has been no pressing necessity for this measure. The hon. gentleman does not say that the law we now have has worked unsatisfactorily; he has not shown that it unduly restricts the influence or power of Parliament, or that it has prevented a proper expression of the opinion of the country in the election of Parliament. This Bill ought to have been introduced earlier than the third Session of Parliament; and the hon. gentleman, the moment he brought it into operation, should have appealed to the country, and obtained from the electors an expression of opinion. If the hon. gentlemen were to argue that this Parliament does not fairly represent the country, that it was not properly elected, that the machinery for the election was so imperfect that a proper expression of the opinion of the country could not be had, then it was important that this measure should have been introduced earlier, and that a discredited Parliament should not have continued to legislate for the general welfare of the country. We have had the present law in operation for eighteen years; no complaint has been made, and no abuse has been shown to have grown up under it; in no case has it been shown that a member returned for a constituency did not fairly represent the opinion of that constituency; so that there was really no abuse to correct. Then the hon. gentleman has proposed to confer the elective franchise upon a class on whom no one proposed to confer it at the last elections. I will venture to say there is not a single hon. gentleman sitting on that side who, at the last election, appealed to the people to return him on the ground that he would vote to confer the elective franchise upon the unfranchised Indians, or promised, if they did return him, that he would do so. The hon. gentleman himself has said that these men were not competent to exercise the elective franchise, or administer the simplest municipal matters. We know that under our system the Indians are not recognised as ordinary subjects. For instance, the tribal Indian is never punished for taking up arms against the Crown, capitally, as guilty of treason. He is not dealt with as an ordinary criminal, and there have been decisions, over and over again, during the existence of the old 13 colonies, and which have since been followed by the courts of the United States and in this country, recognising the fact that the Indian is not an ordinary citizen. I would like to know why it is we have had 150,000 of people or more disfranchised by this Bill, white men, men who have not shown themselves incompetent to exercise the elective franchise, and have had the elective franchise conferred upon men who can neither read nor write, who are not possessed of property in their own right, who pay no taxes, who are under no obligations to serve the State—men who are without public spirit, and, in many instances, are subsisting by the charities of those who are denied the right to vote under the Bill before us. That being the case, I am opposed to this Bill, and have made the motion which is in your hands. In making that motion, I have voiced the opinions of hon. gentlemen, not only on this side but also on that side. I believe that the great majority of the people who have returned the hon. gentlemen, or those who support them in this House, are not in favor of conferring the elective franchise upon men who are not possessed of the ordinary powers, capacities and responsibilities of citizens. Holding that view, Sir, I put this motion into your hands. I have not sought to delay the House in proposing this amendment; I have sought to give the country an opportunity of understanding the question. I believe it is understood, and we are ready to allow the hon. gentleman, if a majority continues to support him on the third reading, to assume the responsibility and the discredit of having put a measure of this sort on the Statute Book.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Mills.

Amendment negatived, and Bill read the third time and passed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is the 4th of July, a fitting day to disfranchise your own countrymen.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 1:10 a.m., Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 6th July, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SOUTH GRENVILLE ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER announced that the Clerk had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a certificate of the election and return of Walter Shanly, Esq., to represent the electoral district of the south riding of the county of Grenville, in the room of the late William Thomas Benson, Esq., deceased.

DOMINION LANDS.

Mr. TROW (for Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT) asked, What sum has been received up to date on account of sales of Dominion lands, for fiscal year 1884-85? What sum has been expended up to date and charged to capital account, for surveys of lands in the North-West, during the present fiscal year?

Mr. McLELAN. The amount received up to the 20th June, 1885, on account of sales of Dominion lands, was $374,057.63; and the expenditure charged to capital account was $269,546.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE RECEIPTS.

Mr. TROW (for Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT) asked, What amount has been received for Customs, and what for Excise, during the month ending 30th June?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The amount received for Customs is $1,361,387, and for Excise $444,031.

RODGERS' FISH-LADDERS.

Mr. FORBES asked, Has the Government, through the Department of Marine and Fisheries, bought Rodgers' interest in his fish-ladders? If so, when was the purchase made, and what was paid for the same?

Mr. McLELAN. No; it has not bought it.

Mr. FORBES asked, Does the Government or the Department of Marine and Fisheries intend using the Rodgers' fish-ladders in Davison's dams during the coming summer, or what means are intended to be used for getting fish up the Lahave, if these ladders are not?

Mr. McLELAN. An engineer is now engaged in making an inspection of the dams on the river, with a view to ascertaining the most desirable means of providing the required passage for fish.

FISHING IN LAKE SIMCOE.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. MULOCK) asked, Is it the intention of the Government, at the present Session, to introduce such legislation as may be necessary in order that Government agents may be empowered to issue valid permits to fish in the waters of Lake Simcoe?

Mr. McLELAN. Lake Simcoe being set apart, under the Fisheries Act, for the propagation of fish it is not proposed to introduce any legislation the present Session in order that Government agents may issue valid permits to fish.

COUNTY COURT JUDGES' SALARIES.

Mr. HOLTON asked, Is it the intention of the Government to introduce a measure during the present Session providing for the increase of the salaries of county court judges throughout the Dominion?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not.

DEEP WATER FISHERIES ON THE COAST OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria) asked, What steps, if any, have been taken by the Dominion Government concerning the protection and promotion of the deep-water fisheries on the coast of British Columbia? Is it the intention of the Government to take the necessary steps for ascertaining their nature and probable value during the ensuing fiscal year? If so, by what method and to what extent of expenditure will such fisheries be encouraged?

Mr. McLELAN. No steps have been taken in connection with the deep sea fisheries. The Inspector of Fisheries has been instructed to take such steps as may be necessary to obtain accurate statistics as to the value of the British Columbia fisheries.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE asked, What are the earnings and working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for the eleven months ending 31st May, 1885?

Mr. POPE. As far as I can understand, the working expenses were $2,304,019, and the earnings $2,173,214.

SALARIES OF MINISTERS.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant) asked, Is it the practice of the members of the Government to draw their salaries monthly in advance? If so, when was the practice established, and why?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This question has been overlooked, but the members of the Government and the Inside Civil Service do draw their salaries monthly in advance. The date, and the reason why, I shall give to-morrow.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. KAULBACH. I desire to bring to the attention of the House, under the rule of privilege, a matter which was brought to the notice of the House on Thursday by the hon. member for Centre Wellington, in answer to a charge made that he had shirked the vote on the amendment from the Senate to the Scott Act. I would have answered on that day the remarks made by the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) had I been in the House, but I was absent in the Library at the time, and I had no knowledge of his intention to bring the matter to the notice of the House. In order that I may not be misinterpreted by the House, and be considered as having acted unfairly, I am desirous of making this explanation. The hon. member for Centre Wellington came to me on the evening of the debate on the Senate amendments to the Scott Act, saying that he was desirous of taking the evening train to Toronto, and asked me if I would pair with him, saying that he intended to vote in favor of the amendment, and he knew that I was going to vote against it. I said to him: "I cannot pair with you. I am desirous of giving an open vote." He said: "I wish you would pair with me, because I want to go away on important business." I was very desirous of accommodating him, but I said that I feared my pairing with him would be misinterpreted. He urged me again, and said he was very anxious for me to pair with him. Finally I consented; but before I consented he told me that there would be no difficulty if I would be present in the House and not vote; that my vote would be challenged, and then I could say that I had paired with him, and my vote would be recorded in the ordinary way and would appear in the Hansard. I told him I did not think that was correct; and he said: "Well, it is understood that we pair; we will pair in that way." I said: "Very well," and we parted with that understanding. A few moments after he had left I went to the Assistant Speaker and informed him of the position, and asked him if the hon. member for Centre Wellington was correct, saying that I had my doubts about it; and he said: "He is not correct. Your name will not appear in the list of the yeas and nays, but if you state that you paired with him, it will appear in the Hansard." I felt then that I was not bound by that pair, and consequently I gave an open vote against the amendment. I make this statement in order that I may not be considered by the House as having acted dishonorably.

Mr. ORTON. I am sorry I cannot entirely endorse the account of the pair which has been given by my hon. friend. When I asked him to pair it was not until after he made some remark as to his being desirous to have it known how he voted, and I told him that by getting somebody to challenge him he could have it recorded in the Hansard, and that would be a sufficient reply to parties who might imagine that he had shirked the vote; and the pair was agreed to on those terms.

THE DEATH OF LIEUT.-COL. WILLIAMS.

Mr. CARON. It is with the deepest pain and sorrow that I have to-day to make an announcement to Parliament which I know will cause as much mourning and affliction among hon. members on both sides of the House as any announcement which has ever been made to Parliament, conveying the information of the death of one of the members of this House. Sir, I have to announce the death of Lieut.-Col. Arthur Williams, in command of the Midland Battalion. I can say that during all the troubles which are now very nearly ended in the North-West, Col. Williams has shown himself to be a brave and gallant officer, honoring his profession, and possessing those qualities which would make any arm of the service proud of possessing him as an officer. I can state, Sir, that it is only a few days ago that I received from him a despatch giving me minute details of the battle of Batoche. It will be remembered by every hon. gentleman that on that memorable occasion, which practically broke the backbone of the rebellion, Col. Arthur Williams was the hero of that day. At the head of his men he gallantly forced the rifle pits and made that charge which is one of the most brilliant actions of a campaign which has distinguished so many of our brave volunteers. He led the men on that day, and the result of that brilliant charge secured the success of the day, and the practical ending of the armed insurrection. In a despatch which was sent to me by the Major General, and which will be read with interest by the hon. members of this House, he mentioned the name of Lieut.-Col. Williams as being one of those who distinguished himself, and to whom was due the honors of that day. I can only tell you, Mr. Speaker, how shocked I was when I received the first sad tidings of his illness, and shortly afterwards of his death. The shock was greater still from the fact that from the recent despatches he had sent me I had little reason to suppose that in the very hour of victory, when he was on the eve of coming home to receive the honors to which he was entitled for having fought so valiantly the battles of his country, I had little reason to suppose that he would never return with his companions in arms to receive the congratulations of their grateful countrymen, and the admiration which every good citizen of Canada must feel for the brave volunteers. Sir, last night I received from the Major General, from the camp at Fort Pitt, the following telegram, dated July 5th:—

"I deeply regret to have to say that Col. Arthur Williams is dangerously suffering from inflammation of the brain. He is on board the North-West steamer, and the doctors say he must be left at Prince Albert.

"(Signed), FRDK. MIDDLETON,
"Major General."

Shortly afterwards I received the following telegram.—

"Steamer Marquis, via STRAUBENZIE, N. W. T.

"It is with the deepest regret that I have to say that Col. Williams is sinking, and that the doctors have little or no hopes. They now say that besides the affection of the brain, he has pneumonia and symptoms of typhoid fever. He has been quite unconscious since this morning.

"(Signed), FRDK. MIDDLETON,
"Major General."

This morning I received another telegram, stating that he was dead. Sir, I have spoken of him as a soldier. Those who know him as an intimate friend feel more deeply the loss which is suffered by a large circle of devoted friends. As a friend we always found him generous and true. I can speak of him as such, because it has been my privilege, ever since I have been in Parliament, to count Lieut.-Col. Williams among my friends. We all remember his geniality and his unselfishness. Whenever it became a question of meeting the views of his friends he was always ready to make the sacrifice of his own personal feelings. He was one of those whose loss will always be remembered. As a public man, he has always been true to the party to which he belonged, and those whose privilege it has been to act with him in politics know how true he has always been to the principles which he considered best, and to the leaders whom he loved and followed so faithfully. I only regret that, on this occasion, some one who would, better than myself, have spoken of the qualities and virtues of the man whose loss we deeply regret, should not have been entrusted with the task which it has been my duty to fulfil to-day.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sure we all heartily concur in the observations just made, expressive of the deep regret with which both sides of the House have heard, as we did hear some hours ago, the sad news, and which has now been officially communicated to us. The friend whom we have lost was, as the hon. gentleman has said, well known to all of us. He had been for many years in Parliament, and his unswerving fidelity to his party was entirely consistent with the exhibition of kindness and most friendly feeling towards those of his colleagues who did not share his political views, and in the discharge of the not unimportant duties which he performed on behalf of his party, we always had to recognise the courtesy and kindness with which he met the views of hon. gentlemen on this side, and he exhibited, in the delicate arrangements which have to be made, that sense of high honor which was a peculiar characteristic of him. For myself, I speak with unfeigned personal sorrow, when I recollect the loss which we have sustained. Col. Williams was an old schoolfellow of mine; he was an old and attached personal friend of mine; he was my colleague in the representation of the county of Durham. We met first in political life in the Local Legislature, to which he was elected a short time after my own election; and we have met since that time for many years, never harmonising, unfortunately, in our political views, but maintaining uninterruptedly our personal friendship. We know his devotion to military duties. He was no holiday soldier, but he exhibited for many years an earnest devotion and an intelligent interest in that important branch of the public service; and I know for myself how eager he had been, if it were at all possible, to exhibit his devotion to the cause of the Empire in the Egyptian campaign, and how anxious he was and how rejoiced he was when the prospect opened of serving his country in the campaign which is now ended. I know for myself of those anxieties, and it strikes one painfully to remember how cheerfully and joyfully he went out; how warmly he shook our hands with that hand which is now cold in death. I regret the event the more because of the incidents to which the hon. gentleman has referred, because of the brilliant part which, from all accounts we have received, our late friend played in the battle of Batoche; and we can only say of him that, though it was not his fortune to fall in that struggle, yet he none the less fairly mort sur le champ d'honneur.

FISHERIES NEGOTIATIONS.

Mr. VAILL. May I ask the First Minister when he will lay on the Table further papers in connection with the fisheries matter. We are drawing very near the close of the Session, and it is very important we should obtain them as soon as possible. I may, at the same time, ask the First Minister if his attention has been drawn to a paragraph which appeared in the papers on Saturday, with respect to some order passed at Washington relating to goods passing free through Canada. Will the hon. gentleman state what the effect of that will be upon the trade of the Dominion. The paragraph is somewhat difficult to understand, unless we are in possession of information from the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As I have mentioned before, I have ready to lay on the Table of the House a number of papers connected with fisheries negotiations. I have not them all, as many of them were private communications. The assent has been obtained from the British Ambassador, and on the return of His Excellency, which will be on Wednesday, I will be in a position to lay the papers before the House. With respect to the other question asked: I saw the notice in the newspapers. There has been no communication at all on that point between Washington and Ottawa. It does not refer to the bonding system, but to the privilege given in 1871, principally in the interest of the Welland Railway. The American coasting laws are very rigid, and American vessels starting from Chicago for Oswego or Ogdensburg were not allowed to touch our coast. They could go through the Welland Canal as being a portion of the navigation, without being supposed to touch at a Canadian port; but many of those vessels draw too much water when laden to get through the Welland Canal, and so they are in the habit of stopping at the Erie terminus of the Welland Railway, landing their cargoes, going through the canal light, and resuming cargo at the Ontario terminus, the cargo having been carried over the Welland Railway. It appears this notice is to do away with that privilege.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask if that is the only effect of it. It is exceedingly ambiguous, and there is a good deal of uncertainty felt in regard to it by merchants.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no uncertainty. If the hon. gentleman will look at the treaty he will see how the matter stands. It has nothing to do with the bonding system whatever.

Mr. BLAKE. It is an exhibition of good will on the part of the Americans to lead us to agree to the other arrangement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It may be so.

Mr. WELDON. Will the hon. gentleman bring down the correspondence with Newfoundland with respect to duties.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The telegraphic despatches will be brought down.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 154) further to amend the Act relating to the culling and measuring of timber in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec.—(Mr. Costigan.)

Bill (No. 152) to amend the Consolidated Militia Act, 1883.—(Mr. Caron.) (On a division.)

SETTLEMENT OF MANITOBA CLAIMS.

Mr. BOWELL moved third reading of Bill (No. 155) for the final settlement of the claims made by the Province of Manitoba on the Dominion.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to ask the Minister whether he has received any information from the Department of the Interior as to the quantity of land which would be transferred to Manitoba under this arrangement.

Mr. BOWELL. I am not in a position to give the hon. gentleman the information he asks. I have not been able to obtain it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved that the Order for the third reading of Bill (No. 156) to restrict and regulate Chinese immigration into the Dominion of Canada be discharged; and that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Bill for the further consideration of the last clause. He said: I wish to make a slight amendment in the last clause of the Bill, namely, to insert the words "other matters" after the word "vessel," in the 23rd clause.

Motion agreed to, and Bill recommitted, amended, reported as amended, and read the third time, and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BLAKE. I desire, before this motion is carried, to bring before the House, a question of which I gave notice at the earliest possible moment. I gave notice, through my hon. friend from South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), of my intention of bringing up the question of the North-West on the same evening on which the First Minister brought down the last papers which he said he intended to bring down this Session, and since that time I have been awaiting the opportunity which now, perhaps a little unexpectedly, has arisen. I rise to charge upon the Government, in their administration of affairs in the North-West, grave instances of neglect, delay and mismanagement, prior to the recent outbreak, in matters deeply affecting the peace, welfare and good government of this country. I do not intend to touch upon many questions connected with the administration of affairs in the North-West, which yet prove, in my judgment, the truth of that accusation, but which, for all that, are more remotely connected with the particular events which will form, so far as I am concerned, the subject of the present discussion. For example, the general railway policy, the general tariff policy, the general policy of inflation, the general land policy, the general use that has been made of the domain, and of the power to appoint to offices by the Government—that conduct, generally speaking, which, without special reference to this matter, led an eminent publicist, not devoted to either party, after a visit to that country during the late summer, in which, indeed, he did not touch the regions which are particularly affected by the present disturbances, but in which he saw what was to be seen and heard what was to be heard along the great line of railway communication—I say which led that eminent publicist, Mr. Goldwin Smith, in a review of his visit, to use these words:

"Nobody doubts that the intentions of the Ottawa Government towards the North-West, are good. But it is a distant Government; its all powerful chief has never himself been in the North-West; and references or appeals to it are tedious and precarious. It is a party Government, and it cannot resist the importunities of hungry partisans, who mark the new and defenceless territory as their perquisite, though the consequence of yielding has inevitably been injurious to the political morality of a young community, the foundation of whose character ought to have been laid in honor. The parliamentary system, though the best for those who are represented, is, for those who are unrepresented, or inadequately represented, the worst."

And again:

"Old politicians think only of voting power; but there is a power besides that of voters, which, if a deaf ear is turned to the remonstrances of the North-West, will probably soon be encountered. Not that there exists the thought of violence. Nowhere is the reign of law more perfect than among these Canadian pioneers. What they contemplate in the last resort, is an appeal to England for release from the Confederation, and for the establishment of the North-West as an independent British colony."

Now, Sir, the matters to which I have referred we have, from time to time, pressed upon the consideration of the Government, and with proofs, though I do not speak of them to-day, because the discussion of the conduct of the Government will—the papers being yet unprinted, and it being necessary, therefore, to make a more exhaustive review than if they had been printed, as they ought to have been, and the course of events over a period of eight years being necessarily to be traced—over-tax one's strength, and for the same reason I propose to summarise only a large number of the more nearly related matters. I am relieved from the necessity of engaging now in any discussion of some important topics. I have already taken occasion to point out to the House the events of the year 1869-70, and their bearing upon the more recent transactions. I have already stated my view of the nature and extent of the responsibility of the Government in connection with North-West affairs. I have already pointed out that the Government, in view of the late events, is really on the defensive, and is bound to vindicate itself, being primò facie responsible for such occurrences as have taken place in a self-governing community. The Government has declined that challenge, but it has courted enquiry, it has challenged attack, and it has denied all fault and blame. One question, which is very material to be discussed, I have already treated in part—the question of local defence—the course of the Government with reference to the local corps of the North-West; and I have also taken the opportunity to refer to another very important point, the lack of those representative institutions, which, had they been granted earlier and been as effective as we might expect, would have proved the safety valve which would have prevented the recent affair. I may say at once that there has been, in my view, a scandalous breach of duty on the part of the Government, with reference to bringing down the papers. From the earliest period at which we had news of the revolt, I have been appealing for those papers. They have come down reluctantly, at long intervals, with pretence of a difficulty in copying, and, when produced, those which have been produced have borne upon their face marks that they had been ready for production for many days before it was thought fit to lay them on the Table. From time to time essential papers have been declined, and even to-day papers which as I shall show are extremely important, in order to reach the full extent of the culpability of the Government, are retained—papers which it is essential should be produced, and which, if they be not produced, must be elicited at some future day through the medium of a select committee. But, although gravely compromising papers, as I believe I shall be able to show, have been withheld, yet enough has come to light in my judgment to enable us to decide in the affirmative on the motion which I shall place in your hands. Now, Sir, to deal with events and a course of administration which runs over so many years at all effectively, it is necessary to grapple with the state of the facts as to each important question separately, and I propose to take that course; but it must never be forgotten that the combined operation of the different series of facts, and of several grievances, concurrently acting upon the mind of a population, is much greater than that of simple addition—that the operation is intensified, and that the difficulties are infinitely greater than if the same sets of grievances were operating at different times. There are questions which arise concerning the half-breeds, questions concerning the Indians, and questions common to whites and half-breeds alike. As to Indian affairs, I have already shown the great importance of the Indian question. I do not propose to embarrass this discussion—as I might by the multiplicity of proofs which I should have to bring forward—by dealing at length with the Indian question, for the sufficient reason that the proofs upon that subject are more easily accessible to hon. members and to the country than the unprinted proofs to which I shall have to refer upon other questions. They are to be found in the Blue Books, and in the reports, and they show, in my judgment, neglects, delays, incompetence, bad appointments, mistaken policy, and breaches of promise, resulting in the fact that many of the Indians had got into a highly discontented and excited state, and were ripe for trouble in 1884-85. But this fact is undeniable that, to whatever cause it was due, such was the condition of many of the Indians at that time. Now, Sir, with reference to the half-breeds, I propose to examine the facts in connection with the claims of the half-breeds of the North-West Territories to recognition in respect of the extinguishment of the Indian title; the facts in connection with the claims of the unenumerated half-breeds of the Province of Manitoba in respect of the extinguishment of the Indian title; the claims of the land holding half-breeds for grants and for surveys, particularly in connection with river lots. And as to the whites and the half-breeds in matters of common concern, I shall touch, though only touch, on the claims of the land holders for grants and surveys; the claims as to the reserves of various kinds; the claims in connection with wood regulations and local improvements; and claims as to representative institutions. But on these questions I shall only repeat the expression of my opinion as to their importance, and their felt importance, to the people. I do not propose, Sir, to engage in the discussion of the actual outbreak or the events of the campaign. I think, as I have more than once said, that it would be entirely premature to do so, and with the exception of perhaps one slight incident I shall disembarass the present discussion from the question of the immediate preparations for and the actual conduct of the campaign. And before I engage upon the enquiry to which I have just pledged myself, I may say, that having passed a good many years of my life in this House and elsewhere, in the investigation of evidence and the analysis of facts, I never rose to state a case which was based upon facts, with a more absolute conviction of the overwhelming character of that case and the inexorable conclusion which is to be drawn from those facts, than I do upon the present occasion. My task is therefore, in this respect, easy. It is rendered difficult only by the number and range of the events, and the multiplicity of the proofs which I shall have to endeavor to adduce, and which I shall submit to all candid persons inside and outside of this House, in the conviction that but one conclusion can be reached as to the result. Now, Sir, with reference to the claim of the half-breeds of the North-West Territories for consideration in respect to the extinguishment of the Indian title, I call attention to the fact that that claim was recognised, in so far as the half-breeds of the original Province of Manitoba were concerned, in the course of the events of 1869-70. By the bargain that was made, incorporated in the Act of 1870, 1,400,000 acres of land were set apart to be divided amongst the half-breed minors in respect of the extinguishment of their claims to the Indian title. By subsequent legislation, it was provided that the half-breeds, heads of families, should get a 160-acre grant. I maintain that the claim of the half-breeds of the North-West Territories to consideration in respect of the extinguishment of the Indian title was then settled in principle. Justice is the same on the banks of the Saskatchewan or the Qu'Appelle as on the banks of the Red River or the Assiniboine. It was impossible to find a different rule to be prescribed for different parallels of latitude, and it was absolutely impossible to say that that which had been granted in the one case should be declined in the other. Now, I rejoice that it happens to me, who am not of the same race or of the same creed with these French half-breeds, to point out these circumstances, because it cannot be said of me that I am moved by those prejudices or predilections which might be charged against one of their own race or creed. It is not on any such grounds that this question is to be handled, it is to be handled as a question of justice, of policy, of statesmanship. Of the half-breeds, I only* say as I have said before, that I recognise them as fellow Canadians, misled and deeply wrong, but we are not to try them here; their trial is appointed elsewhere. It is here, and here alone, in the first instance, that the Government of this country can be tried for its conduct in respect of these transactions; and that trial, and the ascertainment of their responsibility, is a task which fitly falls upon our shoulders. I ask whether the Government has done its duty in respect of this portion of the population of Canada, and I answer that question, as I think you will answer it, after you have heard the evidence, by an emphatic negative. I believe there never was a grosser case of neglect, of delay, and of mismanagement than that which I am about to develop with reference to this particular claim. The question did not become urgent in the North-West Territories very early, because there was but little interference with the half-breeds of the North-West Territories for some years. There was comparatively little settlement in the country; there were but few surveys; there were but few authorities of any kind to interfere; things went on for a while pretty much in the old groove. But by degrees settlement increased; by degrees new arrangements were being made; by degrees a new order of things pressed itself upon attention, and concurrently with that gradual change, there came the rapid disappearance of the buffalo which, about the years 1877, 1878, 1879, indicated the imminent, urgent necessity of some other livelihood than that which many of these half-breeds had wholly depended on, and most of them had in large part depended on in prior years. It was in the early part of 1878 that the regular, formal agitation on this subject took shape. And here, Sir, I may pause to notice with amazement a letter which I have seen published, emanating from a member of the Government, dated so far late as the 6th June last—a letter from the Secretary of State—in which he says:

"If the half-breeds had serious complaints against the Canadian Government, the ordinary method of petition was open to them as to every free citizen. They have not availed themselves of it."

Can it be that on the 8th June, 1885, a member of the Government of Canada should yet have been in such dense ignorance of the facts with reference to this case as to make that public statement? And can it be that that member should be the Secretary of State of Canada? Why, the record is one long cry for redress; but it never reached his ears. About the beginning of June, 1878, a petition was presented from Prince Albert and forwarded to the Government by Captain Moore—that gentleman who is amongst the volunteers who joined the police at the Duck Lake fight—signed by 151 persons; it contained allusion to certain topics, and it contained, amongst others, this paragraph:

"Lastly, your petitioners would humbly represent that whereas a census of the half-breeds and old settlers was taken in the Province of Manitoba shortly after the organisation of that Province, with a view to the distribution of scrip, said scrip having since issued to the parties interested, and whereas at the time this census was taken many half-breeds, both minors and heads of families, resided in the territories and were not included in the said census, your petitioners would humbly represent their rights to participation in the issue of half-breed or old settlers scrip, are as valid and binding as those of the half-breeds and old settlers of Manitoba, and are expected by them to be regarded by the Canadian Government as scrupulously as in that Province; and with a view to the adjustment of the same, your petitioners would humbly request that a census of the said half-breeds and old settlers be taken at as early a date as may be conveniently determined upon, with a view to apportioning to those of them who have not been already included in the census of Manitoba their just allotment of land and scrip."

To that petition no acknowledgment or, at any rate, no answer is on record amongst the papers brought down. On the 1st February, 1878, the half-breeds of St. Laurent had a public meeting, at which Gabriel Dumont was president and Alexander Fisher secretary, both prime movers in the recent affair, and they determined upon several requests. Amongst them was this:

"That there be granted to all half-breeds who have not participated in the distribution of scrip and lands in the Province of Manitoba like scrip and grants of lands as in that Province."

About March, 1878, there was a petition of French Canadians and half-breeds of St. Albert on various subjects. It refers to the petition of St. Laurent, to which I have just referred, and it contains this paragraph:

"That all the heads of families of half-breeds and their children who have not participated in the distribution of scrip and land in the Province of Manitoba be allowed such like scrip and grants of land as were allowed in the said Province (at least that bush lands should be granted to them)."

Both these petitions were transmitted by Lieutenant Governor Laird, in February and in April, to the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What year?

Mr. BLAKE. In 1878, during the time of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie). In 1878 there was a petition of the half-breeds of Cypress Mountains, which contains 269 signatures. It contains a number of statements as to their distressed condition, due principally to the disappearance of the buffalo, and makes this declaration:

"That the majority of us, upon the cession of the Province to the Local Government, were temporarily absent, and were thereby deprived of the benefit of the scrip given to those half-breeds, who were at that time present in the Province."

It prays for several advantages, amongst others seed, grain, agricultural implements, and for a large reserve in a particular locality. And here comes, following on that petition, a resolution passed by the North-West Council. On the 2nd August, 1878, the council of the North-West Territory, in its legislative session, passed the following resolution:—

"Whereas this council has had under consideration a petition of certain half-breeds who usually frequent the neighborhood of Cypress Hills'

And they proceed to describe the substance of the petition:

"And whereas it is not in the power of this council to grant lands, assistance to procure such, or any such like advantages, resolved therefore that the Lieutenant Governor be requested to forward a petition to the Dominion Government together with the following suggestions which they respectfully and strongly urge may receive the early and earnest attention of His Excellency the Governor General:

"1st. That it would be injudicious to set apart reserves of land for the half-breeds of the North-West Territory or give them negotiable scrip;

"2nd. That in view, however, of the fact that grants of land or issues of scrip were made to the half-breeds of Manitoba towards the extinguishment of the Indian title to the lands of that Province, there will undoubtedly be general dissatisfaction among the half-breeds of the said territories unless they receive some like consideration.

"3. That this consideration would most tend to the advantage of the half-breeds were it given in the form of a non-transferable location ticket, for say, 160 acres for each half-breed head of a family, and each half-breed child of parents resident in the said territories at the time of the transfer thereof to Canada, the ticket to be issued immediately to any half-breed eighteen years of age or over, on furnishing evidence of claim, and to every child on arriving at that age and furnishing the necessary evidence.

"4. That each half-breed holding such a location ticket, should be allowed to locate it upon any unoccupied Dominion lands, but the title of the land so entered should remain in the Crown for ten years; and if, at the expiration of three years after such entry, the half-breed locatee has made no improvements on the land, his claim thereto shall be subject to forfeiture.

"5. To induce those half-breeds who now procure their livelihood by hunting on the plains to abandon their present mode of life and settle on their locations, by which course it alone appears possible to avert the great destitution with which they are threatened owing to the imminent early extinction of the buffalo, that aid in agricultural implements and seeds be allowed them for three years, but only once for each family that may settle within that time.

"6. That half-breeds who have shared in the Manitoba distribution of lands and scrip should not be entitled to receive location tickets in the territories though now resident therein."

On the 30th September, 1878, Lieutenant, Governor Laird transmitted the Cypress Hills petition, and the resolution of the North-West Council which I have read, in a despatch which contains these words:

"I feel it my duty to ask you to urge upon the Dominion Government the necessity of taking early action with respect to the claims set forth by the half-breeds of the Territories, either in the direction indicated by the resolutions of the North-West Council, or in such other manner as the Government may deem meet. The half-breeds of Manitoba—the heads, of families as well as the children—having received either script or land, I may remark that from what information is within my reach, I have no doubt the half-breeds of the Territories who think they have as good a claim to consideration as their compatriots in Manitoba, will be very much dissatisfied unless they are treated in a somewhat similar manner."

By the time that reached Ottawa the Government had changed, the hon. gentleman had assumed the reins of office, and, with the reins of office, he had accepted the Department of the Interior and the Superintendency General of Indian Affairs, thus identifying himself in both those aspects with the questions which are involved in this controversy. On the 20th November, 1878, his Deputy Minister acknowledged the despatch of Governor Laird, the resolution and the petition, and stated that that despatch, with its enclosures, would be brought under the consideration of the Minister on his return to the seat of Government. About the same time at which that despatch was written, the Lieutenant Governor visited this section of the country, and I quote from the newspaper the account of his visit:

"While the Lieutenant Governor was at Duck Lake, a deputation of half-breeds from the St. Laurent waited on his honor, and, in most respectful terms, urged him not to allow Chief Beardy's reserve to surround their claims or encroach upon the lands where they had been accustomed to cut hay. They also desired to be informed if any reply has been received to the petition forwarded, through his honor, to Ottawa, respecting the half-breeds in the territories. The Lieutenant Governor thereupon explained matters to them as fully as was in his power. When he had concluded Norbert Laurance, Esq., cordially thanked him for the obliging manner in which he had replied to their enquiries."

I have now shown you as clearly as I could what the position of this question was at the time when hon. gentlemen opposite commenced their dealing with it, in the fall of the year 1878. I have read you the petitions which had already been presented from the locality, the resolution of the council, the despatch of the Lieutenant Governor, all indicating that the question was one for early solution, the North-West Council being of opinion that modified compensation ought to be given in a different form from that which had obtained in the Province of Manitoba, for reasons which were sufficiently obvious; and the case being presented to the Government by the Lieutenant Governor as one for early action, either in the method devised by the council, or in some other method, at the peril of dissatisfaction. I have no complaint to make of the expedition with which the then Deputy Minister of the Interior, Mr. Dennis, grappled with the question. On the 20th December, 1878, Mr. Dennis presented to his Minister a very long memorandum dealing with the case of those claims, and from it I extract some passages. He submits to the Minister "that it is expedient with as little delay as possible to deal with the claims to consideration preferred by the half-breeds of the North-West Territories." He describes the half-breeds as of two classes, those of the plains, and those who, while spending part of the year in hunting the buffalo, possess settled homes. He says:

"The second-class may be illustrated by reference to those half breeds who are found at Edmonton, St. Albert, St. Laurent, St. Anne's, Victoria, etc., who have habitable and in some cases, good houses, where they reside and cultivate the soil to a greater or less extent, but still mainly depend for their means of living upon the buffalo."

He adds:

"Some uneasiness is felt by the half-breed element in the Territories in consequence of no steps having yet been taken towards the recognition of the demands put forward on their behalf. It must be freely admitted they have a claim to favorable consideration, and the question is, how is that claim to be satisfied so as to benefit the half-breeds, and at the same time benefit the country?"

MR. BLAKE.

He discountenances the absolute grant of lands, or treating them as wards and making Indian treaty with them. He proposes to offer them certain inducements to settle on land, and to learn to farm, especially to raise cattle, and of this plan he says:

"The immediate effect would be, assuming that the half-breeds themselves are willing to give it a trial, that we should have the whole of this element in sympathy with the Government in dealing with the plain tribes of Indians. In this way we should attract to our side a moral power which in the present critical relations of the various tribes of Indians towards each other and towards the Government, would prove of the greatest value to the Dominion."

He refers to the petition of the Cypress Hills half-breeds and the resolution of the North-West Council, and says he "is of opinion that encouragement additional to that recommended by the council would be required to induce the half-breeds to become settlers, and he fully believes that it would be in the interest of good government in the North-West to grant the same." He suggests "that the half-breeds, where wished for, should be permitted to take up their lands in such a way as to enable them to settle together in bands, and, wherever a band of 50 or more families form themselves into one community or settlement, they should be provided with a school or teachers for a term of years, such teachers to be selected with a view to being able to instruct them in the raising and care of stock, also in practical agriculture, including the use and care of implements." He adds:

"The undersigned regards the state of affairs in the Territories in relation to the Indians and half-breeds as calling for the serious consideration of the Government, in view of additional complications which are not unlikely to arise owing to the presence on our soil of large numbers of armed Indians, refugees for the time being from the seat of war in the adjoining territory. He is of opinion that further means should be adopted to cultivate and maintain relations with Indians and half-breed populations calculated to attach them to us and to convince them that the Government is desirous of fulfilling its obligations to them in the utmost good faith."

He suggests a scheme of industrial schools, and he closes thus:

"The undersigned respectfully requests for the whole question discussed in this memorandum the early consideration of the Minister of the Interior, in order, if thought desirable, that a measure may be prepared embodying such policy as may be decided upon in good time for the ensuing Session of Parliament."

The action which appears to have been taken on that memorandum was, first, the appointment of Mr. N. F. Davin as a commissioner to enquire into the industrial school question, both in the Territories and in the United States, upon which, so far as I can apprehend, no final report has been brought down; secondly, to send the memorandum for the consideration and advice of Archbishop Taché, Bishop McLean, Bishop Macrae and Governor Laird. On the 23rd of December, 1878, three days after the date of the memorandum, Colonel Dennis writes to Archbishop Taché, transmitting the paper, in this language:

"As you will see by the tenor of the paper, I am fully impressed with the justice as well as the expediency of disposing of the question at the earliest possible period."

On the 29th January, 1879, Archbishop Taché replied in a very long letter to Col. Dennis' communication, and from that I shall make some extracts. Amongst the headings which the Archbishop treats is one "Importance of the Half Breed Question."

"It must be freely admitted that the half-breeds of the North-West have a claim to favorable consideration. Great uneasiness is felt by them in consequence of no steps having yet been taken in their behalf. A liberal policy on the part of the Government would attract to its side a moral and physical power which in the present critical relations of the various tribes of Indians towards each other and towards the Government, would prove of the greatest value to the Dominion. On the other hand the half-breed element dissatisfied would form a standing menace to the peace and prosperity of the Territories. There is no doubt that the state of affairs in the Territories in relation to the Indians and half-breeds, is calling for the serious consideration of the Government, and measures should be adopted to cultivate and maintain relations with the half-breed population calculated to attract them to us."

"The formidable Indian question has not yet arisen in our midst, owing largely to the influence of the half-breed element. The disappearance of the buffalo, and especially the extension of the settlers in the Indian country, are preparing difficulties which may be avoided, I hope, but which would otherwise involve such terrible and expensive results that it is the duty of all the friends of the Government and of the country to do all in their power to prevent such misfortune.

"The result depends in a great measure on the way the half-breeds would be treated. Friendly disposed, they will mightily contribute to the maintenance of peace; dissatisfied, they would not only add to the difficulty, but render the establishment of the country the next thing to an impossibility.

"2. What ought to be avoided when alluding to HALF-BREEDS—It is important in public documents to avoid comparing the half-breeds with the Indians; and it is not just to say that a certain class of them differ but little except in name from the Indians. They have not the tastes, habits and instincts of the Indians. They are hunters, traders or settlers, but no portion of them can be classified with the savages of the plains."

He proceeds to point out on what the settlements at Edmonton, St. Albert, St. Anne's, St. Laurent and Victoria, depend, and how those at Wood Mountain and Cypress Hills also live. He then adds:

"The half-breeds are a highly sensitive race; they keenly resent injury or insult, and daily complain on that point. In fact they are daily humiliated with regard to their origin by the way they are spoken of, not only in newspapers but also in official and semi-official documents.

"3. GRANT OF LAND—Every one acknowledges the desirability for the half-breeds to settle definitely on lands to cultivate them. Here is a scheme which I take the liberty to propose:

"(a.) I estimate the half-breeds actually in the North-West to number about 1,200 families. Let the Government make 12 reserves for them in the very places the half-breeds themselves will like to have them.

"(b.) Each reserve should be for 100 families at least, and contain an area of 12 square miles of available land, that is to say, the extent of four townships.

"c. All the half-breeds, men, women and children, residing in the North-West on the 1st January, 1879, ought to receive two non-negotiable scrips for 80 acres of land each, to be located by them in one of the above mentioned reserves."

He proceeds to point out that this property should be inalienable for at least three generations, save exchanges of entire lots between half-breeds, which might be allowed.

"In the settlements already formed the half-breeds ought to be confirmed in the possession of the lot or lots they claim, and on which there are improvements, even which is very rare, when they claim more than 160 acres. When the lots claimed are less than 160 acres, scrips for the balance ought to be given."

Then, after entering into further details, he concludes by pressing once again, the importance of an early settlement of the question.

"SPEDDY SETTLEMENT OF THE WHOLE MATTER—It is desirable that the half-breed question should be decided without any further delay. The requisite legislation ought to be passed in the coming Session of the Legislature. Immediately after inspectors ought to be appointed, and I would particularly recommend Mr. Angus McKay as one of the inspectors. Surveyors will have to be sent to the Territories next summer, to mark immediately, at least, the outside lines of the reserves, with one or two rows of lots. Other details may come afterwards, provided they be not delayed unnecessarily. There is no doubt the difficulties increase with delay."

On the 18th January, 1879, Bishop McLean wrote in answer to the letter of Colonel Dennis:

"I thoroughly sympathise with you in the anxiety you show to conciliate the half-breeds of the North-West Territories. The plain Crees and the Blackfeet have been but recently reclaimed from a state of constant warfare between themselves by the introduction of the Mounted Police force; and the presence of large bands of Sioux, renowned for their warlike habits, might at any moment, without any administrative skill on the part of the Government, lead to dangerous outbreaks that would not only be deplorable in their immediate results, but tend to damage the prospects of the country in regard to settlement. In bringing so prominently into the foreground the value of the half-breed element being in sympathy with the Government in dealing with the Indians, I think you have grasped the main point of the whole question. The experience of all the years I have lived in the North-West points to the conclusion that the Indian has a tendency, in all his dealings with the white man, to consult and largely to be guided by the opinion of the half-breeds. Therefore you have the whole half-breed element in sympathy with the Government in dealing with the plain tribe of Indians. I would express a very hearty conviction in the conclusion that you draw, namely: that we should attract to our side a moral power which, in the present critical relation of the various tribes of Indians towards each other and towards the Government, would prove of the greatest value to the Dominion."

I should have added that another question is touched on by the Archbishop, which is, that in existing settlements all the properties in the reserves should be sub-divided into lots of 10 chains broad by 80 in depth, in accordance with what was the ancient custom of the country. Bishop Macrae's statement is, perhaps, not material to be read; he declares that he has had but very little acquaintance with the subject. Governor Laird, on the 13th March, 1879, says:

If the half-breeds desire to settle down together I most certainly think that land should be for a short time reserved for them; but I believe it would be a mistake to lock up the land for a longer period than two or three years."

He discusses the question of teachers, and also of industrial schools, arguing rather against the practical availability of that proposition in the emergency, and adding these words:

"The wants of the Indians and half-breeds are pressing, and it appears to me that the same money that would support industrial schools could in the meantime be better employed in hiring a few practical men to go at once on the reserves and teach them how to plough, sow and save their crops, in order that, if possible, starvation in its worst form may be averted."

Just about the same time at which these various despatches were being written, there came the rumor that Louis Riel was going to the Saskatchewan—even at that early date. The Saskatchewan Herald, of the 24th March, 1879, contains this paragraph:

"The Emerson International gives currency to the rumor that Louis Riel intends going to the Saskatchewan next summer with a large French half-breed emigration to take place from settlements on the Red and Pembina Rivers. It is rumored that an agitation is on foot to obtain a reduction of the terms of his banishment, the Hon. Jos. Dubuc being understood to have promised to use his influence at Ottawa with the French Canadian members in support of the application."

On 15th May, 1879, by the Dominion Lands Act brought in during that Session, power is delegated to the Governor in Council:

"To satisfy any claims existing in connection with the extinguishment of the Indian title preferred by half-breeds resident in the North-West Territories outside the limits of Manitoba, on the 15th day of July, 1870, by granting land to such persons, to such extent, and on such terms and conditions, as may be deemed expedient."

So that not having decided upon the precise form of their policy they decided upon a quasi-recognition of the claim, and they asked Parliament to hand over to them absolute power and discretion to deal with it as they pleased, on what terms they pleased and when they pleased; and that power was granted. A question for our consideration from the time of the passing of that Act is, how they used the power which they so asked and so obtained? I will show that from that time up to 1885 they did nothing whatever. I will show they did nothing whatever with a question which had been declared by the Deputy head of the Department, by all persons who had been consulted under the advice of the Minister, to be a present question, a pressing question, a question which had already assumed the form of agitation, namely, public meetings and petitions, a question whose difficulty would be enhanced by time—I will show that having taken from Parliament carte blanche they never used their power from that day until the year in which we now are. The difficulties unquestionably were to be enhanced by time. No grievance grows less by time; no just demand diminishes in its intensity by time. The feeling of soreness, of irritation and neglect increases by time. The demands are apt to be exaggerated by time. The situation grows complicated by time, and in this case it was perfectly clear it was to become more complicated by time, because we were dealing at that moment with a state of things in which but comparatively few of the half breed population had taken up land. There were very considerable numbers at certain points to which I have referred; but taking the whole population of the Territories a large number of them had not taken up and improved lands at that time, and therefore there arose no question on the two titles as to the bulk of the half-breed population, as to at all events the majority of the half-breed population—I mean the right to the extinguishment of the Indian title and their rights as settlers. That arose only as to those who had settled; but it was clear it was going to arise with a much larger proportion of the half-breeds from year to year because it was inevitable they must starve or settle. Those who had not settled lived entirely by the chase of the buffalo and by freighting, and the buffalo having disappeared, they must either starve or settle; and settling, of course, the question of their title as settlers as well as the Indian title would arise. Was it because there was no pressure upon the Government that this matter slipped by neglected? Not so. As I have said, their Deputy Minister had warned them; the North-West Council had warned them; the Governor had warned them; and the three advisors whom they called into council had warned them that it was a question which ought to be settled at once, delay in the settlement of which would enhance the difficulty, and which therefore merited and demanded the early attention of the Government. They did nothing during those six years; they formed no ministerial plan; they enunciated no ministerial policy; they passed no Order in Council; they did not even take the preliminary steps of having an enumeration; they waited until the outbreak was on foot, and then they acted as I will show you after a while. During 1879, after having obtained the parliamentary authority to which I have referred, nothing was done. But on 1st December of that year Colonel Richardson, who had been for many years as a stipendary magistrate and a member of the council in the Territories, being in Ottawa, gave a memorandum, no doubt at the request of the Government, to Colonel Dennis, and in that memorandum he says:

“As soon as steps are taken to ascertain the number of half-breeds in the Territory who have not already shared in the Manitoba grant the scheme suggested by Colonel Dennis in the conclusion of his memorandum would I think give satisfaction generally.”

He differs, however from him on two points: First, he thinks there should be no special educational facilities; and second, there is no need to teach the half-breeds to raise and care for stock, because they know all about it, and in fact they teach the whites the proper way of raising and caring for stock in that country. He adds that some half-breeds would prefer settling near white settlements. It seems to be very clear that the First Minister in charge of this matter was reluctant to recognise this claim. And that seems to be apparent from another letter by Colonel Richardson to Colonel Dennis, written on 13th January, 1880. That letter runs as follows:—

“DEAR COLONEL DENNIS,—Having passed three years in the North-West and during that period seen a good deal of the half-breed population, the following induced by the remarks of the right hon. the Premier in my presence last Saturday, may not be out of place, the subject of dealing with the half-breed element of the North-West being, as I then gathered, intended for early discussion.

“1. These half-breeds claim and insist that as a distinct class they have a share in the Indian title to the land outside of Manitoba which has not been extinguished, and as such distinct class entitled equally with the half-breeds of Manitoba to special consideration. That grounds exist for such contention appear by reference to statutes of Canada, 1870, Cap. 3, sec. 21.

“2. Admitting these half-breeds might (as some few have, but now regret) joined in the Indian treaties, I am convinced such a contingency is not only not probable, but that if they requested they would reject the offer; besides I do not think their joining in the Indian treaties would be in the public interest, but decidedly the opposite.

“How best to deal with the element has, as you are aware, been considered and you already hold my views on the subject.

“I may however be permitted to express the opinion that opportunities now present themselves for removing the dissatisfaction existing among these people, and securing their good will towards the Government, because: 1. Their former occupation as hunters is gone. 2. They are as a class destitute. A further reason for urging as I respectfully do, early action is that they are scattered among the Indians and lately subjected to the evil influences of leading spirits of the Manitoba troubles of 1870, who during the past season have been traversing the country doing at least ‘no good.’”

Again you see, Mr. Speaker, the importance, in the view of a magistrate from the Territories, of early action, the danger of delay, the favorable character of the conjuncture of circumstances which then presented themselves for a settlement in a form which would be permanently beneficial to the half-breeds and at the same time to the country, and the efforts to remove the difficulty which he saw stood in the way from conversations he had with the Minister who seems to have held that the half-breeds had no well founded claim, and to have suggested that the Indian treaty was a good solution for any such claim. Nothing was done in 1880, although the year opened, as I have said, by this further communication from Colonel Richardson. In that year once again there was reference to danger, for amongst the papers brought down is a letter from W. L. Orde, Indian agent and clerk, North-West Indian Superintendency, Battleford, dated 3rd April, as follows:—

“I have the honor to inform you that an authentic report has reached here from the south, that Louis Riel is now agitating amongst the half-breeds, and the Sioux, and Crow Indians, it is said with a view of an attack upon the Blackfeet and Blood Indians, the ostensible object being to wrest from the latter, a large number of stolen ponies. He may have other evil designs, and I think it well to let you know.”

But although nothing was done at Ottawa, pressure was applied to Ottawa. In the spring of 1880, the half-breed inhabitants of Manitoba Village, Lake Manitoba, North-West Territories, signed a petition which contains these words:

“And whereas the half-breed heads of families, and the children of the same, born in or resident in the Territories, previously to 15th July, 1870, have not yet had their claims to equal rights and privileges with their brethren in the Province of Manitoba, investigated as is provided for by sub-section ‘E’ of clause 125, 42 Vic., Chap. 31; and whereas the continued delay in ascertaining and investigating said claims, is creating great and general dissatisfaction throughout the Territories, we your petitioners do humbly pray that you will cause a commission to be issued at an early date to enquire into and confirm the said claims, not only with regard to scrip and allotments of lands as provided for in Manitoba, but moreover to confirm the titles of lands occupied by or purchased by parties from occupants of claims taken previously to the transfer of the Territories to the Dominion of Canada.”

On the 10th of May, 1880, the Deputy Superintendent General acknowledges that petition, and states that it will be duly laid before the Minister for consideration. It was under consideration until 1885. On the 23rd of February, 1880, there was a meeting at Duck Lake to which I adverted a few days ago, called by Father André to protest against the notion of abolishing the territorial government; and in his speech, as reported in the newspapers, Father André said:

“Before long this together with several other settlements, would be entitled to representation in the council at Battleford. Then the council would be in a better position to speak in the name of the people, to press their wants and remedy their grievances at Ottawa.”

Showing that they had even then wants and grievances, in the opinion of the speaker, which required pressing, and in respect of which they valued even that imperfect and rudimentary system of representation, under which they hoped soon to have a member in that district. On the same occasion, another of the speakers, Mr. Abraham Montour, said:

“Several other petitions had already been forwarded to Ottawa, setting forth the rights and certain wants of the half-breed element throughout the territory, and the action of the Government was still to be learned. He feared the present petition would receive similar treatment.”

So that there was even then complaint of the neglect of petitions which were forwarded to Ottawa. On the 19th of May, 1880, Mr. Thomas McKay, I believe a very respected resident of Prince Albert, transmitted to the Minister of the Interior a petition in this letter:

"I herewith forward you petition from the half-breeds of Edmonton and Prince Albert, North-West Territories. As we have no representative for the North-West Territories through whom we could make our wants known, the petition is forwarded to you, trusting it shall receive your early and special attention."

The petition is signed by 102 names, and, amongst other things, it contains these statements:

"And whereas the half-breed heads of families, and the children of the same, born or resident in the Territories previously to July 15th, 1870, have not yet had their claims to equal rights and privileges with their brethren in the Province of Manitoba, investigated, as is justly due to them, and as is provided for by sub-section 'E' of clause 125, 42 Victoria, Chapter 31; and whereas the continued delay in ascertaining and investigating said claims, is creating great and general dissatisfaction throughout the Territories; we your petitioners do humbly pray that you will cause a commission to be issued at an early date to enquire into and confirm the said claims, not only with regard to scrip, and allotments of land as provided for in Manitoba, but, moreover, to confirm the titles to land occupied by or purchased by parties from occupants of claims taken previously to the transfer of the Territories to the Dominion of Canada."

On the 10th of July, 1880, Mr. McKay's letter was acknowledged, and he was informed that it would receive due consideration on the return of the Minister from England. It was under consideration till 1885. I come to the year 1881; nothing was done in the year 1881, but the pressure went on. In the summer of 1881, there was a petition to the Governor General from the half-breeds of Qu'Appelle, with 112 signatures containing these statements:

"That owing to their being temporarily absent from the now Province of Manitoba, at the time of the transfer of the said Province and the North-West Territories to the Dominion of Canada, they have been deprived of, and debarred from, several advantages which were accorded to their confères who were residents in the Province of Manitoba at the time of the aforesaid transfer, and that your petitioners are of opinion that they have been unjustly treated, as their conduct and actions at the time referred to deserve the kind consideration of the Government. Therefore your petitioners humbly pray that they be dealt with and treated similar to the half-breeds of Manitoba, and the Government will grant scrip to the heads of families and grants of land to the children of the heads of families in the North-West Territories, in like proportion as was granted to half-breeds and old settlers in the Province of Manitoba."

That petition was acknowledged on the 20th of September, 1881, by direction of the Minister of the Interior, and the parties were informed that the petition would be duly considered. It was considered up to 1885. On the 7th of June, 1881, the district of Lorne having in the meantime acquired representation in the North-West Council, a memorial was presented to that council by Mr. Lawrence Clarke, member for Lorne, in these words:

"The undersigned has the honor to represent—

"That a feeling of dissatisfaction and discontent exists among the half-breed element of the North-West Territories.

"That such feeling has arisen from what these half-breeds consider a disregard of their rights, and in the opinion of many whose standing in the country gives such an opinion weight, has, to some extent at least, increased the difficulties encountered by the Dominion Government in their dealings with the Indians, between whom and the whites the half-breeds form a distinct class, possessing, as a rule, great influence over the Indians.

"That the half-breeds have always been recognised as possessing rights in the same soil, subject to which the Dominion accepted the transfer of the Territories, and while ample provision has been made for those resident in Manitoba, on the 15th July, 1870, nothing has been done towards extinguishing that portion of the Indian title to lands and territories outside the Province of Manitoba, as originally formed by the Act of 1870.

"The undersigned further draws attention to the fact, that, by law, the half-breeds are excluded from the benefit conferred upon the Indians.

"That the undersigned has been given to understand several petitions from various quarters have been presented to the Dominion Government on the subject of the half-breeds, particularly referred to, but no notice taken thereof.

"That the undersigned knows that a considerable portion of these half-breeds were and are still residents of the electoral districts of Lorne, and feels it his duty as the electoral representative of that district, to bring under notice, their grievances, in the hope that some action may be taken at an early day, towards removing what seems to be just cause or complaint.

"The undersigned recommends that through your honor in council the attention of His Excellency be respectfully drawn to the subject, and he be memorialised to direct the attention of his Ministers to the position of the half-breeds who at the transfer to Canada, were and still are residents of the North-West Territories, and have not become parties to Indian treaties, and the taking of such steps as may lead to a speedy adjustment of the grievances they labor under."

On the 14th of June, 1881, the Lieutenant Governor transmitted a copy of this memorial to the Government, adding:

"I was requested by a resolution in council, passed on the 10th inst., to transmit copies thereof to be laid before His Excellency the Governor General, and to express the hope that His Excellency may be pleased to draw the attention of his Ministers to the grievances complained of.

"I trust you will have the goodness, at an early day, to bring these subjects to which these memorials refer, under the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General."

On receipt of these papers, it seems from the papers which were brought down, that the Deputy Minister felt it needful to make another effort, and he made up a file which contained his memorandum of December, 1878, the letter of Archbishop Taché, the letter of Bishop McLean, the letter of Bishop Macrae, the letter of Governor Laird, the letters of Colonel Richardson, the memorial of Mr. Clarke, and the letter of Governor Laird, which I have just read, and he laid it before Sir David Macpherson, then Acting Minister of Interior, with this memorandum:

"The undersigned submits for the information of the Acting Minister the file herewith on the subject of the claims preferred by the half-breeds of the North-West Territories to lands or scrip following upon the grants in this behalf made to the half-breeds of Manitoba."

It is clear, even from that memorandum and its submission at that date, that up to that time no progress had been made in the solution of the question since the period of the passage of the Act, and it was then laid before the Minister for further consideration. It remained under consideration until the year 1885. On the 4th of September, 1881, the Governor General, Lord Lorne, visited the North-West Territories and those regions. A joint address was presented to him by the Hudson Bay Company, the settlers, and the Indians, on the Saskatchewan, and in reply he used this language:

"In cementing the friendship which, thank God, has reigned between the white and the red man, the Metis has been the valued confidant as he is the brother of both. He has aided in the perfect understanding which exists."

Thus was evidenced the opinion of the executive of the country, as to the importance of the half-breed element, in confirmation of the correspondence I have already read, as to the need of preserving a good understanding between the white and the half-breed with a view to the maintenance of good relations with the Indians. But instead of those good terms being maintained, the half-breeds' petitions were disregarded, he was not vouchsafed a reply, he was despised, and neglected, and he became, as Archbishop Taché indicated in his letter he might become, a scourge instead of a help. On the 8th of October, 1881, there was a meeting at Prince Albert, largely attended by persons representing the entire district of Lorne, who passed a series of resolutions, of which the third is as follows:—

"Whereas the Indian title in this district or territory has not become extinct, and the old settlers and half-breed population of Manitoba were granted scrip in commutation of such title, and such allowances has not been made to those resident in this territory, resolved that the Minister of the Interior be requested to grant such scrip to such settlers, thus placing them on an equal footing with their confères in Manitoba."

These resolutions were ordered to be presented by Mr. Lawrence Clarke, the member for the district, and he was directed to obtain a reply. From the correspondence it appears that he visited Ottawa, and he received a letter after that visit, dated the 22nd of November, 1881, in which, by the direction of the Minister, the Deputy acknowledges the receipt of the memorial and resolutions of the Prince Albert meeting, and says:

It is a very extraordinary thing that this subject should have so little penetrated the brains of the Department up to that time that they were able to seize on the suggestion that the Indian title had been extinguished as an excuse, when it was perfectly clear to the most ordinary mind that it was the share of the half-breeds in the Indian title that had not been extinguished which formed the basis of the resolution.

"In closing, I am to say that the Minister will cause enquiry to be made through his own officers with reference to the several subjects of these resolutions, and will on their report have such action taken in the premises as may be in accordance with law and necessary."

On the 25th of January, 1882, Mr. Clarke, acknowledged the receipt of this letter, and dealing with resolution No. 3 he answers as follows:—

"I would respectfully submit that the Indian title no doubt has been extinguished, but evidently not that of the half-breed residents of the North-West Territories. The Government of the Dominion of Canada have repeatedly acknowledged the right in the soil of the half-breed inhabitants as is proved."

He then proceeds to cite in detail the Act of 1870, to which I have referred, the Act of 1874, the Act of 1876, the Act of 1877, and the Act of 1879, citing the appropriate clauses in each case to prove his contention; and he adds:

"It will be seen therefore that from the first enactment in 1870 to the last in 1879, the rights in the soil of the half-breed have been recognised by the Government, and provision made for the extinguishment of their title. A very strong memorial on this subject was laid before the North-West Council at its last meeting in June, 1881, and a resolution adopted by that body that the memorial should be remitted to the Governor General of Canada, with a recommendation that His Excellency would be pleased to draw the attention of his Ministers to grievance complained of."

On the 14th of April, 1882, the Deputy Minister acknowledges the receipt of the letter of Mr. Clarke, and says:

"The other points raised in your letter"—

Which are the points relating to half-breeds—

"are reserved for the Minister's special consideration."

They received that consideration in 1885. Now, I come to the year 1882. The report of the Minister of the Interior was presented on the 15th February, 1882, and it is the only document which indicates that any step had been taken in the matter:

"The condition of the half-breed population of the Territories, and the claims which have been preferred on their behalf to be dealt with somewhat similarly to those of the half-breeds of the Red River, have been receiving careful consideration, with a view to meeting them reasonably."

But nothing appears to have been done; the consideration appears to have been fruitless. If there were any notions formed, they did not refer to the matured condition of plans or schemes; no report was made by the Minister to Council; no action was taken whatever. In the month of October, 1882, and for several months afterwards, Bishop Grandin, who is the Bishop within whose diocese these parts are, was at Ottawa, on various matters relating to his diocese. I have little doubt, from what I have read and seen, that with reference to that protracted mission of Bishop Grandin there are papers; but I have not had access to those papers, and no papers whatever have been brought down by the Government relative to Bishop Grandin's mission, his petitions, or the results. But besides attending to his own special business, as to which the Government has left us wholly in the dark—if indeed there be, as I believe there to be, papers which would throw light upon it—Bishop Grandin, who certainly got some concessions, who certainly was promised a written reply, which written reply I am not sure he ever received, gave, I believe, warnings to the Government as to the impending trouble in consequence of the delays, and I charge that either then or earlier or later, Bishop Grandin made applications and representations, and received promises: and I will give the proof of that now. In an address which he made to a large assemblage of half-breeds at St. Laurent on the 5th of February, 1884, as reported in Le Manitoba, he used these words:

"As to the other propositions, I have busied myself already for a long time with these in your special interest. I have put upon the Federal Government all possible pressure to obtain justice; I have even obtained promises which I believed official, but which I have the pain of seeing to-day forgotten. I have felt the same discontent that you also have felt, and I have not failed to complain upon the subject in high quarters."

Where are the papers? In the month of October, 1882, the surveyors of the Dominion Government were at St. Albert, which, I believe, is the headquarters of the diocese. They were about to engage in a survey on the ordinary general principle of the lands in that neighborhood. They gave satisfactory explanations to Father Leduc as to the purpose of that survey, and as to its being followed in the course of a few days by a special survey of the recognised holdings on the river lot system. But later on fresh orders from Ottawa came, under which those special surveyors who had commenced their work were stopped. Excitement ensued; a public meeting was held, and Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney were appointed delegates to Ottawa. That poor population raised $600 in cash to pay their expenses; $100 more was raised on their way down to Fort Saskatchewan. Their demands were reduced to writing, and among those demands was one for the settlement of these Indian title claims. That demand was presented by the delegates to the Government at Ottawa, but it has not been brought down; it is not among the papers. They started on their journey; they were 24 days travelling to Qu'Appelle Station; they reached Ottawa; there were long communications, in which intervened the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal), Sir David Macpherson, the hon. Minister of Public Works, and the First Minister himself. Promises were made; they asked for writings; the Minister replied to them: "Give a written memorandum and you shall have a written response." They gave written papers into the hands of the Minister, but they are not brought down. Amongst them, in March, 1883, was a memorandum signed by Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney, and it contains this paragraph:

"The inhabitants of St. Albert are for the most part French or English half-breeds, born in the North-West Territories or Manitoba. Before the transfer they were the natural joint possessors of the soil with the Indians. A treaty has been concluded with the latter for the extinction of their rights, but the half-breeds of the Territories have not yet received any compensation, notwithstanding they are on the same footing of right, in fact, with those of Manitoba. They demand then, by the intervention of their delegates to Ottawa, that the Act of Manitoba relative to the rights of the half-breeds and their children born before the transfer be extended to the North-West Territories."

They have received answers, but the answers are not brought down. I believe the answer with reference to this particular claim, which was not the special claim, which was the foundation of their mission, was that the question of this particular right of the half-breeds at that very moment occupied the attention of Parliament. It is true there were two ways in which it might be said to have occupied the attention of Parliament. One was because there was a motion before the House during the Session, made by myself, for the petitions of the people of St. Albert, which embraced this question; the other was that on that occasion a Consolidated Dominion Lands Act was passed, although no change was made in the Act of 1879 authorising the Government to deal with the question. I know of no other way in no extent to which it could be said that particular question was engaging the attention of Parliament than what I have said. But, notwithstanding these delegations, nothing was done in 1882, and the same observation applies to 1883. Early in the year 1883, in fact during the beginning of 1882-83, a petition was circulated among the citizens of Prince Albert to the House of Commons, and it was presented on the 20th March of that year, bearing the signatures of 394 settlers. It contains this paragraph :

"Whereas there are many half-breeds in this locality and other parts of the North-West Territory who have never taken the treaty, and who were not in Manitoba at the time the census in 1870 was taken, in consequence thereof have not participated in the scrip issued to the half-breeds in that Province."

And this prayer :

"That those half-breeds in the North-West Territory, who have not participated in the scrip issues to the half-breeds in Manitoba may have the same issued to them, thus placing them on the same basis as their brethren in that Province."

In 1883, it seems, Louis Riel visited his old haunts in Manitoba, and became the subject of newspaper comments. On the 9th October, 1883, the North-West Council renewed its application to the Government in this regard. It had done it in 1878; it had done it in 1881; and it did it in 1883:

"Your memorialists further pray that those half-breeds in the Territories who have not participated in the arrangement to extinguish the half-breed claim in Manitoba should enjoy the same rights as accorded half-breeds in that Province."

You will observe that the council had recognised that the time for any other arrangement had now passed; that whatever might have been done to make different arrangements with the half-breeds in the earlier days, when their condition was different, before so much delay and neglect had taken place, could be done no longer; and their suggestion to the authorities, based upon the suggestion of the people there, was that the half-breeds in the North-West Territories should be given the same rights as those in Manitoba had been given. It had come to that at last, after three or four years of suggestion and unavailing pressure. On the 18th October, 1883, the Privy Council referred that memorial to the President of the Council and the Minister of the Interior for action; they had it under consideration until 1885. By that time, the agitation had got high on various questions. There was a mass meeting, on the 17th October, at Prince Albert, of the inhabitants of Prince Albert and the neighborhood. There were resolutions passed and speeches delivered, and these resolutions were ordered to be transmitted by the secretary of the meeting to the Minister, but they have not been brought down. Amongst these was a resolution endorsing the petition of the council of the North-West Territories for a recognition of the right of the half-breeds in respect of the Indian title as in Manitoba. On the 21st of January, 1884, a meeting was held of the settlers of St. Catharines parish to discuss some of their grievances. A committee consisting of W. Kennedy, J. Isbister and W. Swain was appointed to draw up a petition to the Government, setting forth the grievances the people were laboring under in regard to land matters, and praying for redress, and to cooperate with other committees which might be formed, and to wait on Inspector Pearce and ask him to forward the petition to the Government. That petition has not been brought down. It embraced other matters with reference to this matter; and my reason for thinking so is because there was a series of meetings held on the same lines, and I find it expressly stated in the resolutions adopted at another meeting. At a meeting in the parish of St. Catharines, held the 21st of January, 1884, Mr. Kennedy moved, seconded by Mr. J. Anderson, and it was resolved:

"That the half-breed people of the North-West Territories are unjustly treated in not having the same privileges as regards land grants and scrip extended to them, which have been enjoyed by their brethren in Manitoba, and pledging the meeting to make its best endeavors to have the injustice redressed."

But no petition founded on that resolution has been brought down. At Lindsay school-house, Red Deer Hill, in the same month a meeting was held and the resolution, passed at St.

Catharines, was endorsed and a committee appointed to draw up a petition; but no indication of the existence of that paper is brought down. On the 28th of January, 1884, a meeting of settlers was held at Haloro settlement on the South Branch, at which the resolutions of St. Catharines and Lindsay were read and adopted. Mr. A. Spence and Mr. M. Crestine were appointed a committee to draw up a memorial to the Government, but no such memorial appears in the papers brought down. Mr. J. Jackson was appointed to obtain the co-operation of the French settlement in carrying out the resolutions passed at the various meetings, and hopes were expressed that the agitation would increase. The same winter there was a meeting at the Hudson Bay store, South Branch, which was attended by Mr. Macdowall, who was the member for that district, having succeeded Mr. Clark. The grievances were discussed, and much was expected of the coming Session of Parliament. On the 26th of February, 1884, a public meeting was held at Colleston school house. Mr. Macdowall, member for Lorne, spoke; he took up the memorandum of North-West Council in reference to settlers grievances and expressed his confidence in the Minister of the Interior, and thought that the grievances stated in the memorial would be redressed. A series of resolutions were adopted including this one:

"That the half-breeds and natives of the Territories are entitled to the same treatment as their more favored brethren in Manitoba receive."

No indication of that is brought down. On the 27th March, 1884, in this House, the special allusion to the affairs of the North-West which took place for the purpose of debate at any rate, was made. I had discussed in general terms the discontent existing in that region on the Address, and on the 27th of March my hon. friend the member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) on the motion to go into Committee of Supply, made a motion in amendment, and made a speech which contains this language:

"I have spoken to you of the Province of Manitoba and the farmers of that Province, but we must recollect that there is another representative body in the North-West, a body of equal, perhaps of greater importance—a body that rules over an area of 20,000 square miles, with a population estimated at from 20,000 to 150,000 people, a body which has sovereign power in the limits given to it by the constitution under which it has its existence. I refer to the North-West Council. They, too, in solemn council assembled, drew up a list of the grievances of which the North-West Territories had to complain. These grievances were sixteen in number—sixteen different grounds of complaint—and all these grounds of complaint have an importance and a significance well worthy the consideration of those who are now at the head of the affairs in this country. I do not propose dealing with those grievances at any considerable length; I propose only referring to one or two of them; but in dealing with any of these grievances we ought to bear in mind that the importance to be attached to a protest of misgovernment, of bad policy, depends very largely on the source whence the protest comes. The first question that naturally arises is: Do the people who complain know whereof they speak? Are they conversant with the position and the circumstances of the country? Do they appreciate thoroughly the trials and the difficulties connected with pioneer settlement? And can they fully appreciate the errors of judgment or policy committed by the Administration in the great North-West? Are they free to give an honest and an unbiassed judgment on the question on which they undertook to pronounce? If they are the friends of the Government, they surely cannot desire to embarrass the Government, and one cannot help coming to the conclusion that there must be some foundation for their complaints. We all know perfectly well that at least four-fifths of the North-West Council are the friends of the Government. Now, let us see what those friends of the Government in the North-West complain of."

And he read their complaint, which contains this clause:

"Your memorialists further pray that those half-breeds in the Territories who have not participated in the arrangement to extinguish the half-breed claims in Manitoba should enjoy the same rights as accorded half-breeds in that Province."

And then a claim for further surveys and river lot surveys. He adds:

"The demands to which I have referred, made by Manitoba and the North-West Council, are of a not unimportant character. They involve very grave consideration. Hon. members acquainted with the country will admit that they affect the growth and prosperity of the whole of our western region. Their admission will to a large extent inspire hope and confidence in the minds of the settlers who have gone to make homes in the North-West, and the refusal of those demands—reasonable demands, at any rate—will, in my judgment, imperil the very existence of the Province and of the Territory; and I claim, also, that the refusal will at least check the growth and prosperity of the Territory, and to some extent, I believe, it will weaken the ties which bind Manitoba and the Territories to the Dominion of Canada. I do not say that all the demands made by the Province or by the Territories are all fair and reasonable, I do not pretend to say that the claims made are all fair and reasonable; but I say that every claim advanced by the Province of Manitoba, and every ground of complaint against the policy of the Dominion Government made by the North-West Territories, deserve at the very least, at the hands of the Government, a fair consideration. If those claims are fair and reasonable they should be met promptly, they should be discussed promptly, they should be considered promptly, and if fair and honest claims they should be considered by the Government promptly."

And he moved:

"This House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, to consider of the condition, complaints and demands of Manitoba and the North-West Territories with a view to devise means for remedying any well-founded grievances and complying with any reasonable demands."

But unhappily his motion was rejected. In the spring of 1884 the agitation went on, and grievances and complaints were the talk of the people of all this district. In May, 1884, it is reported in the local paper:

"Meetings of the settlers have been held in different places lately, in fact since last winter, discussing their grievances. Last Tuesday a meeting of delegates was held in the Pocha school-house. It was a very large one, all parts being represented. They seem to be fully alive to the fact that farmers' interests are all alike and that union is strength. A working committee has been formed and a list of their grievances drawn out, among which may be mentioned—just representation, the half-breeds of the North-West to receive the same as those of Manitoba, no 80 acres homesteads, and no timber dues. A good deal of feeling exists on account of all officers in the North-West being filled with people from the eastern Provinces, notably Indian instructors. The natives here know the Indian nature much better than strangers can do; besides, the instructors they have sent know nothing about farming and need instruction themselves. Such is the feeling prevalent here."

Then in the same month of May:

"A meeting composed of French and English half-breeds was held at Lindsay school house on Tuesday last; the object seems to be for both parties to agree on a set of resolutions which have been passed at previous meetings, said resolutions embodying grievances complained of by said French and English half-breeds. The substance of the resolutions being the same as was agitated last winter with the addition of two, namely, one protesting against the participation of the Hudson Bay Company in any land in the country and the other in regard to sending a deputation to Louis Riel. Objection was made by the English half-breeds, and, after some sharp discussion in which the Chairman, Mr. Andrew Spence, criticised the English side, in which he said it was his opinion that some of them thought themselves too wise, ergo, a set of fools, the whole thing was left to a committee, who after some time adopted all the resolutions as presented by the French. It seems to be the mind of the meeting to invite Louis Riel into the country instead of having to send out of it to consult him re matters concerning the negotiating for the transfer of Manitoba and the North West Territories into the Union. What the aim of all these meetings is very few seem to know, if any do, but, as far as stated in the resolutions, it is all well enough to set forth grievances of which not only the half-breeds but Canadians from Ontario as well join, one of the latter taking the lead in opening his purse when subscriptions were called for, for defraying the expense of the delegation to Riel. The delegation is composed of four members of the committee—Messrs James Isbister and M. Dumas for the English, the French members have escaped the memory of your correspondent."

In the same month the same newspapers, speaking generally of the rights of the Territories, spoke editorially as follows:—

"We have every reason to believe that the half-breeds have only been restrained hitherto from very active measures to enforce redress of these and other grievances peculiarly their own, by a doubt as to whether they carried with them the sympathy of the rest of the population. But as they are now fully confident of this, they do not intend to tamely submit much longer. The Government must remember that to the numerical strength of this party must be added the power at any moment to stir into a flame the slumbering embers of discontent smouldering in the breasts of our Indians."

I have now reached the period in the history of this affair when Louis Riel was to be invited and to arrive, and it is therefore necessary to trace the condition of affairs in a more general sense than that in which I have been endeavoring to do it heretofore. I have to trace the progress of the particular claim of which I have been speaking, the progress of the agitation, the warnings and the knowledge of the Government, and the course of events down to the imminence of the outbreak, and then to find out what the Government did and when they did anything in this particular claim. I have said that this was not the only grievance. I have referred to the other grievances. I have referred to the questions of the land and several other questions which were at the same time agitating the people, and to which I intend particularly to allude, but there were also of course other things which tended to embitter the minds of many of the settlers. There were great disappointments resulting from change in the railway route, delays in branch railways, some failures in crops, hard times generally, the alleged monopoly by the Hudson Bay Company of contracts, and very serious apprehensions in the minds of the people of Indian troubles. And these various sticks helped to form the materials for a pretty big fire, and that fire was now about to be kindled so far as agitation could kindle it. I maintain, touching very lightly upon these topics at any time, that it is yet necessary to make this brief allusion to them, because at this moment I conceive the Government was called on to deal with this case in view of a new and very serious juncture. The question had reached such a pitch that the inhabitants had actually determined to send for Louis Riel. The influence of Louis Riel upon them was known to the Government. The First Minister has described it in his place in this House. He had pointed out that he was their El Mahdi, their Stuart, their La Rochejaquelin, their leader of the lost cause; a man of unbounded, unlimited influence. And he has pointed out, also, the position which he had formerly occupied; and surely an invitation to such an one to come amongst them, an invitation based, as this was, upon his former acts and achievements in the Province of Manitoba, was a striking and startling circumstance, and ought to have led the Government to the decision that any substantial grievances which really existed, any causes of complaints of long standing, should be adjusted without further delay, so as to give no substantial cause for disaffection, for agitation, for disturbance, for discontent; so as to remove all that could be removed, conscious, as they must have been, if they heeded the circumstances of the case, that even a complete removal at that stage would leave some soreness and irritation remaining; and knowing, as they must have known if they had properly studied the lessons of history, that the result of such a state of things as I have depicted, is that to the original grievances and complaints which had a solid foundation, there are always added, by those who agitate, new claims, less tenable, claims exaggerated, claims which the people are persuaded to demand and adhere to, just because of the discontented mind in which they had been plunged by the denial of justice, by the refusal of right, by neglect, contumely and contempt. Now, Sir, just at this very time, in June, 1884, there were other conjunctions of a serious character; another warning was given. In June, 1884, it was that the very serious Poundmaker disturbance occurred at Battleford; and if you look at the papers of that date, at the Winnipeg Times of that month, you will find an account of that disturbance, a disturbance which recalls, in many of its aspects, some of the late transactions at Battleford, a disturbance under which the people were obliged to place themselves in a state of siege, to vacate their houses, to take refuge in fortified posts, and prepare to resist what they believed to be an organised Indian attack. Nor was that the only case in which the Indian showed at that time a disposition to create disturbance and difficulty. The Government was well aware of that, and for proof I need advert to no more than the hon. gentleman's speech upon this subject at an early period of the Session, when he himself described the condition of the Indian population, and their mental mood and attitude at that time. Just before this time, the Deputy Minister of the Department was at Calgary, I observe, on his return from the mountains, and on the same day on which he was there a telegram reached that very point showing the state of affairs. In a word, I may say, that every storm drum was up at that time, that everything indicated, both from the point of view of the half-breeds and of the Indians, that whatever apathy may have existed before, whatever neglect may have existed before, whatever indifference had existed before, were causes for redoubled energy, for redoubled promptness, for enhanced liberality of treatment, in order to the avoidance of the crisis due to that more formidable agitation which was soon to supervene. Well, Sir, in the month of June, 1884, a delegation consisting of Messrs. Isbister, Dumont, Ouillelt and Dumas, were appointed by a committee, and several resolutions were passed by the meeting which appointed that committee; but I have not been able to find those resolutions, so that I am not able to present them to the House as I would have desired. The delegates walked 700 miles into Montana to meet Riel, and they found him. They presented their papers to him, and they obtained from him a reply. He says:

"GENTLEMEN:—You have travelled more than 700 miles from the Saskatchewan country across the international line to make me a visit. The communities in the midst of which you live have sent you as their delegates to ask my advice on various difficulties which have rendered the British North-West unhappy under the administration of the Ottawa Government. Moreover, you invite me to go and stay amongst you, your hope being that I, for one, could help to better, in some respects, your condition. Cordial and pressing is your invitation; you want me and my family to accompany you; I am at liberty to excuse myself and say no; yet you are waiting for me; so that I have only to get ready, and your letters of delegation assure me that a friendly welcome awaits me in the midst of those who sent you.

"Gentlemen, your personal visit does me honor and causes great pleasure; but on account of its representative character your coming to me has the appearance of a remarkable circumstance which I record as one of the gratifications of my life—an event which my family will remember, and I pray to God that my assistance will prove so successful to you as to render this event a blessing amongst the many blessings of this, my 40th year. To be frank is the shortest. I doubt whether my advice given to you on this soil concerning affairs in Canadian territories, could cross the border and retain any influence. But here is another view of the matter: I am entitled, according to the 31st and 32nd clauses of the Manitoba Treaty, to land, of which the Canadian Government have directly or indirectly deprived me, and my claim to which is valid notwithstanding the fact that I have become an American citizen. Considering, then, that my interests are identical with yours, I accept your very kind invitation, and will go and spend some months amongst you, in the hope that by petitioning the Government we will obtain the redress of all our grievances.

"Montana has a population of which the native half-breed element constitutes a considerable portion, and if we include those white men who, through being connected by marriage, or in other ways, have a personal interest in their welfare, I believe that this element is a pretty strong one. I am just getting acquainted with them, and I am one of those who would like to unite and direct its vote for the furtherance of their best interests; moreover, I have made friends and acquaintances amongst whom I like to live. I go with you, but I come back in September.

"I have the honor to be, gentlemen delegates,
Your humble servant,

"LOUIS RIEL."

And he accompanied the delegates to the Saskatchewan. There is a correspondence of the influential French paper of the North-West, Le Manitoba, which I believe is under the proprietorship of M. de la Rivière, a member of the Manitoba Government, I think, and with which it is supposed my hon. friend opposite, the member for Provencher, sometimes had—perhaps I may say sometimes has—a little to do with. Le Manitoba thus announced the arrival of Riel:

"I learned yesterday that Mr. Louis Riel was to go to-day to St. Laurent. You are aware, perhaps, that after the meetings of this spring, a delegation of the English and French Metis departed to visit the ex-President of the Provisional Government of Red River, then in Montana, to inform him of the needs of those of his fellow half-breeds—because he is a Metis—and beg him to come among them. It appears that the delegation has succeeded, at least to this degree; it is said that Mr. Riel is coming with his family. O, if he would only have the happy idea to remain permanently amongst us! That man only can do good to his fellow countrymen, and he is the only one who can unite them all on any question. His name is great among the Metis, English or French; and there is no doubt that his influence, if well directed, will be of immense advantage to them. Yesterday the people were to assemble in crowds to meet him."

Then, on 10th July, the correspondent writes in the same paper:

"The members of the committee forming the delegation sent to Mr. Riel, and appointed in the month of May last, had a meeting on the 8th inst. at Chas. Nolin's, to receive the report of this delegation. Herewith is the report that the delegates presented to the committee, which was read by the secretary; and also the answer from Mr. Riel:

"To Messrs. the members of the committee in charge of the seven resolutions adopted by the population of the Saskatchewan.

"WM. CROMARTIE, President.
"LOUIS SCHMIDT, Secretary."

A number of statements are then made, which are immaterial, and the report goes on to say:

"After having made known to him the object of our mission, we presented to him our credentials and the six resolutions that we were to consider together, and also the document in which, in the name of the public, you invited him to come to the North-West. We asked him to come with us, if he could, and help us. This interview took place on the 4th of June. Mr. Riel read our papers and asked twenty-four hours to consider and give us an answer.

"The humble condition of his lodging made us think of the numerous occasions he had of becoming rich at the time he had the power in his hands. We recalled his firm attitude in the midst of thousands of dangers as meriting the confidence of his fellow countrymen. We knew what he had done for Manitoba and the North-West, and the little advantages he had personally received from the same. And returning from this long journey of nearly 1,400 miles, we feel twice as much confidence in that man whom we have been visiting in a foreign land. * *"

"Mr. Riel comes here to help us, without any pretension. He hopes that before long the people of the North-West will be perfectly united, and that the Government will very soon do justice to all.

"The speeches of Mr. Riel inspire us with the greatest confidence, because his instructions are to help us; but while helping us he does not want, in the slightest degree, to create needless difficulties to the Government.

"We have the honor to be, gentlemen, your most humble servants and delegates,

"GABRIEL DUMONT,
"JAMES ISBISTER,
"MOISE OUILLETTE,
"MICHEL DUMAS."

The correspondent goes on to give the answer of Louis Riel, which I have already read. This same influential newspaper, on 17th of July, wrote, editorially, upon the North-West, in these words:

"For several months we have been receiving letters from the North-West which inform us of the agitation that is going on there.

"When the Act creating the Province of Manitoba was introduced in Ottawa, in 1870, the Federal Government, after long conference with the Rev. Father Ritchot, Judge Black and Mr. Scott, the three delegates of the colony of Assiniboia, had inserted in that measure some just and equitable provisions guaranteeing to the inhabitants of the colony the confirmation of the titles of the lands possessed by them up to 15th July, 1870. Another clause of the same Act gave a land grant of 1,400,000 acres to the half-breed children for the extinction of their rights as first proprietors of the country. Later on, by another Act, each head of a family received a land grant of 160 acres for the extinction of the same right. But all these provisions were made only in favor of the half-breeds living, at the date of the 15th July, 1870, on the territory comprised in the limits of the Province then created, and those of the half-breeds who were then and are still in the North-West never could participate in any manner in that act of justice on the part of the Federal Government."

The article proceeds to quote the resolution of the North-West Council of 1878, and the Act of Parliament of 1883, and it goes on to say:

"The great difficulty that the half-breeds meet with is, first, the obtaining a survey of their lands according to the limits and actual shape of those lands, the delay in the ratification of their titles, and the quasi refusal to give them the grant asked for the extinction of their Indian rights. These are to-day the causes of all the discontent. Several petitions have been sent to Ottawa; even delegates have been sent to the capital, at great expense, and yet without result. Is there a population in any of the other Provinces who would not have created a regular revolution if they had been subjected to such treatment? Certainly not.

"To-day meetings are called from all parts; the settlers who, though not being half-breeds, have the interests of the latter at heart, join with them to demand justice and draw the attention of the Federal Government, who, let it be said, are far less guilty than the heads of the Department and its other officers. Our correspondent in Prince Albert sends us a word on this subject in the letter that we publish to-day; and since then a despatch informs us that a great meeting, composed of new settlers and French and English half-breeds, has been held a few miles from Prince Albert. At this meeting, the despatch says: Mr. Louis Riel spoke in very moderate terms. The Hon. Chas. Nolin, ex-member of the Government and of the Legislature of Manitoba, also spoke at this meeting, as well as Mr. W. S. Jackson. It was resolved to prepare a petition to the Government, asking that justice be done to the parties interested.

"Notwithstanding all the good reasons that our friends of the North-West can allege in support of their demands, notwithstanding all their neglected rights, we hope, we even have the certainty, that they will not be guilty of any act or any threat of violence, which could only be injurious to their cause. On the other hand, how can one avoid blaming the Federal Government, or rather the Department of the Interior, which is the primary cause of all this discontent?"

On 8th July, 1884, the Government received a telegram from Crozier, of the Mounted Police at Battleford:

"Louis Riel arrived at Duck Lake with family, brought in by half-breeds. They brought him in, it is said, as their leader, agitating their rights."

On 15th July Mr. Mathew Ryan, formerly stipendiary magistrate in the Territories, and who had been engaged as commissioner in connection with the enumeration of the half-breeds, wrote a letter, which was published in the Manitoba Free Press, from which a few extracts may be read:

"In common with many others, no doubt, I expected that the opening of the Sixth Council of the North-West council would be marked by some reference to the state of disquietude manifest in the half-breed settlements of St. Laurent and adjacent places."

After stating his own official relation to another phase of the question, Mr. Ryan proceeds:

"In the discharge of this duty, I found that a large number of half-breeds had no claim under the Act (that is, the original Manitoba Act), not having been residents of Manitoba at the date of the transfer. I also see that this exclusion caused much discontent, and I did not fail to urge, from time to time, that the proper remedy should be applied."

Mr. Ryan then states the memorandum of the North-West Council of 1878, and the Land Act of 1879, and adds:

"But nothing further has yet been done in the premises. In a letter which I have lately received from a gentleman in a high position in the Territories, it is written: 'For what reasons the Government has not, so far, done anything in the premises, is a mystery to me. The half-breeds feel that they are slighted, and the feeling of discontent is daily growing amongst them.'"

This letter derives a great portion of its significance from the fact that it was published at the time and became the property of the Government as well as the property of the public. At this time the Deputy Minister of the Interior, Mr. Burgess, was in the North-West, and upon his return, when suffering very severely, I believe, from an unfortunate accident, he was interviewed; but I have reason to believe that, according to his memory, the report of the interview is not correctly stated, and therefore I do not trouble the House with it. I would not refer to it at all, except for the fact that it was the foundation of action by the North-West Council. On 21st July, 1884, the North-West Council, being in session, and having before them the report of the interview with Mr. Burgess, passed a resolution, which is not brought down, but of which I find a copy in one of the newspapers, and have translated it. It was proposed by Mr. Macdowall, representative of Lorne district, comprising the disturbed district, and seconded by Mr. Jackson, of the Qu'Appelle district, which contains numerous half-breed letters:

"That this council regret the expressions attributed to the Deputy Minister of the Interior, in an interview with a reporter of the Manitoba Free Press, published 17th July, 1884, respecting the half-breed claims. In the absence of more definite information upon this subject, this council desires that it should be understood, notwithstanding that it recognises absolutely the justice of the claims of the Métis of these Territories, so far as concerns the grants of land which they demand, that the question of the claims of the half-breeds in these Territories be referred for disposition to the Executive."

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that there was action based upon, and very naturally based upon, the statement attributed to Mr. Burgess. I find, although the Government has not thought fit to bring down that resolution, that the Government replied to it, for I find the following in the Moose Jaw News, 30th July:—

"His Honor stated to the council that he had a telegram from Sir John A. Macdonald, to the effect that the Minister of the Interior, on his return from Europe will take into his serious consideration the questions relating to the half-breeds in the North-West Territory."

However, the Government has not thought it worth while to bring down the telegram from Mr. Dewdney, or the response from the First Minister, nor have they brought down any results of that serious consideration which was so promised earlier, at any rate, than the year 1885. On the 27th July, 1884, Mr. Crozier, Superintendent of Police, writes to the Government from Battleford, as follows:—

"I have the honor to inform you that Riel has held meetings at both Prince Albert and Duck Lake. I am informed that his meeting at the first named place was an open one; some little difficulty took place, but was promptly put down.

"At Duck Lake his audience was composed of French half-breeds and Indians. He is said, though I have not official information to that effect, to have told the Indians that they had 'rights' as well as the 'half-breeds,' and that he wished to be the means of having them redressed.

"I am also informed that he expressed a wish to confer with the Indian chiefs. I have already reported"—

But I wish to say that that report has not been brought down—

"that I believe the Indians sympathise with the half-breeds, nor could anything else be expected, being close blood relations and speaking the same language.

"What may be the result of the half-breed agitation, or what effect it may have upon the Indians, of course I cannot foretell. I before said"—

But the letter in which he said so has not been brought down—

"I before said, and still think, precautionary measures should be taken, such measures as will not only prevent turbulent spirits carrying their schemes to an extreme, but prevent both Indians and half-breeds even making an attempt to resist authority or organise for illegal purposes, for these constant 'excitements' must have a most injurious effect upon the country, and among those effects, not the least, a sense of insecurity among settlers.

"I believe now that Big Bear and his followers would have been upon their reserve but for the emissaries of Riel, who, it is said, invited him to meet that person at Duck Lake.

"Certain it is he has gone there, and that after having promised, and received provisions, to go to Fort Pitt, he had proceeded with the camp some distance on the road, but they turned back after hearing from Riel.

"There are very many rumors about as to what Riel has said to the Indians, that, if true, are intended to cause discontent among them as to their present condition."

On the 29th of July, 1884, the correspondent of Le Manitoba wrote a letter from Prince Albert, which was published the following month, to this effect:

"The week which has just finished has been very quiet, following always the old proverb: The calm after the storm. The Times of Prince Albert, seeing its ill success in its efforts to prejudice the English public opinion against Riel, has lowered its flag and it is holding itself silent. Meanwhile, the national movement continues its progress quietly and peaceably. Committees are being formed in the different parishes of the district, and each one is preparing a list of their grievances, which will be submitted at a general meeting of these committees, and upon which will be based the memorial which will be sent to the Government. The Herald, of Battleford, of the 12th July, seems to endeavor to ridicule these peaceable proceedings of the whole population, who desire to have their rights recognised, because Riel is there. It says, for example, that 'if Riel wants to establish a Government in the Saskatchewan, he will find, in his immediate neighborhood, many of his old partisans, and, no doubt, his former secretary, Louis Schmidt, will resign with pleasure his office of assistant clerk at the Land Office, at Prince Albert, to offer his services to his country and to his old master.'

"That deserves a word of answer. First, Mr. Riel has not, so far as I am aware, the intention of forming a Government on the Saskatchewan; but should he desire to do so, you would see coming to act as his secretary, not Mr. Schmidt, but a crowd of aspirants of the school of the Herald itself, who would be but too proud to have employment under Mr. Riel. Mr. Laurie himself, so bending before the authorities, would have come quickly to cringe to him, even if only to obtain the modest position of deputy forest ranger. Now, as to Mr. Schmidt, personally, I do not suppose anybody imagines that in accepting an office from the Government he has renounced his title as a citizen and a half-breed. He will, no doubt, fulfil diligently and impartially his duties of public employé, but that will not oblige him to conceal his sympathies for those of his nation who have just rights to be recognised. The responsible persons, happily, do not see in the same light as the Herald the agitation which is going on in the North-West; and, if they see no ground to fear for the peace of the country, yet they know very well that the unanimous sentiments of a whole population must not be displayed."

Then follows the resolution of the North-West Council, of the 21st July, which I have just read. Meantime, Indian troubles were loom- ing still larger and larger, and detailed reports as to Poundmaker, and other matters of that description, were published in the newspapers. And here I may be permitted to make a brief reference to the defensive and quasi military precautions which were taken by the Government, both as showing a sense of danger and because I believe that the Government is greatly to be blamed in these regards. I have already proved, as I think, the blame which is to be attached to them, with reference to the killing out of the local corps of the North-West, and I might add the great neglect they had shown, also, with reference to the local corps proposed in the Province of Manitoba. I do not touch upon these subjects now. As to the operations of the Mounted Police, the report is admittedly meagre. The hon. gentleman acknowledged that the other day. It is eminently unsatisfactory, in not giving fuller details of their operations; and as to the militia operations, we want, as I have more than once said, some more information than we have yet obtained. The Winnipeg Sun, of 25th July, 1884, says:

"Col. Houghton returned last night from a tour of inspection of arms in the Saskatchewan district. As to the corps organised throughout the Territories, they had ceased drilling some time ago. In consequence of the lapse of the three years, the Government, in view of the unsettled state of affairs in the Saskatchewan district, and the probability of an outbreak among the half-breeds at any time, deemed it wise to collect all the arms, as in the event of an uprising they might be used with great advantage against the whites. Corps had been organised at Battleford, Carlton, Prince Albert and Duck Lake, and the arms of each company were found at headquarters. They were taken possession of and handed over to the Mounted Police for safe keeping. Col. Houghton visited Battleford, Carlton and Prince Albert, and personally looked after the work, but he arranged with Capt. Hughes, of Duck Lake, to send in the arms of the company which was organised there.

"The arms were found to be in very good condition, and will doubtless do to distribute again, when other volunteer corps are organised throughout the Territories, which is the intention of the Government. Col. Houghton stated, however, that he had no definite information from the Government on the point. Being asked about the discontent among the half-breeds, the colonel stated they were really in a bad way. Consequent upon the great drought which prevailed all summer, the crops all along the half-breed settlement are almost an entire failure, and starvation stares the poor creatures in the face. Col. Houghton did not have very much conversation with the settlers, but those with whom he did speak informed him of the bad state of affairs existing. They have not been able to procure patents for their lands, and they have other grievances against the Government. Col. Houghton believes if they had their patents they would be appeased, to a certain extent, as by the sale of a portion of their land they could keep the wolf from the door. At the meetings which were held, the opinion was expressed that they should receive the same treatment as was afforded the half-breeds in Manitoba."

Then there is further reference to the grievances and it goes on:

"Col. Houghton being asked about the presence of Riel among the settlers, said he did not see the hero of the Red River rebellion, although he was among the natives when he passed down. He was camping on the south fork of the Saskatchewan, and the half-breeds are endeavoring to secure the co-operation of the Indians in the agitation. If they succeed in rousing the latter to action, and a coalition is formed, a serious uprising will be the result."

Now, Sir, I have already proved to this House, from the published report of the Minister of Militia, that Col. Houghton, under his own signature, did send in a special report upon this very mission on which he was interviewed, and upon which he gave this statement to the interviewer.

I charge that that officer reported then imminent danger, the holding of meetings, the urgency of the case, the necessity of taking precautions at once to prevent the outbreak; but his report has not been brought down. In fact, that report is suppressed. On the 26th of July, in an editorial, the Winnipeg Sun says:

"It is impossible to understand what the Dominion Government means by refusing to hearken to the complaints of the half-breeds in the Saskatchewan region, and then by sending up the Deputy Adjutant General to disarm them. Does the Government think these well-disposed people would revolt without cause or provocation? If not, why does it not at once set about redressing the grievances that are driving them to such desperation that they are no longer to be trusted with weapons? Col. Houghton, no doubt, discharged his duty in the kindest manner, and the arms were quietly surrendered. But what a commentary on the policy of the Interior Department, that a district containing some of the oldest and best settlers in the country should have to be 'proclaimed.'"

It is the whole North-West which is now proposed to be proclaimed by the Bill before the House. Then, Sir, on the 5th of August, Sergt. Brooks, of the Mounted Police, stationed at Prince Albert, writes as follows:—

"In reporting to you as to what is transpiring here at Prince Albert and vicinity, I would say that since I have been here I have found everything quiet. There is very little talk about Riel. The principal part of the people who seem to agree with him are people who are hard up, and think they must do something to cause a little excitement. I have heard of very few who are in any way well-to-do speak favorably of him. There is no doubt but what all the half-breeds swear by him, and whatever he says is law with them. As near as I can learn, he is advising them all very strongly to remain peaceful. Big Bear is still at Beady's reserve. Whether he intends to see Riel or not, I do not know."

The rest of the letter does not seem material. On the 8th of August Serg. Brooks telegraphed as follows:—

"Returned from Duck Lake last night. Big Bear in council with ten other chiefs. Riel has held several private meetings at the south branch, attended by leading half-breeds. He has not seen Big Bear."

On the 14th of August Serg. Brooks reported as follows:—

"Riel is across, the river opposite here, at Batoche's house. He addressed a meeting to-day, as the people were coming from church. From what I can learn, he must have got very excited. One thing he stated was that the Indians' rights should be protected as well as their own. He has not had a meeting with Big Bear, but I am afraid that he has some private way of communicating with him. He is to cross the river to-morrow, and I believe is to remain on this side about a week, as he has asked Tompkins, the Indian farm instructor, to meet him at Duck Lake, for what reason I do not know. There is a man of the name of Jackson here, who came from Prince Albert—he is a brother of the druggist—who seems to be a right-hand man of Riel's. He is with him at present, and has been for some time. He has a great deal to say, and I believe he does more harm than any breed among them. There are a great many people through the country who have what they call grievances, and seem to agree with Riel. Whether they really do or not, is hard to say. I have been speaking to a number of people at Prince Albert, and men who signed the petition for him to go there and speak, simply did it because they thought it would draw the attention of the Government to the place. There is no doubt but that everyone is hard up, and they thought they must do something to draw their attention."

The rest does not appear to be material. On the 21st of August Brooks reported further:

"Both Big Bear and Riel have been in town. The former arrived on the 15th and Riel on the Sunday following. Their being in town caused very little excitement, and people did not seem to pay much attention to them. Riel stayed at Jackson's, the druggist, and before he left he and Lepine held conference with Big Bear, the result of which I have not been able to learn. Riel, of course, claims that he will have nothing to do with the Indians, and Big Bear says he did not come here to see Riel. However, they were at Jackson's house and had a talk, Riel leaving the next day for the south branch, and Big Bear the day after for Battleford—at least, so he said. I have heard it stated on pretty good authority that Riel has given up the idea of going back to Montana, and intends to remain in the Territory, which I think is quite likely, although he has stated to different parties that he would leave for Montana about the 1st September. I will forward returns showing the number of half-breeds and Indians in the vicinity by mail which leaves Duck Lake on Monday next."

The Saskatoon telegraph operator, on the 7th of September, 1884, reported that:

"About 20 Indians, under Black Moon, armed with rifles and swords, rode about the settlement, demanding grub, and threatening to take it if it was not given."

"Then, the House will remember the statement of the hon. First Minister as to the Government having thought it prudent, during this season, to arrange with the Hudson Bay Company for the occupation of Fort Carlton by the Mounted Police. We ought, I think, to have had a little fuller information on that. That post appears to have been chosen by the Comptroller of the Mounted Police, and it appears to have been so well chosen that when the rising took place, it was not considered any longer defensible, because the first thing that was done was to evacuate it. But I am dealing now with the conduct of the Government as evidencing a sense of danger, and I find that on the 3rd of September, 1884, the Comptroller of the Mounted Police recommended to the Minister as follows:—

"The undersigned has the honor to submit, for the Minister's consideration, that in view of the possibility of additional Mounted Police being required in the North Saskatchewan district, it is desirable that steps should be taken to secure accommodation for men and horses beyond the capacity of the Mounted Police post at Battleford, and it is suggested that arrangements might be made with the Hudson Bay Company for the use, for police purposes during the coming winter, of their buildings, or a portion thereof at Fort Carlton, which is about 15 miles north-west of Duck Lake, about 55 miles west of Prince Albert and 120 miles east of Battleford."

I have already called the attention of the House, and therefore do not repeat it, to the statement of an interview with Mr. White, and the views of the situation he then expressed; and here I will pass away from the subject of the Mounted Police to a point to which I have drawn the attention of the hon. gentleman more than once, and it seems to me to come fairly within the subject of defensive precautions; I refer to the condition of the 7-pounder mountain guns of the Mounted Police. On the 1st February, 1882, Commissioner Irvine uses this language:

"The carriages and limbers for the 7-pounder guns are fast becoming unserviceable. These carriages were constructed at Fort Walsh some years ago, under the direction of Inspector Neale. Considering the material at that officer's command, the carriages and limbers have proved most successful. I would, however, recommend that new ones be purchased, of the pattern lately approved by the Imperial authorities. A few signal rockets might, with advantage, be supplied us."

That report was on the 1st February, 1882, but nothing at all was done with the carriages and limbers; and on the 1st January, 1883, Commissioner Irvine reported again:

"I would remind you that the carriages and limbers of the 7-pounder mountain guns are fast becoming unserviceable. I recommend that new ones be purchased, of the pattern lately approved by the Imperial authorities"

Well, nothing was done in the year 1883 to secure new carriages and limbers, and on the 1st January, 1884, the commissioner reported as follows:—

"I have previously reported that the carriages and limbers of the 7-pounder guns are virtually unserviceable"—

So that it is stated now that they are virtually unserviceable, as one would infer from the previous language used in the mild sense customary in speaking of the condition of a military force.

"—are virtually unserviceable, and last year I recommended that carriages and limbers of the Imperial pattern be purchased. On close enquiry it was ascertained that such purchase would have entailed a very considerable expense. Carriages and limbers suitable for our purposes can be manufactured in this country at much smaller cost than would ensue were a purchase made from England. The supply officer at headquarters has now the required material for manufacture, and I trust that next summer may find us in possession of sufficient skilled labor to make carriages and limbers in this country."

So I find that for three years these carriages and limbers had remained in a practically unserviceable condition, and the result was, that when the time of stress came, when the guns were not to be mere toy guns, for show, but were to be used, these carriages and limbers had not been supplied; and these are the consequences as reported by the Toronto Mail correspondent in reference to the fight with Poundmaker at Cut Knife Creek:

Mr. BLAKE.

"Col. Otter had intended advancing right in upon the tepees to the front, but one of the 7-pounders was disabled by the breaking of the gun carriage, and it was not deemed advisable to push on. As a matter of fact, our small arms were not of much use, the two guns being our principal reliance. The Gatling did good work in clearing the groves and clumps, but the moment the enemy dropped down into the coulees it was of little more use than our rifles. The shrapnel of B battery did most of the damage, and the disabling of one of the guns was, under such circumstances, a serious misfortune.

The same correspondent, on the 4th of May, writes, and the Toronto Mail, on the 19th May, publishes the following:—

"At last it seemed as though the ammunition of the Indians was being exhausted, and Col. Otter decided on making a rush to the tepees and burning the whole encampment. There were just two courses open to him, namely, either to withdraw his troops or make a grand rush for their camp. But here fate settled the question. The trail of one of the 7-pounders broke as the gun was discharged, rendering it, of course, useless. The other was cracked some time before, and had been strengthened by a piece of 2 inch oak, which was bolted on the lower side. But the constant firing had loosened this, and every time the gun was discharged it jumped out of the trunnion holes. In fact, it was a race between the gun and the gunners. The former jumped back every time it was discharged, and the latter had to follow it and carry it back to its place again. It would have been folly to attempt to destroy the tepees without the guns, and so Col. Otter decided on withdrawing."

And this is the consequence, Sir, of treating for three years the statements that the carriages and limbers of the guns were unserviceable, with silence and inaction—this is the melancholy consequence, that victory was prevented, that defeat became imminent, in consequence of both the guns becoming unserviceable. Now, Sir, there are pieces of information which it would be very good to have, which we have not; and I will, at this stage, collect a few of them, as they deal with the season of 1884, after the arrival of Riel. In the first place, as I have more than once remarked, several Ministers themselves visited the North-West, among them the hon. Minister of Public Works, the Acting Minister of Railways, I suppose, in his capacity as such, and also in his capacity as Minister of Immigration and Agriculture. During the summer the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Postmaster General visited the west. The Minister of Public Works was charged, as he himself once declared, by the First Minister, to spy out the land, not like the old spies of the promised land, for the good things therein, but to spy out the land for the grievances. His business was to find out what the complaints were of the people of that country. That was the mission on which he went to the North-West and which he discharged. It is gratifying to know that having, presumably, regard to his own nationality, he had on that mission an opportunity of meeting a portion of the aggrieved class of the population to whom I have been referring, and he dealt with them as I will point out later on. Then there were the deputies. There was the Deputy Minister of the Interior, the Comptroller of the Mounted Police, and that year, or the year before, the Deputy Superintendent of Indian Affairs had gone out there. There were upon the spot numerous persons; there was an embarras des richesses in the way of officers. First of all, there was that Lieutenant Governor, of whom the First Minister boasted some years ago that he was a very good judge of men, and a man of long experience, and that he was never more satisfied to an appointment being wise than in this case—that the appointment of Mr. Dewdney had given and would give eminent satisfaction. Then there were the Indian agents, the farm instructors, the Crown land agents, the Crown timber agents, the registrars, the land board, the inspector of colonisation companies, the inspector of agencies, the stipendary magistrates, the mounted police, the militia, the school masters, the North-West Council; and besides these, there were the non-official class of men deeply interested in the prosperity of the country, and to whom hon. gentlemen have frequently and properly appealed for advice, assistance and information, the officers of the Hudson Bay Company and the clergy of the country. Does any one suppose there is not more information as to what was going on in 1884 than what the Government have brought down? That there is no more than that cannot be credited. But the hon gentleman put in a saving clause; he said there was more, but it would be dangerous to the givers of it to bring it down. It would hurt the missionaries and officials of the North-West to have it shown among the Indians and half-breeds that they had sympathised with their grievances and asked the Government to redress them. Because those who warned the Government knew how serious was the case; because they urged that some steps should be taken to remedy those grievances, inasmuch as the lives, and safety, and happiness, and comfort of the inhabitants of the Territories were to be imperilled, the hon. gentleman would not bring down these papers; and these persons stand in a position in which their warnings, declarations, suggestions, advice and information are not brought down because it would be dangerous to their lives to do so? The absence of these papers is dangerous to their honor. There were officers in this neighborhood, besides the officers of the class to which I have referred, a new class of officers. The Government tried its hand at the old-fashioned way of appeasing the leaders of agitation. Louis Schmidt, the secretary of the Riel invitation meeting, was appointed an assistant land agent; Mr. Isbister says in print that he was offered and declined the position of Indian farm instructor; that Mr. Dumais was offered the position of Indian instructor, which he accepted, though we have been unable to obtain information from the Government on that subject; and that Gabriel Dumont was given a ferry license. During that summer, I have reason to believe that amongst the unofficial persons who yet were clothed with great authority and responsibility in this matter, and who communicated with the Government, was Bishop Grandin. I believe he wrote more than once, saying, in substance, that the half-breeds were greatly dissatisfied; that he and his clergy were losing all influence with them; that they were no longer respected; that they were frequently accused by their people of having no real sympathy with the half-breeds and their grievances; that it was said that, on the contrary, the clergy's sympathy was always sure to be with the Government; adding, that unless a prompt settlement of their just claims was effected serious troubles were sure to come soon; and pointing out that the half-breeds being the link between the whites and the Indians, it was important that all cause of dissatisfaction should be removed, as if trouble should arise with the half-breeds it would spread to the Indians, and the consequences would be terrible. I believe this is the substance of the information which was received by the letters that were written. I am positive letters were written, and my reason is because the newspaper I have referred to more than once, and which has given me so much valuable information, contains a letter, dated St. Albert, 24th of April, 1885, from Bishop Grandin to Archbishop Taché, in which he says this:

"Father Lacombe tells me that a copy of certain letters, which I addressed last year to our hon. Government, would be pleasing to you. I will have them copied and send them to you."

The rest of the letter gives a touching account of their troubles. I have therefore proved that Bishop Grandin wrote to the Dominion authorities in the year 1884, and that his letter gave an account of the troubles he and his various missionaries had been involved in, in consequence of the unhappy circumstances prevailing. I have reason to believe, also, from other information, that Archbishop Taché himself wrote, that Mr. Macdowall wrote, that Father André and others wrote, and I can hardly believe otherwise than that Mr. Duck and Mr. Pearce wrote. Then, there was Sheriff Chapleau, who was interviewed in the fall of 1884, and expressed his opinion of the condition of things. It seems to me that the sheriff of the Territory, the officer charged with the administration of justice, and being himself of the French nationality, would surely have taken some steps to point out to the Government the condition of affairs. I believe Judge Rouleau wrote twice to Mr. Dewdney about the disaffection of the half-breeds, urging prompt redress, and Mr. Dewdney answered that he had forwarded his letters and urged prompt settlement. In the latter part of 1884 Judge Rouleau wrote to the First Minister himself, directly and strongly on the question. After the July sitting of the North-West Council Judge Rouleau, Mr. Hayter Reed, and Mr. Forget went to Duck Lake. The ostensible mission of the first two was to select the site for a court, and that of Mr. Forget to inspect ferries and schools; but according to my information, their main object was to ascertain the feeling of the half-breeds on the situation, and certainly, if it was not, it ought to have been, after all the warnings the Government had received. A report of this mission was, I believe, made to Lieutenant Governor Dewdney, and through him to the Government, that there existed considerable dissatisfaction, which might lead to serious consequences, unless promptly remedied, and the views of Bishop Grandin, and probably of Father André and others, were, as I believe, obtained. But none of these papers have been communicated to us. I have also been informed that Mr. Forget has stated that Mr. Dewdney had repeatedly warned the Government, and could clear himself from the heavy load of responsibility which unquestionably devolved upon him if he did not give any warning. Where are these warnings? Then there are the missing Mounted Police reports, some of which are proved to exist, by the statements I have made, and there is the missing report of Col. Houghton, the existence of which I have proved, and then, in the month of October, Governor Dewdney himself visited St. Albert and various places near that country, perhaps, not in the immediate neighborhood of the disturbed region, but a neighborhood which would give him naturally the opportunity of communication with men of great importance, and I can hardly conceive that after that visit he should not have acquired and communicated much information. In truth, Sir, we have gotten and are getting only what cannot be refused to us, as the Government thinks. We have got only what they dare not detain; and, if the further papers, which ought to be produced and which exist, are brought down, that which is, I argue, made plain enough without them would be made plainer still. On the 5th September a great meeting took place at St. Laurent, and the Manitoba shortly afterwards published an account of this meeting, with an editorial preface, from which this is an extract:

"The Manitoba is the organ of the population of French origin, not only of this Province, but also of the new Provinces of the North-West; and we are always pleased to open our columns to the friends of our cause and of our rights. Here is the last letter of our correspondent, dated the 16th September, 1884:

"SIR,—I think I shall interest your readers by giving them a short report of the great meeting held at St. Laurent, on the 5th September. This meeting was composed of French half-breeds, from all the surrounding parishes, and had been called for the purpose of respectfully submitting to His Lordship Mgr. Grandin, and to the other members of the clergy of the diocese of St. Albert, regret at not having their co-operation in the movement going on to-day to obtain from the Federal Government what the half-breed population claims to be entitled to. There were also present at the meeting His Lordship Mgr. Grandin, bishop of St. Albert, the Rev. Father Fourmond, of the St. Laurent mission, the Rev. Father Touze, of the mission of the Sacred Heart, and the Rev. Father Lecoq, of the mission of Cumberland.

"Mr. Louis Riel was appointed president of the meeting, the object of which relates to these two questions: 1st. Why do the clergy keep out of the movement going on to-day, and even seem hostile to it? 2nd. Are the claims of the half-breeds upon the Government good, just and legitimate?

"Mr. Gabriel Dumont briefly stated the uneasiness felt by his compatriots at the abstention of the clergy from taking part in their deliberations. Our intentions, he said, are wrongly interpreted or wrongly understood, and the abstention of the clergy from coming to our aid can only be injurious to us. Mr. Dumont, overcome by emotion, begged His Lordship to direct and enlighten them, adding that his voice, always respected as that of God, would be listened to with the same docility as in the past.

"The venerable prelate deigned to reply immediately, that if, for some time, the relations between the clergy and the half-breed population, concerning the events which have arisen, have seemed cool, indifferent even, still this reserve in no way proved a diminution of affection and of charity, but was only the effect of absolute prudence, necessary under present circumstances, in view of the mystery with which the proceedings up to that day had been surrounded—mystery which not only left the clergy without sufficient light to pronounce intelligently, but also necessarily gave rise to serious suspicions, to fears and alarms really painful. Speak plainly, added His Lordship; tell us what you want, and we shall tell you what we think. If justice is on your side, we will help you with all our might, as we have always done in the past. His Grace was listened to with respect and a religious attention.

"Mr. Charles Nolin spoke next, with an emotion and a conviction which gained for him the most sympathetic attention. He said he bitterly deplored the painful abandonment in which the half-breed population were left by those in whom they had always found devoted friends and fathers, while such an important question for this population is agitated. They are all the more sensible of this abandonment because they have an invincible faith in the rectitude of their intentions and in the justice of their cause. Mr. Nolin concluded by a statement of the principal points, showing the basis of their claims on the Federal Government. Our demands, he said, must be made respectfully, no doubt, but they must also be made with earnestness, force and perseverance. No rebellion; this mode has never been seriously in the mind of anyone, because it would be a crime; we will keep to legitimate means. "His Lordship again declared his affection and devotion to the well-being of his flock on all occasions, where the rights of religion, of honor and of justice were not compromised by their mode of action."

Then there is a discussion upon certain local questions in regard to schools, which is immaterial. Then:

"Mr. Riel, president of the meeting, spoke next. In order, he said, to completely dissipate all misunderstanding, to take away all bad suspicion, and especially to show the value and importance of our demands, I will give a statement of our principal claims.

"We want:

"1st. The sub-division of the North-West Territories into Provinces; "2nd. For the settlers of the North-West the same advantages as those granted in 1870 to the settlers of Manitoba;

"3rd. A grant of 240 acres of land to the half-breeds who have not yet received that grant from the Government;

"4th. An immediate gratuitous grant, by letters patent, to the proprietors who occupy them, of the lands of which they are in possession;

"5th. The offer for sale, by the Government, of half a million of acres of land, the products of this sale to be placed at interest and applied to the aid of half-breeds in the establishment of hospitals, orphanages, schools, etc., or in supplying the poorer persons with ploughs or other agricultural implements, and in distributing seeds in the spring;

"6th. The reservation of about one hundred townships, chosen in the swampy lands, which are not likely to be settled before a long time. These lands to be distributed to the half-breed children of the coming generation and during 120 years, each child to receive his share when he reaches the age of 18 years;

"7th. A subvention of at least one thousand dollars to sustain an establishment of nuns in each place where a great number of half-breed families are established;

"8th. An amelioration in the conditions of labor asked from the Indians, and a greater care of their persons, so as to prevent them from dying with hunger.

"His Lordship acceded again to the wishes of the meeting, and gave his opinions on the different propositions submitted by the president. Among these propositions there are some, said His Lordship, which touch too nearly to politics, and must leave us indifferent, never wishing to take part in political events, and of a more or less doubtful interest to the population and to religion. The other propositions, added His Lordship, I have myself taken steps for a long time in regard to your special interest. I made all possible advances towards the Government to obtain justice. I have even obtained promises that I believed official, but that I regret to see forgotten to-day. I felt the same discontent that you have felt yourselves, and I did not fail to complain in high places."

The extract I read before now finds its proper place:

"His Lordship dwelt on the necessity of a close union and a great confidence in God, on the necessity of being truly Christian and religious, in order to succeed. You want, said His Lordship, to possess all those qualities to affirm your national character. You will never be anything and will never have any influence without a perfect union. At this moment the Rev. Father Fourmond spoke, showing the inappreciable advantages that union, concord and mutual help would bring to the population, advantages which were both political and religious.

The rest of the paper applies to matters which are not material. Then Serg. Keenan, on the 17th of September, 1884, reports from Batoche:

"On Friday last, 5th inst., a meeting of Riel's supporters was convened at St. Laurent (about seven miles from here) at which nearly all the half-breeds in the surrounding settlements were present.

"There were also a number of half-breeds and white men from Prince Albert, including Messrs. Jackson, Scott and Isbister, three of Riel's strongest supporters in that district.

MR. BLAKE.

"The meeting, I believe, was called for the purpose of carrying on the work. Speeches were made, condemning the Government generally, and Mr. Jackson stated that this country belonged to the Indians, and not to the Dominion of Canada.

"I met Riel a few days ago, and during our conversation he told me that the Government, through Bishop Grandin, had offered him a seat in the council or in the Dominion Senate."

In the same month of September, 1884, it is reported in Le Manitoba that the Minister of Public Works was at Qu'Appelle, and the paper goes on to say:

"After mass Sir Hector Langevin addressed the Metis. They asked that the Government should give them scrip, as it did to those of Manitoba. Sir Hector considered the request reasonable, and promised to submit it to his colleagues."

I have no doubt he did so—by word of mouth. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman took pains to do so, but of course he did not do it in writing, because the writing is not brought down. On this occasion he appears to have had less influence with his colleagues than in some other instances. It also appears that the hon. gentleman had a correspondence with Mr. Jackson, a member of the council from the North-West Territories, because one of the commissioners, on the 8th April, 1885, refers Sir David Macpherson to Jackson's letter of the 3rd of September, in reference to the half-breeds' grievances; but unhappily that letter has not been brought down. So that all that concerns the hon. gentleman's interview, his correspondence, his mission and his action, has been forgotten; or care has been taken to prevent them from being brought before this House. Then the hon. gentleman, after having attended to this matter, attended to the not unimportant part of ministerial duties, the festive part, in the manner reported in the Manitoba Free Press of 11th September, 1884:

"At a banquet given to the Hon. Messrs. Langevin and McLellan, at Winnipeg, on their return from visiting the North-West, Sir Hector Langevin said: 'He had conversed with men both in the towns and country. He had asked if there were any grievances, and they had said there were none. Both men in the towns and farmers were satisfied with their positions. Only two farmers had told him they had any grievances, and this was because there were no ladies in the place.'"

I have no doubt the hon. gentleman's language was received with "laughter and applause." Blood and tears have followed since from his superficial and mistaken view of the North-West situation. On the 25th September, 1884, Serg. Keenan reports from Batoche as follows:—

"I have the honor to state that since my last report all has been quiet here. There has been, however, frequent meetings of Riel's committee held in different parts of the settlement. It is almost impossible for me to obtain any information as to what transpires at these meetings, as they are conducted with secrecy, and no person, excepting members of the committee, is allowed to take part in them. At all the public meetings Riel and his supporters have been very moderate, or rather cautious, in their utterances; but I learn that they appear in disguise at these open gatherings, and advocate very different measures in their councils. The last meeting was held a week ago, at the house of Baptiste Boyer, one of the chief supporters of the movement. Charles Nolin, another member, and one of the most unreasonable, proposed that the half-breeds make certain demands on the Government, and if not complied with they take up arms at once, and commence killing every white man they can find, and incite the Indians to do the same. I obtained this information from an old country Frenchman, who belonged to the committee, and left it on account of the extreme and unreasonable measures it advocated. This man, Nolin, is the most dangerous of the half-breeds, for the reason that he is strongly in favor of tampering with the Indians."

On the 23rd October Le Manitoba published a statement of the demands of the natives, as presented by Louis Riel at the meeting of the 5th September. It does not appear to be in the exact words, but its substance is similar to that which I read awhile ago; therefore I merely refer to it without repeating it. It was in October, as I have said, that Lieutenant Governor Dewdney visited St. Albert, Edmonton and Stobart, which is in the same neighborhood. He saw the bishop and clergy upon the subject, and must have learned of the troubles. But where is his report? In November, 1884, a petition was circulated largely in the North-West Territories, to which I referred in a former speech dealing with this question, which petition called upon the Government to grant relief in respect to the grievances to which I have referred. But it is not brought down. There is a report in the Regina Leader of a meeting at Moosomin some time in December, 1884, on the subject of the settlers' rights, and amongst the resolutions passed at that meeting was this one :

"That the Government should recognise the claims of the half-breeds, as was done in the Province of Manitoba, and thus determine a question calculated to disturb the peaceful development of the country."

But nothing is brought down. Then, on the 20th October, from Prince Albert, Major Crozier reports :

"I beg to state that constable Elliott returned from Carlton on the evening of the 15th, and reported to me that a man named Tomkins, who is employed by the Indian Department of that place as interpreter, has told him that Riel was drilling men at St. Jérôme, and that a large meeting had been held there on the 12th, at midnight.

"He further told him that a chief from Muskeg Lake had been sent to see Big Bear, to request him to attend a meeting of Riel's, to be held at Batoche in two weeks' time. I sent a man in plain clothes to the vicinity of St. Jérôme to find out, if possible, the truth of the reports. He returned yesterday, and reports all quiet. He states that there is a rumor of a large meeting to be held at Batoche in two or three weeks, as soon as all the crops are in. He could find out nothing about any drill having been performed.

"I have stationed a man in plain clothes in the vicinity of Batoche, who will keep me informed regarding the movements of Riel.

"The half-breed population are in a very discontented state, principally attributable to the utter failure of their crops."

On the 20th November a letter is written by a person whose name is not given. It contains statements principally about the Indians. It declares arrangements had been made for a general gathering this summer (1885) at Duck Lake; that invitations had been issued for all persons to come. It was also stated that :

"William Badger went to their reserve on behalf of Louis Riel, and demanded of the chiefs Attackakwoops and Mustowasis if he would be allowed to speak. He was told that he could not say anything, as they did not wish their names to appear among people who were trying to make trouble."

A considerable amount of information is given as to the discontented state of the Indians. Then, on the 2nd January, 1885, Major Crozier telegraphed as follows to the Comptroller of the North-West Mounted Police :—

"Riel proposed to Macdowall to go. States if Government would give him assistance in money; suppose $5,000 enough."

On the 31st December Inspector Howe, from Carlton, reports :

"On the 9th December there was a large half-breed meeting called by Riel at St. Laurent, for the purpose of again talking over their Bill of Rights.

"On the 22nd December Mr. Macdowall, member of the North-West Council, accompanied by Father André, Roman Catholic priest at Prince Albert, proceeded to St. Laurent, at the request of Riel, who desired to see and talk with Mr. Macdowall as member for the district. On Mr. Macdowall's arrival at St. Laurent, Riel informed him that he wished to make a proposition to him, of which he wished representation made to Government.

"He first stated that he was very poor, and that he did not know what would become of him; was afraid he would starve, and starvation made men desperate; that he had great power over the half-breeds, and that he could influence them, politically or otherwise, as he thought fit. He said he was tired of Canada, and wished to return to Montana, but had not the means to do so; and that if the Government would give him pecuniary assistance, and something to settle on his wife and family (Mr. Macdowall thinks $5,000 would be accepted by him)—that if the Government grants his request he will at once leave for Montana and remain there. He would guarantee to give up all connection with the half-breeds in the country, and having, he says, such great influence over them, he will guarantee that all claims they now have against the Government will be at once dropped. By this he means that he will throw over all his half-breed supporters and return to Montana himself."

On 23rd December, 1884, Gagnon reports :

"I have the honor to report that during the last month the half-breeds of St. Laurent and Batoche settlements held a public meeting to adopt a petition drawn up by a committee, and that this petition, signed by the settlers of both settlements, has been forwarded to Ottawa. This meeting, from all reports, seems to have been very orderly.

"Several of the other smaller reunions have taken place during the same period, but all have reference to school matters. The half-breeds are pressing Riel to settle amongst them, and have given him, as a token of their gratitude for services rendered, a house well furnished, and will further, on 2nd January next, present him with a purse.

"These testimonials of the good will of the majority would go towards denying certain rumors, which say that several are lacking confidence in their leader; that his way of acting and speaking denotes a very hot head, and that he does not now agree with their priest. There is no doubt that a great number are still led by him, and would act upon his dictates. Some time ago I sent several men to the south branch to have horses shod. The river being full of floating ice, they could not cross. Some way or other, the report was brought to the east side of the river that these men were sent to arrest Riel, who was then at the crossing. Within half an hour over 100 men had collected to protect him. There is a certain amount of suffering among the half-breeds, but not to the extent it was expected to reach. Large quantities of supplies are required for this part of the country, and all who have horses can make a living by freighting. As far as I can see, the chief grievance of the half-breeds is, that they are afraid that the Government will not sanction the way they, amongst themselves, have agreed to take their homesteads—ten chains frontage on the river, by two miles back."

