility to the Amen can sufferers from French spoliations, which the convention of 1800 extinguished, on the part of France, or devolved on the United States, the Senate itself being most competent to decide that question. Under this impression, he hops that he will have sufficiently conformed to the purposes of the Senute, by a brief statement prepared in a hurried moment, of what he up derstands to be the question.

"'The second article of the convention of 1800 was in the following words: "The miniters plenipotentiary of the two parties, not be ing able to agree, at present, respecting the treaty of alliance of the 6th of February, 1778 the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th of November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects, at a convenient time; and until they may have a reed upon these points the said treaties and convention shall have n operation, and the relations of the two courtries shall be regulated as follows."

"' When that convention was laid before the Senate, it gave its consent and advice that should be ratified, provided that the secondari cle be expunged, and that the following article be added or inserted: "It is agreed that the on shall be in force for the tern present co: of eight was from the time of the exchanged the rational or;" and it was accordingly w ratified by the President of the United States on the 18th day of February, 1801. On the 31st of July of the same year, it was ratifed by Bonaparte, First Consul of the French Re public, who incorporated in the instrument of his ratification the following clause as parte it: "The government of the United States, has ing added to its ratification that the convention should be in force for the space of eight year and having omitted the second article, the go ernment of the French Republic consents accept, ratify, and confirm the above convention with the addition, importing that the conve tion shall be in force for the space of eight was and with the retrenchment of the second in cle: Provided, That, by this retrenchment, two states renounce the respective pretends which are the object of the said article."

"'The French ratification being thus contional, was, nevertheless, exchanged against of the United States, at Paris, on the same ! of July. The President of the United Sta considering it necessary again to submit convention, in this state, to the Schate, on 19th day of December, 1801, it was resolved the Senate that they considered the said com tion as fully ratified, and returned it to theh sident for the usual promulgation. It was cordingly promulgated, and thereafter rem as a valid and binding compact. The two tracting parties thus agreed, by the retre ment of the second article, mutually to remain jet of that article. The pretensions of the Inted States, to which allusion is thus made. are out of the spoliations under color of French authority, in contravention of law and existing maties. Those of France sprung from the treaty falliance of the 6th of February, 1778, the realy of amity and commerce of the same date, nd the convention of the 14th of November. Whatever obligations or indemnities, from bese sources, either party had a right to denand, were respectively waived and abandoned; and the consideration which induced one party o renounce his pretensions, was that of renun-lation by the other party of his pretensions. that was the value of the obligations and inemities, so reciprocally renounced, can only enatter of speculation. The amount of the demaities due to the citizens of the United lates was very large; and, on the other hand. e obligation was great (to specify no other reach pretensions), under which the United lates were placed, in the eleventh article of the raty of alliance of the 6th of February, 1778, which they were bound for ever to guarantee on that time the then possessions of the own of France in America, as well as those hich it might acquire by the future treaty of ace with Great Britain; all these possessions ring been, it is believed, conquered at, or not ng after, the exchange of the ratifications of convention of September, 1800, by the arms Great Britain, from France.

The fifth article of the amendments to the stitution provides: "Nor shall private prow be taken for public use, withon; just comasation." If the indemnities to which citis of the United States were entitled for ench spolintions prior to the 30th of Septem-1800, have been appropriated to absolve the ited States from the fulfilment of an obligawhich they had contracted, or from the ment of indemnities which they were bound make to France, the Senate is most competo determine how far such an appropriation public use of private property within the it of the constitution, and whether equitable siderations do not require some compensato be made to the claimants. The Senate lso best able to estimate the probability ch existed of an ultimate recovery from ace of the amount due for those indemnities, hey had not been renounced; in making thestimate, it will, no doubt, give just weight he painful consideration that repeated and nt appeals have been, in vain, made to the ice of France for satisfaction of flagrant ags committed upon property of other citiof the United States, subsequent to the d of the 30th of September, 1800.

Before the interference of our government these claims, they constituted just demands st the government of France. They were vague expectations of possible future intity for injuries received, to uncertain to garded as valuable, or be estermed property. They were just demands, and, as such, they were property. The courts of law took notice of them as property. They were capable of being devised, of being distributed among heirs and next of kin, and of being transferred and assigned, like other legal and just debts. A claim or demand for a ship unjustly seized and confiscated is property, as clearly as the ship itself. It may not be so valuable, or so certain; but it is as clear a right, and has been uniformly so regarded by the courts of law. The papers show that American citizens had claims against the French government for six hundred and fifteen vessels unlawfully seized and confiscated. If this were so, it is difficult to see how the government of the United States can release these claims for its own benefit, with any more propriety than it could have applied the money to its own use, if the French government had been ready to make compensation, in money, for the property thus illegally seized and confiscated; or how the government could appropriate to itself the just claims which the owners of these six hundred and fifteen vessels held against the wrong-doers, without making compensation, any more than it could appropriate to itself, without making compensation, six hundred and fifteen ships which had not been seized. I do not mean to say that the te of compensation should be the same in bot ases; I do not mean to say that a claim for a ip is of as much value as a ship; but I mean say that both the one und the other are property, and that government cannot, with justice, deprive a man of either, for its own benefit, without making a fair compen-

"It will be perceived at once, sir, that these claims do not rest on the ground of any neglect or omission, on the part of the government of the United States, in demanding satisfaction from France. That is not the ground. The government of the United States, in that respect, performed its full duty. It remonstrated against these Illegal seizures; it insisted on redress; it sent two special missions to France, charged expressly, among other duties, with the duty of demanding indemnity. But France had her subjects of complaint, also, against the government of the United States, which she pressed with equal earnestness and confidence, and which she would neither postpone nor relinquish, except on the condition that the United States would postpone or relinquish these claims. And to meet this condition, and to restore harmony between the two nations, the United States did agree, first to postpone, and afterwards to relinquish, these claims of its own citizens. In other words, the government of the United States bought off the claims of France against itself, by discharging claims of our own citizens against France.

"This, sir, is the ground on which these citizens think they have a claim for reasonable indemnity against their own government. And now, sir, before proceeding to the disputed part of the case, permit me to state what is ad-

"In the first place, then, it is universally admitted that these petitioners once had just claims against the government of France, on account of these illegal captures and condemna-

"In the next place, it is admitted that these claims no longer exist against France; that they have, in some way, been extinguished or released, as to her; and that she is for ever discharged from all duty of paying or satisfying them, in whole or in part.

"These two points being admitted, it is then necessary, in order to support the present bill, to maintain four propositions:

"1. That these claims subsisted against France up to the time of the treaty of September, 1800, between France and the United States.

"2. That they were released, surrendered, or extinguished by that treaty, its amendment in cotiation ought to be the determination of the Senate, and the manner of its final ratifica-

"3. That they were thus released, surrendered, or extinguished, for political and national considerations, for objects and purposes deemed important to the United States, but in which these claimants had no more interest than any other citizens.

"4. That the amount or measure of indemnity proposed by this bill is no more than a fair and reasonable compensation, so far as we can judge by what has been done in similar cases.

"1. Were these subsisting claims against France up to the time of the treaty? It is a conclusive answer to this question, to say that the government of the United States insisted that they did exist, up to the time of the treaty, and demanded indemnity for them, and that the French government fully admitted their existence, and acknowledged its obligation to make such indemnity.

"The negotiation, which terminated in the treaty, was opened by a direct proposition for indemnity, made by our ministers, the justice and propriety of which was immediately acceded to by the ministers of France.

"On the 7th of April, 1800, in their first letter to the ministers of France, Messrs. Ellsworth, Davie, and Murray, say: "Citizen ministers:—The undersigned, appreciating the value of time, and wishing by frankness to evince their sincerity, enter directly upon the great object of their mission—an object which they believe may be best obtained by avoiding to retrace minutely the too wellknown and too painful incidents which have rendered a negotiation necessary.

"'To satisfy the demands of justice, and render a reconciliation cordial and permanent, they propose an arrangement, such as shall be compatible with national honor and existing eircumstances, to ascertain and discharge the equitable claims of the citizens of either nation upon the other, whether founded on contract, treaty, or that war had existed, yet we find that a

"The ministers ple sipotentiary of the French Republic have read attentively the proposition for a plan of negotiation which was communication cated to them by the envoys extraordinary as ministers plenipotentiary of the United State of America.

"'They think that the first object of the m regulations, and the steps to be followed for the estimation and indemnification of injure for which either nation may make claim for self, or for any of its citizens. And that second object is to assure the execution of the ties of friendship and commerce made between the two nations, and the accomplishment of the views of reciprocal advantages which suggest

"It is certain, therefore, that the negotian commenced in the recognition, by both parts of the existence of individual claims, and of the justice of making satisfaction for them; and is equally clear that, throughout the whole gotiation, neither party suggested that the claims had already been either satisfied or tinguished; and it is indisputable that the tra itself, in the second article, expressly admit their existence, and solemly recognized the

"It will be observed, sir, that the French" gotiators, in their first letter, while they at the justice of providing indemnity for individclaims, bring forward, also, claims arising with treaties; taking care, thus early, to advance pretensions of France on account of alleged lations by the United States of the treaties 1778. If, inround of a war, and peace be afterwards conuded without obtaining any acknowledgment the right, such a peace may be construed be a relinquishment of the right, on the ground hat the question has been put to the arbitration the sword, and decided. But, if a war be aged to enforce a disputed claim, and it be cared on till the adverse party admit the claim, nd agree to provide for its payment, it would strange, indeed, to hold that the claim itself as extinguished by the very war which had ompelled its express recognition. Now, whatper we call that state of things which existed etween the United States and France from 1798 b 1800, it is evident that neither party contendor supposed that it had been such a state of ings as had extinguished individual claims for demnity for illegal seizures and confiscations.
"The honorable member, sir, to sustain his hipt, must prove that the United States went war to vindicate these claims; that they waged at war unsuccessfully; and that they were crefore glad to make peace, without obtaining wment of the claims, or any admission of their stice. I am happy, sir, to say that, in my inion, facts do not authorize any such record be made up against the United States. I think is clear, sir, that whatever misunderstanding isted between the United States and France, did not amount, at any time, to open and pubwar. It is certain that the amicable relations the two countries were much disturbed; it is tain that the United States nuthorized armed istance to French captures, and the captures French vessels of war found hovering on our st; but it is certain, also, not only that there s no declaration of war, on either side, but t the United States, under all their provocans, did never nuthorize general reprisals on "It is not an act declaring war; it is not an act authorizing reprisals; it is not an act which, in any way, acknowledges the actual existence of war. Its whole implication and import is the other way. Its title is. 'An act more effectually to protect the commerce and coasts of the United States.'

"This is its preamble:

"Whereas armed vessels, sailing under nuthority, or pretence of authority, from the Republic of France, have committed depredations on the commerce of the United States, and have recently captured the vessels and property of citizens thereof, on and near the coasts, in violation of the law of nations, and treaties between the United States and the French nation: therefore '--

"And then follows its only section, in these words:

"'SEC. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, and he is hereby authorized, to instruct and direct the commanders of the armed vessels belonging to the United States, to seize, take, and bring into any port of the United States, to be proceeded against according to the laws of nations, any such armed vessel which shall have committed, or which shall be found hovering on the coasts of the United States for the purpose of committing, depredations on the vessels belonging to citizens thereof; and also retake any ship or vessel, of any citizen or citizens of the United States, which may have been captured by any such armed vessel.' "This act, it is true, authorized the use of force, under certain circumstances, and for eertain objects, against French vessels. But there may be acts of authorized force, there may be assults, there may be battles, there may be captures of ships and imprisonment of persons, and yet no general war. Cases of this kind may occur under that practice of retortion which is justified, when adopted for just cause, by the laws and usages of nations, and which all the writers distinguish from general war. "The first provision in this law is purely pre-ventive and defensive; and the other hardly goes beyond it. Armed vessels hovering on our coast, and eapturing our vessels, under authority, or pretence of authority, from a foreign state, might be captured and brought in, and vessels already seized by them retaken. The act is limited to armed vessels; but why was this, if general war existed? Why was not the naval power of the country let loose at once, if there were war, against the commerce of the enemy? The cruisers of France were preying on our commerce; if there was war, why were we restrained from general reprisals on her commerce? This restaining of the operation of our naval marine to armed vessels of France, and to such coast, for the purpose of committing depredations on our commerce, instead of proving a state of war, proves, I think, irresistibly, that a state of general war did not exist. But even if this act of Congress left the matter doubtful, other acts passed at and near the same time demonstrate the understanding of Congress to have been, that although the relations between the two countries were greatly disturbed, yet that war did not exist. On the same day (May 28, 1798) in which this act passed, on which the member from New-York lays so much stress, as proving the actual existence of war with France, Congress passed another act, entitled 'An act authorizing the President of the United States to raise a provisional army;' and the first section declared that the President should be authorized, 'in the event of a declaration of war against the United States, or of actual invasion of their territory by a foreign power, or of imminent danger of such invasion, to cause to be enlisted,' &c., ten thousand men.

"On the 16th of July following, Congress passed the law for augmenting the army, the second section of which authorized the Fresident to raise twelve additional regiments of infantry, and six troops of light dragoons, 'to be enlisted for and during the continuance of the existing differences between the United States and the French Republic, unless sooner discharged,' &c.

"The following spring, by the act of the 2d of March, 1799, entitled 'An act giving eventual authority to the President of the United States to augn ant the army,' Congress provided that it should be lawful for the President of the United States, in case war should break out between the United States and a foreign European power, &c., to raise twenty-four regiments of infantry, &c. And in the act for better organizing the army, passed the next day, Congress repeats the declaration, contained in a former act, that certain provisions shall not take effect unless war shall break out between the United States and some European prince petentials.

and some European prince, potentate, or state.

"On the 20th of February, 1800, an act was passed to suspend the act for augmenting the army; and this last act declared that further enlistments should be suspended until the further order of Congress, unless in the recess of Congress, and during the continuance of the existing differences between the United States and the French Republic, war should break out between the United States and the French Republic, or imminent danger of an invasion of their territory by the said Republic should be discovered.

"On the 14th of May, 1800, four months before the conclusion of the treaty, Congress passed an act authorizing the suspension of military appointments, and the discharge of troops under the provisions of the previous laws. No commentary is necessary, sir, on the texts of these statutes, to show that Congress never recognized the existence of war between the United States and France. They apprehended war might commence. "The honorable member's second princip source of argument, to make out the fact of state of war, is the several non-intercourse And here again it seems to me an exactly on site inference is the true one. In 1798, 179 and 1800, acts of Congress were passed suspen ing the commercial intercourse between United States, each for one year. Did any ernment ever pass a law of temporary non-tercourse with a public enemy? Such a would be little less than an absurdity. War self effectually creates non-intercourse. It m ders all trade with the enemy illegal, and course, subjects all vessels found so engaged w their cargoes, to capture and condemnation enemy's property. The first of these has passed June 13, 1798, the last, February 1800. Will the honorable member from he York tell us when the war commenced? W did it break out? When did those 'difference of which the acts of Congress speak, assume character of general hostility? Was then state of war on the 13th of June, 1798, the Congress passed the first non-intercourse a and did Congress, in a state of public war, in non-intercourse with the enemy to one ver Or was there a state of peace in June in and, if so, I ask again, at what time after the period, and before September, 1800, did the break out? Difficulties of no small magnin surround the gentleman, I think, whatever com he takes through these statutes, while he tempts to prove from them a state of war, 1 truth is, they prove, incontestably, a state peace; a state of endandgered, disturbed, agin peace; but still a state of peace. lear, beyond all reasonable question, that Conres never, at any time, regarded the state of things existing between the United States and France as being a state of war.

"As little did the executive government so reard it, as must be apparent from the instrucwas sent to France. Those instructions, having neurred to the numerous acts of wrong committel on the commerce of the United States, and the refusal of indemnity by the government of France, proceed to say: 'This conduct of the Franch Republic would well have justified an mmediate declaration of war on the part of the Inited States; but, desirous of maintaining cace, and still willing to leave open the door reconciliation with France, the United States ontented themselves with preparations for deence, and measures calculated to protect their ommerce.

"It is equally clear, on the other hand, that either the French government nor the French ninisters acted on the supposition that war had xisted between the two nations. And it was r this reason that they held the treaties of 1778 ill binding. Within a month or two of the mature of the treaty, the ministers plenipo-ntiary of the French Republic write thus to essrs. Ellsworth, Davie, and Murray: 'In the est place, they will insist upon the principle ady laid down in their former note, viz.: the treaties which united France and the nited States are not broken; that even war uld not have broken them; but that the state misunderstanding which existed for some time tween France and the United States, by the of some agents rather than by 'he will of respective governments, has not war, at least on the side of Franc

"Finally, sir, the treaty itself, what is it? is not called a treaty of peace; it does not ovide for putting an end to hostilities. It says one word of any preceding war; but it does that 'differences' have arisen between the o states, and that they have, therefore, reetively, appointed their plenipotentiaries, and en them full powers to treat upon those 'difences,' and to terminate the same.

But the second article of the treaty, as negoed and agreed on by the ministers of both eraments, is, of itself, a complete refutation the whole argument which is urged against bill, on the ground that the claims had been inguished by war, since that article distinctly expressly acknowledges the existence of the ms, and contains a solemn pledge that the governments, not being able to agree on m at present, will negotiate further on them, convenient time thereafter. Whether we t, then, to the decisions of the American its, to the acts of Congress, to the instrucs of the American executive government, he language of our ministers, to the declaraof the French government and the French isters, or to the unequivocal language of the more interest than any other citizens.

treaty itself, as originally agreed to, we meet irresistible proof of the truth of the declaration, that the state of misunderstanding which had existed between the two countries was

"If the treaty had remained as the ministers on both sides agreed upon it, the claimants, though their indemnity was postponed, would have had no just claim on their own government. But the treaty did not remain in this state. This second article was stricken out by the Senate; and, in order to see the obvious motive of the Senate in thus striking out the second article, allow me to read the whole article. It is in these words:

"'The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree, at present, respecting the treaty of alliance of the 6th of February, 1778, the treaty of amity and com-merce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th of November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time; and until they may have agreed upon these points, the said treaties and convention shall have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows.'

"The article thus stipulating to make the claims of France, under the old treaties, matter of further negotiation, in order to get rid of such negotiation, and the whole subject, the Senate struck out the entire article, and ratified the treaty in this corrected form. France ratified the treaty, as thus amended, with the further declaration that, by thus retrenching the second article, the two nations renounce the respective pretensions which were the object of the article. In this declaration of the French government, the Senate afterwards acquiesced; so that the government of France, by this retrenchment, agreed to renounce her claims under the treaties of 1778, and the United States, in like manner, renounced the claims of their citizens for indemnities due to them.

"And this proves, sir, the second proposition which I stated at the commencement of my remarks, viz.: that these claims were released, relinquished, or extinguished, by the amendment of the treaty, and its ratification as amended. It is only necessary to add, on this point, that these claims for captures before 1800 would have been good claims under the late treaty with France, and would have come in for a dividend in the fund provided by that treaty, if they had not been released by the treaty of 1800. And they are now excluded from all participation in the benefit of the late treaty, because of such release or extinguishment by that of 1800.

"In the third place, sir, it is to be proved, if it be not proved already, that these claims were surrendered, or released by the government of the United States, on national considerations, and for objects in which these claimants had no that the claims and complaints of France against the government of the United States were well founded. It is certain that she put forth such claims and complaints, and insisted on them to the end. It is certain that, by the treaty of alliance of 1778, the United States did guaranty to France her West India possessions. It is certain that, by the treaty of commerce of the same date, the United States stipulated that French vessels of war might bring their prizes into the poris of the United States, and that the enemies of France should not enjoy that privilege; and it is certain that France contended that the United States had plainly violated this article, as well by their subsequent treaty with England as by other acts of the government. For the violation of these treaties she claimed indemnity from the government of the United States. Without admitting the justice of these pretensions, the government of the United States found them extremely embarrassing, and they authorized our ministers in France to buy them off by money, "For the purpose of showing the justice of the present bill, it is not necessary to insist that France was right in these pretensions. Right or wrong, the United States were anxious to get rid of the embarrassments which they occasioned. They were willing to compromise the matter. The existing state of things, then, was exactly this:

"France admitted that citizens of the United States had just claims against her; but she insisted that she, on the other hand, had just claims against the government of the United States.

"She would not satisfy our citizens, till our government agreed to satisfy her. Finally, a treaty is ratified, by which the claims on both sides are renounced.

"The only question is, whether the relinquishment of these individual claims was the price which the United States paid for the relinquishment, by France, of her claims against our government? And who can doubt it? Look to the negotiation; the claims on both sides were discussed together. Look to the second article of the treaty, as originally agreed to; the claims on both sides are there reserved together. And look to the Senate's amendment, and to the subsequent declaration of the French government, acquiesced in by the Scnate; and there the claims on both sides are renounced together. What stronger proof could there be of mutuality of consideration? Sir, allow me to put this direct question to the honorable member from New-York, If the United States did not agree to renounce these claims, in consideration that France would renounce hers, what was the reason why they surrendered thus the claims of their own citizens? Did they do it without any consideration at all? Was the surrender wholly gratuitous? Did they thus solemnly renounce claims for indemnity, so just, so long | zens, it will be necessary to provide for the

"And, on the other hand, let me ask, was it for nothing that France relinquished, what sh had so long insisted on, the obligation of the United States to fulfil the treaties of 1778 For the extinguishment of this obligation as had already offered her a large sum of money which she had declined. Was she now willing to give it up without any equivalent?

"Sir, the whole history of the negotiation full of proof that the individual claims of on citizens, and the governmer claims of Francisco against the United States, constituted the spective demands of the two parties. The gether, insisted on together. The French mi isters would never consent to disconnect the While they admitted, in the fullest manner, claims on our side, they maintained, with persevering resolution, the claims on the sile France. It would fatigue the Senate were! go through the whole correspondence, and as I could easily do, that, in every stage of negotiation, these two subjects were kept gether. I will only refer to some of the m prominent and decisive parts.

"In the first place, the general instruction which our ministers received from our owner ernment, when they undertook the mission rected them to insist on the claims of America citizens against France, to propose a joint la of commissioners to state those claims, and agree to refer the claims of France for infinite ments of the treaty of commerce to the board. I will read, sir, so much of the instru tions as comprehend these points:

"1. At the opening of the negotiation will inform the French ministers that the li ted States expect from France, as an india sable condition of the treaty, a stipulation make to the citizens of the United States compensation for all losses and damages w they shall have sustained by reason of imp or illegal captures or condemnations of vessels and other property, under color of thority or commissions from the French Ra lic or its agents. And all captures and demnations are deemed irregular or illegal contrary to the law of nations, generally ceived and acknowledged in Europe, and in stipulations in the treaty of amity and merce of the 6th of February, 1778, fairly ingenuously interpreted, while that treaty mained in force.

"'2. If these preliminaries should les factorily arranged, then, for the purposed amining and adjusting all the claims of our elves, the object of tra ubjects of so much poat one time so near here -did the government sus them gratuitously, or fa reasonable motive in the it is impossible to main countment of a board of commissioners, similar to that described in the sixth and seventh artieles of the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and Great Britain.

"As the French government have hereto-for complained of infringements of the treaty famity and commerce, by the United States retheir citizens, all claims for injuries, thereby casioned to France or its citizens, are to be abmitted to the same board; and whatever smages they award will be allowed by the nited States, and deducted from the sums warded to be paid by France.

"Now, sir, suppose this board had been contituted, and suppose that it had made awards rainst France, in behalf of citizens of the Uni-States, and had made awards also in favor the government of France against the govment of the United States; and then these stawards had been deducted from the amount the former, and the property of citizens thus plied to discharge the public obligations of country, would any body doubt that such izens would be entitled to indemnity? And they less entitled, because, instead of being st liquidated and ascertained, and then set one against the other, they are finally reed to be set off against each other, and mully relinquished in the lump?

Acting upon their instructions, it will be that the American ministers made an acoffer to suspend the claim for indemnities France should be satisfied as to her politirights under the treaties. On the 15th of y they made this proposition to the French of others:

Indemnities to be ascertained and secured he manner proposed in our project of a treabut not to be vaid until the United States Il have offered to France an article stipulatfree admission, in the ports of each, for the ateers and prizes of the other, to the excluof their enemics.'

This, it will be at once seen, was a direct to suspend the claims of our own citizens our government should be willing to renew rance the obligation of the treaty of 1778. not this an offer to make use of private erty for public purposes?

On the 11th of August, the French pleni-ptiaries thus write to the ministers of the

ed States:

The propositions which the French minishave the honor to communicate to the minplenipotentiary of the United States are ed to this simple alternative:

Either the ancient treaties, with the priviresulting from priority, and a stipulation iprocal indemnit 😁 ;

Dr a new treaty, assuring equality without nity.' other words, this offer is, 'if you will acedge or renew the obligation of the old s, which secure to us privileges in your which our enemies are not to enjoy, then Vol. I.—33

we will make indemnities for the losses of your citizens; or, if you will give up all claim for such indemnities, then we will relinquish our especial privileges under the former treaties, and agree to a new trenty which shall only put us on a footing of equality with Great Britain,

"On the 20th of August our ministers propose that the former treaties, so far as they respect the rights of privateers, shall be renewed; but that it shall be optional with the United States, by the payment, within seven years, of three millions of francs, either in money or in securities issued by the French government for indemnities to our citizens, to buy oll this obligation, or to buy off all its political obligations, under both the old treaties, by payment in like manner of five millions of francs,

"On the 4th of September the French ministers submit these propositions.

" A commission shall regulate the indemnities which either of the two nations may owe to the citizens of the other.

"'The indemnities which shall be due by France to the citizens of the United States shall be paid for by the United States, and in return for which France yields the exclusive privilege resulting from the 17th and 22d articles of the treaty of commerce, and from the rights of guaranty of the 11th article of the treaty of al-

"The American ministers considered these propositions as inadmissible. They, however, on their part, made an approach to them, by proposing, in substance, that it should be left optional with the United States, on the exchange of the ratification, to relinquish the indemnities, and in that case, the old treaties not to be obligatory on the United States, so far as they conferred exclusive privileges on France. This will be seen in the letter of the American ministers of the 5th of September.

"On the 18th of September the American ministers say to those of France;

"'It remains only to consider the expediency of a temporary arrangement. Should such an arrangement comport with the views of France, the following principles are offered as the basis

"'1st. The ministers plenipotentiary of the respective parties not being able at present to agree respecting the former treaties and indemnities, the parties will, in due and convenient time, further treat on those subjects; and, until they shall have agreed respecting the same, the said treaties shall have no operation.

"This, the Senate will see, is substantially the proposition which was ultimately accepted, and which formed the second article of the treaty. By that article, these claims, on both sides, were postponed for the present, and afterwards, by other acts of the two governments, they were mutually and for ever renounced and relinquished.

And now, sir, if any gentleman can look to the treaty, look to the instructions under which it was concluded, look to the correspondence which preceded it, and look to the subsequent agreement of the two governments to renounce claims, on both sides, and not admit that the property of these private citizens has been taken to buy off embarrassing claims of France on the government of the United States, I know not what other or further evidence could ever force that conviction on his mind.

"I will conclude this part of the case by showing you how this matter was understood by the American administration which finally accepted the treaty, with this renouncement of indemnities. The treaty was negotiated in the administration of Mr. Adams. It was smended in the Senate, as already stated, and ratifled on the third day of February, 1801, Mr. Adams being still in office. Being thus ratified, with the amendment, it was sent back to France, and on the thirty-first day of July, the first Consul ratified the treaty, as amended by striking out the second article, but accompanied the ratification with this declaration, provided that, by this retrenchment, the two states renounce their respective pretensions, which are the object of the said article.' "With this declaration appended, the treaty came back to the United States. Mr. Jefferson had now become President, and Mr. Madison was Secretary of State. In consequence of the declaration of the French government, accom-panying its ratification of the treaty and now attached to it, Mr. Jefferson again referred the treaty to the Senate, and on the 19th of Decemher, 1801, the Senate resolved that they considered the treaty as duly ratified. Now, sir, in order to show what Mr. Jefferson and his administration thought of this treaty, and the effect of its ratification, in its then existing form, I beg leave to read an extract of an official letter from Mr. Madison to Mr. Pinckney, then our minister in Spain. Mr. Pinckney was at that time negotiating for the adjustment of our claims on Spain; and, among others, for captures committed within the territories of Spain, by French subjects. Spain objected to these claims, on the ground that the United States had claimed redress of such mjuries from France. In writing to Mr. Pinckney (under date of February 6th, 1804), and commenting on this plea of Spain, Mr. Madison says:

"The plea on which it seems the Spanish government now principally relies, is the erasure of the second article from our late convention with France, by which France was released from the indemnities due for spoliations committed under her immediate responsibility to the United States. This plea did not appear in the early objections of Spain to our claims. It was an afterthought, resulting from the insufficiency of every other plea, and is certainly as little valid as any other.

"'The injuries for which indemnities are claimed from Spain, though committed by bill were recognized by France; and that

Frenchmen, took place under Spanish authority Spain, therefore, is answerable for them, her we have looked, and continue to look for redress. If the injuries done to us by her reaulted in any manner from injuries done to her by France, she may, if she pleases, reson to France as we resort to her. But whether her resort to France would be just or unjust is a question between her and France, not between either her and us, or us and France. We claim against her, not against France. In releasing France, therefore, we have not released her. The claims, again, from which France was released, were admitted by France, and the release was for a valuable consideration, in a correspondent release of the United States from certain claims on them. The claims we make on Spain were never admitted by France, nor made on France by the United States; they made, there fore, no part of the bargain with her, and could not be included in the release.

is of the question lies in the ch, if disembarrassed from a and conditions, and view true character, render it is at a just and correct it devocates of this measure as to rest their case upon the facts; they assume that ay under binding and ones france; that the claims of the ized by France; and that

United States made herself responsible for these claims, instead of France; took them upon herself, and became bound to pay them, in consideration of getting rid of the burdens which weighed upon her. It is assumed that the claims were good when the United States abandoned them; and that the consideration, which it is pretended the United States received, was of a nature to make her fully responsible to the chimants, and to render it obligatory upon her to satisfy the claims.

The measure rests entirely upon these assumptions; but I shall show that they are nothing more than assumptions; that these claims were not recognized by France, and could not be, by the law of nations; they were good for nothing when they were made; they were good for nothing when we abandoned them. The United States owed nothing to France, and received no consideration whatever from her, to make us responsible for payment. What I here maintain, I shall proceed to prove, not by any artful chain of argument, but by plain and historical facts.

Let me ask, sir, on what grounds is it mainsined that the United States received a valuable onsideration for these claims? Under what nerous stipulations did she lie? In what did er debt consist, which it is alleged France gave p in payment for these claims? By the treaty 178, the United States was bound to guarantce he French American possessions to France; nd France, on her part, guaranteed to the nited States her sovereignty and territory. 193, the war between Great Britain and rance broke out; and this rupture between ose nations immediately gave rise to the pestion how far this guaranty was obligatory on the United States? Whether we were and by it to protect France on the side of her merican possessions against any hostile atck of Great Britain; and thus become involved subalterns in a war in which we had no conin or interest whatever? Here we come to point at once; for if it should appear that were not bound by this guaranty to become ties to a distant European war, then, sir, it will an evident, a decided result and conclusion, twewere under no obligation to France—that owed her no debt on account of this guaranty; plainly enough, it will follow, we received bill, when France released us from an obligation which it will appear we never owed. Let us briefly see how the ease stands.

"France, to get rid of claims made by us, puts forward counter claims under this guaranty; proposing by such a diplomatic manœuvre to get rid of our demand, the injustice of which she protested against. She succeeded, and both parties abandoned their claims. And is it now to be urged upon us that, on the grounds of this astute diplomacy, we actually received avaluable consideration for claims which were considered good for nothing? France met our claims, which were good for nothing, by a counter claim, which was good for nothing; and when we found ourselves thus encountered, we abandoned our previous claim, in order to be released from the counter one opposed to it. After this, is it, I would ask, a suitable return for our overwrought anxiety to obtain satisfaction for our citizens, that any one of them should, some thirty years after this, turn round upon us and say: "now you have received a valuable consideration for our claims; now, then, you are bound to pay us!" But this is in fact, sir, the language of this bill. I unhesitatingly say that the guaranty (a release from which is the pretended consideration by which the whole people of the United States are brought in debtors to a few insurance offices to the amount of millions), this guaranty, sir, I affirm, was good for nothing. I speak on no less authority, and in no less a name than that of the great father of his country, Washington himself, when I affirm that this guaranty imposed upon us no obligations towards France. How, then, shall we be persuaded that, in virtue of this guaranty, we are bound to pay the debts and make good the spoliations of France?

"When the war broke out between Great Britain and France in 1793, Washington addressed to his cabinet a series of questions, inquiring their opinions on this very question—how far the treaty of guaranty of 1778 was obligatory upon the United States—intending to take their opinions as a guidance for his conduct in such a difficult situation. [Here the honorable Senator read extracts from Washington's queries to his cabinet, with some of the opinions themselves.]

owed her no debt on account of this guaranty;

, plainly enough, it will follow, we received concurring with his own sentiments, President valuable consideration for the claims of this disregarding the guaranty, and proclaiming that we were not bound by any preceding treatles to defend American France against Great Britain. The wisdom of this measure is apparent. He wisely thought it was not prudent our infant Republic should become absorbed in the vortex of European politics; and therefore, sir, not without long and mature deliberation how far this treaty of guaranty was obligatory upon us, he pronounced against it; and in so doing he pronounced against the very bill before us; for the bill has nothing to stand upon but this guaranty; it pretends that the United States is bound to pay for injuries inflicted by France, because of a release from a guaranty by which the great Washington himself solemnly pronounced we were not bound! What do we now behold, sir? We behold an array in this House, and on this floor, against the policy of Washington i They seek to undo his deed; they condemn his principles; they call in question the wisdom and justice of his wise and paternal counsels; they urge against him that the guaranty bound us, and what for? What is the motive of this opposition against his measures? Why, sir, that this bill may pass; and the people, the burden-bearing people, be made to pay away a few millions, in consideration of obligations which, after mature deliberation, Washington pronounced not to lie upon us!

"I think, sir, enough has been said to put to rest for ever the question of our obligations under this guaranty. Whatever the claims may be, it must be evident to the common sense of every individual, that we are not, and cannot be, bound to pay them in the stead of France, because of a pretended release from a guaianty which did not bind us; I say did not bind us, because, to have observed it, would have led to our ruin and destruction; and it is a clear principle of the law of nations, that a treaty is not obligatory when it is impossible to observe it. But, sir, leaving the question whether we were made responsible for the debts of France. whether we were placed under an obligation to atone to our own citizens for injuries which a foreign power had committed; leaving this question as settled (and I trust settled for ever), I come to consider the claims themselves, their justice, and their validity. And here the principle of this bill will prove, on this head, as weak and untenable-nay, more-as outrageous | known, that, in ninety-nine cases out of also to every idea of common sense, as it was on the former head. With what reason, I would ask can gentlemen press the American people to pay these claims, when it would be unreasonable to press France herself to pay them) 1 France, who committed the wrong, could not justly be called upon to atone for it, how can the United States now be called upon for this money? In 1798, the treaty of peace with France was virtually abolished by various acts of Congress authorizing hostilities, and by proclamation of the President to the same effect; It was abolished on account of its violation be France; on account of those depredations which this bili calls upon us to make good. By those acts of Congress we sought satisfaction for these claims; and, having done so, it was to late afterwards to seek fresh satisfaction by demanding indemnity. There was war, sir, a the gentleman from Georgia has clearly shown -war on account of these spoliations-and when we sought redress, by acts of warfare, we precluded ourselves from the right of demand ing redress by indemnity. We could not, there fore, justly urge these claims against France; and I therefore demand, how can they be urned sgainst us? What are the invincible are ments by which gentlemen establish the justing and validity of these claims? For, surely, be fore we consent to sweep away millions from the public treasury, we ought to hear at less some good reasons. Let me examine their good reasons. The argument to prove the validate of these claims, and that we are bound to me them, is this: France acknowledged them, a the United States took them upon herself: the is, they were paid by way of offset, and valuable consideration the United States a ceived was a release from her pretended oblin tions! Now, sir, let us see how France acknow ledged them. These very claims were deni resisted, and rejected, by every successive ernment of France! The law of nations urged against them; because, having enough in a state of war, on the account of them. had no right to a double redress-first by prisals, and afterwards by indemnity! in sense, as it was on the dred, this was the fact—that American citizens lent their names to the English, and were ready to risk all the dangers of French spoliation, for sake of the great profits, which more than overed the risk. And, in the face of all these ficts, we are told that the French acknowledged the claims, paid them by a release, and we are new bound to satisfy them! And how is this proved? Where are the invincible arguments by which the public treasury is to be emptied? llear them, if it is possible even to hear them with patience! When we urged these claims. the French negotiators set up a counter clair : and to obtain a release from this, we abandoned them! Thus it is that the French acknowledged these claims; and, on this pretence, because of this diplomatic cunning and ingenuity, we are now told that the national honor calls on us to nay them! Was ever such a thing heard of before? Why, sir, if we pass this bill, we shall deserve eternal obloquy and disgrace from the whole American people. France, after rereatedly and perseveringly denying and resisting these claims, at last gets rid of them for ever by an ingenious trick, and by pr tending to acknowledge them; and now her debt (if it was debt) is thrown upon us; and, in consequence of this little trick, the public treasury is to be ricked out of several millions! Sir, this is montrous! I say it is outrageous! I intend no personal disrespect to any gentleman by these bservations; but I must do my duty to my ountry, and I repeat it, sir, this is outrageus 1

"It is strenuously insisted upon, and appears be firmly relied upon by gentlemen who have drocated this measure, that the United States as actually received from France full considertion for these chang; in a word, that France as paid them! I have already shown, by hisprical facts, by the law of nations, and, further, the authority and actions of Washington mself, the father of his country, that we ere placed under no obligations to France by e treaty of guaranty; and that, therefore, a lease from obligations which did not exist, is valuable consideration at all! But, sir, how n it be urged upon us that France actually id us for claims which were denied and reted, when we all know very well that, for disputed claims, for claims acknowledged by aty, for claims solemnly engaged to be paid.

we could never succeed in getting one farthing I thank the senator from New Hampshire (Mr. Hill), for the enlightened view he has given en this case. What, sir, was the conduct of Napoleon, with respect to money? He had bound himself to pay us twenty millions of francs. and he would not pay one farthing! And yet, sir, we are confidently assured by the advocates of this bill that these claims were paid to us by Napoleon! When Louisiana was sold, he ordered Marbols to get fifty millions, and did not even then, intend to pay us out of that sum the wenty millions he had bound himself by trenty to pay. Marbois succeeded in getting thirty millions of francs more from us, and from this the twenty millions due was deducted; thus, sir, we were made to pay ourselves our own due, and Napoleon escaped the payment of a farthing. I mean to make no reflection upon our negotiators at that treaty; we may be glad that we got Louislana at any amount; for, if we had not obtained it by money, we should soon have possessed it by blood: the young West like a lion, would have sprung upon the delta of the Mississippi, and we should have had an earlier edition of the battle of New Orleans. It is not to be regretted, therefore, that we gained Louisiana by negotiation, although we paid our debts ourselves in that bargain. But Napoleon absolutely scolded Marbois for allowing the deduction of twenty millions out of the sum we paid for Louisiana, forgetting that his minister had got thirty millions more than he ordered him to ask, and that we had paid ourselves the twenty millions due to us under treaty. Having such a man to deal with, how can it be maintained on this floor that the United States has been paid by him the claims in this bill, and that, therefore, the treasury is bound to satisfy them? Let senators, I entreat them, but ask themselves the question, what these claims were worth in the view of Napoleon, that they may not form such an unwarranted conclusion as to think he ever paid them. Every government of France which preceded him had treated them as English claims, and is it likely that he who refused to pay claims subsequent to these, under treaty signed by himself, would pay old claims anterior to 1800? The claims were not worth a straw; they were considered as lawful spoliations; that by our proclamation we had broken the neutrality; and, after all, that they were incurred by English enterprises, covered by the American flag. It is pretended he acknowledged them! Would he have inserted two lines in the treaty to rescind them, to get rid of such claims, when he would not pay those he had acknowledged?

To recur once more, sir, to the valuable consideration which it is pretended we received for these claims. It is maintained that we were paid by receiving a release from onerous obligations imposed upon us by the treaty of guaranty, which obligations I have already shown that the great Washington himself pronunced to be nothing; and therefore, sir, it plainly follows that this valuable consideration was—nothing!

What, sir! Is it said we were released from obligations? From what obligations, I would ask, were we relieved? From the obligation of guaranteeing to France her American possessions; from the obligation of conquering St. Domingo for France! From an impossibility, sir! for do we not know that this was impossible to the fleets and armies of France. under Le Clerc, the brother-in-law of Napoleon himself? Did they not perish miserably by the knives of infuriated negroes and the desolating ravages of pestilence? Again, we were released from the obligation of restoring Guadaloupe to the French; which also was not possible, unless we had entered into a war with Great Britain! And thus, sir, the valuable consideration, the release by which these claims are said to be fully paid to the United States, turns out to be a release from nothing! a release from absolute impossibilities; for it was not possible to guarantee to France her colonies; she lost them, and there was nothing to guarantee; it was a onesided guaranty! She surrendered them by treaty, and there is nothing for the guaranty to operate on.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. King], has given a vivid and able picture of the exertions of the United States government in behalf of these claims. He has shown that they have been paid, and more than paid, on our part, by the invaluable blood of our citizens! Such, indeed, is the fact. What has not been done by the United States on behalf of these claims? For these very claims, for the protection of those very claimants, we underwent an incredible expense both in military and nava

[Here the honorable senator read a long lis of military and naval preparations made by $C_{\rm Ob}$ gress for the protection of these claims, specifying the dates and the numbers.]

Nor did the United States confine hersel solely to these strenous exertions and expensive armaments; besides raising fleets and armies, she sent across the Atlantic embassies and agents; she gave letters of marque, by which every injured individual might take his own remedy and repay himself his losses. For these very claims the people were laden at that period with heavy taxes, besides the blood of our people which was spilt for them. Loans were maked at eight per cent. to obtain redress for these claims; and what was the consequence? It overturned the men in power at that period; this it was which produced that result, most than political differences.

The people were taxed and suffered for these same claims in that day; and now they are brought forward again to exhaust the public treasury and to sweep away more millions at from the people, to impose taxes again upon theme for the very same claims for which the people have already once been taxed; reviving the system of '98, to render loans and debts and ecumbrances again to be required; to embarase the government, entangle the State, to importe ish the people; to dig, in a word, by gradul measures of this description, a pit to plunge the nation headlong into inextricable difficulty and ruin!

The government, in those days, performed in duty to the citizens in the protection of the commerce; and by vindicating, asserting, in satisfying these claims, it left nothing under which now is to be done; the pretensions of this bill are therefore utterly unfounded! Dubs are reciprocal; the duty of government is no tection, and that of citizens allegiance. The bill attempts to throw upon the present go ernment the duties and expenses of a form government, which have been already once quitted. On its part, government has fulfilled with energy and zeal, its duty to the citizes it has protected and now is protecting the rights, and asserting their just claims. But, there are limits to the protection of the interests of individual citizens; peace must, at one time or other, be obtained, and sacrifices are to be made for a valuable consideration. Now, sir, peace is a valuable consideration, and claims are often necessarily abandoned to obtain it. In 1814, we gave up claims for the sake of peace; we ave up claims for Spanish spoliations, at the heaty of Florida; we gave up claims to Dennark. These claims also were given up, long nterior to others I have mentioned. When eace is made, the claims take their chance; ome are given up for a gross sum, and some, uch as these, when they are worth nothing, ill fetch nothing. I should not discharge the duty I owe to my untry, if I did not probe still deeper into ese transactions. What were the losses which to these claims? Gentlemen have indulged mselves in all the flights and raptures of etry on this pathetic topic; we have heard ships swept from the ocean, families plunged want and ruin;" and such like! What is the sir? It is as the gentleman from New mpshire has said: never, sir, was there known, ore or since, such a flourishing state of comre as the very time and period of these liations. At that time, men made fortunes if saved one ship only, out of every four or five, the French cruisers! Let us examine the born facts of sober arithmetic, in this case, not sit still and see the people's money med out of the treasury by the persuasive s of poetry. [Mr. B here referred to pubocuments showing that, in the years 1793, '95, '96, '97, '98, '99, up to 1800, the ex-, annually increased at a rapid rate, till, in they amounted to more than $91,000,000]. It must be taken into consideration that, at this period, our population was less than it is now, our territory was much more limited, we had not Louisiana and the port of New Orleans, and yet our commerce was far more flourishing than it ever has been since; and at a time, too, when we had no mammoth banking corporation to boast of its indispensable, its vital necessity to commerce! These are the facts of numbers, of arithmetic, which blow away the edifice of the gentlemen's poetry, as the wind scatters straws.

With respect to the parties in whose hands these claims are. They are in the hands of insurance offices, assignees, and jobbers; they are in the hands of the knowing ones who have bought them up for two, three, five, ten cents in the dollar! What has become of the screaming babes that have been held up after the ancient Roman method, to excite pity and move our sympathies? What has become of the widows and original claimants? They have been bought out long ago by the knowing ones. If we countenance this bill, sir, we shall renew the disgraceful scenes of 1793, and witness a repetition of the infamous fraud and gambling, and all the old artifices which the certificate funding act gave rise to. (Mr. B. here read several interesting extracts, describing the scenes which then took place.)

One of the most revolting features of this bill is its relation to the insurers. The most infamous and odious act ever passed by Congress was the certificate funding act of 1793, an act passed in favor of a crowd of speculators; but the principle of this bill is more odious than even it; I mean that of paying insurers for their losses. The United States, sir, insure! Can any thing be conceived more revolting and atrocious than to direct the funds of the treasury, the property of the people, to such iniquitous uses? On what principle is this grounded? Their occupation is a safe one; they make calculations against all probabilities; they make fortunes at all times; and especially at this very time when we are called upon to refund their losses, they made immense fortunes. It would be far more just and equitable if Congress were to insure the farmers and planters, and pay them their losses on the failure of the cotton erop: they, sir, are more entitled to put forth such claims than speculators and gamblers, whose trade and business it is to make money by losses. This bill, if passed, would be the most odious and unprincipled ever passed by Congress.

Another question, sir, occurs to me: what sum of money will this bill abstract from the treasury? It says five millions, it is true; but it does not say "and no more;" it does not say that they will be in full. If the project of passing this bill should succeed, not only will claims be made, but next will come interest upon them! Reflect, sir, one moment: interest from 1798 and 1800 to this day! Nor is there any limitation of the amount of claims; no, sir, it would not be possible for the imagination of man, to invent more cunning words than the wording of this bill. It is made to cover all sorts of claims; there is no kind of specification adequate to exclude them; the most illegal claims will be admitted by its loose phraseology!

Again suffer me to call your attention to another feature of this atrocious measure; let me warn my country of the abyss which it is attempted to open before it, by this and other similar measures of draining and exhausting the public treasury!

These claims rejected and spurned by France; these claims for which we have never received one cent, all the payment ever made for them urged upon us by their advocates being a metaphysical and imaginary payment; these claims which, under such deceptive circumstances as these, we, sir, are called upon to pay, and to pay to insurers, usurers, gamblers, and speculators; these monstrous claims which are foisted upon the American people, let me ask, how are they to be adjudged by this bill? Is it credible, sir? They are to be tried by an ex parte tribunal! Commissioners are to be appointed, and then, once seated in this berth, they are to give away and dispose of the public money according to the cases proved! No doubt sir, they will be all honorable men. I do not dispute that! No doubt it will be utterly impossible to prove corruption, or bribery, or interested motives, or partialities against them; nay, sir, no doubt it will be dangerous to suspect such honorable men; we shall be replied to at once by the indignant question, "are they not all honorable men?" But to all intents and purposes this tribunal will be an cx parte, a one-sided tribunal and passive to the action of the claimants.

Again, look at the species of evidence which will be invited to appear before these commissioners; of what description will it be? He is not a thing recent and fresh upon which en dence, may be gained. Here are transactions thirty or forty years ago. The evidence is gone witnesses dead, memories failing, no testimon to be procured, and no lack of claimants, notwitk standing. Then, sir, the next best evidence that suspicious and worthless sort of evidence will have to be restored to; and this will have ready at hand to suit every convenience in any quantity. There could not be a more effective and deeper plan than this devised to empty the treasury! Here will be sixty millions exhibit ed as a lure for false evidence, and false claims an awful, a tremendous temptation for men to send their souls to hell for the sake of money On the behalf of the moral interests of my com try, while it may yet not be too late, I denome this bill, and warn Congress not to lend itself a measure by which it will debauch the pull morals, and open a wide gulf of wrong-dir and not-to-be-imagined e.il!

The bill passed the Senate by a vote of 25 to 2); but failed in the House of Representatives. CHAPTER CXXI.

EMPTED ASSASSINATION OF PRESIDENT JACK-SON.

Friday, the 30th of January, the President some members of his Cabinet, attended the ral ceremonies of Warren R. Davis, Esq., in hall of the House of Representatives—of which body Mr. Davis had been a member from the State of South Carolina. The procession had moved out with the body, and its front had reached the foot of the broad steps of the eastern portico, when the President, with Mr. Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Mahlon Dickerson. Secretary of the Navy, were issuing from the door of the great rotunda-which opens upon the portico. At that instant a person stepped from the crowd into the little open space in front of the President, levelled a pistol at him, at the distance of about eight feet, and attempted to fire. It was a percussion lock, and the cap exploded, without firing the powder in the barrel. The explosion of the cap was so loud that many persons thought the pistol had fired: I heard it at the foot of the steps, far from the place, and a great crowd between. Instantly the person dropped the pistol which had missed fire, took another which he held ready cocked in the left hand, concealed by a cloak-levelled it-and pulled the trigger. It was also a percussion lock, and the cap exploded without firing the powder in the barrel. The President instantly rushed upon him with his uplifted cane: the man shrunk back; Mr. Woodbury aimed a blow at him; Lieutenant Gedney of the Navy knocked him down; he was secured by the hystauders, who delivered him to the officers of justice for judicial examination. The examination took place before the chief justice of the district, Mr. Cranch; by whom he was committed in default of bail. His name was ascertained to be Richard Lawrence, an Englishman by birth, and house-painter by trade, at present out of employment, melancholy and irascible. The pistols were examined, and found to be well loaded; and fired afterwards without fail, carrying their bullets true, and driving them through inch boards at thirty feet distance; nor could any reason be found for the two failures at the door of the rotunda. On his examination the prisoner seemed to be at his ease. as if unconscious of having done any thing wrong-refusing to cross-examine the witnesses who testified against him, or to give any explanation of his conduct. The idea of an unsound mind strongly impressing itself upon the public opinion, the marshal of the district invited two of the most respectable physicians of the city (Dr. Caussin and Dr. Thomas Sewell). to visit him and examine into his mental condition. They did so: and the following is the report which they made upon the case:

"The undersigned, having been requested by the marshal of the District of Columbia to visit Richard Lawrence, now confined in the jail of the county of Washington, for an attempt to assassinate the President of the United States, with a view to ascertain, as far as practicable, the present condition of his bodily health and state of mind, and believing that a detail of the examination will be more satisfactory than an abstract opinion on the subject, we therefore give the following statement. On entering his room, we engaged in a free conversation with him, in which he participated, apparently, in the most artless and unreserved manner. The first interrogatory propounded was, as to his agewhich question alone he sportively declined answering. We then inquired into the condition of his health, for several years past-to which he replied that it had been uniformly good, and that he had never labored under any mental derangement; nor did he admit the existence of any of those symptoms of physical derangement which usually attend mental alienation. He said he was born in England, and came to this country when twelve or thirteen years of age, and that his father died in this District. about six or eight years since; that his father was a Protestant and his mother a Methodist, and that he was not a professor of any religion, but sometimes read the Bible, and occasionally attended church. He stated that he was a painter by trade, and had followed that occupation to the present time; but, of late, could not find steady employment-which had caused much pecuniary embarrassment with him; that he had been generally temperate in his habits, using ardent spirits moderately when at work; but, for the last three or four weeks, had not taken any; that he had never gambled, and, in other respects, had led a regular, sober life.

"Upon being interrogated as to the circumstances connected with the attempted assassination, he said that he had been deliberating on it for some time past, and that he had called at the President's house about a week previous to the attempt, and being conducted to the President's apartment by the porter, found him in conversation with a member of Congress, whom he believed to have been Mr. Sutherland, of Pennsylvania; that he stated to the President that he wanted money to take him to England, and that he must give him a check on the bank, and the President remarked, that he was too much engaged to attend to him-he must call another time, for Mr. Dibble was in raiting for an interview. When asked about the pistols which he had used, he stated that his father left him a pair, but not being alike, about four years since he exchanged one for another, which exactly matched the best of the pair; these were both flint locks, which he recently had altered to percussion locks, by a Mr. Boteler; lifted cane, he feared that it contained as

that he had been frequently in the habit loading and firing those pistols at marks, and that he had never known them to fail going of on any other occasion, and that, at the distance of ten yards, the ball always passed through as inch plank. He also stated that he had loaded those pistols three or four days previous, with ordinary care, for the purpose attempted; but that he used a pencil instead of a ramred, and that during that period, they were at all times carried in his pocket; and when asked why they failed to explode, he replied he knew 10 cause. When asked why he went to the capital on that day, he replied that he expected that the President would be there. He also statel that he was in the rotunda when the President arrived; and on being asked why he did not then attempt to shoot him, he replied that did not wish to interfere with the funeral cere mony, and therefore waited till it was over. In also observed that he did not enter the hall but looked through a window from a lobby, and saw the President scated with members of Con gress, and he then returned to the rotunda an waited till the President again entered it, and then passed through and took his position i the east portico, about two yards from the dog drew his pistols from his inside coat pocks cocked them and held one in each hand, co cealed by his coat, lest he should alarm to spectators-and states, that as soon as the on in the right hand missed fire, he immediated dropped or exchanged it, and attempted to he the second, before he was seized; he further stated that he aimed each pistol at the Podent's heart, and intended, if the first pistol gone off, and the president had fallen, to he defended himself with the second, if defence been necessary. On being asked if he did expect to have been killed on the spot, if he killed the President, he replied he did not; a that he had no doubt but that he would be been protected by the spectators. He was quently questioned whether he had any friend present, from whom he expected protection, ! this he replied, that he never had mentioned intention to any one, and that no one in paris lar knew his design; but that he presumed was generally known that he intended to the President out of the way. He furthersta that when the President arrived at the de near which he stood, finding him supported the left by Mr. Woodbury, and observing persons in his rear, and being himself rather the right of the President, in order to m wounding Mr. Woodbury, and those in them he stepped a little to his own right, so should the ball pass through the body of President, it would be received by the d frame, or stone wall. On being asked if he no trepidation during the attempt: He remot the slightest, until he found that the supistol had missed fire. Then observing that President was advancing upon him, with a

Redfern, told him that he would have no ore business, because he was opposed to the resident-and he believed Redfern to be in ague with the President against him. Again eing questioned, whether he had often attended le debates in Congress, during the present making this attack on the person of the Predent, he replied that he had frequently attendthe discussions in both branches of Coness, but that they had, in no degree, influenced action.

"Upon being asked if he expected to become president of the United States, if Gen. Jack-had fallen, he replied no.

When asked whom he wished to be the Preent, his answer was, there were many persons the House of Representatives. On being asked there were no persons in the Senate, yes, seal; and it was the Senate to which I alluded. ho, in your opinion, of the Senate, would ke a good President? He answered, Mr. y, Mr. Webster, Mr. Calhoun. What do think of Col. Benton, Mr. Van Buren. or dge White, for President? He thought they ald do well. On being asked if he knew member of either house of Congress, he red that he did not-and never spoke to one is life, or they to him. On being asked what efit he expected himself from the death of President, he answered he could not rise as the President fell, and that he expected reby to recover his liberty, and that the hanics would all be benefited; that the me-nics would have plenty of work; and that ey would be more plenty. On being asked it would be more plenty, he replied, it id be more easily obtained from the bank. being asked what bank, he replied, the Bank he United States. On being asked if he w the president, directors, or any of the offiof the bank, or had ever held any interse with them, or knew how he could get ey out of the bank, he replied no—that he tly knew Mr. Smith only.

In being asked with respect to the speeches he had heard in Congress, and whether sparticularly pleased with those of Messrs. oun, Clay, and Webster, he replied that he because they were on his side. He was asked if he was well pleased with the hes of Col. Benton and Judge White? He was and thought Col. Benton highly

"When asked if he was friendly to Gen. Jackson, he replied, no. Why not? He answered, because he was a tyrant. Who told you he was a tyrant? He answered, it was a common talk with the people, and that he had read it in all the papers. He was asked if he could name any one who had told him so? He replied, no. He was asked if he ever threatened to shoot Mr. Clay, Mr. Webster, or Mr. Calhoun, or whether he would shoot them if he had an opportunity? He replied, no. When asked if he would shoot Mi. Van Buren? He replied, no, that he once met with Mr. Van Buren in the rotunda, and told him he was in want of money and must have it, and if he did not get it he (Mr. Van Buren), or Gen. Jackson must fall. He was asked if any person were present during the conversation? He replied, that there were several present, and when asked if he recollected one of them, he replied that he did not. When asked if any one advised him to shoot Gen. Jackson, or say that it ought to be done? He replied, I do not like to say. On being pressed on this point, he said no one in particular had advised him.

He further stated, that believing the President to be the source of all his difficulties, he was still fixed in his purpose to kill him, and if his successor pursued the same course, to put him out of the way also—and declared that no power in this country could punish him for having done so, because it would be resisted by the powers of Europe, as well as of this country. He also stated, that he had been long in corespondence with the powers of Europe, and that his family lad been wrongfully deprived of the crown of England, and that he should yet live to regain it—and that he considered the President of the United States nothing more than his clerk.

"We now think proper to add, that the young man appears perfectly tranquil and unconcerned, as to the final result, and seems to anticipate no punishment for what he has done. The above centains the leading, and literally expressed facts of the whole conversation we had with him, which continued at least two hours. The questions were frequently repeated at different stages of the examination; and presented in various forms."

It is clearly to be seen from this medical examination of the man, that this attempted assassination of the President, was one of those cases of which history presents many instances—a discased mindacted upon by a general outery against a public man. Lawrence was in the particular condition to be acted upon by what he heard against General Jackson:—a workman out of employment—needy—idle—mentally morbid; and with reason enough to argue regularly from false premises. He heard the President accused of breaking up the labor of the country! and believed it-of making money scarce! and he believed it-of producing the distress! and believed it-of being a tyrant! and believed it-of being an obstacle to all relief! and believed it. And coming to a regular conclusion from all these beliefs, he attempted to do what he believed the state of things required him to do-take the life of the man whom he considered the sole cause of any own and the general calamity-and the sole obstacle to his own and two general happiness. Hallucination of mand was evident; and the wretched victim of a dreadful delusion was afterwards treated as insune, and never breught to trial. But the circumstance made a deep impression upon the public feeling, and irresistibly carried many minds to the belief in a superintending Providence, manifested in the extraordinary case of two pistols in succession-so well loaded, so coolly handled, and which afterwards fired with such readiness, force, and precision-missing fire, each in its turn, when levelled eight feet at the President's heart.

CHAPTER CXXII.

ALABAMA EXPUNGING RESOLUTIONS.

MR. KING, of Alabama, presented the preamble and joint resolution of the general assembly of his State, entreating their senators in Congress to use their "untiring efforts" to cause to be expunged from the journal of the Senate, the resolve condemnatory of President Jackson, for the removal of the deposits. Mr. Clay desired to know, before any order was taken on these resolutions, whether the senator presenting them, proposed to make any motion in relation to expunging the journal? This inquiry was made in a way to show that Mr. King was, to meet resistance to his motion if he attempted it. The expunging process was extremely distasteful to the senators whose act was proposed to be stigmatized:--and they now began to be sensitive at its mention.-When Mr. Benton first gave notice of his intention to move it, his notice was looked upon as an idle menace, which would end in nothing. Now it was becoming a serious proceeding. The States were taking up. Several of them, through their legislatm -Alabama, Mississippi, New Jersey, New-York North Carolina-had already given the fatal in structions; and it was certain that more would follow. Those of Alabama were the first in sonted; and it was felt necessary to make he against them from the beginning. Hence, the interrogatory put by Mr. Clay to Mr. King-the inque ry whether he intended to move an expusion resolution ?-and the subsequent motion to la the resolutions of the State upon the table if answered negatively. Now it was not the tention of Mr. King to move the expunging solution. It was not his desire to take that he siness out of the hands of Mr. Benton, who is conceived it-made a speech for it-given noise of it at the last session as a measure for the sent one-and had actually given notice at present session of his intention to offer the solution. Mr. King's answer would necessary therefore, be in the negative, and Mr. Ch motion then became regular to lay it upon table. Mr. Benton, therefore, felt himself upon to answer Mr. Clay, and to recall to recollection of the Senate what took place the time the sentence of condemnation passed; and rose and said:

shou'd do it, but he had not consulted with any one. In the ordinary routine of business, no one was more ready to consult with his friends, and to defer to their opinions, than he was; but there were some occasions on which he held sancil with no man, but took his own course, whont regard to consequences. It would have tell a matter of entire indifference with him, had be whole Senate risen as one man, and declared determination to give a unanimous vote against

im. It would have mattered nothing. He rould not have deferred to any human being, tenated by these feelings he had given notice f his intention in the month of May; and in bedience to that determination he had, on the st day of the session, laid his resolution on he table, in order to keep the matter alive.

"This brought him to the answer to the queson proposed. The presentation of the resoluons of the legislature of Alabama afforded a t and proper occasion to give that public notice hich he had already informally and privately ven to many members of the Senate. He had id that he should bring forward his resolution the carliest convenient time. And yesterday ening, when he saw the attempt which was ade to give to a proceeding emanating from e Post Office Committee, and to which, by unanimous consent of that committee, n rilative direction had been assigned, a new m, by one of the senators from South Caroa, so as to make it a proceeding against per-ns, in contradistinction to the public matters abodied in the report; when he heard these rsons assailed by one of the senators from uth Carolina, in such a manner as to prevent y possibility of doubt concerning them; and en hediscovered that the object of these gentle nwasimpeachment in substance, if not in form, did at once form the determination to give tice this morning of his intention to move his olution at the earliest convenient period. This was his answer to the question which been proposed.

Mr. King, of Alabama, said he was surprised hear the question of the honorable senator a Kentucky, as he did not expect such an uiry: for he had supposed it was well underdouble were member of the Senate what his timents were in regard to the right of intended in the pursue a particular course, and should obey their instructions. With regard the resolution to which the legislature alluded, could merely say that he voted against it at time it was adopted by the Senate. His lice as to it was then, as well as now, perly understood. If the gentleman from souri [Mr. Benton] declined bringing the feet forward relative to the propriety of exging the resolution in question from the mal of the Senate, he, himself should, at a proper time, do so, and also say something he great and important question as to the mitted in its fullest extent. He held his place there, subject to the control of the legislature of Alabama, and whenever their instructions reached him, he should be governed by them. He made this statement without entering into the consideration of the propriety or impropriety of senators exercising their own judgment as to the course they deemed most proper to pursue. For himself, never having doubted the right of a legislature to instruct their scuators in Congress, he should consider himself culpuble if he did not carry their wishes into effect, when properly expressed. And he had hoped there would have been no expression of the Senate at this time, as he was not disposed to enter into a discussion then, for particular reasons, which it was not necessary he should state.

"As to the propriety of acting on the subject then, that would depend upon the opinions of gentlemen as to the importance, the great importance, of having the journal of the Senate freed from what many supposed to be an unconstitutional act of the Senate, although the majority of it thought otherwise. He would now say that, if no one should bring forward a proposition to get the resolution expunged, he, feeling himself bound to obey the opinions of the legislature, should do so, and would vote for it. If no precedent was to be found for such an act of the Senate, he should most unhesitatingly vote for expunging the resolution from the journal of the Senate, in such manner as should be justified by precedent.

"Mr. Clay said the honorable member from Alabama had risen in his place, and presented to the Senate two resolutions, adopted by the legislature of his State, instructing b'.n and his colleague to use their untiring exertions to cause to be expunged from the journals of the Senate certain resolutions passed during the last session of Congress, on the subject of the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States. The resolutions of Alabama had been presented; they were accompanied by no motion to carry the intentions of that State into effect; nor were they accompanied by any intimation from the honorable senator, who preposition, in relation to them, to the Senate. Under these circumstances, the inquiry was made by him (Mr. C.) of the senator from Alabama, which he thought the occasion called for. The inquiry was a very natural one, and he had learned with unfeigned surprise that the senator did not expect it. He would now say to the senator from Alabama, that of him, and of him alone, were these inquiries made; and with regard to the reply made by another senator (Mr. Benton), he would further say, that his relations to him were not such as to enable him to know what were that senator's intentions, at any time, and on any subject, nor was it necessary he should know them.

be great and important question as to the of instruction. Now, that might be adpress the hope that the sonator from Alabama would, for the present, withdraw the resoluconsulted precedents, and a careful examination of the constitution of the United States, he finds that he can, consistently with them, make any propositions for the action of the Senate, he (Mr. C.) would be willing to receive the resolutions, and pay to them all that attention and respect which the proceedings of one of the States of this Union merited. If the gentleman did not pursue that course, he should feel himself bound, by every consideration, by all the obligations which bound a public man to discharge his duty to his God, his country, and his own honor, to resist such an unconstitutional procedure as the reception of these resolutions, without the expressed wish of the legislature of Alabama, and without any intimation from her senators, of any proposition to be made on them, at the very threshold. He did hope that, for the present, the gentleman would withdraw these resolutions, and at a proper time present them with some substantive proposition for the consideration of the Senate. If he did not, the debate must go on, to the exclusion of the important one commenced yesterday, and which every gentleman expected to be continued to-day, as he should in such case feel it necessary to submit a motion for the Senato to decide whether, under present circumstances, the resolutions could be received.

"Mr. Clay declared that when such a resolution should be offered he should discharge the duty which he owed to his God, his country and his honor.

"Mr. King of Alabama, had felt an unwillingness from the first to enter into this discussion, for reasons which would be understood by every gentleman. It was his wish, and was so understood by one or two friends whom he had consulted, that the resolutions should lie on the table for the present, until the debate on another subject was disposed of. In reply to the senator from Kentucky, he must say that he could not, situated as he was, accede to his proposition. His object certainly was to carry into effect the wishes of the legislature of his State; and he, as well as his colleague, felt bound to obey the will of the sovereign State of Alabama, whenever made known to them. He certainly should, at a proper time, present a distinct proposition in rela-tion to these resolutions for the consideration of the Senate; and the senator from Kentucky could then have an opportunity of discharging "his duty to his God, to his country, and his own honor,' in a manner most consistent with his own sense of propriety.

"Mr. Clay would not renew the intimation of any intention on his part, to submit a motion to the Senate, if there was any probability that the senator from Alabama would withdraw the resolutions he had submitted. He now gave notice that, if the senator did not think fit to withdraw them, he should feel it his duty to submit a pro-debate, and prevent the one commenced yester day from being resumed to-day.

"Mr. Calhoun moved that the resolution laid upon the table, to give the senator fra Alabama [Mr. King], an opportunity to proper a resolution to accomplish the meditated purpos of rescinding the former resolutions of the Sens I confess, sir (observed Mr. C.), I feel some o riosity to see how the senator from Alaba will reconcile such a proceeding with the fand independent existence of a Senate. sir, a great curiosity to hear how that gentlement proposes that the journals are to be kept, if see a procedure is allowed to take effect. I should like to know how he proposes to repeal a janal. By what strange process he would destreates, and annihilate events and things which now the depositories of history. When he have satisfied my curiosity on this particular then there is another thing I am anxious to be formed upon, and that is, what form, what stars and new plan of proceeding, will he suggest for adoption of the Senate? I will tell him; In show him the only resource that is left, the pi to which he necessarily comes, and that is the he will be obliged to declare, in his resolution that the principle upon which the Senate at was not correct; that it was a false and error ous principle. And let me ask, what was the principle, which now, it seems, is to be destry ed? The principle on which the Senate at the principle which that gentleman engages overthrow, is this: 'we have a right to expour opinion.' He will be compelled to that; or, perhaps, he may take refuge from a predicament by qualifying his subversion this first principle of legislative freedom. how will he qualify the denial of this principle that is, how will he deny it, and yet appared maintain it? It is a question of the utmost magnitude; I an anxious to ee it brought on; two senators [Messrs. Benten and King of Alabama] have pledged them-elves to bring it forward. They cannot do it oo soon—they cannot too soon expose the hor-ible real ty of the condition to which our counry is reduced. I hope they will make no deose no time in their effort to expunge the Seate, and dissolve the system of government and onstitution. Yes, I entreat them to push their eliberate purpose to a resolve. They have now iren origin to a question than which none erhaps is, in its effects and tendencies, of deepand more radical importance; it is a question ore important than that of the bank, or than at of the Post Office, and I am exceedingly vious to see how far they will carry out the petrine they have advanced; a doctrine as enaring and as despotic as any that is maintained the Antocrat of all the Russias. To give them opportunity, I move to lay the resolutions the table, and I promise them that, when they ove their resolution, I will be ready to take it

"Mr. Clay said that the proposition to receive e resolutions was a preliminary one, and was e question to which he had at first invited the tention of the Senate. The debate, certainly, d been very irregular, and not strictly in orr. He had contended, from the first, for the rpose of avoiding an interference with a deon another subject, that the subject of the abama resolutions should not be agitated at at time. The senator from Alabama having used to withdraw these resolutions, he was mpelled to a course which would, in all pro-bility, lead to a protracted debate.

Mr. Clay then submitted the following:
Resolved, That the resolutions of the legisure of Alabama, presented by the senator m that State, ought not to be acted upon by Senate, inasmuch as they are not addressed the Senate, nor contain any request that they laid before the Senate; and inasmuch, also, that which those resolutions direct should be le, cannot be done without violating the conution of the United States."

Mr. Calhoun here moved to lay the resolus on the table, which motion took precece of Mr. Clay's, and was not debatable. withdrew it, however, at the request of Mr.

Mr. Benton said an objection had been raised the resolutions of Alabama, by the senator South Carolina and the senator from Delato which he would briefly reply. Need he refer those gentlemen to the course of their own reading? he would refer them to the case in a State contiguous to South Carolina, where certain proceedings of its legislature were pulliely burnt. (The journal of the Yazoo fraud, in Georgia.) Need he refer them to the case of Wilkes? where the British House of Commons expunged certain proceedings from their journal expunged! not by the childish process of sending out for every copy and cutting a leaf from each, but by a more effectual process. He would describe the modus as he read it in the parliamentary history. It was this: There was a total suspension of business in the House, and the clerk taking the official journal, the original record of its proceedings, and reading the clause to be expunged, obliterated it, word after word, not by making a Saint Andrew's cross over the clause, as is sometimes done in old accounts, but by completely erasing out every letter. This is the way expunging is done, and this is what I propose to get done in the Senate, through the power of the people, upon this lawless condemnation of President Jackson: and no system of tactics or manœuvres shall prevent me from following up the design according to the notice given yesterday.

"Mr. King of Alabama, in reply, said that when the proper time arrived-and he should use his own time, on his own responsibility—he would bring forward the resolution, of which the senator from Missouri had given notice, if not prevented by the previous action of that gentleman. He had no doubt of the power of the Senate to repeal any resolution it had adopted. What! repeal facts? asked the senator from South Carolina. He would ask that gentleman if they had it not in their power to retrace their steps when they have done wrong? If they had it not in their power to correct their own journal when asserting what was not true? The democratic party of the country had spoken, pronounced judgment upon the facts stated in that journal. They had declared that these facts were not true; that the condemnation pronounced against the Chief Magistrate, for having violated the constitution of the United States, was not true; and it was high time that it was stricken from the journal it disgraced.

"Mr. Calhoun observed that the senator from Alabama having made some personal allusions to him, he felt bound to notice them, although not at all disposed to intrude upon the patience of the Senate. The senator had said that he (Mr. C.) was truly connected with party. Now, if by 'party' the gentleman meant that he was enlisted in any political scheme, that he desired to promote the success of any party, or was anxious to see any particular man elevated to the Chief Magistracy, he did him great injustice. It was a long time since he (Mr. C.) had taken any active part in the political affairs of the country. The senator need only to have looked back to his vote, for the last eight years, to have been satisfied that he (Mr. C.) had voluntarily put himself in the very small minority to which he belonged, and that he had done this to serve the gallant and patriotic State of South Carolina. Would the gentleman say that he did not step forward in defence of South Carolina, in the great and magnanimous stand which she took in defence of her rights? Now, he wished the senator to understand him, that he had put himself in a minority of at least one to a hundred; that he had abandoned party voluntarily, freely; and he would tell every senator—for he was con-strained to speak of himself, and therefore he should speak boldly—he would not turn upon his heel for the administration of the affairs of this government. He believed that such was the hold which corruption had obtained in this government, that any man who should undertake to reform it would not be sustained."

Mr. King of Alabama moved that the resolutions be printed, which motion was superseded by a motion to lay it on the table, which prevailed-yeas twenty-seven, nays twenty-as follows:

"YEAS .- Messrs. Bell, Bibb, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghnysen, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Naudain, Poindexter, Porter, Prentiss, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler. Waggaman, Webster.

"NAYS .- Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linu, McKean, Moore, Morris, Preston, Robinson, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wright."

And thus the resolutions of a sovereign State, in favor of expunging what it deemed to be a lawless sentence passed upon the President, were refused even a reception and a printing-a circumstance which seemed to augur badly for the final success of the series of expunging motions which I had pledged myself to make. But, in fact, it was not discouraging-but the contrary. It strengthened the conviction that such conduct would sooner induce the change of senators in the democratic States, and permit the act to be done.

CHAPTER CXXIII.

THE EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

From the moment of the Senate's condemnation of General Jackson, Mr. Benton gave notice of his intention to move the expunction of the ed by seeing the course which the publica sentence from the journal, periodically and cotinually until the object should be effected, a his political life come to its end. In conformate to this notice, he made his formal motion at the session '34-'35; and in these words:

" Resolved, That the resolution adopted by the Senate, on the 28th day of March, in the year 1834, in the following words: 'Resolved That the President, in the late executive poceedings in relation to the public revenue, he assumed upon himself authority and power at conferred by the constitution and laws, but is derogation of both,' be, and the same hereby a ordered to be expunged from the journals the Senate; because the said resolution is ille gal and unjust, of evil example, indefinite as vague, expressing a criminal charge without specification; and was irregularly and unconstitu tionally adopted by the Senate, in subversion the rights of defence which belong to an accuse and impeachable officer; and at a time at under circumstances to endanger the politic rights, and to injure the pecuniary interests the people of the United States."

This proposition was extremely distasteful the Senate-to the majority which passel sentence on General Jackson; and Mr. Souther senator from New Jersey, spoke their sen ments, and his own, when he thus bitterly racterized it as an indictment which the Se itself was required to try, and to degrade is in its own condemnation,-he said;

"The object of this resolution (said Mr. 8 is not to obtain an expression from the Sen that their former opinions were erroneous, in that the Executive acted correctly in relation the public treasury. It goes further, and nounces the act of the Senate as so unconsti tional, unjustiflable, and offensive, that the dence of it ought not to be permitted to re upon the records of the government. The sem from Missouri calls upon us to sit in judn upon our own act, and warns us that wer save ourselves from future and lasting den eintion and reproach only by pronouncing own condemnation by our votes. The bitterness of this self trial was aggre mal, periodically and coet should be effected, a to its end. In conformaty e his formal motion at the in these words:

he resolution adopted by 28th day of March, in the lowing words: 'Resolved in the late executive per to the public revenue, ha If authority and power me stitution and laws, but is be, and the same hereby is nged from the journals of the said resolution is ille vil example, indefinite and a criminal charge withou sirregularly and unconstitu the Senute, in subversion of e which belong to an accuse officer; and at a time ad es to endanger the political re the pecuniary interested United States."

n was extremely distasted as majority which passed to all Jackson; and Mr. Southed w Jersey, spoke their set, on, when he thus bitterly do a indiction on twich the Sea of to try, and to degrade is a mation,—he said:

this resolution (said Mr. S n expression from the Sen opinions were erroneous, ve acted correctly in relation ury. It goes further, and of the Senate as so unconstitution ble, and offensive, that the t not to be permitted to rem ls of the government. It is nst the Senate. He assu no desire or intention to dem the position in which he was of deep degradation—denset humiliating character—wi wledges error, and admits in luct in this legislative brands t, but bows it down before Executive, and makes us nfallibility.'

ss of this self trial was aggree he course which the public

matking. A current, strong and steady, and seatantly swelling, was setting in for the President and against the Senate; and resolutions from the legislatures of several States—Labama, Missiesippi, New Jersey, North Carona—had already arrived instructing their senates to vote for the expurgation which Mr. Lenton proposed. In the mean time he had of yet made his leading speech in favor of his botton; and he judged this to be the proper me to do so, in order to produce its effects on the elections of the ensuing summer; and acardingly now spoke as follows:

Mr. Benton then rose and addressed the mate in support of his motion. He said that resolution which he had offered, though relved upon, as he had heretofore stated, witht consultation with any person, was not reved upon without great deliberation in his m mind. The criminating resolution, which was his object to expunge, was presented to Senate, December 26th, 1833. The senator m Kentucky who introduced it [Mr. Clay], nmenced a discussion of it on that day, which s continued through the months of January February; and to the end, nearly, of the nth of March. The vote was taken upon it 28th of March; and about a fortnight therer he announced to the Senate his intention commence a series of motions for expunging resolution from the journal. Here, then, e nearly four months for consideration; for decision was expected; and he had very jously considered, during that period, all the culties, and all the proprieties, of the step ch he meditated. Was the intended motion ear the journal of the resolution right in f? The convictions of his judgment told that it was. Was expurgation the proper ? Yes; he was thoroughly satisfied that was the proper mode of proceeding in this For the criminating resolution which he ed to get rid of combined all the characics of a case which required erasure and eration: for it was a case, as he believed, e exercise of power without authority, ut even jurisdiction; illegal, irregular, and t. Other modes of annulling the resoluas rescinding, reversing, repealing, could e proper in such a case; for they would rightful jurisdiction, a lawful authority, action, though an erroneous judgment. Vol. I.-34

All that he denied. He denied the authority of the Senate to pass such a resolution at all; and he affirmed that it was unjust, and contrary to the truth, as well as contrary to law. This being his view of the resolution, he held that the true and proper course, the parliamentary course of proceeding in such a case, was to expange it.

But, said Mr. B., it is objected that the Senate has no right to expunge any thing from its journal; that it is required by the constitution to keep a journal; and, being so required, could not destroy any part of it. This, said Mr. B., is sticking in the bark; and in the thinnest back in which a shot, even the smallest, was ever lodged. Various are the meanings of the word keep, used as a verb. To keep a journal is to write down, daily, the history of what you do. For the Senate to keep a journal is to enuse to be written down, every day, the necount of its proceedings; and, having done that, the constitutional injunction is satisfied. The constitution was satisfied by entering this criminating resolution on the journal; it will be equally satisfied by entering the expunging resolution on the same journal. In each case the Senate keeps a journal of its own proceedings.

It is objected, also, that we have no right to destroy a part of the journal; and that to expunge is to destroy and to prevent the expunged part from being known in future. Not so the fact, said Mr. B. The matter expunged is not destroyed. It is incorporated in the expunging resolution, and lives as long as that lives; the only effect of the expurgation being to express, in the most emphatic manner, the opinion that such matter ought never to have been put in the journal.

Mr. B. said he would support these positions by authority, the authority of eminent examples; and would cite two cases, out of a multitude that might be adduced, to show that expunging was the proper course, the parliamenmentary course, in such a case as the one now before the Senate, and that the expunged matter was incorporated and preserved in the expunging resolution.

Mr. B. then read, from a volume of British Parliamentary History, the celebrated case of the Middlesex election, in which the resolution to expel the famous John Wilkes was expunged from the journal, but preserved in the expurgatory resolution, so a to be just as well read now as if it had never been blotted out from the journals of the British House of Commons. The resolution ran in these words: "That the resolution of the House of the 17th February, 1769, 'that John Wilkes, Esq., having been, in this session of Parliament, expelled this House, was and is incapable of being elected a member to serve in the present Parliament,' be expunged from the journals of this House, as being subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors of this kingdom." Such, sald Mr. B., were the terms of the expunging resolution in the ease of the Middlesex election, as it was annually introduced from 1769 to 1782; when it was finally passed by a vote of near three to one, and the clause ordered to be expunged was blotted out of the journal, and obliterated, by the clerk at the table, in the presence of the whole House, which remained silent, and all business suspended until the obliteration was complete. Yet the history of the case is not lost. Though blotted out of one part of the journal, it is saved in another; and here, at the distance of half a century, and some thousand miles from London, the whole case is read as fully as if no such operation had ever been performed upon it.

Having given a precedent from British parliamentary history, Mr. B. would give another from American history; not, indeed, from the Congress of the assembled States, but from one of the oldest and most respectable States of the Union: he spoke of Massachusetts, and of the resolution adopted in the Senate of that State during the late war, adverse to the celebration of our national victories; and which, some ten years afterwards, was expunged from the journals by a solemn vote of the Senate.

A year ago, said Mr. B., the Senate tried President Jackson; now the Senate itself is on trial nominally before itself; but in reality before America, Europe, and posterity. We shall give our voices in our own case; we shall vote for or against this motion; and the entry upon the record will be according to the majority of voices. But that is not the end, but the beginning of our trial. We shall be judged by others; by the public, by the present age, and by all posterity! The proceedings of this case, and of this day, will not be limited to the present age; they will go down to posterity, and to the latest ages. President Jackson is not a character to be forgotten in history. His name is not in be confined to the dry catalogue and office nomenclature of mere American President Like the great Romans who attained the coa sulship, not by the paltry arts of electioneering but through a series of illustrious deeds in name will live, not for the offices he filled be for the deeds which he performed. He is the first President that has ever received the codemnation of the Senate for the violation of the laws and the constitution, the first whose name is borne upon the journals of the American is nate for the violation of that constitution while he is sworn to observe, and of those laws while he is bound to see faithfully executed. a condemnation cannot escape the observation of history. Before he proceeded to the exposition of the case which he intended to make, he wished avail himself of an argument which had be conclusive elsewhere, and which he true could not be without effect in this Senate. was the argument of public opinion. In case of the Middlesex election, it had been cisive with the British House of Commons: the Massachusetts case, it had been decided with the Senate of that State. In both the cases many gentlemen yielded their min opinions to public sentiment; and public se ment having been well pronounced in the now before the Senate, he had a right to h for the same deferential respect for it here will had been shown elsewhere."

Mr. B. then took up a volume of British liamentary history for the year 1782, the volume, and read various passages from a 1407, 1408, 1410, 1411, to show the stress that been laid on the argument of public op in favor of expunging the Middleser resolution and the deference which was paid to ithy litouse, and by members who had, until a opposed the motion to expunge. lle then read from Mr. Fox's speech. Mr. Fox had heretofore opposed the expunging resolation, but now yielded to it in obedience to the roice of the people.

"He (Mr. Fox) had turned the question often in his mind, he was still of opinion that the replution which gentlemen wanted to expunge ras founded on proper principles." * * * Though he opposed the motion, he felt very little anxiety for the event of the question ; for then he found the voice of the people was minst the privilege, as he believed was the case t present, he would not preserve the privilege." . . . "The people had associated, they ad declared their sentiments to Parliament, nd had taught Parliament to listen to the voice f their constituents."

Having read these passages, Mr. B. said they ere the sentiments of an English whig of the d school. Mr. Fox was a whig of the old thool. He acknowledged the right of the peole to instruct their representatives. He yielded the general voice himself, though not specially structed; and he uses the remarkable expreson which acknowledges the duty of Parliament obey the will of the people. "They had deared their sentiments to Parliament, and had ught Parliament to listen to the voice of their nstituents." This, said Mr. B., was fifty years o; it was spoken by a member of Parliament. ho, besides being the first debater of his age, s at that time Secretary at War. He acowledged the duty of Parliament to obey the ice of the people. The son of a peer of the im, and only not a peer himself because he s not the eldest son, he still acknowledged great democratic principle which lies at the tom of all representative government. After s, after such an example, will American Setors be unwilling to obey the people? Will y require people to teach Congress the lesson ich Mr. Fox says the English people had ght their Parliament fifty years ago? The ce of the people of the United States had n heard on this subject. The elections lared it. The vote of many legislatures de-

the voice of the people came rolling in-a swelling tide, rising as it flowed-and covering the eapitol with its mountain waves. Can that voice be disregarded? Will members of a republican Congress be less obedient to the voice of the people than were the representatives of a monarchical House of Commons?

Mr. H. then proceeded to the argument of his motion. He moved to expunge the resolution of March 28, 1834, from the journals of the Senate, because it was illegal and unjust; vague and indefinite; a criminal charge without specification; unwarranted by the constitution and laws; subversive of the rights of defence which belong to an accused and impeachable offleer; of evil example; and adopted at a time and under circumstances to involve the political rights and the pecuniary interests of the people of the United States in peculiar danger and serious injury.

These reasons for expunging the criminating resolution from the journals, Mr. B. said, were not phrases collected and paraded for effect, or strung together for harmony of sound. They were each, separately and individually, substantive reasons; every word an allegation of fact, or of law. Without going fully into the argument now, he would make an exposition which would lay open his meaning, and enable each allegation, whether of law or of fact, to be fully understood, and replied to in the sense intended.

1. Illegal and unjust .- These were the first heads under which Mr. B. would develope his objections, he would say the outline of his objections, to the resolution proposed to be expunged. He held it to be illegal, because it contained a criminal charge, on which the President might be impeached, and for which he might be tried by the Senate. The resolution adopted by the Senate is precisely the first step taken in the House of Representatives to bring on an impeachment. It was a resolution offered by a member in his place, containing a criminal charge against an impeachable officer, debated for a hundred days; and then voted upon by the Senate, and the officer voted to be guilty. This is the precise mode of bringing on an impeachment in the House of Representatives; and, to prove it, Mr. B. would read from a work of approved authority on parliamentary practice; it was from Mr. Jefferson's Manual. Mr. B. then lared it. From the confines of the Republic | read from the Manual, under the section entitled Impeachment, and from that head of the section entitled accusation. The writer was giving the British Parliamentary practice, to which our own constitution is conformable. "The Commons, as the grand inquest of the nation, became suitors for penal justice. The general course is to pass a resolution containing a criminal charge against the supposed delinquent; and then to direct some member to impeach him by oral accusation at the bar of the House of Lords, in the name of the Commons."

Repeating a clause of what he had read, Mr. B. said the general course is to pass a criminal charge against the supposed delinquent. This is exactly what the Senate did; and what did it do next? Nothing. And why nothing? Because there was nothing to be done by them but to execute the sentence they had passed; and that they could not do. Penal justice was the consequence of the resolution; and a judgment of penalties could not be attempted on such an irregular proceeding. The only kind of penal justice which the Senate could inflict was that of public opinion; it was to ostracize the President, and to expose him to public odium, as a violator of the laws and constitution of his country. Having shown the resolution to be illegal, Mr. B. would pronounce it to be unjust; for he affirmed the resolution to be untrue; he maintained that the President had violated no law, no part of the constitution, in dismissing Mr. Duane from the Treasury, appointing Mr. Taney, or causing the deposits to be removed; for these were the specifications contained in the original resolution, also in the second modification of the resolution, and intended in the third modification, when stripped of specifications, and reduced to a vague and general charge. It was in this shape of a general charge that the resolution passed. No new specifications were even suggested in debate. The alterations were made voluntarily, by the friends of the resolution, at the last moment of the debate, and just when the vote was to be taken. And why were the specifications then dropped? Because no majority could be found to agree in them? or because it was thought prudent to drop the name of the Bank of the United States? or for both these reasons together? Be that as it may, said Mr. B., the condemnation of the President, and the support of the bank, were connected in the

in the public mind; and the President was to justly condemned in the same resolution that befriended and sustained the cause of the bank He held the condemnation to be untrue in point of fact, and therefore unjust; for he maintained that there was no breach of the laws and constitution in any thing that President Jackson did, in removing Mr. Duane, or in appointing Mr. Taney, or in causing the deposits to be removed There was no violation of law, or constitution in any part of these proceedings; on the contrary, the whole country, and the government itself, was redeemed from the dominion of great and daring moneyed corporation, by the wisdom and energy of these very proceedings.

2. Vague and indefinite; a criminal chara without specification. Such was the resolution Mr. B. said, when it passed the Senate; but such it was not when first introduced, nor even when first altered; in its first and second forms it contained specifications, and these specifictions identified the condemnation of the Presi dent with the defence of the bank; in its third form, these specifications were omitted, and n others were substituted; the bank and the resolution stood disconnected on the record by as much connected, in fact, as ever. The has lution was reduced to a vague and indefine form, on purpose, and in that circumstance, w quired a new character of injustice to President Jackson. His accusers should have specific the law, and the clause in the constitution which was violated; they should have specific the acts which constituted the violation. To was due to the accused, that he might known what points to defend himself; it was due the public, that they might know or what poin to hold the accusers to their responsibility. to make them accountable for an unjust and tion. To sustain this position, Mr. B. had w course to history and example, and produc the case of Mr. Giles's accusation of General Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, the year 1793. Mr. Giles, he said, proceed in a manly, responsible manner. He specifi the law and the alleged violations of the so that the friends of General Hamilton or see what to defend, and so as to make him accountable for the accusation. Mr. B. said he had a double object in quoting this resolution of Mr. Glies, which was intended to lay the foundation for an impeaclment against General Hamilton; it was to show, first, the speciality with which these criminating resolutions should be drawn; next, to show the absence of any allegations of corrupt or wicked intention. The mere violation of law was charged as the offence, as it was in three of the articles of impeachment against Judge Chase; and thus, the absence of an allegation of corrupt intention in the resolution adopted against President Jackson, was no argument against its inpeachment character, especially as exhibited in its first and second form, with the criminal averment, "dangerous to the liberties of the people."

For the purpose of exposing the studied ragueness of the resolution as passed, detecting its connection with the Bank of the United States, demonstrating its criminal character in wice retaining the eriminal averment, "dangerbus to the liberties of the people," and showing he progressive changes it had to undergo bere it could conciliate a majority of the votes, Ir. B. would exhibit all three of the reolutions, and read them side by side of each ther, as they appeared before the Senate, in he first, second, and third forms which they ere made to wear. They appeared first in the mbryo, or primordial form; then they assumed heir aurelia, or chrysalis state; in the third age, they reached the ultimate perfection of eir imperfect nature.

First Form.—December 26, 1833.

*Resolved, That by dismissing the late Secrery of the Treasury, because he would not, intrary to his sense of his own duty, remove e money of the United States, in deposit with e Bank of the United States and its branches, conformity with the President's opinion, and appointing his successor to make such reoval, which has been done, the President has uned the exercise of a power over the treary of the United States not granted to him the constitution and laws, and dangerous to liberties of the people."

Second Form .- March 28, 1834.

Resolved, That, in taking upon himself the In this case, the House of Representatives, if possibility of removing the deposit of the they confided in the Senate's condemnation, public money from the Bank of the United States, the President of the United States has assumed the exercise of a power over the treasury of the United States not granted to him by the constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people."

THIRD FORM .- . March 28, 1834.

"Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings, in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

Having exhibited the original resolution, with its variations, Mr. B. would leave it to others to explain the reasons of such extraordinary metamorphoses. Whether to get rid of the bank association, or to get rid of the impeachment clause, or to conciliate the votes of all who were willing to condemn the President, but could not tell for what, it was not for him to say; but one thing he would venture to say, that the majority who agreed in passing a general resolution, containing a criminal charge against President Jackson, for violating the laws and the constitution, cannot now agree in naming the law or the clause in the constitution violated, or in specifying any act constituting such violation. And here Mr. B. paused, and offered to give way to the gentlemen of the opposition, if they would now undertake to specify any act which President Jackson had done in violation of law or constitution.

3. Unwarranted by the constitution and laws.—Mr. B. said this head explained itself. It needed no development to be understood by the Senate or the country. The President was condemned without the form of a trial; and, therefore, his condemnation was unwarranted by the constitution and laws.

4. Subversive of the rights of defence, which belong to an accused and impeachable officer.—
This head, also (Mr. B. said), explained itself. An accused person had a right to be heard before he was condemned; an impeachable officer could not be condemned unheard by the Senate, without subverting all the rights of defence which belong to him, and disqualifying the Senate to act as impartial judges in the event of his being regularly impeached for the same offence. In this case, the House of Representatives, if they confided in the Senate's condemnation.

