VOL. XIV.

CARLETON PLACE, C. W., FEBRUARY 17, 1864.

A Lessen from a Flower

A violet raised its purple head On a brooklet's muddy bank, And o'er it spread in course display A burdock wild and rank.

One morning early she awoke And took her dew drop bath, Just as I reached the grassy band That graced the meadow path.

The sun was wiping off the tears
The dewy night had shed, From every tender leaf and plant That raised its glistening head,

The brocklet sang in noisy glee, The violets on the brink Could on its breast their faces see, Reflected from the drink.

The waving grass, the tender elm, The song-birds on the spray, Seemed vicing with each other there In welcoming the day,

But while all nature seemed as gay And happy as a bride, This little foolish violet Drooped down its head and sighed, "Ah, me," she said, my lot is hard,

It gives me such a shock To think what company I keep That vulgar, nauseous dock And, then, to think it cuts me off From all the world outside;

I must confess, for all our fame, I have a little pride. The sun and moon and stars may shine The rainbow paint the sky.
But naught but shadow I may see

While this vile weed is nigh. But while the murmuring violet spoke, A storm-cloud spread its sail,

And poured from out its night black folds A withering shower of hail. And when the blast had spent its power,

And the sun was out again, The little murmuring flower alone Was mistress of the plain. The hated dock whose spreading leaf Hung o'er the violet's head,

Had kept the rushing bail away, While all the rest lay dead. "I'll never murmur any more," The happy violet spoke;
"The darkest cloud may be a shield

To ward away a atroke!' Don't murmur at your lot, my friend,

What seems a curse to-day May prove a blessing in the end,

Mother.

Thou died'st when I was young, When most I needed thee But I know in yonder beaven
Thy happy soul is free.
They laid thee in the tomb, I was too young to know How much I then had lost, It was so long ago.

I have grown older now. And many times I've wept When I have thought of thee, Though many years thou'st slept, Thy grave is now o'ergrown With rich and verdant grass; A headstone marks its place. I cannot by it pass,

When spring shall come again, I'll cull the choicest flowers And plant them on thy mound, To each the early showers. The birds will come and sing, And I shall sing there too

The bistory of this dreadful disease, as The bistery of this dreadful disease, as regards its present visit to the United States although somewhat obscure is substantially as follows: In April, 1858, it made its appearance in Albany, N. "Is it contagious?" This has not yet been definitly settled. Some medical men argue that it is, others that it is not. Indeed, as Prof. Dunglison, of Philadelphia, observes, "physicians are by no means unan-imous in deciding what diseases are contagious and what are not." Contagion depends very much upon the condition of the system, and all constitutions are not equally susceptible to the poison. However, we are of opinion that diphtheria should be classed among the contagious diseases, such as soarlet fever, measles, small-pox, &c., &c.
What causes it?" This is a difficult matter to determine. It has been attributed vine when in a blighted condition, or produces the rot in the potato. It is an insidence, destructive malady, demanding prompt ments, a pre-disposition to diseases of the air-passages, imprudence in diet and dress; some think it is caused by an effluvia arising from the decomposition of animal or or-ganic matters, while others attribute it to a parasite which enters the blood through the Love oft rebels 'gainst fate's decres, Though duty bade us part, Bade each to walk life's weary way With a divided heart;

And twilight oft brings back the past-The happy hours too bright too last.

When borne on memory's airy wings, My thoughts go back to thee, I know that twilight to thee brings Thoughts of the past and me; It brings the words so fraught with pain To both: We may not meet again,

And yet, though bitter is the thought, Perhaps 'twas best to part, Ere cold distrust had banished love. Or time had chilled the heart ; For now we only know we meet To love, to part, but not forget.

When twilight's sombre shadows creep O'er life's declining day, When burst our souls their pr son-doors And break their bands of clay, At last united may we soar Through worlds of light for evermore.

Prohibition of the Exportation OF COAL TO CANADA. We find the following paragraph going the rounds of our American exchanges "One of our coal merchants informs us that he received notice yesterday from a Government official, forbidding any farther exportation of soal to Canada. The trade in this line has heretofere been immense. supplying a pressing want of our Provincial neighbors, and constituting a profitable business to several extensive dealers on this side, The sudden embargo is not understood. What does it mean?"—Oswego Palladium.

This is what it means: Canada imports all her anthracite coal from the United States and during the past two years the coal merchants of Canada have been doing a thriving business in supplying the steamers engaged us blockade runners, at Nassau, with United States anthracite coal, without which they could not escape the vigilance of our blockading fleets, as bituminous coal would make too much smoke. Last summer the attention of the United States Government was called to this trade, and it has very properly been stopped. We are sorry for the "pres sing want of our Provincial neighbors," but before they get any more coal they must limit their operations. Uncle Sam is liberal, but it is too much to ask him to send the English blockade runners that will enable them to supply the rebels with the munitions of war.—Chicago Tribune.

We cannot believe that the statements contained in the above paragraph are true, they involve such manifest absurdities. In the first place, Canada has not supplied blockade runners with anthracite coal. The trade and navigation returns for 1863 have indebted to him either in BOOK ACnot yet been published, but in 1862, not a count of this c Provinces Furthermore, coal is among the products, free importation of which is guaranteed by the Reciprocity Treaty.--Globe.