On the 8th December a meeting was held at Moosomin, at which a resolution was passed in favor of the recognition of the half-breeds' rights, as in Manitoba. Early in January there was a meeting held at Edmonton, on North-West Council affairs, at which Mr. Oliver, a member of the council, spoke. He stated that the order defining the powers of the council did not arrive till after the Session had opened. He complained that funds were controlled by the Government. There was a meeting, very shortly afterwards, at Saskatchewan city, at which Mr. Oliver spoke. He stated that the half-breed lands resolution of the North-West Council was moved by Mr. Macdowall, seconded by Mr. Jackson, and unanimously supported by the council; to which an answer had been received by telegraph, that the matter would be considered at the ensuing meeting of the Ottawa Cabinet, in September. The Qu'Appelle Gazette on 22nd January makes this announcement:

"We are informed that Louis Riel and others are engaged in drafting a petition to the Dominion Government, demanding certain concessions, which they say have been promised to the half-breeds of the North-West Territories, and it is the expressed intention of the half-breeds of the Saskatchewan district that if these concessions are not granted which are asked for, to resort to arms, to force a compliance with their demands, Mr. Vankoughnet's statement to the contrary notwithstanding."

There was a meeting in Sturgeon church on 7th February, at which Mr. Oliver again spoke, and referred to efforts made in council to press on the attention of the Federal Government the necessity of taking action on certain matters of personal interest to the people of the North-West, namely, school lands, timber dues, grazing lands and half-breed lands. In the same month resolutions were passed at mass meetings of settlers, held throughout Assiniboia, at which it was resolved :

"That the Government should promptly recognise the claims of half-breeds, as was done in the Province of Manitoba, and thus determine a question calculated to retard the present development of the country."

In the election address of Mr. Wilson, published in the Edmonton Bulletin on 31st January, he says :

"I consider that the half-breeds of the country are entitled to the same treatment as their brethren received in Manitoba; and therefore I will support, as far as possible, any efforts made to secure that which they have a right to look for."

On 14th January, 1885, Mr. Crozier reports :

"On my return from Carlton and Prince Albert I was informed that a party of Indians had gone west to Edmonton, and would notify on the road all the Indians that there would be a large gathering at Duck Lake next spring. (I presume the annual sun dance being the occasion of the gathering). On further enquiry I find that they went only to Red Pheasant's reserve, at the Eagle Hills, and from that they returned to Duck Lake, being persuaded to do so by one of the leading Indians there. This is the second time Indians have come here on the same mission that I know of, others may have gone on. Certainly, there is an effort being made to have a large gathering at Duck Lake next spring. I was informed, also, that there will be an effort made to get the Qu'Appelle and other Indians in the south-easterly part of the Territory to assemble there. Little Pine, too, it appears, when at Blackfoot Crossing, tried to arrange to get as many as possible of Blackfoot and Southern Indians to come north in the spring. He has told the Indians that he has arranged that many of them will be there. Poundmaker says that Little Pine told his young men not to dispose of their guns, and he further says that Little Pine has come to some understanding with the Blackfeet, but is not sure as to the nature. He, Poundmaker, says, when Little Pine recovers his eyesight he will get full particulars."

And so on. On the 25th February Irvine telegraphs :

"Gagnon telegraphs : 'Half-breeds held a meeting at South Branch yesterday. Object to beg Riel to stay in country ; he will stay ; evidently his own meeting ; orderly.'"

On 26th January Gagnon reports :

"I have the honor to report that during the last month nothing of importance has occurred amongst the half-breeds in this district. They had, after New Year, a social meeting, at which they presented their chief, Riel, with the sum of $60, as a token of their good-will. The meeting was very orderly and loyal, and no allusions were made to the actual troubles. It seems that Riel has had difficulty in getting enough supplies for his own family lately, and had to beg assistance from the Roman Catholic missionary at St. Laurent, who assisted him. It has been stated to me that the petition prepared had been sent to Ottawa ; but it appears that only a letter, preparatory to sending the petition, has been forwarded."

No trace of that letter appears in these papers—

"The petition is undergoing being signed, and will be forwarded next month."

On 27th February there is a report in the Prince Albert Times of a trouble at Halero settlement, on the south branch. It says :

"We learn that considerable excitement has been prevailing in the vicinity of the south branch for the last few weeks. At one meeting we understand the natives turned out armed, a rumor having got about that Riel was to be arrested. A large meeting is to be held next Tuesday at the Halcrow settlement."

You have thus seen, Mr. Speaker, the course of events, from the time Riel came into the country, so far as it is described in the papers which the Government have brought down and in the public newspapers. But I must once again remind you that all the time there were running along with the question I have been dealing with other questions which had grown up. The land, the surveys, the reserves, and the vague claims which, on the sub-stratum of solid ground of grievance unredressed, Riel had conjured up. But those mentioned were the most substantial ; and I am presently to give you the proofs. Meantime, I have now carried the story down to the end of January, within a few weeks of the outbreak ; for on 10th March Gagnon telegraphed from Carlton that half-breeds were excited and preparing arms ; and thenceforward news comes thick and fast. I do not go into the history of the outbreak. That will be discussed with fuller material next Session, but we know that it took shape in March early, and surely there were warnings enough, even apart from those suppressed. It was an outbreak almost entirely of French half-breeds, supported by Indians. There were a few Scotch or English half-breeds, but the attitude of the bulk was neutral. The attitude of the English and Scotch half-breeds in the immediate neighborhood appears, I say, to have been neutral, if we can judge from a rather extraordinary meeting held on 22nd of March. The meeting was held at St. Catharines church ; the Rev. E. Mattheson was chairman and W. Craig, secretary. Two resolutions were passed :

"First, that the members of this meeting continue to sympathise, as they have always done, with the French half-breeds, in their desire to obtain their legal rights by all constitutional means.

"Second, that they do not approve of the resort to arms or the rising of the Indians, and wish to remain neutral."

It was resolved to forward a copy of these minutes to the officer in charge at Carlton and another to L. Riel. After the outbreak the comments of the press appeared, and it is only necessary to say that the Conservative press declared with extraordinary unanimity that the half-breeds had grievances, and they referred to those two points—the question of the extinguishment of the Indian title and the question of the surveys and the half-breed lands. I could quote to you, Mr. Speaker, if I had time, articles from the

Mr. BLAKE.

Mail, and from the principal French Canadian Conservative newspapers, and from Le Manitoba, in this sense. Le Manitoba, on the 3rd of May last, reports an interview with Archbishop Taché, a few days before, at Qu'Appelle, in which the Archbishop said :

"The labors of the land commission are giving satisfaction, and if this measure of justice had been taken three months earlier it would have prevented the rising."

Now, Sir, having advanced a little beyond the period of the action actually taken by the Government, but only two or three weeks, in order to find ourselves in the actual face of the rising, I come to the first action this Administration took after the Act of the 15th of May, 1879, which authorises them to deal with this question ; and the first action, as shown by the papers, was on the 26th of January, 1885. I have shown you the condition of things as it was in 1878 ; I have shown you the state of things as it presented itself to the Ministers at that time ; I have shown you the report of the Deputy Minister, and of the authorities as to its pressing and urgent character ; I have shown you the legislative authority with which they clothed themselves, and there is an absolute blank as to that executive action which they asked to be allowed to take from the time they received that power in May, 1879, until the 26th of January, 1885. And I ask you, under what circumstances it was, after having read the correspondences to which I have referred, that on the 26th of January, 1885, that action, however inadequate it may be regarded, was taken. Is it not perfectly clear and obvious that it was taken under the pressure of this excitement, this agitation, these meetings, these difficulties, after neglect, supineness, apathy, procrastination, beyond example or excuse. On that day, 26th January, 1885, the Minister of the Interior reported to Council : That, with a view of settling equitably the claims of the half-breeds—first, the claims of those in Manitoba and the North-West, who would have been entitled to land had they resided in Manitoba at the time of the transfer—and those are the claims with which I am dealing up to this time ; and secondly, the claims of those who, residing in Manitoba, did not participate in the grant—and those are the claims of the unenumerated half-breeds of Manitoba, with which I propose to deal separately—he says it is desirable to do—what ? To ascertain the numbers of half-breeds—to ascertain the number of all of the half-breeds ; and he recommends that he be authorised to obtain an enumeration of them, and to employ three persons to make such enumeration. There is no declaration as to what the settlement should be, no statement of the principle upon which action is to be taken. The proposal is to number the unenumerated half-breeds of Manitoba as well, and thus to settle, through this machinery, another grievance, which I shall deal with next. The proposal is only to obtain power to appoint three persons to number the people. On the 28th January, accordingly, the Minister's advice was followed and he obtained that power, and that step seems to have exhausted his energies. He seems, once again, to have adopted a passive attitude, with the exception that on the 4th February, 1885, he sent this telegram to Mr. Dawdney :

"Government has decided to investigate claims of half-breeds, and, with that view, has directed enumeration of those who did not participate in grant under Manitoba Act. No representations received recently."

You see by the last sentence of that telegram—"no representations received recently"—that there was obviously communication from the North-West upon which the Minister acted. But we do not get that communication, and the Minister says that no representation was received recently. Well, Sir, I have given you a bead roll of representations, not all of them, because we have not got them here, but all which the inculpated Government chooses to bring down, which makes it the very acme of absurdity to say that no representations have been made. He does not instruct the Lieutenant Governor to communicate this course to the half-breeds. There is no telegram instructing him to tell the half-breeds that a census had been ordered—nothing but this simple telegram; and that being sent, as I said, he pauses, and precious hours were lost, because had decided action been then taken it would have gone far to break the back of the whole affair. When do we find the next movement? The next paper brought down is a telegram of 18th March, 1885, from the Minister to the Lieutenant Governor:

"It is wished that Mr. Forget should be a member of the commission on half-breed claims. Is he available? Answer."

Why, after waiting from the 26th January to the 18th of March, this haste to get Mr. Forget's consent? What was the sudden hurry? What awoke him? Why, the storm had broken while the Minister was sleeping, and the storm having broken, he was trying to keep the storm off. On the 10th of March the commissioner telegraphs from Regina to the comptroller:

"Just received the following telegram from Gagnon, dated to-day, from Carlton. Have shown it to Lieutenant Governor: 'Half-breeds excited. Move about more than usual—preparing arms. Do not know cause or object of these preparations.'"

On the 11th March Superintendent Crozier telegraphs from Carlton:

"Half-breeds greatly excited; reported they threaten attack on Carlton before 16th. Half-breeds refuse to take freight or employment for Government. Will stop all freight coming into the country after 16th of this month. Getting arms ready. Leader will not allow people to leave home, as they may be required. Origin of trouble, I think, letter received, stating Riel not recognised British subject. They expect arms from the States. Have ordered twenty-five men from Battleford, and one gun, to come here at once."

On the 14th of March Col. Irvine telegraphs from Regina:

"Lieutenant Governor received telegram dated Carlton, to-day, from Crozier, saying half-breed rebellion may break out at any moment and joined by Indians, and asking that his division be largely increased. Would recommend that at least 100 men be sent at once, before roads break up. Please instruct."

On the 15th of March the comptroller telegraphs Col. Irvine:

"Start for the north quickly as possible, with all available men up to 100. Telegraph marching-out state, and report passing telegraph station."

There was the state of things on the 18th of March, and now I have given you the explanation of what had waked up the Minister, and why he was telegraphing to find out whether Forget would accept a seat on the commission to number the half-breeds. The Minister of the Interior had his telegrams, too, though he does not show them. He knew the cause of the trouble; he did not believe any cock-and-bull story about Riel not being recognised as a British subject. He knew it was the half-breed claims; and he sought, alas, too late, to do that which he ought to have done years before. But those other telegrams of his are not brought down; they are suppressed. On the 19th of March Mr. Dewdney replies in the affirmative to the telegram of the 18th; and on the same day Mr. Burgess writes a letter to ———— I presume to the three commissioners—enquiring:

"Whether he would be ready to act upon a commission which the Government is about to appoint, for the purpose of investigating the claims of the half-breeds in the North-West Territories, and asking a telegraphic reply."

On the 22nd there is a telegram from Winnipeg, Ruttan to Pearce, but that to which it replies is left out:

"Goulet out west; locality uncertain; expected return Monday; did not receive letter or telegram; his brother thinks no doubt will accept appointment."

That, obviously, is a reply to a telegram from Pearce, wanting to know where Goulet is. But it is not produced. So that you find there was positively at length a little ripple of excitement in the Department of the Interior, for they were telegraphing to the North-West to obtain people to attend to this matter. Then, on the 26th of March, the First Minister gave his account in the House of the appointment of the commission, which is a remarkable statement, in contrast with the facts, which I would like to read, but which I have not the strength or the breath to read. On the 28th of March Mr. Macpherson reports again to council. It was now seen that more was required than a census; it was seen that the proposal simply to send a commission to number the people, without deciding on their claims, would not answer; and on the 30th of March an Order in Council was made on Mr. Macpherson's report. That Order in Council recites his report as, first, recommending the settlement of the claims; second, recommending the expediency of satisfying those claims by granting—first, to each half-breed head of a family resident in the North-West Territories at the transfer, the lot of which he is at present in undisputed and bond fide occupation, by virtue of residence and occupation, to the extent of 160 acres, any deficiency below 160 acres to be made up by scrip, redeemable in land, at $1 an acre; and, in case such head of a family is not in occupation of the land, then an amount of scrip to be redeemable in land to the amount of $160; second, to each child of a half-breed resident in the North-West Territories at the transfer, and born before the 15th of July, 1870, the lot in his possession, up to 240 acres, any deficiency to be made up in scrip, as before; and if the child is not in possession of any land, scrip to the extent of the 240 acres. The order goes on to say that the Minister of the Interior, on the representation made, that it was desirable to have made an enumeration of the half-breeds in Manitoba and the North-West Territories who would have been entitled to land had they resided in Manitoba, was authorised, on the 28th of January, to appoint commissioners, and the following gentlemen were accordingly appointed to carry into effect the order: Messrs. Street, Goulet and Forget; that the Minister of the Interior thought that the scope of the enquiry to be made by the commissioners appointed under the Order in Council of January should be enlarged, and that the commissioners should be empowered not only to enumerate half-breeds resident outside, but also to report to the Minister of the Interior the persons entitled to be dealt with, and also the extent, including all outside of the old Province of Manitoba; that he also thought the commissioners should exercise all the powers and functions provided by the Dominion Lands Act, and recommended that the Order in Council of the 28th of January should be cancelled; and the Minister recommended that the commissioners to make their enquiry and report should be the same as those appointed under the authority of the Order in Council of the 28th of January, namely, Messrs. Street, Goulet and Forget; and it is ordered accordingly. I may say there is no evidence of Messrs. Street, Goulet and Forget having been appointed on the Order of January at all; nothing has been brought down on that subject. On the contrary, we find enquiries made, whether they would accept at a date when the March appointment was imminent. You will observe, first, that there is an acknowledgment of the defective character of the Order in Council of the 28th of January—that more ought to be done than to enumerate. You will observe, secondly, that power is given to investigate and report upon claims, and to give certificates to each claimant who was found entitled to them; you will observe the first attempt, in the third place, that there is an attempt made to define the principle of the grants—to say what, in the opinion of the Government, the people should have; and that definition is a wrong definition, which the Government was forced to retract and retire from in a few days. You will observe, in the next place, that the allegation that Messrs. Street, Goulet and Forget were appointed under that Order in Council of the 28th of January is unproved, and that Order in Council is cancelled. It would not answer; it could not stand the stress of the weather; it was a fair-weather order; the storm had come, and it was quite inadequate to the occasion. On the 30th of March the commission is issued to Messrs. Street, Forget and Goulet, in the terms of the Order in Council authorising them to enumerate and report the persons entitled under the Act; and on the same 30th of March, 1885, there are instructions from Burgess to Street, the chairman of the commission, in which he says:

"The advance of spring renders it desirable that as little delay as possible may occur in the work of the commissioners."

If it were in order I would move to strike out the word "spring," and to substitute the word "Riel" in lieu thereof; I think it is much more likely to have been true. However, with that command of euphemistic phraseology which is peculiar to Government departments, that is the language of the order. Then, the commissioners leave Winnipeg on the 7th of April; an itinerary is provided; the secretary of the land board is ordered to place the whole staff of the land office at their disposal. They are told; "If you meet anyone on the trails, take steps at once to investigate on the spot." Why such a change? They were to go out in the highways and hedges and compel them to come in—if you meet them on the trails, stop them, and investigate their claims; do not stand on any ceremony; set up the staff of justice wherever you are, because the trail will lead to St. Laurent. Forms, and notices, and lists were provided; the Indian agents were ordered to attend the meetings of the commissioners; the treaty Indians were to be told by the commission that if they desired enfranchisement they would be dealt with equitably and liberally. In the case of squatters who were not half-breeds, they were to do nothing, but to take the evidence and forward it, and assure the people that their claims would receive the prompt and liberal consideration of the Government, through the land board. They were told to grant certificates to the half-breed heads of families and their children, and to recognise the illegitimate children. Circulars or letters were to be addressed to land agents, timber agents, Indian agents and Mounted Police, asking them to aid the work of the commission. What a change! What a pleasing and cheering spectacle is the action of the Government at this stage! What a pity they did not do this earlier! What a sad commentary on the condition of things they had allowed to exist for so many years! It is true they show great diligence now; but alas it is too late. On the 30th of March a letter was sent to Mr. Egan, the manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway, telling him that posters are to be distributed, at the earliest possible moment, over the whole railway system. These were posters announcing the messengers of peace. A letter is sent to the secretary of the land board, asking him to assist in every way—to put his whole staff at the disposal of the commission—and to supply notices: first, to the Lieutenant Governor; second, to the Mounted Police Commissioner; third, to each post office; fourth, to each land office; fifth, to each Crown timber office; sixth, to each Customs office; seventh, to each Inland Revenue office; eighth, to each registry office; ninth to each telegraph office in Manitoba and the North-West Territories; also, to each Roman Catholic priest, Protestant minister or missionary, and to each Hudson Bay post. The glad news was to be disseminated all over the Territory, that now, at last, the commission was coming. Then there is a letter to the Indian Department, asking them to give the commission their assistance. The Minister says, in the letter:

"It is of the highest public importance that instructions to this effect should be issued immediately."

Then, on the 30th of March, a letter is sent to Governor Dewdney, advising him in advance, so that no time may be lost in taking the steps suggested. On the 31st of March, Burgess telegraphs to Burpee at the Land Office:

Mr. BLAKE.

"No word from Roger Goulet. Endeavor to find his whereabouts, and reply quickly as possible."

On the 31st of March, Burgess telegraphs to Jackson, member of the council at Qu'Appelle:

"Half-breed commission will be at Qu'Appelle on the 7th and 8th April."

Why this haste? Why this agitation?

PROTESTANT VOLUNTEERS IN THE 65th BATTALION.

Mr. CARON. I desire to read an answer to a telegram sent to Col. Ouimet, in reference to a private in his corps, one Conway. He says:

"Conway, the private referred to, enlisted as a Catholic. He, for the first time, to cause mischief, pretended, on the occasion in question to be a Protestant. However, he was punished, not for having refused to attend Catholic services, but for having incited his comrades to mutiny, and having used insulting language to his captain."

"J. A. OUMET."

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BLAKE. Before recess I was discussing the subject of the recognition, under the order of 30th March, 1885, of the rights of the half-breeds in respect to the extinguishment of the Indian title, and I have shown that the recognition is inadequate in this respect. In the case, say, of the half-breed head of a family, he would be entitled, under the arrangements made under the Manitoba Act, to 160 acres, or scrip for 160 acres, in respect of the extinguishment of the Indian title, but he was only, under the order and instructions, to be permitted to obtain so much of that scrip as should be in excess of the acreage to which he would be entitled to by occupation. If he was in occupation of 160 acres that would nullify his claim altogether in respect to the Indian title; and so of the minor: he was entitled to scrip for 240 acres, but if he were in occupation of 240 or any less quantity to which he would be entitled as a settler, that occupation would, pro tanto, under these documents, diminish his right to scrip for 240 acres in respect of the Indian title. Thus, even at this stage, the Government declined to recognise the rights of the half-breeds; but they were very soon obliged to recede from that illiberal position, for no sooner had the chief commissioner arrived at Manitoba than he telegraphs, on the 4th April, to Mr. Macpherson, as follows:—

"If desired by half-breeds, would it not be advisable to grant scrip, say one sixty or two forty dollars, permitting them to acquire title to land in occupation through possession. Otherwise, Government really gives nothing for Indian title."

He followed that up on the 5th April by the following telegram:—

"Commission agree in recommending that power be granted them to deal with occupying half-breed in manner surmised in my message of yesterday; also, if possible, to enable commission to settle claims of supplementary Manitoba half-breeds, by allowing them same terms as North-West half-breeds."

On the 5th of April he wrote the Minister of the Interior:

"We arrived here early this morning and met my fellow commissioners at the Dominion lands office at 10 o'clock. They introduced the subject as to which I telegraphed you yesterday, and spoke very strongly as to its being one which was likely to be a serious stumbling block in our dealings with the half-breeds. Lest you should not fully have understood my telegram, I will shortly state the point. Suppose we find that a half-breed has been upon and since 13th July, 1877, in occupation of a parcel, say 160 acres, under circumstances which, if he were a white settler, would entitle him to a grant of the land under the homestead clauses of the Dominion Lands Act, under the authority we now possess we could, if he were the head of a family, allow him nothing more than the 160 acres; we could allow him nothing for his claim as a half-breed; and inasmuch as the Government has all along been purporting to deal with the half-breeds as if they had some general right beyond those of ordinary incoming settlers, my fellow commissioners say that great dissatisfaction and disappointment will be created if we give to these occupying half-breeds only that which an ordinary settler can claim, and nothing for the extinguishment of his Indian title. Mr. Pierce discussed the matter very fully with us, and concurred in the advisability of our obtaining, if possible, the power to enable us to allow the half-breed to claim the land occupied by him under the homestead provisions, and, in addition, to give him his scrip for $160 or $240, as the case may be, for his Indian title."

Then there is a telegram from this same Mr. Street, chairman of the half-breed commission:

"Important conference to-day with influential half-breeds' deputation. All difficulty removed, excepting two. First, all children will refuse money scrip, demanding certificate for two forty acres land instead, like Manitoba. Several bishops and priests support this demand. Second, half-breeds having homes on small front unacceptable to buy these at $1 per acre, and free grant one sixty acres from nearest vacant Government land, additional to allowance to extinguish Indian title. See Jackson's letter, 3rd September, to Langevin. These two concessions absolutely necessary if commissions—"

On 6th April, 1885, the Minister of Interior telegraphed to Mr. Street:

"No objection to your suggestion to give scrip and allow occupants to acquire title through possession when desired by them."

So that it was not until the 6th April that the concession was made to place these persons in exactly the same position as the Manitoba half-breeds in this regard. On the same date, 6th April, Mr. Burgess, Deputy Minister of the Interior, telegraphs Mr. Street:

"Manitoba supplementary claims are being considered and disposed of here in all cases where evidence has been filed, which comprise nearly all that class. You need not advertise for evidence, but if any offer, you may take it and forward here."

On the same 6th of April the Minister telegraphs once again to Mr. Street:

"Pray remember that Government determined, in January, before there was any disturbance, to appoint commission, and that half-breeds were notified thereof on 4th February."

He is very anxious to show that he did it a very long time ago, and so he wants Mr. Street to remember; and, in his communications to the people, to point out that in January there was a determination to appoint a commission—but that was a very different kind of thing—and that the half-breeds were notified. Of such notification, however, we have received no proof. There was no disturbance, the Minister says. Was there no disturbance from June, 1884, when Louis Riel came to the country? Was there no disturbance at an earlier period? Were there not meetings? Were there not petitions? Were not the petitions and contributions a condition of discontent? Were there no remonstrances, letters, warnings, as to the condition of the people. But the Minister says there was no disturbance before—there was none in January. Then on the 10th, the 11th and the 12th of April there were telegrams discussing and settling the mode of dealing with the water frontages at Qu'Appelle, which were left unsettled, as I will show, until the outbreak, and were arranged by the commission. Subsequently, amended forms of certificates, in accordance with the extended authority as to Indian title, were sent to the commissioners. Hence, the forms of certificates which had been originally provided would have been inadequate for the settlement which the Government, at the instigation of the commissioners, after they reached Winnipeg, agreed to make; and on the 18th of April the following Order in Council was passed: The Committee, on the recommendation of the Minister of the Interior, advise that the Order in Council, dated 30th of March ultimo, making provision for the manner in which claims existing in connection with the extinguishment of the Indian title preferred by half-breeds resident in the North-West Territories outside of the limits of Manitoba, previous to the 15th day of July, 1870, be amended, by providing:

"1. That the small water frontages, of which half-breeds are at present in bona fide possession, by virtue of residence and cultivation, be sold to them at $1 per acre, the area in no case to exceed 40 acres, and payment therefor to be made within two years.

"2. That in satisfaction of their claims as actual settlers upon these small water frontages, which are proposed to be sold to them, they be permitted to select from lands open for homestead and pre-emption entry, as nearly as possible in the vicinity of their holdings, one-quarter section of 160 acres, more or less, the patents for which, however, shall not issue until payment has been made in full for the lands of which they are now in occupation, as aforesaid.

"3. That in the case of children of half-breed, heads of families residing in the North-West prior to the 16th of July, 1870, and born before that date, instead of an issue of $240 in scrip they be granted a certificate entitling them to select 240 acres of land from any lands open for homestead and pre-emption entry.

Then comes the Commissioners' notice:

"Notice is hereby given that the undersigned have been appointed by letters patent, dated 30th of March, 1885, from Her Majesty the Queen, under the Great Seal of the Dominion of Canada, commissioners, with authority, among other things, to make a remuneration to the half-breeds, who, previous to the 15th of July, 1870, were resident within the ceded portion of the North-West Territory and outside the limits of the original Province of Manitoba; and to investigate their claims, as such half-breeds, existing in connection with the extinguishment of the Indian title, and to issue certificates to such half-breeds as shall prove before the commission their claims to consideration under sub-section e of section 81 of the Dominion Lands Act, 1883.

"And the commissioners will attend for the purpose of receiving, hearing and adjudicating upon such claims at the places mentioned below."

And the places mentioned there, according to the itinerary furnished from the office of the Interior, were:

"At Fort Qu'Appelle, April 8th, 9th, to April 14th, both days inclusive; at Touchwood Hills, April 16th and 17th; at Regina, April 23rd to April 27th, both days inclusive; at Maple Creek, April 29th; at Calgary, May 1st to the 6th, both days included; at Fort McLeod, May 9th to May 12th, both days inclusive. Dates for the sitting of the committee at St. Albert, Edmonton, Fort Saskatchewan, Victoria, Fort Pitt, Battleford, St. Laurent, St. Louis de Langevin, Duck Lake, St. Antoine de Padoue and Prince Albert, will shortly be fixed. Dated the 4th April, 1885."

Thus showing you the wide area over which, in the opinion of the Government, it was necessary that these men should sit, in order to adjudicate upon these claims, no less than 17 different points being mentioned, of which 5 are in the focus of the disturbed districts. Now, I have only this to add: that the course the Government pursued in March and April, in reference to this commission, indicated their own sense of the importance of the removal of that grievance. They felt it was important to proceed, even in the middle of the outbreak, not to lose an hour, to give every publicity that was possible throughout the North-West, to the fact that justice was about to be done, and they felt that it was important, because they felt it was necessary, in order to secure the quiet and the inaction of the half-breeds in other parts of the territory, that not a moment should be lost in doing that tardy justice. I have now gone over the situation, with reference to the claims, in this regard, of the half-breeds of the North-West Territories, and I think I have established to you a case of delay, neglect and mismanagement beyond explanation and beyond excuse. I now turn to a cognate question, the question of the unenumerated half-breeds of the old Province of Manitoba. After the enumeration which took place in the early days, and the allotment of the 1,400,000 acres upon the basis that those enumerated were all that were entitled, it was found that many had not been counted. Of those, presumably, the bulk were absent in the North-West Territories, where many of the Manitoba half-breeds used to resort during the period of the Buffalo hunt, and for purposes of freighting. On the 9th April, 1875, the Dominion lands agent at Winnipeg was authorised to take evidence in the cases of those unenumerated half-breeds, and Mr. Justice Ryan and Mr. Machar were appointed in the same year, 1875, also, to make an enumeration. They did some work, and they reported, in 1876, that their work was incomplete. Mr. Ryan was ordered, by Order in Council of the 14th June, 1876, to take evidence, if offered, within two years from that time, at any point in the Territories in which he might be, he being at that time a stipendiary magistrate in the Territories. On the 19th June, 1876, this letter was written to Mr. Ryan on the subject:

"SIR,—I am directed by the hon. the Minister to inform you that representations having been lately made by his Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface, to the effect that it would greatly facilitate the settlement of claims to half-breed lands scrip in Manitoba if authority were issued to you to take evidence in relation thereto of claimants who had removed from the Province into the North-West Territory previous to the late sittings of yourself and Mr. Machar, as commissioners, and that you were willing to undertake such duty; acting upon the suggestion of His Grace, being desirous of removing, as far as possible, any further obstacles to the final settlement of these claims, the Minister has been authorised, by an Order of the Privy Council, to request you to continue to act as commissioner, to take the evidence, in the usual form, of such claimants as may come before you for the purpose, at Swan River or elsewhere, where your duties as stipendiary magistrate may call you in the North-West Territory; such authority, however, not to extend beyond two years from the date of the Order, that is to say, the 14th instant. The Minister will be glad to know whether you are willing to take upon yourself such additional duty as the Order in Council may involve."

There was some correspondence with Mr. Ryan and some action upon that in 1876 and 1877. On the 7th May, 1877, Mr. George Newcombe and A. Mills, agents, respectively, of the Government, at Emerson and Portage la Prairie, were ordered to take evidence on the same subject. In June, 1878, a proposal was made, with reference to the Saskatchewan half-breeds, to extend the authority of Mr. Ryan, and on the 28th June, 1878, and the Minister announced that he would probably appoint Mr. Duck, Dominion land agent for the Saskatchewan, to make that investigation. Mr. Duck was so appointed, and on the 24th February, 1879, I see the Saskatchewan Herald alludes to Mr. Duck's recent visit to Battleford, and announces his mission to be to receive applications of persons claiming to be entitled to half-breed and old settlers' scrip. I have no more information on these subjects than that which I have stated. The reports of these various officers have not been brought down. Some kind of ticket or voucher was given by them to those who examined into their cases, but there was no recognition of their right. In the spring of 1880 a petition was sent in to the First Minister, as Minister of the Interior, by the residents of Manitoba village, Lake Manitoba, North-West Territories, humbly representing that:

"Whereas, under the terms of the Manitoba Act, scrip was to be issued to the half-breed heads of families and allotment of lands made to the children of the same resident in Manitoba on the 15th July, A.D. 1870, and whereas, subsequently, many of their families removed to the interior, and have not yet benefited by the terms of the said Manitoba Act; and whereas it appears that the allotments of land made in Manitoba for the benefit of children of said half-breed heads of families are likely to prove insufficient to cover all the claimants under the said Act: Now, therefore, your petitioners, who are interested in these matters, do most humbly pray that you will place us on an equal footing, and cause scrip to be issued to us at an early date in satisfaction of our just and lawful claims."

On the 10th May, 1880, that petition was acknowledged, and it was promised to be laid before the Minister for his consideration. There was a similar petition, couched in the same language, from the Saskatchewan region. It was signed by 102 names, and was in like form to that which I have read. It was forwarded to the Minister of the Interior by Mr. Thos. McKay, of Prince Albert, on the 19th May, 1880, and on the 10th July, 1880, consideration of that petition was promised on the Minister's return to Ottawa. On the 6th June, 1881, Mr. Lawrence Clarke, who had then become a member of the North-West Council, petitioned the North-West Council, then sitting at Battleford, as follows:—

"That there are residents within the North-West Territories in various settlements, but more particularly, so far as the personal knowledge of the undersigned extends, about Edmonton, Carlton, Duck Lake, St. Laurent, Prince Albert and Qu'Appelle, a number of half-breeds who were residents in what is now the Province of Manitoba at and before the 15th day of July, 1870, but who, in the interval between this date and the distribution of the scrips and lands specially provided in the terms of transfer, had removed from their residences, and are now living in the North-West Territories.

"That the undersigned, from such information as he has been able to collect, is quite convinced the total number of the above-described class of half-breeds is not large, and that proof of their claims has long since, in the majority of cases, been taken by Mr. Ryan, before his commission lapsed, or since by the local land agents, and which proof, for some time back, has been in the possession of the Department of the Interior at Ottawa.

Mr. BLAKE.

"That these half-breeds, in many instances, were not aware of the sitting of the commissioners in Manitoba being limited in point of time, and, in nearly every instance, even had they been aware of such being the case, were not possessed of means to bear the expense consequent upon attendance thereat.

"That the general feeling of the community is that these half-breeds, possessing even rights with those who have already received scrips or grants of land in Manitoba, have not had that measure of justice meted out to them to which, by the terms of the surrender, they were entitled.

"The undersigned considers the subject as one of considerable importance, and very desirable for the peace, welfare and good government of the Territories, that it should be taken up and adjusted by the Dominion Government with as little further delay as possible.

"And, therefore, the undersigned respectfully recommend that, with the approval of council, Your Honor may see fit to bring the subject of dealing expeditiously, equitably and finally with the claims of the class of half-breeds above mentioned under the notice of His Excellency the Governor General."

That was transmitted by the North-West Council on the 14th June, 1881, with a request that it should be laid before His Excellency, and be by him placed under the consideration of his Ministers. On the 22nd July, 1881, this memorial, with the other papers relating to the half-breed claims, was laid before the Acting Minister of the Interior by the Deputy Minister of the Interior, with this memorandum:

"The undersigned submits for the information of the Acting Minister the file herewith on the subject of the claims preferred by the half-breeds in the North-West Territories to lands or scrip, following upon the grants in this behalf made by Parliament to the half-breeds of Manitoba.

"In reference to the class of half-breeds who moved from Manitoba to the North-West Territories without having received land or scrip, mentioned by Mr. Lawrence Clarke, the undersigned may state that proof as to the right of many of these people to participate in land or scrip have been investigated, but the return did not come in time to enable the persons who would appear to be entitled to participate in the land grant of 1,400,000 acres before the said grant had become entirely exhausted. It remains now for the Government to say whether they will make an additional grant to meet such claims, whether they will issue scrip and meet the demand, or, finally, whether, in view of its being, to a considerable extent, the fault of the parties themselves that their claims were not made in time, they should be refused altogether."

You will observe from that statement of the Deputy Minister of the Department, that at that time it was entirely undetermined by the Government whether they would recognise, and if so, in what shape and to what extent, these claims. He submitted the question once again on the 22nd of July, 1881, when these urgent remonstrances were presented through the North-West Council to the consideration of the Minister. From information I have received, I believe that the member for Provencher (Mr. Royal), and, amongst others, Mr. Bannatyne and Mr. Schultz, formerly a member of this House and now a member of the Senate, and others, intervened, from time to time, to press this subject upon the consideration of the Government; that there was a considerable pressure upon the Department of the Interior, which pressure, however, with a capacity for the resistance of pressure which is unsurpassed, that Department sustained immovably. There were several orders for papers, but save in one case none of those orders were complied with. On the 29th March, 1882, in answer to a motion made by Mr. Schultz, then member for Lisgar, all the claims of the half-breeds who were temporarily absent were brought down. There were 429 names of cases which, up to that time, had been investigated, and that return was laid on the Table. The pressure increased. Many of these claims were sold; more of them were pledged. Discontent had arisen; many of the claimants had removed into the Territories at various points, and another germ of trouble was created wherever a few of these men were together. They were to be found in Qu'Appelle, in the St. Laurent settlement, and at various other points in the North-West Territories, and every one of them was a man with a grievance in this respect. In 1883 the pressure was renewed, but fruitlessly. In 1884 the pressure was renewed; and on the 9th May, 1884, the Deputy Minister of the Interior made a report, recommending the settlement of those claims, and going into the whole case, and that was submitted to the Minister; but that report has not been brought down. The Minister did not act upon that report. Nothing was done upon it at all; and even late in the year 1885 no decision was arrived at, and the outbreak of the trouble began. In March, 1885, the Deputy Minister made a second report, further pressing a settlement of those claims. At last, spurred by the rebellion—for nothing less than a rebellion seems adequate to stir up this Government—the Minister reported and recommended a settlement on the 9th of April, 1885. It was not until then that settlements were proposed by the Minister, although it was pressed in the years 1879, 1880 and 1881; although the papers had been specially laid before him in the year 1881; although the pressure was renewed in 1882, 1883 and 1884; although his own Deputy had brought the question under his consideration on the 9th May, 1884, with a report recommending immediate action; although it was well known that large numbers of those half-breeds were all through the Territories and in the disturbed quarters; although all the disturbance and agitation were known, nothing moved him, nothing stirred him, nothing could resist the great inertia that possessed him but the rebellion. But in April he moved—too late, of course, to save the trouble. Many had been disaffected by this neglect. That settlement is now going on, and 439—I suppose the 439 whose names were laid on the Table on the 29th March, 1882—half-breeds, whose cases had been investigated, are now having their cases settled; and in all about 500 have been and are to be settled in that regard. I say this brief statement I have made of the claims of the unenumerated half-breeds of Manitoba proves with equal force and cogency the neglect, delay and mismanagement which I have charged against the Government in that regard. Now, Sir, having dealt with these two classes of questions, I will touch but very briefly upon some other incidents. As I have said, it does not do to consider this matter without looking at all its bearings, and the question of representation, local and federal, was a question strongly pressed upon the attention of the Government and formed a difficulty in the Territories. But I shall not take time to deal with the details of that. So, also, with reference to the regulations affecting firewood, fencing and house timber. The regulations in the summer of 1879, caused protests and indignation in that year. There was an absurd arrangement, under which, I believe, a man had to get a permit if he wanted to light a camp fire on his way through the prairie, the practical effect of which was that he was exposed to prosecution if he did not; and other equally absurd regulations were made. In February, 1880, a petition was sent from Edmonton and Saskatchewan on that subject, and some of the regulations were cancelled. There were frequent other protests early. There was a protest in November, 1884, from Moosomin, and in September, 1884, from Prince Albert. In May, 1884, there is a strong article in Le Manitoba pointing out the grievances of these regulations, as they applied to the wood on the reserves for ordinary use in the old Province as well as in the new Territories. Then there was a question with reference to the mail service, which was very inadequate, and the improvement of the River Saskatchewan, for which we granted votes repeatedly, but which votes were never used. Then came the white settlers' grievances, in the Prince Albert settlement, as to their lands, which, as I have said, were in a large measure common to the half-breeds. I shall not go into them in detail. The papers on the Table prove abundantly the neglect, the bungling, the delay of the Government. The statement of these troubles includes, amongst other things, the fact that the land office was not opened until after two years after the agent was appointed; that the old settlers' claims were not satisfied, and patents were not given; that an enormous inconvenience was caused by the regulations in the unsurveyed Territories, an inconvenience far greater than existed in the surveyed Territories, because it was impossible for the pioneer settler on unsurveyed land to know whether it was an odd or even lot that he was settling upon, and therefore he was left without security for his holding. By the application of the orders and regulations which, from time to time, were issued, to the cases of settlement, which had begun under other orders and regulations, a gross injustice was attempted to be done, and in respect to this much agitation ensued, until the wholesome principle was laid down in the year 1884, that each man's case should be treated as under the custom, law and regulation in force at the time when he made his settlement. There were delays in communicating the orders of the Department and consequent serious hardships, and very serious trouble arose to the settlers with regard to settlement duties performed in unsurveyed townships before entry, in which there was a typical case, affecting nearly 300 of other cases, in the instance of the man Miller, to which I shall refer briefly. There were delays in the surveys, and delays in settling a principle of action with regard to the settlers. Now, there was a special report by Mr. Russell, the Surveyor General, in 1877, and there were special reports in 1879 by Mr. Duck, who was appointed agent in August, 1878. No office, however, was opened. In 1880, 102 inhabitants of Prince Albert and Edmonton asked for patents to the old settlers. Mr. Duck was appointed to take evidence in 1881. He took the evidence; and in March, 1882, he reported. No action was taken on that report till 1884, and much agitation occurred meanwhile. There were not many of the old settlers, but they had settled on some of the choicest spots, which had afterwards become towns and village sites, and very numerous homesteads and titles were dependent on the question whether the titles of the old settlers would be recognised. In 1880, although the Government did not think fit to open an office, they appointed a registrar. In 1881 the report of the Minister of the Interior admits inconvenience, delay and reasonable complaints of the settlers, and says they have been enabled to provide a remedy by the appointment of the land board. In 1881 there is a memorial from the North-West Council; in June, a protest from Mr. Clarke and Rev. Father André, on the subject of opening the office, and at length, in August 1881, the office was ordered to be opened by the agent who had been two years on the spot without the office being opened. Difficulties at once arose as to the application of the various orders and regulations, which, from time to time, had been passed since settlers came in; and in October, 1881, a public meeting was held, declaring very emphatically the views of the settlers upon various points, and the resolutions were placed in the hands of Mr. Clarke, as I have already stated. I have given you the resolution relating to the extinguishment of the Indian title, and the other had regard to the claims of the settlers to their lands. From November, 1881, to April, 1882, there was correspondence with Mr. Clarke. In January, 1882, instructions were issued at Ottawa as to land entries, but those instructions were not sent to the Prince Albert agent till the summer of 1882; and inasmuch as they altered the condition of things, and established a new state of things, they inflicted great hardship and difficulty, as Mr. Pearce reported. On 27th March, 1882, Lieutenant Governor Dewdney pressed for early action, and pointed out that delays were complicating settlement, and enclosed a letter from Mr. Macdowall, at Prince Albert, in that sense. In the Session of 1882 and 1883 came a petition to this House, signed by 394 settlers, and in the Session 1883 came the debate upon my motion with respect to that petition, to which I will refer presently. In April, 1883, there was the report of Mr. Russell, recommending a plan of settlement. In July, 1883, it was proposed that Mr. Russell should go there; he had been ill since February previous. In October, 1883, the North-West Council memorialised the Government to expedite the settlement of the claims at Prince Albert. In October, 1883, there was a meeting at Prince Albert, at which strong resolutions were passed. In that month the Minister himself reports :

"Settlement of this question without further delay is of the utmost importance to the settlers, and I propose the land board and Mr. Pearce shall act."

In the winter of 1883-84 there was agitation, meetings and articles in the press. On 15th January, 1884, Mr. Pearce commenced an investigation at Prince Albert, and in the course of between six and seven weeks he accomplished the whole enquiry into all these cases at Prince Albert—I speak not of St. Laurent—which had been the subject of agitation, difficulty and that hope deferred which maketh the heart sick, and the want of which enquiry had produced so much discontent and trouble. In March, 1884, having gone down to Winnipeg, he sent his report to the Minister. In April, 1884, the Minister approved that report, and directed the settlement to proceed. I am not now entering at all into the principle of the settlement; I have been dealing solely with the mode in which the business was conducted. I have brought you down to the point at which Mr. Pearce, in six weeks, dealt with all those cases, comprising more than 1,000 affidavits and many hundreds of claims; and the Minister approved the report, and ordered the settlement to proceed. Unhappily, most unhappily, St. Laurent was not embraced in the report, at that time, and the cause of that I shall have to point out later. I now advert, for an instant, to a particular type of claim, to the Miller type, not in the interest of one individual settler, but because it appears from the official reports to be typical of about 300 cases. The old settlers, before the survey, were, by law, entitled to enter and have the benefit of residence upon land as part of their homesteading period. But in 1879 the Department, unfortunately, alleged that this was against the law; they directed it should not be done. The result was, that the settlers did not enter within the three months provided after townships were open for settlement. Had they not been, in effect, deceived by this notice, they would have entered and got the benefit of their past residence. But they were only given three months, and being deceived by the notice from the Department, only five entries were made in Prince Albert and St. Laurent, instead of nearly 300. Correspondence ensued. Questions passed from Prince Albert to the Department, and back again, and it actually seemed utterly impossible to make the Department comprehend the difficulty. I wish I had time to read the letters; I hope they will be read before this debate closes, for they show how utterly impossible it was to get the Department to understand the difficulty and apply a proper remedy. It was not until four years afterwards—from 1879 up to 1883—that it was found possible to get the Department to understand the matter and apply a remedy. In fact, it was not until another visit had been made by Mr. Pearce, in 1884, that a settlement was arrived at, or no less than five years since the difficulty arose. You can perhaps, hardly understand the trouble caused by this bungling. Amongst the grievances complained of by both whites and half-breeds was the large reserves. The country was unsurveyed, and you could not, therefore, tell the odd or even sections. But in 1879 the odd sections were reserved for railway purposes; and if a man took up a section, he did not know at what price or on what terms he would be able to obtain it if it should prove an odd section. The same trouble arose in regard to Hudson Bay sections and school sections. Then there came the enormous Canadian Pacific Railway reserve. The company obtained a reserve of the odd sections in a tract of nearly 40,000,000 acres. Then there were the colonisation companies' tracts near the settlements and partly settled. Then the pretence was made that settlers on even sections must deal with the companies; and that colonisation companies had some rights in respect to those sections, as to which the Government alleged, and the terms of their agreement showed, that they had no special right, and this pretence known to the Government to be set up by the colonisation companies, this effort represented to the Government that the colonisation companies were persuading the people that they must deal with them, was fostered and promoted by the Government, by the system complained of by the North-West Council and others, of appointing, for that particular purpose, whomsoever might be the agent of the colonisation company to be the Government agent. Well, he was not paid as a Government agent; he was the colonisation company's agent, but he was given double power, power as Government agent too, which, of course, helped the colonisation companies in this mode of treating settlers. Now, there were many remonstrances upon this subject. Many of the earlier remonstrances to which I have already alluded touched upon this question also, but I shall refer only to some of the later ones. In the Saskatchewan Herald of 3rd of July, 1881, there was an editorial upon these regulations :

"One omission in the regulations that seriously affects the pioneer is that no provision is made for those who have taken up land in advance of the survey, except in the case of parties who may settle on railway lands to the north of the line, who will be allowed to purchase a quantity not exceeding 320 acres, at $1.25 an acre. It is admitted on all hands that to the pioneers are due the credit of proving to the world how admirably adapted our inland plains are for settlement. By their enterprise the clouds of darkness that have for many years wrapt their capabilities in gloom have been dispelled; and surely they are entitled to some consideration. Sir John A. Macdonald, in his report, as Minister of the Interior, admits 'that squatters are not, as a rule, speculators, but in the majority of instances prove industrious and valuable cultivators of the soil, and as such are entitled to receive protection.' It is gratifying to hear this admission from Sir John, and he would have won himself the goodwill of every one of the squatters, and given a great impetus to them as cultivators of the soil, if he had given effect to his views, by providing a protection to which he admits they are entitled. It is impossible to survey this vast country all at once, and it is also impossible to confine settlement within prescribed limits. One of the causes that, in some cases, operate against making extensive permanent improvements, is the fear that the settler entertains: that he finds himself on a lot reserved for some special purpose, such for instance as on a school or Hudson Bay lot. The great object to be attained is the settlement of the country, which can best be secured by the encouragement of those who lead the van in the forward march of civilisation, and this can most effectually be done by the introduction into the regulations of a clause providing that where a settler finds himself on one or the other of these lots, he should be allowed to keep it, giving to the school fund or the company an equivalent in land elsewhere. This would meet the case, and cause no embarrassment to the Department. The opinion of Sir John on the value of the squatter justified the change asked for, and its introduction would give light and force to the policy that allows the expenditure of large sums of money for the introduction of immigrants from beyond the sea."

The petition of the settlers of Prince Albert and vicinity, of 1882 and 1883, has the following clause:—

"And whereas, prior to the 9th of October, 1879, all lands in the North-West Territories, whether odd or even-numbered, were opened for purchase or homestead, and many of your petitioners took up even-numbered sections, cultivated and improved the same, with the intention of purchasing them at the then Government price, but in consequence of an Order in Council at the date last aforesaid, are prohibited from purchasing the same."

It also says:

"Some of your petitioners, prior to survey, took up claims which they cultivated and improved, and which, after survey, were found to be on sections reserved by the Government or the Hudson Bay Company, and are now threatened with ejection by the company, unless they deliver up possession thereof. Your petitioners consider that a great injustice would be done these settlers if turned off their claims without compensation."

There is also a clause as to the colonisation companies. When I brought this subject up in the House, in 1883, on the 7th of March, I said:

"It is also suggested that colonisation companies surround the district, and the agents of these companies have taken care to forbid all immigrants from going on their lands; and the result has been that many intending settlers have departed and gone across the line."

The hon. gentleman, in answer to that statement, said:

"We cannot help it if people act under the impression that colonisation companies can keep them off their tracts. Land jobbers and land speculators may tell the people: These lands belong to us; and some persons are frightened enough to buy off their claim, whether it is good or not. We cannot help that. All I can say with reference to these colonisation companies is that there is not anything to prevent any settler going in and settling on an even-numbered lot, under the general regulations, making his entry and getting his patent at the end of three years."

But, as I have already stated, the attitude of the colonisation companies was notorious, and that attitude was encouraged and rendered effectual by the appointment of their agents as the Government agents for the tract. On the 9th of October, 1883, a memorial was forwarded to the Governor General by the North-West Council, containing this clause :

"The reservations held by the Government at Regina and Moose Jaw, and the reserve known as the Mile Belt reserve, are detrimental to growth and prosperity; large blocks of land being held by the Government, and settlers being debarred from locating upon them, paralyse the expansive force of this young country, and by bounding the railway tract, comparatively uninhabited, give the traveller a false idea of the North-West, and an inadequate and sometimes a misleading impression of the character of the soil. Your memorialists are aware, too, that many bonâ fide settlers, have located on lands included on these reserves, innocent of any order to the contrary, and have, in many cases, been driven from their claims, and in others have been prevented from obtaining those advantages which the inducement held out by the Government led them to expect. Your memorialists, therefore, pray that immediate action be taken to remove these barriers to the development of the country."

And they also make this declaration :

"That the system of granting immense tracts of the choicest lands of the Territories to colonisation companies is inimical to the best interests of the country. Your memorialists, therefore, pray that no more such grants be made; that the companies now holding the same be compelled to fulfil the conditions imposed on them in letter and in spirit; and that the agents of the companies be not allowed to act as the agents of the Government in any respect; that granting lands already thickly settled, as in the case of the Edmonton and Saskatchewan Land Company, is contrary to the intention of the Land Act; that the company profits to an undue extent by the energy and forethought of the pioneers of the country, who are prevented from reaping the advantages of their own labors, in that the odd-numbered sections are locked up for speculative purposes, which would otherwise be open for settlement, or held for sale by the Government on reasonable terms. Your memorialists, therefore, pray that Your Excellency's Government will enquire into the matter and redress the above grievances."

The other day the First Minister gave, with reference to the Edmonton and Saskatchewan Company, a statement as to the settlers. The surveys of that company's tract were approved on the 25th of June, 1883, as to the bulk, on the 12th of February, 1883, and the 2nd of April, 1883, as to the remainder, and the surveyor who went on it and surveyed it reported 44 settlers on that tract, so that there were that many before it was surveyed. The Inspector of Colonisation Companies reported 49 settlers prior to the commencement of settlement by the company. This is an instance of mistaken action. At the October meeting, in 1883, at Prince Albert, a resolution was passed, endorsing the memorial of the North-West colony, asking the annulment of grants of land made to colonisation companies of lands previously settled on. On the 29th of February, 1884, a public meeting was held at Collestone's school house, Prince Albert, Mr. Macdowall, the representative of the district in the council, being present to explain his course, and the second resolution passed was this :

"That we view with alarm the action of the Government in reserving large tracts of land in this locality for the use of colonisation companies, town sites or other purposes, and desire that as soon as possible all lands in the North-West Territories shall be held for homesteads to actual settlers only."

Then there was a meeting held at Moosomin, in December, 1874, at which the following resolution was passed :—

"The principle of allowing individuals or corporations to control large tracts of land being prejudicial, advantage of any failure on the part of colonisation companies already organised to faithfully fulfil conditions, should be seized to cancel their claims."

Now, Sir, so much with reference to the general and the particular case of the Edmonton company. But I wish to give you two special instances, some facts which are within my reach. Take the case of the Qu'Appelle half-breeds, as to whom there are numerous papers brought down. On the 5th of May, 1873, there was an address presented by the half-breeds of Qu'Appelle to Lieutenant Governor Morris, asking for protection in respect of their holdings. In 1874, when the Indian treaty was made, Mr. Laird, the Minister of Interior, and Mr. Morris, were at Qu'Appelle, and the half-breeds sent in a petition to Lieutenant Governor Morris, for the recognition of their holdings along the rivers. Lieutenant Governor Morris, under authority, assured them that their holdings would be respected, and enclosed the papers to Ottawa. In October, 1874, Father Decorby, of Qu'Appelle, wrote to the Minister of the Interior to the same effect, as to holdings on streams. At this time no Indian reserves were set apart, and no surveys had been made. In the summer of 1881 a petition was sent to the Governor General from 112 of the Qu'Appelle half-breeds, which states :

"That when Her Majesty's commissioners came here, in the autumn of 1874, to treat with the Indians of this region, they, on behalf of Her Majesty, gave a promise to your petitioners that their rights would be recognised and respected. Your petitioners, therefore, pray that the Government will be pleased to cause a survey to be made of their present holdings, similar to the old settlers' claims on the Red and Assiniboine Rivers, in the Province of Manitoba, allotting to each actual settler a certain number of acres, fronting on the lakes or rivers as the case may happen, throughout the settlement, and running two miles back north or south as the case may be, with a privilege of two miles additional for hay and wood purposes."

That was acknowledged and promised to be considered on the 20th September, 1881, but no action was taken on it. On the 29th August, 1882, Governor Dewdney telegraphed to Sir John A. Macdonald from Qu'Appelle as follows :—

"Half-breed holding old claims in valley waited on me to-day and complained that Osler Land Company are warning them off, and claiming their lands. Would recommend that this company be notified not to interfere with them. Have written."

On that day a petition had been presented to Lieutenant-Governor Dewdney from these half-breeds, in these terms :

"That as far back as the year 1860 and up to 1879 we settled or squatted on land situate on the banks of the Qu'Appelle River, erected comfortable dwellings and out buildings thereon, ploughed and cultivated the soil, and by continued residence have complied with all the Government conditions.

"2. That we have erected a church and school in a central position, built and opened up roads and bridges, and made numerous improvements, which are to-day of great value to the new settlers.

"3. That the surveys lately made have discovered some of us to be on railway land now owned by the Ontario and Qu'Appelle Land Co., whose agent has informed us that we must either buy the lands from them or move off. In fact, we are informed that they have sold some of the land at present occupied by a bonâ fide settler.

"4. That we have refused to comply with the request of the Ontario and Qu'Appelle Land Co., and claim a patent from the Crown for our respective pieces of land, or quarter sections, fully believing that we are justly and legally entitled to the same.

"5. We would therefore respectfully ask Your Honor to lay our claims before the right hon. Minister of the Interior, who, we know, will do us justice in the matter, and request his earliest attention and answer."

On the 29th August, 1882, Lieutenant Governor Dewdney enclosed that petition to the Minister of the Interior, with these words :

"The declarations set forth in the petition are, to my knowledge, generally correct. I have informed the petitioners that I will duly communicate to them your answer in connection with the said petition.

"With reference to their claims, I yesterday had the honor to address a telegram to you, and the recommendation therein contained I now beg to reiterate.

"As I glean that many of the claims are somewhat conflicting, and in some instances run part on even and part on odd-numbered sections, I would respectfully suggest that either Mr. Commissioner Walsh or Mr. Inspector Pearce be instructed to examine into and adjust them on an equitable basis, and that without delay, as the half-breeds interested are very uneasy about their holdings, and may be looked upon as the pioneers of the district."

That letter was written, Sir, on the 29th of August, 1882. It was acknowledged, and was to be submitted to the Minister on his return to the Department. On 19th March, 1883, Lieutenant Governor Dewdney writes again, saying :

"Last summer I forwarded a petition from the half-breeds in reference to their claims in this district to the Department of Interior, on the occasion of a claim being made by the Qu'Appelle and Ontario Land Company to some of their land.

"There are a number of half-breeds in this district who have been settled in the Qu'Appelle valley for many years. These went on their usual hunt for buffalo, returning to their homes at different times during each year. Others have settled since 1879, and have remained pretty constantly on their lands.

"The Dominion land surveys have demonstrated that many of them have been living on the same section, and as land became valuable a scramble was made by land speculators to obtain the right, titles and interest of those settled in the most favored locality.

"The sooner the claims of these half-breeds are determined the better, as a number of them are bonâ fide settlers and deserve consideration.

"These settlers have not claimed their land, as was done in some parts of the North-West, by small frontages running back some miles, although the bulk of them built their homesteads close to each other and near the water, where they could easily catch fish. They, however, consider they are entitled to as much land in area as they would have been had they taken up their claims, as had been the custom with half-breeds."

And then he states the difficulty, suggesting a plan of settlement, and suggests that if the question is left to arbitration it should be left to some independent man. Now I have told you of Mr. Dewdney's telegram of August and his letter of August, 1882, in which he requested this pressing case to be considered. Do you know when that letter was answered? It was answered on the 6th of July, 1883, ten months after the date of its receipt, and its answer was:

"I am directed by the Minister of the Interior to send you herewith the enclosed copies of the correspondence concerning the claims of certain half-breed settlers in the Qu'Appelle valley, and to request that you will, at your convenience, investigate and report upon these claims."

And the reference to Mr. Commissioner Walsh took place on that 6th of July, 1882—the letter is here. So that this pressing case, referred to by the Lieutenant Governor of the Territories, by telegram and letter, remained for ten months, although he had suggested a reference to Commissioner Walsh, without the Department possessing sufficient animation either to order the reference or to answer the letter; and it was not until the expiration of that period that the step was taken, even, of ordering the reference. Then Mr. Jackson, the member of the council for the district, on 8th December, 1883, says:

"You will pardon the liberty I now take in addressing you privately, when I tell you that it is at the urgent request of a large deputation of half-breeds that I do so. They, in common with the country, have heard of the generally satisfactory settlement of the mile belt and reserve question,—"

You know, the satisfactory settlement was, that the wrong was undone, as far as it could be, after a while—

"and urge perhaps with reason, that if their own grievances, upon which the Government have been repeatedly petitioned and memorialised, were brought personally to your notice, some immediate action would be taken. Under any circumstances, there would not be very many to deal with, and the settlement of their claims need not be a troublesome one; but there are half-breeds in the Territories who have never received anything from the Government, and who, it has been admitted, are entitled to some consideration."

On 13th March, 1884, after a more reasonable interval of delay—only three months this time—Mr. Hall, the secretary, informed Mr. Jackson that the letter was duly received, and he says:

"The Minister has himself been very anxious to have this question settled, and on the 18th September last Mr. A. Walsh, commissioner of Dominion lands at Winnipeg, was instructed to visit this locality, and make an investigation into the claims of these half-breeds, and other matters. Owing, however, to an unusual pressure of business, Mr. Walsh has so far been unable to visit this locality, but he has again been written to and requested to make this investigation at the earliest possible opportunity."

Now, Sir, so far as I can ascertain, these claims were only settled under the pressure of the rebellion in April, 1885, because the very principle of the decision is that which was discussed by telegram and letter between Mr. Street and Mr. Macpherson, after Mr. Street has reached Winnipeg. The questions how much should be given to them on the water, and on what terms they should have the lands outside, were only settled in April, 1885. There is a combined instance of neglect to settle old claims, and trouble arising out of the reserves. And may I be permitted to enquire if these delays took place when the Minister was so very anxious, what would have been the case if he had not possessed such a tender interest? Then, I turn to the case of the Prince Albert Colonisation Company. That company's tract of land is in the immediate vicinity of these troubles. And the facts, so far as I have been able to gather them, are briefly these: In 1882 Mr. J. White, M.P., East Hastings, and Mr. J. C. Jamieson, of the Belleville Intelligencer, procured the passage of an Order in Council in favor of the projected company, and an agreement for some very choice lands. That agreement was made in June, 1882, and it was intended and provided by the charter of the company that they should also deal in lumber limits and coal lands. It was arranged, on the formation of the company, that the profits should be divided into twelve shares, or parts, of which two were to be what are called, in the parlance of these jobbers, "blind." The shareholders, other than White and Jamieson, were to advance the needed money, and White and Jamieson were to receive each one-twelfth of the net profits, without making any advance or incurring any risk. This agreement, by which they were to receive one-twelfth part of the profits, was in consideration of the fact that they had procured the Order in Council and forwarded the company's interests; and in virtue of the agreement, that they were to continue to assist and promote the interests of the company. It was a versatile company, not confining itself to its specific line, but intending to dabble in timber limits and coal lands as well. The hon. the Minister of Customs knew all about this arrangement. The company found that another river township would be valuable, and these gentlemen, in 1883, applied for an exchange, and obtained an Order in Council in the fall of 1883, whereby they got township 45, range 27, west of 2nd meridian in exchange for township 43 in the same range. That was a township on the Saskatchewan of extraordinary value. Mr. Jamieson was secretary of the company at $600 a year; the other shareholders advanced all the money necessary to pay to the Government its 20,000 odd dollars. The land grant was not surveyed at the date of the original application, and with the exception of township 45, which I have just mentioned, a survey of which was approved in December, 1882, no surveys were approved before the fall of 1883. The First Minister gave the dates of the approvals as follow:

Tp. 45a, R. 26, w. 2nd Mer., surveyed	season '83;	approved	18th Sept., '83
" 46a " 26 "	" "	May, '83	" 19th April, '84

The inspector of colonisation companies reported twenty-nine settlers on the tract, and I believe he reported also a church site on it. The company never did anything that I have been able to find out; the bulk of the twenty-nine settlers went in on township 45, range 27, west 2nd meridian, which is the river township to which I have referred. Its name is the parish of St. Louis de Langevin. Who is its patron saint? I hope the hon. Minister of Public Works will consider of its case. A church and a mission were established here, and the names of most of the settlers on the tract will be found on some of the petitions which I will have presently to read to the House, and on some still more melancholy lists afterwards. The company found the settlers there, and the settlers who hold these river lots held the key of the position. The company asked the Government, during the Session of 1884, to give them possession or to exchange for other vacant land, or to refund the money; but the Minister refused, saying the matter was in the company's hands, as they had the right and title to the land and could eject. In 1884, about the end of February, the company applied again for relief; they wanted their money back; the Minister refused, telling them they had the right and title to eject. They declined to eject, saying it would raise a rebellion, and the matter became more unsettled than ever. The agreement with the company and its title prevented the settlement by the Government of several claims of settlers on the tract, and amongst them are to be found several of the insurgents who fought in the different fights in the neighborhood of Batoche. Some of the settlers were in before 1880, some in 1881, some in 1882, and others in 1883 and 1884. This tract passes just behind that range of country which takes in Gabriel's Crossing, Batoche and St. Laurent. To the northward of that range the river takes a great curve, and this tract of territory, running just behind the river range, strikes the river to the northward, where is St. Louis de Langevin, and as far as I can judge from the map, it was across a portion of this company's tract that the march was made into Batoche, and it was over its lands that the fighting began and the guns were fired. According to Mr. Stephenson's report of last year, it is a very fine property indeed; the soil is choice, and its proximity to the river gives it peculiar advantages. So fine a property should never have been granted, and never would, I suppose, but for the special circumstances to which I have referred. Nor is this the only case in which grants were made on like conditions and understandings; for if you take the Shell River Colonisation Company, I believe you can find repeated there the earlier part of the history I have just given. Now, I turn to the question specially of the claims of the half-breeds to their holdings, and the claims, both of the whites and half-breeds, in respect of surveys, the claims particularly for river lot surveys and special surveys; and I must say the series of papers is so very defective that I counted myself about 30 palpable omissions in this series, but from what information we have can be gathered certain results that are tolerably plain. So long ago as June, 1873, it appears there was an interview on the part of Bishop Grandin with the First Minister and the Minister of Public Works; and in September, 1873, a letter was written by the bishop, following that interview, to the Governor General, an important letter, as I judge from the subsequent references; but I cannot say more of it than that, because, unfortunately, it is not brought down. The reply to that letter was through the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba, and that reply is not brought down. In June, 1874, Governor Morris encloses a statement of Mr. McKay, as to affairs in Prince Albert. In 1875 Bishop Grandin writes a long letter to the Minister of the Interior, in which he refers to the uneasiness of the half-breed people, their suspicion of the Government, and his efforts to disabuse their minds of the idea of leaving the country. In July, 1875, the Hon. Mr. Laird replied very fully to that letter. He referred to the experted legislation under the Territories Acts of 1874, and to the desire of the Government to deal justly by the people. In January, 1876, Bishop Grandin replied, stating the uneasiness and distrust had disappeared, and the Métis were settling down in the North-West Territories and had abandoned the plan a great many of them had formed of going across the lines. Major Walker writes, on the 29th of December, 1876, to Governor Laird, from Carlton, that many disputes about lands in and near Prince Albert had arisen, that a survey was necessary, and he recommended strongly a survey of St. Albert and St. Laurent, which are in the same position. This would save disputes and ill-feeling. In February, 1877, Governor Laird transmits that letter, saying the subject was one affecting the prosperity of the settlement, and hoping the labors of the special survey will be continued and points fixed. He adds that where settlements are along the bank of rivers, it is proper to adapt the surveys to the country, giving an average of ten to twenty chains frontage, the lots running back 160 acres, and that where settlements are along the river, the system of survey on Red and Assiniboine will have to be conceded.

He suggests that settlers should be allowed their frontages with depth enough to make 160 acres; that settlers before transfer should not be obliged to wait three years under Homestead Act, and that Battleford should be surveyed. The Surveyor General, in March 1877, reports on this letter as follows: 1st. The special survey is to be extended to the settlements on the Saskatchewan that season. 2nd. Where settlements are on rivers, it is proposed to adapt the survey to the locality, giving an average, where practicable, of ten or twenty chains frontage, lots running back 160 acres. 3rd. Relief should be given to old settlers, as to their patents, and legislation is needed for that purpose; and Battleford is to be surveyed next year. On the 26th March, 1877, Mr. Mills, Minister of Interior, writes to Governor Laird enclosing that report and endorsing its suggestions. About the beginning of 1878 there is a petition from 151 inhabitants of Prince Albert, stating that the settlement is growing, that land disputes are arising, and surveys are wanted; and, as to the river settlement, requesting a narrow frontage and a depth of two miles the same privilege as given to old settlers in Manitoba. In January, 1878, another petition was sent from Prince Albert for surveys; and, of course, I need hardly say that many of these claims were common to whites and half-breeds. It may be convenient here to point out that there were different plans of survey: first, the general plan; second, the special settlement and town site plan; and third, the river front plan, on the general system applicable to the locality, which was, as you will see, ten chains front by eighty chains in depth. On the 1st February, 1878, there was a public meeting of the settlers of St. Laurent, at which Gabriel Dumont was president and Alexander Fisher secretary, and amongst the resolutions presented in form of a petition was this one:

"That it is of urgent consequence that the Government should cause to be surveyed, with the least possible delay, the lands occupied and cultivated by the Métis and the other old settlers, and that the said lands should be granted to them."

They also asked for implements and seed grain, giving reasons for their poverty. On the 13th February, 1878, Governor Laird transmits this petition, saying:

"It is important that the land policy of the Government towards old settlers and others living for many years in the Territory should be declared. It appears to me that they have a claim to some more speedy means of acquiring a title for settlement purposes than the homestead provisions of the Dominion Lands Act. To prevent disputes between neighbors, it is highly desirable that the survey of lands settled upon along the principal rivers should be prosecuted with all convenient speed."

On the 13th March, 1878, these papers were referred to the Surveyor General for his report, and he reported thus:

"That it is intended that the several subjects affecting Dominion lands alluded to shall be discussed during Mr. L. Russell's visit to the Saskatchewan in the course of the ensuing season, the result of the discussion to be reported by Mr. Russell, with a view to legislation or other action."

And on the 18th March, 1878, the Minister of the Interior replied to Governor Laird:

"The propriety of passing an Act to secure for the half-breeds some more speedy means of acquiring a title for settlement purposes than under the provisions of the present homestead and Dominion lands law has for some time engaged my attention. As regards the application of the petitioners for an early survey of the settled lands along the principal rivers, I have to request you to inform the petitioners that the survey of such lands has already been carried out, to some extent, and will be prosecuted as rapidly as the funds at the disposal of the Department will permit."

In March, 1878, there was a petition of French Canadians and half-breeds of St. Albert, referring to the petition of St. Laurent, and alleging:

"That it is of the greatest importance that the Government cause to be surveyed, with as little delay as possible, the lands occupied and cultivated by the half-breeds or old residents of the country, and that patents for the said lands be granted to them."

That was transmitted on the 10th April by Mr. Laird, and during the seasons of 1877 and 1878 special surveys were made of Prince Albert and at St. Laurent. The Saskatchewan Herald, of the 25th August, 1878, contains this statement :

"Mr. Montague Aldous and Mr. J. L. Reid are engaged in surveying the old settlement belt. They take, as a starting point, the front corner post, agreed upon by the owners of the respective claims as being their boundary, from which a line is run north and south, giving each farm an average depth of two miles, with whatever frontage was originally claimed."

There is a report from Mr. Russell, which is not brought down, but which is frequently alluded to, in the year 1877, and which, from the allusions made to it, obviously contained detailed statements of the condition of the settlers of Prince Albert, and possibly of St. Laurent. There is also a detailed report of Mr. Aldous for 1878, which is not brought down, but is alluded to as if it contained such information. That was the condition of things in 1878, that the survey of the special settlement has been gone through, and the papers show that the survey of St. Laurent—not, of course, the whole neighborhood of St. Laurent, but of St. Laurent parish—the special survey—was approved by the Government in March, 1879, obviously, therefore, having been completed during the season of 1878. On the 30th November, 1878, land agent Duck writes to the Interior Department as to the Prince Albert settlement survey :

"I ask advice as to the amount of river frontage allowed individual settlers: that is, can I allow a settler to homestead and preempt two quarter sections, both having a river frontage?"

He goes on to say there are a large number of settlers anxious to make the necessary entries to secure themselves. The Department replied, on the 14th January, 1879 :

"The rule with respect to river front lots is that they are ten chains in width; one of these can be taken as a homestead claim and another as a preemption by the same person. In surveying the townships fronting on the Saskatchewan, all river lots will be posted in ten chains widths, with a depth back from the river of two miles. The departure from this rule that has been made in the case of the holdings of older settlers in Prince Albert and other places was made in view that the intention of the Government so to lay out the lands on the river had not been made generally known previous to their occupation. But, in the present and all future time, people are to understand that no one can hold, in any manner, more land on the river than I have above indicated, that is to say, twenty chains as homestead and preemption."

I wish you to mark this statement, given for the information of the people as to the general plan which was adopted with reference to the river lots. It was that each lot should be 10 chains by 80 chains, and that no one in future time could hold more than 10 chains as a homestead and 10 chains as a preemption :

"A petition was given me to lay before the Minister of this Department, from certain settlers eastward of the main Prince Albert settlement, to be permitted to retain their lands with the half mile width of frontage, in which manner they had taken up and occupied them. I have not yet succeeded in having this granted, although I have favorably recommended it, in view of the reason before stated, that in taking up the lands they did so in accordance with the published regulations of the Dominion Lands Act, setting forth the system of their survey. Should any enquiry be made of you by the parties interested, you may inform them that the matter is still in abeyance."

You will observe that we get no more information about that particular petition, but it is a petition of persons who had taken up their lots according to the general law, according to the quarter-section principle; and they said: Let us have them; but at that time the Government had a settled policy as to granting only river lots on rivers, and although the officer thought they ought to have them, having taken them up before the notice was given, he had been unable to obtain that concession for them; but the general principle is perfectly clearly stated. In the Dominion Lands Act of 1879, the 16th section, after declaring: "That nothing in this Act shall be construed to prevent the lands upon the Red and Assiniboine Rivers, surrendered by the Indians to the late Earl of Selkirk," from being surveyed, and so on, proceeds :

Mr. BLAKE.

"Or to prevent fractional sections or lands bordering on any river, lake or other watercourse, from being divided, or such lands from being laid out in lots of any certain frontage or depth, in such manner as may be desirable, or to prevent the sub-division of sections, or other legal sub-divisions, into wood lots, or from describing the said lands upon the Red and Assiniboine Rivers, or such sub-divisions of fractional sections or other lots, or wood lots, for patents, by numbers answering to a plan of record, or by metes and bounds, or by both, as may seem expedient."

So that that principle which I have read you as laid down by the Department was expressly authorised by the Dominion Lands Act, which created an exception in the case of lands bordering on rivers, giving to the Department power to survey them as might be deemed advisable. In 1879 Mr. W. F. King, who was in charge of a special survey, reports that he began work on the 19th June, and then he says :

"Having received no instructions on winter work, I left Lac la Biche on the 8th October."

The Saskatchewan Herald of the 3rd November, 1879, thus observes in regard to this :

"Mr. W. F. King, of the special survey, lately passed east on his way to Ottawa. It seems wasteful and injudicious, in view of the rapid extension of settlements westward and the urgent necessity that exists for laying out Indian reserves, to keep surveyors tramping up and down from Ottawa half across the continent every year, causing the loss of the best working part of the season. There are many kinds of work that could, at a very trifling expense, be done as well in winter as in summer. In coming from Ottawa to Edmonton district, a party just gets nicely settled to work when it is time to start home. Supplies cannot be furnished here cheaper than they can be freighted out by the Government."

On the 5th July, 1880, the Saskatchewan Herald further observes, on the mode of conducting the surveys :

"If no party can be despatched from Ottawa this season in time to do the work, it might be entrusted to some of the special survey staff who will be wintering in the country. Every consideration of progress favors the encouragement of settlement to that point elected by the people; but when the impulse of the people agrees with the plans of the Government, it is difficult to find a reason why the neighborhood should not be surveyed at the earliest possible moment."

About this time, in the year 1880, certain inhabitants of Prince Albert petitioned, and in their petition they asked :

"The same consideration as is extended to settlers on river lots in Manitoba and the North-West Territories, and to other settlers on the Saskatchewan; saying that some have improved in 1874, some in 1879, and some in the present year; and asking for a speedy survey of 2 chains front and 80 chains depth, as others hereabouts."

On the 27th September, 1880, the Saskatchewan Herald says :

"The Government has ordered the survey of a quantity of land in the Carrot River country, so as to have it ready for the expected emigration next year. It is wise policy to afford every facility to incoming settlers at the points on which public attention is centreing; and the principle might be advantageously extended so as to take in those settlements in the west whose chief drawback is that they are not surveyed, and where, for that reason, extensive and permanent improvements are kept back. The land at Prince Albert, St. Laurent, Carlton and Duck Lake has been surveyed for some years; much has been taken up by settlers squatting upon it; yet the land office at Prince Albert has not been opened for the receipt of applications for homesteads, to the great detriment of these settlements. The survey of the town site of Battleford, and of a few townships around it and Edmonton, would contribute, in no small degree, to the benefit of the country at large, by providing on the spot much of the supplies required for the Mounted Police and the Indians."

On the 15th September, 1880, the Saskatchewan Herald contains a description of the handsome shop just finished by Batoche, at Batoche's ferry, and it states that :

"Crops at Duck Lake are generally of the most satisfactory character and the settlement is progressing rapidly. Most of the lots are taken up. Great inconvenience and no small amount of unpleasantness among neighbors are due to the impossibility of making the homestead entries, although the land has been surveyed for some years. Steam grist and saw mill, and steam threshing mill, just brought in."

Now, Sir, I would like, had I the time and strength, here to tell you the story of the Battleford surveys. It is really a most interesting episode, for it indicates the character of the dealings of the Department; but I pass it by, and proceed to deal with the question of the half-breeds at Duck Lake and vicinity. In June, 1881, a petition was presented by Rev. Father André to the Lieutenant Governor in Council, which is as follows:—

"In presenting this petition to your hon. body, allow me to observe that I came to Battleford, urged not only by my own grievance, but by the entreaties of the half-breed population about Duck Lake and St. Laurent, and they joined their earnest prayers to mine to call your special attention to the unsatisfactory state of the land question in the country. Disputes and difficulties are continually arising touching the limits and rights of property of landholders in the country, and there is no proper authority to settle these questions, however, conducive to the peace and tranquillity of the country. The land has almost entirely been surveyed in the electoral district of Lorne for now over two years, and a land office has been in existence in Prince Albert for nearly four years; but as the land agent is not authorised to enter claims or to issue patents, the settlers have no way to secure the lands they hold in possession, and which they have improved through considerable expense and exertion."

Then there is a reference to the judicial difficulties. He goes on:

"I beg your indulgence to be obliged to make you acquainted with a grievance of mine which, however, may give you an idea of the state of things calling for a prompt remedy. I hold at Duck Lake a tract of land of about twenty acres, of which I have been in peaceful possession for two years. The land was fenced in and cost me a great deal of money, and was always respected as the Catholic mission's property at that lake. I was one of the first settlers at that place, and through my exertions the settlement increased rapidly, and nobody ever troubled me in my lawful possession of that land, until last March, when a man by the name of J. Kelly jumped my claim, and notwithstanding my protestations, claimed the land as his own, and took the frame of a house upon it, depriving me, in that manner, of half my property. And this is not the only occurrence of the kind at that lake."

"As your honourable body is now assembled at Battleford to legislate upon such measures as will, in your prudence and wisdom, be more suitable to promote the good and welfare of this country, allow me to call upon you to use all your influence and authority to draw the attention of the Government, at Ottawa upon this state of things, and to urge upon them the necessity of taking such prompt measure as will relieve the people of the burden of this grievance, because if not promptly attended to, things may become grave and serious. Wishing the best success to your good will to promote the welfare of the country, and so forth."

At the same time there was a petition from Mr. Clarke from Prince Albert, 1881, asking for the opening of the land office. On the 14th of June the Lieutenant Governor transmits these two petitions, and uses this language:

"Apart from the representations in the memorials in question, I am aware that serious disputes are arising in the Prince Albert, St. Laurent and Duck Lake settlements, regarding claims to land, and I would therefore respectfully urge that in so far as it may be consistent with the policy of the Dominion Government the prayer of the memorials may receive early consideration."

At last, upon the pressure of these memorials, after an interval of two years after the appointment of an agent and more than two years after a portion of the survey, the office was ordered to be opened, and in August, 1881, it was opened. On the 11th March, 1882, Mr. Duck, the land agent, writes:

"Sir,—As the majority of the settlers on the south branch of the River Saskatchewan, in the vicinity of the parish of St. Laurent, have taken up their lands previous to the survey, with narrow frontages, similar to those river claims in other parts of this district, and in view of the difficulty likely to be experienced in this office in adjusting the boundaries of these claims in accordance with the sectional survey, I have at the request of several of the settlers so situated, the honor to request information as to the possibility of re-surveying these sections into river lots on a similar plan to that adopted on the Prince Albert settlement, none of these claims having as yet been entered in this office."

Now, then, the office was opened, as I have said, in August, 1881. No claims had been entered in March, 1882, and the settlers brought forward this request. I have shown you the policy of the Government, as stated in 1879, with reference to river lots on the Saskatchewan. A section survey was made of part of the St. Laurent settlement—I do not speak of the special survey on the river in the neighborhood of St. Laurent; settlers had taken their lots, according to the recognised custom, in the narrow frontages, but without survey at all, and they called for a survey according to the old custom and the system which had been recognised in 1879. Now, Sir, it took seven months and a-half to answer that letter. On the 21st of October, 1882, the secretary writes acknowledging the receipt of the letter of the 11th March previous, and says:

"I have to inform you that it is not the intention of the Government to cause any re-surveys to be made. Of course, any sub-division differing from the regular survey which they may desire they can procure for themselves, when the lands come into their possession. You will please, therefore, communicate this decision to the persons interested."

I need hardly say that the lands might never come into their possession according to that plan, because, as the surveys were township surveys, disregarding the river altogether, it was, in no case, possible to know the numbers, or to adjust the frontages, depths, or improvements, and the rear lots might be taken up by other persons. On the 4th September, 1882, a petition was forwarded from St. Antoine de Padoue to Sir John A. Macdonald, Minister of the Interior, which contained signatures of persons, of whom the great bulk were subsequently insurgents. St. Antoine de Padoue is a parish south of St. Laurent, and the church is at Batoche, which is mentioned as having been shelled in the engagement. The petition, which is in French, is as follows, being translated into English:

"ST. ANTOINE DE PADOUE,

"SOUTH BRANCH OF THE SASKATCHEWAN,

"4th September, 1884.

"To the Right Honorable Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD,
"Minister of the Interior, Ottawa.

"Sir,—We, the undersigned French half-breeds, for the most part, settled on the Saskatchewan, in the district of Prince Albert, North-West Territory, approach your honorable person in this petition to expose with confidence the difficult position in which we find ourselves, with regard to the lands which we occupy in that portion of the Territory. We call the attention of the Government upon this matter, which preoccupies us greatly:

"Obliged, most of us, to abandon the prairies, which no longer can furnish us with means of living, we have come in great numbers during the course of the summer, and settled along the south branch of the Saskatchewan. Being satisfied with the soil and the country, we have gone actively to work to clear the land, with the hope of sowing next spring, and, in the meantime, to build up houses for the winter, which will soon be at hand. The surveyed lands being already occupied or sold, we were forced to occupy lands which are not yet surveyed, besides being ignorant, for the greatest part, of the rules and the regulations of the Government regarding the Dominion lands. What was not, therefore, our astonishment and anxiety when we were told that once the land is surveyed we shall be obliged to pay two dollars per acre to the Government, if our lands are comprised in the odd-numbered sections. Desirous, moreover, of living together, so as to be able to obtain more easily a school-house and a church, we are, Monsieur the Minister, poor people, who have not the means of paying the price of those lands without being totally ruined, if we lose result of our labors by allowing them to pass into the hands of strangers, who shall go to the land office at Prince Albert and pay the price stipulated by the Government."

"In our anxiety, we appeal to your spirit of justice as Minister of the Interior and leader of the Government and we implore you to at once reassure us by giving orders so that we shall not be troubled on our lands, and that the Government will grant us the privilege of considering us as occupants of even sections, since we occupy those lands in good faith; and having occupied this country since such a long time as masters, and having so often defended it against the Indians at the price of our blood, we think that it is not asking too much that the Government give us the right of occupying peacefully our lands, and that it should make some exceptions to its regulations, by granting gratuitously lands to the North West half-breeds. We further desire that Government should give orders to have the lands surveyed along the river ten chains wide by two miles long: it is the old custom of this country to distribute land in this manner, and thus it would enable us to recognise the limits of our respective lands."

Monsieur the Minister; we hope that you will favorably receive this petition which we send you, and that we shall know your decision as soon as possible. This is our anxious wish, while praying the Almighty to protect you and to keep you at the head of this great country of Canada, which you govern with so much wisdom.

"We have the honor to remain, Monsieur the Minister, your humble petitioners:—Gabriel Dumont (wounded); Baptiste Rochlot (prisoner); Patrice Touron (prisoner); Calixte Touron (killed); François Touron (prisoner); Joseph Vandale (killed); Joseph Delorme (killed); Baptiste Vandale (prisoner); Adolphe Nolin (prisoner); Ignace Poitras (prisoner); Maxime Poitras (prisoner); Emmanuel Champagne (prisoner) and others.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. Walter Shanly, member elect for the electoral district of South Grenville, was introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald and Mr. Hickey, and took his seat.

NORTH-WEST TROUBLES.

Mr. BLAKE. That letter was not so long unanswered. On the 13th October, 1882, it is acknowledged by the Deputy Minister of the Interior, addressed to Mr. Charles Nolin, St. Antoine de Padoue, south branch of the Saskatchewan, as follows:—

"In reply, I am directed to request you to inform the petitioners that when the proper time arrives the case of each bona fide settler will be dealt with on its own merits; but as regards the surveying of the land in question, that all lands in the North-West Territories will be surveyed according to the system now in force."

So you will observe, Sir, that so far as regards their difficulty with respect to the odd lots, no redress is suggested, and as regards surveys, they are told that the section survey is to be the only survey for them. On the 16th January, 1883, Rev. Father André, Superior of St. Laurent, North-West Territories, wrote to the Minister of the Interior, Sir John A. Macdonald, as follows:—

"I write you for the purpose of calling your attention to the painfully embarrassing position in which the French half-breeds settled on the southerly banks of the Saskatchewan are placed.

"According to an old custom in Manitoba, they took up their lots 10 chains wide in front, by two miles in depth, trusting that the Government, acting on the rule already established, would survey these lands into lots 10 chains in width by two miles in depth. Their surprise may be imagined when they saw the land along the Saskatchewan measured off into squares of 40 chains, without heed being given to their just claims and protests. What is the result of this abnormal division? Our half-breeds are overwhelmed with difficulties on account of their lands, and this proceeding will now sow discord among our people and will render the Government odious in their eyes, considering it as guilty of a gross injustice towards them. This survey lamentably mixes things. Some lose their lands, which are being grabbed by their neighbors, others see the fruits of their industry and their improvements dissipated. This unhappy state of things could be easily made to cease, by giving ear to their just claims; and how can this be refused them when you granted a similar favor to Prince Albert. All the lands along the branches of the Saskatchewan have been surveyed in this manner. Every body was satisfied, and not the least complaint was heard about the survey. I cannot understand, Sir, why your surveyors should have two different methods of parcelling the public domain—one for Prince Albert, 10 chains in width by 2 miles in length, which we approve, and which we claim as a right, seeing you have granted it for Prince Albert—the other of blocking out the lands in squares of 40 chains, without taking the river or the location of the settlers into consideration. The latter method we protest solemnly against, all of us, and humbly pray, Sir, that you order a new survey, and thus validate our request. Already the people of this colony have addressed to you a petition on this subject, but the answer given under your directions is not one calculated to inspire them with the hope that you would right the wrong of what they complain. Knowing the difficult situation in which our people are placed, I have resolved to make another effort, which I trust will bring happy results, and I dare to hope that you will accede to their just requests, and no later than next summer order a new survey of the lands on the south branch of the Saskatchewan. By your kind concurrence in this matter you will do an act of justice to our people, and render them a service for which they will ever be thankful."

No acknowledgement of or answer to that letter is brought down. The petition of the settlers of Prince Albert of 1882-83 contains the following:—

"And whereas a great number of immigrants, not only from the older Provinces of the Dominion, but from Great Britain as well, came to this section of the country during last spring and summer, with the intention of taking up homesteads, but in consequence of the small tract of country that has been surveyed, all of which has been taken up, they went away."

The petition continues:

"We would urge on your hon. House the importance of having a portion of the wood lands lying to the north of the north branch of the Saskatchewan, and opposite Prince Albert, surveyed into wood lots, so that your petitioners and other settlers may receive at your hands their just allotment, as these lands are being rapidly depleted by those who are not actual settlers, and who have not the welfare of this country at heart."

I pointed out, in my speech on the motion for papers:

"There are about 3,000 farmers in this settlement, and there is said—although the district contains a good deal of good land—to be considerable poor land; and there being only a small amount of land surveyed and properly certified at the Department, it was found impossible to locate upon lands with any certain knowledge of whether they were within odd or even-numbered sections."

Mr. BLAKE.

The First Minister, in answering me, on that occasion, said:

"Similar complaints are made in every new settlement by persons who are anxious to have the country opened to them and surveyed, and patents granted. No matter whether it is in an outlying district, or in the vicinity of more settled parts, they are anxious to have all the advantages of an old, well organised, well settled country. One reason of the delays at Prince Albert has been alluded to by my hon. friend, that is the nature of the surveys. The settlers are scattered along the North Saskatchewan for a great distance. Some of them have complained that they should have long, narrow strips of land, running back three or four miles into the country, such as we were obliged to grant to the settlers along the Red River and Assiniboine River, for the purpose of settling all the disputes that existed in that country. It is not proposed in any way to carry out the same system in Prince Albert. The general system of survey in the North-West has been applied to the Prince Albert district, and, of course, the lines as run will not in every distance form the boundaries of the different sections or quarter-sections which the settlers have taken up, without reference to any survey whatever. But no persons have been removed or ousted. There must be a system of give and take. The survey there has been going on, and the proper officer has been sent there for the purpose of confirming settlers who have bona fide claims according to law. Many cases must arise of settlers going in and taking up fancy spots; and some system must be arranged by which the system of survey shall be adhered to, and the settlers substantially protected at the same time."

Then, with reference to the question of delays in the surveys, the hon. gentleman also stated:

"The Department cannot pretend to survey at once, at the call of a body of settlers, who go and settle wherever they please in the outlying districts of that vast country, whenever called upon or where people want their farms marked out. The returns laid before Parliament during the past three years show how very active the Surveyor General's branch of the Department of the Interior has been in laying out townships. Some three or four hundred townships have been laid out during the past year. Every Dominion surveyor who has passed the examination and can be got, we are only too glad to employ and send up to the North-West. Of course, the first surveys were made in the vicinity of the Red River, and extended westward, and the main force of the surveyors has been employed on the line of the Pacific Railway westward. But surveys have been going on at the same time in other portions of the country—at Prince Albert, at Edmonton, and at other points, and along the boundary south of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Government intend to ask Parliament to give them a large grant for surveying next season. With the increasing number of applications from surveyors, and increasing experience, we hope that the present year will show a very much larger reach of country surveyed than has been covered in any previous year. I hope that perhaps five or six hundred townships will be under survey during the year 1883. If we have a favorable season for the purpose, we expect to be able to cover that quantity of ground. Last year and the year before, the weather in the spring of the year was adverse, and in some portions of the country to be surveyed it was found impossible for the surveyors to get in until well on in the summer. We hope those were abnormal conditions. We have a large staff, and with a long summer we ought to be able this year to cover a great quantity of ground. There will be no objection to the granting of this motion."

Now, I want to call attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman seemed to treat the case of these people as if it were a new and a remote settlement. But it was one of the oldest settlements of the Territories. The people had gone in early; more people were going in year by year; they were exposed to great hardship and disappointment, and special encouragement should have been given to them, instead of engaging in the mad race of surveying so many millions of acres, upon which a single settler has not yet gone. I admit that great attention should be given to opening up the country for settlement, but I say a little more attention should have been given to enabling those to get on who are actually in. Now, Sir, in the same years of 1882 and 1883, there was going on that trouble which commenced in the fall of 1882, with reference to St. Albert and Edmonton and Saskatchewan, that to which I already alluded on the subject of surveys. On this question, important as it is, nothing at all has been brought down; but from other sources I have been able to gather some unofficial information, which will not be uninteresting to the House, and will throw some light upon the question. In October, 1882, some surveyors sent out by the Government were already engaged in the surveys at St. Albert, on Sturgeon River, a tributary of the Saskatchewan, and on the Saskatchewan. For the more perfect understanding of the facts, they applied for the assistance of the missionary in charge of the place, to give notice to the people of Prince Albert that they did not wish to imply, by adopting the general system of survey, that the rights of the settlers to a subsequent special survey would not be recognised. They said, through him, that the people need not be annoyed at seeing them drawing lines from north and south and east to west through their lands and properties. According to them, it was a simple matter of form, and the means of continuing more easily the survey, by way of townships, once out of the settlement; and after they were gone a special surveyor, then employed at Edmonton, would come to St. Albert to make the special survey. Some weeks later that surveyor commenced his work. The people were contented; things were going for the best, when there arrived from Ottawa an order to cease the work, with a notice to the settlers of St. Albert that they must be satisfied with the general survey. No such order or notice has been brought down. This unjust order was no sooner known than the discontent of the settlers was at its height. Who would uphold their rights? Who would prevent the ruin of the settlement? Their thoughts went, naturally, towards the mission. His Lordship the Bishop being absent, the missionary at once despatched a messenger to Edmonton, with the following despatch to the telegraph office:—

“To His Lordship Bishop Grandin, Ottawa,

“Survey by township impossible for St. Albert. It will ruin the settlement. General discontent. See immediately the Minister of the Interior.”

Here I may observe that we have no information brought down to us as to the time when, and the circumstances under which, the Government altered that policy which I have pointed out as to the surveys of these lands. Unfortunately, the telegraphic line was out of order; the despatch was nearly 15 days before reaching its destination, and under these circumstances it was thought well that the situation should be made known, and the following notice was sent to the journal of the locality:—

“The colony of St. Albert is to-day in a state of real excitement, and is very discontented at the unjust manner in which it seems to be treated. The inhabitants of this colony have occupied their lands many years already, and most of them even before the annexation of these Territories to Canada. St. Albert was founded in 1860 by the Catholic mission, which immediately gathered around itself a considerable number of inhabitants. To-day about two hundred families are established on both sides of the Sturgeon River, in a radius of six or eight miles to the east, and six miles to the west. These families are mostly half-breeds, born and brought up in that country, which is certainly theirs by every title; they have incontestable rights to the land, rights which have been conceded by the Manitoba Act. New settlers amongst us have bought lands occupied long before the annexation to Canada. We certainly form the most ancient, and, up to the present time, the most numerous colony of the district, and now they seem to act as if we did not exist. They try to treat us as they tried to treat the people of Manitoba before the troubles of 1870. They will not recognise our right to have a river survey; we must content ourselves, they say, with a township survey. Such an arrangement is at once unjust and absurd, for it would be the ruin of the colony. There is not one of the old settlers who would not witness the partial or total loss of his labors or his improvements; in many cases two, three or four families would find themselves on the same half or the same quarter-section, since, in the system of survey, they wish to impose upon us, the river does not form a limit. Our population is peaceful, calm and submissive; but if it were the victim of such an injustice, if the inhabitants were to be treated as a conquered people, if they were not to receive, in the name of justice, what has been granted to Edmonton, Prince Albert and in the Province of Manitoba, they would protest and would submit only to open force.

“In the name and in the interest of the population of St. Albert.

“H. LEDUC, Priest.”

“Two or three weeks elapsed while they were waiting for a despatch from Ottawa. Finally, doubting as to whether the despatch had been transmitted to Bishop Grandin at the capital, doubting still more whether justice would be obtained from the Minister of the Interior, fearing matters would go from bad to worse, the inhabitants of the country resolved to hold a public meeting in the schoolhouse at St. Albert, on Monday, the 8th January. At the day and hour fixed, all the male population of the colony gathered at the appointed place. Everybody appeared, much excited and discontented, and the topic of all conversations was the survey of lands, the injustice that the Government was about to perpetrate, in refusing to acknowledge the rights of the settlers, the hardships, the fatigues, the difficulties sustained by them in clearing, cultivating and improving their lands, etc. Some spoke of nothing less than imitating the conduct of the Manitoba half-breeds in 1870, and repelling the injustice by arms. Under these circumstances, Father Lestanc providentially arrived from Battleford, at St. Albert. When the population was assembled in the school-house, the object of the meeting was announced. The necessity of doing nothing that might compromise the cause of the colony was pointed out, but at the same time the urgency of taking every legal means to enlighten the Government on the situation and the injustice with which they were threatened. The meeting appointed a president, and Father Lestanc was called to the office of secretary. The discussion became lively at once; each one pleaded for his rights, expressed his cause of complaints and of discontent, and the best and most effective means to be taken were discussed. Finally, the conclusion, which seemed the most likely to obtain the desired object, was reached—to obtain prompt and entire justice. It was decided that the population should send a delegation of two members to the Government at Ottawa.”

And Mr. Maloney, the president of the meeting, and Father Leduc, were chosen as delegates, and, as I said, the sum of $600 was subscribed to pay their expenses. This letter was written to them:

“To Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney:

“GENTLEMEN,—The committee appointed by the inhabitants of St. Albert, at a public meeting at Edmonton and Fort Saskatchewan, request you to start and go to Ottawa, in order to inform the Government of Canada of the causes of our complaints, as they are set out in the annexed documents.”

But these documents have not been brought down:

“We do not doubt that it is owing to a want of reliable information that the Government seems ready to do us a great injustice. We are certain that the Hon. Sir John Macdonald, Minister of the Interior, is disposed to render full justice to all the subjects of Her Majesty, our gracious Sovereign. We are equally convinced that he will recognise the same rights and privileges to us as those recently conceded to the ancient colony of Prince Albert, and that he will favorably receive your demands. We rely, gentlemen, on your zeal and your devotion to our common cause. You will know how to lay it before the Government and defend it, and we hope for the complete success of your delegation.

“Signed on behalf of the committee,

“W. CUST, President.

“SAM. CUNNINGHAM, Secretary.”

Shortly afterwards these gentlemen started on their long and painful journey. On their way they stopped at Fort Saskatchewan for a day, where the inhabitants gathered, and added a contribution of $100 towards the expenses of the mission. After twenty-four days' travel through the prairies and woods, they reached Qu'Appelle station. They stopped a little while at Winnipeg, where they received the advice and suggestions of Archbishop Taché, as to the conduct of their mission. Ultimately they reached Ottawa, and they found there Bishop Grandin, who had been engaged in the discharge of his duties, of which, as I said, I have but a very meagre account. They explained that Bishop Grandin had received good promises, fine promises, but they say:

“It needs more than promises or words—verba volant—acts and authentic writings are necessary—scripta manent.”

They had many discussions with the Minister, and having received from him, as to their own demands, some favorable answers, they requested these also to be written, saying:

“Mais en fin de compte nous n'avons encore que de l'eau bénite de cour. Il faut battre le fer quand il est chaud.”

And the Minister having told them that if they would send in a written statement they would get a written answer, they sent in a letter, which the Government have not brought down, but which, notwithstanding, I will take the liberty to read:

“To the Hon. D. L. Macpherson, Acting Minister of the Interior, at Ottawa.

“SIR,—We, the undersigned, delegates of the inhabitants of St. Albert, Edmonton and Fort Saskatchewan, appointed by them to come to Ottawa to set forth their demands and their complaints to the Government of Canada, have the honor to address to you the enclosed memorandum, summarily indicating the said complaints and demands.

“In the interview which you had the kindness to grant to us on the 7th instant, you have favorably listened to our requests, and we have been happy to learn that full and entire satisfaction would be given by the Government to the population that we represent.

"We would now be extremely obliged if this assurance were given us in writing.

"(Signed),            "H. LEDUC, Priest.
                              " P. MALONEY.

This memorandum, which is enclosed, and which, though not brought down, I will also read, is addressed to the Acting Minister of the Interior (Sir David Macpherson) :

"The inhabitants of St. Albert, in the Territories of the North-West, pray the Government of the day to be good enough to take into consideration the establishment by them of a large and flourishing colony on the Sturgeon River, 9 miles from Edmonton, in the district of Alberta, North-West Territories. In 1861 His Grace Archbishop Tache, chose this locality for the founding of a Catholic mission, and the next year buildings were erected and numerous settlers established themselves at the mission. Some years later many families had settled there, and had chosen land and cultivated it. At the period of annexation to Canada St. Albert had a population of over 900 souls. Though twice decimated by small-pox in 1870, the colony became even more flourishing than before. New settlers arrived, and either took up land or bought land already occupied, and St. Albert is more prosperous than ever. The settlers waited patiently a special survey of their lands, in the hope that their rights would be recognised; and thus things stood when, in December last, they were told that they would have to content themselves with the township survey. Such a survey would be nothing short of the ruin and destruction of the colony established on each side of the river and on the banks of the lake. In order to be nearer the church and the school the settlers had built close to each other, taking narrow strips of land, but claiming always two miles in depth, as has been allowed in Manitoba and at Prince Albert. If it is intended now to compel them to be governed by the general system of survey, they will find themselves 7, 8, 9 or 10 on the same section; they will lose the fruit of their labors and improvements, and will be thrown into complete disorder. That is why the inhabitants of St. Albert ask, through the medium of their delegates, the Government of the Dominion to grant them a river survey, with two miles in depth, as in Manitoba and at Prince Albert. Having occupied their lands for a long time, even before the annexation of the Territories to Canada, they demand the acknowledgment of their rights and the issue of letters patent. The settlers of St. Albert, Edmonton, and of Fort Saskatchewan, beg that the river survey be extended from Edmonton to Fort Saskatchewan, inclusive; there, also, with two miles of depth from the banks of the river, as has been conceded on Red River and the Assiniboine. In case the land comprised within these two miles of depth, has been already occupied in good faith by some settlers before the survey, then let a mile only in depth be granted; but with the privilege of taking elsewhere a preemption of 160 acres of the lands of the Government."

Then they asked also for the immediate opening of a land office, and the early issue of the patents, and they asked that all lands occupied in good faith before the survey was made, and before it was possible to know whether it would be surveyed or not, should be recognised as the property of the occupant, and that none of the first occupants should be obliged to pay more than would have been exacted by the land board at the moment they took possession, and that the subsequent laws relative to preemption and occupation should not have a retroactive effect. They asked for representation in the Commons, and lastly made a demand with reference to the unextinguished Indian title, which I read in dealing with that portion of the case. There were three weeks of expectation after this memorandum went before the Minister, without a new interview being had. They then went, accompanied by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) and the hon. the Minister of Militia (Mr. Caron), to ask a written reply to all their demands and petitions. They were assured anew that they would be entirely satisfied; that the Government was actively engaged with the business of the delegation; that the work of framing the reply was going on and would be soon completed, and that the reply would be, in a few days, addressed to them. Subsequently, they learnt, from Mr. Royal, that the thing was going on according to their wish, slowly but surely. During this time Bishop Grandin had worked without ceasing for the success of his mission and that of the delegates. Then follow some general statements as to Bishop Grandin's success on matters more particularly affecting the interests of the church and education, but I have not the statement of what Bishop Grandin accomplished with reference to the matters now in hand. These are still in the pigeon holes. Then there was a very long interview with the First Minister. All the petitions were examined and discussed, and although all were not granted, the most important were not rejected. The paper then proceeds to say that all this business was done by word of mouth, but that His Grace the Archbishop would not leave until he had the authentic document signed by the proper party. If I am rightly informed, he had to leave on the promise that the document would reach him at Winnipeg, but I have not learned that he ever got it. It is not brought down. The result of the mission of these people, Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney, as stated to me, is this :

"A special river survey is granted; lands occupied or possessed before the annexation of the North-West to the Dominion will be recognised by the Government; the survey will extend two miles back, starting from the river; those who had established themselves before the survey on lands that are now reserved will not be troubled in their settlement; a land office will be opened at Edmonton, and a registration office is also granted; a French magistrate or a judge will be named; the House is now occupied with the question of the Métis."

But although these gentlemen were urgently claiming a writing and pointing out the importance of it, and although in subsequent papers it appears to be stated they did get their writing, that writing is not brought down, and I am not able to read it to you. You see by these statements that the result, as far as the people of St. Albert and Edmonton and of Fort Saskatchewan were concerned, if the information which I have is trustworthy, was that the decision and determination of the Government to depart, as far as the River Saskatchewan was concerned, from their old river survey plan and to stick to the township lots, had to be altered, owing to the pressure that they had to yield, and that they did concede to the extent I have mentioned. The question is, whether having conceded, as far as these people were concerned, on the north bank of the Saskatchewan, they ought not to have acceded also, as far as those of the south branch were concerned, who had complained earlier, were complaining still, and to whom it was a very serious question. Upon that subject a little light is shown by the general report of Mr. Pearce, their officer, on the 12th of March, 1885, with reference to the settlement of claims, in which he said :

"From correspondence in the files sent to me, it appears that it was the intention of the Government, as late as the spring of 1883, to re-survey into river lots the portion of land settled on by these half-breeds at St. Laurent."

But no such papers are brought down, and we are therefore in the dark as to the foundation of that observation of Mr. Pearce, reliable as it must be. Then, on the 19th September, 1883, Mr. Pearce writes from the Land Commissioner's office at Winnipeg, as follows:—

"Sir,—During my recent visit to Prince Albert I learned that portions of land had been held by French half-breeds, for the most part, for many years, without entry having been obtained, although two years had already elapsed since the townships became open for entry.

"I instructed the agent to detail his assistant, who is conversant with the French language, to make an inspection of these lands, and to inform the settlers of the necessity of making their entries immediately

"The agent had been taking some of these entries lately and, at the same time, receiving the applications and recommending for patent. As mentioned in another communication, the Land Act does not permit such a course, unless entries are made within three months of date of land being open for entry.

"I consequently instructed him to discontinue the practice, until specially informed on the matter."

There crops out again with special reference to the half-breeds, the difficulty created by the unfortunate Order of 1879, to which I have already made some reference, under which, on a misapprehension, the settlers were informed that their old settlement would not count, and that they were practically precluded from any benefit of that settlement, and, so did not enter; but here, as I would judge, the abstention from entering these lands was in part due to the circumstance of the demand for the re-survey into river lots. In October, 1883, the North-West Council memorialised the Government on the subject :

"Your memorialists also pray for more extended surveys in the country of the North Saskatchewan; that the special settlement survey in the South Saskatchewan, in the parish of St. Antoine, made by Mr. Aldous, D. L. S., be approved; and that the land agent at Prince Albert be instructed to receive entries for such lands; that the land in the parish of Grandin, St. Laurent and St. Louis, and fronting on the South Saskatchewan, be surveyed in ten chain lots, it being occupied by settlers in this manner."

These are the townships on the scene in question. That was despatched on the 9th October, 1883, and referred by the Privy Council to the President of the Council and the Minister of the Interior, on the 18th October, 1883, but nothing, so far as we can find, came of that reference. Nothing is brought down. In October, 1883, there was a mass meeting of the inhabitants of Prince Albert, at which over 150 were present, and the 4th resolution endorsed the recent memorial of the North-West Council, embracing, among other things, this:

"Insisting on the necessity of more surveys in the North Saskatchewan district."

The 5th resolution referred to a question of wood lots:

"That this meeting has heard with alarm that the lands on the north side of the Saskatchewan River, immediately opposite the town of Prince Albert, which it had been understood would be laid off as wood lots for the use of the settlers, and which, for some time, have been reserved for unknown purposes, are now being surveyed and sub-divided into townships and sections, it is said either for settlement or railway reserves—the effect of which will be to deprive the settlers of the means of obtaining wood for domestic purposes except from a great distance and at a great expense."

But nothing is brought down. And a copy was ordered to be sent to Sir John A. Macdonald. On the 19th November, 1883, a petition was sent, signed by 31 persons from St. Louis de Langevin—that is the parish on the river front of which the lands of the Prince Albert Colonisation Company are situated—to Mr. Duck, in these words:—

"Sir,—The undersigned farmers, residing in the parish of St. Louis de Langevin, on the south branch of the Saskatchewan, have the honor to make you the following recital of their wrongs, with regard to the lands which they occupy.

"Several amongst us are here since the years 1873-74, and '75; others, more numerous, since 1880. We have all of us taken possession of our lands, according to the mode formerly followed on the Red River and Assiniboine lands, to wit: river lots.

"In the fall of 1880 we petitioned the Minister of the Interior at Ottawa to grant us a special survey in river lots, such as was granted to the Prince Albert settlement and to part of that of St. Laurent. We all of us have signed the said petition, not excepting Mr. Michel Canny, who has since entered his land at your office in a square lot, and against whose act we strongly protest by these presents."

I have not seen this petition, which they say they sent in 1880. It is not brought down:

"Since then we have sent new petitions for the same object at different times, supporting our case with the influence of all the persons of high standing who took an interest in us, as Mr. Joseph Royal, M.P., S. H. Macdowall, M.C., N. O. L. Clarke, S.G., His Lordship Bishop Grandin, and the Rev. Father Leduc.

"Finally, last spring, the Rev. Father Leduc, who had been sent as delegate to Ottawa by the populations of Edmonton and of St. Albert, showed us the answer of the Government, which promised a special survey for all the inhabited lands of the Saskatchewan. Since then we have been waiting in vain."

We want to see that letter that Father Leduc showed these people. But it is not brought down.

"As we have said at the beginning, several amongst us have occupied their lands long enough to have a right to a patent, and I nevertheless it is impossible to have them even entered at your office.

"We therefore humbly beg you to communicate to the Government which you represent the wrongs which are partly indicated above, and to beg it to put an end to them as quickly as possible, for the greater welfare and tranquillity of the loyal subjects of Her Majesty the Queen of England, the undersigned.

"Your very humble servants."

There are thirty-one signatures to that petition, of whom sixteen were on the colonisation company's tract. On the 9th December, 1883, Mr. Louis Schmidt and Mr. Baptiste Boucher, who was one of those wounded in the fights, addressed a letter to Mr. Duck, with reference to this petition saying:

"Since the annexed petition has been made and signed, some circumstances well calculated to redouble the anxiety which we already felt with regard to our lands, have taken place. To our knowledge, a certain Thos. Salter has again gone and entered a quarter of a section of land at your office, and this parcel of land, situated three-quarters of a mile from the river, was already taken as part of the river lot, with work done upon it on the river shore. We regret that the Government has not communicated to you their intention to grant river lots, so that you might thus enter at your office the lands comprised in the river lots. We hope that you will make your Government understand the true position in which we are placed, so that it may put a stop to it."

So that the petition reached Mr. Duck with this added circumstance of difficulty, and among the signers were Maxime Lépine, a prisoner; Baptiste Boucher, wounded; Isidore Dumas, killed; Charles Lavallée, wounded; William Swain, wounded, in the recent engagements. This petition and letter were enclosed to the Department on the 17th December, 1883, by Mr. Duck, who says:

"I have the honor to enclose herewith file No. 924 of this office, covering a letter from Mr. Louis Schmidt and others, as also a petition signed by a number of the inhabitants of the parish of Louis de Langevin, praying for a re-survey of the lands on the River Saskatchewan, within the parish into lots of ten chains frontage, on a plan similar to that adopted in the parish of St. Laurent. As I have already expressed my opinion as to the desirability of such a re-survey, I have the honor to refer you to my previous letters on the subject."

So that you find Mr. Pearce and Mr. Duck repeatedly expressing their views as to the desirability of this re-survey, but no heed is given. No answer is returned. Well, Sir, the difficulties connected with the lands began to grow great, and on the 1st of February, 1884, a meeting of the settlers residing at St. Catharines is reported as being held on the 21st of January, 1884. A committee consisting of William Kennedy, James Isbister and Thomas Swain were appointed to draft a petition to the Government, setting forth the grievances under which the people were laboring with regard to land matters, and praying Inspector Pearce to take them into consideration, and requesting him to forward the petition to the Government. A resolution was passed to the effect that the half-breed population of the North-West were unjustly treated, in not having the same privileges as regards land grants and scrip extended to them which had been enjoyed by their brethren in Manitoba. At a subsequent meeting at Lindsay school house, Red Deer Hill, these resolutions were endorsed, giving power to the committee to add any others. Thomas Millar, Charles Adams and Wm. Platt, secretary, were appointed a committee. A meeting of the settlers of the south branch was held on the 29th January. Mr. Andrew Spence was called to the chair, and Mr. Phillip Turner was appointed secretary. The resolution passed at St. Catharines and the ridge were read and discussed. A committee was appointed to draw up a memorial to the Government, namely, Messrs. A. Spence, W. McCorrister and Robert Stevens. Mr. S. J. Jackson was authorised to obtain the co-operation of the French settlers in carrying out the resolutions passed at various meetings; but so far as I have been able to observe, I do not find any of these petitions or resolutions amongst the papers produced. Then, on the 19th January, 1884, Father Vegreville, missionary at St. Louis de Langevin, wrote to Capt. Deville, chief inspector of surveys:

"I have just seen the inspector, Mr. Pearce. To my great surprise, this gentleman was unable to answer, in a satisfactory manner, the questions I put to him. He confined himself to advising me to write to you, promising to do so himself immediately. About a dozen years ago some settlers established themselves upon the bank of the branch of the river Saskatchewan. Towards the end of the winter of 1881 the missionary at St. Laurent (west side of the river, section 21, township 44, range 1, W. 3) no longer able to serve the whole population, which was growing and extending to a distance, I was called upon to establish a new mission at Batoche Crossing, township 43, range 1, W. 3, about eight miles above St. Laurent, and on the opposite bank, which was becoming more rapidly populated. The presence of the missionary, combined with the local advantages of good land situated on the banks of a great river, led those poor people to ask that their lands should be surveyed, in order that they might enter them, and be enabled to obtain possession by means of patents.

"I, myself, caused Mr. Duck, the Dominion land surveyor, to write several times to Ottawa, and always without success, until finally I became discouraged myself, and several people were obliged to leave the settlement, some selling their land for a nominal price, and others abandoning it without any compensation.

"In February, 1883, the Rev. Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney were deputed by the settlement to set forth our complaints and present our demands to the Government. They were given a written promise that the lands we occupied should be surveyed in river lots of 10 chains frontage by 2 miles in depth, and that this survey should take place in the autumn following, (1883).

"The autumn has passed, and winter is coming. What has become of the promises? Has any surveyor been instructed to do the work, and has he failed in his duty? That is what we ask of you to-day.

"I do not put these questions to you, Sir, in my own name alone, or in the name of the two missions that I have established upon the right bank of the south branch of the Saskatchewan. I repeat what Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney have said to the members of the Government in the winter of 1883. I tell you again what our settlers have said to the land agents at Prince Albert. I am the faithful interpreter of the sentiment of the population. Please consider the consequences of a painful delay. The settlers have formed and are every day forming settlements, without knowing where the limits of their future properties will be. These limits being right lines and inflexible parallels, will cut up fields, will pass through houses and will separate fields for convenience of access to which the houses have been built—these will be the inevitable consequences to those who have already built, or who may build hereafter, until a survey is made. What great inconvenience, what deplorable consequences! However, three-fourths of these troubles might have been avoided if the survey had been done when it was asked for and when it was promised.

"I hope, Sir, that the misfortunes which bear so heavily upon our population will soon come to an end, and the more so, as a word from you will suffice. You have the kindness to remind the surveyors charged with this work that it is more necessary in this part of the country than elsewhere, in places where settlement has not yet commenced. If the surveyors have not yet been selected, there are enough others in the country to enable you to name a staff, who could go upon the spot and make the people happy and satisfied, so far as circumstances will permit. I understand you to tell me to have patience; that everything will come out right in the end. Those are words which, permit me to say, I can no longer accept. There is a double proof of it. Prince Albert was settled the same time that this colony began. The inhabitants of Prince Albert have had their lands surveyed a long time and have received their patents. In the second place, I do not want it to be said that there is in this country places where the emigrants are treated like helots."

"Opposite to the mission which we have established, that is to say, on the north shore Tp. 45 E. 27 and 28, W. 2, there are only two families, and already in the two townships the river squares have been changed into river lots. I see them marked on the map. For the last ten years a few families have been living on the north shore; there are about thirty at present. Next summer there will not be enough room for a part of those who have promised to come, and there is not a river lot which is surveyed. What would the immigrants do if they knew that in this country they can be treated with such unheard of partiality?

"If I was on the spot I could get this letter signed by the fathers of families, representing a population of 2,000 souls; but I prefer to send it to you immediately, hoping to receive your answer before the departure of Mr. Pearce."

On 14th February Mr. Deville, to whom that letter was addressed, transmitted it to the Deputy Minister, and in doing so, said:

"I beg to draw your attention to the clause stating that last year the Rev. W. Leduc and Mr. Maloney obtained from the Government written assurances that the lands occupied by French settlers on the south branch of the Saskatchewan would be laid out into river lots. I am not in a position to state whether or not such is the case, but I am aware a similar promise was made for the Saskatchewan, Edmonton and St. Albert settlements."

So we have evidence, in these papers I have read, of the fact that this promise was made for the settlement represented by Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney:

"The wishes of the settlers could easily be met without inconvenience or prejudice to the Government by adopting the following course: (1.) If the inspector of agencies, when on the ground, should be satisfied that the great majority of the settlers in a township desire river lots, then he should have power to direct that every homestead fronting on the river in that township shall be composed of four quarter sections, forming a lot of twenty chains in width by one mile in depth. (2.) Except when all occupants of a section prefer having it allotted into quarter sections, in which case their request should be complied with. (3.) Except when all the occupants of two sections desire that the lots should be ten chains in width and should extend two miles, to the depth of the two sections, in which case their wishes should also be complied with.

"A lot twenty chains wide by one mile deep would be described in the patent as composed of four quarter sections. A lot ten chains wide by two miles deep would be described as the western, eastern, northern or southern halves of eight quarter sections. The areas could easily be found by reference to this office."

MR. BLAKE.

On the 10th March the secretary of the Department wrote Mr. Deville a letter, as follows:—

"A copy of your letter and a translation of that of the Rev. Mr. Vegreville have been sent to Mr. Commissioner Walsh, with a statement that the Minister approves of your suggestion, and a request that the inspector of Dominion land agencies be instructed accordingly."

Meantime, other correspondence was going on on the subject, and Mr. Pearce himself, on the 17th January, 1884, had written to the Minister of the Interior. He says:

"I have the honor to report that I was this day called upon by the Rev. Father Vegreville and Hon. Charles Nolin, in reference to the survey into river lots of the land bordering on the south branch of the Saskatchewan River, in townships 45, ranges 27 and 28, west 2nd meridian, and townships 44, and ranges west 3rd meridian. They state that the Government promised that sub-division into river lots would be made last year, and that it has not been done. At their request, I promised to submit the matter for your consideration. They will themselves communicate with you on the subject."

On the 10th March, 1884, the secretary of the Department wrote to Mr. Deville, enclosing a copy of that letter, and making this enquiry:

"Will you please state, for the information of the Minister, how this matter stands and what promises have been made to the petitioners?"

On the 12th March Mr. Deville answers:

"Some river lots have been laid out in the above townships, but the greater part of the river fronts has been sub-divided into sections. Rev. V. Vegreville and Hon. Chas. Nolin refer probably to a promise of the Minister to Rev. W. Leduc and Mr. Maloney, that certain lands would be laid out into river lots. I do not know whether or not such a promise has been made. As to the proper course to be adopted, I would refer you to my letter of the 14th ult. to the Deputy Minister."

That is the letter which I have already read. Mr. Pearce's report on the Prince Albert settlement contains this statement:

"Two classes of settlers have entered the Prince Albert district from Manitoba, namely, the English-speaking settlers, largely composed of half-breeds, and the French-speaking settlers, who are probably wholly half-breeds. The latter class settled in the neighborhood of Stobart, Duck Lake and the south branch. Those in the latter district have not yet made entry to their lands, nor have any claims been preferred by them, owing to the fact that they anticipated a re-survey of the district into river lots. When this re-survey is completed, the settlers will, no doubt, prefer their claims."

Mr. Pearce received from the Department Mr. Deville's plan which I have already read, and on reply he writes in March, as follows:—

"That if he (Mr. Pearce) personally had time to make a survey of these settlers' holdings he has no doubt that entries could be granted in legal sub-division or fractional parts thereof, so that each person's interest would be as well protected as if laid off in river lots, but that he has not time to do as that suggestion would demand, much as he would like that kind of work. He also states that he thinks, owing to the points and bays on the river, it will be found that no regular width of lots will meet the wishes of those people; that their improvements are in all corners; that they seem determined to have their holdings laid out in river lots, and it will be found that they will expect the lines between every lot plainly defined on the ground at least. That is what Mr. Pearce states he inferred from interviews he had with them. Further, he tried to explain to them how their wishes could be met by means of a legal sub-division survey or fractional portions thereof; but he fears they did not comprehend what he desired to impart. In fact, it was a matter which he took particular pains to discuss with others, and the better educated portion of the community, and the answer invariably was: That is plain enough to you as a surveyor, but it is Greek to us." Those parties are bonâ fide settlers and as such have or will acquire title; and if they wish their land laid off in a certain way, why should the Government object; in fact, it is the duty of the Government to survey it as requested."

"Mr. Inspector Pearce further states that neither the agent nor his assistants are sufficiently conversant with surveys to go to the ground and allot these lands by land survey or fractional portion thereof, and would recommend one of two courses to be adopted: (1) To send with agent on the ground a surveyor who can make a rough traverse of improvements on each section, and then entries can be given by legal sub-division, so as to preserve to each man his improvements, as far as possible. (2) To lay out in river lots on ground, employing a surveyor of considerable experience in that kind of work; if he or his assistants spoke English so much the better, and give him sufficient latitude in his instructions, so that he could make the lot of such width as to preserve to each claimant, so far as possible, his improvements. In both cases he would suggest the township road allowance to be kept open. If the first course is adopted, he begs leave to suggest that Col. Sproat or

J. L. Reid, D.L.S., who are now on the ground, be instructed to proceed with the agent and assist to carry it out, as he thinks time would be saved by so doing—expense also. All of which is respectfully submitted."

There was the suggestion of the man on the ground who had knowledge, who had seen the land and discussed the question with the people, who knew the facts and the difficulties, and who suggests two methods; but I find no statement in these papers of any action being taken on the subject after the report of Mr. Pearce. This was, mind you, in the spring of 1884, and after the Prince Albert settlers had been settled with. The question of the survey of the neighborhood of St. Laurent, in the half-breed settlement, was still undecided. On 26th April, 1884, Mr. Louis Schmidt wrote to the Minister as follows:—

"I am one of the settlers in the South Saskatchewan, in the electoral district of Lorne, who during the last 4 years, have sent petitions upon petitions to your Department to have their lands surveyed in 10 or 20 chains frontage by 1 or 2 miles long, as the same has been done for the Prince Albert settlement on both the north and south branches of the Saskatchewan. I regret to say that so far our prayer has not yet been granted, nor even an answer of any kind has been given, and I feel bound to say that such a state of things is almost intolerable.

"The most part of those settlers, and I am among the number, have lived on and cultivated their lands for over three years, and ought to be entitled to a patent from the Crown, yet as they have taken up their land close to each other, and in the hope of having them sub-divided in river lots, they have not been able to enter them in the lands office. You see, Sir, in a glance, the real state of things, and I need not occupy your valuable time any longer in entering into more details. I pray you, therefore, most earnestly, to have the matter remedied for the satisfaction of so many loyal subjects of her Majesty and

"Your humble servant,

"LOUIS SCHMIDT."

That letter was written on the 26th of April, 1884. It was not answered until 15th July, 1884, and the answer was as follows:—

"I have to inform you that immediately upon the return of the Deputy Minister of the Interior from the North-West, which is expected to be within a very few days, your letter will be brought to his attention with a view to immediate action being taken in the matter."

So that even on the 15th of July Mr. Pearce's suggestion as to satisfying these people had not been accepted, nor any method devised for dealing with the question. The Saskatchewan Herald of the 3rd of May, 1884, announced that the Government had rescinded the Order making the system of narrow river lots, as laid down in Red River, applicable to the principal rivers in the North-West. It goes on:

"When the older settlements on the Saskatchewan were founded, land was taken up, regardless of any other consideration than that there should be a river frontage, and every one accommodated his lines to the peculiarities of the location. This plan was found to interfere seriously with the Government survey in the Territories, and was disregarded, except in the case of some settlements, to which it was conceded. Last winter the Edmonton delegates pressed for its application to the settlements they represented; and the Government, believing that their arguments held good, as regarded the rest of the country, granted their request and extended the plan to all the rivers. With the progress of surveys, however, it became evident that the disadvantages were greatly in excess of any benefits or conveniences to be derived from the extension of the system of narrow frontages, and its discontinuance has therefore been decided on. There is a great deal of broken land on the banks of the Saskatchewan, so that in many places a man might have a river front and yet be unable to reach the water. There will always be broken and irregular lots on the rivers, and we believe an adherence to the rectangular system will, in the end, give the greater satisfaction."

There you have the announcement of the discontinuance of that practice. I am not now engaged in discussing the policy of that discontinuance, as applied to the Saskatchewan district, with a view of dealing generally, but I am dealing with the policy of the discontinuance of that practice, as applied to those who had settled while the practice was otherwise, who had been told it was the rule, who had settled according to the ancient custom of the country, who saw this privilege granted to the people at Prince Albert in 1878, and 1879 at Edmonton, at Saskatchewan, in 1883, and who saw it refused, or, at any rate, not granted to them in 1883 and 1884. On the 17th of July, 1884, Le Manitoba, after discussing the half-breed claims to the Indian titles, says:

"The great difficulty that the Métis have met with is in obtaining first, the survey of their lands, according to the actual limits and form of these lands. The slowness in the confirmation of their titles and the quasi refusal to accord them the grant asked for the extinction of their Indian rights are to-day the cause of all the discontent. Many petitions have been addressed to Ottawa, even delegates have been sent to the capital, at great cost, and still nothing has been accomplished."