5. Of evil example.-Nothing, said Mr. B., could be more unjust and illegal in itself, and therefore more evil in example, than to try people without a hearing, and condemn them without defence. In this case, such a trial and such a condemnation was aggravated by the refusal of the Senate, after their sentence was pronounced, to receive the defence of the President. and let it be printed for the inspection of posterity! So that, if this criminating resolution is not expunged, the singular spectacle will go down to posterity, of a condemnation, and a refusal to permit an answer from the condemned person standing recorded on the pages of the same journal! Mr. B. said the Senate must look forward to the time-far ahead, perhaps, but a time which may come-when this body may be filled with disappointed competitors, or personal enemies of the President, or of aspirants to the very office which he holds. and who may not scruple to undertake to cripple him by senatorial condemnations; to attaint him by convictions; to ostracise him by vote; and lest this should happen, and the present condemnation of President Jackson should become the precedent for such an odious proceeding, the evil example should be arrested, should be removed, by expunging the present sentence from the journals of the Senate. And here Mr. B. would avail himself of a voice which had often been heard in the two Houses of Congress, and always with respect and veneration. It was the voice of a wise man, an honest man, a good man, a patriot; one who knew no cause but the cause of his country; and who, a quarter of a century ago, foresaw and described the scenes of this day, and foretold the consequences which must have happened to any other President, under the circumstances in which President Jackson has been placed. He spoke of Nathaniel Macon of North Carolina, and of the sentiments which he expressed, in the year 1810, when called upon to give a vote in approbation of Mr. Madison's conduct in dismissing Mr. Jackson, the then British minister to the United States. He opposed the resolution of approbation, because the House had nothing to do with the President, in their legislative character, except the passing of laws, calling for information, or impeaching; and, looking into the evil consequences of undertaking to judge of the President's conduct, he foretold the exact prediction ment in which the Senate is now involved, with respect to President Jackson. i. The condemnation of the issolubly connected with the lik! The first form of the red the connection; the seed every speech did the same; it condemnation of the President of the President was in the condemnation of the same; the condemnation of the president was in the condemnation of the president with the condemnation of the president was in the condemnation of the condemna demnation of the bank; and thus the two objects were identical and reciprocal. The attack of one was a defence of the other; the defence of one was the attack of the other. and thus it continued for the long protracted period of nearly one hundred days-from December 26th, 1833, to March 28th, 1834-when, for reasons not explained to the Senate, upon a private consultation among the friends of the resolution, the mover of it came forward to the Secretary's table, and voluntarily made the altertions which cut the connection between the aak and the resolution! but it stood upon the ecord, by striking out every thing relative to he dismissal of Mr. Duane, the appointment of Ir. Taney, and the removal of the deposits. But the alteration was made in the record only. the connection still subsisted in fact, now lives memory, and shall live in history. Yes, sir, aid Mr. B., addressing himself to the President the Senate; yes, sir, the condemnation of the resident was indissolubly connected with the use of the bank, with the removal of the desits, the renewal of the charter, the restoraon of the deposits, the vindication of Mr. uane, the rejection of Mr. Taney, the fate of ections, the overthrow of Jackson's adminisation, the fall of prices, the distress meetings, distress memorials, the distress committees, distress speeches; and all the long list of pless measures which astonished, terrified. lieted, and deeply injured the country during e long and agenized protraction of the famous nic session. All these things are connected, d Mr. B.; and it became his duty to place a t of the proof which established the connecn before the Senate and the people.

herefore the Senate and the people.

In B. then took up the appendix to the retmade by the Senate's Committee of Finance the bank, commonly called Mr. Tyler's ret, and read extracts from instructions sent to cand-twenty branches of the bank, contemnaeously with the progress of the debate on criminating resolutions; the object and effor which, and their connection with the ate in the Senate, would be quickly seen. mising that the bank had dispatched orders the same branches, in the month of August, had curtailed $4,066,000, and again, in the thof October, to curtail $5,825,6.00, and to take the rates of their exchange, and had ressly stated in a circular, on the 17th of that month, that this reduction would place the branches in a position of entire security, Mr. B. invoked attention to the shower of orders, and their dates, which he was about to read. He read passages from page 77 to 82, inclusive. They were all extracts of letters from the president of the bank in person, to the presidents of the branches; for Mr. B. said it must be remembered, as one of the peculiar features of the bank attack upon the country last winter, that the whole business of conducting this curtailment, and raising exchanges, and doing whatever it pleased with the commerce, currency, and Lus. ss of the country, was withdrawn from the board of oirectors, and confided to one of those convenient committees of which the president is ex officio member and creator; and which, in this case, was expressly absolved from reporting to the board of directors! The letters, then, are all from Nicholas Biddle, president, and not from Samuel Jaudon, cashier, and are addressed direct to the presidents of the branch banks.

When Mr. B. had finished reading these extracts, he turned to the report made by the senator from Virginia, who sat on his right [Mr. Tyler], where all that was said about these new measures of hostility, and the propriety of the bank's conduct in this third curtailment, and in its increase upon rates of exchange, was compressed into twenty lines, and the wisdom or necessity of them were left to be pronounced upon by the judgment of the Senate. Mr. B. would read those twenty lines of that report:

"The whole amount of reduction ordered by the above proceedings (curtailment ordered on 8th and 17th of October) was $5,825,906. The same table, No. 4, exhibits the fact, that on the 23d of January a further reduction was ordered to the amount of $3,320,000. This was communicated to the offices in letters from the president, stating 'that the present situation of the bank, and the new measures of hostility which are understood to be in contemplation, make it expedient to place the institution beyond the reach of all danger; for this purpose, I am directed to instruct your office to conduct its business on the following footing' (appendix, No. 9, copies of letters). The offices of Cincinnati, Louisville, Lexington, St. Louis, Nashville, and Natchez, were further directed to confine themselves to ninety days' bills on Baltimore, and the cities north of it, of which they were allowed to purchase any amount their means would justify: and to bills on New Orleans, which they were to take only in payment of pre-existing debts to the bank and its offices; while the office at New Orleans was directed to abstain from drawing on the Western offices, and to make its purchases mainly on the North Atlantic cities. The committee has thus given a full, and somewhat elaborate detail of the various measures resorted to by the bank, from the 13th of August, 1833; of their wisdom and necessity the Senate will best be able to pronounce a correct judgment."

This, Mr. B. said, was the meagre and stinted manner in which the report treated a transaction which he would show to be the most cold-blooded, calculating, and diabolical, which the annals of any country on this side of Asia could exhibit.

[Mr. Tyler here said there were two pages on this subject to be found at another part of the report, and opened the report at the place for Mr. B.]

Mr. B. said the two pages contained but few allusions to this subject, and nothing to add to or vary what was contained in the twenty lines he had read. He looked upon it as a great omission in the report; the more so as the committee had been expressly commanded to report upon the curtailments and the conduct of the bank in the business of internal exchange. He had hoped to have had searching inquiries and detailed statements of facts on these vital points. He looked to the senator from Virginia [Mr. Tyler] for these inquiries and statements. He wished him to show, by the manner in which he would drag to light, and expose to view, the vast crimes of the bank, that the Old Dominion was still the mother of the Gracchi; that the old lady was not yet forty-five; that she could breed sons! Sons to emulate the fame of the Scipios. But he was disappointed. The report was dumb, silent, speechless, upon the operations of the bank during its terrible campaign of panic and pressure upon the American people. And now he would pay one instalment of the speech which had been promised some time ago on the subject of this report; for there was part of that speech which was strictly applicable and appropriate to the head he was now discussing.

Mr. B. then addressed himself to the senator from Virginia, who sat on his right [Mr. Tyler], and requested him to supply an omission in har report, and to inform what were those remeasures of hostility alluded to in the two-and twenty letters of instruction of the bank, and repeated in the report, and which were make the pretext for this third curtailment, and they new and extraordinary restrictions and impositions upon the purchase of bills of exchange.

[Mr. Tyler answered that it was the et. pected prohibition upon the receivability of the branch bank drafts in payment of the federal revenue.]

Mr. B. resumed: The senator is right. These drafts are mentioned in one of the circular le. ters, and but one of them, as the new measure understood to be in contemplation, and which understanding had been made the pretext for scourging the country. He (Mr. B.) was in capable of a theatrical artifice-a stage trickin a grave debate. He had no question butthr the senator could answer his question, and be knew that he had answered it truly; but h wanted his testimony, his evidence, against the bank; he wanted proof to tie the bank down this answer, to this pretext, to this thin dismi for her conduct in scourging the country. I answer is now given; the proof is adduced: the apprehended prohibition of the receivabile of the branch drafts stands both as the preter and the sole pretext for the pressure commence in January, the doubling the rates of exchange breaking up exchanges between the five Wester branch banks, and concentrating the collection of bills of exchange upon four great comment cities.

Mr. B. then took six positions, which he emmerated, and undertook to demonstrate to be true. They were:

That it was untrue, in point of fact, there were any new measures in contemplating or action, to destroy the bank.

2. That it was untrue, in point of fact, that President harbored hostile and revengeful signs against the existence of the bank.

3. That it was untrue, in point of fact, there was any necessity for this third cura ment, which was ordered the last of Januar.

4. That there was no excuse, justification apology for the conduct of the bank in relatito domestic exchange, in doubling its rates being it up between the five Western branks turning the collection of bills upon the principal conduction.

6. That the distress of the country was ocassed by the Bank of the United States and the Senate of the United States, and not by the removal of the deposits.

llaving stated his positions, Mr. B. proceeded to demonstrate them.

l. As to the new measures to destroy the bank. Mr. B. said there were no such measures. The one indicated, that of stopping the regipt of the branch bank drafts in payments the United States, existed nowhere but in he two-and-twenty letters of instruction of the resident of the bank. There is not even an legation that the measure existed; the lang lage "ia contemplation "-" understood to oe in ntemplation," and upon this flimsy pretext fan inderstanding of something in contemplaion, and which something never took place, a et of rethless orders are sent out to every quarr of the Union to make a pressure for money. nd to embarrass the domestic exchanges of the nion. Three days would have brought an swer from Washington to Philadelphia-from Treasury to the bank; and let it be known at there was no intention to stop the receipt these drafts at that time. But it would seem at the bank did not recognize the legitimacy Mr. Taney's appointment! and therefore ould not condescend to correspond with him Secretary of the Treasury! But time gave eanswer, even if the bank would not inquire the Treasury. Day after day, week after ek, month after month passed off, and these bubtable new measures never made their aprance. Why not then stop the curtailment, restore the exchanges to their former foot-1 February, March, April May, June, five oths, one hundred and fifty days, all passed y; the new measures never came; and yet pressure upon the country was kept up; the and-twenty orders were continued in force. at can be thought of an institution which. g armed by law with power over the proceed to exercise that power to distress that country for money, upon an understanding that something was in contemplation; and never inquire if its understanding was correct, nor cease its operations, when each successive day, for one hundred and fifty days, proved to it that no such thing was in contemplation? At last, on the 27th of June, when the pressure is to be relaxed, it is done upon another ground; not upon the ground that the new measures had never taken effect, but because Congress was about to rise without having done any thing for the bank. Here is a clear confession that the allegation of new measures was a mere pretext; and that the motive was to operate upon Congress, and force a restoration of the deposits and a renewal of the charter.

Mr. B. said he knew all about these drafts. The President always condemned their legality, and was for stopping the receipt of them. Mr. Taney, when Attorney General, condemned them in 1831. Mr. B. had applied to Mr. McLane, in 1832, to stop them; but he came to no decision. He applied to Mr. Duane, by letter, as soon as he came into the Treasury; but got no answer. He applied to Mr. Taney as soon as he arrived at Washington in the fall of 1833; and Mr. Taney decided that he would not stop them until the moneyed concerns of the country had recovered their tranquillity and prosperity, lest the bank should make it the pretext of new attempts to distress the country; and thus the very thing which Mr. Taney refused to do, lest it should be made a pretext for oppression, was falsely converted into a pretext to do what he was determined they should have no pretext for doing.

But Mr. B. took higher ground still; it was this: that, even if the receipt for the drafts had been stopped in January or February, there would have been no necessity on that account for curtailing debts and embarrassing exchanges. This ground he sustained by showing-1st. That the bank had at that time two millions of dollars in Europe, lying idle, as a fund to draw bills of exchange upon; and the mere sale of bills on this sum would have met every demand which the rejection of the drafts could have thrown upon it. 2. That it sent the money it raised by this curtailment to Europe, to the amount of three and a half millions; and thereby showed that it was not collected to meet any eyed system of the whole country, should demand at home. 3d. That the bank had at that time (January, 1834) the sum of $4,230,509 of public money in hand, and therefore had United States money enough in possession to balance any injury from rejection of drafts. 4th. That the bank had notes enough on hand to supply the place of all the drafts, even if they were all driven in. 5th. That it had stopped the receipt of these branch drafts itself at the branches, except each for its own in November, 1833, and was compelled to resume their receipt by the energetic and just conduct of Mr. Taney, in giving transfer drafts to be used against the branches which would not honour the notes and drafts of the other branches. Here Mr. B. turned upon Mr. Tyler's report, and severely arraigned it for alleging that the bank always honored its paper at every point, and furnishing a supply of negative testimony to prove that assertion, when there was a large mass of positive testimony, the disinterested evidence of numerous respectable persons, to prove the contrary, and which the committee had not noticed.

Finally, M. B. had recourse to Mr. Biddle's own testimony to annihilate his (Mr. Biddle's) affected alarm for the destruction of the bank, and the injury to the country from the repulse of these famous branch drafts from revenue payments. It was in a letter of Mr. Biddle to Mr. Woodbury in the fall of 1834, when the receipt of these drafts was actually stopped, and in the order which was issued to the branches to continue to issue them as usual. Mr. B. read a passage from this letter to show that the receipt of these drafts was always a mere Treasury arrangement, in which the bank felt no interest; that the refusal to receive them was an object nt all times of perfect indifference to the bank, and would not have been even noticed by it, if Mr. Woodbury had not sent him a copy of his circular.

Mr. B. invoked the attention of the Senate upon the fatal contradictions which this letter of November, and these instructions of January, 1834, exhibit. In January, the mere understanding of a design in contemplation to exclude these drafts from revenue payments, is a danger of such alarming magnitude, an invasion of the rights of the bank in such a flagrant manner, a proof of such vindictive determination to prostrate, sacrifice, and ruin the institution, that the entire continent must be laid under contribution to raise money to enable the institution to stand the shock! November of the same year when the order for the rejection actually comes, these the same measure is declared to be one of the utmost indifference to the bank; in which a never felt any interest; which the Treasury adopted for its own convenience; which was aways under the exclusive control of the Treasury; about which the bank had never expressed a wish; of which it would have taken to notice if the Secretary had not sent them a circular; and the expediency of which it was the intended to question in the remotest degree! Having pointed out these fatal contradictions Mr. B. said it was a case in which the emphasic ejaculation might well be repented: Oh! that mine enemy would write a book!

To put the seal of the bank's contempt on the order prohibiting the receipt of these drafts, to show its disregard of law, and its ability to sutain its drafts upon its own resources, and with out the advantage of government receivability Mr. B. read the order which the president of the bank addressed to all the branches on the recent of the circular which gave him information of the rejection of these drafts. It was in these words: "This will make no alteration whatever in your practice, with regard to issuing or paring these drafts, which you will continue as here tofore." What a pity, said Mr. B., that the pre sident of the bank could not have thought of issuing such an order as this in January, instead of sending forth the mandate for curtailing dela embarrassing exchange, levying three million and a half, alarming the country with the of danger, and exhibiting President Jackson a vindictive tyrant, intent upon the ruin of bank!

2. The hostility of the President to the best This assertion, said Mr. B., so incontinently iterated by the president of the bank, is take up and repeated by our Finance Committee whose report he was now paying an instalment of those respects which he had promised the This assertion, so far as the bank and the mittee are concerned in making it, is an ass tion without evidence, and, so far as the facts concerned, is an assertion against evidence. there is any evidence of the bank or the commit to support this assertion, in the forty pages of report, or the three hundred pages of the appeal the four members of the Finance Committeen produce it when they come to reply. The first was the fact which he mentioned when this report was first read on the 18th of December last, namely, that Presiient Jackson had nominated Mr. Biddle at the head of the government directors, and thereby adicated him for the presidency of the bank, for three successive years after this hostility was apposed to have commenced. The second was, hat the President had never ordered a scire ucias to issue against the bank to vacate its harter, which he has the right, under the menty-third section of the charter, to do, henever he believed the charter to be violated. the third, that during many years, he has never ouire this Secretaries of the Treasury to stop the overnmental receipt of the branch bank drafts, though his own mind upon their illegality had cen made up for several years past. The fourth, at after all the clamor-all the invocations on heaven and earth against the tyranny of moving the deposits - those deposits have ever happened to be quite entirely removed! n average of near four millions of dollars of blic money has remained in the hands of the ak for each month, from the 1st of October, 33, to the 1st of January, 1835, inclusively! bracing the entire period from the time the der was to take effect against depositing in the ak of the United States down to the comneement of the present year! So far are the posits from being quite entirely removed, as public are led to believe, that, at the distance fifteen months from the time the order for the noval began to take effect, there remained in hands of the bank the large sum of three lions eight hundred and seventy-eight thoud nine hundred and fifty-one dollars and ety-seven cents, according to her own showin her monthly statements. That President kson is, and always has been, opposed to the stence of the bank, is a fact as true as it is orable to him; that he is hostile to it, in the dictive and revengeful sense of the phrase, is ssertion, Mr. B. would take the liberty to eat, without evidence, so far as he could see the proofs of the committee, and against evie, to the full extent of all the testimony in his view. Far from indulging in revengeesentment against the bank, he has been patient, indulgent, and forebearing towards it, to a degree hardly compatible with his duty to his country, and with his constitutional supervision over the faithful execution of the laws; to a degree which has drawn upon him, as a deduction from his own conduct, an argument in favor of the legality of this very branch bank currency. on the part of this very committee, as may be seen in their report. Again, the very circum stance on which this charge of hostility rests in the two-and-twenty letters of Mr. Biddle, proves it to be untrue: for the stoppage of the drafts, understood to be in contemplation, was not in contemplation, and did not take place until the pecuniary concerns of the country were tranquil and prosperous; and when it did thus take place, the president of the bank declared it to have been always the exclusive right of the government to do it, in which the bank had no interest, and for which it cared nothing. No, said Mr. B., the President has opposed the recharter of the bank; he has not attacked its present charter; he has opposed its future, not its present existence; and those who characterize this opposition to a future charter as attacking the bank, and destroying the bank, must admit that they advocate the hereditary right of the bank to a new charter after the old one is out; and that they deny to a public man the right of opposing that hereditary claim.

3. That there was no necessity for this third curtailment ordered in January. Mr. B. said, to have a full conception of the truth of this position, it was proper to recollect that the bank made its first curtailment in August, when the appointment of an agent to arrange with the deposit banks announced the fact that the Bank of the United States was soon to cease to be the depository of public moneys. The reduction under that first curtailment was $4,066,000. The second was in October, and under that order for curtailment the reduction was $5,825,000. The whole reduction, then, consequent upon the expected and actual removal of deposits, was $9,891,000. At the same time the whole amount of deposits on the first day of October, the day for the removal, or rather for the cessation to deposit in the United States Bank to take effect, was $9 868,435; and on the first day of February, 1834, when the third curtailment was ordered, there were still $3,066,561 of these deposits on hand, and have remained on hand to near that amount ever since; so that the bank in the two first curtailments, accomplished between August and January, had actually curtailed to the whole amount, and to the exact amount, upon precise calculation, of the amount of deposits on hand on the first of October; and still had, on the first of January, a fraction over three millions of the deposits in its possession. This simple statement of sums and dates shows that there was no necessity for ordering a further reduction of $3,320,000 in January, as the bank had already curtailed to the whole amount of the deposits, and $22,500 over. Nor did the bank put the third curtailment upon that ground, but upon the new measures in contemplation; thus leaving her advocates every where still to attribute the pressure created by the third curtailment to the old cause of the removal of the deposits. This simple statement of facts is sufficient to show that this third curtailment was unnecessary. What confirms that view, is that the bank remitted to Europe, as fast as it was collected, the whole amount of the curtailment, and $105,000 over; there to lie idle until she could raise the foreign exchange to eight per cent. above par; which she had sunk to five per cent. below par, and thus make two sets of profits out of one operation in distressing and pressing the country.

4. No excuse for doubling the rates of exchange, breaking up the exchange business in the West, forbidding the branch at New Orleans to purchase a single bill on the West, and concentrating the collection of exchange on the four great commercial cities. For this, Mr. B. said, no apology, no excuse, no justification, was offered by the bank. The act stood unjustified and unjustifiable. The bank itself has shrunk from the attempt to justify it; our committee, in that report of which the bank proclaims itself to be so proud, gives no opinion in its brief notice of a few lines upon this transaction; but leaves it to the Senate to pronounce upon its wisdom and necessity! The committee, Mr. B. said, had failed in their duty to their country by the manner in which they had veiled this affair of the exchanges in a few lines; and then blinked the question of its enormity, by referring it to the judgment of the Senate. He made the same remark upon the contemporaneous measure of the third curtailment; and called on the author of the report [Mr. Tyler] to defend for the condemnation of the President. In his report, and to defend the conduct of the last now, if he could; and requested him to recent all this part of his speech as a further instament paid of what was due to that report on the bank.

5. That the curtailment and exchange m gulations of January were political and term lutionary, and connect themselves with the contemporaneous proceedings of the Senate in the condemnation of the President. That the curtailment, and these regulations were wante and wicked, was a proposition, Mr. B. said which resulted as a logical conclusion from when had been already shown, namely, that they we causeless and unnecessary, and done upon m texts which have been demonstrated to be fall That they were political and revolutionary, as connected with the proceedings in the Sense for the condemnation of the President, he would now prove. In the exhibition of this proof the first thing to be looked to is the chronology the events-the time at which the bank me this third curtailment, and sent forth these et change regulations-and the time at which Senate carried on the proceeding against # President. Viewed under this aspect the movements are not only connected, but identified and inseparable. The time for the condemnation of the President covers the period from the? of December, 1833, to the 28th of March, 183 the bank movement is included in the period; the orders for the pressure were iss from the 21st of January to the 1st of February and were to accomplish their effect in the min of March, and by the first of April; exception place, where, for a reason which will be sha at a proper time, the accomplishment of effect was protracted till the 10th day of in These, Mr. B. said, were the dates of issume orders and accomplishing their effect; the of the adoption of the resolution in the bank this movement is not given in the report must have been, in the nature of things, and to the issue of the orders; it must have some days before the issue of the orders: was, in all probability, a few days after then mencement of the movement in the Se against the President. The next point of said, was in the subject may necessary to recur to the original ne second form, of the resolution mation of the President. In first or primordial form, the resolution was expressly connected with the cause of the bank. It was, for dismissing Mr. Duane because he would not remove the deposits, and appointing Mr. Taney because he would remove them. In the second form of the resolution—that form which naturalists would call its aurelia, or chrysalis state—the phraseology of the connection was varied, but still the connection was etained and expressed. The names of Mr. Duane and Mr. Taney were dropped; and the emoval of the deposits upon his own responsility, was the alleged offence of the President. nits third and ultimate transformation, all alsion to the bank was dropped, and the vague rm "revenue" was substituted; but it was a abstitution of phrase only, without any alteraon of sense or meaning. The resolution is the me under all its phases. It is still the bank, nd Mr. Tancy, and Mr. Duane, and the removal the deposits, which are the things to be unrstood, though no longer prudent to express. I these substantial objects are veiled, and bstituted by the empty phrase "revenue;" hich might signify the force bill in South rolina, and the bank question in Philadelphia! e vagueness of the expression left every genman to fight upon his own hook, and to hang vote upon any mental reservation which ald be found in his own mind! and Mr. B. uld go before the intelligence of any rational n with the declaration that the connection ween the condemnation of the President and cause of the bank was doubly proved; first the words of the resolution, and next by the ssion of those words. The next point of nection, Mr. B. said, was detected in the es, varied to suit each State, at which the sure under the curtailment was to reach its imum; and the manner in which the rections upon the sale and purchase of bills xchange was made to fall exclusively and rily apon the principal commercial cities, at moment when most deeply engaged in the chase and shipment of produce. Thus, in -York, where the great charter elections to take place during the first week in I the curtailment was to reach its maximum ure on the first day of that month. In inia, where the elections are continued ughout the whole month of April, the pres-

day of that month. In Connecticut, where the elections occurred about the first of April, the pressure was to have its last turn of the screw in the month of March. And in these three instances, the only ones in which the elections were depending, the political bearing of the pressure was clear and undeniable. The sympathy in the Senate in the results of those political calculations, was displayed in the exultation which broke out on receiving the news of the elections in Virginia, New-York, and Connecticut -an exultation which broke out into the most extravagant rejoicings over the supposed downfall of the administration. The careful calculation to make the pressure and the exchange regulations fall upon the commercial cities at the moment to injure commerce most, was also visible in the times fixed for each. Thus, in all the western cities, Cincinnati, Louisville, Lexington, Nashville, Pittsburg, Saint Louis, the pressure was to reach its maximum by the first day of March; the shipments of western produce to New Orleans being mostly over by that time; but in New Orleans the pressure was to be continued till the first of April, because the shipping season is protracted there till that month, and thus the produce which left the upper States under the depression of the pressure, was to meet the same pressure upon its arrival in New Orleans; and thus enable the friends of the bank to read their ruined prices of western produce on the floor of this Senate. In Baltimore, the first of March was fixed, which would cover the active business season there. So much, said Mr. B., for the pressure by curtailment; now for the pressure by bills of exchange, and he would take the case of New Orleans first. All the branches in the West, and every where else in the Union, were authorized to purchase bills of exchange at short dates, not exceeding ninety days, on that emporium of the West; so as to increase the demand for money there; at the same time the branch in New Orleans was forbid to purchase a single bill in any part of the valley of the Mississippi. This prohibition was for two purposes; first, to break up exchange; and next, to make money scarce in New Orleans; as, in default of bills of exchange, silver would be shipped, and the shipping of silver would make a pressure upon all the local banks. To help out this operation, was not to reach its climax until the tenth | Mr. B. said, it must be well and continually remembered that the Bank of the truited States itself abducted about one million and a quarter of hard dollars from New Orleans during the period of the pressure there; thus proving that all her affected necessity for curtailment was a false and wished pretext for the cover of her own political and revolutionary views.

The case of the western branches was next adverted to by Mr. B. Among these, he said, the business of exchange was broken up in toto. The five western branches were forbid to purchase exchange at all; and this tyrannical order was not even veiled with the pretext of an excuse. Upon the North Atlantic cities, Mr. B. said, unlimited authority to all the branches was given to purchase bills, all at short dates, under nincty days; and all intended to become due during the shipping season, and to increase the demand for money while the curtailment was going on, and the screw turning from day to day to lessen the capacity of getting money, and make it more scarce as the demand for it became urgent. Thus were the great commercial cities, New Orleans, New-York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, subject to a double process of oppression; and that at the precise season of purchasing and shipping crops, so as to make their distress recoil upon the planters and farmers; and all this upon the pretext of new measures understood to be in contemplation. Time again becomes material, said Mr. B. The bank pressure was arranged in January, to reach its climax in March and the first of April; the debate in the Senate for the condemnation of President Jackson, which commenced in the last days of December, was protracted over the whole period of the bank pressure, and reached its consummation at the same time; namely, the 28th day of March. The two movements covered the same period of time, reached their conclusions together, and co-operated in the effect to be produced; and during the three months of this double movement, the Senate chamber resounded daily with the cry that the tyranny and vengeance of the President, and his violation of laws and constitution, had created the whole distress, and struck the nation from a state of Arcadian felicity-from a condition of unparalleled prosperity-to the lowest depth of misery and ruin. And here Mr. B. obtested and besought the Senate to consider the indifference with which the bank treated its friends in the Senate, and the sorrowful contradiction in whether they were left to be caught. In the Senate, we all over the country, the friends of the bash were allowed to go on with the old time, to run upon the wrong scent, of removal of the deposits creating all the distress; while, in the two-and-twenty circular letters dispatched create this distress, it was not the old measure alone, but the new measures contemplated, which constituted the pretext for this very same de tress. Thus, the bank stood upon one prebr. and its friends stood upon another; and forth mortifying contradiction, in which all its friend have become exposed to see their mount speeches exploded by the bank itself, a just dignation ought now to be felt by all the friend of the bank, who were laying the distress to the removal of the deposits, and daily crying of that nothing could relieve the country but the restoration of the deposits, or the recharter the bank; while the bank itself was writing to its branches that it was the new measures in derstood to be in contemplation that was on sioning all the mischief. Mr. B. would de this head with a remark which ought to exer reflections which should never die away; which should be remembered as long as national last existed, or asked for existence. It was this That here was a proved case of a national be availing itself of its organization, and of power, to send secret orders, upon a false n text, to every part of the Union, to create a tress and panic for the purpose of accomplish an object of its own; and then publicly calumniously charging all this mischief on act of the President for the removal of the posits. This recollection should warn them try against ever permitting another nation bank to repeat a crime of such frightful im rality, and such enormous injury to the busine and property of the people. Mr. B. express his profound regret that the report of the la committee was silent upon these dreadful en mities, while so elaborate upon trifles in in of the bank. He was indignant at the mist done to private property; the fall in the pi of staples, of stocks, and of all real and persi estate; at the ruin of many merchants, and injury of many citizens, which took place du this hideous season of panic and pressure. was indignant at the bank for creating it still more for its criminal audacity in charge

ns own conduct upon the President; and he was mortified, profoundly mortified, that all this should have escaped the attention of the Finance Committee, and enabled them to make a report of which the bank, in its official organ, declares itself to be justly proud; which it now has undergoing the usual process of diffusion through the publication of supplemental gazettes; which it openly avers would have insured the recharter if it had come out in time; and to which it now looks for such recharter as soon as President Jackson retires, and the country can be thrown into confusion by the distractions of a intelection.

took up another head of evidence that the curtailment and exns of January were political and and connected with the proceed-as mar ings of the Senate for the condemnation of the President; and here he would proceed upon rideace drawn from the bank itself. Mr. B. hen read extracts from Mr. Biddle's letters of natructions (January 30, 1834) to Joseph Johnon, Esquire, president of the branch bank at Charleston, South Carolina. They were as folows: "With a view to meet the coming crisis the banking concerns of the country, and specially to provide against new measures of ostility understood to be in contemplation by be executive officers at Washington, a general duction has been ordered at the several offices, nd I have now to ask your particular attention accomplish it." * * * * "It is as disrreable to us as it can be to yourselves to apose any restrictions upon the business of the fice. But you are perfectly aware of the effort hich has been making for some time to prostrate e bank, to which this new measure to which have alluded will soon be added, unless the ojectors become alarmed at it. On the defeat these attempts to destroy the bank depends, our deliberate judgment, not merely the pemiary interests, but the whole free institutions our country; and our determination is, by en a temporary sacrifice of profit, to place the nk entirely beyond the reach of those who editate its destruction."

Mr. B. would invoke the deepest attention to is letter. The passages which he had read re not in the circulars addressed at the same he to the other branches. It was confined to be letter, with something similar in one more which he would presently read. The coming crisis in the banking concerns of the country is here shadowed forth, and secretly foretold, three months before it happened; and with good reason, for the prophet of the evil was to assist in fulfilling his prophecy. With this secret prediction, made in January, is to be connected the public predictions contemporaneously made on this floor, and continued till April, when the explosion of some banks in this district was proclaimed as the commencement of the general ruin which was to involve all local banks, and especially the visite cafety-fund list of banks, in one universal at the thophe. The Senate would remember all the and spare him repetitions which must now in heard with pain, though uttered with satisfaction a few months ago. The whole free institutions of our country was the next phrase in the letter to which Mr. B. called attention. He said that in this phrase the political designs of the bank stood revealed; and he averred that this language was identical with that used upon this floor. Here, then, is the secret order of the bank, avowing that the whole free institutions of the country are taken into its holy keeping; and that it was determined to submit to a temporary sacrifice of profit in sustaining the bank, which itself sustains the whole free institutions of the country! What insolence! What audacity! But, said Mr. B., what is here meant by free institutions, was the elections! and the true meaning of Mr. Biddle's letter is, that the bank meant to submit to temporary sacrifices of money to carry the elections, and put down the Jackson administration. No other meaning can be put upon the words; and if there could, there is further proof in reserve to nail the infamous and wicked design upon the bank. Another passage in this letter, Mr. B. would point out, and then proceed to a new piece of evidence. It was the passage which said this new measure will soon he added, unless the projectors become alarmed at it. Now, said Mr. B., take this as you please; either that the projectors did, or did not, become alarmed at their new measure; the fact is clear that no new measure was put in force, and that the bank, in proceeding to act upon that assumption, was inventing and fabricating a pretext to justify the scourge which it was meditating against the country. Dates are here material, said Mr. B. The first letters, founded on these new measures, were dated the 21st of January; and spoke of them as being understood to be in contemplation. This letter to Mr. Johnson, which speaks hypothetically, is dated the 30th of January, being eight days later; in which time the bank had doubtless heard that its understanding about what was in contemplation was all false; and to cover its retreat from having sent a falsehood to twoand-twenty branches, it gives notice that the new measures which were the alleged pretext of panic and pressure upon the country were not to take place, because the projectors had got alarmed. The beautiful idea of the projectors-that is to say, General Jackson, for he is the person intended-becoming alarmed at interdicting the reception of illegal drafts at the treasury, is conjured up as a salvo for the honor of the bank, in making two-and-twenty instances of false assertion. But the panic and pressure orders are not countermanded. They are to go on, although the projectors do become alarmed. and although the new measure be dropped.

Mr. B. had an extract from a second letter to read upon this subject. It was to the president of the New Orleans branch, Mr. W. W. Montgomery, and dated Bank of the United States the 24th of January. He read the extract: "The state of things here is very gloomy; and, unless Congress takes some decided step to prevent the progress of the troubles, they may soon outgrow our control. Thus circumstanced, our first duty is, to the institution, to preserve it from all danger; and we are therefore anxious, for a short time at least, to keep our business within manageable limits, and to make some sacrifice of property to entire security. It is a moment of great interest, and exposed to sudden changes in public affairs, which may induce the bank to conform its policy to them; of these dangers, should any occur, you will have early advice." When he had read this extract, Mr. B. proceeded to comment upon it; almost every wor.' of it being pregnant with political and revolutionary meaning of the plainest import. The whole extract, he said, was the language of a politician, not of a banker. and looked to political events to which the bank intended to conform its policy. In this way, he commented successively upon the gloomy state of things at the bank (for the letter is dated in the bank), and the troubles which were to out- necessary, on this head, to show that the design grow their control, unless Congress took some decided step. These troubles, Mr. B. said, could not be the dangers to the bank; for the bank had taken entire care of itself in the two-andtwenty orders which it had sent out to curtail loans and break up exchanges. Every one of these orders announced the power of the bank and the determination of the bank, to take care of itself. Troubles outgrow our control! What insolence! When the bank itself, and its coufederates, were the creators and fomenters of all these troubles, the progress of which it at fected to deplore. The next words-moment of great interest, exposed to sudden changes in public affairs, induce the bank to conform it policy to them-Mr. B. said, were too flagrant and too barefaced for comment. They were equivalent to an open declaration that a revolution was momently expected, in which Jack. son's administration would be overthrown, and the friends of the bank brought into power; and, as soon as that happened, the bank would inform its branches of it; and would then me form its policy to this revolution, and relian the country from the distress which it was the inflicting upon it. Sir, said Mr. B., addressize the Vice-President, thirty years ago, the prephetic vision of Mr. Jefferson foresaw this crise thirty years ago, he said that this bank was a enemy to our form of government; that, by in ramification and power, and by seizing on critical moment in our affairs, it could use the government! And this is what it would have done last winter, had it not been for me man! one man! one single man! with who God had vouchsafed to favor our America in that hour of her greatest trial. That one ma stood a sole obstacle to the dread career of bank; stood for six months as the ramper which defended the country, the citadel un which the bank artillery incessantly thundered And what was the conduct of the Senate all time? It was trying and condenning that ma killing him off with a senatorial condemnation removing the obstacle which stood between bank and its prey; and, in so doing, establish ing the indissoluble connection between movement of the bank in distressing the try, and the movement of the Scnate in " demning the President.

Mr. B. said that certainly no more proof

the bank were political and revolutionary, ntended to put down General Jackson's adminetration, and to connect itself with the Senate; at he had more proof, that of a publication nder the editorial head of the National Gazette. nd which publication he assumed to say, was ritten by the president of the bank. It was a one article of four columns; but he would only ad a paragraph. He read: "The great const now waging in this country is between its ee institutions and the violence of a vulgar spotism. The government is turned into a meful faction, and the spirit of liberty connds against it throughout the country. On one hand is this miserable cabal, with all e patronage of the Executive; on the other and the yet unbroken mind and heart of the untry, with the Senate and the bank;-[in ding these words, in which the bank associditself with the Senate, Mr. B. repeated the nous expression of Cardinal Wolsey, in asisting himself with the king: 'Ego et rex w:']-the House of Representatives, hitherthe intuitive champion of freedom, shaken by intrigues of the kitchen, hesitates for a time, cannot fail before long to break its own fetfirst, and then those of the country. In t quarrel, we predict, they who administer bank will shrink from no proper share which country may assign to them. Personally, must be as indifferent as any of their fellowens to the recharter of the bank. But they not suffer themselves, nor the institution usted to them, to be the instruments of ate wrong and public outrage; nor will they any effort to rescue the institutions of the try from being trodden under foot by a facof interlopers. To these profligate advens, whether their power is displayed in the utive or legislative department, the directors e bank will, we are satisfied, never yield thousandth part of an inch of their own onal rights, or their own official duties; rill continue this resistance until the countoused to a proper sense of its dangers and rongs, shall drive the usurpers out of the places they dishonor." This letter, said B., discloses, in terms which admit of no nation or denial, the design of the bank in ing the pressure which was got up and cond during the panic session. It was to the people, by dint of suffering, against the President and the House of Representatives, and to overturn them both at the ensuing elections. To do this, now stands revealed as its avowed object. The Senate and the bank were to stand together against the President and the House; and each to act its part for the same common object: the bank to scourge the people for money, and charge its own scourging upon the President; the Senate to condemn him for a violation of the laws and constitution, and to brand him as the Cæsar, Cromwell, Bonaparte-the tyrant, despot, usurper, whose head would be cut off in any kingdom of Europe for such acts as he practised here. Mr. B. said, the contemplation of the conduct of the bank, during the panic session, was revolting and incredible. It combined every thing to revolt and shock the moral sense. Oppression, falsehood, calumny, revolution, the ruin of individuals, the fabrication of false pretences, the machinations for overturning the government, the imputation of its own crimes upon the head of the President; the enriching its favorites with the spoils of the country, insolence to the House of Representatives, and its affected guardianship of the liberties of the people and the free institutions of the country; such were the prominent features of its conduct. The parallel of its enormity was not to be found on this side of Asia; an example of such remorseless atrocity was only to be seen in the conduct of the Paul Benfields and the Debi Sings who ravaged India under the name of the Marquis of Hastings. Even what had been casually and imperfectly brought to light, disclosed a system of calculated enormity which required the genius of Burke to paint. What was behind would require labors of a committee, constituted upon parliamentary principles, not to plaster, but to probe the wounds and ulcers of the bank; and such a committee he should hope to see, not now, but hereafter, not in the vacation but in the session of Congress. For he had no idea of these peripatetic and recess committees, of which the panic session had been so prolific. He wanted a committee, unquestionable in the legality of its own appointment, duly qualified in a parliamentary sense for discovering the misconduct they are set to investigate; and sitting under the wing of the authority which can punish the insolent, compel the refractory, and enforce the obedience which is due to its mandates.

6. The distress of the country occasioned by the Bank of the United States and the Senate of the United States .- This, Mr. B. said, might be an unpleasant topic to discuss in the Senate; but this Senate, for four months of the last session, and during the whole debate on the resolution to condemn the President, had resounded with the cry that the President had created all the distress; and the huge and motley mass, throughout the Union, which marched under the oriflamme of the bank, had every where repeated and reiterated the same cry. If there was any thing unpleasant, then, in the discussion of this topic in this place, the blame must be laid on those who, by using that argument in support of their resolution against the President, devolved upon the defenders of the President the necessity of refuting it. Mr. B. would have recourse to facts to establish his position. The first fact he would recur to was the history of a reduction of deposits, made once before in this same bank, so nearly identical in every particular with the reduction which took place under the order for the late removal of deposits, that it would require exact references to documentary evidence to put its credibility beyond the incredulity of the senses. Not only the amount from which the reduction was made, its progress, and ultimate depression, corresponded so closely as each to seem to be the history of the same transaction, but they began in the same month, descended in the same ratio, except in the instances which operate to the disadvantage of the late reduction, and, at the end of fifteen months. had reached the same point. Mr. B. spoke of the reduction of deposits which took place in the years 1818 and 1819; and would exhibit a table to compare it with the reductions under the late order for the removal of the deposits.

Here, said Mr. B., is a similar and parallel reduction of deposits in this same bank, and that at a period of real pecuniary distress to itself; a period when great frauds were discovered in its management; when a committee examined it, and reported it guilty of violating its charter; when its stock fell in a few weeks from one hundred and eighty to ninety; when propositions to repeal its charter, without the forpositions to repeal its charter, without the formality of a scire facias, were discussed in Congress; when nearly all presses, and nearly all voices, condemned it; and when a real necessity compalled it to reduce its discounts and loans with more rapidity, and to a far greater comp rative extent, than that which has attended the late reduction. Yet, what was the state of the country ? Distressed, to be sure, but no pank: no convulsion in the community; no cry of revolution. And why this difference? If men reduction of deposits was to be attended with these effects at one time, why not at the other! Sir, said Mr. B., addressing the Vice-President the reason is plain and obvious. The bank was unconnected with politics, in 1819; it had m desire, at that time, to govern the elections and to overturn an administration; it had no politic cal confederates; it had no president of the bank then to make war upon the President of the United States, and to stimulate and aid a great political party in crushing the President, who would not sign a new charter, and in crushing the House of Representatives which stood by him. There was no resolution then to me demn the President for a violation of the lar and the constitution. And it was this fer resolution, which we now propose to expute which did the principal part of the mischi That resolution was the root of the end the signal for panic meetings, panic men rials, panic deputations, panic speeches, panic jubilees. That resolution, exhibited the Senate chamber, was the scarlet mantle the consul, hung out from his tent; it was it signal for battle. That resolution, and the ale speeches which attended it, was the tocsin which started a continent from its repose. And condemnation which followed it, and which i this chamber jutime to reach the Xa York, Virginia, a . . onnecticut elections, m pleted the effect upon the public mind, and the politics and commerce of the country, with the neasures of the bank had been com ating for three months to produce. And h he must express his especial and eternal wa how all these movements of bank and & co-operating together, if not by arrangement least by a most miraculous system of accident to endanger the political rights, and to injur pecuniary interests of the people of the li States, could so far escape the observation the investigating committee of the Some not to draw from them the expression of solitary opinion, the suggestion of one idea, the application of one single remrt

to have touched these scenes with something more than a few meagre, stinted, and starved lines of faint allusion to the "new measures understood to be in contemplation;" those new measures which were so falsely, so wickedly fibricated to cover the preconcerted and premeditated plot to upset the government by stimulating the people to revolution, through the combined operations of the pecuniary pressure and political alarms.

The table itself was entitled to the gravest recollection, not only for the comparison which it suggested, but the fact of showing the actual progress and history of the removal of the deposits, and blasting the whole story of the President's hostility to the bank. From this table it is seen that the deposits, in point of fact, have never been all taken from the bank; that the nemoval, so far as it went, was gradual and gentle; that an average of three millions has always been there; that nearly four millions was there on the 1st day of January last; and before these facts, the fabricated story of the President's hostility to the bank, his vindictiveness, and violent determination to prostrate, destroy, and min the institution, must fall back upon its authors, and recoil upon the heads of the invenors and propagators of such a groundless im-

Mr. B. could give another fact to prove that t was the Senate and the bank, and the Senate nore than the bank, which produced the disress during the last winter. It was this: that though the curtailments of the bank were puch larger both before and after the session Congress, yet there was no distress in the ountry, except during the session, and while he alarm speeches were in a course of delivery this floor. Thus, the curtailment from the et of August to the 1st of October, was $4,-66,000; from the 1st of October to the meetg of Congress in December, the curtailment as $5,641,000—making $9,707,000 in four onths, and no distress in the country. During e session of Congress (seven months) there as a curtailment of $3,428,138; and during is time the distress raged. From the rise of ongress (last of June) to the 1st of November, period of four months, the curtailment was 270,771, and the word distress was not heard the country. Why? Because there were no nic speeches. Congress had adjourned; and the bank, being left to its own resources, could only injure individuals, but could not alarm and convulse the community.

Mr. B. would finish this view of the conduct of the bank in creating a wantou pressure, by giving two instances; one was the case of the deposit bank in this city; the other was the case of a senator opposed to the bank. He said that the branch bank at this place had made a steady run upon the Metropolis Bank from the beginning to the ending of the panic session. The amount of specie which it had taken was $605,000: evidently for the purpose of blowing up the pet bank in this district; and during all that time the branch refused to receive the notes, or branch drafts, of any other branch, or the notes of the mother bank; or checks upon any city north of Baltimore. On the pet bank in Baltimore it would take checks, because the design was to blow up that also. Here, said Mr. B., was a clear and flagrant case of pressure for specie for the mere purpose of mischief, and of adding the Metropolis Bank to the list of those who stopped payment at that time. And here Mr. B. felt himself bound to pay his respects to the Committee on Finance, that went to examine the bank last summer. That committee, at pages 16 and 22, of their report, brought forward an unfounded charge against the administration for making runs upon the branches of the United States Bank, to break them; while it had been silent with respect to a well-founded instance of the same nature from the Bank of the United States towards the deposit bank in this district. Their language is: "The administrative department of the government had manifested a spirit of decided hostility to the bank. It had no reason to expect any indulgence or elemency at its hands; and in this opinion, if entertained by the directors, about which there can be but little question, subsequent events very soon proved they were not mistaken. The President's address to his cabinet; the tone assumed by the Secretary (Mr. Taney) in his official communication to Congress, and the developments subsequently made by Mr. Duane in his address to the public, all confirm the correctness of this anticipation. The measure which the bank had cause to fear was the accumulation by government of large masses of notes, and the existence thereby of heavy demands against its offices (p. 16).

"In persevering in its policy of redeeming its notes whenever presented, and thereby continuing them as a universal medium of exchange, in opposition to complaints on that head from some of the branches (see copies of correspondence), the security of the institution and the good of the country were alike promoted. The accumulation of the notes of any one branch for the purpose of a run upon it by any agent of the government, when specie might be obtained at the very places of collection, in exchange for the notes of the most distant branches, would have been odious in the eyes of the public, and ascribed to no other feeling than a feeling of vindictiveness " (p. 22). Upon these extracts, Mr. B. said, it was clear that the committee had been so unfortunate as to commit a series of mistakes, and every mistake to the advantage of the bank, and to the prejudice of the government and the country. First, the government is charged, for the charge is clear, though slightly veiled, that the President of the United States in his vindictiveness against the bank, would cause the notes of the branches to be accumusated, and pressed upon them to break them. Next, the committee omit to notice the very thing actually done, in our very presence here, by the Bank of the United States against a deposit bank, which it charges without foundation upon the President. Then it credits the bank with the honor of paying its notes every where, and exchanging the notes of the most distant branches for specie, when the case of the Metropolis Bank, here in our presence, for the whole period of the panic session, proves the contrary; and when we have a printed document, positive testimony from many banks, and brokers, testifying that the branches in Baltimore and New-York, during the fall of 1833. positively refused to redeem the notes of other branches, or to accept them in exchange for the notes of the local banks, though taken in payment of revenue; and that, in consequence, the notes of distant branches fell below par, and were sold at a discount, or lent for short periods without interest, on condition of getting specie for them; and that this continued till Mr. Taney coerced the bank, by means of transfer drafts, to cause the notes of her branches to be received and honored at other branches as usual. In all this, Mr. B. said, the report of the committee was most unfortunate; and showed the necessity for a new committee to examine that institution; a committee constituted upon parliamentary principles—a majority in favor of inquiry—like that of the Post Office. The creation of such a committee, Mr. B. said, was the more necessary, as one of the main guards intended by the charter to be placed over that bank was not there during the period of the pressure and panic operations; he alluded to the pressure and panic operations; the history of whose rejection, after such long delays in the Senate to act on their nomination, is known to the whole country.

The next instance of wanton pressure which Mr. B. would mention, was the case of an individual, then a member of the Senate from Pennsylvania, now minister to St. Petersburg (Mr. Wilkins). That gentleman had informed him (Mr. B.), towards the close of the last session, that the bank had caused a scire fucial to be served in his house, to the alarm and distress of his wife, to revive a judgment against him, whilst he was here opposing the bank.

[Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, here rose, and wished to know of Mr. B. whether it was the Bank of the United States that had issued this scire facial against Mr. Wilkins.]

Mr. B. was very certain that it was. He recollected not only the information, but the time and the place when and where it was given: it was the last days of the last session, and at the window beyond that door (pointing to the door in the corner behind him); and he added if there is any question to be raised, it can be settled without sending to Russia; the scin facias, if issued, will be on record in Pittsburg. Mr. B. then said, the cause of this conduct to Mr. Wilkins can be understood when it is recollected that he had denied on this floor the existence of the great distress which had been depicted at Pittsburg; and the necessity that the bank was under to push him at that time can be appreciated by seeing that two and far members of Congress, as reported by the Fnance Committee, had received "accommodtions" from the bank and its branches in the same year that a senator, and a citizen of Pendsylvania, opposed to the bank, was thus proceeded against.*

Mr. B. returned to the resolution which it was proposed to expunge. He said it ought to go. It was the root of the evil, the father of the mischief, the source of the injury, the box of Pandora, which had filled the land with calamity and consternation for six long months. It was that resolution, far more than the conduct of the bank, which raised the panic, sunk the price of property, crushed many merchants, impressed the country with the terror of an impending revolution, and frightened so many good people out of the rational exercise of their elective franchiso at the spring elections. All these evils have now passed away. The panic has subsided; the price of produce and property has recovered from its depression, and risen beyond its former bounds. The country is tranquil, prosperous, and happy. The States which had been frightened from their propriety at the spring elections, have regained their selfcommand. Now, with the total vanishing of its effects, let the cause vanish also. Let this resolution for the condemnation of President Jackson be expunged from the journals of the Senate! Let it be effaced, erased, blotted out, obliterated from the face of that page on which it should never have been written! Would to God it could be expunged from the page of all history, and from the memory of all mankind. Would that, so far as it is concerned, the minds of the whole existing generation should be dipped in the fabulous and oblivious waters of the river Lethe. But these wishes are vain. The resolution must survive and live. History will record it; memory will retain it; tradition will hand it down. In the very act of expurgation it lives; for what is taken from one page s placed on another. All atonement for the unfortunate calamitous act of the Senate is imperect and inadequate. Expunge, if we can, still he only effect will be to express our solemn onvictions, by that obliteration, that such a reclution ought never to have soiled the pages of urjournal. This is all that we can do; and his much we are bound to do, by every obligaion of justice to the President, whose name has en attainted; by every consideration of duty o the country, whose voice demands this reparaon; by our regard to the constitution, which as been rampled under foot; by respect to the louse of Representatives, whose function has the Senate to vindicate its justice, to correct its errors, and re-establish its high name for equity, dignity, and moderation. To err is human; not to err is divine; to correct error is the work of supereminent and also superhuman moral excellence, and this exalted work now remains for the Senate to perform.

EXPUNGING RESOLUTION: REJECTED, AND RENEWED.

THE speech which had been delivered by Mr Benton, was intended for effect upon the country-to influence the forthcoming elections -and not with any view to act upon the Senate, still consisting of the same members who had passed the condemnatory resolution, and not expected to condemn their own act. The expunging resolution was laid upon the table, without any intention to move it again during the present session; but, on the last day of the session, when the Senate was crowded with business, and when there was hardly time to finish up the indispensable legislation, the motion was called up, and by one of its opponents-Mr. Clayton, of Delaware—the author of the motion being under the necessity to vote for the taking up, though expecting no good from it. The moment it was taken up, Mr. White, of Tennessee, moved to strike out the word "expunge," and insert "rescind, reverse, and make null and void." This motion astonished Mr. Benton. Mr. White, besides opposing all the proceedings against President Jackson, had been his personal and political friend from early youth-for the more than forty years which each of them had resided in Tennessee. He expected his aid, and felt the danger of such a defection. Mr. Benton defended his word as being strictly parliamentary, and the only one which was proper to be used when an unauthorized act is to be condemned-all other phrases admitting the legality of the act which is to be invalidated. Mr. White justified his motion on the ground that an expurgation of the journal would be its obliteration, which he deemed inconsistent with the constitutional injunction to en usurped; by self-respect, which requires "keep" a journal—the word "keep" being

EXPUNGING RESOLUTION: REJECTED, AND

THE speech which had been delivered by Mr. Benton, was intended for effect upon the country-to influence the forthcoming elections -and not with any view to act upon the Senate, still consisting of the same members who had passed the condemnatory resolution, and not expected to condemn their own act. The expunging resolution was laid upon the table, without any intention to move it again during the present session; but, on the last day of the session, when the Senate was crowded with business, and when there was hardly time to finish up the indispensable legislation, the motion was called up, and by one of its opponents-Mr. Clayton, of Delaware—the author of the motion being under the necessity to vote for the taking up, though expecting no good from it. The moment it was taken up, Mr. White, of Tennessee, moved to strike out the word "expunge," and insert "rescind, reverse, and make null and void." This motion astonished Mr. Benton. Mr. White, besides opposing all the proceedings against President Jackson, had been his personal and political friend from early youth-for the more than forty years which each of them had resided in Tennessee. He expected his aid, and felt the danger of such a defection. Mr. Benton defended his word as being strictly parliamentary, and the only one which was proper to be used when an unauthorized act is to be condemned-all other phrases admitting the legality of the act which is to be invalidated. Mr. White justified his motion on the ground that an expurgation of the journal would be its obliteration, which he deemed inconsistent with the constitutional injunction to en usurped; by self-respect, which requires "keep" a journal—the word "keep" being taken in its primary sense of "holding," " preserving," instead of "writing," a journal; but the mover of the resolution soon saw that Mr. White was not the only one of his friends who had yielded at that point-that others had given way-and, came about him importuning him to give up the obnoxious word. Seeing himself almost deserted, he yielded a mortifying and reluctant assent; and voted with others of his friends to emasculate his own motion-to reduce it from its high tone of reprobation, to the legal formula which applied to the reversal of a mere error in a legal proceeding. The moment the vote was taken, Mr. Webster rose and exulted in the victory over the hated phrase. He proclaimed the accomplishment of every thing that he desired in relation to the expunging resolution: the word was itself expunged; and he went on to triumph in the victory which had been achieved, saying:

"That which made this resolution, which we have now amended, particularly offensive, was this: it proposed to expunge our journal. It called on us to violate, to obliterate, to erase, our own records. It was calculated to fix a particular stigma, a peculiar mark of reproach or disgrace, on the resolution of March last. It was designed to distinguish it, and reprobate it, in some especial manner. Now, sir, all this most happily, is completely defeated by the almost unanimous vote of the Senate which has just now been taken. The Senate has declared, in the most emphatic manner, that its journal shall not be tampered with. I rejoice most heartily, sir, in this descisive result. It is now settled, by authority not likely to be shaken, that our records are sacred. Men may change, opinions may change, power may change, but, thanks to the firmness of the Senate, the records of this body do not change. No instructions from without, no dictates from principalities or powers, nothing-nothing can be allowed to induce the Senate to falsify its own records, to disgrace its own proceedings, or violate the rights of its members. For one, sir, I feel that we have fully and completely accomplished all that could be desired in relation to this matter. The attempt to induce the Senate to expunge its journal has failed, signally and effectually failed. The record remains, neither blurred, blotted, nor disgraced."

And then, to secure the victory which he had gained, Mr. Webster immediately moved to lay the amended resolution on the table, with the peremptory declaration that he would not withdraw his motion for friend or foe. The resolve was laid upon the table by a vote of 27 to 20.

The exulting speech of Mr. Webster restored to my courage—made a man of me again; and the moment the vote was over, I rose and submitted the original resolution over again, with the detested word in it—to stand for the second week of the next session—with the peremptory declaration that I would never yield it again to the solicitations of friend or foe.

CHAPTER CXXV.

BRANCH MINTS AT NEW ORLEANS, AND IN THE GOLD REGIONS OF GEORGIA AND NORTH CAR-OLINA.

THE bill had been reported upon the proposition of Mr. Waggaman, senator from Louisiana and was earnestly and perseveringly opposed by Mr. Clay. He moved its indefinite postponement, and contended that the mint at Pail. adelphia was fully competent to do all the coinage which the country required. He denied the correctness of the argument, that the mint at New Orleans was necessary to prevent the transportation of the bullion to Philadelphia It would find its way to the great commercial marts of the country whether coined or not He considered it unwise and injudicious to establish these branches. He supposed it would gratify the pride of the States of North Cabil. na and Georgia to have them there; but when the objections to the measure were so strong he could not consent to yield his opposition to it. He moved the indefinite postponement of the bill, and asked the yeas and nays on his motion; which were ordered .- Mr. Mangan regretted the opposition of the senator from Kentucky (Mr. Clay), and thought it necessar to multiply the number of American coins, al bring the mints to the places of production There was an actual loss of near four percent in transporting the gold bullion from the Gengia and North Carolina mines to Philadelphi for coinage. With respect to gratifying the pride of the Southern States, it was a misme ception; for those States had no price to graf fy. He saw no evil in the multi ication these mints. It was well shown ly the sea tor from Missouri, when the bill was up before was understood that branches might be multiplied.-Mr. Frelinghuysen thought that the obiect of having a mint was mistaken. The mint was established for the accommodation of the government, and he thought the present one sufficient. Why put an additional burden upon the government because the people in the South have been so fortunate as to find gold? -Mr. Bedford Brown of North Carolina, said the senator from New Jersey, asked why we apply to Congress to relieve us from the burden of transporting our bullion to be coined, when the manufacturers of the North did not ask to be paid for transporting their material. He said it was true the manufacturers had not sked for this transportation assistance, but they asked for what was much more valuable, and got it-protection. The people of the south ask no protection; they rely on their own exertions; they ask but a simple act of justice-for their rights, under the power manted by the States to Congress to regulate he value of coin, and to make the coin itself. has the exclusive privilege of Congress, and ewished to see it exercised in the spirit in which was granted; and which was to make the coinregenerel for the benefit of all the sections of Union, and not local to one section. The reark of the gentlemen is founded in mistake. hat are the facts? Can the gold bullion of orth Carolina be circulated as currency? re all know it cannot; it is only used as bulon, and carried to Philadelphia at a great loss. nother reason for the passage of the bill, and e which Mr. Brown hoped would not be less garded by senators on the other side of the ouse, was that the measure would be auxiliary the restoration of the metallic currency, and ing the government back to that currency ich was the only one contemplated by the astitution.

Mr. Benton took the high ground of constitional right to the establishment of these neces, and as many more as the interests of States required. He referred to the Fedeist, No. 44, written by Mr. Madison, that in rendering the coining power to the federal ernment, the States did not surrender their ht to have local mints. He read the passage in the number which he mentioned, and which the exposition of the clause in the constiturelative to the coining power. It was express, and clear in the assertion, that the States were not to be put to the expense and trouble of sending their bullion and foreign coins to a central mint to be recoined; but that, as many local mints would be established under the authority of the general government as should be necessary. Upon this exposition of the meaning of the constitution, Mr. B. said, the States accepted the constitution; and it would be a fraud on them now to deny branches where they were needed. He referred to the gold mines in North Carolina, and the delay with which that State accepted the constitution, and inquired whether she would have accepted it at all, without an amendment to secure her rights, if she could have foreseen the great discoveries of gold within her limits, and the present opposition to granting her a local mint. That State, through her legislature, had applied for a branch of the mint years ago, and all that was said in her favor was equally applicable to Georgia. Mr. B. said, the reasons in the Federalist for branch mints were Infinitely stronger now than when Mr. Madison wrote in 1788. Then, the Southern gold region was unknown, and the acquisition of Louisiana not dreamed of. New Orleans, and the South, now require branch mints, and claim the execution of the constitution as expounded by Mr.

Mr. B. claimed the right to the establishment of these branches as an act of justice to the people of the South and the West. Philadelphia could coin, but not diffuse the coin among them. Money was attracted to Philadelphia from the South and West, but not returned back ngain to those regions. Local mints alone could supply them. France had ten branch mints; Mexico had eight; the United States not one. The catablishment of branches was indispensable to the diffusion of a hard-money currency, especially gold; and every friend to that currency should promote the establishment of branches.

Mr. B. said, there were six hundred machines at work coining paper money—he alluded to the six hundred banks in the United States; and only one machine at work coining gold and silver He believed there ought to be five or six branch mints in the United States; that is, two or three more than provided for in this bill; one at Charleston, South Carolina, one at Norfolk or Richmond, Virginia, and one at New-York or Boston. The United States Bank had twenty four branches; give the United States Mint five or six branches; and the name of that bank would cease to be urged upon us. Nobody would want her paper when they could get gold.

Mr. B. scouted the idea of expense on such an object as this. The expense was but inconsiderable in itself, and was nothing compared to its object. For the object was to supply the country with a safe currency,-with a constitutional currency; and currency was a thing which coucerned every citizen. It was a point at which the action of government reached every human being, and bore directly upon his property, upon his labor, and upon his daily bread. The States had a good currency when this federal government was formed; it was gold and silver for common use, and large bank notes for large operations. Now the whole land is infested with a vile currency of small paper: and every citizen was more or less cheated. He himself had but two bank notes in the world, and they were both counterfeits, on the United States Bank, with St. Andrew's cross drawn through their faces. Ho used nothing but gold and silver since the gold bill passed.

In reply to Mr. Frelinghuysen, who asked where was the gold currency? He would answer, far the greatest part of it was in the vaults of the Bank of the United States, and its branches, to be sold or shipped to Europe; or at all events, to be kept out of circulation, to enable the friends of the bank to ask, where is the gold currency? and then call the gold bill a humbug. But he would tell the gentleman where a part of the gold was; it was in the Metropolis Bank in this city, and subject to his check to the full amount of his pay and mileage. Yes, said Mr. B., now, for the first time, Congress is paid in gold, and it is every member's own fault if he does not draw it and use it.

Mr. B. said this question concerned the South and West, and he would hope to see the representatives from these two sections united in support of the bill. He saw with pleasure, that several gentlemen from the north of the Potomac, and from New England were disposed to support it. Their help was most acceptable on a subject so near and so dear to the South and West. Every inhabitant of the South and West was personally interested in the success of the bill. From New Orleans, the new coin would assend the Mississippi River, scatter itselfall along gold and silver circulation of upwards of its banks, fill all its towns, cities, and village branch off into the interior of the country, Merel all the tributary streams, and replenish and refresh the whole face of the land, Fron the Southern mints, the new gold would one into the West, and especially into Kentucke Ohio, and Tennessee, by the stock driven being to them a safe and easy remittance, and the country a noble accession to their currence enabling them quickly to dispense with their small notes.

It was asked, Mr. B. said, what loss has the Western People now sustained for wantofgold He would answer that the whole West was full of counterfeit paper; that counterfeit paper formed a large part of the actual circulation especially of the United States branch drafts that sooner or later all these counterfeits mus stop in somebody's hands; and they would be sure to stop in the hands of those who were less able to bear the loss. Every trader down Mississippi, Mr. B. said, was more or less impa ed upon with counterfeit paper; some lost real ly their whole cargoes. Now if there was a brand mint in New Orleans every one would get in gold. He could get it direct from the mint; have his gold examined there before he receim it. Mr. B. said that one great object of establishment lishing branch mints was to prevent and des counterfeiting. Such establishments would tect every counterfeit piece, and enable em body to have recourse to a prompt and safe stand ard for ascertaining what was genuine and what not. This was a great reason for the tenbrad es in France.

Mr. B. was against the paper system. Her against all small notes. He was against all a per currency for common use; and being win it he was in favor of the measures that we put down small paper and put up gold and silm The branching of the mint was one of the interior pensable measures for accomplishing that object and therefore he was for it. He was in fe of practical measures. Speeches alone wo not do. A gentleman might make a fine med in favor of hard money; but unless he gave me in favor of measures to accomplish it, the see would be inoperative. Mr. B. held the Francisco currency to be the best in the world, where was no bank note under 500 francs (m $100), and where, in consequence, there was hundred millions of dollars; a currency which had lately stood two revolutions and one conquest, without the least fluctuation in its quantity or value.

New Orleans, he said, occupied the most fellcitous point in America for a mint. It was at the point of reception and diffusion. The specie of Mexico came there; and when there, it asrended the river into the whole West. It was the market city-the emporium of the Great Valley; and from that point every exporter of produce could receive his supply and bring it home. Mr. B. reiterated that this was a question of currency; of hard money against paper; of old against United States Bank notes. It was struggle with the paper system. He said the old bill was one step; the branching the mint ould be the second step; the suppression of all otes under twenty dollars would be the third tep towards getting a gold and silver currency. he States could do much towards putting down mall notes; the federal government could put hem down, by putting the banks which issued hem under the ban; or, what was better, and est of all, returning to the act of 1789, which acted that the revenues of the federal governent should be received in gold and silver coin dy.

The question was then put on Mr. Clay's otion for indefinite postponement-and failed 16 yeas to 27 nays. Further strenuous oxera was made to defeat the bill. Mr. Clay oved to postpone it to the ensuing weekich, being near the end of the session, would a delay which might be fatal to it; but it ne near passing-20 yeas to 22 nays. A tion was made by Mr. Clay to recommit the to the Committee of Finance-a motion equient to its abandonment for the session, which ed. Mr. Calhoun gave the bill an earnest port. He said it was a question of magnitude, of vital importance to the South, and dered the most serious consideration. Yet, he sorry to say, he had seen more perseveropposition made to it than to any other sure for the last two years. It was a ional question, but one intended to extend benefits to all the States-Mr. Clay said, ere had been resistance on one side, there had been a most unparalleled, and he must say, unded perseverance on the other. He would repeat that in whatever light he had received the proposed measure, he had been unable to come to any other conclusion than this, that it was, in his humble judgment, debusive, uncalled for, calculated to deceive the people-to hold out ideas which would never be realized; -- and as utterly unworthy of the consideration of the Senate. - Mr. Calhoun was astonished at the warmth of Mr. Clay on this question-a quesas much sectional in one point of view, as a measure could be, but national in another. Let senators say what they would, this government was bound, in his opinion, to establish the mints which had been asked for. Finally, the question was taken, and carried-24 to 19-the yeas being: Messrs. Benton, Bibb, Brown, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Hendricks, Kane, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Leigh, Linn, Mangum, Morris, Porter, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster, White, Wright. The mays were: Messrs. Hel! of New Hampshire, Black of Mississippi, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Ewing, Frelinghuysen, Goldsborough, Isaac Hill, Knight, McKean, Naudain, Robbins, Silsbee, Smith, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson. The bill was immediately carried to the House of Representatives; and there being a large majority there in favor of the hard money policy of the administration, it was taken up and acted upon, although so near the end of the session; and easily passed.

CHAPTER CXXVI.

REGULATION DEPOSIT BILL.

THE President had recommended to Congress the passage of an act to regulate the custody of the public moneys in the local banks, intrusted with their keeping. It was a renewal of the same recommendation made at the time of their removal, and in conformity to which the House of Representatives had passed the bill which had been defeated in the Senate. The same bill was sent up to the Senate again, and passed by a large majority: twenty-eight to twelve. The yeas were: Messrs. Benton, Black of Mississippi, Calhoun, Clayton of Delaware, Cuthbert of Georgia, Ewing of Ohio, Frelinghuysen, Golds-borough, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Alexander Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Smith, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Tyler, Waggaman, Webster, Wright. The nays were: Messrs. Bibb, Brown, Buchanan, Hendricks, Hill, Kane, King of Alabann, Morris of Ohio, Poindexter, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge. And thus, the complaint ceased which had so long prevailed against the President, on the alleged illegality of the State bank custody of the public moneys. These banks were taken as a necessity, and as a halfway house between the Bank of the United States and an Independent treasury. After a brief sojourn in the intermediate abode, they passed on to the Independent treasury-there, it is hoped, to remain for ever.

CHAPTER CXXVII.

DEFEAT OF THE DEFENCE APPROPRIATION, AND LOSS OF THE FORTIFICATION BILL

THE President in his annual message at the commencement had communicated to Congress the state of our relations with France, and especially the continued failure to pay the indemnities stipulated by the treaty of 1831; and had recommended to Congress measures of reprisal against the commerce of France. The recommendation, in the House of Representatives. was referred to the committee of foreign relations, which through their chairman, Mr. Cambreling, made a report adverse to immediate resort to reprisals, and recommending contingent preparation to meet any emergency which should grow out of a continued refusal on the part of France to comply with her treaty, and make the stipulated payment. In conformity with this last recommendation, and at the suggestion of Mr. John Quincy Adams, it was resolved unanimously upon yeas and nays, or rather upon yeas, their being no nays, and 212 members voting-"That in the opinion of this House, the treaty of the 4th of July 1831 with France be maintained, and its execution insisted upon:" and, with the like unanimity it was resolved-"That preparations ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France." These two resolutions showed the temper of the House, and that it intended vindicate the rights of our citizens, if necessary at the expense of war. Accordingly an appr. priation of three millions of dollars was inserted by the House in the general fortification bill to enable the President to make such military and naval preparations during the recess of Cos. gress as the state of our relations with France might require. This appropriation was zealously voted by the House; in the to ite it met with no favor; and was rejected. The House insignation on its appropriation; the Senate "adhered" to its vote: and that brought the disagreement a committee of conference, proposed by the House. In the mean time Congress was in the expiring moments of its session; and eventually the whole appropriation for contingent prepara tion, and the whole fortification bill, was lost be the termination of the Congress. It was a most serious loss; and it became a question which House was responsible for such a misfortune regrettable at all times, but particularly so i the face of our relations with France. A starting point in the road which led to this le was the motion made by Mr. Webster to "al here "-a harsh motion, and more calculated estrange than to unite the two Houses, Me King, of Alabama, immediately took up them tion in that sense; and said:

"He very much regretted that the senatorful Massachusetts should have made such a imig it had seldom or never been resorted to until de and more gentle means had failed to produce unity of action between the two llouses. this stage of the proceeding it would be consered (and justly) harsh in its character; and had no doubt, if sanctioned by the Senate, wo greatly exasperate the other House, and proble endanger the passage of the bill altogether. I gentlemen, said Mr. Mr. K., prepared for this Will they, at this particular juncture, in a present condition of things, take upon the selves such a fearful responsibility as the ri tion of this bill might involve? For himself your forts are to be left unarmed, your unrepaired and out of commission, and y whole sea-coast exposed without defences of kind, the responsibility should not rest upon shoulders. It is as well, said Mr. K., to plainly on this subject. Our position with gard to France was known to all who heard to be of such a character as would not, in opinion, justify prudent men, men who look the preservation of the rights and the honer the nation, in withholding the means, them ample means, to maintain those rights and serve unimpaired that honor.

Mr. K. said, while he was free to confess that be proposed appropriation was not in its terms begether as specific as he could have wished he could not view it in the light which had, semed to have, so much alarmed the senator on Massachusetts, and others who had spoken the subject. We are told, said Mr. K., that he adoption of the amendment made by the ouse will prostrate the fortress of the constition and bury under its ruins the liberties of e people. He had too long been accustomed the course of debate here, particularly in times high party excitement, to pay much attention loid assertion or violent denunciation. In hat, he asked, does it violate the constitution? es it give to the President the power of de-ring war? You have been told, and told truby my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Buess; nor does this bill in the slightest degree pair it. Does it authorize the raising of mies? No, not one man can be enlisted be-nd the number required to fill up the ranks your little army; and whether you pass this readment or not, that power is already possed under existing laws. Is it, said Mr. K., a unprecedented and unsual? A little atation to the history of our government must isfy all who heard him, that it is neither the nor the other.

During the whole period of the administrans of General Washington and the elder ams, all appropriations were general, applya gross sum for the expenditure of the differdepartments of the government, under the ection of the President; and it was not till Jefferson came into office, that, at his remendation, specific appropriations were pted. Was the constitution violated, broken n, and destroyed, under the administration the father of his country? Or did the fors to which the senator from Massachusetts, this occasion, elings so fondly, tumble into when millions were placed in the hands of Jefferson himself, to be disposed of for a gnated object, but, in every thing else, subject s unlimited discretion? No, said Mr. K., liberties remained unimpaired; and, he trusta God, would so remain for centuries yet to e. He would not urge his confidence in the inguished individual at the head of the govnent as a reason why this amendment should ; he was in favor of limiting executive etien as far as practicable; but circumstanmay present themselves, causes may exist, h would place it out of the power of Conpromptly to meet the emergency. To m, then, should they look? Surely to the of the government-to the man selected by cople to guard their rights and protect their ests. He put it to senstors to say whether, possible contingency, which all would under-, our forts should not be armed, or ships commission? None will venture to gain-Yet the extent to which such armament should be carried must, from the very accessity of the case, be left to the sound discretion of the President. From the position he occupies, no one can be so competent to form a correct judgment, and he could not, if he would, apply the money to other objects than the defences of the country. Mr. K. said he would not, at this last moment of the session, when time was so very precious, further detain the Senate than to express his deep apprehension, his alarm, lest this most important bill should be lost by this conflict between the two Houses. He would beg of sena-tors to reflect on the disastrons consequences which might ensue. He would again entreat the senator from Massachusetts to withdraw his motion, and ask a conference, and thus leave some reasonable ground for hope of ultimate agreement on this most important subject."

The motion was persisted in, and the "adherence" carried by a vote of twenty-nine to seventeen. The year and mays were:

son, Tyler, Wuggaman, Webster, White.—29.
Navs.—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hill, Kane, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Ruggles, Robinson, Shepley, Talluadge, Tipton, Wright.—17.

Upon being notified of this vote, the House took the conciliatory step of "insisting;" and asked a "conference." The Senate agreed to the request-appointed a committee on its part, which was met by another on the part of the House, which could not agree about the three millions; and while engaged in these attempts at concord, the existence of the Congress terminated. It was after midnight; the morning of the fourth of March had commenced; many members sald their power was at an end-others that it would continue till twelve o'clock, noon; for it was that hour, on the 3d of March, 1789, that the first Congress commenced its existence, and that day should only be counted half, and the half of the next day taken to make out two complete years for each Congress. To this it was answered that, in law, there are no fractions of a day; that the whole day counted in a legal transaction: in the birth of a measure or of a man. The first day that the first Congress sat was the day of its birth, without looking to the hour at which it formed a quorum; the day a man was born was the day of his birth, and he counted from the beginning of the day, and the whole day, and not from the hour and minute at which he entered the world-a rule which would rob all the afternoon-born children of more or less of the day on which they were born, and postpone their majority until the day after their birthday. While these disquisitions were going on, many members were going off; and the Senate hearing nothing from the House, dispatched a message to it, on the motion of Mr. Webster, "respectfully to remind it" of the disagreement on the fortification bill; on receiving which message, Mr. Cambreleng, chairman of conference, on the part of the House, stood up and said:

"That the committee of conference of the two Houses had met, and had concurred in an amendment which was very unsatisfactory to him. It proposed an unconditional appropriation of three hundred thousand dollars for arming the fortifications, and five hundred thousand dollars for repairs of and equipping our vessels of war-an amount totally inadequate, if it should be required, and more than was necessary, if it should not be. When he came into the House from the conference, they were calling the ayes and noes on the resolution to pay the compensation due the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Letcher). He voted on that resolution, but there was no quorum voting. On a subsequent proposition to adjourn, the ayes and noes were called, and again there was no quorum voting. Under such circumstances, and at two o'clock in the morning, he did not feel authorized to present to the House an appropriation of eight hundred thousand dollars. He regretted the loss, not only of the appropriation for the defence of the country, but of the whole fortification bill; but let the responsibility fall where it ought—on the Senate of the United States. The House had discharged its duty to the country. It had sent the fortification bill to the Senate, with an additional appropriation, entirely for the defence of the country. The Senate had rejected that appropriation, without even deigning to propose any amendment whatever, either in form or amount. The House sent it a second time; and a second time no amendment was proposed, but the reverse; the Senate adhered, without condescending to ask even a conference. Had that body asked a conference, in the first instance, some provision would have been made for defence, and the fortification bill would have been saved before the hour arrived which terminated the existence of the present House of Representatives. As it was, the committees did not concur till this House had ceased to exist- the ayes and noes had been twice taken without a quorum-the bill was evidently lost, and the Senate must take the responsibility of leaving the country defenceless. He could not feel authorized to report the bill to the House, situated as it dexter was appointed in his place; Mr. M.

was, and at this hour in the morning; but any other member of the committee of com ence proposed to do it, he should make no jection, though he believed such a proposition utterly ineffectual at this hour : for no mem could, at this hour in the morning, be comed

Many members said the time was out in that there had been no quorum for two has A count was had, and a quorum not found in members were requested to pass through tells and did so: only eight-two present. Mr. Mr. Y. Mason informed the House that the Se had adjourned; then the House did the making the adjournment in due form, after an of thanks to the speaker, and hearing his ing address in return.

CHAPTER CXXVIII.

DISTRIBUTION OF REVENUE

Propositions for distributing the public | revenue among the States, had become come to be succeeded by others to distribute the themselves, and finally the Custom House nue, as well as that of the lands. The proof distribution was natural and inevitable in direction, when once begun. Mr. Calhoun his friends had opposed these proposed dist tions as unconstitutional, as well as demoing; but after his junction with Mr. Clay began to favor them; but still with the sh an amendment to the constitution. With view, in the latter part of the session of l he moved a resolution of inquiry into the of executive patronage, the increase of expenditure, and the increase of the number persons employed or fed by the federal ment; and he asked for a select commit six to report upon his resolution. Mr. Calhou d opposed these proposed distr onstitutional, as well as demon er his junction with Mr. Chr. r them; but still with the all nt to the constitution. did not act; and the committee, consisting five stood, politically, three against the adinstration-two for it; and was thus a frustraon of Mr. Calhoun's plan of having an impartial mmittee, taken equally from the three politiparties. He had proposed the committee on the basis of three political parties in the nate, desiring to have two members from each rty; giving as a reason for that desire, that wished to go into the examination of the imstant inquiry proposed, with a committee free m all prejudice, and calculated to give it an partial consideration. This division into three ties was not to the taste of all the members; hence the refusal of some to serve upon It was the first time that the existence of ree parties was proposed to be made the basis senatorial action, and did not succeed. The nal committee classed democratically, but h the majority opposed to the administration. at the first meeting a sub-committee of three formed-Mr. Calhoun of course at its head draw up a report for the consideration of full committee: and of this sub-committee ajority was against the administration. Verv n the committee was assembled to hear the ert read. I was surprised at it-both at the kness of the preparation and the character he paper. It was an elaborate, ingenious plausible attack upon the administration. sing it of having doubled the expenses of government-of having doubled the number rsons employed or supported by it-of holdhe public moneys in illegal custody-of exing a patronage tending to corruptionshole the result of an over full treasury, h there was no way to deplete but by a bution of the surplus revenue among the s; for which purpose an amendment of the itution would be necessary; and was pro-Mr. Benton heard the reading in silence: when finished declared his dissent to it: he should make no minority report—a kind orts which he always disliked; but when n the Senate he should rise in his place and it. Mr. King, of Georgia, sided with enton; and thus the report went in. Mr. un read it himself at the secretary's table, oved its printing. Mr. Poindexter moved tra number of 30,000 copies; and spoke at in support of his motion, and in favor of port. Mr. King, of Georgia, followed him against the report: and Mr. Benton followed Mr. Klng on the same side. On the subject of the increase of expenditures doubled within the time mentioned, he showed that it came from extraordinary objects, not belonging to the expenses of the government, but temporary in their nature and transient in their existence; namely, the expenses of removing the Indians, the Indian war upon the Mississippi, and the pension act of 1832; which carried up the revolutionary pensions from $355,000 per annum to $3,500,000—just tenfold—and by an act which the friends of the administration opposed. He showed also that the increase in the number of persons employed, or supported by the government, came in a great degree from the same measure which carried up the number of pensioners from 17,000 to 40,000. On the subject of the illegal custody of the public moneys, it was shown, in the first place, that the custody was not illegal; and, in the second, that the deposit regulation bill had been defeated in the Senate by the opponents of the administration. Having vindicated the administration from tho charge of extravagance, and the illegal custody of the public moneys, Mr. Benton came to the main part of the report—the surplus in the treasury, its distribution for eight years among the States (just the period to cover two presidential elections); and the proposed amendment to the constitution to permit that distribution to be made: and here it is right that the report should be allowed to speak for itself. Having assumed the annual surplus to be nine millions for eight years—until the compromise of 1833 worked out its problem ;-that this surplus was inevitable, and that there was no legitimate object of federal care on which it could be expended, the report brought out distribution as the only practical depletion of the treasury, and the only remedy for the corruptions which an exuberant treasury engendered. It proceeded thus:

"But if nosubject of expenditure can be selected on which the surplus can be safely expended, and if neither the revenue nor expenditure can, under existing circumstances, be reduced, the next inquiry is, what is to be done with the surplus, which, as has been shown, will probably equal, on an average, for the next eight years, the sum of $9,000,000 beyond the just wants of the government? A surplus of which, unless some safe disposition can be made, all other means of reducing the patronage of the Executive must prove ineffectual.

"Your committee are deeply sensible of the great difficulty of finding any satisfactory solution of this question; but believing that the very existence of our institutions, and with them the liberty of the country, may depend on the success of their investigation, they have carefully explored the whole ground, and the result of their inquiry is, that but one means has occurred to them holding out any reasonable prospect of success. A few preliminary remarks will be necessary to explain their views.

"Amidst all the difficulties of our situation, there is one consolation: that the danger from Executive patronage, as far as it depends on excess of revenue, must be temporary. Assuming that the act of 2d of March, 1833, will be left undisturbed, by its provisions the income, after the year 1842, is to be reduced to the economical wants of the government. The government, then, is in a state of passage from one where the revenue is excessive, to another in which, at a fixed and no distant period, it will be reduced to its proper limits. The difficulty in the intermediate time is, that the revenue cannot be brought down to the expenditure, nor the expenditure, without great danger, raised to the revenue, for reasons already explained. How is this difficulty to be overcome? It might seem that the simple and natural means would be, to vest the surplus in some safe and profitable stock, to accumulate for future use; but the difficulty in such a course will, on examination, be found insuperable. "At the very commencement, in selecting the stock, there would be great, if not insurmountable, difficulties. No one would think of investing the surplus in bank stock, against which there are so many and such decisive reasons that it is not deemed necessary to state them; nor would the objections be less decisive against vesting in the stock of the States, which would create the dangerous relation of debtor and creditor between the government and the members of the Union. But suppose this difficulty surmounted, and that some stock perfectly safe was selected, there would still remain another that could not be surmounted. There cannot be found a stock, with an interest in its favor sufficiently strong to compete with the interests which, with a large surplus revenue, will be ever found in favor of expenditures. It must be perfectly obvious to all who have the least experience, or who will duly reflect on the subject, that were a fund selected in which to vest the surplus revenue for future use, there would be found in practice a constant conflict between the interest in favor of some local or favorite scheme of expenditure, and that in favor of the stock. Nor can it be less obvious that, in point of fact, the former would prove far stronger than the latter. The result is obvious. The surplus, be it ever so great, would be absorbed by appropriations, instead of being vested in the stock; and the scheme, of course, would, in practice, prove an abortion; which brings us back to the ture and its consequent tendency to original inquiry, how is the surplus to be posed of until the excess shall be reduced to iust and economical wants of the government

"After bestowing on this question, on the cessful solution of which so much depends most deliberate attention, your committee, they have already stated, can advise but means by which it can be effected; and that an amendment of the constitution, authorit the temporary distribution of the surplus me nue among the States till the year 1843; as has been shown, the income and expend will be equalized.

"Your committee are fully aware of the lar and fatal objections to the distribution of surplus revenue among the States, consider as a part of the ordinary and regular system this government. They admit them to be great as can well be imagined. The proposition itself, that the government should collect me for the purpose of such distribution, or she distribute a surplus for the purpose of perpetting taxes, is too absurd to require refutation and yet what would be when applied, as a posed, so absurd and pernicious, is, in the ion of your committee, in the present extra dinary and deeply disordered state of our affi not only useful and salutary, but indispense to the restoration of the body politic to a co condition; just as some potent medicine, wi it would be dangerous and absurd to present to the healthy, may, to the diseased, be the means of arresting the hand of death. Di bution, as proposed, is not for the preposter and dangerous purpose of raising a revenue distribution, or of distributing the surplus means of perpetuating a system of dutie taxes; but a temporary measure to dispos an unavoidable surplus while the revenue the course of reduction, and which cannot otherwise disposed of, without greatly ing a disease that threatens the most dam consequences; and which holds out hope, only of arresting its further progress, but of restoring the body politic to a state of he and vigor. The truth of this assertion a few servations will suffice to illustrate.

"It must be obvious, on a little reflection the effects of distribution of the surplus be to place the interests of the States, on questions of expenditure, in opposition to ponditure, as every reduction of expense necessarily increase the sum to be district among the States. The effect of this would to convert them, through their interests i faithful and vigilant sentinels on the si economy and accountability in the expensi of this government; and would thus power tend to restore the government, in its action, to the plain and honest simplicity of mer days.

"It may, perhaps, be thought by some the power which the distribution among States would bring to bear against the

"But it may be objected that, though the disibution might reduce all useless expenditure, would at the same time give additional power the interest in favor of taxation. It is not nied that such would be its tendency; and, the danger from increased duties or taxes was this time as great as that from a surplus renue, the objection would be fatal; but it is affidently believed that such is not the case. n the contrary, in proposing the measure, it is sumed that the act of March 2, 1833, will rein undisturbed. It is on the strength of this sumption that the measure is proposed, and, it is believed, safely proposed.

"It may, however, be said that the distribun may create, on the part of the States, an petite in its favor which may ultimately lead its adoption as a permanent measure. It may leed tend to excite such an appetite, short as is period proposed for its operation; but it is rious that this danger is far more than counrailed by the fact that the proposed amendnt to the constitution to authorize the distri-tion would place the power beyond the reach legislative construction; and thus effectually vent the possibility of its adoption as a pernent measure; as it cannot be conceived that re-fourths of the States will ever assent to amendment of the constitution to authorize stribution, except as an extraordinary meaapplicable to some extraordinary condition the country like the present.

Giving, however, to these and other objections ch may be urged, all the force that can be med for them, it must be remembered the stion is not whether the measure proposed is not liable to this or that objection, but ther any other less objectionable can be ked; or rather, whether there is any other, ch promises the least prospect of relief, that be applied. Let not the delusion prevail the disease, after running through its natucourse, will terminate of itself, without fatal equences. Experience is opposed to such ipations. Many and striking are the examples of free States perishing under that excess of patronage which now atllicts ours. It may, in fact, be said with truth, that all or nearly all diseases which afflict free governments may be traced directly or indirectly to excess of revenue and expenditure; the effect of which is to rally around the government a powerful, corrupt, and subservient corps-a corps ever obedient to its will, and ready to sustain it in every measure, whether right or wrong; and which, if the cause of the disease be not eradicated. must ultimately render the government stronger than the people. "What progress this dangerous disease has already made in our country it is not for your committee to say; but when they reflect on the present symptoms; on the almost unbounded extent of executive patronage, wielded by a single will; the surplus revenue, which cannot be reduced within proper limits in less than seven years-a period which covers two presidential elections, on both of which all this mighty power and influence will be brought to bear; and when they consider that, with the vast patronage and influence of this government, that of all the States acting in concert with it will be combined, there are just grounds to fear that the fate which has befallen so many other free governments must also befall ours, unless, indeed, some effectual remedy be forthwith applied. It is under this impression that your committee have suggested the one proposal; not as free from all objections, but as the only one of sufficient power to arrest the disease and to restore the body politic to a sound condition; and they have accordingly reported a resolution so to amend the constitution that the money remaining in the treasury at the end of each year till the 1st of January, 1843, deducting therefrom the sum of $2,000,000 to meet current and contingent expenses, shall annually be distributed among the States and Territories, including the District of Columbia; and, for that purpose, the sum to be distributed to be divided into as many shares as there are senators and representatives in Congress, adding two for each territory and two for the District of Columbia; and that there shall be allotted to each State a number of shares equal to its representation in both Houses, and to the territories, including the District of Columbia, two shares each. Supposing the surplus to be distributed should average $9,000,000 annually, as estimated, it would give to each share $30,405; which multiplied by the number of senators and representatives from a State will show the amount to which any State will be entitled."

The report being here introduced to speak for itself, the reply also is introduced as delivered upon the instant, and found in the Congress register of debates, tnus:

[&]quot;Mr. Benton next came to the proposition in the report to amoud the constitution for eight years, to enable Congress to make distribution among the States, Territories, and District of Columbia, of the annual surplus of public money. The surplus is carefully calculated at $9,000,000 per annum for eight years; and the rule of distribution assumed goes to divide that sum into as many shares as there are senators and representatives in Congress; each State to take shares according to her representation; which the report shows would give for each share precisely $30,405; and then leaves it to the State itself, by a little ciphering, in multi-plying the aforesaid sum of $30,405 by the whole number of senators and representatives which it may have in Congress, to calculate the annual amount of the stipend it would receive. This process the report extends through a period of eight years; so that the whole sum to be divided to the States, Territorics, and District of Columbia, will amount to seventy-two millions of dollars.

"Of all the propositions which he ever witnessed, brought forward to astonish the senses, to confound recollection, and to make him doubt the reality of a past or a present scene, this proposition, said Mr. B., eclipses and distances the whole! What! the Senate of the United States-not only the same Senate, but the same members, sitting in the same chairs, looking in each others' faces, remembering what each had said only a few short months ago -now to be called upon to make an alteration in the constitution of the United States, for the pupose of dividing seventy-two millions of surplus money in the treasury; when that same treasury was proclaimed, affirmed, vaticinated, and proved, upon calculations, for the whole period of the last session, to be sinking into bankruptcy! that it would be destitute of revenue by the end of the year, and could never be replenished until the deposits were restored! the bank rechartered! and the usurper and despot driven from the high place which he dis-honored and abused! This was the cry then; the cry which resounded through this chamber for six long months, and was wasted upon every breeze to every quarter of the Republic, to alarm, agitate, disquiet and enrage the people. The author of this report, and the whole party with which he marched under the oriflamme of the Bank of the United States, filled the Union with this cry of a bankrupt treasury, and predicted the certain and speedy downfall of the administration, from the want of money to carry on the operations of the government.

"[Mr. Calhoun here rose and wished to know of Mr. Benton whether he meant to include him in the number of those who had predicted a deficiency in the revenue.]

"Mr. B. said he would answer the gentleman by telling him an anecdote. It was the story of a drummer taken prisoner in the low countries by the videttes of Marshal Saxe, under circumstances which deprived him of the pretection of the laws of war. About to be she the poor drummer plead in his defence that he was a non-combatant; he did not fight and k people; he did nothing, he said, but beat his drum in the rear of the line. But he was up swered, so much the worse; that he made other people fight, and kill one another, by driving them on with that drum of his in the rear the line; and so he should suffer for it. Mr. B. hoped that the story would be understood and that it would be received by the gentleman as an answer to his question; as neither in lar politics, nor war, was there any difference le tween what a man did by himself, and did by another. Be that as it may, said Mr. B. the strangeness of the scene in which we are now engaged remains the same. Last year it was bankrupt treasury, and a beggared government: now it is a treasury gorged to bursting wind surplus millions, and a government tramples down liberty, contaminating morals, bribing and wielding vast masses of people, from the unen ployable funds of countless treasures. Such an the scenes which the two sessions present; to it is in vain to deny it, for the fatal speeches of that fatal session have gone forth to all the ders of the republic. They were printed by the myriad, franked by members by the taweight, freighted to all parts by a decried at overwhelmed Post Office, and paid for! paid for! by whom? Thanks for one thing, at less The report of the Finance Committee en the bank (Mr. Tyler's report) effected the exhan tion of one mass—one mass of hidden buried putridity; it was the printing account of the Bank of the United States for that see sion of Congress which will long live in in history of our country under the odious ape lation of the panic session. That printing count has been dug up; is the black romit the bank! and he knew the medicine which could bring forty such vomits from the fa stomach of the old red harlot. It was the m dicine of a committee of investigation, committee tuted upon parliamentary principles; a comi tee, composed, in its majority, of those th charged misconduct, and evinced a disposition to probe every charge to the bottom; such committee as the Senate had appointed at it same session, not for the bank, but for them office.

"Yes, exclaimed Mr. B., not only the many was to be bankrupt, but the currency in to be ruined. There was to be no money. In trash in the treasury, what little there is was to be nothing but depreciated paper, wile issues of insovlent pet banks. Silver, a United States bank notes, and even good of exchange, were all to go off, all to take less and make their mournful exit together; a gold! that was a trick unworthy of connance; a gull to bambozale the simple, and insult the intelligent, until the fall chairs were over. nwful burden of the speech for six long months. Now, on the contrary, it seems to be admitted that there is to be money, real good money, in the treasury, such as the flercest haters of the pet banks would wish to have; and that not a little, since seventy-two millions of surpluses are proposed to be drawn from that same empty treasury in the brief space of eight years. Not a word about ruined currency now. Not a word about the currency itself. The very word ems to be dropped from the vocabulary of genlemen. All lips closed tight, all tongues hushed till, all allusion avoided, to that once dear hase. The silver currency doubled in a year; our millions of gold coins in half a year; exlanges reduced to the lowest and most uniform ates; the whole expenses of Congress paid in old; working people receiving gold and silver or their ordinary wages. Such are the results hich have confounded the prophets of wo, lenced the tongues of lamentation, expelled e word currency from our debates; and rought the people to question, if it cannot ing themselves, to doubt, the future infallility of those undaunted alarmists who still forward with new and confident predictions, twithstanding they have been so recently and conspicuously deceived in their vaticinations a ruined currency, a bankrupt treasury, and beggard government.