Well, then, Sir, this was the state of things in the middle of 1884, when Louis Riel was asked to come: and now I turn back to the spring of that year, and the winter of that year—to February, 1884, when Mr. Pearce had gone up, after these long delays, to settle the claims at Prince Albert and St. Laurent. His mission was to deal with those places. He dealt with the case of Prince Albert, but he did not deal with St. Laurent, or Stobart, Duck Lake, Batoche, Grandin, St. Antoine de Padoue and St. Louis de Langevin; and why did he not? As I have told you, the cases of the white settlers of Prince Albert, after being investigated in January and February, were reported on in March; the proposed settlements were approved by the Minister in April, and if the settlements were just and reasonable the question was ended. But why did Mr. Pearce not go down to St. Laurent and these other places and dispose of their fewer claims? It was this question of the surveys and plans which prevented him. I will read you his telegram from Prince Albert in February, 1884:

"Have taken the evidence of all claims excepting St. Laurent and vicinity. Plans not received. As claimants there speak French, propose agent take evidence, when plans received and forward land board. I intend proceeding Winnipeg Wednesday, unless otherwise ordered. Made no report as yet."

Upon receipt of that telegram Mr. Hall writes to Mr. Deville:

"In what state is the survey of St. Laurent, on the Saskatchewan? Mr. Pearce says that the plans have not yet been received at the Prince Albert agency, and until they are of course the claims of the settlers cannot be enquired into."

We have no answer to that letter, and no information as to when those plans were received. The secretary of the Department writes to Mr. Pearce in acknowledgment of his telegram:

"The suggestion contained in your telegram received here from Prince Albert, that the agent of that district be named to take the evidence in regard to the claims of settlers at St. Laurent, is approved of.

"Mr. Gauvreau has had considerable experience in the business of the Department, and ought to be quite capable of taking the evidence. I have sent to the chief inspector of surveys, enquiring in what state of progress the survey is, and when I hear from him I shall let you know."

I do not know whether Mr. Pearce ever heard from Mr. Burgess, but there is no letter brought down informing Mr. Pearce of the result of the enquiry. Now, the special survey at St. Laurent was approved by the Government in March, 1879, and that special survey was open for entry only in March, 1884, after Mr. Pearce had left the settlement altogether, I presume because the plans never had been sent up, and I suppose that they had been sent up on learning of this mistake; but for four years the special settlement was in the hands of the Government approved, but yet the lands were not opened. As to the settlers whose claims were investigated later, between forty and fifty were on that special survey, and between thirty and forty were between Gabriel's Crossing and Batoche, so that the great bulk of those dealt with were on the special survey—who were about one-half of the settlers—were not allowed to enter, although the surveys were approved in 1879, until after Mr. Pearce left the settlement in 1884. These other townships, or at least most of them, were approved in September 1881; one in November, 1883, and the other in December, 1883. Now, I have no answer to give you as to why the St. Laurent survey was not sent up before. But as to why no entries were made in the other townships I have already shown you that it was because the inhabitants were persistently asking that the method and practice under which they settled should be recognised and conceded to them, as it was to Prince Albert, as to the people of the north branch, as to the people of Edmonton, as to the people of St. Albert, as to the people of Fort Saskatchewan, and because they did not wish for, and, in fact, could not avail themselves, as they understood it, of the township survey, in order to get their lands. Mr. Pearce has given us his reason, in his letter of September, 1883, which I have read. He says these entries were not made because the re-survey was being expected, and the decision as to the re-survey was still being expected when Mr. Pearce was there in February, 1884. But there was another reason. The agent had been stopped by Mr. Pearce in September, 1883, in pursuance of the bungle of the Millar type. However the local agent was directed to investigate, and he did investigate, in May, 1884. The papers are brought down, but the investigation did not touch the lands of St. Louis de Langevin at all, because that was sacred soil; it was colonisation company's land, and it could not be touched, and therefore there was no investigation made of their cases. But the investigation was made of the other cases, and they were generally settled in one way or another. The first settlement in a few cases took place in each of the years 1872, 1873, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877 and 1878, and many settlements in each of the years 1879, 1881, 1882 and 1883. In some cases, as appears by the papers, there were very large improvements, and the names of many of those people appear in the lists of killed, wounded and prisoners. Now, I do not know what was the principle of the settlement that was made; but I point out that had the surveys been made and approved, and the plans sent up, the investigation might have taken place in February, 1884, as it was intended to do, as Mr. Pearce was ready to do, and as he was only prevented from doing by the circumstances to which I have alluded. Then, in May, 1884, when the investigation did take place, the excitement had got higher, and in June, 1884, Riel came into the country, and these complaints and disputes and difficulties about lands remained, and the agitation went on increasing. What was the relative condition, Sir, at that time, of the white settlement at Prince Albert and the half-breed settlements at St. Laurent and in the vicinity? The white settlement had had a hearing; it had had an investigation in January and in February, a report in March, and the decision of the Minister in April. What was the situation in the case of the half-breed settlements at St. Laurent? They had nothing until May; they had then an investigation of the agent; the report was sent on and nothing was done. Mr. Pearce did not report; he was not asked to report, according to any of the papers which have been brought down, although I ask, would not the ordinary dictates of prudence, say: Now, in the month of May you have the report of the agent on the cases of these half-breed settlers; send down your report on them, so that we may act at once and decide their future in reference to these lands. But he was not asked to report on any papers brought down to us, and, in fact, he did not report until the 17th of October; and then he reported late, but still in time, if this report had been acted upon. On the 17th of October he reported on St. Laurent, Duck Lake, Batoche, Grandin, St. Antoine de Padoue, though not on St. Louis de Langevin; and having reported, what came of his report? It came down to Ottawa, and it was buried in the Department. While the report on the white settlers, which dealt with many hundreds of cases, and which established new principles, was disposed of in about three weeks, the report on the comparatively few cases, less than 100, dealing on the recognised old principles with the St. Laurent claims, was held over at Ottawa from the 17th of October, 1884, until the 9th of February, 1885, just while the difficulty was arising, while all the meetings were being held, while all the agitation and excitement was taking place, and on the 9th of February at last that report was approved by this telegram:

Mr. BLAKE.

"February 9, 1885.—Report of land board on St. Laurent claims approved. Instruct Prince Albert agent to give effect thereto."

You can know the reason; the account I have given you in the last few hours shows you that February and March were notable months in the Department of the Interior. There had been warnings; the half-breed enumeration was arranged on the 23th of January; on the 4th of February Governor Dewdney was told of it; and on the 9th of the same February they found time to deal with the ninety-five cases of the St. Laurent settlers, and telegraphed to say that it was approved. Doubtless this was on account of further warnings not brought down; but the grace came too late. Once again, I say I am not criticising the decisions; I am dealing with the question of there being a decision. The decision was reached on the 9th of February; by the time it reached the local agent the people were just on the eve of speaking out, and I observe by the Mail correspondent that in the wrecked house of one of the rebels was found a letter of the agent, informing him what his fate was to be. Thus, in this regard, there was the grossest apathy, delay, neglect, procrastination and incapacity which can be conceived; because, if there ever was a time when men should have been prompt it was at that time. In the fall of the year, the cases of the whites had been settled; those of the half-breeds had not. They were agitating and complaining; their chief was among them, inciting and inflaming them; an increased force had been sent among them; the Government had done something towards repression; were they to do nothing towards redress? No; the papers come down in October, and they lie half October, all November, all December, all January, and until the 9th of February, in the office, without the Government touching them, without telling these people that they should have their lands, and on what terms they might have them. And so I say, both as to their lands and as to the half-breed Indian title, the statements I have made I believe are beyond successful contradiction. In old and sterner times men would have been impeached for conducting in this way the public affairs of the country. In these milder days we have substituted votes of censure, and I move:

To leave out all the words after "that" and insert the following instead thereof: It be Resolved,—That in the administration of North-West affairs by the present Government, prior to the recent outbreak, there have occurred grave instances of neglect, delay and mismanagement in matters affecting the peace, welfare and good government of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Whether, in the long and elaborate speech of the hon. gentleman, he has established a rightful censure upon the Government, whether he has shown that we have been guilty of negligence, of oppression, of mal-administration, I leave to the judgment of the House and the country. But there is one thing I think there can be no doubt about on either side, and that is that the hon. gentleman, in his speech, has furnished gratuitously a most able brief for the counsel of Louis Riel. I venture to say that not one of the counsel for that unfortunate man will be able to advance or will be able to adduce such arguments as the hon. gentleman has done this day, irrespective of the consequences which he should have known would have flown from his language.

Mr. LISTER. Who caused it?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You may sneer but you will find, this House will find, that in the speeches of the counsel for Riel, when the trial takes place, as it will, within a few days, the substance, the basis, the apex and the bottom of that defence will be the speech of the hon. gentleman. And it was so from the beginning. From the beginning of this Session, every motion the hon. gentleman made, every question he asked, every return he called for—it was all done with the one object, the miserable, the wretched object of trying to get a case against the Government rather than get justice for the people of the North-West. I would ask any hon. member in this House if the whole speech of the hon. gentleman is not a justification, an apology, an excuse for the rising in the North-West; a justification, an apology, an excuse for murder.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—a justification, an excuse for anarchy.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). You are the criminals.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I say that the whole course of the Opposition in this House, the whole course of the Opposition out of this House, every effort made by them, every statement made by them in the House and the press, has been with the object of injuring the Government, irrespective of the country, whatever hon. gentlemen opposite may say. What care they whether the future prospects of the North-West be prejudiced or affected? If they can get up a cry or a means of attack on the Government, they do not care. They would rather rule in hell than serve in heaven. There are two things that will rise in the minds of the auditors of the hon. gentleman's speech, and those are, that he never alluded, except very cursorily, to the course of events before 1878-79. How reticent he was about the policy of the Government of which he was a member sometimes, and sometimes not. In the next place, he has not ventured, in the whole of his seven hours' speech, to say that the alleged grievances of the half-breeds were just.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is true he has quoted their grievances; it is true he has gone down to the cellars of the reading room and raked up every newspaper coming from the North-West, to read little paragraphs written by country editors for the special benefit of their special locality. He has read them as evidence of writings withheld by the Government. Whenever he has read a paper he has said: There is no answer to this; and he supposes there must have been an answer, and that answer must have been suppressed.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). So they were.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. member for South Huron—no, he does not say that; he is a gentleman, though a mistaken gentleman. It is the hon. gentleman behind him who has said it. I say, in the first place, the hon. gentleman has never, in the whole course of his long speech, said that the claims of the half-breeds to be put on the same footing with the half-breeds of Manitoba were just and legal. He has not dropped a single word to that effect. Why? Because the Government of which he was a member decided solemnly they had no such claim; that they had no claims at all, no more than the white settler who went in. The hon. gentleman, sometimes in the Government and sometimes not there—I cannot tell whether he was in at the very hour when the policy of the Mackenzie Government was declared in a solemn despatch—but he had it; he has had it in his hands; he has read a portion of it to-night; he has not quoted the whole of that despatch—that despatch in which the hon. member for Bothwell declared that the half-breeds had no rights. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) deny that there is such a despatch? Does the hon. gentleman deny that he does not know it, that he has not read it, that he has not read a portion of it? Then I shall read it. Thus runs the solemn despatch of the 13th February, 1878, written by the then Lieutenant Governor, Mr. Laird. I shall read the whole of the despatch. It is addressed to the hon. member for Bothwell, Minister of the Interior:

"I have the honor to transmit herewith a petition of certain half-breeds of St. Laurent, relating to several matters affecting their interests in this country. Though the petition is addressed to the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territory, yet, as it refers to questions for the most part wholly under the control of the Dominion Parliament and Government, I am requested to forward it to His Excellency the Governor in Council. I hope you will have the goodness at an early day to lay it before His Excellency in Council."

At an early day—the hon. gentleman is very anxious about an early day:

"Should it be the intention of the Government to appoint any additional members to the Council of the North-West Territories, the prayer of the petitioners, that such should be selected from the old residents of the country, is well worthy of consideration. It is important that the land policy of the Government towards old settlers and others living for many years in the territory should be declared. It appears to me that they have a claim to some more speedy means—"

Speedy!

"speedy means for acquiring a title for settlement purposes than the homestead provisions of the Dominion Lands Act. To prevent disputes between neighbors, it is highly desirable that the survey of lands settled upon along the principal rivers should be prosecuted with all convenient speed."

Just put that map on the Table, please, and see what speed has been made with the survey.

"With respect to the prayer for assistance in procuring seeds and implements to commence farming operations, it is similar to the request made to me by the half-breeds of Bow River during the Blackfeet treaty negotiations, and which I forwarded to you and commended to the favorable consideration of the Government."

That is signed by Mr. Laird. This is the answer of the Government, a portion of which the hon. gentleman alluded to, but he did not read the whole:

"Department of the Interior, Ottawa, 18th March, 1878."

The Government went out, I think, in October, 1878.

An hon. MEMBER. September.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, October. They ought to have gone out in September, but they did not.

"Sir,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your despatch (No. 47) of the 13th ultimo, covering a petition addressed to you by certain half-breeds of the parish of St. Laurent, relating to several matters affecting the interest of the half-breeds in the North-West. You are requested to inform the petitioners that I shall have much pleasure—"

Mr. Mills will have much pleasure; I beg his pardon, the Minister of the Interior of that day, will have much pleasure—

"in submitting their petition for the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General in Council. In the meantime, you may intimate to the petitioners that should it be thought desirable to appoint additional members to the Council of the North-West, I shall be prepared to recommend for His Excellency's consideration their application that such members should be selected from the old residents in the Territories"—

Not elected—

"and that if possible one of them should be of French Canadian origin. The propriety of passing an Act to secure for the half-breeds some more speedy means of acquiring a title for settlement purposes than under the provisions of the present homestead and Dominion Lands Act has for some time past, engaged my attention."

Well, he took office in 1873.

Mr. MILLS. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, the Government got in in 1873, and I suppose his predecessor was not a dummy; his predecessor was as able as the hon. gentleman himself, his predecessor had the same responsibility as himself, and the hon. gentleman, being his successor in the same Administration, took upon himself all the responsibility of what his predecessor did or did not do.

"As regards the application of the petitioners for an early survey of the settled lands along the principal rivers, I have to request you to inform the petitioners that the survey of such lands has already been carried out, to some extent, and will be prosecuted as rapidly as the funds at the disposal of the Department will permit."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Exactly; but that Government did not choose to apply for the funds; and, if they had applied for the funds, they would have got them. They left the thing alone.

"The application of the petitioners to be aided by the Government with seeds and agricultural implements in their farming operations I confess I am not disposed to view favorably. I do not see upon what grounds the half-breeds can claim to be treated, in this particular, differently from the white settlers in the Territories."

I agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman.

"The half-breeds who have, in some respects, the advantage over new settlers in the Territories, should be impressed with the necessity of settling down in fixed localities and directing their energies towards pastoral or agricultural pursuits, in which case lands would, no doubt, be assigned to them, in the same way as to white settlers. But beyond this, they must not look to the Government for any special assistance in their farming operations.

"The petitioners are in error in supposing that the Government has given seeds or farming implements, to any other class of white settlers in the North-West.

"Money has been advanced, in some cases, to certain settlers, on the distinct understanding that it would be repaid to the Government by the parties to whom it was advanced. I may add that the result of this experiment has not been such as to induce the Government to repeat it."

There is that despatch, in which the hon. the Minister of Interior, administering the affairs of the North-West, tells the half-breeds of the North-West that they have no greater claims than the white settlers at that period; and what were the claims of the white settlers at that period? They were simply this: that any man going there who was 18 years of age and upwards could settle down on 160 acres of land, and, if he cultivated for three years, he could get his patent for that land. These were the claims and the only claims that the white man going from Ontario or Quebec, or any of the Provinces of Canada, had; he could have 160 acres free, and, if he chose to buy, he could have 160 acres more by preemption; and the hon. gentleman declared that the half-breeds in the North-West should have no other and no greater claims than the white men. Now the hon. gentleman very properly argues that the half-breeds have, in some respects, great advantages over the new settlers going into that country. He says that these half-breeds should be impressed with the necessity of settling down in fixed localities. They know the country; they were born in the country; they were trained in the country. They knew what the conditions of the country were, what the climatic conditions were; they knew what to expect. They knew that if they do not choose to cultivate the land, they must look elsewhere for means of subsistence. Now, Mr. Speaker, the truth is, that the dissatisfaction which has arisen in the North-West has deeper roots than mere discontent by the half-breeds and others who are not getting their patents or getting their claims asserted. From the very inception of the acquisition of this country by Canada from the Hudson Bay Company there was discontent. In the first place, the Hudson Bay subordinates living in the country were very much dissatisfied that the company should be pushed off their throne. They governed that country; they were the sovereigns of that country, and everything that they could do secretly was done for the purpose of preventing the Government getting possession of that country. That discontent was sedulously spread among the whites, and among the half-breeds, and, perhaps, in some degree, among the Indians. That discontent continued, aye, and continues yet. The half-breeds never have been satisfied with the transfer of the country to Canada. They were willing to remain in their semi-free condition under the Hudson Bay Company, but they were not satisfied to come under the Government of the Dominion; and in 1870 this dissatisfaction culminated in an outbreak. That was subdued, but the feeling still lingered. In 1874 Mr. Gabriel Dumont was still a rebel—Mr. Gabriel Dumont—I speak of him with respect, because he was a brave man; although he was a rebel, although he has committed crimes, for which, if proved guilty, he would forfeit his life, still, everyone must have respect for him, that certainly they have not for Louis Riel. But in 1874 Gabriel Dumont was forming a Provincial Government. He never was satisfied under the Crown of Great Britain. And there is a letter from Governor Morris, of the 22nd of June, 1874, inclusive of a statement of John McKay, relating to the conduct of Gabriel Dumont. Now, the hon. gentleman has spoken of John McKay as a respectable man. I believe he is a respectable man, and Mr. McKay, at that time, reported that Gabriel Dumont was trying to form a Provincial Government, of which he was to be president. Now, Sir, from that time until now that feeling has been seething. It is there. The claims of the half-breeds are a mere pretext, and the real desire is that that country should sever its connection with the Dominion of Canada, should become independent in some way. All the grievances that have been alleged are merely a pretext to cover that fixed principle that existed in the minds of the people there, or of some of them, that there should be an independent Government established in the North-West. Now, I have spoken about the action taken by the Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie). I have read a despatch of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), when Minister of the Interior, showing that the half-breeds, as half-breeds, had no other claim and had no greater claim than the whites. But, Sir, it has been alleged that the Government had neglected the claims of the half-breeds; it has been alleged that my hon. friend the Secretary of State made an inaccurate statement when he said that the half-breeds had not exercised their right to petition. The hon. gentleman quoted several despatches, several communications from the North-West to the Government here, in 1878, and before that year, and before the late Government went out; and he asked, how could we be so blind as to not know that such things existed? Why, Sir, that was ancient history, as the hon. gentleman said. Those complaints were made before 1878, and the answer was given in the hon. gentleman's statement, that they had no claims whatever, any more than the whites who went in there. The hon. gentleman has read and quoted as if it were a paper condemning the Government, a letter signed by Mr. Matthew Ryan, formerly stipendiary magistrate in the North-West, but who has now ceased to be such. He speaks of the rights of the half-breeds in the North-West, and this is what he says:

"Having been appointed, on the 1st of January, 1876, stipendiary magistrate for the North-West Territories, I was also informed by the Minister of Justice that my commission to investigate the land claims was to be considered in effect for another year, in order to allow of the half-breeds in the North-West, who were unable to attend the sittings of the commissioners in Manitoba, to establish their claims before me. In the discharge of this duty, I found that a large number of half-breeds had no claim under the Act, not having been residents of Manitoba on the date of transfer, the 15th July, 1870. I could also see that this exclusion caused much discontent, and I did not fail to urge, from time to time, that the proper remedy should be applied."

To whom did they appeal? To hon. gentlemen opposite. Through 1876-77-78 they appealed to the Government composed of hon. gentlemen opposite; and he says they appealed again and again. He made repeated applications on behalf of those poor people; but not one step was taken by hon. gentlemen opposite to remedy those grievances. How could the hon. gentleman do it? He declared they had no right and no claim, and therefore he could not, of course, take any step. From 1873-74 to 1878 not one single step was taken by hon. gentlemen opposite in order to relieve the discontent, if it existed, in order to allay grievances if they existed—not one single step was taken to relieve these poor people for whom the hon. member who has just addressed the House has expressed so much sympathy; they were left out in the cold; their claims were not considered, their petitions were not answered. The hon.

gentleman has read several documents, and he says that some of them were not answered, or that the answers do not appear among the papers. In January or February, 1878, a petition asking redress was presented to the Government of that day, and until the time the Government went out of power not even an acknowledgment of the receipt of the petition was sent. What was the condition of affairs when we took office in 1878? We found that the preceding Government had taken no steps whatever; that they had not remedied the grievances; that they had not even discussed them. In 1869 we obtained possession of the country; in 1870 Manitoba was established as a Province. It is within the recollection of several members of this House—at all events, it is in the history of the country—that in 1870, in order to secure peace and order—in fact, to obtain possession of the country—it was necessary to enter into an arrangement by which that Province might be acquired, that turbulent feelings might be put down and Canada might secure peace and quiet in that country. In order to accomplish that result the Government of the day entered into negotiations with certain delegates from the Province of Manitoba, which culminated in the Act of 1870, creating Manitoba a Province. In that Act it is provided that in order to secure the extinguishment of the Indian title 1,400,000 acres of land should be settled upon the families of the half-breeds living within the limits of the then Province. Whether they had any right to those lands or not was not so much the question as it was a question of policy to make an arrangement with the inhabitants of that Province, in order, in fact, to make a Province at all—in order to introduce law and order there, and assert the sovereignty of the Dominion. The Hudson Bay Company, the old proprietors of the country, had guaranteed certain rights to parties; they had acknowledged certain claims acquired in certain settlements, not only along the banks of Red River, but of the Assiniboia, and it was provided that, after a careful calculation, 1,400,000 acres would be quite sufficient for the purpose of compensating these men for what was called the extinguishment of the Indian title. That phrase was an incorrect one, because the half-breeds did not allow themselves to be Indians. If they are Indians, they go with the tribe; if they are half-breeds they are whites, and they stand in exactly the same relation to the Hudson Bay Company and Canada as if they were altogether white. That was the principle under which the arrangement was made and the Province of Manitoba was established. All white settlers who had not lost their land by lack of occupation or by silent acquiescence in the old Province of Assiniboia were allowed to keep their lands. So far as the half-breeds were concerned, 1,400,000 acres were set apart for the purpose of meeting their claims. There was a census taken, under Lieutenant Governor Archibald, the first Governor of that Province, and it was reported that there were about 10,000 half-breeds with their families that had a right to claim the land. If that census had been adhered to there would have been no difficulty. It was accurate, as accurate as a census can be taken in a new country without municipal institutions and means for enumerating the people one by one. But it was a correct census, and for it 1,400,000 acres had been assigned to meet the half-breed claims; and if that census had been adhered to, there never would have been any trouble. But the truth of the matter is, that the moment we went out of power it was necessary that everything we had done should be reversed, and the Government of the day chose to say that there were not 10,000 half-breeds in the Province of Manitoba, and they appointed Mr. Matthew Ryan and Mr. Machar, the latter a gentleman whom the hon. member for South Huron knows something about, for the purpose of undoing—I will not say of undoing, but of disregarding the census previously taken. That is the fact. If the census that had been taken and returned by Governor Archibald had been accepted there would have been land enough in the appropriation to have settled all trouble, as well for the half-breeds who were actually registered and got their lands as for the half-breeds who happened to be away on the plains at the time the final adjudication was made. But it did not suit the Government of the day to accept that. Oh, no. The claims of the half-breeds in Manitoba were bought up by speculators. It was an unfortunate thing for those poor people; but it is true that this grant of scrip and land to those poor people was a curse and not a blessing. The scrip was bought up; the lands were bought up by white speculators, and the consequences are apparent. I am told that even at this moment, in the vicinity of Winnipeg, instead of the surrounding country comprising smiling farms, settled with industrious people, the land is unsettled, in consequence of the scrip having been bought up for a song by speculators. In enacting the legislation necessary to the erection of the Province of Manitoba, in 1870, the Parliament of Canada provided that a tract of 1,400,000 acres of land should be set apart, from which to make grants to the children of the half-breeds resident in the Province at the date of the transfer, which date, for the purposes of the Act, was fixed as the 15th day of July, 1870. An enumeration of those entitled to share in this allotment was obtained by a census, which Lieutenant Governor Archibald, in December, 1870, reported as having been carefully taken, and which showed that the number was then estimated not to exceed 10,000. It was then decided to grant to each of the half-breed inhabitants of the Province a free patent for 140 acres of land, in extinguishment of their Indian title; but the question was raised as to whether the legal construction of the Manitoba Act permitted the heads of families to obtain any share of the 1,400,000 acres reserved by the Act. This question having been submitted to the law officers of the Crown, they decided that the half-breed heads of families were not so entitled; and the Government of the day then concluded that there would be such a reduction in the number of persons entitled to share, consequent upon the decision of the law officers of the Crown, as would permit of the children of half-breed heads of families born at the time of the transfer receiving an allotment at the rate of 190 acres each. The Indian title of the half-breed heads of families was extinguished, under an Act passed in 1874 (37 Victoria, chapter 20), by issuing scrip for $160 to each, that is to say, to the mother as well as to the father. Upon the census made under the direction of Lieutenant Governor Archibald an allotment was made to the half-breed children at the rate of 190 acres each, in 1873, all the lands affected having been previously surveyed with that object in view. It will be remembered, however, that in the fall of this year a change of Government took place, and the gentlemen who then became responsible for the administration of public affairs, in accordance with a general plan adopted for the purpose of discrediting the acts of their predecessors, and also for the purpose of finding employment for their hungry followers, rushed to the conclusion that the half-breed census was in some way or another deficient, and that they must make a new examination into the claims and obtain a new enumeration of the claimants. In May, 1875, nearly two years after this matter had been satisfactorily closed by an allotment made under the auspices of their predecessors, a commission, consisting of Mr. Matthew Ryan, of Montreal, and Mr. J. M. Machar, of Kingston, was sent out to visit the several parishes and make this new enumeration. The final report of this commission was submitted to the Governor General in Council in March, 1876; but examination shows that the commissioners themselves admitted their work to be incomplete, and the agent of Dominion lands, at Winnipeg, was authorised to continue the enumeration. In consequence of the incompleteness of the examination and enumeration made by Messrs. Machar and Ryan, the actual number of half-breed children entitled to share in the 1,400,000 acres was grossly underestimated; but with all its errors, the Government preferred the work of their own incompetent enumerators, performed in the most perfunctory manner, some six years after the date of the transfer, to the carefully compiled census made under the direction of Mr. Archibald, immediately after the transfer, and when the opportunities of ascertaining the facts must necessarily have been better than they were at the time of the investigation made by Messrs. Ryan and Machar. The actual number of claims enumerated by Ryan and Machar was 5,088; the Dominion lands agent, on the 10th August, 1876, reported 226 more; and the Minister of the Interior at the time jumped to the conclusion, upon what grounds no one can tell, that about 500 more half-breeds would probably be entitled to share in the allotment. So, with a largeness of heart unparalleled in their dealings with the half-breeds of Manitoba or any other section of the people of Canada, the Government decided that they would give to each half-breed child entitled to share in the reserve a free patent for 240 acres. This might look like liberality to the half-breeds, but if we take a peep behind the screen we find that before that date, apparently despairing of ever receiving patents for their lands, the majority of the claimants had disposed of their rights for a mere song, to speculative friends of the Government; and it was no doubt for the benefit of cormorants of this class that the hearts of Mr. Laird and his colleagues so suddenly expanded. If proof were wanted of this, it is easily to be found in the manner in which the work of apportioning the land amongst the rightful claimants was afterwards proceeded with. Not a solitary allotment upon this new and liberal basis was made until March, 1877, and when the present Government returned to office, in 1878, they found that the half-breeds of St. Boniface, St. Norbert, St. François Xavier, Baie St. Paul, and St. Agathe, containing more than one-half of the half-breed population, amongst whom the reserved lands were to be distributed, had not only not received their patents, but the allotments had not even been made. And thus, Mr. Speaker, you see that the Government of that day, who, if they had taken the census of Mr. Archibald, would have found full and ample indemnity and compensation for the rights, real or supposed, of the half-breeds of Manitoba, cut them down one-half, handed over 240 acres, instead of the 150 or the 190, to the white speculators, their friends, who had bought these claims. And now, what do we find? We find that the difference between the 5,000 and the 10,000 are now on the plains, and now they are claiming the amounts which those hon. gentlemen deprived them of when they were in the Government. They are now claiming the land, and they find an advocate in the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Blake). They claim the lands which they ought to have got long ago—not to such an extent, certainly, but to a reasonable extent, if the Government of that time had accepted the census taken under Mr. Archibald, instead of cutting it down one half, in order to double the value to their own friends of that day. But, Sir, to speak a little more of the conduct of the Government of that day, let me call the attention of the House for a moment to the conduct of the Minister, through his own officer, Mr. Ryan. Mr. Ryan was one of the commissioners appointed to enquire into these claims. He got his commission extended, in order to get on the plains, in order to ascertain what the claims of those men were, who, from one reason or another, had not been present to assert those claims. Well, Sir, Mr. Ryan telegraphed or wrote to the Department, to ask for leave to enquire into the claims of the people there. He asked for leave to go round on circuit and settle with those people. What did the hon. gentleman say? He said: You shall do nothing of the kind. He said, as was stated in the paper which was partially read by the leader of the Opposition, Mr. Ryan was originally appointed with Mr. Machar. He afterwards had his commission extended, and he was told to go to the applicants and see what could be done. Mr. Ryan, among many other telegrams, sent the following:—

“28th June, 1878.—Half-breeds pressing me. Will time of investigation be extended.”

Mr. Laird telegraphed from Battleford:

“24th June, 1878.—Observe Mr. Ryan's authority; investigate half-breeds' claims under order 14th June, 1876, lapsed; recommend time be extended one year; he is now here; applicants waiting answer.”

He was refused that time; the enquiry was never made—

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman knows that Mr. Ryan's time was extended, and that Mr. Duff was appointed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And in a letter, dated Dominion Land Office, Winnipeg, 16th March, 1877. Mr. Codd, the agent of Dominion lands, writes to the Surveyor General:

“I have the honor to submit for your consideration the enclosed communication from Mr. Police Magistrate Ryan, not considering that the matter is one coming properly within the sphere of my official duty. Without offering, therefore, a recommendation in the matter, permit to remark that it seems to me to be no part of the duties of the Government to compel, so to speak, the half-breeds to prove their claims.”

That is Mr. Codd's advice. Written across the face of that letter, in the handwriting of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), the Minister of the Interior, at that time, are these words:

Thus it was, Sir, that the whole of the claims and rights of these people were ignored by the Government before we came in. It was stated that they had no greater claims than the whites, and I am not at all sure that the hon. gentleman was not right in his logic; but, at the same time, if that be so, I cannot understand the long indictment which the hon. gentleman has delivered against the successors of the Government of which he was a member. Now, Sir, the question was one of very great difficulty. As I have already stated, the settlement in Manitoba and for Manitoba was for that Province alone. There were very few half-breeds outside of the boundaries of the Province of Manitoba. Whether they had claims, or whether they had not claims, it was necessary that peace should be restored; it was necessary that a Government should be established; it was necessary that the new Province of Manitoba should be organised; and therefore this grant of 1,400,000 acres was made to the half-breeds having possessory rights along the Assiniboine and the Red Rivers. Outside of those cases, the question was altogether open, as the hon. gentleman's despatch shows. Now, the half-breeds must be considered either as white men or as Indians. A great many of them chose to be considered as Indians, to go to the bands of their brothers to enjoy all the advantages of the treaties, to get their annuities, their supplies, and the presents that were given to them. Others said: No; we are white men; we will be considered as white men; we will have the right of white men; and if so, they had the same rights as other white men living outside of the Province of Manitoba, who had settled before the 15th of July, 1870. Now, Sir, these rights have never been denied to them. Not one half-breed has ever been dispossessed of his land. Not one white settler who was in that country at any time before we acquired it, has ever been dispossessed of his lands. Not one act of depression has been announced by the hon. gentleman; no man has come to him and said I have lost my land, I have lost my patrimony, I have lost my house. No man has said he is not in the same complete and happy and undisturbed possession of his land as he was in 1870. Aye, Sir, it is so; there is no pretence that there has been any oppression or any eviction; there is no pretence that there has been any ousting of any man, woman, or child in the great North-West by the action, direct or indirect, of the Government. Mind you, we only got the Province in 1870; we have only been able to introduce, by small degrees, anything like government or organisation since 1870. The thing was going on quietly but slowly, I must say, between 1870 and 1873, when the responsibility of the Government of that country devolved on hon. gentlemen opposite. From 1873 to 1878 that country was stagnant; from 1873 to 1878 not one single step was taken to vindicate the rights of the Indian or the half-breeds, or to assert the rights of the white man; from 1873 to 1878 is a blank leaf in the history of Canada. What step did that Government take in order to assert the rights of the half-breeds? What step did they take, in order to settle the boundary question of the boundary between man and man? What step did they take to survey the lands along the rivers? Look at that plan, and it will show what they did in their five years, and it will show what we did since we came back to office. They did nothing; they took no steps whatever. To be sure, the people went on, and they went on happily, and they would have gone on happily to this moment, had it not been that after the Conservative Government came in the whole end and aim of the Opposition was to excite and arouse those people. During five years they were quite ignorant of their wrongs; during five years they did not know they were suffering; they lived under their own roof-tree; they had their house, be it a humble turf house, or a wooden house, or be it a tent; and during the five years those hon. gentlemen were in they did not complain; they did not know they were wronged; they did not know they were trodden down and oppressed. It required the teaching of hon. gentlemen opposite and the radical press that they were going to lose their property, that they were oppressed, downtrodden, and I charge distinctly upon the Grit party and their associates in this House and out of the House, not only the responsibility but all the consequences. Why should the people, from 1878 to 1884, be more unhappy than were the people from 1873 to 1878? Was there any difference in their circumstances? Was there any attempt made to deprive them of the land and to change their position for the worse. No, they stood exactly, in March, 1885, as they did in the hon. gentleman's time. They were happy, peaceful and contented, until they were told by political agitators for political purposes—and for more sordid purposes than political purposes. In the great game of politics, parties some times go to great extremes; parties on both sides do what may not be considered within the strict lines of rectitude.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear; Franchise Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I hear the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) talking about rectitude. I have shown him up a little. The hon. gentleman who comes here to support the hon. member for the west riding (Mr. Blake), and who, from the beginning of his administration, tried to keep down and crush and destroy the interests and the rights, or, rather, the claims, of those people which he is now advocating. But I say that both political parties may exceed the rules of rectitude. There is something large in the ground; something large in the political field. But there is not that excuse in this case. The game is not so much for political advantage, but it is for the purpose of enabling the land grabbers and speculators, who have a hold on these poor people, to make the most out of them. I believe the most of the claims of these poor people in the North-West are now mortgaged; I believe they have made assignments of them to white men, and that these people will not be any richer by their claims being allowed. Perhaps the hon. member for Huron knows something about buying these claims?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Ask the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. White) and the hon. Minister of Customs.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend near me (Mr. Bowell) just puts me in mind of a circumstance a propos of the frequent interruptions of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron). The hon. member for the west riding (Mr. Blake) complained of the delays in issuing the patents, and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) will, I dare say, make a speech about the delay in issuing patents. Well, in the office of the Department of Interior there is a letter from the hon. gentleman, insisting that no patent shall issue to a certain man, because the hon. gentleman has a claim against him of $3,000.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Why should he not?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is men like him whom we charge with the disturbance, whom we charge with all the discontent and all the effect of the discontent in the North-West: men who have gone there to make their fortune by some means or other; men who get hold of the people—and when they say: Oh, the patents ought to be issued; we ought not to allow speculators to hold the country; we ought to have the patents issued on the very day; we ought to protect the settlers against the speculator and the shaver, the people going in with money to fleece the settlers—when this cry is raised we find it raised by men like the hon. gentleman, who will vote and attack the Government for delay in issuing patents, and who, yet, is one of those who will ask that a patent be delayed in order that he may get his pound of flesh. When we took office, in 1878, we had to consider this question. The Government before us had altogether ignored the rights of the half-breeds; they had refused to listen to the representations of their own agent, Mr. Matthew Ryan, made under his own hand. Until 1879 there was no legal power, and the Government before us did not ask that power to deal honestly or fairly with the claims of the half-breeds. We only came in in November, 1878, but in the Parliament of 1879 we took power to deal with that subject, according to the best of our discretion. We wished to do the best for the North-West; we wished to do the best for the half-breeds and the country generally; we could have no other object in view. We had just come into power, after a defeated, a discredited Administration had gone out, with the united voice of the majority of the people. We had everything to gain by doing what was right, and we attempted to do what was right. What did we do? We wrote to the leading men of the North-West. We wrote to Archbishop Taché and to the other bishops, of whom the hon. gentleman has spoken; we wrote to Mr. Laird, and we got their opinions, and their opinions were united against the granting of scrip; their opinions were united against giving patents to the half-breeds. The hon. gentleman did not read that Col. Denis, my respected, and worthy, and able deputy, who now, I am sorry to say, is retired, wrote that remarkable despatch to which the hon. gentleman alluded, a despatch creditable to him and in some degree creditable to me, as sanctioning every word he wrote, asking the best advice we could get as to what we would do with these people, to save them from their own improvidence and grant them their rights, so far as was consistent with the general prosperity of the country. At the expense of being a little tedious, I will look over what these hon. gentlemen have said. The confidential despatch or letter of Col. Dennis I need not read, because it has been alluded to with sufficient fulness by the hon. gentleman, but let us take the answer of Archbishop Taché. Nobody can doubt that he was a friend of the Indian; nobody can doubt that he was a friend of the half-breeds, and that, when he was writing back to the Department, he was pleading the cause of the half-breeds and fighting their battles, and pointing out, whether pleasing or displeasing to them, their interests. And what does he say? Does he advocate the granting of the scrip? Does he advocate the giving away of the lands? No; his opinion was quite the reverse. The hon. gentleman read a portion of this letter, in which he stated that the half-breeds are a highly sensitive race, that they feel and resent injury or insult; in fact, that they were daily humiliated in regard to their origin, and so on. Let us see what the Archbishop says:

"Every one acknowledges the desirability for the half-breeds to settle definitively on lands, to cultivate them. Here is a scheme I take the liberty to propose:

"(a.) I estimate the half-breed population actually in the North-West to number about twelve hundred families. Let the Government make twelve reserves for them, in the very places the half-breeds themselves will like to have them.

"(b.) Each reserve should be for one hundred families at least, and contain an area of twelve square miles of available land, that is to say, the extent of four townships.

"(c.) All the half-breeds, men, women and children, residing in the North-West on the 1st January, 1879, ought to receive two more negotiable scrips for eighty acres of land each, to be located by them in anyone of the twelve above-mentioned reserves.

"(d.) Said lands could neither be sold, mortgaged nor taxed, before they should have passed through the hands of, at least, the third generation of those who receive them, or of their representatives. I say, at least, because I am strongly inclined to believe that it is desirable that such land be entirely unalienable; and such an idea cannot seem unreasonable to those who consider the advantages deriving from a similar policy, with regard to real and unalienable estates of noblemen."

Now, every half-breed in the North-West, if he does not claim as an Indian and has not accepted as an Indian, belonging to an Indian band and enjoying all the advantages of an Indian, and they are great, because the treaties are liberal, the annuities are large, the supply of implements, cattle, seeds, and so on, is very generous, on the whole—and any half-breed who chooses to be an Indian can go with his tribe—but any half-breed who says I will be considered a white man has all the privileges of a white man; he can get his 160 acres, and after three years' cultivation he gets his land. Here is the friend of the half-breeds, Archbishop Taché, who says he shall not get that, but shall only have a claim to land, shall not have the use of it, unless he cultivates it himself, but he shall not be able to alienate it, that he cannot mortgage it or sell it; and who would take the land under these restrictions, when, under the more liberal law of the Dominion of Canada, every half-breed can enter himself for 160 acres and get his patent after three years, the same as an emigrant from Ontario and Quebec? So, when the Government took up the question which had been left on their hands unsettled, what was best to do for the half-breeds, they were told by Archbishop Taché that the half-breeds would get no land, no matter whether they settled upon it, no matter whether they built a house of marble or a house of clay, that they should have no rights upon it till the third generation. When that was presented to us, do you not think we should consider and pause before we handed over those lands to these people? Archbishop Taché, knowing and believing, having well ascertained that the granting of land to these people would lead to their alienating it for a few dollars, if a man wanted to make a present to his wife of a dress, or if the husband could get the present of a few dollars, or, perhaps, in some cases, a few gallons of whiskey. If we look over the various recommendations of the various bodies, in the North West we get the same result. Bishop MacLean who knew the country well, was not in favor of granting the patent for this land to these men. The bishop of Rupert's Land, who has lately gone there, honestly says he has been too short a time there to judge, and therefore he gives no opinion. But what does the North-West council of 1878 say? The hon. gentleman quoted a portion but not the whole of it. I have not the original document, but I will read it from a letter of Mr. Matthew Ryan, who was a member of the council that passed the order. This was the resolution passed by the North-West council:—

"That in view of the fact that grants of land and issues of scrip were made to the half-breeds of Manitoba towards the extinction of the Indian title for the lands of that Province, there will be dissatisfaction among the half-breeds of the Territories unless they receive some like consideration; that this consideration would most tend to the advantage of the half-breeds were it given in the form of a non-transferable location ticket for, say, 160 acres to each half-breed head of a family, and to each half-breed child at the time of the transfer to Canada, the ticket to be issued immediately to any half-breed of eighteen years or over, who furnishes evidence of his claim; that each half-breed obtaining such location ticket should be allowed to locate it upon any unoccupied Dominion lands, but the title of the land so entered should remain in the Crown for ten years."

The recommendation of Archbishop Taché was that the title should be kept away from the half-breeds for three generations. The recommendation of the council was that it should be kept away for ten years. What was the policy of the Government? Go, take your 160 acres; take your pre-emption for 160 acres more, and you shall stand as well as a white man, and shall get your patent after three years, no matter what the Archbishop or the North-West council have told us. We, the Government of the Dominion of Canada, have more confidence in the half-breeds even than their own Archbishop and their own council. We say: We give you the land; occupy it, cultivate it, live on it, be happy on it, and at the end of three years you will get 160 acres, and you will stand free and independent, a freeholder, a yeoman, a free man in the North-West. You shall not be subject to this paternal Government which has been urged upon you by your own friends in the North-West. Although we are so far away, although we do not know you, although we are charged with dealing unjustly by you, we have more confidence in you than your own friends. We will not ask you to remain for three generations as slaves of the soil—to remain ten years without your deed. We tell you that in three years you may go and occupy your land, and may God's blessing be with you. Sir, that is the policy of the Government, and that is the policy the hon. gentleman has maligned, that he has condemned, that he would curse. The policy of the Government has been generous, it has been free, it has been considerate, and mind you, Mr. Speaker, the Government have held that the land that he has is found in occupation of, and that he had the right to on the 15th July, 1870, that it was his, and the Government could not deprive him of it. The Dominion Act gave it to him. Every man, woman and child, under the Dominion laws, passed, I do not know whether originally by us and afterwards amended by the hon. gentlemen opposite, the Dominion Acts, one and all, declare that being in occupation of land before the Act passed they have now an inalienable right to their lands, no matter whether they are on odd-numbered or even-numbered sections. The Act says that in all unsurveyed lands the party, found in possession shall retain possession of that land, not only the half-breeds, whether English or French, but every white settler, every man in the North-West, whether he is a Hudson Bay factor, or clerk, or runner—every one of them had their rights under the Dominion Lands Act. It did not, in any way, interfere with the rights of the settlers. Everyone of those men may say to us: We have occupied this land; this is ours; we will get out a deed for that, and that is secured to us by the Dominion Lands Act; but we will take up, as settlers, 160 acres of land elsewhere. Every half-breed has that right. No one could deprive him of it. No one could say: If you are going to take your 160 acres as a homestead, you will lose your land as an old settler. They had a right to both, and those claims have been rejected; those claims are now inherent. And I tell you this, as I said before, that no one, no man, no woman, has been dispossessed or distressed since the Government of Canada came into possession of that country. Well, Sir, what had the Government to do? We had all our friends; we had the Archbishop; we had even Mr. Jackson, of whom the hon. gentleman has spoken, who now represents the half-breeds in the North-West council; we had him stating that there should be no grant given to the half-breeds, except on condition of five years of continuous occupation. There was a conflict of opinion; I will not trouble the House with showing that there was an infinity of opinions; an infinity of advice was offered to the Government, how best to deal with the half-breeds, and the Government had only one thing to think of—what was the best for the people, what was it best to do for them, to save them even against their own improvidence, and at the same time not to keep back the settlement of the country. This, Mr. Speaker, may account, to any reasonable man, for what the hon. gentleman talks of as delay. They were not suffering anything. The half-breed had his own lot, he was not cultivating the land that he had. Giving him his land and giving him more land was giving him nothing. The nomadic half-breed, who had been brought up to hunt, having had merely his shanty to repair to in the dead season, when there was no game—what advantage was it to him to give him 160 or 240 acres more? It was of no use to him whatever, but it would have been of great use to the speculators who were working on him and telling him that he was suffering. Oh! How awfully he was suffering, ruined, destroyed, starving, because he did not get 240 acres somewhere else, or the scrip for it, that he might sell it for $50! No, Sir; the whole thing is a farce. Now, Mr. Speaker, we, at the last moment, made concessions, and we did it for the sake of peace. The Government knew, my hon. friend, Sir David Macpherson, the Minister of Interior, knew that we were not acting in the interests of the half-breeds in granting them scrip, in granting him the land. We had tried, after consulting man after man, expert after expert, to find what was best for the country, and we found, without one single exception, they were all opposed to granting unlimited scrip and immediate patents to the half-breeds. But, Sir, an agitation arose, and the hon. gentlemen has rung the changes on Riel being brought into that country. Who brought him into the country? Not the Indians; not the half-breeds. The half-breeds did not pay the money. The white speculators in Prince Albert gave their money to Gabriel Dumont, and gave it to Lepine, and gave it to others. They had all got their assignments from the half-breeds; they had all got in their pockets the scrip or the assignment, and they sent down to bring Riel in as an agent to be a means of attaining their unhallowed ends. It is to the white men, it is to men of our own race and lineage, and not to the half-breeds, nor yet to the Indians, that we are to attribute the war, the loss of life, the loss of money, and the discredit that this country would have suffered had it not been for the gallant conduct of our volunteers. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am able to prove that there has been a deep-laid conspiracy. I am able to establish that the cry of the half-breed grievances was merely a pretext. I am able to show that white man after white man has entered into it. And I tell you this, further, Mr. Speaker—I do not mean in the least degree to impugn the hon. member for West Durham; I do not at all mean to say that he was in any way a party to it; but I tell him this, and I can prove this, that they have unscrupulously used his name and used the name of his party, and they have used that name, not only in the North-West with the half-breeds, not only along the frontier, but they have used it at Washington; at Washington his name has been quoted. I do not believe the hon. gentleman is liable to the charge; but it only shows that you cannot touch pitch without becoming fouled. The hon. gentleman, I know, in his anxiety to get evidence against this Government, in his anxiety to get evidence, no matter from whom or in what way—I can show, if need be, under his own handwriting and signature, that he has gone very far.

Mr. BLAKE. Show it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will prove it, with very great reluctance. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman ever heard of a person called J. E. Brown.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very well. J. E. Brown was a man formerly in the Mounted Police in the North-West. J. E. Brown living in that country employed himself in the very useful but perhaps unpopular occupation of trying to be a detective. J. E. Brown, in his anxiety, not only to extol the merits of the North-West but also, perhaps, to do a little in a pecuniary way, wrote to the hon. member for the west riding of Durham, and told him he could give him a good deal of information—and he would like to get a pass. The hon. gentleman said he could not give him a pass, but he would try to see him in Toronto, and if he could not do so, he would try and get a confidential friend to see him. I have not the man's letter, but I have the hon. gentleman's reply. The man must have written saying: I am going to apply for a survey from the Dominion Government; it will prove rather inconvenient to me if I lost the office, and therefore, perhaps, you will not use my name in that connection, but treat it confidentially, until after I get the appointment. Then, of course, I will give you the information. The hon. gentleman answered him, that he would keep all his communications confidential until after he had got the office. J. E. Brown was to come to the Government here, and was to go on his knees and say he was a friend of the Government, and appeal to the Government and get employment on a survey, and then supply the hon. gentleman with information. The hon. gentleman indicates that I have not got those letters.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not say you have not got these letters.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then we will read them. Mr. Blake writes:

“OTTAWA, 7th May.

“I have your letter of the 6th, and should be very glad indeed to learn from you any facts connected with the management of affairs in the North-West Territories. I would willingly comply with your request for a pass to Ottawa if it were in my power, but I have no means of procuring railway passes. It is possible, though by no means certain, I may be in Toronto for a few hours within the next few days, and if so I would try to arrange an interview with you, or if I am unable to manage that, I can arrange an interview with a confidential friend of mine, who would note down, for my own ear only, all you should choose to communicate, if this would be agreeable to you.

“Yours faithfully,
“EDWARD BLAKE.”

That is the prologue to the play.

“OTTAWA, 12th May, 1885.

“DEAR SIR,—I have your letter, and will ask a friend to make an appointment with you. I will take care, as you desire, that your name shall not be used to your prejudice. I will not disclose it until you have had ample opportunity of securing an appointment for the surveys this year, if you are fortunate enough to do so. But I fancy there will not be a great deal of surveying done. I should gladly assist you in procuring employment if it were in my power, but I have no means of forwarding your interests in this respect. With thanks for your good wishes,

In the hon. gentleman's anxiety to show what a wicked Government this is, to prove how derelict it is in its duty, that it deserves the censure of the country, he tells this man to go on, apply for a position on the surveys, get it if he can, although he does not think there will be many surveys this year, and he will not reveal his name until after he has got the appointment. Then information is to be given by this man who came on his knees to the Government, to show how the Government were injuriously affecting the interests of the country. That is not the way an hon. member usually gets information. We find, in consequence of the continual pressure of the white men, in consequence of the fact that the half-breeds at Prince Albert were the slaves of the white men, of the fact that they held meetings and might rise in arms or might do whatever the white men chose to ask them to do—we made up our mind that although we did not consider it for the interest of the people in the Territories, yet if they would accept nothing else, and we offered them 160 acres of land—if they would place themselves at the mercy of cormorants, who were ruining them and holding them as slaves, and continually keeping up an agitation, we cannot help it; we will give you scrip, although we know it is not in your interest, and it will be thrown away, and will be secured by people who will give you the smallest possible sum for it; but we cannot help it; this matter must be settled. I do not hesitate to say that I did it with the greatest reluctance. I do not easily yield, if there is a better course open; but at the very last moment I yielded, and I said: "Well, for God's sake let them have the scrip; they will either drink it or waste it or sell it; but let us have peace." And my successor, my respected and able successor, Sir David Macpherson, acted upon that decision, which was carried out in January. At that time we knew there was a discontented people; that the white people were making trouble. I say, and I appeal to the judgment of the House to say, if we did not act as we ought to have acted when, in 1879, when we took possession of the Government, when we found that the Government who were behind us had taken not a single step to settle this question; when we found that the Government had denied the right of the half-breed; when the whole thing was thrown upon us—if we did not act wisely, afterwards when we took power, when we went to the chief men of the country, to the men who were known to be friends of the half-breeds, when we went to the hierarchy and the clergy, both Catholic and Protestant; we went to everybody who could give us information, and they were unanimous in saying that it was wrong that this scrip should be used in this way, and that the land could be got possession of for little or nothing. We held out as long as we could, but such was the influence of the half-breeds, who already got a share of their lands in Manitoba, that they went to the North-West, they became dwellers on the plains, they played Indians, and pretended that they had lived in Manitoba; that they were suffering; that their Manitoba friends had got lands and scrip; and nine-tenths of the men claiming it had already got scrip, and were attempting to put up bargains in the North-West. Fourteen out of seventeen petitioners, in one case, were shown to have got lands already in Manitoba. Isidore Dumont, brother of Gabriel Dumont, had land; he applied again, and it was one of his grievances that he did not get more land in the North-West. Gabriel Dumont got not only his 160 acres, as promised, but he had the best house in Batoche; and so it was with very many of these men—they had already got their lands and scrip, but they were greedy to get more. Appetite grew with eating; and though they had got all much more than originally by law they ought to have got, they are clamoring for more. If time would permit, I could prove many such cases; but, perhaps, I may take another occasion, as the hon. gentleman has said we are going to hear from him again on this subject—I may take another occasion to show that the fact of the half-breed not getting, at the moment he wants it, his scrip or his claim for 240 acres, was a mere pretence; yet, Riel, from the beginning, when he went into the country until he left, went there for the purpose of making money. He came there for the most sordid purposes possible, and he told all kinds of lies. Among other things, he said that the hon. member for East York, when he was in the Government offered him $20,000, and I offered him $30,000—he remembered perhaps, the old matter, when he got some money on the frontier, in order to clear away. One of the letters read to-day by the hon. gentleman was that he had been promised a senatorship or a seat in the Cabinet. He came there, and he ruled these men for the most sordid purposes. The white men in Prince Albert and the vicinity, or many of them, subscribed to bring him there, and encouraged him there, for the sake of making a little fuss and drawing attention to Prince Albert and for the sake of threatening the Government into settling the claims of the half-breeds, or, in other words, putting money into their pockets. Sir, I shall not detain the House any longer on the subject. As the hon. gentleman has stated, it is a subject which cannot rest here. This subject must be fully dealt with. I have not alluded to the statements of the hon. gentleman, with respect to the land regulations, the treatment of the whites; and these questions the hon. gentleman has ingeniously mixed up with the question he brought before the House. He has been preparing himself for, I will not say how long, while this House was studiously and earnestly discussing the Franchise Bill; while they were occupied night and day working out that great problem, the hon. gentleman was diving into this question. Well, he has dived into it, and he has gone pretty low into its depths. The hon. gentleman first took up the half-breeds, then the land laws, then the whites, then the colonisation companies—and I do not know what else. But let him take each subject separately, clause by clause, sentence by sentence, impeachment by impeachment, charge by charge, and deal with them, and I shall meet him, and convince this House that the charges are groundless, that the Government are safe and sound, in the opinions of the people and of the country, because they have done what they believed to be the best in their judgment, ought to be done; and because I know that although perhaps they may have made occasional mistakes, although in the tentative process of settling a new country, they have committed, perhaps, an occasional error, they were not too proud to change; and when they came to the conclusion that they had committed an error, they did not indulge in the miserable vanity of thinking they could do no wrong. When they found that any of their conclusions, from their own judgment or on reference to their responsible officers, had better be altered, they were brave enough and honest enough to admit the error, and cure the error, and make amendment. What was the consequence? Sir, I believe we stand well among the whites of the North-West. I know we stand well with the red men of the North-West.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says hear, hear, but I can prove by the testimony of every Indian that has been in arms—of Poundmaker, and Big Bear, and Beardy, and Little Pine, and Little Poplar, and all those Indians—I can show to you, not only that they have been well treated, but that those who have been their guardians, their clergy, and those who watched over them, admit that the Indians had no wrongs to redress; and if you will read the press of the North-West, read such papers as the Saskatchewan Herald, and will find that we were wrong—that we have been pampering and coaxing the Indians; that we must take a new course, we must vindicate the position of the white man, we must teach the Indians what law is; we must not pauperise them, as they say we have been doing.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says hear, hear. Why, Sir, I have come to this House again and again and stated the case of the Indians. I have said it was a case of hardship, and we could not, as christian men, allow them to starve. We have done all we could to put them on themselves; we have done all we could to make them work as agriculturists; we have done all we could, by the supply of cattle, agricultural implements and instruction, to change them from a nomadic to an agricultural life. We have had very considerable success; we have had infinitely more success during our short period, than the United States have had during twenty five years. We have had a wonderful success; but still we have had the Indians; and then in these half-breeds, enticed by white men, the savage instinct was awakened; the desire of plunder—aye, and, perhaps, the desire of scalping—the savage idea of a warlike glory, which pervades the breast of most men, civilised or uncivilised, was aroused in them, and forgetting all the kindness that had been bestowed upon them, forgetting all the gifts that had been given to them, forgetting all that the Government, the white people and the Parliament of Canada had been doing for them, in trying to rescue them from barbarity; forgetting that we had given them reserves, the means to cultivate those reserves, and the means of education how to cultivate them—forgetting all these things, they rose against us. Why, Sir, we are not responsible for that; we cannot change the barbarian, the savage, into a civilised man. Look at the United States; consider the millions that they have expended in defending their frontier; look at the war that is now going on on the south-western frontier, where there is infinitely more loss of life among the tribes of Apaches than has occurred in all our North-West. It is an inglorious war, and there has been a great loss of life; but Americans do not take the part of the rebel and the traitor; that is reserved for the leader of the Opposition in the Parliament of Canada. We acquired the North-West country in 1870. Not a life was lost, not a blow was struck, not a pound nor a dollar was spent in warfare, in that long period that has since intervened. I have not hesitated to tell this House, again and again, that we could not always hope to maintain peace with the Indians; that the savage was still a savage, and that until he ceased to be savage, we were always in danger of a collision, in danger of war, in danger of an outbreak. I am only surprised that we have been able so long to maintain peace—that from 1870 until 1885 not one single blow, not one single murder, not one single loss of life, has taken place. Look at the United States; along the whole frontier of the United States there has been war; millions have been expended there; their best and their bravest have fallen. I personally knew General Custer, and admired the gallant soldier, the American hero; yet he went, and he fell with his band, and not a man was left to tell the tale—they were all swept away. The American army have suffered by hundreds; the American Treasury has been depleted by millions. We have, from a combination of unfortunate circumstances, had one war inconsiderately commenced, wickedly commenced, criminally commenced by the instigators. We put that down speedily and gallantly; and, Sir, it is one consolation, that if we have seen young men sacrificed, if we have lost from this House, as a consequence of that war, one of the most respected members, they went up there of their own accord to fight the battle of their country; they have gained glory and distinction, and they have convinced, not only us—we do not want that conviction—but the mother country, in whose good opinion we take so much pride, that we have as good a militia as their own, that we have men who, untrained as they are, still can listen to the voice of discipline, and will do everything they are called upon to do to maintain the credit of their country. Their action has raised the credit of Canada, not only among the right-minded thinking men of the world, but even in the sordid purlieus of the stock exchange. The credit of Canada has risen, because Canada has shown, as a vindicator of herself, that she is worthy of being a nation, and worthy of the credit of the world.

Mr. LAURIER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 1:10 a.m., Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 7th July, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE DISTURBANCE IN THE NORTH-WEST.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bowell: That the House resolve itself again into Committee of Ways and Means, and the motion of Mr. Blake in amendment thereto.

Mr. LAURIER. There is an old saying well known to all of us that a good lawyer can make of a bad cause a good one. The speech of the right hon. gentleman yesterday must have convinced everyone of us that there are cases so desperately bad that all the ingenuity of the ablest counsel cannot make them appear good. The case must be desperate indeed when a gentleman of the high position which the right hon. gentleman occupies in this House, does not scruple to torture the words of his opponent, in order to make out a case for himself. In the very beginning of his speech, the hon. gentleman adopted that system, and he kept it up to the end. In almost his opening sentence the right hon. gentleman stated that my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition—in the long, as he characterised it, and as he might have said, the most able speech ever delivered by my hon. friend—while presenting the claims of the half-breeds in the North-West Territories to a special grant of land, had not in a single instance stated that the claim was a just one. The hon. gentleman forgot, and he should not have forgotten, that my hon. friend at the very outset of his speech affirmed the justice of the case of the half-breeds in the most characteristic manner, in the following language:

"Justice is the same everywhere. Justice is the same, whether it be on the banks of the Saskatchewan or on the banks of the Red River; justice demands that the same treatment which has been extended to the half-breeds on the banks of the Red River shall also be extended to the half-breeds on the banks of the Saskatchewan."

The right hon. gentleman, Sir, forgot that statement, and the case has to be a desperate one indeed when it has to be supported with such a distortion of facts. Again, the hon. gentleman, proceeding in the same line, in order to clear himself of the charge that was brought against him of having failed for seven years to dispose of the claims of the half-breeds, stated that the Mackenzie Administration had not only failed to dispose of those claims, but had actually denied their justice; and in order to prove his statement he proceeded to quote with great apparent glee from a State paper of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) while in the Mackenzie Government. That paper was addressed to Mr. Laird, at that time Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories, in answer to an application made by him for seed grain on behalf of the half-breeds. The hon. member for Bothwell wrote as follows:—

"The application of the petitioners to be aided by the Government with seed and agricultural implements in their farming operations, I confess I am not disposed to view favorably. I do not see upon what grounds the half-breeds can claim to be treated in this particular, different from the white settlers in the Territories.

"The half-breeds who have, in some respects, the advantages over new settlers in the Territories, should be impressed with the necessity of settling down in fixed localities and directing their energies towards pastoral or agricultural pursuits, in which case lands would, no doubt, be assigned to them in the same way as to white settlers. But beyond this they must not look to the Government for any special assistance in their farming operations."

So that this paper of my hon. friend from Bothwell did not at all apply to the question of the lands and the extinguishment of the Indian title, but it applied to the treatment of the half-breeds and their claim to be aided by being furnished seed, and agricultural implements. That was all, and yet during the whole of the speech of the right hon. gentleman, he insisted that the Mackenzie Government had denied the claims of the half-breeds to a special grant of land in extinguishment of the Indian title. Then again, continuing in the same strain, the right hon. gentleman charged his predecessors with dereliction of duty, because they had failed, while in power, to settle the land claims of the half-breeds. Sir, is it possible that the right hon. gentleman had the courage to advance such a plea as this in justification of himself? How long is it since the Mackenzie Administration has fallen from power? It is six full years; nearly seven years have elapsed since then. Well, Mr. Speaker, if it was a crime in the Mackenzie Administration to have failed to settle those claims, how can the hon. gentleman defend himself when he has allowed nearly seven years to elapse without doing so either? The charge against the Mackenzie Administration is perfectly groundless, as I shall demonstrate before I take my seat, but if that pretended excuse be the only justification which the right hon. gentleman can urge in his behalf, I leave it to the judgment of this country to say whether it is a sufficient justification or not. Now, the hon. gentleman proceeded very exultingly to declare that there had been no case of oppression, that there was not even a pretension that the people had been oppressed, that not a single half-breed had been removed from his holding. No cause for oppression! Why, Mr. Speaker, was it not oppression when men had long been settled upon their lands, even before the country was transferred to Canada, when they had made homes for themselves, when they had put buildings upon their lands, and when, under the policy of the present Government, land surveyors were sent among them, who ran lines across their fields, splitting up farms and fields, who ran their lines so as to put the buildings on one side and the field on the other; and after these people had sent delegation after delegation to this Government for redress, had been constantly refused redress. If this was not a case of oppression, I would like to know what can constitute oppression in the eyes of the right hon. gentleman? The homes of these people were invaded—not accidentally but deliberately—under the policy of the Government for the survey of that country; and yet, the hon. gentleman says there was no case of oppression. Sir, what was it then that Father André protested against when he wrote to the Government in the following manner, first setting forth that settlers there have settled according to the old customs, ten chains fronting on the river; and trusting the Government would survey accordingly, he adds:

"Their surprise may be imagined when they saw the lands along the Saskatchewan measured off into squares of forty chains, without heed being given to their just claims and protests."

What is it that Father Vigreville protested against when he wrote to Captain Devile, chief of the surveys:

"I, myself, caused Mr. Duck, the Dominion land surveyor, to write several times to Ottawa, and always without success, until finally I became discouraged myself, and several people were obliged to leave the settlement, some selling their land for a nominal price, and others abandoning it without any compensation.

Mr. LAURIER,

"In February, 1883, the Rev. Father Leduc and Mr. Maloney were deputed by the settlement to set forth our complaints and present our demands to the Government. They were given a written promise that the lands we occupied should be surveyed in river lots of 10 chains frontage by 2 miles in depth, and that this survey should take place in the autumn following (1883). I understand you to tell me to have patience; that everything will come out right in the end. Those are words which, permit me to say, I cannot accept; the time is past.

The hon. gentleman then proceeded to say that no half-breed had ever been molested, that no half-breed had ever lost his holding. In an organ of the Government, Le Manitoba, of 13th May last, I find the following letter from half-breeds, which was first published in English in the Edmonton Bulletin. I have it here in French, and I will re-translate it into the original English. This is what the paper goes on to say:

"Far from obtaining liberal terms, we have not even obtained justice. Last summer we had the agent of the Government to settle all questions relating to lands in this locality. If the agent's only object had been to provoke the half-breed rebellion, he could not have done better than by following the course he has done, and giving the decision he has recorded, which decisions are always characterised by the most manifest injustice. It would be impossible to state a case of a section of land in dispute between a half-breed and a stranger where the half-breed has not been sacrificed. In many instances half-breeds who for a long time have been in possession of these lands, have had their lands taken away from them and divided among strangers newly arrived; and these unfortunate half-breeds have been thereby forced to leave the place and go and settle elsewhere, where the same fate perhaps awaits them in the future. Is it believed we have no grievances? We have grievances and we feel them deeply.

Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to say that the whole blame of the rebellion and its consequence must be cast upon the Grit party. When the hon. gentleman has made such a statement as I have just referred to, that there are no grievances among the half-breeds in the North-West, he may as well say that the Grit party is responsible for the rebellion and all its consequences. Such rant—for such language is nothing more than rant—is unworthy of him. Yet, such language is quite in keeping with the language which the hon. gentleman has used ever since the opening of these troubles. Ever since these North-West troubles arose the tactics of hon. gentlemen have been to wash their hands of all responsibility and proclaim themselves quite innocent of the blood shed, and lay all the blame on the insurgents. To every enquiry made, as to the origin of these troubles the same answer is given: The half-breeds have no cause, they have no grievances. Such has been the language of the hon. gentleman all through. Speaking on a recent occasion on the same subject, he stated, what he repeated again yesterday, that the half-breeds had no cause, that the rebellion was a causeless rebellion; and he concluded in the following language:—

"We believe, with all the consciousness of being right, that the judgment of the country will be that we have acted well, that we have acted to the best of our abilities, and that, in this case, our abilities have not been wrongly directed."

And again, speaking on the same subject on another occasion, he made another declaration. At that time he believed that the rebellion was not due to the Grit party—that is a new thought, a new grievance—but was due to Louis Riel. He said:

"From former occurrences in the North-West, he (Riel) is considered a sort of martyr in the cause—a sort of half-breed Mahdī—and they look up to him with a sort of superstitious regard, and from that feeling he is able to act upon these poor people."

Such was the language of the hon. gentleman. The only explanation he could give of the rebellion has been this: That the insurgents have no grievances, but that they had been the victims and dupes of Louis Riel. Such an explanation is exceedingly futile. From what we know of Louis Riel, he does not appear to be one of those extraordinary men, who can command general sway over their fellow countrymen. And there is no man in the world, whatever his power may be, who could take men from a state of peace and bring them into war, simply by his influence, unless there were deep-seated and long-felt feelings of grievances. The hon. gentleman compared Louis Riel to the Mahdi. We know little about the Mahdi. But we do know this: That the people of the Soudan who were brought into rebellion had been suffering for years and years from most despotic rule. They had been for years ground by excessive taxation, and the Mahdi brought them into rebellion, by promising to relieve them from the state of suffering in which they were then placed. I can illustrate what I am now saying, that no man however powerful, can exercise such influence as is attributed to Louis Riel, by a page from our own history. Few men have there been anywhere who have wielded greater sway over his fellow-countrymen than did Mr. Papineau at a certain time in the history of Lower Canada, and no man ever lived who had been more profusely endorsed by nature to be the idol of a nation. A man of commanding presence, of majestic countenance, of impassioned eloquence, of unblemished character, of pure disinterested patriotism, for years and years he held over the hearts of his fellow countrymen almost unbounded sway, and even to this day the mention of his name will arouse throughout the length and breadth of Lower Canada, a thrill of enthusiasm in the breasts of all, men or women old or young. What was the secret of that great power he held at one time? Was it simply his eloquence, his commanding intellect, or even his pure patriotism? No doubt, they all contributed; but the main cause of his authority over his fellow-countrymen was this, that at that time, his fellow countrymen were an oppressed race, and he was the champion of their cause. But when the day of relief came, the influence of Mr. Papineau, however great it might have been and however great it still remained, ceased to be paramount. When eventually the Union Act was carried, Papineau violently assaulted it, showed all its defects, deficiencies and dangers, and yet he could not raise his followers and the people to agitate for the repeal of that Act. What was the reason? The conditions were no more the same. Imperfect as was the Union Act it still gave a measure of freedom and justice to the people, and men who at the mere sound of Mr. Papineau's voice would have gladly courted death on battle fields or scaffold, then stood silent and irresponsible, though he asked them nothing more than a constitutional agitation for a repeal of the Union Act. Conditions were no more the same; tyranny and oppression had made rebels of the people of Lower Canada, while justice and freedom made them true and loyal subjects, which they have been ever since. And now to tell us that Louis Riel, simply by his influence, could bring these men from peace to war; to tell us that they had no grievances; to tell us that they were brought into a state of rebellion either through pure malice or through imbecile adherence to an adventurer, is an insult to the intelligence of the people at large, and an unjust aspersion on the people of the Saskatchewan. The hon. gentleman tells us that the people of the Saskatchewan river have no wrongs, this is but a continuation of the system which has been followed all along with regard to these people. They have been denied their just rights, and now they are slandered by the same men whose unjust course towards them drove them to the unfortunate proceedings they have adopted since. This I do charge upon the Government: that they have for years and years ignored the just claims of the half breeds of the Saskatchewan, that for years and years, these people have been petitioning the Government and always in vain. I say they have been treated by this Government with an indifference amounting to undisguised contempt, that they have been goaded into the unfortunate course they have adopted, and if this rebellion be a crime, I say the responsibility for that crime weighs as much upon the men who, by their conduct, have caused the rebellion, as upon those who engaged in it. The right hon. gentleman said yesterday that the leader of the opposition had prepared a brief for the lawyers of Louis Riel.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear; that is true.

Mr. LAURIER. They say now it is true. I say this, that if the conduct of the Government is part of the defence of Louis Riel, then the Government must take the consequences. It will not do for them to say: You must not attack us, because by attacking us you will save Louis Riel. The Government have put Louis Riel on his trial for life and death, and I suppose it is not his blood they are looking for. I suppose, if they are looking to anything, they are looking to nothing but substantial British justice, and if, in the facts brought out yesterday by my hon. friend, there is something which would go in favor of the defence of Louis Riel, then Louis Riel has the full right to that part of his defence. I say more. I repeat that I do not believe that the men who to-day have put Louis Riel on his trial for his life and death do not desire his blood, that they are only looking for justice; and if justice requires that in the numerous papers which have been suppressed, which have not been brought down to this House, there is anything which can go in favor of Louis Riel's defence, it is their duty to bring them down, and if they were concealing anything which could serve for the defence of Louis Riel, I would charge them with helping to his murder, if he were tried in the absence of such portion of his defence. It will not do for the hon. gentleman to attempt to rouse the prejudices of the masses with respect to this matter. There are prejudices in this country of many kinds. We are not yet so built up as a nation as to forget our respective origins, and I say frankly that the people of my own Province, who have a community of origin with the insurgents, sympathise with them, just as the sympathies of the people of Ontario who are of a different origin would go altogether in the other direction.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, sir.

Mr. LAURIER. No? Why is it then that it was repeated yesterday, that it is repeated to-day in the press, that it will be asserted and repeated to-morrow, and again and again, that my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, has prepared a brief for the lawyers of Louis Riel. Why, Sir, that is appealing to the worst kind and the lowest prejudices of the masses. It is said, and truly said, in your language, Sir, that blood is thicker than water. I am of French origin, and I confess that if I were to act only from the blood which runs in my veins, it would carry me strongly in favor of these people; but above all, I claim to be in favor of what is just and right and fair, to be in favor of justice to every man, and I say, let justice be done, and let the consequences fall upon the guilty ones, whether on the head of Louis Riel, or on the shoulders of the Government. Sir, the Government are all the more unjustifiable in their conduct, that the experience of the past ought to have made them more cautious. It is an ominous fact that, although this young Confederation has existed only eighteen years, it has already been assailed twice by armed rebellion. Of the first rebellion we now know the causes. Light has been let upon that subject. What was the cause of the first rebellion on the Red River in 1869 and 1870? The cause as we now know, is, that the Government—this Government, the men who are in power now, and who were in power then—attempted to take possession of the country without any regard to the rights of the people as a whole, whilst they invaded the rights of the people as individuals. It may be conceived that these people, who had been accustomed to the wild liberty of the prairie, who had been accustomed for generations and generations to rove all over the whole continent, who looked upon the country as their own, and regarded as their own every plot of land on which they chose to pitch their tents; I say it may be well conceived that these people, half wild as they were, would regard with something like jealousy the doings of a Government which suddenly came in upon them, and assumed authority over the Territory. Then what took place at that time? One would have thought that it would have been at least prudent on the part of the Government to take some conciliatory steps towards these people, but instead of that they went into the country and treated the people as people used to be treated in feudal times, as if they had been part and parcel of the territory which was purchased from the Hudson's Bay Company—treating the people, I say, as if they were serfs in feudal times—part of the ground which was sold. The people resented such a course. But that was not all. The Government attempted a system of survey which was the most odious that could be devised for the people. Some of the people had holdings or properties, with fields and buildings, and the surveyors sent by the Government paid no heed to their holdings, but ran their lines across their possessions, and, as might be imagined, a great disturbance took place. The facts are well illustrated by the history of the rebellion, and I cannot do better on this subject than quote the following from the report of Mr. Donald A. Smith, who was at that time appointed agent to investigate the matter:

"A not inconsiderable number of them remained true to their allegiance during all the trouble through which they have had to pass, and with these will now be found associated many others whose minds had for a time been poisoned with gross misrepresentations made by designing men, for their own selfish ends. A knowledge of the true state of the case of the advantages they would derive from a union with Canada, had been carefully kept from them, and they were told to judge of Canadians generally by the acts and bearing of some of the less reflecting immigrants, who had denounced them as cumberers of the ground, who must speedily make way for a superior race about to pour in upon them. It is also true that in the unauthorised proceedings of some of the recent Canadian arrivals, some plausible ground had been given for the jealousy and alarm with which the contemplated change of Government was regarded by the native population. In various localities these adventurers had been industriously marking off for themselves considerable, and in some cases very extensive and exceptionally valuable tracts of land, thereby impressing the minds of the people with the belief that the time had come when, in their own country, they were to be entirely supplanted by strangers—a belief, however, I have no doubt, which might have been entirely precluded by the prevention of all such operations, until Canada had fully unfolded her policy and shown the groundlessness of these fears."

Upon the same subject, a book written by Mr. Tuttle, "The History of Manitoba," speaks as follows upon the attitude and the feeling of the French half-breeds:—

"The feeling of the French half-breeds may be briefly expressed as this: That they questioned the right of the Dominion Government to take possession of what they considered their country, without their consent. The feeling was shown in the stoppage of the surveyors, Snow and Webb."

More characteristic yet, a pamphlet, written by Louis Riel, in 1874, and published at the office of the Nouveau Monde, reads thus:

"The North-West Territories were transferred to Canada only on the 15th July, 1870; but Canada commenced in 1868-69 public works in its own name, in Rupert's Land and the North-West, without having obtained the authority of the Hudson Bay Company. The arrival of the Canadian agents in the country was signalised by the contempt which they affected for the authority of the Hudson Bay Company and for the old settlers. They attempted to take possession of the best lands of the half-breeds, especially at Pointe des Chênes, a parish about 30 miles east of Fort Garry. They pretended that they had bought those lands from the Indians. After Mr. Snow had commenced the work of the Dawson route between the Lake of the Woods and Pointe des Chênes, in 1868, in the name of Canada, another intruder under the same authority, commenced a survey in the summer of 1869 around Fort Garry, of the public and private lands as well under a new system of survey which deranged, without explanation at all, the existing order of things, and disturbed without scruple the old settlers in the peaceful and legal possession of their lands."

So, Sir, you see that the grievances of the half-breeds at that time were two-fold. They complained first that Canada had taken possession of their country without respect for their rights as a people; and they complained, in the second place, that the Government, by their system of survey, had invaded their actual possessions and properties. Well, they rebelled; they could not stand this; and the consequence of this rebellion, whatever it may have been otherwise, was that the Government were forced to grant to the half-breeds what they had denied hitherto; that is, the Government acknowledged their right of sovereignty in the land by the distribution of 1,400,000 acres among them, in extinguishment of the Indian title, and abandoned the old system of survey and adopted a new system by which the holdings of the half-breeds were respected. Now, it might have been hoped that the experience of the past would have made the Government more cautious, and would have taught them to treat a highly sensitive people like the half-breeds, with something like fairness and consideration. Indeed, the Government seem to be just like the Bourbons, who, according to Napoleon, neither learned anything nor forgot anything; in this matter the Government seem not to have learned anything or forgotten anything. I say the present Government are far more open to censure for the uprising on the Saskatchewan River than they were for the uprising on the Red River. Guilty as they were in 1869 for their treatment of the half-breeds on the Red River, this, at least, might be said in attenuation, that they had no time to change their policy—that the rebellion sprang up on them before they had time to retrace their steps and correct the errors which more caution at the outset might have averted. But on this present occasion, if millions of dollars have been expended within a few weeks, if valuable lives have been lost and some of the most precious blood of Canada has been shed, if the horrors of civil war, and worse yet of Indian war, have to be deplored, what is the reason? Is it because the Government have not had time to mend a vicious policy, to retrace their steps? Sir, it is because for years and years the Government have pursued a system which they are even now pursuing, of denying that the people had grievances to complain of. It is because for years and years the Government have closed their ears not to hear the complaints, because they have closed their eyes not to see the wrongs, because they have acted like the ostrich which buries its head in the sand so as not to see the danger, and thus ignores the danger; this is the reason that we have had an uprising on the Saskatchewan; and as I said, the Government are far more open to censure for this uprising than they were for the uprising of 1869-70. There was no disturbance on the Saskatchewan River in 1869-70, and the reason is obvious; in 1869-70 the Government had not attempted to assert their authority on the banks of the Saskatchewan River; they did not push on their authority at that time beyond the Red River, and therefore the people on the Saskatchewan River, not being interfered with in any way, continued to live as they had lived hitherto. But the day came when the Government of Canada undertook to assert their authority on the Saskatchewan, and properly so, in order to open that fine country to immigration from the east, the half-breeds on that river showed the same anxiety and made the same claims as the half-breeds on the Red River had done. I have shown you that the claims of the half-breeds on the Red River were two-fold—they claimed that their rights to the soil should be recognised in some manner and they were recognised; and they asked that they should not be troubled in their holdings, and those claims were conceded to them. As soon as the Canadian Government attempted to assert their authority on the Saskatchewan River, the half-breeds there made exactly the same claims. At the outset they demanded nothing more or less than that their rights to the soil and their rights in the extinguishment of the Indian title should be recognised, and that the lands they held, they should be allowed to continue to hold without disturbance. With regard to the first question, I am not aware, though the hon. gentleman said to the contrary yesterday, that the half-breeds of Saskatchewan River ever formulated any demand as to lands before the year 1878, or the last days of 1877. The hon. gentleman said that demands had been made to the Government of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie). I believe that some demands from the Qu'Appelle district were made before 1878, but no demand, so far as I am aware, from the banks of the Saskatchewan, came to the Government before 1878; and the reason is obvious. The country had just only been opened for settlement; the Government had not attempted to exercise authority over the territory for more than 3 years; Mr. Laird, who was the first Lieutenant Governor, was appointed in 1876, and he only reached Battleford in 1877; in fact it took him several months of travel to get at the seat of Government at Battleford. In 1877, a petition was formulated by the half-breeds, and it ran as follows:—

"Your petitioners would humbly represent that their rights to a participation in the issue of half-breed or old settlers scrip are as valid and binding as those of the half-breeds and old settlers of Manitoba, and are expected by them to be regarded as scrupulously as in that Province; and with a view to the adjustment of the same your petitioners would humbly request that a census of said half-breeds and old settlers be taken at as early a date as may be conveniently determined upon, with a view to apportioning to those of them, who have not already been included in the census of Manitoba, their just allotments of land and scrip."

Then, some time in the month of February, a deputation came from St. Laurent to interview Mr. Laird about the same matter, and they presented him a petition, making in substance, the same demand. This petition was addressed, not to the Government at Ottawa, but to the Lieutenant Governor himself; he referred it to his council; the council did not sit until the following month of August; and in that month the council adopted the resolution which has been several times quoted yesterday, whereby the claims of the half-breeds for an apportionment of land were presented to the favorable consideration of the Government at Ottawa. The resolution ran as follows:—

"That in view of the fact that grants of land and issues of scrip were made to the half-breeds of Manitoba towards the extinguishment of the Indian title to the lands of that Province, there will undoubtedly be general dissatisfaction among the half-breeds of the said Territories unless they receive some like consideration."

Then Mr. Laird visited Duck Lake settlement in the following month of September. He was again interviewed by a deputation of the St. Laurent settlement, and they asked him particulars as to what had become of their petition, and what treatment it had received at the hands of the Government. Mr. Laird explained that the council having sat only in August, the Government had not yet had time to consider their application. They were satisfied with the explanation, and their spokesmen cordially thanked the Lieutenant Governor for the kind manner in which he had replied to their enquiries. The half-breeds, it must be said, displayed on that occasion a most gentle spirit; they could not have acted with greater propriety. Then came the fall of the Mackenzie Government and a new Government came into power, the Government of the hon. gentleman opposite. In 1879 the Government took power to deal with the half-breeds in the same manner as the former Government took power to deal with the half-breeds of the Red River, and after the manner suggested by the North-West Council; that is to say, the Government took power for the extinguishment of the Indian title, in so far as it was vested in the half-breeds. Before going further, it is appropriate that we should at once, in order to fix the responsibility of the Government in this matter, refer to the whole legislation on this matter; the Act of 1870, which was the first Act, the Act of 1874, which was the second Act, and then the Act of 1879, to see exactly what was the purport and the object and the cause of the legislation then put upon the Statute Book. The Act of 1870 ran as follows:—

"And whereas it is expedient towards the extinguishment of the Indian title to the lands in the Province, to appropriate a portion of such ungranted lands, to the extent of 1,400,000 acres thereof, for the benefit of the families of the half-breed residents, it is hereby enacted, that, under regulations to be from time to time made by the Governor General in Council, the Lieutenant Governor shall select such lots or tracts in such parts of the Province as he may deem expedient, to the extent aforesaid, and divide the same among the children of the half-breed heads of families residing in the Province at the time of the said transfer to Canada."

So the object of the Act is perfectly clear; it is an allotment of land to the extent of 1,400,000 acres for the avowed purpose of dividing the same among the children of the heads of half-breed families, towards the extinguishment of the Indian title. Then the Act of 1874, ran as follows:—

"Whereas, by the 31st section of the Act 33 Victoria, chapter 3, it was enacted as expedient towards the extinguishment of the Indian title to the lands in the Province of Manitoba, to appropriate one million four hundred thousand acres of such lands, for the benefit of the children of the half-breed heads of families residing in the Province at the time of the transfer thereof to Canada; and whereas no provision has been made for extinguishing the Indian title to such lands as respects the half-breed heads of families residing in the Province at the period named; and whereas it is expedient to make such provision, and it is deemed advisable to effect the same by grant of land, or by any issue of scrip redeemable in Dominion lands."

Here, again, the same spirit is apparent, the same object is avowed. The grant is made in extinguishment of the Indian title, in so far as it was vested in the half-breeds; and in 1879, the Act passed by hon. gentlemen opposite upon this question, enacted as follows:—

"The Government have power to satisfy any claims existing in connection with the extinguishment of the Indian title, preferred by half-breeds resident in the North-West Territories outside of the limits of Manitoba, on the fifteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and seventy, by granting land to such persons to such extent and on such terms and conditions, as may be deemed expedient."

So there cannot be any ambiguity. Provision was introduced in the last statute by hon. gentlemen opposite themselves with the express object of extinguishing the Indian title vested in the half-breeds. This Act never was put in force, its provisions never were carried out. What was the reason? We do not know yet. The Government never told us; I do not believe the Government know themselves the reason. But it was important that this provision should be acted upon. As early as 1879, the Government appointed Mr. Davin to make a report upon the matter. It does not appear he ever reported but it appears that several influential persons in the Territories, among them Archbishop Taché, were consulted on the matter. Upon the importance of at once dealing fairly and generously with the half-breeds. His Grace Archbishop Taché wrote as follows:—

"It must be freely admitted that the half-breeds of the North-West have a claim to favorable consideration. Great uneasiness is felt by them in consequence of no steps having yet been taken in their behalf. A liberal policy on the part of the Government would attract to its side a moral and physical power which in the present critical relations of the various tribes of Indians towards each other and towards the Government, would prove of the greatest value to the Dominion. On the other hand the half-breed element if dissatisfied would form a standing menace to the peace and prosperity of the Territories. There is no doubt that the state of affairs in the Territories in relation to the Indians and half-breeds, is calling for the serious consideration of the Government, and measures should be adopted to cultivate and maintain relations with the half-breed population calculated to attract them to us." * * * * *

"The half-breeds are a highly sensitive race; they keenly resent injury or insult, and daily complain on that point. In fact they are daily humiliated with regard to their origin by the way they are spoken of, not only in newspapers, but also in official and semi-official documents."

Mr. GIROUARD. What is the date of that?

Mr. LAURIER. January, 1879. Then, at the same time, the archbishop suggested a plan to the Government. He suggested that a certain tract of land be apportioned to them. He goes on to say:

"All the half-breeds, men, women and children, residing in the North-West on the 1st January, 1879, ought to receive two non-negotiable scrips for 80 acres of land each, to be located by them in one of the twelve above-mentioned reserves, said lands to be neither sold, mortgaged nor taxed until they should have passed through the hands of at least the third generation of those who receive them or of their representatives."

This was the plan suggested by Archbishop Taché to the Government to adopt. The Government did not adopt it; they would not adopt it; the right hon. gentleman said he would not adopt it. What was the reason? The hon. gentleman stated yesterday that he would not adopt the plan of Archbishop Taché, because, forsooth, the plan of Archbishop Taché would have made the half-breeds wards of the Government; he would rather trust to them; he had a plan of his own for their settlement, for their establishment. What was that plan of his own? Where was it? When was it executed? When was it shown to the country? Where was it published? When was it communicated to the half-breeds themselves? Sir, I believe the right hon. gentleman, when he says he had a plan for the settlement of the half-breed claims, is boasting—it is a vain and idle boast. The hon. gentleman never had any plan at all for the settlement of the half-breeds, or if he had any, it was just like the plan of General Trochu to compel the Germans to raise the siege of Paris; it was a fine plan, according to him, but no one ever saw it, he never attempted to execute it; and the hon. gentleman's plan is in the same manner. And, more than that, I say that if the Government did not carry out the plan of Bishop Taché, did not settle the claims of the half-breeds, it is because the Prime Minister was opposed, in principle and in practice to the extinguishment of the Indian title, in so far as it is vested in the half-breeds. I say that the reason why the Government have not, from 1879 to 1885, settled the claims of the half-breeds to a grant of land, is simply because the Prime Minister held that the half-breeds were not entitled to a special grant of land, and this I can prove out of his own mouth. Not later than the 26th March, the Prime Minister, speaking upon this very question, expressed himself as follows:—

“As a whole, the half-breeds have been told that if they desire to be considered as Indians, there are most liberal reserves that they could go with the others; but that if they desired to be considered white men, they would get 160 acres of land as homesteads. But they are not satisfied with that; they want to get land scrip of equal quantity—I think upwards of 200 acres—and then get, as a matter of course, their homesteads as well.”

Sir, this was the policy to which the hon. gentleman objected, that the half-breeds should get their grant of lands in extinguishment of the Indian title, and then be at liberty to settle on the lands in the North-West. That principle, to which the hon. gentleman objected, is the very principle which has been admitted in our Statute Books ever since 1870. According to the Act of 1870, and the Act of 1874, which completed it, an allotment of land was made to the half-breeds simply in extinguishment of the Indian title, and the half-breed, after he had received the scrip for his land in extinguishment of the Indian title, was at liberty, as every other subject, and even as every foreigner, to go to the North-West and homestead upon any land, and claim it as his own. But the hon. gentleman would not give that to the half-breed. In fact, he said, as late as the 26th of March last, that the half-breeds were asking to have 160 acres of land, the same as every homesteader, and besides that, 200 acres for the extinguishment of their Indian title, and to this he objected; and this then, Sir, is the reason why, from 1878 to 1885, the half-breed question has not been dealt with by the hon. gentleman. I say, the policy of the Government, as indicated in the Statute Book, has been that the half-breeds were entitled, just as much as the Indians, to the extinguishment of the Indian title, but, as white men, instead of taking compensation for their Indian title collectively they were allowed to take it individually, and that is the only difference between them and the Indians, so far as the extinguishment of the Indian title was concerned. And, is land such a scarce article in the North-West? Have we not an abundance of land in the North-West? And will we seriously be told that it was not just or fair that the half-breeds should be allotted a lot of the wide lands of the North-West while the same privileges had been granted to the half-breeds in Manitoba? What reason could there be for not giving to the half-breeds on the Saskatchewan River the very same privileges and rights which had been given to the half-breeds on the Red River? As my hon. friend said yesterday, is not justice the same everywhere—upon the Saskatchewan as upon the Red River? If the half-breeds on the Red River were given a special grant of land in extinguishment of the Indian title, did not justice demand that the same privileges and rights should be given to the half-breeds upon the Saskatchewan River? The officers of the Government in the North-West Territories, the North-West Council, the settlers themselves were more generous to the half-breeds than the right hon. gentleman. Again and again the people of the North-West called the attention of the Government to this. I have already quoted the resolution of the council passed in 1879 upon that question. Again, in 1881, Mr. Clarke, a member of the council, presented a resolution:

Then he goes on to say that the same thing should be done for the half-breeds in the North-West Territory. I believe the council passed a resolution upon this, and transmitted it to the Government, but the Government paid no heed to it. Later on the people of the North-West Territory held meetings and passed resolutions advocating the very same course in favor of the half-breeds. A meeting took place at St. Albert, in October of this year, where it was resolved:

“Whereas the Indian title in this district or territory has not been extinct, and the old settlers and half-breed population of Manitoba ever granted scrip in commutation of such title, and such allowance has not been made to the residents in this territory, resolved that the right hon. the Minister of the Interior be requested to grant such scrip to such settlers, thus placing them on an equal footing with their confères in Manitoba.”

This resolution was transmitted to the Government by Mr. Charles Nolin. There was an answer from the Government which was quite in keeping with the principle enunciated yesterday by the right hon. gentleman. The answer was as follows:—

Well, Sir, that was transmitted to the people of the North-West. Mr. Clark, who had looked into the matter, sent a conclusive answer, setting forth all the legislation from 1874 to 1879, and showing conclusively that the policy of this Government had been the extinguishment of the Indian titles in favor of the half-breeds. Then resolutions were also passed by the people in favor of the same policy, but all without avail. At last Riel was sent for and brought into the country, and it would seem that then at least the Government would have yielded what they had so far refused, but still they moved not. And when did they move? At the time, as was shown by my hon. friend yesterday, when the rebellion was ripe in the North-West Territories on the 26th January, they did something; and what was it? They simply asked for a census. At that time they had no policy upon the matter. When they issued the Order in Council on the 26th January, 1885, to take a census of the half-breeds in the North-West, at that time they had no policy, because, as I have shown by the language of the right hon. gentleman, on the 26th March following, he would not acknowledge that the half-breeds were entitled to a special grant in extinguishment of the Indian title. He simply pretended that they had no more rights than the ordinary settlers; that all they could do was simply to go on to the lands unsettled and take up a homestead or pre-emption, and nothing more; so that at that very time, on the 26th March, the Government had no policy whatever. But, Sir, something took place then which gave the Government a policy, and what was it? Sir, on the very day the hon. gentleman was speaking here in this House, when he stated that the half-breeds of the North West had no more rights than the ordinary settler, that all they could ask for was a homestead or pre-emption, on that very day the fight at Duck Lake was going on; and the bullets of the Duck Lake fight did more to settle this question than six long years of prayers and petitions had done. Six long years of constant petitioning had failed to secure justice for these people, had failed to procure a remedy of the grievances of which they complained, but the bullets of Duck Lake immediately set the Government in motion and immediately brought them to terms. On the 30th March, four days afterwards, the Government came down with an Order in Council in which, for the first time, the rights of the half-breeds were to some extent acknowledged. Not completely acknowledged however; by this Order in Council the half-breeds were allowed a certain grant of land, not however, in extinguishment of the Indian title, but with conditions of settlement. Then commissioners were appointed and proceeded to the disturbed districts. One of the commissioners, Mr. Street, being on the spot, looking at the matter, advised the Government that it was necessary in order to satisfy these people to give them a special grant of land, the same as had been given to the half-breeds in Manitoba, irrespective of conditions of settlement; and since that time forsooth, the commissioners have been distributing scrip amongst the half-breeds in North-West Territory. At last Mr. Speaker, these men who have been petitioning for that special grant ever since 1878 and who up to March, 1885, could not obtain it—at last they succeeded in their request. Still, Sir, justice is doubly just and doubly precious when it is freely and gently given, but justice loses most of its value when it is tardily and grudgingly conceded as it was on this occasion. Even last night the hon. gentleman would not say that in so doing, the Government were doing justice to the half-breeds of Manitoba; he would not say that he recognised their rights; he simply said that he would do it, and did it for the sake of peace. For the sake of peace, when we were in the midst of war! for the sake of peace, when insurgents were in the field, and when blood had been shed! Does the hon. gentleman suppose that this tardy concession will conciliate the feelings of the half-breeds? No, Sir; the feeling that will remain in their hearts will be that they were denied their rights while they confined themselves to petitioning for them, but as soon as they took up their old rusty muskets they brought the Government to their knees and secured what constitutional means could not obtain. This is the feeling which will remain in the hearts of the half-breeds. It is the same with regard to the unenumerated claims in Manitoba. There were a certain number of half-breeds who had not been enumerated in Manitoba, who had also a right to a special grant of land. They petitioned the Government; the North-West Council also petitioned the Government, the friends of the Government in the North-West petitioned, and all without avail. But on the 9th April, after the rebellion had been raging for some time, the Government again came to their knees and granted to threats and violence what had been refused to petitions and prayers. In fact, the Government have not even the courage of Falstaff, for, if I remember rightly, Falstaff said that: "Were reasons as plentiful as berries, I would not give a reason upon compulsion." But the Government would not give anything except upon compulsion. They resisted the prayers and petitions of the settlers, but when the settlers came with arms in their hands the Government immediately yielded, and granted their requests. Sir, there was, as I said before, another claim which was made by the half-breeds—it was that they should not be disturbed in their holdings. It was that they were to be allowed to occupy their holdings such as they were, and keep them on without molestation. The Government had adopted the American, the rectangular system of surveying, and a very good system it is—I have not a word to say against it—but it seems nothing but fair and right that where there had been settlement in advance of surveys, the Government should have acknowledged that fact, and the surveys should have been made according to the settlements. It is characteristic of all French settlements in America that they have all been made upon the banks of rivers and all the lands divided so that the people can live close to one another. That is a feature of the French race. The French race, it will be admitted without dispute, is of a more sociable disposition than the Teutonic race. The characteristics of the two races are distinctly marked in Lower Canada. In Lower Canada, if you go through an old country settlement you will find the farm houses scattered in all directions, wherever is most convenient for the farmer. They may be one mile or more apart; but the moment you go into the French settlement, you will find all the farm houses on the road side, all within a stone's throw of one another, so as to afford the people easy and constant communication. In fact the people of Lower Canada, in all the French settlements, are in constant and daily communication. This is a characteristic not only of French settlements in Lower Canada, but of all French settlements in America. It is the same in old France. The rural population in France chiefly dwell in hamlets, in Lower Canada as close to one another as the circumstances of the country will allow. And I found this feature in the old Acadian settlements in Nova Scotia. In King's county, for instance, in the old classic land of Evangeline, there was a settlement in the old days that was called Rivière aux Canards, there the farms have been settled in narrow strips; all are close to each other, and the settlement is called to-day, so far as I know, by the suggestive name Canard Street. That, in the eyes of the population, represents a street more than an ordinary farm settlement. The adventurers whose blood now runs in the veins of the half-breed population in the North-West, came from France and Lower Canada. The same trait exists among them. The half-breed population in the North-West to-day, wherever they have a settlement, have taken their lands in exactly the same way as have all the French population, whether on the banks of the St. Lawrence, in Acadia or in Louisiana. When the Government took possession of the North-West they found those settlements on the Saskatchewan River in exactly the same fashion as all other French settlements. The lands were divided into narrow strips, and the farms were all close upon one another. Was it anything but right and fair that the holdings of those people should be respected; that the lands which had been divided by the people among themselves should not be interfered with, and that the rectangular surveys should give way so soon as they came in contact with settlements. This was the policy followed by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) when he was in charge of the Department of the Interior. I noticed yesterday that the First Minister, when he addressed himself to this subject, passed rather gently, lightly and sweetly over it. He did not say much upon it. He merely said that the hon. member for Bothwell, when at the head of the Department, had not been so diligent as he might have been. But he extolled his own activity. He said that the Government of which he was a member had displayed the greatest diligence in the matter. Not only did the hon. gentleman make that double assertion, but he said he would prove it. And then, with a somewhat ostentatious manner, he took a map and had laid it on the Table. Look at the map, he said, and it will show how much we have surveyed. And so soon as the House rose I saw a number of the hon. gentleman's followers, who had deep faith and reposed confidence in his word, go to the Table and look for evidences of the energy and activity of their leader; and, from the blank stare which was seen on their faces, it was evident that the map did not show much, that it did not show anything—for the facts are these: the surveys have been carried on by the hon. member for Bothwell when in charge of the Department.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. member for Bothwell surveyed less than 2,000,000 acres. The former Conservative Government surveyed more than 9,000,000 acres and the present Government more than 55,000,000 acres.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman knows that the world was not created in a day. The first thing created was light. The first thing to be done in order to make surveys was to draw the meridian lines, and the reports show that my hon. friend directed his efforts in 1877 to drawing meridian lines in order to proceed with the survey of townships. That was the first thing to be done. I hope this explanation will satisfy the hon. member for North Perth. In fact, as far back as 1876 my hon. friend had addressed himself to this subject, and addressed himself to it in that thorough manner in which he approaches any subject. Governor Laird in 1877 addressed my hon. friend as follows upon the subject of surveys:

"The subject is one materially affecting the prosperity of these and other settlements in the Territory. I would hope, therefore, that the labors of a special survey party will be continued during the ensuing summer."

That was in February, 1877, showing that as far back as the summer previous, that is to say, the summer of 1876, the hon. gentleman had commenced the special survey. And what was the answer of the hon. gentleman? He gave an answer apposite to the question, not only saying that there would be surveys, but that the surveys would be made according to the holdings of the people. This is what the hon. gentleman wrote upon that occasion:

"The programme of the special survey party provides for the work being extended during the coming season to intersect the Saskatchewan in the vicinity of the principal settlements on that river. It is proposed in all cases where settlements have been formed along the rivers in the territory to adapt the surveys to the farms as existing, that is to say, giving a frontage of 10 or 20 chains on the river, and running the lots back so as to give 160 acres."

That was the policy of my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) in 1877, which had been inaugurated even in the previous year. But I admit this: the people were impatient. The surveys could not proceed as rapidly as they desired, and the reason is given in the papers brought down to-day. The surveys could not be proceeded with because the meridian lines had first to be established. They again approached the Government upon this matter, and as my hon. friend stated—I need not give the authority, as it was quoted yesterday—that policy would have been pursued as speedily as could be permitted. But in 1878 there was a change of Government, and this I charge upon hon. gentlemen opposite, that with the change of Government came a change of policy as well, and that instead of henceforth respecting the holdings of the people, and having special surveys where settlements had preceded survey, they subjected the people whether their lands were settled or not, to the system of the rectangular survey. They sacrificed the peace of their country to the whim of having a uniform rectangular survey. Sir, when this new system of survey was first commenced, there were, as may be imagined, complaints in that territory. The people who had settled upon narrow front lots complained of that system, and as far back as March, 1882, Mr. Duck, the agent at Prince Albert, addressed this letter to the Department:

"As the majority of the settlers on the south branch of the Saskatchewan River, in the vicinity of the parish of St. Laurent, have taken up their lands previous to the survey with narrow frontages, similar to those river claims in other parts of the district, and in view of the difficulty likely to be experienced in this office in adjusting the boundaries of these claims, in accordance with the section survey, I have, at the request of the settlers so situated, the honor to request information as to the possibility of re-surveying these sections into river lots in a similar plan to that adopted in Prince Albert settlement."

That was on the 11th March, 1882, and on the 4th September, Mr. Duck had not yet received an answer from the Department; and not having received an answer to those complaints which he had sent to Ottawa at the request of the settlers, the settlers themselves tried their luck in the matter. They petitioned the Government in these words:

"We desire also that you should give orders that the lands should be surveyed along the river in lots, 10 chains wide and two miles long. That is the old usage of the country to divide the lands in this manner, and it would facilitate us in knowing the boundaries of our respective lands."

Then on the 13th of October, an official answer came from the Department of the Interior stating as follows:—

"But as regards the surveying of the land in question that all lands in the North-West Territories will be surveyed according to the system now in force."

That was the policy adopted and promulgated by the Department of the Interior on the 13th October, 1882, that henceforth all lands should be surveyed in the North-West Territories on the new system no matter whether they were occupied or not, or whether they were settled or not. On the 21st of October, Mr. Burgess, the Deputy Minister of the Interior, at last answered the letter of Mr. Duck which had been written on the 11th of March previously, and this is what he said:

"... It is not the intention of the Government to cause any re-survey to be made. Of course, any sub-division, differing from the regular survey, they may desire, they can procure for themselves when the lands come into their possession. You will please, therefore, communicate this decision to the persons interested."

When the settlers asked to have the surveys made according to their holdings the answer was peremptorily: no, you will tell the people that if they want their lands sub-divided afterwards, they can do so, but henceforth the system of survey will be that adopted by the Government. I ask any man in this House, I ask any impartial man, could there be any more vexatious tyranny than that which was thus exercised by the Government, over the people of the Saskatchewan River, who had laid out their land in narrow lots, who had built their fences accordingly, who had placed their houses accordingly, who had tilled the soil, and made improvements accordingly—could there be any more vexatious tyranny than that exercised by the Government when they came forward and ran their lines upon these holdings, irrespective of the possession of the people, or the improvements they had made? Could there be any greater tyranny than running their lines across a man's farm and his buildings, as if these lands were unoccupied or unsettled upon? That was a piece of tyranny without excuse. I say there can be no excuse whatever for the course of the Government in that matter. I say it would have been cheap justice in their hands if they had listened to the prayers of the half-breeds and told them: we will respect your possessions such as you have them. Not only so, but the missionaries of the land, the men of peace, who as a rule in that country do not interfere with the peoples' business, so far as that goes, thought it their duty to remonstrate time and again. Father Leduc came here and interviewed the Government; Father André wrote letters, and Father Vègreville wrote letters, which were quoted by my hon. friend,—as eloquent letters as could be written, letters which were pleading for the just rights of the people, but they remained unanswered. It is asked what are the grievances of the people of the North-West Territories? I ask any man, could there be a greater grievance, even in the old Provinces of Canada, than that the Government should attempt to re-survey the lands according to a new, regular and scientific system. I say that if such a thing were attempted, there would be an outbreak here as there was there. Nothing is more dear to every poor man than his poor patch of land, reclaimed from the wilderness by his own toil, and it was an unjustifiable and unwarrantable piece of tyranny on the part of the Government to act as they did. I can understand why these people, goaded as they were by this systematic ignoring of their claims, at last resorted to a most unfortunate course. Men have rebelled time and again for less just causes than these people had. Look at the conduct of the Government. For 6 long years, the people of the North-West have been petitioning for their rights; for 6 long years they had used every constitutional means which the law could place at their disposal in order to get justice. They sent petitions; they met in assemblies; they passed resolutions; they sent in delegations. The petitions remained unanswered; the resolutions adopted in their meetings were ignored. The delegations were received most courteously, with sweet smiles and sweeter words, which were put down in writing, but were forgotten as soon as the delegates had turned their backs for home. For these long years, the Government never moved. After these long years of useless petitioning, the half-breeds resorted to a most significant course; they sent for Louis Riel, and brought him into the country. This should at last have opened the eyes of the Government. They knew that Riel was a daring man; they knew that the people of the North-West had had their hearts filled with ever accumulating bitterness, and they must have known that under the circumstances there were all the elements for a sudden conflagration, the results of which might be, as they have proved to be, disastrous. Yet the Government never moved. Louis Riel did not remain idle; he held numerous meetings, which were attended, not only by the half-breeds, but by the white settlers; the situation was discussed; the people's grievances were set forth; yet the Government never moved. The Government could not plead ignorance, because the press of the country, the papers published on the Saskatchewan and the papers published in Manitoba, supporting the Government, warned them time and again of what was going on; yet they never moved. Moreover, the officers of the Government warned them again and again. If you look at the correspondence you will find that Mr. Duck the local agent at Prince Albert, again and again urged upon the Government the necessity of remedying individual grievances, and his letters always remained unanswered. You will find that Mr. Pearce, a most indefatigable officer of the Government, time and again pointed out the dangers ahead, and suggested remedies; but the Government never moved. What was it the half-breeds were asking for? Anything unjust or unfair? It was so just that it had been granted to the half-breeds of Manitoba; it was so just that it was granted by the Government themselves at last, when it was too late; yet when it was time the Government never moved. But if the Government remained passive, public opinion became alarmed. Distant as that country was, difficult as was the communication with it, sometimes a faint echo reached here of what was going on in that Territory. As far back as 1883 my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition called the attention of the Government to the complaints which were made by the people of the Territories. He was met on that occasion by the Prime Minister telling him that all was well. But the member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) then sounded a note of alarm, and pointed out that there were possibilities of danger. Such warnings coming from such a staunch supporter of the Administration should at least have excited the attention of the Government; yet they never moved. Again, in the following Session, my friend the member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) set forth the grievances of the North-West, and asked for a committee.

The Government answered that everything was serene there; they would not move. This present Session my hon. friend again called the attention of the Government to the state of the country when he moved the Bill for the representation of the North-West Territories. That Bill came on for its second reading on the 11th of March. At that time the atmosphere was already vibrating with the first waves of the great storm that was soon to roll over the land. The Government could not fail to be aware of what was going on. In fact, we have proof that at that time their agents were sounding the note of alarm in their ears; yet they never moved. The Minister of Public Works rose up in his place, and very quietly moved the adjournment of the debate. That was all the encouragement given to those people. Even at that time it was perhaps not too late. If the Government had shown any good-will at all, it is possible that the people, hearing of it, would have modified their attitude, and this outbreak would perhaps have been spared to us. Later on we had the speech of the right hon. Prime Minister which I have already quoted, telling us that the Government relied on their friends for support, that their consciences told them that they had done everything that could be done to pacify the country. Such boasting of the Government on the eve of a rebellion which they had brought on the land by their own misconduct, is I believe unparalleled in history, unless indeed we recall the language of Emile Olivier in the Corps Législatif in 1870, when he said he was going to war with a light heart, when he was plunging his country in the greatest calamities that ever befell a nation. And to crown the whole we have a letter from the Secretary of State saying on the 6th of June:

Sir, this is simply adding insult to injury. The half-breeds did not petition? What more could they do than they have done in a constitutional manner? To tell the truth, for these long years they have been petitioning and petitioning, begging and begging, knocking and knocking at the door of the Government, and the Government never lifted a finger to come to their rescue; that is the truth of the matter. The Government never did anything to meet the wishes, the prayers of those people. Yes, I beg pardon, they did something; they sent a police force to Carlton. When the people were petitioning for their rights and holding meetings to discuss their grievances, the Government became aware of what was going on, and instead of remedying their grievances, sent a police force to Carlton in order to overawe the people. That is the sort of justice they got from the Government of Canada until they rose in insurrection. Sir, if something more than everything else could condemn the action of this Government, it would be this act of sending the police force to Carlton to meet the petitions of the people by an armed force. This is not British justice; this is not British administration; this is not the manner in which a British Government usually meets the demands of its subjects; but, Sir, this is the Russian way of administering law. This is the way Russia meets the demands of Poland. Whenever the Poles rise and claim their rights, the Russians do exactly what has been done by the Canadian Government—they send armed troops to Warsaw. Now, there is in connection with this matter another point which I have not heard referred to, but which seems to be in the minds of a good many people. It is not expressed, but I think the feeling permeates the very atmosphere, not only of this House, but of the whole of this country. I have not heard it stated, but it is in the minds of many that if these men have rebelled, it is because they are, to a certain extent, of French origin. The First Minister stated yesterday that Gabriel Dumont and his friends are and always were rebels. It is not to my knowledge that Dumont or any one of those who took up arms on the Saskatchewan any more than on the Red River, ever had the thought of rebelling against the authority of Her Majesty. It was not against Her Majesty the Queen; they rebelled against the tyranny of the Canadian Government. It is quite possible that the half-breeds just reclaimed from a nomadic life, having practically been under the authority of the British rule not more than 7 or 8 years, have not yet learned to love the British flag, because so far the flag in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite has not carried that justice which has gone with the British flag everywhere for the last fifty years. But this I say, and I say it coming from a Province where, less than 50 years ago, every man of the race to which I belong was a rebel, and where to-day every man of that race is a true and loyal subject, as true and as loyal as any that breathes—I say give these men justice, give them freedom, give them their rights, treat them as for the last 40 years you have treated the people of Lower Canada, and by-and-bye, throughout those Territories, you will have contentment, peace and harmony where to-day discord, hatred and war are ruining the land.

Mr. GIROUARD. Some two or three months ago, at the beginning of the rising of the North-West, I felt it my duty to look into the facts which were alleged to have been the cause of the uprising. Like the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and like every French Canadian, my sympathies were with the so-called rebels. I thought these rebels, the half-breeds of the North-West, had grievances, as the French Canadians had in 1837. Not being familiar with the facts, I had to make a special study of the political history of Manitoba and the North-West. I admit I was ignorant of the facts then. Like a great many others, I thought that my fellow countrymen of that far country were ill-used. But what has been the result of my study, and I have studied the question, not for the purpose of preparing a plea to defend the Government; I have done so as an independent member of the House.

Mr. GIROUARD. Yes; I think there are very few members on the other side who have shown as much independence as I have in the past. I commenced that study for the sole purpose of getting information, as a representative of the people, who cares more for the sake of the country than for the sake of power, and I came to the conclusion that the half-breeds had grievances, undoubtedly, but not grievances of such magnitude as to warrant their resorting to arms. The whole speech of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down can be resumed in two points. He says, in the first place, the policy of the present Government was not to extinguish the Indian title in favor of the half-breeds, and in the second place, he charges this Government with being guilty of gross mismanagement in not dividing the river lots according to the old custom which prevailed on the Red River. It seems to me very astonishing that, in order to find fault with the present Government, the hon. gentleman should be obliged to repudiate the policy of the Government of which he was a member. He tried ineffectually to show that the policy of the late Government was the reverse of what it really was. Its policy was, so far as the treatment of the half-breeds was concerned, not to give them a particle of the Indian title, but to treat them as white settlers. The leader of the Opposition had ample time to make a close examination of all the documents that have been produced, documents which he had, but which a great many other members had not, for this reason, that the moment the return containing these papers was laid on the Table, the papers disappeared without having even been endorsed in the Sessional Papers Office. I applied for them several times, but was unable to get them or any clue to where they were. I do not want to accuse any one; it was undoubtedly the right of the hon. gentleman to take possession of the papers, but I deny his right to exclusive possession. I had the right to see them. It was my good fortune, however, to peruse within the last twenty four hours a second copy, which was prepared for the Senate. I was greatly surprised when I heard the leader of the Opposition the other evening, after quoting document after document, after quoting the petition of the half-breeds of St. Albert and St. Laurent to the Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) in 1878—I was surprised, I say, that he quoted those petitions without quoting the replies, trying thereby to impress upon the House and upon the country that these were representations made to the present Government which had remained unanswered. I could hardly credit it. I had read enough of those papers to know that the quotations made by the leader of the Opposition were not complete. What is the answer which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), the Minister of Interior at that time, gave? And there is no man in this House, or out of it, who can be convinced that the answer of the hon. gentleman had some other bearing than upon the application for assistance for seed grain or agricultural implements; it is an expression of the Government's unwillingness to consider the demands of the half-breeds to the Indian title. What is the answer?

"The half-breeds, who have, in some respects, the advantage over new settlers in the Territories, should be impressed with the necessity of settling down in fixed localities and directing their energies to agricultural pursuits, in which case land would no doubt (not a sure thing it appears) be assigned to them in the same way as to the white settlers."

I am willing to leave it to any independent man to tell me if this means the half-breeds shall have greater rights than the settlers, but this is not all. In order that no doubt should remain in the minds of the half-breeds, the hon. gentleman added: "But beyond this they must not look to the Government for any special assistance in their farming operations." It is really surprising that, in order to obtain a party triumph, the speaker who has just taken his seat should be obliged to repudiate his party, but he has done more, he has been obliged to mis-state the policy of the present Government. He has made special mention of the speech of the Premier in March last, when he said that, according to his own opinion, the half-breeds were not entitled to more consideration than the white settlers, taking the same opinion as was expressed by the Minister of the Interior of the late Administration; but what the Premier did not say on that occasion he said last night, and his policy is there to say that, from 1870 to the present time, sacrificing his own opinion, he has taken the policy of his colleagues and has given to the half-breeds a right to what we call the Indian title. The policy of the Government in this respect was sanctioned in the Manitoba Act of 1870. Hon. gentlemen opposite who pretend that their adversaries are like the Bourbons, that they cannot learn anything, came to power in 1873, and were there for five years, and what have they learned? They even forgot the principle of treating these half-breeds which had been laid down by the present Administration and the present party; and, in 1879, in order to give encouragement to that class of the population of the North-West which had been so grossly ignored by the late Administration, the present Government laid down again its policy to give the half-breed the right to the Indian title in the soil. I think this is about a résumé of the first part of the argument of the hon. member. Allow me to say one word en passant—I intend to refer to it more fully later on—in reference to the second portion of his plea, or his speech. He says: You have grossly ill-used these half-breeds in not giving them river lots at St. Laurent. Is the hon. member aware that these surveys were made by the late Administration? Is he aware of it? Are you aware that the surveys of the land on the Saskatchewan for the parish of St. Laurent were made in 1878, under the direction of the late Administration? I would like to have an answer.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GIROUARD. If the last speaker will not answer, I will put the question to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MILLS. The reservation was surveyed out so as to exactly suit the river lot system, so as to grant lots 10 chains in width and 2 miles in depth, and I have the map here, and I can show the hon. gentleman that it has been since changed.

Mr. GIROUARD. I will ask the hon. gentleman to show it immediately. Show it.

Mr. MILLS. There it is.

Mr. GIROUARD. Do you pretend that this map shows that the surveys made in 1878 were re-surveyed? There is no such proof, and you cannot produce any.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Look at it again.

Mr. GIROUARD. You may look at it again. This map shows, as it showed at all times, that they took the rectangular system of survey at St. Laurent, more or less.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. GIROUARD. Yes, I say more or less. I am referring to the surveys made in 1878. They were made at Prince Albert 10 chains by 2 miles, but as to St. Laurent, the surveys were 20 chains or more and 1 mile as they are to-day. These surveys have never been remade, and I am going to show immediately that these surveys were made in 1878 under the late Administration and not under the present Administration; and, if all the anathemas and maledictions of the last speaker ought to fall upon anybody, they ought to fall upon the late Administration. In the report of the Minister of the Interior for 1878, this reference is made to the surveys of the settlements of Prince Albert and St. Laurent, and, as the present Government came to office only in October, 1878, you cannot possibly imagine that these surveys were made under the direction of the present Government.

"Surveys of the settlements of Prince Albert and St. Laurent on the Saskatchewan, in the North-West Territories, were made; also a small survey involving the alteration of certain lines in the settlement belt in the Parish of Ste. Agathe, in Manitoba." (Sessional papers, 1879.)

There is another reference to the same survey made by Mr. Lindsay Russell, in his report dated 31st December, 1878. It says:

"Owing to their remoteness, and the comparatively late date at which their survey was commenced, the full returns and reports for them have not yet been received. They are all in the vicinity of Prince Albert settlement, and in the country included between the north and south branches of the Saskatchewan, near their junction. The survey of the river frontage lots in that settlement, and also of the similar lots for half the settlement of St. Laurent on the south branch, was effected."

I think I have disposed of nearly the whole argument of the last speaker. But suppose, as the late Minister of the Interior said, that these surveys, although made as river lots in the beginning, had been resurveyed according to the rectangular system; suppose more than that, that these half-breeds had been treated purely and simply like white settlers, are we going to be told that these were grievances grave enough to justify an appeal to arms? Are you going to compare these grievances with the grievances of the French Canadians of 1837? Are you going to compare the present state of the French population in the North-West, where they number about 5,000 or 6,000 with the state of the French population in Lower Canada in 1837, when they were about half a million? Look at the grievances of the French Canadians in 1837, having a large majority in the Assembly, but being taxed by the Legislative Council and the Governor not responsible to the people. Is there any comparison between the two cases? There is nothing of the kind, and I repeat that, supposing the half-breeds had all the grievances which the hon. gentleman has mentioned—which they have not—they had no ground, no reason for a rebellion. If we were going to maintain the principle that the population under those circumstances would be justified in appealing to arms, I would like to know if the whole of this country would not have been justified in resorting to arms during the five years of the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite from 1873 to 1878 not only a portion of the country, but from one end of it to the other. The last speaker says that the doings of the Mackenzie Administration had nothing to do with the question. Sir, that is not the way I intend to consider this question. I intend to examine the policy, the conduct, and the acts of the last Administration as well as of this one. What is the motion before the House? The motion is that the people have no confidence in the present Government, and they should give their confidence to the hon. gentlemen opposite; therefore I am bound to examine wherein the hon. gentlemen opposite would do better than this Government, and in order to ascertain that I must examine what they did when they were in power. In order to understand the bearings of this whole question it would be necessary to examine, first, the position of the country when the Canadian Government came in possession of it in 1869; in the second place to examine the treatment of the Indians who were to be found in large numbers in that territory; and, in the third place, to glance at the so-called grievances of the half-breeds. As soon as Confederation was formed the Canadian Government took the initiatory steps to secure that vast country lying west of Ontario then known as Rupert's Land and North-Western Territory. During the Session of 1867-68 an address to Her Majesty was voted by Parliament, asking that that vast territory should be added to the Dominion, and in the following year it was acquired for £300,000 from the Hudson Bay Company, the then proprietors, by the Canadian Government, acting through Sir George Cartier and the Hon. Wm. Macdougall. When moving that address before this House, Mr. Macdougall said:

"The great idea of the Confederation Act was, that we should form one people from east to west, a new nationality side by side, with the Republic, which was our only safe and true policy. All the relations between Great Britain and these colonies had been changed by the great war in the United States, and it was the opinion of the statesmen of the Mother Country, that we must reconstruct and in so doing, we must bear some burdens to provide an increase of population, with our own instincts, and to whom we could offer the rights and privileges enjoyed in the Mother Country. With this idea the Government had resolved to ask Great Britain to hand over to us the sovereignty of the North-West Territory."

In 1873 a large addition was made to this country by a concession from the Imperial Government of the balance of the British possessions in North America, and thus Canada became the largest country in the world, Russia and China alone excepted.

Mr. MACKENZIE. When did that event happen?

Mr. GIROUARD. This happened in 1873.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think you had better consult your authorities.

Mr. GIROUARD. The territory was acquired in 1873.

Mr. MACKENZIE. But the hon. gentleman said the balance of the continent was acquired in 1873.

Mr. GIROUARD. That is the date, I think.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There is some mistake.

Mr. GIROUARD. I do not think it is material to the debate. My impression is that it was in 1873.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It was four years after.

Mr. GIROUARD. My impression is that it was in 1873; but as I say, it is not material to the debate whether this territory was acquired in 1873 or 1877; and really hon. gentlemen opposite must be very fond of interruptions to make one like this. Now, it will not be out of place, in order to understand what the Government has done for that territory to mention exactly its area. I do not refer to the changes which have been made by the last decision of the Privy Council on the boundary question; I do not think it will affect the result very much. I have here a table of the areas of the North-West Territories and the several Provinces of the Dominion, together with the areas of some of the nations of the world, showing the comparative extent of our own domain:

Therefore the Territory which we acquired in 1869, with the addition which was made to it in 1873, or, if the hon. gentlemen opposite prefer, 1877, Canada contains one twenty-eighth of all the land in the world, and is fourteen times larger than France, and twenty-three times larger than the United Kingdom. This valuable country was very little known even at the time of its purchase by the Canadian Government. In fact Hon. Joseph Howe who had paid a flying visit to it during the winter of 1869 conceived such a poor opinion of its value that he returned determined to advise his colleagues to have nothing to do with it. Although it was visited for nearly 150 years by Montreal fur traders and Canadian voyageurs, no one but Catholic missionaries and the officials of the Hudson Bay Company had the slightest idea of its importance for agricultural purposes. The buffalo robes and furs collected by the North-West fur traders were always on hand in the markets of Montreal and London, but no one could have the slightest suspicion that the buffalo would so soon disappear before railways and civilisation. The population of the whole North-West then consisted of 1,000 white men, 33,000 or 34,000 Indians and a few settlements of half-breeds, numbering 12,000 or 13,000. There were no means of communication except the canoe, cart, traîneaux, or snow shoes. There was only one steamer, the International, which plied between Lake Winnipeg and a town I believe called Georgetown in Minnesota. In 1869-70, Hon. William Macdougall took 14 days to travel from St. Paul to St. Vincent, a distance travelled to-day in less than eighteen hours. In 1871, Bishop Grandin took fifty-two days to proceed to St. Albert from St. Boniface, which, as hon. members know, is opposite Winnipeg. Mail service was almost unknown. There was a monthly mail service to the outside world; but as to inland service it was almost unknown. I need not say that the laws were very simple. Property could, of course, be transferred by deeds in writing, which were recorded in the office of the Hudson Bay Company, in just about the same way as transfers of property were recorded in the Province of Quebec in the office of the seigneur, but it could also be transformed by verbal agreements. There was no registry office. There was a court of justice at Fort Garry; but so far as courts of justice in remote districts were concerned, they were unknown. I need not talk of jails; there was no necessity for them. The whole of the district was governed in a paternal manner by a Governor and council, assisted by some sub-council as at remote points, and also by the officials of the company. Most of the trade consisted of exchanging the furs of the half-breeds and of the Indians for other commodities of life which were to be found in the stores of the Hudson Bay Company. In fact the Hudson Bay Company had a monopoly of the trade up to about 1858. In all the remote settlements or posts, it could hardly be said that there was any organised Government. Major Butler, speaking of the very district where the recent rebellion took place, wrote to Governor Archibald in 1871:

"The institutions of law and order, as understood in civilised communities, are wholly unknown in the regions of the Saskatchewan, inasmuch as the country is without any executive organisation, and destitute of any means to enforce the authority of the law."

This want of authority was also felt in the most central post, Fort Garry. About five weeks ago I was reading in one of the Manitoba papers that about 1858, Louis Riel, father of the present Louis Riel, went to the Court House, and there found the judge sitting. One of his countrymen had been arrested for having traded outside of the stores of the Hudson Bay Company,—and that was his crime. He went to the judge and told him: Your Honor, I am not willing that my brother should remain in jail (there was a jail at Fort Garry) for ever; I give you till one o'clock to try him. The judge commenced the trial at once. At the hour fixed, the trial was not over. Riel advanced in court and said: May it please the court, I declare the prisoner acquitted. Vive la liberté. A very remarkable fact is this, that Louis Riel and his followers who set the prisoner at large were not molested for fear of more serious trouble ensuing. I give you, Mr. Speaker, this incident to show that even in the very central post of the Hudson Bay Company, Fort Garry, it was some times impossible to enforce the authority of the law. Such was the state of the country when the Canadian Government took possession of it in 1869. To save expense the intention appears to have been for a time at least to govern it as it had been governed for more than a century by a Governor and council. The hon. gentleman who has last spoken said that when we took possession in 1869 we considered the population of the country as a portion of the territory. Was it not to be governed as it had been for years and for almost a century before that time? That population had been governed by a Governor and council; and is it not worthy of admiration that instead of displaying any contempt for that government, Canada wished to continue the government and institutions which had prevailed in the Territory for almost centuries. As early as 1863 a temporary Act was passed, for the government of the North-West. It provided for the appointment of a Governor and a council not exceeding fifteen nor less than seven members to administer the affairs of the country, with such powers as might be from time to time conferred on them by the Governor in Council. It is not necessary to enter at length into the events that followed; but allow me to say, in answer to a remark which fell from the lips of the last speaker, that the rebellion of 1870, if you want to call it so, was very different from the present rebellion. In 1870 when the Canadian Government sent their surveyors and Mr. Macdougall, as the Canadian Governor, to take possession of the country, the transfer from the Hudson Bay Company to the Government had not even been signed. So the Canadian Government had at that time no title to the country. But it is very different in this case. Not only have we our title but we have been in possession for nearly 15 years, and therefore the two situations cannot be compared. Although it is not necessary to enter at any length into the events which caused the rebellion or the troubles of 1870, I would say that the Hon. Mr. Macdougall who was appointed Lieutenant Governor in 1869 proceeded to exercise the functions of his office, but was forcibly refused admission to the country. The population, and more especially the French half-breeds of Manitoba, were resisting the new state of things. A Provisional Government was formed, with Louis Riel as President, and only surrendered on condition of an amnesty, the recognition of certain land claims and the granting of responsible government. The portion of the Territory adjoining the Province of Ontario was constituted a Province by the name of Manitoba. Representation was given to the Province in the Senate and the House of Commons. A Legislature was created, consisting of a Legislative Assembly, and of a Legislative Council which has since been abolished. Clause 30 of the Act provides:

"All ungranted or waste lands in the Province shall be, from and after the date of the said transfer, vested in the Crown, and administered by the Government of Canada for the purposes of the Government of the Dominion, subject to, and except and so far as the same may be affected by, the conditions and stipulations contained in the agreement for the surrender of Rupert's Land by the Hudson Bay Company to Her Majesty."