But here we are, said Mr. B., actually enced in a serious proposition to alter the contution of the United States for the period of ht years, in order to get rid of surplus revee; and a most dazzling, seductive, and fasciting scheme is presented; no less than nine llions a year for eight consecutive years. It ok like wildfire, Mr. B. said, and he had seen member-no, that might seem too particular he had seen a gentleman who looked upon it establishing a new era in the affairs of our perica establishing a new test for the forman of parties, bringing a new question into all elections, State and federal; and operating political salvation and elevation of all who ported it and the immediate, utter, and irre-rable political damnation of all who opposed But Mr. B. dissented from the novelty of scheme. It was an old acquaintance of his, new vamped and new burnished, for the sent occasion. It is the same proposition, to be accomplished in a different way, ich was brought forward, some years ago, by enator from New Jersey (Mr. Dickerson) which then received unmeasured condemon, not merely for unconstitutionality, but all its effects and consequences: the degraon of mendicant States, receiving their anallowance from the bounty of the federal amment; the debauchment of the public als, when every citizen was to look to the ral treasury for money, and every candidate office was to outbid his competitor in offert; the consolidation of the States, thus re-ing from a central supply of revenue; the Vol. I.-36

folly of collecting with one hand to pay back with the other; and both hands to be greased at the expense of the citizen, who pays one man to collect the money from him, and another to bring it back to him, minus the interest and the cost of a double operation in fetching and carrying; and the eventual and inevitable progress of the scheme to the plunder of the weaker half of the Union by the stronger; when the stronger half would undoubtedly throw the whole burden of raising the money upon the weaker half, and then take the main portion to themselves. Such were the main objections uttered against this plan, seven years ago, when a gallant son of South Carolina (General Hayne) stood by his (Mr. B.'s) side-no, stood before him-and led him in the fight against that fatal and delusive scheme, now brought forward under a more sedusive, dangerous, alarming, inexcusable, unjustifiable, and demoralizing form.

"Yes, said Mr. B., it is not only the revival of the same plan for dividing surplus revenue, which received its condemnation on this floor, seven or eight years ago; but it is the modification, and that in a form infinitely worse for the new States, of the famous land bill which now lies upon our table. It takes up the object of that bill, and runs away with it, giving nine millions where that gave three, and leaves the author of that bill out of sight behind; and can the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Culhoun) be so short-sighted as not to see that somebody will play him the same prank, and come forward with propositions to raise and divide twenty, thirty, forty millions; and thus outleap, outjump, and outrun him in the race of popularity, just as far as he himself has now outjumped, outleaped, and outran, the author of the land distribution bill?

"Yes, said Mr. B., this scheme for dividing surplus revenue is an old acquaintance on this floor; but never did it come upon this floor at a time so inauspicious, under a form so questionable, and upon assumptions so unfounded in fact, so delusive in argument. He would speak of the inauspiciousness of the time hereafter; at present, he would take positions in direct contradiction to all the arguments of fact and reason upon which this monstrous scheme of distribution is erected and defended. Condensed into their essence, these arguments are:

"1. That there will be a surplus of nine millions annually, for eight years.

"2. That there is no way to reduce the revenue.

"3. That there is no object of general utility to which these surpluses can be applied.

"4. That distribution is the only way to carry them off without poisoning and corrupting the whole body politic.

"Mr. B. disputed the whole of those proposi-

"Mr. B. disputed the whole of those propositions, and would undertake to show each to be unfounded and erroneous.

"1. The report says that the surplus will probably equal, on the average, for the next eight years, the sum of $9,000,000 beyond the just wants of the government; and in a subsequent part it says, supposing the surplus to be distributed should average $9,000,000, annually, as estimated, it would give to each share $30,405, which, multiplied by the senators and representatives of any State, would show the sum to which it would be entitled. The amendment which has been reported to carry this distribution into effect is to take effect for the year 1835 -the present year-and to continue till the 1st day of January, 1843; of course it is inclusive of 1842, and makes a period of eight years for the distribution to go on. The amendment contains a blank, which is to be filled up with the sum which is to be left in the treasury every year, to meet contingent and unexpected demands; and the report shows that this blank is to be filled with the sum of $2,000,000. Here, then, is the totality of these surpluses, eleven millions a year, for eight consecutive years; but of which nine millions are to be taken annually for distribution. Now, nine times eight are seventy-two, so that here is a report setting forth the enormous sum of $72,000,000 of mere surplus, after satisfying all the just wants of the government, and leaving two millions in the treasury, to be held up for distribution, and to excite the people to clamor for their shares of such a great and dazzling prize. At the same time, Mr. B. said, there would be no such surplus. It was a delusive bait held out to whet the appetite of the people for the spoils of their country; and could never be realized, even if the amendment for authorizing the distribution should now pass. The seventy-two millions could never be found; they would exist nowhere but in this report, in the author's imagination, and in the deluded hopes of an excited community. The seventy-two millions could never be found; they would turn out to be the fellows in Kendal green and buckram suits, which figured so largely in the imagination of Sir John Falstaff -the two-and-fifty men in buckram which the valiant old knight received upon his point, thus! [extending a pencil in the attitude of desence]. The calculations of the author of the report were wild, delusive, astonishing, incredible. He (Mr. B.) could not limit himself to the epithet wild, for it was a clear case of hallucination.

"Mr. B. then took up the treasury report of Mr. Secretary Woodbury, communicated at the commencement of the present session of Congress, and containing the estimates required by law of the expected income and expenditure for the present year, and also for the year 1836. At pages 4 and 5 are the estimates for the present year; the income estimated at $20,000,000, the expenditures at $19,683,540; being a difference of only some three hundred thousand dollars between the income and the outlay; and such is the chance for nine millions taken, and two left in the first year of the distribution. At pages 10, 14, 15, the revenue for 1836 is computed; and, after going over all the heads of surplus of nine millions a year for eight expense, on which diminutions will probably be made, he computes the income and outlay of the year at about equal; or probably a little surplus to the amount of one million. These are the estimates, said Mr. B., formed upon data, and coming from an officer making reports upon his responsibility, and for the legislative guidance of Congress; and to which we are bound to give credence until they are shown to be incorred Here, then, are the first two years of the eight disposed of, and nothing found in them to divide The last two years of the term could be die patched even more quickly, said Mr. B.; for every body that understands the compromise act of March, 1833, must know that, in the last two years of the operation of that act, then would be an actual deficit in the treasury. Los at the terms of the act! It proceeds by slow and insensible degrees, making slight deduction once in two years, until the years 1841 and 1842, when it ceases crawling, and commence jumping; and leaps down, at two jumps, to twenty per centum on the value of the artis which pay duty, which articles are less than thalf of our importations. Twenty her and Twenty per an upon the amount of goods which will then pe duty will produce but little, say twelve or the teen millions, upon the basis of sixty or seren millions of dutiable articles imported then, whi only amount to forty-seven millions now. The there will be no surplus at all for one half period of eight years: the first two and the two. In the middle period of four years the will probably be a surplus of two or three lions; but Mr. B. took issue upon all the alle tions with respect to it; as that there was way to reduce the revenue without distum the compromise act of March, 1833; that the was no object of general utility to which it on be applied; and that distribution was the way to get rid of it.

"Equally delusive, and profoundly em

ous, was the gentleman's idea of the sun which could be taken out of the appretions. True, that operation could be perfected once, and but once. The run of our many contracts of the country of the sury payments show that about one quantof the year's expenditure is not paid will the year, but the first quarter of the mayear, and thus could be paid out of them nue received in the first quarter of the revenue of the last quarter the preceding year was thrown away. But was a thing which could only be done in You might rely upon the first quarter, but could not upon the second, third, and for There would not be a dollar in the treasur the end of four years, if you deducted a quart amount four times successively. It was in if a homely adage might be allowed, which well apply—you could not eat the cake and it too. Mr. B. submitted it, then, to the sa that, on the first point of objection to them his issue was maintained. There was no as had been assumed, nor any thing near it; and this assumption being the corner-stone of the whole edifice of the scheme of distribution, it was sufficient to show the fallacy of that data to blow the whole scheme into the erapty air.

Mr. B. admonished the Senate to beware of ridicule. To pass a solemn vote for amending the constitution, for the purpose of enabling Congress to make distribution of surpluses of revenue, and then find no surplus to distribute, might lessen the dignity and diminish the weight of so grave a body. It might expose it to ridicule; and that was a hard thing for public bodies, and public men, to stand. The Senate had stood much in its time; much in the latter part of Mr. Monroe's administration, when the Washington Republican habitually denounced it as a faction, and displayed many brilliant essays, written by no mean hand, to prove that the epithet was well polied, though applied to a majority. It had good much, also, during the four years of the econd Mr. Adams's administration; as the suriving pages of the defunct National Journal ould still attest: but in all that time it stood lear of ridicule; it did nothing upon which ancy wit could lay its lash. Let it beware now! or the passage of this amendment muy expose to untried peril; the peril of song and caricaire. And wo to the Senate, farewell to its digity, if it once gets into the windows of the printhop, and becomes the burden of the ballads thich the milkmaids sing to their cows.

#2. Mr. B. took up his second head of objecon. The report affirmed that there was no ay to reduce the revenue before the end of the ear 1842, without violating the terms of the mpromise act of March, 1833. Mr. B. said had opposed that act when it was on its pasge, and had then stated his objections to it. was certainly an extraordinary act, a sort of w constitution for nine years, as he had heard felicitously called. It was made in an unusual mer, not precisely by three men on an island the coast of Italy, but by two in some room a boarding-house in this city; and then pushed rough Congress under a press of sail, and a resse of feeling; under the factitious cry of solution of the Union, raised by those who d been declaring, on one hand, that the tariff ild not be reduced without dissolving the ion; and on the other that it could not kept up without dissolving the same Union. e value of all such cries, Mr. B. said, would appreciated in future, when it was seen with much facility certain persons who had stood er the opposite poles of the earth, as it were, the subject of the tariff, had come together compromise their opinions, and to lay the if on the shelf for nine years! a period which ered two presidential elections! That act no favorite of his, but he would let it alone; thus leaving it to work out its design for years, he would say there were ways to re-

here he would speak upon data. He had the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Woodbury) to declare that he believed he could reduce the revenue in this way and upon imports to the amount of five hundred thousand dollars; and he, Mr. B., should submit a resolution calling upon the Secretary to furnish the details of this reduction to the Senate at the commenc ment of their next stated session, that Congre s might act upon it. Further, Mr. B. would say, that it appeared to him that the whole list of articles in the fifth section of the act, amounting to thirty or forty in number, and which by that section are to be free of duty in 1842, and which in his opinion might be made free this day, and that not only without injuiry to the manufacturers, but with such manifest advantage to them, that, as an equivalent for it, and for the sake of obtaining it, they ought to come forward of themselves, and make a voluntary concession of reductions on some other points, especially on

"Having given Mr. Woodbury's authority for a reduction of $500,000 on imports, Mr. B. would show another source from which a much larger reduction could be made, and that without affecting this famous act of March, 1833, in another and a different quarter; it was in the Western quarter, the new States, the public lands! The act of 1833 did not embrace this source of revenue, and Congress was free to act upon it, and to give the people of the new States the same relief on the purchase of the article on which they chiefly paid revenue as it had done to the old States in the reduction of the tariff. Mr. B. did not go into the worn-out and exploded objections to the reduction of the price of the lands which the report had gathered up from their old sleeping places, and presented again to the Senate. Speculators, monopolies, the fall in the price of real estate all over the Union; these were exploded fallacies which he was sorry to see paraded here again, and which he should not detain the Senate to answer. Suffice it to say, that there is no application made now, made heretofore, or intended to be made, so far as he knew, to reduce the price of new land! One dollar and a quarter was low enough for the first choice of new lands; but it was not low enough for the second, third, fourth, and fifth choices! It was not low enough for the refuse lands which had been five, ten, twenty, forty years in market; and which could find no purchaser at $1 25, for the solid reason that they were worth but the half, the quarter, the tenth part, of that sum. It was for such lands that reduction of prices was sought, and had been sought for many years, and would continue to be sought until it was obtained; for it was impossible to believe that Congress would persevere in the flagrant injustice of for ever refusing to reduce the price of refuse and unsalable lands to their actual value. The policy of President Jackson, communicated the revenue, very sensibly, without affect- in his messages, Mr. B. said, was the policy of the terms or the spirit of that act. And wisdom and justice. B. took issue upon all the allen lands more for the purpose of promoting settlements, and creating freeholders, than for the purpose of exacting revenue from the meritorious class of citizens who cultivate the soil. He would sell the lands at prices which would pay expenses-the expense of acquiring them from the Indians, and surveying and selling them; and this system of moderate prices with donations, or nominal sales to actual settlers, would do justice to the new States, and effect a sensible reduction in the revenue; enough to prevent the necessity of amending the constitution to get rid of nine million surpluses! But whether the price of lands was reduced or not, Mr. B. said, the revenue from that source would soon be diminished. The revenue had been exorbitant from the sale of lands for three or four years past. And why? Precisely because immense bodies of new lands, and much of it in the States adapted to the production of the great staples which now bear so high a price, have within that period, come into market; but these fresh lands must soon be exhausted; the old and refuse only remain for sale; and the revenue from that source will sink down to its former usual amount, instead of remaining at three millions a year for nine years, as the report assumes. "3. When he had thus shown that a diminution of revenue could be effected, both on imports and on refuse and unsalable lands, Mr. B. took up the third issue which he had joined with the report; namely, the possibility of finding an object of general utility on which the surpluses could be expended. The report affirmed there was no such object; he, on the contrary, affirmed that there were such; not one, but several, not only useful, but necessary, not merely necessary, but exigent; not exigent only, but in the highest possible degree indispensable and essential. He alluded to the whole class of measures connected with the general and permanent defence of the Union! In peace, prepare for war! is the admonition of wisdom in all ages and in all nations; and sorely and grievously has our America heretofore paid for the neglect of that admonition. She has paid for it in blood, in money, and in shame. Are we prepared now? And is there any reason why we should not prepare now? Look at your maritime coast, from Passamaquoddy Bay to Florida point; your gulf east, from Florida point to the Sabine; your lake frontier, in its whole extent. What is the picture? Almost destitute of forts; and, it might be said, quite destitute of armament. Look at your armories and arsenals-too few and too empty; and the West almost destitute! Look at your militia, many of them mustering with corn stalks; the States deficient in arms, especially in field artillery, and in swords and pistols for their cavalry! Look at your navy; slowly increasing under an annual appropriation of half a million a year, instead of a whole million, at which it was fixed soon after the late war, and from which it was reduced some years ago, when money ran low in the treasury! Look at your class; twenty-three of the second; and if dock-yards and navy-yards; thinly dotted alone the maritime coast, and hardly seen at all on the gulf coast, where the whole South, and the great West, so imperiously demand naval protection Such is the picture; such the state of our comtry; such its state at this time, when even the most unobservant should see something to make us think of defence! Such is the state of on defences now, with which, oh! strange and wor. derful contradiction! the administration is now reproached, reviled, flouted, and taunted, by those who go for distribution, and turn their backs on defence! and who complain of the President for leaving us in this condition, when five years ago in the year 1829, he recommended the annual sum of $250,000 for arming the fortifications (which Congress refused to give), and who now are for taking the money out of the treasury, to be divided among the people; instead of turning it all to the great object of the general and permanent defence of the Union, for which they were so solicitous, so clamorous, so feelings alive, and patriotically sensitive, even one short month ago.

"Does not the present state of the country (said Mr. B.) call for defence ? and is not the the propitious time for putting it in defence and will not that object absorb every dollard real surplus that can be found in the treasure for these eight years of plenty, during which is are to be afflicted with seventy-two millions of surplus? Let us see. Let us take one single brand of the general system of defence, and see how stands, and what it would cost to put it in the condition which the safety and the honor of the country demanded. He spoke of the fortification and selected that branch, because he had data go upon; data to which the senator from Som Carolina, the author of this report, could m object. "The design (said Mr. B.) of fortifying coasts of the United States is as old as the Uni itself. Our documents are full of executive commendations, departmental reports, and ports of committees upon this sub, ct, all with this great object upon the attention of Cong From 1789, through every succeeding admin tration, the subject was presented to Congress but it was only after the late war, and when evils of a defenceless coast were fresh before eyes of the people, that the subject was pres ed in the most impressive, persevering, and tematic form. An engineer of the first m (General Bernard) was taken into our sen from the school of the great Napoleon. An lution of the House of Representatives called the War Department for a plan of defence, a designation of forts adequate to the project of the country; and upon this call examinate wero made, estimates framed, and forts proj for the whole maritime coast from Savanna Boston. The result was the presentation 1821, of a plan for ninety forts upon that of the coast; namely, twenty-four of the three of the third. I'rder the administration of Mr. Monroe, and the urgent recommendations of the then head of the War Department (Mr. Calhoun), the construction of these forts was commenced, and pushed with spirit and activity; but, owing to circumstances not necessary now to be detailed, the object declined in the public favor, lost a part of its popularity, perhaps justly, and has since proceeded so slowly that, at the end of twenty years from the late war, no more than thirteen of these forts have been constructed; namely, eight of the first class, three of the second, and two of the third; and of these thirteen constructed, none are armed; almost all of them are without guns or carriages, and more ready for the occupation of an enemy than for the defence of ourselves. This is the state of fortifications on the maritime coast, exclusive of the New England coast to the north of Boston. exclusive of Cape Cod, south of Boston, and exclusive of the Atlantic coast of Florida. The lake frontier is untouched. The gulf frontier, almost two thousand miles in length, barely is latted with a few forts in the neighborhood of Pensacola, New Orleans, and Mobile; all the rest of the coast may be set down as naked and defenceless. This was our condition. Now, Mr. B. did not venture to give an opinion that the whole plan of fortifications developed in the reports of 1821 should be carried into effect; but he would say, and that most confidently, that much of it ought to be; and it would be the business of Congress to decide on each fort in making a specific appropriation for it. He would Iso say that many forts would be found to be ecessary which were not embraced in that plan; or it did not touch the lake coast, and the gulf past, nor the New England coast, north of Boson, nor any point of the land frontier. Without going into the question at all, of how many rere necessary, or where they should be placed, was sufficient to show that there were enough ranting, beyond dispute, to constitute an object tutility, worthy of the national expenditure; nd sufficient to absorb, not nine millions of anual surplus, to be sure, but about as many miloas of surplus as would ever be found, and the ank stock into the bargain. The thirteen forts instructed had cost twelve millions one hunred and thirteen thousand dollars; near one illion of dollars each. But this was for conruction only; the armament was still to folw; and for this object two millions were esmated in 1821 for the ninety forts then recomended; and of that two millions it may be sumed that but little has been granted by ongress. So much for fortifications; in itself single branch of defence, and sufficient to sorb many millions. But there were many her branches of defence which, Mr. B. said, would barely enumerate. There was the navy, luding its gradual increase, its dock-yards, (besides those which apply to foreign enemies) which need not be named; then the supply of arms to the States, especially field artillery. swords, and pistols, for which an annual but inadequate appropriation had been made for so long a time that he believed the States had almost forgot the subject. Here are objects enough, Mr. President, exclaimed Mr. B., to absorb every dollar of our surplus, and the bank stock besides. The surpluses, he was certain, would be wholly insufficient, and the bank stock, by a solenin resolution of the two Houses of Congress, should be devoted to the object. As a fund was set apart, and held sacred and inviolable, for the payment of the public debt so; should a fund be now created for national defence, and this bank stock should be the first and most sacred item put into it. It is the only way to save that stock from becoming the prey of incessant contrivances to draw money from the treasury. Mr. B. said that he intended to submit resolutions, requesting the President to cause to be communicated to the next Congress full information upon all the points that he had touched; the probable revenue and expenditure for the next eight years; the plan and expense of fortifying the coast; the navy, and every other point connected with the general and permanent defence of the Union, with a view to let Congress take it up, upon system, and with a design to complete it without further delay. And he demanded, why hurry on this amendment before that information can come in?

He spoke of the fortification at the tranch, because he had data to which the senator from Somuthor of this report, could be

"Now is the auspicious moment, said Mr. B., for the republic to rouse from the apathy into which it has lately sunk on the subject of national defence. The public debt is paid; a sum of six or seven millions will come from the bank; some surpluses may occur; let the national defence become the next great object after the payment of the debt, and all spare money go to that purpose. If further stimulus were wanted, it might be found in the present aspect of our foreign affairs, and in the reproaches, the taunts, and in the offensive insinuations which certain gentlemen have been indulging in for two months with respect to the defenceless state of the coast; and which they attribute to the negligence of the administration. Certainly such gentlemen will not take that money for distrihution, for the immediate application of which their defenceless country is now crying aloud, and stretching forth her imploring hands.

mated in 1821 for the ninety forts then recomended; and of that two millions it may be sumed that but little has been granted by sumed that but little has been granted by sumer so much for fortifications; in itself single branch of defence, and sufficient to sorb many millions. But there were many her branches of defence which, Mr. B. said, would barely enumerate. There was the navy, luding its gradual increase, its dock-yards, may-yards: then the armories and arsenals, the were so much wanted in the South and est, and especially in the South, for a reason larity which it bears to the language and sentiments of cotemporaneous reports from the then head of the War Department; the position which the writer of those reports then held in relation to President Monroe; the right which he possessed, as Secretary of War, to know, at least, what was put into the message in relation to measures connected w h his department; considered under any and all of these aspects, the extracts which he was about to read might be considered as expressing the sentiments, if not speaking the words, of the gentleman who now sees no object of utility in providing for the defence of his country; and who then plead the cause of that defence with so much truth and energy, and with such commendable excess of patriotic zeal.

" Mr. B. then read as follows:

" Should war break out in any of those countries (the European), who can foretell the extent to which it may be carried, or the desolation which may spread? Exempt as we are from these causes (of European civil wars), our internal tranquillity is secure; and distant as we are from the troubled scene, and faithful to just principles in regard to other powers, we might reasonably presume that we should not be molested by them. This, however, ought not to be calculated on as certain. Unprovoked injuries are often inflicted, and even the peculiar felicity of our situation might, with some, be a cause of excitement and aggression. The history of the late wars in Europe furnishes a complete demonstration that no system of conduct, however correct in principle, can protect neutral powers from injury from any party; that a defenceless position and distinguished love of peace are the surest invitations to war; and that there is no way to avoid it, other than by being always prepared, and willing, for just cause, to meet it. If there be a people on earth, whose more especial duty it is to be at all times prepared to defend the rights with which they are blessed, and to surpass all others in sustaining the necessary burdens, and in submitting to sacrifices to make such preparations, it is undoubtedly the people of these States.'

"Mr. B. having read thus far, stopped to make a remark, and but a remark, upon a single sentiment in it. He would not weaken the force and energy of the whole passage by going over it in detail; but he invoked attention upon the last sentiment-our peculiar duty, so strongly painted, to sustain burdens, and submit to sacritices, to accomplish the noble object of putting our country into an attitude of defence! , The ease with which we can prepare for the same defence now, by the facile operation of applying to that purpose surpluses of revenue and bank stock, for which we have no other use, was the point on which he would invoke and arrest the Senate's attention.

"Mr. B. resumed his reading, and read the next paragraph, which enumerated all the causes which might lead to general war in Europe, and our involvement in it, and concluded with the phic conception to the reflecting mind. It declaration 'That the reasons for pushing fee ward all our measures of defence, with the nt. most vigor, appear to me to acquire new force.

And then added, these causes for European war are now in as great force as then; the danger of our involvement is more apparent now than then; the reasons for sensibility to our national honor are nearer now than then; and upon all the principles of the passage from which he was reading, the reasons for pushing forward all on measures of defence with the utmost vigor, 10sessed far more force in this present year 1821 than they did in the year 1822.

"Mr. B. continued to read:

"The United States owe to the world a great example, and by means thereof, to the cause of liberty and humanity a generous support. They have so far succeeded to the satis faction of the virtuous and enlightened of ever country. There is no reason to doubt that their whole movement will be regulated by a sacreregard to principle, all our institutions being founded on that basis. The ability to support our own cause, under any trial to which it may be exposed, is the great point on which the public solicitude rests. It has often been charged against free governments, that they have not ther the foresight nor the virtue to provide u the proper season for great emergencies; that their course is improvident and expensive; that war will always find them unprepared; and whatever may be its calamities, that its terrible warnings will be disregarded and forgotten as soon as peace returns. I have full confidence that this charge, so far as it relates to the United States, will be shown to be utterly destitute of truth.

"Mr. B., as he closed the book, said, he would make a few remarks upon some of the points in this passage, which he had last read-the reproach so often charged upon free government for want of foresight and virtue, their improve dence and expensiveness, their proneness to disregard and forget in peace the warning lessons of the most terrible calamities of war. Andre would take the liberty to suggest that, of all the mortal beings now alive upon this earth the author of the report under discussion ought to be the last to disregard and to forget the solemn and impressive admonition which the passage conveyed! the last to so act as to subject his government to the mortifying charge which has been so often cast upon them! the last to subject the virtue of the people to the humiliating trial of deciding between the defence and the plunder of their country!

"Mr. B. dwelt a moment on another point is the passage which he had read-the great eample which this republic owed to the world and to the cause of free governments, to prom itself capable of supporting its cause under every trial; and that by providing in peach the dangers of war. It was a striking point the passage, and presented a grand and philose

It a moment on another point a lich he had read—the great e-his republic owed to the work so of free governments, to prof supporting its cause under that by providing in peace of war. It was a striking point of presented a grand and philosoon to the reflecting mind. It example to be shown to the world, and the duty of this republic to exhibit it, was an elerated and patriotic conception, and worthy of the genius which then presided over the War Department. But what is the example which we are now required to exhibit? It is that of a people preferring the spoils of their country to its defence! It is that of the electioneerer, going from city to city, from house to house, hamlet, who has no means of detecting the falacies which are brought from afar to deceive his understanding: It is the example of this electioneerer, with slate and pencil in his hand (and here Mr. B. took up an old book cover, and a pencil, and stooped over it to make figures, as if working out a little sum in arithmetic), it is the example of this electioneerer, offering for distribution that money which should be sacred to the defence of his country; and pointing out for overthrow, at the next election, erery candidate for office who should be found in opposition to this wretched and deceptive scheme of distribution. This is the example which it is proposed that we should now exhibit. And little did it enter into his (Mr. B.'s) imagination, about the time that message was written, that it should fall to his lot to plead for the defence of his country against the au-ther of this report. He admired the grandeur of conception which the reports of the war fice then displayed. He said he differed from he party with whom he then acted, in giving a eneral, though not a universal, support to the ecretary of War. He looked to him as one ho when mellowed by age and chastened by sperience, might be among the most admired Presidents that ever filled the presidential chair. Mr. B., by a lapsus linguæ, said throne, but prected the expression on its echo from the

"Mr. B. said there was an example which it as worthy to imitate: that of France; her not defended by forts and batteries, behind hich the rich city reposed in safety—the transil peasant cultivated his vine in security—the the proud navy of England sailed intoxious before them, a spectacle of amusement to an object of terror. And there was an example to be avoided: the case of our own merica during the late war; when the approach a British squadron, upon any point of our tended coast, was the signal for flight, for ror, for consternation; when the hearts of brave and the almost naked hands of heroes are the sole reliance for defence; and where ose hearts and those hands could not come, a sacred soil of our country was invaded; a ruffian soldier and the rude sailor became insolent masters of our citizens' houses; is footsteps marked by the desolation of lds the conflagration of cities, the flight of virgins, the violation of matrons! the blood of fathers, busbands, sons! This is the example which we should avoid!

" But the amendment is to be temporary : it is only to last until 1842. What an idea!-a temporary alteration in a constitution made for endless ages! But let no one think it will be temporary, if once adopted. No! if the people once come to taste that blood; if they once bring themselves to the acceptance of money from the treasury they are gone for ever. They will take that money in all time to come; and he that promises most, receives most votes. The corruption of the Romans, the debauchment of the voters, the venality of elections, commenced with the Tribunitial distribution of corn out of the public granaries; it advanced to the distribution of the spoils of foreign nations, brought home to Rome by victorious generals and divided out among the people; it ended in bringing the spoils of the country into the canvass for the consulship, and in putting up the diadem of empire itself to be knocked down to the hammer of the auctioneer. In our America there can be no spoils of conquered nations to distribute. Her own treasury—her own lands—can alone furnish the fund. Begin at once, no matter how, or upon what-surplus revenue, the proceeds of the lands, or the lands themselves-no matter; the progress and the issue of the whole game is as inevitable as it is obvious. Candidates bid, the voters listen; and a plundered and pillaged country -the empty skin of an immolated victim-is the prize and the spoil of the last and the highest bidder."

The proposition to amend the constitution to admit of this distribution was never brought to a vote. In fact it was never mentioned again after the day of the above discussion. It seemed to have support from no source but that of its origin; and very soon events came to scatter the basis on which the whole stress and conclusion of the report lay. Instead of a surplus of nine millions to cover the period of two presidential elections, there was a deficit in the treasury in the period of the first one; and the government reduced to the humiliating resorts to obtain money to keep itself in motion-mendicant expeditions to Europe to borrow money, returning without it-and paper money struck under the name of treasury notes. But this attempt to amend the constitution to permit a distribution, becomes a material point in the history of the working of our government, seeing that a distribution afterwards took place without the amendment to permit it.

Ir. James K. Polk of Tennessee, was elected ker of the House, and by a large majority the late speaker, Mr. John Bell of the same e. The vote stood one hundred and thirtyto eighty-four, and was considered a test he administration strength, Mr. Polk being ported by that party, and Mr. Bell having me identified with those who, in siding with Hugh L. White as a candidate for the preney, were considered as having divided from democratic party. Among the eminent es missed from the list of the House of Repntatives, were: Mr. Wayne of Georgia, apand to the bench of the Supremo Court of United States; and Mr. Edward Everett of schusetts, who declined a re-election.

he state of our relations with France, in the iaued non-payment of the stipulated indemwas the prominent feature in the Presia message; and the subject itself becoming senous in the apparent indisposition in ress to sustain his views, manifested in the agreement of the two Houses. The obligation to pay was admitted, and the money even voted for that purpose; but offence was taken at the President's message, and payment refused until an apology should be made. The President had already sho n, on its first intimation, that no offence was intended, nor any disrespect justly deducible from the language that he had used; and he was now peremptory in ref sing to make the required apology; and had instructed the United States' charge d'affaires to demand the money; and, if not paid, to leave France immediately. The ministers of both countries had previously withdrawn, and the last link in the chain of diplomatic communication was upon the point of being broken. The question having narrowed down to this small point, the President deemed it proper to give a retrospective view of it, to justify his determination, neither to apologize nor to negotiate further. He said:

"On entering upon the duties of my station, I found the United States an unsuccessful applicant to the justice of France, for the satisfaction of claims, the validity of which was never questionable, and has now been most solemnly admitted by France herself. The antiquity of these claims, their high justice, and the aggravating circumstances out of which they arose, are too familiar to the American people to require description. It is sufficient to say, that, for a period of ten years and upwards, our commerce was, with but little interruption, the subject of constant aggressions, on the part of France-aggressions, the ordinary features of which were condemnations of vessels and cargoes, under arbitrary decrees, adopted in con-travention, as well of the laws of nations as of treaty stipulations, burnings on the high seas, and seizures and confiscations, under special imperial rescripts, in the ports of other nations occupied by the armies, or under the control of France. Such, it is now conceded, is the character of the wrongs we suffered; wrongs, in many cases, so flagrant that even their authors never denied our right to reparation. Of the extent of these injuries, some conception may be formed from the fact that, after the burning of a large amount at sea, and the necessary deterioration in other cases, by long detention, the American property so seized and sacrificed at forced sales, excluding what was adjudged to privateers, before or without condemnation, brought into the French treasury upwards of twenty-four millions of francs, besides large custom-house duties.

"The subject had already been an affair of twenty years' uninterrupted negotiation, except for a short time, when France was overwhelmed of the fortification bill, through the dis- by the military power of united Europe. During this period, whilst other nations were extorting from her payment of their claims at the point of the bayonet, the United States intermitted their demand for justice, out of respect to the oppressed condition of a gallant people, to whom they felt under obligations for fraternal assistance in their own days of suffering and of peril. The bad effects of these protracted and unavailing discussions, as well upon our relations with France as upon our national character, were obvious; and the line of duty was, to my mind, equally so. This was, either to insist upon the adjustment of our claims, within a reasonable period, or to abandon them altogether. I could not doubt that, by this course, the interest and honor of both countries would be best consulted. Instructions were, therefore, given in this spirit to the minister, who was sent out once more to demand reparation. Upon the meeting of Congress, in December, 1829, I felt it my duty to speak of these claims, and the delays of France, in terms calculated to call the serious attention of both countries to the subject. The then French Ministry took exception to the message, on the ground of its containing a menace, under which it was not agreeable to the French government to negotiate. The American minister, of his own accord, refuted the construction which was attempted to be put upon the message, and, at the same time, called to the recollection of the French ministry, that the President's message was a communication addressed, not to foreign governments, but to the Congress of the United States, in which it was enjoined upon him, by the constitution, to lay before that body information of the state of the Union, comprehending its foreign as well as its domestic relations; and that if, in the discharge of this duty, he felt it incumbent upon him to summon the attention of Congress in due time to what might be the possible consequences of existing difficulties with any foreign government, he might fairly be supposed to do so, under a sense of what was due from him in a frank communication with another branch of his own government and not from any intention of holding a menace over a foreign power. The views taken by him received my approbation, the French government was satisfied, and the negotiation was continued. It terminated in the treaty of July 4, 1831, recognizing the justice of our claims, in part, and promising payment to the amount of twenty-five millions of francs, in six annual instalments.

"The ratifications of this treaty were exchanged at Washington, on the 2d of February, 1832; and, in five days thereafter, it was laid before Congress, who immediately passed the acts necessary, on our part, to secure to France the commercial advantages conceded to her in the compact. The treaty had previously been solemnly ratified by the King of the French, in terms which are certainly not mere matters of form, and of which the translation is as follows: 'We, approving the above convention, in all and each of the depositions which are contained in it, do declare by ourselves, as well by our heirs and successors, that it is accepted approved, ratified, and confirmed; and by the presents, signed by our hand, we do accept approve, ratify, and confirm it; promising, on the faith and word of a king, to observe it, and a cause it to be observed inviolably, without encontravening it, or suffering it to be contravend directly or indirectly, for any cause, or underly pretence whatsoever.

"Official information of the exchange of ratio fications in the United States reached Page whilst the Chambers were in session. be of that character.

"The expectations justly founded upon the onises thus solemnly made to this governeat by that of France, were not realized. The ench Chambers met on the 31st of July, 1834, on after the election, and although our minisin Paris urged the French ministry to press subject before them, they declined doing so. next insisted that the Chambers, if pro-ued without acting on the subject, should be sembled at a period so early that their acn on the treaty might be known in Washingprior to the meeting of Congress. This sonable request was not only declined, but Chambers were prorogued on the 29th of cember; a day so late, that their decision, rever urgently pressed, could not, in all pro-ility, be obtained in time to reach Washingbefore the necessary adjournment of Con-s by the constitution. The reasons given by ministry for refusing to convoke the Chamat an earlier period, were afterwards shown to be insuperable, by their actual convocaon the first of December, under a special for domestic purposes, which fact, however. not become known to this government until the commencement of the last session of

Thus disappointed in our just expectations, came my imperative duty to consult with gress in regard to the expediency of a resort taliatory measures, in case the stipulations he treaty should not be speedily complied ; and to recommend such as, in my judgt, the occasion called for. To this end, an served communication of the case, in all its cts, became indispensable. To have shrunk, aking it, from saying all that was necessary correct understanding, and that the truth d justify, for fear of giving offence to others, have been unworthy of us. To have on the other hand, a single step further, he purpose of wounding the pride of a govern and people with whom we had so many res of cultivating relations of amity and real advantage, would have been unwise mproper. Admonished by the past of the alty of making even the simplest statement r wrongs, without disturbing the sensibili-those who had, by their position, become asible for their redress, and earnestly deof preventing further obstacles from that I went out of my way to preclude a conion of the message, by which the recomtion that was made to Congress might be ded as a menace to France, in not only disexpect any thing from her fears. The message did not reach Paris until more than a month after the Chambers had been in session; and such was the insensibility of the ministry to our rightful claims and just expectations, that our minister had been informed that the mat ter, when introduced, would not be pressed as a cabinet measure.

"Although the message was not officially communicated to the French government, and notwithstanding the declaration to the contrary which it contained, the French ministry decided to consider the conditional recommendation of reprisals a menace and an insult, which the honor of the nation made it incumbent on them to resent. The measures resorted to by them to evince their sense of the supposed indignity were, the immediate recall of their minister at Washington, the offer of passports to the American minister at Paris, and a public notice to the legislative chambers that all diplomatic intercourse with the United States had been suspended.

" Having, in this manner, vindicated the dignity of France, they next proceeded to illustrate her justice. To this end a bill was immediately introduced into the Chamber of Deputies, proposing to make the appropriations necessary to carry into effect the treaty. As this bill sub-sequently passed into a law, the provisions of which now constitute the main subject of difficulty between the two nations, it becomes my duty, in order to place the subject before you in a clear light, to trace the history of its passage, and to refer, with some particularity, to the proceedings and discussions in regard to it. The Minister of Finance, in his opening speech, alluded to the measures which had been adopted to resent the supposed indignity, and recommended the execution of the treaty as a measure required by the honor and justice of France. He, as the organ of the ministry, declared the message, so long as it had not received the sanction of Congress, a mere expression of the personal opinion of the President, for which neither the government nor people of the United States were responsible; and that an engagement had been entered into, for the fulfilment of which the honor of France was pledged. Entertaining these views, the single condition which the French ministry proposed to annex to the payment of the money was, that it should not be made until it was ascertained that the government of the United States had done nothing to injure the interests of France; or, in other words, that no steps had been authorized by Congress of a hostile character towards France.

"What the disposition or action of Congress of preventing further obstacles from that to all the message, by which the recombined as a menace to France, in not only disposed to the state of affairs between the United States and ker power were too well known to only disposed to the state of affairs between the United States and France, and no action on the subject had occurred in the House of Representatives. These facts were known in Paris prior to the 28th of March, 1835, when the committee, to whom the bill of indemnification had been referred, reported it to the Chamber of Deputies. That committee substantially re-echoed the sentiments of the ministry, declared that Congress had set aside the proposition of the President, and recommended the passage of the bill, without any other restriction than that originally proposed. Thus was it known to the French ministry and chambers that if the position assumed by them, and which had been so frequently and solemnly announced as the only one compatible with the honor of France, was maintained, and the bill passed as originally proposed, the money would he paid, and there would be an end of this unfortunate controversy.

"But this cheering prospect was soon destroyed by an amendment introduced into the bill at the moment of its passage, providing that the money should not be paid until the French government had received satisfactory explanations of the President's message of the 2d December, 1834; and, what is still more extraordinary, the president of the council of ministers adopted this amendment, and consented to its incorpora-tion in the bill. In regard to a supposed insult which had been formally resented by the recall of their minister, and the offer of passports to ours, they now, for the first time, proposed to ask explanations. Sentiments and propositions, which they had declared could not justly be imputed to the government or people of the United States, are set up as obstacles to the performance of an act of conceded justice to that government and people. They had de-clared that the honor of France required the fulfilment of the engagement into which the King had entered, unless Congress adopted the recommendations of the message. They ascertained that Congress did not adopt them, and yet that fulfilment is refused, unless they first obtain from the President explanations of an opinion characterized by themselves as personal and inoperative."

Having thus traced the controversy down to the point on which it hung—no payment without an apology first made—the President took up this condition as a new feature in the case presenting national degradation on one side, and twenty-five millions of francs on the other—and declared his determination to submit to no dishonor, and repulsed the apology as a stain upon the national character; and concluded this head of his message with saying:

"In any event, however, the principle involved in the new aspect which has been given to the controversy is so vitally important to the independent administration of the government, that it can neither be surrendered nor compromitted without national degradation. I hope it is unnecessary for me to say that such a sarri will not be made through any agency of m The honor of my country shall never be staby an apology from me for the statement truth and the performance of duty; nor ca give any explanation of my official acts, even such as is due to integrity and justice, and sistent with the principles on which our ine tutions have been framed. This determine will, I am confident, be approved by my on stituents. I have indeed studied their chine to but little purpose, if the sum of twenty-millions of francs will have the weight d feather in the estimation of what appertant their national independence: and if, unhapped a different impression should at any time tain, in any quarter, they will, I am sure, round the government of their choice with rity and unanimity, and silence for ever the grading imputation."

The loss of the fortification bill at the pressure session, had been a serious interruption to system of defences, and an injury to the cour in that point of view, independently of itselupon our relations with France. A system general and permanent fortification of the cannot harbors had been adopted at the close the war of 1812; and throughout our extended frontier were many works in different dependence of completion, the stoppage of which involuses and destruction, as well as delay, in indispensable work. Looking at the loss of bill in this point of view, the President sai:

"Much loss and inconvenience have been perienced, in consequence of the failure of bill containing the ordinary appropriations fortifications which passed one branch of national legislature at the last session, but lost in the other. This failure was the n regretted, not only because it necessarily in runted and delayed the progress of a system national defence, projected immediately after last war, and since steadily pursued, but because it contained a contingent appropriate inserted in accordance with the views of Executive, in aid of this important object, other branches of the national defence portions of which might have been most use applied during the past season. The plan for the removal of the Indians to the est of the Mississippi being now in successful ogress and having well nigh reached its conmmation, the President took the occasion, hile communicating that gratifying fact, to ake an authentic exposition of the humane olicy which had governed the United States in opting this policy. He showed that it was ill more for the benefit of the Indians than at of the white population who were relieved their presence—that besides being fully paid all the lands they abandoned, and receiving nuities often amounting to thirty dollars head, and being inducted into the arts of civild life, they also received in every instance ore land than they abandoned, of better quality. tter situated for them from its frontier situan, and in the same parallels of latitude. This rion of his message will be read with particugratification by all persons of humane dissitions, and especially so by all candid perswho had been deluded into the belief of ustice and oppression practised upon these ple. He said:

The plan of removing the aboriginal people o ret remain within the settled portions of United States, to the country west of the sissippi River, approaches its consummation. the condition of this race, and ought to be sisted in till the object is accomplished, and secuted with as much vigor as a just regard their circumstances will permit, and as fast their consent can be obtained. All preceding ements for the improvement of the Indians cailed. It seems now to be an established that they cannot live in contact with a cived community and prosper. Ages of fruitless eavors have, at length, brought us to a knowe of this principle of intercommunication them. The past we cannot recall, but the re we can provide for. Independently of the ty stipulations into which we have entered the various tribes, for the usufructuary ts they have ceded to us, no one can doubt moral duty of the government of the United es to protect, and, if possible, to preserve perpetuate, the scattered remnants of this which are left within our borders. In the harge of this duty, an extensive region in West has been assigned for their permanent ence. It has been divided into districts, allotted among them. Many have already oved, and others are preparing to go; and the exception of two small bands, living in ary to call the subject to your special con-gration." and of the Cherokees, all the tribes on the east side of the Mississim. Michigan to Florida, have entered into engagements which will lead to their transplantation.

"The plan for their removal and re-establishment is founded upon the knowledge we have gained of their character and habits, and has been dictated by a spirit of enlarged liberality. A territory exceeding in extent that relinquished, has been granted to each tribe. Of its climate, fertility, and capacity to support an Indian population, the representations are highly favorable. To these districts the Indians are removed at the expense of the United States, and with certain supplies of clothing, arms, ammunition, and other indispensable articles, they are also furnished gratuitously with provisions for the period of a year after their arrival at their new homes. In that time, from the nature of the country, and of the products raised by them, they can subsist themselves by agricultural labor, if they choose to resort to that mode of life. If they do not, they are upon the skirts of the great prairies, where countless herds of buffalo roam, and a short time suffices to adapt their own habits to the changes which a change of the animals destined for their food may require. Ample arrangements have also been made for the support of schools. In some instances, council-houses and churches are to be erected, dwellings constructed for the chiefs, and mills for common use. Funds have been set apart for the maintenance of the poor. The most necessary mechanical arts have been introduced. and blacksmiths, gunsmiths, wheelwrights, millwrights, &c. are supported among them. Steel and iron, and sometimes salt, are purchased for them, and ploughs and other farming utensils domestic animals, looms, spinning-wheels, cars, &c., are presented to them. And besides these beneficial arrangements, annuities are in all cases paid, amounting in some instances to more than thirty dollars for each individual of the tribe; and in all cases sufficiently great, if justly divided, and prudently expended, to enable them, in addition to their own exertions, to live comfortably. And as a stimulus for exertion, it is now provided by law, that, "in all cases of the appointment of interpreters, or other persons employed for the benefit of the Indian, a preference shall be given to persons of Indian descent, if such can be found who are properly qualified for the discharge of the duties.

The effect of the revival of the gold currency was a subject of great congratulation with the President, and its influence was felt in every department of industry. Near twenty millions of dollars had entered the country-a sum far above the average circulation of the Bank of the United States in its best days, and a currency of a kind to diffuse itself over the country, and and Indiana, not exceeding 1,500 persons, remain where there was a demand for it, and for which, different from a bank paper currency, no interest was paid for its use, and no danger incurred of its becoming useless. He thus referred to this gratifying circumstance:

"Connected with the condition of the finances, and the flourishing state of the country in all its branches of industry, it is pleasing to witness the advantages which have been already derived from the recent laws regulating the value of the gold coinage. These advantages will be more apparent in the course of the next year, when the branch mints authorized to be established in North Carolina, Georgia, and Louisiana. shall have gone into operation. Aided, as it is noped they will be, by further reforms in the banking systems of the States, and by judicious regulations on the part of Congress in relation to the custody of the public moneys, it may be confidently anticipated that the use of gold and silver as a circulating medium will become general in the ordinary transactions connected with the labor of the country. The great desideratum, in modern times, is an efficient check upon the power of banks, preventing that excessive issue of paper whence arise those fluctuations in the standard of value which render uncertain the rewards of labor. It was supposed by those who established the Bank of the United States, that, from the credit given to it by the custody of the public moneys, and other privileges, and the precautions taken to guard against the evils which the country had suffered in the bankruptcy of many of the State institutions of that period, we should derive from that institution all the security and benefits of a sound currency, and every good end that was attainable under that provision of the constitution which authorizes Congress alone to coin money and regulate the value thereof. But it is searcely necessary now to say that these anticipations have not been realized. After the extensive embarrassment and distress recently produced by the Bank of the United States, from which the country is now recovering, aggravated as they were by pretensions to power which defied the public authority, and which, if acquiesced in by the people, would have changed the whole character of our government, every candid and intelligent individual must admit that, for the attainment of the great advantages of a sound currency, we must look to a course of legislation radically different from that which created such an insti-

Railroads were at this time still in their infancy in the United States; they were but few in number and comparatively feeble; but the nature of a monopoly is the same under all circumstances; and the United States, in their postoffice department, had begun to feel the effects of the extortion and overbearing of monopolizing companies, clothed with chartered privileges in- lation to the post-office department, I must tended to be for the public as well as prin advantage, but usually perverted to purpose self enrichment, and of oppression. The evil already become so serious as to require the tention of Congress; and the President thus commended the subject to its consideration:

"Particular attention is solicited to that w tion of the report of the postmaster-rewhich relates to the carriage of the mails of United States upon railroads constructed private corporations under the authority of several States. The reliance which the cen government can place on those roads as a me of carrying on its operations, and the principon which the use of them is to be obtained not too soon be considered and settled. Alm does the spirit of monopoly begin to exhibit natural propensities in attempts to exact the public, for services which it supposes be obtained on other terms, the most extraracompensation. If these claims be persisted the question may arise whether a combination of citizens, acting under charters of incorpora from the States, can, by a direct refusal or demand of an exorbitant price, exclude the li ted States from the use of the established nels of communication between the affer sections of the country; and whether the lim States cannot, without transcending their stitutional powers, secure to the post-office partment the use of those roads, by an at Congress which shall provide within itself a equitable mode of adjusting the amount of m pensation. To obviate, if possible, the neces of considering this question, it is suggestion whether it be not expedient to fix, by law, amounts which shall be offered to railroad panies for the conveyance of the mails, grain ed according to their average weight, to be certained and declared by the postmaster ral. It is probable that a liberal proposition that sort would be accepted."

The subject of slavery took a new turn of turbance between the North and South this time. The particular form of announce which it now wore was that of the transmis into the slave States, through the United & mail, of incendiary publications, tending to cite servile insurrections. Societies, individual and foreigners were engaged in this diabil work-as injurious to the slaves by the far restrictions which it brought upon them, the owners whose lives and property were dangered. rite your attention to the painful excitement reduced in the South by attempts to circulate breigh the mails inflammatory appeals addressed the passions of the slaves, in prints, and in rious sorts of publications, calculated to stimuwe them to insurrection, and to produce all the orors of a servile war. There is doubtless no speciable portion of our countrymen who can so far misled, as to feel any other sentiment han that of indignant regret at conduct so deructive of the harmony and peace of the couny, and so repugnant to the principles of our donal compact and to the dictates of humanity of religion. Our happiness and prosperity sentially depend upon peace within our bors: and peace depends upon the maintenance. good faith, of those compromises of the conitution upon which the Union is founded. It fortunate for the country that the good sense, e generous feeling, and the deep-rooted attachnt of the people of the non-slaveholding States, the Union, and to their fellow-citizens of the me blood in the South, have given so strong dimpressive a tone to the sentiments enterned against the proceedings of the misguided rons who have engaged in these unconstitu-nal and wicked attempts, and especially inst the emissaries from foreign parts, who redared to interfere in this matter, as to aurize the hope that those attempts will no errise persisted in. But if these expressions the public will, shall not be sufficient to effect desirable a result, not a doubt can be enterned that the non-slaveholding States, so far countenancing the slightest interference h the constitutional rights of the South, will prompt to exercise their authority in supssing, so far as in them lies, whatever is cal-ated to produce this evil. In leaving the of other branches of this interesting subto the State authorities, to whom they proly belong, it is nevertheless proper for Cons to take such measures as will prevent the office department, which was designed to r an amicable intercourse and correspondbetween all the members of the confederfrom being used as an instrument of an op-te character. The general government, to th the great trust is confided of preserving plate the relations created among the States, he constitution, is especially bound to avoid s own action any thing that may disturb I would, therefore, call the special attenof Congress to the subject, and respectfully est the propriety of passing such a law as prohibit, under severe penalties, the circun in the Southern States, through the mail, cendiary publications intended to instigate laves to insurrection."

e President in this impressive paragraph s a just distinction between the conduct sguided men, and of wicked emissaries, enand the patriotic people of the non-slaveholding States who discountenance their work and repress their labors. The former receive the brand of reprobation, and are pointed out for criminal legislation: the latter receive the applause due to good citizens.

The President concludes this message, as he had done many others, with a recurrence to the necessity, of reform in the mode of electing the two first officers of the Republic. His convictions must have been deep and strong thus to bring him back so many times to the fundamental point of direct elections by the people, and total suppression of all intermediate agencies. He says:

"I felt it to be my duty in the first message which I communicated to Congress, to urge upon its attention the propriety of amending that part of the constitution which provides for the election of the President and the Vice-President of the United States. The leading object which I had in view was the adoption of some new pro vision, which would secure to the people that performance of this high duty, without any intermediate agency. In my annual communica tions since, I have enforced the same views. from a sincere conviction that the best interests of the country would be promoted by their adoption. If the subject were an ordinary one. I should have regarded the failure of Congress to act upon it, as an indication of their judgment, that the disadvantages which belong to the present system were not so great as those which would result from any attainable substitute that had been submitted to their consideration. Recollecting, however, that propositions to introduce a new feature in our fundamental laws cannot be too patiently examined, and ought not to be received with favor, until the great body of the people are thoroughly impressed with their necessity and value, as a remedy for real evils, I feel that in renewing the recommendation I have heretofore made on this subject, I am not transcending the bounds of a just deference to the sense of Congress, or to the disposition of the people. However much we may differ in the choice of the measures which should guide the administration of the government, there can be but little doubt in the minds of those who are really friendly to the republican features of our system, that one of its most important securities consists in the separation of the legislative and executive powers, at the same time that each is held responsible to the great source of authority, which is acknowledged to be supreme, in the will of the people constitutionally expressed. My reflection and experience satisfy me, that the framers of the constitution, although they were anxious to mark this feature as a settled and fixed principle in in disturbing the harmony of the Union, the structure of the government, did not adopt all the precautions that were necessary to secure its practical observance, and that we cannot be said to have carried into complete effect their intentions until the evils which arise from this organic defect are remedied. All history tells us that a free people should be watchful of delegated power, and should never acquiesce in a practice which will diminish their control over it. This obligation, so universal in its application to all the principles of a Republic, is peculiarly so in ours, where the formation of parties, founded on sectional interests, is so much fostered by the extent of our territory. These interests, represented by candidates for the Presidency, are constantly prone, in the zeal of party and selfish objects, to generate influences, unmindful of the general good, and forgetful of the restraints which the great body of the people would enforce, if they were, in no contingency, to lose the right of expressing their will. The experience of our country from the formation of the government to the present day, demonstrates that the people cannot too soon adopt some stronger safeguard for their right to elect the highest officers known to the constitution, than is contained in that sacred instrument as it now stands."

CHAPTER CXXX.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. Buchanan presented the memorial of the religious society of "Friends," in the State of Pennsylvania, adopted at their Caln quarterly meeting, requesting Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade, in the District of Columbia. He said the memorial did not emanate from fanatics, endeavoring to disturb the peace and security of society in the Southern States, by the distribution of incendiary publications, but from a society of Christians, whose object had always been to promote good-will and peace among men. It was entitled to respect from the character of the memorialists; but he dissented from the opinion which they expressed and the request which they made. The constitution recognized slavery; it existed here; was found here when the District was ceded to the United States; the slaves here were the property of the inhabitants; and he was opposed to the disturbance of their rights. Congress had no right to interfere with slavery in the States. That was determined in the first Congress that ever sat- | diary societies and individuals within them:

in the Congress which commenced in 1789 .. ended in 1791 - and in the first session of the Congress. The Religious Society of Friend then petitioned Congress against slavery, and was resolved, in answer to that petition the Congress had no authority to interfere in emancipation of slaves, or with their treatment in any of the States: and that was the ansm still to be given. He then adverted to the cumstances under which the memorial was m sented. A number of fanatics, led on by ferri incendiaries, have been scattering firebre through the Southern States-publications pictures exciting the slaves to revolt, and to destruction of their owners. Instead of le fiting the slaves by this conduct, they do the the greatest injury, causing the bonds to drawn tighter upon them; and postponing em cipation even in those States which might en tually contemplate it. These were his opinion on slavery, and on the prayer of this memorial He was opposed to granting the prayer, but w in favor of receiving the petition as the one had been received, in 1790, and giving its same answer; and, he had no doubt with same happy effect of putting an end to a applications, and giving peace and quiet to country. He could not vote for the motion the senator from South Carolina, Mr. Calle to reject it. He thought rejection would flame the question: reception and condemna would quiet it. Mr. Calhoun had moved to ject all petitions of the kind-not reject a their merits, after consideration, but bei hand, when presented for reception. This the starting point of a long and acrimoin contest in the two Houses of Congress, in which the right of petition was maintained on one and the good policy of quieting the question reception and rejection: on the other side, its held that the rights, the peace, and the did of the States required all anti-slavery petis to be repulsed, at the first presentation, with reception or consideration. The author of View aspired to no lead in conducting this tion; he thought it was one to be settled policy; that is to say, in the way that we soonest quiet it. He thought there was to line of distinction between mistaken pl thropists, and mischievous incendiaries-all tween the free States themselves and the

took an early moment to express these opinions in order to set up the line between what was nistake and what was crime—and between the cts of individuals, on one hand, and of States, a the other; and in that sense delivered the taleging speech:

bllowing speech : "Mr. Benton rose to express his concurrence the suggestion of the senator from Pennsylania (Mr. Buchanan), that the consideration this subject be postponed until Monday. It d come up suddenly and unexpectedly to-day. d the postponement would give an opportunity renators to reflect, and to confer together, d to conclude what was best to be done, where were united it wishing the same end, namely, allay, and not to produce, excitement. He d risen for this purpose; but, being on his t he would say a few words on the general bject, which the presentation of these petins had so suddenly and unexpectedly brought With respect to the petitioners, and those th whom they acted, he had no doubt but at many of them were good people, aiming at nevolent objects, and endeavoring to ameliorthe condition of one part of the human race, hout inflicting calamities on another part; they were mistaken in their mode of proding; and so far from accomplishing any part their object, the whole effect of their interition was to aggravate the condition of those whose behalf they were interfering. re was another part, and he meant to speak he abolitionists, generally, as the body coning the part of which he spoke; there was ther part whom he could not qualify as good ple, seeking benevolent ends by mistaken ns, but as incendiaries and agitators, with olical objects in view, to be accomplished by ed and deplorable means. He did not go the proofs now to establish the correctness of pinion of this latter class, but he presamed ould be admitted that every attempt to work the passions of the slaves, and to excite to murder their owners, was a wicked and lical attempt, and the work of a midnight diary. Pictures of slave degradation and y, and of the white man's luxury and cruwere attempts of this kind; for they were Is to the vengeance of slaves, and not to atelligence or reason of those who legisfor them. He (Mr. B.) had had many es of this kind, as well as many diabolical publications, sent to him on this subject, during the last summer; the whole of which he had cast into the fire, and should not have thought of referring to the circumstance at this time, as displaying the character of the incendiary part of the abolitionists, had he not, within these few days past, and while abolition petitions were pouring into the other end of the Capitol, received one of these pictures, the design of which could be nothing but mischief of the blackest dye. It was a print from an engraving (and Mr. B. exhibited it, and handed it to senators near him), representing a large and spreading tree of liberty, beneath whose ample shade a slave owner was at one time luxuriously reposing, with slaves fanning him; at another, carried forth in a palanguin, to view the half-naked laborers in the cotton field, whom drivers, with whips, were scourging to the task. The print was evidently from the abolition mint, and came to him by some other conveyance than that of the mail, for there was no post-mark of any kind to identify its origin, and to indicate its line of march. For what purpose could such a picture be intended, unless to inflame the passions of slaves? And why engrave it, except to multiply copies for extensive distribution? But it was not pictures alone that operated upon the passions of the slaves, but speeches, publications, petitions presented in Congress, and the whole machinery of abolition societies. None of these things went to the understandings of the slaves, but to their passions, all imperfectly understood, and inspiring vague hopes, and stimulating abortive and fatal insurrections. Societies, especially, were the foundation of the greatest mischiefs. Whatever might be their objects, the slaves never did, and never can, understand them but in one way: as allies organized for action, and ready to march to their aid on the first signal of insurrection! It was thus that the massacre of San Domingo was made. The society in Paris, Les Amis des Noirs, Friends of the Blacks, with its affiliated societies throughout France and in London, made that massacre. And who composed that society? In the beginning, it comprised the extremes of virtue and of vice; it contained the best and the basest of human kind! Lafayette and the Abbé Gregoire, those purest of philanthropists; and Marat and Anacharsis Clootz, those imps of hell in human shape. In the end (for all such societies run the same career of degeneration), the good men, disgusted with their associates, retired from the scene; and the wicked ruled at pleasure. Declamations against slavery, publications in gazettes, pictures, petitions to the constituent assembly, were the mode of proceeding; and the fish-women of Parishe said it with humiliation, because American females had signed the petitions now before us -the fish-women of Paris, the very poissardes from the quays of the Seine, became the obstreperous champions of West India emancipation. The effect upon the French islands is known to the world; but what is not known to the world, or not sufficiently known to it, is that the same societies which wrapt in flames and drenched in blood the beautiful island, which was then a garden and is now a wilderness, were the means of exciting an insurrection upon our own continent: in Louisiana, where a French slave population existed, and where the language of Les Amis des Noirs could be understood, and where their emissaries could glide. The knowledge of this event (Mr. B. said) ought to be better known, both to show the danger of these societies, however distant, and though oceans may roll between them and their victims, and the fate of the slaves who may be excited to insurrection by them on any part of the American continent. He would read the notice of the event from the work of Mr. Charles Gayarre, lately elected by his native State to a seat on this floor, and whose resignation of that honor he sincerely regretted, and particularly for the cause which occasioned it, and which abstracted talent from a station that it would have adorned. Mr. B. read from the work, 'Essai Historique sur la Louisiane: 'The white population of Louisiana was not the only part of the population which was agitated by the French revolution. The blacks, encouraged without doubt by the success which their race had obtained in San Pomingo, dreamed of liberty, and sought to shake off the yoke. The insurrection was planned at Pointe Coupeé, which was then an isolated parish, and in which the number of slaves was considerable. The conspiracy took birth on the plantation of Mr. Julien Poydras, a rich planter, who was then travelling in the United States, and spread itself rapidly throughout the parish. The death of all the whites was re-Happily the conspirators could not agree upon the day for the massacre; and from this disagreement resulted a quarrel, which led to the discovery of the plot. The militia of tie parish immediately took arms, and the Barra de Carondelet caused them to be supported by the troops of the line. It was resolved to an rest, and to punish the principal conspirators The slaves opposed it; but they were quickly dispersed, with the loss of twenty of their number killed on the spot. Fifty of the insurgent were condemned to death. Sixteen were encuted in different parts of the parish; the rest were put on board a galley and hung at intevals, all along the river, as far as New Orleans (a distance of one hundred and fifty miles) The severity of the chastisement intimidated the blacks, and all returned to perfect order.'

"Resuming his remarks, Mr. B. said he had read this passage to show that our white perlation had a right to dread, nay, were bound in dread, the mischievous influence of these eties, even when an ocean intervened, and mu more when they stood upon the same hems phere, and within the bosom of the same country He had also read it to show the miserable fate their victims, and to warn all that were an and virtuous-all that were honest, but mistale -in the three hundred and fifty affiliated a cieties, vaunted by the individuals who str themselves their executive committee, and wh date, from the commercial emporium of Union, their high manifesto against the Par dent; to warn them at once to secede from sociations which, whatever may be their design can have no other effect than to revive in Southern States the tragedy, not of San Domi go, but of the parish of Pointe Coupeé.

They had caused the privi s to be curtailed, and their book ghtly drawn. Nor was the mis of their conduct confined to slaves; it reached the free colored people, and opened a sudden gulf of misery to that population. In all the slave States, this population has paid the forfeit of their intermediate position; and suffered proseription as the instruments, real or suspected, of the bolition societies. In all these States, their godus had either been enforced or was impending. In Missouri there was a clause in the contitution which prohibited their emigration to the State; but that clause had remained a dead leter in the book until the agitation produced among the slaves by the distant rumbling of the sbolition thunder, led to the knowledge in some instances, and to the belief in others, that these people were the antennæ of the abolitionists; and their medium for communicating with the slaves, and for exciting them to desertion first, and to insurrection eventually. Then ensued a painful seenc. The people met, resolved, and prescribed thirty days for the exodus of the obnoxious caste. Under that decree a general emigration had to take place at the commencement of winter. Many worthy and industrious people had to quit their business and their homes, and to ro forth under circumstances which rendered them objects of suspicion wherever they went. and sealed the door against the acquisition of new friends while depriving them of the protection of old ones. He (Mr. B.) had witnessed many instances of this kind, and had given cerificates to several, to show that they were banshed, not for their offences, but for their misortunes; for the misfortune of being villed to he race which the abolition societies had made he object of their gratuitous philanthropy.

"Having said thus much of the abolition soicties in the non-slaveholding States, Mr. B. urned, with pride and exultation, to a different meme-the conduct of the great body of the cople in all these States. Before he saw that onduct, and while the black question, like a ortentous cloud was gathering and darkening the Northeastern horizon, he trembled, not rthe South, but for the Union. He feared at he saw the fatal work of dissolution about begin, and the bonds of this glorious confedacy about to snap; but the conduct of the eat body of the people in all the non-slavehold-States quickly dispelled that fear, and in its ce planted deep the strongest assurance of the mony and indivisibility of the Union which some for and some against the reception, accord

he had felt for many years. Their conduct was above all praise, above all thanks, above all gratitude. They had chased off the foreign emissar' silenced the gabbling tongues of female dup. and dispersed the assemblages, whether fanatical, visionary, or incendiary, of all that congregated to preach against evils which afflicted others, not them; and to propose remedies to aggravate the disease which they pretended to cure. They had acted with a noble spirit. They had exerted a vigor beyond all law. They had obeyed the enactments, not of the statute book, but of the heart; and while that spirit was in the heart, he cared nothing for laws written in a book. He would rely upon that spirit to complete the good work it has begun; to dry up these societies; to separate the mistaken philanthropist from the reckless fanatic and the wicked incendiary, and put an end to publications and petitions which, whatever may be their design, can have no other effect than to impede the object which they invoke, and to aggravate the evil which they de-

"Turning to the immediate question before the Senate, that of the rejection of the petitions, Mr. B. said his wish was to give that vote which would have the greatest effect in putting down these societies. He thought the vote to be given to be rather one of expediency than of constitutional obligation. The clause in the constitution so often quoted in favor of the right of petitioning for a redress of grievances would seem to him to apply rather to the grievances felt by ourselves than to those felt by others, and which others might think an advantage, what wo thought a grievance. The petitioners from Ohio think it a grievance that the people of the District of Columbia should suffer the institution of slavery, and pray for the redress of that grievance; the people of the District think the institution an advantage, and want no redress; now, which has the right of petitioning? Looking to the past action of the Senate, Mr. B. saw that, about thirty years ago, a petition against slavery, and that in the States, was presented to this body by the society of Quakers in Pennsylvania and New Jersey; and that the same question upon its reception was made, and decided by yeas and nays, 19 to 9, in favor of receiving it. He read the names, to show that the senators from the slave and non-slaveholding States voted ing to each one's opinion, and not according to the position or the character of the State from which he came. Mr. B. repeated that he thought this question to be one of expediency, and that it was expedient to give the vote which would go furthest towards quieting the public mind. The quieting the South depended upon quieting the North; for when the abolitionists were put down in the former place, the latter would be at ease. It seemed to him, then, that the gentlemen of the non-slaveholding States were the proper persons to speak first. They knew the temper of their own constituents best, and what might have a good or an ill effect upon them, either to increase the abolition fever, or to allay it. He knew that the feeling of the Senate was general; that all wished for the same end; and the senators of the North as cordially as those of the South."

CHAPTER CXXXI.

MAIL CIRCULATION OF INCENDIARY PUBLICA-TIONS.

MR. CALHOUN moved that so much of the President's message as related to the mail transmission of incendiary publications be referred to a select committee. Mr. King, of Alabama, opposed the motion, urging that the only way that Congress could interfere would be by a postoffice regulation; and that all such regulation properly referred itself to the committee on post-offices and post-roads. He did not look to the particular construction of the committee. but had no doubt the members of that committee could see the evil of these incendiary transmissions through the mails, and would provide a remedy which they should deem constitutional, proper and adequate; and he expressed a fear that, by giving the subject too much importance, an excitement might be got up. Mr. Calhoun replied that the Senator from Alabama had mistaken his object-that it was not to produce any unnecessary excitement, but to adopt such a course as would secure a committee which would calmly and dispassionately go into an examination of the whole subject; which would investigate the character of those publications. to ascertain whether they were incendiary or not; and, if so, on that ground to put a check on their transmission through the mails, lie could not but express his astonishment at the objection which had been taken to his motion for he knew that the Senator from Alabama felt that deep interest in the subject which ler, vaded the feelings of every man in the South He believed that the post-office committee would be fully occupied with the regular business which would be brought before them; and it was this consideration, and no party feeling, which had induced him to make his motion. Mr. Grundy, chairman of the committee on post-offices and post-roads, said that his position was such as to have imposed silence upon him, if that silence might not have been misunderstood. In rentr to the objection that a majority of the committee were not from the slave States, that circum stance might be an advantage; it might give the greater weight to their action, which it was known would be favorable to the object of the motion. He would say that the federal government could do but little on this subject except through a post-office regulation, and thereby aiding the efficiency of the State laws. Jie did not desire to see any power exercised which would have the least tendency to interfere with the sovereignty of the States. Mr. Calhoun adhering to his desire for a select committee and expressing his belief that a great constitutional question was to be settled, and that the crisis required calmness and firmness, and the action of a committee that came mainly from the endangered part of the Union-his request was granted; and a committee of five appointed composed as he desired; namely, Mr. Calhonn chairman, Mr. King of Georgia, Mr. Mangun of North Carolina, Mr. Davis of Massachusetts and Mr. Lewis F. Linn of Missouri. A bill and a report were soon brought in by the committee -a bill subjecting to penalties any post-master who should knowingly receive and put into the mail any publication, or picture touching the subject of slavery, to go into any State or ter ritory in which the circulation of such publiction, or picture, should be forbid by the State laws. When the report was read Mr. Mangun moved the printing of 5000 extra copies of it This motion brought a majority of the committee to their feet, to disclaim their assent to part of the report; and to absolve themselves from responsibility for its contents. A conversation delate ensued on this point, on which Mr. Davis, Messrs, King of Alabama and Georgia, Mr. Linn and Mr. Calhoun thus expressed themselves:

"Mr. Davis said that, as a motion had been made to print the paper purporting to be a rejort from the select committee of which he was a member, he would remark that the views contained in it did not entirely meet his approbation, though it contained many things which he approved of. He had risen for no other purpose than to make this statement, lest the impression should go abroad with the report that he assented to those portions of it which did not meet his approbation."

"Mr. King, of Georgia, said that, lest the same misunderstanding should go forth with respect to his views, he must state that the report was not entirely assented to by himself. However, the gentieman from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun), in making this report, had already stated that the majority of the committee did not agree to the whole of it, though many parts of it were concurred in by all."

"Mr. Davis said he would add further, that he might have taken the usual course, and made an additional report, containing all his views on the subject, but thought it hardly worth while, and he had contented himself with making the statement that he had just made."

"Mr. King, of Alabama, said this was a departure from the usual course-by it a minority might dissent; and yet, when the report was published, it would seem to be a report of the committee of the Senate, and not a report of two members of it. It was proper that the whole matter should go together with the bill, that the report submitted by the minority might be read with the bill, to show that the reading of the report was not in conflict with the principles of the bill reported. He thought the sen-stor from North Carolina (Mr. Mangum) had better modify his motion, so as to have the report and bill published together."

"Mr. Linn remarked that, being a member of the committee, it was but proper for him to say that he had assented to several parts of the report, though he did not concur with it in all its parts. Should it become necessary, he would, when the subject again came before the Senate, explain in what particulars he had coincided with the views given in the report, and how far he had dissented from them. The bill, he said, had met with his approbation."

"Mr. Calhoun said he hoped his friend from North Carolina would modify his motion, so as to include the printing of the bill with the report. It would be seen, by comparing both toether, that there was no non sequitur in the bill, coming as it did after this report."

"Mr. King, of Alabama, had only stated his appressions from hearing the report and bill quiesced in by the committee, and that the bill should be adverse to it."

"Mr. Davis said the report was, as he understood it to be read from the chair, the report of the committee. He had spoken for himself only, and for nobody clse, lest the impression might go abroad that he concurred in all parts of the report, when he dissented from some of them."

"Mr. Calhonn said that a unjority of the committee did not concur in the report, though there were two members of it, himself and the gentleman from North Carolina, who concurred throughout; three other gentlemen concurred with the greater part of the report, though they dissented from some parts of it; and two gentlemen concurred also with some parts of it. As to the bill, two of the committee would have preferred a different one, though they had rather have that than none at all; another gentleman was opposed to it altogether. The bill, however, was a natural consequence of the report, and the two did not disagree with each other."

The parts of the report which were chiefly exceptionable were two: 1. The part which related to the nature of the federal government, as being founded in "compact;" which was the corner-stone of the doctrine of nullification, and its corollary that the laws of nations were in full force between the several States, as sovereign and independent communities except as modifled by the compact; 2. The part that argued, as upon a subsisting danger, the evils by an abolition of slavery in the slave States by interference from other States. On the first of there points the report said:

"That the States which form our Federal Union are sovereign and independent communities, bound together by a constitutional compact, and are possessed of all the powers belonging to distinct and separate States, excepting such as are delegated to be exercised by the general government, is assumed as unquestionable. The compact itself expressly provides that all powers not delegated are reserved to the States and the people. To ascertain, then, whether the power in question is delegated or reserved, it is only necessary to ascertain whether it is to be found among the enumerated powers or not. If it be not among them, it belongs, of course, to the reserved powers. On turning to the constitution, it will be seen that, while the power of defending the country against external danger is found among the enumerated, the instrument is wholly silent as to the power of defending the internal peace and security of the States; and of course, reserves to the States this important power, as it stood before the adoption of the constitution, with no rd. It appeared to him unusual that a report other limitation, as has been stated, except such hould be made by a minority, and merely aclass are expressly prescribed by the instrument itself. From what has been stated, it may be interred that the right of a State to defend itself nearinst internal dangers is a part of the great, primary, and inherent right of self-defence, which, by the laws of nature, belongs to all communities; and so jealous were the States of this essential right, without which their independence could not be preserved, that it is expressly provided by the constitution, that the general government shall not assist a State, even in case of domestic violence, except on the application of the authorities of the State it:elf; thus excluding, by a necessary consequence, its interference in all other cases.

"Having now shown that it belongs to the slaveholding States, whose institutions are in danger, and not to Congress, as is supposed by the message, to determine what papers are incendiary and intended to excite insurrection among the slaves, it remains to inquire, in the next place, what are the corresponding duties of the general government, and the other States. from within whose limits and jurisdiction their institutions are attacked; a subject intimately connected with that with which the committee are immediately charged, and which, at the present juncture, ought to be fully understood by all the parties. The committee will begin with the first. It remains next to inquire into the duty of the States from within whose limits and jurisdiction the internal peace and security of the slaveholding States are endangered. In order to comprehend more fully the nature and extent of their duty, it will be necessary to make a few remarks on the relations which exist between the States of our Federal Union, with the rights and obligations reciprocally resulting from such relations. It has already been stated that the States which compose our Federal Union are sovereign and independent communities, united by a constitutional compact. Among its members the laws of nations are in full force and obligation, except as altered or modified by the compact; and, of course, the States possess, with that exception, all the rights, and are subject to all the duties, which separate and distinct communities possess, or to which they are subject. Among these are comprehended the obligation which all States are under to prevent their citizens from disturbing the peace or endangering the security of other States; and in case of being disturbed or endangered, the right of the latter to demand of the former to adopt such measures as will prevent their recurrence, and if refused or neglected, to resort to such measures as its protection may require. This right remains, of course, in force among the States of this Union, with such limitations as are imposed expressly by the constitution. Within their limits, the rights of the slaveholding States are as full to demand of the States within whose limits and jurisdiction their peace is assailed, to adopt the measures necessary to prevent the same, and if refused or neglected, to resort to means to protect themselves, as if they were separate and independent commonities."

This part of the report was that which, in founding the federal government in compact, as under the old articles of the confederation, and in bringing the law of nations to apply between the States as independent and sovereign communities, except where limited by the compact was supposed to contain the doctrine of mullification and secession; and the concluding part of the report is an argument in favor of the course recommended in the Crisis in the event that New-York, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania did not suppress the abolition societies. The report continues:

"Their professed object is the emancipation of slaves in the Southern States, which they propose to accomplish through the agencies of organized societies, spread throughout the nonslaveholding States, and a powerful press, directed mainly to excite, in the other States. hatred and abhorrence against the institutions and citizens of the slaveholding States, by aldresses, lectures, and pictorial representations abounding in false and exaggerated statements If the magnitude of the mischief affords, in an degree, the measure by which to judge of the criminality of a project, few have ever been devised to be compared with the present, whether the end be regarded, or the means by which it is proposed to be accomplished. The blindness of fanaticism is proverbial. With more zeal than understanding, it constantly misconceives the nature of the object at which it aims, and towards which it rushes with headlong violence regardless of the means by which it is to be effected. Never was its character more fully exemplified than in the present instance. Set ting out with the abstract principle that slaver is an evil, the fanatical zealots come at once to the conclusion that it is their duty to abolish it regardless of all the disasters which must fillow. gards slavery in those States simply ation of master and slave as in at relation is, viewed merely un cuestion of property to the slaveholding section the Union, has a very imperfect conception of in institution, and the impossibility of abolishog it without disasters unexampled in the hispry of the world. To understand its nature and importance fully, it must be borne in mind dat slavery, as it exists in the Southern States oncluding under the Southern all the slaveholding States), involves not only the relation of master and slave, but, also, the social and political relations of two races, of nearly equal numbers, from different quarters of the globe, and the most opposite of all others in every particular that distinguishes one race of men from another. Emancipation would destroy these relations-would divest the masters of their property, and subvert the relation, social and political, that has existed between the races from almost the first settlement of the Southern States. It is not the intention of the committee to dwell on the pecuniary aspect of this vital subject, the vast amount of property involved, equal at least to $950,000,000; the rain of families and individuals; the impoverishment and prostration of an entire section of the Union, and the fatal blow that would be given to the productions of the great agricultural staples, on which the commerce, the navigation, the manu-factures, and the revenue of the country, almost ntirely depend. As great as these disasters tould be they are nothing, compared to what anst follow the subversion of the existing relaon between the two races, to which the comnittee will confine their remarks. Under this elation, the two races have long lived in peace ad prosperity, and if not disturbed, would long ontinue so to live. While the European race as rapidly increased in wealth and numbers, and the same time has maintained an equality, least, morally and intellectually, with their rethren of the non-slaveholding States; the frican race has multiplied with not less rapidity, companied by great improvement, physically intellectually, and the enjoyment of a dere of comfort with which the laboring class few countries can compare, and confessedly eatly superior to what the free people of the me race possess in the non-slaveholding States. may, indeed, be sately asserted, that there is example in history in which a savage people, that there is country, have ever advanced in the same riod so rapidly in numbers and improvement. destroy the existing relations would be to stroy this prosperity, and to place the two expulsion or extirpation of one or the other. other can be substituted, compatible with ir peace or security. The difficulty is in the easily of the races. So strongly drawn is the e between the two, in consequence of it, and strengthened by the force of habit, and edubers are so nearly equal as in the slavehold- rigid discipline and severe police, to the great

ing States, under any other relation than which now exists. Social and political equality between them is impossible. No power on earth can overcome the difficulty. The causes resist-ing lie too deep in the principles of our nature to be surmounted. But, without such equality, to change the present condition of the African race, were it possible, would be but to change the form of slavery. It would make them the slaves of the community, instead of the slaves of individuals, with less responsibility and interest in their welfare on the part of the community than is felt by their present masters; while it would destroy the security and independence of the European race, if the African should be permitted to continue in their changed condition within the limits of those States. They would look to the other States for support and protection, and would become, virtually, their allies and dependents; and would thus place in the hands of those States the most effectual instrument to destroy the influence and control the destiny of the rest of the Union. It is against this relation between the two races that the blind and criminal zeal of the abolitionists is directed-a relation that now preserves in quiet and security more than 6,500,000 of human beings, and which cannot be destroyed without destroying the peace and prosperity of nearly half the States of the Union, and involving their entire population in a deadly conflict, that must terminate either in the expulsion or extirpation of those who are the object of the misguided and false humanity of those who claim to be their friends. He must be blind, indeed, who does not perceive that the subversion of a relation which must be followed with such disastrous consequences can only be effected by convulsions that would devastate the country, burst asunder the bonds of Union, and ingulf in a sea of blood the institutions of the country. It is madness to suppose that the slaveholding States would quietly submit to be sacrificed. Every consideration-interest, duty, and humanity, the love of country, the sense of wrong, hatred of oppressors, and treacherous and faithless confederates, and thally despair-would impel them to the most dering and desperate resistance in defence of property, family, country, liberty, and existence. But wicked and cruel as is the end aimed at, it is fully equalled by the criminality of the means by which it is proposed to be accomplished. These, as has been stated, consist in organized societies and a powerful press, directed mainly with a view to excite the bitterest animosity and hatred of the people of the non-slaveholding States against the citizens and institutions of the slaveholding States. It is easy to see to what disastrous results such means must tend. Passing over the more obvious effects, their tendency to excite to insurrection and servile war, with all its horrors, and ion that it is impossible for them to exist the necessity which such tendency must impose ther in the same community, where their on the slaveholding States to resort to the most mjury of the present condition of the slaves, there remains another, threatening incalculable mischief to the country. The inevitable tendency of the means to which the abolitionists have resorted to effect their object must, if persisted in, end in completely alienating the two great sections of the Union. The incessant action of hundreds of societies, and a vast printing establishment, throwing out daily thousands of artful and inflammatory publications, must make, in time, a deep impression on the section of the Union where they freely circulate, and are mainly designed to have effect. The well-informed and thoughtful may hold them in con-tempt, but the young, the inexperienced, the ignorant, and thoughtless, will receive the poison. In process of time, when the number of proselytes is sufficiently multiplied, the artful and profligate, who are ever on the watch to seize on any means, however wicked and dangerous, will unite with the fanatics, and make their movements the basis of a powerful political party, that will seek advancement by diffusing, as widely as possible, hatred against the slaveholding States. But, as hatred begets hatred, and animosity animosity, these feelings would become reciprocal, till every vestige of attachment would cease to exist between the two sections, when the Union and the constitution, the offspring of mutual affection and confidence, would forever perish. Such is the danger to which the movements of the abolitionists expose the country. If the force of the obligation is in proportion to the magnitude of the danger, stronger cannot be imposed, than is at present, on the States within whose limits the danger originates, to arrest its further progress-a duty they owe, not only to the States whose institutions are assailed, but to the Union and constitution, as has been shown, and, it may be added, to themselves.

The insidiousness of this report was in the assumption of an actual impending danger of the abolition of slavery in all the slave States-the destruction of nine hundred and fifty millions of property-the ocean of blood to be shed-the war of extermination between two races-and the necessity for extraordinary means to prevent these dire calamities; when the fact was, that there was not one particle of any such danger. The assumption was contrary to fact: the report was inflammatory and disorganizing: and if there was any thing enigmatical in its conclusions, it was sufficiently interpreted in the contemporaneous publications in the Southern slave States, which were open in their declarations that a cause for separation had occurred, limited only by the conduct of the free States in suppressing within a given time the incendiary | Carolina in her nullification proceedings;

This limitation societies within their borders. would throw the responsibility of disunion up. on the non-slaveholding States failing to suppress these societies: for disunion, in that case was foreshadowed in another part of this report and fully avowed in contemporary Southern pullications. Thus the report said:

"Those States, on the other hand, are not only under all the obligations which independent communities would be, to adopt such measures but also under the obligation which the constitution superadds, rendered more sacred, if posible, by the fact that, while the Union imposs restrictions on the right of the slaveholding States to defend themselves, it affords the me dium through which their peace and security are assailed. It is not the intention of the committee to inquire what those restrictions are, and what are the means which, under the constitu tion, are left to the slaveholding States to protect themselves. The period has not yet come and they trust never will, when it may be me cessary to decide those questions; but come it must, unless the States whose duty it is to set. press the danger shall see in time its magnitude and the obligations which they are under to adopt speedy and effectual measures to arrestin further progress. That the full force of this obis gation may be understood by all parties, the committee propose, in conclusion, to touch brid ly on the movements of the abolitionists, with the view of showing the dangerous consequences to which they must lead if not arrested.'

These were ominous intimations, to receive their full interpretation elsewhere, and indissolve bly connecting themselves with the late disunia attitude of South Carolina—the basis of discotent only changed. Mr. King of Georgia aid that positions had been assumed and principle insisted upon by Mr. Calhoun, not only incosistent with the bill reported, but he though inconsistent with the "existence of the Union itself, and which if established and carried in practice, must hastily end in its dissolution." Me Calhoun in his reply pretty well justified the conclusions of the Georgia senator. He made in point that the non-slaveholding States had don nothing yet to suppress the incendiary societies within their limits; and joining that non-action of these States with a refusal of Congress to this bill, he looked upon it as in vain to enter security or protection for the slaveholding State except from themselves-from State interp sition, as authorized in the Virginia resolution of 1798; and as recently carried out by Said kelared that nothing was wanted but "concert" mong themselves to place their domestic instinctions, their peace and security under their own rotetion and beyond the reach of danger. All his was thus intelligibly, and ominously stated his reply to Mr. King:

-Thus far (I say it with regret) our just hopes are not been realized. The legislatures of the outh, backed by the voice their constituents pressed through innumerable meetings, have led upon the non-slaveholding States to reres the movements made within the jurisdic-on of those States against their peace and se-nity. Not a step has been taken; not a law a been passed, or even proposed; and I venre to assert that none will be; not but what ere is a favorable disposition towards us in the orth but I clearly see the state of political rties there presents insuperable impediments any legislation on the subject. I rest my inion on the fact that the non-slaveholding tes, from the elements of their population, and will continue to be, divided and distractby parties of nearly equal strength; and that h will always be ready to seize on every vement of the other which may give them the periority, without much regard to consequenas affecting their own States, and much less, ote and distant sections. Nor have we been disappointed as to the proceedings of Con-88. Believing that the general government no right or authority over the subject of rery, we had just grounds to hope Congress uld refuse all jurisdiction in reference to it, whatever form it might be presented. The y opposite course has been pursued. Aboli-petitions have not only been received in h llouses, but received on the most obnoxious dangerous of all grounds—that we are bound eccive them; that is, to take jurisdiction of question of slavery whenever the abolitionmay think proper to petition for its abolition, er here or in the States. Thus far, then, we he slaveholding States have been grievously ppointed. One question still remains to be led that is presented by this bill. To refuse ss this bill would be virtually to co-operate the abolitionists-would be to make the ers and agents of the post-office department ffect their agents and abettors in the cirtion of their incendiary publications, in vionof the laws of the States. It is your untionable duty, as I have demonstrably ed, to abstain from their violation; and, by ing or neglecting to discharge that duty, would clearly enlist, in the existing controon the side of the abolitionists against the hera States. Should such be your decision, fusing to pass this bill, I shall say to the of the South, look to yourselves—you nothing to hope from others. But I must he Senate, be your decision what it may, outh will never abandon the principles of this bill. If you refuse co-operation with our laws, and conflict should ensue between your and our law, the Southern States will never yield to the superiority of yours. We have a remedy in our hands, which, in such events, we shall not fail to apply. We have high authority for asserting that, in such cases, 'State interposition is the rightful remedy '-a doctrine first announced by Jefferson-adopted by the patriotic and republican State of Kentucky by a solemn resolution, in 1798, and finally carried out into successful practice on a recent occasion, ever to be remembered, by the gallant State which I, in part, have the honor to represent. In this well-tested and efficient remedy, sustained by the principles developed in the report and asserted in this bill, the slaveholding States have an ample protection. Let it be fixed, let it be riveted in every Southern mind, that the laws of the slaveholding States for the protection of their domestic institutions are paramount to the laws of the general government in regulation of commerce and the mail, and that the latter must yield to the former in the event of conflict; and that, if the government should refuse to yield, the States have a right to interpose, and we are safe. With these principles, nothing but concert would be wanting to bid defiance to the movements of the abolitionists, whether at home or abroad, and to place our domestic institutions, and, with them, our security and peace, under our own protection, and beyond the mach of These were very significant intimations. Congress itself was to become the ally of the abolitionists, and enlist in their cause, if it did not pass his bill, which was opposed by Southern senators and founded upon a minority report of a Southern committee selected by Mr. Calhoun himself. It was well known it was not to pass; and in view of that fact it was urged upon the South to nullify and secede.

Thus, within two short years after the "compromise" of 1833 had taken Mr. Calhoun out of the hands of the law, he publicly and avowedly relapsed into the same condition; recurring again to secession for a new grievance; and to be resorted to upon contingencies which he knew to be certain; and encouraged in this course by the success of the first trial of strength with the federal government. It has been told at the proper place-in the chapter which gave the secret history of the compromise of 1833-that Mr. Webster refused to go into that measure, saying that the time had come to try the strength of the constitution and of the government: and it now becomes proper to tell that Mr. Clay, after seeing the relapse of Mr. Calhoun, became doubtful of the correctness of his own policy in that affair; and often said to his friends that, "in looking back upon the whole case, he had seriously doubted the policy of his interference." Certainly it was a most deplorable interference, arresting the process of the law when it was on the point of settling every thing without hurting a hair of any man's head, and putting an end to nullification for ever; and giving it a victory, real or fancied, to encourage a new edition of the same proceedings in a far more dangerous and pervading form. But to return to the bill before the Senate.

"Mr. Webster addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the bill, commencing his argument against what he contended was its vagueness and obscurity, in not sufficiently defining what were the publications the circulation of which it intended to prohibit. The bill provided that it should not be lawful for any deputy postmaster, in any State, territory, or district of the United States, knowingly to deliver to any person whatever, any pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other printed paper or pictorial representation, touching the subject of slavery, where, by the laws of the said State, district, or territory, their circulation was prohibited. Under this provision, Mr. W. contended that it was impossible to say what publications might not be prohibited from circulation. No matter what was the publication, whether for or against slavery, if it touched the subject in any shape or form, it would fall under the prohibition. Even the constitution of the United States might be prohibited; and the person who was clothed with the power to judge in this delicate matter was one of the deputy postmasters, who, notwithstanding the difficulties with which he was encompassed in coming to a correct decision, must decide correctly, under pain of being removed from office. It would be necessary, also, he said, for the deputy postmasters referred to in this bill, to make themselves acquainted with all the various laws passed by the States, touching the subject of slavery, and to decide on them, no matter how variant they might be with each other. Mr. W. also contended that the bill conflicted with that provision in the constitution which prohibited Congress from passing any law to abridge the freedom of speech or of the press. What was the liberty of the press? he asked. It was the liberty of printing as well as the liberty of publishing, in all the ordinary modes of publication; and was not the circulation of papers through the mails an ordinary mode of publication? He was afraid that they were in some danger of taking a step in this matter that they might hereafter have cause to regret, by its being contended that whatever in this bill applies to publications touching slavery, applies to other publications that the States might think proper to proble and Congress might, under this example called upon to pass laws to suppress the circu tion of political, religious, or any other descri tion of publications which produced excitents in the States. Was this bill in accordance with the general force and temper of the constitute and its amendments? It was not in accordance with that provision of the instrument with which the freedom of speech and of the pre was secured. Whatever laws the State legislation tures might pass on the subject, Congress restrained from legislating in any manner wie ever, with regard to the press. It would be mitted, that if a newspaper came directed him, he had a property in it; and how on any man, then, take that property and bun without due form of law? and he did not have how this newspaper could be pronounced unlawful publication, and having no property it, without a legal trial. Mr. W. argued again the right to examine into the nature of pullin tions sent to the post-office, and said that right of an individual in his papers was seen to him in every free country in the world. England, it was expressly provided that papers of the subject shall be free from all reasonable searches and scizures—language said, to be found in our constitution. principle established in England, so essential liberty, had been followed out in France, w the right of printing and publishing was in the fullest extent; the individual publish being amenable to the laws for what he published ed; and every man printed and published he pleased, at his peril. Mr. Webster went at some length, to show that the bill was m trary to that provision of the constitution wh prohibits Congress to pass any law about the freedom of speech or of the press."

Mr. Clay spoke against the bill, saying:

"The evil complained of was the circulate of papers having a certain tendency. The pers, unless circulated, did no harm, and in the post-office or in the mail, they were circulated-it was the circulation solely w constituted the evil. It was the taking out of the mail, and the use that was to be of them, that constituted the mischief. The was perfectly competent to the State author to apply the remedy. Why, there was no such as that claimed in the bill; and if they such a law, it would be exercising a most ous power. Why, if such doctrine prethe government might designate the perr parties, or classes, who should have the of the mails, excluding all others."

st the voting came on; and, what looks ntly curious on the outside view, there ree tle votes successively—two on amendand one on the engrossment of the bill. to ties on amendments stood fifteen to the absentees being eighteen: one third | View would not so vote. He was tired of the of the Senate: the tie on engrossment was eighteen to eighteen-the absentces being twelve: one fourth of the Senate. It was Mr. Calhoun who called for the yeas and navs on each of these questions. It was evident that there was a design to throw the bill into the hands of the Vice-President-a New-Yorker, and the prominent candidate for the presidency. In committee of the whole he did not vote in the case of a tie; but it was necessary to establish an equilibrium of votes there to be ready for the immediate vote in Senate on the engrossment; and when the committee tie was deranged by the accession of three votes on one side, the equilibrium was immediately re-established by three on the other. Mr. Van Buren, at the moment of this vote (on the engrossment) was out of the chair, and walking behind the colonnade back of the presiding officer's chair. My eyes were wide open to what was to take place. Lir. Calboun, not seeing him, eagerly and loudly asked where was the Vice-President? and told the Sergeant-at-arms to look for him. But he needed no looking for. He was within hearing of all that passed, and ready for the contingency: and immediately stepping up to his chair, and standing up, promptly gave the casting vote in favor of the engrossment. I deemed it a political vote, that is to say, given from policy; and I deemed it justifiable under the circumstances. Mr. Calhoun had made the rejection of the bill a test of alliance with Northern abolitionists, and a cause for the secession of the Southern States: and if the bill had been rejected by Van Buren's vote, the whole responsibility of its loss would have been thrown upon him and the North; and the South inflamed against those States and himself-the more so as Mr. White, of Tennessee, the opposing democratic candidate for the presidency, gave his votes for the bill. Mr. Wright also, as I believe, voted politically, and on all the votes both in the committee and the Senate. He was the political and the personal friend of the Vice-President, most confidential with him, and believed to be the best index to his opinions. He was perfectly sensible of his position, and in every vote on the subject voted with Mr. Calhoun. Several other senators voted politically, and without compunction, although it was a bad bill, as it was known it would not pass. The author of this eternal cry of dissolving the Union-did not believe in it-and would not give a repugnant vote to avoid the trial. The tie vote having been effected, and failed of its expected result, the Senate afterwards voted quite fully on the final passage of the bill, and rejected it-twentyfive to nineteen: only four absent. The yeas were: Messrs. Black, Bedford, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert of Georgia, Grundy, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Mangum, Moore, Nicholas of Louisiana, Alexander Porter, Preston of South Carolina, Rives, Robinson, Tallmadge, Walker of Mississippi, White of Tennessee, Silas Wright. The nays were: Messrs. Benton, Clay, Crittenden, Davis of Massachusetts, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough of Maryland, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean of Pennsylvania, Thomas Morris of Ohio, Naudain of Delaware Niles of Connecticut, Prentiss, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall of New Jersey, Webster: majority six against the bill; and seven of them, if the solecism may be allowed, from the slave States. And thus was accomplished one of the contingencies in which "State interposition" was again to be applied -the "rightful remedy of nullification" again resorted to-and the "domestic institutions" of the Southern States, by "concert" among themselves, "to be placed beyond the reach of danger."

CHAPTER CXXXII.

FRENCH AFFAIRS—APPROACH OF A FRENCH SQUADRON—APOLOGY REQUIRED.

In his annual message at the commencement of the session the President gave a general statement of our affairs with France, and promised a special communication on the subject at an early day. That communication was soon made, and showed a continued refusal or the part of France to tag the indemnity, unless an apology was first made; and also showed that a French fleet was preparing for the American seas, under circumstances which implied a design either to overawe the American government, or to be ready for expected hostilities. On the subject of the apology, the message said:

"Whilst, however, the government of United States was awaiting the movement the French government, in perfect confidence that the difficulty was at an end, the Some of State received a call from the French en d'affaires in Washington, who desired to rea him a letter he had received from the F minister of foreign affairs. He was asked ther he was instructed or directed to make official communication, and replied that he only authorized to read the letter, and funi copy if requested. It was an attempt to known to the government of the United Sta privately, in what manner it could make nations, apparently voluntary, but really deby France, acceptable to her, and thus payment of the twenty-five millions of h No exception was taken to this mode of munication, which is often used to prepare way for official intercourse; but the suggestion made in it were, in their substance, wholly admissible. One cannot but be struck with the em moderation with which the President gire history of this private attempt to obtain tated apology from him. The attempt in tain the apology being civilly repulsed and proffered copy of the dictated terms refin be taken, an attempt was made to get that placed upon the archives of the govern with the view to its getting to Congres through Congress to the people; to be point of attack upon the President for not the apology, and thereby getting the from France, and returning to friendly # with her. The indiscretion his attempt was made more manifest by the equeat avowal of the French charge d'afs that the object was to bring the letter e Congress and the American people. If gn agents, on a subject of disagreement be-in their government and this, wish to prefer ppeal to the American people, they will after it is hoped, better appreciate their rights, and the respect due to others, than tempt to use the Executive as the passive of their communications. It is due to the eter of our institutions that the diplomatic course of this government should be conwith the utmost directness and simplicity, that, in all cases of importance, the comcations received or made by the Executive idassume the accustomed official form. It ly by insisting on this form that foreign rs can be held to full responsibility; that communications can be officially replied or that the advice or interference of the ature can, with propriety, be invited by the dent. This course is also best calculated, eone hand, to shield that officer from unsuspicions; and, on the other, to subject ortion of his acts to public scrutiny, and, usion shall require it, to constitutional dversion. It was the more necessary to e to these principles in the instance in quesmasmuch as, in addition to other important sts, it very intimately concerned the na-honor; a matter, in my judgment, much cred to be made the subject of private and cial negotiation."

ing shown the state of the question, the ent next gave his opinion of what ought done by Congress; which was, the interof our ports to the entry of French ves-? French products:—a milder remedy that of reprisals which he had recomdat the previous session. He said:

is time that this unequal position of af-hould cease, and that legislative action be brought to sustain Executive exertion measures as the case requires. While persists in her refusal to comply with ms of a treaty, the object of which was, oving all causes of mutual complaint, to accent feelings of friendship, and to unite nations in the bonds of amity, and of a ly beneficial commerce, she cannot justly a if we adopt such peaceful remedies as case may authorize and demand. Of the nature of these remedies I have heretofore had occasion to speak; and, in reference to a particular contingency, to express my conviction that reprisals would be best adapted to the emergency then contemplated. Since that period, France, by all the departments of her government, has acknowledged the validity of our claims and the obligations of the treaty, and has appropriated the moneys which are necessary to its execution; and though payment is withheld on grounds vitally important to our existence as an independent nation, it is not to be believed that she can have determined permanently to retain a position so utterly indefensible. In the altered state of the questions in controversy, and under all existing circumstances, it appears to me that, until such a determination shall have become evident, it will be proper and sufficient to retaliate her present refusal to comply with her engagements by prohibiting the introduction of French products and the entry of French vessels into our ports. Between this and the interdiction of all commercial intercourse, or other remedies, you, as the representatives of the people, must determine. I recommend the former, in the present posture of our affairs, as being the least injurious to our commerce, and as attended with the least difficulty of returning to the usual state of friendly intercourse, if the government of France shall render us the justice that is due; and also as a proper preliminary step to stronger measures, should their adoption be rendered necessary by subsequent events."

This interdiction of the commerce of France, though a milder measure than that of reprisals, would still have been a severe one-severe at any time, and particularly so since the formation of this treaty, the execution of which was so much delayed by France; for that was a treaty of two parts-something to be done on each side. On the part of France to pay us indemnities: on our side to reduce the duties on French wines: and this reduction had been immediately made by Congress, to take effect from the date of the ratification of the trenty; and the benefit of that reduction had now been enjoyed by French commerce for near four years. But that was not the only benefit which this treaty brought to France from the good feeling it produced in America: it procured a discrimination in favor of silks imported from this side of the Cape of Good Hope-a discrimination inuring, and intended to inure, to the benefit of France. The author of this View was much instrumental in procuring that discrimination, and did it upon conversations with the then resident French of nations and the circumstances of the | minister at Washington, and founding his argument upon data derived from him. The data | He often applied for the appropriation bear were to show that the discrimination would be beneficial to the trade of both countries; but the inducing cause was good-will to France, and a desire to bury all recollection of past differences in our emulation of good works. This view of the treaty, and a statement of the advantages which France had obtained from it, was well shown by Mr. Buchanan in his speech in support of the message on French affairs; in which he said:

"The government of the United States proceeded immediately to execute their part of the treaty. By the act of the 13th July, 1832, the duties on French wines were reduced according to its terms, to take effect from the day of the exchange of ratifications. At the same session, the Congress of the United States, impelled, no doubt, by their kindly feelings towards France, which had been roused into action by what they believed to be a final and equitable settlement of all our disputes, voluntarily reduced the duty upon silks coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope, to five per cent., whilst those from beyond were fixed at ten per cent. And at the next session, on the 2d of March, 1833, this duty of five per cent. was taken off altogether; and ever since, French silks have been admitted into our country free of duty. There is now, in fact, a discriminating duty of ten per cent. in their favor, over silks from beyond the Cape of Good Hope.

"What has France grined by these measures in duties on her wines and her silks, which she would otherwise have been bound to pay? I have called upon the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount. now hold in my hand a tabular statement, prepared at my request, which shows, that had the duties remained what they were, at the date of the ratification of the treaty, these articles, since that time, would have paid into the Treasury, on the 30th September, 1834, the sum of $3,061,525. Judging from the large importations which have since been made, I feel no hesitation in declaring it as my opinion, that, at the present moment, these duties would amount to more than the whole indemnity which France has engaged to pay to our fellow-citizens. Before the conclusion of the ten years mentioned in the treaty, she will have been freed from the payment of duties to an amount considerably above twelve millions of dollars."

It is almost incomprehensible that there should have been such delay in complying with a treaty on the part of France bringing her such advantages; and it is due to the King, Louis Philippe to say, that he constantly referred the delay to the difficulty of getting the appropria- injury, and could not be given without tion through the French legislative chambers, degradation; joining the President in

The publicans were also inimical to him, and with the legitimists.

The President concluded his message stating that a large French naval arms was under orders for our seas; and said:

"Of the cause and intent of these arms I have no authentic information, nor any means of judging, except such as are comyourselves and to the public; but whatever be their object, we are not at liberty tom them as unconnected with the measures hostile movements on the part of France compel us to pursue. luchanan sustained the message nd well-considered review of this question, showing that the demand gy was an insult in aggravation and could not be given withoutm tion; joining the President in hi e measures for preserving the rights and honor the country; declaring that if hostilities came es were preferable to disgrace, and that the bele world would put the blame on France. r. Calhoun took a different view of it, declare that the state of our affairs with France was effect of the President's mismanagement, and at if war came it would be entirely his fault; affirmed his deliberate belief that it was the esident's design to have war with France. e said:

"I fear that the condition in which the connis now placed has been the result of a delibte and systematic policy. I am bound to ak my sentiments freely. It is due to my estimients and the country, to act with pert candor and truth on a question in which r interests is so deeply involved. I will not ert that the Executive has deliberately aimed war from the commencement; but I will say t from the beginning of the controversy to present moment, the course which the Preent has pursued is precisely the one calculato terminate in a conflict between the two ions. It has been in his power, at every ped to give the controversy a direction by which peace of the country might be preserved, hout the least sacrifice of reputation or honbut he has preferred the opposite. I feel d Mr. C.) how painful it is to make these larations; how unpleasant it is to occupy a ion which might, by any possibility, be con-ed in opposition to our country's cause; in my conception, the honor and the interof the country can only be maintained by suing the course that truth and justice may ate. Acting under this impression, I do not tate to assert, after a careful examination of documents connected with this unhappy roversy, that, if war must come, we are the ors-we are the responsible party. Standas I fear we do, on the eve of a conflict, it ld to me have been a source of pride and sure to make an opposite declaration; but sacred regard to truth and justice, which, I will ever be my guide under the most dift circumstances, would not permit."

r. Beaton maintained that it was the conof the Senate at the last session which had to the French question its present and leaspect: that the belief of divided counsels. of a majority against the President, and that coked to money and not to honor, had enged the French chambers to insult us by nding an apology, and to attempt to inate us by sending a fleet upon our coasts.

and the fortification bill were lost; since then the whole aspect of the French question is changed. The money is withheld, and explanation is demanded, an apology is prescribed, and a French fleet approaches. Our government, charged with insulting France, when no insult was intended by us, and none can be detected in our words by her, is itself openly and vehemently in-sulted. The apology is to degrade us; the fleet to intimidate us; and the two together constitute an insult of the gravest character. There in no parallel to it, except in the history of France herself; but not France of the 19th century, nor even of the 18th, but in the remote and ill-regulated times of the 17th century, and in the days of the proudest of the French Kings, and towards one of the smallest Italian republies. I allude, sir, to what happened between Louis XIV. and the Doge of Genoa, and will read the account of it from the pen of Voltaire, in his

Age of Louis XIV.
"The Genoese had built four galleys for the service of Spain; the King (of France) forbade them, by his envoy, St. Olon, one of his gentle-men in ordinary, to launch those galleys. The Genoese, incensed at this violation of their liberties, and depending too much on the support of Spain, refused to obey the order. Immediately fourteen men of war, twenty galleys, ten bombketches, with several frigates, set sail from the port of Toulon. They arrived before Genoa, and the ten bomb-ketches discharged 14,000 shells into the town, which reduced to ashes a principal part of those marble edifice, which had entitled this city to the name of Genoa the Proud. Four thousand men were then landed, who marched up to the gates, and burnt the suburb of St. Peter, of Arena. It was now thought prudent to submit, in order to prevent the total destruction of the city. The King exacted that the Doge of Genoa, with four of the principal senators, should come and implore his clemency in the palace of Versailles; and, lest the Genoese should elude the making this satisfaction, and lessen in any manner the pomp of it, he insisted further that the Doge, who was to perform this embassy, should be continued in his magistracy, notwithstanding the perpetual law of Genoa, which deprives the Doge of his dignity who is absent but a moment from the city. Imperialo Lercaro, Doge of Genoa, attended by the senators Lomellino, Garibaldi, Durazzo, and Salvago, repaired to Versailles, to submit to what was required of him. The Doge appeared in his robes of state, his head covered with a bonnet of red velvet, which he often took off during his speech; made his apology, the very words and demeanor of which were dictated and prescribed to him by Seignelai, (the French

Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs). "Thus, said Mr. B., was the city of Genoa, and its Doge, treated by Louis XIV. But it was not the Doge who was degraded by this indignity, but the republic of which he was t was in March last that the three millions | chief magistrate, and all the republics of Italy, besides, which felt themselves all humbled by the outrage which a king had inflicted upon one of their number. So of the apology demanded, and of the fleet sent upon us, and in presence of which President Jackson, according to the Constitutionnel, is to make his decision, and to remit it to the Tuileries. It is not President Jackson that is outraged, but the republic of which he is President; and all existing republies, wheresoever situated. Our whole country is insulted, and that is the feeling of the whole country; and this feeling pours in upon us every day, in every manuer in which public sentiment can be manifested, and especially in the noble resolves of the States whose legislatures are in session, and who hasten to declare their adherence to the policy of the special message. True, President Jackson is not required to repair to the Tuilcries, with four of his most obnoxious senators, and there recite, in person, to the King of the French, the apology which he had first rehearsed to the Duke de Broglie; true, the bomb-ketches of Admiral Mackau have not yet fired 14,000 shells on one of our cities; but the mere demand for an apology, the mere dictation of its terms, and the mere advance of a fleet, in the present state of the world, and in the difference of parties, is a greater outrage to us than the actual perpetration of the enormities were to the Genoese. This is not the seventeenth century. President Jackson is not the Doge of a trading city. We are not Italians, to be trampled upon by European kings; but Americans, the descendants of that Anglo-Saxon race, which, for a thousand years, has known how to command respect, and to preserve its place at the head of nations. We are young, but old enough to prove that the theory of the Frenchman, the Abbé Raynal, is as false in its application to the people of this hemisphere as it is to the other productions of nature; and that the belittling tendencies of the New World are no more exemplified in the human race than they are in the exhibition of her rivers and her mountains, and in the indigenous races of the mammoth and the mastodon. The Duke de Brog-lie has made a mistake, the less excusable, because he might find in his own country, and perhaps in his own family, examples of the extreme criticalness of attempting to overawe a community of freemen. There was a Marshal Broglie, who was Minister at War, at the commencement of the French Revolution, and who advised the formation of a camp of 20,000 men to overawe Paris. The camp was formed. Paris revolted; captured the Bastile; marched to Versailles; stormed the Tuileries; overset the monarchy; and established the Revolution. So much for attempting to intimidate a city. And yet, here is a nation of freemen to be intimidated: a republic of fourteen millions of peoplc, and descendants of that Anglo-Saxon race which, from the days of Agincourt and Cressy, of Blenheim and Ramillies, down to the days of Salamanca and Waterloo, have always known a "squadron of observation," and proceed perfectly well how to deal with the impens and flery courage of the French."

Mr. Benton also showed that there was party in the French Chambers, working to parate the President of the United States from the people of the United States, and to mi him responsible for the hostile attitude of two countries. In this sense acted the depen Mons. Henry de Chabaulon, who spoke thu:

"The insult of President Jackson comes for himself only. This is more evident, from refusal of the American Congress to with him in it. The French Chamber, by terfering, would render the affair more sense and make its arrangement more difficult, even dangerous. Let us put the case to a selver. Suppose the United States had the part with General Jackson, we should lare to demand satisfaction, not from him, but fe the United States; and, instead of now talk about negotiation, we should have had to me appropriations for a war, and to intrust to heroes of Navarino and Algiers the task teaching the Americans that France knows way to Washington as well as England,

This language was received with applaus the Chamber, by the extremes. It was the guage held six weeks after the rise of Conne and when the loss of the three millions by the President for contingent preparation after the loss of the fortification bill, were fill known in Paris. Another speaker in the Chr ber, Mons. Rancé, was so elated by these has as to allow himself to discourse thus:

"Gentlemen, we should put on one side of tribune the twenty-five millions, on the the sword of France. When the America see this good long sword, this very long sw gentlemen (for it struck down every thingh Lisbon to Moscow), they will perhaps real what it did for the independence of their try; they will, perhaps, too, reflect upon it could do to support and avenge the honors dignity of France, when outraged by an ung ful people. The Constitutionnel, the demi-Ecial paper of the government, stated that this neasure was warranted by the actual state of he relations between France and the United tates-that the United States had no force to pose to it—and applauded the government for foresight and energy. Mr. Benton thus ommented upon the approach of this French quadron:

A French fleet of sixty vessels of war, to be llowed by sixty more, now in commission, apcaches our const; and approaches it for the owed purpose of observing our conduct, in retion to France. It is styled, in the French pers, a squadron of observation; and we are ficiently acquainted with the military vocalary of France to know what that phrase ans. In the days of the great Emperor, we reaccustomed to see the armies which delished empires at a blow, wear that pacific le up to the moment that the blow was ready be struck. These grand armies assembled the frontiers of empires, gave emphasis to otiation, and crushed what resisted. A squaon of observation, then, is a squadron of inidation first, and of attack eventually; and thing could be more palpable than that such the character of the squadron in question. leaves the French coast, contemporaneously th the departure of our diplomatic agent, and assembling of our Congress; it arrives upon coast at the very moment that we shall have rote upon French affairs; and it takes a posiupon our Southern border—that border, re all others, on which we are, at this time, uliarly sensitive to hostile approach. What have we done, continued Mr. B., to

We have done wrong to France; we are making no prepaons against her; and not even ordinary pretions for general and permanent security. have treaties, and are executing them, even treaty that she does not execute. under the operation of this discriminating duty, our imports of French silks have risen from two millions of dollars per annum to six millions and a half; from England, they have risen from a quarter of a million to three quarters; from China, they have snak from three millions and a quare to one million and a quarter. This discriminating duty has left between one and two millions of dollars in the pockets of Frenchmen, besides the encouragement to the silk manufacture and trade. Why, then, has she sent this squadron, to observe us first, and to strike us eventually? She knows our pacific disposition towards her, not only from our own words and actions, but from the official report of her own officers: from the very officer sent out last spring, in a brig, to carry back the recalled min-

Mr. Benton then went on to charge the present state of our affairs with France distinctly and emphatically upon the conduct of the Senate, in their refusal to attend to the national defences-in their opposition to the Presidentand in the disposition manifested rather to pull down the President, in a party contest, than to sustain him against France-rather to plunder their own country than to defend it, by taking the public money for distribution instead of defence. To this effect, he said:

"He had never spoken unkindly of the French nation, neither in his place here, as a senator, nor in his private capacity elsewhere. Born since the American Revolution, bred up in habitual affection for the French name, coming upon the stage of life when the glories of the republic and of the empire were filling the world and dazzling the imagination, politically connected with the party which, a few years ago, was called French, his bosom had glowed with admiration for that people; and youthful affection had ripened into manly friendship. He would not now permit himself to speak unkindly, much less to use epithets; but he could not avoid fixing his attention upon the reason assigned in the Constitutionnel for the present advance of the French squadron upon us. That reason is this: 'America will have no force capable of being opposed to it.' This is the reason. Our nakedness, our destitution, has drawn upon us the honor of this visit; and we are now to speak, and vote, and so to demean ourselves, as men standing in the presence of a way, France has gained one or two millions force which they cannot resist, and which had taught the lesson of submission to the Turk and the Arab! And here I change the theme: I turn from French intimidation to American legislation; and I ask how it comes that we have no force to oppose to this squadron which comes here to take a position upon our borders, and to show us that it knows the way to Washington ce England, and China. In four years, and as well as the English? This is my future Vol. I.—38 The greigner pays the tax, eh?

theme; and I have to present the American Senate as the responsible party for leaving our country in this wretched condition. First, there is the three million appropriation which was lost by the opposition of the Senate, and which carried down with it the whole fortification bill, to which it was attached. That bill, besides the three millions, contained thirteen specific appropriations for works of defence, part originating in the House of Representatives, and part in the Senate, and appropriating $900,000 to the completion and armament of forts.

"All these specific appropriations, continued Mr. B., were lost in the bill which was sunk by the opposition of the Senate to the three millions, which were attached to It by the House of Representatives. He (Mr. B.) was not a member of the conference committee which had the disagreement of the two Houses committed to its charge, and could go into no detail as to what happened in that conference; he took his stand upon the palpable ground that the opposition which the Schate made to the three million appropriation, the speeches which denounced it, and the prolonged invectives against the President, which inflamed the passions and consumed the precious time at the last moment of the sersion, were the true causes of the loss of that bill; and so leaves the reaponsibility for the loss on the shoulders of the Senate.

"Mr. B. recalled attention to the reason demiofficially assigned in the Constitutionnel, for the approach of the French fleet of observation, and to show that it came because 'America had no force capable of being opposed to it.' It was a subsidiary argument, and a fair illustration of the dangers and humiliations of a defenceless position. It should stimulate us to instant and vigorous action; to the concentration of all our money, and all our hands, to the sacred task of national defence. For himself, he did not believe there would be war, because he knew that there ought not to be war; but that belief would have no effect upon his conduct. He went for national defence, because that policy was right in itself, without regard to times and circumstances. He went for it now, because it was the response, and the only response, which American honor could give to the visit of Admiral Mackau. Above all, he went for it because it was the way, and the only manly way, of letting France know that she had committed a mistake in sending this flect upon us. In conclusion, he would call for the yeas and nays, and remark that our votes would have to be given under the guns of France, and under the eyes of Europe.

The reproach cast by Mr. Benton on the conduct of the Senate, in causing the loss of the defence bills, and the consequent insult from France, brought several members to their feet in defeace of themselves and the body to which hev belonged.

" Mr. Webster said his duty was to take on that neither in nor out of the Senate there should be any mistake, the effect of which should he to produce an impression unfavorable or m proachful to the character and patriotism of the American people. He remembered the proof of that bill (the bill alluded to by Mr. Benta the incidents of its history, and the real case of its loss. He (Mr. C.) was not disp sayany thing further of the events of the last aght of the session. He took occasion to say there were other matters in connection with this appropriation. Hefore any department or any freed of the administration had named an appropriation for defence, he made the motion to appropriate five hundred thousand dollars. It was on his motion that the Committee on Military Affairs made the appropriation to increase the fortifications. Actuated by the very same motives which induced him to move that appropriation, he had moved an additional appropria-tion to Fort Delaware. The motion was to in-crease the seventy-five thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand, and elicited a protracted de-late. The next question was, whether, in the general bill, five hundred thousand dollars should the appropriated. He recollected the honorable thairman of the Committee on Finance told hem there was an amendment before that comnittee of similar tenor. As chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, he felt disinclined give it up. The amendment fell on the single round, by one vote, that the Committee on inance had before it the identical proposition asde by the Committee on Military Affairs. He ppealed to the country whether, under those ircumstances, they were to be arraigned before he people of the country on a charge of a want fatriotism. He had always felt deeply affect-d when those general remarks were made im-gning the motives of pathiotism of the senaors. He was willing to go as far as he who hes farthest in making appropriations for the ational protection. Nay, he would be in adnce of the administration."

Mr. Benton returned to his charge that the fence bills of the last session were lost through e conduct of the Senate. It was the Senate hich disagreed to the House amendment of ree millions to the fortification bill (which itif contained appropriations to the amount of 00,000); and it was the Senate which moved "adhere" to its disagreement, thereby adoptthe harsh measure which so much endans legislation. And, in support of his views,

The bill died under lapse of time. It died cause not acted upon before midnight of the t day of the session. Right or wrong, the sion was over before the report of the conees could be acted on. The House of Repretatives was without a quorum, and the Senwas about in the same condition. Two atapts in the Senate to get a vote on some nting moved by his colleague (Mr. Linn), re both lost for want of a quorum. The sesthen was at an end, for want of quorums, ether the legal right to sit had ceased or not. bill was not rejected either in the House of resentatives or in the Senate, but it died for term of insisting, and to adhere in the first in-want of action upon it; and that action was prevented by want of time. Now, whose fault was it that there was no time left for acting on the report of the conferces? That was the true question, and the answer to it would show where the fault lay. This answer is as clear as midday, though the transaction took place in the darkness of midnight. It was the Senate! The bill came to the Senate in full time to have been acted upon, if it had been treated as all bills must be treated that are intended to be passed in the last hours of the session. It is no time for speaking. All speaking is then fatal to bills, and equally fatal, whether for or against them. Yet, what was the conduct of the Senate with respect to this bill? Members commenced speaking upon it with vehemence and perseverance, and continued at it, one after another. These speeches were fatal to the bill. They were numerous, and consumed much time to deliver them. They were criminative, and provoked replies. They denounced the President without measure; and, by implication, the Honse of Representatives, which sustained him. They were intemperate, and destroyed the temper of others. In this way the precious time was consumed in which the bill might have been acted upon; and, for want of which time, it is lost. Every one that made a speech helped to destroy it; and nearly the whole body of the opposition spoke, and most of them at much length, and with unusual warmth and animation. So certain was he of the ruinous effect of this speaking, that he himself never opened his month nor uttered one word upon it. Then came the fatal motion to adhere, the effect of which was to make bad worse, and to destroy the last chance, unless the House of Representatives had humbled itself to ask a conference from the Senate. The fatal effect of this motion to adhere, Mr. B. would show from Jefferson's Manual; and read as follows: 'The regular progression in this case is, that the Commons disagree to the amendment; the Lords insist on it; the Commona insist on their disagreement.; the Lords adhere to their amendment; the Commons adhere to their disagreement; the term of insisting may be repeated as often as they choose to keep the question open; but the first adherence by either renders it necessary for the other to recede or to adhere also; when the matter is usually suffered to fall. (10 Grey, 148.) Latterly, however, there are instances of their having gone to a second adherence. There must be an absolute conclusion of the subject somewhere, or otherwise transactions between the Houses would become endless. (3 Hatsell, 268, 270.) The term of insisting, we are told by Sir John Trevor, was then (1678) newly introduced into parliamentary usage by the Lords. (7 Grey, 94.) It was certainly a happy innovation, as it multi-plies the opportunities of trying modifications, which may bring the Houses to a concurrence. Either House, however, is free to pass over the stance. (10 Grey, 146.) But it is not respectful to the other. In the ordinary parliamentary course, there are two free conferences at least before an adherence. (10 Grey, 147.)

"This is the regular progression in the case of amendments, and there are five steps in it. 1.
To agree. 2. To disagree. 3. To recede. 4.
To insist. 5. To adhere. Of these five steps adherence is the last, and yet it was the first wlopted by the Senate. The effect of its adoption was, in parliamentary usage, to put an end to the matter. It was, by the law of Parliament, a disrespect to the House. No conference was even asked by the Senate after the adherence, although, by the parliamentary law, there ought to have been two free conferences at least before the adherence was voted. All this was fully stated to the Senate that night, and before the question to adhere was put. It was fully stated by you, sir (said Mr. B., addressing himself to Mr. Kling, of Alabama, who was then in the Vice-President's chair). This vote to adhere, coupled with the violent speeches, denouncing the President, and, by implication, censuring the House of Representatives, and coupled with the total omission of the Senate to ask for a conference, seemed to indicate a fatal purpose to destroy the bill; and lost it would have been upon the spot, if the House of Representatives, forgetting the disrespect with which it had been treated, and passing over the censure impliedly cast upon it, had not humbled itself to come and ask for a conference. The House humbled itself; but it was a patriotic and noble immiliation; it was to serve their country. The conference was granted, and an amendment was agreed upon by the conferees, by which the amount was reduced, and the sum divided, and $300,000 allowed to the military, and $500,000 to the naval service. This was done at last, and after all the irritating speeches and irritating conduct of the Senate; but the precious time was gone. The hour of midnight was not only come, but members were dispersed; quorums were unattainable; and the bill died for want of action. And now (said Mr. B.) I return to my question. I resume, and maintain my position upon it. I ask how it came to pass, if want of specification was really the objection -how it came to pass that the Senate did not do at first what it did at last? Why did it not amend, by the easy, natural, obvious, and parliamentary process of disagreeing, insisting, and asking for a committee of conference?

"Mr. B. would say but a word on the new calendar, which would make the day begin in the middle. It was sufficient to state such a conception to expose it to ridicule. A farmer would be sadly put out if his laborers should refuse to come until mid-day. The thing was rather too fanciful for grave deliberation. Suffice it to say there are no fractions of days in any calendar. There is no three and one fourth, three and one half, and three and three fourths ends, another begins, and midnight is the tree ing point both in law and in practice. All our laws of the last day are dated the 3d of March and, in point of fact, Congress, for every beneficial purpose, is dissolved at midnight. Many members will not act, and go away; and son was the practice of the venerable Mr. Maca of North Carolina, who always acted preceded as President Jackson did. He put on his hat and went away at midnight; he went away when his own watch told him it was midnight after which he believed he had no authority to act as a legislotor, nor the Senate to make him act as such. This was President Jackson's course. He stayed in the Capitol until a quater after one, to sign all the bills which Umgress should pass before midnight. He stared until a majority of Congress was gone, and one rums unattainable. He stayed in the Capitol in a room convenient to the Senate, to act upon every thing that was sent to him, and did not have to be waked up, as Washington was, to sign after midnight; a most unfortunate refeence to Washington, who, by going to bed a midnight, showed that he considered the best ness of the day ended; and by getting up and putting on his night gown, and ming a billu ming a bill n two o'clock in the morning of the 4th, slowed that he would sign at that hour what had passe before midnight; and does not that act best date the 3d of March?

Mr. Webster earnestly defended the Sensie conduct and his own; and said:

"This proposition, sir, was thus unexpected and suddenly put to us, at eight o'clock in a evening of the last day of the session. Unus unprecedented, extraordinary, as it obviously on the face of it, the manner of presenting itm still more extraordinary. The President hasked for no such grant of money; no department had recommended it; no estimate had suggested it; no reason whatever was given for it. No emergency had happened, and nothing new had occurred; every thing known to administration at that hour, respecting our reign relations, had certainly been known to for days and for weeks before.

"With what propriety, then, could the Sen be called on to sanction a proceeding so entire irregular and anomalous? I took upon myself, then, sir, the responsibility of moving that the Senate should disagree to this rote, and I now acknowledge that res-possibility. It might be presumptuous to say that I took a leading part, but I certainly took an early part, a decided part, and an earnest part, in rejecting this broad grant of three milions of dollars, without limitation of purpose or specification of object; called for by no recommendation, founded on no estimate, made pecessary by no state of things which was made known to us. Certainly, sir, I took a part in its rejection; and I stand here, in my place in the Senate, to-day, ready to defend the part ao taken by me; or rather, sir, I disclaim all de-fence, and all occasion of defence, and I assert it as meritorious to have been among those who arrested at the earliest moment, this extraordimry departure from all settled usage, and, as I think, from plain constitutional injunction—this indefinite voting of a vast sum of money to mere executive discretion, without limit assigned, without object specified, without reason given, and without the least control under heaven.

"Sir, I am told that, in opposing this grant, I spoke with warmth, and I suppose I may have done so. If I did, it was a warmth springing from as honest a conviction of duty as ever infuenced a public man. It was spontaneous, maffected, sincere. There had been among us, ir, no consultation, no concert. There could are been none. Between the reading of the essage and my motion to disagree there was ot time enough for any two members of the leaste to exchange five words on the subject. he proposition was sudden and perfectly unspected. Before the Senate I then avowed, and efore the country I now avow, my part in this position. Whatsoever is to fall on those who actioned it, of that let me have my full share. "The Senate, sir, rejected this grant by a vote twenty-nine against nineteen. Those twentyine names are on the journal; and whensoever e expunding process may commence, or how seever it may be carried, I pray it, in mercy, at to crase mine from that record. "The House, sir, insisted on this amendment. The Senate adhered to its disagreement. The House asked a conference, to which request the Senate immediately accessed. The committees of conference met, and, in a short time, came to an agreement. They agreed to recommend to their respective Houses, as a substitute for the vote proposed by the House, the following:

"As an additional appropriation for arming the fortifications of the United States, three hundred thousand dollars.2

" As an additional appropriation for the repair and equipment of ships of war of the United States, flve hundred thousand dollars."

"I immediately reported this agreement of the committees of conference to the Senate; but, inasmuch as the bill was in the House of Representatives, the Senate could not act further on the matter until the House should first have considered the report of the committees, deeided thereon, and sent us the bill. I did not myself take any note of the particular hour of this part of the transaction. The honorable member from Virginia (Mr. Leigh) says he consuited his watch at the time, and he knows that I had come from the conference, and was in my seat, at a quarter past eleven. I have no reason to think that he is under any mistake in this particular. He says it so happened that he had occasion to take notice of the hour, and well remembers it. It could not well have been later than this, as any one will be satisfied who will look at our journals, public and executive, and see what a mass of business was dispatched after I came from the committees, and before the adjournment of the Senate. Having made the report, sir, I had no doubt that both Houses would concur in the result of the conference. and looked every moment for the officer of the House bringing the bill. He did not come, however, and I pretty soon learned that there was doubt whether the committee on the part of the House would report to the House the agreement of the conferees. At first I did not at all credit this; but it was confirmed by one communication after another, until I was obliged to think it true. Seeing that the bill was thus in danger of being lost, and intending, at any rate, that no blame should justly attach to the Senate, I immediately moved the following reso-

"'Resolved, That a message be sent to the honorable the House of Representatives, respectfully to remind the House of the report of the committee of conference appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill respecting the fortifications of the United States.'

"You recollect this resolution, sir, having, as I well remember, taken some part on the occa-

"This resolution was promptly passed; the Secretary carried it to the House, and delivered it. What was done in the House on the receipt of this message now appears from the printed journal. I have no wish to comment on the proceedings there recorded-all may read them, and each be able to form his own opinion. Suffice it to say, that the House of Representatives, having then possession of the bill, chose to retain that possession, and never acted on the report of the committee. The bill, therefore, was lost. It was lost in the House of Representatives. It died there, and there its remains are to be found. No opportunity was given to the members of the House to decide whether they would agree to the report of the two committees or not. From a quarter past eleven, when the report was agreed to by the committees, until two or three o'clock in the morning, the House remained in session. If at any time there was not a quorum of members present. the attendance of a quorum, we are to presume, might have been commanded, as there was undoubtedly a great majority of the members still in the city.

"But now, sir, there is one other transaction of the evening which I feel bound to state, because I think it quite important, on several accounts, that it should be known.

"A nomination was pending before the Senate, for a judge of the Supreme Court. In the course of the sitting, that nomination was called up, and, on motion, was indefinitely postponed. In other words, it was rejected; for an indefinite postponement is a rejection. The office, of course, remained vacant, and the nomination of another person to fill it became necessary. The President of the United States was then in the capitol, as is usual on the evening of the last day of the session, in the cham-ber assigned to him, and with the heads of departments around him. When nominations are rejected under these circumstances, it has been usual for the President immediately to transmit a new nomination to the Senate; otherwise the office must remain vacant till the next session, as the vacancy in such case has not happened in the recess of Congress. The vote of the Senate, indefinitely postponing this nomination, was carried to the President's room by the Secretary of the Senate. The President told the Secretary that it was more than an hour past twelve o'clock, and that he could receive no further communications from the Senate, and immediately after, as I have understood, left the capitol. The Secretary brought back the paper containing the certified copy of the vote of the Senate, and indorsed thereon the substance of the President's answer, and also added that, according to his own watch, it was a quarter past one o'clock."

This was the argument of Mr. Webster in defence of the Senate and himself; but it could not alter the facts of the case—that the Senate disagreed to the House appropriation—that it adhered harshly—that it consumed the time in elaborate speeches against the President—and that the bill was lost upon lapse of time, the existence of the Congress itself expiring while this contention, began by the Senate, was going on.

Mr. Webster dissented from the new doctrine of counting years by fractions of a day, as a thing having no place in the constitution in law, or in practice;—and which was besides impracticable, and said:

"There is no clause of the constitution, nor is there any law, which declares that the term of office of members of the House of Reposentatives shall expire at twelve o'clock at night on the 3d of March. They are to hold for two years, but the precise hour for the commencement of that term of two years is nowhere fixed by constitutional or legal provision. It has been established by usage and by inference, and very properly established, that, since the first Congress commenced its existence on the first Wednesday in March, 1789, which happened to be the 4th day of that month, therefore, the 4th of March is the day of the commencement of each successive term, but no hour is fixed by law or practice. The true rule is, as I tilik most undoubtedly, that the session holden on the last day, constitutes the last day, for all legislative and legal purposes. While the session commenced on that day continues, the day itself continues, according to the established practice both of legislative and judicial bodies This could not well be otherwise. If the pre cise moment of actual time were to settle such a matter, it would be material to ask, who shall settle the time? Shall it be done by public authority; or shall every man observe the tick of his own watch? If absolute time is to furnish a precise rule, the excess of a minute, it is obvious, would be as fatal as the excess of a hour. Sir, no bodies, judicial or legislative have ever been so hypercritical, so astute tom purpose, so much more nice than wise, as to govern themselves by any such ideas. The sesion for the day, at whatever hour it commences, or at whatever hour it breaks up, is the legisltive day. Every thing has reference to the commencement of that diurnal session. For instance, this is the 14th day of January; we assembled here to day at twelve o'clock; our journal is dated January 14th, and if we should remain until five o'clock to-morrow morning (and the Senate has sometimes sat so late) or proceedings would still all bear date of the 14th of January; they would be so stated upon the journal, and the jounal is a record, and is conclusive record, so far as respects the proceedings of the body."

But he adduced practice to the contrary, we showed that the expiring Congress had the sat after midnight, on the day of the 34 ° against the President—and tost upon lapse of time, the ongress itself expiring while began by the Senate, was ssented from the new doctrine by fractions of a day, as a place in the constitution, in ice;—and which was besided I said:

lause of the constitution, nor which declares that the term bers of the House of Reprexpire at twelve o'clock at night ch. They are to hold for two ccise hour for the commencerm of two years is nowhere utional or legal provision. It hed by usage and by inference, ly established, that, since the commenced its existence on the in March, 1789, which happened y of that month, therefore, the the day of the commencement ve term, but no hour is fixed ce. The true rule is, as I tink lly, that the session holden on purposes. While the sessible that day continues, the day continues, the day is, according to the established folgislative and judicial bodies well be otherwise. If the pre actual time were to settle such uld be material to ask, who shall ? Shall it be done by public hall every man observe the tick ch? If absolute time is to furrule, the excess of a minute, it is be as fatal as the excess of a bodies, judicial or legislative so hypercritical, so astute to m ch more nice than wise, as to lves by any such ideas. The se-, at whatever hour it commences, hour it breaks up, is the legishery thing has reference to the t of that diurnal session. For is the 14th day of January; we e to day at twelve o'clock; ou ed January 14th, and if we should five o'clock to-morrow morning te has sometimes sat so late) or ould still all bear date of the lith hey would be so stated upon the the journal is a record, and is a ord, so far as respects the pree body."

uced practice to the contrary, wi the expiring Congress had offer Inight, on the day of the 3d of March, in the years when that day was the end the Congress; and in speaking of what had then occurred, he was right. I have often seen i myself; but in such cases there was usually n acknowledgment of the wrong by stopping he Senate clock, or setting it back; and I have iso seen the hour called and marked on the journal after twelve, and the bills sent to the president, noted as passed at such an hour of he morning of the fourth; when they remained atouched by the President; and all bills and cts sent to him on the morning of the fourth redated of the third; and that date legalizes hem, although erroneous in point of fact. ut, many of the elder members, such as Mr. acon, would have nothing to do with these ontrivances, and left the chamber at midnight, ying that the Congress was constitutionally tinet, and that they had no longer any power sit and act as a Senate. Upon this point Mr. rundy, of Tennessee, a distinguished jurist as ell as statesman, delivered his opinion, and in nsonance with the best authorities. He said:

A serious question seems now to be made, to what time Congress constitutionally termates. Until lately, I have not heard it serisly urged that twelve o'clock, on the 3d of arch at night, is not the true period. It is now sisted, however, that at twelve o'clock on the h of March is the true time; and the arguent in support of this is, that the first Coness met at twelve o'clock, on the 4th of March. is is not placing the question on the true bund; it is not when the Congress did meet, when the President was qualified by taking oath of office, but when did they have the astitutional right to meet? This certainly s, and is, in all future cases, on the 4th of sich; and if the day commence, according to universal acceptation and understanding of country, at the first moment after twelve lock at night on the 3d of March, the constiional right or power of the new Congress comness at that time; and if called by the Chief gistrate to meet at that time, they might in qualify and open their session. There and be no use in arguing away the common testanding of the country, and it would seem resonable to maintain that the 4th of March led when the first Congress adjourned, as it o say that it began when they met. From dre o'clock at night until twelve o'clock at ht is the mode of computing a day by the ple of the United States, and I do not feel horized to establish a different mode of comation for Congress. At what Lour does istmas commence? When does the first day of a year or month begins and ends at midnight, does not every other day? Congress has always neted upon the impression that the 3d of March ended at midnight; hence that setting back of clocks which we have witnessed on the 3d of March, at the termination of the short session.

"In using this argument, I do not wish to be understood as censuring those who have transacted the public business here after twelve o'clock on the 3d of March. From this error, if it be one, I claim no exemption. With a single exception, I believe, I have always remained until the final adjournment of both Houses. As to the President of the United States, he remained until after one o'clock on the 4th of March. This was making a full and fair allowance for the difference that might exist in different instruments for keeping time; and he then retired from his chamber in the Capitol. The fortification bill never passed Congress; it never was offered to him for his signature; he, therefore, can be in no fault. It was argued that many acts of Congress passed on the 4th of March, at the short session, are upon our statute books, and that these acts are valid and binding. It should be remembered that they all bear date on the 3d of March; and so high is the authenticity of our records, that, according to the rules of evidence, no testimony can be received to contradict any thing which appears upon the face of our acts.

To show the practice of the Senate, when its attention was called to the true hour, and to the fact that the fourth day of March was upon them, the author of this View, in the course of this debate, showed the history of the actual termination of the last session—the one at which the fortification bill was lost. Mr. Hill, of New Hampshire, was speaking of certain enormous printing jobs which were pressed upon the Senate in its expiring moments, and defeated after midnight; Mr. Benton asked leave to tell the secret history of this defeat; which being granted, he stood up, and said:

gistrate to meet at that time, they might a qualify and open their session. There all the no use in arguing away the common lerstanding of the country, and it would seem reasonable to maintain that the 4th of March led when the first Congress adjourned, as it is any that it began when they met. From ler c'clock at night until twelve o'clock at the hour of twelve; and thereupon addressed the presiding officer (Mr. Tyler, the President protein), to call to his attention the refractory disposition of the clock; which, in fact, had been set back by the officers of the House, according to common usage on the last night, to hide from unselves the first that our time was at an end. The presiding officer (Mr. B. said) directed an officer of the House to put forward the clock to the right time; which was done; and not another vote was taken that night, except the vote to adjourn."

This was a case, as the lawyers say, in point. It was the refusal of the Senate the very night in question, to do any thing except to give the adjourning vote after the attention of the Senate was called to the hour.

In reply to Mr. Calhoun's argument against American arming, and that such arming would be war on our side, Mr. Grundy replied:

"But it is said by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun), that, if we arm, we instantly make war: it is war. If this be so, we are placed in a most humiliating situation. Since this controversy commenced, the French nation has armed; they have increased their vessels of war; they have equipped them; they have enlisted or pressed additional scamen into the public service; they have appointed to the command of this large naval force one of their most experienced and renowned naval officers; and this squadron, thus prepared, and for what particular purpose we know not, is now actually in the neighborhood of the American coast. I admit this proceeding on the part of the French government is neither war, nor just cause of war on our part; but, seeing this, shall we be told if we do similar acts, designed to defend our own country, we are making war? As I understand the public law, every nation has the right to judge for itself of the extent of its own military and naval armaments, and no other nation has a right to complain or call it in question. It appears to me that, although the preparations and armaments of the French government are matters not to be excepted to, still they should admonish us to place our country in a condition in which it could be defended in the event the present difficulties between the 'wo nations should lead to hostilities."

In the course of the debate the greater part of the opposition senators declared their intention to sustain measures of defence; on which Mr. Benton congratulated the country, and said:

"A good consequence had resulted from an unpleasant debate. All parties had disclaimed the merit of sinking the fortification bill of the last session, and a majority had evinced a determination to repair the evil by voting adequate appropriations now. This was good. It besoke better results in time to come, and would dispel that illusion of divided counsels on which the French government had so largely calculated. The rejection of the three millions, and the loss of the fortification bill, had deceived France; it had led her into the mistake of supposing that we viewed every question in a mertantile point of view; that the question of profit and loss was the only rule we had to go by that national honor was no object; and that obtain these miserable twenty-five millions francs, we should be ready to submit to a quantity of indignity, and to wade through an depth of national humiliation. The dehan which has taken place will dispel that illusion and the first dispatch which the young A miral Mackau will have to send to his gonment will be to inform it that there has been mistake in this business—that these America wrangle among themselves, but unite against foreigners; and that many opposition senator are ready to vote double the amount of twenty-five millions to put the country in condition to sustain that noble sentiment President Jackson, that the honor of his con try shall never be stained by his making apology for speaking truth in the performance of duty."

France and the United tates had four ht together against Great Britain; ow Great Britain steps between France and the United States to prevent them from fightag each other. George the Third received the ombined attacks of French and Americans; his william the Fourth, interposes to prevent heir arms from being turned against each other. t was a noble intervention, and a just return or the good work of the Emperor Alexander in fering his mediation between the United States od Great Britain-good works these peace melations, and as nearly divine as humanity can each;-worthy of all praise, of long rememrance, and continual imitation; - the more so this case of the British mediation when the seat to be prevented would have been so favorble to British interests-would have thrown ecommerce of the United States and of France to her hands, and en iched her at the expense both. Happily the range of the age which, cultivating good will serong nations, elevates rat powers above all selfishness, and permits no friendly recollection—no selfish calculation balk the impulsions of a noble philanthropy. I have made a copious chapter upon the subttof this episodical controversy with France more full, it might seem, than the subject reired seeing its speedy and happy terminan: but not without object. Instructive sons result from this history; both from the ench and American side of it. The wrong to United States came from the French chamof deputies—from the opposition part of it, prosed of the two extremes of republicans legitimists, deadly hostile to each other, but plined in any attempt to embarrass a king om both wished to destroy: and this French osition inflamed the question there. In the ited States there was also an opposition, comed of two, lately hostile parties (the modern igs and the southern dissatisfied democracy); this opposition, dominant in the Senate, and strating the President's measures, gave enragement to the French opposition: and the together, brought their respective countries be brink of war. The two oppositions are consible for the hostile attitude to which the two countries were brought. That this is not a harsh opinion, nor without foundation, may be seen by the history which is given of the case in the chapter dedicated to it; and if more is wanting, it may be found in the recorded debates of the day; in which things were said which were afterwards regretted; and which, being regretted, the author of this View has no desire to repeat:-the instructive lesson of history which he wishes to inculcate, being complete without the exhumntion of what ought to remain buried. Nor can the steadiness and firmness of President Jackson be overlooked in this reflective view. In all the aspects of the French question he remained inflexible in his demand for justice, and in his detrmination, so far as it depended upon him to have it. In his final message, communicating to congress the conclusion of the affair, he gracefully associated congress with himself in their joy at the restoration of the ancient cordial relations between two countries, of ancient friendship, which misconceptions had temporarily alienated from each other.

CHAPTER CXXXIV.

PRESIDENT JACKSON'S FOREIGN DIPLOMACY.

A VIEW of President Jackson's foreign diplomacy has been reserved for the last year of his administration, and to the conclusion of his longest, latest, and most difficult negotiation; and is now presented in a single chapter, giving the history of his intercourse with foreign nations. From no part of his administration was more harm apprehended, by those who dreaded the election of General Jackson, than from this source. From his military character they feared embroilments; from his want of experience as a diplomatist, they feared mistakes and blunders in our foreign intercourse. These apprehensions were very sincerely entertained by a large proportion of our citizens; but, as the event proved, entirely without foundation. No part of his administration, successful, beneficial, and honorable as it was at home, was more successful, beneficial and honorable than that of his foreign diplomacy. He obtained indemnities for all outrages committed on our commerce before his time, and none were committed during his time. He made good commercial treaties with some nations from which they could not be obtained before-settled some long-standing and vexatious questions; and left the whole world at peace with his country, and engaged in the good offices of trade and hospitality. A brief detail of actua' courrences will justify this general and agrable statement.

1. THE DIRECT TRADE WITH THE BRITISH WEST INDIES .- I have already shown, in a separate chapter, the recovery, in the first year of his administration, of this valuable branch of our commerce, so desirable to us from the nearness of those islands to our shore, the domestic productions which they took from us, the cmployment it gave to our navigation, the extual large amount of the trade, the acceptable articles it gave in return, and its satisfactory establishment on a durable basis after fifty years of interrupted, and precarious, and restricted enjoyment: and I add nothing more on that head. I proceed to new cases of indemnities obtained, or of new treaties formed.

2. At the head of these stands the FRENCH IN-DEMNITY TREATY .- The commerce of the United States had suffered greatly under the decrees of the Emperor Napoleon, and redress had been sought by every administration, and in vain, from that of Mr. Madison to that of Mr. John Quincy Adams, inclusively. President Jackson determined from the first moment of his administration to prosecute the claims on France with vigor; and that not only as a matter of right, but of policy. There were other secondary powers, such as Naples and Spain, subject to the same kind of reclamation, and which had sheltered their refusal behind that of France; and with some show of reason, as France, besides having committed the largest depredation, was the origin of the system under which they acted, and the inducing cause of their conduct. France was the strong power in this class of wrongdoers, and as such was the one first to be dealt with. In his first annual message to the two Houses of Congress, President Jackson brought this subject before that body, and disclosed his own policy in relation to it. He took up the question as one of undeniable wrong which had already griven rise to much unpleasant discussion, and which might lead to possible collision between the two governments; and expressed a son, after a just congratulation on putting confident hope that the injurious delays of the past would find a redress in the equity of the future. This was pretty clear language, and stood for something in the message of a President dent whose maxim of foreign policy was, to "as nothing but what was right, and to submit to nothing that was wrong." At the same time Mr. William C. Rives, of Virginia, was put Paris as minister plenipotentiary and euroves traordinary, and especially charged with this clamation. His mission was successful; and the commencement of the session 1831-32 de President had the gratification to communication to both Houses of Congress and to submit to the Senate for its approbation, the treaty what closed up this long-standing head of compliant against an ancient ally. The French govern ment agreed to pay twenty-five millions of frame to American citizens "for (such was the language of the treaty) unlawful seizures, captures, questrations, confiscations or destruction of the vessels, cargoes or other property;" subject to deduction of one million and a half of francis claims of French citizens, or the royal treasur for "ancient supplies or accounts," or for m clamations on account of commercial injury Thus all Arcerican claims for spoliation in time of the Emperor Napoleon were acknow ledged and agreed to be satisfied, and the knowledgment and agreement for satisfaction made in terms which admitted the illegality injustice of the acts in which they originate At the same time all the French claims we the United States, from the time of our rewi tion, of which two (those of the heirs of Be marchais and of the Count Rochambeau) been a subject of reclamation for forty year were satisfied. The treaty was signed July # 1831, one year after the accession of Louis Phi lippe to the French throne-and to the min desire of the new king (under the circumstant of his elevation) to be on good terms with United States; and to the good offices of General Lafavette, then once more influential in councils of France, as well as to the zealous ertions of our minister, the auspicious conclusi of this business is to be much attributed. I indemnity payable in six annual equal ins ments, was satisfactory to government and the claimants; and in communicating information tion of the treaty to Congress, President July

It so happened that the French legislachambers refused to vote appropriations ssary to carry the treaty into effect. An monions correspondence between the two emments took place, becoming complicated resentment on the part of France for some ressions, which she found to be disrespectful, message of President Jackson. The French ister was recalled from the United States; American minister received his passport; reprisals were recommended to Congress he President. But there was no necessity them. Davish Treaty.—This was a convention demaity for spoliations on Americar compounding the spoliation of the spoliation of

of Mr. Madison s. They consisted of illegal seizures and illegal condemnations or confiscations of American vessels and their cargoes in Danish ports, during the time when the British orders in council and the French imperial decrees were devastating the commerce of neutral nations, and subjecting the weaker powers of Europe to the course of policy which the two great belligerent powers had adopted. The termination of the great European contest, and the return of nations to the accustomed paths of commercial intercourse and just and friendly relations, furnished a suitable opportunity for the United States, whose citizens had suffered so much, to demand indemnity for these injuries. The demand had been made, and had been followed up with zeal during each succeeding administration, but without effect, until the administration of Mr. John Quincy Adams. During that administration, and in the hands of the American Chargé d'Affaires (Mr. Henry Wheaton), the negotiation made encouraging progress. General Jackson did not change the negotiator-did not incur double expense, a year's delay, and substitute a raw for a ripe minister-and the negotiation went on to a speedy and prosperous conclusion. The treaty was concluded in March, 1830, and extended to a complete settlement of all questions of reclamation on both sides. The Danish government renounced all pretension to the claims which it had preferred, and agreed to pay the sum of six hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the government of the United States, to be by it distributed among the American claimants. This convention, which received the immediate ratification of the President and Scnato, terminated all differences with a friendly p wer, with whom the United States never had any but kind relations (these spoliations excepted), and whose trade to her West India islands, lying at our door, and taking much of our domestic productions, was so desirable to us.

4. Neapolitan Indemnity Treaty.—When Murat was King of Naples, and acting upon the system of his brother-in-law, the Emperor Napolec, he seized and confiscated many vessels and their cargoes, belonging to citizens of the United States. The years 1800, 1810, 1811 and 18:2 were the periods of these wrongs. Efforts had been made under each administration, from Mr. Madison to Mr. John Quincy Adams, to obtain redress, but in vain. Among others, the special mission of

Mr. William Pinkney, the eminent crator and jurist, was instituted in the last year of Mr. Madison's administration, exclusively charged, at that court, with soliciting indemnity for the Murat spoliations. A Bourbon was then upon the throne, and this 'legitimate,' considering Murat as an usurper who had taken the kingdom from its proper owners, and done more harm to them than to any body else, was naturally averse to ing compensation to other ous acts. This repugnance nations for his in had found an exc se in the fact that France, the great original wrongdoer in all these spoliations, and under whose lead and protection they were all committed, had not yet been brought to acknowledge the wrong and to make satisfaction. The indemnity treaty with France, in July 1831, put an end to this excuse; and the fact of the depredations being clear, and the law of nations indisputably in our favor, a further and more carnest appeal was m le to the Neapolitan government. Mr. John Nelson, of Maryland, was appointed United States Chargé to Naples, and concluded a convention for the payment of the claims. The sum of two millions one hundred and fifteen thousand Neapolitan ducats was stipulated to be paid to the United States government, to be by it distributed among the claimants; and, being entirely satisfactory, the convention immediately received the American ratification. Thus, another head of injury to our citizens, and of twenty years' standing, was settled by General Jackson, and in a case in which the strongest prejudice and the most reolting repugnance had to be overcome. Murat had been shot by order of the Neapolitan king. for attempting to recover the kingdom; he was deemed a usurper while he had it; the exiled royal family thought themselves sufficiently wronged by him in their own persons, without being made responsible for his wrongs to others: and although bound by the law of nations to answer for his conduct while king in point of fact, yet for almost twenty years-from their rescoration in 1814 to 1832-they had resisted and repulsed the incessant and just demands of the United States. Considering the sacrifice of pride, as well as the large compensation, which this branch of the Bourbons had to make in paying a bill of damages against an intrusive king of the Bonaparte dynasty, and this indemnity bbtained from Naples in the third year of General interference. Faithful to his principle w

Jackson's first presidential term, which hadin refused to his three predecessors-Messra W. son. Monroe and John Quincy Adams-mar looked upon as one of the most remarkable his diplomatic successes.

SPANISH INDEMNITY TREATY.-The of 1819 with Spain, by which we gained Flori and lost Texas, and paid five millions of deal to our own citizens for Spanish spoliation settled up all demands upon that power up that time; but fresh causes of complaints grew up. All the Spanish-American states become independent-had established their forms of government-and commenced police and commercial communications with all world. Spanish policy revolted at this of colonies from its hands; and although un to subdue the new governments, was able to fuse to acknowledge their independent to issue paper blockades, and to seize and fiscate the American merchant vessels to to the new states. In this way much de had been done to American commerce even the brief interval between the date of the to of 1819 and General Jackson's election to presidency, ten years thereafter. A new line claims for spoliations had grown up; and of the early acts of the new President was intstitute a mission to demand indemnity. Cornelius Van Ness, of New-York, was minister appointed; and having been refuse his first application, and given an account of refusal to his government, President Ja dispatched a special messenger to the American minister at Madrid, with instructions. 4 more" to bring the subject to the consider of the Spanish government; informing Com at the same time, that he had made his last mand; and that, if justice was not done would bring the case before that body, "B constitutional judge of what was proper to done when negotiation fails to obtain refre wrongs." But it was not found necessary bring the case before Congress. On se examination of the claims presented and for enforcement of which the power of the a ment had been invoked, it was found that had occurred in this case what often takes in reclamation upon foreign powers; that d were preferred which were not founded in in and which were not entitled to the presidential term, which had be ree predecessors—Messa, Ma d John Quincy Adams—may one of the most remarkable successes.

He said: "Faithful to the princiof asking nothing but what was clearly right, ditional instructions have been sent to modify demands, so as to embrace those only on ich according to the laws of nations, we had trict right to insist upon." Under these moted instructions a treaty of indemnity was eduded (February, 1834), and the sum of elve millions of reals vellon stipulated to be id to the government of the United States, for tribution among the claimants. Ressian Commercial Treaty.—Our reions with Russia had been peculiar—politiir, always friendly; commercially, always ral—yet, no treaty of amity, commerce, and igation, to assure these advantages and guarte their continuance. The United States had n sought such a treaty. Many special misas and of the most eminent citizens, and at ious times, and under different administraas, and under the Congress of the confederabefore there was any administration, had a instituted for that purpose—that of Mr. neis Dana of Massachusetts (under whom young John Quincy Adams, at the age of sixteen, served his diplomatic apprenticeship as private secretary), in 1784, under the old Congress; that of Mr. Rufus King, under the first Mr. Adams; that of Mr. John Quincy Adams, Mr. Albert Gallatin, Mr. James A. Bayard, and Mr. William Pinkney, under Mr. Monroe; that of Mr. George Washington Campbell, and Mr. Henry Middleton, under Mr. Monroe (the latter continued under Mr. John Quincy Adams); and all in vain. For some cause, never publicly explained, the guaranty of a treaty had been constantly declined, while the actual advantages of the most favorable one had been constantly extended to vs. A convention with us for the definition of boundaries on the northwest coast of America, and to stipulate for mutual freedom of fishing and navigation in the North Pacific Ocean, had been readily agreed upon by the Emperor Alexander, and wisely, as by separating his claims, he avoided such controversies as afterwards grew up between the United States and Great Britain, on account of their joint occupation; but no commercial treaty. Every thing clse was all that our interest could ask, or her friendship e-tend. Reciprocity of diplomatic intercou. a fully established; ministers regularly appointed to reside with us-and those of my time (I speak only of those who came within my Thirty Years' View), the Chevalier de Politica, the Baron Thuyl, the Baron Krudener, especially the one that has remained los among us, and has married an American lady, M. Alexandre de Bodisco-all of a personal character and deportment to be most agreeable to our government and citizens, well fitted to represent the feelings of the most friendly sovereigns, and to promote and maintain the most courteous and amicable intercourse between the two countries. The Emperor Alexander had signally displayed his good will in offering his mediation to terminate the war with Great Britain; and still further, in consenting to become arbitrator between the United States and Great Britain in settling their difference in the construction of the Ghent treaty, in the article relating to fugitive and deported slaves. We enjoyed in Russian ports all the commercial privileges of the most favored nation; but it was by an unfixed tenure -at the will of the reigning sovereign; and the interests of commerce required a more stable guaranty. Still, up to the commencement of General Jackson's administration, there was no American treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation with that great power. The attention of President Jackson was early directed to this anomalous point; and Mr. John Randolph of Roanoke, then retired from Congress, was induced, by the earnest persuasions of the President, and his Secretary of State, Mr. Van Buren, to accept the place of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Court of St. Petersburg-to renew the applications for the treaty which had so long been made in vain. Repairing to that post, Mr. Randolph found that the rigors of a Russian climate were too severe for the texture of his fragile constitution; and was soon recalled at his own request. Mr. James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, was then appointed in his place; and by him the long-desired treaty was concluded, December, 1832the Count Nesselrode the Russian negotiator, and the Emperor Nicholas the reigning sovereign. It was a treaty of great moment to the United States; for, although it added nothing to the commercial privileges actually enjoyed. yet it gave stability to their enjoyment; and so imparted confidence to the enterprise of merchants. It was limited to seven years' duration. but with a clause of indefinite continuance, subject to termination upon one year's notice from either party. Near twenty years have elapsed: no notice for its termination has ever been given; and the commerce between the two countries feels all the advantages resulting from stability and national guaranties. And thus was obtained, in the first term of General Jackson's administration, an important treaty with a great power, which all previous administrations and the Congress of the Confederation had been unable to obtain.

7. Portuguese Indemnity.—During the years 1829 and '30, during the blockade of Terceira, several illegal seizures were made of American vessels, by Portuguese men-of-war, for alleged violations of the blockade. The United States charge d'affairs at Lisbon, Mr. Thomas L. Brent, was charged with the necessary reclamations, and had no difficulty in coming to an amicable adjustment. Indemnity in the four cases of seizure was agreed upon in March, 1832, and payment in instalments stipulated to be made. There was default in all the instalments after the first—not from bad faith, but from total inability—although the instalments were, in a national point of view, of amount. It deserves to be recorded, as an stance of the want to which a kingdom, who very name had been once the synonym of regions and diamond mines, may be reduced wretched government, that in one of the in views of the American charge (then Mr. ward Kavanagh), with the Portuguese Minis of Finance, the minister told him "that no m sons in the employment of the government cept the military, had been paid any part their salaries for a long time; and that on the day, there was not one hundred dollars in treasury." In this total inability to par, with the fact of having settled fairly, furt time was given antil the first day of Ju 1837; when full and final payment was made the satisfaction of the claimants.

Indemnity was made to the claimants by lowing interest on the delayed payments, an advantage was granted to an article of h rican commerce by admitting rice of the Unit States in Portuguese ports at a reducel de The whole amount paid was about $1400 which included damages to some other was and compensation to the seamen of the tured vessels for imprisonment and loss clothes-the sum of about $1,600 for these ter items-so carefully and minutely were rights of American citizens guarded in Jacks Some other claims on Portugal sidered as doubtful, among them the case of brave Captain Reid, of the privateer Gen Armstrong, were left open for future prose tion, without prejudice from being omitted the settlement of the Terceira claims, wh were a separate class.

The Turkish dominions include what was once nearly the me half of the Roman world, and countries which had celebrity before Rome was founded. sarred and profane history had given these dominions a venerable interest in our eyes. They govered the seat which was the birth-place of he human race, the cradle of the Christian reigion; the early theatre of the arts and sciences; od contained the city which was founded by the est Roman Christian emperor. Under good govmment it had always been the seat of rich comerce and of great wealth. Under every prect was desirable to the United States to have its ntial political and commercial intercourse with se dominions placed on a safe and stable footunder the guaranty of treaty stipulations; and s object was now accomplished. These were general considerations; particular and recent cumstances gave them additional weight.

Mr. and completed the negotiation, though the her gentlemen joined in the signature of the aty. By the provisions of this treaty, our de with the Turkish dominions was placed the footing of the most favored nation; and ing without limitation as to time, may be sidered as perpetual, subject only to be abated by war, in itself improbable, or by other ents not to be expected. The right of passing Dardanelles and of navigating the Black Sea secured to our merchant ships, in ballast or th cargo, and to carry the products of the ited States and of the Ottoman empire, exthe prohibited articles. The flag of the ited States was to be respected. Factors, or mercial brokers, of any religion were allowed be employed by our merchants. Consuls re placed on a footing of security, and traing with passports was protected. Fairness monizing people long estranged from each other.

and justice in suits and litigations were provided for. In questions between a citizen of the United States and a subject of the Sublime Porte, the parties were not to be heard, nor judgment pronounced, unless the American interpreter (dragoman) was present. In questions between American citizens the trial was to be before the United States minister or consul. "Even when they (the American citizens, so runs the fourth article), shall have committed some offence, they shall not be arrested and put in prison by the local authorities, but shall be tried by the minister or consul, and punished according to the offence." By this treaty all that was granted to other nations by the treaty of Adrianople is also granted to the United States, with the additional stipulation, to be always placed on the footing of the most favored nation-a stipulation wholly independent of the treaty exacted by Russia at Adrianople as the fruit of victories, and of itself equivalent to a full and liberal treaty; and the whole guaranteed by a particular treaty with ourselves, which makes us independent of the general treaty of Adrianople. A spirit of justice, liberality and kindness runs through it. Assistance and protection is to be given throughout the Turkish dominions to American wrecked vessels and their crews; and all property recovered from a wreck is to be delivered up to the American consul of the nearest port, for the benefit of the owners. Ships of war of the two countries are to exhibit towards each other friendly and courteous conduct, and Turkish ships of war are to treat American merchant vessels with kindness and respect. This treaty has now been in force near twenty years, observed with perfect good faith by each, and attended by all the good consequences expected from it. The valuable commerce of the Black Sea, and of all the Turkish ports of Asia Minor, Europe and Africa (once the finest part of the Roman world), travelling, residence, and the pursuit of business throughout the Turkish dominions, are made as safe to our citizens as in any of the European countries; and thus the United States, though amongst the youngest in the amily of nations, besides securing particular advantages to her own citizens, has done her part in bringing those ancient countries into the system of modern European commercial policy, and in har-

9. RENEWAL OF THE TREATY WITH MOROCco.-A treaty had been made with this power in the time of the old Congress under the Confederation; and it is honorable to Morocco to see in that treaty, at the time when all other powers on the Barbary coast deemed the property of a Christian, lawful prey, and his person a proper subject for captivity, entering into such stipulations as these following, with a nation so young as the United States: "Neither party to take commissions from an enemy; persons and property captured in an enemy's vessel to be released; American citizens and effects to be restored; stranded vessels to be protected; vessels engaged in gunshot of forts to be protected; enemies' vessels not allowed to follow out of port for twenty-four hours; American commerce to be an the most favored footing; exchange of prisoners in time of war; no compulsion in buying or selling goods; no examination of goods on board, except contraband was proved; no detention of vessels; disputes between Americans to be settled by their consuls, and the consul assisted when necessary; killing punished by the law of the country; the effects of persons dying intestate to be taken care of, and delivered to the consul, and, if no consul, to be deposited with some person of trust; no appeal to arms unless refusal of friendly arrangements: in case of war, nine months to be allowed to citizens of each power residing in the dominions of the other to settle their affairs and remove." This treaty, made in 1787, was the work of Benjamin Franklin (though absent at the signature), John Adams, at London, and Thomas Jefferson, at Paris, acting through the agent, Thomas Barclay, at Fez; and was written with a plainness, simplicity and beauty, which I have not seen equalled in any treaty, between any nations, before or since. It was extended to fifty years, and renewed by General Jackson, in the last year of his administration, for fifty years more; and afterwards until twelve months' notice of a desire to abridge it should be given by one of the parties. The resident American consul at Tangier, Mr. James R. Leib, negotiated the renewal; and all the parties concerned had the good taste to preserve the style and language of the original throughout. It will stand, both for the matter and the style, a monument to the honor of our early statesmen.

CHAPTER CXXXV.

SLAVERY AGITATION.

It is painful to see the unceasing efforts to arm the South by imputations against the orth of unconstitutional designs on the subject davery. You are right, I have no doubt, in liering that no such intermeddling disposition in the body of our Northern brethren. eir good faith is aufficiently guaranteed by interest they have as morchants, as ship mers, and as manufacturers, in preserving a ion with the slaveholding States. On the er hand what madness in the South to look greater safety in disunion. It would be se than jumping into the fire for fear of the ing pan. The danger from the alarms is, that pride and resentment exerted by them may movermatch for the dictates of prudence; favor the project of a Southern convention. dously revived, as promising by its councils. best securities against grievances of every sort the North."-So wrote Mr. Madison to Mr. in June 1833. It is a writing every word hich is matter for grave reflection, and the at the head of all. It is dated just three the after the tariff "compromise" of 1833, th in arranging the tariff question for nine n was supposed to have quieted the South stan end to agitation, and to the idea of a them convention-and given peace and hary to the whole Union. Not so the fact-at not so the fact in South Carolina. Agitadid not cease there on one point, before it n on another: the idea of a Southern conion for one cause, was hardly abandoned nitwas "insidiously revived" upon another. the language of Mr. Madison in qualifying revival with a term of odious import: for an was a better master of our language than ns-no one more scrupulously just in all udgments upon men and things-and no occupying a position either personally, polly, or locally, to speak more advisedly on ubject of which he spoke. He was pained the efforts to alarm the South on the subof slavery, and the revival of the project for them convention; and he feared the effect resentment of Southern people. His letter was not to a neighbor, or to a citizen in private life, but to a public man on the theatre of national action, and one who had acted a part in composing national difficulties. It was evidently written for a purpose. It was in answer to Mr. Clay'a expressed belief, that no design hostile to Southern slavery existed in the body of the Northern people—to concur with him in that belief—and to give him warning that the danger was in another quarter—in the bouth likelf; and that it looked to a dissolution of the Union. It was to warn an eminent public man of a new source of national danger, more alarming than the one he had just been composing.

About the same time, and to an old and confidential friend (Edward Coles, Esq., who had been his private secretary when President), Mr. Madison also wrote: "On the other hand what more dangerous than nullification, or more evident than the progress it continues to make, either in its original shape or in the disguises it assumes? Nullifleation has the effect of putting powder under the constitution and the Union, and a match in the hand of every party to blow them up at pleasure. And for its progress, hearken to the tone in which it is now preached: cast your eyes on its increasing minorities in the most of the Southern States, without a decrease in any of them. Look at Virginia herself, and read in the gazettes, and in the proceedings of popular meetings, the figure which the anarchical principle now makes, in contrast with the scouting reception given to it but a short time ago. It is not probable that this offspring of the discontents of South Carolina will ever approach success in a majority of the States: but a susceptibility of the contagion in the Southern States is visible: and the danger not to be concealed, that the sympathy arising from known causes, and the inculcated impression of a permanent incompatibility of interests between the South and the North, may put it in the power of popular lenders, aspiring to the highest stations, to unite the South on some critical occasion, in a course that will end in creating a new theatre of great though inferior interest. In pursuing this course, the first and most obvious step is nullification, the next secession, and the last a farewell separation."

its contagious influence-its fatal action upon an "inculcated incompatibility of interests" between the North and the South-its increase in the slave States - its progress, first t; secession, and then to "farewell separation:" in this view of the old danger under its new disguise, Mr. Madison, then eighty-four years old, writes with the wisdom of age, the foresight of experience, the spirit of patriotism, and the "pain" of heart which a contemplation of the division of those States excited which it had been the pride, the glory, and the labor of his life to unite. The slavery turn which was given to the Southern agitation was the aspect of the danger which filled his mind with sorrow and misgiving:-and not without reason. A paper published in Washington City, and in the interest of Mr. Calhoun, was incessant in propagating the slavery alarm-in denouncing the North-in exhorting the Southern States to unity of feeling and concert of action as the only means of saving their domestic institutions. The language had become current in some parts of the South, that it was impossible to unite the Southern States upon the tariff question: that the sugar interest in Louisiana would prevent her from joining: that it was a mistake to have made that issue: that the slavery question was the right one. And coincident with this current language were many publications, urging a Southern convention, and concert of action. Passing by all these, which might be deemed mere newspaper articles, there was one which bere the impress of thought and authenticitywhich assumed the convention to be a certainty. the time only remaining to be fixed, and the cause for it to be in full operation in the Northern States. It was published in the Charleston Mercury in 1835, -was entitled the "Crisis" -and had the formality of a manifesto; and after dilating upon the aggressions and encroachments of the North, proceeded thus:

"The proper time for a convention of the slaveholding States will be when the legislatures of Pennsylvania, Massachusetts and New-York shall have adjourned without passing laws for the suppression of the abolition societies. Should either of these States pass such laws, it would be well to wait till their efficacy should be tested. The adjournment of the legislatures of the Northern States without adopting any measures effectually to put down Garrison, Tappan and their associates, will present an issue which must be met by the South, or it will be vain for us ever after to attempt any thing further than for the State to provide for her own safety by defense measures of her own. If the issue presented to be met, it can only be done by a convention of the aggrieved States; the proceedings which, to be of any value, must embody make known the sentiments of the whole South and contain the distinct annunciation of fixed and unaltered determination to obtain to redress of our grievances, be the consequent what they may. We must have it clearly u derstood that, in framing a constitutional and with our Northern brethren, the slaveholden States consider themselves as no more liable any more interference with their domestic a cerns than if they had remained entirely in pendent of the other States, and that as a interference would, among independent paris be a just cause of war, so among members such a confederacy as ours, it must place t several States in the relation towards each of open enemies. To sum up in a few were the whole argument on this subject, we wo say that the abolitionists can only be put do by legislation in the States in which they em and this can only be brought about by the bodied opinion of the whole South, acting u public opinion at the North, which can enjy effected through the instrumentality of 40 vention of the slaveholding States."

It is impossible to read this paragraph for the "Crisis," without seeing that it is identified with Mr. Calhoun's report and speech upon cendiary publications transmitted through mail. Mr. Morris, of Ohio, presented two on that State, himself opposed to touching is subject of slavery in the States, but deeming his duty to present those which applied to be District of Columbia. Mr. Calhonn demoded that they be read; which being done,—

That the petitions just read contained goes, false, and malicious slander, on eleven ates represented on this floor, there was no an who in his heart could deny. This was, in kelf, not only good, but the highest cause why se petitions should not be received. Had it t been the practice of the Senate to reject patias which reflected on any individual member their body; and should they who were the as to be brought there, wilfully, maliciously, most wickedly, slandering so many sovereign ates of this Union? Were the States to be sprotected than individual members on that le demanded the question on receiving petitions, because they asked for what was riolation of the constitution. The question emancipation exclusively belonged to the sev-il States. Congress had no jurisdiction on subject, no more in this District than the he of South Carolina: it was a question for individual State to determine, and not to be ched by Congress. He himself well underod, and the people of his State should under-nd that this was an emancipation movement. ose who have moved in it regard this District the weak point through which the first movent should be made upon the States. We id Mr. C.), of the South, are bound to resist We will meet this question as firmly as if ere the direct question of emancipation in States. It is a movement which ought to, ich must be, arrested, in limine, or the guards the constitution will give way and be de-ored. He demanded the question on receiv-the petitions, because of the agitation which uld result from discussing the subject. The ger to be apprehended was from the agita-of the question on that floor. He did not those incendiary publications which were blated abroad, and which could easily be counteracted. But he dreaded the agitation which would rise out of the discussion in Congress on the subject. Every man knew that there existed a body of men in the Northern States who were ready to second any insurrectionary movement of the blacks; and that these men would be on the alert to turn these discussions to their advantage. He dreaded the discussion in another sense. It would have a tendency to break asunder this Union. What effect could be brought about by the interference of these petitioners? Could they expect to produce a change of mind in the Southern people? No; the effect would be directly the opposite. The more they were assailed on this point, the more closely would they cling to their institutions. And what would be the effect on the rising generation, but to inspire it with odium against those whose mistaken views and misdirected zeal menaced the peace and security of the Southern States. The effect must be to bring our institutions into odium. As a lover of the Union, he dreaded this discursion; and asked for some decided measure to arrest the course of the evil. There must, there shell be some decided step, or the Southern people never will submit. And how are we to treat the subject? By receiving these petitions one after another, and thus tampering, trifling, sporting with the feelings of the South? to no, no ! The abolitionists well understand the effect of such a course of proceeding. It will give importance to their movements, and accelerate the ends they propose. Nothing can, nothing will stop these petitions but a prompt and stern rejection of them. We must turn them away from our doors, regardless of what may be done or said. If the issue must be, let it come, and let us meet it, as, I hope, we shall be prepared to do."

This was new and extreme ground taken by Mr. Calhoun. To put the District of Columbia and the States on the same footing with respect to slavery legislation, was entirely contrary to the constitution itself, and to the whole doctrine of Congress upon it. The constitution gave to Congress exclusive jurisdiction over the District of Columbia, without limitation of subjects; but it had always refused, though often petitioned, to interfere with the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia so long as it existed in the two States (Maryland and Virginia) which ceded that District to the federal government. The doctrine of Mr. Calhoun was, therefore, new; his inference that slavery was to be attacked in the States through the opening in the District, was gratuitous; his "demand" (for that was the word he constantly used), that these petitions should be refused a reception, was a harsh motion, made in a harsh manner; his assumption that the existence of the Union was at stake, was without evidence and contrary to evidence; his remedy, in State resistance, was disunion; his eagerness to atch at an "issue," showed that he was on the watch for "issues," and ready to seize any one that would get up a contest; his language was all inflamma-duty to the State from which he came deep slaveholding States:-for the whole of which he constantly assumed to speak. Mr. Morris thus replied to him:

"In presenting these petitions he would say, on the part of the State of Ohio, that she went to the entire extent of the opinions of the senator from South Carolina on one point. We deny, said he, the power of Congress to legislate concerning local institutions, or to meddle in any way with slavery in any of the States; but we have always entertained the opinion that Congress has primary and exclusive legislation over this District; under this impression, these petitioners have come to the Senate to present their petitions. The doctrine that Congress have no power over the subject of slavery in this District is to me a new one; and it is one that will not meet with credence in the State in which I reside. I believe these petitioners have the right to present themselves here, placing their feet on the constitution of their country, when they come to ask of Congress to exercise those powers which they can legitimately exercise. I believe they have a right to be heard in their petitions, and that Congress may afterwards dispose of these petitions as in their wisdom they may think proper. Under these impressions, these petitioners come to be heard, and they have a right to be heard. Is not the right of petition a fundamental right? I believe it is a sacred and fundamental right, belonging to the people, to petition Congress for the redress of their grievances. While this right is secured by the constitution, it is incompetent to any legislative body to prescribe how the right is to be exercised, or when, or on what subject; or else this right becomes a mere mockery. If you are to tell the people that they are only to petition on this or that subject, or in this or that manner, the right of petition is but a mockery. It is true we have a right to say that no petition which is couched in disrespectful language shall be received; but I presume there is a sufficient check provided against this in the responsibility under which every senator presents a petition. Any petition conveyed in such language would always meet with his decided disapprobation. But if we deny the right of the people to petition in this instance, I would ask how far they have the right. While they believe they possess the right, no denial of it by Congress will prevent them from exercis-

Mr. Bedford Brown, of North Carolina, en. tirely dissented from the views presented by Mr. Calhoun, and considered the course he proposed, and the language which he used, exact, calculated to produce the agitation which is professed to deprecate. He said:

"He felt himself constrained, by a sense and vitally interested as she was in every thin connected with the agitating question white had unexpectedly been brought into discussion that morning, to present, in a few words, hi views as to the proper direction which should be given to that and all other petitions relating to slavery in the District of Columbia. llefe himself more especially called on to do so from the aspect which the question had assumed consequence of the motion of the gentlem from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN], to refu to receive the petition. He had believed from the first time he had reflected on this subject and subsequent events had but strengther that conviction, that the most proper disposition of all such petitions was to lay them on the table, without printing. This course, while indicated to the fanatics that Congress yield no countenance to their designs, at the same time marks them with decided reprobation by a refusal to print. But, in his estimation another reason gave to the motion to lay the on the table a decided preference over any other proceedings by which they should be met. I peculiar merit of this motion, as applicable this question, is, that it precludes all dele and would thus prevent the agitation of a si ject in Congress which all should deprecate fraught with mischief to every portion of f happy and flourishing confederacy. Mr. B. that honorable gentlemen who advocated a motion had disclaimed all intention to prohagitation on this question. He did not prete to question the sincerity of their declaration and, while willing to do every justice to the motives, he must be allowed to say that method could be devised better calculated his judgment, to produce such a result. (Mr. B.) most sincerely believed that the le interests of the Southern States would be m consulted by pursuing such a course here would harmonize the feelings of every secti and avoid opening for discussion so danger and delicate a question. He believed all senators who were present a few days si when a petition of similar character had be presented by an honorable senator, had, by the votes to lay it on the table, sanctioned course which he now suggested. [Mr. Calbo in explanation, said that himself and his league were absent from the Senate on the casion alluded to.] Mr. B. resumed his marks, and said that he had made no refer to the votes of any particular members of body, but what he had said was, that a sin retition had been laid on the table without obection from any one, and consequently by a manimous vote of the senators present. Here, then, was a most emphatic declaration, by genthemen representing the Northern States as well as those from other parts of the Union, by this rote, that they will entertain no attempt at krislation on the question of slavery in the listrict of Columbia. Why, then, asked Mr. R should we now adopt a mode of proceeding alculated to disturb the harmonious action of the Senate, which had been produced by the famer vote? Why (he would respectfully ask of honorable gentlemen who press the motion to refuse to receive the petition) and for what teneficial purpose do they press it? By perssting in such a course it would, beyond all doubt, open a wide range of discussion, it would not fail to call forth a great diversity of opinion in relation to the extent of the right to petition make the constitution. Nor would it be confided to that question alone, judging from an agression which had fallen from an honorable gatteman from Virginia [Mr. TYLER], in the ourse of this debate. That gentleman had dehred his preference for a direct negative vote the Senate, as to the constitutional power Congress to emancipate slaves in the District (Columbia. He, for one, protested, politically paking, against opening this Pandora's box in the halls of Congress. For all beneficial and ractical purposes, an overwhelming majority the members representing the Northern ales were, with the South, in opposition to ny interference with slavery in the District of dumbia. If there was half a dozen in both ranches of Congress who did not stand in enre opposition to any interference with slavery this District or elsewhere, he had yet to m it. Was it wise, was it prudent, was it gnanimous, in gentlemen representing the othern States, to urge this matter still further, d say to our Northern friends in Congress, entlemen, we all agree in the general consion, that Congress should not interfere in isquestion, but we wish to know your reasons arriving at this conclusion; we wish you to clare, by your votes, whether you arrivo at aresult because you think it unconstitutional not?' Mr. B. said that he would yield to e in zeal in sustaining and supporting, to the ent of his ability, what he believed to be the einterest of the South; but he should take re to say that, when the almost united will both branches of Congress, for all practical poses, was with us, against all interference this subject, he should not hazard the peace iquiet of the country by going on a Quixotic edition in pursuit of abstract constitutional stions."

of increasing the slavery agitation, and giving the abolitionists ground to stand upon in giving them the right of petition to defend. He said:

"This being among the Southern members a mere difference of form in the manner of disposing of the subject, I regret exceedingly that the senator from Carolina has thought it his duty (as he doubtless has) to press the subject upon the consideration of the Senate in such form as not only to permit, but in some measure to create, a necessity for the continued agitation of the subject. For he believed, with others, that nothing was better calculated to increase agitation and excitement than such motions as that of the senator from South Carolina. What was the object of the motion? Senators said, and no doubt sincerely, that their object was to quiet the agitation of the subject. Well, (said Mr. K.,) my object is precisely the same. We differ, my object is precisely the same. then, only in the means of securing a common end; and he could tell the Senators that the value of the motion as a means would likely be estimated by its tendency to secure the end desired. Would even an affirmative vote on the motion quiet the agitation of the subject? He thought, on the contrary, it would much increase it. How would it stop the agitation? What would be decided? Nothing, except it be that the Senate would not receive the particular memorial before it. Would that prevent the pre-sentation of others? Not at all; it would only increase the number, by making a new issue for debate, which was all the abolitionists wanted; or, at any rate, the most they now expected. These petitions had been coming here without intermission ever since the foundation of the government, and he could tell the senator that if they were each to be honored by a lengthy discussion on presentment, an honor not heretofore granted to them, they would not only contime to come here, but they would thicken upon us so long as the government remained in existence. We may seek occasions (said Mr. K.) to rave about our rights; we may appeal to the guaranties of the constitution, which are denied; we may speak of the strength of the South, and pour out unmeasured denunciations against the North; we may threaten vengeance against the abolitionists, and menace a dissolution of the Union, and all that; and thus exhausting ourselves mentally and physically, and setting down to applaud the spirit of our own efforts, Arthur Tappan and his pious fraternity would very coolly remark: 'Well, that is precisely what I wanted; I wanted agitation in the South; I wished to provoke the "aristocratic slaveholder" to make extravagant demands on the North, which the North could not consistently surrender them. I wished them, under the pretext of securing their own rights, to encroach upon the rights of all the American people. In short, I wish to change the issue; upon the present boun pursued, and charging upon it the effect issue we are dead. Every movement, every demonstration of feeling among our own people, shows that upon the present issue the great body of the people is against us. The issue must be changed or the prospects of abolition are at an end.' This language (Mr. K. said) was not conjectured, but there was much evidence of its truth. Sir (said Mr. K.), if Southera senators were actually in the pay of the abolition directory on Nassan-street they could not more effectually co-operate in the views and administer to the wishes of these enemies to the peace and quiet of our country.'

Mr. Calhoun was dissatisfied at the speeches of Mr. Brown and Mr. King, and considered them as dividing and distracting the South in their opposition to his motion, while his own course was to keep them united in a case where union was so important, and in which they stood but a handful in the midst of an overwhelming majority. He said:

"I have heard with deep mortification and regret the speech of the senator from Georgia; not that I suppose that his arguments can have much impression in the South, but because of their tendency to divide and distract the Southern delegation on this, to us, all-momentous question. We are here but a handful in the midst of an overwhelming majority. It is the duty of every member from the South. on this great and vital question, where union is so important to those whom we represent, to avoid every thing calculated to divide or distract our ranks. 1 (said Mr. C.), the Senate will bear witness, have, in all that I have said on this subject, been careful to respect the feelings of Southern members who have differed from me in the policy to be pursued. Having thus acted, on my part, I must express my surprise at the harsh expressions, to say the least, in which the senator from Georgia has indulged."

The declaration of this overwhelming majority against the South brought a great number of the non-slaveholding senators to their feet, to declare the concurrence of their States with the South upon the subject of slavery, and to depreciate the abolitionists as few in number in any of the Northern States; and discountenanced, reprobated and repulsed wherever they were found. Among these, Mr. Isaac Hill of New Hampshire, thus spoke:

"I do not (said he) object to many of the positions taken by senators on the abstract question of Northern interference with slavery in the South. But I do protest against the excitement that is attempted on the floor of Congress, to be kept up against the North. I do protest against the array that is made here of the acts of a few misguided fanatics as the acts of the ligious institutions subservient to political

There is no course that will better suit the few Northern fanatics than the agitation of the question of slavery in the halls of Congressnothing will please them better than the discussions which are taking place, and a solemn to of either branch denying them the right to po fer petitions here, praying that slavery may h abolished in the District of Columbia. Ad nial of that right at once enables them, and n without color of truth, to cry out that the con test going on is 'a struggle between power and

"Believing the intentions of those who has moved simultaneously to get up these petition at this time, to be mischief, I was glad to the first petition that came in here laid on the table without discussion, and without referen to any committee. The motion to lay on the table precludes all debate; and, if decided affected affected matively, prevents agitation. It was with the view of preventing agitation of this subject the I moved to lay the second set of petitions the table. A senator from the South (Mr. Ch houn) has chosen a different course; he has terposed a motion which opens a debate in may be continued for months. He has chose to agitate this question; and he has present that question, the decision of which, let senate vote as they may, will best please the agitate who are urging the fanatics forward.

"I have said the people of the North we more united in their opposition to the plans the advocates of antislavery, than on any oil subject. This opposition is confined to no poli cal party; it pervades every class of the comin nity. They deprecate all interference with subject of slavery, because they believe such terference may involve the existence and m fare of the Union itself, and because they undestand the obligations which the non-slavehold States owe to the slaveholding States by compact of confederation. It is the strong sire to perpetuate the Union; it is the deter nation which every patriotic and virtuous citi has made, in no event to abandon the 'ark our safety,' that now impels the united No to take its stand against the agitators of antislavery project. slavery movement, which brings m various parts of the country to abolish slavery in the Dist originates with a few persons to the habit of making charitals autions subservient to politically pset, and who have even controlled some of these charitable associations. The petitions are set on foot by men who have had, and who continue to have, influence with ministers and religious teachers of different denominations. They have issued and sent out their circulars alling for a united effort to press on Congress the abolition of slavery in this District. Many of the clergymen who have been instruments of the agitators, have done so from no bad moive. Some of them, discovering the purpose of the agitators-discovering that their labors were calculated to make the condition of the slave worse, and to create animosity between the people of the North and the South, have paused in their course, and desisted from the further application of a mistaken philanthropy. Others, having enlisted deeply their feelings, still pure the unprofitable labor. They present here the names of inconsiderate men and women, any of whom do not know, when they subcribe their papers, what they are asking; and thers of whom, placing implicit faith in their eligious teacher, are taught to believe they are hereby doing a work of disinterested benevoeace, which will be requited by rewards in a uture life.

"off all the vehicles, tracts, pamphlets, and exspapers, printed and circulated by the abotionists, there is no ten or twenty of them that have contributed so much to the excitetat as a single newspaper printed in this city. used not name this paper when I inform you at for the last five years, it has been laboring produce a Northern and Southern party—to a the flame of sectional prejudice—to open ider the breach, to drive harder the wedge, hich shall divide the North from the South is the newspaper which, in 1831-'2, strove to take that state of things, in relation to the lift, which would produce inevitable collision tween the two sections of the country, and bich urged to that crisis in South Carolina, minating in her deep disgrace—

"[Mr. Calboun here interrupted Mr. Hill, and like him to order. Mr. H. took his seat, and r. Hubbard (being in the chair) decided that remarks of Mr. H. did not impugn the motes of any man—they were only descriptive the effects of certain proceedings upon the ate of South Carolina, and that he was not tof order.]

"Mr. H. resumed: It is the newspaper which memns or ridicules the well-meant efforts of officer of the government to stop the circuston of incendiary publications in the slave-king States, and which designedly magnifies taumber and the efforts of the Northern abolitionists. It is the newspaper which libels the whole North by representing the almost united people of that region to be insincere in their efforts to prevent the mischief of a few fanatical and misguided persons who are engaged in the abolition cause.

"I have before me a copy of this newspaper (the United States Telegraph), filled to the brim with the exciting subject. It contains, among other things, a speech of an honorable senator (Mr. Leigh of Virginia), which I shall not be surprised soon to learn has been issued by thousands and tens of thousands from the abolition mint at New-York, for circulation in the South. Surely the honorable senator's speech, containing that part of the Channing pamphlet, is most likely to move the Southern slaves to a servile war, at the same time the Channing extracts and the speech itself are most admirably calculated to awaken the fears or arouse the indignation of their masters. The circulation of such a speech will effect the object of the abolitionists without trenching upon their funds. Let the agitation be kept up in Congress, and let this newspaper be extensively circulated in the South, filled with such speeches and such extracts as this exhibits, and little will be left for the Northern abolitionists to do. They need do no more than send in their petitions: the late printer of the Senate and his friends in Congress, will create enough of excitement to effect every object of those who direct the movements of the abolitionists."

At the same moment that these petitions were presented in the Senate, their counterparts were presented in the House, with the same declarations from Northern representatives in favor of the rights of the South, and in depreciation of the number and importance of the abolitionists in the North. Among these, Mr. Franklin Pierce, of New Hampshire, was one of the most emphatic on both points. He said:

"This was not the last memorial of the same character which would be sent here. It was perfectly apparent that the question must be met now, or at some future time, fully and explicitly, and such an expression of this House given as could leave no possible room to doubt as to the opinions and sentiments entertained by its members. He (Mr. P.), indeed, considered the overwhelming vote of the House, the other day, laying a memorial of similar tenor, and, he believed, the same in terms, upon the table, as fixing upon it the stamp of reprobation. He supposed that all sections of the country would be satisfied with that expression; but gentlemen seemed now to consider the vote as equivocal and evasive. He was unwilling that any imputation should rest upon the North, in consequence of the misguided and fanatical zeal of a few-comparatively very few-who, however honest might have been their purposes, he believed had done incalculable mischief, and whose movements, he knew, received no more sanction among the great mass of the people of the North, than they did at the South. For one. he (Mr. P.), while he would be the last to infringe upon any of the sacred reserved rights of the people, was prepared to stamp with disapprobation, in the most express and unequivocal terms, the whole movement upon this subject. Mr. P. said he would not resume his seat without tendering to the gent.eman from Virginia (Mr. Mason), just and generous as he always was, his acknowledgments for the admission frankly made in the opening of his remarks. He had said that, during the period that he had occupied a seat in this House (as Mr. P. understood him), he had never known six men seriously disposed to interfere with the rights of the slaveholders at the South. Sir, said Mr. P., gentlemen may be assured there was no such disposition as a general sentiment prevailing among the people; at least he felt confidence in asserting that, among the people of the State which he had the honor in part to represent, there was not one in a hundred who did not entertain the most sacred regard for the rights of their Southern brethren-nay, not one in five hundred who would not have those rights protected at any and every hazard. There was not the slightest disposition to interfere with any rights secured by the constitution, which binds together, and which he humbly hoped ever would bind together, this great and glorious confederacy as one family. Mr. P. had only to say that, to some sweeping charges of improper interference, the action of the people of the North at home, during the last year, and the vote of their representatives here the other day, was a sufficient and conclusive answer."