Then as to Indian titles, it was provided:

"And whereas, it is expedient towards the extinguishment of the Indian title to the lands in the Province, to appropriate a portion of such ungranted land, to the extent of 1,400,000 acres thereof, for the benefit of the families of the half-breed residents;

"It is hereby enacted, that, under regulations to be from time to time made, by the Governor General in Council, the Lieutenant Governor shall select such lots or tracts in such parts of the Province as he may deem expedient, to the extent aforesaid, and divide the same among the children of the half-breed heads of families residing in the Province at the time of the said transfer to Canada, and the same shall be granted to the said children respectively, in such mode and on such conditions as to settlement and otherwise as the Governor General in Council may from time to time determine."

Then there are clauses providing for the quieting of title, and section 35 is as follows:—

"And with respect to such portion of Rupert's Land and the North-West Territory as is not included in the Province of Manitoba, it is hereby enacted that the Lieutenant Governor of the said Province shall be appointed by commission, under the great seal of Canada, to be Lieutenant Governor of the same* under the name of the North-West Territories, and subject to the provisions of the Act in the next section mentioned."

That is the Act of 1869. The Manitoba Act also provided that both French and English should be the official languages before the Legislature, and in the courts of justice. The principle of separate schools was freely recognised. The privilege of a mixed jury was granted as in the Province of Quebec. Provision was made for the extinction of the Indian title, and free grants of land were made to the half-breeds and their children, which in 1873 by the Land Act were extended to the old white settlers and their children. All these concessions were granted by the Manitoba Act of 1870, Vic. 33, cap. 3. Whatever may be the diversity of opinion as to the causes, pretexts or circumstances of these troubles of 1869-70, there cannot be any doubt that without the French half-breeds, Manitoba would not have been granted the liberties and privileges of popular government, and this important reform bears testimony to the intelligence and patriotism of the French half-breeds. This has been admitted by many eye witnesses of the events of these days, and quite recently by Mr. Alexander McArthur, of Winnipeg, an old official of the Hudson Bay Company, a prisoner of Riel, when lecturing before the Historical and Scientific Society of Winnipeg, on the 4th October, 1882, and in fact the language he used shows his impartiality in the matter. He says:

"While the leaders of the half-breeds brought ignominy on themselves by imbuing their hands in blood, it cannot be denied that they obtained rights and privileges for themselves and their fellow countrymen, which but for the stand they took would never have been granted, and the boons so secured they have the satisfaction of knowing were equally participated in by those nations and residents of the country, who not only took part in the rising, but were many of them opposed to it and disposed to aid the other side."

The Manitoba Act also provided for a temporary government in that portion of Rupert's Land, and North-Western Territory not included in the Province of Manitoba. It enacted that until the end of the Session of 1871, it was to be left to the management of the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba with the aid of the council provided for by the Act of 1869. Considering the state of the country, its small population, this provisional Government was perhaps the only practicable one. Its services were fully acknowledged by the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Mills) in his report of 1876. He said:

"It is due to that council to record the fact that their legislation and valuable practical suggestions submitted to Your Excellency from time to time through their official head, Lieutenant Governor Morris, aided the Government not a little in the good work of laying the foundations of law and order in the North-West, in securing the good will of the Indian tribes, and in establishing the prestige of the Dominion Government throughout the vast territory."

During the Sessions of 1871 and 1873 the appointment of a special Lieutenant Governor and Council for the North-West was provided for, but notwithstanding this provision and others which were adopted in 1873, the affairs of the Territories continued to be administered from Winnipeg. By an Order in Council of the 12th February, 1873, the Council was authorised to make provision for the administration of justice in the Territories and generally to make and establish such ordinances (not to exceed the jurisdiction of any Provincial Legislature) as may be necessary for the peace, order and good government of the said North-West Territories subject to the approbation of the Governor in Council. The council was to meet at least every six months in Winnipeg, and except in special cases public notice by advertisement of such meeting was to be required for at least 40 days. An annual meeting was held on the first Monday in June in each year. I will now give the names of the members of the first Legislative Council. Hon. Alexander Morris was appointed Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories on the 2nd day of December, 1872, and on the 28th day of the same month the following gentlemen were appointed members of the Council: Hon. Chas. A. Girard, Hon. Donald A. Smith, Hon. Henry J. Clarke, Hon. Paschal Breland, Hon. Alfred Boyd, John Schultz, Joseph Dubuc, Andrew G. B. Bannatyne, Wm. Fraser, Robert Hamilton, Wm. J. Christie. On the 30th October, 1873, Messrs. James MacKay, a half-breed, and William N. Kennedy were appointed. On the 1st January, 1874, Mr. Christie resigned and John H. McLaird married to a half-breed, was nominated in his place and Messrs. William Tait, married to half-breed, and Robert Cunningham, were also added to the list of the councillors by hon. gentlemen opposite. One of the last ordinances of the North-West Council was the passing of "An Act for the prevention of Prairie and Forest Fires in the North-West Territories," which in due time was transmitted to Ottawa for approbation with representation that it was of "urgent importance"; but up to 1876, when the papers connected with this measure were brought before the House, it had not been yet approved. The Conservative party in power soon after left office (1873). It was not, however, till two years after (1875) that the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite thought of providing for the removal of the seat of Government of the North-West, and it took another year to put this Act into operation; so three years were required to accomplish this important reform, recommended as most necessary and urgent by the great organ of the Liberal party. The Toronto Globe, of the 25th February, 1876, said:

" Heretofore the North-West Territory east and west of Manitoba has been governed by the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba and a species of half advisory, half legislative council of gentlemen chosen from among the residents in Winnipeg and its vicinity. They are themselves not slow to admit that their constitution is a farce, and it requires no effort of imagination in those even who have never been in the North-West to understand the impossibility of merchants and others in Winnipeg acting as a Legislature for the settlements on the Saskatchewan, and nearly a thousand miles away in the neighborhood of the Rocky Mountains. At one of the last sittings of this Winnipeg Council of which the former editor of the Nouveau Monde is a prominent member it was proposed to incorporate the clergy of the missionary dioceses of the North-West with land holding powers. The object of this was so apparent to those in Winnipeg who have seen the effect of the system there, that it was strenuously opposed by some of the English members, but in spite of their efforts it was carried, and would have come to Ottawa with such force as this nondescript council have been able to give to their legislation, had not Lieutenant Governor Morris refused to assent to the Bill."

We have several times in this Parliament incorporated ecclesiastical communities without objection from hon. gentlemen opposite, and have given them the right to hold real estate in the North-West; and this is the crime which is charged on the North-West Council, and which is put forth as the principal reason why it should be abolished. Under the new constitution the seat of the Government was removed to Fort Pelly, in the Territories. The council was composed of five members nominated by the Crown, including the two stipendiary magistrates, ex officio. The jurisdiction of the council extended over taxation for local and municipal purposes, property and civil rights, the administration of justice, including the organisation and maintenance of the courts of justice; education, with separate schools if desired by any minority; public health, licensing of inns, landmarks and boundaries, game and wild animals, and the care and protection thereof; roads and highways, the protection of timber, gaols, &c., and generally all matters of a merely local or private nature. Nearly all the powers of Local Legislatures of the old Provinces were thus given to this North-West Council; and to give a representative character to this body the Act provides that any district not exceeding an area of one thousand square miles is entitled to be erected into an electoral district, and to elect a member to the council for its first one thousand inhabitants of adult age, exclusive of aliens and Indians, and to two members for two thousand inhabitants. When the number of elected members shall reach twenty-one, the Act provides that the council shall become ipso facto the Legislative Assembly of the North-West Territories, having not only all the powers of the council, but also all the powers of a Legislative Assembly of the old Provinces, which the Governor in Council in Ottawa might confer upon it. The French language was ignored in the Act, but this grave error was corrected two years after, in 1877. A jury of six was granted in criminal cases, but the grand jury and the mixed jury system which prevails in Quebec and Manitoba was refused. With the hon. gentlemen opposite lies, therefore, the responsibility of the position of Louis Riel, who, as matter of right, is not entitled to a trial by his peers. He is entitled to have only six jurymen, and among these he is not entitled to have three of his own countrymen. In 1877 new powers were given to the North-West Council by Order in Council:

" And whereas, by the third section of the said Act, it is further enacted that 'the Lieutenant-Governor, by and with the advice of the Legislative Assembly, as the case may be, shall have such powers to make ordinances for the government of the North-West Territories as the Governor in Council may, from time to time, confer upon him: Provided always, that such powers shall not at any time be in excess of those conferred by the ninety-second section of The British North America Act, 1867,' upon the Legislatures of the several Provinces of the Dominion;

" Now, in pursuance of the powers by the said statute conferred, His Excellency, by and with the advice of the Privy Council, has been pleased further to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall be and he is hereby empowered to make ordinances in relation to the following subjects, that is to say:—

" 1. The establishment and tenure of territorial offices, and the appointment and payment of territorial officers;

Mr. GIROUARD.

" 2. The establishment, maintenance and management of prisons in and for the North-West Territories;

" 3. The establishment of municipal institutions in the Territories, in accordance with the provisions of the 'North-West Territories Act, 1875 and 1877';

" 4. The issue of shop, auctioneer and other licenses, in order to the raising of a revenue for territorial or municipal purposes;

" 5. The solemnisation of marriage in the Territories;

" 6. The administration of justice, including the constitution, organisation and maintenance of territorial courts of civil jurisdiction;

" 7. The imposition of punishment by fine, penalty or imprisonment for enforcing any territorial ordinance;

" 8. Property and civil rights in the Territories, subject to any legislation by the Parliament of Canada upon these subjects, and—

" 9. Generally on matters of a merely local or private nature in the Territories."

I have heard it stated that hon. gentlemen opposite did nothing for the North-West during the time of their administration. I will not go so far; I am too much of an independent member to go that far. I will admit that the late Administration conferred upon the population of the North-West a constitution which is certainly worthy of admiration; but this is the only thing they did. That constitution is similar to the constitution of the old Provinces. To-day the Crown is represented in the North-West council very much in the same way as it is represented in this Parliament or in the Legislature of Quebec. There are two or three Stipendiary Magistrates and other nominees of the Crown numbering six altogether; and at the same time that constitution provides that the people of that country, the moment there is a certain population spread over a certain extent of territory, have a right to send a representative there to deal with what matters? Upon the local taxation, upon the municipal taxation, upon the administration of justice, upon in fact all the matters which are conferred by the constitution of 1867 on the old Provinces, and that is why I am willing to give credit to the late Administration for having done something toward the settlement of the North-West. Later on, I will say, in answer to those settlers who want to have those Territories divided into different Provinces and enjoy all the expense and luxury of the legislatures of the old Province, that in the constitution of the North-West they have all the privileges and liberties of a free people, without having, at the same time, the burden of local legislatures. It is a pity, indeed, that the late Administration did not go further when they were considering the constitution of the country. They nominated to hold office in that Territory people who were strangers to the population. You cannot find even a stipendiary magistrate, you cannot find a nominee, from the Governor down, with the exception of Mr. Forget—a very good nomination—who was clerk of the council and private secretary to the Governor, to represent the people of that country, selected from the people of that country. I am not surprised at this, because, in the opinion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills), the French half-breeds were like Indians; though, later on, on another policy, they were to be treated as white settlers. I am not surprised that the hon. gentleman, as Minister of the Interior, did not wish that the half-breeds should be represented in the North-West, because he considered half-breeds were like Indians; but why did he not take some of the new white settlers? Are you going to tell me you have provided a council of a representative character, without being able to find in the population of the place a single representative?

Mr. MILLS. We appointed a French half-breed, a member of the council.

Mr. GIROUARD. He was appointed in 1878; your council was appointed in 1876.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman is mistaken, because it was organised on my advice.

Mr. GIROUARD. I will give you the date of Mr. Berland's nomination. He was in the old council which was nominated in the constitution of 1869, and which remained in office until 1876, but you did not renominate him, or Mr. Royal, or Mr. Delorme, a half-breed.

Mr. MILLS. They were residents of Manitoba.

Mr. GIROUARD. Why did not you nominate Mr. Breland who is not resident of Manitoba?

Mr. MILLS. We did.

Mr. GIROUARD. Not at that time. I will give you the date later on. I say this treatment of the people of the North-West was the subject of a great deal of complaint. The French population expected some attention from the Government. The old settlements of Qu'Appelle and St. Albert were important centres; the English settlement at Battleford and Prince Albert had considerably increased; the surrounding rural districts had been taken up by white settlers, who also thought they were entitled to some consideration. Affairs in the North-West attracted the attention of public men, and during the Session of 1878 they were the subject of a very interesting debate. It will be interesting to hear what were the opinions of the hon. member for Bothwell then.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman went last week to New Brunswick to find a member for that council.

Mr. GIROUARD. One member only. But I am going to show you that you took all the members for that council from Ontario, and its Governor from Prince Edward Island. The Hon. Mr. Langevin, now Sir Hector, called attention to this point. The debate took place on the 8th May, 1878:—

“ Mr. LANGEVIN said he wished to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the action of the Government in the North-West Territories. When the organisation of government took place in Manitoba, the hon. gentlemen opposite found fault with the Government of the right hon. member for Kingston, for the manner in which that was organised. They accused the late Government of having acted without proper consideration of the wants of the Provinces, without having consulted its people, and of having sent up a ready-made government. The hon. the First Minister said, in his speech at Kingston, of the 27th June, speaking of the right hon. member for Kingston:

“ He sent out Mr. Wm. Macdougall with a ready-made Cabinet to take possession, as if they had been the conquerors of the land, without asking the people what their opinions were as to the mode or nature of the authority under which they were to be placed.”

This was the opinion of the hon. the First Minister, and also of the hon. the Minister of the Interior. Before going further, he would state he did not admit the justice of this criticism. The late Government did not send a ready-made Government to the North-West. They sent a Governor and two officers, who were, in connection with other gentlemen, taken from that region, and who had the confidence of the people to form a Cabinet. It was natural that the hon. gentleman, in order to make a strong case before the electors of Ontario should have used the words already quoted; but, at all events, the hon. gentleman, after having found fault with the action of the late Government, should have done better. Let us see how the hon. gentleman and his Government acted towards that country. They appointed, as Lieutenant Governor, the Hon. Mr. Laird, one of their friends, who had been formerly Minister of the Interior, and had dealt with matters connected with the North-West, and whom they had a right, therefore, to send there. But whom did they select as members of the Executive Council of that Territory? Colonel Macleod was appointed at the head of the police and also Stipendiary Magistrate. Colonel Macleod did not possess the confidence of the people.

“ Mr. MILLS. Who were they? Indians?

“ Mr. LANGEVIN. Indians and half-breeds were people. He wondered would the hon. gentleman feel as he did, were he in Manitoba amongst those people. They were not to be despised although they were Indians. Mr. Mathew Ryan, lawyer from Montreal, was also appointed Stipendiary Magistrate, and was made also a member of the Executive Council; the next was Mr. Richardson. How were the officers selected for this territory? Mr. Scott, a gentleman from this part of the country, was appointed registrar; hon. Mr. St. John of Toronto was appointed sheriff; Mr. Dickson was sent there as an accountant and inspector; Captain McDonald was sent as Indian agent. This was the Government which had sent there, to use the language of the hon. the First Minister, “ a ready-made cabinet to take possession, as if they had been conquerors of the land.” The people not very unnaturally, objected to being presented with this ready-made cabinet. The hon. gentleman could not say that in the Territories or in Manitoba, they could not find a few members of the people who could help in governing that country and who would have the confidence of the half-breeds. But what people had they to govern? Indians? There were Indians and a great many half-breeds and white men as well.

These people had been cast aside. The Government said: We will send a ready-made cabinet; we despise those people and will govern them as we choose. His Excellency the Governor General formed a very different opinion of these people, and he would refer the hon. the Premier and his colleagues to the remarks of His Excellency concerning these half-breeds. They were a sensitive, proud race, and should not have been deprived of their share in the government of the country. He remembered the time when his race was excluded from the government of the country, when none but people imported from the old country had a right to sit in the councils of the Province, and he could imagine the feelings of those half-breeds of the North-West when they saw that none but people from Ontario or Montreal or the Lower Provinces were to have office in their Government. These people had no representative in this House, and it was left to some one to see whether they should be left in that position, or whether they should have their share in the offices and in the Government in that Territory. A deputation of half-breeds had lately called on the Lieutenant Governor of the Province to claim representation in the councils of their country, and he hoped, since the attention of the Government had been called to this matter openly before Parliament, that they would recognise the justice of the claims.

“ Mr. MILLS said the hon. gentleman had made somewhat extraordinary speech. The hon. gentleman might not have considered the effect which his speech would have on the minds of the people of the North-West.”

They are very careful indeed to direct properly the mind of the people of the North-West.

“ The circumstances were wholly different which govern the action of the late Government and of the present one. The country which Mr. Laird and the other gentlemen were sent to govern had very few inhabitants except Indians. But the right hon. member for Kingston sent his Government to a country in which there were several thousand white people, a people from whom rulers had already been chosen, and who had formerly a Council and Government of their own. What was the position in the North-West? Did the hon. gentlemen pretend to say that the half-breeds were an educated population, who appointed their chief the same as the Indians did, who followed the buffalo from place to place, and had no fixed habitation? That was the impression the hon. gentleman seemed to wish to create. Yet he must know, if he gave any attention to the condition of things in that country, that the half-breed population, with the single exception of the few who resided in the vicinity of Prince Albert, were, in no respect, different in their modes and conditions of life from the Indians.”

The hon. gentleman interrupted me a moment ago to say that, at the time he constituted the North-West Council, he appointed a half-breed.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Breland, and he is named in that speech.

Mr. GIROUARD. I say you did not; you appointed him in 1878.

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Mr. GIROUARD. Then do not contradict me when I say you did not appoint any half-breed before 1878.

Mr. MILLS. That is what I said.

Mr. GIROUARD. I was going to give you the reason why you appointed one then.

Mr. MILLS. You said we did not appoint any.

Mr. GIROUARD. You did not in 1876, when you organised the council. It was constituted under Act of Parliament of 1875, but you waited one year before you would put that new constitution into operation, and yet, when you came to make the nominations to that council, not only was there not one half-breed in it or one in office under it, but there was not on it one single white-man living in that country; they were all taken from Ontario and even from around Ottawa here, like Mr. Scott, who was placed in the registry office there, and was a brother of one of the colleagues of the hon. gentleman. I have mentioned that there was a complaint. It was not only made in the House but also outside of it. Take the petition which was sent at the beginning of 1878, the petition of the half-breeds of St. Albert and also of the half-breeds of St. Laurent. One of their first grievances is that they have no representative in the institutions of their country.

“ The humble petition of the undersigned French Canadians and half-breeds of St. Albert in the North-West Territories.—Information having been given to them that a petition had been signed by the half-breeds of St. Laurent on the 1st February last, they also respectfully show.

"That the population of the North-West Territories is mostly composed of French half-breeds without any stipendiary magistrate understanding or speaking their language."

And later on, there was a public meeting of indignation against the ruling of stipendiary magistrate Richardson who refused to allow the attendance of French half-breeds who had come from long distances to attend the criminal courts, on the ground that they did not understand English and he did not understand French and that he would simplify the matter very easily by telling them to go back home. There was immediately an indignation meeting held, and the people complained: That is the kind of magistrates they give; they are not only taken from outside the country, but they are men who do not even understand the language of the majority of the people. The petitioners continue to allege:

"Without any stipendiary magistrate understanding their language, and without any person of their own origin to represent them in the deliberations of the council of the North-West Territories, it is therefore resolved that a humble petition be addressed to his Excellency the Governor General praying that the two members of the council remaining still to be appointed under the authority of the Act of 1875 and its amendments be selected from the old residents of French origin, and, in order to give full and entire justice to the nationality of your petitioners, that the nomination of a stipendiary magistrate equally of French origin be proceeded with."

You would perhaps imagine that the reason why these half-breeds were not represented in the council was because the number was complete. No, there were six members to be appointed—I am sure of five—and they could easily have appointed one or two French half-breeds; but no, they did not do it. What was the answer of the Minister of the Interior, of date the 18th March, 1878? It is addressed to the Governor of the North-West Territories, through whom the petition of the people of St. Laurent and St. Albert had been sent to Ottawa.

"You are requested to inform the petitioners that I shall have much pleasure in submitting their petition for the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General in Council.

"In the meantime you may intimate to the petitioners that should it be thought desirable to appoint additional members to the council of the North West, I shall be prepared to recommend to His Excellency's consideration their application that such members should be selected from the old residents in the Territories and that if possible one of them should be of French Canadian origin."

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, the late Administration did nothing with the exception of creating this new constitution for the North-West, and appointing this half-breed in 1878; they did nothing to give to the population of the North-West any representation or any part in the government of that country, either legislative or judiciary. Other important matters came to their attention, but they had a very simple policy—they told the half-breeds that they were to be considered as white settlers. I will not refer again to that statement made by the Minister of the Interior. It is made in such clear language that no ambiguity is possible. The principle is laid down that the half-breeds must be treated like white settlers, and so they have been treated. Nothing was done towards the extinguishment of the Indian title; and if hon. gentlemen opposite are so anxious of benefiting from the experience of past Administrations, why did they not take the principle of the Administration which left office in 1873? Why did they not say to the half-breeds of the North-West: You shall be treated in the same way as the half-breeds of Manitoba? When they constituted their council in 1875 was the proper time, rather than in 1879, to declare what their policy was to be with reference to the half-breeds. When they sent their Governor up to the North-West and made four new treaties with the Indians, they ought to have laid down their policy in regard to the treatment of the half-breeds. But nothing was done concerning the half-breed claims and the Indian title; nothing was done concerning the surveys which affected not only the half-breeds but the white population as well. My hon. friend from Quebec East stated that he did not think that any complaints came from the half-breeds of the North-West previous to 1877 or 1878. Perhaps he was like myself, and did not have occasion to look over all the papers which were brought down four or five weeks ago, and which were inaccessible to certain members of the House—at least to myself. But I will call his attention to the resolutions, which were in effect petitions, of the half-breeds, not only of Qu'Appelle but of the whole North-West, dated the 5th May, 1873 and which were transmitted on the 5th June following by Governor Morris. All the half-breeds of the North-West joined in that petition, their votes having been taken at a council as was then customary; and they say:

"We also ask of you, the Lieutenant Governor, to give us lands in compensation of our rights."

They received an answer from Governor Morris to the effect that their request would be transmitted to the Government. But the Government then in office left to make room for the hon. gentlemen opposite, and up to the present time there has been no answer given to that petition.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. GIROUARD. I mean up to 1878—when they left office. On the 1st of October, 1874, I find a letter from Father Decorby to the Honorable Mr. Laird on the same subject; in this he says:

"As the Government has entrusted the conduct of the affairs of the North-West to you, I take the liberty of addressing you a few explanations concerning Lake Qu'Appelle and the half-breed population settled there. The spirit of justice which animates you and the desire you have shown to contribute to the welfare of those whose interests have been confided to you, lead me to hope that you will kindly take them into consideration and bring them to the attention of the Government in order that it may treat the half-breeds of Lake Qu'Appelle with justice and generosity, according to the kind words of His Excellency, our Governor, Alexander Morris. I may remark at once that the half-breeds have a right to some privileges in this place. It was they who made a kind of conquest of it by obliging the Indian nations who formerly warred here to keep the peace. It is they who still keep them off, and it is to their presence that is due the honor of peace and the security which is enjoyed all around.

"I cannot state the exact period when the half-breeds began to winter at the Lake Qu'Appelle, but having explained to his Lordship the Bishop of St. Boniface, the wish to have a Catholic priest among them, my Lord Taché, now Archbishop of St. Boniface, went there himself in 1865 and chose the present site of the mission, gave orders for the erection of a chapel, and took for the requirements of the mission all the points comprised between the two streams called the Mission Streams, that is to say, of the extent of about a mile of front. The half-breeds then established there promised to respect the land reserved by His Lordship. * * * Now, the half-breeds desire and ask the Government to leave their lands as they took them, that is, that they will not force them to exact lines."

Now take the petitions of the half-breeds of St. Laurent and St. Albert, transmitted by Mr. Laird on the 13th February, 1878, to which reference has so often been made:

"It is of immediate necessity that the Government cause to be surveyed within the shortest possible delay those lands occupied and cultivated by the half-breeds or former residents upon those lands.

"That the sudden change from a prairie life to an agricultural life brought about by the rapid disappearance of the buffalo and the hunting regulations of the council of the North West Territories have reduced your petitioners to a state of want and obliges them to address the Federal Government in order to obtain assistance in seed, grain and in agricultural implements. The same as has been given to certain foreign immigrants in the Province of Manitoba. The implements of agriculture always extremely rare are sold at so high a price that your petitioners are unable to purchase them."

Governor Laird accompanied the transmission of those two petitions with a recommendation or a report, which was sent on 13th February, 1878, as follows:—

"It is important that the land policy of the Government towards old settlers and others living for many years in the Territories should be declared. It appears to me that they have a claim to some more speedy means of acquiring a title for settlement purposes than the homestead provisions of the Dominion Lands Act.

"To prevent disputes between neighbors, it is highly desirable that the survey of lands settled upon along the principal rivers should be prosecuted with all convenient speed.

"With respect to the prayer for assistance in procuring seeds and implements to commence farming operations, it is similar to the request made to me by the half-breeds of Bow River during the Blackfoot treaty negotiations, and which I forwarded to you and commended to the favorable consideration to the Government."

It seems to me, therefore, that the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) was in error when he made the statement that very few petitions had reached the late Administration prior to 1878. We find that almost at the last moment, before the Conservative Government left office, in the fall of 1873, the first complaint came in. Of course the Administration had not time to do it justice. We find from 1874, and subsequently, repeated representations were made to the late Administration, and they took five years to consider them, and did not even then declare a policy. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) complains that the present Administration has done nothing. We shall see what they have done. In the first place, they passed the statute of 1879. The following powers were given to the Governor in Council.

"To satisfy any claims existing in connection with the extinguishment of the Indian title preferred by half-breeds resident in the North-West Territories, outside of the limits of Manitoba, on the 15th day of July, 1870, by granting land to such persons to such extent and on such terms and conditions as may be deemed expedient;

"To investigate and adjust claims preferred to Dominion lands situate outside of the Province of Manitoba, alleged to have been taken up and settled on previous to 15th July, 1870, and to grant to persons satisfactorily establishing undisturbed occupation of any such lands, prior to and being by themselves or their servants, tenants or agents, or those through whom they claim in actual, peaceable possession thereof, at the said date, so much land in connection with and in satisfaction of such claims as may be considered fair and reasonable."

Evidently the Government acted upon the recommendation of Governor Laird. Governor Laird, in his despatch accompanying the petition of the half-breeds of St. Laurent recommended the Government to adopt some policy. They did not do so. But, immediately on the present Government obtaining power, they adopted a policy, which was to recommend the claim of the half-breeds to the Indian title. It will be remembered also, that the half-breeds complained that they did not have a magistrate who spoke and understood French. In the fall of 1882, Mr Rouleau, stipendiary magistrate residing at Aylmer, Province of Quebec, was appointed stipendiary magistrate for the district of Saskatchewan, where the French Canadian and French half-breed population was mainly to be found, and this officer became a member of the council, making two French members altogether, Mr. Breland and Mr. Rouleau, out of six appointed by the Government. About the same time, the construction of the Canadian Pacific had opened new fields to immigration. Towns and villages were erected along its line from Brandon westward. A large number of people flew into the towns and rural districts, and form to-day a white population of about 40,000 or 50,000, some say 100,000 or more, who became entitled to representation in the council. Electoral districts have been constituted under the Act of 1875, and have been represented in the council, where they are to-day in majority over the nominees of the Crown. Eight districts have representation in the new council: Edmonton, Broadview, Qu-Appelle, Regina, Moose Jaw, Lorne, Calgary and Moose Mountain, and with the three stipendiary magistrates, and these nominated by the Government, form 14 members. This fact induced the Edmonton Bulletin, of the 30th January, 1885, to say:

"Every paper in the North-West gave a kick to the Council, but it is the fault of the people, who elect the majority of them."

One of the first duties of the Government under the terms of the Manitoba Act of 1870, was to extinguish the Indian title to the Territory of the North-West. The policy of the country has been to do this by a treaty, whereby the Indians cede their rights to the land in consideration of a certain indemnity which the Government agrees to pay to them. The Indians under treaty in Manitoba and the North-West represent a population of 33,959. The treaties are seven in number, and contain about the same agreements and stipulations:

		Population.
3rd August, 1871,	Chippewas and Crees, Treaty No. 1	3,395
21st " 1871,	" " " " " "	895
3rd October, 1873,	Sauteux " " " "	2,805

23rd August, 1876,	Plain and Wood Crees (Fort Carlton and Pitt) Treaty No. 6	8,157
22nd May, 1877,	Blackfeet, Treaty No. 7	6,873

As an example, let us look at Treaty No. 7. It contains a cession from the Indians to the Crown of territory which is described, and "all their rights, titles and privileges whatsoever to the lands" of said Territory. The Indians reserve to themselves the right of hunting throughout the tract surrendered, subject to such regulations as the Government of the country may make from time to time, and saving such tracts of land as may be required or taken up from time to time for settlement, mining, trading or other purposes, by the Government of Canada or by any citizen duly authorised therefor by said Government. The treaty provides for a reserve of land, which is also described, and is sufficiently large to allow one square mile for each family of five. In settlement of past claims the treaty provides for the payment of a sum of $12 to each man, woman and child. The price of the Indian title payable to the Indians at suitable places and dates, and annually to each chief $25, each minor chief or councillor $15, and to every Indian, of whatever age, $5. A sum of $2,000 is to be expended every year in the purchase of ammunition or some other purpose, as the Indians and Government may determine. Every head chief, minor chief, chief and councillor, is entitled every three years to a suitable suit of clothing. Each head and minor chief is to receive, for the use of their bands, once for all, ten axes, five handsaws, five augers, one grindstone and the necessary files and whetstones. Every family of five persons and under is to receive the following cattle for raising stock, two cows; family of more than five and less than ten persons, three cows; family over ten persons, four cows; every head and minor chief, for his band, one bull. If any band desire to cultivate the soil as well as raise stock, each family of such band shall receive one cow less; and in lieu thereof, when settled on their reserves and prepared to break up the soil, two hoes, one spade, one scythe, and two hay forks; and for every three families, one plough and one harrow; and for each band, enough potatoes, barley, oats and wheat to place other land actually broken up. All the said articles to be given once for all for the encouragement of the practice of agriculture among the Indians. Each head chief and minor chief and Stony chief is to receive a Winchester rifle. And finally, the Indians undertake to conduct and behave themselves as good and loyal subjects of Her Majesty. These are the stipulations generally inserted in treaties with Indians. Treat No. 7, however, signed in 1877 with the Blackfeet, is the only one which provides for the supply of Winchester rifles, a provision greatly to be regretted, introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite, which did its work of destruction among our troops during the recent battles. Treaty No. 6 and other treaties with the Plain and Woods Crees contains the undertaking, on the part of the Government, to grant, during the three years after two or more of the reserves shall be set apart to the Indians, a sum of one thousand dollars yearly, to be employed in the purchase of provisions for the use of the Indians as are actually engaged in cultivating the soil, and to assist them in such cultivation. A medicine chest is also to be kept by the Indian agent for the use of the Indians, the necessity of which is fully demonstrated by the report of the Mounted Police for 1884. It will be conceded that these Indian treaties are most liberal, and they do not comprise the numerous presents which had to be made as preliminaries before even talking of the terms of the treaties. Le Metis, of the 24th July, 1872, speaking of one of the treaties with the Sautaux, says:

" Mr. Simpson, at Fort Francis, spent $4,000 or $5,000 in presents to the Sautaux, who, before even speaking of treaty, had already laid down most exorbitant pretensions.

On rapporte que s'ils n'ont pas demandé chacun un carrosse, c'est uniquement parce qu'ils n'en ont pas encore l'idée."

Notwithstanding the liberality of the treaties towards the Indians, experience soon proved that they were insufficient. For some years it was supposed that it would be at least 25 years before the decrease of the buffalo would be seriously felt. It was then to be seen nearly over the whole North-West Territory. A correspondent of the New York Sun, writing from Mile's city, Montana, on the 24th of April 1885, says: "In 1815 the buffalo ranges extended as far east as Illinois, Minnesota and Iowa; in short, the Mississippi River marked the eastern boundary of their grazing grounds. On the west the main Rocky Mountain ridge was the limit of their pastures; and between these two natural boundaries the buffalo roamed over the vast plains of the west, migrating with the seasons north and south, from the shores of the Arctic to the Gulf of Mexico. They were at the mercy of various Indian tribes, but the Indians were merciful. From this one animal the red men drew the main necessities of life. The hides furnished clothing, beds and lodge coverings. The horns were used as ornaments, and also furnished various kitchen utensils. The flesh was their staple food, and their sinews became arrow cords. The Indians used the animal but did not abuse it. The herds in those days south of the present international boundary line strictly in the United States must have contained not less than 5,000,000 animals. In what is now Manitoba, Assiniboia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, there must have been fully 5,000,000 more, as the Hudson Bay trappers who came south to trade with the Snake, Shoshone and Modé Indians always reported vast herds of bison in the neighborhood of Great Slave and Great Bear Lakes. The buffalo were all right, until about seven years ago, when the Indians were conquered, which opened up the country and let the hide hunters in. It took almost seven years, beginning with 1870, to exterminate the buffalo along the line of the Northern Pacific Railway, which, in the good old times, could have been seen blackening the Platte River bottom for miles. These poor silly beasts were so easily killed, and from their abundance, offered so rich a reward to the hide hunter, that every idle fellow in that part of the country could make good wages by butchering them. The Union Pacific railroad split the herds in half, and left a moiety to the north and a moiety to the south. Those in Texas were soon used up by sportsmen and professional hunters; but the great northern herd fled to Wyoming and Montana, where Sitting Bull and his followers took charge of and protected them, until Uncle Sam's soldiers began chasing him around the country, as well as the bison. From 1875 to 1880 fully 1,000,000 of these brutes were killed by soldiers and other white men. I heard of one enterprising pot-hunter on the Yellowstone who actually had a Gatling gun to help the slaughter along. He employed no less than thirty skinners to tear the hide from the poor animals as soon as they dropped, and each skinner received $1 for every hide he brought in at night. The skinned carcasses, as well as numberless unskinned, were left to rot where they fell. In short, the manipulator of the artillery kept ahead of his employés and provided them with more than they could attend to." As early as 1875 a missionary wrote to Le Métis, on the 15th September, from the Saskatchewan district:

" Il est vraiment inquiétant de voir les buffalos diminuer à vue d'œil ! Encore quelques années et le gouvernement aura sur les bras ces différentes tribus du Nord-Ouest, qui lui demanderont de quoi les empêcher de mourir de faim."

The slaughter of the buffalo was so great that the Indians and half-breeds became alarmed. They could not understand the inaction on the part of the Government. If we are to believe the Globe, the Mail and the Free Press of Mr. GIROUARD, Winnipeg, a Provisional Government which these papers called a republic, was proclaimed at St. Laurent, in 1875, with Gabriel Dumont as president, for the avowed purpose of protecting the buffalo, and obtaining a large tract of land for hunting purposes. Major General Smith and Col. French were sent with 55 Mounted Police to subdue the rebels, who, on learning of the arrival of the force, sent two emissaries to Fort Carlton to offer their surrender on condition of being pardoned, and they were pardoned. A correspondent of the Globe, of July, 1876, says during the winter of 1876 about 120,000 of these animals were killed. Mr. Schultz directed the attention of the Government to this important question during the Session of 1876." I believe that if the late Administration had made the slightest effort to protect the buffalo the recent troubles would never have happened. During the years 1874, 1875 and 1876 representations were made to them on all hands that the buffalo would soon disappear unless some protective measures were adopted by the Government; but nothing was done. If we have to feed the Indians for generations it will be because no action was taken by the late Government to preserve, for the Indians and half-breeds, who were living something like them, the buffalo, their main means of support. On the 20th of March, 1876, Mr. Schultz said:

" Among the papers which he hoped to have brought down by this motion would be found valuable suggestions as to the preservation of the buffalo. He (Mr. Schultz) would urge the importance of this matter upon the Government. So long as the buffalo were numerous there was little danger of difficulty with the plain tribes of Indians, with whom we were now being brought into contact. When these were extinct we must expect to deal with a race of paupers, rendered dangerous by want of food. The Rev. Father Lascombe, a high authority on all such matters, believes, in common with many others, that if the present rate of destruction goes on the race of buffalo will be extinct in 10 years. It is true that since the completion of the Union Pacific Railroad and the establishment of military and other settlements in the Missouri, Father Lascombe estimates the number killed yearly during the winter at 80,000, and about the same number in summer. Their present feeding ground comprises a length of, say, about 600 miles by about 150, and is bounded on the west by the Rocky Mountains, on the east by the Qu'Appelle Lakes, on the south by the Missouri, and on the north by the north branch of the Saskatchewan; and this limit is ever decreasing, by the destruction caused by the hunters of the Saskatchewan on the north, those from the Missouri on the south, and the red River Hunters on the east, to an extent and rapidly so alarming that it is estimated by the Reverend Father and others that in 10 years they will be extinct. Such a result is not at all improbable, since it is only a few years since the buffalo ranged east of the Red River, and since the last of the wood buffalo, an animal of the same species, but of larger size, which ranged between the Saskatchewan and the Slave Lakes, was killed, and the whole of the race is extinct. The use of the revolving pistol and the repeating rifle, instead of the ordinary loading gun, has helped to bring this about, aided by the destruction caused by wolves, sickness, accidents of various sorts and the wasteful destruction of the buffalo pound. Unfortunately, too, it is the robe of the female Buffalo which is the most valuable, and when killed for it she is always with calf. It is her flesh which makes the best meat, and being more easily hunted down than the bulls, it has caused a destruction which has resulted in many of the bands met with last summer being composed of a proportion of six or seven males to one female. The district where buffalo are found has narrowed with a startling rapidity during the last 10 years, buffalo having about that time been seen by him (Mr. Schultz) east of Red River. These facts point strongly to the necessity of preventive measures, and the facts spoken of are so well known to the Indians and half-breeds that they are anxious the Government should take action in the matter, if it were not for the fact that it would be impossible to prevent the killing of cows. At the same time there would be no objection to the killing of buffalo bulls at any season of the year; but since this is impossible, a stringent law is demanded, which will practically leave these animals undisturbed from the 1st November to 1st May, and an enactment to prevent the killing of calves at any season. If such a law were passed it is believed that in five years the buffalo would have so increased that these restrictions might be removed. He (Mr. Schultz) hoped that this matter would receive the consideration at the hands of the Government which its importance demanded, and that the papers bearing on this matter would be printed for the general information they would afford."

" Hon. Mr. Mackenzie said the matter to which the hon. member had particularly alluded—the preservation of the buffalo in the western prairies—had occupied a large share of the attention of the Government for a considerable time."

Nothing more; nothing whatever was done to protect this most important food of the Indians.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, there was.

Mr. GIROUARD. I am coming to that. True, the council of the North-West, at its first session, 1877, passed an ordinance for the protection of the buffalo; but for reasons which do not appear, was repealed the next session. Perhaps it did conflict with treaty obligations with Indians. The measure was, however, too important to be left to the local council. It was a question of death or life for the large number of Indians which were under the special care of the Dominion, and should have been dealt with by the Dominion Government. It is greatly to be regretted that the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite did not adopt the protective measures which had been suggested to the Government by Father Lacombe and other experienced residents. The Premier of the Administration of those days admitted, in March, 1876, that the matter occupied a large share of the attention of his Government for a considerable time, but nothing was done. Again, during the Session of 1877, this important matter was brought before the House and discussed at considerable length. New revelations were made and the policy of the Government announced. Mr. Schultz addressed the House on the subject. I will not repeat every speech made, but merely quote a few extracts:

"Several years ago, in speaking of the condition of the Indians of the North-West, he (Mr. Schultz) had pointed out the results likely to be occasioned by the entire destruction of the buffalo. The animal was invaluable to the Indians, because its flesh was his food, the hide his house and clothing, while the sale of its robe furnished him with all that he needed of European manufacture. Without this source of supply the Indian would become a pauper, and, by an easy transition, a marauder. To avert these results, it was obvious that the buffalo must be protected, at least, till a time arrived when the Indians who now inhabited these hunting grounds could be weaned from the chase and taught to depend wholly or in part upon agriculture. From one of the Government sources of information he was glad to see their attention directed towards this matter, and hon. gentlemen would find, in page 34 of the Minister of the Interior's report, the following statement of Mr. Dickinson, of that Department.

"The subject which at present takes precedence of all others in connection with the Indian question in the North-West Territories is the preservation of the buffalo. The rapid decrease in the numbers of the buffalo has become a matter of alarm to the Indians, who see that, unless steps are speedily taken to arrest it, their future condition will be one of extreme hardship. That the buffalo are decreasing in number in a rapidly increasing ratio is a fact admitted on all sides.

"I am aware that this question has already received some consideration on the part of the Government, and that representations have been made by parties better informed than I claim to be, as to the necessity of some action in regard to it. For this reason, I will not enter into the matter as fully as I would otherwise have done.

"While at the Qu'Appelle Lake the Cree chiefs, accompanied by their principle head men, waited upon me, and represented that they were becoming alarmed, on account of their means of subsistence failing, and begged me to report what they said to the Government, and to convey their request that something should be done to prevent the entire extermination of the buffalo. To show the importance they attached to this question, I may remark that each chief and his head men separately made the same request. In all my previous intercourse with the Indians I have never seen this course adopted. In discussing other matters, a spokesman is generally chosen, who speaks for all; the others merely signify their assent; but in this case it was evident they considered something more was necessary, and adopted this method to impress the gravity of their position upon me. In my opinion, the buffalo must be protected, or in a few years, not more than ten at the furthest, the whole number of Indians in the North-West, who now rely upon these animals for subsistence, will require to be fed and maintained principally at the expense of the Dominion Government. I can see no other alternative, as it is an impossibility to teach them in a short time to forsake their present mode of life and adopt that of civilised men. The subject is one which demands and should receive the early consideration of the Government, for the peace and consequent prosperity of the North-West Territories depend in a great measure upon it. Should the buffalo become exterminated, it is not to be expected that the starving Indians will refrain from helping themselves to the supplies to be found in the stores of the Hudson's Bay Company and other traders; compelled by hunger, outrages might be committed by them which would result in an Indian war. These are the views of every one who is well informed regarding the state of the country, and while I admit that the Indians at present are peaceable, well disposed, and have every confidence in the Government, I think there can be no doubt that they are correct."

These were the warnings made in 1876 by one of the officials of the late Administration. Let us see what has been their policy on receiving such strong remonstrances.

Mr. MILLS. Since 1879.

Mr. GIROUARD. I will let you know very soon. This report of Mr. Dickinson was made in 1876 and published in the Sessional Papers of 1877, and quoted by Mr. Schultz during the debate of 1877. Other hon. gentlemen spoke on the subject. Let us see what Mr. Donald Smith said:

"The Hon. Donald A. Smith (Selkirk) said he was happy to be able to concur entirely with the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz). It was very necessary that some steps should be taken to prevent the entire destruction of the buffalo in the North-West. This was a matter in which there might be reciprocity with the United States. We should give them the same measure which they gave us. They did not permit any except American citizens to go to their territories and trade and hunt, and even their own citizens were forced to get licenses. The slaughter and disappearance of the buffalo was owing in a large measure to the inducements held out to American traders. A large number of the robes went to the other side, and, while the Canadian trader lost profit so far as this was concerned, the buffalo were also rapidly decreasing, or rather, gradually but surely being killed out. He hoped that the Government would be able to devise some means to exclude, to some extent, the ingress of American traders, and also, as far as possible, to give protection to the buffalo."

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. GIROUARD. When we rose at six o'clock, I was referring to the discussion which took place in the House of Commons in 1876 and in 1877, concerning the sudden disappearance of the buffalo. I also referred to the report of Mr. Dickinson, an officer of the late Administration, upon the subject, where he said that the most important question affecting the Indians was the preservation of the buffalo. I quoted the opinion of Mr. Schultz and of Mr. Smith. I will now continue to read extracts of the continuation of that debate. Mr. Mills, on behalf of the Government, rose and said:

"This subject had received the serious consideration of the Government. So far as he has been able to look into the matter, he was of the opinion that it had better be left to be dealt with by the Government of the North-West, rather than by the Parliament here. From the information in the possession of the Government, there could be no doubt that the buffalo were rapidly diminishing, and this diminution had sensibly increased since American traders had come across. Ever since the settlement of Manitoba, also, the buffalo had retreated farther and farther to the west. The half-breeds, in their pursuits, had invaded the country of the Blackfeet and Blood Indians, and much complaint had arisen therefrom. The Government had some information which they could supply, such as a report by the North-West council and a communication from one or two missionaries. He saw one of the missionaries a short time ago, and obtained from him all the information possible. He had come to the conclusion that it would be a very formidable undertaking. The missionary he spoke of said it would be necessary to induce the Indians to obey the law, as at present they had not sufficient respect for each other to observe any regulation. The result was, that those who would be disposed to refrain from destroying the buffalo were prevented from acting upon such a principle by the fact that others would not act in the same way. His informant's opinion further was, that it would be necessary to get the Indians to abandon the plains and live along the borders of some of the lakes for a period of four or five years. They could subsist by fishing and agriculture during that time, although the Government would also be obliged to contribute very considerably to their support. The Local Government of the North-West could probably devise a cheaper and better plan than this Parliament, it being on the spot and more familiar with the matter."

"Mr. Trow (I believe now the whip of the Opposition) said buffalo were very prolific, and if a law were passed to protect them for a few years, he had no doubt that they would soon increase. Although he frequently saw the bones of the buffalo bleaching in the sun in Manitoba, not a live buffalo could be seen, until four or five hundred miles west was reached. The buffalo must be protected, or else it would soon become extinct.

"Mr. Schultz (in reply to Mr. Mills) said: Father Lacombe suggested that no Buffalo should be killed from 1st November to 1st May in each year, and no calf at any time—this restriction to continue for five years. But the full-grown animal might be killed all the summer; hence the fear of his hon. friend, that the Government would have to support the Indians during the five years of enforcement of a preservation law, would be without foundation. The statement made by the hon. the Minister of the Interior, on the same point, he must criticise somewhat. The hon. the Minister seemed to fear that if a protective statute were enacted great expense would be caused to the Government in supplying the Indians with the means of subsistence during the interval between 1st November and 1st May, when they were not allowed to kill the buffalo. Now he (Mr. Schultz) believed that no such great expense would be caused. Much of the food in the shape of dried meat and pemmican used by the Indians in the winter was made by them in the summer months, and if it was once understood that no buffalo were to be killed during the winter months, the Indians would lay in an extra supply of the dried meat, and the expenditure by the Government of a few thousand dollars for twine for nets would be all the aid the Indians would require. On the score of expense, he must take issue on other grounds as well with the Minister of the Interior. Every hon. gentleman who has spoken seemed impressed with the belief that we were likely to have difficulty with the Indians if the buffalo supply speedily cut off. Now, the history of Indian difficulties in the United States taught us that, under any circumstances, it was far cheaper to feed the Indians than to fight them. * * * He had every confidence in the good intentions of his hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, but as the Government of the North-West was an appointed one, and not responsible in any way to the people of that region, it would be necessary for the Government here, as they were responsible for the actions of the North-West Government, to see that important measures, like the one under consideration, receive prompt attention.

"Mr. Mills said that the hon. gentleman had misapprehended what he had stated. He had not said that it was necessary to prevent the Indians from destroying the buffalo for several years in succession, but for the period of each year extending from November to May. This was the statement made to him by Father Lacombe. He believed that the hon. gentleman was himself a member of the North-West council, and it had had power to deal with this question, but he was not aware that anything had been done.

"Mr. Schultz said that the hon. Minister had evidently not lately read the correspondence of the late North-West Council, for if he had he would find, among the papers which he hoped to have brought down by this motion, that the old North-West council had brought up the matter in the strongest form possible, and urged the necessity for a protective law of this kind."

So we have the policy expressed by the late Government, that they would do nothing to preserve the buffalo. At this time, in 1877, they did not say that the matter will continue to receive an important share of the consideration of the Government. They express that their policy is to do nothing; and when they left office, in 1878, the buffalo was almost—I might say altogether—extinct. It was too late for the present Administration to do anything to preserve it. The buffalo was destroyed for want of protection, and for this blunder of the late Administration, the country is forced to-day to feed, and not only to feed, but to fight the Indians, and will likely be obliged to do so until the grown-up generations are gone. At the time the present Administration came into power, the preservation of the buffalo was out of question. The Indian problem was how to take care of the Indians, irrespective of treaties, and how to civilise them. Le Métis said:

"Le Canada a une grosse difficulté à résoudre, celle des sauvages du Nord-Ouest. Ces pauvres gens meurent de faim * * * Le gouvernement fait tout ce qu'il peut pour soulager leur misère actuelle, mais il semble en oublier la cause."

The Métis then states that the principal cause of the destitution of the Indian is their nomadic life, and asked the Government to settle them down somewhere. Immediately upon coming to power, the right hon. Premier of this Government announces its Indian policy for the future. In his report, dated 10th April, 1879, he says:

"The rapid disappearance of the buffalo, which is the staple article of food of the Indians and half-breeds of the North-West Territories, induces the belief that these people must, in a few years, be fed at the expense of the country, unless they, in the meantime, acquire some other means of subsistence than the buffalo hunt now affords. In order to enable them to become self-supporting as soon as possible, facilities must be provided by which they may acquire some practical knowledge of agriculture and of the care of stock.

"They will probably require some small supply of provisions each year while they are engaged in tilling and sowing their lands. Such assistance, however, should only be extended to those Indians who prove to be in earnest in endeavoring to become self-subsisting.

"The bands in the vicinity of the Rocky Mountains appear to prefer stock raising to agriculture, and they will be encouraged to become owners of herds of cattle."

On the 13th of the same month, 1880, Father Hugonard, speaking of the distress prevailing among the Indians and half-breeds in the North-West, gives this advice to the half-breeds of Manitoba, who had left their settled Province for the prairie life:

"Pauvres gens de Manitoba qui cherchez à vendre vos terres pour aller reprendre la vie de chasse et de traité, réfléchissez donc un peu au tort que vous préparez à vos familles. Ne comptez plus sur les chances de vivre dans les prairies de l'Ouest. Les sauvages eux-mêmes n'y trouveront pas de quoi subsister, et s'ils veulent éviter la mort, ils seront obligés sous peu de se livrer à l'agriculture. Tandis que vous possédez de riches terres, gardez-les avec soin et n'allez pas les vendre au premier venu."

M. G. GIROUARD.

In the Speech from the Throne for the Session of 1880 the situation of the Indians is thus referred to:

"In consequence of the entire failure in the food supply of the Indians in the North-West, a large expenditure has been necessarily incurred to save them from starvation. It is hoped that the efforts which are now being made to settle the several bands on the reserves and to induce them to betake themselves to the cultivation of the soil may prevent the necessity of similar calls for relief in the future."

On the contrary, the distress, instead of decreasing, has been ever since increasing. Le Métis, of the 10th April, 1878, says:

"The news from Battleford is to the effect that the greatest dissatisfaction prevails among the Indians."

In 1881 the Marquis of Lorne visited the North-West, and thus referred to the Indians in the Speech from the Throne, in the Session of 1882:

"During my journey I was met by numerous Indian tribes, all expressing confidence in the continuance of the traditional policy of kindness and justice which has hitherto marked the relations between the Government and the aborigines.

"I regret, however, that the necessity of supplementing the food supply to the Indians still exists, and is likely to continue for some years."

Referring to the year 1884, the Minister of the Interior, in his report, dated 1st January, 1885, says:

"Upon being advised of this fact, I directed that measures should be taken to prevent consequent suffering among the Indians. Supplementary contracts have accordingly been made with inhabitants of the Territories for the supply of additional quantities of flour, as they may be required at the various points. I also authorised the purchase of an additional quantity of ammunition and twine, in order that the Indians might be able to supply themselves and families with fish and game during the winter."

Mr. Speaker, it will be necessary to feed the Indians, not only for a year, but until the present grown up generations are gone. It can hardly be expected that a man who has been brought up in hunting and war can immediately settle down to the civilised life of agriculture. We will have to feed him, or he will steal and fight for his life. Our only hope is with the children. Monseigneur Grandin said, in 1878:

"On ne parviendra jamais à civiliser les sauvages suffisamment pour en faire de bons citoyens, qu'en les prenant tout petits enfants."

The present Government acted upon this recommendation. The first Government aid towards schools was made by hon. gentlemen opposite, in 1876, but it amounted only to $2,000. In 1877 only three schools were receiving Government aid, St. Albert, Lac la Biche and White Fish Lake. In 1878 ten Indian schools were in operation in Manitoba and four in the North-West. Mr. McCaul, Indian Superintendent for Manitoba, says, in his report, dated Winnipeg, 31st December, 1878:

"There are comparatively few Government schools in operation in this superintendency, and I regret to say that the majority of them are of a very inferior grade, on account of the incompetency of many of the teachers in charge. In numerous instances, where no schools have been established, the chiefs and councillors expressed the desire that their children might be educated, and requested me to ask the Government not only to send them teachers, but also to build them school houses. I attribute the low standard of the schools to the small amount allowed by the Government for the salary of teachers in each reserve, for only the most inefficient ones can be obtained at such a consideration. I would, therefore, beg leave to suggest that a larger allowance be granted for that purpose, and that only efficient teachers be engaged."

As to the yet "unorganised superintendency" of the North-West, as Hon. Mr. Laird was pleased to call it, in his report of the 5th December, 1878, speaking of the schools, he says:

"Only a few schools in this superintendency as yet received aid from the Government. All of these are mission schools. The schools connected with the Roman Catholic mission at St. Albert, Lac la Biche and Isle à la Croix receive aid for the Indian children instructed there. I have not been able to visit any of these institutions, but I hear them highly spoken of. The Church of England mission school at Touchwood Hills, near Chief Gordon's reserve, also received aid, and an application has been made on behalf of a similar school at Assissippi, on Ahtahacoop's reserve, near Carlton, and of one at Eagle Hills reserve, near Battleford, which I trust will receive favorable consideration. The Canadian Methodists have also some good Indian schools, but if they are now in receipt of Government aid it is not forwarded through this office."

I may say, however, that it is was not without due representation coming from very high authorities in the North-West, if the late Administration paid so little attention to teaching the Indians. Amongst the papers which came into my hands only yesterday, I find a letter from His Lordship the Bishop of St. Albert, Monseigneur Grandin, to Lieutenant Governor Laird, dated 5th April, 1875. I will not quote the whole letter, but only extracts of it. His Lordship, in the course of his remarks, says:

"BISHOPRIC, ST. ALBERT,
"5th April, 1875.

"SIR,—You will perhaps be surprised, that without having the advantage of knowing you, or of being known by you, I venture to address Your Honor personally.

"I would not have ventured on this boldness if the worthy Colonel Jarvis had not apprised me of your indulgence, and your great desire to render any service.

"Assured of your goodness, I will write to you at length, hoping you will have the patience to read and take into consideration what I shall tell you.

"The little news we receive from Manitoba had made us suppose that the Government at Ottawa was a good deal occupied about our country. However, until the arrival of the troops, we had not received the slightest mark of interest from that Government.

"Permit me, Sir, to tell you frankly that it appears to me, while encouraging emigration into the North-West Territories, the Government should consider the benefit of the present inhabitants of the North-West. Apart from the sending of the soldiers nothing has been done, at least, of which we are aware, and this single benefit is far from being known and appreciated by all.

"But they will say, 'the Métis are good for nothing—a people idle and without economy.'

"If they were a hundredfold worse, if you will, those who have such advantages over them should not forget that the Métis are generally descended from the servants of the Hudson Bay Company; that these servants, almost exclusively engaged in voyaging, did nothing, or nearly nothing, during their long winters, and could not consequently give their children a liking for work—not seeing its utility. Who was there to teach them notions of order and economy? The mothers had not the faintest idea. Besides, receiving each day the food necessary for the whole family, what was the good of managing? 'The company profits, and the company is rich,' says a proverb well known in the country.

"If they left the service the buffalos, then very numerous, supplied them with abundance of food with little labor. The surplus of provisions and the furs and skins, also very abundant, procured them the necessary clothing.

"But they do not even manage their money. How can they? Many of them never saw money, and have not the least idea of its value. Why deprive themselves of anything during the year? The only advantage they will acquire will be to learn, on the return of the courier (postman), that the books of York Factory contain many Louis to their credit.

"Others who have spent all their wages in fine clothes for themselves and their families have a pile of pleasant and useful little things. In this they behold a fortune. Money nor an account book is of any consideration.

"I ask Your Honor's pardon for such details; but I do not consider them altogether useless.

"Whatever draws attention to the chain of circumstances in which the Métis are born, is important, and which, being multiplied, cannot but excuse them for faults with which they are reproached nor be surprised that they are even as they are.

"I could cite more than one tourist who, by their writings, have contributed to make them be regarded in Canada and other places as a barbarous and savage people, incapable of culture or civilisation, and who have left among the Métis and the Indians themselves a very sad idea of the morality of civilised people.

"No, Sir, the Métis are not such as they would wish to make them appear—a barbarous people, incapable of culture. I think, on the contrary, that they merit all the sympathy of a good Government. Let it give them some encouragement and it will see if there is nothing to hope from them.

"I therefore venture, Sir, to pray you to take in hand the cause of these poor Métis, and that the Government will be good enough to do something to encourage farming among them, at least, to those who exhibit such a willingness. Everything is scarce and so difficult to get in this country that not only the Métis, but strangers themselves can only vegetate.

"We have boasted of our Territory being called the garden of the north, and the fertile belt. This does not prevent those who inhabit it from suffering, and those who will come from suffering still more.

"To encourage agriculture, it is not only necessary to procure farming implements at a low rate, but as soon as possible to have easy ways of transport for the actual necessities of life.

"In June, 1873, taking advantage of a trip to Europe, I passed through Ottawa, and had the honor of an interview with the right hon. John Macdonald and H. Langevin on the affairs of our country. In the month of September following I addressed a letter directly to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada. On my return from Europe I found at St. Albert a letter, which His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor, of Manitoba had caused to be written to me. According to that letter I had every reason to hope that my requests would be complied with.

"To advance civilisation of our population, all Métis and Indians, everyone is aware that schools are of the last importance. I was convinced that, under the Government of Canada, the encouragement of schools would be one of its first boons—till now I have hoped in vain.

"Besides the schools, we have also orphan asylums. I have the advantage of having three in my diocese, where fifty children have been brought up, both Métis and Indian.

"They speak of civilising the Indians by making them cultivate. It may arise that the missionaries, by working with them, ploughing and making them plough their lands, may, in the course of time, reach some results; but they will be slow and unappreciable. Fifteen years' experience does not allow me doubt that we can succeed in bringing up the little children. Many, doubtless, will not be able to receive a thorough education; but at least they can speak their Indian tongue; and getting accustomed to work, their savage life will be no longer possible. They can rank and mix with the Métis, with whom we marry them without much difficulty; and they will end, I doubt not, in forming good families, who will have no traces of the Indian but the blood. If, then, instead of three asylums for orphans, I had a certain number wherein I could admit all the little Indians they would give me, we would advance civilisation.

"As regards those who are Indians, if the Government will make reserves in their favor, I venture to beg that Your Honor will ensure that these reserves be composed of cultivable lands and situated near fishing lakes. In this way, besides cultivation, which will not amount to much, they will have two other means of living—hunting and fishing.

"I ask pardon, Sir, for abusing your patience so long, but I still rest on what the brave Col. Jarvis told me of your indulgence.

"I have shown you my mode of procedure to elevate the position of the inhabitants of this country. More than twenty years of experience among them makes me believe that my plans are not bad.

"I venture then, Sir, to reiterate my requests, and to earnestly pray Your Honor to use all your influence to procure them for me:

"1st. Before all, I ask some encouragement for the settlers. The Catholic missionaries have done almost impossible things in this direction. They have at different places three mills. For the third time we have tried to erect one in the colony of St. Albert—behold more than £900 stg. which we have sacrificed for it; and we are still uncertain whether we shall succeed. That the Government may, on their part, deign to do something to encourage agriculture.

"2nd. Aid for a hospital—at least to construct it, and put it in a condition to receive the sick.

"3rd. Aid for schools. The Government makes large outlay for education in all Canada. Is our North-West to be alone withheld assistance? It cannot be said that we require help less than other parts of the country.

"4th. Aid for our orphan asylums, that we may increase these establishments, so as to be able to take in a greater number of little savages.

"5th. Concession of land for each orphan asylum or model farm.

"6th. Reserve, of land for the children thus brought up, and aid to help them on to a little farm once they are married.

"7th. And lastly, that the reserves to be made over to the Indians be of arable land, and situated near fishing lakes.

"I am really ashamed, Sir, of the length of my letter, which I have been obliged to write in haste, because I was sure of the opportunity which offered of its reaching you.

"I wrote the lines close, and tried to economise my paper, so as to conceal my prattling.

"I have only succeeded in making it more apparent.

"Your Honor knows what babblers the Indians are—it is not surprising if I should resemble them, after living twenty-one years amongst them.

"This letter, coming to you, as it were, from a poor Indian, will, such as it is, be received and read by you indulgently. You will also, I am sure, take it into consideration, and constitute yourself our advocate.

"Receive, in advance, the assurance of my consideration, and be good enough to believe me,

"Sir, Your Honor's humble and respectful servant,

"(Signed) + VITAL, J.,

"Bishop of St. Albert, O.M.I.

"To His Honor

"The Very Honorable D. LAIRD,
"Minister of the Interior, Ottawa."

Here is the answer of the Minister of Interior:

"To the Right Reverend J. VITAL GRANDIN,
Bishop of St. Albert, North-West Territory.

OTTAWA, 31st July, 1875.

"MY LORD,—I have the honor, by the desire of the Superintendent General, to acknowledge the receipt of Your Lordship's letter of the 5th of April last, calling his attention to the condition of the settlers in your diocese in the North-West.

"2. The Superintendent General desires me to say that he has read with much interest your valuable communication, which reached him some days ago.

"3. He wishes me to assure Your Lordship that he and his colleagues in the Government have the most earnest desire to promote the well-being of all the inhabitants of the North-West, whether Indians or half-breeds, and that it will afford the Government sincere pleasure to cooperate, so far as is in his power, in your praiseworthy efforts to elevate their condition.

"4. The Superintendent General is gratified to receive from Your Lordship the assurance of the great benefits to the cause of law and order in the Territories which have already resulted from the action of the Government in sending the Mounted Police into the country. He regrets to learn, however, from your letter, that a large number of the Métis has contemplated abandoning the Province and settling in the United States, but is gratified to find that through Your Lordship's judicious intervention they were induced to remain in Canada.

"5. The Superintendent General is surprised and grieved at the statement in your letter that the Métis in your diocese regard the Dominion Government with feelings of uneasiness and distrust, and point to the occurrences in connection with the troubles at Red River as an evidence of the want of friendly feeling of the Government towards them.

"6. The Superintendent General thinks that a calm review of all the facts connected with those unhappy occurrences ought to convince any candid and thoughtful person that the Government has acted throughout towards the Métis who were compromised therein in a spirit of kindness; and Your Lordship can assure the settlers in your diocese who continue peaceable and law-abiding that the Government will be prepared to deal with them in a spirit of generous consideration. The Superintendent General hopes, therefore, that Your Lordship will be able to disabuse the minds of the Métis of the Saskatchewan of the erroneous impressions they would seem to labor under with regard to the feelings entertained toward them by the Dominion Government.

"7. The Superintendent General has read with especial interest your remarks upon the subject of schools for the Indians and Métis, believing, as he does, that it is to the education of the rising generation of Indians we must look for any permanent elevation of the red man.

"8. I shall now proceed to notice seriatim the several heads under which you ask the Government to aid the settlers in the North-West. You ask for:

- "1. Encouragement for the settlers in agriculture.
- "2. Aid for hospitals.
- "3. Aid for schools.
- "4. Aid for orphan asylums.
- "5. Concessions of land for orphan asylums and model farms.
- "6. Reserves of land for the children, and aid to help them in farming; and
- "7. And lastly; reserves for the Indians of arable land situate near fishing lakes.

"As to the first, namely the encouragement of agriculture among the settlers, the Superintendent General cannot but congratulate Your Lordship upon the efforts made by the mission, especially by the establishment of mills to enable the settlers to utilise the grain raised in your diocese.

"The Superintendent General wishes to remind you that this is a subject which will properly come within the province of the Local Government soon to be inaugurated in the North-West. He thinks, however, that it is obvious that the measures now being taken by the Dominion Government to carry a railroad and telegraph line through the Territories must have the effect of opening up the country and of facilitating transfer through it, and in this way cannot fail to give an impetus to the agricultural interest of the Territory.

"The 2nd, 3rd and 4th heads referred to by you, are all matters which come especially within the province of the Local Legislature.

"With regard to the third head, I may remark that the Dominion Lands Act makes provision by a liberal land grant to aid general educational purposes in the Territories, and so far as the Indians are concerned, the Dominion Government will, no doubt, be prepared, when the Territory is surrendered, to make the same provisions there as elsewhere by treaty for Indian schools. In the meantime, I am directed by the Minister to transmit to Your Lordship an official cheque for the sum of $300 in aid of the school at St. Albert, authorised by Order in Council of the 22nd October, 1873. As is assumed from Your Lordship's report, that the average attendance of Indian children at this school is not less than the number required by the Order in Council, viz. 25, any one of the other schools which Your Lordship may think proper to select will be entitled to a similar one for the current year, provided, of course, the average attendance of Indian children throughout the year is not less than 25.

"As to the fifth head, namely, concessions of land for orphan asylums and model farms, the Superintendent General is not prepared at present to make any definite pledge on behalf of the Government. On this point the Superintendent General will be able to speak more definitely after a treaty has been made, and when the question of the extent of land asked for for the purposes above mentioned is more accurately known.

"The sixth head refers to large question of public policy, on what it would be manifestly too premature at present to pronounce an opinion. The settlers of the North-West have good grounds for believing that the Dominion Government will deal liberally with them. There is a sufficiency of land in the Territory for all of them and their children, and it is earnestly to be hoped that they will cultivate as much of it as possible, and secure for themselves comfortable homes in the country to which they belong.

Mr. GIBOUARD.

"As regards the seventh head, namely, the reserves for the Indians. This matter has hitherto been fully provided for, and all treaties made with the Indians, by which assistance in money and agricultural implements has always been secured to them, and there can be no reason to doubt that these matters will be dealt with in a similar spirit of liberality in future treaties.

"The reservation secured to the Indians will, no doubt, have a fair proportion of arable land, and will include, when it is practicable, any fishing lakes which the Indians may desire to avail themselves of.

"In this connection. Your Lordship will bear in mind that in all cases Indian reserves are selected after conference with the tribes interested, and in this way every reasonable precaution to guard the interest and meet the wishes of the Indians.

"I have the honor to be, Your Lordship's most obedient servant, (Signed.) DAVID LAIRD."

It will be noticed that when this answer to Bishop Grandin was sent, on 31st July, 1875, the North-West council was not organized. Here is the opinion of a very high authority, perhaps the best in that country, in regard to the habits, characters and qualities of the Indians. Bishop Grandin recommends to the Government that Indian children should be educated; and what is the answer he received? In the month of July, 1875, His Lordship is sent to the North-West council. And it must be remarked that at that time the council was not in existence. There was a provision passed during the Session, a few months before that letter was written, in 1875, providing for the creation of a North-West council as it exists to-day, and undoubtedly giving the members of that council jurisdiction over school matters; but that council was not really organized until the month of October, 1876. The law was not put in operation, and that is the answer which the late Government gave to Bishop Grandin, to go to the North-West Council, which was not then in existence. We may well imagine the difference between the policy of the present Government and that of the last one, when we are informed (as we are, in the report of Indian Affairs for last year) that the Government now maintains or subsidised 53 schools among the Indians of Manitoba and the North-West, at an expense of $12,241.74, or about $240 per annum for each school. Among these teachers, 10 are French, or French Canadians: Sisters Lemay, Paquette, Langelier and Blanchet, and Fathers Dupont, Allard, Marchand, Paquette, Fafard, Méraire, Lestance and Mr. Tabouret. The Government having seriously undertaken to settle the Indians to civilised life, went further than establishing elementary schools among them. In 1883 they asked for a vote of $14,000 to establish industrial schools, with a view of forming one on the High River, near Calgary, for the benefit of the Blackfeet under Father Lacombe; one at Battleford, under the direction of the Rev. Thomas Clarke, of the Church of England, for the benefit of the Crees and other Indians of the Saskatchewan district; one at Fort Qu'Appelle, under Father Huguenard. These schools cost about $12,000 each, and are large enough to receive 30 boys and the High River and Qu'Appelle schools can also accommodate 10 or 12 girls, which are placed under the care of the nuns. Besides these establishments entirely maintained by the Government, the Government granted, in 1883, $1,500 to the Indian School of Bishop Grandin at St. Albert. The Minister of Indian Affairs, in his last official report, thus speaks of the working of these schools so far:

"Adverting to the improvement, intellectually, of the Indians of the North-West Territories, I am pleased to be able to inform your Excellency that the industrial schools at Battleford, Qu'Appelle and High River, which were referred to in my report of last year, as then in contemplation, have been since established, and are now in operation. That at Battleford commenced its work quite early in the year, under the Rev. Thos. Clarke as principal; and the institutions at Qu'Appelle and High River at a later date, under the control, the former of the Rev. Mr. Huguenard, and the latter of the Rev. Mr. Lacombe. Trades have not as yet been introduced among the attainments to be required by the pupils; but it is hoped that during the ensuing year the progress of the children will admit of the same being done. The original proposal was that these institutions should be devoted exclusively to the education of Indian boys, but it would be a proper subject for the consideration of Parliament at its ensuing Session, whether a sufficient amount should not be voted to admit of the buildings being enlarged, and a staff of female teachers employed for the education and industrial training of Indian girls; the same being, in my opinion, of as much importance as a factor in the civilisation and advancement of the Indian race as the education of the male portion of the community. The appreciation in which the Indians hold this effort of the Government to improve their intellectual and industrial condition is shown by the fact that at the institution at Battleford little or no difficulty was experienced in obtaining pupils; and for that at High River, more boys were offered than could be accommodated. It would, in my opinion, be advisable to establish two industrial institutions in the Manitoba superintendency, in order to afford the rising generation of Saulteaux, Swampy Cree, and Cree Indians of the districts embraced in that superintendency, similar advantages to those granted the Cree and Blackfoot Indians of the North-West Territories.

"Before leaving the district embraced in the Edmonton agency, I feel it to be incumbent upon me, as well as a pleasure, to refer to the excellent industrial institution which is conducted under the direction of His Lordship the Bishop of St. Albert at that place. The Indian pupils at this establishment, besides being instructed in the ordinary branches of education, have imparted to them, so far as the boys are concerned, a knowledge of farm work; and the girls are taught sewing, knitting and other household duties. The value of the service rendered to the Indian race by such institutions as the school at St. Albert, and that at Morleyville, which is of a similar type, is incalculable, and His Lordship, the energetic patron of the former establishment, and his able assistants, and the Rev. John McDougall, the able principal of the latter institution, are deserving of every praise for the efforts put forth by them for the elevation of these poor children of the prairie and of the forest."

We may fairly assume that the scheme is a move in the right direction from the fact that Bishop Grandin had already and successfully made the experiment and that His Grace Archbishop Taché went to Montreal, in 1884, for the purpose of providing for more industrial schools among the Indians throughout Manitoba and the North-West. Le Manitoba, of the 10th July, 1884, thus refers to the policy of industrial schools among Indians:

"L'établissement d'écoles industrielles pour les enfants sauvages que vient de décréter le gouvernement est une mesure de la plus grande prévoyance et qui est appelée à rendre des services les plus signalés. Le but est de recueillir l'enfant sauvage, de l'instruire, de le brieiser à une discipline et de l'accoutumer au travail suivant le progrès de ses forces.

The Government has adopted not only the system of industrial schools, but has also introduced practical farming among the Indians. That nothing was done by the late Government in this respect clearly results from the following extract of a letter of the 11th November, 1878, from Mr. Laird, published with the Sessional Papers of 1879:—

"In regard to your enquiries respecting the method of teaching the Indians farming, I am decidedly of opinion that the best plan is to have a permanent agricultural instructor with the bands. Where reserves are grouped together one instructor might take charge of, say, three or four bands. The number which would be necessary might be, for Treaty No. 4, five instructors; for Treaty No. 6, eight; Treaty No. 7, two. Each instructor, for salary and perquisites, would cost at least $1,000, or $1,500 in all, per annum, for say, ten years. If such instructors were appointed, I would advise dispensing with ordinary Indian sub-agents. Agents to go round and make the annual payments, and oversee the instructors to some extent, would still be required, as, in my opinion, it is injudicious to let money get into many hands. If the Indians were instructed in farming I think most of the bands would soon save their seed from their own crops. But, for a few years it would be of little avail to give them instructions unless they were allowed seed and provisions for two or three weeks while planting. In the spring they are generally absolutely destitute of food, and can do but little at farming, unless provisions are supplied to them."

Acting upon this report, the Conservative Government, as early as 1880, asked for an appropriation for the purpose of establishing farms on Indian reserves. Seventeen were established during that year, and there are now twenty-six in operation, and more particularly among the Indians of the Saskatchewan district. The total cost of the maintenance of these farms was $44,023. To give you an instance of the results of these farms, let us look at the return from the Indian agency of Carlton for 1884:

"The returns received show the number of Indians resident upon the reserves, and the area of land ploughed, and the quantities of produce raised last season on the reserves belonging to these Indians, to have been as follows:—

Resident Indians .....	1,791 souls.
Land broken .....	5,625 acres.
Roots grown .....	8,960 bushels.
Grain do .....	4,910 do
Hay cut .....	705 tons.

Battleford Agency—(Report for 1884).

"The ten bands and six reserves, last described, are under the superintendence of an Indian agent, who is stationed at Battleford. The following is a statement of the number of resident Indians, and the quantity of land ploughed, and of the quantities of produce gathered on these reserves last season:—

Resident Indians .....	2,423 souls.
Land ploughed and fenced.....	6,153 acres.
Roots grown.....	2,881 bushels.
Grain do .....	1,100 do
Hay saved .....	804 tons.

It will not be without interest to show the treatment by the Government of Poundmaker, who had connection with the recent rebellion. Poundmaker belongs to this agency, and last summer had a farm on his reserve, under the direction of Mr. Jefferson, as instructor; and here is the report of Mr. Dewdney, for 1884:

"It is estimated that this band had in crop this year two hundred acres, viz:—twenty-five of wheat, five of oats, one hundred and fifty of barley, eight of potatoes, seven of turnips, three of carrots and two acres in gardens. The grain will yield scarcely anything, on account of the drought and the frost. The computed yield of potatoes is three hundred bushels, and two hundred and fifty bushels of turnips. They have twenty-five dwellings and eight stables. They put up this year two hundred waggon loads of hay. The band has quite a herd of cattle, consisting of nineteen oxen, twelve cows, seven bulls, three steers, four heifers, six bull and six heifer calves; total fifty seven head and, for Northern Crees, they are rich in horses, having fifty-eight head. I did not observe much fall ploughing. They have plastered, repaired and banked up their houses for the winter. Upon enquiring what became of the crop of 1883, I was informed that a threshing machine was sent to the reserve shortly after the harvest, but the Indians, influenced by the chief, would not render the labor required to work it; consequently, no threshing was done with the machine. During the winter they treshed a little from day to day by hand, and were so careless that more than half the grain was wasted. I find it, therefore, impossible to give you any further particulars."

Among the papers which have recently been returned, I find a report of Mr. Jefferson, the instructor of Poundmaker, dated February, 1885, in which he says:

"All seem to look forward to spring work eagerly, the fact of their getting cash for produce having given a great impulse to the cultivation of the soil"

The Government was so anxious to help Poundmaker and to induce him to farm, that it appears it had the intention of moving the Battleford agency to his reserve, which caused a strong protest from the Saskatchewan Herald, the local paper published at Battleford. In an article of the 27th of February, 1885, it said:

"We heard a long time ago that the Indian Department had decided to build the agency, storehouse and several other buildings on Poundmaker's reserve, about 40 miles above Battleford, but the thing seemed to us so preposterous that we did not take any notice of it at that time, thinking that it was only a rumor. It appears, however, that we have been mistaken; that it is well and finally decided that the patriotic Poundmaker will have all these public buildings at his own door, as reward for his rebellion last summer. If we knew the evil genius that suggested such a mad step to the Department, we should certainly present him with a leather medal and exhibit him through this part of the country as a great curiosity. We defy him, whoever he may be, to give a single reasonable argument in favor of such a move to any man acquainted with the locality and the situation of the different Indian reserves around Battleford."

Now, let us look at the report for last year of the Frog Lake agency, to which Big Bear belongs:

Indians resident on reserves.....	1,190 souls.
Land ploughed and fenced.....	1,260 acres.
Roots grown .....	4,050 bushels.
Grain do .....	4,670 do
Hay saved.....	485 tons.

This is what the Indian agent, A. Macdonald, said of him, on the 9th December, 1882:

"FORT WALSH, 9th December, 1882.

"SIR,—I have the honor to enclose Big Bear's adhesion to Treaty No. 6.

"This chief is a Cree, from the vicinity of Fort Pitt, and was present at the signing of the treaty there by the other chiefs, but on account of having but a few followers with him (the other members of his band being on the plains), and also owing to his great objection to hangings, as a punishment for murder, he withheld from the signing of the treaty. From the fall of 1876 to the present time he and his followers have made Fort Walsh their headquarters, from time to time following the buffalo, south, even across the Missouri River."

This is the report for 1884 :

"Big Bear, who is now getting old, and who is ruled by the bad spirits in his band, has made repeated promises that he would go to a reserve, and as often broken them. He has been lately joined by an old follower of his, named 'Little Poplar,' who, a few years ago, married into the Cree band of Indians. It is difficult to say what the result of his influence might lead to; he has already made several threats, but he will be closely watched, and any attempt to create a disturbance will at once be met with firm action."

Knowing the character of Big Bear, and knowing also that Poundmaker was not exactly very well situated on the reserve, during the Session of 1884 the Government asked Parliament to vote $6,500 to assist in the erection of grist mills at Battleford, Carlton and Frog Lake. In fact, in January last, Messrs. Gowanlock & Laurie were building one at Frog Lake, with the aid of a portion of that bonus. The Government thought that the mill would induce the Indians to farm and support themselves more quickly. Concerning Big Bear, the Saskatchewan Herald, of 3rd July, 1884, says :

"This chief, whose name has for a long time occupied an undue prominence in the annals of the day, has entered on a new career, and one which is likely to prove more useful to all concerned than the unsettled one he has so long followed. At an interview with Major Crozier and Indian Agent Rae a few days ago, he announced it as his intention to select his reserve at once and to move on to it. He pleaded in extenuation of his former course that he was laboring under a false impression, and did not understand things as they really were, and had consequently allowed himself to be too much influenced by his young men. He could now see that the Government had done more for them than they were required to do by the treaty. He was ready to go on to a reserve with such of his people as would follow him. He said they were all very ignorant of farming and the modes of settled life, and begged that the Government would send a man to teach them, who would have some patience with their ignorance, and not get angry and abuse them because they could not do things at once. He spoke most reasonably and with apparent candor throughout, and concluded by asking for provisions to keep him while he gathered his men together and went to Pitt. If he went there, as he agreed, the agent would know that he was in earnest, and then he would ask for something else when he had got to work. He got what he asked, in the way of provisions, and left town, and there is every reason to believe he is in earnest, and that with his settlement on his reserve one of the few disturbing elements in the Indian question will be quieted."

But instead of going to his reserve he went down to the east, on the 23rd of July, after he had that interview with Major Crozier and the Indian Agent Ray, to confer with Riel; and there is no doubt that must be the principal cause of Big Bear taking arms against the authorities of the North-West. Finally, Big Bear moved to Frog Lake on the 8th November, 1884. I find among the papers which have been recently brought down, a letter from Governor Dewdney, dated 31st of December, 1884, concerning Big Bear :

"I have the honor to state that after receiving Mr. Ballandine's report on the condition of the Indians in the Carlton district, I thought it advisable to instruct Mr. Agent Rae to visit the reserves and make arrangements to relieve the distress which existed principally on the reserve north of the river, occupied by Mestowasis and Ahtahkakoop.

"The visit of Mr. Rae, as appears from his report, a copy of which is herewith enclosed, has satisfied the Indians, and I am in hopes it will be found, when spring opens, that these Indians, instead of listening to the discontented and obstructive, will be found anxious to go to work, and that we shall thus be enabled to counteract the movement which was intended, viz., of having a large gathering in the Carlton neighborhood next summer.

"As you are aware, Mr. Rae wanted 800 sacks of flour and 12,000 pounds bacon as a further supply of provisions to be sent in; but as 200 sacks are due under contract at the end of this month, I thought that by authorising the purchase of 150 sacks he could get along until the delivery was made. In addition to this 50 sacks, flour had already been purchased, under the circumstances stated in Voucher No. 10111.

"With regard to the bacon, as you know, 8,000 pounds were ordered from the Hudson Bay Company some little time ago, and on receipt of Mr. Rae's letter I requested that it might be sent in immediately, which has been done. It may be that some further supply may be necessary, but if so you shall be at once advised."

On the 12th January, 1885, Mr. Francis Dickens, the inspector at Fort Pitt, wrote :

"I have the honor to report that Big Bear Indians are working, being engaged in drawing logs, cutting wood, etc. As long as they work they will receive rations. All quiet at present."

Mr. GIBOUARD.

This letter shows that on the 12th January Big Bear was employed by the Indian agent of the Government at Frog Lake, and that he was receiving rations. On the 20th February, 1885, I find a letter from John Delaney, farm instructor, Frog Lake. He writes as follows:—

"I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, No. 832, dated the 27th ult., and to inform you that I am sure that Big Bear and band will take their reserve this spring. I have had the chief here to-day, and he took my hand saying: 'Believe me I am going to take my reserve this spring; do not doubt me; I cannot see anything else to make a living, only to go on a reserve.' Ever since I offered to let Indians from his band join other bands in the district, they are stirring themselves about a reserve. The chief asked me not to try and break up his band by allowing them to join other bands, because I will go on a reserve, so I have told those who wish to leave him to wait.

"Monthly report of farm 15, for February, 1885.—The Indians around here have done very well this month; they have made and have drawn out a lot of timber for building, also a quantity of rails for the different reserves. Big Bear's band have cut 390 cords of wood, and are still cutting. The Long Lake Indians are doing well; they have taken out timber for several buildings; also, the old chief has been very sick the most part of the winter, but he is getting all right again.

"I think the Indians on all the reserves around here are well contented."

Mr. Quinn writes, on the 13th March, 1885, from the Indian office, Frog Lake :

"I beg to inform you that Mr. Peter Ballandine arrived here on the 7th inst., and immediately upon his arrival we called Big Bear's band together, to impress upon them the importance of taking their reserve, but the chief being away on a hunt, we could not come to any understanding; therefore, I advised Mr. Ballandine to go and find Big Bear and bring him in; which he did on the 10th, and we called them together daily, with no results, until to-day, when he picked upon a spot at the mouth of Dog Rump Creek, on the eastern side. Their reserve, therefore, will be some 30 miles from here.

I must not omit to mention Big Bear's son 'I-am-e-sees' who stood by me and helped me to impress upon his father the importance of selecting a reserve. In fact, seeing his father hesitating, he called all the young men of the band together, and they informed the chief that if he did not take his reserve he and most of the young men would leave the band, as they were tired of waiting and starving, and I think this made the chief give in at last, as the chief was for holding out till spring. Mr. Ballandine gave them a few pounds of tea and some beef which I beg to recommend to be paid by voucher."

Big Bear seemed to be so anxious to go on his reserve that he requested Mr. Ballandine to write to Mr. Dewdney to give him an instructor in the spring, and he even informed him that he wished to have Mr. Delaney as the instructor. He asked that as late as the 14th March, 1885, a few days only, in fact, before Mr. Delaney was massacred by Big Bear's band. This kind treatment of the Indians brought these remarks from the Saskatchewan Herald, of the 23rd April last. I may be excused for quoting this paper. So far, I have always refrained to quote any paper which has been published since the commencement of this rebellion. I have done so intentionally. I do not wish to form my opinion from articles which have been written and printed under the influence of the events that were taking place. I do not wish to take my information from articles in newspapers which have been written under the strong influence either of sympathy or antipathy. I take all my information from the reports of the Department, from the Debates of the House of Commons, from newspaper articles also, but only those published before the rebellion. I may be excused, however, for making a quotation from this article, from the mere fact that we can hardly believe that, upon a question of this kind, this paper will be influenced by a feeling either of sympathy or antipathy. The Saskatchewan Herald, of the 2nd April, 1885, says :

"The petted Indians are the bad ones. The Stonies have been treated as being of a superior race, and are the first to shed the blood of their benefactors. Poundmaker has been petted and pampered, and stands in the front rank as a raider. Little Pine, bribed to come north and kept in comfort, hastens to the carnage. Big Bear, who has for years enjoyed the privilege of eating of the bread of idleness, shows his gratitude by killing his priests and his best friends in cold blood. Little Poplar, a non-treaty Indian, has been liberally supplied with provisions and other necessaries, and thus enabled to spend all his time in travelling up and down the land, plotting mischief and preparing for this season's carnival of ruin. The petted Indians have proved the bad ones, and this gives weight to the old adage, 'that the only good Indians are the dead ones.'"

Such has been the treatment of the Indians by the Administration, and it must be admitted that they have no reason to complain. The policy of the Government has been most liberal to them, outside of treaty obligations. They have been supplied with the necessaries of life; they have been given the means of educating themselves to civilised life, for the sole purpose of enabling the Indians to make their living out of the soil, when they could no longer make it out of hunting. In every manner possible they have been aided, in schools, industrial schools and in farming. The wisdom of this policy has been recognised by many, and among others, by the Saskatchewan Herald, of the 26th July, 1884, which, in an article headed "Our Indian Policy," says:

"That there have been mistakes in the past is well enough known, and by no one better than by the heads of the Department, for changes have been made from year to year as experience dictated, until the system has been brought to combine the maximum of efficiency with the minimum of expense. It is now practically the plan inaugurated by Hon. David Laird, when he was commissioner at Coté's reserve, Fort Pelly, and which would at that time have been made general but for the crankiness and penuriousness of Hon. Mr. Mills, then head of the Indian Department. He thought he knew all about the management of Indians, when he really knew nothing, and refused to take advice. 'There is no appropriation for it,' was his curt way of dismissing suggestions offered by the practical men of the Department."

The following figures will better illustrate the policy of the Government than all the speeches that can be made. Here is the Indian expenditure from the beginning:

or a total of $2,162,796, for three years, divided among the population of about 34,000, it will give $21 per head per annum or $105 per annum for a family of five, which the Indians receive from the Government in money and provisions, without talking of cattle, seed, grain, clothing, etc. Before going any further, it may not be out of place here to say a word or two about certain reports which have been circulated of late, that the Indians did not get what the Government paid for, in other words, that the supplies were deficient both in quality and quantity. It is very remarkable indeed that in all the local papers that I have read I did not find a single complaint about this; and can it be doubted that if deception and fraud had been practised on a large scale, and had been the system followed by the contractors and the officials, it would have reached the local press in one shape or another. As to the reports of the Indian agents for 1884, they all admit that the Indians have no reason to complain, and, in fact, no complaint is mentioned. Mr. Pether, Indian agent for Keewatin, in his report of August, 1884, says:

"The supplies for the various bands on this agency were delivered in good condition and according to samples."

Mr. McIntyre, in his report of the same month:

"The supplies were up to the samples and were quite satisfactory to the Indians."

Mr. Wadsworth, Inspector of Indian Agencies, in his report of the 25th October, 1884, speaking of the Piegan reserve:

"The flour and other supplies were of good quality, and put up according to the terms of the contract. I took an accurate inventory of the flour, bacon, tea, beef, agricultural implements, tools, live stock, etc., and audited the books."

Mr. Wadsworth, same report, from the Blood reserve—

"The flour and other supplies were of good quality. I audited the books, and found them well kept. The receipts shown therein agreed with the quantities charged against the reserve of the agency. I took an inventory of all departmental property upon the reserve."

"Indian Office, Fort McLeod.

"I audited the books, took an inventory of the supplies, agricultural implements, tools, etc., on hand, and examined into their quality and condition. I found everything generally satisfactory, and the books have been well and regularly kept since Mr. Lash was appointed clerk, in December last.

"I found the issue of flour here somewhat less per head than at the Blood reserve, and there was some discontent regarding it. The chief, Crowfoot, wished also that those of his men who assisted in issuing the rations should be paid the same wages ($13 per month) as those who perform similar duty upon the Blood reserve."

"Battleford District.

"I took stock of the flour and bacon, which proved satisfactory."

"Battleford Industrial School.

"The food supplies, cloth, blankets, linen, etc., sent here this year, are fully equal to contract samples, excepting the flour, which is dark; it, however, appears to be very wholesome."

" Qu'Appelle Industrial School.

" 20th Nov. 1884.—A correspondant of Le Manitoba says that the supplies are 'de première qualité.'

" I took an inventory of the flour, bacon and other supplies on hand. The flour was of inferior quality, and weighed only ninety-eight pounds per sack. Upon enquiry the agent informed me that, running short of flour, he was obliged to borrow some from Mahaffy & Clinkskill, Battleford, and this was the only kind they had. Amongst the bacon I found five hundred and seventeen pounds "long clear."

Some discussion took place during last Session (1884) as to some delay or deficiency in the delivery of seed grain and agricultural implements, but not only did they not apply to the provisions, but were explained to have been due to difficulties of transportation. The only report of any consequence I have been able to find, in which mention is made of bad supplies, has reference to the last year of the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. It is signed by Mr. Vankoughnet, and is dated 31st December, 1878, and applies to the whole of Manitoba and the North-West:

" The payment of the annuities to the Indians within the North-West Indian superintendency were, I am happy to say, made at the dates previously fixed upon at the several points of meeting, and the supplies of food, implements and cattle were delivered for the most part on time.

" I regret to report, however, that complaints have been made of the bad quality of the flour and beef furnished at some of the points of payment, and also that the cattle purchased for these Indians were too wild to be handled."

I have also heard complaints that the Government had given contracts to foreigners for supplies. Especially some complaint has been made with regard to the contracts given to the firm of I. G. Baker & Co., of Benton, Montana. There was a debate, in 1883, upon this point, and it will be seen that if I. G. Baker & Co. are employed to-day to furnish the greatest portions of the supplies in the North-West, the initiative came from hon. gentlemen opposite. I will read an extract from that debate:

" Mr. CHARLTON. I notice, amongst the expenditures in the Public Accounts for the year ending 30th June last, that one firm, Baker & Co., obtained a very large sum. Where is that firm located?

" Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At Fort Benton, Montana.

" Mr. CHARLTON. I believe they are Americans?

" Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

" Mr. CHARLTON. The other night, when I referred to the system of surveys in the North-West, I asked why the hon. gentleman had not adopted the American system in its entirety, and it was said, in reply, that I drew all my inspirations from Washington. Where does the hon. gentleman draw his inspiration from, in permitting a Yankee firm to obtain $462,000 for supplies, which could have been obtained from our own dealers?

" Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The inspiration from which I drew those supplies, through Baker & Co., was the greatest of all monarchs, the monarch of necessity. There was nobody else to supply the food on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains for the Blackfeet and the Bloods. There were no means of getting supplies, except from Montana. I may say, though the members of the firm are Americans, they are most satisfactory contractors—fair, honest, liberal and trustworthy. They have fairly competed with other traders, because these contracts have always been put up to public competition, but nobody could tender for the supplies in the extreme west. The Hudson Bay Company tendered for a good deal. Other parties, Capt. Howard, who is known, perhaps, to Mr. Watson, tendered, and is the lowest for some contracts this year."

It will be noticed that in 1884 that contracts were given to Baker & Co.; but they were given after public tenders being asked. Did hon. gentlemen opposite pursue the same course? Hon. gentlemen opposite first gave contracts to Baker & Co., in 1876, and they did so without calling for public tenders. They asked Baker & Co., to supply the Indians in the North-West, and they even sent an agent to Chicago to obtain a portion of those supplies. Mr. Schultz attacked the Government in this House on the question. Here is the explanation given by Mr. Blake:

" The first detachment of police (about 150) was sent to Manitoba upon very short notice, in September, 1873, and during the winter of 1873-74, was supplied from the Hudson Bay Company's stores, I believe, at rates similar to those charged the militia. When the force was recruited to its full extent for the journey to the Rocky Mountains (May, 1874), an agent was sent to Chicago to St. Paul to purchase such articles of provision as was considered be purchasable in the States at cheaper rates than in Canada. The bacon required was obtained at St. Paul, Min., at 12½ cents per pound, American currency. Twenty-five barrels of pork were also purchased there, at $19.50 per barrel, American currency. The pork (bacon) required for the force on its return from the expedition, in 1874, was obtained in Winnipeg, Manitoba—tenders were called for by public advertisement. On 16th April, 1875, Mr. Nixon was instructed to communicate with the commissioners and purchase, amongst other things, sufficient bacon for two divisions (100 men) for six months. He had represented that he could purchase them cheaper than at a later date. The bacon for 1876-77 was included with other articles for which tenders were called, but owing to complaints as to the quality of the pork purchased in Manitoba, a supply was obtained in Ontario—Ingersoll; with the addition of re-freight charges to Manitoba, this bacon cost about 2 cents per pound more than the tenders for supply at Winnipeg. Small quantities have, at various times, been purchased from storekeepers in Manitoba, but the above mentioned include all large quantities. The bacon required for the force, in the southern parts of the Territories, has been supplied by Baker & Co., of Fort Benton, Montana, either under contract or at prices certified by the assistant commissioner of the force. It will require some time to obtain a statement of all the prices and quantities."

Mr. GIBOUARD.

You can hardly imagine that this liberal policy of the Administration met with the approbation of hon. gentlemen opposite. Every year after they left office, it became more necessary to come to the assistance of the Indians, and the Indian expenditure increased, and hon. gentlemen opposite complained of this. Mr. Mills, in 1882, said:

" Mr. MILLS. I called the attention of the hon. Minister last year to the largeness of the sum for annuities, and to the fact that when you collected the payments made of the annuities due for different years it was pretty clear, from the Public Accounts, that we had not an accurate return of the number of Indians of the various bands, and that through Indian dishonesty a considerable number were paid twice, or even a third time. The sums paid last year and this year are very much larger than four or five years ago."

During the debate, in 1883, on Indian supplies, Mr. Casgrain said:

" I lay down, as a principle which cannot be controverted, that this race is becoming rapidly extinct, and we are wasting an enormous expenditure to attain an object which will never be attained—that is, to civilise these Indians. I have seen myself, at Garden River, the experiment tried by Catholic and Protestant missionaries. A small plot had been cultivated and set out in garden lots, and small houses had been built near them for the Indians, but instead of living in these houses, they built themselves, in front of the houses, small bark wigwams, and there they lived.

" Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Those were their country houses.

" Mr. CASGRAIN. As to their plots, there was not a root to be found in any of them.

" Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You might find some briar roots.

" Mr. CASGRAIN. I give this as an instance of the inaptitude of the Indians to enter into civilised life. Now, Sir, I will make an exception in favor of the British Columbia Indians. They are a self-sustaining race, because they have not had large fields in which to hunt buffalo, and have been obliged to resort to fishing, in order to supply themselves with the necessaries of life. This gave them sedentary habits and led them to cultivate the soil. But as to Indians of the North-West Territories, they are a doomed race, and it is only a question of how soon they will disappear. This race is extremely jealous, and they do not look to the Government employees, that are bound to aid them, but, as they say, they look to the Great Mother on the other side to protect them."

Even if this race is going to become extinct some day, but I doubt that the prediction of the hon. member for L'Islet will be realised, it becomes important to consider what we are going to do with them in the meantime. Even if they are going to become extinct, Poundmaker and Big Bear are not dead to-day. Something must be done for them, in order to keep them quiet; otherwise they will plunder and murder. The policy of hon. gentlemen opposite seems to be very different from that which was plainly advocated by the Winnipeg Free Press, one of their organs, on 8th September, 1884. It said:

" It must be apparent to both the American and Canadian Government that their present methods of dealing with the Indians are doomed to failure. They should either make up their mind to provide sufficient food for them, or else, in earnest, set to the work of making them self-supporting."

Notwithstanding the opinion of the hon. member for L'Islet, there can be no doubt that the policy of the Government was the correct one. I will quote the authority of one who is very familiar with the Indian question. I refer to Hon. Mr. Laird. In an interview with a reporter of the Montreal Daily Witness the following appears in the issue of that paper on 19th June. Mr. Laird says:

"It is hardly my place to give the Government an Indian policy; but the only course, in my opinion, that can be adopted, is to patiently go on instructing and encouraging them to be farmers. In ten years many of them have made greater progress towards civilisation than any of the Indians on the reserves in Ontario have in a hundred; and in 1882, when I retired from office, the settled bands were, by their crops, reducing the cost of supporting them at least one-half. If in one generation, or even in two, you raise men from the level of savages to civilisation you are doing more than has ever been done in any other country. Many of the older men can never, I fear, be taught to work steadily or make provision for future needs, but the young men, who have never been on the war path or on the buffalo hunt, soon learn to look to their crops and take care of them. To the old Indians it is almost an impossibility to wait three months for a crop to grow. For instance, we had a good deal of difficulty in preventing them from digging up the potatoes as soon as the young plants show above the ground. On the whole, they made wonderful progress, from 1878 onward—well worth all the labor it cost."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have closed with the Indian question. I believe I have said enough to show that the policy of the Government in the treatment of the Indians in the North-West and Manitoba has been most liberal, and has produced good results. Now, let us see where are the complaints of the half-breeds, of which so much has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not intend to enter into that question at very great length. I will take them exactly as they appear from the last meetings of the half-breeds and the white settlers in the North-West. Let us take in the first place the grievances of the half-breeds as laid down in the Bill of Rights, which was adopted at the meeting at Prince Albert, on the 5th of September, 1884. I have not been able to obtain an English copy of it, but I find the original published in Le Manitoba. The first demand which they asked for is "the inauguration of responsible government." Now, I ask if the members for the other Provinces to-day are willing to create new Provinces in the North-West. I say that under the constitution of the North-west council they enjoy virtually all the liberties and privileges of responsible government. In 1870—I am speaking as a member from the Province of Quebec—we had a great deal to do with the establishment of the Province of Manitoba. Then the question was only one of paying $43,600, to give the population of that country the privileges of popular government. Well, where are we now? The subsidy to the Province of Manitoba amounts to something like $440,000, and if we are going to give Provinces to the North-West, then we must make up our minds to allow those new Provinces a few hundred thousand dollars more each. Sir, I do not believe that the people of the old Provinces are willing that they should be taxed to that extent, especially when no good result can be obtained. I ask, if you give them Provinces, will they be in any better position than they will be when a North-West council will be established for the different districts? I say no. A Legislature sitting in Regina will not be in any better position to know the wants of that Territory than the North-West council sitting to-day. When the time will come when a change in the constitution in the North-West will be necessary, when the council will have twenty-one members, when they will be entitled to become ipso facto Provinces, with an Assembly, then will be the time to consider the constitution of the whole North-West, and instead of giving them the expensive machinery of a Legislature, give them a council, for each district, such as they have to-day, which will be more beneficial to that country and more satisfactory to the older Provinces. I say that the desire for responsible government and a Legislature, as enjoyed by the older Provinces, is not shared in by all the people of the North-West. The Saskatchewan Herald, of the 23rd of August, 1884, says:

"It cannot be long before Assiniboia will have the population necessary to set it up as a Province, and then the opportunity will be afforded of modernising the constitution of the remaining Territories."

The next grievance of the half-breeds is, that they want "the same guarantees to be allowed to the old settlers of the Territories as were allowed in 1870 to the settlers of Manitoba; that a certain area of land, to-day in the possession of the half-breeds, should be left to them, and that on application patents should be granted to them; that the half-breeds of the North-West shall receive each 240 acres of the land, as the half-breeds of Manitoba received; that 2,000,000 acres of land should be set aside by the Government for the benefit of half-breeds, Protestants and Catholics; that the Government should sell these lands, deposit the money in the bank, and that the interest of that money should be used for the maintenance of schools of instruction, industrial schools and hospitals, and for the purpose of procuring ploughs for the half-breeds, at least every spring, to enable them to sow their lands; that about 100 townships be taken, of the swamp lands of the North-West, which do not appear to be open for settlement for a long time; that these lands be set apart by the Government, and that they be distributed by the Government, every 18 years, among the children of the half-breed population. They say that the Province of Manitoba has been enlarged since 1870, and that the rights of the Métis to the titles of these lands have not been recognised. They, therefore, ask that these titles should be extinguished in favor of the half-breed children at the time of the transfer, and of such children as may be born for four generations." With regard to these lands and the grievances of the half-breeds, there is one point worthy of remark. A great deal has been said by the member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) about the lots at St. Laurent, on the river, not being divided into river lots of 10 chains by 2 miles. It is strange, indeed, that at this meeting, which took place on the 5th of September, 1884, there is not a single complaint about that—no complaint that the lands of the half-breeds have been badly surveyed or divided; that anyone has been evicted, or that even an attempt at eviction has been made. There are some items in these resolutions which are most unreasonable—some things which have not been demanded even by the half-breeds of Manitoba. There are some, however, which require a little explanation. As to the demand that lands should be set apart for educational purposes, it is well known that by the Dominion Lands Act two sections in each township are set apart to provide for the education of children; and, indeed, the half-breed and white population of the North-West have no reason to complain of being neglected by the present Government so far as schools are concerned. The number of schools in the North-West receiving Government aid was 19 in 1883 and 28 in 1884—17 Protestant and 11 Roman Catholic. With regard to the half-breed claims to the Indian title, I have already shown what the late Government have done. The Minister of the Interior said the half-breeds were not entitled to anything more than the white settlers, that is to say, a free homestead. The present Government, as I have also mentioned, immediately after they came into office, in 1879, changed that policy, and went back to their policy of 1870, with regard to the half-breeds of Manitoba, and asked this Parliament to give them power to deal with the half-breed claims as they might deem expedient. But it is said: Although you declared your policy, although you intended, evidently, to satisfy the claims of the half-breeds to the Indian title, you have done nothing since 1879. Well, as the hon. Premier explained last night, the Government had to face a great many difficulties. In the first place, on the one hand, Archbishop Taché, no doubt, having before him the experience of 1870, and following years, in Manitoba, had made representations that he wished these new free grants to extinguish the Indian title in the North-West to be entailed for three generations. There were, besides, representations of the Anglican Bishop, who also wished them to be entailed, but only for ten years. Then there were the representations of the Premier of Manitoba, who had also a great deal of experience in these matters, and who also desired these lands to be entailed, but for a shorter period. On the other hand, the North-West council recommended that free grants should be given to the half-breeds, just as they were given to the half-breeds of Manitoba in 1870. Those grants were made without any condition—160 acres to the heads of families and 240 acres to the children. What was the consequence? The scrip were sold immediately, almost before they reached the hands of the half-breeds; and no doubt Archbishop Taché, Mr. Norquay and the bishop of the Church of England had very good reasons for recommending the Government to change their policy towards the half-breeds. But matters were pressing. The half-breeds, no doubt, pushed by speculators, were asking, not that their lands should be entailed, but they were asking for a title which could be disposed of immediately. At the meeting which took place in September, 1884, at Prince Albert, the half-breeds expressed their wish for such a title to those lands as they might dispose of as they chose. There was a little delay, no doubt. From 1879 to to-day those claims have not all been settled; their settlement only commenced within the last few months; but you will admit, and the public will admit, that the Government have labored under serious difficulties, having, on the one hand, to contend with the representations—in my opinion, the very reasonable representations—of Archbishop Taché and the other gentlemen of experience in the North-West, and, on the other hand, with the demands of the half-breeds, supported by the North-West council. In the issuing of patents for lands there was another difficulty—the difficulty of finding lands which were surveyed. When hon. gentlemen opposite left office, in 1878, they had hardly done anything in this respect in the North-West. I will give you a complete table of the surveys, as they were made, from the beginning until to-day both in Manitoba and the North-West:

The agricultural population these lands would sustain, on the basis of three souls to a homestead, would be 1,261,197. The land surveyed up to 1873 were 9,999,000; from 1874 to 1875, 1,797,120; from 1884, 55,618,500. The survey, in the vicinity of Prince Albert and also in the vicinity of St. Laurent were made in 1878. Surveys were made subsequently in the old settlements on the North Saskatchewan, Edmonton and St. Albert. The lands between Carlton and Fort Pitt, and between Edmonton and Calgary, were surveyed in 1884. During the season of 1883, 120 land surveyors were employed, 35 among them French Canadians. In 1884, 61 surveyors were employed, of whom 22 were French Canadians. The surveys in 1883, alone, cost $750,000. With the surveys, land offices were opened. The first was opened at Prince Albert in 1878, Mr. Duck, agent, appointed by Mr. GIBOUARD.

the late administration, the very same officer who was nominated long before the office was opened and ready. The second office was in Regina (Troy, for a short time). In 1884, four land offices were opened at Calgary, Edmonton, Touchwood and Coteau, and finally this spring at Swift Current. The first registry office was opened in 1876 at Battleford and three more later, Prince Albert, Regina and Calgary. In 1883, during the debate which took place in this House on a motion of Mr. Blake, in moving for copies of all correspondence and memorials relating to the claims of the inhabitants of Prince Albert and the neighboring districts in the North-West, with respect to the lands which they occupy, and other matters affecting their condition, I find the following statement made by Mr. Royal, the hon. member for Provencher:—

“I suppose you are aware that delegates have been sent here by a certain portion of the population of the North-West Territories, respecting the subject which is just now engaging the attention of this House, and is more especially under the notice of the Government. These delegates have laid their grievances—it grievances they are—before some of the hon. Ministers. Their object is to have the title to the lands occupied, owned and improved by some of these people for over 20 years recognised and confirmed by the Government. Their claims are nothing but just. These lands belong mostly to half-breed people and pioneers from Ontario, who went west from the Province of Manitoba some five, ten or fifteen years ago. These pioneers of Canadian civilisation have formed groups throughout the Territories, which will, no doubt, be the nucleus of a large population. There is a very important group at Duck Lake, Prince Albert, another at Edmonton, another at St. Albert, and so on. Last year surveyors were sent out to carry on the surveys of the Dominion in that part of the country. These surveyors had no instructions to stop wherever they would meet any of the old settlements, and their continuing the lines aroused, of course, the suspicion of the old settlers, who held a meeting, and represented to the Government the justice of respecting their property in farm improvements. Their claims have been fully recognised, and orders have been sent to the surveyors to respect those settlements. The object of this delegation is to have the Government cause the lines of the Dominion surveys to front on the limits of their settlements. The delegates have already had an interview with some members of the Government, and were assured, in every case, the rights of ownership of those old settlers would be fully recognised. These settlers are not to be classed with squatters. The squatter is, generally speaking, a man who goes off the survey and squats on the piece of land he thinks best suited for farming. In some cases, unfortunately, he is sent there by somebody else, or goes on his own impulse, to select the best spot, on which he will make a slight improvement, in order that he may be able to sell it to some company or individual. The settlers to whom I refer went as far as Prince Albert, some few miles west of Edmonton, and lived there on their farms for over thirty years. Of course, it was quite natural they should suspect something was wrong when they saw the surveyors continuing their lines of survey; but there is no more reason for fear on that ground. The delegates have also another object in view, namely, to have the Government recognise and confirm the titles of these settlers. No doubt, to a certain extent, they have been squatters, but their rights are clear, and of course they are anxious the Government should confirm them and issue Crown patents to them, in order that their property should be classed the same as any other in the Dominion. In that respect, also, I am happy to state their wants have been fully met with, and they have been assured the Government will fully recognise their titles, and issue, in due time, the letters patent. They have also demanded from the Government that a land agent should be appointed in their own district. The nearest land agent is about 300 or 400 miles distant from Prince Albert, and the hon. Minister has assured them that as soon as the plans of survey would be recognised and confirmed by the Government a Dominion land office would be opened there, and everything made ready for the interests of the new settlers. It is well known, I believe, in Manitoba and the rest of the Dominion, that that part of the North-West Territories which lies on the North Saskatchewan, and extends from Prince Albert to Edmonton, will certainly, before many years, contain a very large population. That district is composed of the most fertile lands in that part of the country, where running waters, forests and vast arable lands are to be found in large quantities. Already the pioneers have gone in advance of the surveys, and formed groups of population, which are now among the most important groups in the North-West. On behalf of these delegates I must recognise the fact that the Government have dealt with them in a most open and liberal manner.”

I know, as a fact, that a land office has been opened at Edmonton last year, and that Mr. Gauvreau was transferred from Prince Albert to Edmonton, in order to give more facilities to the French half-breeds of that district. At the same time, last year Louis Schmidt, French half-breed, was appointed assistant to the land office of Prince Albert for the same purpose. In 1883 I believe the Government, with a view of giving greater facilities to white settlers and claimants in the North-West, and also in Manitoba, to make out their claims and have them investigated established a land board in Winnipeg, with more extensive powers than the ordinary powers of a land office, with Mr. Walsh as commissioner. Mr. Walsh has investigated many of these claims. It will be noticed that the policy of the present and the last Government is very different in this respect. What was the reply of the late Government? Representations were made by Mr. Matthew Ryan, that the half-breeds were very pressing for the recognition of their rights—I refer to the half-breeds who were entitled to scrip in consequence of being residents in Manitoba at the time of the transfer, and who emigrated afterwards to the North-West. Mr. Ryan made strong representations to the late Administration that he should be empowered to examine the claims of those half-breeds who were entitled to scrips in Manitoba, but who happened then to be in the North-West Territories. On the 24th June, 1878, Mr. Laird wrote from Battleford to Col. Dennis, as follows:—

"Observe Mr. Ryan's authority; time to investigate half-breed claims under Order 14th June, 1876 lapsed; recommend time be extended one year. He is now here. Applicants waiting answer."

Mr. Denis replied:

"Will consult Minister on his return; expected this week in re half-breed claims, and advise you forthwith."

Now, what is the answer of the Minister of the Interior? We find on a margin of a report made by Mr. Codd, dated 16th March, 1877, the following note:—

"It is not necessary to look up parties who have claims. If they care for their interests they will themselves come forward and establish their claims."

The present Government did not act upon the same principle. They thought that these half-breeds in the North-West and Manitoba should have some easy means of establishing their claims, and that is the reason why the land bureau was established in Winnipeg, and Mr. Walsh appointed as commissioner. This land bureau of Manitoba went to work, and, from the report of 1884, it will be seen that they have done a great deal of work. The Government land board reported on 711 claims of squatters in 1884, including those of old settlers. Here is the report of the Minister of the Interior for that year:

"At the time the offices of Deputy Head and Surveyor General were separated, and Mr. Lindsay Russell was charged with the duties appertaining to the latter position, it was provided that he should also investigate and settle the claims to land by virtue of long occupation advanced by the old settlers along the North Saskatchewan. When it was found that Mr. Russell's health did not admit of his visiting the settlements, an Order in Council was passed, remitting this portion of his work to the land board. Accordingly, early in the year, Mr. Pearce went to Prince Albert, and from thence to Battleford, Edmonton and St. Albert, and made a careful personal enquiry into all the claims of this class at those places, with the result that all, with one or two exceptions, at Battleford and Edmonton, have been finally and satisfactorily disposed of. The only claims of old settlers remaining unsettled are at Lac la Biche, Victoria and Battle River. The necessary investigation at the two latter places will be made early next spring, but the claims at Lac la Biche cannot be properly adjusted until the surveys reach that point."

Mr. Pearce was sent to the Saskatchewan at the beginning of last year, and here is his report:

"The question of the claims of the old settlers on the Saskatchewan is one of long standing; but, with the exception of the claims in the immediate vicinity of Prince Albert, nothing could be done in the matter until the surveys were completed. These surveys were not finished until this summer, and could not have been completed at an earlier date; for, had these been prosecuted in any other way than the one adopted, it would have been at a great sacrifice of both accuracy and economy."

"Very full reports accompanied the evidence forwarded to the Minister so soon as the investigations were completed. The claims of Prince Albert have been finally disposed of. Those at the other points may reasonably be expected to be settled within a few weeks."

"The most liberal construction possible under the circumstances was put upon all the claims; and, judging by the result at Prince Albert, it is confidently anticipated that the percentage of claimants who will be dissatisfied therewith will be very small—probably not 5 per cent.—and of these more than one-half will be only on the grounds that their claims have not had as liberal treatment as the claims of others. It may be said of these claimants—upwards of seven hundred in number—that, as a class, the 'land shark' formed a very small number."

"The difficulty of obtaining explicit evidence has been referred to in the special reports; and in this it need only be mentioned that this difficulty did not arise from unwillingness, but from inability."

"It is somewhat remarkable that, out of the large number of cases investigated, but few were advanced through a residence on and peaceable possession of the land on the 15th July, 1870; the only points at which such were preferred being Prince Albert and St. Albert—some half dozen at the former, and about forty at the latter. This would go to demonstrate that it has been only within the past few years that any idea of making a livelihood by husbandry has occurred to the inhabitants of the district; and when this fact is considered, the progress they have made is really wonderful. Such facts encourage the hope of a fairly successful fruition of the policy adopted in teaching the rising generation of Indians habits of industry, with a view to make them a self-sustaining people."

"The claims at St. Laurent, on the south branch of the Saskatchewan, were not personally investigated by me, as the greater portion of the claimants spoke only French, and I would have required an interpreter."

"With the approval of the Minister, Mr. Duck, Dominion land agent, who speaks the French language, was instructed to obtain the evidence of these claimants. This was revised by me, and recommendations made in each case by the land board."

"I would particularly wish to refer to the aid extended to me by the Rev. Père Le Duc, when investigating the claims at St. Albert."

"Most of the claimants could only speak Cree, and the Rev. Father acted as interpreter, and did all he could to make the investigation run smoothly and pleasantly."

"The only claims now remaining are at Lac la Biche, Victoria and Battle River. Those at the latter two points can be disposed of so soon as the surveys are adjusted; probably early next spring. At the former point some delay, probably a year, must ensue, in getting the surveys carried to that point, owing to its isolated position; also the survey on the ground of an Indian reserve."

"There are a few other isolated cases remaining, chiefly in the vicinity of Fort McLeod; and they can be readily dealt with when the townships in which they are situated are open for entry."

The Saskatchewan Herald, of the 23rd August, 1884, speaks in very favorable terms of Mr. Pearce's investigation:

"But, of course (this paper adds) it is not likely that he has acquired the art of pleasing everybody, or of giving to each of two or three claimants the whole of the parcel of land in dispute."

When Mr. Pearce was making this investigation, or a short time after that, Mr. Riel came to the country, and, on the 26th July, the Saskatchewan Herald says:

"Louis Riel is visiting all the settlements at Prince Albert and the south branch, but, so far, has given no public utterances of his intentions. Rumor, however, has his work cut and dried for him, and telegrams from Prince Albert to the east give as one ground for the agitation, that the Government refuses to recognise the claims of the early settlers to the land taken up by them long ago, and that, in surveying the country, all their rights have been ignored. So far from this being the case, the Government has put a blot on the general system of survey, by laying out their claims in narrow frontages, as the settlers desired."

This shows that the Government has not been inactive. They proceeded last year with the examination of the claims of the old settlers; they sent someone to investigate the claims; a report was made, and, more than that, they commenced to examine the claims of the half-breeds to scrips; and on the 28th January, 1885, an Order in Council was passed, which has been read before. Whether that Order in Council has been cancelled later on or not, it shows that, at that period, nearly two months before the commencement of the rebellion, the Government was in earnest, with a view to meet the claims of the half-breeds. Now, in presence of all these facts, how can it be pretended that the Government has done nothing within the last few years for the half-breeds? The country has been surveyed to the extent of several millions of acres. Land offices and registry offices have been opened; agents have been appointed, and in most districts where the French population is to be found, an agent has been named who speaks French. We can easily imagine the difficulties the Department must have met with in dealing with this matter. Let us see what the late Administration has done towards the settlement of the half-breed claims in Manitoba. The rights of the half-breeds were declared by an Act of 1870, and 1,400,000 acres of land were given by the Manitoba Act. Commissions were appointed by the Government for the purpose of finding out the number of half-breeds entitled to that free grant. When they left office, in 1878, the work was far from being done. Hon. gentlemen opposite went to work and appointed commission after commission. I do not want to blame them for it. I think it would be hardly fair to blame an Administration when they have to deal with such a vast territory as this. I would like to know, however, if hon. gentlemen opposite will tell me whether in 1878, eight years after the rights of the half-breeds had been declared by Act of Parliament—not seven years, as the hon. member for Quebec East stated, with respect to the half-breeds in the North-West Territories—but after eight years of investigation on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite and their predecessors, they had left half-breed claims in Manitoba unsettled, and how many claims did they leave unsettled? I do not wish to be hard with them, but at the same time they ought to know the difficulties of the situation; that really it is not an easy task for any Administration to deal with the half-breed question in the North-West. I say that notwithstanding all these commissions the present Government, after coming into office in 1881, had to appoint another commission, composed, Judges Miller and Dubuc, of the Superior Court, for the sole purpose of making a new enumeration and completing the list of claims which had to be examined in Manitoba; but notwithstanding this commission, another Order in Council had to be passed, with a view of giving full justice to the half-breeds who had no other title to their land but occupation, and on the 25th February, 1881, an Order in Council was passed by this Government, with a view of coming to the relief of those half-breeds of Manitoba who had not obtained justice. Yet the hon. gentleman had five years to do that after all the work which had been done by their predecessors. But, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, even if these half-breeds had some complaints, even if the scrip came too late, even if the patents to their lands also came too late, I say that was no reason why they should resort to arms. They should have done like the rest of the population in this country. Are hon. gentlemen going to tell me that during the whole of their administration the people of this Dominion were satisfied? There was a cry from one end of the country to the other that the National Policy should be introduced into this country. But they would not do it; and the consequence was, that poverty was becoming general, from one end of the Dominion to the other, but still the people did not resort to arms. They appealed to the Government, and when an election came around they took the remedy into their own hands. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to allude to the commission of Messrs. Street, Goulet and Forget, which was appointed a few days after the uprising in the North-West, and which, if we are to judge from the account of Le Manitoba, is giving so much satisfaction. The leader of the Opposition the other day quoted the conclusion of that article of Le Manitoba, stating that it was a great pity that this commission was not appointed a long time ago. Well, I will not take my authority from a newspaper article written since the rebellion began, but I take my authority from public documents, which show that the Government have really acted for the best. Now, I pass to the other articles of the Bill of Rights of the half-breeds, at their meeting at Prince Albert, in September last. Article 8 says:

“Contracts for Government works should be, as far as possible, given to the people in the Territory, in order to encourage them and to increase the circulation of money among them.”

What just complaints can they have in this respect? The contracts for work are given in the North-West Territories, as everywhere else in the Dominion, by public tenders, and there is no reason why the Government should change its policy in that respect. If the people residing in a locality cannot tender successfully with the residents of the older Provinces, the Government cannot be blamed for that.

“Article 9. That the Canadian Government should feed the Indians, and not offer to the christian world the spectacle of a people dying of starvation. If the civilisation of our century does permit it, and if the Province wishes it, the Government should make the Indians work about as much as Pharoah did the Jews; but, at all events, they should not leave them a victim of hallucination and in the delirium of starvation. They do not wish the people to talk with the Indians, but the Indians are all the time around the half-breed establishments. The half-breeds and other settlers spend more for the Indians than the Government does, and the people are going to be prevented from mentioning this state of things. It is not just that the Federal Government should administer Indian affairs.”

It is perfectly plain, after the exposure I have made of the policy of the Government towards the Indians, after everything the Government has done for them, after the millions of money we have spent to feed them and instruct them, it is plain that whoever framed this article of the Bill of Rights did not know what the Government had done for the Indians. It must be remembered there is no complaint in this article of the Bill of Rights that the Indians have not received their supplies, that the quality was bad and that they were hardly used by the officials. The 10th article of the Bill of Rights contains a demand for educational institutions. The answer to this is, that to-day there is a complete organisation in the North-West for the education of the youth. At the time Bishop Grandin applied to Minister of Interior for a grant there was no such organisation. But since 1876 there has been a board of education, comprised of six Protestants and six Roman Catholics, and the Government, on their representation, have granted such aid as in their opinion might be necessary. Therefore, the matter referred to in this article will be dealt with as it is in the older Provinces, under the constitution of the North-West. Article 12th of the Bill of Rights demands the erection of the districts in the North-West into so many Provinces. They claim that they should become Provinces when they obtain the same population as Manitoba possessed at the time of its entry into Confederation, and besides that this erection of districts into Provinces should be accompanied by all the advantages of responsible government and the administration of the Crown lands. I have already alluded to this matter while dealing with other portions of the Bill of Rights. That is a portion of the articles of the Bill of Rights which is most unreasonable. Not only do they want the North-West to be erected into Provinces, but the half-breeds want to have as many Provinces as there are districts. We have to-day five districts, Keewatin, Alberta, Assiniboia, Athabaska and Saskatchewan. Therefore, there would be five new Provinces to be established. We are, therefore, asked to increase the burden of taxation on the older Provinces to the extent of $400,000 or $500,000. And, what is more, the half-breeds want to keep all the lands in the North-West to themselves. We have constructed a Canadian Pacific Railway round Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean, with a view to opening up that immense Territory, embracing a couple of billion acres of lands, and now that the railway is practically built, the people of the North-West, and among others, the French half-breeds, say: “We want all the districts to be turned into Provinces; we want subsidies from the old Provinces; we have got railways and land offices, and you are going to take care of the Indians, and we are going to take the last possible assets which the country can possess, and that is the land.” A pretention of that kind is simply absurd. I have passed over every article of the Bill of Rights as adopted by the half-breeds at a meeting at Prince Albert in September last, and hon. gentlemen opposite will notice that it does not contain a complaint about surveys, in regard to which subject so much capital has been made. There is not a complaint in regard to surveys from the half-breeds along the river, where it is said great tyranny has been committed by the present Administration, so much so, that the half-breeds at that time had sufficient reason to resort to arms. Is it not astonishing that during their last protests, their last declaration of rights, detailing their list of grievances, there is nothing said about the surveys of the river lots? I might perhaps stop at this stage of the discussion; but it will be as well to consider what the white settlers were demanding. Meetings were held, not only at Prince Albert, but all over the North-West Territory. There was a meeting of the inhabitants of the Province of Alberta. I find the resolutions published in Le Manitoba. I have not been able to get an English copy, so I will translate them. It will be sufficient to mention the pretended grievances, the articles of the Bill of Rights of the white settlers of Alberta, to show that most of them are unfounded:

"The undersigned have the honor to represent that questions of the greatest importance, and worthy of the special attention of the Government, arise from that portion of the North-West, and more particularly from the district of Alberta. The undersigned hope that the Government will give all these questions the most serious consideration:

"1. There is not sufficient police stipendiary magistrates in the North-West; the judicial districts are too large, and, consequently, do not provide sufficient tribunals. This evil has been increased by the fact that under the Act respecting the North-West Territories cases appealed must be laid before the sitting judge, and decided by the same judge."