The newspaper named by Mr. Hill was cutirely in the interest of Mr. Calhoun, and the course which it followed, and upon system, and incessantly to get up a slavery quarrel between the North and the South, was undeniable-every daily number of the paper containing the proof of its incendiary work. Mr. Calhoun would not reply to Mr. Hill, but would send a paper to the Secretary's table to be read in contradiction of his statements. Mr. Calhoun then handed to the Secretary a newspaper containing an article impugning the statement made by Mr. Pierce, in the House of Representatives, as to the small number of the abolitionists in the State of New Hampshire; which was read, and which contained scurrilous reflections on Mr. Pierce, and severe strictures on the state of slavery in the South. Mr. Hill asked for the title of the newspaper; and it was given, "The Herald of as if an abolition newspaper was better author

Freedom." Mr. Hill said it was an abolita paper, printed, but not circulated, at Concern New Hampshire. He said the same paper ha been sent to him, and he saw in it one of Me Calhoun's speeches; which was republished good food for the abolitionists; and said h thought the Senate was well employed in listen ing to the reading of disgusting entracts from an hireling abolition paper, for the purpose impugning the statements of a member of the House of Representatives, defending the South there, and who could not be here to defend him self. It was also a breach of parliamentary las for a member in one House to attack what wa said by a member in another. Mr. Pierce statement had been heard with great satisfaction by all except Mr. Calhoun; but to him it wa so repugnant, as invalidating his assertion of great abolition party in the North, that he coul not refrain from this mode of contradicting It was felt by all as disorderly and improper and the presiding officer then in the chair (M Hubbard, from New Hampshire) felt himsel called upon to excuse his own conduct in m having checked the reading of the article. gy han a statement from a member in his piace a the House. It happened that Mr. Pierce was soning into the Senate Chamber as this reading sene was going on; and, being greatly surgred, and feeling much aggrieved, and having to right to speak for i meself, he spoke to the wist of this View to maintain the truth of his statement against the scurrilous contradiction of it which had been read. Mr. Benton, therefore, stood up—

To say a word on the subject of Mr. Pierce, he member of the House of Representatives, from New Hampshire, whose statements in the louse of Representatives had been contradicted the newspaper article read at the Secretary's ble. He had the pleasure of an intimate acmintanc ith that gentleman, and the highest epect for him, both on his own account and that his renerable and patriotic father, who was taly Governor of New Hampshire. It had so appened (said Mr. B.) that, in the very moment the reading of this article, the member of the louse of Representatives, whose statement it atradicted, was coming into the Senate Chamer, and his whitening countenance showed the ent which that gentleman had made in the was in the highest degree consolatory al agreeable to the people of the slaveholding thes. He had said that not one in five huned in his State was in favor of the abolition-is; an expression understood by every body, as an arithmetical proposition worked out figures, but as a strong mode of declaring at these abolitionists were few in number. that sense it was understood, and was a most come and agreeable piece of information to people of the slaveholding States. The repaper article contradicts him, and vaunts number of the abolitionists, and the numersigners to their petition. Now (said Mr.), the member of the House of Representa-(Mr. Pierce) has this moment informed that he knows nothing of these petitions, knows nothing to change his opinion as to small number of abolitionists in his State. B. thought, therefore, that his statement th not to be considered as discredited by the spaper publication; and he, for one, should give faith to his opinion."

nhis eagerness to invalidate the statement Mr. Pierce, Mr. Calhoun had overlooked a kism of action in which it involved him. still to suppress the mail transmission of inda, publications was still before the Senate, yet decided; and here was matter .ead in Senate, and to go forth as part of its produgs, the mest incendiary and diabolical that yet been seen. This oversight was perceived by the author of this View, who, after vindicating the statement of Mr. Pierce, went on to expose this solecism, and—

"Took up the bill reported by the select committee on incendiary publications, and read the section which forbade their transmission by mail, and subjected the postmasters to fine and loss of office, who would put them up for transmission; and wished to know whether this incendiary publication, which had been read at the Secretary's table, would be included in the prohibition, after being so read, and thus becoming a part of our debates? As a publication in New Hampshire, it was clearly forbid; as part of our congressional proceedings would it still be forbid? There was a difficulty in this, he said, take it either away. If it could still be inculcated from this floor, then the prohibition in the bill was mere child's play; if it could not, and all the city papers which contained it were to be stopped, then the other congressional proceedings in the same paper would be stopped also; and thus the people would be prevented from knowing what their representatives were doing. It seemed to him to be but lame work to stop incendiary publications in the villages where they were printed, and then to circulate them from this chamber among the proceedings of Congress; and that, issuing from this centre, and spreading to all the points of the circumference of this extended Union, one reading here would give it ten thousand times more notoricty and diffusion than the printing of it in the village could do. He concluded with expressing his wish that the reporters would not copy into their account of debate the paper that was read. It was too offensive to the member of the House [Mr. Piercel, and would be too disagreeable to the people of the slaveholding States, to be entitled to a place in our debates, and to become a part of our congressional history, to be diffused over the country in gazettes, and transmitted to posterity in the volumes of debates. He hoped they would all omit it."

The reporters complied with this request, and the Congress debates were spared the pollution of this infusion of scurrility, and the permanent record of this abusive assault upon a member of the House because he was a friend to the South. But it made a deep impression upon senators; and Mr. King, of Georgia, ad verted to it a few days afterwards to show the strangeness of the scene—Southern senators attacking their Northern friends because they defended the South. He said:

ings, the most incendiary and diabolical that patriotic, and highly influential member of the patrioten seen. This oversight was perceived other House, from New Hampshiro [Mr.

Pierce], to whose diligence and determined efforts he had heard attributed, in a great degree, the present prostrate condition of the abolitionists in that State. He had been the open and active friend of the South from the beginning, and had encountered the hostility of the abolitionists in every form. He had made a statement of the strength and prospects of the abolitionists in his State, near the commencement of the session, that was very gratiflying to the people of the South. This statement was corroborated by one of the senators from that State a few days after, and the senator from Carolina rose, and, without due reflection, he was very sure, drew from his pocket a dirty sheet, an abolition paper, containing a scurrilous article against the member from New Hampshire, which pronounced him an impostor and a liar. The same thing in effect had just been repeated by the senator from Mississippi against one of the best friends of the South, Governor Marcy, of New-York. [Here Mr. Calhoun rose 10 explain, and said he had intended, by the introduction of the paper, no disrespect to the member from New Hampshire; and Mr. Black also rose to say he only wished to show the course the abolitionists were pursuing, and their future views.] M., King said he had been interrupted by the senators, but corrected by neither of them. He was not attacking their metives, but only exposing their mistakes. The article read by his friend from Carolina was abusive of the member from New Hampshire, and contradicted his statements. The article read by his friend from Mississippi against Governor Marcy was of a similar character. It abused, menaced, and contradicted him. These abusive productions would seem to be credited and adopted by those who used them as evidence, and incorporated them in their speeches. Here, then, was a contest in the North between the most open and avowed friends of the South and the abolitionists; and we had the strange exhibition of Southern gentlemen apparently espousing the cause of the latter, who were continually furnishing them evidence with which to aid them in the contest. Did gentle-men call this backing their friends? What encouragement did such treatment afford to our friends at the North to step forth in our be-

Mr. King did not limit himself to the defence of Mr. Pierce, but went on to deny the increase of abolitionism at the North, and to show that it was dying out there until revived by agitation here. He said:

"A great deal had been stated in one form or other, and in one quarter or other, as to the numbers and increase of these disturbers of the peace; and he did not undertake to say what was the fact. He learned, and thought it probable, that they had increased since the commencement of the session, and had heard also the increase attributed to the manner in which it subject had been treated here. However the might be, what he insisted on was, that the base productions were no evidence of the far or of any fact; and especially should not be used by Southern men, in opposition to the same term of high-minded, honorable men at the North, who were the active and efficient friend of the South."

As an evidence of the manner in which the English emissary, George The Proson and beginned at treated in the North, upon whose labors a much stress had been tild in the South, Mr. King read from an English newspaper (the Leed's Mercury), Thompson's own account of his mission as written to his English etaple, in thus:

"Letters of a most distressing vature ins been received from Mr. George The apson, to zealous and devoted missionary of slave eman cipation, who has gone from this country to the United States, and who writes from Boston He says that the North (that is, New English land, where slavery does not exist), he universally sympathized with the South opposition to the abolitionists; that 'the North hae let fall the mask;' that 'merchants ar me banics, priesis and politicians, have ali stoc I forth the defenders of Southern despot and the furious denouncers of Northern phila thropy;' that all parties of politics, especial the supporters of the two rivals for the predential office (Van Buren and Webster), with each other in denouncing the abolitionist and that even religious men shun them, exce when the abolitionists can fairly gain a hearing from them. Mr. Webster gave his opinion in favor of reging the petitions, not to grant their prayer, at to yield to a constitutional right on the part (the petitioners; and said:

"He thought they ought to be received, reered, and considered. That was what was mally done with petitions on other subjects, of what had been uniformly done, heretofore, ith petitions on this subject also. Those who dieved they had an undoubted right to petition, nd that Congress had undoubted constitutional thority over the subjects to which their petims related, would not be satisfied with a re-sal to receive the petitions, nor with a formal eption of them, followed by an immediate strejecting their prayer. In parliamentary mathere was some difference between these mo modes of proceeding, but it would be conkered as little else than a difference in mere m. He thought the question must at some ne be met, considered, and discussed. In this ater, as in others, Congress must stand on its sons. It was in vain to attempt to shut the or against petitions, and expect in that way wold discussion. On the presentment of the st of these petitions, he had been of opinion at it ought to be referred to the proper comttee. He was of that opinion still. The subtould not be stifled. It must be discussed, the wished it should be discussed calmly, assionately, and fully, in all its branches, and its bearings. To reject the prayer of a peon at once, without reference or consideran, was not respectful; and in this case nothcould be possibly gained by going out of the al course of respectful consideration."

The trial votes were had upon the petition of the Society of Friends, the Caln petition; and on Mr. Calhoun's motion to refuse to receive it. His motion was largely rejected—35 to 10. The vote to receive was: Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Cr.ttenden, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Goldsborough. Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Mc-Kean, Morris, Naudain, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, Wright. The nays were: Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Leigh, Moore, Nicholas, Porter, Preston, Walker, White.

The motion to reject the petition being thus lost (only a meagre minority of the Southern members voting for it), the motion to reject its prayer next came on; and on that motion M. Calhoun refused to vote, saying:

"The Senate has by voting to receive this petition, on the ground on which the reception was placed, assumed the principle that we are bound to receive petitions to abolish slavery, whether in this District or the States; that is to take jurisdiction of the question of abolishing slavery whenever and in whatever manner the abolitionists may think proper to present the question. He considered this decision pregnant with consequences of the most disastrous char-When and how they were to occur it was not for him to predict; but he could not be mistaken in the fact that there must follow a long train of evils. What, he would ask, must hereafter be the condition on this floor of the senators from the slaveholding States? No one can expect that what has been done will arrest the progress of the abolitionists. Its effects must be the opposite, and instead of diminishing must greatly increase the number of the petitions. Under the decision of the Senate, we of the South are doomed to sit here and receive in silence, however outrageous or abusive in their language towards us and those whom we represent, the petitions of the incendiaries who are making war on our institutions. Nay, more, we are bound, without the power of resistance to see the Senate, at the request of these incendiaries, whenever they think proper to petition, extend its jurisdiction on the subject of slavery over the States as well as this District. Thus deprived of all power of effectual resistance, can any thing be considered more hopeless and degrading than our situation; to sit here, year after year, session after session, hearing ourselves and our constituents vilified by thousands of incendiary publications in the form of peti-tions, of which the Senate, by its decision, is bound to take jurisdiction, and against which we must rise like culprits to defend ourselves, or permit them to go uncontradicted and unresisted? We must ultimately be not only degraded in our own estimation and that of the world, but be exhausted and worn out in such a contest."

This was a most unjustifiable assumption on the part of Mr. Calhoun, to say that in voting to receive this petition, confined to slavery in the District of Columbia, the Senate took jurisdiction of the question in the States-jurisdiction of the question of abolishing slavery whenever, and in whatever manner, the abolitionists might ask. It was unjustifiable towards the Senate, and giving a false alarm to the South. The thirty-five senators voting to receive the petition wholly repudiated the idea of interfering with slavery in the States. Twelve of them were from the slaveholding States, so that Mr. Calhoun was outvoted in his own half of the Union. The petition itself was confined to the object of emane pation and the suppression of the slave trade in the District of Columbia. where it alleged, and truly that Congress possessed jurisdiction; and there was nothing either in the prayer, or in the language of the petition to justify the inferences drawn from its reception, or to justify the assumption that it was an insult and outrage to the senators from the slaveholding States. It was a brief and temperate memorial in these words:

"The memorial of Caln Quarterly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, respectfully represents: That, having long felt deep sympathy with that portion of the inhabitants of these United States which is held in bondage, and having no doubt that the happiness and interests, moral and pecuniary, of both master and slave, and our whole community, would be greatly promoted if the inestimable right to liberty was extended equally to all, we contemplate with extreme regret that the District of Columbia, over which you possess entire control, is acknowledged to be one of the greatest marts for the traffic in the persons of human beings in the known world, notwithstanding the principles of the constitution declare that all men have an unalienable right to the blessing of liberty. We therefore carnestly desire that you will enact such laws as will secure the right of freedom to every human being residing within the constitutional jurisdiction of Congress, and prohibit every species of traffic in the persons of men, which is as inconsistent in principle and inhuman in practice as the foreign slave trade."

This was the petition. It was in favor of emancipation in the District, and prayed the in which they were now treated in the list suppression of the slave trade in the District; of Representatives. The vote was:

and neither of these objects had any relative emancipation or the slave trade, in the State Mr. Preston, the colleague of Mr. Calhoun, gas his reasons for voting to reject the prayer of the petition, having failed in his first object to reject the petition itself: and Mr. Davis, of Massichusetts, repulsed the inferences and assumptions of Mr. Calhoun in consequence of the voto receive the petition. He denied the justic of any suggestion that it portended mischief the South, to the constitution, or to the Unical or that it was to make the District the head quarters of abolitionists, and the stepping-ston and entering wedge to the attack of slavery in the States: and said:

"Neither the petition on which the delan had arisen, nor any other that he had seen, more posed directly or indirectly to disturb the University unless the abolition of slavery in this Distrior the suppression or regulation of the sla trade within it, would have that effect. I himself, Mr. D. believed no purpose could further than this from the minds of the jet tioners. He could not determine what though or motives might be in the minds of men, b he judged by what was revealed; and he con not persuade himself that these petitione were not attached to the Union and that the had (as had been suggested) any ulterior pa pose of making this District the head-quarte of future operation-the stronghold of an slavery-the stepping-stone to an attack un the constitutional rights of the South. He w obliged to repudiate these inferences as unin for he had seen no proof to sustain them in of the petitions that had come here. The pe tioners entertained opinions coincident their fellow-citizens as to the power of Co gress to legislate in regard to slavery in the District; and being desirous that slavery shou cease here, if it could be abolished upon ju principles; and, if not, that the traffic carri on here from other quarters should be su pressed or regulated, they came here to Congress to investigate the matter. This all; and he could see no evidence in it of a da destine purpose to disregard the constitution to disturb the Union."

The vote was almost unanimous on a Buchanan's motion—34 to 6; and those a against it, not because they were in favor granting the prayer of the memorialists, because they believed that the petition out to be referred to a committee, reported we and then rejected—which was the ancient and freating such petitions; and also the main which they were now treated in the Hood Representatives. The vote was:

After this decision, Mr. Webster gave notice hat he had in hand several similar petitions, hich he had forborne to present till this one on Peansylvania should be disposed of; and hat now he should, on an early occasion, present hem, and move to dispose of them in the way which it had been his opinion from the first hat all such petitions should have been treated; but is, referred to a committee for consideraon and inquiry.

The action of the House of Representatives all now be seen on the subject of these eitions; for duplicates of the same genelly went to that body; and there, under the ad of a South Carolina member, and with ge majorities of the House, they were dissed of very differently from the way that Mr. shoun demanded in the Senate, and in the ar that he deemed so fatal to the slaveholding ates. Mr. Henry L. Pinckney, of the Charlesa district, moved that it be-

Resolved, That all the memorials which re been offered, or may hereafter be presented this House, praying for the abolition of rery in the District of Columbia; and also resolutions offered by an honorable member m Maine (Mr. Jarvis), with the amendment reto proposed by an honorable member from rinia (Mr. Wise), together with every in relation to the subject, be referred to a ect committee, with instructions to report: tCongress possesses no constitutional authorto interfere in any way with the institution slavery in any of the States of this confedey: and that in the opinion of this House, ngress ought not to interfere, in any way, h slavery in the District of Columbia, bese it would be a violation of the public faith, wise, impolitic, and dangerous to the Union. signing such reasons for these conclusions, in the judgment of the committee, may be calculated to enlighten the public mind, to rexcitement, to repress agitation, to secure maintain the just rights of the slave-holding tes, and of the people of this District, and restore harmony and tranquillity amongst various sections of this Union."

On putting the question the motion was divided, so as to have a separate vote on the different propositions of the resolve; and each was carried by large, and some by nearly unanimous majorities. On the first division, To refer all the memorials to a select committee, the vote was 174 to 48. On the second division. That Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the States, the vote was 201 to 7-the seven negatives being Mr. John Quincy Adams, Mr. Harmer Denny of Pennsylvania, Mr. William Jackson, Mr. Horacu Everett of Vermont, Mr. Rice Garland of Louisiana, Mr. Thomas Glascock of Georgia, Mr. William Jackson, Mr. John Robertson of Virginia; and they, because opposed to voting on such a proposition, deemed gratuitous and intermeddling. On the third division, of tho resolve, That Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia, the vote stood 163 to 47. And on the fourth division, giving as reasons for such non-interference, Because it would be a violation of the public faith, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous to the Union, the vote was, 127 to 75. On the last division, To assign reasons for this report, the vote stood 167 to 6. So the committee was ordered, and consisted of Mr. Pinckney, Mr. Hamer of Ohio, Mr. Pierce of New Hampshire, Mr. Hardin of Kentucky, Mr. Jarvis of Maine, Mr. Owens of Georgia, Mr. Muhlenberg of Pennsylvania, Mr. Dromgoole of Virginia, and Mr. Turrill of New-York. The committee reported, and digested their report into two resolutions, first, That Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any State of this confederacy. Secondly, That Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia. And, "for the purpose of arresting agitation, and restoring tranquillity to the public mind," they recommended the adoption of this resolve: "That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions, or papers relating in any way to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without either being printed or referred, be laid upon the table; and that no further action whatever be had upon them." All these resolutions were adopted; and the latter one by a vote of 117 to 68; so that the House camo to the same course which the Senate had taken in relation to these memorials. Mr. Adams, whose votes, taken by themselves, might present him as acting with the abolitionists, was entirely opposed to their objects, and was governed by a sense of what appeared to him to be the right of petition, and also the most effectual way of putting an end to an agitation which he sincerely deprecated. And on this point it is right that he should be heard for himself, as speaking for himself when Mr. Pinckney's motion was before the House. He then said:

"But, sir, not being in favor of the object of the petitions, I then gave notice to the House and to the country, that upon the supposition that these petitions had been transmitted to me under the expectation that I should present them. I felt it my duty to say, I should not support them. And, sir, the reason which I gave at that time for declining to support them was precisely the same reason which the gentleman from Virginia now gives for reconsidering this motion namely, to keep the discussion of the subject out of the House. I said, sir, that I believed this discussion would be altogether unprofitable to the House and to the country; but, in deference to the sacred right of petition, I moved that these fifteen petitions, all of which were numerously signed, should be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, at the head of which was, at that time, a distinguished citizen of Virginia, now, I regret to say .- and the whole country has occasion to regret-no more. These petitions were thus referred, and, after a short period of time, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia made a report to this House, which report was read, and unanimously accepted; and nothing more has been heard of these petitions from that day to this. In taking the course I then took, I was not sustained by the unanimous voice of my own constituents; there were many among them, persons as respectable and as entitled to consideration as any others, who disapproved of the course I pursued on that occasion.

"Attempts were made within the district I then represented to get up meetings of the people to instruct me to pursue a different course, or to multiply petitions of the same character. These efforts were continued during the whole of that long session of Congress; but, I am gratified to add, without any other result than that, from one single town of the district which I had the honor to represent, a solitary petition was forwarded before the close of the session, with a request that I would present it to the House. Sir, I did present it, and it was referred to the same Committee on the District of Columbia, and I believe nothing more has been heard of it since. From the experience of this session, I was perfectly ratisfied that the true and only method of keeping this subject out of discussion was, to take that course; to refer all jetition of this kind to the Committee on the District Columbia, or some other committee of the House, to receive their report, and to necest unanimously. This does equal justice to parties in the country; it avoids the discussion of this agitating question on the one has and, on the other, it pays a due respect the right of the constituent to petition. It years afterwards, similar petitions were present ed, and at that time an effort made, without cess, to do that which has now been done so cessfully in one instance. An effort was my to lay these petitions on the table; the ile did not accede to the proposition: they refere the petitions as they had been before referred and with the same result. There was certainly reason in what Mr. Adas proposed, and encouragement to adopt his ourse, from the good effect which had already nemled it in other cases; and from the further ol effect which he affirmed, that, in taking bat course, the committee and the House would are come to the same conclusion by a unanious instead of a divided vote, as at present. is course was also conformable to that of the rliest action of Congress upon the subject. It m in the session of Congress of 1789-'90-bethe first under the constitution—that the two stions of abolishing the foreign slave trade. d of providing for domestic emancipation, came fore it; and then, as in the case of the Caln emorial, from the Religious Society of Friends, ere was discussion as to the mode of acting on it-which ended in referring the memorial aspecial committee, without instructions. That mmittee, a majority being from the non-slave-Hing States, reported against the memorial on th points; and on the question of emancipation the States, the resolve which the committee mmended (after having been slightly altered phraseology), read thus: "That Congress ne no authority to interfere in the emancition of slaves, or in the treatment of them thin any of the States; it remaining with vereral States to provide any regulations rein which humanity and true policy may mire." And under this resolve, and this treatntof the subject, the slavery question was then eted; and remained so until revived in our own e. Inthediscussion which then took place Mr. dison was entirely in favor of sending the peonto a committee; and thought the only way get up an agitation in the country, would be opposing that course. He said:

The question of sending the petition to a opposed mittee was no otherwise important than as in both.

gentlemen made it so by their serious opposition. Had they permitted the commitment of the memorial, as a matter of course, no notice would have been taken of it out of doors; it could never have been blown up into a decision of the question respecting the discouragement of the African slave trade, nor alarm the owners with an apprehension that the general government were about to abolish slavery in all the States. Such things are not contemplated by any gentleman, but they excite alarm by their extended objections to committing the memorials. The debate has taken a serious turn ; and it will be owing to this alone if an alarm is created: for, had the memorial been treated in the usual way, it would have been considered, as a matter of course; and a report might have been made so as to give general satisfaction. If there was the slightest tendency by the commitment to break in upon the constitution, he would object to it; but he did not see upon what ground such an event could be apprehended. The petition did not contemplate even a breach of the constitution; it prayed, in general terms, for the interference of Congress so far as they were constitutionally anthorized."

This chapter opens and concludes with the words of Mr. Madison. It is beautiful to behold the wise, just, and consistent course of that virtuous and patriotic man—the same from the beginning to the ending of his life; and always in harmony with the sanctity of the laws, the honor and interests of his country, and the peace of his fellowcitizens. May his example not be lost upon us. This chapter has been copious on the subject of slavery. It relates to a period when a new point of departure was taken on the slave question; when the question was carried into Congress with avowed alternatives of dissolving the Union; and conducted in a way to show that dissolution was an object to be attained, not prevented; and this being the starting point of the slavery agitation which has since menaced the Union, it is right that every citizen should have a clear view of its origin, progress, and design. From the beginning of the Missouri controversy up to the year 1835, the author of this View looked to the North as the point of danger from the slavery agitation: since that time he has looked to the South for that danger, as Mr. Madison did two years earlier. Equally opposed to it in either quarter, he has opposed it

CHAPTER CXXXVI.

REMOVAL OF THE CHEROKEES FROM GEORGIA.

THE removal of the Creek Indians from this State was accomplished by the treaty of 1826, and that satisfied the obligations of the United States to Georgia, under the compact of 1802, so far as the Creek tribe was concerned. But the same obligation remained with respect to the Cherokees, contracted at the same time, and founded on the same valuable consideration, namely: the cession by Georgia to the United States of her western territory, now constituting the two States of Alabama and Mississippi. And twenty-five years' delay, and under incessant application, the compact had been carried into effect with respect to the Creeks; it was now thirty-five years since it was formed, and it still remained unexecuted with respect to the Cherokees. Georgia was impatient and importunate, and justly so, for the removal of this tribe, the last remaining obstacle to the full enjoyment of all her territory. General Jackson was equally anxious to effect the removal, both as an act of justice to Georgia, and also to Alabama (part of whose territory was likewise covered by the Cherokees), and also to complete the business of the total removal of all the Indians from the east to the west side of the Mississippi. It was the only tribe remaining in any of the States, and he was in the last year of his presidency, and the time becoming short, as well as the occasion urgent, and the question becoming more complex and difficult. Part of the tribe had removed long before. Faction split the remainder that staid behind. Intrusive counsellors, chiefly from the Northern States, came in to inflame dissension, aggravate difficulties, and impede removal. For climax to this state of things, party spirit laid hold of it, and the politicians in opposition to General Jackson endeavored to turn it to the prejudice of his administration. Nothing daunted by this combination of obstacles, General Jackson pursued his plan with firmness and vigor, well seconded by his Secretary at War, Mr. Cassthe War Department being then charged with the administration of the Indian affairs. In the autumn of 1835, a commission had been ap- home, and making a larger and a better ho

General William Co roll, of Tennessee, well known to all the Souther Indians as a brave and humane warrier, and in Reverend John F. Schermerhorn, of New-You well known as a missionary laborer, company the commissiom; and it had all the succession which the President expected.

In the winter of 1835-'36, a treaty was beg tiated, by which the Cherokees, making de disposal of all their possessions east of the Mississippi, ceded the whole, and agreed to West, to join the half tribe beyond that rive The consideration paid them was ample, a besides the moneyed consideration, they he large inducements, founded in views of the own welfare, to make the removal. These is ducements were set out by themselves in preamble to the treaty, and were declared be: "A desire to get rid of the difficulties e perienced by a residence within the settled lar of the United States; and to reunite their me ple, by joining those who had crossed the Mi sissippi; and to live in a country beyond limits of State sovereigntles, and where the could establish and enjoy a government of the choice, and perpetuate a state of society, while might be most consonant with their views, habi and condition, and which might tend to their dividual comfort, and their advancement in cri zation." These were sensible reasons for desiri a removal, and, added to the moneyed consider tion, made it immensely desirable to the ladius The direct consideration was five millions dollars, which, added to stipulations to pay the improvements on the ceded lands-todds the expenses of removal to their new homes yond the Mississippi-to subsist them for year after their arrival-to commute sch funds and annuities—to allow pre-emptions pay for reserves-with some liberal grants money from Congress, for the sake of quieti complaints-and some large departmental lowances, amounted, in the whole, to more to twelve millions of dollars! Advantageous as this trenty was to the Indans, and desirable as it was to both parties, it as earnestly opposed in the Senate; and only ared by one vote. The discontented party of he Cherokees, and the intrusive conusellors, ad party spirit, pursued it to Washington city, ad organized an opposition to it, headed by the not chiefs then opposed to the administration General Jackson-Mr. Clay, Mr. Webster, ad Mr. Calhoun. Immediately after the treaty s communicated to the Senate, Mr. Clay prested a memorial and protest against it from "Cherokee nation," as they were entitled by faction that protested; and also memorials om several individual Cherokees; all which tre printed and referred to the Senate's Comittee on Indian Affairs, and duly considered ten the merits of the treaty came to be exnined. The examination was long and close, tending at intervals for nearly three months from March 7th to the end of May-and asming very nearly a complete party aspect. the 18th of May Mr. Clay made a motion ich, as disclosing the grounds of the opposin to the treaty, deserves to be set out in its n words. It was a motion to reject the resoion of ratification, and to adopt this resolve its place: "That the instrument of writing, porting to be a treaty concluded at New hota on the 29th of December, 1835, between United States and the chiefs, head men and ple of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and the plementary articles thereto annexed, were made and concluded by authority, on the tof the Cherokee tribe, competent to bind and therefore, without reference to the terms conditions of the said agreement and supmentary articles, the Senate cannot consent ad advise the ratification thereof, as a valid ty, binding upon the Cherokee tribe or na-" concluding with a recommendation to President to treat again with the Cherokees of the Mississippi for the whole, or any of possessions on this side of that river.

The vote on this resolve and recommendation was, 29 years to 15 mays; and it requiring twothirds to adopt it, it was, of course, lost. But it showed that the treaty itself was in imminent danger of being lost, and would actually be lost, in a vote, as the Senate then stood. The whole number of the Scuate was forty-eight; only forty-four had voted. There were four members absent, and unless two of these could be got in, and vote with the friends of the treaty, and ne one got in on the other side, the treaty was rejected. It was a close pinch, and made me recollect what I have often heard Mr. Randolph say, that there were always members to get out of the way at a pinching vote, or to lend a hand at a pinching vote. Fortunately the four absent senators were classified as friends of the administration, and two of them came in to our side, the other two refusing to go to the other side: thus saving the trenty by one vote. The vote stood, thirty-one for the treaty, fifteen against it; and it was only saved by a strong Northern vote. The yeas were: Messrs. Benton of Missouri; Black of Mississippi; Brown of North Carolina; Buchanan of Pennsylvania; Cuthbert of Georgia; Ewing of Illinois; Goldsborough of Maryland; Grundy of Tennessee; Hendricks of Indiana; Hubbard of New Hamp. shire; Kent of Maryland; King of Alabama; King of Georgia; Linn of Missouri; McKean of Pennsylvania; Mangum of North Curolina; Moore of Alabama; Morris of Ohio; Niles of Connecticut; Preston of South Carolina; Rives of Virginia; Robinson of Illinois; Ruggles and Shepley of Maine; N. P. Tallmadge of New-York; Tipton of Illinois; Walker of Mississippi; Wall of New Jersey; White of Tennessee; and Wright of New-York-31. The nays were: Messrs. Calhoun of South Carolina; Clay of Kentucky; Clayton of Delaware; Crittenden of Kentucky; Davis of Massachusetts; Ewing of Ohio; Leigh of Virginia; Naudain of Delaware, Porter of Louisiana; Prentiss of Vermont; Robbins of Rhode Island; Southard of New Jersey; Swift of Vermont; Tomlinson of Connecticut; and Webster of Massachusetts-15. Thus the treaty was barely saved. One vote less in its favor, or one more against it, and it would have been lost. Two members were absent. If either had come in and voted with the opposition, it would have been lost. It was saved by the free State vote-by the fourteen free State affirmative votes, which precisely balanced and neutralized the seven slave State negatives. If any one of these fourteen had voted with the negatives, or eve an absent at the vote, the treaty would have been lost; and thus the South is indebted to the North for this most important treaty, which completed the relief of the Southern States—the Chickasaws, Creeks and Choctaws having previously agreed to remove, and the treaties with them (except with the Creeks) having been ratified without serious opposition.

The ratification of this treaty for the removal of the Cherokees was one of the most difficult and delicate questions which we ever had to manage, and in which success seemed to be impossible up to the last moment. It was a Southern question, involving an extension of slavery, and was opposed by all three of the great opposition leaders; who only required a minority of one third to make good their point. At best, it required a good Northern vote, in addition to the undivided South, to carry the treaty; but, with the South divided, it seemed hardly possible to obtain the requisite number to make up for that defection; yet it was done, and done at the very time that the systematic plan had commenced, to charge the Northern States with a design to abolish slavery in the South. And I, who write history, not for applause, but for the sake of the instruction which it affords, gather up these dry details from the neglected documents in which they lie hidden, and bring them forth to the knowledge and consideration of all candid and impartial men, that they may see the just and fraternal spirit in which the free States then acted towards their brethren of the South. Nor can it fail to be observed, as a curious contrast, that, in the very moment that Mr. Calhoun was seeing cause for Southern alarm lest the North should abolish slavery in the South, the Northern senators were extending the area of slavery in Georgia by converting Indian soil into slave soil: and that against strenuous exertions made by him-

EXTENSION OF THE MISSOURI BOUNDARY

This was a measure of great moment to Missogn and full of difficulties in itself, and requiring double process to accomplish it-an act of Congress to extend the boundary, and an Indian treaty to remove the Indians to a new home It was to extend the existing boundary of the State so as to include a triangle between theen isting line and the Missouri River, large enough to form seven counties of the first class, and for tile enough to sustain the densest population The difficulties were threefold: 1. To make sil larger a State which was already one of the largest in the Union. 2. To remove Indian from a possession which had just been assigned to them in perpetuity. 3. To alter the Misson compromise line in relation to slave territory and thereby convert free soil into slave so The two first difficulties were seriousthird formidable: and in the then state of the public mind in relation to slave territory, thise largement of a great slave State, and by conver ing free soil into slave, and impairing the compr mise line, was an almost impossible undertaking and in no way to be accomplished without generous co-operation from the members of free States. They were a majority in the Hou of Representatives, and no act of Congress con pass for altering the compromise line with their aid: they were equal in the Senate, whe no treaty for the removal of the Indians on be ratified except by a concurrence of t thirds. And all these difficulties to be on come at a time when Congress was inflan with angry debates upon abolition petition transmission of incendiary publications, impu designs to abolish slavery; and the appears of the criminating article in South Carolina titled the "Crises," announcing a Southern vention and a secession if certain North States did not suppress the abolition socie within their limits within a limited time.

In the face of all these discouraging obstathe two Missouri senators, Messrs. Beaton Linn, commenced their operations. The step was to procure a bill for the alteration the compromise line and the extension of

It went to the House of Representatives; and found there no serious apposition to its passage. A treaty was negotiated with the Sac and Fox Indians to whom the country had been assigned, and was ratified by the requisite two thirds. And this, besides doag an act of generous justice to the State of Missonri, was the noble answer which Northern numbers gave to the imputed design of abolishglavery in the States! actually extending it! nd by an addition equal in extent to such States Delaware and Rhode Island; and by its ferlity equal to one of the third class of States. and this accomplished by the extraordinary exess of altering a compromise line intended be perpetual, and the reconversion of soil which d been slave, and made free, back again from e to slave. And all this when, had there been k least disposition to impede the proper extenon of a slave State, there were plausible reasons ough to cover an opposition, in the serious tections to enlarging a State already the larstin the Union-to removing Indians again mahome to which they had just been reored under a national pledge of no more removs-and to disturbing the compromise line of 20 on which the Missouri question had been uled; and the line between free and slave terby fixed for national reasons, to remain for et. It was the second at proof to this effect at this identical session, atification of the Georgia Cherokee treaty ing the other.

CHAPTER CXXXVIII.

ADMISSION OF THE STATES OF ARKANSAS AND MICHIGAN INTO THE UNION,

These two young States had applied to Congres for an act to enable them to hold a convention, and form State constitutions, preparatory to admission into the Union. Congress refused to pass the acts, and the people of the two territories held the convention by their own authority, formed their constitutions—sent copies to Congress, praying admission as States. They both applied at this session, and the proceedings on their respective applications were simultaneous in Congress, though in separate bills. That of Michigan was taken up first, and had been brought before each House in a message from the President in these words:

"By the act of the 11th of January, 1805, all that part of the Indian Territory lying north of a line drawn due 'east from the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan until it shall intersect Lake Erie, and east of a line drawn from the said southerly bend, through the middle of said lake, to its northern extremity, and thence, due north, to the northern boundary of the United States,' was erected into a separate Territory, by the name of Michigan. The Territory comprised within these limits being part of the district of country described in the ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787, which provides that, whenever any of the States into which the same should be divided should have sixty thousand free inhabitants, such State should be admitted by its delegates 'into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government, provided the constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles, the inhabitants thereof have, during the present year, in pursuance of the right secured by the ordinance, formed a constitution and State government. That instrument, together with various other documents connected therewith, has been transmitted to me for the purpose of being laid before Congress, to whom the power and duty of admitting new States into the Union exclusively appertains; and the whole are herewith communicated for your early decision."

The application was referred to a select committee, Mr. Benton the chairman; and a memorial, entitled from the "Legislature of Michigan," was also referred to the same committee, though objected to by some senators as purporting to come from a State which, as yet, had no existence. But the objection was considered by others as being one of form-that it might be considered as coming from the people of Michigan-and was not even material in that point of view, as the question was already before the Senate on the President's Message. objection was also made to the boundaries, as being too large, and as trenching upon those of Indiana and Ohio. A bill was reported for the admission of the State, in support of which Mr. Benton said, the committee had included in the proposed limits a considerable portion of territory on the northwest, and had estimated the superficial contents of the State at 60,000 square miles. The territory attached contained but a very small portion of Indian population. It was necessary to make her large and strong, being a frontier State both to the Indians and to the British possessions. It should have a large front on Lake Superior. The principal points of objection, of a permanent character, were, that the proceedings of the people were revolutionary, in forming a constitution without a previous act of Congress; and her constitution inconsistent with that of the United States in admitting aliens to vote before naturalization. To the first it was answered that she had applied for an act of Congress two years ago, and was denied by the then dominant party, and that it was contradictory to object to her, for not having that which had been refused to be given; and on the second, that the same thing had been done for a quarter of a century. On the latter point Mr. Buchanan said:

"Michigan confined herself to such residents and inhabitants of her territory as were there at the signing of her constitution; and to those alone she extended the right of suffrage. Now, we had admitted Ohio and Illinois into this Union; two sister States, of whom we ought certainly to be very proud. He would refer senators to the provision in the constitution of Ohio on that subject. By it, all white male inhabitants, twenty-one years of age, or upwards, having resided one year in the State, are entitled to vote. Michigan had made the proper distinction; she had very properly confined the elective franchise to inhabitants within the State at the time of the adoption of her constitution; but Ohio had given the right of suffrage as to all future time to all her white inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years; a case embracing | movement, Mr. Buchanan answered:

all time to come, and not limited as in the constitution of Michigan. He had understood that since the adoption of her constitution, Ohio ha repealed this provision by law. He did no know whether this was so or not; but here was, as plain as the English language coul make it, that all the white male inhabitants Ohio, above the age of twenty-one years, we entitled to vote at her elections. Well, what lilinois done in this matter? Ho would read an extract from her constitution, by which it would appear that only six months' previous residence was required to acquire the right suffrage. The constitution of Illinois w therefore still broader and more liberal than that of Ohio. There, in all elections, all white male inhabitants above the age of twenty-or years, having resided in the State six month previous to the election, shall enjoy the right of an elector. Now, sir, it had been made a ter of preference by settlers to go to Illinoi instead of the other new States, where the must become citizens before they could vote and he appealed to the senators from Illing whether this was not now the case, and whether any man could not now vote in that State after a six months' residence.

"[Mr. Robinson said that such was the fact " Now, here were two constitutions of State the senator from one of which was most su nuously opposed to the admission of Michigan who had not extended the right of suffrage far as was done by either of them. Did Mid gan do right in thus fixing the elective fa chise? He contended that she did act rish and if she had not acted so, she would not he acted in obedience to the spirit, if not the ve letter, of the ordinance of 1787. Michigan took the right ground, while the States of 0 and Illinois went back in making perpetual their constitution what was contained in ordinance. When Congress admitted thema Indiana on this principle, he thought it was ungracious in any of their senators or re sentatives to declare that Michigan should be admitted, because she has extended theri of suffrage to the few persons within her lin at the adoption of her constitution. He inclined to go a good deal further into this ject; but as he was exceedingly anxious the decision should be made soon, he would extend his remarks any further. It appear to him that an amendment might very well made to this bill, requiring that the assent the people of Michigan shall be given to change of boundary. He did hope that by bill all objections would be removed; and this State, so ready to rush into our arms, we not be repulsed, because of the absence of formalities, which, perhaps, were very po but certainly not indispensable.

ther point, that of a revolution Ir. Buchanan answered:

*I think their course is clearly justifiable; but if there is any thing wrong or unusual in it is to be attributed to the neglect of Congass. For three years, they have been rapping st your door, and asking for the consent of Congess to form a constitution, and for admission into the Union; but their petitions have not hen heeded, and have been treated with neglect. Not being able to be admitted in the way they sought, they have been forced to take their own course, and stand upon their rights-rights segured to them by the constitution and a solemn impealable ordinance. They have taken the census of the territory; they have formed a constitution, elected their officers, and the whole machinery of a State government is ready to be put in operation: they are only awaiting your stion. Having assumed this attitude, they now demand admission as a matter of right; they demand it as an act of justice at your hands. are they now to be repelled, or to be told that they must retrace their steps, and come into the Inion in the way they at first sought to do, but ould not obtain the sanction of Congress? Sir, fear the consequences of such a decision; I tremble at an act of such injustice."

The bill passed the Senate by rather a close note-twenty-four to eighteen; the latter being all senators in the opposition. It then went to the llouse of Representatives for concurrence. from the time of the admission of new States, it had been the practice to admit a free and slare State together, or alternately, so as to keep up a numerical equilibrium between them a practice resulting from some slight jealousy nisting, from the beginning, between the two lasses of States. In 1820, when the Missouri untroversy inflamed that jealousy, the State of lassachusetts divided herself to furnish terribry for the formation of a new free State Maine) to balance Missouri; and the acts of ongress for the admission of both, were passed untemporaneously, March, 1820. Now, in 1836, hen the slave question again was much inamed, and a State of each kind to be admitted, he proceedings for that purpose were kept as arly together as possible, not to include them the same bill. The moment, then, that the khigan bill had passed the Senate, that of ransas was taken up, under the lead of Mr. uchanan, to whom the Arkansas application had enconfided, as that of Michigan had been to Mr. enton. This latter senator alluded to this cirinstance to show that the people of these young utes had no fear of trusting their rights and terests to the care of senators differing from Maselves on the slavery question. He said:

"It was worthy of notice, that, on the presentation of these two great questions for the admission of two States, the people of those States were so slightly affected by the exertions that had been made to disturb and ulcerate the public mind on the subject of slavery, as to put them in the hands of senators who might be supposed to entertain opinions on that subject different from those held by the States whose interests they were charged with. Thus, the people of Arkansas had put their application into the hands of a gentleman representing a non-slaveholding State; and the people of Michigan had put their application into the hands of a senator (himself) coming from a State where the institutions of slavery existed; affording a most beautiful illustration of the total impotence of all attempts to agitate and ulcerate the public mind on the worn-out subject of slavery. He would further take occasion to say, that the abolition question seemed to have died out; there not having been a single presentation of a petition on that subject, since the general jail delivery ordered by the Senate."

Mr. Swift, of Vermont, could not vote for the admission of Arkansas, because the constitution of the State sanctioned perpetual slavery; and said:

"That, although he felt every disposition to vote for the admission of the new State into the Union, yet there were operative reasons under which he must vote against it. On looking at the constitution submitted by Arkansas, he found that they had made the institution of slavery perpetual; and to this he could never give his assent. He did not mean to oppose the passage of the bill, but had merely risen to explain the reasons why he could not vote for it."

Mr. Buchanan felt himself bound by the Missouri compromise to vote for the admission, and pointed out the ameliorating feature in the constitution which guaranteed the right of jury trials to slaves; and said:

"That, on the subject of slavery, this constitution was more liberal than the constitution of any of the slaveholding States that had been admitted into the Union. It preserved the very words of the other constitutions, in regard to slavery; but there were other provisions in it in favor of the slaves, and among them a provision which secured to them the right of trial by jury; thus putting them, in that particular, on an equal footing with the whites. He considered the compromise which had been made, when Missouri was admitted into the Union, as having settled the question as to slavery in the new South Western States; and the committee, therefore, did not deem it right to interfere with the question of slavery in Arkansas."

Mr. Prentiss, of Vermont, opposed the admission, on account of the "revolutionary" manner in which the State had held her convention, without the authorization of a previous act of Congress, and because her constitution had given perpetual sanction to slavery; and, referring to the reasons which induced him to vote against the admission of Michigan, said:

"That he must also vote against the admission of Arkansas. He viewed the movements of these two territories, with regard to their admission into the Union, as decidedly revolutionary, forming their constitution without the previous consent of Congress, and importunately knocking at its doors for admission. The objections he had to the admission of Arkansas particularly, were, that she had formed her constitution without the previous assent of Congress, and in that constitution had made slavery perpetual, as noticed by his colleague. He regretted that he was compelled to vote against this bill; but he could not, in the discharge of his duty, do otherwise."

Mr. Morris, of Ohio, spoke more fully on the objectionable point than other senators, justifying the right of the people of a territory, when amounting to 60,000 to meet and form their own constitution—regretting the slavery clause in the constitution of Arkansas, but refusing to vote against her on that account, as she was not restrained by the ordinance of 1787, nor had entered into agreement against slavery. He soid:

"Before I record my vote in favor of the passage of the bill under consideration, I must ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment, while I offer a few of the reasons which govern me in the vote I shall give. Being one of the representatives of a free State, and believing slavery to be wrong in principle, and mischievous in practice, I wish to be clearly understood on the subject, both here and by those I have the honor to represent. I have objections to the constitution of Arkansas, on the ground that slavery is recognized in that constitution, and settled and established as a fundamental principle in her government. I object to the existence of this principle forming a part of the organic law in any State; and I would vote against the admission of Arkansas, as a member of this Union, if I believed I had the power to do so. The wrong, in a moral sense, with which I view slavery, would be sufficient for me to do this. did I not consider my political obligations, and the duty, as a member of this body, I owe to the constitution under which I now act, clearly require of me the vote I shall give. I hold that any portion of American citizens, who may reside on a portion of the territory of the United States, whenever their numbers shall amount; that which wook! entitle them to a represent tion in the House of Representatives in ton gress, have the right to provide for themselves constitution and State government, and to l admitted into the Union whenever they shall so apply; and they are not bound to wait the action of Congress in the first instance, excel there is some compact or agreement require them to do so. I place this right upon the broad, and, I consider, indisputable ground, that all persons, living within the jurisdiction of the United States, are entitled to equal privileges and it ought to be matter of high gratification to us here, that, in every portion, even the most remote, of our country, our people are anxion to obtain this high privilege at as early a day, possible. It furnishes clear proof that the Uni is highly esteemed, and bas its foundation deep in the hearts of our fellow-citizens.

"By the constitution of the United States power is given to Congress to admit new State into the Union. It is in the character of State that any portion of our citizens, inhabiting any part of the territory of the United State must apply to be admitted into the Union: State government and constitution must first formed. It is not necessary for the pover Congress, and I doubt whether Congress h such power, to prescribe the mode by which the people shall form a State constitution; and this plain reason, that Congress would be a tirely incompetent to the exercise of any coercise power to carry into effect the mode they migh prescribe. I cannot, therefore, vote against the admission of Arkansas into the Union, on the ground that there was no previous act of Co gress to authorize the holding of her convention As a member of Congress, I will not look b yond the constitution that has been presental I have no right to presume it was formed by in competent persons, or that it does not fully e press the opinions and wishes of the people that country. It is true that the United State shalf guarantee to every State in the Union republican form of government: meaning in m judgment, that Congress shall not permit an power to establish, in any State, a government without the assent of the people of such State and it will not be amiss that we remember her also, that that guaranty is to the State, and n us to the formation of the government by the people of the State; but should it be admitted that Congress can look into the constitution of a State, in order to ascertain its characte hefore such State is admitted into the Unio yet I contend that Congress cannot object to for the want of a republican form, if it contain the great principle that all power is inherent the people, and that the government drew all just powers from the governed.

Yet, believing that this govemment has no right to interfere with the question of slavery in any of the States, or prescribe what shall or shall not be considered property in the different States, or by what tenure property of any kind shall be holden, but that all these are exclusively questions of State policy, leannot, as a member of this body, refuse my rote to admit this State into the Union, because her constitution recognizes the right and existence of slavery."

Mr. Alexander Porter, of Louisiana, would tote against the admission, on account of the revolutionary" proceedings of the people in the formation of their constitution, without a previous act of Congress. It is believed that Mr. Clay voted upon the same ground. There were but six votes against the admission; nameg: Mr. Clay, Mr. Knight of Rhode Island, Mr. Porter, Mr. Prentiss, Mr. Robbins of Rhode Island, and Mr. Swift. It is believed that Mr. Robbins and Mr. Knight voted on the same mund with Mr. Clay and Mr. Porter. So, the all was easily passed, and the two bills went brether to the House of Representatives, where hey gave rise to proceedings, the interest of slich still survives, and a knowledge of which, herefore, becomes necessary. The two bills rere made the special order for the same day. Wednesday, the 8th of June, Congress being to Journ on the 4th of July; and the Michigan Il having priority on the calendar, as it had st passed the Senate. Mr. Wise, of Virginia, athe announcement of the Michigan bill, from he chair, as the business before the House, ored to postpone its consideration until the suing Monday, in order to proceed with the mansas bill. Mr. Thomas, of Maryland, obexted to the motion, and said:

"He would call the attention of the House to e position of the two bills on the Speaker's ble and endeavor to show that this postpone-at is entirely unnecessary. These bills are on the Senate. By the rules of this House, suffer Michigan to hold her present position;

two, I may say three, questions will arise, to be decided before they can become a law, so far as this House is concerned. We must first order each of these bills to be read a third time; the next question then will be, when shall the bill be read a third time? And the last question to be decided will be, shall the bill pass? Why, then, should Southern men now make an effort to give precedence to the bill for the admission of Arkansas into the Union? If they manifest distrust, must we not expect that fears will be entertained by Northern members, that unreasonable opposition will be made to the admission of Michigan? Let us proceed harmoniously, until we flad that our harmony must be interrupted. We shall lose nothing by so doing. If a ma-jority of the House be in favor of reading a third time the Michigan bill, they will order it to be done. After that vote has been taken, we can refuse to read the bill a third time, go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, then consider the Arkansas bill, report it to the House, order it to be read a third time, and in this order proceed to read them each a third time, if a majority of the House be in favor of that proceeding. Let it not be said that Southern men may be taken by surprise, if the proceeding here respectfully recommended be adopted. If the friends of Arkaasas are sufficiently numerous to carry now the motion to postpone, they can arrest at any time the action of the House on the Michigan bili, until clear undubitable indications have been given that the Missouri compremise is not to be disregarded."

These latter words of Mr. Thomas revealed the point of jealousy between some Southern and Northern members, and brought the observance of the Missouri compromise fully into view, as a question to be tried. Mr. Wise, after some remarks, modified his motion by moving to refer both bills to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to incorporate the two bills in o one bill. Mr. Patton, of Virginia, opposed the latter motion, and gave his reasons at length against it. If his colleague would so modify his motion as to move to refer both bills to the Committee of the Whole House, without the instructions, he would vote for it. Mr. Bouldin, of Virginia, successor to Mr. Randolph, said:

"He agreed with his colleague [Mr. Patton] in a fact too plain for any to overlook, that both bills must be acted on separately, and that one must have the preference in point of time. Michigan had it at that time—he was willing it should hold it. His colleague [Mr. Patton] seemed to think that in the incipient steps in relation to this bill, it would be well enough to would be well to require of the House (or rather of the non-slaveholding portion of the Union) to give some unequivocal guaranty to the South that no difficulty would be raised as to the reception of Arkansas in regard to negro slavery. Mr. B. was willing to go on with the bill for the admission of Michigan. He had the most implicit confidence in the House, particularly alluding to the non-slaveholding part of the Union, that no serious difficulty would be made as to the admission of Arkansas in regard to negro slavery. If there were any serious difficulties to be raised in the House to the admission of Arkansas, upon the ground of pegro slavery, he wished immediate notice of it. If his confidence was misplaced, he wished to be corrected as soon and as certainly as possible. If there really was any intention in the House of putting the South under any difficulty, restraint, limit, any shackle or embarrassment on the South on account of negro slavery (some gentlemen said slavery, but he said negro slavery), he wished to know it. If there were any individuals having such feeling. he wished to know them; he wished to hear their names upon yeas and nays. If there were a majority, he should act promptly, decisively, immediately upon it, and had no doubt all the uth would do the same. There might be some question as to the claim of non-slaveholding States to stop the progress of Southern lubits and Southern influence Northward. As to Arkansas, there could be no question; and if seriously pressed, such claims could leave no doubt on the minds of the South as to the object of those who pressed them, or the course to be pursued by them. Such a stand being taken by the non-slaveholding States, it would make little difference whether Michigan was in or out of this Union. He said he would sit down, again assuring the House, and the gentlemen particularly from the non-slaveholding States, of his entire confidence that no such thing would be seriously attempted by any considerable numbers of this House '

Mr. Lewis, of North Carolina, took decided ground in favor of giving the Arkansas bill the priority of decision; and expressed himself thus:

"He should vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] to lay the bill for the admission of Michigan into the Union on the table, until the bill for the admission of Arkansas should be first passed. He should do this, for the obvious reason that there were dangers, he would not say how great, which beset Arkansas, and which did not beset Michigan. The question of slavery could be moved as a condition for the admission of Arkansas, and it could not as a condition to the admission of Michigan. I look upon the Arkansas question as therefore the weaker of the two, and for that reason I would give it precedence. Besides, upon the Union, with all the sins of its constitution. the del cate question which may be involved in upon its head.

For that reason, if gentia men mean to offer no obstructions to the admission of Arkansas, let them give the assurance by help ing the weaker party through with the weaker question. We of the South cannot, and will no as I pledge myself, offer any objections to the domestic institutions of Michigan with reparto slavery. Can any gentleman make the same pledge that no such proposition shall confrom the North? Besides, the two bills are no now on an equal footing. The bill for the admission of Arkansas must be sent to a Commis tee of the Whole on the state of the Union, The bil. for the admission of Michigan need not no cessarily go to that committee. It will therefore pass in perfect safety, while we shall be left to get Arkansas along, through the tedious stage of commitment, as well as we can. The gentle man from Pennsylvania [Mr. Sutherland] san that these two bills will be hostages for the safety of each other. Not, sir, if you pass the stronger bill in advance of the weaker. ·The constitution of Arkansas, as communiand to Congress in the memorial of the people that Territory, praying to be admitted into the Union, centains the following clause: 'The feneral Assembly shall have no power to pass as for the emancipation of slaves without the mosent of the owners. They shall have no over to prevent emigrants to this State from raging with them such persons as are deemed first by the laws of any one of the United last. This provision of the constitution of the condensate o mansas is condemned by those whom I reesent on this occasion as anti-republican, as mng on general principles of civil polity, and onjust to the inhabitants of the non-slave-oling States. They object to it as being, in Set a provision to render slavery perpetual in new State of Arkansas. I concur in reproing such a clause. The legislature of Armas is forbidden to emancipate the slaves withis irisdiction, even though it should be ready inlemnify fully their owners. It is forbidden exclude slaves from being imported into the ate. I cannot, by any vote of mine, ratify or ertion a constitution of government which tertakes in this way to forcelose in advance eprogress of civilization and of liberty for ever. order to do justice to the unchangeable opins of the North, without, in any respect, inting the rights, real or supposed, of the South, rolleague [Mr. Adams], the vigilant eye of unsleeping mind there is nothing which apes, has moved an amendment of the bill for admission of Arkansas into the Union, so tif the amendment be adopted, the bill would das follows: 'The State of Arkansas is adtted into the Union upon the express condition at the people of the said State shall never interwith the primary disposal of the public lands hin the said State, nor shall they levy a tax my of the lands of the United States within said State; and nothing in this act shall be strued as an assent by Congress [to the artiin the constitution of the said State relating slavery and to the emancipation of the slaves, wallor to any of the propositions contained in ordinance of the said convention of the people Arkansas, nor to deprive the said State of kassas of the same grants, subject to the same trictions, which were made to the State of souri.' This amendment is, according to my igment, reasonable and proper in itself, and very least that any member from the North propose in vindication of the opinions and propose in vinceation to the opinions and proposed, however, by the gentleman a Virginia [Mr. Wise], with his accustomed or and ability. He alleges considerations was to the motion. He interrogates the ods of the proposed amendment in regard to farce, effect, and purposes, in terms which no challenge response; or which, at any if not distinctly and promptly met, would be the objections which those interrogatories siedly convey, to be taken as confessed and admitted by our significant silence. What may be the opinions of Martin Van Buren as to this particular bill, what his conduct formerly in reference to a similar case, is a point concerning which I can have no controversy with the gentleman from Virginia. Hook only to the merits of the qusetion before the committee. There is involved in it a principle which I regard us immeasurably more important than the opinion of any individual in this nation, however high his present situation or his possible destiny—the great principle of constitutional freedom. The gentleman from Virginia, who, I cheerfully admit, is always frank and honorable in his course upon this floor, has just declared that. as a Southern man, he had felt it to be his duty to come forward and take a stand in behalf of an institution of the South. That institution is slavery. In like manner, I feel it to be my duty, as a Northern man, to take a counter stand in conservation of one among the dearest of the institutions of the North. This institution is liberty. It is not to assail slavery, but to defend liberty, that I speak. It is demanded of us, Do you seek to impose restrictions on Arkansas, in violation of the compromise under which Missouri entered the Union? I might content myself with replying that the State of Massachusetts was not a party to that compromise. She never directly or indirectly assented to it. Most of her Representatives in Congress voted against it. Those of her Representatives who, regarding that compromise in the light of an act of conciliation important to the general interests of the Union, voted for it, were disavowed and denounced at home, and were stigmatized even here, by a Southern member, as over-compliant towards the exactingness of the South. On the first introduction of this subject to the notice of the House, the gentleman from Virginia made a declaration, which I particularly noticed at the time, for the purpose of having the tenor of the declaration distinctly understood by the House and by the country. The gentleman gave it to be known that, if members from the North held themselves not engaged by the terms of the compromise under which Missouri entered into the Union, neither would members from the South hold themselves engaged thereby; and that, if we sought to impose restrictions affecting slave property on the one hand, they might be impelled, on the other hand, to introduce slavery into the heart of the North. I heard the suggestion with the feelings natural to one born and bred in a land of equality and freedom. I took occasion to protest, in the surprised impulse of the moment. against the idea of putting restrictions on liberty in one quarter of the Union, in retaliation of the attempt to limit the spread of slavery in another quarter. I held up to view the incon-sistency and inconsequence of uttering the warmest eulogiums on freedom one day, of pouring out aspirations that the spirit of liberty might pervade the universe, and at another time threatening the North with the establishment of Slavery within its borders, if a Northern member should deprecate the legal perpetuation of slavery in a proposed new State of the West. It did not fall within the rules of pertinent debate to pursue the subject at that time; and I have but a single idea to present now, in addition to what I then observed. It is not possible for me to judge whether the gentleman from Virginia, and any of his friends or fellowcitizens at the South, deliberately and soberly cherish the extraordinary purpose which his language implied. I trust it was but a hasty thought, struck out in the arder of debate. To introduce slavery into the heart of the North? Vain idea! Invasion, pestilence, civil war, may conspire to exterminate the eight millions of free spirits who now dwell there. This, in the long lapse of ages incalculable, is possible to happen. You may raze to the earth the thronged cities, the industrious villages, the peaceful hamlets of the North. You may lay waste its fertile valleys and verdant hill-sides. You may plant its very soil with salt, and consign it to everlasting desolation. You may transform its beautiful fields into a desert as bare as the blank face of the sands of Sahara. You may reach the realization of the infernal boast with which Attila the Hun marched his barbaric hosts into Italy, demolishing whatever there is of civilization or prosperity in the happy dwellings of the North, and reducing their very substance to powder, so that a squadron of cavalry shall gallop over the site of populous cities, unimpeded as the wild steeds on the savannas of the West. All this you may do: it is within the bounds of physical possibility. But I solemnly assure every gentleman within the sound of my voice, I proclaim to the country and to the world, that, until all this be fully accomplished to the uttermost extremity of the letter, you cannot, you shall not, introduce slavery into the heart of the North."

A point of order being raised whether the two bills were not required by a rule of the House to go before the Committee of the Whole, the Speaker, Mr. Polk, decided in the affirmative-the Arkansas bill, upon the ground of containing an appropriation for the salary of judges; and that of Michigan because it provided for judges, which involved a necessity for an appropriation. The two bills then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Speight, of North Carolina, in the chair. Many members spoke, and much of the speaking related to the boundaries of Michigan, and especially the line between herself and the State of Ohio-to which no surviving interest attaches. The debate, therefore, will only be pursued as it presents points of present and future interest. These may be assumed under three heads: 1. If formation of constitutions without the prerion assent of Congress: and this was applicable both States. 2. The right of aliens to vote fore naturalization. 3. The right of Arkan to be admitted with slavery by virtue of the third ark of the treaty which ceded Louisiana to the third states—and by virtue of the Misson compromise. On these points, Mr. Hame, Ohio, spoke thus:

"One of the principal objections urged again their admission at this time is, that their p ceedings have been lawless and revolutions and that, for the example's sake, if for no cu reason, we should reject their application, force them to go back and do all their w over again. I cannot assent to this propositi Two ways are open to every territory that sires to emerge from its dependent conditi and become a State. There is no impropriety in eit mode. It is optional with Congress, at last admit the State or not, as may be thoughter dient. If they wish to admit her, they can it by two acts of Congress; one to nuthe the formation of a constitution, and the of to approve of it when made; or by one act lowing the prayer of the petitioners to ben a State, and approving of their constitution the same time. This latter course is the adopted in the present case. There is not disrespectful in it. Indeed, there is much justify the Territory in its proceeding. We have the authority to do this; if their constitution is republican, we ough do it. There is no weight in this objection I will dismiss it without further remark. other objection is, that aliens have aided in ing this constitution, and are allowed ther of suffrage in all elections by the provision contains. As to the first point, it is suffi to say that all the new States northwest of Ohio formed their constitutions precisely in same way. sentitled to vote in the election of delegates the convention; and afterwards in deciding better the people will accept the constitution feel by their convention. Such has been the onstruction and practice in all the country ah of the Ohio; and as the last census shows there are but a few hundreds of aliens in nchigan, it would be hard to set aside their astitution, because some of these may have ricipated in its formation. It would be uns to do so, if we had the power; but we have authority to do it; for if we regard the orsance as of any validity, it allows all ' free inditants' to vote in framing the State governwhich are to be created within the sphere tis influence. We will now turn to the remining point in this objection, and we shall see at it has no more force in it than the other. The constitution allows all white male citizens on twenty-one years of age, having resided six on the in Michigan, to vote at all elections; deery white male inhabitant residing in the ate at the time of signing the constitution is boxed the same privilege. These provisions doubtedly confer on aliens the right of sufee; and it is contended that they are in viola-of the constitution of the United States. atinstrument declares that 'new States may admitted by the Congress into this Union; tithe United States shall guarantee to every ste in this Union a republican form of governat; and that 'the citizens of each State ctizens in the several States.' The ordinance 1787 provides that the constitution to be formnorthwest of the Ohio 'shall be republican,' his an error not very uncommon to suppose at the right of suffrage is inseparably connectivith the privilege of citizenship. A slight estigation of the subject will prove that this of so. The privileges are totally distinct. State cannot make an American citizen who, er the constitution of the United States be entitled to the rights of citizenship federal government. We pass all the naalization laws, by which aliens are trans-med into citizens. We do so under the conution of the United States, sonceding to us authority. But, on the other hand, we have control over the right of suffrage in the difnt States. That belongs exclusively to e legislation and State authority. It varies lmost all the States; and yet who ever supdthat Congress could interfere to change rules adopted by the people in regard to it? one, I presume. Why then attempt to conithere? Other States have adopted the e provisions. Look at the constitutions this and other new States, and you will find they require residence only, and not citihip to enable a man to vote. Each State coafer this right upon all persons within limits. It gives them no rights beyond the zens, for that would violate the naturalization laws; or, rather, it would render them nugatory It cannot give them a right to vote in any other State, for that would infringe upon the authority of such State to regulate its own affairs, It simply confers the right of aiding in the choice of public officers whilst the alien remains in the State; it does not make him a citizen; nor is it of the slightest advantage to him beyoud the boundaries of Michigan."

Mr. Hamer concluded his remarks with a feeling allusion to the distractions which had prevailed during the Missouri controversy, a congrafulation upon their disappearance under the Missouri compromise, and an earnest exhortation to harmony and the preservation of good feeling in the speedy admission of the two States; and

"We can put an end to a most distracting contest, that has agitated our country from Maine to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the most remote settlement upon the frontier. There was a time when the most painful anxiety pervaded the whole nation; and whilst each one waited with feverish impatience for further intelligence from the disputed territory, he trembled lest the ensuing mail should bear the disastrous tidings of a civil strife in which brother had fallen by the hand of brother, and the soil of freedom had been stained by the blood of her own sons. But the storm has passed. The usual good fortune of the American people has The land heaves in view, and a prevailed. haven, with its wide-spread arms, invites us to enter. After so long an exposure to the fury of a tempest that was apparently gathering in our political horizon, let us seize the first opportunity to steer the ship into a safe harbor, far beyoud the reach of that elemental war that threatened her security in the open sea. Let us pass this bill. It does justice to all. It conciliates all. Its provisions will carry pence and harmony to those who are now agitated by strife, and disquieted by tumults and disorders. By this just, humane, and beneficent policy, we shall consolidate our liberties, and make this government what Mr. Jefferson, more than thirty years ago, declared it to be, 'the strongest government on earth; the only one where every man, at the call of the law, will fly to the standard of the law, and meet invasions of the public order as his own personal concern.' With this policy on the part of the government, and the spirit of patriotism that now animates our citizens in full vigor, united America may bid defiance to a world in arms; and should Providence continue to smile upon our country, we may confidently anticipate that the freedom, the happiness, and the prosperity, which we now enjoy, will be as perpetual as the lofty mountains that crown our continent, or the noble sof the State. It cannot make them citi- rivers that fertilize our plains."

Mr. Adams commenced a speech in Committee of the Whole, which was finished in the House, and being prepared for publication by himself, and therefore free from et or, is here given—all the main parts of it—to show his real position on the shavery question, so much misunderstood at the time on account of his tenacious adherence to the right of petition. He said:

"I cannot, consistently with my sense of my obligations as a citizen of the United States, and bound by oath to support their constitution, I cannot object to the admission of Arkansas into the Union as a slave State; I cannot propose or agree to make it a condition of her admission, that a convention of her people shall expunge this article from her constitution. She is entitled to admission as a slave State, as Louisiana and Mississippi, and Alabama, and Missouri, have been admitted, by virtue of that article in the treaty for the acquisition of Louisiana, which secures to the inhabitants of the ceded territories all the rights, privileges, and immunities, of the original citizens of the United States; and stipulates for their admission, conformably to that principle, into the Union. Louisiana was purchased as a country wherein slavery was the established law of the land. As Congress have not power in time of peace to abolish slavery in the original States of the Union, they are equally destitute of the power in those parts of the territory ceded by France to the United States by the name of Louisiana, where slavery existed at the time of the acquisition. Slavery is in this Union the subject of internal legislation in the States, and in peace is cognizable by Congress only, as it is tacity tolerated and protected where it exists by the constitution of the United States, and as it mingles in their intercourse with other nations. Arkansas, therefore, comes, and has the right to come into the Union with her slaves and her slave laws. It is written in the bond, and, however I may lament that it ever was so written. I must faithfully perform its obligations. I am content to receive her as one of the slave-holding States of this Union; but I am unwilling that Congress, in accepting her constitution, should even lie under the imputation of assenting to an article in the constitution of a State which withholds from its legislature the power of giving freedom to the slave. Upon this topic I will not enlarge. Were I disposed so to do, twenty hours of continuous session have too much exhausted my own physical strength, and the faculties as well as the indulgence of those who might incline to hear me, for me to trespass longer upon their patience. When the bill shall be reported to the House, I may, perhaps, again ask to be heard, upon renewing there, as I intend, the motion for this amendment.'

After a session of twenty-five hours, including the whole night, the committee rose and reporthe two bills to the House. Of the ardnooms of this session, which began at ten in the moing of Thursday, and was continued unit deo'clock the next morning, Mr. Adams, who mained at his post the whole time, gave the account in a subsequent notice of the sitting:

"On Thursday, the 9th of June, the Ileg went into Committee of the Whole on the an of the Union upon two bills; one to fix if Northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and the conditional admission of the State of Mid gan into the Union; and the other for the mission of the State of Arkansas into the University The bill for flxing the Northern boundary the State of Ohio, and the conditional admiss of Michigan Into the Union, was first taken for consideration, and gave rise to debates whi continued till near one o'clock of the morni of Friday, the 10th of June : repeated moti to adjourn had been made and rejected. committee had twice found itself without auorum, and had been thereby compelled to and report the fact to the House. > Mr. Adams resumed his seat, and Mr. Wise dressed the committee, particularly in reply Mr. Cushing. Confusion, noise and disorder came great in the Hall. Several members oke; and cries of "order," and "question" refrequent. Personal reflections passed, and pfair of honor followed between two Southmembers, happily adjusted without blooded The chairman, Mr. Speight, by great ertions, had procured attention to Mr. Hoar, Massachusetts. Afterwards Mr. Adams again dressed the committee. Mr. Wise inquired him whether in his own opinion, if his amendeat should be adopted, the State of Arkansas old by this bill, be admitted? Mr. Adams swered-" Certainly, sir. There is not in my pendment the shadow of a restriction proposed on the State. It leaves the State, like all the st to regulate the subject of slavery within self by her own laws." The motion of Mr. iams was rejected, only thirty-two members ting for it; being not one third of the mems from the non-slaveholding States.

The vote was taken on the Michigan bill first, iwas ordered to a third reading by a vote of $ to 45. The nays were:

is remarkable that this list of nays begins with Mr. Adams, and ends with Mr. Wise-a proof that all the negative votes, were not given upon the same reasons.

The vote was immediately after taken on ordering to a third reading the bill for the admission of the State of Arkansas; which was so ordered by a vote of 143 to 50. The nays were:

"Messrs, John Quincy Adams, Heman Allen. Joseph B. Anthony, Jeremiah Bailey, William K. Bond, Nathaniel B. Borden, George N. Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Timothy Childs, William Clark, Joseph H. Crane, Caleb Cushing, Edward Darlington, Hacon Denny, George Evans, Horace Everett C. Phillips, David Potts, jr., John Reed, David Russell, William N. Shinn, William Slade, John Thomson, Joseph R. Underwood, Samuel F. Vinton, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams,"

Here again the beginning and the ending of the list of voters is remarkable, beginning again with Mr. Adams, and terminating with Mr. Lewis Williams, of North Carolina-two gentlemen wide apart in their political courses, and certainly voting on this oceasion on different principles.

From the meagreness of these negative votes, it is evident that the struggle was, not to pass the two bills, but to bring them to a vote. This was the secret of the ardnons session of twentyfive hours in the House. Besides the public objections' which clogged their admissionboundaries in one, slavery in the other, alien voting, and (what was deemed by some), revolutionary conduct in both in holding conventions without authority of Congress; besides these public reasons, there was another cause operating silently, and which went more to the postponement than to the rejection of the States. This cause was political and partisar, and grew out of the impending presidential election, to be held before Congress should meet again. Mr. Van Buren was the democratic candidate; General William Henry Harrison was the candidate of the opposition; and Mr. Hugh L. White, of Tennessee, was brought forward by a fraction which divided from the democratic party. The new States, it was known, would vote, if now admitted, for Mr. Van Buren; and this furnished a reason to the friends of the other candidates (even those friendly to eventual admission, and on which some of them were believed to act), to wish to stave off the admission to the ensuing session.-The actual negative vote to the admission of each State, was not only small, but nearly the same in number, and mixed both as to political parties and sectional localities; so as to exclude the idea of any regular or considerable opposition to Arkansas as a slave State. The vote which would come nearest to referring itself to that cause was the one on Mr. Adams' proposed amendment to the State constitution; and there the whole vote amounted only to 32; and of the sentiments of the greater part of these, including Mr. Adams himself, the speech of that gentleman must be considered the authentic exponent; and will refer their opposition, not to any objection to the admission of the State as slave-holding, but to an unwillingness to appear upon the record as assenting to a constitution which forbid emancipation, and made slavery perpetual. The number actually voting to reject the State, and keep her out of the Union, because she admitted slavery, must have been quite small-not more in proportion, probably, than what it was in the Senate.

CHAPTER CXXXIX.

ATTEMPTED INQUIRY INTO THE MILITARY ACADEMY.

This institution, soon after its organization under the act of 1812, began to attract public attention, as an establishment unfriendly to the rights of the people, of questionable constitutionality, as being for the benefit of the rich and influential; and as costing an enormous sum for each officer obtained from it for actual service. Movements against it were soon commenced in Congress, and for some years perseveringly continued, principally under the lead of Mr. Newton Cannon, and Mr. John Cooke, representatives from the State of Tennessee. Their speeches and statements made considerable impression upon the public mind, but very little upon Congress, where no amelioration of any kind could be obtained, either in the organization of the institution, or in the practical administration which had grown up under it. In the session of 1834-'35 these efforts were renewed chief induced by Mr. Albert Gallatin Hawes, rep sentative from Kentucky, who moved for a attained the appointment of a committee twenty-four, one from each State; which me a report, for which no consideration could procured-not even the printing of the rem Baffled in their attempts to get at their object the usual forms of legislation, the members on ed to the institution resorted to the extraording mode of attacking its existence in an appropriate tion bill: that is to say, resisting appropriate for its support-a mode of proceeding entire hopeless of success, but justifiable, as the believed, under the circumstances; and at events as giving them an opportunity to their objections before the public.

It was at the session of 1835-36, that # form of opposition took its most determine course; and some brief notices of what was then may still be of service in awakening a spi of inquiry in the country, and promoting in tigations which have so long been request and denied. But it was not until after anoth attempt had failed to do any thing through committee at this session also, that the ultim resource of an attack upon the appropriation the support of the institution was reserted Early in the session Mr. Hawes offered this solution: "That a select committee of nine appointed to inquire into what amendments any, are expedient to be made to the laws lating to the military Academy at West Pol in the State of New-York; and also into the pediency of modifying the organization of institution; and also whether it would not m port with the public interest to abolish same: with power in the committee to me by bill or otherwise." Mr. Hawes, in supply of his motion reminded the House of the pointment of the committee of the last sess of its report, and his inability to obtain at upon it, or to procure an order for its print The resolution which he now submitted w but in one particular from that which he offered the year before, and that was in the duced number of the committee asked Twenty-four was a larger number than be induced to enter into any extended or patie investigation; and he now proposed a com

His resolution was only one inquiry, to obtain a report for the inforstion of the people, and the action of the lace a species of resolution usually granted as matter of course; and he hoped there would no objection to his motion. Mr. Wardwell. New-York, objected to the appointment of sect committee, and thought the inquiry at to go to the standing committee on milimaffairs. Mr. F. O. J. Smith, of Maine. shed to hear some reason assigned for this otion. It seemed to him that a special comttee ought to be raised; but if the friends of institution were fearful of a select commitand would assign that fear as a motive for ferring the standing committee, he would hidraw his objection. Mr. Briggs, of Massasetts, believed the subject was already remed to the military committee in the general grace to that committee of all that related the President's message to this Academy; to believing, he made it a point of order for Speaker to decide, whether the motion of Hawes could be entertained. The Speaker, Polk, said that the motion was one of iniry; and he considered the reference of the dent's message as not applying to the case. Briggs adhered to his belief that the subject pt to go to a standing committee. The comtte had made an elaborate report at the last min, which was now on the files of the House; if gentlemen wished information from it, would order it to be printed. Mr. John moids, of Illinois, said it was astonishing members of this House, friends of this inution, were so atrenuous in their opposition prestigation. If it was an institution founded proper basis, and conducted on proper and blican principles, they had nothing to fear ninvestigation; if otherwise the people had: the great dread of investigation portended whing wrong. His constituents were disided with this Academy, and expected him represent them fairly in doing his part to reor to abolish it; and he should not disout them. The member from Massachusetts, Briggs, he said, had endeavored to stifle inquiry, by making it a point of order to be iled by the Speaker; which augured badly the integrity of the institution. Failing hat attempt to stifle inquiry, he had joined member from New-York, Mr. Wardwell, ward to merit. We, members of Councess, rise in the attempt to send it to a committee where no inquiry would be made, and in violation of parliamentary practice. He, Mr. Reynolds, had great respect for the members of the military committee; but some of them, and perhaps all, had expressed an opinion in favor of the institution. Neither the chairman, nor any member of the committee had asked for this inquiry; it was the law of parliament, and also of reason and common sense, that all inquiries should go to committees disposed to make them; and it was without precedent or justification, and injurious to the fair conducting of business, to take an inquiry out of the hands of a member that moves it, and is responsible for its adequate prosecution, and refer it to a committee that is against it, or indifferent to it. When a member gets up, and moves an inquiry touching any branch of the public service, or the official conduct of any officer, he incurs a responsibility to the moral sense of the House and of the country. He assumes that there is something wrong-that he can find it out if he has a chance; and he is entitled to a chance, both for his own sake and the country; and not only to have his committee, but to be its chairman, and to have a majority of the members favorable to its object. If it were otherwise members would have but poor encouragement to move inquiries for the public service. Cut off himself from the performance of his work, an indifferent or prejudiced committee may neglect inquiry, or pervert it into defence; and subject the mover to the imputation of preferring false and frivolous motions; and so discredit him, while injuring the public, and sheltering abuse. Under a just report he believed the Academy would wither and die. Under its present organization it is a monopoly for the gratuitous education of the sons and connections of the rich and influential-to be afterwards preferred for army appointments, or even for civil appointments; and to be always provided for as the children of the government, getting not only gratuitous education, but a preference in appointments. A private soldier, though a young David, slaying Goliath, could get no appointment in our army. He must stand back for a West-Pointer, even the most inefficient, who through favor, or driving, had gone through his course and got his diploma. Promotion was the atimulus and the refrom the ranks of the people when we come here, and have to depend upon merit to get here. Why not let the same rule apply in the army, and give a chance to merit there, instead of giving all the offices to those who may have no turn for war, who only want support, and get it by public patronage, and favor, because they have official friends or parents? The report made at the last session looks bad for the Academy. Let any one read it, and he will feel that there is something wrong. If the friends of the institution would suffer that report to be printed, and let it go to the people, it would be a great satisfaction. Mr. Wardwell said the last Congress had refused to print the report: and asked why it was that these complaints against the Academy came from the West? Was it because the Western engineers wanted the employment on the roads and bridges in place of the regular officers. Mr. Hannegan, of Indiana, said he was a member of the military committee which made the report at the last session, and which Mr. Wardwell had reminded them the House refused to order to be printed. And why that refusal? Because the friends of the Academy took post behind the two-thirds rule; and the order for printing could not be obtained because two-thirds of the House could not be got to suspend the rule, even for one hour. and that the morning hour. The friends of the Academy rallied, he said, to prevent the suspension of the rule, and to present publicity to the report. Mr. Hamer, of C aid, why oppose this inquiry? The people are it. A large portion of them believed the Academy to be an aristocratical institution, which ought to be abolished; others believe it to be republican, and that it ough! to be cherished. Then why not inquire, and find out which is right, and legislate accordingly? Mr. Abijah Mann, of New-York, said there was a considerable interest in the States surrounding this institution, and he had seen a strong disposition in the members coming from those States to defend it against all charges. He was a member of the committee of twenty-four at the last session, and concurred partially in the report which was made, which was, to say the least of it, an elaborate examination of the institution from its foundation. He knew that in doing so he had incurred some censure from a part of his own State; but he never had flinched, and never would flinch, from the performance of any duty here which he is it incumbent upon him to discharge. Ile h found much to censure, and believed if friends of the institution would take the troub to investigate it as the committee of twenty-fa had done, they would find more to censure the principle of the establishment than the were aware of. There were abuses in this stitution, developed in that report, of a charge that would not find, he presumed, a single vocate upon that floor when they came to published. He believed the principle of the stitution was utterly inconsistent with the pri ciple of all other institutions; but he was for exterminating it. Reformation was his ject. It was the only avenue by which people of the country could approach the office of the army-the only gateway by which the could be reached. The principle was won and the practice bad. We saw individuals of tinually pressing the government for admiss into this institution, to be educated professor for the military service, but very frequently, too generally with the secret design in the hearts to devote themselves to the civil pursu of society; and this was a fraud upon the ernment, and a poor way for the future office begin his educational life. When the report the twenty-four came to be printed, as he ho it would, it would be seen that this institut cost the government by far too much for education of these young men. The opportunity for this was not presented until near the end of the session, when Mr. Franklin Pierce, of New Hampshire, delivered a well-considered and wellseconed speech against the institution, bottomed a facts, and sustained by conclusions, in the sighest degree condemnatory of the Academy; ad which will be given in the next chapter.

CHAPTER CXL.

WILITARY ACADEMY-SPEECH OF MR. PIERCE.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: - An attempt was made during le last Congress to bring the subject of the remization of the Military Academy before the ountry, through a report of a committee. The me thing has been done during the present mred alike unsuccessful! Still, you do not to call for appropriations; you require the cople's money for the support of the institu-, while you refuse them the light necessary enable them to judge of the propriety of or annual requisitions. Whether the amount posed to be appropriated, by the bill upon rtable, is too great or too small, or precisely ficient to cover the current expenses of the stitution, is a matter into which I will not at sent inquire; but I shall feel bound to oppose bill in every stage of its progress. I cannot teasingle dollar until the resolution of inr. Hawes), at an early day in the session, be first taken up and disposed of. I am are, sir, that it will be said, because I have and the same declaration on a former occathat this is not the proper time to discuss merits of the institution; that the bill is to he provision for expenses already incurred part; and whatever opinions may be entermed upon the necessity of a reorganization, appropriation must be made. I say to genwho are opposed to the principles of the titution, and to those who believe that abuses st which ought to be exposed and corrected, t now is their only time, and this the only priunity, during the present session, to atst the bill until its friends shall find it neces- dreaded levelling principle.

Vol. I.—41

sary to take up the resolution of inquiry, and give it its proper reference.

"Sir, why has this investigation been resist ed? Is it not an institution which has already cost this country more than three millions of dollars, for which you propose, in this very bill, an appropriation of more than one hundred and thirty thousand dollars, and which, at the same time, in the estimation of a large portion of the citizens of this Union, has failed, eminently failed, to fulfil the objects for which it was established, of sufficient interest and importance to claim the consideration of a committee of this House, and of the House itself? I should have expected the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Hawes), merely proposing an inquiry, to pass without opposition, had I not witnessed the strong sensation, nay, excitement. that was produced here, at the last session, by the presentation of his yet unpublished report. Sir, if you would have an exhibition of highly excited feeling, it requires little observation to learn that you may produce it at any moment by attacking such laws as confer exclusive and gratuitous privileges. The adoption of the resolution of inquiry, at the last session of Congress, and the appointment of a select committee under it, were made occasion of newspaper paragraphs, which, in tone of lamentation and direful prediction, rivalled the most highly wrought specimens of the panic era, One of those articles I have preserved, and have before me. It commences thus: 'The architects of ruin.—This name has been appropriately given to those who are leading on the base, the ignorant, and the unprincipled, in a remorseless war upon all the guards and defences of society.'

"I introduce it here merely to show what are in certain quarters, considered the guards and defences of society. After various compliments, similar to that just cited, the article proceeds: All this is dangerous as novel, and the ultimate results cannot be contemplated without anxiety. If this spirit extends, who can check it? "Down with the Bank;" "down with the Military Academy;" "down with the Judiciary;" "down with the Senate;" will be followed by watchwords of a worse character.' Here, Mr. Chairman, you have the United States Bank first, and then the Military Academy, as the guards and defences of your country. If it be so, you are, indeed, feebly protected. One of these guards and defences is already tottering. And who are the 'architects of ruin' that have resolved its downfall? Are they the base, the ignorant, and the unprincipled? No, sir. The most pure and patriotic portion of your community: the staid, industrious, intelligent farmers and mechanics, through a public servant, who has met responsibilities and seconded their wishes, with equal intrepidity and success, in now is their only time, and this the only the camp and in the cabinet, have accomplished this great work. Mr. Chairman, there is no their object, and I trust they will steadily real danger to be apprehended from this much-

"From the middling interest you have derived your most able and efficient support in the most gloomy and trying periods of your history. And what have they asked in return? Nothing but the common advantages and blessings of a free government, administered under equal and impartial laws. They are responsible for no portion of your legislation, which, through its partial and unjust operation, has shaken this Union to its centre. That has had its origin in a diffirent quarter, sustained by wealth, the wealth of monopolies, and the power and influence which wealth, thus accumulated and disposed, never fails to control. Indeed, sir, while far from demanding at your hands special favors for themselves, they have not, in my judgment, been sufficiently jealous of all legislation conferring exclusive and gratuitous privileges.

"That the law creating the institution, of which

I am now speaking, and the practice under it, is strongly marked by both these characteristics, is apparent at a single glance. It is gratuitous, because those who are so fortunate as to obtain admission there, receive their education without any obligation, except such as a sense of honor may impose, to return, either by service or otherwise, the slightest equivalent. It is exclusive, inasmuch as only one youth, out of a population of more than 47,000, can participate in its advantages at the same time; and those who are successful are admitted at an age, when their characters cannot have become developed, and with very little knowledge of their adaptasystem disregards one of those great principles which, carried into practice, contributed, perhaps, more than any other to render the arms of Napoleon invincible for so many years. Who does not percieve that it destroys the very life and spring of military ardor and enthusiasm, by utterly foreclosing all hope of promotion to the soldier and non-commissioned officer? However meritorious may be his services, however pre-eminent may become his qualifications for command, all is unavailing. The portcullis is dropped between him and preferment; the wisdom of your laws having provided another cri-terion than that of admitted courage and conduct, by which to determine who are worthy of command. They have made an Academy, where a certain number of young gentlemen are educated annually at the public expense, and to which there is, of consequence, a general rush, not so much from sentiments of patriotism and a taste for military life, as from motives less worthy—the avenue, and the only avenue, to rank in your army. These are truths, Mr.

nius of your government, and the efficiency and chivalrous character of your military force. "Sir, no man can feel more deeply interested in the army, or entertain a higher regard for it,

Chairman, which no man will pretend to deny; and I leave it for this House and the nation to determine whether they do not exhibit a spirit of exclusiveness, alike at variance with the ge-

than myself. My earliest recollections connect themselves fondly and gratefully with the name of the brave men who, relinquishing the quiet and security of civil life, were staking their upon the defence of their country's rights and honor. One of the most distinguished among that noble band now occupies and honors a sea upon this floor. It is not fit that I should in dulge in expressions of personal respect and all miration, which I am sure would find a heart response in the bosom of every member of the committee. I allude to him merely to expres the hope that, on some occasion, we may have upon this subject, the benefit of his experience and observation. And if his opinions shall dif fer from my own, I promise carefully to review every step by which I have been led to my posent conclusions. You cannot mistake me, sir I refer to the hero of Erie. I have declare myself the friend of the army. Satisfy me, the what measures are best calculated to render effective and what all desire it to be, and I for the proposition with my whole heart.

"But I cannot believe that the Military Am demy, as at present organized, is calculated a accomplish this desirable end. It may, and m doubtedly does, send forth into the countries much military knowledge; but the advanta which your army, or that which will constitu your army in time of need, derives from it is no means commensurate with the expense ye incur. Here, Mr. Chairman, permit me to that I deny, utterly, the expediency, and the right to educate, at the public expense, m number of young men who, on the completion their education, are not to form a portion of you military force, but to return to the walks private life. Such was never the operation the Military Academy, until after the law 1812; and the doctrine, so far as I have be able to ascertain, was first formally annound by a distinguished individual, at this time su ciently jealous of the exercise of executive tronage, and greatly alarmed by what he ceives to be the tendencies of this government to centralism and consolidation. It may found in the report of the Secretary of W communicated to Congress in 1819.

hat are, in fact, destined for civil life, why may von not, by parity of reasoning, provide the means of a legal, or theological, or medical eduation, on the ground that the recipients of your bounty will carry forth a fund of useful knowledge, that may, at some time, under some ciremstances, produce a beneficial influence, and pomote 'the general wolfare ?' Sir, I fear that men some of us may live to see the day when this 'general welfare' of your constitution will have us little ground to boast of a government of limited powers. But I did not propose at this time to discuss the abstract question of mastitutional right. I will regard the expedimer alone; and, whether the power exist or not, is exercise, in an institution like this, is subverire of the only principle upon which a school, moducted at the public expense, can be made profitable to the public service—that of making nadmission into your school, and an education there, secondary to an appointment in the army. it this distinctive feature characterized all your legislation, and all executive recommendations, down to 1810.

"I may as well notice here, as at any time, maswer which has always been ready when diections have been raised to this institutionn answer which, if it has not proved quite sa-tractory to minds that yield their assent more midly to strong reasons than to the authority of great names, has yet, unquestionably, exer-cied a powerful influence upon the public mind. thas not gone forth upon the authority of an dividual merely, but has been published to the orld with the approbation of a committee of a ormer Congress. It is this: that the institubin has received, at different times, the sanc-bin of such names as Washington, Adams, and derson; and this has been claimed with such biness, and in a form so imposing, as almost forbid any question of its accuracy. If this encorrect, in point of fact, it would be entiid to the most profound respect and considerain, and no change should be urged against the right of such authority, without mature delibntion, and thorough conviction of, expediency. afortunately for the advocates of the instituon, and fortunately for the interests of the untry, this claim cannot be sustained by remence to executive documents, from the first port of General Knox, in 1790, to the close Mr. Jefferson's administration.

The error has undoubtedly innocently ocred, by confounding the Military Academy West Point as it was, with the Military Acamy at West Point as it is. The report of retary Knox, just referred to, is characterby this distinctive feature—that the corps sposed to be organized were 'to serve as an tal defence to the community,' and to constito part of the active military force of the mtry, to serve in the field, or on the frontier, in the fortifications of the sea-coast, as the McHenry), communicated to Congress in 1800 although it proposed a plan for military schools, differing in many essential particulars from those which had preceded it, still retained the distinctive feature just named as characterizing the report of General Knox.

"With regard to educating young men gratuitously, which, whatever may have been the design, I am prepared to show is the practical operation of the Academy, as at present organized, I cannot, perhaps, exhibit more clearly the sentiments of the Executive at that early day, urgent as was the occasion, and strong as must have been the desire, to give strength and elliciency to the military force, than by reading one or two paragraphs from a supplementary report of Secretary McHenry, addressed to the chairman of the Committee of Defence, on the 31st

January, 1800.
"The Secretary says: 'Agreeably to the plan of the Military Academy, the directors thereof are to be officers taken from the army; consequently, no expense will be incurred by such appointments. The plan also contemplates that officers of the army, cadets, and non-commissioned officers, shall receive instruction in the Academy. As the rations and fuel which they are entitled to in the army will suffice for them in the Academy, no additional expense will be required for objects of maintenance while there. The expenses of servants and certain incidental expenses relative to the police and administration, may be defrayed by those who shall be admitted, out of their pay and emoluments.'

"You will observe, Mr. Chairman, from the phraseology of the report, that all were to constitute a part of your actual military force; and that whatever additional charges should be incurred, were to be defrayed by those who might receive the advantages of instruction. These were provisions, just, as they are important. Let me call your attention for a moment to a report of Col. Williams, which was made the subject of a special message, communicated to Congress by Mr. Jefferson, on the 18th of March, 1808. The extract I propose to read, as sustaining fully the views of Mr. McHenry upon this point, is in the following words: 'It might be well to make the plan upon such a scale as not only to take in the minor officers of the navy, but also any youths from any of the States who might wish for such an education, whether designed for the army or navy, or neither, and let them be assessed to the value of their education, which might form a fund for extra or contingent expenses. Sir, these are the true doctrines upon this subject; doctrines worthy of the administration under which they were promulgated, and in accordance with the views of statesmen in the earlier and purer days of the Republic. Give to the officers of your army the highest advantages for perfection in all the branches of military science, and let those advantages be open to all in rotation, and under such terms and regulations mander-in-chief may direct.' At a later pe-the report of the Secretary of War (Mr. as shall be at once impartial toward the officers and advantageous to the service; but let all young gentlemen who have a taste for military life, and desire to adopt arms as a profession, prepare themselves for subordinate situations at their own expense, or at the expense of their parents or guardinas, in the same manner that the youth of the country are qualified for the professions of civil life. Sir, while upon this subject of gratuitous education, I will read an extract from 'Dupin's Military Force of Great Britain,' to show what favor it finds in another country, from the practice and experience of which we may derive some advantages, however far from approving of its institutions generally. The extract is from the 2d vol. 71st page, and relates to the terms on which young gentlemen are admitted to the junior departments of the Royal Military College

" First: The sons of officers of all ranks, whether of the land or sea forces, who have died in the service, leaving their families in peeuniary distress; this class are instructed, boarded, and habited gratutiously by the State; being required only to provide their equipments on admission, and to maintain themselves in linen. Secondly: The sons of all officers of the army above the rank of subalterns actually in the service, and who pay a sum proportioned to their ranks, according to a scale per annum regulated by the supreme board. The sons of living naval officers of rank not below that of master and commander, are also admitted on payment of annual stipends, similar to those of corresponding ranks in the army. The orphan sons of officers, who have not left their families in pecuniary difficulties, are admitted into this class on paying the stipends required of officers of the rank held by their parents at the time of their decease. Thirdly: The sons of noblemen and private gentlemen who pay a yearly sum equivalent to the expenses of their education, board, and clothing, according to a rate regulated from time to time by the commissioners.' Sir, lct it be remembered that these are the regulations of a government which, with all its wealth and power, is, from its structure and practice, groaning under the accumulated weight of pensions, sinecures, and gratuities, and yet you observe, that only one class, 'the sons of officers of all ranks, whether of the land or sea forces, who have died in the service, leaving their families in pecuniary distress,' are educated gratuitously.

"I do not approve even of this, but I hold it up in contrast with your own principles and practice. If the patience of the committee would warrant me, Mr. Chairman, I could show, by reference to Executive communications, and the concurrent legislation of Congress in 1794, 1796, 1802, and 1808, that prior to the last mentioned date, such an institution as we now have was neither recommended nor contemplated. Upon this point I will not detain you longer; but when hereafter confronted by the authority of great rames, I trust we shall be told where the expressions of approbation are to be found. We may then judge of their applicability to the Military Academy as at present organized. I am far from desiring to see this country destitute of a Military Academy; but I would have it a school of practice, and instruction, for officer actually in the service of the United States: not an institution for educating gratuitously, young gentlemen, who, on the completion of their terms or after a few months' leave of absence, resign their commissions and return to the pursuits devial life. If any one doubts that this is the practical operation of your present system, I refer him to the annual list of resignations, to be found in the Adjutant General's office.

"Firmly as I am convinced of the necessity of a reorganization, I would take no step to create an unjust prejudice against the institution All that I ask, and, so far as I know, all that any of the opponents of the institution ask, is that after a full and impartial investigation is shall stand or fall upon its merits. I know there are graduates of the institution who are ornaments to the army, and an honor to their country; but they, and not the seminary, and entitled to the credit. Here I would remark once for all, that I do not reflect upon the offcers or pupils of the Academy; it is to the prin ciples of the institution itself, as at present or ganized, that I object. It is often said that the graduates leave the institution with sentiment that but ill accord with the feelings and opinion of the great mass of the people of that govern ment from which they derive the means of ed cation, and that many who take commission possess few qualifications for the command men, either in war or in peace. Most of i members of this House have had more or le intercourse with these young gentlemen, and leave it for each individual to form his on opinion of the correctness of the charges. The much I will say for myself, that I believe the these, and greater evils, are the natural, if m the inevitable, result of the principles in white this institution is founded; and any system education, established upon similar principle on government patronage alone, will produ like results, now and for ever. Sir, what a some of these results? By the report of the Secretary of War, dated January, 1831 real informed that, "by an estimate of the set in years (preceding that date), it appears that supply of the army from the corps of graduat cadets, has averaged about twenty-two annual while those who graduated are about for making in each year an excess of eighteen. I number received annually into the Academys rages one hundred, of which only the num stated, to wit, forty, pass through the p scribed course of education at schools, and come supernumerary lieutenants in the arm By the report of the Secretary of War, I cember, 1830, we are informed, that "the many than the many ber of promotions to the army from this or

m convinced of the necessity on, I would take no step to orejudice against the institution. nd, so far as I know, all that ents of the institution ask, is and impartial investigation, it fall upon its merits. Most of the is House have had more or le th these young gentlemen, and ich individual to form his ow correctness of the charges. Thu y for myself, that I believe the ater evils, are the natural, if no result of the principles in which a is founded; and any system blished upon similar principal to patronage alone, will produce toward for ever. Sir, what is results? By the report of the Var, dated January, 1831 real

"by an estimate of the ach ing that date), it appears that the army from the corps of graduate eraged about twenty-two annual who graduated are about fort h year an excess of eighteen. T red annually into the Academy ndred, of which only the numb t, forty, pass through the pe e of education at schools, and merary lieutenants in the arm rt of the Secretary of War, I we are informed, that "the na tions to the army from this cor five years, has averaged about annually while the number enduates has been at an average of forty. This 10088, which is annually increasing, has placed eighty-seven in waiting until vacancies shall take place, and show that in the next year, probably, and in the succeeding one, certainly, there will be an excess beyond what the existme law authorizes to be commissioned. There will then be 106 supernumerary brevet second leutenants appurtenant to the army, at an arrage annual expense of $80,000. Sir, that results here disclosed were not anticipated by Mr. Madison, is apparent from a recurrence to his messages of 1810 and 1811.

"In passing the law of 1812, both Congress and the President acted for the occasion, and they expected those who should succeed them to act in a similar manner. Their feelings of natriotism and resentment were aroused, by beholding the privileges of freemen wantonly inraded, our glorious stars and stripes disregarded and national and individual rights trampled in the dust. The war was pending. The noessity for increasing the military force of the country was obvious and pressing, and the urgent occasion for increased facilities for military instruction, equally apparent. Sir. it was under creumstances like these, when we had not only enemies abroad, but, I blush to say, enemies at bone, that the institution, as at present organized, had its origin. It will hardly be pretended that it was the original design of the law to sugment the number of persons instructed, bevond the wants of the public service. Well, the report of the Secretary shows, that for five years prior to 1831, the Academy had furnished eighteen supernumeraries annually. A practical operation of this character has no sanction in the recommendation of Mr. Madison. The report demonstrates, further, the fruitfulness and willing of this institution, by showing the fact, that but two-fifths of those who enter the Academy graduate, and that but a fraction more than one-fifth enter the public service. This is not the fault of the administration of the Acade my; it is not the fault of the young gentlemen who are sent there; on your present peace esablishment there can be but little to stimulate them, particularly in the acquisition of military science. There can hardly be but one object in the mind of the student, and that would be to obtain an education for the purposes of civil life. The difficulty is, that the institution has outfred both the occasion that called it into existnce, and its original design. I have before renarked, that the Academy was manifestly enaged to correspond with the army and militia bra moment at facts, and observe with how and wisdom, justice, and sound policy, you re-in the provisions of the law of 1812. The total in the provisions of the law of 1812. uthorized force of 1813, after the declaration of nr, was 58,254; and in October, 1814, the allitary establishment amounted to 62,428. By eset of March, 1815, the peace establishment tive in its effect with the conspiracy of the Bank as limited to 10,000, and now hardly exceeds of the United States to effect the most wicked that number. Thus you make a reduction of more than 50,000 in your actual military force, to accommodate the expenses of the government to its wants. And why do you refuse to do the same with your grand system of public education? Why does that remain unchanged? Why not reduce it at once, at least to the actual wants of the service, and dispense with your corps of supernumerary lieutenants? Sir, there is, there can be but one answer to the question, and that may be found in the war report of 1819, to which I have before had occasion to allude. The Secretary says, 'the cadets who cannot be provided for in the army will return to private life, but in the event of a war their knowledge will not be lost to the country.' Indeed, sir, these young gentlemen, if they could be induced to take the field, would, after a lapse of ten or fifteen years, come up from the bar, or it may be the pulpit, fresh in military science, and admirably qualifled for command in the face of an enemy. magazine of facts, to prove at the same glance the extravagance and unfruitfulness of this institution, is not easily exhausted: but I am admonished by the lateness of the hour to omit many considerations which I regard as both interesting and important. I will only detain the committee to make a single statement, placing side by side some aggregate results. There has already been expended upon the institution more than three millions three hundred thousand dollars. Between 1815, and 1821, thirteen hundred and eighteen students were admitted into the Academy; and of all the cadets who were ever there, only two hundred and sixty-tive remained in the service at the end of 1830. Here are the expenses you have incurred, and the products you have realized.

"I leave them to be balanced by the people. But for myself, believing as I do, that the Academy stands forth as an anomaly among the institutions of this country; that it is at variance with the spirit, if not the letter of the constitusion under which we live; so long as this House shall deny investigation into its principles and practical operation, I, as an individual member, wil refuse to appropriate the first dollar for its support."

CHAPTER CXLI.

EXPUNCING RESOLUTION-PERORATION OF SEN-ATOR BENTON'S SECOND SPEECH.

"THE condemnation of the President, combining as it did all that illegality and injustice could inflict, had the further misfortune to be co-operaand universal scheme of mischief which the annals of modern times exhibit. It was a plot against the government, and against the property of the country. The government was to be upset, and property revolutionized. Six hundred banks were to be broken-the general currency ruined-myriads bankrupted-ail businesa stopped-all property sunk in valueall confidence destroyed! that out of this wide spread ruin and pervading distress, the vengeful institution might glut its avarice and ambition, trample upon the President, take possession of the government, reclaim its lost deposits, and perpetuate its charter. These crimes, revolting and frightful in themselves, were to be accomplished by the perpetration of a whole system of subordinate and subsidiary crime! the people to be deceived and excited; the President to be calumniated; the effects of the bank's own conduct to be charged upon him; meetings got up; business suspended; distress deputations organized; and the Senate chamber converted into a theatre for the dramatic exhibition of all this fletitious woe. That it was the deep and sad misfortune of the Senate so to act, as to be cooperative in all this scene of mischief, is too fully proved by the facts known, to admit of denial. I speak of acts, not of motives. The effect of the Senate's conduct in trying the President and uttering alarm speeches, was to co-operate with the bank, and that secondarily, and as a subordinate performer; for it is incontestable that the bank began the whole affair; the little book of fifty pages proves that. The bank began it; the bank followed it up; the bank attends to it now. It is a case which might well be entered on our journal as a State is entered against a criminal in the docket of a court: the Bank of the United States versus President Jackson: on impeachment for removing the deposits. The entry would be justified by the facts, for these are the indubitable facts. The bank started the accusation; the Senate took it up. The bank furnished arguments; the Senate used them. The bank excited meetings; the Senate extolled them. The bank sent deputations; the senators received them with honor. The deputations reported answers for the President which he never gave; the Senate repeated and enforced these answers. Hand in hand throughout the whole process, the bank and the Senate acted together, and succeeded in getting up the tempt against President Jefferson, and the most serious and afflicting panic ever known is this country. The whole country was agitated Citles, towns, and villages, the entire country and the whole earth seemed to be in commotion against one man. A revolution was proclaimed the overthrow of all law was announced! the substitution of one man's will for the voice of the whole government, was daily asserted! the public sense was astounded and bewildered with dire and portentous annunciations! In the midst of all this machinery of alarm and distress many good citizens lost their reckoning; sens, ble heads went wrong; stout hearts quailed; old friends gave way; temporizing counsels came in: and the solitary defender of his country was urged to yield! Oh, how much depended upon that one man at that dread and awful point of time! If he had given way, then all was gone! An insolent, rapacious, and revengeful institution would have been installed in sovereign power. The federal and State governments, the Congress, the Presidency, the State legislatures all would have fallen under the dominion of the bank; and all departments of the government would have been filled and administered by the debtors, pensioners, and attorneys of that institution. He did not yield, and the country was saved. The heroic patriotism of one man prevented all this calamity, and saved the Republic from becoming the appendage and fief of a moneyed corporation. And what has been his reward? So far as the people are concerned, honor, gratitude, blessings, everlasting benedictions; so far as the Senate is concerned dishonor, denunciation, stigma, infamy. And shall these two verdicts stand? Shall our journal bear the verdict of infamy, while the hearts of the people glow and palpitate with the verdice of honor?

"President Jackson has done more for the human race than the whole tribe of politicians put together; and shall he remain stigm tized and condemned for the most glorious action of his life? The bare attempt to stigmatize Mr. Jefferson was not merely expunged, but cut ou from the journal; so that no trace of it remain upon the Senate records. The designs are the same in both cases; but the aggravations in inexpressibly greater in the case of Presiden Jackson. Referring to the journals of the House of Representatives for the character of the a

The designs are the cases; but the aggravations in greater in the case of Presiden erring to the journals of the House tives for the character of the at President Jefferson, and the re-

ses for repulsing it, and it is seen that the stempt was made to criminate Mr. Jefferson, ad to charge him upon the journals with a mistion of the laws; and that this attempt was made at a time, and under circumstances insidisaly calculated to excite unjust suspicion in the minds of the people against the Chief Maglamite. Such was precisely the character of the charge; and the effect of the charge against President Jackson, with the difference only that the proceeding against President Jackson, was many ten thousand times more revolting and gravated; commencing as it did in the Bank, arried on by a violent political party, prosecuted sentence and condemnation; and calculated, I believed, to destroy the President, to change the administration, and to put an end to popular representative government. Yes, slr, to put an and to elective and representative government! for what are all the attacks upon President Jackson's administration but attacks upon the people who elect and re-elect him, who approve his administration, and by approving, make it their own? To condemn such a President, thus apported, is to condemn the pople, to condemn the elective principle, to condemn the fundamental principle of our government; and to sublish the favorite dogma of the monarchists, in the people are incapable of self-government, ad will surrender themselves as collared slaves nto the hands of military chieftains.

"Great are the services which President lekson has rendered his country. As a Geneal he has extended her frontiers, saved a city, adarried her renown to the highest pitch of bry. His civil administration has rivalled and ascended his warlike exploits. Indemnities exured from the great powers of Europe for poliations committed on our citizens under mer administrations, and which, by former ministrations were reclaimed in vain; peace diriendship with the whole world, and, what more, the respect of the whole world; the aracter of our America exalted in Europe; exalted that the American citizen treading continent of Europe, and contemplating sudden and great elevation of the national recter, might feel as if he himself was an dred feet high. Such is the picture abroad! home we behold a brilliant and grateful ene; the public debt paid,—taxes reduced,—

States released from a useless and dangerous population,-all disturbing questions settled,a gigantic moneyed institution repulsed in its march to the conquest of the government,-the highest prosperity attained, - and the Hero Patriot now crowning the list of his glorlous services by covering his country with the panoply of defence, and consummating his measures for the restoration and preservation of the currency of the constitution. We have had brilliant and prosperous administrations; but that of President Jackson eclipses, surpasses, and casts into the shade, all that have preceded it. And is he to be branded, stigmatized, condemned, unjustly and untruly condemned; and the records of the Senate to bear the evidence of this outrage to the latest posterity? Shall this President, so glorious in peace and in war, so successful at home and abroad, whose administration, now, hailed with applause and gratitude by the people, and destined to shine for unnumbered ages in the political firmament of our history : shall this President, whose name is to live for ever, whose retirement from life and services will be through the gate that leads to the temple of everlasting fame; shall he go down to posterity with this condemnation upon him; and that for the most glorious action of his life?

"Mr. President, I have some knowledge of history, and some acquaintance with the dangers which nations have encountered, and from which heroes and statesmen have saved them. I have read much of ancient and modern history, and nowhere have I found a parallel to the services rendered by President Jackson in crushing the conspiracy of the Bank, but in the labors of the Roman Consul in crushing the conspiracy of Catiline. The two conspiracies were identical in their objects; both directed against the government, and the property of the country. Cicero extinguished the Catilinarean conspiracy, and saved Rome; President Jackson defeated the conspiracy of the Bank, and saved our America. Their heroic service was the same, and their fates have been strangely alike. Cicero was condemned for violating the laws and the constitution; so has been President Jackson. The consul was refused a hearing in his own defence: so has been President Jackson. The life of Cicero was attempted by two assassins; twice was the murderous pistol levelled at our gold currency restored, - the Southern President. All Italy, the whole Roman world, bore Cicero to the Capitol, and tore the sentence of the consul's condemnation from the fasti of the republic: a million of Americans, fathers and heads of families, now demand the expurgation of the sentence against the President. Cicero, followed by all that was virtuous in Rome, repaired to the temple of the tutelary gods, and swore upon the altar that he had saved his country: President Jackson, in the temple of the living God, might take the same oath, and I'm its response in the hearts of millions. Nor shall the parallel stop here; but after times, and remote posterities shall render the same honors to each. Two thousand years have passed, and the great actions of the consul are fresh and green in history. The school-boy learns them; the patriot studies them; the statesman applies them: so shall it be with our patriot President. Two thousand years hence,-ten thousand,nay, while time itself shall last, for who can contemplate the time when the memory of this republic shall be lost? while time itself shall last, the name and fame of Jackson shall remain and flourish; and this last great act by which he saved the government from subversion, and property from revolution, shall stand forth as the seal and crown of his heroic services. And if any thing that I myself may do or say, shall survive the brief hour in which I live, it will be the part which I have taken, and the efforts which I have made, to sustain and defend the great defender of his country.

"Mr. President, I have now finished the view which an imperious sense of duty has required me to take of this subject. I trust that I have proceeded upon proofs and facts, and have left nothing unsustained which I feel it to be my duty to advance. It is not my design to repeat, or to recapitulate; but there is one further and vital consideration which demands the notice of a remark, and which I should be faithless to the genius of our government, if I should pretermit. It is known, sir, that ambition for office is the bane of free States, and the contentions of rivals the destruction of their country. These contentions lead to every species of injustice, and to every variety of violence, and all cloaked with the pretext of the public good. Civil wars and banishment at Rome; civil wars, and the ostracism at Athens; bills of attainder, star-chamber prosecutions, and impeachments in England; all to get rid of some envied, or cur enlightened day; it is the Areopagus for hated rival, and all pretexted with the public good : such has been the history of free States for two thousand years. Impeachment alone are permitted; and these would most usually occur for political offences, and be of character to enlist the passions of many, and to agitate the country. An effectual guard was supposed, was provided against the about of the impeachment power, first, by requiring charge to be preferred by the House of Renn sentatives, as the grand Inquest of the nation and next, in confining the trial to the Senate and requiring a majority of two-thirds to convict. CHAPTER CXLII.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE LAND REVENUE.

the great loss of the bank has been in the arciation of the securities; and the only way again a capital is to restore their value. A portion of them consists of State stocks, ich are so far below their intrinsic worth that present prices could not have been anticial by any reasonable man. No doubt can stertained of their ultimate payment. The themselves, unaided, can satisfy every in against them; they will do it speedily, if gress adopt the measures contemplated for relief. A division of the public lands g the States, which would enable them all their debts-or a pledge of the proceeds ales for that purpose-would be abundant rity. Either of these acts would inspire fdence, and enhance the value of all kinds operty." This paragraph appeared in the adelphia National Gazette, was attributed Mr. Biddle, President of the Bank of the ked States; and connects that institution all the plans for distributing the public money among the States, either in the of a direct distribution, or in the disguise deposit of the surplus revenue; and this for purpose of enhancing the value of the State ts held by it. That institution was known are interfered in the federal legislation, to ote or to baffle the passage of laws, as ed to be favorable or otherwise to her ints; and this resort to the land resonue whan act of Congress was an eminent inm of the spirit of interference. This distion had become, very nearly, a party ure; and of the party of which the bank

the author of the scheme—had introduced it at several sessions-and now renewed it. Mr. Webster also made a proposition to the same effect at this session. It was the summer of the presidential election; and great calculations were made by the party which favored the distribution upon its effect in adding to their popularity. Mr. Clay limited his plan of distribution to five years t but the limitation was justly considered as nothing-as a mere means of beginning the system of these distributions-which once began, would go on of themselves, while our presidential elections continued, and any thing to divide could be found in the treasury. Mr. Benton opposed the whole scheme, and confronted it with a proposition to devote the surplus revenue to the purposes of national defence; thereby making an issue, as he declared, between the plunder of the country and the defence of the country. He introduced an antagonistic bill, as he termed it, devoting the surplus moneys to the public defences; and showing by reports from the war and navy departments that seven millions a year for fifteen years would be required for the completion of the naval defences, and thirty millions to complete the military defences; of which nine millions per annum could be beneficially expended; and then went on to say:

"That the reports from which he had read, taken together, presented a complete system of preparation for the national defence; every arm and branch of defence was to be provided for; an increase of the navy, including steamships; appropriate fortifications, including steam batteries; armories, foundries, arsenals, with ample supplies of arms and munitions of war; an increase of troops for the West and Northwest; a line of posts and a military road from the Red River to the Wisconsin, in the rear of the settiements, and mounted dragoons to scour the country; every thing was considered; all was reduced to system, and a general, adequate, and appropriate plan of national defence was presented, sufficient to absorb all the surplus revenue, and wanting nothing but the vote of Congress to carry it into effect. In this great system of national defence the whole Union was equally interested; for the country, in all that concerned its defences, was but a unit, and every section was interested in the defence of every other section, and every individual citizen was interested in the defence of the whole population. It was in vain to say that the navy was on the sea, and the fortifications on the seaboard, and that the citizens in the interior States, or in the valley of the Mississippi, had no interest member, and Mr. Clay the chief. He was in these remote defences. Such an idea was mistaken and delusive. The inhabitant of Missouri and of Indiana had a direct interest in keeping open the mouths of the rivers, defending the seaport towns, and preserving a naval force that would protect the produce of his labor in crossing the ocean, and arriving safely in foreign markets. All the forts at the mouth of the Mississippi were just as much for the benefit of the western States, as if those States were down at the mouth of that river. So of all the forts on the Gulf of Mexico. Five forts are completed in the delta of the Mississippi; two are completed on the Florida or Alabama coast; and seven or eight more are projected; all calculated to give security to western commerce in passing through the Gulf of Mexico. Much had been done for that frontier, but more remained to be done; and among the great works contemplated in that quarter were large establishments at Pensacola, Key West, or the Dry Tortugas. Large military and naval stations were contemplated at these points, and no expenditure or preparations could exceed in amount the magnitude of the interests to be protected. On the Atlantic board the commerce of the States found its way to the ocean through many outlets, from Maine to Florida; in the West, on the contrary, the whole commerce of the valley of the Mississippi, all that of the Alabama, of western Florida, and some part of Georgia, passes through a single outlet, and reaches the ocean by passing between Key West and Cuba. Here, theu, is an immense commerce collected into one channel, compressed into one line, and passing, as it were, through one gate. This gives to Key West and the Dry Tortugas an importance hardly possessed by any point on the globe; for, besides commanding the commerce of the entire West, it will also command that of Mexico, of the West Indies, of the Caribbean sea, and of South America down to the middle of that continent at its most eastern projection, Cape Roque. To understand the cause of all this (Mr. B. said), it was necessary to look to the trade winds, which, blowing across the Atlantic between the tropics, strike the South American continent at Cape Roque, follow the retreating coast of that continent up to the Caribbean sea, and to the Gulf of Mexico, creating the gulf stream as they go, and by the combined effect of a current in the air and in the water, sweeping all vessels from this side Cape Roque into its stream, earrying them round west of Cuba and bringing them out between Key West and the Havana. These two positions, then, constitute the gate through which every thing must pass that comes from the valley of the Mississippi, from Mexico, and from South America as low down as Cape Roque. As the masters of the Mississippi, we should be able to predominate in the Gulf of Mexico; and, to do so, we must have great establishments at Key West and Pensacola. Such establishments are now proposed; and every citizen of the West should look upon them as the guardians of his own immediate interests, the indispensable squard to his own commerce; and to him highest, most sacred, and most beneficial obto which surplus revenue could be applied. Gulf of Mexico should be considered as the tuary of the Mississippi. A naval and milit supremacy should be established in that recost what it might; for without that supremaches the commerce of the entire West would lie the mercy of the fleets and privateers of immerces of the same privateers of the sam powers.

"Mr. B. returned to the immediate object his remarks-to the object of showing that defences of the country would absorb every plus dollar that would ever be found in the sury. king sent to the House for concurrence it me evident that it could not pass that body; then the friends of distribution in the Senate mon a new mode to effect their object, and form to gain the votes of many members held distribution to be a violation of the citation-among them Mr. Calhoun ;-who the lead in the movement. There was a before the Senate to regulate the keeping of public moneys in the deposit banks; and was turned into distribution of the surplus to moneys with the States, in proportion to representation in Congress, to be returned Congress should call for it: and this was da deposit with the States; and the faith States pledged for returning the money. deposit was defended on the same argument hich Mr. Calhoun had proposed to amend mustitution two years before; namely that was no other way to get rid of the surplus. wa suggestion from Mr. Wright that the ys, when once so deposited might never be ck again, Mr. Calhoun answered:

But the senator from New-York objects to essure, that it would, in effect, amount to inbution, on the ground, as he conceives, the States would never refund. He does bubt but that they would, if called on to d by the government; but he says that ress will in fact never make the call. He this conclusion on the supposition that would be a majority of the States opposed He admits, in case the revenue should e deficient, that the southern or staple would prefer to refund their quota, rather to raise the imposts to meet the deficit: insists that the contrary would be the ith the manufacturing States, which would to increase the imposts to refunding their on the ground that the increase of the would promote the interests of manufac-I cannot agree with the senator that untenable as to refuse to refund a deposit which their faith would be plighted to return, and rest the refusal on the ground of preferring to lay a tax, because it would be a bounty to them, and would consequently throw the whole burden of the tax on the other States. But, be this as it may, I can tell the senator that, if they should take a course so unjust and monstrous, he may be assured that the other States would most unquestionably resist the increase of the imposts; so that the government would have to take its choice, either to go without the money, or call on the States to refund the deposits."

Mr. Benton took an objection to this scheme of deposit, that it was a distribution under a false name, making a double disposition of the same money; that the land money was to be distributed under the bill already passed by the Senate: and he moved an amendment to except that money from the operation of the deposit to be made with the States. He said it was hardly to be supposed that, in the nineteenth century, a grave legislative body would pass two bills for dividing the same money; and it was to save the Senate from the ridicule of such a blunder that he called their attention to it, and proposed the amendment. Mr. Calhoun said there was a remedy for it in a few words, by adding a proviso of exception, if the land distribution bill became a law. Mr. Benton was utterly opposed to such a proviso-a proviso to take effect if the same thing did not become law in another bill. Mr. Morris also wished to know if the Senato was about to make a double distribution of the same money? As far it respected the action of the Senate the land bill was, to all intents and purposes, a law. It had passed the Senate, and they were done with it. It had changed its title from "bill" to "act." It was now the act of the Senate, and they could not know what disposition the House would make of it. Mr. Webster believed the land bill could not pass the House; that it was put to rest there; and therefore he had no objection to voting for the second one: thus admitting that, under the name of "distribution" the act could not pass the House, and that a change of name was indispensable. Mr. Wright made a speech of statements and facts to show that there would be no surplus; and taking up that idea, Mr. Benton spoke thus:

would promote the interests of manufac-I cannot agree with the senator that Sates would assume a position so utterly bankrupt Treasury, and in proving to the people that utter ruin must ensue from the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States. The same Senate, nothing abated in confidence from the failure of former predictions, is now engaged in celebrating the prosperity of the country, and proclaiming a surplus of forty, and fifty, and sixty millions of dollars in that same Treasury, which so short a time since they thought was going to be bankrupt. Both occupations are equally unfortunate. Our Treasury is in no more danger of bursting from distension now, than it was of collapsing from depletion then. The ghost of the panic was driven from this chamber in May, 1834, by the report of Mr. Taney, showing that all the sources of the national revenue were in their usual rich and bountiful condition; and that there was no danger of bankruptcy. The speech and statement, so brief and perspicuous, just delivered by the senator from New York [Mr. Wright], will perform the same office upon the distribution spirit, by showing that the appropriations of the session will require nearly as much money as the public Treasury will be found to contain. The present exaggerations about the surplus will have their day, as the panic about an empty Treasury had its day; and time, which corrects all things, will show the enormity of these errors which excite the public mind, and stimulate the public appetite, for a division of forty, fifty, and sixty millions of surplus treasure."

The bill being ordered to a third reading, with only six dissenting votes, the author of this View could not consent to let it pass without an attempt to stigmatize it, and render it odious to the people, as a distribution in disguise—as a deposit never to be reclaimed; as a miserable evasion of the constitution; as an attempt to debauch the people with their own money; as plundering instead of defending the country; as a cheat that would only last till the presidential election was over; for there would be no money to deposit after the first or second quarter; -and as having the inevitable effect, if not the intention, to break the deposit banks; and, finally, as disappointing its authors in their schemes of popularity: in which he was prophetic; as, out of half a dozen aspirants to the presidency, who voted for it, no one of them ever attained that place. The following are parts of his speech:

"I now come, Mr. President (continued Mr. B.), to the second subject in the bill—the distribution feature—and to which the objections are, not of detail, but of principle; but which objections are so strong, in the mind of myself and some friends, that, far from shrinking from the contest, and sneaking away in our little minority of six, where we were left last even-not imposed. After all, it must be itted to be a very compendious mode of ding the constitution, and such a one as framers of that instrument never happened ink of. Is this fancy, or is it fact? Are gislating, or amusing ourselves with phanagoria? Can we forget that we now have the calendar a proposition to amend the titution, to effect this very distribution, and the only difference between that resolution this thirteenth section, is in substituting ord 'deposit' for the word 'distribute?'
laring shown this pretended deposit to be tibution in disguise, and to be a mere eva-of the constitution, Mr. B. proceeded to exits effects, and to trace its ruinous conse-

States. It is brought forward as a temporary measure, as a single operation, as a thing to be done but once; but what career, either for good or for evil, ever stopped with the first step? It is the first step which costs the difficulty; that taken, the second becomes easy, and repetition habitual. Let this distribution, in this disguise, take effect; and future distribution will be common and regular. Every presidential election will bring them, and larger each time; as the consular elections in Rome, commencing with distributions of grain from the public granaries, went on to the exhibitions of games and shows. the remission of debts, largesses in money, lands, and provisions; until the rival candidates openly bid against each other, and the diadem of empire was put up at auction, and knocked down to the last and highest bidder. The purity of elections may not yet be affected in our young and vigorous country; but how long will it be before voters will look to the candidates for the magnitude of their distributions, instead of looking to them for the qualifications which the presidential office requires?

"The bad consequences of this distribution of money to the States are palpable and frightful. It is complicating the federal and State systems, and multiplying their points of contact and hazards of collision. Take it as ostensibly presented, that of a deposit or loan, to be repaid at some future time; then it is establishing the relation of debtor and creditor between them: a relation critical between friends, embarrassing between a State and its citizens; and eminently dangerous between confederate States and their common head. It is a relation always deprecated in our federal system. The land credit system was abolished by Congress, fifteen years ago, to get rid of the relation of debtor and creditor between the federal government and the citizens of the States; and seven or eight millions of debt, principal and interest, was then surrendered. The collection of a large debt from numerous individual debtors, was found to be almost impossible. How much worse if the State itself becomes the debtor! and more, if all the States become indebted together! Any attempt to collect the debt would be attended, first with ill blood, then with cancellation. It must be the representatives of the States who are to enforce the collection of the debt. This they would not do. They would stand together against the creditor. No member of Congress could vote to tax his State to raise money for the general purposes of the confederacy. No one could vote an appropriation which was to become a charge on his own State treasury. Taxation would first be resorted to, and the tariff and the public lands would become the fountain of supply to the federal government. Taken as a real transaction—as a deposit with the States, or a loan to the States-as this measure professes to be, and it is fraught with consequences adverse to the harmony of the federal as upon the federal government and the system, and fraught with new burdens upon the customs, and upon the landa; taken as a fiction to avoid the constitution, as a John Doe and Itichard Roe invention to convey a gift under the name of a deposit, and to effect a distribution under the disguise of a loan, and it is an artifice which makes derision of the constitution, lets down the Senate from its lofty station; and provides a facilo way for doing any thing that any Congress may choose to do in all time to come. It is only to depose one word and instal another—it is merely to change a name—and the frowning constitution immediately smiles

"To the federal government the consequences of these distributions must be deplorable and destructive. It must be remitted to the helpless condition of the old confederacy, depending for its supplies upon the voluntary contributions of the States. Worse than depending upon the voluntary contributions, it will be left to the gratuitous leavings, to the eleemosynary crumbs, which remain upon the table after the feast of the States is over. God grant they may not prove to be the feasts of the Lapithæ and Centaurs! But the States will be served flist; and what remains may go to the objects of common defence and national concern for which the confederacy was framed, and for which the power of raising money was confided to Congress. The distribution bills will be passed tirst, and the appropriation bills afterwards; and every appropriation will be cut down to the lowest point, and kept off to the last moment. To stave off as long as possible, to reduce as low as possible, to defeat whenever possible, will be the tactics of federal legislation; and when at last some object of national expenditure has miraculously run the gauntlet of all these assaults, and escaped the perils of these multi-plied dangers, behold the enemy still ahead, and the recapture which awaits the devoted appropriation, in the shape of an unexpended balance, on the first day of January then next ensuing. Thus it is already; distribution has occupied us all the session. A proposition to amend the constitution, to enable us to make the division, was brought in in the first month of the session. The land bill followed, and engrossed months, to the exclusion of national defence. Then came the deposit scheme, which absorbs the remainder of the session. For nearly seven months we have been occupied with distribution, and the Senate has actually passed two bills to effect the same object, and to divide the same identical money. Two bills to divide money, while one bill cannot be got through for the great objects of national defence named in the constitution. We are now near the end of the seventh month of the session. The day named by the Senate for the termination of the session is long passed by; the day fixed by the two Houses is close at hand. The year is half gone, and the season for lahor largely lost; yet what is the state of the general, national, and most essential appropriations? Not a shilling is yet voted for fortifications; not a shilling for the ordnance: thing for filling the empty ranks of the akei army; nothing for the new Indian treat nothing for the continuation of the Cumber road; nothing for rebuilding the burnt-Treasury; nothing for the custom-house in Orleans; nothing for extinguishing the of private corporators in the Louisville and making that great thoroughfare free to commerce of the West; nothing for the w armory, and arsenals in the States which none; nothing for the extension of the ci court system to the new States of the West Southwest; nothing for improving the machinery; nothing for keeping the m regularly supplied with metals for coin nothing for the new marine hospitals; not for the expenses of the visitors now gone to Military Academy; nothing for the chain posts and the military road along the West and Northwestern frontier. All these, in long list of other objects, remain without a to this day; and those who have kept them now coolly turn upon us, and say the mo cannot be expended if appropriated, and that the first of January, it must fall into the sur fund to be divided. Of the bills passed, of the most essential character have been de ed for months, to the great injury of individ and of the public service. redupon and divided out. It is the nnexpendthiances which are now the object of all deand the prize of meditated distribution. word surplus is not in the will! that word, hich has figured in so many speeches, which ben the subject of so much speculation, the has been the cause of so much delusion the public mind, and of so much excited hope; word is not in the bill! It is carefully, emression is adopted to cover all the money the Treasury, a small sum excepted although repriated by law to the most sacred and resary objects. A recapture of the appropriate money is intended; and thus the very sticl money which we appropriate at this goa is to be seized upon on the first day of goary, torn away from the objects to which and absorbed in the fund for ral distribution. And why? because the morant appetite of distribution grows as it is and becomes more ravenous as it gorges. st out for the surplus; now it takes the unnded balances, save five millions; next year ill take all. But it is sufficient to contemplate thing as it is; it is sufficient to contemplate bill as seizing upon the unexpended balances the first day of January, regardless of the cts to which they are appropriated; and to ness its effect upon the laws, the policy, and existence of the federal government. Such, then, is the progress of the distribusprit; a cormorant appetite, growing as it k ravening as it gorges; seizing the appro-ted moneys, and leaving the federal governto starve upon crumbs, and to die of inion. But this appetite is not the sole cause this seizure. There is another reason for it. eted with the movements in this chamber, bunded in the deep-seated law of self-preation. For six months the public mind has stimulated with the story of sixty millions urlus money in the Treasury; and two s carried the rash joke of that illusory rention so far as to pass a bill to commence distribution of that vast sum. It was the bill which was to do it, commencing its ling dividends on the 1st day of July, dealthem out every ninety days, and completing splendid distribution of prizes, in the sixtymillion lottery, in eighteen months from commencement of the drawing. It was two the ago that we passed this bill; and all upts then made to convince the people that were deluded, were vain and useless. Sixtymillions they were promised, sixty-four mis they were to have, sixty-four millions began to want; and slates and pencils were as busy then in figuring out the dividends sixty-four millions, to begin on the 1st aly, as they now are in figuring out the lads under the forty, fifty, and sixty mil-

chapter. The 1st of July is come, but the sixtyfour millions are not in the Treasury! It is not there; and any attempt to commence the distribution of that sum, according to the terms of the land bill, would bankrupt the Treasury, stop the government, and cause Congress to be called together, to levy taxes or make loans. So much for the land bill, which two months ago received all the praises which are now bestowed upon the deposit bill. So the drawing had to be postponed, the performance had to be adjourned, and the 1st of January was substituted for the 1st of July. This gives six months to go upon, and defers the catastrophe of the mountain in labor until the presidential election is over. Still the first of January must come; and the ridicule would be too great, if there was nothing, or next to nothing, to divide. And nothing, or next to nothing, there would be, if the appropriations were fairly made, and made in time, and if nothing but a surplus was left to divide. There would be no more in the deposit bank, in that event, than has usually been in the Bank of the United States-say ten, or twelve, or fourteen, or sixteen millions; and from which, in the hands of a single bank, none of those dangers to the country were then seen which are now discovered in like sums in three dozen unconnected and independent banks. Even after all the delays and reductions in the appropriations. the surplus will now be but a trifle-such a trifle as must expose to ridicule, or something worse, all those who have tantalized the public with the expectation of forty, fifty, or sixty millions to divide. To avoid this fate, and to make up something for distribution, then, the unexpended balances have been fallen upon; the law of 1795 is nullified; the fiscal year is changed; the policy of the government subverted; reason, justice, propriety outraged; all contracts, labor, service, salaries cut off, interrupted, or reduced; appropriations recaptured, and the government paralyzed. Sir, the people are deceived; they are made to believe that a surplus only, an unavoidable surplus, is to be divided, when the fact is that appropriated moneys are to be Leized.

"Sir, I am opposed to the whole policy of this measure. I am opposed to it as going to sap the foundations of the Federal Government, and to undo the constitution, and that by eva-sion, in the very point for which the constitu-tion was made. What is that point? A Treasury! a Treasury! a Treasury of its own, unconnected with, and independent of the States. It was for this that wise and patriotic men wrote, and spoke, and prayed for the fourteen years that intervened from the declaration of independence, in 1776, to the formation of the constitution in 1789. It was for this that so many appeals were made, so many efforts exerted, so many fruitless attempts so long rewhich are to begin on the 1st of January peated, to obtain from the States the power of And now behold the end of the first raising revenue from imports. It was for this that the convention of 1787 met, and but for this they never would have met. The formation of a federal treasury, unconnected with the States, and indepenent of the States, was the cause of the meeting of that convention; it was the great object of its labors; it was the point to which all its exertions tended, and it was the point at which failure would have been the failure of the whole object of the meeting, of the whole frame of the general government, and of the whole design of the constitution. With infinite labor, pains, and difficulty, they succeeded in erecting the edifice of the federal treasury; we, not builders, but destroyers, "architects of ruin," undo in a night what they accomplished in many years. We expunge the federal treasury; we throw the federal government back upon States for supplies; we unhinge and undo the constitution; and we effect our purpose by an artifice which derides, mocks, ridicules that sacred instrument, and opens the way to its perpetual evasion by every paltry performer that is able to dethrone one word, and exalt another in its place. "I object to the time for another reason. There is no necessity to act at all upon this subject, at this session of Congress. The distribution is not to take effect until after we are in acssion again, and when the true state of the treasury shall be known. Its true state cannot be known now; but enough is known to make it questionable whether there will be any surplus, requiring a specific disposition, over and beyond the wants of the country. Many appropriations are yet behind; two Indian wars are yet to be finished; when the wars are over, the vanquished Indians are to be removed to the West; and when there, either the Federal Government or the States must raise a force to protect the people from them. Twenty-five thousand Crecks, seven thousand Seminoles, eighteen thousand Cherokees, and others, making a totality of seventy-two thousand, are to be removed; and the expenses of removal, and the year's subsistence afterwards, is close upon seventy dollars per head. It is a problem whether there will be any surplus worth disposing of. The surplus party themselves admit there will be a disappointment unless they go beyond the surplus, and seize the appropriated moneys. The Senator from New-York [Mr. Wright], has made an exposition, as candid and perspicuous as it is patriotic and unanswerable, showing that there will be an excess of appropriations over the money in the treasury on the day that we adjourn; and that we shall have to depend upon the accruing revenue of the remainder of the year to meet the de-mands which we authorize. This is the state of the surplus question: problematical, debatable; the weight of the evidence and the strength of the argument entirely against it; time enough to ascertain the truth, and yet a determination to reject all evidence, refuse all time, ruen on to the object, and divide the money, receivability of paper for federal dues.

The catastrophe of the land project ought certainly to be a warning to Two months ago it was pushed through the only means of saving the country, as blessed act which was to save the republic was to commence on the first day of July magnificent operations of distributing in four millions; now it lies a corpse in the lie of Representatives, a monument of haste folly, ita very authors endeavoring to su sede it by another measure, because it c not take effect without ruining the count and, what is equally important to them, ruin themselves.

Instead of ing fright and throwing the money away, statesman should look into the cause of this he should take for his motto the prayer Virgil: Cognoscere causa rerum. secil. Banks are our masters; not one, but me hundred and fifty! and this splendid deal Congress, like a chained and chastised in lies helpless and powerless at their feet. Sr. I can see nothing but evil, turn on thick side I may, from this fatal scheme of di-ling money; not surplus money, but approated funds; not by an amendment, but by a risory evasion of the constitution. Where is it and? History shows us that those who begin rolutions never end them; that those who compat innovations never innut them. Here is pat innovation, constituting in reality—not figure of speech, but in reality—a revolution the form of our government. We set out to like the surplus; we are now dividing the copplated finds. To prevent all appropriatory to the nowerful States will be the surplus of the surplus o as except to the powerful States, will be the nt step; and the small States, in self-defence, st oppose all appropriations, and go for a di-ion of the whole. They will have to stand wher in the Senate, and oppose all appropria-ts. It will not do for the large States to all the appropriations first, and the bulk the distribution afterwards; and there will no way to prevent it but to refuse all approtions, divide out the money among the ues, and let each State lay it out for itself. new surplus party will supersede the present plus party, as successive factions supersede other in chaotic revolutions. They will te Congress the quæstor of provinces, to colmoney for the States to administer. This be their argument: the States know best tthey need, and can lay out the money to best advantage, and to suit themselves. One will want roads and no canals; another als and no roads; one will want forts, anr troops; one wants ships, another steamone wants high schools, another low ols; one is for the useful arts, another is the fine arts, for lyceums, athenœums, musearts, statuary, painting, music; and the state will want all for banks. Thus will g go on, and Congress will have no appro-tion to make, except to the President, and had clerks, and their under clerks. Even own pay, like it was under the confederamay be remitted to our own States. The dollars a day may be voted to them, and orted by the argument that they can get men for four dollars a day; and so save the money, and have the work better done. is the progress in this road to ruin. Sir, of this measure, as I said of its progeni-the land bill: if I could be willing to let pass, that good might come of it, I should illing to let this bill pass. A recoil, a reaca revulsion must take place. This conin the hearts of the people which will save m nullification in disguise, as well as from fration in arms. One word of myself. It ten years since schemes of distribution Vol. I.-42 with a senator from New Jersey, now Secretary of the navy (Mr. Dickerson). They were denounced by many, for their unconstitutionality, their corrupting tendencies, and their fatal effects upon the federal and State governments. I took my position then, have stood upon it during all the modifications of the original scheme; and continue standing upon it now. My answer then was, pay the public debt and reduce the taxes; my answer now is, provide for the public defences, reduce the taxes, and bridle the paper system. On this ground I have stood—on this I stand; and never did I feel more satisfaction and more exultation in my vote, when triumphant in numbers, than I now do in a minority of six."

The bill went to the House, and was concurred in by a large majority—one hundred and fifty-five to thirty-eight—although, under the name of distribution, there was no chance for it to pass that House. Deeming the opposition of this small minority courageous as well as meri torious, and deserving to be held in honorable remembrance, their names are here set down; to wit:

Messrs. Michael W. Ash, James M. H. Benle, Benning M. Bean, Andrew Beanmont, John W. Brown, Robert Burns, John F. H. Claiborne, Walter Coles, Samuel Cushman, George C. Dromgoole, John Fairfield, William K. Fuller, Ransom H. Gillet, Joseph Hall, Thomas L. Hamer, Leonard Jarvis, Cave Johnson, Gerrit Y. Lansing, Gideon Lee, George Loyall, Abijah Mann, jr., John Y. Mason, James J. McKay, John McKeon, Isaac McKim, Gorham Parks, Franklin Pierce, Henry L. Pinckney, John Roane, James Rogers, Nicholas Sickles, William Taylor, Francis Thomas, Joel Turrill, Aaron Vanderpoel, Aaron Ward, Daniel Wardwell, Henry A. Wise.

The bill passed the House, and was approved by the President, but with a repugnance of feeling, and a recoil of judgment, which it required great efforts of friends to overcome; and with a regret for it afterwards which he often and publicly expressed. It was a grief that his name was seen to such an act. It was a most unfortunate act, a plain evasion of the constitution for a bad purpose-soon gave a sad overthrow to the democracy—and disappointed every calculation made upon it. Politically, it was no ndvantage to its numerous and emulous supporters-of no disservice to its few determined opponents-only four in number, in the Senate, the two senators from Mississippi voting against it, broached upon this floor. They began for reasons found in the constitution of their

State. 'To the States, it was of no advantage, raising expectations which were not fulfilled. and upon which many of them acted as realities. and commenced enterprises to which they were inadequate. It was understood that some of Mr. Van Buren's friends favored the President's approval, and recommended him to sign it-induced by the supposed effect which its rejection might have on the democratic party in the election. The opponents of the bill did not visit the President to give him their opinions, nor had he heard their arguments. If they had seen him, their opinions concurring with his own feelings and judgment, his conduct might have been different, and the approval of the act withheld. It might not have prevented the act from becoming a law, as two thirds in each House might have been found to support it; but it would have deprived the bill of the odor of his name, and saved himself from subsequent regrets. In a party point of view, it was the commencement of calamities, being an efficient cause in that general suspension of specie payments, which quickly occurred, and brought so much embarrassment on the Van Buren administration, ending in the great democratic defeat of 1840. But of this hereafter.

CHAPTER CXLIII.

RECHARTER OF THE DISTRICT BANKS—SPEECH OF MR. BENTON: THE PARTS OF LOCAL AND TEMPORARY INTEREST OMITTED.

"MR. BENTON rose to oppose the passage of the bill notwithstanding it was at the third reading, and that it was not usual to continue opposition, which seemed to be useless, at that late stage. But there were occasions when he never took such things into calculation, and when he continued to resist pernicious measures, regardless of common usages, as long as the forms of parliamentary proceeding would allow him to go on. Thus he had acted at the passing of the United States Bank charter, in 1832; thus he did at the passing of the resolution against President Jackson, in 1834; and thus he did at the passing of the famous land bill, at the present session. He had continued to speak against all these measures, long after speaking seemed to be of any avail; and, far from regretting, he he reason to rejoice at the course that he had pur sued. The event proved him to be right; in all these measures, though floated through the chamber upon the swelling wave of a resistle and impatient majority, had quickly run the brief career. Their day of triumph had be short. The bank charter perished at the fe general election; the condemnatory resolution was received by the continent in a tempest execration; and the land bill, that last hore expiring party, has dropped an abortion in the Senate. It is dead even here, in this char ber, where it originated-where it was once omnipotent that, to speak against it, was deem by some to be an idle consumption of time, by others to be an unparliamentary demonst tion against the ascertained will of the llon Yet, that land bill is finished. That brief a dle is out. The Senate has revoked that he has retracted, recanted, and sung its palm over that unfortunate conception. It has out a committee-an extraordinary commit of nine-to devise some other scheme for de ing that same money which the land bill divid and, in doing so, the Senate has authentic declared a change of opinion, and a revocati of its sentiments in favor of that bill. "Mr. B. said he had wished to have been on a lect committee for the charter of those banks; wished to have revived the idea of a bank without circulation, and to have disconnected be government from the banking of the district. It had failed in his attempt to raise such a maintitee; and, as an individual member of the Senate, he could now do no more than menin debate the ideas which he would have rished to have ripened into legislation through the instrumentality of a committee.

"Mr. B. said he had demonstrated that no at of circulation ought to be authorized in is district; and, he would add, that none to mish currency, except of large notes, ought be authorized any where; yet what are we ing? We are breeding six little corporations birth, to issue $2,250,000 of paper currency: don what terms? No bonus; no tax on the nital; none on the circulation; no reduction interest in lieu of bonus or tax; no specie t what the stockholders please to put in; and liability on the part of the stockholders for a fure of these corporations to redeem their tes and pay their debts. This is what we are ing; and now let us see what burdens and nes these six corporations will impose upon business part of the community—the protive classes among which they are to be pertasted. First, there is the support of these corporation governments; for every bank st have a government, like a State or kingn; and the persons who administer these poration governments must be paid, and paid the people, and that according to the rates d by themselves and not by the people. th of these six banks must have its president, hier clerks, and messengers; its notary pubto protest notes; and its attorney to bring The aggregate salaries, fees, and perquiof all these officers of the six banks will the first tax on the people. Next comes the fits to the stockholders. The nett profits banks are usually eight to ten per cent. at ent; the gross profits are several per cent. e; and the gross profits are what the people per cent., and the annual levy upon the community will be about $270,000. The third loss to the community will be on the fluctuations of prices of labor and property, and the rise and fall of stocks, from the expansions and contractions of currency, produced by making money plenty or scarce, as it suits the interest of t'e bank managers. This item cannot be calculated. and depends entirely upon the moderation and consciences of the Neptunes who preside over the flux and reflux of the paper ocean; and to whom all tides, whether of cbb or flow, and all conditions of the sea, whether of calm or storm, are equally welcome, equally auspicious, and equally productive. Then come three other heads of loss to the community, and of profit to the bank: loss of notes from wear and tear, counterfeits imposed upon the people for good notes, and good notes rejected by the banks for counterfeits; and then the loss to the holders from the stoppage and failure of banks, and the shav ing in of notes and stocks. Such are the bur dens and taxes to be imposed upon the people to give them a paper currency, when, if the paper currency were kept away, and only large notes used, as in France, they would have a gold and silver currency without paying a tax to any body for it, and without being subject to any of the frightful evils resulting from the paper system.

"Objecting to all banks of circulation, but not able to suppress them entirely, Mr. B. suggested some ameliorations in the charters proposed to be granted to render them less dangerous to the community. 1. The liability of the stockholders for all the debts of the institution, as in the Scottish banks. 2. The bank stock to be subject to taxation, like other property. 3. Te issue or receive no note of less than twenty dollars. 4. The charters to be repealable at the will of Congress: and he gave reasons for each of these improvements; and first for the liability of the stockholders. He said.

"Reasons for this liability were strong and palpable. A man that owes should pay while he has property to pay with; and it is iniquitous he first tax on the people. Next comes the list of the stockholders. The nett profits holder, should riot in wealth while the business maks are usually eight to ten per cent. at each ties to the gross profits are several per cent. at each ties to the gross profits are what the people had closed its doors. Such exemptions are some

trary to the rights of the community, and one of the great causes of the failure of banks. A liability in the stockbrokers is one of the best securities which the public can have for the correct management and solvency of the institution. The famous Scottish banks, which, in upwards of one hundred years' operations, had neither once convulsed the country with contractions and expansions, nor once stopped payment, were constituted upon this principle. All the country banks in England, and all the bankers on the continent of Europe, were liable to a still greater degree; for in them each stockholder, or partner, was liable, individually, for the whole amount of the debts of the bank. The principle proposed to be incorporated in these charters strikes the just medium between the common law principle, which makes each partner liable for the whole debts of the firm; and the corporation principle in the United States, which absolves each from all liability, and leaves the penniless and soulless carcase of a defunct and eviscerated bank alone responsible to the community. Liability to the amount of the stock was an equitable principle, and with summary process for the recovery of the amounts of notes and deposits, and the invalidity of transfers of stock to avoid this liability, would be found a good remedy for a great evil. If the stockholders in the three banks which stopped payment in this city during the panic session had been thus liable, the notes would not have been shaved out of the hands of the holders; if the bank which stopped in Batimore at the same time, had been subject to this principle, the riots, which have afflicted that city in consequence of that stoppage, would not have taken place. Instead of these losses and riots, law and remedy would have prevailed; every stockholder would have been summoned before a justice of the peace-judgment granted against him on motion -for the amount held by the complainant; and so on, until all were paid, or he could plead that he had paid up the whole amount of his stock."

The evil of small notes he classed under three general heads: 1. The banishment of gold and silver. 2. Encouragement to counterfeiting. 3. Throwing the burthens and losses of the paper system upon the laboring and smalldealing part of the community, who have no share in the profits of banking, and should not be made to bear its losses. On these points, he said: feiting was chiefly directed! They were

"The instinct of banks to sink their circular tion to the lowest denomination of notes which can be forced upon the community, is a trait the system universally proved to exist where banks of circulation have been permitted give a currency to a country; and the effect that instinct has always been to banish go and silver. When the Bank of England w chartered, in the year 1694, it could issue note less than £100 sterling; that amount gradually reduced by the persevering efforts the bank, to £50; then to £20; then to £1 then to £10; at last to £5; and finally to and £1. Those last denominations were a reached until the year 1797, or until one hunde and three years after the institution of bank; and as the several reductions in the of the notes, and the consequent increase paper currency took place, gold became me and more scarce; and with the issue of the and two pound notes, it totally disappear from the country.

"This effect was foretold by all politic economists, and especially by Mr. Burke, the aged and retired from public life, who was from his retreat, to Mr. Canning, to say to Pitt, the Prime Minister, these prophetic won If this bill for the one and two pounds is mitted to pass, we shall never see another mi in England.' Before the four years out, the Bank of England reported to Parlia that it was ready to begin gold payments; commenced accordingly, and has continued ever since.

does game of the forging depredator! and tat for the obvious reasons that fives and tens set small enough to pass currently among perwas not much acquainted with bank paper, and here enough to afford some profit to compenute for the expense and labor of producing the conterfeit, and the risk of passing it. Below free, the profits are too small for the labor and isk. Too many have to be forged and passed before an article of any value can be purchased; and the change to be got in eilver, in passing or for a small article, is too little. Of twenty d upwards, though the profit is greater on ssing them, yet the danger of detection is so greater. On account of its larger size, the ote is not only more closely scrutinized before is received, and the passer of it better rememred, but the circulation of them is more conhed to business men and large dealers, and her change will not be given for them in buysmall articles. The fives and tens, then, in he United States, like the £1 and £2 in Engnd are the peculiar game of counterfeiters, of this is fully proved by the criminal statistics the forgery department in both countries. cording to returns made to the British Parliaent for twenty-two years-from 1797 to 1819 the period in which the one and two pound tes were allowed to circulate, the whole unber of prosecutions for counterfeiting, or sing counterfeit notes of the Bank of Engod, was 998: in that number there were 313 pital convictions; 530 inferior convictions; and bacquittals: and the sum of £249,900, near a illion and a quarter of dollars, was expendby the bank in attending to prosecutions. this great number of prosecutions, the rems show that the mass of them were for ences connected with the one and two pound tes. The proportion may be distinctly seen the number of counterfeit notes of different meminations detected at the Bank of England s given period of-time-from the 1st of mary, 1812, to the 10th of April, 1818—being eriod of six years and three months out of twenty-two years that the one and two and notes continued to circulate. The detecs were, of one pound notes, the number of 238; of two pound notes, 17,787; of five and notes, 5,826; of ten pound notes, 419; trenty pound notes, 54. Of all above twenty to the other sizes may be well seen in the tables for this brief period; but to have any idea of the mass of counterfeiting done upon those small notes, the whole period of twenty-two years must be considered, and the entire kingdom of Great Britain taken in; for the list only includes the number of counterfeits detected at the counter of the bank; a place to which the guilty never carry their forgeries, and to which a portion only of those circulating in and about London could be carried. The proportion of crime connected with the small notes is here shown to be enormously and frightfully great. The same results are found in the United States. Mr. B. had looked over the statistics of crime connected with the counterfeiting of bank notes in the United States, and found the ratio between the great and small notes to be about the same that it was in England. He had had recourse to the most authentic data-Bicknell's Counterfeit Detector-and there found the editions of counterfeit notes of the local or State banks, to be eight hundred and eighteen, of which seven hundred and fifty-six were of ten dollars and under; and sixty-two editions only were of twenty dollars and upwards. Of the Bank of the United States and its branches, he found eighty-two editions of fives; seventy-one editions of tens; twenty-six editions of twenties; and two editions of fifties; still showing that in the United States, as well as in England, on local banks as well as that of the United States. the course of counterfeiting was still the same; and that the whole stress of the crime fell upon the five and ten dollar notes in this country, and their corresponding classes, the one and two pound notes in England. Mr. B. also exhibited the pages of Bicknell's Counterfeit Detector, a pamphlet covered over column after column with its frightful lists, nearly all under twenty dollars; and he called upon the Senate in the sacred name of the morals of the country-in the name of virtue and morality-to endeavor to check the fountain of this crime, by stopping the issue of the description of notes on which it exerted nearly its whole force.

and notes continued to circulate. The detects were, of one pound notes, the number of 238; of two pound notes, 17,787; of five and notes, 5,826; of ten pound notes, 419; treaty pound notes, 54. Of all above twenty to the distance at which the counterfeits were ads, 35. The proportion of ones and twos them, and the still greater difficulty (in most cases impossible) of getting witnesses to attend in person, in States in which they do not reade, the counterfeiters all choosing to practise their crime and circulate their forgeries in States which do not contain the banks whose paper they are imitating. So difficult is it to obtain the attendance of witnesses in other States, that the crime of counterfeiting is almost practised with impunity. The notes under $20 feed and supply this crime; let them be stopped, and ninety-nine hundredths of this crime will stop with them.

" A third objection which Mr. B. urged against the notes under twenty dollars was, that nearly the whole evils of that part of the paper system fell upon the laboring and small dealing part of the community. Nearly all the counterfeits lodged in their hands, or were shaved out of their hands. When a bank failed, the mass of its circulation being in small notes, sunk upon their hands. The gain to the banks from the wear and tear of small notes, came out of them; the loss from the same cause, falling upon them. The ten or twelve per cent, annual profit for furnishing a currency in place of gold and silver (for which no interest would be paid to the mint or the government), chiefly falls upon them; for the paper currency is chiefly under twenty dollars. These evils they almost exclusively bear, while they have, over and above all these, their full proportion of all the evils resulting from the expansions and contractions which are incessantly going on, totally destroying the standard of value, periodically convulsing the country; and in every cycle of five or six years making a lottery of all property, in which all the prizes are drawn by bank managers and their friends.

"He wished the basis of circulation throughout the country to be in hard morey. Furmers, laborers, and market people, circle in teceive their payments in hard money. They ought not to be put to the risk of receiving bank, notes in all their small dealings. They are no judges of good or bad notes. Counterfeits are sure to fall upon their hands; and the whole business of counterfeiting was mainly directed to such notes as they handle—those under twenty dollars.

"Mr. B. said he here wished to fix the attenion of those who were in favor of a respectable powerful political and moneyed combined paper currency -a currency of respectable-size notes of twenty dollars and upwards-on the great fact, that the | ger the specie basis, the larger and safer would be the superstructure of paper which rested upon it; the smaller that specie basis, the smaller and more unsafe must be the paper which rested on it. The current of England is $300,000,000, to wit: £8,000,000 sterling (near $40,000,000) in silver; £22,000,000 sterling (above $100,000,000) in gold; an about £30,000,000 sterling (near $150,000,000 in bank notes. The currency of the United States is difficult to be ascertained, from the multitude of banks and the incessant ebb an flow of their issues; calculations vary; but all pe the paper circulation at less than $100,000,000 and the proportion of specie and paper, at more than one half paper. This is agreed upon if hands, and is sufficient for the practical result that an increase of our specie to $100,000,00 and the suppression of small notes, will give larger total circulation than we new have a a safer one. The total circulation may then h $200,000,000,in the proportions of half paper as half specie; and the specie, half gold and ha silver. This would be an immense improve ment upon our present condition, both in qua tity and in quality; the paper part would be come respectable from the suppression of not under twenty dollars, which are of no profite cept to the banks which issue them, and if counterfeiters who imitate them; the spec part would be equally improved by becomi one half gold. Mr. B. could not quit this is portant point, namely, the practicability of obtaining a specie currency of $100,000,000, n the one half gold, without giving other production to show the facility with which it has be every where done when attempted. He refe red to our own history immediately after Revolution, when the disappearance of page n. mey was instantly followed, as if by may by the appearance of gold and silver; to Fran where the energy of the great Napoleon, the first consul, restored an abundant supply of a and silver in one year; to England, where acquisition of gold was at the rate of $24,000! per annum for four years after the notes un five pounds were ordered to be suppressed; he referred with triumph to our own pres history, when, in defiance of an immense

.Mr. B. took this occasion to express his regithat the true idea of banks seemed to be let in this country, and that here we had but tale conception of a bank, except as an issuer currency. A bank of discount and deposit, montradistinction to a bank of circulation, is welly thought of in the United States; and it by be news to some bank projectors, who supe that nothing can be done without banks sisue millions of paper, to learn that the great mkers in London and Paris, and other capitals Europe, issue no paper; and, still more, it whenews to them to learn that Liverpool Manchester, two cities which happen to do out as much business as a myriad of such ites as this our Washington put together, also appen to have no banks to issue currency for m. They use money and bills of exchange, dhave banks of discount and deposit, but no aks of circulation. Mr. Gallatin, in his Essay on Currency, thus speaks of them:

"There are, however, even in England, where corporated country banks issuing paper are numerous, and have been attended with the me advantages, and the same evils, as our cutry banks, some extensive districts, highly districts and prosperous, where no such bank exist, and where that want is supplied by is of exchange drawn on London. This is ease in Lancashire, which includes Liverpool if Manchester, and where such bills, drawn at the try days after date, are indorsed by each service holder, and circulate through numerspressons before they reach their ultimate stination, and are paid by the drawee."

Mr. B. greatly regretted that such banks as in Liverpool and Manchester were not in on in the United States. They were the it kind of banks. They did great good, and re wholly free from mischief. They lent ag; they kept money; they transferred dits on books; they bought and sold bills of hange; and these bills, circulating through sy hands, and indorsed by each, answered purpose of large bank notes, without their pers, and became stronger every time they e passed. To the banks it was a profitable mess to sell them, because they got both exage and interest. To the commercial community they were convenient, both as a remittance and as funds in hand. To the community they were entirely safe. Banks of discount and deposit in the United States, bewing no currency, and issuing no bank note except of $100 and upwards, and dealing in exchange, would be entitled to the favor are confidence of the people and of the federal government. Such banks only should be the depositories of the public moneys.

"It is the faculty of issuing paper enrency which makes banks dangerous to country. and the height to which this slanger fine rises. in the United States, and the progress with it is making, should rouse and alarm the phole community. It is destroying all standar of value. It is subjecting the country t demoralizing and ruinous fluctuations of price. It is maying a lottery of property, and making han disc of money, which has to be bought by th ticket holders in the great lottery at sw and three per cent. a mouth. It is equivale: destruction of weights and measures, a like buying and selling without counting, way, or measuring. It is the realization, in a derent form, of the debasement and arbitrary a ration of the value of coins practised by the keeps of Europe in former ages, and now by the Swan of Turkey. It is extinguishing the idea of fine moderate, annual interest. Great duties thus imposed upon the legislator; and the firm of these duties is to revive and favor the classof banks of discount and deposit; banks to make loans, keep money, transfer credits on books, buy and sell exchange, deal in burnou; but to issue no paper. This class of banks should be revived and favored; and the United States could easily revive them by confiding to them the public deposits. The next great duty of the legislator is to limit the issues of banks of circulation, and make them indemnify the community in some little degree, by refunding, in annual taxes, some part of their undue gains.

"The progress of the banking business is alarming and deplorable in the United States. It is now computed that there are 750 banks and their branches in operation, all having authority to issue currency; and, what is worse, all that currency is receivable by the federal government. The quantity of chartered bank capital, as it is called, is estimated at near $800,000,000; the amount of this capital reported by the banks to have been paid in is about $300,000,000; and the quantity of paper money which they are authorized by their charters to issue is about $750,000,000. How much of this is actually issued can never be known with any precision; for such are the fluctuations in the amount of a paper currency, flowing from 750 fountains, that the circulation of one day cannot be relied upon for the next. The amount of capital, reported to be paid in, is, however, well ascertained, and that is fixed at $300,000,000. This, upon its face, and without recourse to any other evidence, is proof that our banking system, as a whole, is unsolid and delusive, and a frightful imposition upon the people. Nothing but specie can form the capital of a bank; there are not above sixty or seventy millions of specie in the country, and, of that, the banks have not the one half. Thirty millions in specie is the extent; the remainder of the capital must have been made up of that undefinable material called 'specie funds,' or 'funds equivalent to specie,' the fallacy of which is established by the facts already stated, and which show that all the specie in the country put together is not sufficient to meet the one fifth part of these 'specie funds,' or 'funds equivalent to specie.' The equivalent, then, does not exist! credit alone exists; and any general attempt to realize these 'specie funds,' and turn them into specie, would explode the whole banking system, and cover the country with ruin. There may be some solid and substantial banks in the country, and undoubtedly there are better and worse among them; but as a whole—and it is in that point of view the community is interested-as a whole, the system is unsolid and delusive; and there is no safety for the country until great and radical reforms are effected.

"The burdens which these 750 banks impose upon the people were then briefly touched by Mr. B. It was a great field, which he had not time to explore, but which could not, in justice, be entirely passed by. First, there were the salaries and fees of 750 sets of bank officers: presidents, cashiers, clerks, messengers, notaries public to protest notes, and attorneys to sue on them; all these had salaries, and good salaries, paid by the people, though the people had no hand in fixing these salaries: next, the profits to the stockholders, which, at an average of ten per centum gross would g'-e thirty millions of and gave the most undue advantages to one dollars, all levied upon the people; then cam the profits to the brokers, first cousins to the bankers, for changing notes for money, or for other notes at par; then the gain to the bank and their friends on speculations in property merchandise, produce, and stocks, during the periodical visitations of the expansions and con tractions of the currency; then the gain free the wear and tear of notes, which is so mus loss to the people; and, finally, the great char ter of counterfeiting which, without being my fitable to the bank, is a great burden to the pel ple, on whose hands all the counterfeits sin The amount of these burdens he could not con pute; but there was one item about which the was no dispute-the salaries to the officers an the profits to the stockholders-and this pre sented an array of names more numerous, an an amount of money more excessive, than w to be found in the 'Blue Book,' with the Arm and Navy Register inclusive.

"Mr. B. said this was a faint sketch of the burdens of the banking system as carried on the United States, where every bank is a coint of paper currency, and where every town, some States, must have its banks of circulation while such cities as Liverpool and Mancheste have no such banks, and where the paper more of all these machines receive wings to fly on the whole continent, and to infest the who land, from their universal receivability by federal government in payment of all dues their custom-houses, land-offices, post-office and by all the district attorneys, marshals, clerks, employed under the federal judicing The improvidence of the States, in charten such institutions, is great and deplorable; h their error was trifling, compared to the imp vidence of the federal government in taking paper coinage of all these banks for the current of the federal government, maugre that class in the constitution which recognizes nothing b gold and silver for currency, and which was tended for ever to defend and preserve this Unit from the evils of paper money.

"Mr. B. averred, with a perfect knowledge the fact, that the banking system of the Univ States was on a worse footing than it was in country upon the face of the earth; and that addition to its deep and dangerous defects was also the most expensive and burdenson

d upon the people; then came e brokers, first cousins to the nging notes for money, or for ar; then the gain to the bank ds on speculations in property roduce, and stocks, during th tions of the expansions and con currency; then the gain from ear of notes, which is so much ple; and, finally, the great chap iting which, without being pro ank, is a great burden to the peo hands all the counterfeits sink these burdens he could not com e was one item about which then the salaries to the officers and the stockholders-and this pre y of names more numerous, an money more excessive, than wa the 'Blue Book,' with the Arm gister inclusive.

d this was a faint sketch of the e banking system as carried on i ates, where every bank is a coine rency, and where every town, must have its banks of circulation ties as Liverpool and Mancheste banks, and where the paper mone nachines receive wings to fly ore ontinent, and to infest the whole neir universal receivability by the nment in payment of all dues n-houses, land-offices, post-office e district attorneys, marshals, an oyed under the federal judiciar dence of the States, in chartern ions, is great and deplorable; h as trifling, compared to the impre e federal government in taking the e of all these banks for the current l government, maugre that clan tution which recognizes nothing b er for currency, and which was i er to defend and preserve this Unio s of paper money.

verred, with a perfect knowledge the banking system of the Unite n a worse footing than it was in a n the face of the earth; and that its deep and dangerous defects most expensive and burdenson e most undue advantages to one pa

the community over another. He had no bubt but that this banking system was more lardensome to the free citizens of the United sales than ever the feudal system was to the aleias, and serfs, and peasants of Europe. And that did they get in return for this vast burin? A pestiferous currency of small paper! then they might have a gold currency without aving interest, or suffering losses, if their banks, the those in Liverpool and Manchester, issued no entency except as bills of exchange; or, like the Bank of France, issued no notes but those 4500 and 1,000 francs (say $100 and $500); g even, like the Bank of England, issued no ote under £5 sterling, and payable in gold. And th how much real capital is this banking sysn, so burdensome to the people of the United tates, carried on? About $30,000,000! Yes; on jout $30,000,000 of specie rests the $300,000,000 id in, and on which the community are paying terest, and giving profits to bankers, and blindyielding their faith and confidence, as if the hole $300,000,000 was a solid bed of gold and irer, instead of being, as it is, one tenth part ecie, and nine tenths paper credit!"

Other senators spoke against the recharter of se banks, without the amelioration of their arters which the public welfare required; but thout effect. The amendments were all rered, and the bill passed for the recharter of whole six by a large vote-26 to 14. The as and nays were :

CHAPTER CXLIV.

INDEPENDENCE OF TEXAS.

use several months memorials had been ing in from public meetings in different cities vor of acknowledging the independence of

of that small revolted province, strong from the beginning of the contest, now inflamed into rage from the massacres of the Alamo and of Goliad. Towards the middle of May news of the victory of San Jacinto arrived at Washington. Public feeling no longer knew any bounds. The people were exalted-Congress not less so -and a feeling for the acknowledgment of Texian independence, if not universal, almost general. The sixteenth of May-the first sitting of the Senate after this great news-Mr. Mangum, of North Carolina, presented the proceedings of a public meeting in Burke county, of that State, praying Congress to acknowledge the independence of the young republic. Mr. Preston said: "The effects of that victory had opened up a curtain to a most magnificent scene. This invader had come at the head of his forces, urged on by no ordinary impulse-by an infuriate fanaticism-by a superstitious catholicism, goaded on by a miserable priesthood, against that invincible Anglo-Saxon race, the van of which now approaches the del Norte. It was nt once a war of religion and of liberty. And when that noble race engaged in a war, victory was sure to perch upon their standard. This was not merely the retribution of the cruel war upon the Alamo, but that tide which was swollen by this extraordinary victory would roll on; and it was not in the spirit of prophecy to say where it would stop." Mr. Walker, of Mississippi, said:

"He had, upon the 22d of April last, called the attention of the Senate to the struggle in Texas, and suggested the reservation of any surplus that might remain in the treasury, for the purpose of acquiring Texas from whatever government might remain the government de facto of that country. At that period (said Mr. W.) no allusion had been made, he believed, by any one in either House of Congress to the situation of affairs in Texas. And now (said Mr. W.), upon the very day that he had called the attention of the Senate to this subject, it appeared that Santa Anna had been captured, and his army overthrown. Mr. W. said he had never doubted this result. When on the 22d of April last, resolutions were introduced before the Senate by the senator from Ohio (Mr. Morris), requesting Congress to recognize the independence of Texas, he (Mr. W.) had opposed laying these resolutions on the table, and advocated their reference to a committee of the Senate. Mr. W. said he had addressed the Senate then under very different circumstances the public feeling in behalf of the people from those which now existed. The cries of the expiring prisoners at the Alamo were then resounding in our ears; the victorious usurper was advancing onward with his exterminating warfare, and, in the minds of many, all was gloom and despondency; but Mr. W. said that the published report of our proceedings demonstrated that he did not for a moment despond; that his confidence in the ritle of the West was firm and unshaken; and that he had then declared that the sun was not more certain to set in the western horizon, than that Texas would maintain her independence; and this sentiment he had taken occasion to repeat in the debate on this subject in the Senate on the 9th of May last. Mr. W. said that what was then prediction was now reality; and his heart beat high, and his pulse throbbed with delight, in contemplating this triumph of liberty. Sir (said Mr. W.), the people of the valley of the Mississippi never could have permitted Santa Ana and his myrmidons to retain the dominion of Texas."

Mr. Walker afterwards moved the reference of all the memorials in relation to Texas to the Committee on Foreign Relations. If the accounts received from Texas had been official (for as yet there were nothing but newspaper accounts of the great victory), he would have moved for the immediate recognition of the Texian independence. Being unofficial, he could only move the reference to the committee in the expectation that they would investigate the facts and bring the subject before the Senate in a suitable form for action. Mr. Webster said:

"That if the people of Texas had established a government de facto, it was undoubtedly the duty of this government to acknowledge their independence. The time and manner of doing so, however, were all matters proper for grave and mature consideration. He should have been better satisfied, had this matter not been moved again till all the evidence had been collected, and until they had received official information of the important events that had taken place in Texas. As this proceeding had been moved by a member of the administration party, he felt himself bound to understand that the Executive was not opposed to take the first steps now, and that in his opinion this proceeding was not dangerous or premature. Mr. W. was of opinion that it would be best not to act with precipitation. If this information was true, they would doubtless before long hear from Texas herself; for as soon as she felt that she was a country, and had a country, she would naturally present her claims to her neighbors, to be recognized as an independent nation. He did not say that it would be necessary to wait for this event, but he thought it would be discreet to do so. He would be one of the first to acknowledge the independence of Texas, on tional King Louis Philippe of Orleans.

reasonable proof that she had established a goo ernment. There were views connected wi Texas which he would not now present as would be premature to do so; but he would o serve that he had received some information from a respectable source, which turned his a tention to the very significant expression us by Mr. Monroe in his message of 1822, that European Power should ever be permitted establish a colony on the American continent He had no doubt that attempts would be ma by some European government to obtain a sion of Texas from the government of Mexico

Mr. King, of Alabama, counselled moderation and deliberation, although he was aware that the present excited feeling in relation to Ten every prudent and cautious course would misunderstood, and a proper reserve be probal construed into hostility to Texian independent but he would, so long as he remained a mem on that floor, be regardless of every person consideration, and place himself in opposition all measures which he conceived were calcula to detract from the exalted character of country for good faith, and for undeviating herence to all its treaty stipulations. lle th went on to say:

Let us see an independent governet in Texas, and he would not be behind senator from Mississippi nor the senator of South Carolina in pressing forward to its equition, and establishing with it the most real and friendly relations."

Mr. Calhoun went beyond all other speakers, julvocated not only immediate recognition the independence of Texas, but her simultants admission into the Union; was in favor to guing on both questions together, and at the ment session; and saw an interest in the slaveling States in preventing Texas from having apparent to annoy them. And he said:

lewas of opinion that it would add more and note that the cause of Texas, to wait for a few runtil they received official confirmation of rictory and capture of Santa Anna, in order ahtain a more unanimous vote in favor of the gnition of Texas. He had been of but one ion, from the beginning, that, so far from no being able to reduce Texas, there was at danger of Mexico, herself, being conquered the Texans. The result of one battle had ed the ruler of Mexico in the power of the ans; and they were now able, either to dicwhat terms they pleased to him, or to make s with the opposition in Mexico. This exodinary meeting had given a handful of brave most powerful control over the destinies Mexico; he trusted they would use their my with moderation. He had made up his not only to recognize the independence of a but for her admission into this Union; and Texans managed their affairs prudently, would soon be called upon to decide that tion. No man could suppose for a moment that country could ever come again under dominion of Mexico; and he was of opinion it was not for our interests that there id be an independent community between Mexico. There were powerful reasons Texas should be a part of this Union. The hern States, owning a slave population, were ly interested in preventing that country having the power to annoy them; and the ating and manufacturing interests of the hand the East were equally interested in ing it a part of this Union. He thought would soon be called on to decide these ions; and when they did act on it, he was ting on both together-for recognizing the endence of Texas, and for admitting her the Union. Though he felt the deepest sode on this subject, he was for acting calmly, rately, and cautiously, but at the same with decision and firmness. They should iolate their neutrality; but when they once satisfied that Texas had established a government, they should do as they had done in all other similar cases: recognize her as an independent nation; and if her people, who were once citizens of this Republic, wished to come back to us, he would receive them with open arms. If events should go on as they had done, he could not but hope that, before the close of the present session of Congress, they would not only acknowledge the independence of Texas, but admit her into the Union. He hoped there would be no unnecessary delay, for, in such cases, delays were dangerous; but that they would act with unanimity, and act promptly."

The author of this View did not reply to Mr. Calhoun, being then on ill terms with him; but he saw in the speech much to be considered and remembered-the shadowings forth of coming events; the revelation of a new theatre for the slavery agitation; and a design to make the Texas question an element in the impending election. Mr. Calhoun had been one of Mr. Monroe's cabinet, at the time that Texas was ceded to Spain, and for reasons (as Mr. Monroe stated to General Jackson, in the private letter heretofore quoted) of internal policy and consideration; that is to say, t conciliate the free States, by amputating slave territory, and preventing their opposition to future Southern presidential candidates. He did not use those precise words, but that was the meaning of the words used. The cession of Texas was made in the crisis of the Missouri controversy; and both Mr. Monroe and Mr. Calhoun received the benefit of the conciliation it produced: Mr. Monroe in the re-election, almost unanimous, of 1820; and Mr. Calhoun in the vice-presidential elections of 1824 and 1828; in which he was so much a favorite of the North as to get more votes than Mr. Adams received in the free States, and owed to them his honorable election by the people, when all others were defeated, on the popular vote. Their justification (that of Mr. Monroe's cabinet) for this cession of a great province, was, that the loss was temporary-"that it could be got back again whenever it was wanted"-but the victory of San Jacinto was hardly foreseen at that time. It was these reasons (Northern conciliation, and getting it back when we pleased) that reconciled General Jackson to the cession, at the time it was made. One of the foremost to give away Texas, Mr. Calhoun was the very foremost to get her back; and at an immense cost to our foreign relations and domestic peace. The immediate admission of Texas into the Union, was his plan. She was at war with Mexico-we at peace: to incorporate her into the Union, was to adopt her war. We had treaties of amity with Mexico: to join Texas in the war, was to be faithless to those treaties. We had a presidential election depending; and to discuss the question of Texian admission into our Union, was to bring that element into the canvass, in which all prudent men who were adverse to the admission (as Mr. Van Buren and his friends were), would be thrown under the force of an immense popular current; while all that were in favor of it would expect to swim high upon the waves of that current. The proposition was incredibly rash, tending to involve us in war and dishonor; and also disrespectful to Texas herself, who had not asked for admission; and extravagantly hasty, in being broached before there was any official news of the great victory. Before the debate was over, the author of this View took an opportunity to reply, without reference to other speakers, and to give reasons against the present admission of Texas. But there was one of Mr. Calhoun's reasons for immediate admission, which to him was enigmatical, and at that time, incomprehensible; and that was, the prevention of Texas "from having the power to annoy" the Southern slave States. We had just been employed in suppressing, or exploding, this annoyance, in the Northeast; and, in the twinkling of an eye, it sprung up in the Southwest, two thousand miles off, and quite diagonally from its late point of apparition. That sudden and so distant re-appearance of the danger, was a puzzle, remaining unsolved until the Tyler administration, and the return of Mr. Duff Green from London, with the discovery of the British abolition plot; which was to be planted in Texas, spread into the South, and blow up its slavery. Mr. Bedford Brown, and others, answered Mr. Calhoun. Mr. Brown said:

"He regarded our national character as worth infinitely more than all the territoria' possessions of Mexico, her wealth, or the wealth of all other nations added together. We occupied a standing among the nations of the earth, of which we might well be proud, and which we ought not to permit to be tarnished. We have, said Mr. B., arrived at that period of our history, as a nation, when it behoves us to act with the greatest wisdom and circumspection. But a few years since as a nation, we were comparatively in a state of infancy; we were now, in the offidence of youth, and with the buoyancy of spincident to this period of our existence as a tion, about to enter on 'man's estate.' Power of the infancial in resources, and conscious of our strengte in the state of the strength of the strengt

tion in regard to Texas was very different, tastly more important. That is a country our own borders, and its inhabitants, most them, emigrants from the United States; most of the brave men constituting its who are so heroically fighting to redeem province, are citizens of the United States, have engaged in this bold enterprise as vowers. Were this government to be precipie in acknowledging the independence of ras, might it not be exposed to a suspicion having encouraged these enterprises of its itself a There is another consideration of the importance. Should the independence of be followed by its annexation to the nited States, the reasons for suspicions deroory to the national faith might be still onger. If we, by our own act, contribute to the the constituted authorities of the prore with the power of sovereignty over it, then accept a cession of the country from e authorities, might there not be some reato charge us with having recognized the hendence of the country as a means of getting session of it? he various memorials were referred to the mittee on foreign relations, consisting of Mr. Mr. King of Georgia, Mr. Tallmadge, Mr. gum, and Mr. Porter of Louisiana; which orted early, and unanimously, in favor of the gnition of the independence of Texas, as as satisfactory information should be reed showing that she had a civil government peration capable of performing the duties fulfilling the obligations of a civilized er. In the report which accompanied the olution, its author, Mr. Clay, said:

Sentiments of sympathy and devotion to liberty, which have always animated the le of the United States, have prompted the tion of the resolution, and other manifesns of popular feeling which have been red to the committee, recommending an ac-ledgment of the independence of Texas. committee shares fully in all these sentis; but a wise and prudent government id not act solely on the impulse of feeling, ver natural and laudable it may be. It grave a measure as that of recognizing the independence of a new Power, until it has satisfactory information, and has fully deliberated.

The committee has no information respecting the recent movements in Texas, except such as is derived from the public prints. According to that, the war broke out in Texas last autumn. Its professed object, like that of our revolutionary contest in the commencement, was not separation and independence, but a redress of grievances. In March last, independence was proclaimed, and a constitution and form of government were established. No means of ascertaining accurately the exact amount of the population of Texas are at the command of the committee. It has been estimated at some sixty or seventy thousand souls. Nor are the precise limits of the country which passes under the denomination of Texas known to the committee. They are probably not clearly defined, but they are supposed to be extensive, and sufficiently large, when peopled, to form a respectable Power."

Mr. Southard concurred in the views and conclusion of the report, but desired to say a few words in reply to that part of Mr. Calhoun's speech which looked to the "balance of power, and the perpetuation of our institutions," as a reason for the speedy admission of Texas into the Union, and said:

"I should not have risen to express these notions, if I had not understood the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Calhoun] to declare that he regarded the acknowledgment of the indepence of Texas as important, and principally important, because it prepared the way for the speedy admission of that State as a member of our Union; and that he looked anxiously to that event, as conducing to a proper balance of power, and to the perpetuation of our institu-tions. I am not now, sir, prepared to express an opinion on that question—a question which all must foresee will embrace interests as wide as our Union, and as lasting in their consequences as the freedom which our institutions secure. When it shall be necessarily presented to me, I shall endeavor to meet it in a manner suitable to its magnitude, and to the vital interests which it involves; but I will not, on the present resolution, anticipate it; nor can I permit an inference, as to my decision upon it, to be drawn from the vote which I now give. That vote is upon this resolution alone, and confined to it, founded upon principles sustained by the laws of nations, upon the unvarying practice of our government, and upon the facts as they are now known to exist. It relates to the independence of Texas, not to the admission of Texas into this Union. The achievement of the one, at the proper time, may be justified; the other may be found to be opposed by the highest and strongest considerations of interest and duty. to avoid all precipitation, and not adopt so I discuss neither at this time; nor am I willing that the remarks of the senator should lead, in or out of this chamber, to the inference that all those who vote for the resolution concur with him in opinion. The question which he has started should be left perfectly open and free."

The vote in favor of the Resolution reported by Mr. Clay was unanimous-39 senators present and voting. In the House of Representatives a similar resolution was reported from the House Committee of foreign relations. Mr. John Y. Mason, of Virginia, chairman; and adopted by a vote of II3 to 22. The nays were: Messrs. John Quincy Adams, Heman Allen, Jeremiah Bailey, Andrew Beaumont, James W. Bouldin, William Clark, Walter Coles, Edward Darlington, George Grennell, jr. Hiland Hall, Abner Hazeltine, William Hiester. Abbott Lawrence, Levi Lincoln, Thomas C Love, John J. Milligan, Dutce J. Pearce, Stephen C. Phillips, David Potts, jr., John Reed, David Russell, William Slade.

It is remarkable that in the progress of this Texas question both Mr. Adams and Mr. Calhoun reversed their positions-the former being against, and the latter in favor, of its alienation in 1819; the former being against, and the latter in favor of its recovery in 1836-'44.-Mr. Benton was the last speaker in the Senate in favor of the recognition of independence; and his speech being the most full and carefully historical of any one delivered, it is presented entire in the next chapter; and, it is believed, that in going more fully than other speakers did into the origin and events of the Texas Revolution, it will give a fair and condensed view of that remarkable event, so interesting to the American people.

CHAPTER CXLV.

TEXAS INDEPENDENCE-MR. BENTON'S SPEECH.

'MR. BENTON rose and said he should confine himself strictly to the proposition presented in the resolution, and should not complicate the practical question of recognition with speculations on the future fate of Texas. Such speculations could have no good effect upon either of the countries interested; upon Mexico, Texas, or the United States. Texas has not asked for admission into this Union. Her independence is still contested by Mexico. Her boundariand other important points in her political and other important points in her political addition, are not yet adjusted. To discuss question of her admission into his Union, unthese circumstances, is to treat her with disspect, to embroil ourselves with Mexico, to appromise the disinterestedness of our motives the eyes of Europe; and to start among oursel prematurely, and without reason, a quest which, whenever it comes, cannot be with its own intrinsic difficulties and perplexities. "Since the three months that the affair

Texas have been the subject of repeated disc sion in this charger, I have imposed on my a reserve, not the effect of want of feeling, the effect of strong feeling, and some judin combined, which has not permitted me to utterance to the general expression of my timents. Once only have I spoken, and that the most critical moment of the contest, when the reported advance of the Mexic upon Nacogdoches, and the actual movement General Gaines and our own troops in that rection, gave reason to apprehend the encoun of flags, or the collision of arms, which m compromise individuals or endanger the n of nations. It was then that I used those we not entirely enigmatical, and which have been repeated by some, without the prefix their important qualifications, namely; that w neutrality was the obvious line of our duty of our interest, yet there might be emerge in which the obligation of duty could have force, and the calculations of interest could no place; when, in fact, a man should have head to think! nothing but a heart to feel! an arm to strike! and I illustrated this ment. It was after the affair of Goliad and imputed order to unpeople the country, the supposititious case of prisoners assassing women violated, and children slaughtered: these horrors to be perpetrated in the preor hearing of an American army. In such a I declared it to be my sentiment—and I no peat it, for I feel it to be in me-in such se I declared it to be my scntiment, that tree were nothing, books were nothing, laws nothing! that the paramount law of God nature was every thing! and that the Ame soldier, hearing the cries of helplessness weakness, and remembering only that he man, and born of woman, and the father of

I uttered this timent not upon impulsion, but with considnien; not for theatrical effect, but as a rule section; not as vague declamation, but with ere to possible or probable events, and with a on to the public justification of General Gaines his men, if, under circumstances appalling humanity, they should nobly resolve to obey impulsions of the heart instead of coldly coniting the musty leaves of books and treaties. Beyond this I did not go, and, except in this stance, I do not speak. Duty and interest escribed to the United States a rigorous neulity; and this condition she has faithfully fulld Our young men have gone to Texas to ht; but they have gone without the sanction the laws, and against the orders of the Govment. They have gone upon that impulsion wh in all time, has carried the heroic youth all ages to seek renown in the perils and gloof distant war. Our foreign enlistment law pot repealed. Unlike England, in the civil r now raging in Spain, we have not licensed reference by repealing our penalties: we have stimulated action by withdrawing obsta-No member of our Congress, like General ans in the British Parliament, has left his to levy troops in the streets of the metropand to lead them to battle and to victory in land torn by civil discord. Our statute inst armaments to invade friendly powers is full force. Proclamations have attested our tral dispositions. Prosecutions have been krei against violators of law. A naval force tegulf, and a land force on the Sabine, have ndirected to enforce the policy of the govment; and so far as acts have gone, the adtage has been on the side of Mexico; for Texian armed schooner Invincible has been ght into an American port by an American of war. If parties and individuals still go leras to fight, the act is particular, not nacompromising none but the parties thems, and may take place on one side as well the other. The conduct of the administrahas been strictly neutral; and, as a friend hat administration, and from my own conons, I have conformed to its policy, avoidthe language which would irritate, and opg the acts which might interrupt pacific and commercial communications. Mexico is our nearest neighbor, dividing with us the continent of North America, and possessing the elements of a great power. Our boundaries are co-terminous for more than two thousand miles. We have inland and maritime commerce. She has mines; we have ships. General considerations impose upon each power the duties of reciprocal friendship; especial inducements invite us to uninterrupted commercial intercourse. As a western senator, coming from the banks of the Mississippi, and from the State of Missouri, I cannot be blind to the consequences of interrupting that double line of inland and maritime commerce, which, stretching to the mines of Mexico, brings back the perennial supply of solid money which enriches the interior, and enables New Orleans to purchase the vast accumulation of agricultural produce of which she is the emporium. Wonderful are the workings of commerce, and more apt to find out its own proper channels by its own operations than to be guided into them by the hand of legislation. New Orleans now is what the Havana once was -the entrepot of the Mexican trade, and the recipient of its mineral wealth. The superficial reader of commercial statistics would say that Mexico but slightly encourages our domestic industry; that she takes nothing from our agriculture, and but little from our manufactures. On the contrary, the close observer would see a very different picture. He would see the products of our soil passing to all the countries of Europe, exchanging into fine fabrics, and these returning in the ships of many nations, our own predominant, to the city of New Orleans; and thence going off in small Mexican vessels to Matamoros, Tampico, Vera Cruz, and other Mexican ports. The return from these ports is in the precious metals; and, to confine myself to a single year, as a sample of the whole, it may be stated that, of the ten millions and three quarters of silver coin and bullion received in the United States, according to the custom-house returns during the least year, eight millions and one quarter of it came from Mexico alone, and the mass of it through the port of New Orleans. This amount of treasure is not received for nothing, nor, as it would seem on the commercial tables, for foreign fabrics unconnected with American industry, but, in reality, for domestic productions changed into foreign fabrics, and giving double employment to the navigation of the country. New Orleans has taken the place of the Havana; it has become the entrepot of this trade; and many circumstances, not directed by law, or even known to lawgivers, have combined to produce the result. First, the application of steam power to the propulsion of vessels, which, in the form of towboats, has given to a river city a prompt and facile communication with the sea; then the advantage of full and assorted cargoes, which brings the importing vessel to a point where she delivers freight for two different empires; then the marked advantage of a return cargo, with cheap and abundant supplies, which are always found in the grand emporium of the great West; then the discriminating duties in Mexican ports in favor of Mexican vessels, which makes it advantageous to the importer to stop and transship at New Orleans; flually, our enterprise, our police, and our free institutions, our perfect security, under just laws, for life, liberty, person and property. These circumstances, undirected by government, and without the knowledge of government, have given to New Orleans the supreme advantage of being the entrepot of the Mexican trade; and have presented the unparalleled spectacle of the noblest valley in the world, and the richest mines in the world, sending their respective products to meet each other at the mouth of the noblest river in the world; and there to create in lapse of time, the most wonderful city which any age or country has ever beheld. A look upon the map of the great West, and a tolerable capacity to calculate the aggregate of geographical advantages, must impress the beholder with a vast opinion of the future greatness of New Orleans; but he will only look upon one half of the picture unless he contemplates this new branch of trade which is making the emporium of the Mississippi the entrepot of Mexican commerce, and the recipient of the Mexican mines, and which, though now so great, is still in its infancy. Let not government mar a consummation so auspicious in its aspect, and teeming with so many rich and precious results. Let no unnecessary collision with Mexico interrupt our commerce, turn back the streams of three hundred mines to the Hayana, and give a wound to a noble city which must be felt to the headspring and source of every stream that pours its tribute into the King of Floods.

"Thus far Mexico has no cause of complain The conduct of our government has been to of rigorous neutrality. The present motion de not depart from that line of conduct; for proposed recognition is not only contingent in the de facto independence of Texas, but it lows in the train, and conforms to the spirit the actual arrangements of the President Gene Santa Anna, for the complete separation of two countries. We have authentic information that the President General has agreed to armistice; that he has directed the evacuat of the country; that the Mexican army is full retreat; that the Rio Grande, a limit beyond the discovery and settlement of La Sa in 1684, is the provisional boundary; and negotiations are impending for the establishm of peace on the basis of separation. Mexico had the advantage of these arrangements, the made by a captive chief, in the unmolested treat and happy extrication of her troops for their perilous position. Under these circu stances, it can be no infringement of neutral for the Senate of the United States to adop resolution for the contingent and qualified knowledgment of Texian independence. I after the adoption of the resolution, it will main inoperative upon the hands of the Pa dent until he shall have the satisfactory in mation which shall enable him to act with detriment to any interest, and without in tion of any law. .