Suppose there were not enough stipendiary magistrates, the Government have this Session introduced a Bill to give an additional magistrate to the North-West.

"2. The people are of the opinion that you must remove from the officers of the Mounted Police every judicial power, and that resident judges shall be named for all the principal towns and cities in the North-West."

That is more as regards the administration of justice than is provided for the older Provinces—a judge resident in every principal centre of the North-West Territory. I do not believe that the people of the older Provinces would be willing that we should tax ourselves in order to concede this extraordinary demand, and have a judge resident in every principal centre of the North-West Territory.

"3. We know that it has been decided that the stipendiary magistrates have no power to issue a writ of habeas corpus, and, therefore, in this district we are deprived of one of the greatest safeguards of British liberty."

I am sure that whoever drew up this Bill of Rights of the population of the Province of Alberta was not a lawyer. Whether there is a statute declaring that a writ of habeas corpus may be issued in the North-West Territories or not—I believe there is one, but suppose there is not—by the common law of England every British subject deprived of his liberty on British soil has a right to a writ of habeas corpus. That is too elementary a principle of law to be open to any doubt.

"4. In cases of intoxicating liquors, the fact of one-half of the penalty being given to the informer has a bad effect. A man may be imprisoned on the oath of that sole informant, and this state of things has been the cause of numerous and grave acts of injustice. There have been many perjuries committed in this respect. This abuse exists among the constables of the Mounted Police, as one of them had made two hundred dollars in a day as informer—one-half of the penalty imposed on two persons. However, the defence denied to the accusation brought against them by the informer, and the two were condemned, although respectable.

"5. The police have abused their right to make inquisition as to the use of liquor; and no police officer should have the right to enter a private house for the purpose of ascertaining whether there are intoxicating liquors in it or not, unless there has been a sworn information previously made to that effect."

Well, this law is based upon the principle of penalty laws in the old Provinces. In all the old Provinces the policy of this Government, sanctioned for years and years, has been that one-half of the penalty, even in cases brought for the infraction of the liquor laws, should go to the informer, and the other half should go to the Crown.

"6. The stealing of horses is very common here, and there is very little effort made to pursue the guilty parties. The thieves go south by McLeod's road, and there the police cannot reach them before they go to the United States. A telegraphic line, as far as Fort McLeod, would prevent a good deal of the stealing of horses, and would also be of great use to the Mounted Police."

The telegraph line has been built since that time.

"7. The settlers of the neighboring districts are asking for their patents, and they complain when they would make their homestead entries for townships 23 and 24, range 1, west of the 5th principal meridian, and in these districts there are a large number of settlers. The natural consequence is that the neighboring country is in statu quo, and will remain in that condition as long as these townships are not open to settlers."

These lands were surveyed only last year, and, necessarily, a few months must elapse before the land office is ready for entry, but I believe it is ready now.

"8. We believe that a court of appeal should be established in the North-West Territories, and that an extension of the powers of the court of first resort, held by the stipendiary magistrates, should be made, and more facility given for appeals from the magistrate's to the court of appeals in all cases where the contract exceeds $200."

Now, here is another demand which is unreasonable. Under the constitution of the North-West, passed in 1875, a court of appeals was established for the North-West Territories, not sitting in the North-West Territories, but sitting in Winnipeg. There is a court of appeal for Manitoba, and with a view of saving expense, considering the large amount which the country had to spend in developing that vast country, this Parliament thought proper to give the right of appeal, in cases in the North-West Territories, to the court of appeals of Manitoba; and in every case where there is a question affecting real estate, or in any case for damages or torts for $500, or in all cases in which there is $1,000 in dispute, there is appeal to the court at Winnipeg. Considering that the means of communication are so easy to-day, from every portion of the North-West Territories, and especially from Calgary, from which this complaint comes, it seems to me that this complaint is without foundation.

"9. In the interests of justice, we believe that a prison and court house ought to be erected in Calgary. The building now used as a prison is altogether unfit for that purpose, and there is no place for the detention of criminals. Furthermore, we have been informed that the North-West council has refused to pass ordinances to arrest any one about to leave the country, and that because there is no jail, in order to detain the fleeing debtor or criminal. Last year the building which served as a prison was almost constantly full of prisoners, and as Calgary is the centre of the district, and near the Rockies, where the works of the Canadian Pacific Railway are proceeding, and where mining is being pursued with activity, the construction of a prison is an immediate want. In Calgary, also, there is need for a court house building, wherein to hold the sittings of the court."

There is also a jail and court house built by the Government at Regina, the capital of the North-West Territories. Under the constitution of the North-West council, the council has the right to order the erection of any prison which may be required in any portion of any district; and if the people of Calgary want a jail they should build one themselves, and ask the council for the proper authority.

"10. We also demand that the settlers should have the right to cut hay upon the lands which they occupy, and unoccupied lands, without being subject to pay $1 a ton. The cutting can only improve the quality; and if it is not cut it will be entirely lost. This payment of $1 per ton, although a small payment, has been a burden for the poor settlers, and is the source of a very small revenue for the Government."

Now, if we look at the regulations of the Department regarding the cutting of hay, it is very plain that this charge or due cannot be a burden for the poor settler. This article of the bill of grievances is altogether untrue; the Government do not charge $1 a ton for cutting hay. According to the regulations, they charge, for any amount up to 20 tons, 10 cents per ton; for from 20 to 50 tons, 25 cents per ton; for from 50 to 100 tons, 50 cents per ton; and for 100 tons and over, $1 per ton. Besides that, every settler is allowed to take all the hay he wants for his own use free. To show that this grievance has really no foundation whatever, let us look at the report for 1884. The amount collected by the Department for all the hay permits in the North-West during the year, amounted to the large sum of $120,200.

"11. We demand the liberty to cut large quantities of wood, because to-day we cannot get enough in order to build even a good stable, and a settler who has no considerable resources is unable to procure one."

These are the regulations of the Department for cutting wood:

"Any occupant of a homestead quarter section having no timber of his own, may, upon application, obtain a permit to cut such quantity of building timber, fencing timber or fuel, as he may require for use on his homestead, not exceeding the following:—1,800 lineal feet of house timber, no log to be over 12 inches at the small end; 400 roof rails, 30 cords of dry wood, 2,000 fence rails."

Then, there are permits subject to dues, in order to preserve the forests. The rates are as follows:—

Cordwood, per cord.....	25 cents.
Fence posts, 8 ft. 6 in. long.....each	1 cent.
Telegraph poles, 22 ft. long.....each	5 cents.
Each lineal foot over 22 feet long.....	1 cent.
Railroad ties, 8 ft. long.....	3 cents.
Rails, 12 ft. long.....	$2.00 per M.
Stakes, 8 ft. long.....	$2.00 per M.
Shingles.....	0.60 per M.
Square timber and saw logs of oak, elm, ash or maple.....	$3.00 per M., B. M.
Pine, spruce, tamarac, cedar, and all other woods, with the exception of poplar....	$2.50 per M., B. M.
Poplar.....	$2.00 per M., B. M.
All other products of the forest, not enumerated.....	10 p. c. ad valorem .

The timber dues collected by the Government last year amounted to $193,196.86; and we may almost say that, with the exception of the revenues collected by the Department from the sale of lands and Customs Dues, this constitutes about the whole of the assets. Finally, the last article of the bill of grievances says:

"We demand that the territories of the North-West be represented in Parliament before the erection of the Provinces, as is the case with regard to the territories of the United States."

It has been observed that the half-breeds do not demand representation in this Parliament. But I believe it has been recognised for some time that this demand is reasonable, and that steps have already been taken by the Government—in fact, were taken before the rebellion broke out—with the view of giving the North-West Territories representation in the Dominion Parliament. A bill was introduced, providing for the taking of the census of the North-West Territories; and, of course, we must wait till that census is made, in order to learn the exact number of members to which the North-West Territories are entitled. There is also another difficulty. We know that in 1871 doubts were expressed as to the power of the Government of the Parliament of Canada to erect territories similar to those in the United States, and an Act was introduced into the Imperial Parliament to give that power in expressed terms. That Imperial statute also gives the Dominion Parliament power to give representation to the Provinces which may be erected out of the territories in the North-West; but there is no power given by it to the Dominion Parliament to grant representation to the Territories so long as they remain Territories. Therefore, some steps must be taken to have the constitution amended by the Imperial Parliament in that respect; and I hope that between now and the next Session of the Imperial Parliament, while our officers will be proceeding with the census of the North-West, this Government will take initiatory steps towards having our constitution amended, so as to permit us to give the North-West Territories representation in this Parliament, according to their population. Now, I have mentioned the grievances of the half-breeds and of the white population of the district of Alberta. Now, let us see what are the grievances of the district of Assiniboia. A meeting took place at Moosomin, at which the following resolutions were adopted, which I find reported in the Saskatchewan Herald of the 9th of January, 1885:

"That large tracts of land have been allotted to colonisation companies, subject to certain duties and conditions, and which would be of advantage to the country if carried out in good faith. This meeting is of opinion that the principle of allowing individuals or companies to control large tracts of public land is prejudicial; they would therefore urge strongly that where such conditions and duties are not being carried out faithfully the grants should be promptly cancelled."

Mr. GIROUARD.

The principle of colonisation companies in good faith is here admitted, and the Government has taken steps, a few years ago, to see that these companies were kept within their obligations, and I believe an inspector, Mr. Stephenson, a former member of this House, was appointed for that purpose. I know, of course, in consequence of the hard times several colonisation companies could not comply with the terms, and have been forced to give up their charter. If any cannot comply with the terms of their agreement they should be forced to do so.

"That the policy of the Government in building the Canadian Pacific Railway as a national work, and assisting it to an early completion, meets with our hearty approval, and will, we believe, be of incalculable benefit to the Dominion; that the policy of making free grants of land to branch lines in the interests of the North-West; but as these assisted lines run mainly east and west, this meeting strongly urges upon the Government the absolute necessity, in the interests of the various large settlements north and south of the Canadian Pacific, that the same liberal policy should be adopted towards lines judiciously located running north and south.

"That this meeting recognises the fact that the practicability of the navigation of Hudson's Bay and Straits has been amply proved. That the construction of a railway to some point on the shores of Hudson's Bay, to meet the ocean traffic there, would give an outlet and inlet for exports and imports between this country and the European markets, which would not only enable the settlers here to procure a better price for their products and obtain their necessities at a cheaper rate, but which is an absolute necessity, to enable this country to take her place in the first rank of wheat-producing countries in the markets of the world.

"That this meeting urges upon Parliament the justice and necessity of giving representation in the Parliament and Senate of Canada to the people of the North-West Territories; that we believe there are not less than 125,000 people in the North-West Territories, 95,000 of which are in the provisional district of Assiniboia; that in order to an effectual and just representation, four members should be given to Assiniboia and at least two members each to Alberta and Saskatchewan, and that provision for such representation should be made at the coming Session of Parliament.

"That we are not in favor, in the meantime, of a division of the Territories into Provinces, for purposes of Government, but one Local Government for the whole of the North-West Territories will, in our opinion, best suit the requirements of the people; and that no alteration should be made in the eastern boundary of Assiniboia.

"That the timber regulations should be amended, so as to give homesteaders absolute control of all dead and dry timber upon their homesteads, and the people generally free permission to use the dead and dry wood found on Dominion lands.

"That the Government should promptly recognise the claims of half-breeds, as was done in the Province of Manitoba, and thus determine a question calculated to disturb the present development of the country."

These are the grievances that were complained of by the whole population of the North-West, half-breeds as well as white. I have read in the newspapers of other complaints. I have read of railway monopolies, complaints against land regulations. On the 24th November, 1883, the Globe thus commented on a letter which appeared in it the day previous:

"Our correspondent, whose letter we published yesterday, states once more the grievances of which the settlers in the North-West complain. They are burdened with monopolies, burdened with enormous taxation, harassed and worried by land regulations, which are as absurd, in some respects, as they are unjust in others, and rendered almost desperate by misgovernment. From some districts it is almost impossible to get the wheat to a market. Those who do reach a market find that, owing to railway monopoly and to an elevator monopoly which has lately been added to all the other grievances, they can get no more than 60 cents, instead of the 90 cents which it should now be worth. The complaints of settlers, while they came from individuals, were unheeded at Ottawa."

All these grievances which have been repeated for week after week and day after day in the Globe and the Grit press of Ontario, are not to be found expressed at the meetings which took place, either at Alberta or the Assiniboia or Saskatchewan districts, and the reason is, that they have no foundation whatever. I wish to be sure upon this point, and I hope it will be sufficient for me to quote the Minneapolis Canadian American:

"Canadians, who are in such a dreadful stew over the rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway, would perhaps be a little more moderate in their criticisms if they were aware of the freight charges of the Northern Pacific. It is a fact that Union Pacific rates for the same distances are 15 to 30 per cent. higher than those of the Canadian line.

"In charging extortion upon the north-western railways, a great deal of recklessness is displayed by the public. The operating expenses of such roads as the Union Pacific, Canadian Pacific Railway, and St. Paul, Minneapolis and Minnesota, are at least 75 per cent. higher than those of eastern lines

"They have not a concentrated traffic, such as the Grand Trunk or roads between Minneapolis and Chicago have, to command, and, moreover, their traffic may be said to be all one way, as the cars which carry their wheat east return to them empty, a fact that increases the cost of transportation."

Now, as to the land regulations, perhaps it would not be necessary I should say anything on this point, because really there were no complaints at all these meetings. To show how affairs of the land regulations are managed across the line. I may, however, quote from Senator Plumb's speech of the 7th April, 1884, in the Senate. He said :

"Mr. Macfarland, the United States commissioner of the land office, published his report in October last. He stated that one of the well-grounded complaints made against their management of land affairs was that patents are not issued promptly, and the evil had grown to such enormous magnitude in the United States that he was obliged to ask Congress to give him a hundred extra clerks to bring up the arrears.

"A comparison between the homestead policy of Canada and the United States will show which is most favorable to settlers :

"CANADA.

"The head of the family, or any male person not less than 18 years of age, is entitled to a homestead entry.

"Such entry may be for any quantity not exceeding 160 acres in any land open therefor, the even-numbered sections, on about eighty millions of the most fertile lands, being free for selection until the first of January, 1885. The settler will have the right of pre-emption of an adjoining tract of the same extent as his homestead, which he can purchase at the end of three years at Government prices. He obtains a patent at the end of three years' residence and cultivation. He may have a second homestead entry, and a third and fourth. He may commute, by purchase, after one year's residence."

Now, I will close these quotations as to the land regulations of our Canadian Government in our North-West by an extract of a recent interview which a well known gentleman, occupying at one time a high office in the United States, had with a reporter of the Montreal Herald. This gentleman is the hon. N. G. Ordway, of Concord, N. H., ex-Governor of Dakota. Here is the report of the interview, and, as this opinion is expressed by an American, I think it will not be without interest to quote it in full :

"I left Boston six weeks ago, on business connected with the New Hampshire Land Company, who have in view the purchase of a large tract of land in the North-West for cattle raising and breeding. The company are already large owners in Nebraska and Dakota of lands purchased by myself three years ago. To say that I was astonished at the fertility of the country I visited in Manitoba would be putting it mildly. In common with many Americans, I had always entertained the opinion that the lands were situated too far to the north to be of very much use to the agriculturist. I find myself very much mistaken. The wheat belt of the North-West is in every respect equal to that of Minnesota, Dakota or Iowa. There is one advantage which the Dominion possesses over the United States, and that is in respect to their homestead laws. Another cause which contributes to the advantage of the Dominion, and tends to injure the United States in the eyes of intending emigrants, is the Alien Land Law, passed at the last session of Congress. The passage of this law was, to my mind, a grievous error, as it will tend more than any other dozen causes to retard emigration to the States. No one can question the fact that the Canadian North-West is a great country, both in extent and as regards its possibilities. It has a glorious future before it. With its great through line—the Canadian Pacific Railway—reaching from ocean to ocean, an extent of country and trade has been opened up which will be almost without limit. This great railway is one of which all Canadians should be proud. Certainly no other country can claim an enterprise of equal magnitude. I found the road much better built than I anticipated it could have been, when one considers the disadvantages the company is said to have labored under. The roadbed is admirable and the construction throughout excellent. As an American, I, as is perfectly natural, think that within the borders of my own country is to be found the finest land the sun ever shown upon, but I am not blind to the fact that in the opening up of the Canadian North-West an area of country has been presented to the intending emigrant and settler which is equal to anything I have ever yet seen, and which possesses many advantages to the settler which we, south of the border, can no longer offer."

This opinion was expressed only a few days ago. I have said, in the course of my remarks, that I would quote the opinion of the local press, as expressed before the rebellion, to show that the Government had no reason to expect anything like the uprising which took place in the month of March. Le Manitoba, of the 22nd June, 1884, speaking of the arrival of Father Lacombe with the nuns in his charge en route for the High River Mission, said :

"Whatever the sensational press may say, the most perfect security reigns in the prairies, and nothing could disturb it. The settler has more security there than in any station of the American railway."

On the 10th of July, 1884, a correspondent from St. Laurent to Le Manitoba says :

"All is quiet here, and the large clouds which appeared on the political horizon have about disappeared. It is the result of the meeting held at Batoche, in the month of May last, by the Hon. Lieutenant Governor Dewdney."

Le Manitoba, of the 19th March, 1885—a few days before the rebellion took place—I think the first news we had of the uprising, was on the 23rd March—said :

MR. RIEL AND THE HALF-BREEDS.

"Despatches transmitted from Prince Albert to the newspapers of Manitoba bring us the sensational news that Mr. Riel, at the head of the half-breeds of that district, is preparing for an uprising, in which, it is said, the Indians would take part. The English population, it is said, asks arms for its defence, in case of an attack.

"If this news were not of a nature to cause an immense damage to our country, in leading to believe that we are in a constant state of rebellion, we would not give it any attention ; but as the foreign newspapers, always eager for sensational news, will hasten to reproduce the above, we believe it to be our duty to say : That no trouble is to be apprehended from the half-breeds in the North-West. It is true that discontent exists among them, which are in most cases based on legitimate reasons, but the cause of their grievances is seriously engaging the attention of the Government, and they promise to remedy them as soon as possible.

"Now, that there is some agitation, some meetings, even too violent, speeches, it is possible. Certain individuals think that justice cannot be obtained without grumbling, complaining or lamenting. It is their way of acting. But from that to a rebellion there is a great distance. The thing, moreover, would be so ridiculous that it is impossible for us to believe that our friends from that district would have the least idea to compromise themselves to that extent, even if they were so advised by those who ought to know better."

The Saskatchewan Herald of the 12th July, 1884, says :

"That Riel has come in, on the invitation of his friends, to be their leader, is freely admitted ; but no declaration has lately been made as to what they want. It is a suspicious circumstance, however, that immediately following his arrival in the country threats of armed rebellion should be indulged in, and that stories of the co-operation of Indians should be put in circulation, as they now are. We do not believe these rumors will lead to anything. The people are under no disabilities that cannot be redressed by constitutional means. To incite the Indians to acts of violence for purposes of revenge for real or fancied wrongs is a thing that will not be permitted by the Government or the settlers."

Now, let us take the representation of the North-West council at its sitting of the 21st of July, 1884. Mr. Dewdney, in his opening speech said :

"As we now have members from almost every district in the Territories who must be thoroughly conversant with the feeling on this most important question, I shall ask you to assist me with your advice and experience, in making representations to the Federal Government. I should not have touched on this question, which is one solely within the province of the Dominion Government, had I not felt it was one of paramount importance. From what I have seen myself, during my travels in the spring, and from what I gather from the correspondence which reached me as Indian commissioner, I can confidently say that our Indians generally are more contented than they were since the treaty was made, and the progress they are making in agriculture is most gratifying. It cannot be expected that with a population of some twenty thousand Indians scattered on reserves, in bands all over the Territories, we can escape without a little trouble, and, at times, excitement ; and this is inevitable when Indians fresh from the plains are first brought on their reserves and come in contact with white settlers. It has been so with those who are now comparatively well off, and will be so until the new arrivals recognise the facts that they must settle down and work and make a living ; but that there is any cause of alarm, I deny. I am sure the general feeling is one of security, and the exaggerated reports which have been circulated are to be regretted.

" You will have learned that the representations made by you to the Dominion Government have received attention, and many of the requests made acted upon, while others are under consideration. I am quite sure that should you feel the necessity of making further representations during the present Session, they will receive the same consideration at the hands of the Dominion Government."

Now, if grievances had existed of such a magnitude as to create a rebellion, would not some of the distinguished visitors to the North-West last summer have made some mention of it? In the first place, Manitoba and the North-West were visited by the Minister of Public Works. The Free Press, of Winnipeg, and Le Manitoba, of the 11th September of the same year, contain a statement that:

" The Minister of Public Works had come, with the sanction of the Government, to know the wants and feelings of the people and their grievances, if grievances they had. They might be sure that their grievances would be well weighed at Ottawa and that justice would be done."

Only one interview was mentioned by the leader of the Opposition, which some of the half-breeds had with the Minister of Public Works, and what answer did they get? Did they get an answer that they would be treated like white settlers? The Minister of Public Works answered that their claims would receive favorable consideration as soon as he will reach Ottawa. Now, Mr. Speaker, upon this invitation of the Minister of Public Works, the Free Press made some remarks. It pointed out to the Minister some grievances, and asked him to visit south-western Manitoba, where he would hear of some complaints. But no allusion is made to the grievances which existed, if any existed, in the North-West Territory. Manitoba and the North-West were also visited by Sir Richard Cartwright, the member for South Huron, and by the hon. Mr. Mackenzie, the member for East York, at the same time. A banquet was offered to Mr. Mackenzie, at Winnipeg, and an address was read to him by the Liberals of that part of the country. This address is dated on the 2nd of September, 1884, and says, among other things:

" We have a country unsurpassed in climate, fertility of soil and other natural advantages, but its development is retarded by a fiscal policy unjust to this portion of the Dominion. We feel that in this matter, and in the policy of the Dominion, with regard to our public lands and our provincial railway legislation, we have been treated without a fair regard to our peculiar position and our rights to an equality with the other Provinces of Canada. We wish to draw attention to the necessity for such assistance to our railway enterprises as will promptly develop this great country, and for such an increase in the representation of Manitoba and the North-West in the Parliament of Canada as will insure greater consideration for our interests."

Now, Mr. Speaker, these Reformers of Manitoba and the North-West complain of the National Policy, but the half-breeds of St. Laurent and the white settlers of the North-West did not make any such complaints. Do we hear anything of the grievances of the half-breeds, or even of the white settlers, which have been mentioned at their meetings? Not a word. The Hon. Mr. McDougall also visited Winnipeg about the same time. Some of his admirers also gave him a banquet. The whole subject of the conversation and the speeches turned upon Manitoba and the North-West. I have seen the reports of the speeches which were delivered on that occasion, and not a single reference is made to the grievances of the white settlers, or of the half-breeds of the North-West, laid down by the meetings which I have mentioned. But there is more. Mr. Dewdney visited St. Albert on the 16th October, 1884. The report of his visit is given in Le Manitoba, of the 7th of November of that year: Several addresses were presented to him by the citizens, and Monseigneur Grandin, in the name of the clergy, containing sentiments of loyalty to the Canadian Government and Canadian institutions. A banquet was even tendered to him at the Bishop's Palace. A committee of citizens, with Mr. E. Maloney at their head, met the Lieutenant Governor, in order to make certain requests of him in the public interest. They asked, first, the purchase of a bridge on the Red River, and to make it a free bridge.

Mr. GIROUARD.

They also ask that those portions of the supplies intended for the Indians should be bought in the district, where they could be supplied more advantageously than in any other place. They said His Honor promised to take into consideration their demands, and do everything he could to satisfy them. Not a word was said during that meeting, held only a few months before the rebellion, against the Government; nothing but praise and admiration for the policy of the Government. Something was said last night by the leader of the Government of the action which the white settlers in the North-West have taken in this rebellion. I believe that the white settlers, I do not say the whole of them, but some of them, and they include parties acting on behalf of American colonisation companies, had more to do with this rebellion, of the spring of 1885, than the half-breeds and Indians. Let me read to you an article from the Globe, of 21st November, I will not say 1884, but 1883, and this article is only a sample of numerous inflammatory articles which, from time to time, have been published by that newspaper. It is as follows:—

" The American press is already holding out to our distressed brethren active sympathy and promise of help. In one day's exchanges we find nearly a dozen of the most influential papers of the Union telling the people of Manitoba they must break with the Dominion, which is treating them scandalously. Let there be no more of ostrich-like tucking of the head in the sand and refusing to see what is patent to every body. The organisation movement of Manitoba means business. It means that justice must be done. Ottawa methods must be revolutionized, and that quickly."

A letter from a special correspondent of the Globe at Winnipeg is headed " Manitoba troubles. Discontent coming to a head in the prairie Province. Result of a series of blunders. The farmers will have their rights by some means. Down with monopoly. Threatening to burn elevators and tear up railways. The situation very serious." The correspondent says:

" All through the controversy which has been raging in regard to the Government of this country no newspaper has displayed a fuller knowledge of the requirements of this country than the Globe, nor has it gone beyond the mark in predicting that, unless good government be at once vouchsafed to us, our position in Confederation will every day become more a matter of form, and that finally we will shake ourselves loose from the monotonous burden and seek some more congenial government. There is no doubt that the Canadians are a loyal people; they love their institutions and their traditions, but they are common-sense people as well, and will not allow their generous sentiments to be used against them, to compel them to sit still while other loyal people are steadily accomplishing their ruin."

" The day has gone by when, by a peculiar perversion, forms of government were worshipped for themselves, and every Canadian, at any rate, has learned that Governments are made for the conveniences of men, and not men for the glory of Governments. The day has come when the lumbering blue mould appendages of Government must be scattered to the four winds, and when a system of government is chosen like a particular kind of reaping machine—because it is the best for the purposes for which it is required, and for no mysterious or awful reason whatever. This is especially the case in Manitoba and the North-West. The country is young; the population is made up of all nationalities; people have come here to make money. We are independent of the eastern Provinces. We are not independent of the United States."

I shall now close these very long remarks, which have been much longer than I should have liked to have made them. I am not in the habit, as every member knows, of making long speeches. In fact, I very seldom trouble the House with speeches or remarks. I have been long on this occasion, it is true, but everyone will admit that the subject is important, everyone will admit, moreover, that it is new. I have not been as long as the leader of the Opposition, who spent seven hours, and did not touch the Indian question, an important element in the examination of the whole case. I cannot close these remarks without making an appeal to the Government, which, I hope, will receive their favorable consideration: it is to exercise its clemency in favor of the prisoners now confined at Regina. I have just pointed out that those poor half-breeds and Indians are not, after all, so much to blame as the great organ of the Liberal party in this Dominion. I do not want to make any reference to any special case. I have carefully refrained from making any remarks with respect to Riel which might injure his position. I do not make any special appeal, but on behalf of all those prisoners I ask that the Government should exercise clemency. We have a good example of clemency in a Government which has not so well treated the Indians as has the Canadian Government or the British Government. Some few years ago, when Sitting Bull was induced to return with his warriors to his reserve in the United States territory, what was done? A Métis—Jean Louis Légaré—for it is always known that half-breeds have great influence over all Indians—was charged by the United States Government to bring back the Sioux Indians who had committed so many depredations, murders, assassinations and massacres; and not only were the members of Sitting Bull's band pardoned, but Sitting Bull himself was pardoned, without any condition. And to-day he is on his reserve in American territory, an Indian just as peaceful as any citizen in the American Union. To sum up the facts of this case: We are asked to vote non-confidence in this Government in regard to its policy in the North West. We are asked to vote that hon. gentlemen opposite shall come to this side of the House and manage the affairs of the country. In other words, we are asked to condemn the policy of the Government in its treatment of the Indians. We are also asked to condemn the Government and its policy with regard to the half-breeds and the white settlers. Mr. Speaker, I cannot give my vote in favor of that motion. I believe the Government deserves great praise for having established law and order in such a large Territory, which only fifteen years ago was almost a wilderness. They deserve the thanks of the country for having achieved such a great result without shedding a drop of blood. The events of the last few months, which we all deplore, should not alarm us. The rebellion has been confined to a small portion of the French half-breeds and of the Indians; it has been limited to a small area, some 20 or 25 square miles. The rebels have been subdued after great loss of property and life, it is true, but law and order have been re-established, and I would say to the Government: Continue your policy of instructing the Indians of the North-West; continue to give them farm instructors, common schools and industrial schools. But I would venture, in that respect, to make one suggestion. I think it is of the greatest importance that all those instructors should have something in common with the Indians who are confided to their charge, and therefore I would say, if it is at all possible to find farm instructors or school teachers who speak the language of the Indians who are placed under them, preference should be given to them. I would go further. I would take the advice given by the First Minister in 1883, when he said:

"Well, I think I may almost ask the hon. gentleman to look into the report on these schools, where he will find their success more or less alluded to. I believe, however, that these schools are fairly successful, especially those under the charge of religious bodies, Catholic or Protestant. These are, I believe, more successful than the merely secular schools, where the schoolmasters, who are honest men and who do their duty, are actuated, of course, by a desire to support themselves and their families. The moral restraints of the clergy, both Catholic and Protestant, are greater. They are actuated by higher motives than any secular instructor can pretend to. Secular education is a good thing among white men, but among Indians the first object is to make them better men, and, if possible, good christian men, by applying proper moral restraints, and appealing to the instinct for worship which is to be found in all nations, whether civilised or uncivilised."

I hope that the commission which is just now sitting in the North-West, entrusted with the work of satisfying the half-breed claims as to land, will not only satisfy these claims, but will also examine into the amount of indemnity which is to be paid to the settlers who have suffered in consequence of the rebellion, and ascertain the amount of damages which has been sustained by the white population, so that it may be known next Session, and a vote of Parliament given next Session. Further, I would say that I do not quite agree with the view that the half-breed must be considered either as an Indian or a white man. I believe that he should be considered as he is, as the connecting link between the Indian and the white; and therefore I hope the Government will see fit to give to these half-breeds some of the advantages which have been given to the Indians—some of the grain and seeds and agricultural implements which they require, in order to become familiar with agriculture. Now, I have only one more remark to make. It may be said that the half-breed families in the distressed districts are not worthy of consideration. Mr. Speaker, I believe there are many half-breeds in that district who were loyal to the Dominion Government and to Dominion institutions; but I say, whether they were or not, I hope the Government will not forget the women and children who are homeless in that district, but will do something to save them from actual starvation. A letter has just been published in the Mail, by Father André, who says:

"What a sad sight met my eyes the other day, when I visited this same parish of St. Antoine! The cottages which I had admired so much last year were most of them burned down to the ground; those standing were nothing but a wreck, with windows and doors broken. The fields and gardens lay waste and uncultivated; cattle and horses were gone; a few only remained, as the taking of them away was not worth the trouble. Everywhere I went I met with fearful evidence of wretchedness and poverty. It was a hard trial for me to bear. A good many houses were tenantless; the owners were dead or gone away; and as I saw all the ruins about me, I could not stop my tears, so heavy was my heart with grief. Who could help not to be moved with compassion in seeing those poor and unfortunate women, surrounded by their children, coming to meet me and to shake hands with me? They formed a perfect picture of squalor and desolation, in tatters, and broken hearted. The little children did not present a less pitiable appearance. They were there standing before me, crying to their full heart, and telling me all the sad misfortunes which had befallen them. They had lost all their clothes at the sack of Batoche's, and when they came back home they found all their furniture smashed in pieces and their dwellings left with the bare walls. There they were, destitute, and starvation staring them in the face, unless help be near at hand. Add to this that these poor women were most of them mourning for their dead sons or husbands, or for husbands and sons lying in prison at Regina, waiting for trial, and you can conceive how much these unfortunate people deserve our compassion."

Now, I have only to state what appears to me to be a necessity in the North-West. The Mounted Police force have shown its usefulness; no doubt a guard of some kind is necessary for the protection of the white settlers against the attacks of the Indians; but I question whether we could not really form a better body of men than the Mounted Police force, composed of picked men from the Mounted Police, the militia of the country, and, I would also add, from the half-breeds. In a recent correspondence to the Mail newspaper from St. Boniface, I read:

"What a pity it is that the Dominion Government cannot see its way to forming a corps of Métis for service as police on the plains! General Middleton can bear testimony to their valor and endurance; and I am sure the gallant troops also will give them a just measure of praise. At Edmonton a small force of loyal half-breeds, organised under the direction of Bishop Grandin, is doing splendid work, the men being unequalled as scouts. A division or two of Métis would greatly strengthen the North-West Mounted Police, and help to restore the prestige of that body among the Indians. The question is certainly worth the consideration of the Government. Father Dugast, of this archdiocese, has collected, in book form, many admirable stories about the Métis, which the Ottawa officials in charge of the police should read. They would convince them, if, after recent experience, they need convincing, that there is no better raw material for a mounted infantry man than the half-breed."

Now, I would ask the white settlers to have a little patience. They should not forget all the sacrifices the old Provinces have been making for them; they should not forget that for the last ten years all the resources of the country have been devoted to the development of that country; they should not forget that we have spent millions and millions for the purpose of building the Pacific Railway, for carrying on surveys throughout that vast territory, and for opening up registry offices and land offices; they should not forget that we have suspended the great public works of the old Provinces on this account, for instance, the enlargement of our canals. No doubt they have some grievances, we have some in the old Provinces; but before long they will enjoy all the luxuries of civilisation, and with a little patience and forbearance, this country will be so developed as to be a happy home for everybody, not only in the old Provinces, but also in Manitoba and the North-West.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). At this late hour of the night, at this late period of the Session, and in about the middle of the dog days, I have too much respect for the ease and comfort of the members of this House, and too much regard for my own ease and comfort, to spend six hours and twenty minutes in delivering, like the preceding speaker, a long wordy speech, nineteen-twentieths of which had about as much connection with the subject under discussion as Barnum's woolly horse had with Barnum's Circassian princess. The hon. gentleman told us, at the beginning of his speech, that he knew nothing about the North-West, about the half-breeds, their claims, their condition, their grievances or their interests. He undertook to study the question, and his sympathies, he told us, were entirely with the half-breeds until he did so. He devoted two or three months to the investigation of the North-West question and the claims of the half-breeds, and we have had the result of that investigation in the speech to-night. The hon. gentleman justified the course pursued by the Government on the ground that the late Government had not dealt with the claims of the half-breeds with that promptitude which, in his judgment, they ought to have been dealt with. The hon. gentleman's argument is this: because a man of the name of Mackenzie, some seven or eight years ago, committed some act of negligence, long since condoned, therefore, a man of the name of Macdonald, who, for seven years, has persistently refused to investigate the claims of the half-breeds, and, as a consequence, human life has been lost and human blood has been spilt, is to go unwhipped of justice. The hon. gentleman told us that the buffalo was rapidly disappearing from the plains of the west; that the disappearance of that source of supply, on which the half-breeds and the Indians were largely dependent, had caused the rebellion; that the late Government caused the buffalo to disappear, and that, therefore, the late Government is responsible for the recent uprising in the North-West Territories. That is the line of argument of the hon. gentleman, and it is just about as logical as all the answers made to the charges levelled against the Government by my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake). The hon. gentleman says we have no reason to complain against this Government. He asks us what has the Government not done? He replies, just see what they have done. They have opened registry offices and appointed registrars; they have opened land offices and appointed agents; they have created the offices of farm instructors, and filled them with farm instructors. That is just the difficulty; they have created many offices, and have taken good care to fill them; but there is one thing they did not do: they did not consider the claims of the half-breeds, or redress their wrongs, and it is no satisfaction to them to be told: Your wrongs are not redressed, it is true; your grievances are not considered, but we have appointed registrars, farm instructors, school teachers, land agents, sub-agents, and sub-sub-agents in the North-West, and, therefore, you ought to be satisfied. That is the line of argument hon. gentlemen opposite pursue. The hon. gentleman gave an interesting sketch of the admission of the great North-West into this Confederation; but it strikes me that the half-breeds of the North-West, whose friend, I suppose, the hon. gentleman is, would be much more interested in getting some relief and redress in the position in which they are now placed by reason of the negligence and misconduct of this Administration. The hon. gentleman gave us very correctly, no doubt, the area of each provisional District in the North-West. But what the half-breeds want is the area of their holdings, not the area of the Provinces. The hon. gentleman told us something about the Indian title in the North-West. What the half-breed wants is the title to his own land. What cares he about the Indian title, whether it is extinguished or not. What he wants is that this Government should give him the title to the land that he has been in possession of for the last twenty years, and, in some cases, that his father before him was in possession of, and the title to which is, to this hour, vested in the Crown. The hon. gentleman sought to arouse a feeling of animosity against the Liberal party by pointing out that the unfortunate Riel and the other half-breeds who are now in custody in the North-West were deprived of the right of trial by a mixed jury, and he charged that upon the late Administration. Why, I have in my hand the law under which these men are to be tried, passed in the year 1880, under this Administration, while the hon. gentleman was a member of this House and supporting that administration; and if the half-breeds of the North-West are deprived of the right, which is given by the law of the land to certain classes in the community, of being tried before a mixed jury, the fault, the responsibility rests upon the shoulders of hon. gentlemen opposite, and those friends of the half-breeds, such as the hon. gentleman who are members of this House. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Girouard) in his opening remarks gave the case away. He admitted that the half-breeds had grievances, but, he said, they had no such grievances as would justify rebellion. Who said they had? Who made that statement? Did any hon. gentlemen on this side?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). No; no man on this side made any such statement as that the half-breeds had grievances that would justify rebellion. But the hon. gentleman admits they had grievances unredressed, and that is what my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake), in the motion he has submitted, complains of. These men have had grievances of long standing unredressed. You, gentlemen on the Treasury benches, by your apathy, by your neglect, by your criminal misconduct, in refusing to redress these grievances, are responsible for the consequences. When the hon. gentleman who has just sat down stood up, on a wager that he would make a speech of six hours and twenty-five minutes, hon. gentlemen opposite did not call him an obstructionist. They charged us with obstruction when we were endeavoring to show their iniquitous measure of the franchise in its true light, but when, upon a wager of a dozen of champagne, an hon. gentleman on their side takes up six hours and twenty-five minutes of the time of the House, in order to win this bet, they have not a word to say about obstruction. What we say is, that the half-breeds, the Indians and the white inhabitants of the North-West, but notably the half-breeds, have had for years grievances which ought to have been investigated, wrongs which ought to have been redressed, and that this Government is guilty in not having investigated these grievances and redressed those wrongs and are responsible for all the consequences which have resulted from their misconduct, mismanagement and incapacity; and we say nothing more. I listened with the attention that befitted the occasion and the man to the speech of the First Minister. I knew that the First Minister was on his trial before the Parliament of his country, and I was curious to know—knowing something of the position of this case, of the claims and the wrongs of the half-breeds—what defense the hon. gentleman would make to the formidable indictment that was presented against him by my hon. friend from the west riding, and I must say that I never listened to a more inconsequential and illogical defense than the hon. gentleman made. I have defended many prisoners in my day; and will honestly say that if called on to offer such a defence as the hon. gentleman has made, I would have thrown up the brief at once, and I would have done as the hon. gentleman for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) has done, advised him to plead guilty to the charge preferred against him. What did the First Minister say? He said that the rebellion was caused by the disaffection of the half-breeds to Canadian rule; and, in the second place, that the white men, for their own sordid and selfish purposes, incited the half-breeds to rebel. In the third place, that the half-breeds were incited to rebel by the Grits of the Dominion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). No, Sir. I say they were incited to rebel by the Tories; the Tories stole everything that could be stolen in the North West, from a timber limit down to a little, petty gravel pit, and they were not satisfied with their stealings in the days gone by. If anybody incited the half-breeds to rebellion it was the Tories, who sold their hay for feeding the horses of the troops at $400 a ton, and who, from the president of a land company down to the humblest follower of the First Minister, charged $10 a day for the hire of their horses. If anybody fattened upon the misfortunes of the country it was the Tory party. The hon. gentleman told us that the half-breeds had no grievances worthy of the name, and therefore should not have rebelled; that the half-breeds were the slaves of the whites of Prince Albert District, and that it would not do to give them their lands or scrip, because they would be wasted and squandered in a very short time. He forgot to tell us that after human life was lost, after human blood was spilt, and ruin, desolation and death scattered abroad, commissioners were sent out by the First Minister to investigate the claims of the half-breeds, and not only to give them land and scrip, but to give them more than they ever asked for before. He told us no half-breed in the North-West was disturbed or oppressed; that the half-breeds had their homes and their lands, and that was all they wanted; but he forgot to tell us that some of the colonisation companies, the creation of his own mad folly, to suit his own political purposes, had notified the half-breeds to abandon their holdings. He forgot to tell us that these half-breeds had not their lands and houses, and that was just what they were complaining of. They were mere tenants at will; they were there at the will of the Government, or of the colonisation company which was fortunate enough to secure a grant of their land from this liberal Government, liberal as regards its followers. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) boldly and openly charged the First Minister and his colleagues with the consequences of this terrible rebellion, and he charged upon this Administration the results of their own inaction and misconduct. How, I say, did the hon. gentleman answer the charge? Did he make any answer at all? Did he submit a logical answer? Why, I defy any man who listened to the First Minister to say exactly upon what ground the First Minister justified the position he took. The answer was: I charge the Grit party, I charge the Liberal party in Parliament and out of Parliament, with the whole consequences of this rebellion, with having incited and directed and induced the half-breeds of the North-West Territories to take up arms against the sovereign power of this Dominion. But he forgot to tell us that, for seven long years, as my hon. friend from West Durham has pointed out, these people have been pressing their claims upon and demanding a rectification of their wrongs from the Government, and have been unable to obtain justice up to this hour. I think this, without drawing upon one's imagination, is reason enough, in the mind and the temper, and the disposition, and the peculiarity of the half-breeds, to induce them to take up arms against this Government. The hon. gentleman stated that the whole of the consequences of the rebellion were at the door of the Liberal party. But the hon. gentleman did not tell us the political complexion of those who were actively engaged in that terrible contest that fortunately has just drawn to a successful conclusion? Did he tell us the political complexion of Mr. Louis Schmidt, a man after his own heart, a man in whom he had such unbounded faith that he appointed him to an office of emolument in the gift of the Crown, a man who I believe still holds that office, and, while he was the paid official of this Tory Government, was private secretary and Secretary of State to Mr. Louis Riel, the controller of affairs in the great North-West. The First Minister forgot to tell us what were the politics of Mr. Dumas, another man whom he appointed to an office of emolument in the gift of the Crown and in the service of the Government in the North-West Territories, and who, at the same time, was one of Riel's councillors. The hon. gentleman forgot to tell us the political complexion of Mr. Isbister. I do not know; I do not care what his politics were; I know he was one of the men who induced Louis Riel to leave his home in Montana and engage in this contest to secure the rights of the half-breeds in the North-West Territories; but the First Minister forgot to tell us that he had offered him a position, an office of emolument in the gift of the Crown. He also forgot to tell us the political complexion of Mr. Gabriel Dumont, the commander-in-chief of the rebel army in the North-West, and a man for whom I, for one, entertain a profound respect, no matter what his politics may be, a man who would not be bought, but who believed his countrymen were wronged, and, believing that, was prepared to sacrifice his life in defence of his countrymen. This man has obtained favors from this Government. He is the lessee of the ferry across the Saskatchewan at his own place. More than that: he was a constant reader of La Minerve, and the editor of the Minerve has boasted that Gabriel Dumont was a contributor to his paper, and paid for it for years; and I know that no sound Grit reads the Minerve. You may place Mr. Dumont among followers of hon. gentlemen opposite. Then, the First Minister, who says the rebellion was caused by the Grit party, that it was instigated by the Grit party, forgot to tell us who was the leader of the rebellion in the North-West, he forgot to say anything about Mr. Louis Riel, the bosom friend and companion of the hon. gentleman, the political friend and ally for fifteen years of the First Minister, his co-worker in the Conservative field, a man who had conferred favors on the Government in the days gone by, and had received favors at the hands of the Government of this country in return. Who was it, twelve years ago, when a colleague of the First Minister was defeated in his own constituency, abandoned his contest for the county of Provencher, in order that the First Minister's colleague might get a seat in the Parliament of Canada? Mr. Louis Riel. And he got it through the instrumentality of Mr. Louis Riel. And when he was elected, who were they who sent a congratulatory telegram, addressed to the First Minister's Colleague on that subject? Mr. Louis Riel, Mr. A. Lepine, and Mr. Joseph Royal signed that telegram. There were more favors that passed between these high contracting parties. For whom did the First Minister, in days of old, plunge his hand right up to the elbow in the public purse of this country and extract therefrom $1,000 of the people's money, and send that money, through a venerable dignitary of the church, to this traitor, conspirator and redhanded murderer, that he might fly the offended justice of his country and escape the bloodhounds of the law then upon his track? The First Minister sent that to Louis Riel, and yet they say—

Mr. SPROULE. How about the amnesty?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Yes; about the amnesty. It shows how little the hon. gentlemen knows about it. Did not the venerable Archbishop of St. Boniface, under his oath, declare—

Mr. BOWELL. No.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes; declare, under his oath, that he was promised by the Government that preceded Mr. Mackenzie's that the offenders in the North-West Territories should be amnestied? There was the evidence submitted to the investigating committee, that the First Minister and his colleagues, including the Minister of Public Works, had promised an amnesty to these traitors and rebels in the North-West, and yet the hon. gentleman talks about the amnesty, as if promised by the late Government. If the hon. gentleman would only take the trouble to read the documents, he would find who it was that promised the amnesty. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) boldly charges the First Minister with neglect, with delay, in not investigating the demands of the half-breeds in the North-West Territories. How are we answered? We were answered by the production of a despatch sent by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to the proper authority in the North-West, in which it was indicated that, for certain things, the half-breeds should be precisely in the same position as the white man. I have no hesitation in saying, from a careful examination of the demands of the half-breeds for a long series of years that, if this had been conceded seven years ago by this indolent and incapable Government, the half-breeds of the North-West would have been perfectly satisfied. My hon. friend from West Durham charged the First Minister with gross dereliction of duty in not recognising the claims of the half-breeds in the North-West Territories at an earlier period. What answer did the First Minister make to that charge? The answer was: The hon. member for West Huron has sent a letter to the public departments, notifying them not to issue patents for certain pieces of land until a claim he has against the land is discharged. The First Minister wanted to convey a wrong impression; he wished to convey the impression to the House that I, in some way, was speculating in the claims of the half-breeds; that I had got some of those claims into my possession, and had notified the Department not to grant the patents until those claims were settled. If the hon. gentleman had been honest, he would have stated the facts. He knew the facts. He knew that there were two young men who left my county in 1882 and settled upon the Moose Jaw lands. He knew that these young men had for several years been endeavoring, but in vain, to get from this Government, from the First Minister and his officials, a recognition of their rights to the land upon which they had settled. He knew that in 1883, in one of my visits to the North-West, I saw these young men, whom I had known for years. They expressed their determination to abandon a country where they could get no satisfaction from the Government, but upon my advice they remained there. The First Minister knew all that, because last Session, when I brought this question to the attention of Parliament, the First Minister commended the conduct that I pursued with respect to the settlers in the Moose Jaw region. Because I knew these young men, and did not desire that they should leave the country and the land upon which they had settled, and in order to induce them to remain, I advanced them a considerable sum of money to erect houses upon their locations, to buy horses, oxen, waggons and the implements to carry on farming operations. Through my instrumentality these young men remained in the country, and to secure myself for the money advanced I took a lien upon the land. Was there any harm in that? No. Yet the First Minister wants to make this Parliament believe that there was something wrong in what I did in that respect. I say that if the conduct of the Government in dealing with the settlers in the North-West had been as clean-handed as my conduct was with respect to those young men, there would have been no rebellion. My hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake) pointed out that owing to the gross carelessness and the misconduct of this Administration, in not redressing the grievances of the people in the North-West, the half-breeds become dissatisfied, uneasy, discontented, and broke out into rebellion. He was answered by the First Minister producing, with a flourish of trumpets, and with all the indications of having discovered a mare's nest, a letter written by my hon. friend to a person of the name of Brown. Well, what about it, if he did write a letter to a person by the name of Brown? Every body knows that for four months my hon. friend was attempting to drag out of the hon. gentleman's possession papers that would throw light upon the transactions of this Government with the half-breeds in the North-West Territories, and that for four months my hon. friend had signally failed to induce the First Minister to submit these papers to Parliament. My hon. friend was promised and refused, he was refused and promised, and ultimately they were brought down in a mutilated condition, while some of the valuable papers were not brought down at all. One of these papers that the First Minister refused to bring before Parliament he had with him last night, and he read an extract from it in his place in Parliament. He refused to bring that document before the House, that the House might see it, but he was willing to use that paper for the purpose of building up his own argument. This man Brown, knowing that my hon. friend was persisting in his efforts to procure information, wrote to my hon. friend that he had been in the North-West and was conversant with the affairs of that country, and knew of the difficulties there. My hon. friend replied to him, and Brown wrote again, asking a pass to come to Ottawa, and stating that he desired employment, and did not wish that his name should be known until he had got that employment. My hon. friend answered that he could not give him the pass, and, of course, could not give him employment, but that he would not let his name be known until he got employment, whatever it was. He did not send him the pass. Brown was here. Who brought him here? Is it not a fact that one of the whips of the Government procured a pass and brought him here? He was here, and that is the answer the hon. gentleman makes to this charge of my hon. friend from West Durham. What became of the letter? How did the First Minister get that letter? What was the price paid for that letter? How much did the First Minister pay to Brown to get that letter? Sir, has it come to this? Has the Government of this Dominion descended so low and become so degraded that they have to adopt the rôle of the spy and detective, and to enroll themselves as members of the spittoon brigade, and pick up scraps of papers and letters, and retail their contents on the floor of Parliament, in answer to charges of gross misconduct? Sir, I say again: How did the hon. gentleman get hold of that letter? What price did he pay for it? Did this Government again betray the trust reposed in them, and barter the public service of this country as the price of that letter? Has Brown been given employment? If he has not, has he been promised employment as the price of delivering that letter to the Administration? Do they think that a fair and honorable, and justifiable warfare—using private letters, written by private parties, to an individual outside of Parliament, and the public service of this country being bartered for the purpose of getting possession of that letter. Sir, I wish the hon. gentleman joy of his letter. It shows nothing; it proves nothing. Now, Sir, this question of the North-West insurrection is an important question. It is a grave question. It is rarely in the history of any country that we find the Government of that country impeached as the Government of this country are now. They are charged with the gravest offences that can be committed by any Government. In my judgment, this is the most important question that ever was submitted to this or any other Parliament. The motion of my hon. friend from West Durham challenges, in the clearest terms, the policy of this Government in dealing with the affairs of the North-West Territories. The motion of my friend challenges the conduct of the First Minister of this Dominion, who was the Minister of Interior in days gone by, and the conduct of the officials appointed by this Administration, in the management of the affairs of the North-West Territories. It censures, it is true, in mild and temperate language, but all the same it censures the conduct and the actions of the gentlemen upon the Treasury benches, with respect to their conduct in managing the affairs of this country in the North-West Territories. It charges them with being responsible for the recent outbreak, and it holds them directly responsible to the people of this country, to the Parliament of this country, for the loss of life and the spilling of blood. I venture to say now, in all calmness, that there is no man who will sit down and deliberately consider all the evidence, all the facts that have been submitted by my hon. friend from West Durham and my hon. friend from East Quebec, and the facts that I propose to submit to Parliament, but who will hold the Government responsible. Now, it is a singular fact, that in the history of this country two rebellions have taken place under the administration of the First Minister. History, we know, Mr. Speaker, repeats itself. Like causes produce like effects. I say that the rebellion of 1869 was the result of apathy, carelessness, indifference, misconduct, mal-administration on the part of the First Minister and his then colleagues. I say, Sir, that the recent rebellion has been the direct outcome of neglect, misconduct, mal-administration, refusal to deal with grievances and to investigate wrongs; and I say that the evidence sustains my assertion beyond peradventure. Now, the questions we have to grapple with at the very threshold of this discussion are: Had the half-breeds of the North-West Territories who took up arms against the sovereign power of this Dominion, had the white settlers who sympathised with the half-breeds, to some extent, had the Indians, who ultimately joined the half-breeds in the rebellion, complaints, grievances, wrongs, that remained unredressed by the Government of the country, after presenting those grievances to the Government, after directing the attention of the authorities to those grievances and wrongs, and after presenting them as earnestly and vigorously as, under the circumstances of the case, they were warranted and justified in doing? First, then, had the half-breeds grievances? That they had grievances is admitted. The hon. gentleman who preceded me admitted it. The First Minister, in the early part of this Session, stated that the half-breeds of the North-West made many complaints, some of which were well founded. If the half-breeds had grievances, and they remained unremedied, who is responsible for the rebellion that was the result of the refusal to consider those grievances and rectify those wrongs? I say it is not a very difficult matter to fix that responsibility. It can be fixed on no one except the Administration of the day, which has been guilty of that carelessness and indifference. It is true the organs of hon. gentleman opposite have sought to fix the responsibility, as the First Minister has done, on the Liberal party, in Parliament and out of Parliament. I say they have done so in order to draw public attention away from the real culprits. When the rebellion first broke out there was no hint or suggestion in the Conservative press as to the Liberal party being responsible, and it was only a second thought, when hon. gentlemen opposite found they were on dangerous ground, that the press supporting hon. gentlemen opposite sought to fix the responsibility of the outbreak on the shoulders of the Liberal party. No one pays very much attention to what some of the organs, the subsidised organs of hon. gentleman opposite say on this question, such as the Mail, the Montreal Gazette and the Ottawa Citizen. They are the paid organs of the Government, and are bound to earn their reward. But when the First Minister, perhaps in a moment of weakness, perhaps in a moment of excitement, adopts the same ignoble role and attempts to shift the responsibility for his own neglect and the neglect of his colleagues, his own maladministration and the maladministration of his colleagues, and attempts to fix that responsibility upon the shoulders of the Liberal party, the hon. gentleman does what neither the facts nor the circumstances warrant the hon. gentleman in doing. We have, on more than one occasion, challenged the First Minister and his followers to point to a single sentence in the Liberal press, to a single word uttered by Liberal members of Parliament, that could be distorted into offering the slightest encouragement to armed insurrection. As representatives of the people in Parliament assembled, with high and important duties to discharge, we have, upon many occasions, pointed out to the First Minister that the policy to which he committed the Parliament of Canada and the people of this country was a policy calculated to create uneasiness, dissatisfaction, discontent and turbulence in the North-West Territories. How were we answered? By the hon. gentleman calmly reconsidering that policy—a policy which was sure to end in dissatisfaction and discontent, if not in rebellion. No, Sir, we were assured that the settlers had no ground of complaint; that they were satisfied and contented, and, in any event, they need not expect to be spoon-fed. We protested against that policy, we warned hon. gentlemen opposite against that policy, we pointed out the fatal results that were sure to follow that policy. How were we answered? By calmly and deliberately considering the condition of affairs in the North-West, and ascertaining whether there were grievances uninvestigated and wrongs unredressed? No; we were assured that no one complained, all were satisfied. The history of the past taught hon. gentlemen no lessons, the warnings of the present were wholly unavailing and so, I say, if their wilful neglect ended in rebellion, upon the shoulders of hon. gentlemen opposite must rest the responsibility for that rebellion. What were those grievances, what did the half-breeds complain of? Their complaints were made openly and boldly; they were not concealed; they were made in the broad light of day and in every way known to the people of a country when protesting against the wrong-doing of the Government of that country. They were grievances of long standing, grievances that spread over a period of seven long weary years and during all those years they were constantly pressed on the attention of the Government at Ottawa. Their prompt settlement was a matter of vital importance to the peace, the growth and prosperity of that country. They were pressed upon the attention of the Government by letters, by memorials, by petitions, by remonstrances, by resolutions passed at public meetings and by delegations all the way from the North-West to interview the Government. They were pressed on the attention of the Government, in 1883, by the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), who then pointed out the necessity of considering at once those grievances. They were pressed at the attention of the Government by myself, in 1884, in the most solemn way known to Parliament, by a motion on going into Supply, on which occasion I pointed out some of the grievances complained of by the people of the North-West and warned hon. gentlemen opposite against the fatal consequences of refusing to deal promptly with those grievances. I was answered, by the ex-Minister of Railways, that there were no grievances and no complaints; that everybody was satisfied and contented, and everybody was prospering. We see the result of that negligence to-day. Let me consider for a moment what those grievances were. They have been referred to by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) and the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier). I direct attention to them for a moment or two. The half-breeds complained of the system of surveys adopted by this Government. They desired that the North-West Territories should be divided into Provinces. They requested that the half-breeds of the North West should receive the same considerations and the same advantages as the half-breeds of Manitoba had received. Are not those reasonable claims? Why were they not conceded? There were other complaints, perhaps not of the same importance, but still of considerable importance, in the interests of the peace and prosperity of the North-West Territory. There was a universal demand throughout those Territories for representation in this Parliament. To meet that demand, in the Session of 1884 I introduced a Bill to give representation to the people of the North-West Territories. On moving for leave to introduce that Bill, I pointed out the necessity for it, and the danger of refusing it. How was I answered? I was answered with silent indifference—with supreme contempt. Still thoroughly alive to the necessity of giving representation to those people, I introduced the Bill this Session, and, on moving the second reading, I pointed out again the fairness, the reasonableness of the demands made by the people of the North-West for representation in this Parliament, where they could meet face to face the representatives of the people of this country, and ventilate their grievances, point out their wrongs, and demand from Parliament redress for those wrongs. How was I answered? Was this reasonable demand assented to? No; my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works, moved the adjournment of the debate, knowing quite well that, at that period of the Session, when the Government had taken possession of nearly every working day of the week, it was impossible to reach the discussion during the present Session, and again the reasonable demands of the settlers of the North-West were refused by the Government. There were other demands. They claimed that their rights as settlers were not recognised by the Government; that the Government had given to colonisation companies, to land companies, to mining and ranching companies, vast portions of the Territories of the North-West, which had been occupied by the half-breeds for years. Now, I say in all sincerity, let any man sit down and calmly and honestly consider these claims of the half-breeds, and I say he will rise from their consideration thoroughly impressed with their fairness. I do not mean to say that these grievances, uninvestigated, these wrongs, unredressed, would justify an armed insurrection; but I do say, that if anything would justify an armed insurrection to rectify wrongs and redress grievances, it would be just such grievances uninvestigated, just such wrongs unredressed by this Government for seven long years. I venture to say, that now when human life has been lost and human blood has been spilt, and houses and homes have been ruined; when all over Canada wives have been made widows and children orphans; I venture to say now that four-fifths of these demands of the half-breeds will be conceded by this Government. Why, Sir, we know that the very moment that these half-breeds took up arms against the Government, this incompetent, this incapable, this imbecile Government, white with terror at the results of their own misconduct in the past, hurriedly set to work to investigate those grievances, and redress the wrongs which, for seven long years, they refused to redress. The fact, Sir, that grievances existed has been shown by my hon.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

friend the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier). The fact can be shown by a mass of testimony that is simply startling. It can be shown by the independent press, by the press supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, by the official records of Parliament, by the returns which have been brought down to the House by order of the House; and I say, when all these fix the responsibility on the shoulders of the Government, there is no shirking that responsibility. Let us see what the independent press of this country has said as to the responsibility of Ministers. The Winnipeg Sun says:

"There has been too much of this carpet-bagging business in the North-West, and to incompetent administration and delusive reports much of the present difficulty may be ascribed. Had the representatives of the Government in the North-West fully informed it, or taken the trouble to inform themselves of the real state of feeling there, measures for an enquiry into alleged wrongs would long ere this have been instituted, and preparations to meet an outbreak, which has been threatened for months back, would not have been deferred until the uprising took place."

The Montreal Post says, speaking of the Bill of Rights presented by the half-breeds:

"This Bill was presented to the Government at Ottawa, but it appears no action was taken upon it. This indifference to their demands has caused discontent to ripen into open revolt."

And then the Montreal Herald, the organ of the Independent party, with strong leanings towards the Government, says:

"If the Department of the Interior is not to remain a scandal to the Government, the Premier will find a new head for this, one of the most important branches of the Government operations. But this mismanagement does not justify the half-breed troubles; if it did, the whole country would be in revolt, and not a handful of half-breeds only, but several millions of people, would rise in rebellion."

The Montreal Post further says:

"It is for all these reasons that we hold that the interests of law and order should be tempered by an acknowledgment of acquired rights, and by a clemency compatible with the guarantees of the peace of the country in the future. Even at this late hour we believe that the Métis would lay down their arms, without any recourse to violence being necessary, if they could be persuaded that their claims would be honestly and fully investigated by an impartial commission, and granted wherever found legitimate. It is to the interests of the Confederation that this insurrection be brought to an end, without any fighting, if possible. We want no baptism of blood, as some of our warlike orators have yearned for, especially when it would be made to flow from the veins of our own people."

And then, Sir, let us see what the Conservative press, supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, the press that never wavers in its support, except, perhaps, when the life and the vitality of the nation are concerned. The Toronto Mail, before it was instructed to shift its ground, and place the responsibility, if possible, on the shoulders of the Liberal party, said:

"The half-breeds in the St. Laurent district complain that the Dominion has treated them badly and we think it has—"

Mr. MACKINTOSH. What was the date?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). If the hon. gentleman is curious on the subject, he will find it there.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Was it correspondence?

Mr. CAMERON. No. The date is the 24th March, 1885.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Editorial?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am not sure; but I suppose the Mail is responsible for what appears in its columns. It is an editorial, if that will gratify the hon. gentleman; I believe it is—in fact, I know it is.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). You have just said you did not know.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Last March the Mail said that "the half-breeds of the St. Laurent district complain that the Dominion has treated them badly, and we think it has." Why did the Dominion Government treat them badly? What was the cause of it? What was the ground of complaint? What were their grievances? Sir, if they had grievances, which were not rectified, the Mail was justified in saying that they were treated badly. There is a paper called La Minerve, edited, I understand, by a distinguished member of Parliament, not a supporter of the Opposition, not in sympathy with the Opposition, a trusted friend of the Government. Let us see what the editor of that paper says upon this question:

"If their grievances have not been redressed before this, fault lies with the Interior Department, and especially with certain autocrats of small dimensions, such as are always found in this Department. The Department of the Interior, against whom they rise, is, to speak frankly, the cause of these disturbances. It depended upon it to have had all these difficulties arranged long ago. It has preferred to treat the Métis like pariahs, preferring even Mennonites to those who were the first settlers of the country. Let the Department of the Interior bear the responsibility of its own actions."

When we find this devoted friend and supporter of the Government, as late as last March, pointing out to the Government in the strongest possible language, that half-breeds who had taken up arms, against this Government, were not to blame, that the blame and the responsibility for the insurrection rested with the Department of the Interior, and certain autocrats of small dimensions in that Department, is there any difficulty in fixing the responsibility for this outbreak upon the proper shoulders? The Winnipeg Times, as far back as August, 1884, said:

"Among a small band of half-breeds in the Prince Arthur settlement there is a feeling of dissatisfaction with the conditions offered them by the Government agents with regard to homesteads."

The Saskatchewan Herald, of the 9th February last, before the insurrection broke out, said:

"That the Government should promptly recognise the claims of half-breeds, as was done in the Province of Manitoba, and thus determine a question calculated to disturb the present development of the country."

That paper is taken in the office of the Department of the Interior, and the head and the officials of that Department must have been conversant with it. Another paper I quote from is called La Presse. I am told it is an organ of a prominent member of the Administration—that it lives and moves and has its being by the smiles and support and the aid of the hon. Secretary of State. Let us see what this Minister has to say in this question:

"In the first place, we must have a Minister of the Interior who has the vigor necessary for the discharge of the duties of his office, and not, as we have had for a year past a valetudinarian, who believes that he has done his duty by adjourning the settlement of every difficulty."

That is the opinion of the organ of the hon. Secretary of State, speaking of one of his own colleagues. Another paper, which I believe is also controlled and inspired by the same worthy official, L'Événement, says:

"We have no wish for recrimination; far less have we the least desire to justify rebellion. On the contrary, we demand that order be re-established by the most vigorous measures of which the resources of Canada will admit. But we should, at the same time, fail in our duty if we did not express our wish to see Sir John very soon inviting a younger and more active element to take part in the management of public affairs. On this point the sentiment of the country is all but unanimous, and the Premier will take account of this if he show his ordinary adroitness. At this moment the vital energies of the Conservative party are inactive, to the certain injury of that party as well as of Canada."

Such are the opinions of the press controlled by a member of the Government. This paper declare that sir John A. Macdonald, the First Minister of this Dominion, is surrounded by officials who, are unfit for their places, and the interests of the Conservative party are suffering in consequence. Not a word about the interests of the unfortunate half-breeds of the North-West Territories. Let us see what the paper controlled by the junior member for the city of Ottawa says on this subject:

"We must take into consideration the impatience and soreness of these poor people, so long neglected, forgotten, despised and scoffed at. The Department of the Interior, against whom they rise, is, to speak frankly, the cause of these disturbances. It depended upon it to have all these difficulties arranged long ago. It has preferred to treat the Métis like pariahs, preferring even the Mennonites to those who were the first settlers of the country. Let the Department of the Interior bear the responsibility of its own actions."

And yet, Sir, the hon. First Minister of this Dominion sits in this House, and declares that the half-breeds have no grievances and that he has no responsibility, while his own organs, written for or inspired by his own supporters, to his right, to his left, and behind him, declare in the face of day, that if there has been an insurrection in the North-West Territories, and life has been lost and blood spilt, upon the shoulders of the Administration of the day must rest the responsibility. Let us see what the Mail newspaper says on this subject:

"Of course, it must be obvious that men do not take up arms, and fight and kill, and risk being hanged and shot, like Riel and his followers, without, at least, a conviction that they have grievances. These grievances will have to be heard some day, and the sooner the public understands them the better."

So say I. So says every man in Canada to-day, who looks over the western horizon and sees the difficulties, the trials, the hardships, the blood and the death of these half-breeds. Had hon. gentlemen been alive to the gravity of the situation, and investigated those grievances and redressed those wrongs, there would have been no rebellion. The Mail newspaper truly says that men do not take up arms and risk being shot or hanged for nothing. Where there is smoke you may rest pretty well assured there is same fire, where there is a rebellion you may rest pretty well assured there is something to provoke a rebellion. The Winnipeg Times, speaking on the same subject, on the 27th of March last, says:

"The half-breeds will be well satisfied, however, if they obtain the patents for the farms which they have been cultivating all these years, with grants of 240 acres for those among them who have not taken up lands. M. Ouseigneur Grandin, the Roman Catholic Bishop of that region, supports the Bill of Rights to that extent, and so do the vast majority of the English-speaking settlers."

Up to the very eve of the breaking out of the rebellion this Government remained inactive, never moved. Had they only conceded to the half-breeds what they are prepared to concede to them now, the half-breeds would at once have laid down their arms. Let us see what L'Étendard, another organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, says on this subject:

"But still we must look for the causes of the rising * * * Their attitude may not be justifiable, but may yet be excusable, at least, in a measure. It is always permissible, and sometimes it is a matter of equity, and even a duty, to plead extenuating circumstances. Their cause may be a much better one than it looks at first sight. They are, perhaps, hated for their French origin and their Catholic faith. It is not impossible that they have been persecuted for our sakes. These are two reasons that should make it a duty of honor and loyalty for us to accept a share of fellowship in their situation."

The correspondent of the Mail, writing from Batoche, the scene of the recent engagement, on the 23rd June, with the facts before his eyes, writes as follows, with respect to the negligence of the Government:—

"I am not trying to excuse the Government's procrastination and delay in appointing the commission, but simply stating the fact, well known to every loyalist here, that the real authors of the insurrection were intelligent white men, possessed, to an inordinate degree, by the evil spirit of partisanship."

So clear was the negligence, the misconduct of the Administration, that even the correspondent of the Mail would not undertake to justify the delay of the Government in appointing the commission, and the Mail correspondent, on the same day, again says:

"Non issue of scrip to half-breeds. I have no hesitation in saying that the half-breeds of the North-West are equally entitled to scrip as were those in Manitoba; and it was unfortunate that the Government commission was so long delayed."

La Minerve further says:

"We condemn the behavior and actions of Riel and his companions. But on the other hand we must not exaggerate their range, while it is necessary to acknowledge the fact that the grievances of the Métis are serious. If their grievances have not been redressed before this, the fault lies with Messieurs of the Department of the Interior, and especially with certain autocrats of small dimensions, such as are always found in this Department."

And then La Minerve quotes from the Mail newspaper, in which it is acknowledged that, from the treatment the Indians received, it was not to be wondered at if they should become turbulent. La Minerve goes on to say :

"In reference to the claims discussed at the end of the last paragraph, our confère adds that 'the Department of the Interior is busy arranging these, but this takes times.' It would undoubtedly have taken a good deal less time if it had concerned the Icelanders, the Russian Menonites, and the other hordes imported at a great expense, at our expense, into the Canadian North-West, that North-West discovered, founded, colonised and peopled by the ancestors of those very rebels whom these people now wish to treat in such a high-handed fashion.

"Our Toronto confère (the Mail), as we have seen, is far from thinking the claims of the Métis unjust or unreasonable. Quite the contrary. It explains, and explains perfectly, the legitimate grievances. All the mischief, however, it thinks, has arisen from this, that these poor people, so ill-treated, driven to desperation, 'losing patience,' to use the phrase of the Mail—losing patience after having waited so long in the expectation of getting justice—have overpassed legal limits. But, again we repeat, they have not been the only offenders, and the Department of the Interior would be better employed in crying mea culpa than in counselling the despatch of troops to massacre the rebels.

"We are not in the Soudan, thank God, and they are in the wrong who wish to treat the Métis as if they were the disciples of the Mahdi."

The correspondent of the Mail at Batoche, on the 22nd of June, 1885, says :

"The Métis were in the gloomy frame of mind I have tried to depict, and the Interior Department exasperated them still more by neglecting to comply with their legitimate demand for scrip or homesteads."

The Mail newspaper correspondent here published to the world that the Department exasperated these men by the refusal to consider their claims or to give them the scrip they were entitled to—by refusing to deal with them fairly and justly. Such are the opinions of the independent press of the country, with respect to the condition of the half-breeds in the North-West, and such are the opinions expressed by the press of hon. gentlemen, with respect to these grievances, and the action of the Government in relation thereto. What did the Government do, with regard to these complaints of the half-breeds? Did the Government investigate them? or settle them? Did the Government rectify the wrongs? adjust the grievances? No, Sir; they did nothing of the kind. It was only when uneasiness, dissatisfaction and discontent assumed the most threatening attitude; it was only when the half-breeds were on the eve of breaking out into open rebellion; it was only when the half-breeds, unable to secure redress for their grievances, sought the aid of Riel, their old commander and leader; it was only when Riel, traitor as he was, was induced by the half-breeds to leave the United States and lead them—it was only when all these things occurred that this incompetent Government aroused itself and then only partially, to a true sense of the danger of the situation. What did the Government do? Instead of appointing a man competent to adjust these claims and redress these wrongs, they appointed a man who, as the First Minister admitted the other day, though he might be a good man, in many respects, was utterly unfit for the position. He could not speak a word of French or Cree, and yet he was sent to make an enquiry into the grievances of the French half-breeds of the North-West Territories. He reported, 21st October:

"The claims at St. Laurent, on the south branch of the Saskatchewan, were not personally investigated by me, as the greater portion of the claimants spoke only French, and I would have required an interpreter."

This was an extraordinary thing for the First Minister to do. If the First Minister desired to have these grievances investigated, honestly and promptly, he ought not to have appointed a man to investigate them who could not speak a word of Cree or French. Mr. Pearce, more honest than those who employed him, admitted his incompetency. What did the Government do? They did nothing. What the Government ought to have done, what men of judgment would have done, was to have sent to investigate these claims a Frenchman, or a half-breed, a man who understood the temper, the peculiarities and the prejudices of the half-breeds. A man who could conciliate the half-breeds, a man in whom the half-breeds had confidence could have settled these claims in a week. But the golden moment was lost. Mr. Pearce made a report on the 21st October. Even then the First Minister did nothing. From the 21st October to the 19th March, when the rebellion broke out, the Government did not take the first step to enquire into the truth of the report, or take the first steps to investigate these grievances and redress these wrongs. It was only after the rebellion broke out, it was only after human life had been lost and human blood spilt, that they acted, by appointing a commission. But it was too late. Life was lost, blood was spilt; and in the words of the venerable Archbishop of St. Boniface: it was too late, too late, too late.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman who leads the Government to-night, should consent to an adjournment of the debate, as the the hour is late, and my hon. friend has still a good deal to say on the subject.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon. gentleman had better go on and finish his speech.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am prepared to go on with my speech, but at this late hour I think we ought to adjourn, and I have no doubt that in any case the debate will be concluded to-morrow.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I understand that there are other members besides the hon. member for Huron who are to speak on this question, and we have no guarantee at all that we will finish to-morrow.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). It is unreasonable to attempt to force on the discussion to-night. I think three days is not too much to give to such an important question.

Mr. MILLS. The proposition for an adjournment is reasonable. This is a motion of censure upon the conduct of the Administration, and surely the latter do not want to force it on at this time of the morning. I do not know that there are many to speak on this side.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government do not desire to choke off discussion, but are anxious to have the decision of the House; and I think it is only fair that the hon. member should be allowed to finish his speech now.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not want to finish it now. I will undertake to be as brief as possible to-morrow. I will not take half or quarter of six hours, but I feel it is unjust to force me to go on now.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not want to be unreasonable, but the Session has been so protracted that we must be careful not to lose time. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman will see, with us, that the discussion will be completed to-morrow night?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). For myself, as a humble member of the Opposition, my whole desire is that it should, and I believe it will, from what I have heard.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that can be done, on the understanding that the speeches on the Government side should be of moderate length. In that case, I have no doubt that we can close the debate to-morrow. I agree entirely with the hon. member that it is very desirable the Session should come to a close, but I do not think myself that we could very fairly say that three days for the discussion of this question were too much.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think, if it were understood on both sides of the House that the discussion should be brought to a close to-morrow night, we might agree to adjourn. I think that is fair. Therefore, whether the hon. gentleman finishes his speech this evening or not, it will not make much difference, if he finishes it to-morrow. Therefore, we will say that to-morrow this discussion shall come to a close, and we will take a vote and go into committee.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed, to and the House adjourned at 1:30 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 8th July, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. GIROUARD. I rise to a question of privilege. In the report in the Montreal Times of the debate of last night, it is stated:

"Mr. Girouard followed, speaking for six hours. He said nothing in particular, and it was said his speech was made in consequence of a wager that he could speak as long as Mr. Blake."

When the hon. member for West Huron spoke last evening I happened to be absent at the time he made this statement. The statement is altogether untrue, and upon its face it has the appearance of falsehood. I am astonished the hon. gentleman should have started that statement. I have nothing to add.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has not stated a question of privilege, as he should have done. All questions of privilege should, strictly speaking, be concluded with a motion. The hon. gentleman has not stated what the question of privilege is.

Mr. GIROUARD. It may not be a question of privilege, but it is a personal explanation.

Mr. BLAKE. Order.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I never made the statement.

Mr. BLAKE. I rise to order. If the hon. gentleman wishes to correct any statement the hon. member for West Huron has made, so soon as that hon. gentleman has concluded his speech the hon. member will be in a position to do it.

Mr. BOWELL. When the Orders of the Day are called every member has a right to call attention to any inaccuracy or misstatements which may have been made. I am not surprised that the leader of the Opposition should try, in a case of this kind, to prevent a member from correcting a statement which has gone forth to the world, that the hon. gentleman made a bet that he would make a speech longer than the hon. member for West Durham.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Girouard) cannot now correct the statement made by the hon. member for West Huron. He should wait until the hon. gentleman has concluded his speech. It is not a question of privilege to rise, on the Orders of the Day being called, and proceed to correct a statement made by an hon. member, but on the conclusion of the hon. gentleman's speech the hon. gentleman can make a personal explanation.

Mr. GIROUARD. The statement has already gone to the press, and that is the reason why I made the explanation.

Mr. BLAKE. I cannot allow the statement of the Minister of Customs to pass without replying to it. I have in no way endeavored to prevent the hon. gentleman making a statement. I declared his statement was out of order, and that such an explanation could only be made when the hon. member for West Huron had concluded his speech; and therefore, so far from seeking to prevent the hon. gentleman making an explanation at the proper time, I was pointing out the proper time to make it.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman has no right to reply.

Mr. ORTON. I rise to a question of privilege. I feel, as a private member of this House, that I have a serious grievance to complain of, in regard to the very subject brought up just now. I maintain that the course pursued by the leader of the Opposition, not only on this but on other occasions, and followed also by other hon. members, of reading extracts from newspapers, from country newspapers, whose opinions are of no importance to this House, which course is a gross breach of privilege—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is not in order.

Mr. ORTON. If I am not in order, I will move the adjournment of the House, in order to speak on this question. It is a matter of the greatest importance. The representatives of the people are not sent here to remain on the back benches and listen to long extracts read by members of the House. It is a gross breach of the privileges of the House when such a course is pursued. It has been pursued, not only by the leader of the Opposition, in one instance, but on many occasions. We have seen the hon. gentleman read whole speeches. Not only has the example of the leader of the Opposition been followed by members on his own side, but I regret to say that the same course has been followed, in some instances, by members sitting on this side. I do not refer more to members on one side than on the other side, except that the grievance complained of has occurred more from the Opposition benches than from this side of the House. I was not present during the discussion on the Franchise Bill; but from the proceedings which I read in Hansard, I find that the business of the House was obstructed by reading from books, by members getting books out of the Library and reading them for a length of time. I maintain that on such a question as this, relating to the North-West troubles, it is important to have the views of members who are, perhaps, more intimately connected with the North-West than is the leader of the Government or other members who have spoken. But they are debarred, and will not have an opportunity of speaking. The member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) said that all the time he would occupy was one quarter of that occupied by the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard). But after speaking one hour and a-half he moved the adjournment of the House, in order that he might commence again. If we can judge from the large bundle of documents I have seen him dragging round the House to-day, we must expect to have to submit—if he is allowed to go on—to hearing extracts read again for three or four hours. I maintain this is a gross wrong on Parliament. The Marquis of Salisbury, the other day, in making a statement in regard to the foreign policy of the British Empire, occupied only half an hour. It is a well known fact that in the British House of Commons it is not usual for the leader of the Government to make long speeches, or even for the leader of the Opposition to make outrageously long speeches. If members cannot say all they desire to say in one hour, they have a very bad case. If it requires seven hours for the leader of the Opposition to prove charges of wrong-doing against the Government, it is the strongest evidence that his case was a bad one, and required no end of subtle logic to give even the appearance of wrong-doing on the part of the Government. I desire to say something upon this question; and as I shall never have another opportunity, I intend to seize the opportunity thus afforded to speak on the question of the North-West troubles. I know, if I do not speak now —

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think it is in order to interrupt a speech which is going on. The member for Centre Wellington said he was going to move the adjournment of the House, otherwise his remarks would not have been in order.

Mr. ORTON. I move the adjournment of the House, seconded by Mr. Hesson.

Mr. GIROUARD. I only wish to add one word upon this motion. As I was out of order it appears, a moment ago, I rise for the sole purpose of stating that what the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) said yesterday, and what the newspapers have said, that I had made a bet to speak as long as Mr. Blake, is untrue and absurd.

Motion lost.

Mr. DAWSON. I beg leave to draw the attention of the House to an article which appeared in the Port Arthur Herald of the 27th of June, affecting two members of this House, and as it is short, I shall read it:

"We publish below a letter just received from Mr. Macmaster, the representative of Glengarry, and the gentleman who had so much to say the other day in the discussion on the Franchise Bill, about the Highlanders of Scotland. It will be seen that even he, Tory as he is, is trying to get justice done us by the Dominion Government. It seems that Mr. Dawson who has been sent to represent us in the councils of this Dominion, has very little to say or do for us.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, OTTAWA, 19th June, 1885.

'JAMES CONNIE, Esq., Port Arthur, Ont.

"MY DEAR CONNIE.—Your favor of the 8th instant has been duly received. As you seemed very urgent, I immediately saw Mr. Dawson, and after discussing with him for some time on the prospects of the late disputed territory, touching upon the question of the Thunder Bay Railway you mentioned, at which Mr. Dawson rather laughed. He appeared to be free in the discussion, and when asked what were the prospects of its being built, shook his head and remarked that money was too scarce for any more railway building for a number of years. I asked him why the Dominion Government was not asked to grant aid. To this he said it is useless to expect anything while they are so oppressed with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the late rebellion in the North West. I asked him also if he had discussed the matter with the Minister of Railways, Mr. Pope. He evaded the question, remarking that there was not much use talking to the Dominion Ministers about provincial matters, and expressed himself as though he thought that the only source from which aid would be given would be the Province, as that was the proper source from which to receive it, it being a provincial road. He appeared to regret the action of our Government in passing the Act of 1883. This, I think, gives you an idea as you requested, of Mr. Dawson's position as regards your little railway, and I will add myself, that he is utterly powerless to assist in obtaining money or credit for a road, at Ottawa.

"I am pleased to hear of your entrance into politics, but I am sorry to find you in the Grit camp, as I was always under the impression that you were strictly neutral, or had Conservative leanings. However, it will not destroy the old friendship that has existed between us so long.

"I am exceedingly anxious to get away home, this Session seems interminable.

"Yours very truly,

"L. McMASTER."

Now, Mr. Speaker, with reference to this letter, I have simply to say that no such conversation as therein indicated ever occurred between the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McMaster) and myself. The hon. member for Glengarry is now in his place, and he will be able to explain what the character of the letter is.

Mr. MACMASTER. Mr. Speaker, this letter is entirely a novelty to me. The only portion with which I am in entire sympathy is: "I am exceedingly anxious to go home, this Session seems interminable. I may say that this letter was not written by me. I had no conversation with the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) or with the Hon. Mr. Pope, respecting the subject matters of this letter, and it is, indeed, a combination of fiction, falsehood and forgery, from beginning to end.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). The Ottawa Free Press of yesterday has the following:—

"Two of the Cabinet members are related to men who obtained an Order in Council granting to them the very lands to which the half-breeds sealed their belief in their just claims, by shedding their life's blood. The names of the promoters of the Prince Albert colonisation company and the Cabinet Minister who passed the Order in Council granting them the half-breeds lands with the right of ejection, will go down to all time as fit terms for the hissing and reproach of posterity."

In the first place, let me just say that so far as the Prince Albert Colonisation Company is concerned, the names of the parties connected with the company are all in the Order in Council. The company obtained the lands some three years ago. They gave the Government, I think, 20,000 and some odd dollars. The land, when they got it, was not surveyed; they did not take possession of the land, but they sent in an agent there. They knew nothing about the settlers being on the lands, until Mr. Stephenson, the Government inspector of colonisation companies, went up there and made a report to the Government, that there were some thirty settlers on the land. As soon as the company learned that, they called their members together, and they appointed a committee to wait on the Minister, which was done. That committee was composed of Mr. Hugh Sutherland, President of the company; N. B. Falkner, barrister, Belleville; Mr. David Gilmore of Trenton, and myself. We had nothing whatever to do with negotiating with any of the persons there; we were willing to leave that entirely in the hands of the Government. The company said: We are so earnest in this matter that we will take back our money without interest, or we will take lands in some other section of the country at a fair price. That was the statement made to the Minister. There has been nothing done in regard to those settlers; and I say there is no half-breed, or Indian, or Englishman, or Irishman, or Scotchman—there is no living man can say that the Prince Albert Colonisation Company, directly or indirectly, insulted them or put them off, or interfered with them in any way. So far as I am personally concerned, I can wait until Mr. Sutherland the Member for Selkirk, is here, when he can make a statement publicly of my connection with the company, and then hon. gentlemen will see that we have done nothing, directly or indirectly, that is unfair or unjust to the House of Commons, to the Government, to the country, or to the parties in that section of the country. I make this statement, and I hope it will satisfy the leader of the Opposition. I am quite willing to wait and risk my reputation for the next 12 months that Mr. Sutherland will endorse it if he is, at the end of that time, a member of the House. The men who sent me here know me, and I leave all to them; and I hope that any gentleman who doubts my statement will go over to the Department and ascertain for himself whether it is correct or not. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to make this statement.

Mr. McLELAN. May I be allowed, on behalf of the Cabinet Minister who is charged with instructing the Company to eject persons from lands held by colonisation companies, to deny that charge, and to say that no such authority has ever been given either to the Prince Albert Colonisation Company, or to any other colonisation company, either by the Minister of the Interior or by any other Cabinet Minister, or by the Cabinet as a Whole. The instructions are the very reverse, that people must not be disturbed when they are found settled on colonisation companies' lands.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant). I desire to rise to a question of privilege. I find the following article in the Ottawa Citizen of this morning:

"Mr. James Somerville, M.P., is never happy unless when playing the sneak and the spy in the hope of injuring his brother journalists. In the House of Commons the other day he took up the question of Government printing, which he dealt with in his characteristically disingenuous way. Among the journals that received attention at his hands was the Hamilton Spectator. He charged that the Spectator had been paid for work it never performed, and with receiving double prices for presswork. The Spectator replies under the heading, 'A Common Slanderer':

"Somerville says what he knows to be false. Double prices were not paid for presswork. The Spectator was paid at prices fixed by the Mackenzie Government. The Spectator was not paid for presswork never performed; and Somerville does not believe or think it was. Ten cents is not the price paid for any presswork under any Government contract whatever; and Somerville knows it is not. The man is a deliberate falsifier; and only hopes to commend himself to the Grits of Auncaster by libelling respectable people."

Now, if these statements were true, I think you will agree with me that they would be sufficient to discredit anything I might say in this House at any future time; but I wish to show, in as few words as possible, that there is not one word of truth in the statement made by the Hamilton Spectator. I will just analyse the paragraph as shortly as possible. In the first place—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman's word will be taken by the House. I think this is not a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman will see that it will open up a debate.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant). I have the contract here, and I shall quote just one line.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can do that on a motion for adjournment, or on some motion before the House; but the hon. gentleman's statement is quite sufficient for the House, and will be accepted by the House.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant). I will take another opportunity to do so.

Mr. EDGAR. I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPEAKER. That motion cannot be put; it has just been put. The hon. gentleman may bring up the matter to-night when the motion for adjournment is made. It will be in order then.

Mr. BOWELL. It was not my intention to pay the slightest attention to the reference made by the leader of the Opposition to myself in connection with this matter of the Prince Albert colonisation company had not my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. White) brought it under the notice of the House. I desire, however, to put the hon. gentleman right so far as Mr. Jamieson and myself are concerned. I wish it to be distinctly understood, at the same time, that I do not desire the House to think that the statement made by the hon. gentleman was from his own knowledge, but upon information which is not correct. I understand the disingenuous way in which Mr. Jamieson's name was introduced, as well as that of the Minister of Customs. I desire to say on behalf of Mr. Jamieson that he had nothing to do with the selecting of the land. After the Order in Council was obtained, he paid $500 in cash to a gentleman who was interested in the company for whatever rights he had. When the company was organised, I spoke to him in reference to the matter, and having some interest in the young gentleman, I advised him by all means to get out of the company as fast as he could, and if he could get his money out, the sooner he did it the better for himself pecuniarily. That is my connection with that company, and if it was a crime for me to advise one in whom I took some interest not to have anything to do with the colonisation company, I am quite willing to bear all the odium attached either to the formation of the company or the advice I gave to Mr. Jamieson. I am not prepared to deny that I did not know that the company was being organised. I necessarily knew that, having been a member of the Government when the order was passed.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to enquire of the Minister of Customs whether the view expressed by the Premier the other day with respect to the effect of the recent regulation published by the American authorities, has been confirmed; or has he any other information on the subject?

Mr. BOWELL. I have been making enquiry with reference to the effect of that order on the trade of the country. I telegraphed to Washington for a correct copy of the order, which has not yet been received; but from the information we can obtain, the telegraphic despatch has no other bearing on the trade of the country than that which the leader of the Government stated, that is, that it repeals, so far as we can understand it, that portion of the Washington Treaty, which gave the right to shippers in vessels from American ports in the west, to tranship their cargo at the west end of the Welland Canal, and have it reshipped to the east on board vessels for American ports. Under the old regulations, and under the coasting law, that action was considered by the American authorities to be a breach of the coasting law; but under the Washington Treaty special provision was given for the benefit of this trade to be carried on from the west to the eastern ports of the United States. I hope, however, to be able to-morrow, or next day, to give a positive answer to the question.

Mr. BLAKE. I doubt whether that is done under the Washington Treaty; I think it was an executive regulation of the United States after the Washington Treaty had been made. I suppose it was a spontaneous manifestation of good will by the American Government after the treaty was made, as I suppose the withdrawing of the regulation is an expression of the same good will. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he will be prepared to-day to lay on the Table all the correspondence with the Newfoundland Government on the subject of the recent interruption in our trade relations, which has taken place partly by our action and partly by their action. It seems to me it is very important we should have that correspondence at the earliest possible date. The subject has been in agitation, more or less, for several months; in fact, ever since our legislation which created this reciprocal hostile legislation. I cannot conceive there should not have been some communications earlier than July or June, and at any rate there has been, within the last few days, correspondence resulting in the effort, by the suspension of the duty which our Government has imposed, to restore friendly trade relations. We should have all the papers before us, so that we may have an opportunity of looking at them before the Session closes. I hope also we will have no further delay in the presentation of papers concerning the fisheries. It was stated that His Excellency would return to-day, and I trust the delay, which has been very great in the production of the papers, will not be protracted one instant more than necessary.

Mr. BOWELL. I cannot say when I will be able to lay on the Table correspondence between the Newfoundland and this Government. I believe there has been no correspondence other than that by telegraph. In reference to the fishery papers, I will call the First Minister's attention to the matter. They will be laid on the Table as soon as possible, according to the promise made by the First Minister.

WAYS AND MEANS—NORTH-WEST INSURRECTION

House resumed adjourned debate on motion of Mr. Bowell to go into Committee on Ways and Means, and motion of Mr. Blake in amendment thereto.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Before the adjournment I pointed out that the half-breeds of the North-West

Territory had grievances which existed for years, grievances which the Government of this country had over and over again neglected to redress; grievances which the Government knew had existed for at least seven long weary years; grievances which the Government had promised, over and over again, to redress, until hope deferred had made the heart of the half-breed sick, until, despairing of getting redress at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, the half-breeds took up arms against the sovereign power of the Dominion; grievances which the Government neglected to investigate until that neglected culminated in open rebellion. It is true the hon. the Secretary of State, in his letter of the 6th of June last, addressed to the Frenchmen of Fall River, in the State of Massachusetts, contained this declaration:

"If the half-breeds had serious grievances against the Canadian Government the ordinary channel of petition was open to them as to all free citizens. They did not avail themselves of it. If their petitions were not listened to by the Government, they had the right, as free citizens, to enter upon a constitutional agitation, and to induce their friends in Parliament to make known their grievances, their abandonment, their protestation. They did not do this. They knew they had devoted friends in the Privy Council, in the House, in the press; they did not appear to apply to them, nor for their support."

In this letter the Secretary of State exhibits an extraordinary—an unpardonable amount of ignorance, with respect to the condition of the half-breeds in the North-West Territories, with respect to their claims, with respect to their grievances, with respect to their long and persistent efforts to induce the Government to investigate their grievances and to redress their wrongs. The Secretary of State is steeped to the very lips in ignorance on this subject, in ignorance as to the countless petitions, remonstrances and memorials that the half-breeds of the North-West Territories had, for the period of seven years, presented, year in and year out, in season and out of season, to the Government of Canada. The hon. gentleman, in his letter, part of which I have just read, poses as a friend of the half-breeds. He said that in the Privy Council there are friends of the half-breeds, that he himself is a friend of the half-breeds; and yet that hon. gentleman, up to the 6th of June last, knew absolutely nothing of the condition of the half-breeds, his own friends, knew absolutely nothing of the grievances of the half-breeds, his own friends, knew absolutely nothing of the demands of the half-breeds, his own friends, knew absolutely nothing of their claims, petitions and memorials, many of which have been submitted to Parliament, and all of which are teeming with petitions unanswered, memorials treated with contempt remonstrances unheeded wrongs unredressed. This friend of the half-breeds, this hon. gentleman, high in the council of his Sovereign, who ought to know something of the condition of public affairs, and who was bound to listen to the complaints and the grievances of his friends the half-breeds, knows absolutely nothing about their condition. He says there were no petitions, no memorials, no agitation. This young, aspiring, ambitious, Minister of the Crown, who abandoned the politics of his own native Province to obtain a seat in the Parliament of Canada and a seat at Her Majesty's Privy Council Board in the Dominion, was too careless, too neglectful of the interest of his friends to examine the mass of documents, petitions, memorials and remonstrances which were to be found in the office of his own chief in order to make himself conversant with the claims of the half-breeds of the North-West Territories; he was too careless, too neglectful, too indifferent to their claims, to master the mass of documents dealing with this question which have been submitted to Parliament by the First Minister. When we find this trusted friend of the half-breeds so ignorant as to their claims and grievances; when we find him so reckless and careless as to their wrongs, need we be at all surprised that the half-breed should have taken up arms against the constituted authorities of the Dominion. As I pointed out the half-breeds of the North-West Territories had grievances which ought to have been considered and redressed. The hon. member for Jacques-Cartier, in his 6½ hours speech, admitted in the opening sentences, that the half-breeds had grievances; the leader of the Government admitted that they made many complaints, some of which were well founded. It has been established, as a fact, by a mass of testimony simply startling, that the half-breeds had grievances, the redress of which they have been persistently demanding and demanding in vain for seven long years. Passing from the half-breeds, I say that the white settlers had grievances which remained unredressed, and many of which were similar to the grievances of the half-breeds. They complained that their rights as settlers were not recognised by the Government; secondly, that settlement and improvements made prior to 1881, when the land office was opened in Prince Albert district, were not recognised by the Government; thirdly, they complained that for years, after all the settlements duties far in excess of the requirements of the law had been performed by the settlers, they could not get their patents; fourth, that their petitions and remonstrances and demands for redress were treated with indifference and silent contempt; fifth, they complained of the uncertain and vacillating and extraordinary policy pursued by the Department with reference to the claims of the settlers. Let us see what those claims were. I regret that I cannot gratify the hon. member for Centre Wellington; it is necessary, in the discussion of a case of this kind, to read extracts. I propose to read but few, taken from the public documents submitted to Parliament. I find, with respect to the claims of the white settlers in the Prince Albert district, in the Saskatchewan Valley and the neighboring districts, that the following facts exist. Prior to 1876, a large number of immigrants had settled on the lands in the Prince Albert district. Mr. Pearce, one of the Land Commissioners for the North-West, estimates the number at 300 settlers. Many of these settlers, if not all of them, settled upon their land in 1876, and between 1876 and the opening of the land office at Prince Albert in the middle of 1881. According to law, these settlers were entitled to have their claims recognised and their patents issued to them three years after they had occupied the land as actual and bona fide settlers. On the 29th November, 1879, Mr. Lindsay Russell, the Surveyor General, wrote to George Duck, the land agent at Prince Albert, directing him to post up a notice that squatting on land and improvements made on land should not precede entry in the land office, and that such squatting would not be recognised—in other words, that entry in the land office only would constitute a claim that the Government were bound to recognise. On the 12th September, 1881, two years after this order was posted up by Mr. Duck at Prince Albert, Mr. Burgess, now Deputy Minister of the Interior, wrote to Mr. Duck that the notice of the 28th November, 1879, was a mistake, and ought not to have been issued. It appears, on some incomprehensible reason known to no man, the law on the subject was misread and misunderstood in the Department of the Interior, and hence the issuing of the Order of the 29th November, 1879. This notice of the 12th September, 1881, that is the notice countermanding the notice of the 29th November, 1879, never reached the agent, or, if it did reach him, it was mislaid, and therefore he was not in a position to countermand the notice issued two years before. On the 25th October, 1882, exactly three years after the notice prohibiting settlement was posted up, the agent wrote to the Minister of the Interior that no settler had made application to him for a patent, because he would not be entitled to a patent under the Order of the 29th November, 1879, under which occupation only counted from the day upon which the entry was made. Under these absurd orders issued by the Department, no settler could obtain a patent for his land except at the expiration of three years from the day of his entry in the land office. The land might have been occupied for 20 years, improvements far in excess of those required by law might have been made, valuable improvements and valuable erections might have been made, and yet the settler, though living on the land for a period far in excess of the period required by law was not entitled to get his patent. I say this absurd order was not the fault of the settler. It was the fault of the Government; it was the fault of the Department of the Interior. These men remained upon their land, many of them, from 1876 down to 1881, when the office was opened. Some of them remain on their land up to this hour. But up to 1884, not one of these white settlers in the Prince Albert district could obtain from the Government a patent for the land. The incomprehensible policy which ruled the Department, the vacillating and uncertain action of the Minister, the changing and wholly inconsistent orders that issued from the Department, puzzled the agent at Prince Albert, and worried, harassed, and annoyed the actual settlers. In 1882, those outraged and aggrieved settlers petitioned the Government and complained that the land office was not opened at Prince Albert until the middle of 1881 and on that account entries could not be made; that a large number of settlers had located lands then surveyed; that these settlers had been then living on and cultivating these lands for years before the office opened; that they could not get their claims as settlers recognised and could not get their patents for 3 years after 1881 and praying for redress. They got no redress. For years their claims were treated with indifference and contempt by the Government of this country. On the 27th February, 1883, the agent at Prince Albert again drew the attention of the Government to the fact that these settlers could not get their patents owing to the notice of the 29th November, 1879, that settlement prior to entry did not count. Mr. Pearce, the land inspector, who appears to have been making some investigation on the subject, on the 12th September, 1883, presented a report to Mr. Walsh, the Chief Land Commissioner for the North-West, and in that report he states that there were about 300 settlers at Prince Albert whose occupation was prior to the opening of the land office, that these men could not get their titles on account of the notice of the 29th November, 1879, and he recommends that their claims should be recognised. He also pointed out that it was of the greatest possible importance to the settlers of that district, and in fact to the Government, to the peace and prosperity of the country, that these claims should be recognised. This report was transmitted to the Minister of the Interior by Mr. Walsh, on the 12th September, 1883, so that, at that early period, the Government had abundant notice of these claims. That they had this notice is manifest because, on the 18th October, 1883, the Secretary of the Department acknowledged the receipt of the letter and intimated that the notice of the 29th November, 1879, was all wrong, that the settlers were misled, and that on proof of settlement they were entitled to the issue of their patents. But nothing was done. The Government never moved or took the first step except to give that intimation. That the Government had abundant notice of these grievances of the early settlers at Prince Albert is shown by the fact that, on the 3rd October, 1881, the Saskatchewan Herald called the attention of the Government to those grievances. On the 8th October, 1881, a meeting of the settlers was held in which resolutions were passed setting forth the grievances, and these resolutions were transmitted to the Government. On the 9th October, 1883, the North-West Council complained that titles to land occupied over three years by actual settlers were not recognised by the Government. On the 21st January, 1884, a meeting of the settlers of Prince Albert was held to discuss the grievances. A petition was signed at that meeting and handed to Mr. Pearce, and was no doubt sent by him to the Government. In February, 1884, a meeting of settlers was held at Colleston's School House, and the proceedings were transmitted to the Government. But again I say that, through the incomprehensible policy which has guided the Department of the Interior, the claims of these white settlers were practically ignored. A correspondent of the Montreal Gazette, dealing with this subject says:

"The parties who have been on the lands for years have been unable, it is said to procure patents, and speculators and others who have given fees to persons who have influence have obtained deeds, and in many cases taken the lands over the heads of the first settlers, who had improved them for 15 or 18 years, and that was the real cause of the trouble."

My hon. friend from West Durham, pointed out as a typical case the case of Mr. Thomas Miller. It is a case of gross hardship. I think, if that is a typical case, one of 300, one need not be surprised if difficulty, uneasiness, dissatisfaction, turbulence and ultimately something more than turbulence did occur. I do not propose to discuss this point, because my hon. friend has referred to it at length so that the House understands it. Now, Sir, the Mail newspaper declared, not very long ago, that people do not take up arms without cause, that there must be some cause for an armed insurrection. People do not complain without cause; and you know, Mr. Speaker, in the words of a great French statesman, that whenever the people complain, the people are always in the right. Now, Sir, the fact that the people of the North-West Territories have been persistently, for the last seven or eight years, complaining of the inaction of this Government with reference to their condition proves pretty conclusively that the people of the North-West Territories have ground of complaint, and that those complaints are not of recent origin. I say that you cannot, upon the spur of the moment, in an instant of time, induce an intelligent class of settlers in any country to become turbulent, rebellious, and ultimately to take up arms against the constituted authorities. Now, we find that just about the time of the outbreak in the North-West Territories, the white settlers in the Calgary district, a district which is a very considerable distance from the scene of the late unfortunate disaster, held a public meeting complaining of the inaction of the Government of Canada in dealing with the complaints of the settlers. That meeting was held at the house of John Glen, eight miles from Calgary, and at that meeting an association was formed, called:

"The Alberta Rights Association, with the following as officers:—President, Samuel Livingstone; Vice-President, John Glenn; Secretary, S. W. Shaw. It was decided to demand from the Government the immediate settlement of land claims, the granting of representation, and the allowance of half-breed claims. The following telegram was sent to Sir John A. Macdonald:

"A meeting of settlers of this district was held to-day, at John Glen's. The meeting was called by private invitation. At such meeting the following resolution was passed unanimously: 'That whereas a number of townships about Calgary are not open for settlement which are now largely settled, and many of the settlers have resided on such lands over three years, and have made more than sufficient improvements to entitle them to patents, and have made repeated demands at the land office for entry, which has been refused; and, whereas leases cover a large tract of land, near Calgary, fit for settlement, and a number of settlers have settled on these leases; and, whereas a number of leases have been granted, and no cattle or sheep were put on them; and whereas it is absolutely necessary that this country be represented at Ottawa, without delay, as we are now governed by agents who are interested in misgoverning this country; and, whereas settlers cannot bring cattle in without paying duty, and leaseholders can do so without tax; be it resolved, that in the opinion of this meeting, it is necessary that all the townships about Calgary be immediately thrown open for homesteads and settlement, and that parties who have complied with the terms of the Dominion Lands Act as to residence and improvements have their patents granted immediately, and that all leases, the terms and conditions of which have not been complied with, be cancelled, and the land thrown open for homestead entry; and that all the lands suitable for agricultural purposes or leases now granted be thrown open for entry and settlement; also that the settlers importing cattle into the country be put on the same footing as leaseholders, and also, that this meeting regrets that the Bill introduced to give representation to the North-West Territory in the Dominion Parliament has been defeated, and would strongly impress upon the Government the absolute necessity of a Government measure being introduced and passed this present Session, having that object in view as the only means of quieting the present discontent among the settlers in the Territories, and of properly governing them, and that the Government, without taking a census, has sufficient information to warrant a measure for representation, and this meeting would press immediate action in this regard to prevent a repetition of the trouble which now unhappily exists in these Territories; and

It is further resolved, that the half-breeds in these Territories are entitled to, and should receive the same privileges as regards lands as have already been conceded to their brethren in Manitoba."

"I send this by the request of the meeting. A memorandum of grievances goes forward by next mail, with over two hundred signatures. In case of refusal of the demands, the question of resorting to arms and joining the half-breeds was moved. One speaker said that if we are refused we will get behind our Winchesters. The President said the only difference between a settler and a wild animal in this country was that the wild animal had a close season, whereas the settler was hunted at all seasons, either by the police, Government officials, or ranchmen. The half-breeds are greatly pleased with the resolutions, and intend to join the association. A manifesto is to follow the telegram to Sir John. This feeling has been maturing for some time, and it is believed to be more serious than it seems."

Sir, following up the proceedings of that meeting, a petition was prepared and transmitted to the Government at Ottawa, wherein it is urged by the petitioners :

"1. That we, Her Majesty's loyal subjects, residing in the North-West Territories of Canada, are entitled to the same rights and privileges as freemen, both in regard to the tenure of the soil, and representative institutions, as are enjoyed by our brethren in the other colonies of the empire.

"2. That these rights and privileges have hitherto been denied to us for, as we consider, very insufficient reasons.

"3. That some of us have been residing upon our homesteads, and have made improvements thereon, for a much longer period than that required by the provisions of the Dominion Lands Act, and have conformed to all the conditions thereof, but have as yet been unable to procure our patents, the result of which has been that settlers have been debarr'd and discouraged from making on their uncertain holdings the improvements necessary for their comfort and success, and we wish to impress in the most forcible manner upon the Government the irritating and mischievous result of this most unreasonable and unaccountable delay in giving legal ownership to those peaceable settlers who, by their assiduous compliance with the conditions of settlement, are entitled to the same. We require, therefore, from the Government, that patents for these lands be at once issued to those entitled to receive them.

"4. That large tracts of land in the district of Alberta are now nominally under lease (a considerable quantity of which is fit for agricultural purposes) the terms and conditions of which leases have not been complied with. We require that these leases be immediately cancelled, and the lands included in them, and also in all other leases already granted, upon which settlers may wish to locate, should be opened for entry and settlement.

"5. We are of opinion that the half-breeds of the North-West Territories are entitled to the same rights and privileges as have already been conceded to their brethren in Manitoba. And we most earnestly impress upon the Government the necessity of granting these privileges as the only way of removing the present discontent, and of quieting the disturbances which have already unhappily arisen in these Territories.

"6. We have heard with great regret of the rejection of a measure introduced into the Dominion Parliament providing for the representation of these Territories in that body, and we would wish strongly to impress upon the Government the fact that nothing short of immediate representation in Parliament will satisfy the people of these Territories.

Now, Sir, I say that the proceedings at this public meeting, held by British subjects, living under the British flag under the protection which the Government of this country are bound to afford them, are entitled to every consideration at the hands of this Government. So far as appears by the papers brought down, they have received no consideration at the hands of this Government. The Government have been inactive, they have not moved, they have done nothing, they have allowed these grievances to go uninvestigated and these wrongs to remain unredressed. I find that the correspondence of the Mail newspaper of the 17th April, 1885, which states :

"By far the most serious complaint, however, is based upon the idea that in some way or other the settler "has no show" with outsiders, who obtain possession of lands which he, as a squatter, has improved and built upon. This, I take it, is the core of all the discontent and disaffection among whites and half-breeds alike; but of the truth or falsity of it I am not in a position to speak from any personal knowledge."

The Toronto Telegram says :

"But we may be sure that all those who are discontented in the North-West are not half-breeds with fraudulent claims. Even white settlers have complained that they could not get their land patents, so many officials having fallen victims to the land fever."

Sir, it is quite clear from these papers, and from the statements I have read that the half-breeds in the North-West Territories have grievances that have remained unredressed, that settlers have had for a long series of years, grievances of the most important character, that the Government of the country failed to recognise or consider. I now proceed to discuss for a few moments another class of the population in the North-West Territories deserving the careful consideration of the Parliament of Canada—I refer to the Indians. I would not have entered at length upon the discussion of this question had not the hon. member who preceded me declared in his place in Parliament, that the Indians of the North-West Territories had been treated with the utmost consideration by the Government of this country, that they had no claims, no grievances, nothing to complain of, no wrongs to redress. Sir, I propose to make it abundantly clear that the Indians in the North-West Territories had a cause of complaint, that they did complain to this Government, and that the public press of the North-West Territories, writing in the interests of our common humanity, complained to this Government, that the Indians in many cases were starved to death, and in many cases, frozen to death through the negligence of this Government; that the Indian was neglected, robbed, and cheated, that he was swindled by the employes of this Government appointed to administer the affairs of this country in the North-West Territories, and that this misconduct was connived at by the Government. Sir, on the 14th March, 1884, the Moose Jaw News, writing of the condition of the Indians in that neighborhood says :

"In this connection the case of several Indian families in this vicinity may be cited. A friend driving by one, a few days ago, was given to understand that death had been in their midst. On entering the tepee a pitiable sight was discovered. Starvation was visible in their countenances, and a glance sufficed to show the cause of the warrior's death. One can hardly imagine how they had lived at all. The canvas of the tent was old and torn. Not a vestige of anything edible was to be seen, but a few rabbit-skins lying around showed what had composed their last meal. Everything in the way of blankets was under or over the dead braves. Around a cheerless fire were huddled an Indian and three or four squaws. They stated that they had been without food for two days, and appearances would go to prove the truth of their assertion. Can we in this enlightened age, allow scenes like this to take place in our midst without uttering an indignant protest to the proper authorities? Would these Indians have left their reserves, and run the risk of starvation if they were sure of being supplied with the necessities of life there?"

The Quebec Mercury says :

"Could this rising of the Indians in the North-West have been prevented? There is, at this early hour of the rebellion, a difference of opinion on the subject; but it does not prevent some from thinking that the Department of Interior at Ottawa, who have charge of the Indian reserves, must have been dreadfully dilatory in their attention to Indian and half-breed matters. * * * In this city there is a feeling among the English and French that the Indians had a grievance, and it should have been settled."

The Moose Jaw News, on the 13th June, 1884, discussing the injury inflicted by this Government on Chief Piapot in compelling him to remain on a swampy and unhealthy reserve and declining to change it for one of a more healthy character says :

"But even this will be utterly insufficient to wipe out the past. Its record will remain a foul blot in our history. The sufferings of the Indians in the Assiniboia reserves during the past winter are a burning shame to us, a lasting reproach to our Government. What would be thought of us in England, or in any other christian country, were it clearly understood that for weeks large bands of Indians, the wards of the nation, poor, wretched creatures, whose primitive sources of supply had been cut off by our invasion, and whom we were bound by solemn treaty, as well as by every consideration of justice and humanity, to feed and care for, were dying by scores, partly from semi-starvation and partly from disease resulting from the bad quality of the food supplied by the agents! It is no excuse to say that the facts were not known. Why were they not known? Were there not high officials whose first duty it was to know the facts? If it should prove that the want of knowledge, or to the fearful ravages of scurvy, were due in any degree to a petty economy which dispensed with the services of a competent medical inspector in order to save his fees, this would be an aggravation of the guilt of those responsible for it.

"We write thus strongly because we feel strongly on this subject. It is a subject on which every Canadian and every settler in the North-West in particular, is in duty bound to feel strongly. As we have before pointed out, the gravest issues, involving not only the paramount claims of humanity and right, but also the security of life and property, are wrapped up in the maintenance of friendly relations and good faith with the aborigines.

"We do not remember to have met with a settler from the neighborhood in which those events occurred, who has not sympathized with Piapot and admitted that, however wrong-headed and cantankerous the chief may have shown himself on other occasions, he is, in this instance, the injured party. We have returned to the matter because it is of the first importance that the record of last winter's treatment of the Indians should be thoroughly examined, and such measures taken as will render the recurrence of such scenes impossible."

Let anyone take up the Public Accounts, the report of Indian Affairs and the Mounted Police reports and he will see how those Indians were treated, whom the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Girouard) declared last night were well treated and had no ground of complaint, what will he find? He will find that the Indians were to get beef, for which the Government contracted with responsible men in the North-West at 13½ cents per lb., that the Government through their officials in the North-West supplied them with pork at 23 cents a lb. The Indians were to obtain beef which was contracted for at 13½ cents per lb., and yet because some friend of the Government had pork in the North-West which he wished to get rid of, the Government sanctioned the purchase of his pork for the Indians at 23 cents a lb. Yet we are told the Indians had nothing to complain of. The policy of starvation was the policy of the First Minister of the Dominion. He declared his policy was that the Indians should be reduced to submission by starvation. Four years ago in his place in Parliament the First Minister, with all the responsibilities of his high position resting on his shoulders, declared that the policy of his Government was one of reducing the Indians of the North-West to a state of submission by a state of starvation. I quote from the discussion on the Estimates, in 1880, the hon. gentleman's words:

"I must say, however, that it was a dangerous thing to commence the system of feeding the Indians."

It was not a dangerous thing to induce the Indians to surrender their possessory rights in the North-West, but it was a dangerous thing to continue to feed the Indians.

"So long as they know they can rely, or believe they can rely, on any source whatever for their food, they make no effort to support themselves. We have to guard against that, and the only way to guard against it is by being rigid, even stingy, in the distribution of food, and require absolute proof of starvation before distributing it."

That was the policy announced by the First Minister four years ago—that before food is distributed to Indians the Government must have positive proof that the Indians are in a condition verging on starvation. That indeed is the policy declared by the First Minister in his place in Parliament not long ago. The hon. gentleman said:

"When Louis Riel was sent for last summer, he was sent for by these poor people, suffering from hunger; because, while we went to a large expenditure in keeping them, we did not give them such a quantity of food as would make them hang around the different stations and become habitual beggars. We kept them on short rations, on short allowances, and we tried to force them—I am speaking now of the Indians—and we have forced them upon their reserves."

That was the policy. I say it is clear from the reports of the Department of Indian Affairs, by the Mounted Police reports and other official papers, as well as from the press, that the Indians have been systematically robbed and swindled by the officers and middlemen who furnished the supplies to the Indians. This fact has for years been well known to the Government, and no steps have been taken to remedy the wrong. As a general rule, the Indian is easily controlled, easily managed by those in whom he has confidence. Those who keep faith with the Indian can rely on him. But the moment you break faith with the Indian he becomes faithless, turbulent, treacherous, and rebellious, as we have seen in the recent outbreak. The Government have broken faith with the Indian. They induced him to surrender to the Crown his possessory rights to the North-West on the faith of certain promises made. Those promises have been violated. The Government agents have deceived the Indian, broken faith with him and lied to him, and in the recent outbreak we have seen the terrible results. The First Minister, the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, has been aware of this condition of things for years. The Government have been warned of the Indian discontent by officials, by the public press and in every possible way by residents of the North-West, and yet the Government did nothing to avert disaster and death to the whites surrounded by roving bands of uncivilised Indians. Take up the reports of the Indian Department and Mounted Police reports, and you will find abundant evidence of violated promises, breach of faith and gross fraud. And now, Sir, I will quote from the public reports brought to Parliament by hon. gentlemen opposite—from official sources, and I say if these reports can be relied upon, the condition of affairs in the North-West Territories with respect to the Indians, is a condition of affairs which would not be tolerated in any christian country. C. E. Denney, Indian agent, in his report for 1882, speaking of one Grant, an agent over the Sarcees and Stoneys at Calgary, says:

"I was obliged to discharge Mr. Grant, who has been in charge of that agency, owing to grave irregularities."

In other words, this man who was entrusted by this Government to deal fairly and honestly with the Indians, broke faith with them, violated this duty, misled them, defrauded them, and he was dismissed and nothing more. It was only the Indians who were defrauded, and Grant was simply dismissed without investigation and without punishment, although the matter was drawn to the attention of the First Minister through his own agent. T. P. Wadsworth, superintendent of Indian agencies, in his report for 1882—speaking of the Rivière du Barre Indians, says:

"That the flour and bacon received as supplies was bad and that the flour received by the Indians at Battleford, had become lumpy."

Mr. Wadsworth in his report for 1883, speaking of the Indians in Sekaskoots reserve, says:

"I could get no account of the supplies sent in by the contractors or the Government."

He further says:

"That the flour received by those Indians only average 83 pounds per sack."

And again speaking in the same report of Poundmaker's band, he says:

"That the flour was inferior and of light weight."

Here we have positive evidences of fraud. The Indians were supplied with flour which was light in weight and inferior in quality, and yet the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs never took the first step to redress these wrongs, or bring the guilty to justice. We must recollect that we are under treaty obligations with these Indians, to supply them with certain articles at a given time, of a given quality and quantity. We failed in discharging our duty in that respect, and the consequences were serious. A. McKay, the Indian agent at Grand Rapids, in his report for 1882, speaking of the Island Band, says:

"That the inspector of Indian agencies promised to supply them with all they might require and that they were urged by that agent to make their demands on the Department for the same." That they did do but the supplies were not sent.

Mr. E. McColl, inspector of agencies, in his report for 1882, speaking of the Swan Lake Band, says:

"That waggons, etc. were promised these Indians and that he was apprehensive of serious consequences unless their claims were recognised."

Mr. A. McDonald, the Indian agent under Treaty No. 4, in his report in 1882, publishes a letter from Poundmaker to Dewdney in which Poundmaker says:

"It is Poundmaker who takes the liberty of sending you a few lines. He entreats your Honor to send him the grist mill with horse power you so kindly promised him at Cypress. We expected it last summer but in vain."

This letter was written in November, 1882, and two years before that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs had promised these supplies to the old chief, but he had neglected to give them. He had deceived him, and lied to him, and the result was that the Indians had lost all confidence in the Indian Commissioner. J. McRae, the Indian agent at Carlton, in his report for 1882, speaking of Okenasis' Band, says:

"The chief says, and Mr. Tompkins corroborates his statement, that Mr. Wadsworth, the inspector, promised him a large lumber wagon last fall, and broke his promise."

L. W. Herchmer, in his report for 1883, speaking of the Sioux at Bird Tail Creek, says:

"A great deal of sickness has visited them lately, caused by the want of fresh meat."

W. Pocklington, in his report for 1883, speaking of the Stoneys, says,

"During last winter there was a great deal of distress among them for want of clothing, many of them not having a blanket to cover their nakedness."

T. P. Wadsworth, in his report for 1883, speaking of Day Star's Band, says:

"That the chief complained that he could not get his treaty pigs and that he wanted more oxen, a tool chest and milk pans."

He also reports:

"That Mistowasis' Band and Ah-tah-ka-Koops band did not get their treaty pigs and he recommends that they do get them."

He further reports that:

"Bobtail's Band complained that there was still due them under the treaty a cow and bull."

He further reports that:

"Ermine Skins Band complained that there was due them under the treaty a mower and some carts."

Now recollect that all these articles were articles which we were bound to supply the Indians under treaty obligation, and that the officials of the Government criminally neglected to supply them, and they neglected to do so with the full knowledge and connivance of this Administration. I say it is no wonder that the Indians should become dissatisfied, discontented and turbulent; Commissioner McLeod, in 1879, says:

"I have experienced great difficulty, (with the distress and suffering from hunger) applications for relief being constantly made to me by the starving bands of Indians."

Again:

"A Stoney Indian and his family had been without food for many days."

Superintendent Walsh, in 1880, says of the Sioux:

"Hunger and suffering prevailed. In some places persons became so reduced as to be unable to help themselves. The want of food, followed by disease, caused an epidemic—which marked its results by the many graves now to be seen in Wood Mountain."

The breach of faith, the violated promises, the broken pledges of this Government to the Indians, the fraud, the misconduct, the robbing, and the cheating, are all marked by the graves of the Indians in the mountains of the West. And this is the condition of affairs which the First Minister of this country considers the proper condition of affairs with respect to the Indians. Inspector Dickens says in January, 1884.

"Gladstone said he never saw Indians in such a state before."

Commissioner Irvine, in his report in 1882, says:

"For a considerable time they made no demand for aid from the Government, but as the cold weather came on, being very poorly clad, and insufficiently supplied with food, they experienced much hardship from exposure and starvation."

Why, Sir, the First Minister is carrying out his policy of reducing the Indians to submission by absolute starvation. Again, Mr. Irvine reports:

"A report of the acute sufferings of these Indians was embodied in a report by Surgeon Jukes, forwarded to you in October last."

Again, in 1882:

"I would call your attention to the fact that, in a letter of the 20th May last, I impressed upon the Government the importance of the Indians being well received in the north, also the fulfilment of all treaty obligations."

On the 17th October, 1884, Inspector Dickens writes the officer commanding Mounted Police, Battleford:

"That Little Poplar insisted on the dismissal of the Indian agents, and good men appointed in their place. That Big Bear complained that the Government had broken faith with the Indians; that they were not paid enough, and were starved."

I say, Sir, if these reports are correct—and we have no reason to doubt their correctness—if these uncivilised wards of the nation—these Indians with whom you have broken faith, whom you were bound to feed, but whom you permit to be starved—if they became turbulent and rebellious, if they were easily led to take up arms against the Government and the people of this Dominion, we need not be surprised. These poor helpless wards of the nation, these roaming bands of barbarians, are entitled to every consideration at the hands of the people of this country. In their case the strong arm of the law has reduced them to subjection. In their case justice must be tempered with mercy. The real culprits are the men who committed the wrongs, who were guilty of the misconduct, the fraud, the cheating, and the swindling of the Indians; and the Government of this country who for years have connived at all these crimes. The people of this country, I say, must deal with these men in a spirit of justice, but that justice must be tempered with mercy. But what should we say of the Government who have tolerated such things? They deserve at the hands of the people of this country the very severest condemnation. Now, I have pointed out that not only were these Indians—if the reports are to be believed—robbed, cheated, and defrauded, but by reason of this cheating and defrauding, they became discontented, dissatisfied and turbulent, and were thus very easily led to take up arms against the sovereign power of this country. I propose to prove now, from the reports brought down to Parliament, that such was the case. I make the statement openly, boldly and without fear of successful contradiction—and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to contradict it—that for the last four years, by reason of the scandalous treatment of the Indians at the hands of the Government, they became uneasy, dissatisfied, discontented, and turbulent, and ready at any moment to break out into open rebellion against the Government of this country. In his own report for 1882 the First Minister says:

"In the Battleford district, some of the Indians have proved very obstructive."

A. McKay, one of the agents, speaking of the Berin's River Indians, says:

"They complain of a want of supplies. They further complain because they received no grain from the Department in 1882."

Mr. McColl, inspector of Indian agencies, in his report in 1882, speaking of the Indians at Swan Lake, says:

"The agent there was apprehensive of serious consequences, unless their claims to their former possessions were immediately recognised by the Government."

C. E. Denney, Indian agent at Fort McLeod, in his report for 1882, speaking of the Blackfeet Indians, says:

"The Blackfeet are in a most troublesome mood."

And again:

"I found the Blackfeet willing to work had they received assistance, but they have been badly neglected, and in consequence are very wild and unsettled."

Who treated them badly? The white settlers in the North-West? There is no such complaint; it was the officials appointed by this Government. The Government were notified of this fact by one of their own agents three years ago, and the documents submitted to Parliament do not show that the First Minister, the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, ever raised a finger to redress these wrongs. T. P. Wadsworth, in his report for 1882, speaking of the Eagle Hills Indians, says:

"They are restless now."

A. McDonald, the Indian agent, under Treaty No. 4, publishes in his report for 1882, a letter from Chief Poundmaker to Chief Commissioner Dewdney, in which Poundmaker says:

"There is to day a great distress in my band; their rations are suspended now for 41 days, and of course everybody is busy roving about and hunting."

And then the proud old chief pathetically says:

"It is impossible to work on our empty stomachs."

Sir, why should they work on an empty stomach. The Parliament of Canada has dealt liberally by the Indians. We have voted over a $1,000,000 a year for the purpose of supplying them with the necessaries of life. That was more than enough to keep them in comfort if these supplies had honestly reached their destination; but they have not; there is the clearest possible proof that the middlemen and agents in the North-West have defrauded and cheated the Indians without a word of complaint from the Government of this Dominion. The First Minister, in his report for 1883, says:

"The Indians in the Edmonton district are dissatisfied, because an error was committed in not furnishing them with the necessary number of implements and cattle."

Who committed the error? Why was the error committed? Why should these wild men of the plain, who are entitled to every consideration at our hands, and whom we are bound to protect, be deprived of the supplies to which they are entitled under the treaties we have made with them? The First Minister further reports respecting the Cree Band at Bird Tail Creek:

"This band has shown an indisposition to work, and have become violent."

L. W. Herchmer, an Indian agent, in his report for 1883, speaking of Way-way-se, Cappo and Gamble's Bands, says:

"They have become particularly independent, and have undertaken to compel me to give them what they require. Gambler's Band was also very independent. However, both these bands can get work if they require it; and a little starvation will do them good."

Such is the report of the hon. gentleman's agent—these ignorant, uncivilised, untamed barbarians of the plains, with whom we have broken faith, and whom we have allowed to be robbed, will improve by starvation. This is the treatment the agents of this Government mete out to the Indians, and the treatment the Agent General of Indian Affairs thinks the proper treatment, and with such treatment we expect the Indians to submit to us and respect us. W. Anderson, Indian agent at Edmonton, speaking in his report for 1883, of the Indians in that locality, says:

"As a general rule, the Indians of this locality have been quiet and soberly, although I perceived a feeling of discontent at different times."

W. Pocklington, Indian sub-agent at Blackfoot Crossing, in his report for 1883, says:

"Nearly all last winter they gave me constant trouble, by interfering with white men, and wounding horses. Bulls Head and his band are again in trouble. The Sarcee Indians are the most troublesome in my district."

J. A. McRae, Indian agent, says of John Smith's Band:

"They are in a chronic state of discontent."

I find that the Calgary Herald, speaking of the Indians, makes use of the following words:—

"In regard to the Indians, it cannot be supposed that agrarian troubles agitate them much, nor is it probable that a desire for territorial acquisition is a very powerful motive for casting in their lot with the half-breeds. It may seem a paltry reason, but if the agitating cause amongst the breeds is the approximation of "hard times," it will not be considered surprising by those who know anything about the Indians, if a lack of Government tobacco and tea were not the agitating cause with them."

Then, if you refer to the Report of the Mounted Police, you will find the following condition of affairs reported. Col. Macleod says, in 1879:

"In March complaints were made to me by cattle drivers that the Indians were killing their cattle; from that time until the annual payments, in October, similar reports and complaints were almost daily coming in."

Again, Mr. Macleod reports:

"During the year many sensational reports were in circulation of intended risings of the Indians in rebellion."

Again, he says:

"The Sioux, who numbered about 200 lodges, were at first quite excited, and a few of them purposed to attack the fort."

Superintendent Walker says, in his report of 1879:

"In February last I received intelligence that Chief Beardy of Duck Lake and his band of Indians had threatened several times to break into Stobar, Eden & Co.'s store, and help themselves to the Indian stores there."

Commissioner Irvine, in his report for 1880, says:

"This Indian population, too, will, irrespective of the aid received from Government, be a starving race, a dangerous class, requiring nerve as well as care in handling."

This report was made in 1880. I am not aware that the Government took the first step to see that those Indians who were said to be in a starving condition, and required most careful supervision were properly looked after. Again, Superintendent Walker says, speaking of the Indians at Battleford and the Saskatchewan:

"This district embraces a vast section of country, which, in some places, is becoming settled; and is inhabited by say, 2,000 Indians of different tribes, many of whom have, at various times, given much trouble and been the cause of great anxiety."

And again, speaking of the Sarcees, he says:

"During the past month some difficulty was experienced with the Sarcee Indians at Fort Calgary. It appears that they threatened to help themselves to Government rations."

Superintendent Winder, in his report for 1880, says of the Blackfeet:

"About the middle of June, Patterson, the man in charge of the Indians at Blackfoot Crossing, reported to Mr. McLeod, the agent, that he was having considerable difficulty with them."

Commissioner Irvine, in his report for 1881, says:

"Considerable difficulty was experienced in inducing the Indians at Fort Walsh to accept their treaty survey. They conducted themselves in a disorderly manner."

Again, in 1881, he says:

"You will have learnt that during the present winter considerable trouble was experienced on the Blackfeet reservation at the Blackfoot Crossing."

Again, in 1882, he says, speaking of Wood Mountain Indians and some disputes they had with one Legarrie:

"During the night, Mr. Legarrie heard the Indians in council arranging to kill him. But the arrangements were changed and it was decided to allow Legarrie and his party to eat once more before killing them. Legarrie expected every moment to be killed. The noise was fearful, some crying for the scalps of the whole party, others only wishing to kill the Teton Sioux."

Commissioner Irvine, in his report for 1883, says:

"In the month of July, the Indian Agent at Edmonton communicated with the officer commanding our post in that district, informing him of the exorbitant demands made by the Indians in a most overbearing manner."

Again, in 1883, the same commissioner reports:

"Reports had reached His Honor to the effect that the Indians on the reserves in that vicinity (Fort Pitt) were likely to give serious trouble."

Such was the condition of the Indians in the North-West Territories for the last four or five years—robbed, swindled, half-starved, frozen, although enough money had been voted by Parliament to keep them in comparative ease and comfort, had the supplies only honestly reached them. I say the Indian has been deprived of his rights, has not been properly treated, and that the Government is responsible for not having taken steps to see that he was properly treated. Under these circumstances is it to be wondered at that the Indian became rebellious? Another ground for complaint is the class of officials sent by the Government to administer the affairs of this country in the North-West Territories. Until the advent of the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, there were no complaints of wrong-doing, of cheating, and of fraud; there were no complaints of middle men capturing the supplies voted for the Indian, before they reached the Indians. The supplies voted by Parliament, I believe, honestly reached the Indian, and there were no complaints. But there is a different story to tell now. The Indians have no faith in the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; he has broken faith with them too often. He is domineering, arrogant, tyrannical, brusque in his manner towards them. His reputation is such that it has become proverbial in the North-West Territories, where he is known among the Indians as "the man with four tongues," as "the old to-morrow of the North-West." His unpopularity can be easily understood, when one considers his mode of dealing with the Indians. In 1882, commissioner had a conference with Pie-a-pot and his band, and at that conference, an extraordinary state of affairs was exhibited, in so far as the commissioner was concerned. I have clipped from a newspaper an account of the meeting, and am going to trouble the House with it:

"In the summer of 1882, one of the most influential and powerful of the Cree chiefs, Pie-a-Pot was brought with his band at a very considerable expense from Cyprus Mountain to Fort Qu'Appelle with the expectation that he would go upon a reserve selected for him in that part of the country, as it was thought very desirable that he should be removed from close proximity to the United States frontier. Before going upon his reserve he bethought him of certain promises which had been made to him, but which had not up to that time been fulfilled, and he determined to have an interview with the Lieutenant Governor before committing himself further. There were many white men present at the interview which grew out of this resolve on the part of Pie-a-pot, and all must have been impressed with the very brusque and disrespectful manner in which the great chief was received by Her Majesty's representative. Pie-a-pot was repeatedly accused of lying, and that in a most offensive manner, but in each instance the weight of evidence appeared to be quite as much in his favor as in the Lieutenant Governor's. At length the chief said, 'I was promised a horse and buckboard, and I have not seen them yet.'

"Who promised you that?" brusquely demanded Mr. Dewdney.

"The man who is speaking to me," replied Pie-a-pot sneeringly.

"Not quite understanding the meaning of his answer, Mr. Dewdney repeated the question, upon which Pie-a-pot answered with very deliberate emphasis, pointing with his finger as he spoke, 'You made me that promise, and there is your own interpreter who heard you.'

"The interpreter, on being referred to, confirmed Pie-a-pot's statement, when the Lieutenant Governor, reddening, as well he might, made matters worse by saying:

"Well, if I made you that promise, it was on condition that you should do something for me."

"Yes," answered Pie-a-pot, "it was on condition that I would get Little Pine and Lucky Man to take the treaty, and perhaps you remember whether they did or not."

Now, be it remembered that when this pitiable exhibition of the veracity of the Lieutenant Governor was being made, a large number of the Qu'Appelle Indians were present, and it may well be guessed that such a circumstance did not go far toward strengthening their respect for the Government and its institutions.

I say that statement is absolutely correct, and yet this man is allowed to fill the position of Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Not long ago I called the attention of the Government to the unfitness of Mr. Dewdney for the high position he holds, I was told by the First Minister that he was a reader of character, that he had known Mr. Dewdney for many long years and was satisfied that he had the right man in the right place. The hon. gentleman was not prepared to take the advice of anybody, but was determined to keep Mr. Dewdney in the position he now occupies, the responsible duties of which he is unfitted to exercise. His self-seeking, his brusque and uncourteous manner, his business transactions and relations in the North-West—all render him a man exceedingly dangerous to be kept in such an important position as that of the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories and Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The Government have been made aware of this over and over again; the press published in the interest of hon. gentlemen opposite have frequently drawn attention to it. Let me read you what the Winnipeg Times, the favored organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, on the 5th January, 1883, said:

"But the cross of gold is not Mr. Dewdney's god. He is eminently a philanthropist. His delight is to advance the interests of the savage and promote the welfare of the more wretched white man under his sceptre. For example, when Long Lodge, chief of the Assiniboines, who were camping last summer near Indian Head, complained that the contractor's bacon, costing the Canadian taxpayers nineteen cents per pound, was not suitable to the Indian palate, the Indians feeding always on buffalo meat; when Long Lodge offered to accept half a pound of steer beef costing a York shilling a pound dead weight, in place of a pound of bacon costing nineteen cents; when Long Lodge said the bacon was 'hurting his people because it was not their food'—Mr. Dewdney said 'the Indians should eat the bacon or die, and be d—d to them.' This was not said in haste but at his honor's leisure. He did not say it because his friend the contractor, who happened to be in a land syndicate with him, had 90,000 pounds of that bacon to dispose of, but because he wished to indoctrinate the savage with the tastes of the average white man. Mr. Dewdney, let Piapot witness, is the Indian's friend. To the white man also he sets a noble example. He teaches the raw settler a new code of morals. He shows him by precept and example that in these degenerated days it is not necessary for a man holding a trust not to abuse it. He illustrates in his own walk and life the modern principle that every man should fight for his own wallet. He is, in this great country, the most signal exemplar of the science of how to get along regardless of the means or methods of locomotion. Mr. Dewdney, therefore, deserves well at our hands and at the hands of the Indians of these Territories. It would hardly be appropriate to present him with a home-stead, for he has several, also pre-emptions in abundance. Money would also be out of place, inasmuch as while Sir Leonard has a surplus and Sir John remains in power, he will not want. Could anything be more appropriate than to present him with a petition to leave, to get out, to go elsewhere and teach other Indians and other white men the ethics of grab, greed, and shamelessness which he has introduced here?"

This is an article from the press supporting hon. gentlemen, and, notwithstanding this warning, and in defiance of the Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

protests of the friends of the Government, this man has been retained in his place. Notwithstanding these solemn protests, these warnings, these direct and specific charges against Governor and Indian Commissioner Dewdney, he continues in office. The consequences have been serious to the country. What services has this man rendered to the Government of the country that the peace, the progress, the prosperity of the North-West, and the lives of the white settlers in the North-West should be jeopardised in order that Governor Dewdney might fill two offices and draw two salaries. It cannot be on account of his courage, because everyone who knows anything about the North-West knows that it has passed into a proverb in that country that, the moment there is anything like Indian discontent, Governor Dewdney is found in the city of Winnipeg. Let us see what the Minerve says, not of Governor Dewdney, but of the head of this Department:

"If their grievances have not been redressed before, the fault lies with the Interior Department. * * * The Department of the Interior, against whom they rise, is, to speak frankly, the cause of these disturbances. * * * Let the Department of the Interior bear the responsibility of its own actions."

La Presse, the organ of the Secretary of State, dealing with this question of responsibility for the rebellion and who ought to be condemned, convicted and executed, declares that:

"After having avenged our national honor and restored peace, it will remain for us to study the line of conduct to be followed to prevent a repetition of similar catastrophes. In the first place we want a Minister of the Interior with sufficient strength to fulfil his duties."

A correspondent of the Globe of the 13th April, 1885, writing from the scene of action, says:

"The Indians were unfairly treated, and beginning to murmur, but he thought his personal popularity would be sufficient to protect him. While his own relations with Mr. Dewdney were cordial and pleasant he was almost alone in this respect. Mr. Dewdney was altogether too high and mighty for the settler. The settler had no grievances which he (the Lieutenant Governor) need trouble himself with, and so there was no getting near the seat of power. Still, all these disadvantages would be remedied in time, and the people felt if they were only permitted to live there they would persevere and things would right themselves ultimately."

The Winnipeg Sun says:

"The following resolution was put before a meeting held at Wolseley last week, called to form a home guard. It was moved by a leading Conservative: 'That it is the opinion of the meeting that it is now time for the Government to take decisive action, and that their first shall be that orders be issued to hang Riel to the first tree when he is caught, but if there must be delay that it shall only be long enough to capture Dewdney, and hang the two together.' The chairman refused to put the motion, but as it was seconded he was forced to do so, and it was carried."

Mr. John Stinson says:

"I left Qu'Appelle in December last, and this rebellion was quite an expected long before that time. Riel was back in the country in July last, and it was well known that he was agitating and organising for some mischief of this kind. But the authorities both in the North-West and at Ottawa disregarded all warnings and made no effort to stop the rebellion, as they should have done, before it assumed an organised form. If the half-breeds and Indians had received anything like just treatment there would have been nothing of this rebellion. But the powers that be by their action towards those people invited the rebellion. Governor Dewdney made promises to them which he did not fulfil. This is the reason that the Indians call Governor Dewdney and Sir John 'Old To-morrow,' the idea being that they never do anything they promise. They took more stock of truth than of any other virtue, hence to make them a promise and then break it wrecks their confidence. All the Indians and half-breeds and most of the whites dislike Governor Dewdney, and harmony cannot be attained without his removal."

Now I have shown you, I think, very clearly from public documents and other sources that the Indians of the North-West Territories have been badly treated. I have shown that, by reason of that treatment, they became dissatisfied, discontented and rebellious. I now propose for a few minutes to deal with another question. I say that it does not lie in the mouth of the hon. gentlemen opposite to say that this outbreak in the North-West Territory was unexpected, that it was without cause, that it was without warning, that it was an outbreak of which hon. gentleman had no notice, an outbreak wholly unpremeditated. I have shown you that the grievances complained of by the half-breeds of the North-West Territories and the Indians were grave and serious, they were of the first possible consequence to the parties interested, their prompt settlement was of the first possible consequence to the peace, good order, progress and prosperity of that country. Those grievances were drawn to the attention of this Government over and over again. In every way known to the people of any country, by petitions, by memorials, by remonstrances, by delegations, by resolutions passed at public meetings convened for the purpose of considering these grievances; and they were unheeded. What was the result? Those complaints, those grievances grappled with and settled? No, Sir, they were treated with indifference and contempt. Hon. gentlemen never moved, never took the first step, never paused to consider the dangerous condition in which the country was then placed, and so these unreasonable, these unjustifiable delays ended in bloodshed and loss of human life, neither of which would have happened had hon. gentleman been alive to the gravity of the situation, neither of which would have happened if hon. gentlemen had only paused to consider the brink upon which they were standing. The First Minister of this Dominion knew, or ought to have known, the temper, the peculiarities of the French half-breeds; the First Minister ought to have known the danger of trifling with the grievances of that element in our population; and the First Minister, knowing all this, recklessly, indifferently, and carelessly abstained from this investigation; and, if life has been lost and blood has been shed, upon the shoulders of hon. gentlemen opposite must rest the responsibility.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. CAMERON. Hon. gentlemen howl and express their disapproval. We know that in ancient times when an ancient city was being reduced to ashes, the ruler of the country danced and fiddled. We know that on more than one occasion when the great interests of this country were being imperilled and voted away, they were imperilled and voted away amid the cheers of hon. gentlemen opposite. And now, Sir, when we point out that hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for the terrible consequences that have succeeded their misconduct, they howl and cheer again. I propose to point out as shortly as I can, and chronologically, that this Government was thoroughly aware of the difficulties in the North-West Territories. In 1878, 122 half-breeds petitioned the North-West Council for a fair consideration of their grievances. They pointed out, among other things, that owing to the disappearance of the buffalo they had no means of subsistence, except a resort to tilling the soil. They pointed out that many of them were absent on the plains when the half-breeds of Manitoba were settled with, and that therefore they obtained no scrip entitling them to land; and praying for a redress of the wrongs complained of. On the 20th September, 1878, this petition was sent by Governor Laird to the Minister of the Interior. On the 20th November, the Deputy Minister of the Interior acknowledged the receipt of the document. In 1878 the half-breeds of St. Albert petitioned the Government for a survey of their lands according to their old holdings. I am not giving you the words of the petition, Mr. Speaker; I only give you the substance of these documents. On the 10th April, 1878, this petition was transmitted to the Minister of the Interior. In the same year the half-breeds of St. Laurent petitioned the Government to the same effect. On the 10th May, Mr. Mills, then Minister of the Interior, acknowledged the receipt of the petitions, and said they would receive consideration. Mr. Mills having resigned his office shortly afterwards, they could receive, of course, no consideration at the hands of the then Government. Upon the 2nd August, 1879, Mr. Ryan published a letter in a Winnipeg paper, pointing out clearly the grievances complained of by the half-breeds. On the 10th March, 1880, the Saskatchewan Herald pointed out to the Government the complaints made and the grievances complained of. On the 28th of February, 1880, the Saskatchewan Herald published another article on the same subject. In the summer of 1881, the half-breeds of Qu'Appelle petitioned the Government that they should be treated in the same way as those of Manitoba had been. On the 20th September, Mr. Russell, Acting Surveyor General, acknowledged the receipt of that petition. In 1883, a delegation of half-breeds came all the way from the Saskatchewan Valley to visit the city of Ottawa and present their grievances and ask for redress at the hands of this Government. When the hon. member for West Durham drew the attention of the Government to the complaints of the settlers in the North-West Territories the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) said:

"We must remember that in 1870 nearly all the troubles that arose in the Red River settlement were due to the instructions or want of instructions given to surveyors who went out to survey the country, without taking into consideration that that country had been settled some five or six years before. Of course the population then became naturally suspicious as to what was taking place, and about the transfers of their lands, as well as the whole territory, to the Dominion Government without their being consulted. They naturally became excited over this bargain and stopped the surveyors. It is but natural that these half-breeds of the same stock, and sometimes of the same parentage, in the North-West, may have been a little suspicious about what was taking place during last summer in the Dominion surveys. But history is always of great assistance to Government, and in this case, I am happy to say, that the rights of these pioneers who have kept the country to Canada are being fully recognised by the Dominion Government."

Sir, for two years the Government of this Dominion did nothing to settle these claims. In June, 1884, Riel's letter acceding to the request of the half-breeds of Manitoba to place himself once more at their head, was published in a Winnipeg paper. In July, 1884, Mr. Isbister, a prominent and intelligent half-breed, published a letter, I think, in the Winnipeg Sun, pointing out the grievances of the half-breeds. On the 12th June, 1884, the Saskatchewan Herald pointedly drew the attention of the Government to the fact that Riel was again among the half-breeds of the Saskatchewan valley, and that there were breakers ahead. On the 9th August, 1884, the Saskatchewan Herald again discussed the claims of the half-breeds and the presence of Riel, and warned the Government of impending dangers. On the 22nd July, 1884, the Qu'Appelle Vidette pointed out that Riel was then among the half-breeds and that they would undoubtedly resort to arms unless their wrongs were promptly righted. On the 2nd June, 1885, Sir Alexander Campbell, in the Senate, admitted that between the 1st of January, 1879, and the 1st of March, 1885, Archbishop Taché, Bishop Grandin, and others in the North-West Territory, were in communication with the Government on the subject of these half-breed claims. On the 8th July, 1884, Captain Crozier telegraphed to the Controller of the Mounted Police at Ottawa, that Riel had arrived and was the leader of the half-breeds. On the 27th of July, 1884, Superintendent Crozier wrote to Colonel Irvine, who on the 2nd of August, 1884, sent this letter to the controller at Ottawa:

- "1. That meetings held by Riel at Battleford and Duck Lake, at which half-breeds and Indians were present.
- "2. That Riel told the Indians that they had rights as well as half-breeds.
- "3. That the Indians sympathised with half-breeds.
- "4. That precautionary measures should be taken by the Government as the Indians sympathised with the half-breeds, as was to be expected from their blood relationship.
- "5. That such precautionary measures should be such as would prevent these turbulent spirits from carrying their schemes to an extreme, but prevent both the Indians and half-breeds even making an attempt to resist authority or organise for illegal purposes.
- "6. That Big Bear and his followers would have remained on his reserve but for Riel."

On the 9th August, 1884, Crozier again wrote to the Controller that the Indians were in an uncertain condition, and this letter, on 21st August, was transmitted to the Department at Ottawa. On the 14th August, 1884, Crozier again writes:

"But there are a great many people through the country who have what they call grievances, and seem to agree with Riel."

On the 3rd July, 1884, the Winnipeg Sun pointed out to the Government that the Indians were becoming restless and turbulent. On the 21st, 23rd and 24th June, 1884; and on the 22nd and 28th July, 1884, the Times discussed fully the condition of the Indians and pointed out their restless and discontented condition, and that danger might be apprehended. On the 2nd August, 1884, the Edmonton Bulletin also drew the attention of the Government to the condition of the Indians. On the 4th August, 1884, the Times declared that the half-breeds complained and not without cause. In September, 1884, the Bill of Rights embracing the claims of the half-breeds, was adopted at a public meeting of the half-breeds held at St. Laurent, and was transmitted to the Government. On the 21st of August, 1884, Sergeant Brooks writes to the officer commanding the North-West Mounted Police at Battleford:

"That Riel and Big Bear held a conference at Prince Albert a few days before this."

His letter was duly transmitted to Ottawa. On the 17th September, 1884, Sergt. Keenan wrote to the officer commanding the North-West Mounted Police at Battleford:

- "1. That on the 5th September, 1884, a meeting of half-breeds was held at St. Laurent.
- "2. That all the half-breeds in the surrounding settlement were there;
- "3. That the meeting was called to carry on the work and condemn the Government;
- "4. That Riel told him that the Ottawa Government had offered him seat in the North West Council or in the Dominion Senate."

On the 2nd October, 1884, this letter was transmitted by Captain Crozier to the controller of the police force at Ottawa. On the 26th September, 1884, Sergeant Keenan wrote to Captain Crozier at Battleford:

- "1. That Riel was holding frequent meetings among the half-breeds;
- "2. That at these meetings Riel's utterances were careful and cautious;
- "3. That at the private meetings of his committees very different language was used and different measures advocated;
- "4. That Charles Nolin, one of Riel's councillors, proposed that the half-breeds should make certain demands on the Government and that if these demands were not complied with they would take up arms once, and kill every white man they could find and incite the Indians to do the same."

On the 30th October, 1884, Captain Crozier wrote to the officer commanding the North-West Mounted Police at Regina:

"That Riel was drilling his men at St. Laurent and that a large meeting was held there at midnight on the 12th October, 1884.

This was sent to the Government at Ottawa. On the 31st December, 1884, Inspector Howe wrote to Captain Crozier:

"On the 9th December, 1884, there was a large meeting of the half-breeds held at St. Laurent for the purpose of again talking over the Bill of rights; that Riel proposed to McDowall, a member of the North-West Council, that he would leave the country if he got $5,000."

This letter was transmitted to the Government at Ottawa. On the 2nd December, 1884, Superintendent Gagnon wrote to Crozier:

"That in the month of November, 1884, several meetings of half-breeds were held at St. Laurent and Batoche, at which petitions were prepared and signed by the half-breeds and sent to Ottawa, insisting on their Bill of rights."

On the 10th March, 1885, a telegram was sent from the police force at Regina to the Controller at Ottawa:

"Half-breeds excited. Move about more than usual. Preparing arms. Do not know cause or object of these preparations."

On the 11th March, 1885, Crozier telegraphs:

"Half-breeds greatly excited. Reported that they threaten attack on Carlton before 16th. Half-breeds to take freight or employment from the Government. Will stop all freight coming into the country after 16th of this month. Getting arms ready. Leader will not allow people to leave home, as they may be required."

In the Mounted Police reports brought down on 23rd June, 1885, Col. Irvine reports that the Blackfeet, Pi-a-Pot's Band, the Man-that-took-the-Coat's Band and Dry Lodges Band, were turbulent and hard to manage. That the Indians broke into the supply store; that 20 Mounted Police went to arrest the offenders; that they could not do it; that Pi-a-Pot's and other bands had to be overcome, and only succeeded in doing it with 57 Mounted Police and a 7-pounder. That horses were stolen and men killed, and that several of the bands were on the war-path. The reports of Department of Indian Affairs and Mounted Police from 1879 to Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

1885 are teeming with these uninvestigated grievances, these unredressed wrongs, the complaints of the half-breeds and Indians, the uneasy, dissatisfied condition of half-breeds and Indians, their threatening and dangerous attitude. And yet we are told that there were no grievances uninvestigated, no wrongs unredressed, no complaints and no causes of complaints, that the settlers, the half-breeds and the Indians were satisfied. The Government had abundant notice of the grievances of the half-breeds in the North-West. They had abundant notice of the complaints and grievances of white settlers in the North-West. Those notices were sent to them over and over again. They were repeated month after month, and year after year, as is manifested from the papers submitted to Parliament, to which the hon. member for West Durham has referred. I will not, therefore, repeat them, but I will only say this, that the hon. gentleman has on more than one occasion drawn the attention of the Government to the unsatisfactory condition of affairs in the North-West. I have pointed out over and over again to the Government that their policy of procrastination, of delay, of not promptly dealing with wrongs complained of would be fatal to the peace, progress and prosperity of the North-West and would ultimately end in bloodshed. The Government appeared to be wholly indifferent. In order to remedy some of the grievances, I introduced a Bill in this House giving settlers in the North-West Territories representation in the Parliament of Canada; and I failed in that respect. I say again, that the papers submitted to Parliament contain the clearest possible indications of the discontent existing in the North-West. I propose to give one or two short extracts from newspapers to indicate this condition of affairs. The Saskatchewan Herald on October 31st says:—

"That Little Poplar came from the South (i. e. the United States) in the hope being able to stir up trouble."

The Mail, editorially says:

"That dissatisfaction has existed among the half-breeds in the Saskatchewan country for years past is undeniable. They complain, as we have before explained, that while the Metis of Manitoba were given grants of 240 acres under the Act of 1870, their claims have been ignored; and they say, with equal truth, that the Government should at least give them free patents for the farms which they have been cultivating, and compensation for disturbance in cases where the Dominion surveyors may find it necessary to rearrange the shape of their holdings, the old French form of delimitation being at variance with the modern system. These claims the Interior Department is trying to adjust, but it takes time to deal with questions affecting the rights of property."

The Saskatchewan Herald, on the 12th July last, tells of the quiet and secret meetings progressing amongst the half-breeds at Duck lake, consequent upon the arrival of Louis Riel there, it says:

"But should Mr. Riel desire to establish a government on the Saskatchewan, he will find many of his former followers in his immediate neighborhood, and no doubt his former secretary, Louis Schmidt, will cheerfully resign the position he now occupies as assistant Dominion lands agent at Prince Arthur, to give his services to the country and his old master."

On January 22nd, the Qu'Appelle Vidette editorially made this alarming announcement:

"We are informed that Louis Riel and others are engaged in drafting a petition to the Dominion Government demanding certain concessions which they say have been promised to the half-breeds of the North-West Territories, and it is the expressed intention of the half-breeds of the Saskatchewan district that if these concessions are not granted, which are asked for to resort to arms to force a compliance with their demands, Mr. Vankoughnet's statement to the contrary notwithstanding."

A special correspondent of the Mail, writing from Fort Qu'Appelle said:

"The people of Eastern Canada must by this time have a tolerably good idea of the nature of the half-breed grievances. The grievances of the whites have been submitted in the form of resolutions to the North-West Council, and debated by that body; and have been laid before the Ottawa authorities so often, and with such urgency, that the Interior Department must by this time be quite familiar with them."

Of the complaints of whites and half-breeds, he wrote:—

"By far the most serious complaint, however, is based upon the idea that in some way or other the settler 'has no show' with outsiders, who obtain possession of lands which he, as a squatter, has improved and built upon. This, I take it, is the core of all the discontent and dissatisfaction among whites and half-breeds alike."

The Winnipeg Times said:

"The rebellion of 1869-70 was not without its lessons for Riel, and he has closely observed them. He saw more plainly after it was over than before what a desperate and determined leader could do, backed by a force of wary and devoted half-breeds, inured to hardships and familiar with the country. Before he made up his mind to raise the standard of a second insurrection he no doubt took stock of all the chances and prepared to meet them. We do not believe that he ventured on an open revolt so far in the interior as Carlton without having the most reliable assurances of support from a number of the Indian chiefs, whose minds he had been poisoning for months without the least interference."

The Mail correspondent, writing from Batoche, says:

"Without doubt it is necessary to assert authority, but as it is authority which is to blame, its duty is to assert itself in such a manner as to prove that it is able at least to recognise its wrongs."

I say again it is abundantly clear from the evidence submitted by the member for West Durham and the member for Quebec East and myself that the half-breeds had grounds for complaint, that the white settlers had grievances that they could not get redressed. I say that the Indians were robbed, cheated, swindled, and that the solemn promises made by the Government to the Indians were violated. I say that the Government had abundant evidence of all this. I say that with all these facts before the Government, the First Minister carelessly and negligently and with criminal apathy delayed the investigation of those grievances; he refused even to consider them until after the rebellion broke out. I say, this being the case, how does this incompetent, incapable, imbecile Government hope to escape the punishment that should follow wrongdoing; how does this Government expect to escape the indignation of a justly aroused and insensed people? By concealing from this Parliament and people of Canada as the First Minister has done, a mass of the evidence in his possession, and on which the people could form a clearer judgment as to the responsibility of Ministers? No; they cannot so escape. There is more than enough of convincing evidence of criminal neglect now before Parliament to condemn a dozen Administrations. Do they hope to escape by distorting the evidence and misrepresenting the facts, and by doing as the Secretary of State has done, denying that the half-breeds ever petitioned or memorialised the Government for a redress of their wrongs; and by doing, as the Montreal Gazette, the organ of the Government, has done, declaring that:

"There has been no neglect. Nearly every claim has been passed upon and adjusted long since; those upon which the pretext of the rebellion is based are not to be entertained for a moment."

or by doing as the Minister of the Interior in his place in the Senate, has done, by declaring that:

"The half-breeds had no grievance whatever in relation to their lands, or to any other matter. No half-breeds was ever disturbed or threatened with disturbance in the occupation of his land. Not in one solitary case. No half-breed delegation came to Ottawa to complain of ill-treatment or disturbance in relation to their lands, no complaint on behalf of the half-breeds was ever made on the floor of Parliament, no grievance existed, and that will be made manifest when the papers are brought down."

"Until Riel arrived in this country there was no disturbance, no threatened disturbance. Riel is an incendiary, and he had great influence with the half-breeds. From the moment he arrived in this country he was endeavoring, no doubt, to excite them to discontent, but there was not the slightest apprehension of that discontent taking any form more serious than words until the outbreak actually took place."

I say this Government cannot so escape the responsibility for their misconduct. The evidence is too strong, the guilt too clear, to permit of escape. Their own conduct, their own dealing with this whole question in recent months, is the clearest possible evidence of their criminal neglect to discharge the most important duties that could devolve on any Government. What did they do? They issued a commission to investigate these old grievances, that the Secretary of State, the Minister of the Interior, and the Montreal Gazette never heard of. The returns laid before Parliament show that on the 26th of January last Sir D. Macpherson reported to the Governor in Council that measures be taken to settle the claims of the half-breeds; that on the 28th an Order in Council, such as he asked for, was passed, and that proceeding deliberately he telegraphed to Mr. Dewdney on February 4th:

"The Government has decided to investigate the claims of the half-breeds, and with that view has directed an enumeration of those who did not participate in the grant under the Manitoba Act. No representations received recently."

But his colleague, the Minister of Justice, when asked if any complaints had been presented from the half-breeds on the 2nd of June last, stated:

"Considering the gravity of the question, the House should not be surprised if he confined himself strictly to answering the question. The Government had received between the 1st of January, 1879, and the 1st of March, 1885, from various persons taking special interest in the North-West, and among others, Monseigneur Grandin, Bishop of St. Albert, and Monseigneur Pache, written representations respecting the position of the half-breeds of the North-West, and the best way of ameliorating it. There was no record of any written representations from Mr. Royal, and no records of verbal representations existed."

I say therefore, that the First Minister and his colleagues cannot so escape their personal responsibility, for their negligence and carelessness in the administration of affairs in the North-West. The Mail newspaper suggests another mode by which these hon. gentlemen can escape the responsibility that properly rests on their shoulders. The Mail says that delay was a sound policy; that time solves all difficulties, and that the First Minister was justified in not investigating these claims because time might help him. That policy—the policy of delay, the hon. gentleman has lived on for the last 25 years. It is a policy which has cost this country millions of money, a policy which has provoked two rebellions, a policy which has cost this country almost oceans of human blood and many human lives. The Mail says:

"There is such a thing as too much haste. Sir John Macdonald is right enough in his alleged belief that time settles a good many problems which men only muddle by rash action. It is possible to err in this direction, we may admit; but it is certain that undue haste in the North-West might have been disastrous. Delay has weakened Riel and strengthened General Middleton. Delay has enabled the officials to bring pressure to bear on the Indians."

Yes Sir, delay accomplishes many things; delay caused the rebellion; delay left the settlers unprotected, when the rebellion did break out; delay induced the half-breeds to fight at Duck Lake; delay gave opportunity to raise the Indians, excited by the news of the Duck Lake victory; delay caused the massacre at Frog Lake; delay caused all the sufferings and losses at Battleford and Fort Pitt; delay gave an opportunity for the destruction of hundreds of homesteads, of much property, and of many valuable lives; delay caused the battle at Fish Creek; delay caused the battle of Batoche; delay caused many Canadian homes to mourn; delay has caused the shedding of blood; delay has caused the loss of many human lives; delay has scattered desolation, ruin, death, among the peaceful homes of the half-breeds of the West, and this delay is justified by the Government and its organs. Now, Sir, there is still another proof, if that were wanting, of the guilt of hon. gentlemen opposite, of their gross misconduct and their criminal neglect in dealing with the claims of the half-breeds. After life was lost, after blood was spilt, after ruin was scattered abroad, this Government settled very nearly, if not altogether, 400 of these identical grievances of these identical half-breeds, which the Secretary of State, the Minister of Interior, the Mail and the Gazette never heard of; 400 of these grievances have, since the half-breeds took up arms to redress their wrongs, been recognised by the Government. This fact alone is enough to stamp this Administration as the most incompetent, the most reckless, the most imbecile, and the most criminal Administration that ever the country was cursed with. What have you gentlemen on the Treasury benches done south of Clarke's Crossing? You have, after life was lost and blood was spilt, after ruin, desolation and death to the half-breeds followed your tracks—you have recognised these claims, you have righted these wrongs, redressed these grievances which existed for years, and yielded to the half-breeds more than the half-breeds ever demanded. North of Clarke's Crossing what have you done? you have recognised the same identical claims, righted the same identical wrongs, and redressed the same identical grievances of the same identical classes of half-breeds by powder and shot, by the rattle of your Snyders and the thunder of your artillery, and as a Tory paper said: by mowing down these half-breeds with your Gatling gun, commanded by an American officer, as grass falls before the scythe of the mower. What did the Mail newspaper say speaking of the family of one of these half-breeds?

"The writer states that Joseph Tourand moved three years ago with his wife and eight children from the parish of St. Francois Xavier to Fish Creek, where he built a beautiful residence, and where he resided until the beginning of last year, when his death occurred. One of his sons followed him shortly afterwards to the tomb, leaving Madame Tourand with a family composed of five boys and two girls, aged respectively 18 and 20 years. When General Middleton's army arrived the house was attacked with cannon, and the Tourand brothers, in the hope of saving their property, joined the little band of insurgents commanded by Dumont, and fought as best they could during this time. The two young girls, fearing for their lives, and yielding only to their fright, escaped with one Miss Gervais, carrying in their arms two young children, almost without clothing. They gained the woods and disappeared, to be found no more. Without doubt, they perished with cold and hunger. After the battle at Fish Creek the Tourands retreated to Batoche, where two sons fell upon the battlefield. The third was dangerously wounded, and the remaining two are now prisoners at Regina. The mother is now alone without a dwelling or means of subsistence, and without even the support of the children who survived so many misfortunes."

This has been your policy in the North-West; that is the policy by which you hope to colonise the North-West Territories. This is your justice to the people who complain of uninvestigated grievances and unredressed wrongs; this is your policy of Canadian justice; this you do in a British colony and under the British flag, and this you call Canadian justice; and your Orange Sentinel insists that these men, who protested against your gross injustice and your criminal neglect of their grievances with their lives, must be hanged by the neck or shot down in their tracks. Sir, there are some men to be tried, convicted and punished; but they are the men who negligently and criminally refused to investigate these wrongs, and to redress these grievances; and these men are sitting on the Treasury benches to-day. Now, I have shown you by the clearest possible evidence that the Government of this country had been informed that discontent, dissatisfaction and uneasiness prevailed among the half-breeds of the North-West Territories. I have shown you that the half-breeds of the North-West Territories memorialised this Government and complained to it over and over again. I have shown you that so keenly alive were the half-breeds of the North-West to the necessity of a peaceful solution of the difficulties that existed between them and the Government of this country that two years ago at their own expense they sent a delegation all the way from the valleys of the Saskatchewan to press their claims upon the attention of the Government at Ottawa. I have shown you that the Government had abundant notice of the nature and extent of these claims. I have shown you that the Government promised over and over again to promptly investigate these grievances and redress these wrongs. I have shown you that the Government of this country signally failed to discharge one of the most imperative duties that devolves on any Government—to remove all well-founded grievances, and to redress all well-founded wrongs. I have shown you that the Government persistently ignored these grievances, both of the white settlers and the half-breeds, for a long series of years. I have shown that the white settlers living in the neighborhood of Prince Albert and along the borders of the Saskatchewan complained to this Government of many and well-founded grievances, and complained in vain. I have shown that the Indians of the North-West Territories frequently complained, and presented their complaints to the Government of Canada. I have shown, from the reports of the Department of Indian Affairs and the Department of the Mounted Police, that these complaints were over and over again repeated to the Government of this country, and never received a response. I have shown that the solemn promises made by this Government to the Indians, and on the faith of which they were induced to abandon a nomadic life and to settle on the reserves, have been violated. I have shown that the Indians have been systematically robbed, cheated and swindled by the agents of this Government, and that this has been connived at by this Government. I have shown that the Indians were starved and frozen, owing to the insufficiency of the supplies given to them. I have shown that many of the officials entrusted by the Government with the administration of affairs in the North-West have been arrogant, deceitful and dishonest in their dealings with the Indians. I have shown that the Lieutenant Governor and Indian Commissioner of the North-West Territories, according to the papers submitted to the Government, is wholly unfit for the position he occupies. I have shown that these grievances have been submitted to for at least seven years, and that the First Minister, the Agent General of Indian Affairs and Minister of the Interior, never raised a finger to remove these grievances, to redress these wrongs, or to bring the guilty to justice. I have shown that in consequence of this inaction, this bad treatment and this misconduct, on the part of the Government, the people became discontented, dissatisfied and uneasy. Now, I ask you, Sir, I ask this House, and I ask the people of this country what punishment ought to be inflicted upon a Government guilty of all these wrongs? Impeachment at the bar of this House? Impeachment before the high court of public opinion, the electors at the poll? Sir, there is no punishment known to the law of this land that is at all commensurate with the crimes these men have committed. The unfortunate results which have followed the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite, and which they ought to have known would have succeeded their misconduct as surely as effect follows cause, or daylight succeeds darkness, are still more grave and serious. This criminal misconduct of the Government, in persistently refusing to promptly dispose of the grievances of the North-West half-breeds, the complaints of the Indians, and the wrongs of the white settlers, caused a reign of terror in the North-West, and this reign of terror culminated in rebellion. But recently we have had many hundreds of our best young men bearing the crosses and enduring untold hardships, imposed upon them by this negligent, this incompetent, this imbecile Government. But recently hundreds of men in the North-West Territories were fleeing for their lives from the savage and ferocious Indians, and scores of intelligent and refined ladies were fleeing for more than their lives—their virtue and honor—with no city of refuge to flee to—but recently for the second time under the administration of the First Minister, we have had a rebellion, in which Canadian was arrayed against Canadian in deadly conflict. To-day many a Canadian home is mourning the loss of loved ones whose presence will no more gladden the home circle. To-day many a pulse has ceased to beat, and many a manly heart has ceased to throb. To-day we have the broad prairies of the west crimsoned with the best blood of Canada: to-day sadness and sorrow wrings the heart and pierces the soul of many a Canadian mother, who like Rachel of old mourns for her children and will not be comforted because they are not. The bravest have fallen in this terrible conflict, victims of the incapacity, the carelessness, the delays, the criminal misconduct of this Administration. For my own part, I protest now, as for years I have protested, against the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite—against their procrastination, their delay, their wicked mismanagement and criminal neglect of long standing grievances. I shall vote for the motion of my hon. friend as an embodiment of these solemn protests, and I am willing to leave the issue of the personal responsibility to the people of Canada and the punishment of the guilty to the tender mercies of the electors at the polls.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I have no doubt that the temperate, judicious, patriotic and carefully considered speech delivered by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) will not only be read by the public with surprise, but will place his party in a position which they will have no reason to feel proud of. Sir, I yield to no man in my feeling of sympathy for those who have suffered in the North-West, and I yield to no man in my desire to vindicate the rights of the people, not only of the North-West, but of the entire Dominion. Therefore, when the hon. gentleman constitutes himself the champion of the people of the North-West, it behooves us to look into the record of his party, and not do as he demands—treat that record as a sealed book. Sir, we have heard the present Administration called ignorant, incompetent, and imbecile. His allegation recalls the happiest days of my life, those I spent in yon press gallery, when I witnessed the operations of an incompetent Administration in this House—an Administration which the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) was virtually ashamed to remain in. The Administration in which Mr. Ross was Minister of Militia, in which Mr. Coffin was Receiver-General and in which Mr. Cauchon was President of the Council. Mr. Cauchon has gone, and with his record I shall not deal; but these were the pillars of the Administration of the State, the men who formulated legislation that a subservient majority was at all times willing to endorse. Hon. gentlemen opposite appear to think that we should close the book of the past, that we should wipe out their record, and discuss simply the question as to what is the position of this Government with regard to the North-West. I have always held, as a member of the Dominion Parliament, and as a member of the electorate of the Dominion, that we should have no issue among us as to origin, race, or nationality; but the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) last night, in discharging the first barrel of his gun, referred to a question which occasioned much heart burning in 1870, the murder of Scott in the North-West, and charged the Government of that day with having given money to Louis Riel to leave the country in order to escape the consequences of his crime. I did not desire to take up that subject, but it would not be fair to the party in power if I did not furnish such evidence as will prove to this House and the country that the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, from 1874 to 1878, had much more to do with the amnesty of Riel and the present difficulty in the North-West, than the Government which preceded or followed it. To do so I will have to refer to the record, and therefore must crave the indulgence of the House while reading a few extracts from the organ, then controlled by the Hon. George Brown, the recognised leader of the Opposition in those days, as bearing out the position I take. The very moment the Government of my right hon. friend, Sir John Macdonald, endeavored to take possession of the North-West Territories and Rupert's Land, the Globe was prepared to condemn every official the Government sent up there, to embitter the minds of the people in every possible way against the Government and do all it could to stir up feelings of antagonism in that new country. The Globe said, on the 31st August, 1869:

"If Mr. Macdougall is sent up to Fort Garry with a ready-made council composed of men utterly ignorant of the country and people, the strongest feelings of discontent will be aroused."

That was the olive branch sent to the North-West in 1869, and a message similar in intent, I am sorry to say, has been sent there from the same source in 1885. On 26th July, 1869 the Globe said:

"We are not surprised to hear, as we do, that the Government plan for governing the North-West is very distasteful to the people of that Territory. When the measure was before Parliament, we pointed out that its oligarchical feature could not fail to be unpopular with the people to be governed by it, and advices from the Territory confirm our anticipations."

Of the Red River Council, the same organ, on September 7th, 1869, said:

"At best, the Territory gets a miserably small boon when it is allowed 2 votes out of 8 or 9 in the management of its own Government; and there are many chances that practically, that small boon may be rendered nearly worthless. We pointed out the other day that the only possible reason for refusing to select the Local Executive Council of the territory from the residents thereof, was to be found in the desire of the members of the Dominion Government to have the patronage to distribute among their adherents in other part of the Dominion. Mr. Macdougall's little compact will be made up, in the main of strangers, and if they do not govern worse than the old Family Compact, it will be because of the difference in the times, we have the consolation of knowing, however, that the Red River compact will not last as long by many years as did the old Upper Canada one. The mere appointment of an irresponsible council of outsiders for the Red River country, will be the signal for an agitation there for a Legislature responsible to the people under Local Executive responsible to the Legislature. And that agitation will soon dispose of the oligarchy."

Again, the Globe said:

"The territory does not belong to Canada, the Hudson Bay Co. has ceased to reign, and Messrs. Bruce and Riel may hoist any flag they please, without special charge of disloyalty being raised against them. A portion of the people of Red River have committed grave errors, but the Ottawa Government were the first to do wrong, and ought to be the first to acknowledge it and make restitution."

But, Sir, the Toronto Globe—the organ of the Reform party, and the very journal that now eulogises Archbishop Taché and pretends to advocate the rights of the half-breeds—then said, on the 4th of April, 1870:—

"Governor McDougall returned and commissioners were sent up to treat with the rebels on behalf of the Government, and who were the commissioners?—a priest in full sympathy with a large section of the rebels; a French Canadian without talent or influence, and a Hudson Bay Company factor only careful to preserve the property of his employers. Can we wonder that the labors of these gentlemen seem rather to have strengthened Riel's power than weakened it; it is a fact that Mr. Donald A. Smith canvassed the settlers to secure their adhesion to Riel's Government."

This was the language used then, this the language which inspired and encouraged and approved of rebellion, and looking over the official records it will be found that a gentleman who was connected with the Globe revised the proof-sheets of Riel's manifesto. Lieutenant Governor McDougall, in a despatch to the Secretary of State, said:

"I enclose a printed paper (A) issued by the rebels at Fort Garry on the 6th instant. It was printed at the office of the Nor'-Wester by the rebels, who seized the office for the purpose, the proprietor and his employees refusing to have anything to do with it. The type was set by a Yankee in their ranks, and the proof corrected, as I am informed, by Mr. Ross, late of the Globe office, Toronto. This 'call' was enclosed in a letter under cover to the Postmaster at Pembina, which he delivered after some hesitation and stating that he would not in future deliver letters to me which might come under cover addressed to him."

And this was the document referred to:

"PUBLIC NOTICE TO THE INHABITANTS OF RUPERT'S LAND.

"The president and representatives of the French-speaking population of Rupert's Land, in council (the invaders of our rights being now expelled), already aware of your sympathy, do extend the hand of friendship to you our friendly inhabitants, and, in doing so, invite you to send twelve representatives from the following places, viz:—
St. John's, 1; St. Margaret's, 1; Headingley, 1; St. James, 1; St. Mary's, 1; Kildonan, 1; St. Paul's, 1; St. Andrew's, 1; St. Clement's, 1; St. Peter's, 1; town of Winnipeg, 2;—in order to form one body with the above council, consisting of twelve members, to consider the present political state of the country, and to adopt such measures as may be deemed best for the future welfare of the same.

A meeting of the above council will be held in the Court House, at Fort Garry, on Tuesday, the 16th day of November, at which the invited representatives will attend.

"By order of the president,

"LOUIS RIEL, Secretary.

"Winnipeg, November 6th, 1869."

Agitation was prompted in that country, and human blood was shed. Instead of regretting, the party of hon. gentlemen opposite then, as now, striving to reach the Treasury benches here and striving to control Ontario as well, were prepared to utilise that unfortunate tragedy for the purpose of advancing party interests. Take the evidence of the late Hon. Joseph Howe, when he returned from the North West as to the feeling existing in that Territory, excited by journalistic articles such as those referred to. I quote from official reports of Debates February 1870:—

"I do not desire to abuse the Globe or any other newspaper, because I am too old a journalist myself to take such a course. I will say this, however, that when I was in the house of Captain Kennedy and when the subjects of how the Territory was to be governed, and how Canada was to act, and what the instructions of Mr. Macdougall were, and what he would do when he came into the Territory were discussed, I did there as I did everywhere else—defended what was the policy of Canada in the most open and undisguised manner. And where I defended as I was bound to do, the incoming Governor, against the charges and insinuation and doubts and apprehensions thrown out against him,—when I did this—what was the answer? I was referred to Mr. George Brown's editorials as an evidence of the fact that he (Brown) had said that Canada would send men in there to ride rough shod over the country, that the man who was sent was unfit on account of his political conduct, and was to bring with him instructions and men who would set at naught the rights and disregard the feelings of the people."

But, during the discussion last evening, the hon. gentleman challenged this side of the House to show any point in which the Liberal party or the present leader of the Opposition was instrumental in causing the trouble in the North-West, and challenged us further to show whether the Government which succeeded Sir John Macdonald was to blame because he had given $1,000 to Mr. Riel. I propose, as the hon. gentleman's speech will go abroad, to quote from the records of the country as briefly as possible, and to invite any hon. gentleman to interrupt me if I mistake anything and challenge any hon. gentleman on that side to dispute what I shall say. I have referred to the death of Thos. Scott in March, 1870, and I am now prepared to show in what way the sad end of that unfortunate man was utilised in order to benefit a political party, that, while prating about patriotism, while prating about national feeling, while prating of desiring union between all the Provinces, with hearts to beat as one from ocean to ocean, they utilised it as they would to-day, as they would utilise this question if the people would allow them, in order to promote party interests. What was the first movement in regard to Riel? On the 4th April, 1870, the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), then representing Lambton and leader of the Opposition, spoke in the House of Commons. He said:

"We have most painful accounts in public newspapers of an atrocious murder being committed by men—ruffians I might say—(hear, hear) who are at the head of forces there, that calls for most extraordinary exertions on the part of our Government, (hear, hear) and in order to know exactly what the House and country ought to do, the Government, I think, are bound to place in possession of this House all the information they have with regard to that murder. We know that other persons were held prisoners there besides the unfortunate gentleman who was murdered, and what security have we in this country that other of our fellow subjects shall not be murdered as well as poor Scott."

The question came up in the Provincial assembly of Ontario, and the hon. member for West Durham, then for South Bruce, was the leader of the Opposition. On the 2nd February, 1871, we find him moving:

"That the cold-blooded murder for his out-spoken loyalty to the Queen of Thomas Scott, lately a resident of this Province, and an emigrant thence to the North-West, has impressed this House with a deep feeling of sorrow and indignation, and in the opinion of this House every effort should be made to bring to trial the perpetrators of this great crime, who, as yet, go unwhipped of justice.

"That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor, embodying the foregoing resolution, and praying him to take such steps as may be best calculated to further its views."

The hon. gentleman said:

"He (Riel) is receiving deputations from the people of that country, asking him to stand as a candidate for the Local Legislature and for the Parliament of Canada. Yes, for the Parliament of Canada! We find him declining, for the good of the country and from patriotic motives, to allow himself to be nominated. But, Sir, I say that unless this Province speaks out, it will not be long the case that he will act thus, and we may yet undergo the humiliation and disgrace of seeing the murderer of one of our people elected to the Parliament of Canada, and representatives from Ontario sitting in council on the affairs of the country with one guilty of murder. I warn this House and this Province that unless we act in this matter the murderer will go unpunished! This, Sir, is no ordinary murder. It was no murder for revenge, for money, or for any of those causes that usually provoke a great crime. The spot where poor Scott's ashes rest is unknown. Let his country write his epitaph in the records of her Assembly, and express a people's sorrow for his untimely death, and a people's stern resolve that that death shall be avenged!"

Sir, we all know how that death was avenged. In 1872 I find the hon. gentleman in West Toronto, after the defeat of Sanfield Macdonald's Government, saying on the hustings:

"Now, with regard to Scott, they had a good deal of talking, and now they were going to have action! (Cheers). The principles he had contended for in Opposition he would endeavor to carry out in practice. Office had no charms for him; he desired merely to carry out in power those things he advocated when out of power, and when they found him careless with reference to those things, then it would be their duty to withdraw their support from him."

Judging from the manner in which the hon. gentleman has succeeded since he entered public life and became a member of a Government and the leader of the Opposition, I think the people must really have found that he was a little careless in regard to consistency, and so have withdrawn their support from him. Then someone asked:

Mr. MACKINTOSH.

"What can the Ontario Government do about the Scott murder?"

"Mr. BLAKE. I shall show you what the Ontario Government can do about that."

The Provincial Secretary, Mr. Gow, said "it was a lamentable thing that any son of our country should be murdered in cold blood and not a single move made to bring the murderer to justice." The Local Legislature met in 1872, and a resolution was passed offering a reward of $5,000 for bringing the murderers to trial. The following was the resolution: Sir John Macdonald's Government resigned in the fall of 1873, and in March, 1874, Louis Riel took the oath and subscribed to the members' roll of the Dominion House of Commons. I am not introducing these matters to create bickering or strife or recrimination, but wish to show to hon. members on both sides, to those who were in Parliament then and those who are here now, the line of hypocrisy and double dealing uniformly adopted by the party now in Opposition. I desire to show that in 1871, while the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Cartier were maintaining the rights of the people, were proceeding under constitutional government and respecting constitutional privileges, the hon. gentlemen were fighting them step by step in a manner that they must to-day regret when looking back upon the record. Last night, the member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) said that the amnesty was promised Riel by Sir John A. Macdonald, therefore the leader of the Opposition could not be held responsible, because he had to agree to it. I suppose some hon. gentlemen will endeavor to prove that an amnesty was promised. So far as the amnesty is concerned, I am prepared to prove that the hon. leader of the Opposition not only never mentioned Riel's name, because the elections of 1872 were then pending, when he became Premier of Ontario, but that he never replied in any affirmative way to applications made by those who said they could arrest Riel, and that in letters, and telegrams, and correspondence and documents, he carefully avoided mentioning Riel's name, refusing to recognise him as the murderer, because fearing that whatever he wrote might pass into the Province of Quebec, where he imagined the people were so weak, so narrow, so bigotted as to vote for him and defeat Sir John Macdonald's Government because he was professing to be the friend and protector of Louis Riel. I have said the hon. gentleman never mentioned Louis Riel's name in 1872. I find in the Sessional Papers, No. 38 of 1873, a telegram from Walter R. Brown:

"What amount will be paid on delivery of Louis Riel in Toronto? Answer at once."

The answer was:

"$5,000 will be paid to the persons instrumental in bringing to trial before any competent court, one or more of the murderers of Thomas Scott.

"EDWARD BLAKE."

Mr. Walter R. Brown—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Bown.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. It is spelled Brown in the returns—Bown wanted to know, if he delivered Riel at Toronto, whether he would get the reward. The hon. gentleman who led the Government said the $5,000 would be paid on bringing to trial "one or more of the murderers." Then, the late Hon. John Hillyard Cameron also made an application for Mr. Woodington of Niagara. Mr. Woodington's application was:

"Will you let me know if warrants for the arrest of Riel and Lépin in the United States can be issued in Ontario, and whether they can be brought from there to Ontario under the extradition treaty, provided the charge of murder could be sworn against them? If so, I am prepared to charge Riel and Lépin with the above crime, and make affidavit of the same, as I was one of the prisoners held by the rebels when Scott was taken out and shot, and that I also saw both Riel and Lépin order the men to go out and shoot him. I think the expenses of the journey would not exceed $200, and if that sum is advanced to me and the necessary papers furnished for their arrest, I promise that, within two or three weeks from the day of my leaving, I will land in Toronto either Riel or Lépin, or, perhaps, both. Mr. Woodington is residing at Niagara, and can be vouched for by several respectable persons."

Here is the answer, dated 2nd April, 1872 :

"I have your note with the extract from the letter of Mr. Henry Woodington. It appears Mr. Woodington desires funds to be provided, not exceeding $3,000 for an effort which he proposes to make to procure the trial of some of the murderers of Scott. You will observe that a reward of $5,000 has been offered to any person who is instrumental in accomplishing that result."

Then further down :

"In my private capacity I should be very glad."

Mr. BLAKE. Read it all.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. It is rather long.

Mr. BLAKE. No, it is not long.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I will do so, and can further show the hon. gentleman that under the judgment of Chief Justice Wood, he held that for any money that had been advanced, any work that had been done, the parties were to be recouped, and that that $5,000 was to be given to every Tom, Dick and Harry, whichever happened to see Riel. I will also give him a list of the men to whom it was paid. The following is the remainder of the hon. gentleman's letter :

"It is presumed that the magnitude of the reward would induce those who are able to accomplish it to undertake the work. I have already stated to you that I have received applications from other persons who are desirous to obtain funds for the indicated purpose, and I have been obliged to answer these applications in the same way. I also pointed out to you the possible consequences of so disbursing the public money, inasmuch as it would be out of the question to ensure any result, and numerous applications might be made involving considerable expenses to no good purpose."

Then follows the paragraph that I commenced reading :

"In my private capacity I should be very glad to become a subscriber to any fund for the purpose of accomplishing the indicated object, but, as I have mentioned above, we have no public moneys which we are authorised to dispose of in that way."

Now, that is most of the correspondence that can be found with regard to parties who desired assistance in order to capture Riel; and that is the record of the hon. gentleman who promised action. It will be remembered that Archbishop Taché published a book in 1874, after the change of Government, in which he endeavored to prove that an amnesty was promised. The organ of the Liberal party, the Globe of the 19th March, 1874, said :

"The men who could speak with authority on the subject are still alive, and are still accessible; Lord Lisgar is not beyond reach. Why, if such a promise were given, has he never been referred to, and never asked to state what he knows of the subject? Lord Lisgar is a man of too lofty an integrity and too independent a position to shrink from stating what he knows on the subject. Yet no recourse has been had to him; and, so far as the public is aware, not the slightest effort made to secure his testimony. Sir Clinton Murdoch, whose name has been freely used in this connection, is also perfectly within reach. He is not a man to shrink from avowing what he has said or done. Has there been any attempt made to secure his version of the matter? If not, why not? And there is Sir John Macdonald himself. His late colleague in the Ministry, Governor Morris, has most solemnly declared that he, during all the time he held a portfolio, knew nothing of such a promise or such an amnesty. Why, then, not refer to Sir John himself? We are told that he is the soul of honor, and he is bound by no official oath to conceal such a transaction."

Then, after the Revd. gentlemen's pamphlet was issued, the Globe, on the 9th April, 1874, said :

"The reader cannot fail to have observed: (1.) That no direct proof of any kind can apparently be brought forward to prove the promise of amnesty. (2.) That four years having elapsed, and Archbishop Taché being well informed on the subject, is almost conclusive against the existence of any such proof. (3.) That the proof relied on is hearsay evidence of the most unreliable kind—documents anterior to the crucial circumstance, and inferences from conversations which so far as they are reported, makes against the amnesty theory. As we have said, the difficulty of proving it, the necessity of elaboration, and of having recourse to inadmissible evidence, furnish a strong presumptive case against the theory of a promise being made. How is it there is a record of everything else, and no reliable record of such a promise! The matter may be regarded now as settled, and Riel's friends must take up some other stand than that he is an amnestied man."

Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman said last night that the venerable Archbishop Taché, upon his oath, swore that the amnesty was promised. Allow me to refer to the evidence given by that distinguished prelate before the North-West committee in 1874:—

"The only reason for delaying the granting of the amnesty promised by the proclamation of Sir John Young, that I am aware of, has been the excitement existing throughout the Dominion, and especially in the Province of Ontario. This is not merely my own opinion; it is also the opinion expressed to me by certain members of the late Government. The constant reply which I received when I spoke to them on the subject was, that the excitement was so great that the Government would not be sustained if the amnesty was given. I spoke first of all to Sir George Cartier on the subject, I then spoke to Sir John A. Macdonald, and subsequently to Mr. Langevin. I also spoke on the subject to other members of the Government, but not so minutely, because I was not brought so closely in contact with them. The reply I have quoted was that given me by each member of the Government when I spoke to them."

"In the conversations I had with those gentlemen, I always understood that the amnesty was to be a full, complete and entire one. I never had any conversation on the subject of a partial Manitoba amnesty, under that proclamation. I have had a communication relative to a partial amnesty, but that was not until the year 1873. That communication was with Sir John A. Macdonald, and it was made verbally, not in writing."

Now with regard to the amnesty, a proclamation dated December, 1869, and signed by the Governor General, Sir John Young, was issued in this language :

"And I do lastly inform you that in case of your immediate and peaceable obedience and dispersion, I shall order that no legal proceedings be taken against any parties implicated in these unfortunate breaches of the law."

Added to this, permit me to read an extract from a letter written to Lieut.-Governor Archibald by Archbishop Taché in June, 1870 :

"ST. BONIFACE,
"RED RIVER SETTLEMENT,
"9th June, 1870.

"Hon. JOSEPH HOWE,
"Secretary of State for the Provinces,
"Ottawa, Canada.

"HONORABLE SIR,—I hasten to communicate to you, for the information of His Excellency in Council, a very important promise I have just made in the name of the Canadian Government. I feel all the responsibility I have incurred in taking such a step, while on another hand I am confident that His Excellency the Governor General and his Privy Council will not judge with too much severity an act accomplished in order to avoid great misfortunes and secure the welfare of the country."

Well, the hon. gentleman, as I have shown, has not proved and cannot prove that Archbishop Taché swore that an amnesty had been promised to Riel, after the murder of Thomas Scott was known. However, as a consensus of evidence generally prevails, I will now read the evidence upon that subject. Lord Lisgar wrote to Sir George Cartier early in 1873 :

"I have in recollection the interview which I had with the Reverend Abbé Ritchot upon your introduction and in your presence.

"He dwelt earnestly upon two points :

"First. The redress of the political grievances of the inhabitants of the Red River settlement, with a special reference, as I understood, to land grants."

"Second. On an assurance of the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy to cover all offences."

"I promised to forward, without delay, the petition he speaks of as in preparation, and stated that I felt sure Her Majesty's Government would give full and serious consideration to any pleas which might be urged on behalf of the view he advocated."

"I am quite clear that neither on the occasion in question, nor on any other, did I give an assurance or promise of an amnesty to cover all the offences committed during the insurrection."

"LISGAR."

Here is another from Sir Clinton Murdoch, formerly of the Governor's staff :

"I have no recollection of any promise or expectation of an amnesty to Riel and his associates having been held out by Lord Lisgar, when Mr. Ritchot had an interview with him, in my presence, or at any other time. I scarcely think if such a promise had been made, I could have failed to notice it at the time or to collect it now. As regards Sir George Cartier, I do not remember having ever had any conversation with him on the subject, or being present at any interview when it was discussed between him and Lord Lisgar."

Sir George E. Cartier wrote to Sir John A. Macdonald on the 8th February, 1873 :

"The only thing I can do to-day is to acknowledge the receipt of your last, of the 22nd January, about "Riel" matter.

"I hear Lord Lisgar is to be here in a few days, and I will hasten to see him about what passed at the interview with Father Ritchot. To the best of my recollection nothing went beyond stating that he would transmit Ritchot's petition to the Queen, praying for an amnesty. Bear in mind that oath of us stated to Father Ritchot that the amnesty was a question for the Queen, not for our Government."

Then we have the testimony of Sir Hector Langevin, then Mr. Langevin, on this subject :

"The proclamation of amnesty, dated December 8th, 1869, was issued long before the death of Thomas Scott, and when so issued, it certainly did not contemplate anything else than the legal acts that had been committed up to the time of its issue."

"The causes that have delayed the granting of an amnesty in accordance with the proclamation were, first: that circumstances were altogether changed when the death of Thomas Scott occurred."

"I am not aware of any promise or any amnesty having been made by the Government of Canada further than that contained in the proclamation of 8th December, 1869, or of any promise by any member of the Government on behalf of the Government."

Sir John A. Macdonald also swore that no such amnesty was promised, and this is potently established by a letter.

from Archbishop Taché to hon. Mr. Howe, from which I read an extract:

Yet in face of these facts, hon. gentlemen opposite have, since 1871, endeavored to prejudice the electors throughout Ontario. I had some experience in the election of 1871, and remember that in many counties there were placards circulated—"Vote for the Conservative candidate and the murderer of Thomas Scott." They endeavored to appeal to people of a certain nationality and of a certain denomination throughout the Dominion, and endeavored to excite religious prejudices. But to-day we see the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) rejoicing over the fact that he is here to fight and defend the half-breeds and champion their rights. Before passing on to that matter, I wish to show upon what grounds the amnesty was granted; upon what flimsy basis and evidence hon. gentlemen opposite were prepared to actually decide a question which they said was one of the most vital importance not only to Ontario, but to every man who lived under constitutional government. Amnesty was granted to Riel and Lépine in 1875, and hon. gentlemen opposite deliberately went to work to suppress in the citation, a large portion of the evidence. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) smiles; but he will have an opportunity of showing whether I am correct or not. In the records of Parliament, what do we find? When the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow) introduced a resolution asking the then Government to put on record the evidence given before the committee, the Opposition voted in a body against the evidence being attached to the resolution. Let me read these documents from the evidence before the North-West Committee in 1874, Archbishop Taché stated that:

" * * * On the 25th November the Hon. Mr. Letellier, in his office, said to Bishop Tache, 'I think (or I hope) that we shall be able to give the amnesty to our Lower Canadian friends as a New Year's gift.' That on the 30th November, Bishop Tache saw the Hon. Mr. D'Orion and the Hon. Mr. Letellier, and in his evidence said:—'I was led to believe that they themselves had some guarantees about it (the amnesty). They were not explicit, but I was led to believe it. It was something to the effect that there was an agreement with their colleagues as to the granting of the amnesty. The words as near as I can say were these: 'We cannot settle everything. It is so soon after the formation of the Government. We have hopes that the thing will be arranged in a favorable way according to your wishes; and we see ourselves the necessity of the amnesty.' I remember no further words."

Then followed further telegrams:

"FORT GARRY, 24th December, 1873.

"To the Hon. A. A. DORION, Ottawa.

"Anxious hearing from you. Is communication received. Lépine bailed yesterday.

"ARCHBISHOP TACHE."

"MONTREAL, December 25th, 1873.

"To ARCHBISHOP TACHE.

"I received the gratifying intelligence contained in your telegram. Matters here are progressing slowly but most satisfactorily. In a few days I will write result and about some important questions.

"A. A. DORION."

"OTTAWA, 2nd January, 1874.

"General election immediate. Governor Morris will communicate with you. Of paramount importance for friends to comply with his request. Answer by telegraph.

"J. C. TACHE."

"OTTAWA, January 2nd, 1874.

"To ALEXANDER MORRIS, Fort Garry, Manitoba.

"Will you communicate confidentially to Bishop Tache that I am particularly desirous in the interest of his people, in order to avoid excitement, that Riel should not be a candidate.

"A. A. DORION."

It was well enough according to hon. gentleman, when order was restored, when the Crown was able to maintain its rights, when there were safeguards surrounding the constitution of that country for a Minister of Justice, in order to avoid excitement, and in the interest of peace and harmony, to amnesty Riel; but it was very wrong on the part of the right hon. gentleman who leads this

Mr. MACKINTOSH.

Government, and who led the Government at that time, in 1871, to take the advice of Archbishop Taché, who hon. gentlemen opposite now speak of as in every way reliable, and whose word should always be accepted. It was quite right that Mr. A. A. Dorion should have so acted, but it was a damnable crime, a fearful offence, on the part of the right hon. gentleman, when the North-West was in danger, when a Fenian invasion had just closed, when Governor Archibald did not know at what hour more trouble might arise, when such a long distance intervened between Ottawa and the North-West, and there was no ready means of communication, to have taken the advice of Archbishop Taché and have endeavored to get Riel and Lépine to leave the country for a time until order was restored. The right hon. gentleman has been charged in this connection with saying, "Would that I could catch Riel." Was there anything inconsistent in that expression?

Mr. BLAKE. He was in the country.

Mr. MILLS. He was paid to go out.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I will reply to that point presently. Riel was supposed to be out of the country, and the right hon. gentleman said he would like to catch him. In what connection was that speech delivered? It was in reply to a speech made a few days before by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), in which he had said that, thank God, the offer of the reward that had been made by the Local Government had been the means of chasing Riel out of the country. The right hon. gentleman's statement was simply this: that, "owing to the reward he had offered, Riel no longer polluted the soil of Canada by his presence." Now, with respect to this matter of Riel being out of the country, and paid to stay away during the elections; Riel was in the country in June, 1872. If the right hon. gentleman paid Riel and Lépine $1,000, $2,000 or $4,000, part of it contributed by Hon. D. A. Smith and Governor Archibald to induce them to leave the country for any particular time, how was it that Archbishop Taché had an interview with Riel in June? He swore to this, and Archbishop Taché is a most distinguished prelate whose word would be accepted by anyone. Archbishop Taché said he had an interview with him. Riel and Lépine had received about $3,200. I will now account for $3,500. In the first place the leader of the Government had nothing whatever to do with the payment of that money; he did not know the money was being paid; he had no cognisance of Archbishop Taché having recommended its payment or that Hon. D. A. Smith had promised to help to pay it, he being anxious to protect the interests of the Hudson's Bay Company. We turn again to the records of the party opposite. We turn to the remarks of the leader of the Opposition and we there find the reason for the money being paid. I do not find that the hon. gentleman, from his place in this House, when he occupied a seat adjacent to where the First Minister now sits, condemned the payment of the money; for he said it would be a gross breach of faith if the interests of the country were not protected, and if any promise made in any way by an officer of the Crown holding a position like that occupied by Governor Archibald were in the least degree questioned. We find that the payment of £600 sterling was voted to D. A. Smith on 1st April, 1875, an appropriate date. Some hon. members objected to the item. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) said, no doubt it was a very unpopular vote, but it was also a just one. The hon. gentleman was then in power.

Mr. BLAKE. No; I was not in office.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I do not mean that the hon. gentleman was a member of the Government, because it would be a difficult task to state precisely when he was or was not a member of the Government; but the hon. gentleman's party was in power, and he was virtually the Premier, the dictator; and perhaps he would have made a very good dictator had members of his party allowed him to have his own way. The hon. gentleman said: "What the hon. member for South Leeds said was strictly true. Mr. Archibald, as Governor of that Territory, had apprehension for the safety of the country, and those apprehensions were shared by others qualified to judge of the danger. It was deemed proper in the public interest that this money should be advanced, and it was procured from the hon. member for Selkirk. The right hon. member for Kingston took the same view when the circumstances were stated to him, as would be seen by the evidence of that hon. gentleman before the North-West Committee." Yet we have heard hon. gentlemen charging the Conservative party throughout this country, through the Toronto Globe, and before the constituencies of Ontario, with degrading themselves and the country and the constitution because Hon. D. A. Smith, in protecting the Hudson's Bay Company's interests, advised by Governor Archibald, paid out a certain sum of money without the cognisance of the right hon. gentleman then at the head of the Government. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) said:

"It was deemed proper in the public interest that this money should be advanced, and it was procured from the hon. member for Selkirk. The right hon. member for Kingston took the same view when the circumstances were stated to him, as would be seen by the evidence of that hon. gentleman before the North-West Committee. No doubt Governor Archibald intimated to Mr. Smith that he had no authority to pay this money, but there was equally as little doubt that he pledged the faith of the country as far as he could, to its repayment to the hon. member for Selkirk. This House should respect that pledge and vote money. The hon. member for Kingston would have been unworthy of his position if he failed to respect that pledge, and this House would be equally unworthy, if it refused to repay the money."

Yet, Sir, the hon. gentleman's friends—I do not include him, because I scarcely think he would be capable of it—throughout Ontario, have over and over again represented, since the troubles broke out in the North-West, that the right hon. gentleman paid out public money, paid out secret service money, to keep Riel out of the country during the general election, and this $1,000 and the $3,500 having been made one sum, he is represented as having degraded the constitution, and as having been the means of keeping Riel alive and bringing him into the country to-day. Now, I think I have shown—and I regret to have been obliged to bring the matter up, but we were challenged to do so by the hon. member for West Huron—that the agitation with regard to Riel and the murder of poor Scott, was introduced into the House of Commons by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie); that he was followed with all the great power and ability which the hon. member for West Durham possesses, who carried it into the Local Legislature; spoke of it on the public hustings; offered a reward; refused in those telegrams of 1872 to say whether Riel was considered a murderer or not, and sent a promiscuous telegram, which would cover almost anybody except Riel, in consequence of the general election, and that, after coming into power, he voted that $5,000 reward. Now, as to the disposal of the reward. Judge Wood reported in 1876 to the Ontario Government as follows:—

"In this sense, very many were instrumental in procuring the arrest of Lepine and Nault, and the outlawry of Riel and Donoghue. But I think the word "instrumental" means something more than counselling, approving of, and, when action was taken, supporting and defending those who took the responsibility of setting the law in motion, and of following it up as a private prosecutor until Lepine and Nault, two of the murderers of Scott were brought to trial before a court of competent jurisdiction, and on the trial appearing as prosecutor, and procuring and marshalling the evidence, and witnesses, which led to the conviction of Lepine, and should have secured and, eventually would have secured the conviction of Nault. The jury disagreed in the trial of Queen vs. Nault—tried at the same assizes as Lepine—and at the ensuing assizes, he was bailed in consequence of the amnesty resolutions passed in the House of Commons, and was finally, along with the other murderers of Scott, pardoned.

What became of the money? They made a general distribution, and there was a general grab. William A. Farmer, who served the warrant on Riel, got $2,000; Francis A. Cornish, a very able lawyer, now dead, formerly mayor of London, and then living in Winnipeg, got $400; C. B. Thibaudeau, $400; Léon Dupont, $330; John S. Ingram, $330; Edward Armstrong, (Sheriff), $330; John A. Kerr, $330; George M. Young, $300; Thomas Hughes, $290, and H. W. Smith, $290. In fact one might imagine that almost the whole population of the Province at that time, received a portion of this money.

An hon. MEMBER. Probably they were all Grits.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I do not know whether they were all Grits or not, but I know if there was a distribution of money going on, and there were any Grits around, they would be likely to get a full share of it. I have traced what became of the money, I have shown how Riel was amnestied, I have shown who was responsible for that amnesty, and I have also shown, upon the statement made by gentlemen whose words would not be questioned in any intelligent body, and by the oaths of Ministers, that there was no promise of amnesty to Riel in 1872-3; that the amount of money paid at the suggestion of Archbishop Taché was first $1,000, that Riel was not out of the country, during the election of 1872, and that furthermore, when the Reform party came into power, they paid $3,600 due to Donald A. Smith, at the suggestion of Governor Archibald, and that throughout their whole career, there cannot be shown a weak point in the armour of the Conservative party on that question. People must measure the position in 1874 by a very different standard from that applied in 1870 and 1871, when there was hardly any constituted authority in Manitoba. The people having become enlightened upon these matters having read and judged, have changed their views materially, and they will change their views materially now, when they find the leader of the Opposition, who agitated Ontario from one end to the other, with regard to the outrageous conduct of red handed murderer Riel—to find the hon. gentleman espousing his cause, advocating that Riel's rights and grievances should be redressed—

Mr. BLAKE. I rise to order. The hon. gentleman has no right to state that I have been advocating Riel's cause.

An hon. MEMBER. Yes, he has.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman had better wait until he stops speaking.

Mr. BLAKE. No; I rise to order.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I certainly do not mean it in any offensive sense, and intended, had I not been interrupted, to have added, "as I will show by the evidence of Riel himself." Now, the hon. gentleman has referred to the delegation which waited on Riel at Clarke county, Montana. The hon. gentleman has read a number of extracts from that document, but I observe that he did not read them all, as in the case of many documents he reads official or otherwise. Although he claimed that some of the official documents were missing that should have been supplied by the department of Interior there were certainly some others which were missing, which were in the possession of the hon. gentleman himself, and which he did not read. Riel in reply to Dumont and others who waited on him, said:

"I doubt whether my advice given on this side of the boundary on matters relating to a foreign country can, when known among you, be of any value, but I will submit another consideration. The Canadian Government owe me 240 acres of land, in accordance with clause 31 of the Manitoba Act—

There is where the connection came in. The hon. gentleman being so proud to advocate the grievances of the half-breeds, must have been aware that he was advocating the cause of Riel, who now claims 240 acres of land.

"As well as five lots of a great value, on account of the hay and timber covering them, and of their situation on the river. These lots belong to me in accordance with the various sections of clause 32 of the above mentioned Act, and I have been deprived of them through the direct or indirect action of the Government."

Now, I think the hon. gentleman's amendment certainly covers that case:—

"Besides that, if the Government would only reflect for a moment, they would soon find that they also owe me something in addition to that."

The hon. member for West Huron said it was represented that if Riel was paid some small amount of money, he would leave the country and that if he had left, there would have been no rebellion; so that, in this case we find the hon. gentleman advocating the cause of Riel, advocating his remaining in the country and fighting the battles of the half-breeds, on the ground that coming from Montana he had a claim against the Government and something in addition. Suppose that addition was not paid; suppose the grievances were all settled, and each man got 240 acres, whether he was entitled to it or not; and suppose Riel had that great power and influence he is represented to have, would he be satisfied with 240 acres, or would he claim something else in addition? The hon. gentleman will see the dilemma in which he places himself, and the dilemma he puts me in with regard to voting for his amendment. Now, the hon. member for West Huron and others who have preceded him have said that the Government should have taken warning. I shall show that Riel came to the country a wolf in sheep's clothing, that he had no respect for his friends, that he had no reverence for the priests, that he did not care a snap of his fingers for the church, and that he went there, as ambitious and unprincipled a man in 1885, as he was in 1870; but with regard to Riel's visit being for war or bloodshed, no such construction could be put upon it at the time; in public he was diplomatic and prudent, while behind the curtain, he was working another and evidently far more dangerous game. Working too with the friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite; those Indians of the North-West who have been so oppressed and abused, and malignod and starved. An address of welcome was presented to Mr. Riel on the 8th of July, and his answer to it, as some of the papers said, appeared to be more moderate than some of the agitators desired it to be. One of them, writing to Le Manitoba, on the 10th of July speaks of it in the following terms:—

"It cannot be denied that some of his hearers who expected from him a vigorous onslaught on the Government have been in a measure disappointed. But Mr. Riel is not a political man neither was his speech addressed to a political meeting."

Still we were told last night that he is a warm friend and supporter of the right hon. gentleman who leads this Government—

"He referred to the means which should be taken to obtain redress for their grievances, and stated that in order to obtain something from a Government, no threats should be used, but that their requests should be couched in terms of respect and confidence in the manner in which a respectful child speaks to a kind father."

My impression is that a good many kind fathers in this country would not care to have their children speak to them in the way Mr. Riel has spoken to the Government and people of this country. The result of this first interview was the convocation of a public meeting at Prince Albert on the 11th of July following; and the correspondent of Le Manitoba speaks of Riel as follows:

"It is admitted on all sides that the ex-president is a quiet, moderate and well informed man, appearing well worthy of the confidence his countrymen have placed in him."

Another meeting was held at Prince Albert, on the 19th of July, at which Riel spoke. The correspondent of Le Manitoba writes of his speech as follows:—

"He wishes to co-operate with all of them in harmony and in peace, in order to obtain from the Government that which is just. In order to succeed they must use none other than constitutional and pacific means."

Later on, he said:

"He spoke of the Indians and the half-breeds. He does not believe that they have as yet received sufficient compensation for the enormous extent of lands which have been taken away from them. They should not be trifled with or treated unfairly; otherwise, they may become dangerous."

Then, on the 29th of July, 1884, the Le Manitoba received a communication from Prince Albert, which said:

"Big Bear, a chief of the Crees, and a very intelligent person, who has always given much annoyance to the Government, and is now stationed
Mr. MACKINTOSH,

In the neighborhood of Battleford, is on the way to St. Laurent, where he purposes to have an interview with Riel. It is certain that most of the Indian chiefs will try to confer with Riel, but he will only give them good advice, and whilst assuring them that he will do all in his power for their benefit, he will not bias their minds so as to render them intractable."

Then came his meeting with his Lordship Bishop Grandin on the 5th of September, which I need not now refer to, and a later meeting in January. Then we lose sight completely of Louis Riel, until the trouble broke out in March.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I am quoting now from the document in my hand, that nothing more was heard of him until the rebellion broke out:

"This was the last heard of Riel, till it was announced that he had taken possession of the stores at Batoche, that he had made prisoners, that his soldiers, under the command of Dumont, had routed the Mounted Police at Duck Lake."

That is an extract from Le Manitoba. Then what do we find? We find not one of the Reform papers prepared to assist the Government by even sympathetic or patriotic advice, but rather proving recreant to their trust by the most ungenerous criticism and by such a course as promised to give infinite relief and encouragement to the rebels of the North-West. The very moment the trouble commenced, that very moment the Globe made the following remarks:—

"Sir John Macdonald admits that matters looked so serious last summer that it was thought prudent to have an additional force in the vicinity of Prince Albert, that Major Crozier and a 100 men were sent to Carlton, a Hudson Bay Company's post, the use of which was obtained for this purpose. He did nothing, however, but send these policemen to overawe the discontented. Masterly inactivity, perhaps, he imagined, would make the way easy out of this difficulty also. His favorite, Mr Dewdney, and the gang who form that potentate's court are not the men to trouble themselves about the grumbings and repining of a few half-breeds whom it would be so easy to crush if they dared to go too far. Their insolence, their swaggering, and hectoring and bullying, no doubt increased the irritation caused by the neglect of the Dominion Government."

Here, in 1885, we find precisely a repetition of the conduct of this paper and its party in 1869-70, glorying over the ruin of the North-West, glorying over trouble in Nova Scotia, glorying over trouble wherever it could be fomented, hoping, by exciting religious bickerings and sectional feelings, to secure a party advantage. I could quote further from the Globe in the same tone, but do not desire to unduly occupy the time of the House. But we find what the Yankees call the "whoop-la business" done by the organ of the Opposition in this city. On the 28th of March, when the report came that some of our unfortunate friends had died in the defence of Canada's rights and privileges, what do we find that paper saying?

"The responsibility for the dreadful massacre near Duck Lake—for it was a massacre—rests upon the present Dominion Government. The blood guiltiness lies with them."

Well, one could imagine during a heated time, when the passions of the people were aroused, a writer making a remark of this kind; but I can scarcely imagine, and I do not think any hon. gentleman could, had he not heard it last night, imagine that a member of this house would, in cold blood, charge this reckless, incompetent, extravagant and ignorant Government—

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). And imbecile.

Mr. MACKINTOSH—with the responsibility of shedding oceans of blood. The Ottawa Free Press further said:—

"The deplorable state of affairs there is the natural outcome of their infamous system of North-West administration, which wronged, oppressed and plundered the white and half-breed alike."

Here again was a message sent to the people of the North-West: You have shed the blood of your brothers; the Reform party will stand by you and defend you; and they are carrying out their pledge now. Go on; strike blow after blow at the constitution; take the lives of innocent men; kidnap women—perpetrate all these crimes, and our distinguished leader will rise in his place in Parliament a few weeks from now and say he rejoices over the fact that, not being of your race, he can all the better plead the cause of the poor half-breed. That message went out, the glad tidings of sympathisers in the older Provinces were flashed across the wires, and rebels were made happy, hopeful and aggressive. Knowing these things, one turns involuntarily to a vacant chair in this House, at which none of us can look without moistened eyes; and all feel it and know it to be an insult to tell us we are responsible for sending out our brothers to the North-West to be murdered in cold blood or to die from the effect of war's hardships. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cameron) knows, when the record comes to be written, it will not be the record he represents, but a constitutional record, written, I hope, by one who values his own position in politics and in public life, and who would therefore scorn to resort to such petty and ungenerous tactics. The hon. gentleman told us that the Government should have been on its guard, seeing there was so much trouble brewing, and should have done something to maintain the peace, honor and happiness of the North-West. Why, the very fact that the Department of Indian Affairs sent 100 policemen to Prince Albert was the signal, as shown in these documents, for the general uprising and the murder at Duck Lake. Had the Government hastily sent soldiers up there months ago, what would have been the cry? It would have been: "Oh! there is your policy; that is to save the ranchers and the colonisation companies." There would have been a howl against military expenditure, against the utilising the army of snobbery, as it was called in 1883, when the Minister of Militia undertook the re-organisation of the militia. The Government would have been charged with deliberately squandering the money of the country in order to save the colonisation companies, and the timber lands, and the rancho lands of their friends, and with oppressing and tyrannising over the poor half-breeds; and instead of the amendment now under discussion, we would have had to discuss an amendment of a very different character. The hon. gentleman last night deemed proper to insult the Government and the party of which I am an humble member by referring to the colonisation companies; and he insinuated that they had caused all the trouble. What do I find? Here is the prospectus of the Dominion Land Colonisation Co. (Limited), capital $500,000; president, H. S. Howland, and solicitors, Messrs. Blake, Kerr and Cassels. Mr. Howland—a leading Reformer, and the solicitors—well the first name is enough. Does anyone in his senses say that a colonisation company, which had paid a large sum of money into the Government for land, was going deliberately to ruin its prospects by fomenting a rebellion. Yet that is what hon. gentlemen opposite charged the colonisation companies with. Would any one believe the leader of the Opposition would act for a colonisation company that had such hellish designs in view? The hon. gentleman talked too about timber limits having been given to supporters of the Government. As I have never been interested in one acre of land in the North-West—and I am happy now, to be able to say so—I can speak without prejudice; but I desire to call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that when his party was in power, this Reform party, which has such respect for the feelings and the instincts of the people, and such high regard for constitutional honor, it signalled its closing hours of office by a remarkable transaction. When the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was Minister of the Interior in the Mackenzie Administration, of which the hon. member for West Huron was a warm supporter—though not quite so active as he is now, in Opposition—this gentleman, after the people had voted non-confidence in him and his leader, met his colleagues in council, and proceeded to encumber and hand over to a monopoly nearly all the timber lands in the valley of the Saskatchewan. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) shakes his head; but I have the Order in Council, passed on the 7th of October, 1878:

"The Minister of Interior reported on 4th October, representing that being of opinion that it would encourage and facilitate settlement in the valley of the Saskatchewan if facilities were afforded for obtaining lumber at a reasonable price, which he understands cannot be done at the present time—he recommends that a timber limit to the extent of 200 square miles on the Saskatchewan River and its tributaries in the North West Territories, be granted to Messrs. Cooke and Sutherland, the same to be selected by them in blocks of not less than 20 square miles—the bonus payable on the said limit to be at the rate of $15 per square mile."

Well, he found his friends were not quite satisfied, and he thought he ought to do something more to facilitate the progress and comfort of the people of the North-West and particularly of the Saskatchewan valley, and he added:

"That the applicants shall have a period of 3 years within which to make selection of limits."

The Government was then just going out; they had been beaten on the 17th of September, 1878, and the day before resigning they passed this Order in Council. One sees the injudiciousness of the proposition of the Crown. The proposition was to give control to a combination, over 200 square miles of timber lands throughout the Saskatchewan valley, to be picked out in lots of 20 square miles. The consequence would be, they would get all the good timber and have at least from 10 to 20 monopolies throughout that country—and that was to decrease the price of timber. It was to give the settlers cheap timber, but to put the timber into twelve monopolies instead of one, but that one controlling the twelve.

"That the applicants shall have a period of three years within which to make selections of the limit, which shall not interfere with any lands which may be set apart for the Canadian Pacific Railway, or for reserves for Indians or school lands, or with any other timber limits which may have been previously granted."

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." He knows that some of these timber limits were then in the hands of their friends and were under the control of these men. They changed the men, but not the object.

"The Committee submit the foregoing recommendation for Your Excellency's approval.

"W. A. HIMSWORTH,
"Clerk Privy Council."

On the 26th December that order was cancelled by the Conservative Government, yet the gentleman who endeavoured to perpetrate this job call themselves the friends of the half-breeds and the would be saviours of the North-West. If the half-breeds merely want friends who are always professing to plead for them, the country can do no better than to keep these hon. gentlemen in Opposition, for certainly, from 1873 to 1878, it cannot be proved from the record that they ever lifted their hands to help the half-breeds, or the surveys either. The next thoughtful act of the member for Bothwell, as Minister of Interior, was to introduce a Colonisation Railway Bill in March, 1878.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I know there is no Bill that the hon. gentleman is prouder of, and perhaps the reasons are that he withdrew it, and it never became an Act. The hon. gentleman has said a great deal about settlers' rights, and we shall hear a good deal more from him presently on that subject, and the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) has talked about them, and the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has also talked about settlers' rights. In regard to this Bill, of which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is so proud, I ask the House to allow me to dissect a few paragraphs. The hon. gentleman was afraid of railway monopolies. After providing for the Pacific Railway, he proposed to give all the lands of the North-West to any number of companies, and to locate and allot that land so soon as the companies were formed, and put up a percentage on the stock it was necessary to subscribe. The hon. gentleman has his ideas in reference to the homestead settler. Listen to this:

"The Governor in Council may vary or entirely change the mode of disposal of Dominion lands lying within a certain distance of a railway constructed under this Act, as regards homesteads, pre-emptions, sales and bounty land entries from those contained in the Dominion Lands Act, by reducing the quantity of land which may be granted in free homesteads or by withdrawing the homestead right altogether on such lands, and may fix a price for such lands, and order that such lands may be sold exclusively for cash, with or without conditions of actual settlement, as may be deemed expedient."

Here the hon. gentleman who objects to the land regulations of this Government, under this clause of a colonisation Bill introduced the system of clothing the Governor in Council with power to fix the cash price, and, unless the poor settler paid the cash, he had to get off. Then the villages, the town sites, all these were pounced upon, and section 28 provided that:

"Nothing in this Act shall be construed as binding the Government to acknowledge any right to land settled on, or for any improvements effected on and within the limits of any tract reserved for a village or town site along or upon the line of railway, after public notice shall have been given of such land being reserved for such purpose."

That is, if parties were on the land, if they had squatted on the land—the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) shakes his head. He can shake his head now, but had this Act been in force, we would have hung his head regretfully instead of shaking it:

"And in case of any person having settled on land found to be necessary for villages or for town sites."

If any of the railway autocrats came along, and said to the Minister of Interior: I want that land; we are going to build a station there, or a church, or to locate a town there, or to lay the foundation of a large village, the settler would have to go off, no matter if he had his family around him, and if he had surrounded himself with all the sources of comfort. What was to take place?

"Although such settlement may have been effected previous to public notice as above."

Although no notice had been there to warn him that he was going on forbidden ground, yet that august gentleman, the Minister of the Interior, because Reform Ministers are all august, assumed autocratic power:

"the Minister of the Interior may resume possession of such lands,—"
May come out in the character of bailiff, clothed with purple and fine linen, and may tell the settler that the land is wanted and he must go. But there was a compensation. What was it?

"and compensate such person, by allotting him other land in lieu thereof, and paying for his improvements."

That is, a man goes to Regina, takes his son with him, takes his family, surrounds them with comforts, and the Government tell him: There is no land there; it is given to a company that is going to build a railway. Well, he asks: I can go to Qu'Appelle? No; there is another railway company there. Where can I go? Well, you can go north of Fort Pitt. That is precisely the power the Government took to itself, and this is the policy the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) has, since last night, been endeavoring to defend. The hon. member wanted to know something about half-breed claims and half-breed lands, and he shed a good many crocodile tears on the subject. He has asked us to rub the sponge over the slate and commence at 1879, but we cannot do that. The legacy left by the previous Government is what has worked much of the trouble in the North-West to-day and we cannot possibly trace that or prove it, or substantiate it, unless we go to that record and see the policy which they followed, the mistakes which they made, the wrongs they committed, and the entangled web which they left hon. gentlemen who succeeded them in office to unravel. That so called Reform Government was in power in November, 1873, 1874, 1875, 1876; they were in power in 1877 and during a part of 1878, and the country breathed freely during the latter part of 1873, when they went out. They were in power in 1877, and what was the evidence recorded by their own friends at that time? During the Session of 1877 Mr. Ryan, of Marquette, who supported them most of the time they were in power, on a motion for correspondence in regard to half-breed lands in Manitoba, said:

"From the time the reserves were established, in 1872, nothing was done about the matter until 1875, although occasionally a good deal was said. During the latter Session he called the attention of the House and the Government to the fact that these reserves were blocking the path of provincial progress. The hon. Mr. Laird, at that time Minister of Interior, in reply to a question asked by him, stated that the delay in settling the matter had arisen from conflicting claims, called staked claims. At the same time, the hon. gentleman took occasion to assure him that a decision had been arrived at upon the question of staked claims, and that the Government were prepared at once to proceed to the distribution. He (Mr. Ryan) knew fully at the time, as he knew now, that the answer was neither full nor satisfactory. As in many reserves, amongst others, the reserves for the half-breeds of White Mud River, Portage la Prairie, High Bluff and Poplar Point, in the county of West Marquette, not a single case of staked claims had arisen, and, therefore, there was no reason for the delay in these parishes."

Although there were no stake claims, the Minister stated to his friend, in 1875, that it was on account of the stake claims in this particular district that the lands had not been allotted. I will show more than that:

"The year passed away, but the promise respecting the distribution of the reserves had not been fulfilled."

Now, if Mr. Ryan had known the hon. gentlemen opposite as we know them, and as the people of Ontario have known them since 1874, he would have known that never, during all their existence as a party, did they ever carry out in power what they had promised in Opposition. But Mr. Ryan was an innocent man, and he left the House disappointed, and, I believe, took a seat upon the bench a year or two after:—

"The year passed away, and again, during the course of last Session, he felt it to be his duty to remind the Minister of the Interior that his promise respecting the distribution of the reserves had not been fulfilled. Again he had received an assurance that the Government were going to abate the nuisance at once and to distribute the reserves. Another twelve months having expired, he found his half-breed constituents and the Province of Manitoba precisely in the same position they had occupied during the last five years."

Here were gentlemen who, for four years, had been making promises and making exaggerated statements of their duties in regard to the allotment of these lands, whereas the statements of the settlers show there were no stake claims. I will shortly prove that while they were telling the settlers about these stake claims, and holding them up as a raw head and bloody bones, they had already passed Orders in Council, in 1876, refusing to recognise in any way whatever with stake claims. Mr. Mills, in reply, stated:

"On assuming office, his attention was almost immediately directed to the subject. The hon. member for Marquette was, of course, aware that provision was made for the allotment of the land into half-breed settlements, and that before any action was taken claims were put forward on behalf of private parties to particular tracts of land within the district. On investigation, it was found that there were several hundreds of these claims. All possible information was obtained, in order that the claims might be disposed of at the earliest practicable day; and he trusted that this would be very soon. The Government were fully aware of the mischief which had resulted to Manitoba from no action being taken in allotting the land, and they had considered the injury occasioned by locking up lands by merely changing the form of reservation."

To-day the hon. gentlemen charge the Government with offences for which they themselves are responsible, by adopting their policy with regard to stake claims and refusing to admit settlers' claims. There were in the North-West men of influence, men of substance, men of industry, who were driven off their lands by the action of these hon. gentlemen. Some of the very disaffected parties who are now inciting trouble in the North-West are people who were driven out of Manitoba by the Orders in Council passed by the hon. gentlemen opposite.

After Recess.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I have shown that the party opposed to the present Government, from 1869 up to the present time, has on all occasions utilised any sectional or national troubles to benefit themselves and to promote their party's interest, irrespective of the effect it would have upon the country in general. I have shown that throughout their policy has been one for office and not for the promotion of the country's interests. When the House rose at recess I was referring to the settlement of the half-breeds' land in Manitoba, and the non-allotment of those lands in 1877. I showed that the then Minister of the Interior admitted that the dilatory policy of the Government worked mischief to Manitoba; I have shown that one of the representatives of Manitoba stated that the lack of attention to their duties on the part of the Government was blocking the path of provincial progress. I have shown that during all that time nothing but promises, promises, promises, were given in return for the support of the country. I have shown that from November, 1873, to September, 1878, their policy was one of indifference and inaction. I have shown that the only effort they made to redeem themselves in the public estimation was on the 7th October, 1878, when they passed their infamous Orders in Council to give to Cook and Sutherland entire control of the timber limits of the North-West. Now, the hon. gentleman who preceded me dealt very strongly and, to a certain extent, very cogently—at any rate, very insultingly—with the policy of the Government led by the right hon. Premier in connection with lands and limits. I stated that I would show by the Orders in Council passed by the preceding Government in 1876, when the hon. member for Bothwell was Minister of the Interior, what their policy was with regard to stake claims. I find, in a report of the Committee of the Privy Council, a memorandum of the 20th April, 1876:

“On a memorandum, dated 29th January, 1876, from the hon. the Minister of the Interior, reporting the existence of certain claims to land in Manitoba, which, he states, do not come clearly within those provided for under the law as it now stands.”

I will take No. 2 of the classification.

“2. Lands alleged to have been taken up, but which were not surveyed as above, or occupied, but merely marked out by the claimants, by stakes, prior to the 15th July, 1877.”

“The second class the Minister submits are not entitled to consideration.”

I have shown by this Order in Council that the policy adopted by the then Minister of the Interior resulted in a number of people leaving Manitoba and going to the North-West. I have stated that those who went there did so as men driven from the Province they had adopted, and, being driven out, became disaffected members of society in the Territories. I have stated further, that upon the Conservative Government coming into power they calmly deliberated the matter, and the result was that on 25th February, 1881, a report of the Committee of the Privy Council was adopted, in which it is stated:

“On a memorandum dated 23rd February, 1881, from the hon. the Minister of the Interior, in reference to the Order in Council of the 20th April, 1876, on the subject of certain claims to land in Manitoba, and adopting a certain mode of dealing with the same.

“The Minister reports that exception has been taken by the persons interested in the operation of that Order, in respect of the particular class of claims set forth in paragraph No. 2 of the same, it being alleged that a settlement of their rights on the basis of the said order would result in injustice to the claimants.”

The Order in Council further stated:

“For convenience in dealing with the question, the Minister classifies the several claims as follows:—

“1. Those of such claims as have changed hands, the purchasers having in some cases gone into possession, and are living on the land at the present time.

“2. Those of the claims so staked out, which remain exactly as they were when it is alleged they were taken up, and are claimed by the persons who staked them out.

“3. Those claims which, since being staked out, have been bought up by other parties, for, it is said, speculative purposes, and are now held with that view, nothing having been done upon them in the way of cultivation or improvement.”

This is the second class dealt with by the Minister of the Interior in 1876:

“Respecting the second class, that the lands be offered to the claimants at the price of railway lands in the belt in which they are found to be situated, but should the claimant in any case prefer to do so, he may accept a homestead entry for 160 acres of the lot, and acquire the balance at the railway lands price, as before mentioned.”

Mr. MILLS. What is the date of that Order?

Mr. MACKINTOSH. The date is the 23rd February, 1881. I have shown that whereas the present Government is charged with dilatoriness, that charge really lies at the door of hon. gentlemen opposite. I have shown by evidence and I can show by further evidence—that hon. gentlemen opposite were absolutely indifferent to the claims of the half-breeds; that they never thought of the claims of the poor Indians, that they thought solely of their friends, and when they enlarged the boundaries of the allotments to half-breeds to 240 acres, based upon a partial return, and done, many declare, to help those who had bought scrip from the poor half-breeds—they laid the foundation of what has caused half the trouble in the North-West. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) stated that the grievances of the people of the North-West were the result of inaction—inaction in regard to the surveys, indifference, proved by the small number of patents issued, and the non-settlement of claims. I will ask the House to allow me to draw a comparison between the number of patents issued by the present Government and those issued by the preceding Government. The total number of patents issued in Manitoba and the North-West Territories up to the 27th February, 1885, was 23,036. Issued from 5th May, 1873, to January, 1879, 6,500. Those patents were issued and claims settled by hon. gentlemen opposite at a time when they were promising, year after year, from 1873 to 1878, that they would make a final arrangement and have the trouble amicably settled. The number of patents issued from 1st January, 1879, to 27th February, 1885, was 16,537, as compared with 6,500 issued between 1873 and 1879. The hon. member for Bothwell, when Minister of the Interior, wrote to the Dominion land agent, at Winnipeg, as follows:—

This letter was in reply to a communication from a gentleman living on the spot, who knew the feelings of the people, who understood the instincts of the people, and saw future trouble engendered from want of policy and want of tact. The Dominion land agent laid down a policy which, if adopted by the hon. gentleman, would have created more happiness and comfort than exists in the North-West and Manitoba to-day.

Mr. MILLS. That observation was made upon a memorandum to Mr. Codd, and Mr. Codd had already suggested exactly the same line.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I am perfectly willing to accept the explanation of the hon. gentleman; but it is very strange that the Dominion agent, if he desired to induce the Minister to adopt—

Mr. MILLS. It was not an Indian agent. It was Mr. Codd; and if the hon. gentleman will look at Mr. Codd's letter he will find that Mr. Codd presented exactly the same view.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. Then the hon. member has only proved that not alone was he incompetent, but the Dominion agent as well. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) talked about surveys, and said what the half-breeds wanted was surveys. The other night the First Minister displayed a map which afforded very suggestive and significant proof of the lack of action on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. From that map I find that the land surveyed up to 1873, from the time that Canada became seized of the territory of Rupert's Land, and the North-West Territories, from the time that Manitoba got a constitution, amounted to 9,999,000 acres; and the progressive, brilliant, patriotic, statesmanlike, all-the-talents Government which came in in 1873, succeeded, in five years, by a remarkable effort and an energy almost unparalleled in the history of reform, in surveying 1,797,000 acres. I find that under the present incompetent, ignorant, imbecile Administration which I have the honor to support, and which the country endorsed, from the time they came into power, in 1879, down to 1884, there were 55,618,500 acres surveyed. And we are told that what the half-breeds want, and what the poor starving Indians want, are surveys. Well, Sir, I do not know what food could be extracted from a survey by a starving Indian; I do not know what particular pleasure would accrue to a half-breed by seeing surveys, from which he was deriving no benefit. So far as the half-breeds are concerned, we are told that there has been an absolute want of action, and a non-settlement of claims on the part of the Government. Now, I find that in 1883 the land board met at Prince Albert, Mr. Pearce being the leading member of it, and they sat and adjusted a large number of claims. In 1884 Mr. Pearce went to Calgary, Edmonton and Battleford, contrary to the statements made by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and which, despite the evidence I am now giving, will probably be repeated by the hon. member for Bothwell. He visited the South Saskatchewan and did a large amount of work, subsequently leaving to Mr. Duck, the agent at Prince Albert, the settlement of claims on the South Saskatchewan—the claims of men who had come there and taken up land and forcibly made settlers of themselves. I think I have shown that so far as patents issued are concerned, want of action and utter indifference were alone shown by the hon. member for Bothwell when he was Minister of the Interior. So far as the duties performed by Mr. Pearce and the land board are concerned, there was rapid and active work, and instead of condemning hon. gentlemen opposite, from their own records, should have been the first to have endorsed it. They appear to forget, too, that their negligence in surveys, in allotments and in locations, allowed years to elapse, thereby making it difficult to find the rightful owners or claimants, and that by annulling Governor Archibald's enumeration they lost several years and completely reversed the policy of their predecessors. But with that party blindness which drove them out of power, and which will keep them out of power for many years, these hon. gentlemen proceed, in the face of evidence that they cannot gainsay, to condemn the present Government as one wanting in action, one neglectful of its duties to the country. The hon. member for West Huron said, where is the Prime Minister, and why is he not present to hear my indictment? And what was the indictment? Was it one which a leading public man should bring against any Government? No, Sir; it was a series of extracts from newspapers, and a denial on the part of the hon. gentleman that he was actuated by any motive save the public interest. When the dates of these papers were asked he took it as a personal affront, and gave the date of only one extract from the Toronto Mail of March last. He alluded also to an extract from La Minerve. Why, Sir, had the hon. gentleman desired to do so, he could have found in La Minerve of the next day an article by the regular editor, manager and controller of that paper, stating that the article to which the hon. gentleman referred was smuggled into the editorial columns of that journal. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman, instead of making that statement, omitted these facts. Do these hon. gentlemen imagine that the people of this country are not intelligent? The people had a Government, of which the hon. gentleman was a leading representative, in power from 1873 to 1878, and we know that so far as the Hon. Mr. Laird is concerned, who preceded the hon. member for Bothwell as Minister of the Interior, so soon as that gentleman was found incompetent, was found not to answer just exactly what the Reform party required, as Minister of Interior, he was sent up to formulate and regulate a policy for the great North-West. He was given control over the larger territory and the larger interest, and the hon. member for Bothwell took his place, and I think the hon. gentleman, in his inner consciousness, knows what state that Department was in when he entered it, and how much credit it reflected on his predecessor. If Mr. Laird was competent, if he was an able and brilliant statesman, why did they not keep him in the Government? But, no; they sent him to the North-West, to make treaties with the Indians, and I ask why it was, while he was there, that he did not in those treaties arrange for the allotment and the settlement of those claims. And when the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) talks about the Indians having no rations, about their being badly treated, about their starving, I ask him if in any of the treaties they can find obligations entered into by the then Government, or by any Government controlling the interests of Canada, at that time, promises or engagements to ration those Indians? I ask hon. gentlemen who have moved an amendment in the interests of the half-breeds, and in the interest of their leader, M. Riel, the claimant of 240 acres of land, the claimant of five lots, who says he has many other additional claims to make—I ask if they knew what the policy of Riel was. If they did not know, they should not have introduced that resolution, because I think those gentlemen have read the records, they know the history of the uprising, and they have taken far more interest in knowing more of him and those connected with him than they have with regard to the interests of the Dominion at large. I find that Riel, writing to Bishop Grandin, at the time when he pretended to be acting in the interests of peace and harmony and constitutional government, treating this Government as a child should its father, said:

"Here is what we request for the present until Canada becomes able to pay each year the interest on the capital representing the value of our country, and until public opinion consents to recognise our rights to the land, to their full extent."

I ask hon. gentlemen to weigh this evidence, this statement, and see what it means. They know what they did for Riel in 1874. We know now what they are trying to do for him. They are trying to cloak the wrong-doing of that agitator by a vote of Parliament, though I do not assert they are doing it with a rebellious thought or feeling.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes; they are.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. But I know that party passion has misled them, that it is carrying them to an extent they will much regret in the future, when they come to meet the people at the polls; and what has the result been? Does Riel say to that distinguished prelate of his church: Give us these rights; give us responsible government; give us our land, and we will be satisfied. No; he says we are willing to take that for the present only, until public opinion consents to recognise our rights to the land to the full extent. What does that mean? It means that any compromise with those people now would mean future trouble and misery in the North-West. Even with the heads of the Church, Riel was mysterious, as proved by Bishop Grandin's words at the meeting in September last, when that dignitary made a speech as follows:—

"The venerable prelate said that if for some time past the relations between the clergy and the half-breed population with regard to what had taken place appeared cold and unsympathetic, that reserve on the part of the clergy did not argue any diminution of affection or charity, but was simply actuated by the extreme prudence which the actual circumstances demanded on account of the mystery in which they (the half-breeds) had thought proper to envelop their proceedings up to that day—a mystery which not only left the clergy without sufficient knowledge on which to base a clear and well-founded judgement, but which, moreover, gave rise to serious suspicions, to fears and disquietudes that were absolutely painful. 'Only speak out honestly,' added his Lordship; 'only let us know distinctly what your desires and aims are, and we will give you our opinion and counsel. If justice is on your side, we will sustain you with all our strength and influence, as we have ever done in like circumstances in the past.'"

Louis Riel is no common man; he knows the instincts of his people; he knows what control he has over them; and he knew, when he wrote letters to different respectable people, that if he was paid a certain amount of money he would go out of the country and the trouble would cease, that at some future time he could come back, and bring misery and tribulation and depression upon the North-West. But we find hon. gentlemen opposite willing to endorse Riel's policy and Riel's duplicity. Now, the hon. gentleman has sneered at the land regulations introduced by this Government. I ask if, from his place in this House, he dare contrast the vacillating land regulations of the Government of Mr. Mackenzie, in 1874, with the land regulations improved upon and adopted by the present Administration. I have shown that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in his colonisation Bill, proposed to sow the seeds of disunion and trouble for the struggling settler in the North-West—that he not only set apart the territory for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but did this also for different colonisation railway companies, thus allowing Americans to come in and control the trade of the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, thus diverting that to the United States. Now, if the House will permit me, I wish to contrast the land regulations of the present Government with the land regulations of the former Government, and both with those of the United States, which have been so frequently eulogised by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Chariton), and other hon. gentlemen opposite. Under the regulations of the late Government, no homestead and pre-emption grants were allowed, no sale of lands for cash was permitted, except under the peculiar clause in the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Bothwell, in 1878, which allowed favored classes to come in and claim the land and pay cash for it; thus certain men who were making a living by traffic along the railways, and had very little money, were put into the hands of a lot of land grabbers and speculators. No one was allowed to have more than 340 acres; $1 per acre, cash down, was demanded, and the balance was to be paid at whatever time and at whatever price the Government might fix; actual settlement was to begin within a year, on pain of forfeiture of all payments. The House is doubtless aware that there have been various changes made in the land regulations by the present Government, according as the progress and development of the country required them, as the reports of agents came in, and as the opinions of Ministers were ripened and matured by experience. Homesteads of 160 acres each may now be obtained, on all the even-numbered sections (not otherwise disposed of), upon the simple payment of $10 of an office fee. In the mile belt, that is the land one mile in width on each side of the railway, the actual settler must begin residence within six months, and break up his homestead land at a certain number of acres. Outside of the mile belt the homesteader may begin occupation within six months, and live only six months per annum on his grant, cultivating it, of course. The homesteader may reside within a radius of two miles of his land for the three years succeeding his entry. This is a particularly liberal provision, as it enables the settler to board for two or three seasons, or half a dozen to club together and live in comfort while cultivating their land. A homesteader may purchase his grant outright, if he pleases, after he has lived on it a year and cultivated thirty acres. A pre-emption plot of 160 acres can be had at the same time as the homestead grant, at $2.50 per acre, or, in some parts, for $2 per acre. On payment of a fee of 50 cents, a settler may get a permit to cut 30 cords of wood, 1,800 lineal feet of logs, 2,000 cubic feet of rails, and 400 roof rails. Payments for lands may be in cash, scrip, or police or military bounty warrants. Now, having shown that the land policy of the present Government is infinitely superior to and more liberal than that of the preceding Government, I wish to refer to that which some hon. gentlemen laud as everything that is wise and just and progressive—the land policy of the United States. In Canada, the land regulation grants to every actual settler a free homestead, and a pre-emption adjoining. In the United States a homestead and pre-emption cannot adjoin, and cannot be held at the same time. In Canada, pre-emption is the right to purchase a lot adjoining a free grant, when the homesteader is entitled to his free patent. In the United States, pre-emption means the right to purchase a homestead lot, after living on it and improving it for not less than twelve months. In Canada, a man can get two homesteads and pre-emptions. In the United States, only one can be obtained. In Canada, the condition of ownership is three years' settlement and cultivation. In the United States, the term is five years. In Canada, a youth of eighteen years of age has the right to a homestead and pre-emption. In the United States, he must be twenty-one years old. For young men, therefore, Canada is three years ahead of the United States. In the United States, no person who is owner of 320 acres in any State or Territory can obtain a homestead. In Canada, the only condition for securing homestead and pre-emption is, that the man shall actually reside on the land. He may own lands in other places, without that fact preventing him obtaining his free grant and pre-emption. Now, I submit to the House that comparison of the land system of Mr. Mackenzie's Government with the land system of the present Administration, and the existing system, as contrasted with that of the United States, shows that our regulations in Canada are far more liberal and progressive in all that contributes to promote the public welfare and the public interest. The hon. member for West Huron dealt at length with the Indian question. That question has been treated with force, ability, power and exhaustiveness by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard); I shall, therefore, not allude to it at any length, but would remind the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that he, as Minister of the Interior, must have realised that at some future period there would be trouble with the Indians in the North-West, even when he did not know that Riel was plotting, or that an incipient rebellion was threatening that country. In 1879, when a Bill was brought in to increase the Mounted Police force to 500 men, the hon. member for Bothwell said:

"He was strongly impressed with the idea that there was danger of difficulties with the aborigines at no very remote period. He believed the supply of buffalo would, at an early day, be exhausted, these buffalo being the principal means of support of the Indians; and unless something was done at an early day to induce them to engage in industrial pursuits, serious complications would arise, when their present means of subsistence failed."

"Sir John Macdonald said no doubt the danger the hon. gentleman mentioned must always be contemplated. The Government and Parliament must be prepared for an outbreak some time, when the Indians' means of subsistence failed or became scarce."

"Mr. Mills has no doubt, before the time of the present Parliament expired, serious troubles would be witnessed in the North-West."

That was in 1879. The hon. member for Bothwell was a little previous in his prophetic fears; but I ask the hon. member for West Huron how, in the face of the fact that millions of dollars have been expended, that intelligent instructors using every advantage that civilization could afford have been provided, he can assert that the Government have ill-treated the Indians. The hon. member for West Huron quoted from different books and reports. I observed that he dropped his voice at the dates, and very frequently I could not hear them. I do not now know what particular years he mentioned or what particular reports he quoted from; but as the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier has dealt with that question, with great ability and as his statements will go the country, I am willing to put his arguments against those of three or four gentlemen of the same calibre as the hon. member for West Huron. It may, however, in this connection be imagined that I am not doing justice to the ex-Minister of the Interior. I forgot that we then had a sanguinary Minister of Interior; I forgot that his policy was, that in order to assist the Indians and in order to promote peace and comfort in the North-West, the Indians should be furnished with Winchester rifles; and if we look at the Estimates under his regime we will find an appropriation for rifles to the Indians. I do not know whether he thought, with my hon. friends last night, that the only

Indian he could trust was a dead Indian, and was of the opinion that they would probably shoot one another; but I cannot think that, feeling in his heart there would be an uprising some day, he gave arms into the hands of these ignorant people for the purpose of slaughtering the white population. Before I close, I desire to add some further evidence which disproves the allegation that the uprising was due to maladministration on the part of the Government. I know that any statement favorable to the Government, will not be palatable to hon. gentleman opposite; I know that for over three months they have been studying the Blue Books, seeking to prejudice their own minds, seeking to convince themselves that they are right and the Government wrong. I do not blame them for, maddened by partisanship and ambition, they knew not, cared not, what they did; they are prejudiced, and when a man has strong prejudices it is difficult to remove them, particularly when he has an object in view in having them. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about starving Indians, about the want of surveys, and about the poor half-breeds. What does Louis Riel say now, when, being in prison, he professes give the true reason for the uprising. He says, in a letter dated June 15th inst, addressed to Mr. Fiset, formerly a member of this House:

"Times were hard in the Saskatchewan country especially. There was no work; there was no money. The crops had failed, as you may have seen by newspaper reports. Merchants were embarrassed, or half ruined, or brought to the verge of ruin, and knew not what to do. They plotted together to bring in all the Mounted Police they could."

Riel was the leader of that rebellion, the preacher of peace and harmony, who, going there in the interest of peace and harmony, saw his opportunity. He says there was considerable trouble in the North-West; but instead of trying amicably to settle the case, he went to the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, the starving Indians, and tried to mislead them, convincing Poundmaker and Big Bear that they were ill-treated in being deprived of their lands—lands on which they would not settle, and which they were not disposed to value, and a country becoming distasteful, because the buffalo had disappeared. The hon. gentleman knows that some years ago, in this House, hon. members from Manitoba brought before the Mackenzie Administration the fact that the buffalo were being slaughtered at the rate of 160,000 each season, and predicted trouble in the North-West in consequence. Did that Government take up this question and deal with it, as an honest, active Administration would have done? No; turning to the report of 1877, in the Official Debates of the House, we find that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and other members supporting him, held that the matter had better be left to the Local Government or the North-West council—that despised North-West council, that hon. gentlemen opposite have since scoffed at and defamed. To that irresponsible body, when in power, hon. gentlemen opposite were willing to leave every question of vital importance to the North-West. I have said I would be as brief as possible, but the statements made by Louis Riel led me to refer to the question I have just alluded to, and leads me now to ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether their policy with regard to Canada has not worked danger, tribulation and disaster to the North-West. Has one of them a good word to say for the North-West? They have thrown the challenge across the House, daring us to prove that they decry their country. I offered the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), when he challenged us to produce the proof—I offered it to him and asked him to insert it in his speech, so that the antidote should go with the poison; but he would not consent to the proposition, preferring party interests to patriotic honesty. I hold in my hand the proof, and propose to give it to the House. I firmly and sincerely believe that if hon. gentlemen opposite had been patriotic—and I do not use the word patriotic in its hackneyed sense—had these hon. gentlemen, who were Ministers of the Crown at one time, not been convinced that this country had done them an injustice in driving them out of power, and endeavored to get even with the people, endeavored to be revenged on the country, and had they adopted a policy such as that which was followed by hon. gentlemen on this side, when in Opposition, and assisted the Government in developing this country, and founding on the continent a second empire, peopled by British subjects, German, English, Irish, Scotch and French, vieing with one another in allegiance to their country and fealty to one of the best women and the best queen the world has ever known, we would have seen an intelligent and happy people throughout the Dominion; we would not have seen the oceans of blood that the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) speaks of, but many a happier household than is in Canada to-day. We would not have seen troops moving from Halifax, Winnipeg, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto and Quebec, brought together—for what object? The object of shooting down their brothers. There was the poison that, when circulated, worked misery to this country and jeopardised the union, which every man to-day, since that occurrence, would shed the last drop of his blood to maintain. Sir, the rebel thought is foster father to the rebel deed and those who, even silently on by insinuation, encourage or justify armed resistance to legal authority, do violence to constitutional principles and outrage the sacred rights of national autonomy. Mr. Speaker, demagogues promise, statesmen perform, and I leave to this House the duty of declaring which party professed and promised and which professed and performed. Not only in Canada, not only within the walls of this House, but throughout Great Britain, hon. gentlemen opposite and those who sympathise with them, and those who are their paid agents, those who receive money from the Ontario Government, have done their utmost to injure the country, to prevent capital flowing into the North West. I propose to establish, from the utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite, that there is a class of people in the country prepared, for the sake of office, to trample over the very ruins of their country and to wade through what the hon. member for West Huron calls oceans of blood, to the Treasury benches. I was in England two years ago, and the first man I met, a leading representative of an important institution, said: "You know it is very wrong for your public men to talk the way they do; they are infinitely damaging their country." I asked him what he referred to, and he said: "I can give you a pamphlet containing a lecture delivered by Mr. Fleming, the well known land agent for the Union Pacific Railway, and he there draws his conclusions, not from his own inner consciousness—there is no romance about it—and he says to the people, as he passes through the country: "I will not tell you what I think about it myself, because you might not believe me, you might think that I have some interest in it, but I will quote the Canadian papers to show you the desperate condition in which Canada is," and in consequence of which Canada is losing thousands and thousands of men who would go to that country, and who would represent millions of dollars. I procured one of those pamphlets. It is called "farming and stock-raising in America," and it commences with most thoughtful and kindly criticisms of Canada, but—there was always that "but" in the way—but what did the Canadian papers say? He then quotes, line by line, word by word, and sentence by sentence, from the Toronto Globe, to show that there is a vast exodus going on from this country.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. The hon. member says, "hear, hear." I undertake to say he cannot prove it. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite now, and I say I will prove by their own arguments that their exodus is absolutely fallacious. I will prove it from the mouth of the hon. member for South Huron. I will take his own standard, and, going back to the record, will prove that there is not a single sentence uttered by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) on this subject, that cannot be disproved, and that the official records do not disprove, and I will measure the whole by the statistics which he applies to one decade and not to another. To proceed with my remarks—Mr. Fleming goes on to say :

“What the Americans think of Dakota may be judged of from the fact which, I presume, most of you who are in the habit of reading American newspapers, are already aware of, viz., that the farmers in Eastern States are leaving in hundreds for Dakota; and still more suggestive is the other fact, that the Canadian farmers are not only leaving their own farms in the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario, but are actually leaving their own North-Western Territories, in large numbers, and settling in Dakota. I have here quite a pocketful of clippings from Canadian papers to substantiate that statement, but will not try your patience by reading them all. I will, however, read two or three extracts from the leading Canadian newspaper.

Now, I want, without occupying too much time, to show hon. gentlemen that, from the time the Canadian Pacific Railway became a fixed fact, nay, more, from the time, in 1879, that the vote of 1,000,000 acres of land was taken to build that road, hon. gentlemen opposite and their organs commenced decrying the country, and the dates I will give and the statements I quote, will establish the correctness and soundness of what I assert :

The Toronto Globe of March, in 1880, says :

“That on the preceding Tuesday an emigrant train left Ottawa (the capital of the Dominion) and by the time it reached Coburg there were 447 persons on board bound for Dakota, and only three for the Canadian North-West.

Again the same paper, 1st October, 1880, says :

“Surely the intelligent immigrant may be supposed to know what he wants and where he can best suit himself, and if he prefers Dakota to the Canadian North-West he must have some reason for doing so. All the thousands of Canadians who have this year settled in Dakota instead of the fertile belt north of the boundary are not born fools. In making a choice they must have been determined by either the character of the country or the conditions under which land can be procured.”

I have already shown the land regulations from 1874 to 1878 and from 1878 to 1884, and have compared those regulations with the system adopted and approved of in the United States, and I think I have also established by comparison that the land regulations of Canada are immensely superior—and if they are not, I have no doubt the hon. member for Bothwell will prove that I am incorrect—and, if there is a mistake on the part of this Government, I shall be glad to know that he will point out the mistake in the regulations now existing, and he will find that instead of this Government being the ignorant, incompetent, imbecile Government which has been depicted by the member for West Huron, it is an Administration abreast of the times and anxious to promote national welfare, hence prepared on every occasion to amend any regulations which may be defective. The Globe proceeds :

“What does it matter whether the absolute cost of land is greater or less to the immigrant in Canada than in Dakota? The only means of testing whether the regulations are suitable is the rapidity with which population comes in, and judged by this test, those now in force have this year failed most egregiously.”

Hon. gentlemen will see the design in this statement. This Mr. Fleming, travelling through the different cities of Ireland and Scotland, tells the people that even our Canadian papers admit that our land regulations are infinitely inferior to and far more onerous than the land regulations of the United States. The Toronto Globe proceeds to say that the only way of testing the relative character of the regulations is the rapidity with which population comes in, and then it states that 447 persons left for Dakota, and only three for the Canadian North-West, thus proving, by its own statement, the animus and the design it had in making it. Again, I quote from the Globe of 1st April, 1881 :

“The exodus to the west and North-West from this section is large, and is likely to increase. Unfortunately, the major part go to Dakota and other western States, instead of our own North-West. Only the other day a party of ninety left the Grand Trunk station, eighty for Dakota, ten only for Manitoba, and this is about the proportion of other parties who have gone or are going. The other day an intelligent and close observer, just returned from Manitoba, who had, during the last summer, travelled largely in Manitoba, and especially in the Pembina Mountain and Turtle Mountain districts, reports large numbers leaving those districts for Dakota.”

And in the very next year we have articles from the Dakota newspapers, stating that farmers were sending their wheat to our own North-West, and selling it there, after paying the duty, and making 15 cents a bushel more than was paid in United States settlements; but we never find one word about that in the papers opposed to this Government. I sincerely hope that the leader of the Opposition does not endorse this policy; I do not believe he wishes to come into power in a ruined country; for, should his party outside of this House or in this House succeed in destroying the country, if he came in he would go out again, as his predecessor went out, disgraced and ruined in public life. I am sure he does not wish that, and, if so, then it is his bounden duty to denounce it. Of course, hon. gentlemen opposite do not desire to hear these facts, because they have, time after time, asked us to prove that the country is decry'd, and I am here to-night to prove it, and I challenge them to show that one word I quote is not in the papers from which I have read. Now, having shown the result, on the other side of the water, of their efforts to decry and ruin this country, I ask hon. gentlemen to go back to the year 1882. At that time they were endeavoring to bring emigrants into this country, and I find the opinions expressed by the ex-Minister of Finance quoted over and over again in American papers and pamphlets, and commented upon in Europe. Sir Richard Cartwright stated, in 1852 (I quote from the Official Debates) :

“Immediately on the introduction of that policy, as every one acquainted with western Canada knows, there was a large and lamentable exodus of many of the best farmers of the western region, not, I am sorry to say, to our own North-West, but to Dakota, Minnesota and other portions of the United States.”

In the same debate he said :

“Why, Sir, I tell them to-day that Canada is a country in which no man is free to buy or sell, to eat or to drink, to travel or to stand still, without paying toll to some extortioner or other.”

I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, where is the tax-gatherer now? Where are the taxes they levied in 1874 and 1875, as compared with the taxes this Government levies? What is the condition of the poor man in this country now, as compared with his condition during the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite? Although they came into office with an immense surplus, in a few years they were driven from power, with a deficit of between six and seven million dollars, leaving to their successors works uncompleted, an empty treasury, a starving population and a hopeless and undone country. I ask hon. gentlemen to contrast the Canada of 1878 with the Canada of 1885, and say who were the demagogues and who were the statesmen. The hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) proceeded to say :

“If you want to find a true parallel to our Government in Canada, you will not find it in a country having free institutions, outside of Canada. You must search for it in some such state of things as existed in France in the days known as the Second Empire, which began with the massacre of December and wound up with the capitulation of Sedan.”

This is the way the hon. gentleman spoke of his country; this the picture he drew of it, to be sent across the Atlantic. This was his proclamation: “I will paint a Yankee picture, in Yankee colors, with a Yankee brush and send it across the ocean in a Yankee frame.” And thus he closed :

"Our condition is far worse, I am sorry to say, than the condition of the people of the United States to-day."

No wonder pamphlets had to be published as counter-irritants—these remarks made by the ex-Prime Minister have gone abroad, have been used to our detriment in foreign lands, have irritated the people of the newer territories, and done much to cause acrimony and ill feeling. Do we wonder, then, at the uprising in the North-West? Now, Sir, I find in the Globe of the 2nd of December, 1884:

"Sir Richard Cartwright, in his speech at Montreal, gave some statistics which are as startling as they are undeniable. He showed that in all that constitutes a progressive and prosperous people Canada has, for some time, been going back, and going back when, according to the ordinary course of things, she ought to have been advancing, and with leaps and bounds."