"Even without the armistice and provisi treaty with Santa Anna, I look upon the sen tion of the two countries as being in the order of events, and absolutely certain to place. Texas and Mexico are not formed union. They are not homogeneous, Is of Texas as known to La Salle, the bay of Bernard—(Matagorda)—and the waters w belong to it, being the western boundary. do not belong to the same divisions of cour nor to the same systems of commerce, n the same pursuits of business. They have affinities-no attractions-no tendencies to lesce. In the course of centuries, and Mexico has extended her settlements infini further in other directions-to the head of Rio Grande in the north, and to the bay of Francisco in the northwest; yet no settle had been extended east, along the neighbor coast of the Gulf of Mexico. The rich and of our government has been th trality. The present motion de om that line of conduct; for gnition is not only contingent un ndependence of Texas, but it a ain, and conforms to the spirit, angements of the President General for the complete separation of t s. We have authentic informati esident General has agreed to nat he has directed the evacuat ry; that the Mexican army is that the Rio Grande, a limit liscovery and settlement of La Sa he provisional boundary; and t are impending for the establishm the basis of separation. Mexico intage of these arrangements, thou captive chief, in the unmolested appy extrication of her troops for ous position. Under these circ can be no infringement of neutral ate of the United States to ador for the contingent and qualified ent of Texian independence. E doption of the resolution, it will rative upon the hands of the Pr he shall have the satisfactory in ich shall enable him to act with to any interest, and without infe law. .

Sooner or later, separation would be intable; and the progress of human events has herated the operation of natural causes. Gohas torn Texas from Mexico; Goliad has medindependence; San Jacinto has sealed it! at the massacre decreed, the victory has sealand the day of the martyrdom of prisoners afor ever be regarded as the day of disunion wen Texas and Mexico. I speak of it politimot morally; that massacre was a great lical blunder, a miscalculation, an error, and istake. It was expected to put an end to stance, to subdue rebellion, to drown revolt good, and to extinguish aid in terror. On contrary, it has given life and invincibility he cause of Texas. It has fired the souls of own citizens, and imparted to their courage energies of revenge and despair. It has ato her the sympathies and commiseration he civilized world. It has given her men money, and claims upon the aid and a hold the sensibilities of the human race. If the gle goes on, not only our America, but ne will send its chivalry to join in the con-I repeat it; that cruel morning of the o, and that black day of Goliad, were great ral faults. The blood of the martyr is the of the church. The blood of slaughtered ots is the dragon's teeth sown upon the from which heroes, full grown and armed, into life, and rush into battle. Often will Mexican, guiltless of that blood, feel the o American steel for the deed of that day, war continues. Many were the innocent Jeinto, whose cries, in broken Spanish, ing Goliad and the Alamo, could not save devoted lives from the avenging rememt of the slaughtered garrison and the masprisoners.

happy day, for ever to be deplored, that ymorning, March 6, 1836, when the unkd garrison of the Alamo, victorious in so history will sit in judgment upon all concerned, many assaults over twenty times their number perished to the last man by the hands of those om they had released on parole two months efore, leaving not one to tell how they first dealt out to multitudes that death which they themselves finally received. Unhappy day that Palm Sunday, March 27, when the five hundred and twelve prisoners at Goliad, Issning from the sally port at dawn of day, one by one, under the cruel delusion of a return to their families, found themselves enveloped in double files of cavalry and infantry, marched to a spot fit for the perpetration of the horrid deed-and there, without an instant to think of parents, country, friends, and God-in the midst of the consternation of terror and surprise, were inhumanly set upon, and pitilessly put to death. in spite of those moving cries which reached to heaven, and regardless of those supplicating hands, stretched forth for mercy, from which arms had been taken under the perfidious forms of a capitulation. Five hundred and six perished that morning-young, vigorous, brave, sons of respectable families, and the pride of many a parent's heart-and their bleeding bodies, torn with wounds, and many yet alive, were thrown in heaps upon vast fires, for the flames to consume what the steel had mangled. Six only escaped, and not by mercy, but by miracles. And this was the work of man upon his brother; of Christian upon Christian; of those upon those who adore the same God, invoke the same heavenly benediction, and draw precepts of charity and mercy from the same divine fountain. Accursed be the ground on which the dreadful deed was done! Sterile, and set apart, let it for ever be! No fruitful cultivation should ever enrich it; no joyful edifice should ever adorn it; but shut up, and closed by gloomy walls, the mournful cypress, the weeping willow, and the inscriptive monument, should for ever attest the foul deed of which it was the scene, and invoke from every passenger the throb of pity for the slain, and the start of horror for the slayer. And you, neglected victims of the Old Mission and San Patricio, shall you be forgotten because your numbers were fewer, and your hapless fate more concealed? No! but to you also justice shall be done. One common fate befell you all; one common memorial shall perpetuate your names, and embalm your memories. Inexorable and will reject the plea of government orders, even if those orders emanated from the government, instead of being dictated to it. The French National Convention, in 1793, ordered all the English prisoners who should be taken in battle to be put to death. The French armies refused to execute the decree. They answered, that French soldiers were the protectors, not the assassius of prisoners; and all France, all Europe, the whole civilized world, applauded the noble reply.

"But let us not forget that there is some relief to this black and bloody picture-some alleviation to the horror of its appalling features. There was humanity, as well as cruelty, at Goliad-humanity to deplore what it could not prevent. The letter of Colonel Fernandez does honor to the human heart. Doubtless many other officers felt and mourned like him, and spent the day in unavailing regrets. The ladies, Losero and others, of Matamoros, saving the doomed victims in that city, from day to day, by their intercessions, appear like ministering angels. Several public journals, and many individuals, in Mexico, have given vent to feelings worthy of Christians, and of the civilization of the age; and the poor woman on the Gaudaloupe, who succored and saved the young Georgian (Hadaway), how nobly she appears! He was one of the fe .7 that escaped the fate of the Georgia battalion sent to the Old Mission. Overpowered by famine and despair, without arms and without comrades, he entered a solitary house filled with Mexican soldiers hunting the fugitives of his party. His action amazed them; and, thinking it a snare, they stepped out to look for the armed body of which he was supposed to be the decoy. In that instant food was given him by the humane woman, and instant flight to the swamp was pointed out. He fled, receiving the fire of many guns as he went; and, escaping the perils of the way, the hazards of battle at San Jacinto, where he fought, and of Indian massacre in the Creek nation, when the two stages were taken and part of his travelling companions killed, he lives to publish in America that instance of devoted humanity in the poor woman of the Gaudaloupe. Such acts as all these deserve to be commemorated. They relieve the revolting picture of military barbarity-soften the resentments of nationsand redeem a people from the offence of individuals.

A succession of violent es in government, and the rapid overthrow relers, annoyed and distressed them; but remained tranquil under every violence th did not immediately bear on themselves. 1822 the republic of 1821 was superseded by imperial diadem of Iturbide. In 1823 he deposed and banished, returned and was and Victoria made President. Mentuno Bravo disputed the presidency with Vica; and found, in banishment, the mildest known among Mexicans to unsuccessful war. Pedraza was elected in 1828; Gueroverthrew him the next year. Then Busente overthrew Guerrero; and, quickly, a Anna overthrew Bustamente, and, with all the forms of the constitution, and the ole frame of the federative government. By own will, and by force, Santa Anna dissolved eristing Congress, convened another, formed two Houses into one, called it a convention; made it the instrument for deposing, withtrial, the constitutional Vice-President, Go-Farias, putting Barragan into his place, hilating the State governments, and estabing a consolidated government, of which ho monarch, under the retained republican title hesident. Still, the Texians did not take up s: they did not acquiesce, but they did not It. They retained their State government meration, and looked to the other States, and more powerful than Texas, to vindithe general cause, and to re-establish the al constitution of 1824. In September, this was still her position. In that month, rican armed vessel appeared off the coast exas, and declared her ports blockaded. the same time, General Cos appeared in the with an army of fifteen hundred men, orders to arrest the State authorities, to m the inhabitants, leaving one gun to every hundred souls; and to reduce the State to editional submission. It was the same demand! and the same answer was given-resistance-battle-victory! for the American blood was at Clonzales as it had been at Lexington; and between using their arms, and surrendering their arms, that blood can never hesitate. Then followed the rapid succession of britiant events, which, in two months, left Texas without an armed enemy in her borders, and the strong forts of Goliad and the Alamo, with their garrisons and cannon, the almost bloodless prizes of a few hundred Texian rifles. This was the origin of the revolt; and a calumny more heartless can never be imagined than that which would convert this just and holy defence of life, liberty, and property, into an aggression for the extension of slavery.

"Just in its origin, valiant and humane in its conduct, sacred in its object, the Texian revolt has illustrated the Anglo-Saxon character, and given it new titles to the respect and admiration of the world.

"It shows that liberty, justice, valor-moral, physical, and intellectual power-discriminate that race wherever it goes. Let our America rejoice, let Old England rejoice, that the Brassos and Colorado, new and strange names-streams far beyond the western bank of the Father of Floods-have felt the impress, and witnessed the exploits of a people sprung from their loins, and carrying their language, laws, and customs, their magna charta and its glorious privileges, into new regions and far distant climes. Of the individuals who have purchased lasting renown in this young war, it would be impossible, in this place to speak in detail, and invidious to discriminate; but there is onamong them whose position forms an exception, and whose early association with myself justifies and claims the tribute of a particular notice. I speak of him whose romantic victory has given to the Jacinto* that immortality in grave and serious history which the diskos of Apollo had given to it in the fabulous pages of the heathen mythology. General Houston was born in the State of Virginia, county of Rockbridge: he was appointed an ensign in the army of the United States, during the late war with Great Britain, and served in the Creek campaign under the banners of Jackson. I was the lieutenant colonel of the regiment to which he belonged, and the first field officer to whom he reported. I then marked in him the same soldierly and gentlemanly qualities which have since distinguished his eventful career: frank, generous, brave; ready to do, or to suffer, whatever the obligations of civil or military duty imposed; and always prompt to answer the call of honor, patriotism, and friendship. Sincerely do I rejoice in his victory. It is a victory without alloy, and without parallel, except at New Orleans. It is a victory which the civilization of the age, and the honor of the human race, required him to gain: for the nineteenth century is not the age in which a repetition of the Goliad matins could be endured. Nobly has he answered the requisition; fresh and luxuriant are the laurels which adorn his brow.

"It is not within the scope of my present purpose, to speak of military events, and to celebrate the exploits of that vanguard of the Anglo-Saxons who are now on the confines of the ancient empire of Montezuma; but that combat of the San Jacinto! it must for ever remain in the catalogue of military miracles. Seven hundred and fifty citizens, miscellaneously armed with rifles, muskets, belt pistols, and knives, under a leader who had never seen service, except as a subaltern, march to attack near double their numbers-march in open day across a clear prairie, to attack upwards of twelve hundred veterans, the élite of an invading army of seven thousand, posted in a wood, their flanks secured, front intrenched; and commanded by a general trained in civil wars, victorious in numberless battles; and chief of an empire of which no man becomes chief except as conqueror. In twenty minutes, the position is forced. The combat becomes a carnage. The flowery prairie is stained with blood; the hyacinth is no longer blue, but scarlet. Six hundred Mexicans are dead; six hundred more are prisoners, half wounded; the President General himself is a prisoner; the camp and baggage all | which, in giving the Secretary of the Im taken; and the loss of the victors, six hi and twenty wounded. Such are the results, which no European can believe, but those saw Jackson at New Orleans. Houston is pupil of Jackson; and he is the first selfgeneral, since the time of Mark Antony, and King Antigonus, who has taken the general the army and the head of the government tive in battle. Different from Antony, he spared the life of his captive, though forfer by every law, human and divine.

It w Il the land-offices to reject paper m vo nothing but gold and silver in the public lands; and was issued ority of the resolution of the year giving the Secretary of the Tre preticeary authority to receive the notes of paying banks in revenue payments, gave also the right to reject them. The numof these banks had now become so great. quantity of notes issued so enormous, the dity of obtaining loans so universal, and the eptation to converting shadowy paper into lestate, so tempting, that the rising streams paper from seven hundred and fifty banks took ir course towards the new States, seat of the Mic domain-discharging in accumulated volthere collected torrents upon the different doffices. The sales were running up to five ilions a month, with the prespect of unboundincrease after the rise of Congress; and it this increase from the land sales which made surplus which the constitution had been requed to divide among the States. And we was no limit to this conversion of public into inconvertible paper. In the customebranch of the revenue there was a limit the amount to be received-limited by the out of duties to be paid: but in the land-office nch there was no limit. It was therefore at point that the remedy was wanted; and, that reason, the "Specie Circular" was limitin its application to the land-offices; and ly forbade the sale of the public lands for thing but hard money. It was an order of iculable value to the United States, and ed by President Jackson in known disregard be will both of the majority of Congress and kfor the adjournment of Congress, and in et with the President, the author of this ad attempted to get an act of Congress to the evil; and in support of his motion to effect gave his opinion of the evil itself, and be benefits which would result from its supsion. He said:

He was able to inform the Senate how it ened that the sales of the public lands had red all calculations, and run up from four ons a year to five millions a quarter; it was speculators went to banks, borrowed five, twenty, fifty thousand dollars in paper, in notes, usually under twenty dollars, and ed to carry off these notes to a great dissometimes five hundred or a thousand and there laid them out for public lands. land-office money, they would circulate in untry; many of these small notes would return at all, and their loss would be a min to the bank; others would not return terest on them for years before they had to redeem them. Thus speculators, loaded with paper, would ontbid settlers and cultivators, who had no undue accommodations from banks, and who had nothing but specie to give for lands, or the notes which were its real equivalent. Mr. B, sald that, living in a new State, it came within his knowledge that such accommodations as he had mentioned were the main cause of the excessive sales which had taken place in the public lands, and that the effect was equally injurious to every interest concerned-except the banks and the speculators: it was injurious to the treasury, which was filling up with paper; to the new States, which were flooded with paper; and to settlers and cultivators, who were outbid by speculators, loaded with this borrow-ed paper. A return to specie payments for lands is the remedy for all these evils."

Having exposed the evil, and that to the contry generally as well as to the federal tr Mr. B. went on to give his opinion of the fits of suppressing it; and said:

"It would put an end to every complaint now connected with the subject, and have a beneficial effect upon every public and private interest. Upon the federal government its effect would be to check the unnatural sale of the public lands to speculators for paper; it would throw the speculators out of market, limit the sales to settlers and cultivators, stop the swelling increases of paper surpluses in the treasury, put an end to all projects for disposing of surpluses; and relieve all anxiety for the fate of the public moneys in the deposit banks. Upon the new States, where the public lands are situated, its effects would be most auspicions. It would stop the flood of paper with which they are inundated, and bring in a steady stream of gold and silver in its place. It would give them a hard-money currency, and especially a share of the gold currency; for every emigrant could then carry gold to the country. Upon the settler and cultivator who wished to purchase land its effect would be peculiarly advantageous. He would be relieved from the competition of speculators; he would not have to contend with those who received undue accommodations at banks, and came to the land-offices loaded with bales of bank notes which they had borrowed upon condition of carrying them far away, and turning them loose where many would be lost, and never get back to the bank that issued them. All these and many other good effects would thus be produced, and no hardship or evil of any kind could accrue to the meritorious part of the country; for the settler and cultivator who wishes to buy land for use, or for a settlement for his children, or to increase his farm, would have no difficulty in getting hard money to make his purchase. He has no undue accommodations from banks. He has no paper but what is good; such as he can long time; and the bank would draw in- | readily convert into specie. To him the exaction of specie payments from all purchasers would be a rule of equality, which would enable him to purchase what he needs without competition with fictitions and borrowed capital.'

Mr. B. gave a view of the actual condition of the paper currency, which he described as hideous and appalling, doomed to a catastrophe; and he advised every prudent man, as well as the government, to fly from its embrace. His voice. and his warning, answered no purpose. He got no support for his motion. A few friends were willing to stand by him, but the opposition senators stood out in unbroken front against it. reinforced largely by the friends of the administration: but it is in vain to attribute the whole opposition to the measure merely to the mistaken opinions of friends, and the resentful policy of foes. There was another cause operating to the same effect; and the truth of history requires it to be told. There were many members of Congress engaged in these land speculations. upon loans of bank paper; and who were unwilling to see a sudden termination of so profitable a game. The rejection of the bill it was thought would be sufficient; and on the news of it the speculation redoubled its activity. But there was a remedy in reserve for the cure of the evil which they had not foreseen, and which was applied the moment that Congress was gone. Jackson was still President! and he had the nerve which the occasion required. He saw the public lands fleeting away-saw that Congress would not interfere-and knew the majority of his cabinet to be against his interference. He did as he had often done in councils of war -called the council together to hear a decision. He summoned his cabinet-laid the case before them-heard the majority of adverse opinions: -and directed the order to issue. His private Secretary, Mr. Donelson, was directed to prepare a draught of the order. The author of this View was all the while in the office of this private Secretary. Mr. Donelson came to him, with the President's decision, and requested him to draw up the order. It was done-the rough draught carried back to the council-put into official form-signed-issued. It was a second edition of the removal of the deposits scene, and made an immense sensation. The disappointed speculators raged. Congress was considered insulted, the cabinet defied, the banks disgraced. But the vindication of the measure soon came, sellor. In these qualities of the mind hed

CHAPTER CXLVIII.

DEATH OF MR. MONROE, FIFTH PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

He died during the first term of the administration of President Jackson, and is appropriately noticed in this work next after Mr. Madison, with whom he had been so long and so intimately associated, both in public and in private life; and whose successor he had been in successive high posts, including that of the presidency itself. He is one of our eminent public characters which have not attained their due place in history; nor has any one attempted is give him that place but one-Mr John Quincy Adams-in his discourse upon the life of Mr. Monroe. Mr. Adams, and who could be a more competent judge? places him in the first time of American statesmen, and contributing, during the fifty years of his connection with the public affairs, a full share in the aggrandisement and advancement of his country. His parts were not shining, but solid. He lacked genius, but he possessed judgment: and it was the remark of Dean Swift, well illustrated in his own case and that of his associate friends, Harley and Bolingbroke (three of the rarest geniuses that ever acted together, and whose cause went to ruin notwithstanding their wit and eloquence), that genius was not necessary to the conducting of the affairs of state: that judgment, diligence, knowledge, good intentions, and will, were sufficient. Mr. Monroe was an instance of the soundness of this remark, as well as the three brilliant geniuses of Queen Anne's time, and on the opposite side of it. Mr. Monroe had none of the mental qualities which dazzle and astonish mankind; but he had a discretion which seldom committed a mistake—an integrity that always looked to the public good-a firmness of will which carried him resolutely upon his object-a diligence that mastered every subject-and a perseverance that yielded to no obstacle or reverse. He began his patriotic career in the military service, at the commencement of the war of the revolutionwent into the general assembly of his native State at an early age-and thence, while still young, into the continental Congress. There he showed his character, and laid the foundation of his future political fortunes in his uncompromising opposition to the plan of a treaty with Spain by which the navigation of the Mississippi was to be given up for twenty-five years in return for commercial privileges. It was the qualities of judgment, and perseverance, which he displayed on that occasion, which brought him those calls to diplomacy in which he was afterwards so much employed with three of the then greatest European powers-France, Spain. Great Britain. And it was in allusion to this circumstance that President Jefferson afterwards, when the right of deposit at New Orleans had been violated by Spain, and when a minister was wanted to recover it, said, "Monroe is the man: the defence of the Mississippi belongs to him." And under this appointment he had the felicity to put his name to the treaty which secured the Mississippi, its navigation and all the territory drained by its western waters, to the United States for ever. Several times in his life he seemed to miscarry, and to fall from the top to the bottom of the political ladder: but always to reascend as high, or higher than ever. Recalled by Washington from the French mission, to which he had been appointed from the Senate of the United States, he returned to the starting point of his early career—the general assembly of his State-served as a member from his county-was elected Governor; and from that post restored by Jefferson to the French mission, soon to be followed by the embassies to Spain and England. Becoming estranged from Mr. Madison about the time of that gentleman's first election to the presidency, and having returned from his missions a little mortified that Mr. Jefferson had rejected his British treaty without sending it to the Senate, he was again at the foot of the political ladder, and apparently out of favor with those who were at its top.

Nothing despairing, he went back to the starting point—served again in the Virgin general assembly—was again elected Govern and from that post was called to the cabinet Mr. Madison, to be his double Secretary of Sa and War. He was the effective power in declaration of war against Great Britain. residence abroad had shown him that unavene British wrongs was lowering our character w Europe, and that war with the "mistress of seas" was as necessary to our respectability the eyes of the world, as to the security of citizens and commerce upon the ocean brought up Mr. Madison to the war point. drew the war report which the committee foreign relations presented to the Housereport which the absence of Mr. Peter B. DEATH OF CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL. It died in the middle of the second term of eneral Jackson's presidency, having been chief stice of the Supreme Court of the United utes full thirty-five years, presiding all the hile (to use the inimitable language of Mr. andolph), "with native dignity and unpreoling grace." He was supremely fitted for in judicial station:—a solid judgment, great soning powers, acute and penetrating mind: in manners and habits to suit the purity and sancity of the ermine :- attentive, patient, borious: grave on the bench, social in the prourse of life: simple in his tastes, and in-nombly just. Seen by a stranger come into a on and he would be taken for a modest coungentleman, without claims to attention, and dy to take the lowest place in company, or table, and to act his part without trouble to rbody. Spoken to, and closely observed, he ould be seen to be a gentleman of finished eding, of winning and prepossessing talk, and at as much mind as the occasion required n to show. Coming to man's estate at the pinning of the revolution he followed the cur-at into which so many young men, destined become eminent, so ardently entered; and red in the army, and with notice and obsertion, under the eyes of Washington. Elected Congress at an early age he served in the ouse of Representatives in the time of the er Mr. Adams, and found in one of the proment questions of the day a subject entirely ted to his acute and logical turn of mind-the e of the famous Jonathan Robbins, claiming be an American citizen, reclaimed by the itish government as a deserter, delivered up, hanged at the yard-arm of an English manrar. Party spirit took up the case, and it one to inflame that spirit. Mr. Marshall ke in defence of the administration, and de the master speech of the day, when there e such master speakers in Congress as dison, Gallatin, William B. Giles, Edward ingston, John Randolph. It was a judicial ect, adapted to the legal mind of Mr. Mar-It requiring a legal pleading: and well did to say that it distanced competition-leaving all associates and opponents far behind, and carrying the case. Seldom has one speech brought so much fame, and high appointment to any one man. When he had delivered it his reputation was in the zenith: in less than nine brief months thereafter he was Secretary at War. Secretary of State, Minister to France, and Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. Politically, he classed with the federal party, and was one of those high-minded and patriotic men of that party, who, acting on principle, commanded the respect of those even who deemed them wrong.

CHAPTER CL.

DEATH OF COL. BURR, THIRD VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

HE was one of the few who, entering the war of independence with ardor and brilliant prospects, disappointed the expectations he had created, dishonored the cause he had espoused, and ended in shame the career which he had opened with splendor. He was in the adventurous expedition of Arnold through the wilderness to Quebec, went ahead in the disguise of a priest to give intelligence of the approach of aid to General Montgomery, arrived safely through many dangers, captivated the General by the courage and address which he had shown. was received by him into his military family; ard was at his side when he was killed. Returning to the seat of war in the Northern States he was invited by Washington, captivated like Montgomery by the soldierly and intellectual qualities he had shown, to his headquarters, with a view to placing him on his staff; but he soon perceived that the brilliant young man lacked principle; and quietly got rid of him. The after part of his life was such as to justify the opinion which Washington had formed of him; but such was his address and talent as to rise to high political distinction: Attorney General of New-York, Senator in Congress, and Vice-President of the United States. At the close of the presidential election of 1800, he stood equal with Mr. Jefferson in plead it. Mr. Randolph has often been heard the vote which he received, and his undoubted successor at the end of Mr. Jefferson's term. But there his honors came to a stand, and took a downward turn, nor ceased descending until he was landed in the abyss of shame, misery, and desolation. He intrigued with the federalists to supplant Mr. Jefferson-to get the place of President, for which he had not received a single vote-was suspected, detected, baffledlost the respect of his party, and was thrown upon crimes to recover a position, or to avenge his losses. The treasonable attempt in the West, and the killing of General Hamilton, ended his career in the United States. But although he had deceived the masses, and reached the second office of the government, with the certainty of attaining the first if he only remained still, yet there were some close observers whom he never deceived. The early mistrust of Washington has been mentioned: it became stronger as Burr mounted higher in the public favor; and in 1794, when a senator in Congress, and when the republican party had taken him for their choice for the French mission in the place of Mr. Monroe recalled, and had sent a committee of which Mr. Madison was chief to ask his nomination from Washington, that wise and virtuous man peremptorily refused it, giving as a categorical reason, that his rule was invariable, never to appoint an immoral man to any office. Mr. Jefferson had the same ill opinion of him, and, notwithstanding his party zeal, always considered him in market when the federalists had any high office to bestow. But General Hamilton was most thoroughly imbued with a sense of his unworthiness, and deemed it due to his country to balk his election over Jefferson; and did so. His letters to the federal members of Congress painted Burr in his true character, and dashed far from his grasp, and for ever, the gilded prize his hand was touching. For that frustration of his hopes, four years afterwards, he killed Hamilton in a duel, having on the part of Burr the spirit of an assassination-cold-blooded, calculated, revengeful, and falsely-pretexted. He alleged some trivial and recent matter for the challenge, such as would not justify it in any code of honor; and went to the ground to kill upon an old grudge which he was ashamed to avow. Hard was the fate of Hamilton-losing his life at the early age of forty-two for having done justice to his country in the person of the man

Hard his fate, wh withdrawing from public life at the age thirty-four, he felt himself constrained to app to posterity for that justice which contem raries withheld from him. PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION OF 1836.

LVAN BUREN was the candidate of the demotic party; General Harrison the candidate of the opposition; and Mr. Hugh L. White that of a fragment of the democracy. Mr. Van Buren was elected, receiving one hundred and seventy electoral votes, to seventy-three given to General Harrison, and twenty-six given to Mr. White. The States voting for each, were: -Mr. Van Buren: Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island. Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, Louisiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, Missouri, Michigan, Arkansas. For General Harrison: Vermont, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana. For Mr. White: Georgia and Tennessee. Massachusetts complimented Mr. Webster by bestowing her fourteen votes upon him; and South Carolina, as in the two preceding elections, threw her vote away upon a citizen not a candidate, and not a child of her soil-Mr. Mangum of North Carolina-disappointing the expectations of Mr. White's friends, whose standing for the presidency had been instigated by Mr. Calhoun, to divide the democratic party and defeat Mr. Van Buren. Colonel Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, was the democratic candidate for the vicepresidency, and received one hundred and fortyseven votes, which, not being a majority of the whole number of votes given, the election was referred to the Senate, to choose between the two highest on the list; and that body being largely democratic, he was duly elected: receiving thirty-three out of forty-nine senatorial votes. The rest of the vice-presidential vote, in the electoral colleges, had been between Mr. Francis Granger, of New York, who received seventy-seven votes; Mr. John Tyler, of Virginia, who received forty-seven; and Mr. William Smith, of South Carolina, complimented by Virginia with her twenty-three votes. Mr. Granger, being the next highest on the list, after Colonel Johnson, was voted for as one of the two referred to the Senate; and received sixteen votes. A list of the senators voting for each will show the strength of the respective parties in the Senate, at the approaching end of President Jackson's administration; and how signally all the efforts intended to overthrow him bad ended in the discomfiture of their authors, and converted an absolute majority of the whole Senate into a meagre minority of one third. The votes for Colonel Johnson were: Mr. Benton of Missouri; Mr. Black of Mississippi; Mr. Bedford Brown of North Carolina; Mr. Buchanan of Pennsylvania; Mr. Cuthbert of Georgia; Mr. Dana of Maine; Mr. Ewing of Illinois; Mr. Fulton of Arkansas; Mr. Grundy of Tennessee; Mr. Hendricks of Indiana; Mr. Hubbard of Maine; Mr. William Rufus King of Alabama; Mr. John P. Southard of New Jersey; Mr. John S. Spence of Maryland; Mr. Swift of Vermont; Mr. Gideon Tomlinson of Connecticut; Mr. Wall of New Jersey; Mr. Webster. South Carolina did not vote, neither in the person of Mr. Calhoun nor in that of his colleague, Mr. Preston: an omission which could not be attributed to absence or accident, as both were present; nor fail to be remarked and considered ominous in the then temper of the State, and her refusa' to vote in the three preceding presidential elections.

CHAPTER CLIII.

LAST ANNUAL MESSAGE OF PRESIDENT JACKSON.

Ar the opening of the second Session of the twenty-fourth Congress, President Jackson delivered his last Annual Message, and under circumstances to be grateful to his heart. The powerful opposition in Congress had been broken down, and he saw full majorities of ardent . tried friends in each House. We were in per and friendship with all the world, and all end ing questions quieted at home. Industry in its branches was prosperous. The revenue w abundant-too much so. The people were py. His message, of course, was first a recapit lation of this auspicious state of things, at hom and abroad; and then a reference to the que tions of domestic interest and policy which quired attention, and might call for action, the head of these measures stood the depo act of the last session-the act which under insidious and fabulous title of a deposit of surplus of revenue with the States-made actual distribution of that surplus; and was tended by its contrivers to do so. Ilis noti of this measure went to two points-his on regrets for having signed the act, and his m givings in relation to its future observation.

"The consequences apprehended, when deposit act of the last session received a luctant approval, have been measurably realing Though an act merely for the deposit of surplus moneys of the United States in State Treasuries, for safe keeping, until the may be wanted for the service of the gener government, it has been extensively spoken as an act to give the money to the several State and they have been advised to use it as a m without regard to the means of refunding when called for. Such a suggestion has don less been made without a due consideration the obligation of the deposit act, and with a proper attention to the various principal and interests which are affected by it. It manifest that the law itself cannot sanction su a suggestion, and that, as it now stands, States have no more authority to receive use these deposits without intending to retin them, than any deposit bank, or any individu temporarily charged with the safe-keeping application of the public money, would m have for converting the same to their prin use, without the consent and against the will the government. But, independently of violation of public faith and moral obligati which are involved in this suggestion, w examined in reference to the terms of the pr sent deposit act, it is believed that the siderations which should govern the future legislation of Congress on this subject, will equally conclusive against the adoption of a measure recognizing the principles on whi the suggestion has been made.'

This misgiving was well founded. Before on has been made."

ssion was over there was actually a motion to hase the States from their obligation to reeare the money-to lay which motion on the the there were seventy-three resisting votesa atonishing number in itself, and the more os given by the same members, sitting in the me seats, who had voted for the act as a desit a few months before. Such a vote was minous of the fate of the money; and that ke was not long delayed. Akin to this meaere, and in fact the parent of which it was the stard progeny, was distribution itself, under own proper name; and which it was evident ns soon to be openly attempted, encouraged its advocates were by the success gained in deposit act. The President, with his chareristic frankness and firmness, impugned that elley in advance; and deprecated its effects uner every aspect of public and private justice, nd of every consideration of a wise or just olicy. He said:

*To collect revenue merely for distribution the States, would seem to be highly impolitic, not as daugerous as the proposition to retain it the Treasury. The shortest reflection must hisfy every one that to require the people to y taxes to the government merely that they be paid back again, is sporting with the stem which produces such a result can be nected to receive the public countenance. sidual who contributed a portion of the tax ald receive back promptly the same portion. atit is apparent that no system of the kind a ever be enforced, which will not absorb a miderable portion of the money, to be distrited in salaries and commissions to the agents ployed in the process, and in the various see and depreciations which arise from other uses; and the practical effect of such ar atapt must ever be to burden the people with is not for purposes beneficial to them, but swell the profits of deposit banks, and sup-taband of useless public officers. A distrition to the people is impracticable and unjust other respects. It would be taking one man's perty and giving it to another. Such would the unavoidable result of a rule of equality d none other is spoken of, or would be likely headopted), inasmuch as there is no mode by ich the amount of the individual contribuas of our citizens to the public revenue can secrtained. We know that they contribute qually, and a rule therefore that would disbute to them equally, would be liable to all objections which apply to the principle of equal division of property. To make the structure and government the instrument of carrying and receivers in the early part of last summer this odious principle into effect, would be at once to destroy the means of its usefulness, and change the character designed for it by the framers of the constitution."

There was another consideration connected with this policy of distribution which the President did not name, and could not, in the decorum and reserve of an official communication to Congress: it was the intended effect of these distributions-to debauch the people with their own money, and to gain presidential votes by lavishing upon them the spoils of their country. To the honor of the people this intended effect never occurred; no one of those contriving these distributions ever reaching the high object of their ambition. Instead of distribution-instead of raising money from the people to be returned to the people, with all the deductions which the double operation of collecting and dividing would incur, and with the losses which unfaithful agents might indict-instead of that idle and wasteful process, which would have been childish if it had not been vicious, he recommended a reduction of taxes on the comforts and necessaries of life, and the levy of no more money than was necessary for the economical administration of the government; and said:

"In reducing the revenue to the wants of the government, your particular attention is invited to those articles which constitute the necessaries of life. The duty on salt was laid as a war tax, and was no doubt continued to assist in providing for the payment of the war debt. There is no article the release of which from taxation would be felt so generally and so beneficially. To this may be added all kinds of fuel and provisions. Justice and benevolence unite in favor of releasing the poor of our cities from burdens which are not necessary to the support of our government, and tend only to increase the wants of the destitute."

The issuance of the "Treasury Circular" naturally claimed a place in the President's message; and received it. The President gave his reason for the measure in the necessity of saving the public domain from being exchanged for bank paper money, which was not wanted, and might be of little value or use when wanted; and expressed himself thus:

"The effects of an extension of bank credits, and over-issues of bank paper, have been strikingly illustrated in the sales of the public lands. From the returns made by the various registers it was perceived that the receipts arising from the sales of the public lands, were increasing to an unprecedented amount. In effect, however, these receipts amounted to nothing more than credits in bank. The banks lent out their notes to speculators; they were paid to the receivers, and immediately returned to the banks, to be lent out again and again; being mere instruments to transfer to speculators the most valuable public land, and pay the government by a credit on the books of the banks. Those credits on the books of some of the western banks, usually called deposits, were already greatly beyond their immediate means of payment, and were rapidly increasing. Indeed each speculation furnished means for another; for no sooner had one individual or company paid in the notes, than they were immediately lent to another for a like purpose; and the banks were extending their business and their issues so largely, as to alarm considerate men, and render it doubtful whether these bank credits, if permitted to accumulate, would ultimately be of the least value to the government. The spirit of expansion and speculation was not confined to the deposit banks, but pervaded the whole multitude of banks throughout the Union, and was giving rise to new institutions to aggravate the evil. The safety of the public funds, and the interest of the people generally, required that these operations should be checked; and it became the duty of every branch of the general and State governments to adopt all legitimate and proper means to produce that salutary effect. Under this view of my duty, I directed the issuing of the order which will be laid before you by the Secretary of the Treasury, requiring payment for the public lands sold to be made in specie, with an exception until the 15th of the present month, in favor of actual settlers. This measure has produced many salutary consequences. It checked the career of the Western banks, and gave them additional strength in anticipation of the pressure which has since pervaded our Eastern as well as the European commercial cities. By preventing the extension of the credit system, it measurably cut off the means of speculation, and retarded its progress in monopolizing the most valuable of the public lands. It has tended to save the new States from a non-resident proprietorship, one of the greatest obstacles to the advancement of a new country, and the prosperity of an old one. It has tended to keep open the public lands for the entry of emigrants at government prices, instead of their being compelled to purchase of speculators at double or treble prices. And it is conveying into the interior large sums in silver and gold, there to enter permanently into the currency of the country, and place it on a firmer foundation. It is confidently believed that the country will find in the motives which induced that order, and the happy consequences which will have ensued, much to commend and nothing to condemn."

The people were satisfied with the Treasur Circular; they saw its honesty and good effect but the politicians were not satisfied with They thought they saw in it a new exercise illegal power in the President-a new tamperin with the currency-a new destruction of the public prosperity; and commenced an attach upon it the moment Congress met, very mue in the style of the attack upon the order for the removal of the deposits; and with fresh home from the resentment of the "thousand banks whose notes had been excluded, and from the discontent of many members of Congress who schemes of speculation had been balked. As notwithstanding the democratic majorities the two Houses, the attack upon the "Circular had a great success, many members being terested in the excluded banks, and partners schemes for monopolizing the lands. A bill tended to repeal the Circular was actual passed through both Houses; but not in dim terms. That would have been too flagrant. was a bad thing, and could not be fairly dor and therefore gave rise to indirection and am guity of provisions, and complication of phras and a multiplication of amphibologies, whi brought the bill to a very ridiculous conclusion when it got to the hands of General Jacks But of this hereafter.

But as the force of the Indians s aot so far weakened by these partial sucses as to lead them to submit, and as their rage inroads were frequently repeated, early asures were taken for placing at the disposal Governor Call, who, as commander-in-chief the territorial militia, had been temporarily nested with the command, an ample force, for purpose of resuming offensive operations in most efficient manner, so soon as the seuson ould permit. the Bank of the United States was destined receive another, and a parting notice from end Jackson, and greatly to its further disüt, brought upon it by its own lawless and onest course. Its charter had expired, and ad delayed to refund the stock paid for by United States, or to pay the back dividend; and all its subscribers except the United States. to a new corporation, under the same name, created by a provise to a road bill in the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, obtained by bribery, as subsequent legislative investigation proved. This transfer, or transmigration, was a new and most amazing procedure. The metempsychosis of a bank was a novelty which confounded and astounded the senses, and set the wits of Congress to work to find out how it could legally be done. The President, though a goorl lawyer and judge of law, did not trouble himself with legal subtleties and disquisitions. He took the broad, moral, practical, business view of the question; and pronounced it to be dishonest, unlawful, and irresponsible; and recommended to Congress to look after its stock. The message said:

"The conduct and present condition of that bank, and the great amount of capital vested in it by the United States, require your careful attention. Its charter expired on the third day of March last, and it has now no power but that given in the 21st section, to use the corporate name, style, and capacity, for the purpose of suits, for the final settlement and liquidation of the affairs and accounts of the corporation, and for the sale and disposition of their estate, real, personal, and mixed, and not for any other purpose, or in any other manner whatsoever, nor for a period exceeding two years after the expiration of the said term of incorporation.' Before the expiration of the charter, the stockholders of the bank obtained an act of incorporation from the legislature of Pennsylvania, excluding only the United States. Instead of proceeding to wind up their concerns, and pay over to the United States the amount due on account of the stock held by them, the president and directors of the old bank appear to have transferred the books, papers, notes, obligations, and most or all of its property, to this new corporation, which entered upon business as a continuation of the old concern. Amongst other acts of questionable validity, the notes of the expired corporation are known to have been used as its own, and again put in circulation. That the old bank had no right to issue or reissue its notes after the expiration of its charter, cannot be denied; and that it could not confer any such right on its substitute, any more than exercise it i self, is equally plain. In law and honesty, the notes of the bank in circulation, at the expiration of its charter, should have been called in by public advertisement, paid up as presented, and, to-gether with those on hand meelled and destroyed. Their re-issue is sa ned by no law. and warranted by no necessity. If the United States be responsible in their stock for the payhad transferred itself with all its effects, ment of these notes, their re-issue by the new corporation, for their own profit, is a fraud on the government. If the United States is not responsible, then there is no legal responsibility in any quarter, and it is a fraud on the country. They are the redeemed notes of a dissolved partnership, but, contrary to the wishes of the retiring partner, and without his consent, are again re-issued and eliculated. It is the high and peculiar duty of Congress to decide whether any further legislation be necessary for the security of the large amount of public property now held and in use by the new bank, and for vindicating the rights of the government, and compelling a speedy and honest settlement with all the creditors of the old bank, public and pri-vate, or whether the subject shall be left to the power now possessed by the executive and judiciary. It remains to be seen whether the persons, who, as managers of the old bank, un-dertook to control the government, retained the public dividends, shut their doors upon a committee of the House of Representatives, and filled the country with panic to accomplish their own sinister objects, may now, as managers of a new Bank, continue with impunity to flood the country with a spurious currency, use the seven millions of government stock for their own profit, and refuse to the United States all information as to the present condition of their own property, and the prospect of recovering it into their own possession. The lessons taught by the bank of the United States cannot well be lost upon the American people. They will take care never again to place so tremendous a power in irresponsible hands, and it will be fortunate if they seriously consider the consequences which are likely to result on a smaller scale from the facility with which corporate powers are granted by their State government."

This novel and amazing attempt of the bank to transmigrate into the body of another bank with all its effects, was a necessity of its position-the necessity which draws a criminal to even insane acts to prevent the detection, exposure, and ruin from which guilt recoils in not less guilty contrivances. The bank was broken, and could not wind up, and wished to postpone, or by chance avert the dreaded discovery. It was in the position of a glass vase, cracked from top to bottom, and ready to split open if touched, but looking as if whole while sitting unmoved on the shelf. The great bank was in this condition, and therefore untouchable, and saw no resource except in a metempsychosis-a difficult process for a soulless institution-and thereby endeavoring to continue its life without a change of name, form, or substance. The experiment was a catastrophe, as might have been expected beforehand; and as was soon seen afterwards.

The injury resulting to the public serifrom the long delay in making the appropriations at the last session—delayed while occup with distribution bills until the season for lablad well passed away. On this point the magnetic sage said:

Here was one of the evils of dividing the p lic money, and of factious opposition to the p ernment. the message recommended a friendly superion ever the Indian tribes removed to the st of the Mississippl, with the important gration of preventing intestine war by milininterference, as well as improving their conion by all the usual means. On these points, aid:

The national policy, founded alike in interest in humanity, so long and so steadily pursued this government, for the removal of the Inatribes originally settled on this side of the sissippi, to the west of that river, may be to have been consummated by the conclusion the late trea'y with the Cherokees. The sures taken in the execution of that treaty, in relation to our Indian affairs generally, hilly appear by referring to the accompany-papers. Without dwelling on the numerous important topics embraced in them, I again it your attention to the importance of proing a well-digested and comprehensive system the protection, supervision and improvement he various tribes now planted in the Indian ir. The suggestions submitted by the missioner of Indian affairs, and enforced by scretary, on this subject, and also in regard he establishment of additional military posts be Indian country, are entitled to your prod consideration. and duty to ourselves. Such wars are nothing but massacres, assassinations and confiscations. The stronger party oppress a hated, or feared minority or chief; and slay with impunity (in some of the tribes), where the assumption of a form of government, modelled after that of the white race, for which they have no capacity, gives the justification of executions to what is nothing but revenge and assassination. Under their own ancient laws, of blood for blood and for the slain to avenge the wrong, this liability of personal responsibility restrained the killings to cases of public justifiable necessity. Since the removal of that responsibility, revenge, ambition, plunder, take their course: and the consequence is a series of assassinations which have been going on for a long time; and still continue. To aggravate many of these massacres, and to give their victims a stronger claim upon the protection of the United States, they are done upon those who are friends to the United States, upon accusations of having betrayed the interest of the tribe in some treaty for the sale of lands. The United States claim jurisdiction over their country, and exercise it in the punishment of some classes of criminals; and it would be good to extend it to the length recommended by President Jackson.

The message would have been incomplete without a renewal of the standing recommendation to take the presidential election out of the hands of intermediate bodies, and give it directly to the people. He carnestly urged an amendment to the constitution to that effect; but that remedy being of slow, difficult, and doubtful attainment, the more speedy process by the action of the people becomes the more necessary. Congressional caucuses were put down by the people in the election of 1824: their substitute and successor-national conventions-ruled by a minority, and managed by intrigue and corruption. are about as much worse than a Congress caucus as Congress itself would be if the members appointed, or contrived the appointment, of themselves, instead of being elected by the people. The message appropriately concluded with thanks to the people for the high honors to which they had lifted him, and their support under arduous circumstances, and said:

"Having now finished the observations deem ad proper on this, the last occasion I shall have of communicating with the two Houses of Comgress at their meeting, I cannot omit an expression of the gratitude which is due to the great body of my fellow citizens, in whose partiality and indulgence I have found encouragement and support in the many difficult and trying scenes through which it has been my lot to pass during my public career. Though deeply sensible that my exertions have not been crowned with a success corresponding to the degree of favor bestowed upon me, I am sure that they will be considered as having been directed by an earnest desire to promote the good of my country; and I am consoled by the persuasion that whatever errors have been committed will find a corrective in the intelligence and patriotism of those who will succeed us. All that has occurred during my administration is calculated to inspire me with increased confidence in the stability of our institutions, and should I be spared to enter uppon that retirement which is so suitable to my age and infirm health, and so much desired by me in other respects, I shall not cease to invoke that beneficent Being to whose providence we are already so signally indebted for the continuance of his blessings on our beloved country."

CHAPTER CLIV.

FINAL REMOVAL OF THE INDIANS.

At the commencement of the annual session of 1836-'37, President Jackson had the gratification to make known to Congress the completion of the long-pursued policy of removing all the Indians in the States, and within the organized territories of the Union, to their new homes west of the Mississippi. It was a policy commencing with Jefferson, pursued by all succeeding Presidents, and accomplished by Jackson. The Creeks and Cherokees had withdrawn from Georgia and Alabama; the Chickasaws and Choctaws from Mississippi and Alabama; the Seminoles had stipulated to remove from Florida; Louisiana, Arkansas and Missouri had all been relieved of their Indian population; Kentucky and Tennessee, by earlier treaties with the Chickasaws, had received the same advantage. This freed the slave States from an obstacle to their growth and prosperity, and left them free to expand, and to cultivate, to the full measure of their ample boundaries. All the free Atlantic States had long been relieved from their Indian populations, and in this respect the northern and southern States were now upon an equality. The result has been done, constituting, as they did, a large mi be, beneficial to both parties; and still more to the Indians than to the whites. With the it was a question of extinction, the time on the debatable point. They were daily waste under contact with the whites, and had before their eyes the eventual but certain fate of hundreds of tribes found by the early colonic on the Roanoke, the James River, the Potom the Susquehannah, the Delaware, the Conne cut, the Merrimac, the Kennebec and the P. obscot. The removal saved the southern tril from that fate; and in giving them new unmolested homes beyond the verge of white man's settlement, in a country temper in climate, fertile in soil, adapted to agricula and to pasturage, with an outlet for hunti abounding with salt water and salt springsleft them to work out in peace the problem Indian civilization. To all the relieved & the removal of the tribes within their bond was a great benefit-to the slave States in cendently and inappreciably great. The large tribes were within their limits, and the best their lands in the hands of the Indians, to extent, in some of the States, as Georgia bama and Mississippl, of a third or a quarte their whole area. I have heretofore shear the case of the Creeks and the Cheroken Georgia, that the ratification of the treaties the extinction of Indian claims within her its, and which removed the tribes which en bered her, received the cordial support of me ern senators; and that, in fact, without support these great objects could not have accomplished. I have now to say the all the other slave States. They were a lieved in like manner. Chickasaws and (taws in Mississippi and Alabama: Chiefe claims in Tennessee and Kentucky; Semin in Florida; Caddos and Quapaws in Louis and in Arkansas; Kickapoos, Delawares, S nees, Osages, Iowas, Pinkeshaws, Weas, orias, in Missouri; all underwent the same cess, and with the came support and m Northern votes, in the Senate, came to the cation of every treaty, and to the passa every necessary appropriation act in the H of Representatives. I that in the case of the Creek treaty and the brokee treaty, for the removal of these tribes m Georgia; and showed that the North was mimous in one case, and nearly so in the het, while in both treaties there was a southpopposition, and in one of them (the Cheroboth Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Clay in the stire: and these instances may stand for an stration of the whole. And thus the area of repopulation has been almost doubled in the m States, by sending away the Indians to make m for their expansion; and it is unjust and wi-unjust and cruel in itself, independent of motive-to charge these Northern States tha design to abolish slavery in the South. they had harbored such design-if they had merely unfriendly to the growth and prosrit of these Southern States, there was an way to have gratified their feelings, withcommitting a breach of the constitution, or aggression or encroachment upon these us: they had only to sit still and vote inst the ratification of the treatles, and the etment of the laws which effected this great oral. They did not do so-did not sit still rote against their Southern brethren. On mutrary, they stood up and spoke aloud, and to these laws and treaties an effective and support. And I, who was the Senate's man of the committee of Indian affairs at time, and know how these things were done, who was so thankful for northern help at time; I, who know the truth and love jusand cherish the harmony and union of the rican people, feel it to be my duty and my ilege to note this great act of justice from the th to the South, to stand in history as a perd contradiction of all imputed design in the States to abolish slavery in the slave States. nk of States, not of individuals or societies. have shown that this policy of the unidremoval of the Indians from the East to West of the Mississippi originated with Mr. rson, and from the most humane motives, her having seen the extinction of more than tribes in his own State of Virginia; and been followed up under all subsequent adtrations. With General Jackson it was nothing but the continuation of an established policy, but one in which he heartily concurred, and of which his local position and his experience made him one of the safest of judges; but, like every other act of his administration, it was destined to obloquy and opposition, and to misrepresentations, which have survived the object of their creation, and gone into history. He was charged with injustice to the Indians, in not protecting them against the laws and jurisdiction of the States; with cruelty, in driving them away from the hones of their fathers; with robbery, in taking their lands for paltry considerations. Parts of the tribes were excited to resist the execution of the trenties, and it even became necessary to send troops and distinguished generals-Scott to the Cherokees, Jesup to the Creeks-to effect their removal; which, by the mildness and steadiness of these generals, and according to the humane spirit of their orders, was eventually accomplished without the aid of force. The outcry raised against General Jackson, on account of these measures, reached the ears of the French traveller and writer on American democracy (De Tocqueville), then sojourning among us and collecting materials for his work, and induced him to write thus in his chapter 18:

"The ejectment of the Indians very often takes place, at the present day, in a regular, and, as it were, legal manner. When the white population begins to approach the limit of a desert inhabited by a savage tribe, the government of the United States usually dispatches envoys to them, who assemble the Indians in a large plain, and having first eaten and drunk with them, accost them in the following manner: 'What have you to do in the land of your fathers? Before long you must dig up their bones in order to live. In what respect is the country you inhabit better than another? Are there no woods, marshes or prairies, except where you dwell? and can you live nowhere but under your own sun? Beyond those mountains, which you see at the horizon—beyond the lake which bounds your territory on the west-there lie vast countries where beasts of chase are found in great abundance. Sell your lands to us, and go and live happily in those solitudes.'

"After holding this language, they pread before the eyes of the Indians fire-arms, woollen garments, kegs of brandy, glass necklaces, bracelets of tinsel, car-rings, and looking-glasses. If, when they have beheld all these riches, they still hesitate, it is insinuated that they have not the means of refusing their required consent.

and that the government itself will not long have the power of protecting them in their rights. What are they to do? Half convinced, half compelled, they go to inhabit new deserts, where the importunate whites will not permit them to remain ten years in tranquillity. In this manner do the Americans obtain, at a very low price, whole provinces, which the richest sovereigns in Europe could not purchase."

The Grecian Plutarch deemed it necessary to reside forty years in Rome, to qualify himself to write the lives of some Roman citizens; and then made mistakes. European writers do not deem it necessary to reside in our country at all in order to write our history. A sojourn of some months in the principal towns-a rapid flight along some great roads-the gossip of the steamboat, the steam-car, the stage-coach, and the hotel-the whispers of some earwigs-with the reading of the daily papers and the periodicals, all more or less engaged in partisan warfareand the view of some debates, or scene, in Congress, which may be an exception to its ordinary decorum and intelligence: these constitute a modern European traveller's qualifications to write American history. No wonder that they commit mistakes, even where the intent is honest. And no wonder that Mons. de Tocqueville, with admitted good intentions, but with no "forty years" residence among us, should be no exception to the rule which condemns the travelling European writer of American history to the compilation of facts manufactured for partisan effect, and to the invention of reasons supplied from his own fancy. I have already had occasion, several times, to correct the errors of Mons. de Tocqueville. It is a compliment to him, implicative of respect, and by no means extended to others, who err more largely, and of purpose, but less harmfully. His error in all that he has here written is profound! and is injurious, not merely to General Jackson, to whom his mistakes apply, but to the national character, made up as it is of the acts of individuals; and which character it is the duty of every American to cherish and exalt in all that is worthy, and to protect and defend from all unjust imputation. It was in this sense that I marked this passage in De Tocqueville for refutation as soon as his book appeared, and took steps to make the contradiction (so far as the alleged robbery and cheating of the Indians was concerned) authentic and complete, and as pub- United States, and by the United States

To s, the whole net amount for w ry sold under the land system of ates, and by the United States

feers, three millions of dollars for six and bree-quarter millions of acres, being the way is nation chose to dispose of it. Here are fix-six millions to four tribes, leaving thirty millions to go to the small tribes whose names are unknown to history, and which it is probable to writer on American democracy had never learl of when sketching the picture of their facied oppressions.

I will attend to the case of these small regote tribes, and say that, besides their proporin of the remaining thirty-six millions of blars, they received a kind of compensation nited to their condition, and intended to induct em into the comforts of civilized life. Of see I will give one example, drawn from a aty with the Osages, in 1839; and which was ly in addition to similar benefits to the same the, in previous treatics, and which were exaded to all the tribes which were in the huntstate. These benefits were, to these Osages, o blacksmith's shops, with four blacksmiths, ith five hundred pounds of iron and sixty rands of steel annually; a grist and a saw il with millers for the same; 1,000 cows and ires; two thousand breeding swine; 1,000 hughs; 1,000 sets of horse-gear; 1,000 axes; 000 hoes; a house each for ten chiefs, costing hundred dollars apiece; to furnish these ies with six good wagons, sixteen carts, enty-eight yokes of oxen, with yokes and chain; to pay all claims for injuries comitted by the tribe on the white people, or on er Indians, to the amount of thirty thousand lars; to purchase their reserved lands at two lars per acre; three thousand dollars to reburse that aum for so much deducted from irannuity, in 1825, for property taken from whites, and since returned; and, finally, e thousand dollars more for an imputed ongful withholding of that amount, for the e reason, in the annuity payment of the r 1829. In previous treaties, had been given grains, and seed vegetables, with fruit seeds fruit trees; domestic fowls; laborers to igh up their ground and to make their fences, nise crops and to save them, and teach the has how to farm; with spinning, weaving, sewing implements, and persons to show ruse. Now, all this was in one single treawith an inconsiderable tribe, which had been ely provided for in the same way in six different previous treaties! And all the rude tribes—those in the hunting state, or just emerging from it—were provided for in the same manner, the object of the United States being to train them to agriculture and pasturage—to conduct them from the hunting to the pastoral and agricultural state; and for that purpose, and in addition to all other benefits, are to be added the support of schools, the encouragement of missionaries, and a small annual contribution to religious societies who take charge of their civilization.

Besides all this, the government keeps up a large establishment for the special care of the Indians, and the management of their affairs; a special bureau, presided over by a commissioner at Washington City; superintendents in different districts; agents, sub-agents, and interpreters, resident with the tribe; and all charged with seeing to their rights and interests-seeing that the laws are observed towards them; that no injuries are done them by the whites; that none but licensed traders go among them; that nothing shall be bought from them which is necessary for their comfort, nor any thing sold to them which may be to their detriment. Among the prohibited articles are spirits of all kinds; and so severe are the penalties on this head, that forfeiture of the license, forfeiture of the whole cargo of goods, forfeiture of the penalty of the bond, and immediate suit in the nearest federal court for its recovery, expulsion from the Indian country, and disability for ever to acquire another license, immediately follow every breach of the laws for the introduction of the smallest quantity of any kind of spirits. How unfortunate, then, in M. de Tocqueville to write, that kegs of brandy are spread before the Indians to induce them to sell their lands! How unfortunate in representing these purchases to be made in exchange for woollen garments, glass necklaces, tinsel bracelets, ear-rings, and looking-glasses I What a picture this assertion of his makes by the side of the eighty-five millions of dollars at that time actually paid to those Indians for their lands, and the long and large list of agricultural articles and implements-long and large list of domestic animals and fowls-the ample supply of mills and shops, with mechanics to work them and teach their use-the provisions for schools and missionaries, for building fences and houses-which are found in the Osage treaty quoted, and which are to be found, more or less, in every treaty with every tribe emerging from the hunter state. The fact is, that the government of the United States has made it a fixed policy to cherish and protect the Indians, to improve their condition, and turn them to the habits of civilized life; and great is the wrong and injury which the mistake of this writer has done to our national character abroad, in representing the United States as cheating and robbing these children of the forest.

But Mons. de Tocqueville has quoted names and documents, and particular instances of imposition upon Indians, to justify his picture; and in doing so has committed the mistakes into which a stranger and sojourner may easily fall. He cites the report of Messrs. Clark and Cass, and makes a wrong application-an inverted application-of what they reported. They were speaking of the practices of disorderly persons in trading with the Indians for their skins and furs. They were reporting to the government an abuse, for correction and punishment. They were not speaking of United States commissioners, treating for the purchase of lands, but of individual traders, violating the laws. They were themselves those commissioners and superintendents of Indian affairs, and governors of Territories, one for the northwest, in Michigan, the other for the far west, in Missouri; and both noted for their justice and humanity to the Indians, and for their long and careful administration of their affairs within their respective superintendencies. Mons. de Tocqueville has quoted their words correctly, but with the comical blunder of reversing their application, and applying to the commissioners themselves, in their land negotiations for the government, the cheateries which they were denouncing to the government, in the illicit traffic of lawless traders. This was the comic blunder of a stranger: yet this is to appear as American history in Europe, and to be translated into our own language at home, and commended in a preface and notes.

This order grew out of the contest to hich I have referred. It was issued not by sadvice of Congress or under the sanction of ylaw. It was delayed until Congress was in out of the city, and all possibility of inter-mace by legislation was removed; and then ant forth this new and last expedient. It was that these funds, received for public at, had become a chief source of revenue, and may have occurred to some that the passage i treasury order of this kind would have a seency to embarrass the country; and as the for the regulation of the deposits had just sed the public might be brought to believe at all the mischief occasioned by the order s the effect of the distribution bill. It has, seed happened, that this scheme has failed; public understand it rightly, but that was newas devised. It was not then foreseen that people would as generally see through the arrivance as it has since been found that they There may have been various other motives th led to the measure. Many minds were wally to be consulted; for it is not to be premed that a step like this was taken without sultation, and guided by the will of a single bridual alone. That is not the way in which the things are done. No doubt one effect red for by some was, that a check would be to the sales of the public lands. The opetion of the order would naturally be, to raise price of land by raising the price of the curey in which it was to be paid for. But, while would be the effect on small buyers, those purchased on a large scale would be enato sell at an advance of ten or fifteen per over what would have been given if the ited States lands had been open to purchasers the ordinary way. Those who had borrowed mey of the deposit banks and paid it out for it would thus be enabled to make sales to untage; and by means of such sales make ment to the banks who found it necessary all in their large loans, in order to meet the isions of the deposit bill. The order, therewas likely to operate to the common benefit the deposit banks and the great land dealers, le it counteracted the effect of the obnoxious sit bill. There may have been yet another tire actuating some of those who devised this There was danger that the deposit banks, called upon to refund the public treasure ld be unable to do it: Indeed, it was said his floor that the immediate effect of the ribution bill would be to break those banks. this treasury order would operate to collect the specie of the country into the land offices, whence it would immediately go into the deposit banks, and would prove an acceptable aid to them while making the transfers required by law. These seem to me to have been among the real motives which led to the adoption of that order."

Mr. Ewing then argued at length against the legality of the treasury circular, quoting the joint resolution of 1816, and insisting that its provisions had been violated; also insisting on the largeness of the surplus, and that it had turned out to be much larger than was admitted by the friends of the administration; which latter assertion was in fact true, because the appropriations for the public service (the bills for which were in the hands of the opposition members) had been kept off till the middle of the summer, and could not be used; and so left some fifteen millions in the treasury of appropriated money which fell under the terms of the deposit act, and became divisible as surplus.

Mr. Benton replied to Mr. 1 ing, saying:

"In the first of these object the present movement is twin brother to the mous resolution of 1833, but without its boldness; for that resolution declared its object upon its face, while this one eschews specification, and insidiously seeks a judgment of condemnation by inference and argument. In the second of these objects every body will recognize the great design of the second branch of the same famous resolution of 1833, which, in the restoration of the deposits to the Bank of the United States, clearly went to the establishment of the paper system, and its supremacy over the federal government. The present movement, therefore, is a second edition of the old one, but a lame and impotent affair compared to that. Then, we had a magnificent panie; now, nothing but a miserable starveling! For though the letter of the president of the Bank of the United States announced, early in November, that the meeting of Congress was the time for the new distress to become intense, yet we are two weeks deep in the session, and no distress memorial, no distress deputation, no distress committees, to this hour! Nothing, in fact, in that line, but the distress speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Ewing]; so that the new panic of 1836 has all the signs of being a lean and slender affair-a mere church-mouse concern—a sort of dwarf-ish, impish imitation of the gigantic spectre which stalked through the land in 1833."

Mr. Benton then showed that this subaltern and Lilliputian panic was brought upon the stage in the same way, and by the same managers, with its gigantic brother of 1832-'34; and quoted from a published letter of Mr. Biddle in November preceding, and a public speech of Mr. Clay in the month of September preceding, in which they gave out the programme for the institution of the little panic; and the proceeding against the President for violating the laws; and against the treasury order itself as the cause of the new distress. Mr. Biddle in his publication said: "Our pecuniary condition seems to be a strange anomaly. When Congress adjourned, it left the country with abundant crops, and high prices for them-with every branch of industry flourishing, and with more specie than we ever had before-with all the elements of universal prosperity. None of these have undergone the slightest change; yet, after a few months, Congress will re-assemble, and find the whole country suffering intense pecuniary distress. The occasion of this, and the remedy for it, will occupy our thoughts. In my judgment, the main cause of it is the mismanagement of the revenue-mismanagement in two respects: the mode of executing the distribution law, and the order requiring specie for the payment of the public lands-an act which seems to me a most wanton abuse of power, if not a flagrant usurpation. The remedy follows the causes of the evils. The first measure of relief, therefore, should be the instant repeal of the treasury order requiring specie for lands; the second, the adoption of a proper system to execute the distribution law. These measures would restore confidence in twenty-four hours, and repose in at least as many days. If the treasury will not adopt them voluntarily, Congress should immediately command it," This was the recommendation, or mandate, of the president of the Bank of the United States, still acting as a part of the national legislative power even in its new transformation, and keeping an eye upon that distribution which Congress passed as a deposit, which he had recommended as raising the price of the State stocks held by the bank; and the delay in the delivery of which he considers as one of the causes which bad brought on the new distress. Mr. Clay in his Lexington speech had taken the same grounds; and speaking of the continued tampering with the currency by the administration, went on to say:

"One rash, lawless, and crude experiment right of the Secretary to order the collects succeeds another. He considered the late treatobe made in either of the four media ments sury order, by which all payments for public lands ed. That the resolution is not mandatory

That resolution required and directed the Secretary of Treasury to dopt such measures as he mis deem necessiry, to cause, as soon as may all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, cruing or becoming payable to the United State to be collected and paid in the legal currency the United States, or treasury notes, or no of the Bank of the United States, as by law prided and declared, or in notes of banks whi are payable and paid on demand, in said le currency of the United States.' Mr. Benton replied to the arguments of a Ewing, the letter of Mr. Biddle, and the spee of Mr. Clay; and considered them all as idea cal, and properly answered in the lump, with special reference to the co-operating assailar On the point of the alleged illegality of treasury order, he produced the Joint Resoltion of 1816 under which it was done; and the said:

for of any one of the four, is obvious from the maner in which the notes of the Bank of the laid States are mentioned. They were to be neived as then provided for by law; for the hak charter had then just passed; and the 14th ction had provided for the reception of the ses of this institution until Congress, by law, heald direct otherwise. The right of the inintion to deliver its notes in payment of the grenue, was anterior to this resolution, and almounts, san anterior to this resolution, and al-nys held under that 14th section, never under signit resolution, and when that section was graid at the last session of this Congress, that felt was admitted to be gone, and has never her chimed since. The words of the en claimed since. The words of the law are ar; the practice under it has been uniform duninterrupted from the date of its passage the present day. For twenty years, and un-tribree Presidents, all the Secretaries of the masury have acted alike. Each has made sections, permitting the notes of some speciearing banks to be received, and forbidding hers. Mr. Crawford did it in numerous intances; and fierce and universal as were the tacks upon that eminent patriot, during the residential canvass of 1824, no human being er thought of charging him with illegality in is respect. Mr. Rush twice made similar sedions, during the administration of Mr. Adams, d no one, either in the same cabinet with him, out of the cabinet against him, ever complainof it. Having vindicated the treasury order from charge of illegality, Mr. Benton took up the d of the new distress, and said:

The news of all this approaching calamity given out in advance in the Kentucky sch and the Philadelphia letter, already remed to; and the fact of its positive advent dectual presence was vouched by the senator m Ohio [Mr. Ewing] on the last day that the ute was in session. I do not permit myself id Mr. P.) to bandy contradictory asseveraas and debatable assertions across this floor. hoose rather to make an issue, and to test ruon by the application of evidence. In this y lwill proceed at present. I will take the er of the president of the Bank of the United te as being official in this case, and most auntative in the distress department of this com-

national calamity in December; and after charging part of this ruin and mischief on the mode of executing what he ostentatiously styles the distribution law, when there is no such law in the country, he goes on to charge the remainder, being ten-fold more than the former upon the Treasury order which excludes paper money from the land offices."

Mr. Benton then read Mr. Biddle's description of the new distress, which, in his publication was awful and appalling, but which, he said, was nowhere visible except in the localities where the bank had power to make it. It was a picture of woc and ruin, but not without hope and remedy if Congress followed his directions; in the mean time he thus instructed the country how to behave, and promised his co-operationthat of the bank-in the overthrow of President Jackson, and his successor, Mr. Van Buren (for that is what he meant in this passage):

"In the mean time, all forbearance and calmness should be maintained. There is great reason for anxiety-none whatever for alarm; and with mutual confidence and courage, the country may yet be able to defend itself against the government. In that struggle my own poor efforts shall not be wanting. I go for the country, whoever rules it. I go for the country best loved when worst governed-and it will afford me far more gratification to assist in repairing wrongs, than to triumph over those who inflict them."

This pledge of aid in a struggle with the government was a key to unlock the meaning of the movements then going on to produce the general suspension of specie payments in all the banks which saluted the administration of Mr. Van Buren in the first quarter of its existence, and was intended to produce it in its first month. Considering specie payments as the only safety of the country, and foreseeing the general bank explosions, chiefly contrived by the Bank of the United States, which was to re-appear in the ruin, and claim its re-establishment as the only remedy for the evils which itself and its confederates created, Mr. Benton said:

"There is no safety for the federal revenues but in the total exclusion of local paper, and that from every branch of the revenue—customs, lands, and post office. There is no safety for the national finances but in the constitutional medium of gold and silver. After forty years of wandering in the wilderness of paper money, we have approached the confines of the constid movement against President Jackson. He tutional medium. Seventy-five millions of specie ounces, in November, the forthcoming of the in the country, with the prospect of annual increase of ten or twelve millions for the next four years; three branch mints to commence next spring, and the complete restoration of the gold currency; announce the success of President Jackson's great measures for the reform of the currency and vindicate the constitution from the libel of having prescribed an impracticable currency. The success is complete; and there is no way to thwart it, but to put down the treasury order, and to re-open the public lands to the inundation of paper money. Of this, it is not to be dissembled, there is great danger. Four deeply interested classes are at work to do itspeculators, local banks, United States Bank, and politicians out of power. They may succeed but he (Mr. B.) would not despair. The darkest hour of night is just before the break of day; and, through the gloom ahead, he saw the bright vision of the constitutional currency erect, radiant, and victorious. Through regulation, or explosion, success must eventually come. If reform measures go on, gold and silver will be gradually and temperately restored; if reform measures are stopped, then the paper system runs riot, and explodes from its own expansion. Then the Bank of the United States will exult in the catastrophe, and claim its own re-establishment, as the only adequate regulator of the local banks. Then it will be said the specie experiment has failed! But no; the contrary will be known, that the specie experiment has not failed, but it was put down by the voice and power of the interested classes, and must be put up again by the voice and power of the disinterested community."

This was uttered in December 1836: in April 1837 it was history.

Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, replied to Mr. Benton; and said:

"The senator from Missouri had exhibited a table, the results of which he had pressed with a very triumphant air. Was it extraordinary that the deposit banks should be strengthened? The effect of the order went directly to sustain them. But it was at the expense of all the other banks of the country. Under this order, all the specie was collected and carried into their vaults: an operation which went to disturb and embarrass the general circulation of the country, and to produce that pecuniary difficulty which was felt in all quarters of the Union. Mr. C. did not profess to be competent to judge how far the whole of this distress was attributable to the operation of the treasury order, but of this at least he was very sure, through a great part of the Western country, it was universally attributed to that cause. The senator from Missouri supposed that the order had produced no part of this pressure. If not, he would ask what it had produced? Had it increased the specie in the country? Had it increased the specie in actual and general circulation? If it had done no evil, what good had it done? This, he believed was as yet undiscovered. So far it had operated at all, it had been to dere the state of the currency, and to give it a dim tion inverse to the course of business, honorable senator, however, could not see hi moving money across a street could operate affect the currency; and seemed to suppose the moving money from west to east, or from a to west, would have as little effect. Mr. Webster also replied to Mr. Benton, in elaborate speech, in which, before arguing legal question, he said: s as yet undiscovered. ter also replied to Mr. Benton, in eech, in which, before arguing t n, he said:

The honorable member from Missouri (Mr. aton) objects even to giving the resolution to gind a second reading. He avails himself of right, though it be not according to general grice, to arrest the progress of the measure is first stage. This, at least, is open, bold, manly warfare. It is preely on these general and long-known opinions the rests his support of the treasury order. question, therefore, is at once raised between gentleman's principles and opinions on the blief of the cur bject of the co-y, and the principles and mons which ha generally prevailed in the mtry, and which are, and have been, entirely posite to his. That question is now about to put to the vote of the Senate. In the proes and by the termination of this discussion, shall learn whether the gentleman's sentints are or are not to prevail, so far, at least, the Senate is concerned. The country will sice, I am sure, to see some declaration of the mions of Congress on a subject about which much has been said, and which is so well callated, by its perpetual agitation, to disquiet disturb the confidence of society.

'We are now fast approaching the day when e administration goes out of office, and an-er is to come in. The country has an intetin learning, as soon as possible, whether the administration, while it receives the power d patronage, is to inherit, also, the topics and projects of the past; whether it is to keep the avowal of the same objects and the same emes, especially in regard to the currency. the face of it, perpetual. And are those notions of an exclusive specie currency, and opposition to all banks, on which it is defended, to be espoused and maintained by the new administration, as they have been by its predecessor? These are questions, not of mere curiosity, but of the highest interest to the whole country. In considering this order, the first thing naturally is, to look for the causes which led to it, or are assigned for its promulgation. And these, on the face of the order itself, are declared to be 'complaints which have been made of frauds, speculations, and monopolies, in the purchase of the public lands, and the aid which is said to be given to effect these objects, by excessive bank credits, and dangerous, if not partial, facilities through bank drafts and bank deposits, and the general evil influence likely to result to the public interest, and especially the safety of the great amount of money in the trea sury, and the sound condition of the currency of the country, from the further exchange of the national domain in this manner, and chiefly for bank c edits and paper money.

"This is the catalogue of evils to be cured by this order. In what these frauds consist, what are the monopolies complained of, or what is precisely intended by these injurious speculations, we are not informed. All is left on the general surmise of fraud, speculation, and monopoly. It is not avowed or intimated that the government has sustained any loss, either by the receipt of the bank notes which proved not to be equivalent to specie, or in any other way. And it is not a little remarkable that these evils, of fraud, speculation, and monopoly, should have

ne so enormous and so notorious, on the of July, as to require this executive interference for their suppression, and yet that they should not have reached such a height as to make it proper to lay the subject before Congress, although Congress remained in session until within seven days of the date of the order. And what makes this circumstance still more remarkable, is the fact that, in his annual message, at the commencement of the same session, the President had speken of the rapid sales of the public lands as one of the most gratifying proofs of the general prosperity of the country, without suggesting that any danger whatever was to be apprehended from fraud, speculation, or monopoly. His words were: 'Among the evidences of the increasing prosperity of the country, not the least gratifying, is that afforded by the receipts from the sales of the public lands, which amount, in the present year, to the unexpected sum of eleven millions. From the time of the delivery of that message, down to the date of the treasury order, there had not been the least change, so far as I know, or so far as we are informed, in the manner of receiving payment for the public lands. Every thing stood, on the 11th of July, 1836, as it had stood at the opening of the session, in December, 1835. of the land and the rule of the treasury, How so different a view of things happened to be taken at the two periods, we may be able to learn, perhaps, in the further progress of this debate.

"The order speaks of the 'evil influence' likely to result from the further exchange of the public lands into 'paper money.' Now, this is the very language of the gentleman from Missouri. He habitually speaks of the notes of all banks, however solvent, and however promptly their notes may be redeemed in gold and silver, as 'paper money.' The Secretary has adopted the honorable member's phrases, and he speaks, too, of all the bank notes received at the land offices, although every one of them is redeemable in specie, on demand, but as so much 'paper money.' In this respect, also, sir, I hope we may know more as we grow older, and be able to learn whether, in times to come, as in times recently passed, the justly obnoxious and odious character of 'paper money' is to be applied to the issues of all the banks in all the States, with whatever punctuality they redeem their bills. This is quite new, as financial language. By paper money, in its obnoxious sense, I understand paper issues on credit alone, without capital, without funds assigned for its payment, resting only on the good faith and the future ability of those who issue it. Such was the paper money of our revolutionary times; and such, perhaps, may have been the true character of the paper of particular institutions since. But the notes of banks of competent capitals, limited in amount to a due proportion to such capitals, made payable on demand in gold and silver, and always so paid on demand, are paper money in no sense but one; that is to say, they are made of paper, and they circulate as money. And it may be proper enough for those who maintain that nothing should so circulate but gold and silver, to denominate such bank notes 'paper moncy,' since they regard them but as paper intruders into channels which should flow only with gold and silver. If this language of the order is authentic, and is to be so hereafter, and all bank notes are to be regarded and stigmatized as mere 'paper money,' the sooner the country knows it the better.

"The member from Missouri charges those who wish to rescind the treasury order with two objects: first, to degrade and disgrace the President; and, next, to overthrow the constitutional currency of the country. For my own part, sir, I denounce nobody; I seek to degrade or disgrace nobody. Holding the order illegal and unwise, I shall certainly vote to rescind it; and, in the discharge of this duty, I hope I am not expected to shrink back, lest I might do something which might call in question the wisdom of the Secretary, or even of the President. And I hope that so much of independence as may be manifested by free discussion and an honest vote is not to cause denunciation from any quarter. If it should, let it come."

should, therefore, speak against it, and hald direct his attention to the bill reported the Public Land Committee, which had so changed the character of the proceeding this subject. The recision of the treasury elet was introduced a resolution-it went out molution-but it came back a bill, and a bill regulate, not the land office receipts only, but the receipts of the federal government; and this new form is to become statute law, and hw to operate on all the revenues, and to reall other laws upon the subject to which it lated. In this new form it assumes an imof considering the bill reported the stance, and acquires an effect, infinitely bead a resolution, and becomes in fact, as well in name, a totally new measure. Mr. B. minded the Senate that he had, in his first ech on this subject, given it as his opinion, two main objects were proposed to be acmplished by the rescinding resolution; first, implied condemnation of President Jackson riolating the laws and constitution, and deroying the prosperity of the country; and, seally, the imposition of the paper currency of States upon the federal government. With ect to the first of these objects, he presumed was fully proved by the speeches of all the position senators who had spoken on this subat; and, with respect to the second, he bered it would find its proof in the change which original resolution had undergone, and the mit was now assuming of statute law, and exially with the proviso which was added at end of the second section. Mr. B. then took up the bill reported by the > gy, not in the spirit of verbal criticism, but the spirit of candid objection and fair argunt. There were cases in which words were gs, and this was one of those cases. Money sa thing, and the only words in the constitunof that thing were, "gold and silver coin." ebill of the committee was systematically dusive of the words which meant this thing, dused words which included things which e not money. These words w. ..., then, a subject of objection and argument, because went to set aside the money of the constiion, and to admit the public revenues to be d in something which was not money. The e of the bill uses the word "funds." It pro-es to designate the funds receivable for the

revenues of the United States. Upon this word Mr. B. had remarked before, as being one of the most indefinite in the English language; and, so far from signifying money only, even paper money only, that it comprehended every variety of paper security, public or private, individual or corporate out of which money could be raised. The retention of this word by the committee, after the objections made to it, were indicative of their intentions to lay open the federal treasury to the reception of something which was not constitutional money; and this intention, thus disclosed in the title to the bill, was fully carried out in its enactments. The words "legal currency of the United States" are twice used in the first section, when the words "gold and silver" would have been more appropriate and more definite, if hard money was intended.

Mr. B. admitted that, in the eye of a regular bred constitutional lawyer, legal currency might imply constitutional currency; but certain it was that the common and popular meaning of the phrase was not limited to constitutional money, but included every currency that the statute law made receivable for debts. Thus, the notes of the Bank of the United States were generally considered as legal currency, because receivable by law in payment of public dues; and in like manner the notes of all specie-paying banks would, under the committee's bill, rise to the dignity of legal currency. The second section of the bill twice used the word "cash;" a word which, however understood at the Bank of England, where it always means ready money, and where ready money signifies gold coin in hand, yet with the banks with which we have to deal it has no such meaning, but includes all sorts of current paper money on hand, as well as gold and silver on hand.

Having remarked upon the phraseology of the bill, and shown that a paper currency composed of the notes of a thousand local banks, not only might become the currency of the federal government, but was evidently intended to be made its currency; and that in the face of all the protestations of the friends of the administration in favor of re-establishing the national gold currency, Mr. B. would now take up the bill of the committee under two or three other aspects, and show it to be as mistaken in its design as it wor ! be impotent in its effect. In the first place, it transferred the business of suppressing the small note circulation from the deposit branch to the collecting branch of the public revenue. At present, the business was in a course of progress through the deposit banks, as a condition of holding the public moneys; and, as such, had a place in the deposit act of the last session, and also had a place in the President's message of the last session, where the suppression of paper currency under twenty dollars was expressly referred to the action of the deposit banks, and as a condition of their retaining the public deposits. It was through the deposit banks, and not through the reception of local bank paper, that the suppression of small notes should be effected. In the next place, he objected to the committee's bill. because it proposed to make a bargain with each of the thousand banks now in the United States, and the hundreds more which will soon be born; and to give them a right—a right by law—to have their notes received at the federal treasury. He was against such a bargain. He had no idea os making a contract with these thousand banks for the reception of their notes. He had no idea of contracting with them, and giving them a right to plead the constitution of the United States against us, if, at any time, after having agreed to receive their notes, upon condition that they would give up their small circulation, they should choose to say we had impaired the contract by not continuing to receive them; and so either relapse into the issue of this small trash, or have recourse to the judicial process to compel the United States to abide the contract, and continue the reception of all their notes. Mr. B. had no idea of letting down this federal government to such petty and inconvenient bargains with a thousand moneyed corporations. The government of the United States 'ought to act as a government, and not as a contractor. It should prescribe conditions, and not make bargains. It should give the law. He was against these bargains, even if they were good ones; but they were bad bargains, wretchedly bad, and ought to be rejected as such, even if all higher and nobler considerations were out of the question. What is the consideration that the United States is to receive? A mere individual agreement with each bank by itself, that in three years it will cease to issue notes under ten dollars and in five years it will cease to issue notes under twenty dollars. What is the price which she pays for this consideration? In first place, it receives the notes of such bank gold and silver at all the land-offices, custom houses, and post-offices, of the United State and, of course, pays them out again as gold silver to all her debtors. In the next place compels the deposit banks to credit them as on In the third place, it accredits the whole circ lation of the banks, and makes it current all or the United States, in consequence of univer receivability for all federal dues. In other won it endorses, so far as credit is concerned. whole circulation of every bank that comes i the bargain thus proposed. This is certainly most wretched bargain on the part of the Uni States-a bargain in which what she receives ruinous to her; for the more local payment receives in payment of her revenues, the we for her, and the sooner will her treasury be fill with unavailable funds.

Mr. B. having gone over these objections the committee's bill, would now ascend to class of objections of a higher and graver racter. He had already remarked that committee had carried out a resolution, and brought back a bill; that the committee; posed a statutory enactment, where the sens from Ohio [Mr. Ewing], and the senator in Virginia [Mr. Rives], had only proposed a ic resolution; and he had already further remark that in addition to this total change in mode of action, the committee had added neither of these senators had proposed a class under a proviso, to enact paper money into -to pass paper money to the credit of United States, as cash—and to punish, by loss of the deposits, any deposit bank wh should refuse so to receive, so to credit, and to pass, the notes "receivable" under the pr sions of their bill. These two changes make tirely a new measure-one of wholly a differ character from the resolutions of the two se tors-a measure which openly and in terms, under penalties undertakes to make local & paper a legal tender to the federal government and to compel the reception of all its revenue the notes "receivable" under the provisions the committee's bill. After this gigantic str this colossal movement-in favor of paper mo there was but one step more for the commi to take; and that was to make these note legal tender in all payments from the for s for this consideration? In the eceives the notes of such bank er at all the land-offices, custos ost-offices, of the United State , pays them out again as gold u her debtors. But that step was unnecessary mernment. betaken in words, for it is taken in fact, when other great step becomes law. For it is inestable that what the government receives, sust pay out; and what it pays out becomes currency of the country. So that when bill passes, the paper money of the local aks will be a tender by law to the federal memment, and a tender by duresse from the remment to its creditors and the people. his is the state to which the committee's bill bring us I and now, let us pause and conmplate, for a moment, the position we occupy, the vast ocean of paper on which we are oposed to be embarked.

We stand upon a constitution which recogies nothing but gold and silver for money; we and upon a legislation of near fifty years, tich recognizes nothing but gold and silver mey. Now, for the first time, we have a stamy enactment proposed to recognize the er of a wilderness of local banks for money, dia so doing to repeal all prior legislation by and the constitution by fact. This is an in our legislation. It is statute law to conall other law, and is not a resolution to other laws, and to express the opinions of agress. It is statutory enactment to create and not a declaratory resolution to expound and the effects of this statute would be, to ke a paper government-to insure the exration of our specie—to leave the State aks without foundations to rest upon—to proeacertain catastrophe in the whole paper tem—to revive the pretensions of the United tes Bank—and to fasten for a time the Adam ith system upon the Federal Government and whole Union.

Ir. Benton concluded his speech with a ring against the coming explosion of the aks; and said:

he day of revulsion may come sooner or later, its effects may be more or less disastrous; but he it must, and disastrous, to some degree, it sibe. The present bloat in the paper system not continue; the present depreciation of hey exemplified in the high price of every g dependent upon the home market, cannot a The revulsion will come, as surely as it did $19-20. But it will come with less force if treasury order is maintained, and if paper money shall be excluded from the federal treaaury. But, let these things go as they may, and let reckless or mischievous banks do what they please, there is still a refuge for the wise and good; there is still an ark of safety for every honest bank, and for every prudent man : it is in the mass of gold and silver now in the country-the seventy odd millions which the wisdom of President Jackson's administration has accumulated-and by getting their share of which, all who are so disposed can take care of themselves. Sir (said Mr. B.), I have performed a duty to myself, not pleasant, but necessary. This bill is to be an era in our legislation and in our political history. It is to be a point upon which the future age will be thrown back, and from which future consequences will be traced. I separate myself from it; I wash my hands of it; I oppose it. I am one of those who promised gold, not paper. I promised the currency of the constitution, not the currency of corporations. I did not join in putting down the Bank of the United States, to put up a wilder. ness of local banks. I did not join in putting down the paper curency of a national bank, to put up a national paper currency of a thousand local banks. I did not strike Cæsar to make Anthony master of Rome.

Mr. Walker replied to what he called the bill of indictment preferred by the senator from Missouri against the committee on public lands; and after some prefatory remarks went on to say:

"But when that senator, having exhausted the argument, or having none to offer, had indulged in violent and intemperate denunciation of the Committee on Public Lands, and of the report made by him as their organ, Mr. W. could not withhold the expression of his sur-prise and astonishment. Mr. W. said it was his good fortune to be upon terms of the kindest personal intercourse with every senator, and these friendly relations should not be interrupted by any aggression upon his part. And now, Mr. W. said, he called upon the whole Senate to bear witness, as he was sure they all cheerfully would, that in this controversy ho was not the aggressor, and that nothing had been done or said by him to provoke the wrath of the senator from Missouri, unless, indeed, to differ from him in opinion upon any subject constituted an offence in the mind of that senator. If such were the views of that gentleman, if he was prepared to immolate every senator who would not worship the same images of gold and silver which decorated the political chapel of the honorable gentleman, Mr. W. was fearful that the senator from Missouri would do execution upon every member of the Senate but himself, and be left here alone in his glory. Sir (said Mr. W.), being deeply solicitous to preserve unbroken the ranks of the democratic party in this body, participating with the people in grateful recollection of the distinguished services rendered by the senator from Missouri to the democracy of the Union, he would pass by many of the remarks made by that senator on this subject.

"[Mr. Benton here rose from his chair, and demanded, with much warmth, that Mr. Walker should not pass by one of them. Mr. W. asked, what one? Mr. B. replied, in an angry tone, Not one, sir. Then Mr. W. said he would examine them all, and in a spirit of perfect freedom; that he would endeavor to return blow for blow; and that, if the senator from Missouri desired, as it appeared he did, an angry controversy with him, in all its consequences, in and out of this house, he could be gratified.]

"Sir (said Mr. W.), why has the senator from Missouri assailed the Committee on Public Lands, and himself, as its humble organ? He was the author of the measure, and had been, and still was, its able, zealous, and successful advocate. Why, then, had the senator from Missouri assailed him (Mr. W.), and permitted the author of the measure to escape unpunished? Sir, are the arrows which appear to be aimed by the senator from Missouri at the humble organ of the Committee on Public lands, who reported this bill, intended to inflict a wound in another quarter? Is one senator the apparent object of assault, when another is designed as the real victim? Sir, when the senator from Missouri, without any provocation, like a thunderbolt from an unclouded sky, broke upon the Senate in a perfect tempest of wrath and fury, bursting upon his poor head like a tropical tornado, did he intend to sweep before the avenging storm another individual more obnoxious to his censure?

"Sir (said Mr. W.), the senator from Missouri has thrice repeated the prayer, 'God save the country from the Committee on Public Lands;' but Mr. W. fully believed if the prayer of the country could be heard within these walls, it would be, God save us from the wild, vision-

This species of money was expressly sale receivable for the public dues by an act Congress, passed immediately after the adopon of the constitution, and which remained in tre until eighteen hundred and eleven. It rs so received, as a matter of practice, from theen hundred and eleven until eighteen indred and sixteen, when, again, by an act of togress then passed, and which has just ex-ged, it was so authorized to be received during that period. Now, although these acts have pired there is that which is equivalent to a still in force, expressly authorizing the wes of the specie-paying banks of the States be received in revenue payments. it is the int resolution of eighteen hundred and sixa adopted by both houses of Congress, and groved by President Madison.

Where is the distinction, in principle, as reels the reception of bank paper on public acort, between the two provisions? And the stor from Missouri, in thus denouncing the If the committee as a repeal of the constition denounces directly the President of the stature, can make any thing but gold or silstender in payment of debts by one citizen mother; but that Congress, or a Stato legisare, or an individual, may waive their conutional rights, and receive bank paper or as, in payment of any debt, is a principle of persal adoption in theory and practice, and re doubted by any one until at the present soa by the senator from Missouri. The tinction of the senator in this respect was as omprehensible to him (Mr. W.) as he beed it was to every senator, and, indeed, was amible only by the magnifying powers of a the high rescore. It was a point-no-point, the like the logarithmic spiral, or asymptote the hyperbolic curve, might be for ever appealed without reaching; an infinite imal, the t of an idea, not only without length, dth, thickness, shape, weight, or dimensions, without position—a mere imaginary nothwhich flitted before the bewildered vision he honorable senator, when traversing, in fiful somnambulism, that tesselated pavet of gold, silver, and bullion, which that tor delighted to occupy. Sir, the senator, Missouri might have heaped mountain his piles of metal; he might have swept, is Quixotic flight, over the banks of the s, putting to the sword their officers, stockrs, directory, and legislative bodies by h they were chartered; he might, in his ries, have demolished their charters, and comed their paper by the fire of his clo-co; he might have transacted, in fancy, s metallic currency of twenty-eight milin circulation, an actual annual business Vol. I.-45 of fifteen hundred millions, and Mr. W. would not have disturbed his beatific visions, nor would any other senator-for they were visions only, that could never be realized-but when, descending from his ethereal flights, he seized upon the Committee on Public Lands as criminals, arrainged them as violators of the constitution, and prayed Heaven for deliverance from them, Mr. W. could be silent no longer. Yes, even then he would have passed lightly over the ashes of the theories of the honorable Senator, for, if he desired to make assaults upon any, it would be upon the living, and not the dead; but that send in the opening of his (Mr. W.'s) address, had rejected the olive branch which, upon the urgent solicitation of mutual friends, against his own judgment, he had extended to the honorable senator. The senator from Missouri had thus, in substance, declared his 'voice was still for war.' Be it so; but he hoped the Senate would all recoilect that he (Mr. W.) was not the aggressor; and that, whilst he trusted he never would wantonly assail the fee mgs or reputation of any senator, he thanked God that he was not so abject or degraded as to submit, with impunity, to unprovoked attacks or unfounded accusations from my quarter. Could be thus submit, he would be wifit to represent the noble, generous, and millant people, whose rights and interests it was his pride and glory to endeavor to protect, whose honor and character were dearer to him than life itself, and should never be turnished by any act of his, as one of their humble representatives upon this floor."

Mr. Rives returned thanks to Mr. Walker for his able and satisfactory desence of the bill, which in fact was his own resolution changed into a bill. He should not be able to add much to what had been said by the honorable senator, but was desirous of adding his mite in reply to so much of what had been so zealously urged by the senator from Missouri (Mr. Benton), us had not been touched upon by the chairman of the land committee; and did so in an elaborate speech a few days thereafter. Mr. Benton did not reply to either of the senators; he believed that the events of a few months would answer them, and the vote being immediately taken, the bill was passed almost unanimously-only five dissenting votes. The yeas and nays were:

NAVS-Messrs. Benton, Linu Morris, Ruggles, Wright-5.

The name of Mr. Calhoun is not in either list of these votes. He had a reason for not voting, which he expressed to the Senate, before the vote was taken; thus:

"He had been very anxious to express his opinions somewhat at large upon this subject. He put no faith in this measure to arrest the downward course of the country. He believed the state of the currency was almost incurably bad, so that it was very doubtful whether the highest skill and wisdom could restore it to soundness; and it was destined, at no distant time, to undergo an entire revolution. An explosion he considered inevitable, and so much the greater, the longer it should be delayed. Mr. C. would have been glad to go over the whole subject; but as he was now unprepared to assign his reasons for the vote which he might give, he was unwilling to vote at all."

The explosion of the banks, which Mr. Calhoun considered inevitable, was an event so fully announced by its "shadow coming before," that Mr. Benton was astonished that so many senators could be blind to its approach, and willing, by law, to make their notes receivable in all payments to the federal government. The bill went to the House of Representatives, where a very important amendment was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means to which the bill had been referred, intended to preserve to the Secretary of the Treasury his control over the receivability of money for the public dues, so as to enable him to protect the constitutional currency and reject the notes of banks deemed by him to be unworthy of credit. That amendment was in these words, and its rejection goes to illustrate the character of the bill that was passed:

"And be it further enacted, That no part of this act shall be construed as repealing any existing law relative to the collection of the revenue from customs or public lands in the legal currency, or as substituting bank notes of any description as a lawful currency for coin, as provided in the constitution of the United States; nor to deprive the Secretary of the Treasury of the power to direct the collectors or receivers of the public revenue, whether derived from duties, taxes, debts, or sales of the public lands, not to receive in payment, for any sum due to the United States, the notes of any bank or banks which the said Secretary may have reason to believe unworthy of credit, or which he apprehends may be compelled to suspend specie ayments."

Mr. Cambreleng, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in support of this amend ment, said it had been reported for the purpose of preventing a misconstruction of the bill as a came from the Senate, and securing the public revenue from serious frauds, and askel for the yeas and nays. The amendment was cut off by a sustained call for the previous question; and the bill passed by a strong vote—143 to 59 The nays were:

CHAPTER CLVI.