This is the statement of the ex-Finance Minister, while his successor in office goes to England a few months afterwards and makes the best loan this country has ever negotiated. Shrewd loan negotiators could put a proper value upon Canada's resources, but this was not the case with emigrants and land purchasers. On 11th December, 1884, the Globe says again:

"The American statistics of immigrants from Canada have been pronounced ridiculously false, but it is in evidence that they are being prepared with greater care now than in the years when Mr. Mackenzie was Premier, and in the main they are closely verified by the most accurate and trustworthy of Canadian statistics. The Province of Ontario has alone lost 260,000 of her sons during the four years, 1879-'83."

The hon. member for South Huron bases his calculation on the attendance at schools. What does the official report show? Between 1861 and 1871 the school population increased nearly 400,000, while applying that rule to the population, the decrease, according to the statement of the ex-Minister of Finance, was 400,000; and yet he argues that diminution in school population in 1879-1884, is proof of an exodus from Canada. Now, I shall not pursue that subject, but simply desire to give the ground of argument; I want to show that this continual decrying of our country is preventing people from coming hither from Europe. When hon. gentlemen were in office their cry was: We must people the North-West. Every effort was put forward. They expended at least $13 per head, as compared with our $4 per head, to bring emigrants into this country. The hon. gentleman now at the head of the Immigration Department gave them every assistance in his power, but they have not returned the compliment. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), said, a few nights ago: "We are spending too much money in the North-West, while the old Provinces are being neglected." At one time they say one thing, at another time they say another thing, each the diametrical opposite of the other, but applied as proof in the same case. When the present Government came into power the Ontario Government were paying a certain sum to bring people here, but they have withdrawn that assistance. How are they spending money now? Is it in the interests of the people of Ontario? No, Sir; but they are paying a man in Toronto, named D. J. O'Donoghue, between $700 and $800 a year to defame and slander our country. I find in the Manchester Guardian a letter written by this gentleman to a person named J. H. Scholes, a Trades Union man, in May last. That letter has been sent to me, and I shall submit it to this House, and, through this House, send it to the country, that the people may see what kind of men their money is used to support:

"TORONTO, 13th April, 1865.

"DEAR SIR,— * * * The snow keeps coming down to date. The ice is solid on our inland waters, and has no even as yet shown any perceptible sign of loosening its frigid grasp on the harbor or Toronto, so that the opening of navigation in Canada is, so far, a thing of the future. The situation as respects business generally, and as respects the labor market in particular, shows but little, if any, change from that of the past winter, nor is there any likelihood of any material change for the better for some time to come. And, as if to add to the gravity of the situation, the present serious rebellion in our North-West has paralyzed the chances of that unfortunate country as a field for emigrants, either from the old Canada or Great Britain for years."

MR. MACKINTOSH.

Utilising national adversity, national anxiety, for the purpose of promoting the interests of—what? Of Mr. Mowat's Government and of hon. gentlemen opposite.

"When the Indians of Canada have gone so far as to murder those whom, in the long past, they have revered, in the persons of Roman Catholic priests, it lies not in the mouth of any person (even though he be a Government or a steamship agent, and such persons can elongate the truth considerably) to say that this trouble is not much more than serious. Bearing this in mind respecting this North-West, of long and lonely distances, without Railway communication of any extent"

This statement was published while our troops were passing over the line, and going north of Lake Superior, and marching on the enemy. There was no railway communication, he said, while Canada is expending millions to complete one of the greatest railways in the world. This is the gentleman who receives money from the Province of Ontario, who is the paid hireling of the Ontario Government, because he is in sympathy with the gentlemen opposite in this House.

"Sparse population, hostile half-breeds and Indians and semi-savages."

Those are the people whom the hon. member for West-Huron talked of. Have they proved themselves to be "semi-savages?" If you will look at the record of some of the half-breeds you will find that they are among the most industrious, active and intelligent people who live on any part of the American continent. And yet this man, who pretends to be a friend of the workmen of Canada and of Ontario, but who is only a friend to himself and his own pocket, and is the hireling of Mr. Mowat and his Government—this is the man who calls those people "semi-savages," and sends across the water the story that we, in Canada, are fighting "semi-savages," who murder their priests, and warns emigrants against coming to this country. The man is a worthy representative of those who abused the Minister of Interior for not going to the North-West; and when he was going last year subpoenaed him before a court in Toronto to prevent his visiting that country. And hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to wonder where our immigrants go. I remember when the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) stated in this House and in my hearing—I was not then a member—that every immigrant brought into this country was worth $25—

MR. TROW. $1,000.

MR. MACKINTOSH. The hon. gentleman said we could afford to pay $25 per head to bring immigrants here. What do we find Mr. Mowat's agent doing? We find Mr. Mowat's agent declaring that we are fighting savages, and at the same time hon. gentlemen opposite are obstructing the bold and progressive policy, the necessarily bold policy, inaugurated and maintained by the Minister of Agriculture, for the purpose of bringing the better class of settlers to the Dominion. He goes on to say:

"None other than the most gullible of innocent mortals will venture, under any pretence, to emigrate thereto at the present time, with the intent of making it a home."

This letter is signed, "D. J. O'Donoghue." This gentleman was formerly in the Local Legislature of Ontario. He became secretary of the Trades and Labor Union. He is one of the gentlemen sending petitions down here to the Minister of Agriculture, asking him to stop giving money to bring people to the country; while at the same time, with a duplicity which I deeply regret, he is writing letters to prevent people going to the North-West, and the Opposition, not knowing it, perhaps, have assisted him in his disloyal, unpatriotic and unjustifiable work. But I go further. I look at the Public Accounts of Ontario, and what do I find? Why, that D. J. O'Donoghue is the recipient, as a Seasonal writer and clerk for the Ontario Government, of a sum, annually, ranging from $600 to $800. And yet that gentleman, after writing that letter, a letter which has done an infinite amount of harm to Canada, is still kept in office by

Mr. Mowat—and if he is not kept there, he will be made a colonisation road inspector or a license inspector, and will receive promotion in the grand army of freedom and reform. Since recess I have been looking over some papers, and my attention has been called to an article published in a Manitoba journal, as showing that this party acrimony ceases not, that it has no limits. It is an article published by the Winnipeg Times from the Winnipeg Free Press. That paper is edited and controlled by a western Reformer, who lived in the county of Middlesex, who had been a strong politician there, although not an active one, and published a Reform newspaper at that time. He went to Winnipeg, still remained a member of the Reform party and supporter of the Reform cause—if they have any cause—at all events, he supported the “lost cause” and has done much towards promoting trouble and spreading dissatisfaction.” The Free Press, about the 2nd of July, says :

“Apparently, the old battle of responsible government will have to be fought all over again in this new western country. The people of the North-West may as well recognise the fact at once and prepare for the struggle. Surely another rebellion, accompanied by the loss of hundreds of more lives and millions of treasure, will not be necessary to bring the Government to their senses. The Opposition in and out of Parliament will aid them to the utmost.”

The declaration is, that in and out of Parliament the Opposition will aid the rebels to the utmost. They will not justify the rebellion, but they justify the rebels. It means that we have again to fight the battle as to whether we are to proceed on national or provincial lines, and whether we are going to be one people or not, or whether everything has to be sacrificed for the sake of office. Sir, the man who utilises a Provincial or sectional question of so serious a nature as that under discussion, for the purpose of promoting partisan interests, commits a crime against order and does violence to the constitution under which he lives. This the Opposition is now doing. The sober second thought of the people however is with us. We know that were we to-morrow to appeal to the country our candidates would be elected by vast majorities. Hon. gentlemen opposite declare that this Government has shown incapacity, imbecility and ignorance. Let me ask hon. gentlemen opposite how many seats they have redeemed in Ontario since 1882? We have the honor of having the hon. member for Bothwell here, and I am sure if he would devote his great ability to defending his country and fighting for its interests he would occupy a much higher position before the people. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite what they have gained? The hon. member for West-Durham (Mr. Blake) went to Lennox; I was there. Instead of propounding a policy he undertook to abuse me. Sir, I may have erred in my private capacity, but I have made no mistake, as a member of Parliament, that I know of. I have fought the battle fairly. All I asked in Lennox was that I should have a fair field, for I did not ask any favor. But the hon. gentleman behind my back maligned me, and made statements which I have already disproved upon the floor of Parliament. Then we had a contest in West Northumberland a few weeks ago; what was the result? A larger majority than ever for the Conservative candidate. Again, hon. gentlemen opposite had another opening in Grenville. What was the result? They were defeated, horse, foot and artillery. The constituency returned by acclamation one who formerly held a seat in this House, an able and esteemed gentleman, who will be a strength to the Conservative party. This is the answer that has gone abroad, this is the answer that should be a warning to hon. gentlemen. They must understand that the good, sterling, honest, common sense of the people always prevails. The people are reading and thinking all the time. They know the motives of men; they know what politicians are; they make allowances for their weaknesses and admire their strength. When there is nothing but weakness on one side, and a small amount of weakness and great strength on the other, the people will go where there is a small amount of weakness and a great amount of strength. I have shown, Sir, that throughout their administration of affairs, those who called themselves a Reform Government, by their inaction and indifference, laid the foundation of much of the trouble that has disturbed the North-West—So complicating matters that their successors in office found it difficult to adjust claims without lengthy and careful investigation. I have shown that gentlemen opposite have decried the country and thus prevented capital and immigration flowing in; that Louis Riel admits that hard times and no money prompted disaffection and led to the terrible outbreak of March last, and that instead of assisting the Government, the Opposition policy was a virtual expression of sympathy with the rebels. Sir, I am prepared to leave with this House and country the question of relative merits between the Opposition and Administration of the day. The facts are before them, the record of both parties is before them, and it will be for those who constitute the jury to render a verdict in accordance with the evidence. Mr. Speaker, I regret having occupied the time of the House so long; but I feel a deep, an almost overwhelming interest in this question, and that now and forever must the problem be solved as to whether this is going to be a united Dominion or a mere plaything for politicians and partisans. We have heard hon. members, in recent debates, here and in other places, endeavoring to stir up sectional ill-feeling. Why, Sir, the hon. member for East Quebec (Mr. Laurier), said :

“It will not do for the hon. gentleman to attempt to arouse the prejudices of the masses with respect to this matter.”

Who is arousing prejudices? Who moved the amendment? He has said that the Government was so guilty that those men were justified in making some show of resistance? I do not assert that these hon. gentlemen justify the rebellion; but I hold that they justify it in such a way and to such an extent that people of common sense will know that if they do as their papers did, in March and April last, condemn the Government for everything that has taken place, these people in the North-West will feel that, if at any time they rebel again and run up the black flag there will be found those who sympathise with them, in the Province of Ontario, at least. I know there are men on that side of the House who are as sincere and as true and loyal men, not only to their country, but to their Queen, as could possibly be found on this side; hence the great danger is, that by the bitterness with which we are conducting our political warfare, and the extremes to which we are carrying our political animosities, we will bring about the evils to which I have referred; and until we learn to subdue that bitterness of feeling, learn to stand unitedly for our country and our country's interest, when that country is in danger, we will jeopardise, every hour and every day, the interests, the institutions and the progress of the Dominion. The hon. Member for Quebec East, further said :

“There are prejudices in this country of many kinds. We are not so built up as nation as to forget our origin, and I say frankly that the people of my own Province, who have a community of origin, undoubtedly sympathise with Louis Riel, just as the sympathies of the people of Ontario go altogether in the other direction.”

Now, I feel that an hon. gentleman representing a city where a monument has been raised to the memory of those two great heroes and commanders, Wolfe and Montcalm, a sacred column, a memento of peace, harmony and union between the two great races—a gentleman representing that city could well have afforded to put aside the question of race and of origin. We know that every day the people of the Province of Quebec, both French and English, are becoming more and more welded into one; and we know that our interests in Ontario are to maintain the best spirit of harmony amongst all classes and races in the Province of Quebec, and jointly to work out the problem of laying deep and strong the foundations of future greatness. The man is a traitor to his country, is jeopardising the interests of his country, who, for the sake of party interest, for the promotion of party gain, would stir up race against race, section against section, brother against brother. I know what party gain and party tactics mean, but that is quite another matter from setting Province against Province, race against race, and brother against brother; and when the rallying cry is: A united Dominion, and the flag of our nation is run up, we should find every true Canadian, whether of French, German, English, Scotch, Irish or Canadian origin, rallying round that flag, until the enemies of our country are driven from their strongholds. If I speak warmly, it is because I realise that a few mistakes may prove fatal to national autonomy. I have given plain facts and figures, and challenge any hon. gentleman to show that I have spoken beyond or outside of the records. Every statement I have made I am prepared to defend, for I feel that this is a question which should be discussed on its merits—not on the basis of Provinces or origin, but a question as to whether, when rebels raise the flag of rebellion in the North-West, or any other section of in this Dominion, led by an amnestied rebel and a virtual outlaw, the Parliament of Canada should tolerate an amendment which expresses illconcealed sympathy with the misguided men who instigated that rebellion. By expressing sympathy with those who claim they have grievances, we express sympathy with the men who went to Montana to induce Riel to come to the country, and sympathy for Riel, who returned to the North-West as a claimant of lands to which he cannot be entitled. Riel, who while that country was in trouble, while hard times were abroad in it boldly admits that he took advantage of the depression to countenance extreme measures. These men found among the Opposition, those who were decrying the country, who were preventing capital from coming in, who were opposing the completion of a great public work, the very element needful to accomplish their nefarious schemes, and the result is that we have had bloodshed, and our friends have fallen. But no great interest was ever established in any country, without loss of life, and those who fell at Duck Lake, at Batoche, at Fish Creek and other places, will be remembered as patriots who fought bravely the battles of their country; and while they have gone before, we know that we have soon to follow; and though we lost a brother member of this House, sad as that loss may be, it will, at least, teach us to love our country better, and we will be able to say that when the union was in peril English and French, Scotch and Irish, and Germans, all combined to fight the battles of the nation and to maintain the flag which I trust will always float over a country possessing one of the freest and best constitutions in the world, the future home of millions of prosperous people, hardy sons of the north whose hearts will ever throb responsive to national sentiment; millions worthy the race whence they sprung, true to the motherland, rejoicing when she rejoices and sympathising with and defending her should trial, tribulation or adversity at any time afflict or overtake the Empire.

Mr. MILLS. It is not my intention to devote much time to the consideration of the observations which the hon. member for this city has addressed to the House for the past two hours. I have failed altogether to see their relevancy to the proposition which is now before you for the consideration of the House. If the hon. member for Jacques Cartier had made the observations which he has addressed to the House some seven or eight years ago, they might have had more value. The hon. gentleman proposes to put on trial a Government that ceased to exist in October, 1878. The hon. gentleman seems to forget that from 1873 to 1878 the Government of the hon. member for East York was administering the affairs of the country; that the hon. genlemen now sitting on the Treasury benches at that time occupied seats on this side of the House. It was part of their business, in the discharge of their public duties, to watch with care the administration of public affairs—to criticise the conduct of the Government, and point out the mistakes which that Government made. But now, Sir, seven years after that Government has left office, it is too late to begin to bring charges that those hon. gentlemen did not venture to bring when the Government were responsible for the conduct of affairs. I might, Sir, at some other time, be disposed to go into some detail in defence of the conduct of that Government, with regard to the various matters that have been passed in review the last few days. I shall but briefly allude to these charges, because I do not think that they are important for the consideration of the House at this moment. I do not intend to be drawn away from the important proposition submitted to the House by the hon. member for West Durham, by a discussion of what the Government did some eight or ten years ago. The hon. member who has just taken his seat has charged the Opposition with sympathising with Riel, with defending the rebels and with upholding the rebellion. I deny that charge. I say that we are not putting Riel on trial in this House. He is shortly to be tried before another tribunal, and I hope, when his trial takes place, that he will be judged according to the evidence there submitted, and not according to charges made on that side of the House or this. I am quite ready to repeat the words which are used on the trial of anyone for so serious an offence—that I trust he will have a fair trial by God and his countrymen. The hon. gentleman knows that in the estimation of a great many the Government committed mistakes in 1869 and 1870. Riel committed murder. The hon. gentleman knows that the feeling in the minds of a great many of the community is still a feeling of resentment for that crime, and he takes advantage of that feeling in order to shelter the Government for their misconduct during the last seven years. Sir, I do not intend to be drawn in that direction; I do not intend to say one word of the conduct of Mr. Riel, either by way of censure or by way of excuse. His case is in the hands of another tribunal, and I feel that it would be indecent, on my part, under the circumstances, to discuss it. Sir, the hon. gentleman says this resolution is a defence of Riel. Now, let me read the resolution. It is:

"That in the administration of North-West affairs by the present Government, prior to the recent outbreak, there have occurred grave instances of neglect, delay and mismanagement, in matters affecting the peace, welfare and good government of the country."

The question is, are the charges set forth in that resolution well founded. The question is not whether those who took arms against the Government had any cause, or whether the cause was sufficient to become an extenuating circumstance. It is the Government we have to try; not the parties who have been engaged in the rebellion in the North-West Territories. Their trial is vested in other hands, and it will be conducted according to other evidence than that which is submitted to the House for the purpose of either approving or disapproving of the conduct of the Administration. The hon. First Minister, in discussing this question the other evening, said that the Hudson Bay Company officials in the North-West Territories had always exhibited discontent, that they were disloyal, that they had been pushed by the Canadian Government from their throne, and had never become reconciled to their position; he said the half-breeds of the North-West had long been in the employ of the Hudson Bay Company—that they were their factors and hunters, and that they sympathised with the officers of the company; and he told us that Gabriel Dumont was a rebel in 1870, a rebel in 1874, and he was a rebel still. Well, Sir, I do not know how that may be, nor do I care. That is not the question before us now; but this much I will say, that I do not believe there is any people in the world who ever exhibit disaffection towards a Government when they are justly and fairly dealt with, and I believe that wherever you find rebellion you will, at the same time, find misgovernment. I do not think there is any exception to that rule. We may go to other parts of the British Empire, where there may be a discontented people, and I venture to say that no one has ever yet enquired into the history of such people without being satisfied that they have been grossly misgoverned. Now, I am not going to say more on that subject at this moment. The hon. gentleman, setting the example to those who have since spoken in defence of the Administration, said that the Government which preceded his Government had failed to administer the affairs of Manitoba and the North-West Territories properly, as we had not dealt with the claims of the half-breeds. Why, he said Governor Archibald took the census in 1870, and yet, in order to give an opportunity to speculators, we appointed other parties, and had the census taken over again. Now, the hon. gentleman was in office three years after Governor Archibald's census of 1870 was taken, and how was it that he made no distribution of the half-breeds' grants during those three years? How was it he took no action? We took the census, because the census taken by Mr. Archibald was inaccurate. The hon. gentleman decided that grants should be made to the children of half-breeds, and the census taken by Mr. Archibald did not show how many were children and how many were parents; and so it was necessary to take a new census and base the distribution on that; and it was found that each half-breed was entitled, out of the 1,400,000 acres of land, not to 190 acres, but to 240 acres, and the distribution was made accordingly. Now, the hon. gentleman who spoke a few minutes ago told the House that I had advised the officers of the Government not to look after those parties who had failed to make application, because if they were interested in putting forward their claims it was open to them to do so. Well, Sir, I did that; I did it at Mr. Codd's suggestion, not simply because he suggested, but because I concurred in that opinion, and for this reason: I told Mr. Codd that it was necessary to secure an early distribution of the half-breed lands, and as long as we left the question open; for the purpose of hunting up half breeds, it was impossible to make a distribution; and I felt that it was better, if there were any half-breeds who were not included, but who would afterwards establish their claims, to make an additional grant to them, than to keep the whole of the lands open, in order to make a distribution to a few more than would receive the lands, and that less trouble and expense would be incurred. That was done not to delay but to hasten the allotment. Then the hon. gentleman says we ought to have made the distribution at once. He forgot that when his Government was in the old settlers along the Red and Assiniboine Rivers claimed that they were entitled, not merely to two miles in depth, but to an additional two miles of hay privilege, and he and his colleagues conceded that; and when these additional two miles were taken on each side of the Red River and the Assiniboine River, it became necessary to make a further concession to the half-breed population, as this additional two miles was taken off the half-breeds reservation. Then, the hon. gentlemen seemed to forget that his officers, in making the treaty with the Indians east of Manitoba, dealt with a very considerable number of those who had been dealt with as half-breeds, and that they had come in under the treaty and had received their annuities. They subsequently, however, applied to be included as half-breeds, because they had been enumerated as half-breeds in the census that had been taken by Mr. Archibald. Then, Sir, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier alluded to the river surveys of the half-breed lands of the Saskatchewan and the Qu'Appelle Rivers, and said the demand of the half-breeds to be put on the same footing as those in Manitoba had not originated after 1879, and that they had petitioned the Government of Mr. Mackenzie some years before. Well, Sir, that was true, and they were informed by Mr. Laird and Lieutenant Governor Morris that they would be protected in their holdings. They were content with that information, and we were not in a position to deal with them, because we had not pushed forward the special surveys in the regions where they were settled, and we could not make the river surveys until that was done. Well, I will say this: The petition came before me; I gave notice that the special survey in the vicinity of Touchwood should be pushed forward to Prince Albert settlement. This was done at the earliest opportunity, in 1877, and that was as much work as it was possible to accomplish then. The survey was for the purpose of fixing the latitude and longitude of the settlement, so that when an isolated survey was made it would fit in with the other portion of the general survey of the country. In 1878 that survey was made at Prince Albert, and special instructions were given to the surveyors, that in laying out the lands along the river they were to lay them out in ordinary river lots, so as to meet the wishes of the settlers. So far as the surveys were concerned, the Government did all that the population required, and all that was necessary, under the circumstances. The hon. gentleman complained that the buffalo had disappeared, but they have disappeared since our day. There were buffalo in that country since 1870, but the fact is, that the buffalo was almost extinct south of the border. The First Minister, not long since, in addressing the House, stated the fact that the American soldiers stationed near the frontier had driven the buffalo southward and kept them from crossing the frontier, for the purpose of keeping the Indians away from the border. It is well known they have done this for several years; and so far as I know, the hon. gentleman had not suggested any means by which the Canadian Government could have kept the buffalo north of the international boundary or have exercised any control over them, by Customs or other regulations, which would have prevented the extinction of that very important animal. Then the hon. gentleman who has just addressed us told the House that a very rascally Order in Council was passed, in October 1878, by which Cook and Sutherland were allowed 200 square miles of a timber limit on the Upper Saskatchewan. I need not say much about that. That subject was before the House last year, when the First Minister made a charge similar to that which the hon. gentleman has made to-night. When we came into office these hon. gentlemen, we found, had been in the habit of giving timber limits, contrary to the law; finding that it was impossible to secure the sale of timber limits in the ordinary way, we changed the law, so as to allow the Government to make a private contract with a party in reference to timber limits. That was done by hon. gentlemen opposite, contrary to law; we did it in accordance with the law, because it was the only way the people of Manitoba could get the necessary supply of lumber. When we came into office there was but one saw mill on the Saskatchewan, and lumber was sold to the settler at the rate of $100 per 1,000 feet. I believed, then, and I believe still, it would be in the interest of the population to have competition. Those gentlemen proposed to erect a saw mill, and they had the necessary machinery carried to the district; they asked for a timber limit, and upon precisely the same terms as limits were granted to others who made application, we gave them a limit, having sufficient extent to enable them to run their mill for a reasonable time, as some parties had obtained timber limits from this Government since, and found they were not sufficient to keep the mill in operation for a year or two; and the extent granted was not greater than what was granted others in the Rainy River district by hon. gentlemen opposite, or than what would enable them to carry on their business for a reasonable length of time. More than that: we provided that the grant should not interfere with the rights of others to obtain limits in the same district before the lots were selected, and we provided no lot would be granted less than twenty miles, so that where there were small areas of timber, three or four miles in extent, they had to be taken as twenty-mile lots before they could be obtained; we did this to preserve the small areas for the use of the settlers. I do not propose to say more on that subject. The hon. gentleman has referred to staked claims and to delays in the distribution of some of the half-breed grants in Manitoba. Let me say that the greater portion of those were distributed in 1877; and we find, when this Government came in, that further distribution was not made until 1881. He charged the late Government with dilatoriness in issuing patents. Hon. gentlemen opposite, no doubt, issued more than were issued in our day, as there was a larger population in the country. Besides, when we were in office, three years were required before a patent could be issued to homestead lands, and it is perfectly clear that until the population was in the country for some time no patent could be issued. It was only those who were the original settlers of the country, the few who went in at the beginning of our administration, who were entitled to the patents at all. I need say no more on that subject. The hon. gentleman has referred, in great detail, as others have who spoke before him on that side, to the administration of affairs by us; but that is not the question which is before the House at this moment. What we have to consider is the conduct of the present Administration, and not that of the Government which retired from office seven years ago. It is important we should look with some care into the conduct of affairs in the North-West, and it is my purpose to bring under the attention of the House some of the grievances of the white settlers of Manitoba and the North-West, with a view to a more efficient administration of our public lands, and the prevention of further abuses. One of the most important functions of the House of Commons is to exercise a careful supervision over the administration of public affairs, so as to secure honest and prompt action, and so as to prevent a public Department being subordinated to the interest of the camp followers of a party. This, in a great and distant region like the North-West, is all the more necessary, because the settlers are without representatives on the floor of Parliament, and cannot, in the ordinary constitutional way, complain of any wrong which may have been done them. It would not be improper for me to briefly refer to the history of our attempts at colonisation in the North-West. With the acquisition of that country we began a new departure. Until then, we were ordinary colonies, possessed, it is true, of a constitutional system of government, similar in principle to that of the parent State; but with the acquisition of the North-West we set out on a new venture—we began, ourselves, the work of establishing colonies. The extension of the frontier settlements in the older colonies, was a work which proceeded without the interference of Government. All that was needed was that surveys should be made, the country set out for settlement, and a land office opened. But the acquisition of the North-West imposed upon us duties of a somewhat different character. It is true that no difficult problems were involved. It only required ordinary prudence and industry on the part of Ministers to have made the business of settling the North-West in the highest degree successful. We had no new problem to solve—we had the experience of England and of the United States before us. The Territories which, in 1869, were annexed to the Dominion, were Territories out of which all believed Provinces in time would be carved; that what was to-day a colony, must soon become a Province, incorporated into the federal family, and represented on the floor of Parliament. We had before us the plan of the neighboring Republic. We saw how, for nearly a century, it had surveyed and set out for settlement its Territories. How it gave to the settlers of these Territories local self-government; and how, when the Territories had acquired a certain population, they were formed into States and admitted as members of the Union. We saw before us Crown colonies growing up into constitutionally governed Provinces. There was no difficulty in our way. There was no new question presenting itself for solution. Every political problem with which we were called upon to deal had already been solved. All that we needed was honesty of purpose and industry to do the work of to-day at the proper time, and not to defer until some more convenient season what ought at once to be undertaken. When we acquired the North-West Territories there was already a population of eight or ten thousand whites and half-breeds. These had been, for many years, under the jurisdiction of the Hudson Bay Company and their officers. They had been ruled with a niggardly hand. No Government could well have done less for a people than the Hudson Bay Company did for the dwellers in the Red River district. They had no love for the company's rule; they knew enough about representative institutions to know that they enjoyed fewer of the political rights of British freemen than any other people in the British North American dominions. They furnished a splendid nucleus with which to begin a loyal and contented colony; but the course adopted towards them was so unwise that, before the Canadian Government succeeded in establishing its authority in the country, it had made an enemy of nearly every man in the country. The Hudson Bay Company had there a governor, a council, and a judicial officer, none of whom were consulted with reference to the future government of the country. There was not a leading man among the settlers who was treated with more consideration. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier says we did not find men in the North-West to put in the North-West council. But how was the first Government of Manitoba constituted, in 1869? The entire population were ignored. A system of arbitrary government was provided. No provision was made in the Act providing for the government of the settlement, for the election, by the people, of a single representative to the council. A Governor was appointed; a law officer was named; other parties were promised positions on the council; but not one of them was a resident of the country. If they had been a conquered population they could not have been more arbitrarily dealt with. Whatever could offend the susceptibilities of a free people was done. It is true they owed the Hudson Bay Company little. They had not enjoyed elective institutions under the régime of the company, but if their government was arbitrary, it was a government by men taken from among themselves, while the new Government established by Canada was one wholly from without. What they had seen of the Canadians was well calculated to excite alarm. The surveys, when begun, were upon a plan which so completely ignored the plan of settlement that it was not surprising that the population everywhere believed what they were told, that their occupation of the country and their improvements were not of a kind that could give them any claim to the lands of which they were in possession. They found the constituted authorities of the country scarcely less discontented than themselves, and it was not surprising that alarm and resentment culminated in rebellion and in bloodshed. I remember seeing a letter, which had been addressed by Sir Stafford Northcote to Governor McTavish, shortly after the terms of surrender had been agreed upon, in which he informed the Governor of what had been done; and he went on to say that those who had directed the affairs of the settlement under the company would continue to share in its government after the transfer was made. What a disappointment it must have been to these men to find themselves completely ignored; and could any one have been surprised at the alarm and hatred of the population, which had been evoked by the arrogance and folly of Dominion officials, or that the old officials did nothing to allay the discontent? I need not speak of the rebellion which followed, or of the extraordinary concessions made to conciliate the population. From being a Crown colony, without a representative, they were changed to a full-blown Province, weighed down with powers and privileges which they had neither the wealth nor the numbers needed to exercise them with advantage; 1,400,000 acres of land, in the neighborhood of Winnipeg, were set aside for the children of the half-breed population. More than half these people were hunters of the plain, who, at that time, attached no value to the lands reserved to their use. Hundreds of them left the place. As the buffalo retreated further westward, they ceased to return to the Red River in the winter season. Their numbers could not be ascertained. The division of the land was, in consequence, delayed. The great majority of them were minors, whose interest in their allotments could not be utilised for settlement; and so the district which it was most necessary to occupy first was one from which white settlers were practically excluded. When the half-breed districts became known, and the adjacent lands were set out for settlement, many of those who first went into the country found it impossible to secure an entry for the lands which they desired to select. It was said that the first land agents were interested with other parties in land speculations, and they profited by the labors of those who explored the country, with a view to becoming settlers. Those desiring to obtain entry for lands could not obtain it for the lands which they had visited and selected. Hundreds of those who, in 1872 and 1873, went from the older Provinces to the Red River district, with the view to settlement, finding the obstacles in the way so serious, they withdrew, discouraged and disgusted, and settled south of the international boundary. They became the founders of rival settlements in the United States. The country along the Red River, from Fargo to Pembina, is occupied chiefly by Canadians, who went thither from Manitoba before 1874. The populous and prosperous settlement at the Grand Forks, is Canadian. The Government of Canada has spent not a little in advertising the country and in seeking to secure immigration from abroad. Recently the Minister of Agriculture, failing to secure Europeans, has undertaken to do what has never been done in the neighboring Republic—to send out immigration agents into the Provinces, with the view of securing settlers for the North-West. I am not going to enter into a criticism of this policy now, but it certainly discloses an extraordinary state of things, when the Government finds itself driven to such a proceeding. The people of Canada ought to be able to decide for themselves the question of settling in the North-West, without Government interference and without Government pressure. But we have already lost a fifth of our population. They reside on the American side of the border. When once any of our people resolve to look for new homes they are attracted to the neighborhood where their friends and acquaintances have gone before, whether it be in Dakota or in the North-West, if there are no words of discouragement and no events happening dissuading them against such a course. The people who first settled between Fargo and Pembina have been of far more consequence to Dakota in securing settlers from Canada than any number of pamphlets and immigration agents. These settlers were formerly residents of Ontario. They have drawn thither ten times their numbers. As they receive new accessions they become an attractive force of increasing power, so long as there are fertile lands to occupy. Now, what must not be forgotten is, that the whole of these people, with ordinary care and prudence on the part of the Government, might have been retained or secured as settlers of Manitoba and the North-West. The original settlers went to Manitoba. They withdrew for the reasons which I have stated, and they have since attracted thousands of their friends and neighbors. It is a calumny to say these people were wanting in patriotism, or that they would not have preferred remaining in their own country, other things being equal. Now, Sir, it is all very well to talk about newspapers advising men to go abroad and about their decrying the country. Why, Sir, these hon. gentlemen decried the country from 1875 to 1878. What was the resolution proposed by the right hon. gentleman, and which was supported by his followers, when in Opposition, in 1878? Has the hon. member for the city of Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh), who spoke to-night about the unpatriotic conduct of the members of the Opposition, forgotten all about that resolution? Does he not remember that it said that thousands were leaving Canada every year for want of employment?

Mr. MACKINTOSH. What resolution does the hon. gentleman allude to?

Mr. MILLS. To the resolution which the right hon. gentleman proposed, introducing his National Policy, and in which he declared there was no employment for the people of Canada, and that there were thousands leaving Canada every year, for the want of employment?

Mr. MACKINTOSH. Yes; I remember that. He said there was poison in the policy of the Government, and he propounded an antidote for it.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman did not consider such statements unpatriotic just then. But there is this very important difference: that there is now, and has been for the last five years, a very large emigration from Canada, and there was not a very large emigration at that time. I simply state this, Mr. Speaker, by the way. Now, I contend that the first condition necessary to secure a brisk immigration into our North-West Territories is to satisfy the population that are already there. So long as they are discontented, just so long will the residents of the country be a repellent and not an attractive body. If the policy of the Government had been at all satisfactory it would not have been necessary to have sent out immigration agents through the Province of Quebec and into the other Provinces. The people who are already there would have been far more efficient for that purpose; and no more conclusive evidence could have been furnished of the failure of the Government than the confession of the Minister of Agriculture, that his agents were scouring the old Provinces, in order to secure settlers for the North-West. In the settlement of our North-West it was of great consequence that the first settlers should be satisfied with the rules and regulations adopted by the Government; for, if the views I have expressed are correct, it is by satisfying those who are the pioneers of every settlement that its future progress is to be best promoted. There is, too, a great advantage in continuous settlement—in the establishment of schools, in the building of churches, in the improvement of roads, in the construction of bridges, and in the establishment of markets. It is of great consequence to the population that large tracts of lands in private hands should not intervene; for, beside the disadvantages which I have indicated, there is a want of mutuality in the enhanced value given to property by labor; for the vacant land is increased in value by the industry of the settler, for which the settler receives nothing in return. It is also of consequence, in the colonisation of a country, that facilities should be given for egress and ingress. There must be either railway or water communication. The want of the one or the other makes it impossible to secure settlers. The products of the farm will not bear the expense of carriage by an ordinary vehicle for many miles, and unless railway facilities are furnished to settlers in the inland districts but few settlers will be had. In fact, we have lost to the North-West already many thousands, from the want of the necessary railway facilities. I have before me a list containing the names of 111 settlers who had taken up lands within a radius of six miles from Rapid City, and who have abandoned them because they were wholly without railway facilities, and without access to markets. They went into that part of the Province of Manitoba at a time when it was supposed the Canadian Pacific would pass through the settlement. They were destined to disappointment, and they abandoned the country in consequence. They preferred to lose their labor, and begin a new home elsewhere, rather than be without the means of ingress and egress, and without a market for the products of their toil. The Administration of Mr. Mackenzie proposed to provide for the construction of colonisation roads. They believed that one line of railway through the extensive prairies of the North-West would be wholly inadequate to secure the settlement of the country. A railway has but little value to the farmer who is more than twenty miles away. The Pacific Railway may secure the settlement of the country for a short distance upon either side, but without radiating lines, from points well situated to become great commercial centres, the general settlement of a prairie country is not likely to take place. The progress of settlement in the State of Illinois furnishes a striking proof of the soundness of this view. The State was settled for many years along the banks of the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Illinois and the Rock River, but the interior of the country remained unpeopled. Land one hundred miles south from Chicago had but little value. It was exceedingly fertile, and capable of producing immense harvests of corn and wheat; but it was inaccessible to any market. When the Illinois Central Railroad was built all this was changed. Thousands poured into the country. The railway became to the people of the interior all that the rivers had been to the earlier settlers upon their banks, and the population of Illinois received an accession of more than a half million within ten years. It is, in my opinion, greatly to be regretted that steps were not taken by Ministers to carry out, without delay, upon their accession to office, the colonisation railway policy of their predecessors. But, instead of doing so, the interests of the North-West have been sacrificed to the construction of a trans-continental railway in advance of the requirements of the country, and to the construction of which the well-being of the population of the North-West has been subordinated. Obstacles have been put in the way of necessary railway construction. Settlers have been harassed and ruined. Many of them have been driven out, and they have published abroad the wrongs which they were compelled to endure. Millions of acres, upon which some might have voluntarily gone, were put into the hands of land sharks and speculators—upon such terms as to enable them to make a profit. The toiler saw that these men had vast areas put at their disposal, into which he could not enter without their consent and upon their terms. These companies were more favored than the settlers; discontent was produced by contrast; and instead of settlement being promoted, it was retarded. What could a colonisation company do to promote the settlement of an extensive region of prairie? The man that had not the means to take him into the country, could not subsist after he got there. It was not because the North-West could not be reached that it was not more rapidly settled. It was because no market was to be found for the product of the settler's industry that so few have gone thither, up to the present moment. The colonisation companies, under whose control, three years ago, ten millions of acres were placed, have all signally failed. There is not one exception. There is not one which has not stood in the way of settlement.

Mr. MILLS.

There is to-day many a quarter-section in the North-West which would have been occupied and cultivated by a Canadian, who has become a land owner south of the border, had it not been under the control of a colonisation company. It would have been immeasurably better, in the interests of the country, had every acre in the North-West been burdened with a charge towards the construction of a colonisation railway within reach, rather than to have been subject to the policy pursued by Ministers. Settlers care but little for a charge of $1 an acre upon their lands if these are made accessible to markets. It is a fact that the whole North-West has been practically given up for the construction of a road to secure the trade of Asia, which must always take another route. The Government have paid no heed to the interests of the settlers; they have turned away the currents of immigration, and they have produced a feeling of discontent over the whole North-West country that is not likely to be overcome, so long as the administration of affairs is in their hands. They have exasperated the population beyond measure, until they are as much distrusted by the settlers as the settlers are distrusted by them. Do we not see in the organs of the Government charges daily made against the white settlers of the North-West? But we are not left to draw inferences from the newspapers in the confidence of Ministers. We have but to look to the measures submitted by Ministers to Parliament. The people have their local representative body swamped by Government appointees—men who are strangers in the country—who know nothing about its local wants—who are ignorant of the views of the people—who are strangers to their grievances, are sent thither to make laws and ordinances for their government. Could such a course be pursued under a Democratic system of Government, if there was not a deep distrust in the minds of Ministers of the population? Then we had the Minister of Militia submitting to the House a measure for disarming the white population. In that distant part of our country there are numerous bands of savages, who have already imbrued their hands in the blood of the settlers. That these savages should be disarmed may be highly expedient, but what could induce a Ministry to propose the disarmament of their countrymen and kindred in the North-West? Was ever such a measure proposed by the Government of a free people before? What have our neighbors and friends who have gone to the Territories done, that they should be disarmed, in the presence of the savages who threaten their lives and their property? Is such a course likely to produce contentment? Are those who are disposed to leave these Provinces to seek their fortunes elsewhere likely to be drawn to our own Territories, rather than to Dakota, by such a measure? Does it not show that the Government know that they have produced in the minds of the settlers the feelings of the deepest indignation? Ministers failed to stifle the voice of the white population of the North-West by making the Indians voters. They propose now to disarm the white population, and to swamp their council by appointees of the Crown. But we have still other evidences of the feeling of Ministers towards the white settlers of the North-West. We have the disarmament of the volunteer corps. Does not every one see that the cheapest, the most efficient force that could be had for the maintenance of peace and the protection of life and property in the North-West Territories would be numerous and well-appointed companies of volunteers? Has the Government taken, as a measure of defence, that course, which plainly presents itself as the best, under the circumstances? Not at all. Ministers distrust the population. They double the number of police, and retain in the country the nucleus of a soldiery. Is there any reason for this, except the fact that they are more hostile to the white population than to the Indians.

Ministers know that they have well nigh ruined hundreds of those who, before they went into that country, were their political supporters and friends. If there has been a half-breed insurrection, if there has been Indian massacres, if men have been butchered, if settlers have been robbed, if their dwellings have been destroyed, if their wives have been ignominiously treated by savages, how came it about? Has it not been because that men have in vain prayed and petitioned and entreated the Government for years to listen to their complaints and to redress their grievances? There is not a life that has been lost, there is not a cow or a horse that has been driven away, there is not a dwelling that has been burned, that would have been molested had Ministers given attention to the duties that devolved upon them in connection with the administration of the affairs of the North-West Territories. We have heard a great deal of late about the white traitors of Prince Albert settlement, and not a little has been done by organs of the Government to turn away the indignation from the Ministers to the settlers of Prince Albert, whom they had wronged. Here are men who have for four years been imploring the Government to do them justice and to redress their grievances. They demanded no aid. They were asking for nothing that would cost the country a farthing. They simply called upon the Government to do its duty; and how was there request met? Let me narrate the facts connected with that settlement. Prince Albert settlement was begun by the establishment of a Presbyterian mission there in 1866. The residents were largely half-breeds and Indians at that time. In 1873 there were ten white settlers. In 1874 there was a further accession, some of whom came from Canada and some from the United Kingdom. It was supposed that the Pacific Railway would be constructed on the line surveyed by the Government, and this was regarded as a favorable district for settlement. In 1879 they asked to have their land surveyed. During that year the special survey was pushed on to the Prince Albert settlement, so as to make it possible to comply with their wishes, and in 1878 the survey was made. During that same year Mr. George Duck was appointed agent for Dominion lands, and he went from Winnipeg to Prince Albert in August, so as to be ready, without delay, to enter upon his duties. But it does not appear that anything was done for more than two years; for I find that it was not until the 8th October, 1880, that he received any instructions from this Government, and then he was directed to obtain evidence by statutory declaration of all claims based upon occupation before the transfer of the country to Canada. He is instructed to include in his inquiry all cases at Fort Carlton and at Fort à la Corne, as well as those at Prince Albert. The agent reported, on the 5th March, 1881, that there were twenty three lots in Prince Albert settlement that had been occupied before the transfer of the country, but there were none in the vicinity of Carlton, and he believed there were none at Fort à la Corne. The great majority of the settlers of Prince Albert came later. A large number of them came and chose their locations in 1879, returned east for their families, and took possession of their locations the following year. There were white settlers who were English, and half-breeds partly English and partly French. They did not enquire into the terms of the Dominion Lands Act. They believed the Government was only too anxious to secure the settlement of the country. They expected when it was set out for settlement they would obtain entry without difficulty, and that they would be allowed to date their occupation from the time they entered upon the lands. Many of them, especially among those who squatted before surveys were made, as they made improvements, sold to other comers, as they had opportunity and as they found it to their advantage. It never occurred to those who purchased that any objection would be made to the acquisition of the improvements of those from whom the purchase was made. They did not doubt that if they could show possession, as well on account of prior occupants as on their own, that they would be allowed to count the aggregate time and obtain their patents without difficulty, where the time was sufficient. On the 12th February, 1877, Governor Laird wrote to the Minister of the Interior that it would seem, from the wording of the Dominion Lands Act, that the settlers who located before the lands were surveyed would require to wait three years after having made entry before they could get their patent; that this would seem to be harsh to those who had been many years in the country, and to meet this legislation was promised by the then Minister. On the 9th September, 1878, the Lieutenant Governor visited Prince Albert settlement. On the following day a deputation of settlers presented an address to him. In it they spoke of their progress in agriculture, of their churches and schools; and they expressed the opinion that, should no untoward accident turn aside immigration, they will always hold the first place among the settlements of the country. They had confidence in the future prosperity of the settlement; they hoped for steam communication by land or water to hasten their progress. They informed the Lieutenant Governor that they feared trouble from hungry Indians, and they urged the establishment of a small detachment of police at Prince Albert, for the purpose of maintaining peace. They spoke of the propriety of having a representative in the Government of the Territories. About sixty of them had signed this address. This address shows the state of public feeling at that time. They were still contented. They took a cheerful view of their future prospects. They desired communication with the outside world. They wished security for life and property, and they wanted representation in the North-West council. Mr. Laird told them that the subject of representation had been already considered. That the census of the settlements at Prince Albert, Duck Lake and St. Laurent would be taken, and if the requisite number of people were found they would be called upon to elect a representative. The chairman, Mr. Lawrence Clarke, assured Mr. Laird that the people had the utmost confidence in the Government of the Territories. So far, they were contented and hopeful, and relied upon the Government doing them justice without undue delay. In the Saskatchewan Herald, of the 25th August, 1879, there is a report of the Lieutenant Governor and others having visited earlier in the month St. Albert and the settlements on the Upper Saskatchewan. The Herald says:

"The country between Edmonton and Prince Albert is settled, and the magnificent crops of wheat tell of the industry of the settlers and the fertility of the soil."

The same newspaper says that about a hundred people from Manitoba have located upon the South Saskatchewan and at Prince Albert early in the month. It says they are well off, and are well supplied with implements and live stock of all kinds. That numerous other small parties are on the road, on their way to the settlement. On the 30th November, 1878, Mr. Duck, the land agent at Prince Albert, writes to the Department as follows:—

"I have much pleasure in informing you that a large quantity of land outside the Prince Albert settlement survey has already been settled upon during the past season. There are, so far as I am aware, very few cases of disputed claims. The settlers are all anxious to make the necessary entries to secure themselves."

On the 22nd November, 1879, the Surveyor General writes Mr. Duck, that it has been brought to his notice that in cases where occupancy and improvements have preceded homesteading, the period of settlement has been counted from that date, and not from date of entry. This practice, the Surveyor General says, is contrary to the Dominion Lands Act, and cannot be allowed, and he advises the land agent to post a notice of this in a prominent position. This was accordingly done, and may be said to be the beginning of the difficulties between the Government and the settlers in the Saskatchewan district. A false step was taken, which was not promptly retraced, although it was again and again brought under the attention of the Department. In May, 1880, a petition, signed by 102 of the settlers of Edmonton and Prince Albert, asking that steps might be taken to confirm titles to lands purchased from occupants of claims taken previously to the transfer of the Territories. On the 6th October, 1879, the Saskatchewan Herald says it is reported that Sir John Macdonald will not retain the post of Minister of the Interior. It approves of his retirement from the office, because it is believed that the individual attention of a Minister is required. The people are getting impatient. The surveys had been completed for more than a year. The agency was not yet formally opened. No entries could yet be made; and the regulations which the Department had adopted in July and in August were far from satisfactory. The Herald refers to the regulation forbidding any one to cut wood enough to build a camp fire, denounces it as absurd, and says it is more honored in its breach than in its observance. The Government were indifferent, but the progress of the country went forward. The Saskatchewan Herald, of the 7th June, says that the half-breeds have taken up locations—have fenced and planted gardens, and are taking the first steps towards establishing themselves as farmers. The Herald, of the 13th September, 1880, says the St. Albert mission is growing rapidly in population and importance. A continuous settlement, twelve or fourteen miles, extends along the river, both above and below the mission, and that 50,000 bushels of wheat will be harvested during the year within its limits. On the 31st October, 1880, an Order in Council was made, establishing a land board, consisting of a land commissioner and an inspector of agencies. The commissioner was to have general supervision of the business of the office. The inspector is to perform the duties indicated by his title. The Minister hoped that this would lead to a more speedy despatch of business and more correctness in decision. It is admitted that much inconvenience and delay had been experienced and much complaint had been made, and not unreasonably, by parties interested. Ministers altered the machinery of administration, but nothing was still done. The efforts of the Department of the Interior were like Mr. Bouncer's efforts at study. He shaved his head and did everything but apply himself to the work on hand. On the 31st January, 1881, the Saskatchewan Herald reports four new registration offices, one at Turtle Mountain, at the Little Saskatchewan, at Touchwood Hills, and at Prince Albert. Mr. Martin McDonald, of Nova Scotia, is appointed to the office at Turtle Mountain. G. A. Brisbois, of the Mounted Police, is appointed for the Little Saskatchewan, and Alexander Sproat, of Walkerton, Ontario, is appointed to the office at Prince Albert. The Herald says there are no lands to register at Touchwood Hills and none yet at Prince Albert, as no lands, up to that time, were yet opened for settlement. The correspondence in reference to the settlement began in 1878, with the inspection of Peter Hourie's claim. Hourie claimed several lots on the banks of the river. The Minister informed the agent that the lots would be surveyed ten chains wide and two miles deep, and the settlers would be entitled to one lot as a homestead and to a second as a pre-emption. On the 20th January, 1879, the Minister wrote to the agent at Prince Albert: "When your office is regularly established, and you have received the returns of the surveys, you will prepare to take entries." But it was not until the 2nd of August, 1881, that an Order was made to open the office, which was received by the agent on the 21st of September following. More than three years passed, from the time when the surveys were made and the agent appointed, before instructions were given for the opening of the office. In the meantime, the people had become greatly discontented. On the 7th June, 1881, Mr. Lawrence Clarke, who represented the district of Lorne in the North-West council presented a memorial to the Lieutenant Governor and the council, representing that the district was rapidly filling with settlers, many of whom have well-cultivated farms; that a large portion of the district had been surveyed in 1877 and 1878; that a land agent had been appointed in 1878; that the surveying of the lands and the appointment of an agent had hastened the progress of the country and encouraged the people to improve their holdings. That disputes had arisen between neighbors, and there were no means to secure a judicial settlement, and early action on the part of the Government was asked. The Lieutenant Governor transmitted this memorial, and the memorial of Father André, as to the land entries in this district, and he adds:

"I am aware that serious disputes are arising in the Prince Albert and Duck Lake settlements, regarding claims to land, and I would therefore respectfully urge that, in so far as it may be consistent with the policy of the Dominion Government, the prayer of the memorialists may receive early consideration."

The head office instructed the agent to open the office for homesteading, pre-emptions and sale of lands in surveyed townships, which was done, as I have already stated, on the 21st September. The Saskatchewan Herald, of the 3rd October, 1881, says that the land office is open, but the people are far from happy, as the new regulations mix things badly. The people do not know where they are. The regulations forbid them to homestead odd numbers; points out the great hardship which has arisen from applying new regulations to those who have settled upon a different understanding. Great dissatisfaction was produced by the action of the Government. The people were first exasperated by the long delay. They were now still more indignant on account of the regulations which had been made. Accordingly, on the 8th of October, a meeting was called at Prince Albert. The meeting adopted a series of resolutions. They protested against the reservation of odd-numbered sections after they had been occupied and improved by the settlers, and after the homestead duties had been performed upon them. They protested against the price of pre-emption being other than what it was fixed at by the Order in Council in force at the time of settlement. They said that many of the claims were taken up prior to the survey. When the survey was made, some of the settlers were found to be upon lands which, by the law, were reserved for schools or allotted to the Hudson Bay Company, and they requested that these occupants should be secured in their holdings. They said that many persons had been settled upon lands in the district for three years and more, and had performed the homestead duties required by law. That many persons had bought land from such settlers, depending upon the good faith of the Government for the security of their holdings, and they resolved that the Minister be requested to grant patents to such persons, with as little delay as possible. They resolved not to make entries unless they are accepted in accordance with the Order in Council existing at the time the lands were taken up—and they decide that Mr. Lawrence Clarke, who represents their district in the North-West council, shall present a copy of their resolutions to the Minister of the Interior and receive his reply. Mr. Clarke, accordingly, did so, and the Minister replied, on the 22nd of November. The Minister agreed that, upon proper evidence, they should have their lands at the price fixed at the time of settlement. He agreed that lands taken up before survey, which proved to be school lands, should be secured to the occupants. But he affirmed that the terms of the Order in Council of the 9th of July, 1879, was sufficiently well known, as it had been made public in the Official Gazette. And so a large number of settlers on odd sections received no satisfactory answer; so far as they were concerned, the Order in Council reserving the odd sections upon which they resided from being homesteaded, still remained in full force. The Minister said he had sufficiently answered their fourth resolution in his answers to the three that preceded it. But this was not so. The answers to the three preceding resolutions did not touch the case of the grievances set out in the fourth resolution of the Prince Albert meeting. The fourth resolution pointed out that many had resided upon their lands, and made improvements, such as are required for homesteading, but they did this before the land was surveyed, and before entry could be made, and they want the time of occupation before as well as after entry to count, and the Minister persistently refused to understand both their complaint and his own ruling. He haughtily tells the settlers that he "will cause enquiry to be made through his own officers, and take such action as may be in accordance with law." On the 25th January, 1882, Mr. Clarke writes the Minister that a meeting had been held on the 19th, and that he read to a large assembly of his constituents the Minister's letter. They were pleased with the concessions, but they expressed strong feelings of regret that the law debarred the pioneer settlers, who had performed all settlement duties prior to the opening of the local land office, from obtaining immediate patents for their lots, and are confident, on further consideration, the Minister would have the law amended, so as to allow of this grievance being redressed. On the 14th of April they are informed from the Department, that an amendment of the land law is before Parliament, indicating that their wishes were to be met, and the defect complained of repaired, but the subsequent conduct of the Government is strangely at variance with such an intention. In January, 1882, new instructions were issued from the Department, authorising entries to be made of odd-numbered sections, but they do not appear to have been sent to the agent at Prince Albert for several months. These instructions applied only to those who did settlement duties prior to 9th October, 1879. On the 12th September, 1882, the Deputy Minister writes Mr. Duck, "if the settler makes application to the land office for entry within three months after notice has been received at the head office, of land having been surveyed, and the survey having been confirmed and the settler has made proof to the local agent of the settlement and improvements at the time of filing such application, and has been allowed to enter his homestead, he will be entitled to his patent under clause 11, section 34, Dominion Lands Act, upon proof of residence and cultivation for three years next preceding the application;" but this notice did not at all meet the case of the people of Prince Albert, for although they had resided upon and cultivated their land for more than three years preceding their application they had not applied for entry for three months after the office had been opened, and they had not applied, because the Government had passed an Order in Council increasing the price of pre-emptions and withdrawing odd-numbered sections from settlement, and they feared they would, in some way, be assenting parties to these regulations, if they applied for leave to make entry after they became aware of the facts. On the 25th of October Mr. Duck acknowledged the letter of the 12th of September, and pointed out that no notice was made within three months, in consequence of the notice posted up by order of the Surveyor General, that the settlement duty began to run only from the day of entry, and asking for further instructions. To this letter Mr. Burgess replied on the 23rd November, informing the agent that as to receiving applications for patents that his circular superseded the letter of the Surveyor General, and requires to be construed together with the law and regulations; but this statement left the agent as much in the dark as ever, for the Deputy Minister's circular only applied to those who ask to make entry within three months, and these people at Prince Albert had, for the reasons which I have stated, not applied to make entry until long after the three months had expired. To make the manner of dealing with the people of Prince Albert more clear, I will refer to Miller's case. Miller settled upon certain lots in June, 1876, and he applied and obtained entry in 1882. He was a settler in good faith, but the office was opened on the 21st September, 1881, and Miller did not obtain entry until seven months after the office had been opened. He applied for patent. Neither instructions nor regulations met his case. The agent reported it to the Department, and Mr. Andrew Russell, for the Surveyor-General, informed the agent that he was to deal with the case under departmental instructions: that if three years had passed since Miller obtained entry, the agent was directed to refer the land for patent, upon Miller paying $1 per acre for his pre-emption. Mr. Burgess also wrote Mr. Duck, on the same day, informing him that on the 19th instant an Order in Council had been made to authorise the antedating of the entry to the time of the application, so as to cover the time, during enquiry, where the settler was found to be entitled, but was not allowed to make his entry at the time he applied; but this did not meet Miller's case, as it did not meet the case of scores of others. There had been no question with regard to Miller's right to obtain entry. There had been no delay at the office. The people in the settlement had resolved not to make entries until certain Orders on Council were modified. Miller had been on his lands more than six years. About that there could be no doubt. The difficulty was, that he had not been entered within three months of the opening of the office. Mr. Duck acknowledged Mr. Burgess' letter on the 25th November, informing him that his circular had no reference to Miller's case; that the land office had only been open fifteen months, and that he required further instructions. On the 1st February, 1883, Mr. Russell wrote Mr. Duck, in order to further instructions being given in Miller's case, asking him to send all available information. Mr. Duck complies on the 27th of February, and adds:

"I believe the said Miller's declaration to be true, and that he and many other settlers were prevented from applying for their patents for their homesteads within the time specified in sub-section 5, section 34, Dominion Lands Act, by the fact of the notice posted in this office, to the effect that residents prior to the date of entry could not be counted as settlement duty, and that notice of this ruling of the chief law officer of the Crown, with reference to sub-sections 5 and 11 of section 34, was not received at this office until after three months had elapsed, in which such application for homestead patents could be received."

"As your appointment as Dominion land agent was in March, 1878, although lands in your agency were not opened for sale or homestead entry until 2nd August, 1881, if Miller or any other actual settler applied for entry between these dates, he should have the benefit of the Order in Council of the 19th of October, 1882, which authorises the circular of the 19th of that month."

So you see that Miller was as far off as ever from getting his patent. Now, in the beginning of 1883 the people of Prince Albert petitioned the House of Commons, complaining that no patents had yet been issued for their lands, that their claims had become valuable, that the owners and occupiers were unable to sell. Villages and towns were springing up, but building was impeded and business interfered with. On the 23rd April Mr. Lindsay Russell, the Deputy Minister, reported to the Minister that the progress of settlement, arising from projected railways, had led to urgent applications by settlers for an opportunity of getting their titles. On the 7th July the Minister transmitted Mr. Russell's report to the Council, and there was an Order in Council adopting the same. On the 11th September, 1883, Mr. Pearce writes to Mr. Walsh, and directs the Minister's attention to the two classes of claims in Prince Albert district, in order that a decision may be reached at once. So you see that the surveys were not reported for three years, and the people were unable to secure entries. A man named Moore bought a lot of another party, who had improved over 100 acres and been in possession for seven years; yet he was unable to obtain his patent. Then Lawrence Clarke bought lands of Isbister, in 1877, and was subjected to similar annoyance. There were several other similar cases in Prince Albert, Battleford and Edmonton, which should be referred to the land board and adjusted without further delay. Mr. Pearce, in his communication to Mr. Walsh, says that: "Parties now claim that their claims should count prior to date of entry." The office at Prince Albert was opened on 21st September, 1881. The regulation requires that entry be made within three months from this date. Only five persons so entered. Between 200 and 300 were then settled within the limits so opened. The Dominion Lands Act, 1879, also 1880, makes it imperative that entries should be made within three months. Let me now give some of the reasons for this delay. I desire to call attention to these facts: that in the Birtle district two limits of each township had been defined, and most of the entire survey completed, though not open for entry; and that on 7th July, 1883, Mr. Walsh requests instruction in reference to farm instructors in the Souris district. On 13th September, 1883, Walsh sends Pearce's report to the Minister of the Interior. Pearce asks: "But when these parties fail to comply with the law as to entry within three months, there being nothing to prevent their doing so, and since the Act clearly states that entry must be made before application for patent can be received, should they not lose the time prior to entry? This, however, is to be taken into consideration in their case. As a class, they are very ignorant of the rules and regulations embodied in the Dominion Lands Act." This letter explicitly states entry must be made within three months, and evidence filed of prior residence and improvements. The Order in Council provides that entry may be antedated, so as to cover the time of investigation, and not the time land has been resided on and improved. The Prince Albert claims were not covered by the Order in Council; Miller's case was not within the rule. His entry was made on 12th April, 1882, seven months after the office was opened. If the three months' rule is overlooked, all, says Mr. Pearce, will claim they were ready to make entry three years ago, and are now entitled to be recommended for patents. I have called the attention of the House to an Order in Council of 19th October, 1882, and it must be remembered that the vast majority of the settlers did not make application within the three months allotted.

Mr. McLELAN. Why so?

Mr. MILLS. I have told the House the reason. The Government had demanded $2 an acre for pre-emption lands, and that demand was made although the settlers had been on the lands adjoining and were entitled to the pre-emption at $1. If the land office had been opened in proper time a large number of entries would have been made long before the Order in Council was passed increasing the value of the pre-emption lands.

Mr. McLELAN. What reason had they to expect to obtain the land at $1 per acre?

Mr. MILLS. That had been the rule everywhere in the North-West.

Mr. McLELAN. Established by whom?

Mr. MILLS. Established by the Government.

Mr. McLELAN. Established by which Government?

Mr. MILLS.

Mr. MILLS. It was the rule when we were in office, and when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, down to July, 1879.

Mr. McLELAN. Is not that in the forty-mile belt, that you prohibited anyone from going into, and in which you prohibited homestead settlement, but in regard to which you finally said to the people: You may go in and settle, and pay $1 per acre, cash, and such further sum as we may fix upon hereafter.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman knows that the Government reported to the people of Prince Albert that they were not within the railway belt. The hon. gentleman knows that the regulations to which he refers had no reference to Prince Albert. The Order in Council to which the hon. gentleman refers only refers to settlers in the portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway reserve within the limits of Manitoba, in the immediate vicinity of Selkirk. The hon. gentleman has but to look at it, in order to know precisely to what particular lands it refers. I have gone over the whole of the papers brought down by the Government. There is not, from the beginning to the end, any intimation that they are within the railway belt; on the contrary, they are informed that they are not, and that the regulations do not refer to them. The North-West council urged on the Government that immediate steps be taken to determine the question of title to land over three years in cultivation. A meeting of the Prince Albert settlement, reported in the Prince Albert Times, of the 17th of October, was held, of which Mr. Miller was chairman, and Mr. Fitzcochrane secretary. Let me call attention to what was said at that meeting. They complained of the grievances on account of the land policy; that the Government had failed to provide any machinery for the management of their internal affairs; that no attention had been paid to their remonstrances, prayers and memorials; that the so-called amendments of the Land Act had increased the injustice and the evils complained of by these settlers. It will be seen that up to this time no patents were issued. The lands were surveyed, a town was laid out, buildings were erected, of considerable value, and the settlers asked for the opportunity of mortgaging their property to raise money to carry on their business. But they could not get it, they could give no security, because the Government refused to issue patents. They insisted on the rule that the time should run from the date at which entry was made, and they refused to antedate the time for the improvements of these people, although some of them had been in possession for more than ten years. Now, Mr. Walsh, on the 9th of October, reports a number of other cases, and on the 10th of October, 1883, he writes to Mr. Duck, that the Surveyor General's letter was clearly a misinterpretation of the Act, but only in so far as having the residence prior to entry count as a part of the three years required. He also informed Mr. Duck that there was nothing in the Surveyor's letter forbidding or even deterring parties from making entry within three months after the land was open for entry, and furnishing evidence. This is perfectly true. They might have done so. But who could expect that ordinary settlers of the country, who were not lawyers, seeing a notice, that by law they had no right to antedate the entry, would contest the validity of the decision of the Department, and insist on the Dominion lands agent taking the evidence. And because they did not do so they are to be denied the opportunity of doing so when the Department admits that it was mistaken, and that the law had been misconstrued. Some months later information was communicated to the land office, that these cases might be antedated, and that the land agent might take evidence and enquire into the merits of the cases of those parties who were making application. But when application was made, when it was proposed to deal with cases, it was found that all the papers in Miller's case, instead of being considered by the Department, and a report made and instructions given to the agent, were still lying in the Department, and, so far as I know, Mr. Miller received no patent for his land up to this moment. I need not go on with other cases. I have a large number of them here, but they are of a similar type of this one of Mr. Miller. The people complain of the reservations at Regina and in other parts of the country. They complain of the reservation of the one mile belt, and a good indication of the state of the country is shown by the fact that a newspaper, the Prince Albert Times, which generally supported the Government, as small papers in new districts usually do, had an article, when the rumor came, in November, 1883, that the First Minister had resigned, as Minister of Interior, expressing pleasure at the information, and hopes that the new Minister will devote himself to the discharge of his duties, and would be found to be the right man in the right place. In fact, the difficulties complained of by the people of Prince Albert, and the impediments standing in the way of granting their patents, were trifling in their character, though extremely injurious in their effects; they were such as might be remedied by any Minister in five minutes. There was no difficulty, no wrong being done by meeting the wishes of the settlers; on the contrary, it was carrying out the policy of the law to have given the people what they asked. Why was the period of three years' residence, before granting a homestead, required? Merely as an evidence of a bond fide intention to occupy the land. Well, if the party has occupied it three years before it is surveyed, and he asks, when it is surveyed, that the Government should give him his patent, what reason is there for withholding it? Are not the three years he has been on the land as good an evidence of his intention of remaining there as if the three years were put in at a later time? There were men who had been on their land for ten years. They were laying out villages and towns. They wanted capital, but the opportunity for obtaining it was denied them, because the Government refused to discharge their duties. I say, a more extraordinary case of—I will not say utter imbecility, but of utter neglect—I never knew in any public office. There is no justification for the treatment the people of Prince Albert and other places in that district received at the hands of the Administration. They were neglected; they were irritated; they had impediments put in the way of their improvements; their business was brought to stagnation by the failure of the Government to discharge the ordinary duties that devolved upon them. The state of things is easily traced. It began in the year 1879, with expressions of good-will towards the Government, in the newspapers. We find that complaints arose after a time—not loud nor very strongly put, but still complaints were made. We find that these complaints grew into exasperation; that public meetings were called; and that afterwards there were declarations of distress and discontent on the part of the population against the conduct of the Government. We find these people declaring that the impediments put in the way of settlement had driven away a large number of people and a large amount of capital, and we find the Edmonton Bulletin, a small newspaper in the North-West, which was edited by a member of the North-West Council, stating that there was rebellion in Canada, in 1837, to redress grievances, that there was a rebellion in Manitoba in 1870, before the rights of the people could be secured, that even murder had been committed, and that the Government must not be surprised if difficulties occurred in the North-West if this system of neglect and misconduct were continued. The Prince Albert Times, in commenting on the declaration of the Edmonton Bulletin, said that

"the above, coming from a member of the North-West council, has a ring of the true metal about it, which indicates the temper of the North-West." I say these complaints, these remonstrances, these petitions, these reports of public meetings, these newspaper articles, all came, from time to time, under the attention of the Government. They began in 1881, before the land office was open. It was by these complaints and remonstrances that the land office was opened at Prince Albert, three years after it ought to have been opened. From that hour until the rebellion occurred there have been remonstrances and complaints on the part of the people, and the grievances of which they complain have not been redressed. Their demands are reasonable; they show how very little it would have required on the part of the Government to satisfy those people; yet that little was not done, and the same misgovernment which drove the half-breeds into rebellion, which excited the Indians, has also produced discontent among the white population of the North-West. I do not deem it necessary to go into these details further. I could give a score of cases, in addition to this one case of Miller, if it were necessary; I take that as a type of all, and I say for this conduct there was no excuse; and if this House refuses to affirm the resolution of the hon. member for West Durham, it will be wanting in its duty to the North-West and to the electors who created this Parliament. I say that the cases I have brought under the attention of the House are cases of maladministration. I say that hon. gentlemen opposite have grossly mismanaged the public affairs of this country, and their conduct is properly characterised in the resolution before us. If hon. gentlemen vote against that resolution, they will declare that the white population of the North-West have had nothing to complain of; they will declare that the Government have dealt fairly and justly by the white population and by the half-breed population; they will declare that those people have no grounds of complaint. If they do so, they will vote contrary to the facts available to every member of the House in the papers laid before us.

Mr. ROYAL. A great deal has been said upon this question during the last two days; it has been considered from different points of view, and I believe it is proper for the members from the Province of Manitoba to offer some considerations on the causes, whether remote or immediate, that have led to the troubles which have just come to an end. In a new country, where institutions are new, those institutions are put to a supreme test when a portion of the people rise in arms to enforce some remedy for their grievances. Those grievances may be real or imaginary; but when there is a unanimous feeling among the different portions of the same community to rush to arms in defence of the majesty of the law and the institutions of the country, and to restore peace and order, I believe that in that country, however young it may be, the institutions are of a lasting nature. In this case, we have seen that the moment there was a call for the people of the old Dominion of Canada to support the majesty of the law, and to enforce the existing connection between all the members of this Dominion, that is to say, between all the Provinces having a common interest in supporting the existence of Canada, the way in which this call was responded to showed that every person and every family in the Dominion of Canada were ready to aid in maintaining the vitality of our institutions. When we have seen the call to arms responded to by the flower of our youth in all the Provinces of the Dominion, I believe that is an evidence that there is an enthusiasm to support the institutions of our country, which is essential to a nationality. And, Sir, from out of these troubles I believe this good will come: They have demonstrated that there is a national spirit in the whole Dominion of Canada. Now that we have seen that some of our volunteers have shed their blood in support of law and the constitution of Canada, I believe it becomes the duty of this Parliament to investigate the causes of these troubles. This Parliament is the great enquirer into all the evils of the country, and into all public questions that may arise in the course of our political course; I believe that now is the proper time for this Parliament to investigate the causes of these troubles, and that we, who come from the Province of Manitoba, and who are supposed to know something about the people of the North-West and the causes which may have led to the recent outbreak, may properly be called upon to express our views on the subject. Well, Sir, I deem it my duty to-night to express an opinion on the subject. That opinion is based on some experience which I have gained during some fifteen or sixteen years spent amongst the population of that country. In the course of my residence there, from 1870 to the present time, circumstances have made me intimately acquainted with the feelings of the half-breed population, of which so much has been said in the course of this debate. My own opinion is, that there are causes which have brought about the recent troubles which are of a remote nature—causes over which no Government could have any control. Amongst these, I may cite, in the first place, the non-granting of the amnesty in 1870, and by amnesty I mean a complete amnesty for all that had taken place until the 15th July, 1870. Besides that, I say that the distance which separates that western country from old Canada had a great deal to do with our management of affairs in Manitoba and the North-West Territories. We know very well that at that time communications were very slow. We know that it used to take three or four weeks to reach Winnipeg from this part of Canada, and on that account no sufficient check could be exercised by the heads of the Departments over the subordinates sent to those distant parts to administer laws or see to the carrying out of the policy of the Dominion Government. Another cause, of a remote nature, and over which no Government could possibly have any control, was the insufficient knowledge of the character of the population in the North-West at the time of its transfer to Canada, in 1870. The population was considered of no importance whatever in the transfer; nor even when the whole North-West Territories were bought over by the Dominion of Canada was there any mention made, at least by the Hudson's Bay Company, of the existence of a fully organised population in the North-West, and this, I believe, is one of the causes which led, not only to the troubles in 1870, but the recent ones. I am going to treat this question in as a brief a manner, as this most important question permits. The importance of the question demands forsooth that it be fully discussed, and it is not to be wondered at, in view of its importance, that some of our colleagues should have spent five hours or six hours in discussing it. I intend to treat it from an independent point of view; something may be said by an independent member of the House which may not be said by a member of the Government. I am disposed to give full credit for what has been done for the people and the future prosperity of that distant part of the Dominion; while, at the same time, I am disposed to criticise, independently, the measures which have led to the present troubles. I must say that the policy of the present Administration has led: First, to the organisation of those distant Territories; second, it has induced immigrants to go in there, not only from the eastern Provinces but also from England and other portions of Europe; and thirdly, it has led to the consolidation of the Dominion. Upon these three points I say its policy has been successful. I have stated that the character of the population in the North-West had been ignored by Canada when negotiating for the transfer of those Territories to the Dominion. It was a prevalent idea among us that there were no people in the North-West, except the half-breeds, who were something like the Indians, with no idea of political institutions, no social existence, and no prospect in the future—a population, in fact, who could be ignored without causing the least inconvenience to them, or the Government, or the eastern Provinces. It is my object to-night to show there was a nationality established on the shores of the Red River and the Assiniboine at the time of the transfer of that Territory to Canada. If we look back to the first time these Territories had any political or commercial existence in the history of this part of North America, we see that in 1670 a charter was granted by King Charles II to a certain number of merchant adventurers, who wanted to trade on the shores of Hudson Bay. A monopoly was given them to trade over all that region whose waters flow into Hudson Bay; that trade was carried on successfully for a certain number of years. In 1731 Gauthier Varennes de la Vérandrye, a French Canadian, born in Three Rivers, under a license from the King of France of that day, went westward and discovered the plains lying west of Lake Superior and Red River. Gauthier Varennes de la Vérandrye was accompanied by his sons, and by some of his compatriots from the Province of Quebec, then La Nouvelle France. A few years afterwards, when he saw, and the Government saw, and the merchants saw, that there was a prospect of a highly prosperous trade being got up between those Indian tribes that had been communicated with by Varennes de la Verandrye and his associates, such a trade was established, which grew very prosperous indeed. In the course of events, in 1763, the treaty of Paris took place, by which the whole of the present Dominion of Canada, then La Nouvelle France, was ceded to the Crown of England. It did not stop the traffic that was then being carried on by the traders from the Province of Quebec in those distant Territories; but it was not until 1774 that the Hudson's Bay Company felt that the privileges that had been granted to them had been greatly interfered with by these traders from the Province of Quebec. So far, the Hudson's Bay Company's agents had been trying to get that trade from the tribes trading with them on the waters flowing into the Hudson's Bay. It seems that they had no idea of the possible commerce that might have been made with the tribes of Indians existing on the shores of some of the tributaries of the great rivers that were emptying into the Hudson's Bay; but, in that year 1774, according to the historians, the Hudson's Bay Company saw that they had to deal with a very serious question of competing traders, and, in consequence of the success of those traders in intercepting Indians on their way to the Hudson's Bay Company's factories, they thought it was their duty to protect their interest, by establishing forts inland, on the grounds on which their opponents had, until then, carried on their operations, comparatively undisturbed. This competition grew up into an actual war between them and those independent traders, supplied by merchants from Montreal, Three Rivers and Quebec. In order to be more united and more powerful, these various traders agreed to form a company, which was called the North-West Company, and was organized in Montreal in 1783. To give you an idea of the important traffic that had grown up then, I may say that in that year the number of people that were trading in the interests of that North-West Company in the North-West Territories amounted to 5,000 individuals. We may have an idea of the importance of the trade which had grown up in opposition to the Hudson's Bay Company by this fact, that 5,000 men were employed in trading with the Indians westward of Lake Superior, and this is the most distant origin of the half-breed population. These people were mostly imported from the Province of Quebec, and they gave rise to the well-known class of trappers and coureurs des bois, whose life has been made the subject of romances and novels, which, no doubt, some of the members of this House have read. Cooper, for instance, has given, in some of his novels, the most striking features of that life, romantic as well as pleasing to every adventurous man. It is natural to suppose that of these 5,000 people, some settled, or at least spent the best part of their life in those distant parts of the territories; no doubt they formed unions with the only women who were then to be seen in that part of the Territory, and from these unions sprung up the race of half-breeds. At that time the Red River forts and those established on the Assiniboine, as well as westward, became the headquarters of the inland trading posts of both companies. The posts on the Red River, especially, at the junction of the Red and Assiniboine Rivers, became of the utmost importance, and from their isolated position, from the various circumstances in connection with that trade, they became one of the principal scenes of contention between the Hudson's Bay Company and the North-West Trading Company. Feelings of rivalry between these two companies ran so strong as to lead to bloodshed on more than one occasion. From that period of the history of the North-West Territories—and, when I say that, I include all the region situated westward of Lake Superior—we come to the first attempt that was made to plant a settlement of settlers in that distant part of Canada. That took place in 1811. It was attempted by Lord Selkirk. He was a shareholder in the Hudson's Bay Company, and I suppose, in his view, by planting a colony on the shores of the Red River, at that most important point, at the junction of the Assiniboine and the Red Rivers, he thought that the Hudson's Bay Company could get a ready supply of servants from that colony, in order to be able to better compete with the Canadian North-West Company. In that year Lord Selkirk brought out a certain number of families from the county of Sutherland, in Scotland. Now, Sir, all historians are unanimous on this point, that though it may have been in the interests of the Hudson Bay Company to have such a colony settled on their land, yet it led to hostility with the Indians, and also with the North-West Company. These settlers were regarded as invaders by the rival companies and the Indians. The Indians were exasperated because so much of their territory was taken up for agriculture. Matters grew worse, and property was destroyed. I suppose many members of this House have heard of the North-West Company. In the rivalry between this company and the natives, serious disturbances took place. Settlements were attacked, forts were taken, men were captured and lives were lost, troubles of which we heard during the debate on the boundary question. The title to the property of the half-breed population in the North-West Territories is connected with the establishment of that colony on the Red River. Lord Selkirk had to treat with the Indians, in order to get peaceable possession of territory upon which to establish his colony. The treaty that he then made with the Indians provided, besides mentioning certain geographical limits, that so much territory as could be seen between the legs of a horse, by looking under his belly, was to belong to him; so much of the territory was to be ceded by the Indians upon certain conditions. Here is what I find concerning this event in Morris' book, "The Treaties of Canada with the Indians of Manitoba, the North-West Territories and Keewatin":

"In the year 1817 the Earl of Selkirk visited his wide domain, and entered into negotiations with the Indian tribes, for the extinction of their title to a tract of land described as follows:—

"All that tract of land adjacent to Red River and Assiniboine River, beginning at the mouth of Red River and extending along the same as far as Great Forks at the mouth of Red Lake River and along Assiniboine River as far as the Musk Rat River, otherwise called Rivière des Champignons, and extending to the distance of six miles from Fort Douglas on every side, and likewise from Fort Doer, and also from the Great Forks and in other posts extending in breadth to the distance of two English statute miles back from the banks of the river."

"The Indians then inhabiting the region were described as being of the Chippewa or Saulteaux and Killistine or Cree nations. They were made to comprehend, the depth of the land they were surrendering, by being told, that it was the greatest distance at which a horse on the level prairie could be seen, or daylight seen under his belly between his legs. The consideration for the surrender was the payment of one hundred pounds of good merchantable tobacco, to each nation annually.

"The treaty was signed by Lord Selkirk and by five Indian chiefs, who affixed thereto drawings of the animals after which they were named, by way of signature, a fac simile of which will be found elsewhere. The surrender was to the Sovereign Lord, King George the Third. The treaty was accompanied by a map which shows that the tract surrendered extended to Grand Forks in what is now United States territory."

In 1836, the Hudson's Bay Company bought back the whole tract from the heirs of Lord Selkirk for the sum of £84,000, the rights of colonists who had purchased land between 1811 and 1836 being respected. Now, so far as we can judge from this and other historical accounts, that is the origin of the titles to the property which the half-breeds claimed from the Hudson's Bay Company, and which the Canadian Government undertook to guarantee to them by the Manitoba Act of 1870. In 1817 the forts of the Hudson's Bay Company were captured. The North-West Company of Montreal displayed great energy in order to overcome the competition of the Hudson's Bay Company, and some of the most troublous times in the history of that country belong to that period. In 1816 a battle was fought on the shores of Red River, a little below what is now the city of Winnipeg, in which Governor Semple, of the Hudson's Bay Company, and 26 of his men, were killed by the men employed by the North-West Company. It was then thought that the Hudson's Bay Company had lost their hold on the territory south and south-westward of Manitoba. But the year after Lord Selkirk came from Montreal, with part of the regiment of the Murons, and recaptured all the forts. During these troubles trade became demoralised in the rivalries of competition, and both companies came to the verge of bankruptcy; when, in 1821, there was a combination effected by which the two companies were united, and the North-West Company disappeared. I have alluded to that hostility between these two companies in order to show that the North-West Company of Montreal was accustomed to employ all its servants from the Province of Quebec. Numbers of those men in its employ settled in distant parts of the territory. The Hudson's Bay Company, on the other hand, brought nearly all its servants from Scotland or the Orkney Islands; and when the two companies were combined, of course a great number of these servants were thrown out of employment, and there you have the date of the first agricultural settlements in that region. The union between the servants of the North-West Company and the Indian women was the first origin of the half-breed people. It was about that time that Lord Selkirk, with the ideas of a statesman and the founder of a people—because, after all, he may be regarded as one of the founders of that country—Lord Selkirk, disregarding altogether his own religious ideas, applied to the Catholic bishop of Quebec for some priests, in order to establish French Canadian half-breed parishes in the settlements he had founded on the shores of the Red River and the Assiniboine. The Rev. Messrs. Provencher and Dumoulin were sent by the Catholic bishop of Quebec, in 1818, to that Territory. And, Sir, Lord Selkirk, when requested to do so, did not hesitate one moment to endow the Roman Catholic Church, that is to say, to give to those priests the means of endowing a church, the means of subsistence, and the means of extending their faith amongst the people of that country and assisting them to set up parishes alongside of the Scotch settlements which he had organised in that territory. It was only two years afterwards that Revd. Father Provencher visited the country. In 1822 St. Boniface became the nucleus of a large settlement. Lord Selkirk had brought with him, as I have stated, the remnant of the Murons regiment. That regiment was one of those foreign regiments which had taken service under the Crown of England in the Continental wars of 1812. A part of the regiment had been sent over to Canada, and Lord Selkirk, with the permission of the authorities, hired some of them to go with him in order to retake possession of the forts which had been captured by the North-West Company. That regiment was composed mostly of Swiss and German soldiers. Some of them who accompanied Lord Selkirk took up land and settled in the parish of St. Boniface; that is to say, in the territory lying east and almost opposite Fort Douglass, which is now comprised in the limits of the city of Winnipeg, and those settlers formed the parish of St. Boniface. It was a matter of surprise to me to know how it happened that the title of St. Boniface was given to that diocese. Rev. Father Provencher, who afterwards became the first Catholic bishop of that territory, when he saw so many German and Swiss settled there, gave to that part of the territory the name of St. Boniface, which is that of a German saint. We know, also, that there is a small slough which runs east of St. Boniface and empties itself into Red River, which slough is known to this day as German Creek. Upon that creek and at that point is the site of a church, and that then formed a very flourishing and populous settlement and parish, and it was called by Bishop Provencher the diocese of St. Boniface. Unfortunately, those Swiss and German soldiers did not remain very long in the settlement. Some of them, the minority, married French-speaking half-breed women, and that union, up to the present day, has given rise to large families; but most of the soldiers went away, thinking that under the then circumstances of the country they could do better by going to the United States or back to Canada. At that period, 1822, we have a fixed population for the first time in the history of the territory. That population was comprised, first, of the Scotch who were brought over by Lord Selkirk from Scotland; second, the descendants and families of those Scots and the Germans of the Murons regiment; and, third, the half-breeds, who originated from the union of French Canadians and Indian women. Thus we had three elements in the population then existing in the North-West Territories. In his arrangement with the Hudson's Bay Company, Lord Selkirk stipulated that he would give so much to that company, and undertake to plant, I think, 1,000 families within a certain number of years, and at any time that company could resume possession of the lands, and then the colonists would look to the company for their titles. In 1783 there were 5,000 people employed in that prosperous and best paying trade of the North-West Company. In those times, the French Canadians especially, took to that life, and we see amongst the half-breeds, noble names, the names of the nobility of France. In fact, we have the blood of the French families of New France instilled in that growing colony in the North-West. Members of those families, who saw a colony planted on the shores of Red River, that there was a church established, and educational institutions organised, emigrated to that distant point in the west; and after they retired from the service of the Hudson Bay Company they returned with their families, and settled in the important parish of St. Boniface. That is the origin of the half-breed nation in the North-West Territory, and I say that nobler blood and better parentage could not have originated it. It became the duty of those priests, whom Lord Selkirk had obtained from the bishop of Quebec, to see to the educational institutions; and, in course of time, sisters of charity, and sisters devoted to educational work, were brought into that country by the clergymen from the Province of Quebec. Those half-breed families, whether Scotch, or whether the descendants of the Murons regiment, are half-breeds, and had, at a certain time, and as late as 1840, as good facilities as they could have had in the Province of Quebec, or any other Province of Canada. Now, Sir, after these people settled in parishes, those parishes commenced to grow, and gave rise to many others. After the parish of St. Boniface had grown, it expanded into the parishes of St. Vital, St. Norbert, St. Charles, St. François Xavier, St. Paul, and others, and we found them all growing and improving. The population being under the régime of the Hudson Bay Company, had their own peculiar existence. As you may well judge, these people gave themselves to agricultural pursuits, and as there was no market for their surplus produce, they took to hunting as well. Hunting the buffalo was a benefit to them, as it was to the Hudson Bay Company, and that company encouraged them in hunting as much as possible. There was no currency in the colony. The currency mainly consisted of promissory notes, issued by the Hudson Bay Company, redeemable by bills of exchange, granted at sixty days' sight, on the Governor, the Deputy Governor, and the commissioner of the Hudson Bay Company, in London. I have seen this paper currency which existed in the Territories in 1870. It seems that the smaller the denomination of the bill the greater its size. A bill for a shilling, the people called a blanket, on account of its large dimensions, and they grew less in proportion according to the amount represented. The £5 notes were very small, the size being about that of our present bank bills. As these people could only grow on their land what they could consume or sell, they had, to a large extent, to depend on hunting to supply them with meat, and you would see a part of those parishes, after the seed was sown, organising for the buffalo hunts on the plains. A priest, as a general rule, would accompany them, and they would form camps, numbering from 500 to 1,500 people. As might be expected, these pursuits had a great influence on the character of the people; their characteristics were largely derived from their pursuits. When these people would go to the plains they would return months afterwards with their carts laden with the best kind of meat, and after harvesting their crops and selling what they could sell, they would have all they could wish to depend upon for the fall and the winter. When they were on the plains, these people were, of course, among the Indian tribes, whom they would have to fight occasionally. In fact, Sir, in these times, and to a very recent period, the half-breeds were the terror of the Indian tribes on the plains, and we have an instance, amongst others, that occurred in 1852, on the Grand Coteau of the Missouri, in which 67 half-breeds defended themselves for two days against 2,000 Sioux; and when I went to Manitoba some 15 years ago, I used to enjoy very much the narration given to me of that encounter, from eye witnesses of the fight. On that occasion Bishop Lafèche, of Three Rivers, who was then a missionary in the North-West, was present. I believe he was one of the wounded, and that he is still lame from the wound he received in that engagement. From the habits of life of these people, from the constitution of the country, from the distance which lay between this isolated group of settlers and the rest of the world, we may well imagine the characteristics of that nation. A spirit of independence and self-reliance were amongst the characteristics of that nation. Everyone had to look after himself, and a half-breed with his family, on the plains, was just as independent, and just as secure from all the necessities of life, as any citizen of our own towns or cities. With his family, his gun and his horse, he could depend on himself for a living for himself and his family. They were isolated, as I have said, from the rest of the world. They were 500 miles from the nearest terminus of the American system of railways, at the latest times. They were sixty days' travel from the Province of Canada, and they had depended on themselves entirely for their means of subsistence. We have seen the origin of the half-breed people. We have seen the origin of their title to property, and from 1822, when the first settlements were formed on the banks of the Red River, down to 1858, when the trade monopoly of the Hudson Bay Company ceased to exist, there was witnessed the development of a nationality—for it was a distinct nationality, to all intents and purposes. From their fathers they inherited many of the virtues of the races from which they sprung, and from their alliances with the Indian women, their descendants had, of course, inherited many of the features of the Indian population. Well, Sir, it would be wrong for anyone to suppose that these people had no idea of political institutions. They were under the sway of the Hudson Bay Company, which was eminently and essentially a trading company; and the Hudson Bay Company was not the company to offer the colonists any part of the Territories which had been granted to it by Charles II. However, when that colony grew into existence, the same institutions were given; and what were they? The legislative as well as the executive power was vested in the Governor and the council for the colony of Assiniboia, as it was called, until 1870, when those Territories were annexed to Canada. The councillors were seventeen in number, although afterwards they became twenty-one. These councillors, as well as the Governor of the colony, were appointed by the committee of the Hudson Bay Company; and, mark you, representation was then a principal feature of the political institutions of the country. The councillors were taken as representing all the various classes in the settlement. Representative men were nominated by the directors of the Hudson Bay Company from the various elements of nationality then existing in the colony—from the Scotch, the French half-breeds, and some of the foreign elements; and the recorder or chief justice of the Territory, as well as the two bishops, the Catholic bishop and the Anglican bishop, representing the religious element then existing, were made councillors. Therefore, when we see it stated in the press, and when the idea has been spread amongst the population of Canada, that those people, in 1870, had no idea of political institutions, public opinion has been greatly deceived and misled. Representative institutions were given to them, because they had a strong sense of justice, and all their rights and privileges, their national features and instincts, were represented in that council. Therefore, we may well infer that they had some correct idea of political government and some idea that their political rights should be respected when the transfer of the country to Canada took place. Now, it seems quite a surprise to us that that population should have existed for 50 years without any organisation, either judicial or political. I have stated what the political institutions were: the judiciary was equally simple and rudimentary, and yet it was sufficient to meet the wants of that population. That population had strong religious ideas, and you know, Sir, that hard life engenders naturally high morals; and morality is found to exist among those people, whose life is moral and frugal, and not tainted with the luxuries which we, amongst ourselves, call civilisation. Their judiciary consisted of a recorder or chief justice, if you may call him so, and some petty magistrates, and these formed the courts in the settlement. The recorder was appointed by the Hudson Bay Company in London, and had a seat in the council, when he had to perform duties there similar to those of the Attorneys General in the old Provinces; in fact, the recorder was the legal adviser of that council. They had the full jury system; no person could be tried except by his peers; and we may see, by consulting the history of those times, that this was the case. It may be said that those people had not the idea of our high civilisation. Well, Sir, upon that point there may be some difference of opinion. However, by the by-laws or regulations issued by that council the sale of liquor was strictly prohibited amongst the Indians, and was punished with the utmost severity. The granting of licenses—and I am sure that this will be a piece of very gratifying news to the prohibitionist members of this House—was also regulated, to the utmost extent, and it was surrounded with all possible safeguards. I believe we, in the eastern Provinces, may borrow from the regulations of that uncivilised council a good many features which would prove very satisfactory. In fact, after the organisation of the Province of Manitoba, the Government of that Province could not do anything better than embody in its own laws the very regulations that were issued by the council of Assiniboia. Under that political and social organisation, that people lived and increased for nearly forty years. There was no political strife amongst them; they had a paternal Government, which was sufficient for all their requirements, whether as leading an agricultural life or a hunting life on the prairie. They had no lawyers, no newspapers, no demagogues, no politicians, no grits.

Mr. HACKETT. The last was a blessing.

Mr. ROYAL. No doubt, a great blessing. They had no communication with the rest of the world; their complete isolation prevented them from enjoying the luxuries of our civilisation, but it made the population harmonious, united, sober, and fully convinced that liberty is only practicable with a corresponding sum of protection, and that to do justice to various interests requires a certain amount of representation from various classes, in a country obliged to protect themselves from the raids of the Indians. The public spirit of these people was dignified and self-confident. The country was deemed to be theirs, as they had to defend it unassisted, and it is a remarkable fact that those people, who numbered from 12,000 to 15,000, had to defend themselves against the incursions of the powerful warlike tribes in the west. The Hudson Bay Company had but one interest, that of making money and securing the most valuable export of furs from the Territory every year. The company had a renewal of the monopoly from 1838 to 1858, and such was then the condition of that people living in harmony together, having but few wants, and those wants fully satisfied. In fact, the existence of that people would be a most interesting study for any writer on political economy. They had no exports; their productions were consumed by the local market, and, besides, they had a circulation only of a certain character. In 1858 the extinction of that monopoly induced a certain number of American traders, and also some Canadian adventurers, to go through St. Paul to that Territory. The civilisation was not, perhaps, that which we are sometimes so proud of. It may have been a better one, if, by civilisation, we understand the greatest possible degree of order, and happiness in all the ranks of society; if by civilisation we understand a community so well regulated that law seems to touch lightly upon everyone, and is cheerfully obeyed by all; if by civilisation we understand, people in which the authority is respected, the family strong and united, the wants few, and all easily satisfied; if by civilisation we understand a community where all the individuals love their country, fight for its defence, revere its institutions, and do not cast an eye of envy upon other nations and other countries; if by civilisation we understand a people attached to its religion, a people whose manners, social enjoyments and amusements exhibit a high degree of morality, mutual benevolence and simplicity as well; if by civilisation we understand a nation which produces all the necessaries of life with the least degree of toil, hardships and hire of one free man to another, and where golden mediocrity is to be found in every man's home; the civilisation which was then flourishing on the shores of the Red River was certainly not one of fine public or private construction, of great activity of intelligence, of literature and arts, of steamboats, railways and telegraphs: but I dare say that the people to be found there were most assuredly the happiest that were known then to exist. With regard to some of the feelings that civilised people seem to have a monopoly of, patriotism, for instance—I do not say it is one that peculiarly characterises the present Opposition, but I must say patriotism was and is still a characteristic of that population. I will ask the forbearance of the House while I quote from one of the writers in the history of those people, Mr. Hargrave. In his book on the Red River, he says :

“Patriotism is a virtue popularly supposed to flourish in mountainous and old countries, whose majestic scenery and associations of old time foster and perpetuate the pride and allegiance which their children feel for them. The inhabitants of the plain country of Red River, however, most assuredly evince an affection for the land of their nativity, closely allied to, if not identical with the patriotic emotions of the denizens of other countries, nor is it only to the dead natural scenery that their feelings cling, but the existing under an improved exterior, the romantic life, the custom, mode of thought and language of the Indians, retain their hold on the affections of their descendants to successive generations.”

Now, it has been the custom, unfortunately, of writers and speakers upon the half-breed population of the Red River, to represent them as a semi-savage population, devoid of all the feelings which we, styling ourselves civilised communities, are so proud of; but, as I have stated, that population had the idea of political institutions, of representative institutions; they had more, perhaps, than our own people, accustomed, as they are, to representative institutions, the idea of submission to law and authority, and, as to feelings of patriotism, it is shown by this writer, who certainly has no prejudices in their favor, that patriotism flourished as well in their bosoms as it flourishes, I expect and hope, in the bosoms of the Canadian people. In the history of that strange country you will find many examples—and I have stated some—of chivalric ideas of valor and patriotism. Now, from the commencement of that settlement of the Red River, it may be well to ask whether that population had any intercourse with any other population in the world. They were isolated, but they kept up correspondence with the population of the older Provinces, through the missionaries sent to them, through the sisters of charity, through the ministers of the Gospel sent them; there was an uninterrupted intercourse maintained between that population and the population of the Eastern Provinces, and, when I have stated that the extension of the trade monopoly in 1858 was the signal for some merchants from Canada to go amongst that people, and try to enjoy the benefits and profits of that measure, I must say that this coincides with the first arrival amongst that people of Canadians. In 1859, a paper was established, the very first newspaper established in that portion of British America. It was the Nor'-Wester, and in the very first number of that paper the editors showed a spirit of opposition to the Government of the colony. In fact, from the first, the aim and ambition of the founders of the paper were in hostility to the existing institutions of the Red River. The first step publicly taken to effect such a change was when a petition was sent to England, asking for troops to protect the colony against the Sioux, who were just coming from Minnesota, after the massacre of 1862. The petition was signed by 1,183 settlers, a majority of whom were French-speaking half-breeds of that colony. The Nor'-Wester and the party upon whose support it existed sent a counter petition, and for the first time, and to the great scandal of the colony, that petition, while asking also for troops, commented disparagingly on the manner in which the Hudson Bay Company exercised its jurisdiction. In 1862 these parties, composed of Canadians as well as Americans, availing themselves of the weakness of the institutions in that country, liberated one prisoner—in fact, gaol was broken, in that circumstance, as well as in the year after, 1863. In 1866 the same party of foreigners assumed a more decided opposition to the existing institutions of the country. They made a request to the council that, instead of having the appointment of one councillor made by the Hudson Bay Company, in London, they should make that appointment. Of course, the petition was refused. The answer that came from the council stated that the appointment rested, not with the council, but with the committee of directors of the Hudson Bay Company, in London. The Nor'-Wester said: “The people of Winnipeg are openly discussing the propriety of taking the Government from its present hands into their own.” In 1867 an attempt was made to organise a republic in Portage la Prairie. Portage la Prairie was then a settlement lying outside of the limits of the settlement of Assiniboia. The constitution of Assiniboia was limited to a certain territory, outside of which it had no jurisdiction at all. In the meantime, the Scotch colonists had developed, and some few parishes west of Baie St. Paul, which was then the last parish of the settlement, were organised, and Poplar Point and Portage la Prairie and another parish were formed, and these people wanted to have some authority amongst them to maintain peace. So, in 1867, there was an attempt to organise a Republic amongst them. Thos. Spence was the elected president; he organised his council, made some laws, imposed some import and export duty, and then wrote to the British authorities to ascertain whether his Republic had any legal existence or not. Of course, he got an answer that he had no right to organise such a Government, and that was the end of it. However, it shows that the population was increasing fast, and that there was need of a Government to maintain peace and order. I will quote from the Globe, in reference to the establishment of that Government. The Globe seems always to have taken a very watchful interest in the welfare of the people of those Territories, but I do not hesitate to say that it has been the chief instrumentality in spreading discontent and dissatisfaction among the people, and hatred to the Government of Canada. This is what the Globe said :

“The Nor'-Wester is advised that, under the misgovernment of the Hudson Bay Company, the people of Red River had risen in revolt, under the leadership of Spence, and organised a Republic on British soil.”

The Nor'-Wester was the only medium of communication that then existed between that Territory and the eastern Provinces. To show that there was very little echo among the people, a counter petition to that above mentioned, made by Canadians and Americans respecting the electoral principle was signed by 804 people, asking that the institutions then existing should be continued to be maintained. The half-breed people, who formed the majority in the settlement of Assiniboia, had some political ideas of what the system of future movement for their country may be, I will read one of the clauses of the petition :

“Changes are anticipated in this country. We cannot foresee the result of the negotiations pending between the Imperial Government and your honorable body, but we are confident that you will not lose sight of our condition; and we humbly entreat your honors to take measures in the said transactions to secure the welfare of the natives and inhabitants of this settlement, and to guard them against the preponderating and undue influence of newcomers.”

This shows that the spirit of these people was fully awakened to the changes that were talked of as being about to take place in the Territories. Well, Sir, the Nor'-Wester refused to publish a counter petition, signed by the majority of the people of that settlement. The Canadians who came to that country in 1858 were naturally looked upon by the natives as being hostile to the institutions under which they had lived contented and happy. They looked upon the Canadians as a dangerous sort of men, who wanted to seize hold of the Government and to administer it to suit themselves; and to this fact we must attribute the commencement of the ill-feeling which the people of that country exhibited against the Canadians. In 1868 a party of Canadians was sent to construct a road from the Lake of the Woods to Fort Garry, under charge of a man named Snow, I suppose a civil engineer or surveyor. Amongst that party of Canadians there was, unfortunately, a poet. In fact, I believe this poet was his assistant, and had acquired some renown in the Canadian press as the author of verses of a some merit. Now, if that poet had confined himself to writing poems and reciting Shakespeare for his own amusement, no harm would have been done; but the very moment he set foot into the North-West Territories he began to write to his friends, and his letters were published in the Globe. Those letters gave a description of the country and of the people, which was simply a caricature, and was most unfair and unjust. The female part of the population got very angry at the reading of those letters. One lady pulled the nose of the poet, and another, in the store of her husband, used her hands rather freely about his ears. These facts show that when Canadians wrote about the features of the people and sought to caricature their mode of life and social institutions, the people became very sensitive, as they were justly proud of their condition. The uneasiness of that people assumed a different phase when, in February, 1868—and, mark you, that is a very important period in the history of the country—a disturbance occurred at Oak Point, in consequence of a report gaining credence among settlers in that locality that Canadians were purchasing from the Indians portions of land on which actual occupants had a pre-emption claim. In the lack of judgment displayed by those Canadian employees whom the Government sent there in 1868, we find the very seeds of discontent and hostility that afterwards matured in open revolt against the Canadian authorities. Of course, they were defending their own property, and these half-breeds, sensitive and proud, and feeling that Canadians were invaders of the Territory, felt the injustice of the proceedings. They knew very well that those people transacted business with the Indians in the Territory, which had been sold to Lord Selkirk, and upon which they had settled and made improvements and secured a pre-emptory claim. One of those parties was arrested and brought to Fort Garry, and the people submitted a prayer to the Governor that this man should be sent out of the Territory, because his presence was calculated to arouse misgivings and excitement among the people. In order to show what was the true state of the little party of Canadians and Americans who were then arousing opposition to existing institutions, the Nor. Wester published an article, in which it was stated that “while Sir George Cartier and William Macdougall were going to England, in order to unite the North-West to Canada, Senator Ramsay, of Minnesota, was submitting a series of resolutions at Washington, for the purpose of annexing the colony of Red River to the United States.” What was the patriotic winding up to that document? It was, that: “Whichever way the cat jumped the North-West was bound to be a great country.” It was not love of Canada that influenced them, but a feeling that they were bound to have some power, either political or in some other direction; and whether union occurred with the United States or Canada, it was a matter of indifference to them. I mean to state that matters connected with the remote causes of the present disturbances were beyond the control of any Government, whether Conservative or Liberal, and that in these the recent troubles had their rise and cause is quite evident. With respect to the influence of Canadians sent to the North-West, I will quote the testimony of a writer whose prejudices against the French-speaking half-breeds are well known:

“Had the Canadian party endeavored to lead the settlers to demand in a proper way annexation to Canada, without trying at the same time to blacken the character of the Hudson Bay Company, it is very probable that Canada would have found more friends than it did in Red River. There was no objection to a union with Canada amongst the people, but when men who represented themselves as champions of Canada defied the laws and endeavored to bring mob violence into existence, then the settlers took fright, and without waiting to judge properly, they denounced all Canadians on account of the acts done by a few lawless men. The fact was, that the people of Red River felt that although the Hudson Bay Company government was weak and unsuitable to the wants of the country, still it was the only one in existence at the time in the North-West, and therefore the sole protection to life and property. They consequently had no desire to see it overthrown, until another and better one was substituted in its place. There was no anti-Canadian feeling dominant amongst the settlers; but there was a fear that if the generality of Canadians should prove to be like the party who put themselves forward as the representatives of Canada in Red River, they would not be a good or safe people to become allied to.”

Then, further on, the same author says:

“Other parties now commenced staking off land, until, at last the settlers finding out what was going on, interfered, and a great deal of ill-feeling was caused amongst the people on the subject. Indeed, this promiscuous claiming of land on the part of strangers did more to engender a feeling of discontent towards Canadian annexation than anything else. The idea became quite prevalent that the rights of settlers to their lands would not be respected, but that every Tom, Dick or Harry might come in and claim land wherever they found it. This selfish and unprincipled behavior on the part of such men did a great deal of harm, and sowed the seeds of future trouble in the settlement. In fact, it became generally believed amongst a large number of the settlers that they were to be ignored, and that strangers were to be allowed to come into the country and do as they pleased; and that Canada's whole aim in endeavoring to obtain possession of the country was to find a place of refuge for its surplus population, and that the interests of the Red River people were to suffer thereby. All this ignorance of the real intentions of the Canadian Government was caused by the actions of a few men.”

Now, Sir, you may well imagine with what feelings of uneasiness the arrival of Col. Dennis and his party of surveyors was welcomed in the summer of 1869, after the doings of the men under surveyor Snow, after their trying to buy lands from the Indians, without regard to the occupants of those lands. So great was that anxiety that when this officer commenced with his surveyors to survey some lands which had been occupied for a long time in the vicinity of St. Boniface, their work was put a stop to by the population. That was the commencement of open difficulties among the Red River people, a very important period in the history of that part of the Territory, in connection with Canadian doings. It is very important to make known the remote causes which led the population there to take fright at the attempt made by these people, the injudicious attempt, to survey lands which had been cultivated and improved for many years before.

Mr. TROW. The hon. gentleman will excuse me, but it is so excessively hot, and members are so uncomfortable from sitting so long, that I believe the House will be delighted if the hon. gentleman would hand in the balance of his speech to the Hansard reporters. It would answer just as well.

Mr. ROYAL. I have no objection to moving the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. TROW. The balance would be published in Hansard.

Mr. ROYAL. Not at all. My speech is not written.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I think we have shown a good deal of patience with other hon. gentlemen, and I think we might give the same courtesy to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal). Perhaps, if he was speaking in his own language, which he avoids out of courtesy to members who do not understand the French language, he might occupy less time.

Mr. ROYAL. I have no intention of wearying the House. It is not a source of pleasure to me to be obliged to speak in a foreign language. I do it, of course, as a matter of courtesy to this House, and to those who do not understand the French language. I would, no doubt, find great pleasure in addressing the House in French, but I do it in English with no little difficulty; and I know it must be very tiresome and unpleasant to some of the members here to listen to a member who addresses the House in a language which is not familiar to him. However, I believe the question is very important; but if the House is unanimous upon this point, that the debate had better be adjourned, I have no hesitation to agreeing to that sentiment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. ROYAL. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure and interest to some of the speeches made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Of course, I do not expect the same courtesy from some of them, for various reasons, but I believe if my pleasure here had been studied, it would have been better for me to have handed a ready made speech to the Hansard reporters. I must say, in speaking upon the subject I have tried to impress this House with the importance of knowing the origin of the population which existed in the North-West Territories at the time of the transfer. I know that very little is known of that population and their history, from the very fact that hon. gentlemen opposite ignored that there was such a population as the half-breeds, and said that the population existing there were either Indians or white people. Well, Sir, that is not the case. That is contrary to history and facts, and I thought it was my duty to correct the idea which has gone aboard, that the population of that country was of no consequence whatever, that the number of that population was insignificant, that they had no political institutions, that they did not know anything about representative institutions, that whatever Government might be given to them they should accept, as a matter of course with the greatest grace possible. I feel it my duty to-night to vindicate the character of that population, and to show what history states about the origin and characteristics of that population. When it is stated by hon. gentlemen opposite that that population must consist of either Indians or whites, I believe that statement is very incorrect. Those people had enjoyed their rights and their existence in that country for many years, and they had some reasons to claim from the Government of Canada the recognition of their existence as a separate and distinct people. Now, Sir, I come to the period of 1869-70. I have no intention to recite in detail the events of that period—the criminal rashness of Lt. Col. Dennis, his efforts to incite an Indian war by his mad proclamation, calling on the Indians to unite with the Canadian party to make war on the native population of the country; the meetings of the settlers, French and English, to discuss the proposed transfer of their country to Canada; the stern determination to resist all such action, until the people obtained the recognition of their existence and their rights as free men and British subjects; the decision of the French-speaking population to fight, even if left alone and unassisted, for the granting of such rights, not only to themselves, but to the whole community; the organisation of the convention, which delegates from all parts of the colony attended; the subsequent election of members to maintain peace and order in the settlement, by the establishment of a provisional Government; the election of Louis Riel as president; the maintenance of such power at great risk and cost for over eight months; the refusal to receive Lieutenant Governor Macdougall; the selection and sending of delegates to Ottawa, in 1870, to negotiate the terms and conditions on which the people of the colony of Assiniboia would consent to form part of the Dominion of Canada; the passing of the Manitoba Act, and the final transfer of the colony, on the 15th of July, 1870, to the Dominion of Canada. It is not my intention to deal at length with these facts. But the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) stated yesterday that the rights to the property were the only cause of the rising in Manitoba, or in the Territory which now constitutes the Province of Manitoba. I must dissent from that opinion. Those men felt that if their rights to property were being tampered with they had a perfect right to revolt and repel any attempts that might be made to interfere; but there were other rights, which were more sacred to them, and it was the recognition of those rights, which have been in existence in their political institutions from 1822 to 1870, that they desired; and to state that the rights to their property were the only cause of their resistance to Canadian institutions is not correct. For instance, under their institutions they had the liberty of education, they had the separate school system, they had the use of their language, they had their own laws, administered in their own way, and the people clung to those laws and those institutions as strongly as to their rights of property, which the Canadians, then in the country, attempted to interfere with. Were I, Sir, to go into the details of that eventful period, I would point out the efforts of the party opposite, in their press and elsewhere, to make political capital out of the resistance of the Red River people. We heard, this afternoon, a most pointed speech from the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh) on this subject. That opinion, coming from him, was more weighty, perhaps, than from myself. However, he showed that the Globe had been exciting the dispute and the resistance to Canadian authorities in the Red River long before we sent Lieutenant Governor Macdougall and his party up there to take possession of the country. It is to its language and to the efforts of its correspondents that we owe the resistance which was then offered to the Canadian authorities. The Globe stated that the half-breeds had no business to accept from the Canadian Government a ready-made government, and we have heard the hon. member for Ottawa quoting extracts from the Globe to prove that fact. I will only say that the calm and dispassionate historian of that eventful period, when years have passed away, will have a great deal to say in favor of the energy, moderation and public spirit evinced by the French-speaking half-breeds of the Red River; he will then be able to see that public opinion was so much worked up and excited by an unfortunate incident during the troubles, at least, among a great portion of the population of Canada; that the Government of the day found it impossible to redeem their pledge to grant a full and complete amnesty to those whose principal crime had been the obtaining for their country those liberties inherent to every British citizen. In fact, such a measure had become impossible for any Government, as it was fully demonstrated by the limited and incomplete amnesty which was proclaimed by hon. gentlemen opposite in 1875. The extracts and the argument of the hon. member for Ottawa, this afternoon, showed that the opposite party has done everything in its power to make political capital out of Scott's death, as they have done with every other public question. The men at the head of affairs in the colony expected that amnesty as the essence of their contract with Canada. Now, in fact, those delegates who were then sent from the de facto Government in the Red River district, treated with the Canadian authorities; they had interviews; they deliberated over the Bill of Rights, and on the various questions which were these submitted to the Canadian Government. Every one of questions was settled. Every man of common sense will imagine easily the amnesty to be certainly the essence of the contract, which was then thought to be made by the authorities in the Red River and the Canadian Government. There is a great deal of contention of opinion on the question; but we have, from the documents, from the records of the country, from the evidence taken in the committee struck by Parliament, in 1875, proof that the delegates were led to believe that an amnesty would be proclaimed before they returned to Manitoba. Such was the opinion of the people in the country at that time. I was a personal witness to the fact that the then provisional Government organised a reception to be given to Governor Archibald, when they expected him to arrive by the Dawson route. Carriages had been prepared, and an address drafted; and the address was to be presented to the Canadian Governor on his touching the soil of Manitoba. Instead of such a dénouement, what was the profound dissatisfaction of the people, what was their intense feeling of humiliation and deception, when they were informed that no amnesty had been granted, and that they would have to flee for their lives from the country they had just liberated. A great deal was said about the expedition of our troops across the portages between Lake Superior and the Red River; a great deal was said in the English reviews of the wonderful feat accomplished by our volunteers under the guidance of Col. Wolseley. I know that his proclamation is not generally known in Canada; but I was in Fort Garry myself twenty-four hours before the arrival of the troops. I saw Col. Wolseley coming to the fort, with his troops displayed in order of battle, and I know he had not a single shot to fire nor a gate to break open; there was not a man, not even a child, to fight with, to gain possession of the fort. What was, then, his proclamation the next day? I take it from the report of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), who thought it was rather a piece of curiosity, and therefore inserted it in his report to the Public Works Department at that time. Col. Wolseley, the day after his arrival at Fort Garry, issued the following proclamation:—

"From Prince Arthur's Landing to Fort Garry is over 600 miles, through a wilderness of forest and water, where no supplies of any description are obtainable. You had to carry on your backs a vast amount of supplies over no less than 47 portages, making a total distance of seven miles, a feat unparalleled in our military annals. You have descended a great river, esteemed so dangerous from its rapids, falls and whirlpools, that none but experienced voyageurs attempt its navigation. Your cheerful obedience to orders has enabled you, under the blessing of Divine Providence, to accomplish your task without any accident.

"Although the banditti who had been oppressing this people fled at your approach, without giving you an opportunity of proving how men capable of such labor could fight, you have deserved as well of your country as if you had won a battle."

Now Mr. Dawson, the hon. member for Algoma, adds this:

"This is no doubt very eloquent, and the soldiers deserved all that could be said in their praise, but as it occurs in a document which will doubtless be placed on record, I must protest against its being accepted as a correct representation of the state of matters existing in the Red River settlement when the troops arrived.

"The people to whom he alludes, instead of flying at his approach, like banditti, were quietly following their usual occupations, except those who were out, at his particular request, making a road to facilitate the movements of Her Majesty's troops, and the soldiers had had experienced guides on the Winnipeg, although the contrary is implied."

Those people expected that a complete amnesty would reach that country before the arrival of the troops; they were perfectly ready to receive the Canadian Government; they had organised a demonstration to welcome Mr. Archibald, the first Lieutenant Governor of that country. Col. Wolseley's proclamation, calling these people banditti, calling them cowards, because he had not the chance of firing a shot against them, caused very naturally great humiliation, and, I must say, exasperation in the minds of those people. Col. Wolseley had no right to call them banditti; he had no more right than the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), in a speech he delivered in Toronto in 1872. When you call a whole population banditti, thieves and robbers, and when you call them cowards, no wonder if these people, whose minds had been already poisoned by the ill-doings of some officials, resent the humiliation inflicted upon them. Such was the state of affairs at the arrival of the troops at Fort Garry in 1878. The expedition of those troops had been asked for by the heads of the people in that colony, but certainly it would not have been asked for if they had believed the arrival of the troops would have been followed by such results. The whole population was insulted by such a proclamation, and the events that followed showed that population that Canada, instead of considering them as people whose rights had to be respected, looked upon them as a nation whose fate was not worth that of the Indian. In the presence of these facts, is it improper for me to say they are the remote cause of the troubles which occurred last spring on the Saskatchewan? It has been in their bosom ever since 1870, and some years before, that they had been unjustly dealt with, and that Canada, instead of being a country friendly to them, was a receptacle of foes and opponents. In the presence of the facts I have just mentioned, is it improper for me to say that those facts are some of the causes of the troubles of last spring on the Saskatchewan? The half-breeds, from that moment, looked upon Canadians as faithless invaders, as a people totally foreign to all sentiments of justice, fair play, patriotism and public honor and dignity. They returned to their homes with the deep-seated feelings of the injustice, humiliation and insult with which they, as a nation, had been treated; the good faith of their devoted bishop and clergy had been abused and surprised; their natural leaders were in exile, and the machinery of Government was entrusted to them to organise, when it had been made impossible for them to take advantage of. I have been a witness to their sorrows, to their complaints, and to the utter want of respect which they had towards the Government and institutions of my country. Such scenes I will never forget. I was then able to realise how criminal to their country had been, and still are, those politicians and journalists whose only programme is to appeal to religious or national prejudices in a country like ours, and such was the programme of the Globe for the last thirty years. In fact, a whole generation has grown up in Ontario under the teachings of that paper. But the complement of the policy of the Globe and its partisans was the promise made by the leader of the Opposition when he was in the Government of Ontario, and promised $5,000 for the capture of Riel and his accomplices. In the remarks I have made, I have tried to show that the people with whom we had to deal in 1870 was a distinct people, was a nationality by itself, was a people that had its own national characteristics, its own institutions, its own social life; that that people was entirely different from ours, that their ideas of civilisation were not altogether those we have; and I have tried to show that they were forgotten in the agreement which was entered into by the Hudson Bay Company and the Canadian Government, in 1869. Whether it was the fault of the Hudson's Bay Company, as stated by the leader of the Government, or not, I do not know, but I must say that we have to deal now with the causes of the recent troubles, and the causes of a remote nature are some of those which I have cited. Owing to the distance, owing to the impossibility of exercising a proper check upon the conduct of Canadian officials in the North-West, those officials have been, to a great extent, the cause of the discontent, the suspicion and the hostility shown by the natives of that country to Canada; and these remote causes, the existence of which I have cited, were causes which it did not lay in the power of any Government to deal with or to make disappear. I cannot help making a contrast between the expedition of the Canadian volunteers in 1870 and the expedition of the volunteers which has recently taken place.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Adjourn.

Mr. McMULLEN moved the adjournment of the debate

Mr. TROW. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Royal) has taken his seat, and he cannot speak a second time.

Mr. ROYAL. I see that hon. gentlemen opposite do not like to hear the truth on some points.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman took his seat, and I moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. ROYAL. In the course of my remarks—

Mr. TROW. The hon. gentleman took his seat.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is not the question of adjournment before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. gentleman took his seat with the idea of giving up his right. If an hon. member takes his seat when another member rises to speak, he loses his right.

Mr. McMULLEN. When he sat down, I moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. ROYAL. I sat down when I was called to order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the hon. gentleman please proceed with his speech.

Mr. ROYAL. I might contrast the two expeditions of troops in 1870 and 1885. In 1885 the troops were certainly more disciplined. They showed a better spirit; and it was seen that a young country, when a portion of its population, rightly or wrongly, chooses to appeal to arms for the redress of its grievances, from every part of that young country the volunteers on the call to arms are unanimous. It shows the strength of our institutions, and I believe that no young country was ever so true to a test as great as that which Canada has had. In 1870 the troops, on arriving at Winnipeg, showed a great deal of indiscipline, of which I was myself witness. But in the present year our volunteers have displayed an amount of discipline, of endurance, of patriotism, that every member of this House is justly to be proud of. The 65th Montreal regiment accomplished a march of thirty-two miles in a boggy, swampy country, which, I believe is unparalleled in the history of any march. Contrast the proclamations issued by Colonel Wolseley and that of General Middleton. In the proclamation issued by Colonel Wolseley there was an insult of the population of the country, while that of General Middleton was a simple and dignified appeal to the people to lay down their arms and submit to the laws of the country. The result of Colonel Wolseley's proclamation was a deep feeling of humiliation and sorrow among the people, while the conduct of General Middleton was such as to conciliate the people towards the Government; and instead of a protracted spirit of resistance and hostility on the part of the people, I am sure that in a few weeks it will be evident to all that the half-breed population did not willingly go into rebellion, but that they were misled by designing politicians. Now, Sir, the half-breeds were accused of cowardice by Col. Wolseley in his despatch; but if we may judge of the resistance that they might have offered to his march to the Red River and of the resistance they have offered to our own troops, I believe if the half-breeds had been so disposed Col. Wolseley would never have been able to issue his proclamation from Fort Garry. At every portage that our volunteers had to make, 25 armed half-breeds could for a long time have prevented Col. Wolseley and his troops from going from Port Arthur to the Red River. Sir, these half-breeds have also been accused of cruelty. Well, we know by the newspaper accounts that it was to the half-breeds that last spring the white prisoners in the Indian camps owed their liberty and their lives. We know that Mrs. Delaney, who was taken prisoner in Poundmaker's camp, was liberated by a poor half-breed, a man named Delphis Nolin, who had only two ponies with him, and who cheerfully gave them up to Poundmaker to assure the freedom of Mrs. Delaney. This is but one instance, but there were many others, during the recent outbreak, which prove the humanity of the half-breeds. Far from exercising any vengeance upon any of their white prisoners, either civilian or military, our English and French half-breeds were instrumental in saving the lives of these prisoners from the cruelties which Indians have always been accustomed to exercise towards their captives. It has also been stated that the half-breeds are inferior to our own people in the arts of agriculture and civilisation.

Mr. ROYAL.

Now, if we look at the reports published in the American papers—which certainly are not over friendly to us—we see that the half-breeds at Batoche, St. Laurent and other parishes, had farms as highly improved as any farm in the State of Minnesota. We have seen the description of the house opposite Batoche, and of other farm houses in that region, which shows that there is a considerable degree of civilisation and cultivated taste among the half-breeds. Agricultural implements are numerous among them, and you will find as many agricultural implements on their farms as on any farm in the eastern Provinces. With regard to the intellectual standing of the half-breed population in Manitoba and the North-West Territories, I believe we have no reason to be ashamed of them, as having descended from English and French fathers, the same as ourselves. An English-speaking half-breed, Mr. Norquay, has for the last eight years, been Premier of Manitoba. We see, also, by the last report, that a French-speaking half-breed won the Governor's medal, at the concourse of the colleges affiliated with the Manitoba University. In the course of my connection with the Administration in Manitoba, I sat at the council table with two or three half-breeds, and I must say they are not inferior to any one in intelligence and intellectual capacity as well as education. I have stated what I consider to be the remote causes of the troubles that have taken place on the shores of the Saskatchewan. I now come to the second part of my observations, and I shall have to state some unpleasant facts to hon. gentlemen opposite, which facts, however, cannot be disputed. I come to the more immediate causes of the outbreak. I have stated that there are remote causes, over which no Government, whether Liberal or Conservative, could have controlled. They were in the essence of the matter. There was the want of sagacity and judgment of Canadians who first went to the Red River settlement. Then there was the utter want of judgment on the part of officials sent in 1869-70, and the fanaticism and want of judgment on the part of some officials sent to Manitoba in 1870. Then there was the want of easy and quick communication, and it is almost impossible for any Government to thoroughly control its officials unless within easy distance. I believe those immediate causes were aggravated to a large extent by the shameful speculation that was carried on at the expense of the half-breeds in the years following 1870. By the Manitoba Act a certain reserve had been set out for the extinguishment of the Indian title in favor of the people of that part of the country. In fact, the half-breeds under that Act were recognised as a distinct people, having distinct privileges and rights, which the Government of Canada had to deal with and settle. And let me here say that with respect of North-West grievances, there are three causes of the grievances in connection with the North-West affairs. There are letters and petitions addressed to the Government by the people, both of Manitoba and the North-West Territories. Those letters and petitions have been read and commented upon at great length by some hon. gentlemen opposite, more especially by the leader of the Opposition. Then we have the resolutions and Bills of Rights proposed by Riel and his white Grit followers at Prince Albert and elsewhere; and the resolutions proposed at the Moosomin and Calgary meetings, and they form a distinct part of the grievances. The third class of grievances is composed of the grievances of the Opposition, and I believe they are the only grievances with which to deal in the settlement of this question. Under the Manitoba Act as stated the half-breeds were entitled to have a certain lot of land for the extinguishment of the Indian title. A reserve, comprising 1,400,000 acres of land, was set apart for the purpose. But long were the delays. It is not my intention to make more of those details than should be made of them. And so long were the delays in the apportionment of those reserves, and so protracted the issue of letters patent, that the people became doubtful of the good faith of the Government, and were easily induced by speculators to sell their rights to the land. They were canvassed by those speculators, who informed them that it would take many years to get possession of their 240 acres; that the Government did not desire that they should get possession of them; and other arguments of that kind were used. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite know something about that, for I believe that some of them and some of their friends own several thousand acres of these reserves. I presume that at one time 240 acres of half-breed claims were actually purchased for 5, 6, 7 and 8 pounds, and those prices prevailed during the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. The result was that the half-breeds lost confidence in Canadian laws and Canadian promises, and were easily induced to part with their reservations for a mere trifle. In fact, at the present day, I do not suppose that one-twentieth of these reserves remain in the hands of the original owners, and that is the reason why we see so many of these reserves in certain parishes lying waste. The result was, that in 1880, 1881 and 1883, a large number of these half-breeds left the Province, some going towards the Turtle Mountain district, in Dakota, and were thus lost to us entirely, others going westward to increase materially the half-breed settlements at Duck Lake, Qu'Appelle, Battleford and St. Albert. It is stated that, of a strong colony which formerly existed at Wood Mountain, only a few remain, the others having gone to the United States. Only a few thousand half-breeds now remain in Manitoba, although their population at the time of the transfer, in 1870, was 12,000 or 13,000. With regard to the conduct of the several officers, I have referred to the conduct of Snow, Dennis, Col. Wolseley and other officers appointed to deal with the population. These officers very often assume airs of importance amongst those people and as they were looked upon as representing the Canadian Government, they did a great deal of harm to Canada and to Canadian institutions. To the dishonest conduct of some of these officers is due the fact that there are some of these long outstanding claims not yet settled. These claims have been in existence for fifteen years, and have been pressed on the attention of the Government during that time, and I am convinced that if it had not been for the dishonesty of these officers, which the Government could not know of, except after a long time, on account of the difficulty of surveillance and communication, these officers would have been checked sooner and those grievances would have been ameliorated. During the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite these grievances existed, and to a large extent. In fact, if you compare the number of patents issued—and, of course, the number issued was on account of their being no dispute about them—if you compare the number issued by the late Administration and the present Administration, you will see that the present Government have done more justice to those parties than their predecessors. As to surveys, I have obtained the following figures as to the extent of the work done in the North-West by both the Conservative and Reform Governments respectively:

Total area of the North-West Territories .....	9,999,000 acres.
Lands surveyed from 1874 to 1878.....	1,797,120 do do do 1879 to 1884.....	55,618,500 do
Blocks and Townships, outline surveys from 1874 to 1878, inclusive.....	2,200 miles.
Block and Townships, outline surveys from 1879 to 1884, inclusive.....	36,900 do
First-class traverse, from 1874 to 1878 inclusive do do 1879 to 1884 do ...	200 do
Odometer and other traverse, from 1874 to 1878 inclusive.....	2,300 do
Odometer and other traverse, from 1879 to 1884 inclusive.....	1,600 do
Odometer and other traverse, from 1879 to 1884 inclusive.....	6,900 do

Such has been the work done in the North-West by the two governments; the figures show on whose side was the actual and earnest desire to work for developing our newly acquired Dominion. I now come to a more sensitive part of my remarks, and I state that the action, the language, the example, and even the direct support of the large portion of the Grit party, appear to have been the most immediate and most direct cause of the late troubles on the shores of the Saskatchewan. No one will attempt to deny that, with any show of reason. And yet let us not lose sight of this remarkable fact, that half-breeds have not the sympathies of the Opposition party. The late Minister of Interior, Mr. Mills, said that no privileges were to accrue to half-breeds—that they had to be either whites or Indians. From 1873 to 1878 very little was done on the part of the Government to satisfy the half-breeds. In fact, nothing was done; as stated by the right hon. leader of the Government, there was a blank in that day. I must say that, except for the reward that was offered by the party opposite for the capture of Riel, the appointment of a judge to try him and the refusal to give representation to the half-breeds in the appointments which were made, and the refusal to recognise those rights outside of Manitoba, very little, indeed, was done by hon. gentlemen opposite, and they come with very bad grace now to defend the rights and privileges of the half-breed population, which they say has been so shamefully neglected by the present Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question.