STRIBUTION OF LANDS AND MONEY-VARIOUS PROPOSITIONS.

ge spirit of distribution, having got a taste of at feast in the insidious deposit bill at the preding session, became ungovernable in its aprite for it at this session, and open and undissed in its efforts to effect its objects. Within first week of the meeting of Congress, Mr. keer, a representative from Virginia, moved resolution that the Committee of Ways and ans be directed to bring in a bill to release States from all obligation ever to return the idends they should receive under the so-called positact. It was a bold movement, considering the States had not yet received a dollar, and t it was addressed to the same members, ing in the same chairs, who had enacted the sure under the character of a deposit, to be redly returned to the United States whendesired; and under that character had ed over to the support of the act two classes roters who could not otherwise have been ined; namely, those who condemned the er of distribution, and those who denied its titutionality. Mr. Dunlap, of Tennessee, Mr. Mercer's motion at the threshold—conned it as an open conversion of deposit into ribution—as a breach of the condition on discussed; and moved that it be laid upon the table-a motion that precludes discussion, and brings on an immediate vote. Mr. Mercer asked for the yeas and nays, which being taken showed the astonishing spectacle of seventy-three members recording their names against the motion. The vote was 126 to 73. Simultaneously with Mr. Mercer's movement in the House to pull the mask from the deposit bill, and reveal it in its true character, was Mr. Clay's movement in the Senate to revive his land-money distribution bill, to give it immediate effect, and continue its operation for five years. In the first days of the session he gave notice of his intention to bring in his bill; and quickly followed up his notice with its actual introduction. On presenting the bill, he said it was due to the occasion to make some explanations: and thus went on to make

"The operation of the bill which had heretofore several times passed the Scuate, and once the House, commenced on the last of December, 1822, and was to continue five years. It provided for a distribution of the nett proceeds of the public lands during that period, upon wellknown principles. But the deposit act of the last session had disposed of so large a part of the divisible fund under the land bill, that he did not think it right, in the present state of the treasury, to give the bill—which he was about to apply for leave to introduce-that retrospective character. He had accordingly, in the draught which he was going to submit, made the last day of the present month its commencement, and the last day of the year 1841 its termination. If it should pass, therefore, in this shape, the period of its duration will be the same as that prescribed in the former bills. The Senate will readily comprehend the motive for fixing the end of the year 1841, as it is at that time that the biennial reductions of ten per cent. upon the existing duties cease, according to the act of the 2d March 1833, commonly called the compromise act, and a reduction of one half of the excess beyond twenty per cent. of any duty then remaining, is to take effect. By that time, a fair experiment of the land bill will have been made, and Congress can then determine whether the proceeds of the national domain shall continue to be equitably divided, or shall be applied to the current expenses of the government. The bill in his hand assigns to the new State of Arkansas her just proportion of the fund, and grants to her 500,000 acres of land as proposed to other States. A similar assignment and grant are not made to Michigan, because her admission into the Union is not yet complete. But when that event occurs, h the deposit was obtained—as unfit to be provision is made by which that State will receive its fair dividend. He had restored, in this draught, the provision contained in the original plan for the distribution of the public lands, which he had presented to the Senate, by which the States, in the application of the fund, are restricted to the great objects of education, internal improvement, and colonization. Such a restriction would, he believed, relieve the Legislatures of the several States from embarrassing controversies about the disposition of the fund, and would secure the application of what was common in its origin, to common benefits in its ultimate destination. But it was scarcely necessary for him to say that this provision, as well as the fate of the whole bill, depended upon the superior wisdom of the Senate and of the House. In all respects, other than those now particularly mentioned, the bill is exactly as it passed this body at the last session."

The bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, consisting of Mr. Walker of Mississippi, Mr. Ewing of Ohio, Mr. King of Alabama, Mr. Ruggles of Maine, Mr. Fulton of Arkansas. The committee returned the bill with an amendment, proposing to strike out the entire bill, and substitute for it a new one, to restrict the sale of the lands to actual settlers in limited quantities. In the course of the discussion of the bill, Mr. Benton offered an amendment, securing to any head of a family, any young man over the age of eighteen, and any widow, a settlement right in 160 acres at reduced prices, and inhabitation and cultivation for five years: which amendment was lost by a close vote-18 to 20. The yeas and nays were:

Yeas—Messrs. Benton, Black, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Rives, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tipton, Walker, White—18

Nays—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, King of Georgia, Niles, Page, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Swift, Tallmadge, Wright—20.

The substitute reported by the committee on public lands, after an extended debate, and various motions of amendment, was put to the vote, and adopted—twenty-four to sixteen—the yeas and nays being:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Rives, Robinson, Strange, Walker, Wright—24.

Nays.—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Davis, Ew-

So Mr. Clay's plan of a five years' open distri bution of the land money to the States, in addition to the actual distribution, under the deposi mask, was now defeated in the Senate: but that did not put an end to kindred schemes. The multiplied in different forms; and continued to vex Congress to almost the last day of it existence. Mr. Calhoun brought a plan for the cession of all the public lands to the States i which they lay, to be sold by them on graduate prices, extending to thirty-five years, on condition that the States should take the expenses the land system on themselves, and pay thirty three and a third percentum, of the sales, to the federal treasury. Mr. Benton objected, on princ ple, to any complication of moneyed or proper transactions between the States and the feder government, leading, as they inevitably world to dissension and contention; and ending in co troversies between the members and the he of the federal government: and, on detail h cause the graduation was extended beyond period when the new States would be strop enough to obtain better terms, without the co plication of a contract, and the condition of purchase. Within the thirty-five years, the would be three new apportionments of rep sentatives, under the censuses of 1840, 18 and 1860-doubling or trebling the new State representation each time; also several States admitted; so that they would be stro enough to take effectual measures for the tinction of the federal titles within the Star on just and equitable principles. Mr. Buchan openly assailed Mr. Calhoun's proposition a bid for the presidency; and said:

"He had heard a great deal said about brib the people with their own money; argume of that kind had been reiterated, but they never had much effect on him. But spea on the same principles on which this had b said, and without intending any thing pers toward the honorable senator from South Co lina, he would say this was the most spler bribe that had ever yet been offered. It was give the entire public domain to the peop the new States, without fee or reward, and the single condition that they should not be all the land into market at once. Mr. Sevier of Arkansas, said it might be very true that presidential candidates would bid deep for the favor of the West; but that was no reaan why the West should refuse a good offer, then made. Deeming this a good one, and beneficial to the new States, he was for taking i. Mr. Linn, of Missouri, objected to the propostion of Mr. Calhoun, as an amendment to the till in favor of actual settlers (in which form it ras offered), because it would be the occasion dosing both measures; and said:

"He might probably vote for it as an indenendent proposition, but could not as it now 100d. He had set out with the determination to vote against every amendment which should be proposed, as the bill had once been nearly bet by the multiplication of them. If this mendment should be received, the residue of the session would be taken up in discussing it, and nothing would be done for his constituents. He wanted them to know that he had done his atmost, which was but little, to carry into effect their wishes, and to secure their best interests in the settlement of the new country. He was unious to obtain the passage of an equitable premption law, which should secure to them their homes, and not throw the country into the hands of great capitalists, as had been done the case of the Holland Land Company, and us retard the settlement of the West. As to he evasions of previous pre-emption laws, of hich so much had been said, he believed they ither had no existence in Missouri, or had been rossly exaggerated. In the course of his proessional duty (Mr. Linn is a physician, in large metice), he had occasion to become extensively quainted with the people concerning whom hese things had been asserted (he referred to e emigrants who had setled in that State, nder the pre-emption law of 1814), and he ald say, nothing of the kind had fallen under sobservation. They had come there, in most es, poor, surrounded by all the evils and sadvantages of emigration to a new country; had attended many of them in sickness; and could truly aver that they were, as a whole, best and most upright body of people he d ever known.

"Mr. L. said he was a practical man, though temperament might be somewhat warm. He oked to things which were attainable, and in bill, far advanced in the Senate, and, as he hoped. on the eve of passing. He believed it would secure a great good to his constituents; and he could not consent to risk that bill by accepting the amendment proposed by the senator from South Carolina. If the senator from Arkansas would let this go, he might possibly find that it was a better thing than he could ever get again. He wanted that Congress should so regulate the public lands, and so arrange the terms on which it was disposed of, as to fornish in the West an opportunity for poor men to become rich, and every worthy and industrious man prosperons and happy."

Mr. Calhoun felt himself called upon to rise in defence of his proposition, and in vindication of his own motives in offering it; and did so, in a brief speech, saying:

"When the Senate had entered upon the present discussion, he had had little thought of offering a proposition like this. He had, indeed, always seen that there was a period coming when this government must cede to the new States the possession of their own soil; but he had never thought, till now, that period was so near. What he had seen this session, however, and especially the nature and character of the bill which was now likely to pass, had fully satisfied him that the time had arrived. There were at present eighteen senators from the new States. In four years, there would be six more. which would make twenty-four. All, therefore, must see that, in a very short period, those States would have this question in their own hands. And it had been openly said that they ought not to accept of the present proposition, because they would soon be able to get better terms. He thought, therefore, that, instead of attempting to resist any longer what must eventually happen, it would be better for all concerned that Congress should yield at once to the force of circumstances, and cede the public domain. His objects in this movement were high and solemn objects. He wished to break down the vassalage of the new States. He desired that this government should cease to hold the relation of a landlord. He wished, further, to draw this great fund out of the vortex of the presidential contest, with which it had openly been announced to the Senate there was an avowed design to connect it. He thought the country had been sufficiently agitated, corrupted, and debased, by the influence of that contest; and he wished to take this great engine out of the hands of power. If he were a can-didate for the presidency, he would wish to leave it there. He wished to go further: he sought to remove the immense amount of patronage connected with the management of this domain-a patronage which had corrupted both enear prospect of being obtained, rather than the old and the new States to an enormous exthese contingent and distant. Here was a tent. He sought to counteract the centralism, which was the great danger of this government, and thereby to preserve the liberties of the peop'e much longer than would otherwise be possi-ble. As to what was to be received for these lands, he cared nothing about it. He would have consented at once to yield the whole, and withdraw altogether the landlordship of the general government over them, had he not beheved that it would be most for the benefit of the new States themselves that it should contime somewhat longer. These were the views which had induced him to present the amendment. He offered no gilded pill. He threw in no apple of discord. He was no bidder for popularity. He prescribed to himself a more humble aim, which was simply to do his duty. He sought to counteract the corrupting tendency of the existing course of things. He sought to weaken this government by divesting it of at least a part of the immense patronage it wielded. He held that every great landed estate required a local administration, conducted by persons more intimately acquainted with local wants and interests than the members of a central government could possibly be. If any body usked him for a proof of the truth of his positions, he might point them to the bill now before the Senate. Such were the sentiments. shortly stated, which had governed him on this occasion. He had done his duty, and he must leave the result with God and with the new States."

Mr. Calhoun's proposition was then put to the vote, and almost unanimously rejected, only six senators besides himself voting for it; namely: Messrs. King of Georgia; Moore of Alabama; Morris of Ohio; Robinson of Illinois; Sevier of Arkansas; and White of Tennessee. And thus a third project of distribution (counting Mr. Mercer's motion as one), at this session, had miscarried. But it was not the end. Mr. Chilton Allen, representative from Kentucky, moved a direct distribution of land to the old States, equal in amount to the grants which had been made to the new States. Mr. Abijah Mann, jr., of New York, strikingly exposed the injustice of this proposition, in a few brief remarks, saying :

"It must be apparent, by this time, that this proposition was neither more nor less than a new edition of the old and exploded idea of distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, attempted to be concealed under rubbish and verbiage, and gilded ever by the patriotic idea of applying it to the public education. Its paternity is suspicious, and its hope fallacious and delusive. The preamble to this resolution is illusory and deceptive, addressed to the cupidity of the old States represented on this floor. It recites the grants made by Congress to each of the new States of the public lands in the an gregate, without specifying the motive or consideration upon which they were made, h argument is, that an equal quantity should be granted to the old States, to make them respectively equal sharers in the public lands, Now rir (said Mr. M.), nothing could be devised ther disingenuous and deceptive. Let us look at briefly. The idea is, that the old States granted these lands to the new for an implied consider. tion, and resulting benefit to themselves; that it was a sort of Indian gift, to be refunded with increase. Not so, sir, at all. If Mr. M understood the motives inducing those grants. they were paternal on the part of the old States: proceeding upon that generous and noble liber. ulity which induces a wealthy father to advance and provide for his children. This was the moving consideration, though he (Mr. M.) was aware that the grants in aid of the improvements of the new States and territories were upon consideration of advancing the sale and improvement of the remaining lands in these States held by the United States."

The proposition of Mr. Allen was disposed of by a motion to lie on the table, which prevailedone hundred and fourteen to eighty-one roles; but the end of these propositions was not yet Another motion to divide surpluses was to l made, and was made in the expiring days of the session, and by way of amendment to the regular fortification bill. Mr. Bell, of Tennessee moved, on the 25th of February, that a further deposit of all the public monies in the treasura on the first day of January, 1838, above the sum of five millions of dollars, should be "depo sited" with the States, according to the terms of the "deposit" bill of the preceding session; and which would have the effect of making a second "deposit" after the completion of the first one The argument for it was the same which ha been used in the first case; the argument against it was the one previously used, with the addition of the objectionable proceeding of springing such a proposition at the end of the session and as an amendment to a defence appropriation bill, on its passage; to which it was utterly it congruous, and must defeat; as, if it failed t sink the bill in one of the Houses, it must co tainly be rejected by the President, who, was now known, would not be cheated and with the word deposit. It was also opposed an act of supererogation, as nobody could # whether there would be any surplus a year hence; and further, it was opposed as an act usurpation and an encroachment upon the thority of the ensuing Congress. Mr. Yell, of Arkansas, was the macipal speaker against it; and said:

"I voted, Mr. Speaker, against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tenhis bill, if passed, and sanctioned by the Preplent-and I trust that it never will receive the countenance of that distinguished man and Instrious statesman-will at once establish a stem demoralizing and corrupting in its inprereignty of the States, and render them demalant suppliants on the general government. his measure of distribution, since it has been hobby-horse for gentlemen to ride on, has preented an anomalous spectacle! The time vet blongs to the history of this Congress, when boorable gentlemen, from the South and West, tere daily found arraying themselves against nery species of unnecessary taxation, boldly rowing that they were opposed to any and all priff systems which would yield a revenue beoad the actual wants and demands of the govmment. Such was their language but a few maks or months ago; and, in proclaiming it, y struggled hard to excel each other in zeal they struggled hard to excel each other in zeal adviolence. And now, sir, what is the spec-tage we behold? A system of distribution nother and a specious name for a system of ribery has been started; the hounds are in full ry; and the same honorable and patriotic genmen now step forward, and, at the washond of 'put money in thy purse; aye, put oney in thy purse,' vote for the distribution bribery measure; the effect of which is to enil on this country a system of taxation and pression, which has had no parallel since the ws of the tea and ten-penny tax—two frightful asures of discord, which roused enfeebled whiles to rebellion, and led to the foundation this mighty republic. But we are told, Mr. teaker, that this proposed distribution is only momentary duration; that it is necessary to lieve the Treasury of a redundant income, and at it will speedily be discontinued! Indeed, What evidence have we of the fact? What idence do we require to disprove the assertion? is scheme was commenced the last session has been introduced at this; and let me tell 4 Mr. Speaker, it never will be abandoned so eg as the high tariff party can wheedle the ple with a siren lullaby, and cheat them out their rights, by dazzling the vision with gold, definding the fancy by the attributes of so-istry. Depend upon it, sir, if this baleful sem of distribution be not nipped in the bud, will betray the people into submission by a cies of taxation which no nation on earth should endure. Sir, continued Mr. Y., I enter my protest against a system of bargain and corruption, which is to be executed by parties of different political complexions, for the purpose of dividing the spoils which they have plundered from the people. If the sales of the public lands are to be continued for the benefit of the speculators who go to the West in multitudes for the purpose of legally stealing the lands and improvements of the people of the rew States, I hope my constituents may know who it is that thus imposes upon them a system of legalized fraud and oppression. If, sir, my constituents are to be sacrificed by the maintenance of a system of persecution, got up and carried on for the purpose of filling the pockets of others to their ruin, I wish them to know who is the author of the enormity. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, and that hope has not yet been abandoned, that if ever this branch of the government is bent on the destruction of the rights of the people, and a violation of the Constitution, there is yet one ordeal for it to pass where it may be shorn of its baneful aspect. And, Mr. Speaker, I trust in God that, in its passage through that ordeal, it will find a quietus."

Mr. Bell's motion succeeded. The second "deposit" act, by a vote of 112 to 70, was engrafted on the appropriation bill for completing and constructing fortifications; and, thus loaded, that bill went to the Senate. Being referred to the Committee on Finance, that committee directed their chairman, Mr. Wright of New-York, to move to strike it out. The motion was resisted by Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Clay, Mr. Webster, Mr. White of Tennessee, Mr. Ewing of Ohio, Crittenden, Preston, Southard, and Clayton; and supported by Messrs. Wright, Benton, Bedford Brown, Buchanan, Grundy, Niles of Connecticut, Rives, Strange of North Carolina: and being put to the vote, the motion was carried, and the "deposit" clause struck from the bill by a vote of 26 to 19. The yeas and navs were:

of the loss of a previous appropriation bill for fortifications; and warning them that their perseverance must now have the same effect, and operate a sacrifice of defence to the spirit of distribution: but all in vain. The motion to disagree was carried-110 to 94. The disputed clause then went through all the parliamentary forms known to the occasion. The Senate "insisted "on its amendment: a motion to "recode" was made and lost in the House: a motion to "adhere" was made, and prevailed: then the Senate "adhered": then a committee of "conference" was appointed, and they "disagreed." This being reported to the Houses, the bill fellthe fortification appropriations were lost: and in this direct issue between the plander of the country, and the defence of the country, define was beaten. Such was the deplorable progress which the spirit of distribution had made.

CHAPTER CLVII.

MILITARY ACADEMY: ITS RIDING-HOUSE.

THE annual appropriation bill for the support of this Academy contained a clause for the purchase of forty horses, "for instruction in light artillery and cavalry exercise;" and proposed ten thousand dollars for the purpose. This purchase was opposed, and the clause stricken out. The bill also contained a clause proposing thirty thousand dollars, in addition to the amount theretofore appropriated, for the erection of a building for "recitation and military exercises," as the clause expressed itself. It was understood to be for the riding-house in bad weather. Mr. McKay, of North Carolina, moved to strike out the clause, upon the ground that military men ought to be inured to hardship, not pampered in effeminacy; and that, as war was carried on in the field, so young officers should be learned to ride in the open air, and on rough ground, and to be afraid of no weather. The clause was stricken out, but restored upon re-consideration; in opposition to which Mr. Smith, of Maine, was the principal speaker; and said:

"I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to the paragraph of this bill proposed to be stricken out. It is an appropriation of thirty thousand dollars, in addition to the amount already appropriated, for the erection of a building within which to exercise and drill the cadets at West Point. The gentleman from Pennsy vania [Mr. Ingersoll] who reported this bill, as who never engages himself in any subject with out making himself entire master of all its part will do the committee the justice, I trust, a inform them, when he shall next take the flow what the amount heretofore appropriately this same building, in which to exercise the category that the prepriety of having such a building, we may also know how much we have heretofore takes from the public Treasury for its erection, and to what sum the thirty thousand dollars not proposed will be an addition.

Sir, if the gen tleman would extend his inquiries somewhat further North or East, he would find that a points where the winters are still more inclement than at West Point, and where the sno lies for months in succession from two to eight feet deep, a very large and useful and respectable portion of the citizens not only incur the snow and storms of winter by day without workshor or buildings to protect them, but actually pursu the business of months amid such snows an storms, without a roof, or board, or so much a a shingle to cover and protect them by eithe day or night, and do not dream of murmuring But, forsooth, the young cadet at West Point who goes there to acquire an education for him self, who is clothed and fed, and even paid fo his time, by the government while acquiring hi education, cannot endure the atmosphere West Point, without a magnificent building shield him during the few hours in the weel while in the act of being drilled, as part of hi education! But same tender spirit of guardianship which has ested the expediency of housing the cadets in the atmosphere while performing their drill ties and exercises has in some way construed ray one third of the law of Congress upon this abject; and, instead of three months' camp duty, the law requires, the cadets are required, by the ales and regulations of the institution, to camp aniose, sir, every species of camp utensils and firniture that government money can purpis pictured forth here by the gentleman from w. Sir, the hardships jexposures of the cadets are nothing comrel with those of the generality of our fellow-gens in the North, in their ordinary pursuits; dyet we are called upon to add to their luxutwo hundred and fifty dollar horses to k, splendid camp equipage to protect them the dews and damp air of summer, and gnificent buildings to shield them in their nter exercises. I think it is high time for agress, and for the people of this nation, to feet seriously upon these matters, and to inin with somewhat of particularity into the meter of this institution.

But the honorable gentleman from Pennsylin (Mr. Ingersoll), has volunteered to put reputation of the West Point Academy for ality in issue at this time, and sets it out in ment description, as pre-eminently pure and spoachable in this respect. Sir, does not the honorable gentleman know the history of this institution, within a few mback only, bears quite different testimony m this subject? Does not the gentleman w the fact—a fact well substantiated by the rister of Debates in your library—that only w years since the government was forced othenecessity of purchasing up, at an exe of ten thousand dollars, a neighboring m stand, as the only means of saving the fitation from being overwhelmed and ruined the gross immoralities of the cadets? Is not centleman aware that the whole argument ed to force and justify the government into purchase was, that the moral power of the demy was unequal to the counter influences he neighboring tavern? And are we to be told, sir, that this institution stands forth in its history pre-eminently pure, and above comparison with the institutions that exist upon the private enterprise and munificence, and thirst for knowledge, that characterize our countrymen? I make these suggestions, and allude to these facts, not voluntarily, and from a wish to create a discussion upon either the merits or demerits of the Academy. When I made the proposition to strike from this bill the ten thousand dollars proposed to be appropriated for the purchase of horses, I neither inteded nor desired to enter into a discussion of the institution. I have not now spoken, except upon the impulse given by the remarks of the gentlemen from New-York and Pensylvania; and now, instead of going into the facts that do exist in relation to the Academy, I can assure gentlemen that I have but scarcely approached them. I have been willing, and am now willing, to have these facts brought to light at another time, and upon a proper occasion that will occur hereafter, and leave the people of this nation to judge of them dispassionately. A report upon the subject of this institution will be made shortly, as the honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Hawes) has assured the house. From that report, all will be able to form an opinion as to the policy of the institution in its present shape and under its present discipline. That some grave objections exist to both its shape and discipline, I think all will agree. But I wish not to discuss either at this time. Let us know, however, and let the country know, something about the expensive buildings now in progress at West Point, before we conclude to add this further appropriation of thirty thousand dollars to the expenses of the institution; and, while I am up, I will call the attention of the honorable gentleman who reported this bill to another item in it, which embraces forage for horses among other matters, and I wish him to specify to the committee what proportion of the sum of over thirteen thousand dollars contained in this item, is based upon the supposed supply of forage. We have stricken out the appropriation for purchasing horses, and another part of the bill provides forage for the officers' horses; hence a portion of the item now adverted to should probably be stricken out."

The debate became spirited and discursive, grave and gay, and gave rise to some ridiculous suggestions, as that if it was necessary to protect these young officers from bad weather when exercising on horseback, it ought to be done in no greater degree than young women are protected in like circumstances-parasols for the sun, umbrellas for rain, and pelisses for cold: which it was insisted would be a great economy. On the other hand it was insisted that ridinghouses were appurtenant to the military colleges of Europe, and that fine riders were trained in these schools. The $30,000, in addition to previous appropriations for the same purpose, was granted; but has been found to be insufficient; and a late Board of Visitors, following the lead of the Superintendent of the Academy, and powerfully backed by the War Office, at Washington City, has earnestly recommended a further additional appropriation of $20,000, still further to improve the riding-house; on the ground that, "the room now used for the purpose is extremely dangerous to the lives and limbs of the codets." This further accommodation is deemed indispensable to the proper teaching of the art of "equitation:" that is to say, to the art of riding on the back of a horse; and the Visitors recommend this accommodation to Congress, in the following pathetic terms: "The attention of the committee has been drawn to the consideration of the expediency of erecting a new building for cavalry exercise. We are aware that the subject has been before Congress, upon the recommendation of former boards of Visitors, and we cannot add to the force of the arguments made use of by them, in favor of the measure. We would regret to be compelled to believe that there is a greater indifference to the safety of human life and limb in this country than in most others. It is enough for us to say that, in the opinion of the Superintendent, the course of equitation cannot be properly taught without it, 'and that the room now used for the purpose is extremely dangerous to the lives and limbs of the cadets.' In this opinion, we entirely concur. The appropriation required for the erection of such a building will amount to some $20,000. We can hardly excuse ourselves, if we neglect to bring this subject, so far as we are able to do so, most emphatically to the notice of those who have the power, and, we doubt not, the disposition also, to remove the evil."

CHAPTER CLVIII.

SALT TAX: MR. BENTON'S FOURTH SPEECH AGAINST IT.

THE amount which this tax brings into the treasury is about 600,000 dollars, and that upon an article costing about 650,000 dollars; and one-half of the tax received goes to the fishing sounties and allowances founded upon it. So that what upon the record is a tax of about if per centum, is in the reality a tax of 200 centum; and that upon an article of prime cessity and universal use, while we have article of luxury and superfluity-wines, silks-eith free of tax, or nominally taxed at some ten twenty per centum. Mr. B. would remark that salt, being brought billast, the greatest quantity came from Engwhere we had the largest trade; and that importation, with a tax upon it, being merely siental to trade, this greatest quantity came the place where it cost most, and was of enferior kind. The salt from England was gly one half of the whole quantity imported; sest was about sixteen cents a bushel; and quality was so in Serior that neither in the nited States, nor in Great Britain, could it be of for curing provisions, fish, butter, or any that required long keeping, or exposure nouthern heats. This was the salt commonly dd Liverpool. It was made by artificial heat, never was, and never can be made pure, as mere agitation of the boiling prevents the antion of the bittern, and other foreign and sonous ingredients with which all salt water, even mineral salt, is more or less impregna-The other half of the imported salt costs ks than the English salt, and is infinitely erior to it; so far superior that the English will not even serve for a substitute in the prtant business of curing fish, and flesh, bng keeping, or southern exposure. This was made by the action of the sun in the miles approaching, and under the tropics. begin to obtain it in the West Indies, and large quantity on Turk's Island; and get it all the islands and coasts, under the sun's k from the Gulf of Mexico to the Black Sea. Cape de Verd Islands, the Atlantic and literranean coasts of Spain and Portugal, the iterranean coast of France, the two coasts bly, the islands in the Mediterranean, the s of the Adriatic, the Archipelago, up e Black Sca, all produce it and send it to The table which has been read shows that original cost of this salt-the purest and ngest in the world—is about nine or ten ka bushel in the Gulf of Mexico; five, six seven cents on the coasts of France, Spain Portugal; three and four cents in Italy and Adriatic; and less than three cents in Sicily. all this salt bears one uniform duty; it was wenty cents a bushel, and is now near ten sabushel; so that while the tax on the ish salt is a little upwards of fifty per cent. te value, the same tax on all the other salt m one hundred to two hundred, and three sun-made salt is chiefly used in the Great West, in curing provisions; the Liverpool is chiefly used on the Atlantic coasts; and thus the people in different sections of the Union pay different degrees of tax upon the same articles, and that which costs least is taxed most. A tax ranging to some hundred per cent. is in itself an enormous tax; and thus the duty collected by the federal government from all the consumers of the sun-made salt, is in itself excessive; amounting, in many instances, to double, treble, or even quadruple the original cost of the article. This is an enormity of taxation which strikes the mind at the first blush; but, it is only the beginning of the enormity, the extent of which is only discoverable in tracing its effects to all their diversified and injurious consequences. In the first place, it cheeks and prevents the importation of the salt. Coming as ballast, and not as an article of commerce on which profit is to be made, the shipper cannot bring it except he is supplied with money to pay the duty, or surrenders it into the hands of salt dealers, on landing, to go his security for the payment of the duty. Thus, the importation of the article is itself cheeked; and this check operates with the greatest force in all cases where the original price of the salt was least; and, therefore, where it operates most injuriously to the country. In all such cases the tax operates as a prohibition to use salt as ballast, and cheeks its importation from all the places of its production nearest the sun's track, from the Gulf of Mexico to Constantinople. In the next place, the imposition of the tax throws the salt into the hands of an intermediate set of dealers in the scaports, who either advance the duty, or go security for it, and who thus become possessed of nearly all the salt which is imported. A few persons employed in this business engross the salt, and fix the price for all in the market; and fix it higher or lower, not according to the cost of the article, but according to the necessities of the country, and the quantity on hand, and the season of the year. The prices at which they fix it are known to all purchasers, and may be seen in all prices-current. It is generally, in the case of alum salt, four, five, ten, or fifteen times as much as it cost. It is generally forty, or fifty, or sixty cents a bushel, and nearly the same price for all sorts, without any reference to the led and near four hundred per cent. The original cost, whether it cost three cents, or five cents, or ten cents, or diffeen cents a bushel. hands of regraters, and would substitute About one uniform price is put on the whole, and the purchaser has to submit to the imposition. This results from the effect of the tax. throwing the article, which is nothing but ballast, into the hamls of salt dealers. The importer does not bring more money than the salt is worth, to pay the duty; he does not come prepared to pay a heavy duty on his ballast; he has to depend upon raising the money for paying the duty after he arrives in the United States; and this throws him into the hands of the salt dealer, and subjects the country purchaser to all the fair charges attending this change of hands, and this establishment of an intermediate dealer, who must have his profits; and also to all the additional exactions which he may choose to make. This should not be. There should be no costs, nor charges, nor intermediate profits, on such an article as salt. It comes as ballast; as ballast it should be handed out-should be handed from the ship to the steamboat-should escape port charges, and intermediate profits-and this would be the case, if the duty was abolished. Thus the charges, costs, profits, and exactions, in consequence of the tax, are greater than the tax itself! But this is not all-a further injury, resulting from the tax, is yet to be inflicted upon the consumer. It is well known that the measured bushel of alum salt, and all sun-made salt is alum saltit is well known that a bushel of this salt weighs about eighty-four pounds; yet the custom-house bushel goes by weight, and not by measure, and fifty-six pounds is there the bushel. Thus the consumer, in consequence of having the salt sent through the custom-house, is shifted from the measured to the weighed bushel, and loses twenty-eight pounds by the operation! but this is not his whole loss; the intermediate salt dealer deducts six pounds more, and gives fifty pounds for the bushel; and thus this taxed and custom-housed article, after paying some hundred per cent, to the government and several handred per cent. more to the regraters, is worked into a loss of thirty-four pounds on every bushel! All these losses and impositions would vanish, if salt was freed from the necessity of passing the custom-houses; and to do that, it must be freed in toto from taxation. The slightest duty would operate nearly the whole misrhief, for it would throw the article into the shucks, &c. In England it is ascertain-

Such are the direct injuries of the salt m a tax enormous in itself, disproportionate in application to the same article in different m of the Union, and bearing hardest upon kind which is cheapest, best, and most in pensable. The levy to the government is en mous, $650,000 per annum upon an article a worth about $600,000; but what the gow ment receives is a trifle, compared to what exacted by the regrater,-what is lost in difference between the weighed and the sured bushel,-and the loss which the far sustains for want of adequate supplies of sale his stock, and their food. Assuming the ernment tax to be ten cents a bushel, the a age cost of alum salt to be seven cents, and regrater's price to be fifty cents, and it is that he receives upwards of three times as m as the government does; and that the trib to those regraters is near two millions of do per annum. Such was the my of the salt-tax in England to the agrihural interest in the single article of stock. hat the injury might be to the agricultuinterest in the United States on the same cde, on account of the stinted use of salt ssiened by the tax, might be vaguely conred from general observation and a few ablished facts. In the first place, it was wan to every body that stock in our country stinted for salt; that neither hogs, horses, rile, or sheep, received any thing near the antity found by experience to be necessary England; and, as for their food, that little or salt was put upon it in the United States; ile in England, ten or fifteen pounds of salt the ton of hay, clover, &c. was used in curing Taking a single branch of the stock of the ited States, that of sheep, and more decided dence of the deplorable deficiency of salt canthe produced. The sheep in the United States recomputed by the wool-growers, in 1832, in ir petitions to Congress, at twenty millions; number, at half a bushel each, would reir about ten millions of bushels; now the ole supply of salt in the United States, both me-made and imported, barely exceeds ten liens; so that, if the sheep received an adete supply, there would not remain a pound any other purpose! Of course, the sheep net receive an adequate supply, nor perhaps fourth part of what was necessary; and so all other stock. To give an opinion of the United States for want of the free use of this article, would require the minute, comprehensive, sagacious, and peculiar turn of mind of Dr. Young; but it may be sufficient for the argument, and for all practical purposes, to assume that our loss, in proportion to the number of our stock, is greater than that of the English farmers, and amounts to fifteen or twenty times the value of the tax itself!

CHAPTER CLIX.

EXPUNGING RESOLUTION-PREPARATION FOR DECISION.

Ir was now the last session of the last term of the presidency of General Jackson, and the work of the American Senate doing justice to itself by undoing the wrong which it had done to itself in its condemnation of the President, was at hand. The appeal to the people had produced its full effect; and, in less time than had been expected. Confident from the beginning in the verdict of the people, the author of the movement had not counted upon its delivery until several years-probably until after the retirement of Generel Jackson, and until the subsidence of the passions which usually pursue a public man while he remains on the stage of action. Contrary to all expectation, the public mind was made up in less than three years, and before the termination of that second administration which was half run when the sentence of condemnation was passed. At the commencement of this session, 1836-'37, the public voice had come in, and in an imperative form. A majority of the States had acted decisively on the subject-some superseding their senators at the end of their terms who had given the obnoxious vote, and replacing them by those who would expunge it; others sending legislative instructions to their senators, which carried along with them, in the democratic States, the obligation of obedience or resignation; and of which it was known there were enough to obey to accomplish the desired expurgation. Great was the number superseded, or forced to resign. The great leaders, Mr. Clay, Mr. Webster, Mr. loss to the agricultural interest in the Calhoun, easily maintained themselves in their respective States; but the mortality Od heavily upon their followers, and left them in a helpless minority. The time had come for action; and on the second day after the meeting of the Senate, Mr. Benton gave notice of his intention to bring in at an early period the unwelcome resolution, and to press it to a decision. Heretofore he had introduced it without any view to action, but merely for an occasion for a speech, to go to the people; but the opposition, exulting in their strength, would of themselves call it up, against the wishes of the mover, to receive the rejection which they were able to give it. Now these dispositions were reversed; the mover was for decision-they for staying it off. On the 26th day of December-the third anniversary of the day on which Mr. Clay had moved the condemnatory resolution-Mr. Benton laid upon the table the resolve to expunge it-followed by his third and last speech on the subject. The following is the resolution; the speech constitutes the next chapter:

Resolution to expunge from the Journal the Resolution of the Senate of March 28, 1834, in relation to President Jackson and the Removal of the Deposits.

"Whereas, on the 26th day of December, in the year 1833, the following resolve was moved in the Senate:

CHAPTER CLX.

EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.-MR. BENTON'S THERD SPEECH.

MR. PRESIDENT: It is now near three years since the resolve was adopted by the Senate, which it is my present motion to expunge from the journal. At the moment that this resolve was adopted, I gave notice of my intention to move to expunge it; and then expressed my confident belief that the motion would eventually prevail. That expression of confidence was not an ebullition of vanity, or a presumptuous calculation, intended to accelerate the event it affected to foretell. It was not a vain boast, or an idle assumption, but was the result of a deep conviction of the injustice done President Jackson, and a thorough reliance upon the justice of the American people. I felt that the President had been wronged; and my heart told me that this wrong would be redressed! The event proves that I was not mistaken. The question of expunging this resolution has been carried to the people, and their decision has been had upon it. They decide in favor of the expurgation; and their decision has been both made and manifested, and communicated to us in a great variety of ways. A great number of States have expressly instructed their senators to vote for this expurgation. A very great majority of the States have elected senators and representatives to Congress, upon the express ground of favoring this expurgation. The Bank of the United States, which took the initiative in the accusation against the President, and furnished the material, and worked the machinery which was used against him, and which was then so powerful on this floor, has become more and more odious to the public mind, and musters now but a slender phalanx of friends in the two Houses of Congress. The late Presidential election furnishes additional evidence of public sentiment. The candidate who was the friend of President Jackson, the supporter of his administration, and the avowed advocate for the expurgation, has received a large majority of the suffrages of the whole Union, and that after an express declaration of his sentiments on this precise point. The evidence of the public will, exhibited in all these forms, is too manifest to be mistaken, too explicit to require illustration, and too imperative to be disregarded. Omitting details and specific enumeration of proofs, I refer to our own files for the instructions to expunge,-to the complexion of the two Houses for the temper of the people, -to the denationalized condition of the Bank of the United States for the fate of the imperious accesser,-and to the issue of the Presidential election for the answer of the Union. All these are pregnant proofs of the public will, and the last pre-eminently so; because, both the question of the expurgation, and the form of the process, was directly put in issue upon it. A representative of the people from the State of Kentucky formally interrogated a prominent candidate for the Presidency on these points, and required from him a public answer for the information of the public mind. The answer was given, and published, and read by all the voters before the election; and I deem it right to refer to that answer in this place, not only as evidence of the points put in issue, but also for the purpose of doing more ample justice to President Jackson by incorporating into the legislative history of this case, the high and honorable testimony in his favor of the eminent citizen, Mr. Van Buren, who has just been exalted to the lofty honors of the American Presidency:

"Your last question seeks to know an opinion as to the constitutional power of the Senate or House of Representatives to expans or obliterate from the journals the proceeding of a previous session.

"You will, I am sure, be satisfied upon fa ther consideration, that there are but few one tions of a political character less connected w the duties of the office of President of the Univ States, or that might not with equal proprie be put by an elector to a candidate for that si tion, than this. With the journals of neith house of Congress can he properly have a thing to do. But, as your question has dou less been induced by the pendency of Col. Be ton's resolutions, to expunge from the journ of the Senate certain other resolutions touchi the official conduct of President Jackson, I fer to say, that I regarded the passage of Benton's preamble and resolutions to be an of justice to a faithful and greatly injured pulservant, not only constitutional in itself imperiously demanded by a proper respect the well known will of the people."

I do not propose, sir, to draw violent warranted, or strained inferences. I do not sume to say that the question of this expun tion was a leading, or a controlling point in issue of this election. I do not assume to s or insinuate, that every individual, and en voter, delivered his suffrage with reference this question. Doubtless there were many ceptions. Still, the triumphant election of candidate who had expressed himself in the ter just quoted, and who was, besides, the perso and political friend of President Jackson, the avowed approver of his administration, m be admitted to a place among the proofs in case, and ranked among the high concurring dences of the public sentiment in favor of motion which I make.

I hold that it ought to be bind and obligatory upon us! and that, not only upon the principles of representative governments of the known will the people, but also in conformity to the ciples upon which the proceeding against sident Jackson was conducted when the sent against him was adopted. Then every it was done with especial reference to the will the people! Their impulsion was assume be the sole motive to action; and to then chimate verdict was expressly referred. The shole machinery of alarm and pressure-every mine of political and moneyed power-was put motion, and worked for many months, to exthe people against the President; and to stir meetings, memorials, petitions, travelling emmittees, and distress deputations against in; and each symptom of popular discoutent hailed as an evidence of public will, and octed here as proof that the people demanded e condemnation of the President. Not only rislative assemblies, and memorials from large semblies, were then produced here as evidence public opinion, but the petitions of boys unage, the remonstrances of a few signers, ithe results of the most inconsiderable elecans, were estentatiously paraded and magnified, the evidence of the sovereign will of our contuents. Thus, sir, the public voice was every ing while that voice, partially obtained through olitical and pecuniary machinations, was adse to the President. Then the popular will s the shrine at which all worshipped. Now, hea that will is regularly, soberly, repeatedly, al almost universally expressed through the llot boxes, at the various elections, and turns at to be in favor of the President, certainly no e can disregard it, nor otherwise look at it an as the solemn verdict of the competent and timate tribunal upon an issue fairly made up, lly argued, and duly submitted for decision. such verdict, I receive it. As the deliberate rdict of the sovereign people, I bow to it. I content. I do not mean to reopen the case, to recommence the argument. I leave that ik to others, if any others choose to perform For myself, I am content; and, dispensing th further argument, I shall call for judgment, lask to have execution done, upon that unpy journal, which the verdict of millions of emen finds guilty of bearing on its face an une, illegal, and unconstitutional sentence of demnation against the approved President the Republic.

Then every the with especial reference to the wi e! Their impulsion was assume ole motive to action; and to them

But, while declining to reopen the argument his question, and refusing to tread over again ground already traversed, there is another a different task to perform; one which the reaching termination of President Jackson's niaistration makes peculiarly proper at this , and which it is my privilege, and perhaps clusion to the arduous contest in which we have been so long engaged; I allude to the general tenor of his administration, and to its effect, for good or for evil, upon the condition of his country. This is the proper time for such a view to be taken. The political existence of this great man now draws to a close. In little more than forty days he ceases to be a public character. In a few brief weeks he ceases to be an object of political hope to any, and should cease to be an object of political hate, or envy, to all. Whatever of motive the servile and timeserving might have found in his exalted station for raising the altar of adulation, and burning the incense of praise before him, that motive can no longer exist. The dispenser of the patronage of an empire-the chief of this great confederacy of States-is soon to be a private individual, stripped of all power to reward, or to punish. His own thoughts, as he has shown us in the concluding paragraph of that message which is to be the last of its kind that we shall ever receive from him, are directed to that beloved retirement from which he was drawn by the voice of millions of freemen, and to which he now looks for that interval of repose which age and infirmities require. Under these circumstances, he ceases to be a subject for the ebullition of the passions, and passes into a character for the contemplation of history. Historically, then, shall I view him; and limiting this view to his civil administration, I demand, where is there a chief magistrate of whom so much evil has been predicted, and from whom so much good has come? Never has any man entered upon the chief magistracy of a country under such appalling predictions of ruin and woe! never has any one been so pursued with direful prognostications! never has any one been so beset and impeded by a powerful combination of political and moneyed confederates! never has any one in any country where the administration of justice has risen above the knife or the bowstring, been so lawlessly and shamelessly tried and condemned by rivals and enemies, without hearing, without defence, without the forms of law or justice! History has been ransacked to find examples of tyrants sufficiently odious to illustrate him by comparison. Language has been tortured to find epithets sufficiently strong to paint him in description. Imagination has been exhausted duty, to execute, as being the suitable con- in her efforts to deck him with revolting and inhuman attributes. Tyrant, despot, usurper; destroyer of the liberties of his country; rash, ignorant, imbecile; endangering the public peace with all foreign nations; destroying domestic prosperity at home; ruining all industry, all commerce, all manufactures; annihilating confidence between man and man; delivering up the streets of populous cities to grass and weeds, and the wharves of commercial towns to the encumbrance of decaying vessels; depriving labor of all reward; depriving industry of all employment; destroying the currency; plunging an innocent and happy people from the summit of felicity to the depths of misery, want, and despair. Such is the faint outline, followed up by actual condemnation, of the appalling denunciations daily uttered against this one MAN, from the moment he became an object of political competition, down to the concluding moment of his political existence.

"The sacred voice of inspiration has told us that there is a time for all things. There certainly has been a time for every evil that human nature admits of to be vaticinated of President Jackson's administration; equally certain the time has now come for all rational and well-disposed people to compare the predictions with the facts, and to ask themselves if these calamitous prognostications have been verified by events? Have we peace, or war, with foreign nations? Certainly, we have peace with all the world! peace with all its benign, and felicitous, and beneficent influences! Are we respected, or despised abroad? Certainly the American name never was more honored throughout the four quarters of the globe, than in this very moment. Do we hear of indignity, or outrage in any quarter? of merchants robbed in foreign ports? of vessels searched on the high seas? of American citizens impressed into foreign service? of the national flag insulted any where? On the contrary, we see former wrongs repaired; no new ones inflicted. France pays twenty-five millions of francs for spoliations committed thirty years ago; Naples pays two millions one hundred thousand ducats for wrongs of the same date; Denmark pays six bundred and fifty thousand rix dollars for wrongs done a quarter of a century ago; Spain engages to pay twelve millions of reals vellon for injuries of fifteen years date; and Portugal, the last in the list of former aggressors, admits her liability, her account by adequate indemnity. So far from war, insult, contempt, and spoliation from abroad; this denounced administration has been the season of peace and good will, and the augpicious era of universal reparation. So far from suffering injury at the hands of foreign powers. our merchants have received indemnities for all former injuries. It has been the day of account. ing, of settlement, and of retribution. The total list of arrearages, extending through four successive previous administrations, has been closed and settled up. The wrongs done to commerce for thirty years back, and under many different Presidents, and indemnities with held from all, have been repaired and paid over under the beneficent and glorious administration of President Jackson. But one single instance of outrage has occurred, and that at the extremi ties of the world, and by a piratical hords amenable to no law but the law of force. The Malays of Sumatra committed a robbery an massacre upon an American vessel. Wretches they did not then know that JACKSON wa President of the United States! and that n distance, no time, no idle ceremonial of treating with robbers and assassins, was to hold bad the arm of justice. Commodore Downes wen out. His cannon and his bayonets struck the outlaws in their den. They paid in terror an in blood for the outrage which was committed and the great lesson was taught to these distant pirates-to our antipodes themselves-that p even the entire diameter of this globe could pro tect them! and that the name of America citizen, like that of Roman citizen in the ene days of the Republic and of the empire, was t be the inviolable passport of all that wore throughout the whole extent of the habital world.

"At home, the most gratifying picture pr sents itself to the view: the public debt pai off; taxes reduced one half; the completion the public defences systematically commenced the compact with Georgia, uncomplied with since 1802, now carried into effect, and her so ready to be freed, as her jurisdiction has been delivered, from the presence and encumbran of an Indian population. Mississippi and Al oama, Georgia, Tennessee, and North Carolin Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Arkana in a word, all the States encumbered with and only waits the adjustment of details to close Indian population have been relieved from the

"The currency is not ruined! On the conmry, seventy-five millions of specie in the counwis a spectacle never seen before, and is the larrier of the people against the designs of any anks which may attempt to suspend payments, nd to force a dishonored paper currency upon the community. These seventy-five millions are the security of the people against the dangers of depreciated and inconvertible paper money. fold after a disappearance of thirty years, is stored to our country. All Europe beholds ith admiration the success of our efforts in hree years, to supply ourselves with the curency which our constitution guarantees, and thich the example of France and Holland hows to be so easily attainable, and of such inalculable value to industry, morals, economy, and solid wealth. The success of these efforts styled in the best London papers, not merely reformation, but a revolution in the currency! revolution by which our America is now renining from Europe the gold and silver which he has been sending to it for thirty years

Domestic industry is not paralyzed; confience is not destroyed; factories are not stopd; workmen are not mendicants for bread ed employment; credit is not extinguished; ices have not sunk; grass is not growing in te streets of populous cities; the wharves are at lumbered with decaying vessels; columns curses, rising from the bosoms of a ruined and mized people, are not ascending to heaven ainst the destroyer of a nation's felicity and osperity. On the contrary, the reverse of all is is true! and true to a degree that astonhes and bewilders the senses. I know that all not gold that glitters; that there is a differe between a specious and a solid prosperity. know that a part of the present prosperity is parent only—the effect of an increase of fifty illions of paper money, forced into circulation one thousand banks; but, after making due owance for this fictitious and delusive excess, ereal prosperity of the country is still unpreceatedly and transcendently great. I know that ry flow must be followed by its ebb, that in the President, is nothing but a qualified copy every expansion must be followed by its contraction. I know that a revulsion of the paper system is inevitable; but I know, also, that these seventy-five millions of gold and silver is the bulwark of the country, and will enable every honest bank to meet its liabilities, and every prudent citizen to take care of himself.

Turning to some points in the civil administration of President Jackson, and how much do we not find to admire! The great cause of the constitution has been vindicated from an imputation of more than forty years' duration. He has demonstrated, by the time itself, that a national bank is not 'necessary' to the fiscal operations of the federal government, and in that demonstration he has upset the argument of General Hamilton, and the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and all that ever has been said in favor of the constitutionality of a national bank. All this argument and decision rested on the single assumption of the 'necessity' of that institution to the federal government. He has shown it is not 'necessary;' that the currency of the constitution, and especially a gold currency, is all that the federal government wants, and that she can get that whenever she pleases. In this single act, he has vindicated the constitution from an unjust imputation, and knocked from under the decision of the Supreme Court the assumed fact on which it rested. He has prepared the way for the reversal of that decision; and it is a question for lawyers to answer, whether the case is not ripe for the application of that writ of most remedial nature, as Lord Coke calls it, and which was invented, lest, in any case, there should be an oppressive defect of justice! the venerable writ of audita querela defendentis, to ascertain the truth of a fact happening since the judgment; and upon the due finding of which the judgment will be vacated. Let the lawyers bring their books, and answer us, if there is not a case here presented for the application of that ancient and most remedial writ?

From President Jackson, the country has first learned the true theory and practical intent of the constitution, in giving to the Executive a qualified negative on the legislative power of Congress. Far from being an odious, dangerous, or kingly prerogative, this power, as vested of the famous veto power rested in the tribunes of the people among the Romans, and intended to suspend the passage of a law until the people themselves should have time to consider it. The qualified veto of the President destroys nothing; it only delays the passage of a law, and refers it to the people for their consideration and decision. It is the reference of a law, not to a committee of the House, or of the whole House, but to the committee of the whole Union. It is a recommitment of the bill to the people, for them to examine and consider; and if, upon this examination, they are content to pass it, it will pass at the next session. The delay of a few months is the only effect of a veto, in a case where the people shall ultimately approve a law; where they do not approve it, the interposition of the veto is the barrier which saves them the adoption of a law, the repeal of which might afterwards be almost impossible. The qualified negative is, therefore, a beneficent power, intended, as General Hamilton expressly declares in the 'Federalist,' to protect, first, the executive department from the encroachments of the legislative department; and, secondly, to preserve the people from hasty, dangerous, or criminal legislation on the part of their representatives. This is the design and intention of the veto power; and the fear expressed by General Hamilton was, that Presidents, so far from exercising it too often, would not exercise it as often as the safety of the people required; that they might lack the moral courage to stake themselves in opposition to a favorite measure of the majority of the two Houses of Congress; and thus deprive the people, in many instances, of their right to pass upon a bill before it becomes a final law. The cases in which President Jackson has exercised the veto power has shown the soundness of these observations. No ordinary President would have staked himself against the Bank of the United States, and the two Houses of Congress. in 1832. It required President Jackson to confront that power-to stem that torrent-to stay the progress of that charter, and to refer it to the people for their decision. His moral courage was equal to the crisis. He arrested the charter until it could go to the people, and they have arrested it for ever. Had he not done so, the charter would have become law, and its repeal almost impossible. The people of the whole been unavailing; the bank would have been

Union would now have been in the condition of the people of Pennsylvania, bestrode by the monster, in daily conflict with him, and maintaining a doubtful contest for supremacy between the government of a State and the directory of a moneyed corporation.

To detail specific a ts which adorn the administration of President Jackson, and illustrate the intuitive sagacity of his intellect, the firm. ness of his mind, his disregard of personal popu. larity, and his entire devotion to the public good, would be inconsistent with this ratio sketch, intended merely to present general views, and not to detail single actions, howso. ever worthy they may be of a splendid page in the volume of history. But how can we pass over the great measure of the removal of the public moneys from the Bank of the United States, in the autumn of 1833? that wise, heroic, and masterly measure of prevention, which has rescued an empire from the fangs of a merciless, revengeful, greedy, insatiate, implacable moneyed power! It is a remark for which I an indebted to the philosophic observation of my most esteemed colleague and friend (point. ing to Dr. Linn), that, while it requires far greater talent to foresee an evil before it happens, and to arrest it by precautionary measures than it requires to apply an adequate remedy to the same evil after it has happened, yet the applause bestowed by the world is always greatest in the latter case. Of this, the removal of the public moneys from the Bank of the United States is an eminent instance. The veto of 1832, which arrested the charter which Congress had granted, immediately received the applause and approbation of a majority of the Union: the removal of the deposits, which prevented the bank from forcing a recharter, was disapproved by a large majority of the country and even of his own friends; yet the veto would have been unavailing, and the bank would inevitably have been rechartered, if the deposits ha not been removed. The immense sums of pullic money since accumulated would have enabled the bank, if she had retained the possess sion of it, to have coerced a recharter. Nothing but the removal could have prevented her from extorting a recharter from the sufferings an terrors of the people. If it had not been for that rieasure, the previous veto would have

Of this, the removal of eys from the Bank of the United eminent instance. The immense sums of pub nce accumulated would have enk, if she had retained the possess ave coerced a recharter. Nothing ral could have prevented her from echarter from the sufferings and people. If it had not been for , the previous veto would have ng; the bank would have been gain installed in power; and this entire federal government would have been held as an appendage to that bank, and administered according to her directions, and by her nominees. That great measure of prevention, the removal of the deposits, though feebly and faintly supported by friends at first, has expelled the bank from the field, and driven her into abeyance under a State charter. She is not dead, but, holding her capital and stockholders together under a State charter, she has taken a position to watch ereats, and to profit by them. The royal tiger has gone into the jungle; and, crouched on his belly, he awaits the favorable moment for emerging from his covert, and springing on the body of the unsuspicious traveller!

The Treasury order for exc'iding paper moner from the land offices is another wise measure, originating in enlightened forecast, and preventing great mischiefs. The President foresaw the evils of suffering a thousand streams of paper money, issuing from a thousand different tanks, to discharge themselves on the national domain. He foresaw that if these currents were allowed to run their course, that the public lands would be swept away, the Treasury would te filled with irredeemable paper, a vast number of banks must be broken by their folly, and the cry set up that nothing but a national bank could regulate the currency. He stopped the ourse of these streams of paper; and, in so doing has saved the country from a great calamity, and excited anew the machinations of those whose schemes of gain and mischief have been disappointed; and who had counted on a new edition of panic and pressure, and again saluting Congress with the old story of confidence destroved, currency ruined, prosperity annihilated, and distress produced, by the tyranny of one ma. They began their lugubrious song; but ridicule and contempt have proved too strong for money and insolence; and the panic letter of the ex-president of the denationalized bank, after limping about for a few days, has shrunk from the lash of public scorn, and disappeared from the forum of public debate.

The difficulty with France: what an instance it presents of the superior sagacity of President sukson over all the commonplace politicians who beset and impede his administration at home! That difficulty, inflamed and aggravated by domestic faction, wore, at one time, a portentous aspect; the skill, firmness, elevation of purpose, and manly frankness of the President, avoided the danger, accomplished the object, commanded the admiration of Europe, and retained the friendship of France. He conducted the delicate affair to a successful and mutually honorable issue. All is amicably and happily terminated, leaving not a wound, nor even a scar, behind—leaving the Frenchman and American on the ground on which they have stood for fifty years, and should for ever stand; the ground of friendship, respect, good will, and mutual wishes for the honor, happiness, and prosperity, of each other.

But why this specification? So beneficent and so glorious has been the administration of this President, that where to begin, and where to end, in the enumeration of great measures, would be the embarrassment of him who has his eulogy to make. He came into office the first of genv als; he goes out the first of states-His civil competitors have shared the fate of his military opponents; and Washington city has been to the American politicians who have assailed him, what New Orleans was to the British generals who attacked his lines. Repulsed! driven back! discomfited! crushed! has been the fate of all assailants, foreign and domestic, civil and military. At home and abroad, the impress of his genius and of his character is felt. He has impressed upon the age in which he lives the stamp of his arms, of his diplomacy, and of his domestic policy. In a word, so transcendent have been the merits of his administration, that they have operated a miracle upon the minds of his most inveterate opponents. He has expunged their objections to military chieftains! He has shown them that they were mistaken; that military men were not the dangerous rulers they had imagined, but safe and prosperous conductors of the vessel of state. He has changed their fear into love. With visible signs they admit their error, and, instead of deprecating, they now invoke the reign of chieftains. They labored hard to procure a minitary successor to the present incumbent; and if their love goes on increasing at the same frames. rate, the republic may be put to the expense of periodical wars, to breed a perpetual succession of these chieftains to rule over them and their posterity for ever.

To drop this irony, which the inconsistency of mad opponents has provoked, and to return to the plain delineations of historical painting, the mind instinctively dwells on the vast and unprecedented popularity of this President. Great is the influence, great the power, greater than any man ever before possessed in our America, which he has acquired over the public mind. And how has he acquired it? Not by the arts of intrigue, or the juggling tricks of diplomacy; not by undermining rivals, or sacrificing public interests for the gratification of classes or individuals. But he has acquired it, first, by the exercise of an intuitive sagacity which, leaving all book learning at an immeasurable distance behind, has always enabled him to adopt the right remedy, at the right time, and to conquer soonest when the men of forms and office thought him most near to ruin and despair. Next, by a moral courage which knew no fear when the public good beekoned him to go on. Last, and chiefest, he has acquired it by an open honesty of purpose, which knew no concealments; by a straightforwardness of action, which disdained the forms of office and the arts of intrigue; by a disinterestedness of motive, which knew no selfish or sordid calculation; a devotedness of patriotism, which staked every thing personal on the issue of every measure which the public welfare required him to adopt. By these qualities, and these means, he has acquired his prodigious popularity, and his transcendent influence over the public mind; and if there are any who envy that influence and popularity, let them envy, also, and emulate, if they can, the qualities and means by which they were acquired.

Great has been the opposition to President Jackson's administration; greater, perhaps, than ever has been exhibited against any government, short of actual insurrection and forcible resist-Reveiution has been proclaimed! and every thing has been done that could be expected to produce revolution. The country has been alarmed, agitated, convulsed. From the Senate chamber to the village bar-room, from one end of the continent to the other, denunciation, agitation, excitement, has been the order of the day. For eight years the President of this republic has stood upon a volcano, vomiting fire and flames upon him, and threatening the lust. This history is not to be written in our country itself with ruin and desolation, if the day. The cotemporaries of such events are my people did not expel the usurper, despot, and the hands to describe them. Time must first di tyrant, as he was called, from the high place to which the suffrages of millions of freemen hat elevated him.

Great is the confidence which he has always reposed in the discernment and equity of the American people. I have been accustomed to see him for many years, and under many discouraging trials; but never saw him doubt, for an instant, the ultimate support of the people. It was my privilege to see him often, and during the most gloomy period of the panic conspiracy. when the whole earth seemed to be in commotion against him, and when many friends were faltering, and stout hearts were quailing, before the raging storm which bank machination, and senatorial denunciation, had conjured up to over. whelm him. I saw him in the darkest moments of this gloomy period; and never did I see his confidence in the ultimate support of his fellow. citizens forsake him for an instant. He always said the people would stand by those who stand by them; and nobly have they justified that confidence! That verdict, the voice of millions. which now demands the expurgation of that sentence, which the Senate and the bank then pronounced upon him, is the magnificent response of the people's hearts to the implicit confidence which he then reposed in them. But it was not in the people only that he had confidence; there was another, and a far higher Power, to which he constantly looked to save the country, and its defenders, from every danger; and signal events prove that he did not look to that high Power in vain.

Sir, I think it right, in approaching the termination of this great question, to present this faint and rapid sketch of the brilliant, beneficent and glorious administration of President Jackson. It is not for me to attempt to do it justice; it is not for ordinary men to attempt its history. His military life, resplendent with dazzling events, will demand the pen of a nerrous writer; his civil administration, replete with scenes which have called into action so many and such various passions of the human heart, and which has given to native sagacity so many victories over practised politicians, will require the profound, luminous, and philosophical conceptions of a Livy, a Plutarch, or a Sals called, from the high place to ages of millions of freemen had

And now, sir, I finish the task which, three rars ago, I imposed on myself. Solitary and abne, and amidst the jeers and taunts of my apponents, I put this ball in motion. The people have taken it up, and rolled it forward, and iam no longer any thing but a unit in the vast ass which now propels it. In the name of that mass I speak. I demand the execution of the edict of the people; I demand the expurgation of that sentence which the voice of a few stators, and the power of their confederate, the Bank of the United States, has caused to be lared on the journal of the Senate; and which the voice of millions of freemen has ordered to be expunged from it.

CHAPTER CLXI.

MPINGING RESOLUTION: MR. CLAY, MR. CAL-HOUN, MR. WEBSTER: LAST SCENE: RESOLU-HON PASSED, AND EXECUTED.

ITURDAY, the 14th of January, the democratic entors agreed to have a meeting, and to take hir final measures for passing the expunging solution. They knew they had the numbers; at they also knew that they had adversaries grapple with to whom might be applied the oud motto of Louis the Fourteenth: "Not an hequal match for numbers." They also knew at members of the party were in the process of parating from it, and would require conciliag. They met in the night at the then famous staurant of Boulanger, giving to the assemblage eair of a convivial entertainment. It continutill midnight, and required all the moderan, tact and skill of the prime movers to obn and maintain the union upon details, on success of which the fate of the measure depended. The men of conciliation were to be the efficient men of that night; and all the winning resources of Wright, Allen of Ohio and Linn of Missouri, were put into requisition. There were serious differences upon the mode of expurgation, while agreed upon the thing; and finally obliteration, the favorite of the mover, was given up; and the mode of expurgation adopted which had been proposed in the resolutions of the General Assembly of Virginia; namely, to inclose the obnoxious sentence in a square of black lines-an oblong square: a compromise of opinions to which the mover agreed upon condition of being allowed to compose the epitaph-" Expunged by the order of the Senate." The agreement which was to lead to victory was then adopted, each one severally pledging himself to it, that there should be no adjournment of the Senate after the resolution was called until it was passed; and that it should be called immediately after the morning business on the Monday ensuing. Expecting a protracted session, extending through the day and night, and knowing the difficulty of keeping men steady to their work and in good humor, when tired and hungry, the mover of the proceeding took care to provide, as far as possible, against such a state of things; and gave orders that night to have an ample supply of cold hams, turkeys, rounds of beef, pickles, wines and cups of hot coffee, ready in a certain committee room near the Senate chamber by four o'clock on the afternoon of Monday.

The motion to take up the subject was made at the appointed time, and immediately a debate of long speeches, chiefly on the other side, opened itself upon the question. It was evident that comsumption of time, delay and adjournment, was their plan. The three great leaders did not join in the opening; but their place was well supplied by many of their friends, able speakers-some effective, some eloquent: Preston of South Carolina; Richard H. Bayard and John M. Clayton of Delaware; Crittenden of Kentucky; Southard of New Jersey; White of Tennessee; Ewing of Ohio. They were only the half in number, but strong in zeal and ability, that commenced the contest three years before, reinforced by Mr. White of Tennessee. As the darkness of approaching night came on, and the great chandelier was lit up, splendidly illuminating the chamber, then crowded with the members of the House, and the lobbies and galleries filled to their utmost capacity by visitors and spectators. the seene became grand and impressive. A few spoke on the side of the resolution-chiefly Rives, Buchanan, Niles - and with an air of ease and satisfaction that bespoke a quiet determination, and a consciousness of victory. The committee room had been resorted to in parties of four and six at a time, always leaving enough on watch: and not resorted to by one side alone. The opposition were invited to a full participation-an invitation of which those who were able to maintain their good temper readily availed themselves; but the greater part were not in a humor to eat any thing-especially at such a feast. The night was wearing away: the expungers were in full force-masters of the chamber-happy-and visibly determined to remain. It became evident to the great opposition leaders that the inevitable hour had come: that the damnable deed was to be done that night: and that the dignity of silence was no longer to them a tenable position. The battle was going against them, and they must go into it, without being able to re-establish it. In the beginning, they had not considered the expunging movement a serious proceeding: as it advanced they still expected it to miscarry on some point: now the reality of the thing stood before them, confronting their presence, and refusing to "down" at any command. They broke silence, and gave vent to language which bespoke the agony of their feelings, and betrayed the revulsion of stomach with which they approached the odious subject. Mr. Calhoun said:

"No one, not blinded by party zeal, can possibly be insensible that the measure proposed is a violation of the constitution. The constitution requires the Senate to keep a journal; this resolution goes to expunge the journal. If you may expunge a part, you may expunge the whole; and if it is expunged, how is it kept? The constitution says the journal shall be kept; this resolution says it shall be destroyed. does the very thing which the constitution declares shall not be done. That is the argument, the whole argument. There is none other. Talk of precedents? and precedents drawn from a foreign country? They don't apply. No, sir. This is to be done, not in consequence of argument, but in spite of argument. I understand the case. I know perfectly well the gentlemen have no liberty to vote otherwise. They are coerced by an exterior power. They try, indeed, to comfort their conscience by saying such a one as might have been perpetrated that it is the will of the people, and the voice of the days of Pompey or Cæsar; but an actilities the will of the people, and the voice of the people. It is no such thing. We all know how these legislative returns have been obtained It is by dictation from the White House. The President himself, with that vast mass of patron age which he wields, and the thousand expecta tions he is able to hold up, has obtained the votes of the State Legislatures; and this, for sooth, is said to be the voice of the people. The voice of the people! Sir, can we forget the scene which was exhibited in this chamber whe that expunging resolution was first introduchere? Have we forgotten the universal givin way of conscience, so that the senator free Missouri was left alone? I see before me s sators who could not swallow that resolution and has its nature changed since then? Is any more constitutional now than it was then Not at all. But executive power has interpoded. Talk to me of the voice of the people! N sir. It is the combination of patronage an power to coerce this body into a gross and pa pable violation of the constitution. Some indi viduals, I perceive, think to escape through the particular form in which this act is to be perpetrated. They tell us that the resolution of your records is not to be expunged, but is only to be endorsed 'Expunged.' Really, sir, I not know how to argue against such contempt ble sophistry. The occasion is too solemn for an argument of this sort. You are going a violate the constitution, and you get rid of the infamy by a falsehood. Mr. Calhonn was right in his taunt about the niversal giving way when the resolution was fist introduced - the solitude in which the mover was then left-and in which solitude he rould have been left to the end, had it not been brhis courage in reinstating the word expunge, and appealing to the people.

Mr. Clay commenced with showing that he ad never believed in the reality of the proceedig until now; that he had considered the resoletion as a thing to be taken up for a speech. ad laid down when the speech was delivered; ed that the last laying down, at the previous assion, was the end of the matter. He said:

"Considering that he was the mover of the molution of March, 1834, and the consequent plation in which he stood to the majority of he Senate by whose vote it was adopted, he had felt it to be his duty to say something m this expunging resolution; and he had imays intended to do so when he should be ersuaded that there existed a settled purpose f pressing it to a final decision. But it had een so taken up and put down at the last sesson-taken up one day, when a speech was prepared for delivery, and put down when it was monounced—that he had really doubted wheher there existed any serious intention of ever patting it to the vote. At the very close of the ast session, it will be recollected that the resohtion came up, and in several quarters of the Senate a disposition was manifested to come to definitive decision. On that occasion he had offered to waive his right to address the Senate, and silently to vote upon the resolution; but it was again laid upon the table; and laid there for er, as the country supposed, and as he beleved. It is, however, now revived; and, sun-

Then, after an argument against the expurgation, which, of necessity, was obliged to be a reapitulation of the argument in favor of the siginal condemnation of the President, he went m to give vent to his feelings in expressions not ess bitter and denunciatory of the President nd his friends than those used by Mr. Calhoun, aying:

"But if the matter of expunction be contrary the truth of the case, reproachful for its base abserviency, derogatory from the just and ne- the debate which seemed to indicate its concluhis could never have been consummated by a cessary powers of the Senate, and repugnant to Roman Senate until the times of Caligula and the constitution of the United States the manner in which it is proposed to accomplish this dark deed is also highly exceptionable. The expunging resolution, which is to blot out or enshroud the four or tive lines in which the resolution of 1834 stands recorded, or rather the recitals by which it is preceded, are spun out into a thread of enormous length. It runs, whereas, and whereas, and whereas, and whereas, and whereas, &c., into a formidable array of nine several whereases. One who should have the courage to begin to read them, unaware of what was to be their termination, would think that at the end of such a tremendous display he must find the very devil."

> And then coming to the cenclusion, he concentrated his wrath and grief in an apostrophizing peroration, which lacked nothing but verisimilitude to have been grand and affecting.

"But why should I detain the Senate, or needlessly waste my breath in fruitless exertions. The decree has gone forth. It is one of & urgency, too. The deed is to be done-that foul deed which, like the blood-stained hands of the guilty Macbeth, all ocean's waters will never wash out. Proceed, then, with the noble work which lies before you, and, like other skilful executioners, do it quickly. And when you have perpetrated it, go home to the people, and tell them what glorious honors you have achieved for our common country. Tell them that you have extinguished one of the brightest and purest lights that ever burnt at the altar of civil liberty. Tell them that you have silenced one of the noblest batteries that ever thundered in defence of the constitution, and bravely spiked the cannon. Tell them that, henceforward, no matter what daring or outrageous act any President may perform, you have for ever hermetically sealed the mouth of the Senate. Tell them that he may fearlessly assume what powers he pleases, snatch from its lawful custody er changes having taken place in the members the public purse, command a military detach-this body, it would seem that the present ment to enter the halls of the capitol, overawe wign is to bring the resolution to an absolute Congress, trample down the constitution, and raze every bulwark of freedom; but that the Senate must stand mute, in silent submission, and not dare to raise its opposing voice. That it must wait until a House of Representatives, humbled and subdued like itself, and a majority of it composed of the partisans of the President, shall prefer articles of impeachment. Tell them, finally, that you have restored the glorious doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance. And, if the people do not pour out their indig-nation and imprecations, I have yet to learn the character of American freemen."

Mr. Webster spoke last, and after a pause in sion; and only rose, and that slowly, as the question was about to be put. Having no personal griefs in relation to General Jackson like Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Clay, and with a temperament less ardent, he delivered himself with comparative moderation, confining himself to a brief protest against the act; and concluding, in measured and considered language, with expressing his grief and mortification at what he was to behold; thus:

"We have seen, with deep and sincere pain, the legislatures of respectable States instructing the senators of those States to vote for and support this violation of the journal of the Senate: and this pain is infinitely increased by our full belief, and entire conviction, that most, if not all these proceedings of States had their origin in promptings from Washington; that they have been argently requested and insisted on, us being necessary to the accomplishment of the intended purpose; and that it is nothing else but the influence and power of the executive branch of this government which has brought the legislatures of so many of the free States of this Union to quit the sphere of their ordinary duties, for the purpose of co-operating to accomplish a measure, in our judgment, so unconstitional, so derogatory to the character of the Senate, and marked with so broad an impression of compliance with power. But this resolution is to pass. We expect it. That cause, which has been powerful enough to influence so many State legislatures, will show itself powerful enough, especially with such aids, to secure the passage of the resolution here. We make up passage of the resolution here. our minds to behold the spectacle which is to ensue. We collect ourselves to look on, in silence, while a scene is exhibited which, if we did not regard it as a ruthless violation of a sacred instrument, would appear to us to be little elevated above the character of a contemptible farce. This scene we shall behold; and hundreds of American citizens, as many as may crowd into these lobbies and galleries, will behold it also: with what feelings I do not undertake to say."

Midnight was now approaching. The dense masses which filled every inch of room in the lobbies and the galleries, remained immovable. No one went out: no one could get in. The floor of the Senate was crammed with privileged persons, and it seemed that all Congress was there. Expectation, and determination to see the conclusion, was depicted upon every countenance. It was evident there was to be no adjournment until the vote should be taken—until the deed was done; and this aspect of invincible determination, had its effect upon the ranks of the opposition. They began to falter und a useless persistence, for they alone now did to speaking; and while Mr. Webster was yet w citing his protest, two senators from the opportunity site side, who had been best able to maintain the equanimity, came round to the author of the View, and said "This question has degenerate into a trial of nerves and muscles. It has le come a question of physical endurance; and see no use in wearing ourselves out to keep for a few hours longer what has to come before we separate. We see that you are able an determined to carry your measure; so call the vote as soon as you please. We shall say more." Mr. Webster concluded. No one ros There was a pause, a dead silence, and an interest feeling. Presently the silence was invaded ! the single word "question"-the parliamet tary call for a vote-rising from the seats different senators. One blank in the resolu remained to be filled-the date of its adoption It was done. The acting president of the S nate, Mr. King, of Alabama, then directed the roll to be called. The presidrofficer promptly gave the order, which the esprescribe in such cases, to clear the gallery. Benton opposed the order, saying :

I hope the galleries will not be cleared, as my innocent persons will be excluded, who re been guilty of no violation of order. Ir. Benton knew that he was the object of cutrage, and that the way to treat these altern wretches was to defy and seize Tomlinson, Webster, White of Tennessee.

Among the Justices of the Supreme Court, these changes took place from the commence-immediately over his head, and had evidently collected into that place. His motion was agreed to. The order to clear the galleries was revoked; the order to seize the disturbers was given, and immediately executed by the energetic sergeantat-arms, Mr. John Shackford, and his assistants. The ringleader was seized, and brought to the bar. This sudden example intimidated the rest; and the expanging process was performed in quiet. The whole seene was impressive; but no part of it so much so as to see the great leaders who, for seven long years have no and upon General Jackson, and a Correct times pronounced him rained, each risking in los place, with pain and reluctance, to confess themselves vanquished-to admit his power, and their weakness-and to exhale their griefs in unavailing reproaches, and impotent deprecations. It was a tribute to his invincibility which cast into the shade all the culogiums of his friends. The gratification of General Jackson was extreme. He gave a grand dinner to the expungers (as they were called) and their wives; and being too weak to sit at the table, he only met the company, placed the "head-expunger" in his chair, and withdrew to his sick chamber. That expurgation! it was the "crowning mercy" of his civil, as New Orleans had been of his military, life!

THE SUPREME COURT-JUDGES AND OFFICERS.

THE death of Chief Justice Marshall had vacated that high office, and Roger B. Taney, Esq., was nominated to fill it. He still encountered opposition in the Senate; but only enough to show how much that opposition had declined since the time when he was rejected as Secretary of the Treasury. The vote against his confirmation was reduced to fifteen; namely: Messrs. Black of Mississippi; Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden; Ewing of Ohio; Leigh of Virginia; Mangum; Naudain of Delaware; Porter of Louisiana; Preston; Robbins of Rhode Island; Southard,

FAREWELL ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT JACKSON— EXTRACT.

Following the example of Washington, General Jackson issued a Farewell Address to the people of the United States, at his retiring from the presidency; and, like that of Washington, it was principally devoted to the danger of disunion, and to the preservation of harmony and good feeling between the different sections of the country. General Washington only had to contemplate the danger of disunion, as a possibility, and as an event of future contingency;

General Jackson had to confront it as a presentual, subsisting danger; and said:

"We behold systematic efforts publicly in to sow the seeds of discord between differ parts of the United States, and to place pa divisions directly upon geographical distinction to excite the South against the North, and North against the South, and to force into controversy the most delicate and exciting pics-topics upon which it is impossible the large portion of the Union can ever speak wi out strong emotion. CLUSION OF GENERAL JACKSON'S ADMINISTRATION.

renemies of popular representative governat may suppose that they find something in work to justify the reproach of faction and sace which they lavish upon such forms of enument; but it will be by committing the take of overlooking the broad features of a picture to find a blemish in the detail-disregarding a statesman's life to find a misstep; and shutting their eyes upon the action of the people. The mistakes and errors of public men are fairly shown in this work; and that might seem to justify the reproach: but the action of the people is immediately seen to come in, to correct every error, and to show the capacity of the people for wise and virtuous government. It would be tedious to enumerate the instances of this conservative supervision, so continually exemplified in tho course of this history; but some eminent cases stand out too prominently to be overlooked. The recharter of the Bank of the United States was a favorite measure with politicians; the people rejected it; and the wisdom of their conduct is now universally admitted. The distribution of land and money was a favorite measure with politicians; the people condemned it and no one of those engaged in these distributions ever attained the presidency. President Jackson, in his last annual message to Congress, and in direct reference to this conservative action of the people, declared "that all that had occurred during his administration was calculated to inspire him with increased confidence in the stability of our institutions." I make the same declaration, founded upon the same view of the conduct of the people-upon the observation of their conduct in trying circumstances; and their uniform discernment to see, and virtue and patriotism to do, whatever the honor and interest of the country required. The work is full of consolation and encouragement to popular government; and in that point of view it may be safely referred to by the friends of that form of government. I have written veraciously and of acts, not of motives. I have shown a persevering attack upon President Jackson on the part of three eminent public men during his whole administration; but have made no attribution of motives. But another historian has not been so forbearing-one to whose testimony there can be no objection, either on account of bias, judgment, or information; and who, writing under the responsibility of history, has indicated a motive in two of the assailants. Mr. Adams, in his history of the administration of Mr. Monroe, gives an account of the attempt in the two Houses of Congress in 1818, to censure General Jackson for his conduct in the Seminole war, and says: "Efforts were made in Com gress to procure a vote censuring the conduct of General Jackson, whose fast increasing popularity had, in all probability, already excited the envy of politicians. Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun in particular favored this movement; but the President himself, and Mr. Adams, the Secretary of State, who had charge of the Spanish negotiation, warmly esponsed the cause of the American commander." This fear of a rising popularity was not without reason. There were proposals to bring General Jackson forward for the presidency in 1816, and in 1820; to which he would not listen, on account of his friendship to Mr. Monroe. A refusal to enter the canvass at those periods, and for that reason, naturally threw him into it in 1824, when he would come into competition with those two gentlemen. Their opposition to him, therefore, dates back to the first term of Mr. Monroe's administration; that of Mr. Clay openly and responsibly; that of Mr. Calhoun secretly and deceptiously, as shown in the "Exposition." They were both of the same political party school with General

Jackson; and it was probably his rising to the head of that party which threw them both of it. Mr. Webster's opposition arose from political relations, as belonging to the opposischool; and was always more moderate, as better guarded by decorum. He even appears sometimes, as the justifier and supporter President Jackson's measures; as in the we known instance of South Carolina nullification Mr. Clay's efforts were limited to the overthrow of President Jackson; Mr. Calhoun's etended to the overthrow of the Union, and the establishment of a southern confederacy, the slave States. The subsequent volume we have to pursue this aubject.

This chapter ends the view of the administration of President Jackson, promised to him his lifetime, constituting an entire work in self, and covering one of the most eventful priods of American history—as trying to the virtue and intelligence of the American peop as was the war of the revolution to their countries.

CHAPTER CLXV.

RETIRING AND DEATH OF GENERAL JACKSON-ADMINISTRATION OF MARTIN VAN BUREN.

n's presidency expired on the 3d of March, 7. The next day, at twelve, he appeared th his successor, Mr. Van Buren, on the eleted and spacious eastern portico of the capitol, one of the citizens who came to witness the guration of the new President, and no way tinguished from them, except by his place on left hand of the President elect. The day s beautiful—clear sky, balmy vernal sun, mouil atmosphere; -- and the assemblage imase. On foot, in the large area in front of steps, orderly without troops, and closely dred together, their faces turned to the porp-presenting to the beholders from all the tern windows the appearance of a field paved h human faces. This vast crowd remained sted to their places, and profoundly silent, il the ceremony of inauguration was over. vas the stillness and silence of reverence and ction; and there was no room for mistake as shom this mute and impressive homage was dered. For once, the rising was eclipsed by setting sun. Though disrobed of power, retiring to the shades of private life, it was ent that the great ex-President was the abbing object of this intense regard. At the ment he began to descend the broad steps of pertico to take his seat in the open carriage ch was to bear him away, the deep repressed ng of the dense mass brook forth, acclamasand cheers bursting from the heart and g the air—such as power never commanded, man in power received. It was the affecgratitude, and admiration of the living age, ting for the last time a great man. It was acclaim of posterity, breaking from the ms of contemporaries. It was the anticia of futurity—unpurchasable homage to Eight years afterwards he died at the Hermitsecond and last term of General Jack- the hero-patriot who, all his life, and in all circumstances of his life, in peace and in war, and glorious in each, had been the friend of his country, devoted to her, regardless of self. Uncovered, and bowing, with a look of unaffected humility and thankfulness, he acknowledged in mute signs his deep sensibility to this affecting overflow of popular feeling. I was looking down from a side window, and felt an emotion which had never passed through me before. I had seen the inauguration of many presidents, and their going away, and their days of state, vested with power, and surrounded by the splendors of the first magistracy of a great republic. But they all appeared to be as pageants, empty and soulless, brief to the view, unreal to the touch, and soon to vanish. But here there seemed to be a reality-a real scene-a man and the peoplehe, laying down power and withdrawing through the portals of everlasting fame; -they, sounding in his ears the everlasting plaudits of unborn generations. Two days after, I saw the patriot ex-President in the car which bore him off to his desired seclusion. I saw him depart with that look of quiet enjoyment which bespoke the inward satisfaction of the soul at exchanging the cares of office for the repose of home. History, poetry, oratory, marble and brass, will hand down the military exploits of Jackson: this work will commemorate the events of his civil administration, not less glorious than his military achievements, great as they were; and this brief notice of his last appearance at the American capital is intended to preserve some faint memory of a scene, the grandeur of which was so impressive to the beholder, and the solace of which must have been so grateful to the heart of the departing patriot.

age, in the full possession of all his faculties, and strong to the last in the ruling passion of his soul—love of country. Public history will do justice to his public life; but a further notice is wanted of him—a notice of the domestic man—of the man at home, with his wife, his friends, his neighbors, his slaves; and this I feel some qualification for giving, from my long and varied acquaintance with him. First, his intimate and early friend—then a rude rupture—afterwards friendship and intimacy for twenty years, and until his death: in all forty years of personal observation, in the double relation of friend and foe, and in all the walks of life, public and private, civil and military.

The first time that I saw General Jackson was at Nashville, Tennessee, in 1799-he on the bench, a judge of the then Superior Court, and I a youth of seventeen, back in the crowd. He was then a remarkable man, and had his ascendant over all who approached him, not the effect of his high judicial station, nor of the senatorial rank which he had held and resigned; nor of military exploits, for he had not then been to war; but the effect of personal qualities; cordial and graceful manners, hospitable temper, clevation of mind, undaunted spirit, generosity, aud perfect integrity. In charging the jury in the impending case, he committed a slight solecism in language which grated on my ear, and lodged on my memory, without derogating in the least from the respect which he inspired; and without awakening the slightest suspicion that I was ever to be engaged in smoothing his diction. The first time I spoke with him was some years after, at a (then) frontier town in Tennessee, when he was returning from a Southern visit, which brought him through the towns and camps of some of the Indian tribes. In pulling off his overcoat, I perceived on the white lining of the turning down sleeve, a dark speck, which had life and motion. I brushed it off, and put the heel of my shoe upon it-little thinking that I was ever to brush away from him game of a very different kind. He smiled; and we began a conversation in which he very quickly revealed a leading trait of his character,-that of encouraging young men in their laudable pursuits. Getting my name and parentage, and learning my intended profession, he manifested a regard for me, said he had received hospitality at my father's house in North Carolina, gave me kind invitations to visit him; as expressed a belief that I would do well at the bar—generous words which had the effect of promoting what they undertook to foretell. So after, he had further opportunity to show his generous feelings. Dels were usual in that time, and he had his plare of them, with their unpleasant concomipast; but they passed away with all their aniposities, and he has often been seen zealously

had but lately been arrayed in deadly hosdity.

His temper was placable as well as irascible, nd his reconciliations were cordial and sincere. that, my own case was a signal instance. fter a deadly feud, I became his confidential wiser; was offered the highest marks of his for, and received from his dying bed a mese of friendship, dictated when life was desting, and when he would have to pause for eath. There was a deep-scated vein of piety him, unaffectedly showing itself in his revere for divine worship, respect for the ministers the gospel, their hospitable reception in his se, and constant encouragement of all the ous tendencies of Mrs. Jackson. And when by both afterwards became members of a urch, it was the natural and regular result of ir early and cherished feelings. He was genin his house, and alive to the tenderest emoas; and of this, I can give an instance, greatly contrast with his supposed character, and oth more than a long discourse in showing at that character really was. I arrived at house one wet chilly evening, in February, came upon him in the twilight, sitting alone bre the fire, a lamb and a child between his es. He started a little, called a servant to ove the two innocents to another room, and lained to me how it was. The child had d because the lamb was out in the cold, and ged him to bring it in-which he had done please the child, his adopted son, then not years old. The ferocious man does not do ! and though Jackson had his passions and riolence, they were for men and enemieswho stood up against him-and not for en and children, or the weak and helpless: all whom his feelings were those of protecand support. His hospitality was active rell as cordial, embracing the worthy in y walk of life, and seeking out deserving ets to receive it, no matter how obscure.

relation to the son of the famous Daniel Boone. The young man had come to Nashville on his father's business, to be detained some weeks and had his lodgings at a small tavern, towards the lower part of the town. General Jackson heard of it; sought him out; found him; took him home to remain as long as his business detained him in the country, saying, "Your father's dog should not stay in a tavern, where I have a house." This was heart! and I had it from the young man himself, long after, when he was a State Senator of the General Assembly of Missouri, and, as such, nominated me for the United States Senate, at my first election, in 1820: an act of hereditary friendship, as our fathers had been early friends.

Abhorrence of debt, public and private, dislike of banks, and love of hard money-love of justice and love of country, were ruling passions with Jackson; and of these he gave constant evidence in all the situations of his life. Of private debts he contracted none of his own. and made any sacrifices to get out of those incurred for others. Of this he gave a signal instance, not long before the war of 1812-selling the improved part of his estate, with the best buildings of the country upon it, to pay a debt incurred in a mercantile adventure to assist a young relative; and going into log-houses in the forest to begin a new home and farm. He was living in these rude tenements when he vanquished the British at New Orleans; and probably, a view of their conqueror's domicile would have astonished the British officers as much as their defeat had done. He was attached to his friends, and to his country, and never believed any report to the discredit of either, until compelled by proof. He would not believe in the first reports of the surrender of General Hull, and became sad and oppressed when forced to believe it. He never gave up a friend in a doubtful case, or from policy, or calculation. He was a firm believer in the goodness of a superintending Providence, and in the eventual right judgment and justice of the people. I have seen him at the most desperate part of his fortunes, and never saw him waver in the belief that all would come right in the end. In the time of Cromwell he would have been a puritan.

this, I learned a characteristic instance in tion, followed by an instant and decisive action.

It was that which made him a General, and a President for the time in which he served. He had vigorous thoughts, but not the faculty of arranging them in a regular composition, either written or spoken; and in formal papers he usually gave his draft to an aid, a friend, or a secretary, to be written over-often to the loss of vigor. But the thoughts were his own vigorously expressed; and without effort, writing with a rapid pen, and never blotting or altering; but, as Carlyle says of Cromwell, hitting the nail upon the head as he went. I have a great deal of his writing now, some on public affairs and covering several sheets of paper; and no erasures or interlineations anywhere. His conversation was like his writing, a vigorous flowing current, apparently without the trouble of thinking, and always impressive. His conclusions were rapid, and immovable, when he was under strong convictions; though often yielding, on minor points, to his friends. And no man yielded quicker when he was convinced; perfectly illustrating the difference between firmness and obstinacy. Of all the Presidents who have done me the honor to listen to my opinions, there was no one to whom I spoke with more confidence when I felt myself strongly to be in the right.

He had a load to carry all his life; resulting from a temper which refused compromises and bargaining, and went for a clean victory or a clean defeat, in every case. Hence, every step he took was a contest: and, it may be added, every contest was a victory. I have already said that he was elected a Major General in Tennessee-an election on which so much afterwards depended -by one vote. His appointment in the United States regular army was a conquest from the administration, which had twice refused to appoint him a Brigadier, and once disbanded him as a volunteer general, and only yielded to his militia victories. His election as President was a victory over politicians—as was every leading event of his administration.

I have said that his appointment in the regular army was a victory over the administration, and it belongs to the inside view of history, and to the illustration of government mistakes, and the elucidation of individual merit surmounting obstacles, to tell how it was. Twice passed by to give preference to two others in the West (General Harrison and General Winchester), once disbanded, and omitted in all the lists of military nominations, how did he get at last be appointed Major General? It was the Congress had passed an act authorizing th President to accept organized corps of volunteer I proposed to General Jackson to raise a comunder that act, and hold it ready for service He did so; and with this corps and some militi he defeated the Creek Indians, and gained the reputation which forced his appointment in t regular army. I drew up the address which made to his division at the time, and when carried it to him in the evening, I found to child and the lamb between his knees. He h not thought of this resource, but caught at instantly, adopted the address, with two slie alterations, and published it to his division. raised a regiment myself, and made the speech at the general musters, which helped to raise others, assisted by a small band of friendsfeeling confident that if we could conquer to difficulty-master the first step-and get hi upon the theatre of action, he would do there himself. This is the way he got into the reg In army, not only unselected by the wisdom government, but rejected by it-a stone reject by the master builders-and worked in by unseen hand, to become the corner stone of t temple. The aged men of Tennessee will member all this, and it is time that histo should learn it. But to return to the priva life and personal characteristics of this extra dinary man.

Her greatest culogy is in the affection which he bore her living, and in the sorrow with which he mourned her dead. She died at the moment of the General's first election to the Presidency; and every one that had a just petition to present, or charitable request to make, lost in her death, the surest channel to the ear and to the heart of the President. His regard for her survived, and lived in the persons of her nearest relatives. A nephew of hers was his adopted son and heir, taking his own name, and now the respectable master of the Hermitage. Another nephew, Andrew Jackson Donelson, Esq., was his private secretary when President. The Presidential mansion was presided over during his term by her niece, the most amiable Mrs. Donelson; and all his conduct bespoke affectionate and lasting remem-

"Decline to accede to this proposition, 526; object to carry ont his instructions, 526; at a proper time a distinct proposition would be presented on this subject," 526,

Moved to lay the resolutions on the table, by Mr. Calhoun, 520; object to give the Senator an opportunity to prepare a rescinding resolution, 526; curious to see how such a proceeding would be reconciled with the independent existence of the Senate, 526; how is it proposed to repeal a journal ? 526; the only course left is to declare that the principle upon which the Senate acted is not correct, 526; what is the principle to be overthrown but that "we have a right to express our opinions," 526; then it comes to this, that the Senate had no right to express its opinion in relation to the executive, 526; "the king can do no wrong," 526; this is tho very question in which the expunging our legislative freedom and independence is to be agitated, 527; a question of the atmost magnitude, 527; none of deeper or more radical importance, 527.

it is said we have no right to destroy a part of the journal, 529; to expunge, It is said, is to destroy, 529; not so, 529; it is incorporated in the expunging resolution, and lives as long as that lives, 529; APPLETONS'

AMERICAN CYCLOTÆDIA.

NEW REVISED EDITION.

Entirely rewritten by the ablest writers on every subject. Printed from new type, and illustrated with Several Thousand Engravings and Maps.

THE work originally published under the title of THE NEW AMERICAN CYCLOPÆDIA was completed in 1863, since which time the wide circulation which it has attained in all parts of the United States, and the signal developments which have taken place in every branch of science, literature, and art, have induced the editors and publishers to submit it to an exact and thorough revision, and to issue a new edition entitled THE AMERICAN CYCLOPÆDIA.

Within the last ten years the progress of discovery in every department of knowledge has made a new work of reference an imperative want.

The movement of political affairs has kept pace with the discoveries of science, and their fruitful application to the industrial and useful arts and the convenience and refinement of social life. Great wars and consequent revolutions have occurred, involving national changes of peculiar moment. The civil war of own country, which was at its height when the last volume of the old work appeared, has happily been ended, and a new course of commercial and industrial activity has been commenced.

Large accessions to our geographical knowledge have been made by the indefatigable explorers of Africa.

explorers of Africa.

The great political revolutions of the last decade, with the natural result of the lapse of time, have brought into public view a multitude of new men, whose names are in every one's mouth, and of whose lives every one is curious to know the particulars. Great battles have been fought and important sieges maintained, of which the details are as yet preserved only in the newspapers or in the transient publications of the day, are as yet preserved only in the newspapers or in the transient publications of the day, but which ought now to take their place in permanent and authentic history.

In preparing the present edition for the press, it has accordingly been the aim of the editors to bring down the information to the latest possible dates, and to furnish an accurate account of the most recent discoveries in science, of every fresh production in literature, and of the newest inventions in the practical arts, as well as to give a succinct and original record of the progress of political and historical events.

The work has been begun after long and careful preliminary labor, and with the most ample resources for earrying it on to a successful termination.

None of the original stereotype plates have been used, but every page has been printed on new type, forming in fact a new Cyclopædia, with the same plan and compass as its predecessor, but with a far greater pecuniary expenditure, and with such improvements in its composition as have been suggested by lenger experience and enlarged knowledge. knowledge.

The illustrations, which are introduced for the first time in the present edition, have been added not for the sake of pictorial effect, but to give greater lucidity and force to the explanations in the text. They embrace all branches of science and of natural history, and depict the most famous and remarkable features of scenery, architecture, and art, as well as the various processes of mechanics and manufactures. Although intended for instruction rather than embellishment, no pains have been spared to insure their artistic excellence; the cost of their execution is enormous, and it is believed they will find a welcome reception as an admirable feature of the Cyclopædia, and worthy of its high character.

This work is sold to subscribers only, payable on delivery of each volume. It will be completed in sixteen large octavo volumes, each containing about 800 pages, fully illustrated with several thousand Wood Engravings, and with numerous colored Lithographic Maps.

Price and Style of Binding.

Five volumes now ready. Succeeding volumes, until completion, will be issued once in two months.

THE POPULAR SCIENCE MONTHLY.

Conducted by Prof. E. L. YOUMANS.

THE POPULAR SCIENCE MONTHLY was started to promote the diffusion of valuable scientific knowledge, in a readable and attractive form, among all classes of the community, and has thus far met a want supplied by no other periodical in the United States.

and has thus far met a want supplied by no other periodical in the United States.

The great feature of the magazine is, that its contents are not what science was ten or more years since, but what it is to-day, fresh from the study, the laboratory, and the experiment: clothed in the language of the authors, inventors, and scientists themselves, which comprise the leading minds of England, France, Germany, and the United States. Among popular articles, covering the whole range of NATURAL SCIENCE, we have the latest thoughts and words of Herbert Spencer, and Professors Huxley, Tyndali, and R. A. Proctor. Since the start, it has proved a gratifying success to every friend of scientific progress and universal education; and those who believed that science could not be made any thing but dry study are disappointed.