Mr. ROYAL. During the long and tedious debates on the Franchise Bill, I never interrupted any of the hon. gentlemen opposite, but listened very patiently to their discourses. Now, what was the first act of the present Government towards settling the burning questions of the North-West Territories? They took upon themselves the right to deal with those questions, and to settle them in a manner that would meet the largest demands of those people. During the period from 1873 to 1878 not one act was done by hon. gentlemen opposite. On the contrary, they bungled the whole subject, and it was the worst legacy they left to the present Government, after they left office, in 1878. But that change of Government, in 1878, seemed to have drawn from hon. gentlemen opposite all their interest in the matter. The protection seemed to cause them to rush to arms and not discriminate between the means they might take to overthrow the present Government. War was commenced—a war of words. That war of words may be all right amongst us, because it is confined to newspapers and to some very high and loud talk on the floor of this House; but upon the minds of those people in the North-West it had a very different effect. They took those words as meaning exactly what they intended; they could not understand that two parties fighting upon a certain question did not exactly mean what their speakers said. Now, Sir, I come to the Province of Manitoba. In 1882 the agitation that had been going on in the eastern Provinces culminated there in the organisation of what was afterwards called the Farmers' Union, which, under the color of remedying the condition of affairs that seemed injurious to the farmers at that time, was nothing else but a firm and well-concealed design to strengthen the cause of the Opposition to the Conservative party.

Mr. WATSON. No, no.

Mr. ROYAL. I hear "No" from an hon. gentleman opposite. There was a co-existence of different causes which led farmers to seek to remedy a certain condition of things which they thought to be injurious to themselves, and in the ranks of the Farmers' Union, as first organised, we find some well-meaning Conservatives, but I must say they were in a minority. Granting that the country was in the midst of a crisis such as they professed, the leaders, instead of confining themselves to the immediate purpose of this organisation, as at first established, extended their protection and patronage to every interest in the Province. There was nothing permitted to escape them. They assumed to correct and control the affairs of the Province, from the management of a school up to the enlargement of the boundaries of the Province to the Hudson Bay, from interference with the individual settler in the growing and selling of grain up to the shaping of the policy of the country in its relation to the Dominion. They constituted themselves a rival Parliament to the Local Legislature, and dictated terms alike to Mr. Norquay and to Sir John Macdonald. They did not deal in protests or remonstrances, but in demands. They took the whole country and its various interests under their protection, and with superb impudence fashioned them according to their own notions. In a word, they exercised the powers of the Local Government and demanded the liberty to exercise them. Such is the character of the institution that was then started, under the fallacious name of the Farmers' Union, by some designing politicians belonging to the opposite party. Now, in November, 1884 meetings were held to protest against the disallowance of railway charters, at which very violent and treasonable expressions were used. I will, with your permission, Sir, read something which will, no doubt, attract the attention of some hon. gentleman opposite. At a meeting held in Portage la Prairie, in 1882, of the delegates, a meeting which was reported to be very enthusiastic by the Opposition press, one gentleman having a seat in this House, was reported as having used the following language.—

"He thought that what was necessary was a Local Government, which would stand up for Manitoba, and if, after all had been tried, we could not get our rights, we must try a little of what some would call rebellion, or petition for annexation to the United States."

Another gentleman, who is a member of the Local House, said:

"The Lower Provinces were, to a great extent, dependent upon this Province to dispose of their superfluous manufactures, and we should say to them, that if they would not give us equal rights with themselves we would have nothing to do with them. He thought our duty was not to petition Mr. Norquay, but to send men into the Local Government who would stand manfully by Manitoba and insist on her rights."

That was the kind of language used by some persons who did not belong to the Conservative party, in the various meetings which took place in 1882, under the color and pretext of disallowance for railway charters. Later on, at a meeting of citizens in the council chamber at Brandon, in December, 1883, Mr. Purvis, one of the leading spirits in the Farmers' Union—

Mr. WATSON. And a Conservative.

Mr. ROYAL. He is not a Conservative.

Mr. WATSON. He has been one all his life.

Mr. ROYAL. Mr. Purvis said: "If we cannot obtain our rights, let us annex to the United States." In February last, a meeting was held of the Farmers' Union, at which that question was discussed, and subsequent to that another meeting was called, for the purpose of discussing independence. The time is not long since when the Free Press was stirring up the feelings of the people, and were it not for the sober sense of the people, the agitation would have resulted in a disruption of the Union. The Free Press is the recognised and, I must say, skillful organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, in Manitoba; there is no doubt about the activity, energy and enterprise displayed by the editor of that paper, and therefore I attach the most importance to its utterances. The Free Press said:

"The threats of Riel are not worth considering, in view of what we have to apprehend from the not less unscrupulous but vastly more powerful traitor who rules the Dominion. * * * It would be better a million fold that Riel and his descendants shall forever remain kings or presidents, or whatever they may choose to call themselves, of the North-West half-breeds, than that Sir John Macdonald should be permitted to proclaim himself and his friends perpetual rulers of Canada."

Mr. ROYAL.

The Hamilton Spectator has seen the motive which prompted the paragraphs and comments thereon as follows:—

"That is plain enough. And if it means anything, it means that whatever else may happen, it is of paramount importance that the Grit party should be again placed in power. To bring about the defeat of the present Government, and hoist the Grits into office, is the only thing worth working for. Riel may rebel, Indians may rise, men and children may be massacred, women may suffer worse than death, our citizen soldiers may be slain and mangled and maimed, the entire country, from the Saskatchewan to the Atlantic, may be plunged into grief and may mourn its dead—but what of it? In the language of the Free Press, 'it would be better a million fold' that these things should happen than that the Tories should remain in office—it is better a million fold that the murdering, the plundering, the maiming, the killing and the ravishing should go on, than that the greedy clutches of the Grits should be longer kept from the coveted money bags of the Dominion."

I do not charge the whole of the Opposition press and party with being directly responsible for the late insurrection, but were it not for the excitement they created in Manitoba the events of the Saskatchewan would not have taken place. These expressions of disloyalty, because by loyalty I mean devotion to the interests of the country and devotion to the prosperity and development of the country, these expressions of disloyalty are not only confined to the Opposite party in the Province of Ontario; the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec share in the same sentiments. I would not, of course, attribute anything in the insurrection that took place in the North-West last spring direct to the Liberal party of the Province of Quebec. I must say however, that, in disloyalty, they are not the least in sympathy with their colleagues of the Province of Ontario or the other Provinces. In the Herald, of the 27th May last, what do we find? We find that the Club National, which is the club par excellence of the hon. gentlemen opposite in the Province of Quebec, gave a banquet; that this banquet took place in the city of Montreal; at that banquet toasts were proposed and drunk and responded to, and amongst those toasts were two, one to the independence of Canada and the other to the Republic of Canada; and one of the speakers stated that he wished to God that Mr. Mercier, the leader of the Opposition in the Province of Quebec, might be the first President of that Republic. I believe there is a connection in things; there is something that breaks out, sooner or later, and shows the unanimity of principle and feeling in one party. I would not attribute to the Rouge party in Quebec the events that took place on the Saskatchewan; but in the feelings expressed in the Grit press of Manitoba, Ontario and elsewhere, their partisans in Quebec fully sympathise. The hour being very late, and my observations having been in the first place of a rather lengthy character, I shall dispense with citing extracts that I had intended to read to you. I now come to the end of my remarks. If, Sir, in the course of these remarks, I have succeeded in giving a fair idea of the origin of the first population of the North-West, which we met in going there, of their characteristics, of their high state of prosperity and contentment, of their situation, religious, political and social—if I have succeeded in impressing upon the House that the half-breed nation is not a semi-savage population, but is distinguished for humanity, courage, industry, intelligence and moral character, I will have accomplished much of my task. I have tried to trace the remote sources as well as the immediate sources of the troubles. However, we must not lose sight of the motion before the House. I have tried to show that the immediate cause of the troubles lies in the conduct, the language, and the doings of the Opposition party. I will not charge that party with being a disloyal party; I am willing to give them credit for what Mr. Mackenzie's Administration did from 1873 to 1878, and amongst the doings of that Administration I must pay a high tribute of admiration to the territorial organisation they have given to the North-West Territories. But, Sir, I stop there. I was a member of the North-West council, and I remember that, when it was mentioned that we had to deal with the extinction of the buffalo, with the small-pox, then raging among certain tribes, with the administration of justice in these Territories we were uniformly, at every turn, met with this answer from Governor Morris, who was then the President: "No funds." It was, unfortunately, the period of deficits, and these gentlemen had no funds for any of these purposes. They could form a North-West council to direct them how to deal with affairs, but, when it came to practice, the uniform answer was that they had no funds, and it was the same when the question of surveys was pressed upon their attention. When the Premier said that a blank existed with regard to the administration of North-West affairs from 1873 to 1878, I would have been glad to agree with him, but I must say that, from the very start, the half-breeds were totally ignored as having distinct rights and privileges, in fact, as having any distinct existence, by the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite. The Premier stated, the other night, I think properly, that the leader of the Opposition had abstained carefully from stating his opinion upon the intrinsic merit of the claims of the half-breed population of the North-West. I believe the leader of the Opposition was very right, because, if he had stated that they had rights, he would have logically stated that they had grievances, but he did not state whether they had rights or not, and where there are no rights there are no grievances. In 1873 Bishop Grandin wrote to the Government of Mr. Mackenzie. In 1874 he wrote upon the same question and urged the attention of the Government to the claims of that population. In 1875, again, the same prelate, with all the authority and with all the benevolence he felt for his people, and with the care and anxiety which he felt for the good government of those Territories and their contentment, with the Canadian rule, wrote again to the Government, and spoke of the excitement and uneasiness that was felt then, and which had existed for four or five years among the half-breed people of those Territories. In 1876 Major Walsh, then an officer of that Government, wrote again about the disputed land claims in Prince Albert and St. Laurent. In 1877 Governor Laird transmitted his letters. That forms the whole docket, the whole record of the doings of hon. gentlemen opposite, with what I have stated and with what has been stated, so far, by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), and hon. members of this House who have addressed you on the same subject. It is well known that in 1878 there was no allotment; from 1870, when the acquisition of that Territory took place, there had been no allotment on the reserve made for the French-speaking parishes. On the 16th March Mr. Mills, then Minister of the Interior, wrote:

"It is perfectly unnecessary to look up parties who may have claims upon the Government. Let them come forward and state their claims."

That was in keeping with the declaration of the said gentleman, that he would make no distinction between white men and Indians, thereby setting at naught the provisions which had been inserted in the Manitoba Act of 1870. Now, respecting the conduct of the Administration towards the settlers, I will quote some remarks of Mr. Schultz, then one of the members of this House, on the 20th April, 1878:

"Mr. SCHULTZ said that it was quite evident, from the discussion in the Senate, that there existed a strong feeling to these stake claims, and in reference to such grievances he must call attention to a peculiar class of them existing in the parishes of St. Clements and St. Peter, in Manitoba. He had occasion to speak of these before, and had assisted in giving all sorts of data and evidence. No action had been taken, and no hope, apparently, of a speedy settlement, while the greatest inconvenience was experienced by the occupants of these lands. In the neighborhood of the Stone Fort, also, there was a number of quarter-sections sold to Stephens and others, in Montreal, and given to the Hudson Bay Company, which were in the hay-poundage belt, and which, consequently, belonged to the people in that district who owned the river farms, and if the Government desired the good opinion of that section, these matters must be looked into and redressed, and at once.

As regard the amendments to the Disputed Claims Act, he very much regretted that if that Act needed amendment, why had not the necessity been discovered a year ago, and was surprised that the commissioner appointed under that Act should have drawn his pay to the last moment, and only then repented that the Act was unworkable. Too much time by far had been lost in that way, and, apparently, in every other way in the Province. In fact, a fatality seemed to attend all Manitoba matters in connection with land matters. The blocks taken by parishes, and notably that of St. Andrews, had not been preserved intact, but had been altered to suit the convenience of the Department. The issue of scrip had been delayed till all benefit from it had passed away, and the continued delay in the distribution of the minors, land was an injustice to all parties concerned, and was too palpable to need comment. Session after Session, he had spoken of these matters, and would now make a last appeal. He had been often promised the attention of the Government to these matters, and he trusted that these promises would be fulfilled, and believed that in view of these long and grievous delays, and the peaceful and quiet way in which the people had borne them, that the Government would be only performing a just and graceful act were they to remit the payment of the seed grain which they had received."

Not only were the half-breeds ignored by the Government of the hon. gentlemen opposite, but in the organisation of the North-West council no representation was given to them. Also, in 1874, the Government withdrew from sale and settlement all lands for 24 miles on each side of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and in 1875 they withdrew the lands for 35 miles on each side of the telegraph lines. In 1877 a change was made; there was no homestead, and all land was to be sold at $1 an acre. In the same year the hon. gentleman introduced his famous Bill for colonisation railways, under which anybody who wanted to build a railway could get an appropriation of 10,000 acres per mile, as subsidy. All this has been done by the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, between 1873 and 1878. The hon. gentleman for West Durham (Mr. Blake) is of the same opinion as his colleague. He says that he does not acknowledge any special rights to the old population of the Territories. He seems to ignore their existence altogether, and during the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite there were interferences with Manitoba in every way. They sowed the seeds of permanent disorder. Their action in Ontario, with regard to the troubles that had taken place in Manitoba in 1870, had the effect of discouraging emigration altogether to the North-West. And, Sir, they signally failed in their attempts to build a railway from ocean to ocean, in order the better to develop that country. Now, I must say that to vote in favor of the motion that is in your hands, I would have to ignore all the facts of the past. It would be ignoring the history of the last twenty-five years; it would be ignoring the teaching and lessons, that the people of Canada and both political parties in the Dominion are bound to obtain from the occurrences and facts which I have stated, very imperfectly, perhaps, but certainly as accurately as it was in my power to do. The present Government, under the distinguished leadership of the First Minister, has accomplished such a work in connection with the North-West during the last eight or ten years that history affords no parallel to it in any country in the world. With a population of 4,000,000, a mere colony, we have acquired a country larger than the United States. Isolated, as it is, being 500 miles from the rest of the world, yet we have organised a Government and established one Province. The First Minister has made treaties with the Indians and established law and order there by means of a territorial government. And we have built a railway connecting ocean with ocean, and we have done that despite our limited financial resources. It has been accomplished by a Government that has been the means of bringing into the North-West 150,000 immigrants, a Government that has arranged Indian treaties and undertaken the management of our Indian population; a Government that has established in the Dominion institutions of permanency and solidity that has been shown in the last events that have taken place in connection with the North-West troubles. I say, under such circumstances, there can be no doubt as to how members of this House should cast their votes on this motion. When Hon. Joseph Howe, in 1870, declared, after visiting the country during the winter, that he was not in favor of its acquisition by Canada, he never anticipated that an interprovincial trade between Manitoba and the North-West and the eastern Provinces would be built up to the amount of very many millions annually, and that there would be a Province independent as to the management of its own affairs, and there would be in so few years a prosperous and contented community.

Mr. EDGAR. I think this is not an unreasonable hour to move the adjournment of the debate. Two or three hours ago it was understood to be arranged that the division should be taken, but as we have been kept here hour after hour since, and as there are several members on both sides of the House who wish to speak—at all events, there are on this side—I move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is true the discussion has been a little protracted; but it will be remembered that last evening, when the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron) had spoken for an hour and a-half, he and his friends wished an adjournment, and this was agreed to, on the understanding that we would have a vote this evening. That was the understanding.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman is quite correct in saying that last evening it was agreed that the vote should be taken this evening. But the hon. gentleman must admit that members on this side of the House endeavored to bring the debate to a close at a much earlier hour than this. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) took the floor at about 12, stating that he would not speak more than one hour. Upon that understanding, several of our friends who were ready and anxious to speak agreed not to speak. The understanding, so far as made, has not been carried out; and the hon. gentleman having extended his remarks to almost four hours, it is nothing but reasonable that an opportunity should be given to hon. members on this side to reply to him, especially after his statement, in the course of his speech, that he would be severe on the Opposition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When I came into the House, half an hour ago, several hon. gentlemen opposite were calling "question."

Mr. TROW. I have always understood that it is the part of gentlemen to adhere strictly to their word and agreement. I, for one, would sacrifice all I am worth in this world to adhere strictly to my word. Hon. gentlemen on this side yielded rather reluctantly to my wishes to make this arrangement, and when I mentioned it to the whip of hon. gentlemen opposite and the Minister of Public Works, the arrangement was made on the express condition that the hon. member for Provencher would not occupy more than three-quarters of an hour or so.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Last evening, when this agreement was made, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) was not here, and it was solemnly agreed that we should have a vote to-night, at the instance of the hon. member for West Huron, who implored the House that we should adjourn at a certain hour last evening. Two hours ago the hon. member for South Huron was crying out "adjourn," and two hours ago the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) was calling out "question" and "divide." Well, I had prepared notes of a speech of some length, but owing to the length of the Session and the amount of work before us, I had agreed not to say anything upon this question, in order that we might take a vote to-night. These hon. gentlemen who entered into this agreement are now asking for an adjournment without having a vote.

Mr. VAIL. We all admit that there was an agreement made last night, that under certain circumstances a vote should be taken to-night. A second agreement was made to-night, and I think it was rather unfair, after entering into that agreement, that the hon. member for Provencher should have been allowed to speak three hours in making the last speech of the debate. I say, therefore, the second agreement has been broken, as the hon. member for Provencher has spoken two or three hours longer than he agreed.

Mr. McCALLUM. We have no objection to sit here and listen to the hon. member for Ontario, if he wishes to speak.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would just say that as the matter was arranged, so far as it could be arranged, between the Minister of Public Works and myself, I will state the circumstances, from my recollection of them, and the hon. gentleman can correct me if I am wrong. Yesterday night, when the hon. member for West Huron had spoken for some little time, I suggested an adjournment, and the Minister of Public Works, after some demur, agreed to consent to the suggestion that we should close the debate to-night. I called his attention to the great length of the speech delivered by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and I asked that he would guarantee that the speeches should not run to such a length on his side. The hon. gentleman will recollect that. Now, we have been seven hours, since 8 o'clock, and our side occupied 1½ hours, to the best of my recollection. Still, I would say to my hon. friends, that under all the circumstances we had better perhaps consent to a vote.

Mr. McMULLEN. With reference to what has been said by the hon. member for King's, N. S. (Mr. Woodworth), I would just say that we understood that the hon. gentleman then addressing the House would not take up more than an hour, or a little more. We listened to him patiently, and I gave way, though I fully intended to make a few remarks. I think it is unfair that the hon. gentleman should have taken the entire evening; that it was certainly conveyed to him in some way that he should only occupy about an hour.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I wish to make a remark in answer to what has been said by the hon. member for South Perth. I may say that when I met the hon. gentleman in the lobby, he said that it appeared that it was the wish of both sides to come to an understanding about closing the debate; that after the hon. member for Bothwell, who was then speaking, had closed, we might take a vote. I observed to him that the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) wished to make some remarks, in answer to the hon. gentleman, and that as the debate had been begun by the motion of the hon. member for West-Durham, on the Opposition side, and as an hon. member had answered on our side, and so on alternately, until the hon. member for Bothwell spoke, if the hon. member for Provencher made his speech, that would make an even number on both sides. The hon. gentleman said: Well, I think so; but how long will he speak. I said: I understood an hour or an hour and a-quarter. That is the statement I have to make in answer to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WATSON. In justice to myself, coming from Manitoba, and representing the county nearest to the disaffected district, I intended to speak on this question; but when the whip on this side, Mr. Trow, told me, about a quarter to one o'clock, that there had been arrangements made to close, and that Mr. Royal would get through at one o'clock, I reluctantly gave way, knowing that the members wanted to get home, and knowing that the arguments on this side had not been answered, and that up to that time the hon. member for Provencher had said nothing which I wished to reply to. The hon. gentleman has spent two hours and a quarter longer in making statements which I would have liked to reply to; but as I was present last night when the understanding was arrived at, that there should be short speeches, and that the debate should close to-night, I am willing to forego speaking on this question, as I would very much have liked to do, feeling a great interest in it. However, my views have been expressed by gentlemen on this side of the House, and I will content myself with simply voting for the amendment.

Mr. EDGAR. I can understand that it is quite possible, after what we were able to observe on this side of the House, that the hon. Minister of Public Works and his friend, for the last two or three hours, have really been trying to put an end to this discussion and to have a vote. Perhaps it was not their fault altogether. Moreover, I happened to go out of the House a few minutes before the adjournment last night, and I must, of course, accept the statements of my hon. friends on this side of what occurred, and for that reason I will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Blake (p. 3110).

Amendment negatived, and House resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BOWELL moved :

When any manufactured article is imported into Canada in separate parts, each part shall be charged the same rate of duty as the finished article, on a proportionate valuation, and when the duty thereon is specific or specific ad valorem, an average rate of ad valorem duty, equal to the specific or specific and ad valorem duties so chargeable, shall be ascertained and charged upon such part.

Motion agreed to, and Committee rose and reported the resolution.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 4 a.m., Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 9th July, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

WAYS AND MEANS—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant). I wish to detain the House a very few moments to make an explanation I was proceeding to make yesterday when I was ruled out of order. I will just repeat the extract which I then read in the Ottawa Citizen. (See Debates of July 8th). As I was proceeding to say yesterday, if these statements from the Hamilton Spectator were true, they would be sufficient to discredit anything I might say in this House in future; and in order to show that they are not true, I will proceed as briefly as possible to dissect the paragraph. It says:

"Somerville says what he knows to be false. Double prices were not paid for press work."

Now, I find in the accounts which were rendered by the Hamilton Spectator Company, that they charged for 20,865 tokens of press work, and they only performed 10,433 tokens, for which they were paid 30 cents per token instead of 10 cents the contractors' rates. Consequently, I think I have established beyond any doubt whatever that the statement the Spectator makes with regard to not being paid double prices for press work is not correct. Anyone can look at the accounts which were produced before the Public Accounts Committee, and verify my words. Then, the editor of the Spectator says:

"The Spectator was paid at prices fixed by the Mackenzie Government."

They were not paid at prices fixed by the Mackenzie Government. This is on a par with the charges made by the gentlemen who support this Administration with regard to the troubles in the North-West. They say the Mackenzie Government is to blame for all the blood spilt and all the treasure spent in putting down that rebellion. Now, everybody knows that the present Government, who have administered the affairs of that country for the last seven years, are wholly responsible for that expenditure and that loss of blood. The Spectator goes on to say:

"The Spectator was not paid for press work never performed; and Somerville does not believe or think it was."

I do believe and I do think so, and I have proven my statements.

"10 cents is not the price paid for any press work under any Government contract whatever; and Somerville knows it is not."

Now, I wish to read from the Sessional Papers of this House, in which a copy of the contract that now exists is printed, and it is open for the inspection of every member of this House, and also the editor of the Hamilton Spectator; and I find here that it is stated:

"Press work, per token of 250 impressions of 16 pages royal 8vo, 10 cents; composition, per 1,000 ems of actual measurement, Roman type, 10 cents.

Now, I think I have established the fact that the Spectator is not speaking the truth in making this statement; and in doing so I have answered what the Spectator says with regard to this matter. But what shall I say of the Ottawa Citizen, the journal which charges me with being a sneak and a spy, who acts in the hope of injuring his brother journalists? When we think of the history of the Ottawa Citizen in the past, it is fruitful of much discussion. The Ottawa Citizen has had a checkered career during some years past. At one time, I believe, it was the property of a Minister of the Crown held under mortgage; at another time it was the property of the sheriff; at another time it was the property of the tax collector of the city of Ottawa; and I believe it only exists, as has been proved by the public records, by the crumbs and the droppings which fall from the Government table, and which it is always ready to take up. And when we think of the history of the gentleman who is the conductor of that journal we have something rather astonishing to remember. We can remember that this purist journalist is the man who was known all over the Dominion of Canada as the celebrated contract broker, as the man who had something to do with securing a large sum of money under the celebrated Whitehead contract. I think he is the last man, and his paper is the last paper, that should charge any hon. member of this House with being a sneak and a spy. I wish to say that in discharging the duty I have discharged, I have been working in the interests of the people; I have been discharging a duty which I owe to my constituents and the Dominion at large in exposing the frauds which have been perpetrated by the Conservative press of this country with the sanction of this Government. So long as I have the honor to represent a constituency in this House, I will discharge my duty in this respect. I am not actuated by any desire to sneak or spy on my brother journalists, but solely by the desire to elevate the tone of the press of this country, to elevate the morality of the people, and I think the country will justify me in exposing these frauds and showing up this corrupt Government in the manner I have.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BOWELL. * Before proposing the resolution which I desire to lay before the committee, I desire to refer to one or two items which were allowed to stand when the committee rose upon the last occasion. The first question I wish to refer to is that of rags, which was discussed in the committee for about three hours, and upon my own suggestion was allowed to stand for further consideration. The leader of the Opposition asked at the time what position this article would remain in, if action were not taken by the committee. I informed the House it would remain on the free list under the Order in Council which had been passed. At that time, it was the intention to propose a rate at which this article should be taxed, but after full investigation into the matter, as to the importations, the quality of article imported, the supply found in the country, and the effect on the manufacturing industries of the country, it has been decided to allow this particular article to remain on the free list, and for this reason: The commoner class of rags, to which reference was more particularly made when the question was under discussion, is obtained in the country. That particular kind is not imported, or imported in very small quantities. The more valuable rags that are imported and used in the different manufactures are what are termed tailors' clippings, and I find these run from 5 cents to 15 cents a pound. I ascertained if a duty were put on this raw material which enters into the manufacture of a particular kind of cloth made and sold in the country, the result would be to prevent its manufacture in Canada. I need scarcely tell those who have given the slightest attention to the question, that of the class of cloth which is termed shoddy, that which is made in Canada is much better and of more durable quality than that which is imported. I know it was argued that this kind of cloth should not be encouraged; but we must bear this in mind, that if it be not made in Canada it will be imported, and as this kind of cheap article will be consumed in the country; it is, particularly under our policy, better that it should be manufactured here, and the benefits arising from its manufacture accrue to us rather than to outsiders. We have, therefore, decided to allow rags to remain on the free list. The question of inland transportation, the committee will remember was very fully discussed when we were in committee. The difficulties which have arisen, the frauds which have also been committed, have occasioned a good deal of trouble, and the Government thought of suggesting a repeal of that clause of the law, but ascertaining that this would interfere, to a certain extent, with a very large trade, particularly the dry goods and some other branches with which we have never had any difficulty, it has been deemed advisable to recommend to the committee to allow the clause as it now stands on the Statute Book to remain, and to add a provision giving power to the Minister of Customs, for the time being, to determine what shall be the rate to be deducted from the face of the invoice for inland transportation. It may be deemed an arbitrary power, but it is in consonance with all the provisions of the Customs Act, and the House will readily understand that when a dispute arises between an importer and the Customs Department as to the rate of freight, say from Manchester to Liverpool, it will be very easy for the Department to ascertain from the parties in England what the rates upon different kinds of freight are, and to establish, for the time being, such rates as the amount to be taken from the face of the invoice. I will give the committee one illustration of the working of the law as it exists: Take the manufacturing town near Glasgow, Storebridge, 15 or 20 miles out of Glasgow, and a large iron manufacturing centre; we have had invoices presented for Customs with a deduction of 20s. sterling per ton for freight from that town to Greenock; we have had other invoices, with not a month or two difference in time, showing only 5s. deduction per ton for freight, making a difference of 15s. per ton. These invoices, I may inform the House without giving names, were from two large wholesale establishments in the one city in the Province of Ontario. If the Department has the power to say, for instance, 5s. shall be the rate and issues a circular to that effect, all the different ports in the Dominion will, when they receive an invoice from that particular town, allow the importer to deduct the 5s. for freight, and thereby avoid contention with the importer, and prevent fraud when intended. The way in which the invoices have been made out has been this: The amount paid to the manufacturer or merchant in the old country has been precisely the same by both merchants in Canada; only the invoice in the one case would be made out at, say, £6, adding 5s. for freight; while the other would be made out at £5 5s. and 20s. for freight; so that, when the invoices were presented for duty, the one merchant would have the advantage of 17½ or 15 per cent., or whatever the rate of duty might be, on 15s. per ton of every ton of his entry. I am giving the committee the practical working of the law as it has existed, and simply asking now that the Department shall have the power to say, after full enquiry, what amount of freight the merchant shall be allowed to deduct from his invoice. There are other resolutions which I propose to lay before the committee for its consideration, which will have the effect of increasing taxation upon certain articles, and the changing of the Tariff in one particular, as it affects sugar, without, I think, affecting the revenue in any way. We have found of late that the importation of what are termed the lower grades of sugar, or yellows, manufactured principally from beet-root, which is obtained in Germany and upon which the manufacturers in the old countries receive a drawback of 2 cents a pound, enable them to send the lower grades or qualities into this country, and to prevent altogether its manufacture here. What we propose is to change the sugar duties, so as to create a separate class, and impose the rate of duty now imposed upon the sugars over No. 14 upon all classes of refined sugars. The article in the Tariff will read: "All refined sugars to pay 1 cent per pound and 35 per cent. ad valorem." It is also proposed to increase the duties upon spirits and tobacco, both Excise and Customs. The resolutions which I desire to lay before the committee will have the effect of increasing the Excise duty on whiskey manufactured from corn from $1 to $1.30; whiskey manufactured from malt from $1.02 to $1.32; whiskey manufactured from molasses and other articles of a similar kind, from $1.03 to $1.33. The House is aware that the present duties are $1 per gallon on spirits manufactured from corn, $1.02 on spirits manufactured from malt, and $1.03 on spirits manufactured from molasses and other articles of the kind. This extra duty of 2 cts. and 3 cts. was put upon the manufacture of spirits in this country from malt and molasses in consequence of the duty imposed upon corn.

* For resolutions see p. 3232.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) You add 30 cents all round ?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes. The Customs duty, which is now upon gin, rum, whiskey, and other spirits of like character $1.32½, it is proposed to increase to $1.75; and that upon brandies, which is now $1.45, we propose to ask the committee to increase to $2 per gallon. The Excise duty upon tobacco manufactured from foreign leaf is now 12 cents per pound. The old duty was 20 cents, and we propose to place the Excise duty upon tobacco in precisely the same position it was before 1873, when it was reduced to 12 cents, and to increase it to 20 cents per pound, and the domestic leaf in proportion. I may inform the committee that, up to 1883, 8 cents was imposed upon the domestic leaf. We propose to increase that from 2 cents, the sum now imposed by the Excise law, to 5 cents per pound. The Customs duty upon tobacco and snuff is now 20 cents per pound. We propose to increase it to 30 cents per pound, which will be 5 cents higher for the imported tobacco than was imposed when the Excise was 20 cents per pound under the old tariff. Under the old tariff the Customs duty upon tobacco imported was 25 cents; it is now 20 cents; we propose to increase it to 30 cents, which will give a better protection to the Canadian manufacturers than the old tariff did, and the protection also to the manufacturers from the Canadian leaf will be 3 cents per pound better than it was under the tariff as it existed previous to the reduction of duty. I have explained as succinctly as I could, without entering elaborately into the figures, what changes we propose to make in these particular articles of Excise and Customs duties. I may state that we do not anticipate any additional revenue of any consequence from the change in the sugar duty.

Mr. VAIL. Will the hon. gentleman state again what the change is ?

Mr. BOWELL. We propose to make all refined sugar pay 1 cent a pound and 35 per cent. without any reference whatever to its grade by the Dutch standard. I was about saying that we did not anticipate any appreciable increase from this change, from the fact that, if the importation of what are termed the lower grades or common kinds of sugar falls off, it will be made up by the importation of the raw article which will enter into the manufacture of that particular class of sugar in this country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you going to admit this without reference to color and without any reference to saccharine strength ?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, without reference to color or saccharine strength. The hon. gentleman knows that the saccharine strength is not taken into consideration at all under the present Tariff, only when the refiners purchase their sugars upon a guarantee of a certain strength, when if it exceeds that strength they pay a proportionate advance on the value ad valorem. When the test is made by the polariscope, if it is found that the sugar does not come up to the standard, then of course the value of the invoice would have to be decreased in order to obtain the correct ad valorem value of the sugar. In the same way, if the purchase be at 85, and the sugar should, upon test, be found to contain 90 of saccharine matter, then, whatever the importer would have to pay, in addition to the face of the invoice would have to be added to its value for duty. That is the only case in which the question of strength can be considered under the present Tariff.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Practically, you exclude all the refined sugars, I suppose, below a certain standard, or certain number. What is your calculation upon that point ? Do you propose to exclude all below 14 or 15, or what number ? I am speaking of the practical result.

Mr. BOWELL. We do not propose to exclude any kind of sugar, but we propose to place all refined sugar under one resolution imposing the duty. The effect we anticipate is this : That that particular class of sugar to which I have referred, will be excluded to a certain extent, but we anticipate that the revenue will be fully made up by the increased importation of the raw material.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is just the point on which I would have doubts myself. Of course it is exceedingly difficult to anticipate what may be the course of trade in this matter; but the hon. gentleman is now proposing to impose on all refined sugars a new rate—and by that word "refined" I suppose he means sugars that have undergone any process of manufacture of any sort. How is any one going to define what are refined sugars ?

Mr. BOWELL. Any sugars that may be imported from any country which have gone through any process of refining. It is almost impossible to answer the hon. gentleman until a test has been made.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At present on these low grades of sugar, I think you are collecting a cent a pound, I mean on the sugar imported for manufacturing purposes. Just at present raw sugar is brought in on which a duty is collected of half a cent or a quarter of a cent per pound. I suppose this tax of one cent, 35 per cent. would be likely to amount to, roughly at least, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. BOWELL. In many cases it would amount to 2 cents per pound, particularly at the present value of sugar.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Sugar is low as compared with former years. I should imagine, looking at the amount, there would be a certain amount of revenue lost.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). As I understand the Minister the duty is not raised on sugars below No. 9; on all above that, raw sugars are not touched at all; that is, only the raw refined yellow. Well, we have no means of ascertaining, from any information in our hands, what proportion of sugars below No. 9, for instance, are refined sugars. I do not know whether the Minister can tell himself; if he cannot, we are working in the dark, to a great extent. I should judge, however, that the effect of the Minister's proposal would be to exclude this low class of refined yellows. It is about equivalent to prohibition.

Mr. BOWELL. This word "refined" sugar is not in the Tariff. There is no separate record kept as to what amount is refined or raw. It may be under 9 and still be refined—that is, the lower qualities; hence it is impossible for us to ascertain what quantities were imported of that particular kind of sugar. I agree that this will, to a certain extent, exclude the low grade of sugar.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should imagine it would exclude it altogether. We imported, roughly, about 30 millions of sugar between 14 and 9, and that, undoubtedly, would cover all the quantities to which the hon. gentleman referred. Well, it is tolerably clear that we only receive about  $1\frac{3}{4}$  cents on the sugars above 9, and only about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  cents on sugars below 9. If you put on a tax which will range from  $2\frac{1}{2}$  to  $2\frac{3}{4}$  cents, on the average, you will completely destroy any chance of importing this and the other class of sugar; you are putting on so very low a duty I am afraid you will lose revenue on the change.

Mr. STAIRS. I think that, though it is impossible to separate in the Trade Returns the fine sugar from the lower grades, the effect of the change in the duty will not be to decrease the revenue. For this reason: There will be collected 30 per cent. and 1 per cent. on any sugar over No. 14. This is just the same as has heretofore been collected on refined sugars below 14, and on raw sugars. The only way in which the revenue can be affected will be if vessels brought in refined sugar which came in under No. 14 and were very much higher than the prices of the raw. A careful inspection of the duties on sugars imported into the Dominion, taken from the prices current during last year, will show, as was mentioned by the member for South Brant, in the early part of this Session, during a discussion on the sugar question, that a refined sugar has been purchased in Greenock, quite as low as the ordinary price of raw sugar under No. 14. If the whole of the 30,000,000 lbs. which were imported during the last fiscal year had been refined sugar, and it was exchanged for an equal amount of raw, it would not affect the revenue 5 per cent., because the raw sugar taking the place of the refined would have paid as much, as the refined would have paid 30 per cent. and  $\frac{1}{2}$  of a cent. Of course, I do not say it is so. I believe the larger portion of that was raw sugar; but I state a suppositious case to show what the effect would have been if all the sugar had been refined sugar and if its place had been taken by the same amount of raw.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If that is the case, the practical result will be, that the burdens of the people will be considerably increased for the benefit of no human being, except manufacturers of sugar. We are raising the duty very largely indeed on grades of sugar which are proposed to be prohibited, and no doubt the refiners will be equal to the occasion, and raise the price accordingly. As to how it may affect the refiners, I offer no opinion; but the Minister does not pretend that he is going to obtain increased revenue, in which he is undoubtedly right, so that it is safe to draw the conclusion that the increased duty will come out of the pockets of the consumers.

Mr. VAIL. I am sorry the Minister of Custom has not gone a little further and made some re-arrangement in the Tariff generally in regard to sugar, for I can assure him that the mode of collecting duties on sugars is very unsatisfactory. The importers of raw sugar in Nova Scotia have for some time complained of want of uniformity in working the Customs laws, and state that while the Customs officials in Halifax are very strict in their administration of the law, and collect duties to the fullest extent that the Act permits, the same rigorousness is not observed in other portions of the Dominion, and more especially at

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Montreal; and if their statement is correct, the importers and refiners of raw sugar in Montreal have a decided advantage over those engaged in the same business at Halifax. The House will remember that early in the present Session an order was made for a return of all cargoes of raw sugar imported into Halifax from Jamaica between 1st January, 1883 and 31st December, 1883; also for a return of all sugars imported into the port of Montreal during the same period, either direct or via Halifax, giving the number of pounds in each cargo, the amount of duty per 100 lbs., and the value per 100 lbs. for duty. An examination of this return shows that among other arrivals at Halifax were four vessels from Jamaica. Two of those vessels, Georgie and Annie, had cargoes for Montreal; the other two vessels were S. J. Mussen and Clifford; and as the return does not give the dates of the arrival of the vessels or the prices at which their cargoes were entered, in order that the House may be fully informed on the subject, I propose to supply the information. The Anne arrived on 23rd April; S. J. Mussen on 26th April; Clifford, 29th April; Georgie, 2nd May. All those arrivals were within a period of one week. It is usual with cargoes that are shipped for Montreal via Halifax to be passed through Customs in transit without being entered; but by accident the agent of those two vessels, the Annie, and Georgie reported their cargoes at the Custom House, when the collector of Customs discovered that the cargoes were invoiced very much below two cargoes of the same kind of sugar arriving from the same port. He immediately called the attention of the agent to the fact, and informed him that those cargoes were invoiced too low; that he could not receive them, except at the same rate as the other two cargoes from the same port were valued. And the case, I presume, was reported to Ottawa. The Customs Act, clause 68, explicitly states that the ad valorem duty shall be levied on the fair market value at the time of shipment; and consequently, as I have stated, the collector could do nothing else under the circumstances than require the cargoes for Montreal to be entered at the same rate as the two cargoes for Halifax were entered. The return brought down shows that the sugars were graded below No. 14 and No. 9, and were consequently of the same value and were liable to the same duties. But the return also shows that the duty collected on the two cargoes for Montreal was very much less than was paid by the Halifax merchant, as the following figures taken from the return show:

	Duty.	Value per 100 lbs. for Duty.
Annie , below No. 14,	\$1.59 $\frac{1}{2}$	} ..... \$2 80 $\frac{1}{2}$
" " " "	9, 1.34 $\frac{1}{2}$
Georgie , " " "	14, 1.60 $\frac{1}{2}$	} ..... 2 85 $\frac{1}{2}$
" " " "	9, 1.35 $\frac{1}{2}$
S. J. Mussen , " " "	14, 1.81	} ..... 3 54
" " " "	9, 1.56
Clifford , " " "	14, 1.75	} ..... 3 34 $\frac{1}{2}$
" " " "	9, 1.50

I have been particular in stating these figures because they have an important bearing on what I intend to say with regard to this matter. On the 16th of December last, there appeared in a Montreal paper the following article, and it is interesting as showing the advantage which the Montreal importers had over the Halifax importers. The article is headed "Sugar Seizures in Montreal," and is as follows:—

" MONTREAL, Dec. 16.—A decision has at length been given in a case between Mr. S. B. Heward and the Customs authorities. Mr. Heward commenced importing sugar from Jamaica about four of five years ago, and after a small cargo had been passed through the Customs, larger consignments were made at the same prices. Through jealousy of Halifax merchants, a seizure was made, but nothing came of it. When navigation opened, the sugar was shipped direct, but the cargo of the first vessel was seized, and a large amount of extra duty had to be paid on it before it was released. As it was under protest a rebate was claimed, and the Department at Ottawa on finding that the prices were similar to the first importation which had been passed; decided that the extra duty ought not to have been charged. But meantime it was found that other firms were importing sugar and paying duty at lower prices.

And that Mr. Heward instead of defrauding the revenue (as they claimed) by invoicing the goods under the proper price, was actually paying a higher duty than his rivals. The question at once arose as to whether Mr. Heward's duty should be lowered, or the other should be raised; the Department concluded it would be easier to drop the duty on the new imports than to raise them on the old ones, so that was done. Mr. Heward, however, claimed rebate on duty previously paid, with legal expenses and damages, but the case has now been concluded by the acceptance of $1,500 by Mr. Joseph Duhamel, Q.C., who has acted for Mr. Heward, who returned from Ottawa this morning after obtaining a settlement."

Well, Sir, this reads very strangely after the figures I have given to the House, taken from the returns furnished from the Customs Department, under an order of this House. Now, if this statement is correct, and I have no doubt it is, that the Customs authorities have discovered that other firms in Montreal were importing sugars and paying a lower rate of duty than Mr. Heward, who, according to the returns, was paying a lower rate than other firms, I should like to know why the Minister of Customs, who had the papers before him, did not make the Montreal firms pay an equal sum with Mr. Heward, instead of paying \$1,500 out of the Treasury, in order to reduce Mr. Heward's amount down to the amounts paid by firms, which he must have known, were really paying a less rate than firms in other portions of the Dominion. I cannot see what excuse the Minister of Customs will offer for this rather extraordinary proceeding, unless he intends to refund to the importers of sugar in Nova Scotia, the excess of duty which they have been paying. Then there is another ground of complaint that the people of Nova Scotia make, and that is, that while sugar is weighed in Nova Scotia by the Customs officials, I am informed that in Montreal it is weighed by the city weighers, and it frequently happens that these men withdraw samples for classifying. Now anybody acquainted with the sugar trade will see that as sugar is graded on color, drawing samples is a very important part of the business, and if the person drawing these samples is anxious to assist the importer, he can make a difference of a quarter of a cent per hundred pounds, and 5 per cent. ad valorem, and apparently do the work fairly. I am not in a position to charge on the officials at Montreal that they have acted unfairly, but I am told that the importers consider that the matter requires the consideration of the Government. What I have stated in reference to these matters may, perhaps, account for the investigation which I am told took place here last year, when it was discovered that sugars landed at Montreal paid, as a rule, 15 to 20 cents per hundred pounds less than if landed at Halifax. This may not seem a very heavy sum to those not familiar with the trade, but when I tell the House, that if applied to the total imports of 1883, of 180,000,000 of pounds, it reaches the respectable sum of \$360,000, it will be seen that it is a matter of considerable importance. I may here state a case which occurred a few years ago, which will go a long way towards convincing the House that there is a lack of uniformity in this sugar business, which should be rectified in some way. A Montreal merchant purchased a cargo of sugar in Halifax, most of it grading over No. 14. It was purchased on that basis, duty paid. The sugar went to Montreal, and it was re-classified there, and, strange to say, the bulk of that cargo was graded under No. 14, while in Halifax it was graded over No. 14, and the Montreal importer received the advantage of the difference in the duty, which must have been a considerable amount, because there was a saving of 25 cents per 100 pounds, and 5 per cent. ad valorem on the cost of the article. I think that this shows that there is some very different rule in Montreal from what there is in other portions of the Dominion in regard to this matter. I think I have also shown that there is a serious defect in the mode of classifying and grading sugar, and that a great injustice is being done to the Halifax importers, which requires the attention of the Government. I shall now proceed to show, in as concise a manner as possible, that the present mode of testing sugar is defective, and if continued, will be ruinous to the West India trade, which is a very important trade to the Dominion, and more especially to the Maritime Provinces. Sugar pays both a specific and an ad valorem duty, and is graded on color, and any person who has studied the subject knows that color is not an index of the strength or value of sugar. For example, a sample under No. 9 pays  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. and tests 97 degrees, and is consequently a valuable sugar for refining purposes; while another sample, over No. 9 and under 14, pays  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a cent, and tests only 82 degrees, although the first sample is worth from \$1 to \$1.50 per 100 pounds more than the latter; and it often happens that two lots of sugar worth the same price, duty paid, pays 25 cents per 100 pounds difference in duty. The ad valorem duty being collected on the cost of the article at the place of shipment, enables the refiners to import the low priced beet-root sugar on more advantageous terms than they can import the brighter and clearer sugar from the West Indies, and the result has been to kill out the West India trade, and encourage the importation of low-priced sugar from China and other foreign countries. For instance, I am told that in the early part of last year, and I presume it is the same now, that sugar could be imported from China of the same strength and landed here duty paid for 25 cts. less per 100 lbs., than it could be imported from Demerara, a comparatively near port, only about 3,000 miles from Halifax. This shows the discrimination of the present Tariff in favor of foreign grown sugar as against West Indies sugar. Of the sugar imported in the last half of the year 1883 which went into consumption in Halifax, from 40 to 50 per cent. was imported from foreign countries, and, as a matter of course, West Indies sugar had to be sold at corresponding prices with these sugars made artificially cheap by the operation of the Tariff, or be sent elsewhere, and the consequence was a large falling off in the importation of West Indies sugar into Halifax during the last half of 1883 to one-third the importation of the corresponding half year of 1882. Refiners in competing with each other must buy in the cheapest market, but the Tariff should be so arranged as to encourage the importation of sugar from countries which it is to our advantage to trade with. In fact, sugar refining at present is an injury to the trade of the Dominion, instead of what it should be, and what we in the Maritime Provinces supposed it was intended to be, a means of building up a larger trade with the West Indies and Brazil, and giving us a market for our fisheries, farms, forests and manufactured goods, as well as employment for a class of vessels from 75 to 200 tons, which are especially adapted to the fish trade, a trade which is in itself of far more importance than sugar refining is in itself. The fisheries of Nova Scotia last year yielded about \$8,500,000, nearly all clear gain to the country, and I think an export of this magnitude, which is largely consumed in the West Indies, and paid for in sugar, is entitled to some consideration from the Government. The statistics for the six months ending 31st December, 1883, shows a decrease in the quantity of West India sugar imported into Halifax of 28,000,000 pounds, or 46 per cent. less than for the same period of 1882. In Brazil sugars, during the same period, there was a decrease of 10 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., while the importation from China and Germany, countries which take none of our products, was nearly eight times as great as for the same period of the previous year, or 28 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. of the whole importation of sugar. Now, in view of all this, one would naturally have supposed the Minister of Customs, when his attention was called to it last year, would have taken steps to remedy this grievance. But, on the contrary, as I stated a few days ago, for some reason which I never could understand, unless it was for the express purpose of crushing out the West India trade, the Government last Session granted a subsidy of \$48,000 per annum to a line of steamers between Antwerp and Canada and Germany and Canada. These steamers come to Montreal in summer and Halifax in winter loaded with low priced beet-root sugar at 14s. per ton freight and of course West India sugar is thus driven out of the market to that extent. For return cargo they go to the United States and on the homeward voyage call at Halifax again for a mail, which I am told is a bag with one or two letters in it. Then again, with a view, I presume, of discriminating still farther against the West India sugars, the Government, early the present year, passed an Order in Council permitting the importation of beet-root sugar from Germany on payment of duty on the cost, less the draw brack, which the Minister of Customs stated in answer to my question on the Notice Paper, was a little over 2 cents per lb., a further discrimination against the West India sugar of 55 cents per 100 lbs.

Mr. BOWELL. Does that hon. gentleman object to that Order in Council.

Mr. VAIL. I most certainly do, because the effect of it is to allow the low-priced sugars from Germany and elsewhere to be brought in to compete with our West India sugars, and the West Indies trade with us, while those foreign countries do not. Consequently the West India sugar must be sold at as low a rate as the beet-root sugar or find a market somewhere else. Now, the Minister of Customs may say it is very easy to point out defects in the present mode of testing and grading sugar, but what is the remedy for all this? My answer is that he should adopt the polariscopic test, which must necessarily be a fairer and more correct way of getting at the relative value and strength of sugar, more particularly for refining purposes, and charge duty on the actual strength, as they do in the United States. They adopted this test many years ago, and have seen no reason to change. It is the only correct mode of testing sugar. I am told the Belgian Government, some time ago, applied to the leading scientific men of Europe for their opinion as to the best method of levying the duty on sugar, and the reply was, that the use of the polariscope was the best, most correct and fairest mode that could be adopted, whereas the color test was the worst that could be conceived. I have referred to this matter at some length, and, I think, shown the House pretty clearly that there is not only a serious defect in the mode of classifying and grading sugar, which requires the attention of the Customs authorities, but I have also shown that a great injustice has been done the Halifax importers of sugar, which calls for some explanation and redress from the Government. I, therefore, hope the Minister of Customs will look into this matter and see if something cannot be done to place it on a more satisfactory basis.

Mr. GUNN. I think the change will shut out yellow sugars altogether; they were almost prohibited before. The Minister of Customs should have shown us what was the quantity imported, so that we could tell exactly where we were. I do not believe the quantity imported last year exceeded 5 to 7½ per cent., and the loss of duty on this would be from $50,000 to $75,000. The refiners are now paying on sugar testing 90 degrees, about $1.25 per 100 lbs., while the American refiners pay $2, or 75 cents more than ours. Granulated sugar sells in New York at 6½ cents, and in Montreal at 7 cents, both duty paid; that is ¼ of a cent. more we have to pay for our sugar, and we have ¾ of a cent less duty on it, equal to 1 cent per lb. loss to the people, which, on an importation of 200,000,000, lbs. alone would make $2,000,000. The refiner is already so highly protected, that I do not think the tax on yellow sugar should be further advanced.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It does seem to me this is really a grant to the sugar refiners for extra protection, and taking into account the protection they already enjoy, they are the last class who should approach us again. I have no wish to see the sugar refineries closed; but I say that when it was conclusively shown, in March last, that the average ad valorem duty at that time which would have to be paid on granulated sugar imported from the United States, was 96½; when it was proved that it could then have been brought into the country, and the importer had just cleared himself, on paying on an ad valorem basis of 96½: when it was conclusively demonstrated by figures, taken from reliable Canadian and New York quotations, that sugar was selling in the United States for ½ ct. per lb. less than in Canada, while the refiner in the States had to pay fully ½ ct. per lb. more duty than the Canadian refiner, I considered that a case was made out showing that the protection given to Canadian refiners was excessive. Instead now of proposing to decrease the excessive amount of protection, the Government propose to leave these highly refined sugars at the same rate, and give an amount of protection on yellow sugars to the Canadian refiners which, in my judgment, will be absolute prohibition of all foreign refined sugar. The Minister is simply delivering the whole trade of the country, bound hand and foot, to the refiners. I fear, at present, that the refiners have a combination among themselves to keep up prices. When an industry has been stimulated to such an extent that production overreaches consumption, and there is freedom of action and competition among those engaged in the trade, the price of the article may not in some cases be enhanced, but where you have the trade in a few hands and an understanding arrived at, as I believe there is among the refiners, not to lower prices, the people have to suffer. The refinery business is in the hands of four or five men, and the probability is there will not be more than four or five men engaged in that business, because there is not room for more, and that being the case the consumer will have to pay whatever price they decide on. The effect of the Tariff changes now proposed will be to give greater protection to the refiner on yellow sugars, at the risk of absolute loss to the revenue and the certainty of increased prices to the consumer.

Mr. STAIRS. I think the hon. gentleman is quite mistaken in assuming that the measure proposed will give too great an amount of protection to the refiners. He makes the mistake he always does in assuming there is no other sugar used in the Dominion than granulated. I think he will acknowledge that not more than one-fifth of the sugar is granulated, and the other four-fifths is yellow sugar.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). This is yellow sugar.

Mr. STAIRS. Yes; but this yellow is under No. 14. and forms but a small portion of the yellow sugar of the Dominion. The member for Kingston (Mr. Gunn) fell into the same error as the hon. member for South Brant, and talked upon the increased duty which would be produced by these resolutions, and, as I understood him, he assumed that these resolutions applied to granulated sugars and to the higher classes, whereas they only touch those below No. 14.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). He only referred to yellow.

Mr. STAIRS. I understood him to say something about granulated sugar, but I could not hear very well. If he referred only to yellow sugars, the amount affected by these resolutions could not be anything like the amount I understood him to state. This change which is being made in the sugar duties is only carrying out the policy always advocated by the party in power, and which they put into force in 1879. It is no doubt the intention of the present Government to afford sufficient protection to the manufacturers of the Dominion. In reply to the statement of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), as to a combination of the sugar refineries, I may say that I have had no word of any such thing being in view. My information within the past few months has been to the contrary effect, though I acknowledge that I have not had anything lately, but I believe that the number of refineries now at work in the Dominion render it impossible for them to make any combination, and the Government can trust, in this as in other matters, to the home competition making the price a moderate one.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is an immoderate one now. It is very easy for the hon. gentleman to compare the New York quotations with the Canadian.

Mr. STAIRS. I do not acknowledge that the prices of sugars to-day are immoderate. Before this change was proposed there was not any protection on sugars below No. 14, the same duty was collected on refined sugars below 14 that was collected on raw sugars below 14, and, if you look at the prices of West Indian yellows, you will find the duty per lb. was a little higher on the raw than on the refined sugars. Therefore, I contend that the Government are justified in carrying out their policy and giving the refiners sufficient protection, because the increased duty put upon these sugars is not very great; it is 5 per cent on a very low cost indeed, not more than 10 cents at the present cost and 25 per cent. The member for Brant acknowledged that he did not object to the manufacturers having sufficient protection. I say the refiners have not as great a protection as the cotton manufacturers had before 1878, under the 17½ per cent tariff. The hon. members talk about duties on granulated sugars, but they do not allow for the duty which is imposed upon raw sugar. The measure of protection is only the difference of these duties, allowing for the loss in manufacture. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) spoke of the sugar refining having injured the trade with the West Indies. If he will turn to the returns up to 1878, he will find that the contrary is the case. I am not going into the question now, because I do not want to take up the time of the committee, but the sugar refining in the Dominion has largely increased the trade with the West Indies instead of reducing it. As to the polariscopic test, though my own opinions are strongly in favor of it, I would point out that it will not help to keep beet-root sugar out. On the contrary, I think it will allow it to come in on more favorable terms than the West Indian sugar.

Mr. VAIL. I do not want to keep it out. I only think it should pay a duty according to the strength, the same as other sugars. It should not come in competition with the brighter and cleaner sugar that comes from the West Indies of a lower grade, without paying the same duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The only result of this measure will be to add to the price of sugar to the consumer, because it is quite clear that the refiner will take every farthing out of the consumer that he can. The only check upon him was the power of importing these sugars when they were at their present low figures, which could be done under the existing Tariff, but will not be done under the Tariff now proposed. This will amount on the average, taking the valuations given us in the Customs return, to 68 per cent., and that on an article which can hardly be called a luxury, which is, if not a prime necessary, at any rate one of the necessities of life for all parties in the Dominion, is a most enormous duty, and, comparing the prices paid here with the prices paid in the United States, under a heavier scale of duty, our refiners are levying an enormous scale of duties on the people of this country. I should like to hear from the Minister of Customs what he has to say as to the difference of duties on cargoes imported in Montreal and in Halifax, which has been alluded to by my hon. friend. Waiving entirely the question of protection, it is perfectly clear that pains ought to be taken to make the duty the same in the different ports of the Dominion, and, if my hon. friend's facts are correct, it is quite clear that a serious injustice is worked upon the people of Halifax and the refiners there.

Mr. BOWELL. I propose, for a few minutes, to refer to the charge of the hon. member for Digby. It is not a new one on his part. As I anticipated, he has come ready primed in order to renew the attack which he made some time ago, and I think, upon a full investigation of the matter, if he had had all the facts before him, he would probably not have made the serious charge he has, particularly of neglect of duty on the part of the head of the Customs Department in reference to investigation into these matters. That there may have been differences in grading and errors committed in different ports I am not prepared to deny. Any gentleman who has had any experience in administering the Customs law with the numerous ports there are in this Dominion, and consequently the very large number of appraisers and collectors, who take different views upon different subjects, would know that it would be almost impossible even to suppose that you could secure perfect uniformity in all these ports. The question to which the hon. gentleman referred, the importation of these two cargoes of sugar into Halifax and their afterwards having been sent to Montreal and entered at a lower rate, is not strictly in accordance with the facts. I do not say that the hon. gentleman has made that statement knowingly; but I do say this, particularly in reference to the importation of sugars, that when the complaint was received from Halifax I sent an officer at once to make a thorough investigation, not only as to that entry, but to the value of the sugar at Jamaica at the time of exportation and the rates which should be properly charged upon such sugar. The reports made to me were that the demands made of the importer by the appraiser at Montreal, were higher than the market value of the sugar at the time it was exported from Jamaica, and it was the duty of the Department, under such circumstances, to refund whatever extra amount might have been collected. But I can assure the committee that not a dollar has ever been remitted to any importer upon any article, until there has been a full and thorough investigation into the whole question. When those who are experts make an investigation and report, it is not expected that the Department, unless there is something so flagrant that it is easily discovered, would interfere with that report. The charge also made by the Halifax merchants and importers, that Montreal has an advantage over Halifax, was thoroughly investigated, and the results shows that Halifax, on the contrary, in the way to which the hon. gentleman referred, and also in the grading of the sugars, has, if anything, an advantage over Montreal. When the hon. gentleman brought this question before the House upon a previous occasion, as I was desirous of obtaining the fullest information, I wrote to Mr. Dustan, who had visited Ottawa a short time before, and who had made the same serious complaints, not only against the Department, but against the appraisers and collectors in Montreal. He was invited to investigate all the returns that we had, and all the reports made by those who had investigated the question, and the collector in Montreal was written to, asking him to give Mr. Dustan access to all the books and entries, and give him all the information he might require to enable him to satisfy himself as to the manner in which the business was transacted at that port. My letter was dated on the 19th of February, immediately after the debate in this House, and I will read it:

"MY DEAR DUSTAN,—In conversation with the Commissioner a few days since, on the question of sugars imported at Montreal and Halifax, I was informed that you made a thorough investigation in Montreal some time ago, and that you expressed yourself satisfied as to the correctness of the Montreal values for duty.

"Kindly let me know how you found things at that port.

"Yours truly,

"(Signed), M. BOWELL."

On the 23rd February, Mr. Dustan telegraphed to me as follows:—

" Letter 19th received. Judging from my investigation at Montreal Custom House, consider attack of the Nova Scotia refinery on the Customs officials there, a baseless—

Pretty strong language—

" and vile calumny. Writing as to values for duty.

" GEORGE GORDON DUSTAN."

On the 24th February, the day after the date of the telegram, he wrote me as follows:—

" HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA,
" 24th February, 1885.

" MY DEAR MR. BOWELL,—I am duly in receipt of your valued letter of the 19th inst., asking about the question of sugars imported at Montreal and Halifax, and the thorough investigation made by me at the port of Montreal as to the correctness of the values for duty there. I beg to say in reply that in the autumn of 1883 my attention was directed to an alleged evasion of the payment of a portion of the duties payable upon cargoes of Jamaica sugars, particulars of which were furnished me, amounting to 4,777,046 pounds, of the value of $139,249, and upon which duty was paid to the amount of $41,774.70, and that, as compared against the value of seven similar cargoes from the same Island of Jamaica that were entered for duty at the port of Halifax, there was a loss to the revenue of $7,611.30 upon an undervaluation of $25,371 "

These are the charges which, he says, were made, and then continues:

" I at once proceeded to Ottawa and received from the Department of Customs leave to call upon the appraiser at the port of Montreal and to satisfy myself whether such a state of matters existed, as I had been led to suppose was the case.

" I was met by the Government in the frankest manner and permitted to make an informal investigation. All the samples of the sugars in question with invoices and entries were in the appraiser's office, and Mr. Moir, the able and efficient grocery appraiser, gave me an opportunity of looking into the matter.

" I had in my possession advices as to the state of the market during the period covered by these importations and I most positively state that I came to the conclusion that all the duty to which the Government were fairly entitled had been paid upon the sugars in question. I need not state any more significant point in the whole matter than this, viz: The alleged undervaluation was made up from a statistical point of view. One cargo averaged against another. Any one familiar with Jamaica sugar will know that cargoes may be made up of different qualities, and as my informant had never seen the cargoes in question, I was not surprised at the result of my examination.

" I came away from the port of Montreal convinced that in that particular instance, there was no just ground of complaint against the Customs Department.

" I have the honor to be,

" My dear Sir,

" Your obedient servant,

" The Hon. MACKENZIE BOWELL, " GEO. GORDON DUNSTAN,
" Minister of Customs, Ottawa."

Mr. VAIL. Who are you reading from?

Mr. BOWELL. I am reading Mr. Dustan's letter. The committee will see that I took the precaution of writing to the man who certainly has the reputation of knowing not only the value of sugar but has a thorough knowledge of the sugar trade in this country.

Mr. VAIL. He had not knowledge enough to make money out of it.

Mr. BOWELL. That is many a good man's fault. There are many men who, as the hon. gentleman knows, have a thorough knowledge of business, but who do not succeed in it when working on their own account, but who make admirable servants and who make money when they are working for others. We see that in every avocation of life. However, I was well aware that the reports of the officers of the Department and of the Commissioner whose name has been mentioned, would not be satisfactory to those who made these complaints; hence I wrote to the man in whom I believe, every one has confidence in so far as his knowledge of the sugar question is concerned; because Mr. Dustan has been connected with this business for a great number of years, and has devoted much of his time to the study of the whole question. I asked him to inform me as to the result of his investigation and that result I have read to the House. It is much better, I think than a report coming from an inexperienced man, or from any one of our officers. In regard to the general statement with respect to the different importations, I find on going through the return to which the hon. gentleman has referred, and from which he has drawn certain deductions as to one or two importations, that the results of the whole importations for the year 1883 into the ports of Halifax and Montreal do not bear out the statement which the hon. gentleman has made, and the deductions he has drawn from two particular cargoes of sugar. The hon. gentleman ought to know that a merchant may buy sugar in Jamaica or in any other port for export, and that the ruling price of the same quality of sugar may be higher or lower during the same day, and that cargoes may be exported in the morning at one price and in the evening or following day at another price. The sugar market, particularly in regard to raw sugars, varies almost as rapidly as exchange or the stock market. The hon. gentleman does not require to be told that, for no doubt from the thorough knowledge he appears to possess of the whole question he knows the truth of what I have stated. I will be pardoned for occupying a little time in dealing with this question, as I desire more particularly to give information to the importers at the different ports, as this question is constantly cropping up. Montreal complains to the head office that Halifax has an advantage. Halifax merchants declare that Montreal with its large refineries has great influence, and they have gone so far as to say in the newspapers that the weighers and appraisers are under the control of the refiners. I have made a pretty thorough investigation into all these matters, and have yet to learn that there is a scintilla of truth in any of the charges made against our officers in Montreal or Halifax. They have performed to the best of their knowledge their onerous and responsible duties honestly and faithfully. The following is a comparative statement of sugars imported from Jamaica into the ports of Montreal and Halifax direct during the year 1883:—

The above statement reveals the following facts: The sugars from Jamaica in 1883 were graded as follows: In Montreal, 43.11 per cent. between 9 and 14. In Halifax, 27.13 per cent. between 9 and 14. The aggregate or average duty paid on the same was: In Montreal, $1.58 per 100 lbs. In Halifax, $1.55 per 100 lbs., a difference in favor of Halifax of 3 cts. per 100 lbs. In regard to the question of weighing. It is charged by the Halifax press, and it was repeated by the hon. member for Digby, that weighing in Halifax was done under the surveillance of the Customs authorities; and that in Montreal the weighing is done by the city weigher, without any check whatever. The hon. gentleman is incorrect in that statement also. The moment I saw that charge I thought it a very serious one, and I at once sent an officer, Mr. Wolff, to make an investigation into the matter, and I will give the result of that investigation. That officer says:

" CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT, CANADA,
" SPECIAL AGENT'S BRANCH,
" MONTREAL, 23rd August, 1884.

" Sir,—I have the honor to state that two cargoes of sugar were lately landed at Halifax ex Craigton and Ayrshire.

"The consignee, who resides here, not having implicit faith in the weighers at Halifax, despatched a city weigher from Montreal for the purpose of checking the cargoes—and I have now the honor to hand you copies of the weighing of various lots imported by the vessels named.

"It is asserted in some quarters that the weighers at Halifax do not weigh as closely as is the practice at other ports, and further, that owing to their regarding small sized hhds. as tierces, that the Halifax importer gains an advantage on the tare of tierces (so called) weighing over 1,300 lbs.

"As the enclosed statements give you the exact gross weight in each case it will be easy to check the Halifax returns and ascertain if there is any truth in the assertions.

"It is also stated that the Customs weighers at Halifax do not include scrapings in the weight for duty, which should certainly be included, as in many cases owing to the breaking of packages they are very large, representing frequently many hogsheads.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"JAS. F. WOLFE,

"Special Agent.

"J. JOHNSON, Esq.,

"Commissioner of Customs,

"Ottawa."

I am not prepared to say whether that is correct or not, but any one who is acquainted with the sugar trade, will see not only the propriety, but the absolute necessity of adding the scrapings if the correct weight is to be obtained. Then the Inspector reports again as follows:—

"MONTREAL, 6th December, 1884.

"I have the honor to return you file 3591—84, sent me for further inquiry, and to report that I find the weights returned by the officers at Halifax, to agree with weights returned by the private weigher, and that the only difference between the practice of Halifax and Montreal, as far as shown in the treatment of the cargoes ex-Ayrshire and Craighton, as regards weighing of sugar, lies in the weight of tare. The attached statement signed by the assistant weigher at this port, shows the cargo of the Ayrshire to have been entered 9,553 pounds, and that of the Craighton 12,434 pounds short of that. The same gross weight would have been entered at Montreal owing to the latter port only allowing 12 per cent. tare on packages weighing over 1,300 pounds, such packages being considered as hogsheads, whereas at the port of Halifax, the invoiced name of the package appears to rule for tare."

I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

"JAS. F. WOLFE,

"Special Agent.

"J. JOHNSON, Esq.,

"Commissioner of Customs,

"Ottawa."

They take the invoices names, instead of applying the rule which prevails in Montreal as that upon which the allowance is made. Now, what does this show? It shows:

M. F. QUIN,
Assistant Weigher and Gauger,
Port of Montreal.

I have given these figures from the actual test of the weighing—a comparison of the two systems, not particularly for the purpose of finding fault with the port of Halifax, but to show that there has been no discrimination against that port, but that on the contrary, in various ways, that in the whole amount of the import of sugar from Jamaica in 1883, they had an advantage over Montreal of 3 cents per 100 lbs., and in these two cargoes an advantage of 12,434 lbs. I have read all the figures with reference to the steamships Craighton and Ayrshire, showing by the calculation that the Halifax merchant, who made the entry, had an advantage in the weighing alone—on the calculation of tare of—of 12,434 lbs. over what there would have been had the importation and weighing been in Montreal, and the entry made at that port. Now, so far as the investigation is concerned—so far as the charges—

Mr. VAIL. Before the hon. gentleman passes from that point, I would ask him is it a fact or not that sugar in Montreal is weighed by the city weighers?

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman has scarcely given me time. I was coming to that.

Mr. VAIL. I thought you were passing from it.

Mr. BOWELL. I was just going to refer to that point. Sugar in Montreal is weighed by the city weighers.

Mr. VAIL. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOWELL. What are you hear, hearing about?

Mr. VAIL. That is just what I said.

Mr. BOWELL. Would you like me to stop there? Sugar is weighed by the city weighers and checked by a Customs officer. I put that same question to the collector, and also to Mr. Wolfe the Inspector. I have heard people "hear, hear" and hallo before they got out of the woods, and I think my hon. friend was in that position.

Mr. BLAKE. He is in the wood.

Mr. BOWELL. No, he is out of the cane and into the syrup, and very soft syrup it is. The inspector reports that "The weighing is checked by a Customs officer at the time of weighing, and a separate account is kept as a check by the Customs officer, Customs tares and city tares differ of course because they have a different mode of calculating it."

That only refers to the tares, and perhaps that may be the reason why the Halifax merchant had the advantage to which I have referred.

"The Customs officers get no fees for weighing or gauging at Montreal, and importers never know what officers may be sent to weigh their goods."

This is certainly an advantage over the system which prevails at some ports of having one weigher to weigh all the sugar, and every importer knowing who that man is.

Mr. VAIL. Who pays the weigher of the sugar?

Mr. BOWELL. The Customs pay him—the Government pay him.

Mr. VAIL. That is the city weigher?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, for all work done for the Customs by him. I do not know how it may be in Halifax, but I have never yet been able to find anybody in Ontario or Quebec to work for nothing, and when we utilize a public officer, such, for instance, as a public analyst, we have to pay him, as we pay all those who do work for us. I can also state to the hon. gentleman that the city weigher of Montreal takes a solemn oath to perform his duties to the best of his knowledge and ability, and we have no right to assume that he is corrupt unless it is proved. I do not propose to occupy the attention of the committee longer, unless there are some questions the hon. gentleman wishes to ask me. I have already referred to the Heward importation, and the hon. gentleman says I must have known it was not correct. Well, I knew from reports, particularly by the Halifax papers that they stated that it is not correct.

I took every possible means of ascertaining the facts, first by sending an officer to investigate and report; then by having an accountant of the Department make a report as to the prices and calculations, and everything necessary, in order to arrive at a correct conclusion, and having found that the statements which had been made against that particular importation were not correct, I took the responsibility of ordering the refund of the extra amount of duty which had been paid. The hon. gentleman objects to the mode of testing the quality and the ignoring of the saccharine strength of the sugar. That is a very vexed question; it is a question that the most experienced experts have not yet decided. The hon. gentleman, in his ideas of the American tariff, is about as correct as he was in reference to the other points to which he has drawn the attention of the House. It is only one quality of sugar which is tested by the polariscope under the United States tariff. There they have the mixed system of the polariscope for one grade, the Dutch standard for another, and the refined for another. I will read them to the hon. gentleman in order that he may not fall into the error again. The American tariff reads as follows:—

"Sugars—class 1. Those tested by the polariscope; all sugars not above No. 13 Dutch standard in color shall pay duty on their polariscope test as follows, viz.: All sugars not above No. 13 Dutch standard, all tank bottoms, syrups of cane juice or beet juice, maleda, concrete and concentrated molasses, testing by the polariscope not above 75 degrees, 1½ cents per pound; and for every additional degree or fraction of a degree shown by the polariscope test, they shall pay  $\frac{1}{10}$ ths of a cent per pound additional.

"Class 2. Those classified by the dutch standard of color; all sugars above No. 13 Dutch standard shall be classified by the Dutch standard of color and pay duty as follows, namely: all above No. 13 and not above No. 16, 2½ cents per pound; all above No. 16 and not above No. 20, 3 cents per pound; and all above No. 20, 3½ cents per pound.

"Class 3. Refined sugars; all sugars after being refined, when tintured, colored, or in any way adulterated, value 30 cents per pound or less, 10 cents per pound."

Therefore the United States Government do not adhere to the polariscope test in levying their duty, except in the case of one particular grade of sugar; and it has not been considered advisable as yet to adopt that test as a principle of our Tariff for many reasons. While there may be an error of judgment in the grading of sugar as to its color by the different appraisers and the different collectors in the country, how much greater difficulties would be likely to occur if the whole decision depended exclusively on the eye of the individual using the polariscope. We know that there are many men who are good judges of sugar and have all the qualifications of good officers who could not by any possibility use the polariscope. There are others who of course could; but where you have so many officers, I am very much inclined to believe—and I know this is the opinion of the Finance Minister, who has given this question a great deal of consideration—that frauds and errors would be as likely to occur under the polariscope test as under the present system. The hon. gentleman objects to the subsidy which was given to the line of steamers plying between Halifax and Antwerp, which he tells us has imported some beet-root sugar, which I believe is correct, and he charges the Government with having given that subsidy for the purpose of destroying the West Indian trade.

Mr. VAIL. I did not make that statement; I said it did do it, and I could not imagine any other cause the Government had for it.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman says he did not make the charge that the subsidy was given for the purpose of destroying the West India trade, but states that it had that effect, and that he could not conceive any other reason the Government could have in doing that, except to create a monopoly of trade in beet-root sugar between Antwerp and Canada to destroy the West India trade. I leave the hon. gentleman to draw the distinction; there is as much difference between that and the statement I made as there is between tweedledum and tweedledee. If the hon. gentleman is correct in his statement, and if he desires that the refiners of Halifax and Moncton should manufacture from the West India sugar alone, and not from beet-root sugars, what would be the result? If there had been no beetroot sugar imported into Canada during the past year, I question whether any of our refineries would be in operation to-day, for the simple reason that if we had exacted the duty upon the 2 cent per pound bounty which is paid by the German Government on exports of beetroot sugar, no merchant or refiner in Canada could have imported one pound of that sugar, and the result would have been that the product of the beet-root sugar from the English and Scotch refineries would have been imported into this country to compete with the product of our own refineries, and we should not have had a single refinery at work to-day, and the price of such would have run up proportionately. Therefore the policy the hon. gentleman is very anxious for this Government to adopt, is one to prevent the refiners of this country obtaining a cheap raw material to supply the market, and thus shut them up, in order as he says, that the vessels for Halifax could go to the West Indies and bring the cane sugar to this country. Where should we find a market for the sugar imported from the West Indies if the refineries of the country could not use it? All they could do would be to bring refined sugars to supply the market. The result would have been precisely what I have stated, the closing of the refineries in the Dominion and the destruction of the West India trade. I make the hon. gentleman a present of his argument, and I have no doubt that when not only the refiners, but the Halifax merchants, look into this matter thoroughly, they will duly appreciate the hon. gentleman's interest on their behalf, an anxiety which will result in the total destruction not only of the West India trade, so far as the article of raw sugar is concerned, but in shutting up all the refineries we have in the country. I apologise to the committee for having occupied its time so long, but this question has occupied so much attention in the Maritime Provinces that I deemed it only right that the information I have given should be laid before the country, in order that the public might know precisely what has been done in the Customs Department, and that if error has occurred it has not been through laxity on the part of the officials or the head of the Department. In no single instance has a complaint been made when an investigation was not at once set on foot to ascertain the truth of the charge. There never yet has been a complaint made at Halifax when I did not at once despatch an official, not only to make an investigation, but to compare the working of the whole system as between the one port and another. I hope ere long to be able to carry this plan out to a greater extent by having some person, who has a thorough knowledge of the West India trade and the value of sugars, to travel from port to port. I think that would satisfy the merchants, and effect a saving probably in the revenue; and if it does not save a dollar, it will satisfy the merchant and importer that we are endeavoring to have one uniform system prevail.

Mr. VAIL. The hon. gentleman has given us a good deal of valuable information, but has taken care to evade the real question at issue. As regards the weighers, I understand from the best authority that the weighing in Montreal is done by the city weighers; while, in other ports, it is done by the Customs officials. The hon. gentleman says a Customs officer oversees the work, but one Customs officer could not oversee the weighing of several cargoes being landed on the same day.

Mr. BOWELL. We have a Customs officer to oversee the weighing of every cargo.

Mr. VAIL. Why not make the Customs officials do the work instead of having the city officials and the Customs officers to oversee them? With reference to the invoice prices of different cargoes arriving at the same time, and which sailed about the same time, the hon. gentleman said that in the West Indies sugar often was bought at one price in the morning and at another price in the afternoon; but in the cases I referred to, that hypothesis could not hold, in regard to the two vessels which arrived at Halifax, as one sailed before and the other shortly after, the two which arrived at Halifax, and yet the Montreal cargoes were entered at a lower rate than the Halifax cargoes. The hon. gentleman says he finds the valuation of sugar entered at Montreal somewhat in excess of the Halifax prices; but referring to his report which covers the year, I find that the average price in Montreal per 100 lbs. upon which the ad valorem duty was collected has been for the year 3·16 cents against 3·27 cents in Halifax. This shows exactly the reverse of what the hon. gentleman stated; and he surely will not go back on his return. The Minister has referred to Mr. Dustan's report on his examination in Montreal. Well, strange to say, Mr. Dustan, although he has had a good deal to do with the sugar business, very often differs with other gentlemen who have made this matter a study for a long time, and have had a great deal to do with the importation of sugar, and I do not know that Mr. Dustan is any better authority on this question than some other parties. Within the last year or two there has been a very great difference in opinion between Mr. Bremner, a gentleman formerly engaged in the West India trade, and Mr. Dustan, in regard to the way in which sugars ought to be classified and in regard to the amount of duty paid in Montreal as compared with that paid in Halifax; and, when Mr. Bremner was here a year or two ago, I understood that he made it very clear to the Minister of Customs that there was something wrong in the grading of sugar at Montreal.

Mr. BOWELL. So there was in Halifax.

Mr. VAIL. That Halifax labored under a disadvantage, in the mode of classifying the sugar, was quite clear. The color test is not a proper test, and some other mode ought to be adopted. The Minister of Customs says the people of the United States do not adopt the polariscope test in all cases, but he admitted that they did under No. 13. Well, that goes about as far as we want to have it adopted, because it is only the sugars under No. 14 that are used for refining purposes, and therefore all we ask is that the polariscope should be used for all under No. 14. I do not know that any sugar is imported above 14 for refining purposes, and of course refined sugar does not need to be classified as it pays the highest rate, 1 cent per pound and 35 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I presume the hon. gentleman, from his argument, assumes that there has been fraud practised in the interest of one of the ports in this Dominion, against another port, in the appraisal of sugar, and he proposes to get over that by the system of testing the strength by the polariscope instead of the present system of appraising it by color. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has ever seen a polariscope or knows anything about the practical working of it. I do not say that in an offensive sense, because I fancy very few except those engaged in the trade have ever seen the polariscope. I had curiosity enough to study its working in the presence of people who were testing it, and the conclusion I arrived at was that there is no system of testing that gives greater opportunities for fraud than the polariscope, if there is a disposition to commit fraud at all. In the first place, I will state to the committee the actual experience of a test. The sugar was taken from a hogshead with a large scoop and thrown upon a table. With an ordinary folder we put a portion of that sugar into the small vessel and dissolved it in the ordinary way, and tested it in the polariscope, and found it to have a particular percentage. We took another small quantity from the same pile of sugar on the table and tested that, and we found a difference of 3 per cent. The reason was that purposely, although no one looking at it would imagine that it was done, in the selection of these two little quantities that were to be tested through the polariscope a little foreign matter was permitted to go into one that did not go into the other. When you remember that the cleanliness of the vessels, the purity of the water, the carefulness of selecting exactly the same kind of sugar in quantities for the different tests, all have to be observed, you will see that any person disposed to commit fraud—and the hon. gentleman assumes that, because in Montreal the city weigher is permitted to do the weighing, under the Customs officer, there may have been, indeed he almost suggests that there has been, fraud—he will agree with me, I think, that it will be very easy for anyone, if disposed to commit fraud, if Customs officers would allow themselves to be used in this way, it could be done through the test of the polariscope much more easily than now, because there would be no means of testing it afterwards. Apparently there was the absolute, the accurate scientific test of the strength of the sugar and the duty imposed upon it, when, by the introduction of the smallest foreign substance, great difference would be caused. When I say that the difference which that small percentage would make in the duty paid by one sugar refinery would amount to over $100,000, you will agree with me that the polariscope does not offer to us that absolute and certain test we ought to have. The advantage of the color test is that at least, you can get the sugar and subject it to subsequent test by the samples preserved in the Department and the various Customs offices. I state these facts because I came to the conclusion—having previously had a strong opinion in favor of what appeared to be a thoroughly scientific method of arriving at a thoroughly accurate test of the saccharine strength of sugar, and therefore the proper duty to be imposed—after spending a part of the day in seeing several tests, I came to the conclusion that there is no means in which fraud can be more easily practised than by the polariscope.

Mr. VAIL. Is it reasonable to imagine that the Americans, clever, shrewd, sharp people as they are, would have adopted the polariscope and retained it, if this was the case.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There is a great difference of opinion in the States now about it.

Mr. VAIL. The hon. gentleman has seen the polariscope. I acknowledge I have not, but I have enquired a good deal about it. I do not think that the opinion of my hon. friend from Montreal is of much value in comparison with the opinion of the scientific men from Europe, whom I referred to this afternoon. There is not the slightest doubt that the Belgian Government did refer this to the scientific men of Europe, and their report was unanimously in favor of the polariscope test. The hon. gentleman says you may take from one portion of the table and from another and get different tests. I do not see how that is possible, but, admitting that, take the present test. You test by color, but everyone knows that one portion of a hogshead may be very dark and another very light, and it is impossible to get a true test by color. It is no index to the value of the sugar. There may be one bright sugar almost like refined sugar, to be classed over 14 and to pay 1 cent a lb. and 35 per cent., but it may be not more than No. 9 in strength, paying only  $\frac{1}{2}$  cent a lb. and 25 per cent. Does not the hon. gentleman see the unfairness of that?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman has not understood my argument at all. I do not deny that the polariscope is a scientific test of sugar; I am dealing with the question of how you can appraise the sugar at the different ports so as to avoid the possibility of inaccuracy or fraud. The hon. gentleman based his whole argument in connection with Montreal on the idea that as the sugar was weighed by the city weigher, he suggested—though he did not say so—that the weigher was in the pay of the refiners. His whole argument was based upon the idea of fraud committed by that officer, it is worth nothing unless there was fraud. My point was that with the polariscope there are even greater opportunities for fraud than with the ordinary system.

Mr. VAIL. I made no charge against the weigher; I merely referred to that incidentally as another objection the Halifax merchants had to the mode pursued in Montreal as compared with Halifax. I pointed out that two or three years ago a cargo of sugar was purchased in Halifax that had been classified and graded there. Most of it was graded at over No. 14, and it was purchased upon that basis. It was by accident re-graded in Halifax, the bulk of it under No. 14. That cargo went to Montreal, and the grading showed there was a great change between the classification of sugar in Montreal and in Halifax, and the purchaser of sugar benefitted to the extent of 25 cents per 100 lbs. and 5 per cent. ad valorem duty.

Mr. MILLS. Any one who knows anything of testing sugars to ascertain their value with a view to taxation, must admit that the polariscope is a far better test than that of the Dutch standard. Now, no difficulty could arise in the way suggested by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). It is true that where sugars are impure you may find one specimen that, according to the polariscope, would represent a lower grade than another specimen of the same mass; but the scientific men, in making their investigations to ascertain the percentage of cane sugar, would take half a dozen specimens and ascertain the average result. By the polariscope there is no difficulty whatever. One of the difficulties presented in the United States and one that was brought out specially by the committee, was that a practice had grown up of coloring sugars by the use of aniline dyes in their preparation, so that the color of the sugar was no indication of its actual purity and strength. It is well known that in the United States the practice grew up of fixing taxation by the color, adopting the Dutch standard, and that importers made arrangements with extensive sugar manufacturers in the Island of Cuba to have sugars manufactured of a particular number. Some of the finest sugars, some that were nearly a pure such as marked 97 and 98 per cent. by the polariscope, were introduced into the country marked as No. 9 Dutch standard, and they were colored in the manufacture with aniline dye prepared from burnt sugar; the dye running into the baskets upon the centrifugal wheel, and in a short time all the coloring matter, was imparted to the sugar, the water disappearing. The sugar is colored of the exact shade required to indicate the particular standard. It is dried in a few minutes by the centrifugal force, and there you have a sugar that comes into the market as the lowest grade, while it is in fact almost as pure as loaf sugar. It requires simply that the dyes should be washed out and that is about all the refining process it requires. Now, in order to meet that difficulty, we impose this specific duty; but our specific duty does not at all adequately meet the case. It seems to me there are but two tests or fair modes of imposing taxation upon sugar. The one is an ad valorem duty fixed according to value, and you take the risk, of course, of fraudulent invoices; the other fixes the taxation by the strength of the sugar, indicated by the polariscope. But the taxation according to the Dutch standard is wholly illusive, and has become specially so since the use of aniline dyes. If you had sugar without any coloring, then the Dutch standard would serve very well, for the nearer pure the sugar is the whiter it will be. But when you use an artificial coloring matter for the purpose of making the sugar of a particular shade, the polariscope should be used.

On paragraph 2, resolution 1,

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). I have received a telegram from the Board of Trade of British Columbia, asking that some exceptions should be made in their favor in this connection. The telegram is as follows:

"VICTORIA, B.C., 14th March, 1885.

"Board of Trade wishes you to object strongly to Tariff resolution No. 2, clause 1, referring to duty on transportation charges. European shipment for this Province can only reach us by American railway or via Panama through American ports on this coast. Government should exempt this Province from operation of part of the resolution referred to. Kindly interest all British Columbia members in this important matter.

"(Signed)

R. P. RITHET,
"President."

I think the same representations were made on a previous occasion in this matter. It hits British Columbia a little too hard, I think.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not think this will discriminate against British Columbia. This is to enable parties importing from Great Britain and Ireland to deduct the inland charges from the face of the invoice for duty. If you import, say from the interior of Germany, you have to add the charges from the interior to the point of shipment, to the value of the goods for duty. You do not add that when you import from Great Britain. As I understand the telegram, they ask to have British Columbia exempted from all inland transportation charges. I do not see how we could do that.

Mr. BAKER. Everyone knows how far we are from the rest of the Dominion, and some regulation which may not be objectionable as regards the Eastern Provinces may hit us very hardly. I do not wish to enlarge on this subject, because I might have to say something against the Tariff generally.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman will remember that the merchant who has sent the telegram has based it upon the resolutions originally introduced. We adhere to the old law, only giving the Customs authorities the power to determine what the amount of deduction shall be. It is not adding anything; on the contrary, it is making a deduction.

On paragraph 3, resolution 3, Geneva gin and brandy,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to know what computations the hon. gentleman has made as to the probable effect of the increase. I would also point out that he has apparently increased the Customs duties on those articles a good deal more than he has increased the duty on the article of Canadian manufactured whiskey. As a matter of fact, it is an absolute increase per gallon of from 12 to 25 cents, according to the different articles on which the duty is levied. First, what amount of increased revenue does the hon. gentleman expect to obtain?

Mr. BOWELL. I am taking 1884 as the basis of my calculations, because the hon. gentleman knows that the disturbance in trade during the last three or four months, and the general impression being abroad that for various reasons the duties upon spirits would be raised, thereby inducing a large number of merchants to make entries of their goods, it would scarcely be fair to take the importations for the year ending 1885 as a basis. In 1884 the country was in a normal condition so far as regards the revenue. Of brandy there was imported and entered for consumption 247,156 gallons, the duty on which will be increased from $1.45 to $2. Gin of all kinds, 418,329 gallons, at $1.32½. Rum, 124,616 gallons, at $1.32½. Whiskey, 166,544 gallons, at $1.32½. Unenumerated spirits, 523 gallons, at $1.32½, which duties we propose to increase to $1.75 per gallon. The increases of duty would, if the same quantities were entered for consumption, be in round figures $291,755.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is your calculation for this year?

Mr. BOWELL. We do not calculate on receiving this year more than $150,000, and perhaps $80,000 from brandy, for the reasons I have already indicated.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then you expect to obtain about $200,000.

Mr. BOWELL. From $175,000 to $200,000. It may possibly be more.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Nobody will have any objection to these articles yielding as large a revenue as can possibly be obtained from them. The question the Government must consider is to what extent those heavy duties will promote adulteration and smuggling. So far as regards the inland waters there is not, I presume, much danger; but as regards the Maritime Provinces we know there is a certain amount of smuggling going on.

Mr. VAIL. No. It is charged against us sometimes; but there is none.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I think the circumstances have altered within the last half dozen years, or perhaps the people have all become such strong advocates of the Scott Act that they have set their faces against such liquors. As regards brandy, from which most revenue is expected to be obtained, I fancy a good deal will be smuggled in down in the Maritime Provinces. How do these duties compare with the duties levied in the United States?

Mr. BOWELL. In the United States the duty is $2 per gallon on the whole. We considered that question when we fixed this rate of duty. The question of smuggling was one that entered into consideration, and I presume just so long as there is a difference of duty and articles can be brought in there will be smuggling. The principal smuggling that has taken place into the Maritime Provinces has been from St. Pierre.

On resolution 4, Spirits and tobacco.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On this item how much do you expect to get?

Mr. BOWELL. About $60,000, thus making a deduction for entries that may possibly have been made from warehouse.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has said nothing about one point to which I alluded, that these duties are undoubtedly somewhat absolutely larger, though not relatively larger, on imported spirits than on spirits manufactured here. There can be no doubt that the skill of the manufacturer has enabled him to convert native produce into tolerable or intolerable brandy, gin and other spirits. The hon. gentleman no doubt does not speak from practical experience, but perhaps some of his colleagues could advise him on that question.

Mr. BOWELL. I suppose you are speaking from practical experience.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is that risk going on in increasing the duties, that the more you increase them the more likely they will be to turn round and produce an imitation of the foreign article, and it strikes me the hon. gentleman had not got to a point where the temptation will be considerable.

Mr. BOWELL. That is true, but it is hoped by a rigid enforcement of the provisions of the Adulteration Act, we will be able to put a stop to that adulteration, as far as possible. I believe what the hon. gentleman says to be quite correct. There are a number of establishments in every city and town in the country where in their own cellars they manufacture from spirits, brandy, gin, and other medicinal cordials I will call them—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Pain killers.

Mr. BOWELL. No, I would not use that word, I think they generally have the opposite effect, particularly when adulterated. The intention of the Department is, as far as possible, to put the Adulteration Act rigidly in force, and more particularly is that necessary when the Department has come to the conclusion that whiskey shall not be allowed to go into consumption for some years after it is made, in order that some of the deleterious matter in it may evaporate. To be consistent with that policy, it will be necessary for the Government to enforce the Act providing against the adulteration of food and other articles. As to the reason we have put liquors as high as we have, we do not expect of course to increase the revenue very much on that point, relatively. But in the United States, where the production is so very large, as no doubt the hon. gentleman is well aware, the manufacturers are allowed to export from bond, without the payment of any Excise duty, and the combination existing among the distillers of the United States, give an additional bonus to the exporters of liquor in order to keep their own market, thus enabling American manufacturers to export to this country at rates so low that unless you put a high duty upon it, they can afford to send it in and pay the duty, thus preventing the consumption of the home made article which would of course decrease the revenue to that extent. That is one reason which induced the Government to raise the duty so high—to prevent if possible the importation of this liquor through the Customs at a rate which would drive the Canadian article out of the market, and thus decrease the Revenue from Excise.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The American duty is only $1, I think.

Mr. BOWELL. It is 90 cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, the hon. gentleman is right—it is 90 cents on the Winchester measure, and ours is Imperial; so it is about $1 for the purpose of comparison.

On paragraph 5, resolution 4.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know what revenue is expected to be derived from this, which will of course come into effect on a much larger quantity than of the preceding sections.

Mr. BOWELL. The revenue collected for 1884 was $3,608,246, that is at $1 per gallon. I am now speaking of the quantities entered for consumption. At $1.30 per gallon, it would give an additional revenue of $1,082,473, but we do not anticipate this year obtaining anything like that revenue for reasons that I need not repeat, as the hon. gentleman knows them and called the attention of the House to them a short time ago—that is, that very large entries of this particular article have been made all over the country. We may, however, I think, calculate on getting, during the coming year, at least half that amount of revenue and the year following. If the amounts entered for consumption are equal to those of 1884, they would yield an additional revenue of over $1,000,000. Perhaps if we succeeded in obtaining $500,000 this year, it will be as much as we ought to expect. There is very little duty collected on malt liquors—that which is manufactured of molasses upon which a difference of 2 to 3 cents per gallon is provided for.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course I have no objection to getting all the revenue we can extract from this particular article. But, as the hon. gentleman is well aware, the experience of United States authorities led them to doubt whether it was quite safe to have the duties upon whiskey more than about $1 per gallon. They had it as high as $2 per gallon—

Mr. BOWELL. That was a war tax.

Mr. SCRIVER. It was $3, I think.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was that paid in currency? They made a series of experiments, and tried to reach the highest revenue producing point, which they finally concluded to be something like a dollar. Now, the hon. gentleman, in putting this on, has no doubt made himself more or less acquainted with the possibilities of our increasing illicit distillation. At one time there was a good deal of danger that that would be on the increase, but whether it be due to the vigilance of the Inland Revenue Department or to the spread of temperance principles I am not prepared to say, but I believe of late years the Department has not been much troubled with illicit distillation. Still there is always an additional risk if you largely increase the duty on whiskey. Has the hon. gentleman anything to say on that particular subject as to the present condition of illicit distillation of whiskey throughout the country?

Mr. BOWELL. Perhaps the Minister of Inland Revenue would be able to give more information on that point than I can; but my impression is, as the hon. gentleman says, that we have not been so much troubled of late years as formerly. When the Excise duty was much lower than it is now, there was quite as much illicit distillation as there has been of late, the vigilance of the officers having been such as to almost prevent the possibility of its going on. Now and again a still has been discovered in somebody's cellar, but the quantities manufactured have been very small.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course there is the risk also—although it is not by any means so serious, I believe—of smuggling from the United States to be taken into account. Now, I would like to know what decision the Government have come to with respect to certain large sums of money which have been lately tendered them in payment of duty. I understand that within the last few days as large a payment as $340,000 was tendered by one firm, the firm of Gooderham & Co., in Toronto. It was stated that the Government had decided to refuse all payments of duty. I would like to have an authentic statement from the Minister of Customs on that point.

Mr. BOWELL. When I moved that the House should go into committee two or three days ago, I was about to rise to make the statement, but the hon. leader of the Opposition rose before I could get the floor, the late debate intervened, and so I was prevented from making the statement. But as soon as the House was moved into Committee of Ways and Means, I instructed the Commissioner to take the usual precautions and the telegraph offices were taken possession of to this extent, not to send anything over the wires affecting the Tariff; and as it was proposed that the resolutions should take effect on and after the 6th of the month, the tenders of entry to which the hon. gentleman has referred come under the provisions of the law, and the parties will have to pay the duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is another matter to which I regret to have to call the attention of the Government and the House. I saw in the newspapers also—though I have no personal knowledge of the subject—the statement that the bonded warehouses in the Province of Quebec were pretty nearly cleaned out before the change, whereas they were not elsewhere. If that should turn out to be correct, it would seem as if there had been leakages somewhere, by which some party had profited. Can the hon. Minister say what he knows with respect to that?

Mr. BOWELL. I have not heard of the rumor that the warehouses in the Province of Quebec have been emptied. What I have heard is that certain parties in that province telegraphed to a distiller in Prescott to draw upon them to pay the duty upon a certain number of cars of whiskey and to ship it. Of course if that were done it would come under the meaning of this provision, and the distiller would have to pay the full amount of the duty. Whether the warehouses to which the hon. gentleman has referred are empty or not, I am not able to say. We have no knowledge of it in the Customs Department, although I may frankly tell the hon. gentleman that I had made no enquiry into that yesterday or to-day, as after sitting in the House until four o'clock in the morning, I had not time.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I may state for the information of the hon. gentleman that I have received telegrams from all parts of the Dominion complaining that that privilege was refused.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the Minister of Customs or the Minister of Inland Revenue acquaint us at the next stage with the facts of the matter as shown by the returns. They could very easily give us the quantity of spirits in bond in the Province of Quebec, say on the 1st of July, and also on the morning of the 6th.

Mr. BOWELL. We will do so as far as possible. The hon. gentleman knows that the returns are only made quarterly to us, and we shall have to make special application to the different ports for the information. I can ascertain from the principal ports.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There is a matter in connection with this increased duty on spirits as to which I think the committee are fairly entitled to have some information. It seems to me the whole course of the Government with reference to this matter has been one of the most extraordinary it is possible to conceive of. During the month of May the Minister of Inland Revenue put a notice on the Order Paper, stating among other things that it was his intention to introduce resolutions, one of which was to ask the House to give the Governor in Council power to impose an additional duty of 5 cts. a gallon on spirits. What was the result of that notice? In the month of May no less than $1,140,970 were paid in Excise duty on spirits, while in the corresponding month of the previous year but $280,217 were paid. It would appear that, by the notice given by the Minister of Inland Revenue to the manufacturers of spirits in this country, 860,756 extra gallons of spirits were taken out of bond; and now the Government come down with a proposition to impose 30 cts. a gallon increased duty on whiskey. Now, what has the Government, through the instrumentality of the Minister of Inland Revenue, done? By giving that warning they have deprived this country of the revenue of 30 cts. a gallon on 860,000 gallons of spirits; in other words, the country has lost $250,000 of revenue; and for whose benefit? For those who consume the whiskey, or for the general public? No, but for the benefit of one or two distilling firms in this country. That has been the result of their operation, and it is certainly the most remarkable piece of legislation that I think has ever been brought before the Canadian Parliament. If there had been no notice given to those distillers, as following the precedents there should not have been, but if this matter had been dealt with as the Minister of Customs is now dealing with it, when after the horses are stolen, he takes credit for having taken possession of the wires and not allowing the distillers to get any benefit from the change, as they did before, the country would have been the gainer to the extent of $250,000.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman has charged the Government with having taken $250,000 out of the pockets of the people.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Prevented it going in.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is not consistent with the facts of the case. It is true that a proposition was made to provide for an additional 5 cents a gallon on whiskey. That was a distinct proposition to make up the loss we expected to sustain in allowing distillers the benefit of the shrinkage. It had nothing to do with the policy of increasing the Tariff. The hon. gentleman complained that in consequence of that notice, the distillers withdrew 800,000 gallons more than they would have drawn out under ordinary circumstances. Well, the most of what was taken out has gone into consumption, and on the small portion left we will lose the increased duty now imposed, 30 cents per gallon; but does the hon. gentleman pretend that any Government can control so closely the relations between the public and the Department, that the distillers may not draw out more liquor than is absolutely required for consumption.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. COSTIGAN. What does the hon. gentleman mean with his "hear, hear." Is there any signification in it or is it merely from habit. Does he approve or disapprove what I have said. What is to prevent the distillers, knowing that there was a probability of an increase in the Tariff, removing their goods in bond. They have simply shown their good judgment; no Government can prevent speculation of that kind. On the other hand, we find that except on the morning of the 6th May, no attempt was made to remove spirits. On that morning several applications were made to remove liquor from bonded warehouses but they were rejected and the duty will be collected on all these goods.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Minister of Inland Revenue has given no explanation of the fact that there was $860,756 more paid in Excise duty in May this year than in May of last, or of any of the previous years. The House went into committee in March, and it was then given to understand that all the Tariff changes that were to be made were then proposed. Who ever supposed Tariff resolutions would be introduced in March and not concurred in in July? It would be fairly inferred by everybody that, as soon as the resolutions were published, any article that escaped extra taxation would be held over until the next Session. The troubles broke out subsequent to the resolution, and it is strange that the fears of the distillers were not awakened until the time the Minister put this notice on the paper. Hostilities broke out in March, but their fears were not then aroused. How is it that at the time the Minister gave this notice, there was this sudden increase in the amount of goods taken out of bond and duty paid? The notice does not read that the increase of 5 cents was to cover shrinkage or evaporation; the notice was one that shrewd men would act upon, seeing that there was a probability of 5 cents a gallon being imposed. Whether the object was to bring in revenue for that month I do not know, but that these 860,000 gallons extra of spirits removed were for immediate consumption it evidently could not be, because that quantity is more than sufficient for three months consumption, and it would have remained in bond but for the action of the Government. The Government, if they had imposed their duty when they should, would have had 30 cents a gallon on these 860,000 gallons.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the least we can say about the matter is this: that there has been very great carelessness and laxity on the part of the Government with respect to imposing this duty. Every body knew well long before the month of May that the expenses in the North-West were going to reach several millions; and, but for the fortunate fact that the rebellion was suppressed a good deal earlier than might have been expected, the expenditure would have been very much heavier even than the amount named by the hon. the Minister of Customs. Under these circumstances, it was the height of imprudence for the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue or the Government, if they knew, as I conclude they must have known by that time, it would be necessary to provide additional ways and means, to give a notice which they must have known would have the effect of startling all the manufacturers through the country and inducing them to take all they possibly could out of bond. It is clear from what has since occurred that had the same ordinary vigilance been used at an earlier period as was used the other day, this $300,000 would have gone into the Treasury. All through April we were in possession of facts which showed that the expenditure would be enormous, and it was not asking too much of the Government to have made up their minds then as to what they would do. It appears to me their object may have been twofold. I do not at all mean to say that they desired to give any benefit to the manufacturers of whiskey, but they did desire, I fear, to add largely to the revenues for the current year, without paying much regard to the cost at which it was done or to the effect on the future year. That I believe they did, and, without duly calculating the probable effects of their proposition, they gave on the 7th May this notice, which has to all intents and purposes resulted in a loss of about $265,000. It is not evident, as the Minister of Inland Revenue says, that this need necessarily have gone into consumption. In the first place, 1,000,000 gallons is much more than a month's consumption. Our consumption every month is only about 200,000 or 300,000 gallons, and, without special disturbing cause, these distillers would never have paid in $860,000, to which my hon. friend referred. So that falls to the ground. The whiskey has not gone into consumption, and besides, prior to May, the Government were in possession of information which would have warranted them in anticipating the necessary increase of taxes, and putting it on at that time, and they know very well, that, no matter what business was engaging the attention of the House, room and place would have been given to them at a moment's notice for the purpose of imposing this duty at any time. It is clear that very serious loss has been incurred by the public and by the Treasury which need not have been incurred. A little exercise of common prudence, a little exercise of common diligence would have enabled the Government to save this $260,000.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It appears to me that the effect of the notice ought to have been quite different from what the hon. gentlemen opposite say. The notice given on the 7th May was quite clear, allowing an abatement on spirits and allowing the Governor in Council to add 5 cents on each gallon and to prohibit spirits being entered for duty for a certain specified time after manufacture. It is quite clear that the distillers were not frightened by the imposition of the 5 cents, and that they did not make a rush for the sake of saving that 5 cents. If we declare that we are going to put 25 cents on any article I think that would not be taken by the trade as a notice that we were going to put on 50 cents afterwards. It would rather be taken as an intimation that that was the amount of duty the Government intended to put on, and would have the effect of quieting the apprehensions of the manufacturers.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Why did it work the way it did?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. To say you are going to put 5 cents on is not likely to alarm them with the idea that you are going to put on 30 cents. But they began to calculate for themselves; they knew there had been a great deal of expenditure—war expenditure and other expenditure—and they were wise in their generation and saved so much by the transaction; but certainly this 5 cents could not have been a warning to them that they were to be charged 30 cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No doubt the distillers were wise in their generation and the Government were not. The point I made was that, as it was perfectly clear as long ago as the early part of April that there would be a tremendously heavy expenditure in the North-West, and as it was perfectly clear to me, and I have no doubt to hon. gentlemen opposite, that the revenue this year and next year would fall short of the calculation, they ought to have known that it was desirable then to take precautions, and it is clear that by taking these ordinary precautions they might have caught these 860,000 gallons, which were taken out so unusually and needlessly in the month of May. It is quite clear that the Government, if they had looked beyond, might have saved this $260,000, and that they did not do it because they were less wise in their generation than the victuallers. Everyone saw the facts. They were clear enough. I know that the effect of the notice given by the Minister of Inland Revenue was probably simply to intensify the fears of the distillers and call their attention a little more to the position they were in. I strongly suspect, from what I have heard, that several of them, at any rate, believed that this notice, when it came to be acted on would be reinforced by an additional duty, just as, in point of fact, has happened, and that is why they took it out; but it is clear that the same sources of information which were open to these distillers, and which induced them to take a million of gallons out of bond in May, were open to the First Minister and to his colleagues; and by exercising the same foresight and diligence as the distillers, we might have been better off by $260,000.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is something in the statement of the hon. gentleman, but not in the statement of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) who said that the notice that 5 cts. was to be imposed proved that 30 cts. would be imposed. The line taken by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) is quite different. His is a legitimate argument, but that was not the argument of the hon. gentleman behind him. Look at England. Just now, there has been a very large expenditure in the Soudan and in Egypt, and I do not think there was very great haste in Mr. Gladstone to put on the duties, and in fact the amount was expended a year before he thought of increasing the duty.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am sorry that my views are so little considered by the First Minister. He is complimentary to the hon. member for South Huron, and of course we know he is always complimentary to that hon. gentleman. There is this remarkable coincidence to be observed that, coincident with this notice being given in May, there is $1,000,000 more revenue derived from a class of men who are not in the habit of paying money to allow it to lie idle. If the 5 cents additional duty would not do it, then the prohibition of spirits being entered for a certain time after manufacture would tend in the same direction. The whole notice tended in that direction, and the Minister will not venture to say of his own knowledge that the distillers were not operated upon by that notice. To suppose that they had a hint given them that there was to be an increase would be to suppose something dishonorable in the working of the Department, and that cannot be tolerated. Neither can we suppose that this was caused by the war expenses, because the resolutions had been submitted in March and April and had passed without causing any alarm, nor was there any alarm until May, when this notice appeared. I say unhesitatingly, in my opinion, that it was that notice that led to the withdrawal of that amount of spirits from bond, and the withdrawal of that has led to a loss of revenue to this country of $258,000.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman for Brant gave what, in his opinion, was a sufficient reason for this change in the revenue which induced the distillers to take a large quantity of spirits out of bond and pay nearly $900,000 more than usual into the Treasury. The hon. gentleman for South Huron suggested another motive which may have operated. He is rather inclined to agree with the First Minister's view. The First Minister says that the distillers knew that there was a large increase in the public expenditure, that the Government must impose more duties and increase the taxation, and what more obvious than that an additional duty should be placed on distilled liquors, and in order to escape those duties they took this large quantity out of bond during the month of May. Well, the hon. gentleman says they were wise in their generation. Then how is it the Ministry were not equally wise?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have heard of that before.

Mr. MILLS. No doubt he has, and the hon. gentleman may have heard it before he came into the House at all. It has been suggested that the distillers heard of it, too, and from official sources: that they derived their information from the Department. Now, there are three considerations presenting themselves. There is the consideration suggested by the hon. gentleman from Brant; there is the First Minister's statement, that these men say that the Government would probably increase the duties on liquors; and there is the third suggestion, that these men must have had information. They were not likely to pay $870,000 into the Treasury in a month, beyond what they would have had to pay, unless they knew that the increased burden was going to fall upon them. The hon. gentleman admits that the 5 cents per gallon is not a motive that would have moved them to take that course. Then it is very doubtful whether the probabilities of an additional duty would have been a sufficient motive. There must have been something more certain, and that was private information that these duties were likely to be imposed. The hon. gentleman has given no sufficient reason for this course. If the Government intended to impose such duties, they were derelict in their duty in not making their proposition in May instead of July. How was it that the Government, knowing that it would be necessary to impose these duties, did not come down to Parliament in May and ask for power to impose them, and thus save the additional revenue that would have accrued? The hon. gentleman pleads that there was no dishonesty, no improper communication from the Department. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman himself has told us—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I never said a word, one way or the other. I say that the hon. gentleman has no right to make such an insinuation, unless he can prove it. I can only tell him that the insinuation is altogether, in my belief, false and untrue.

Mr. MILLS. Well, Sir, there is the payment of $870,000 which the hon. gentleman has not accounted for. There is some powerful motive operating upon the distillers. He says that the notice put by the Minister of Inland Revenue upon the Paper was not the motive which operated on these men. I ask him what it was, then?

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman, as remarked by the First Minister, had no right to insinuate that any person in the Department had given secret information to the distillers, unless he was prepared to prove it. He insinuated that either the Minister, or some other person in the Department, had given information which ought not to have been given. I repeat that no member of this House has a right to make an insinuation of that kind, unless he has something upon which to base it. I tell the hon. gentleman that no one in the Department knew anything about this, except the Ministers themselves and the two deputy heads. It was kept scrupulously from every clerk. The hon. gentleman either insinuates that the Ministers had perjured themselves in revealing their intention, or that some employé of the Government had done that which would merit instant dismissal. For myself, I care very little about his insinuations. A man's reputation, where he has lived all his life, should be sufficient to answer an insinuation of that kind. But I must congratulate the Opposition on the fact that two of their financial critics, the hon. member for Brant and the hon. member for Bothwell, entirely differ from the ex-Finance Minister. Well, that is a matter that they must settle among themselves. I think from the ex-Minister's experience and knowledge of the working of the tariff he is just as likely to judge correctly of the effects likely to be produced upon businessmen as the hon. member for Brant or the hon. member for Bothwell.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Why was not the same course pursued with regard to the 5 cents duty as with regard to the 30 per cent. ?

Mr. BOWELL. I will tell the hon. gentleman why. A few years ago, when the Finance Minister was about making his Budget Speech, and it was known all over the country that the Government were going to raise the duties on various articles, this same firm of Gooderham & Worts paid into the Treasury, on the very morning of the day the Budget Speech was delivered, about half a million dollars duty upon liquor they had in stock. Well, to their disgust, certainly to their disappointment, there was no rise upon whiskey at all. You might as well ask why they did that. They did it, I presume, for the same reason that induced them to make the last entry. For the reason given by the member for South Huron, no extra duty was imposed, and the result was that the individuals lost by it. As to the question asked by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), why the same course was not pursued, let me say that the impost of 5 cents per gallon upon whiskey was to compensate, as stated in the notice, for the evaporation which would take place in case the liquor remained in bond 12 months. When liquor is put in bond, evaporation takes place to the extent of 5 to 10 per cent., but the holders are obliged to pay duty on the quantity of liquor which was gauged when it was placed in bond. The proposition of the Inland Revenue Department is, that in order to preserve the equilibrium there should be an impost of 5 cents a gallon. So that if the liquor was in bond for one year, instead of paying a duty of $1, they would pay 94 cents, and this extra 5 cents was imposed to compensate to a certain extent for the loss of revenue which would arise by reason of the evaporation. The longer they kept the liquor in bond the greater would be the proportion, and consequently the less Excise duty they would have to pay.

Mr. MACKENZIE. They would escape payment of the 5 cents, all the same.

Mr. COSTIGAN. They pay the usual duty. If they kept the liquor over one year there was a reduction of 6 cents, but if they did not keep it over one year the 5 cents provision would apply.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The notice given did not state what the provisions would be with respect to the duty, and it was not until the matter had been discussed and there had been questioning and cross-questioning that the committee learned from the Minister in charge what the proposal was. If it was intended to cover shrinkage, it was unfortunate that the notice was not so worded as to make that apparent. There was nothing, however, in the notice, to show that this was for evaporation. I therefore maintain, in face of all the explanations that have been attempted, that 660,000 gallons of spirits were taken out of bond which should have paid 30 cents a gallon additional duty and given to the revenue of the country about $250,000. When the full facts in regard to the quantity taken out are known, it will be found that upwards of $200,000 have been lost to this country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The First Minister is not quite correct in saying that there is conflict between the arguments addressed by the hon. member for Brant and myself. They are cumulative arguments. They mean that the distilleries were influenced by certain considerations. Just at the moment when people were most influenced by those considerations, which were apparent to every business man and to every politician, came the notice of 7th May, by the Minister of Inland Revenue, and considering the condition of affairs, the manufacturers withdrew 800,000 or 900,000 gallons. My hon. friend is quite right, and I am quite right, and the Minister is quite wrong; and this is quite clear, that $275,000 which should now have been in the Treasury is in the pockets of two or three large firms, who, by their foresight and tact, obtained the benefit.

The Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

On resolution 4, spirits and tobacco,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I understood the Minister of Customs to say that he expected an increased revenue from this proposed 30 per cent. of $1,082,000 on a total of $3,608,000.

Mr. BOWELL. I said that would be the increase if the Excise entries for home consumption were as great as they were in 1884, but from the fact of large entries being made throughout the country, we did not expect more than half a million this year.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I understood that, but under ordinary circumstances that we might count on $1,082,000 of increased revenue.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, as compared with 1884, $1,082,484.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I see the Minister has put on the 30 cents a gallon only to make up that amount of increased revenue. It will be necessary for him, in Committee of Ways and Means, to introduce the resolution imposing the additional 5 cents, of which notice was given by the Minister of Inland Revenue, to make up for the shrinkage.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not proposed to introduce that resolution, as it is thought that the 30 cents additional per gallon will be quite sufficient to meet the loss occurring in that way. The hon. gentleman understands that we cannot affect the present year's revenue to any appreciable extent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then the Minister's calculation of increased revenue is all wrong, because the 5 cents was to make up for the loss, and if it is not imposed the Minister is simply putting on 25 cents increased duty. That is not carrying out what was promised by the Minister of Inland Revenue. Then again, if this is not done, I ask the Minister what amount of protection he proposes to give to the distillers of this country? He is raising the Customs duty higher in proportion than he is raising the Excise, and if the 5 cents is not to be put on, what amount of protection is he to give the three or four distillers of this country?

Of course, the Minister understands that the protection is the difference between the Customs and the Excise duty, less the amount of duty on the corn they import, and he is giving them a vast increase of protection, when what they had before was thought to be ample.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman is correct, basing his argument on the supposition that all the spirits which will be entered for consumption would first have remained in bond for twelve months, in order to enable them to take advantage of the shrinkage. But that cannot possibly arise until next year, and that going into consumption will be of the same quality as that which has gone into consumption in the past. If, however, hereafter, they enter any spirits for consumption, except that which has been in bond for twelve months, and they take advantage of the shrinkage, which, of course, they will, if it is in bond, it would reduce it to that extent. Still, the hon. gentleman will see that it will add just that much to the revenue, which will be a still greater protection to that extent to the article produced in the country. From the revenue standpoint, it will be collected from Excise rather than Customs; I do not know that it makes any particular difference. If the foreign spirit is kept out, and a larger quantity is manufactured here, the revenue will profit to that extent.

Mr. BLAKE. When the proposition was brought forward, awhile ago, for the drawback or discount, we were told that 5 cents increase of duty was to be made as a compensation. The Ministerial proposition was, of course, considered; I presume it was not bungled and that it was accurate and well weighed. If so, it was thought necessary then to impose 5 cents, in order to compensate for the expected loss of revenue, by virtue of the operation of the proposition of the Bill which has gone through the House; otherwise, the Ministerial proposition was ill-advised and mistaken. They told us the plan was a complete one, whereby certain allowances were to be made to the distillers to compensate them for the increase of duty. One was to balance the other. Now, what the hon. gentleman says is that very little of that 5 cents will be used during this year, and, no doubt, less this year than in future years, and it will not be necessary then. If we are to calculate for some time, very little will be used, and then we must assume that it was a premature proposition altogether to have suggested this 5 cents duty, to publish it in the papers, as it was for weeks, before the discussion in the House. Now it is dropped, apparently on the theory that it will not be wanted for a good while, and it will be time enough to put it on when the revenue requires it. Now, that was not the view taken the other day in discussing this question. At first the Minister of Inland Revenue was disposed to take that view, but my hon. friend from Brant explained that evaporation would be going on, and he acknowledged that something would have to be done to remedy that difficulty. Then I think we should learn from the Minister what the real gist of his proposition is with regard to the protection. As I understand, the distillers are at present a close corporation, agreed with one another, and they have fixed a scale of prices, which are just about up to duty point, that is, just as high as the duty will permit the distillers to place them, and avoid the importation of foreign spirits. They are therefore taking the whole or nearly the whole advantage of their protection, which is in the neighborhood of 30 cents on the gallon. If I understand the present proposition, it adds about 50 per cent. to their protection, the difference in the Customs and the Excise being about 15 cents a gallon: and the distillers, owing to their small numbers and their agreement, are a practical monopoly, and take the full advantage of the protection. The practical result of that is that the revenue does not gain to the amount of the Customs duty, but only to the amount of the Excise duty. Of course, we know that certain kinds of spirits will be imported from time to time, and in that respect the revenue will make some gain; but the vast mass of the revenue will be regulated by the Excise, and not by the Customs duty. The result of making such a large increase in the Customs over the Excise duty will be to increase the price to the consumer without increasing the compensation to the revenue to the same extent; and the price being increased to the consumer to that extent, there will be those temptations to smuggling and illicit distillation which have been mentioned more than once in connection with the raising of the duty on spirits. I do not know of any article of consumption which is better calculated to bear a share of the public burdens than this very article, and I have always favored placing the duties as high as practical revenue purposes would permit; but it seems to me that the hon. gentleman's combined proposition of increasing so much the Customs duty relative to the Excise duty will incur a considerable danger from smuggling and illicit distillation beyond that which would be incurred if he kept the Customs duty down to something more nearly approaching the Excise. I should be glad to learn from the hon. gentleman whether I am substantially correct in my view as to the increased protection his proposition produces.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not think there is any difficulty in arriving at the amount of protection given by looking at the figures. We increase the Excise duty 30 cents, and the Customs duty from  $32\frac{1}{2}$  to 75 cents; so that the increase in the protection would be just the difference between the two, which would be about 50 cents. But, as I explained this afternoon, there is no protection to that extent.

Mr. BLAKE. On account of the corn.

Mr. BOWELL. Not so much on account of the 5 per cent duty on corn, although that does reduce it, but on account of the system that prevails in the United States, of granting a bonus on exportations; so that the duty does not afford the amount of protection which it apparently does on its face. Under the  $32\frac{1}{2}$  cents, there was really no protection at all, considering the price in the United States. However, I do not suppose the hon. gentleman's argument is in favor of having cheap whiskey in this country, or of enabling the importers to bring in the foreign article, in order that that might be consumed at a cheaper rate than that manufactured in this country. As I understand, he complains that we fix the duty on the foreign article too high, thus giving a greater market to the home producer, while we collect less duty than would be collected from Customs duty if it was a little lower—in other words, that we should collect more from Customs duties at a lower rate, and less from Excise. The intention of the Government in these resolutions is to put the Excise duty just as high as they thought the article could bear, so as to prevent illicit distillation, which has gone on in the past and may go on in the future, and to place just as high a duty on the imported article as they thought it could possibly bear, without encouraging smuggling to any greater extent than it is carried on at present.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). As I understand, the Minister has abandoned the 5 cents a gallon to cover evaporation; nevertheless, he allows 5 cents a gallon on the evaporation, which virtually makes the increase in the Excise duty 25 cents a gallon. The home manufactured article will then be $1.25 a gallon and the foreign imported liquor will be $1.75. The Minister will see at once that there is a protection of 50 cents a gallon given to the distiller.

Mr. BOWELL. Less the duty on corn.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Under the old tariff he had  $32\frac{1}{2}$  cents a gallon of protection, and that worked very well. As the hon. member for West Durham pointed out, under that protection it has been charged that a ring has been formed and high prices have been obtained. But the Minister is now giving them an advantage of 18 cents a gallon above what they had before. From that is simply to be taken the amount of the duty on corn. I am told by a gentleman, who seems to know, that the product of a bushel of corn is something like four gallons of whiskey. If that is so, the duty on the corn would amount to only about 2 cents a gallon. So that it seems to me it would be safe to leave the duty on the imported article where it is now, and to increase the Excise duties above the point at which the Government are fixing them. The 5 cents a gallon which the Minister proposes to allow for evaporation might be quite safely put on, and the distiller left with more protection than he had before; for even with that 5 cents on, which would raise the duty 35 cents, the distiller would have a protection of  $33\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. It is no part of the Government's business, nor are they, I suppose, attempting unduly to enrich anybody in trade through the operation of their tariff. As I understand, what they do is to give those in trade a chance to carry on their operations, but not to give them a vastly enriching monopoly.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The amount of protection given to the distillers is not as great as the hon. gentleman represents it to be. Perhaps he overlooks the fact that the present Bill, or the Bill that passed shortly before this one, provides for the sale in this country of whiskey that shall be aged before it can be taken out of bond—shall be kept in the wood for not less than one year. Of course the 5 cents of which he speaks, that was proposed to be asked for to compensate for the percentage allowed for shrinkage, but which is not now asked for, should not be added to the protection given to Canadian distillers; because, to-day, in the United States and in England, that percentage is allowed the distillers there. The difference in favor of Canadian distillers before this change, was as between \$1.02 and 1.03 cents, and \$1.32 $\frac{1}{2}$  cents Customs; now it is changed to \$1.30, \$1.32 and \$1.33 Excise and \$1.75 Customs. The advantage to the Canadian distiller, under the old system, was, generally speaking,  $32\frac{1}{2}$  cents; the same calculation would be to-day  $42\frac{1}{2}$  cents. The hon. gentleman ought not to count the 5 cents at all, because that the American distiller gets to-day. Before recess, the hon. gentleman stated he did not charge exactly that the intention of the Government, in giving that notice, was to warn distillers that an increased tax was going to be put on spirits for revenue purposes, and that they took advantage of the notice to take out large quantities of whiskey. I explained then that it was not a question of increasing the revenue, but simply a calculation of what was necessary to offset the percentage allowed for shrinkage. The leader of the Opposition told us it was clearly understood, when the Bill was brought in, that the 5 cents power to levy which was asked was to make up that deficiency caused by shrinkage. Then the hon. gentleman stated that, when the Bill was passing through, I said this 5 cents extra, when we went into Committee of Ways and Means, would be asked for. Well, I did not say it would be asked for in any particular way. The hon. gentleman questioned me closely upon it. I said the duty would be less this 5 cents, but that when the question came up we would deal with it in such a way that there would be no loss on that account. Suppose we decided to increase the duty 18 cents or 20 cents, what was there to prevent us adding this 5 cents to that, so as to make up the difference.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). When I alluded to the notice of the hon. gentleman, I said the Minister had informed us, when in committee on the resolutions, that his intention was to cover the loss by evaporation by this 5 cents. But we did not understand that until then, and to-day the Minister is not doing that. He has departed from that now, and we have the plain declaration that the policy of the Government is to get 30 cents a gallon more by way of Excise. The Minister knows it will take 5 cents to make up the shrinkage, so that the Government policy is not being carried out. The hon. gentleman's argument is somewhat plausible, with reference to the amount of protection to the distillers. He said that on the other side this shrinkage was allowed, and therefore the American distillers had the benefits of it, while our distillers had not. But I suppose that system has prevailed over there for many years, so that the circumstances are not altered in the least by that. The distiller, when he had  $32\frac{1}{2}$  cents protection, was at an equal disadvantage, by not being allowed that shrinkage reduction, as he is to-day, and the circumstances being the same, there is still the 18 cents per gallon additional protection.

Mr. BOWELL. The protection is not so great as it appears upon the face of it. The present Excise duty is \$1; add 30 cents to that makes 30 per cent. additional. Take the \$1.32 Customs duty now levied on whiskey and calculate 30 per cent. on that, will give within a fraction of 40 cents additional; that will make a total of \$1.72 $\frac{1}{2}$ , so that the difference of protection is the difference between \$1.72 $\frac{1}{2}$  and \$1.75. When the Minister of Inland Revenue placed his resolution upon the Notice Paper, stating the intention of the Government to add 5 cents per gallon to make up the loss by shrinkage, the question of raising the Excise duty upon the manufacturer of spirits in this country was not then decided upon.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I wanted, on the last resolution, to draw the attention of the Minister to the increase on manufactured tobacco from 12 cents to 20 cents. No one on this side, that I am aware of, has any objection to the increased duty on tobacco or spirits. I think they are fair objects on which to levy revenue, and the Minister is perfectly justified in getting what he can out of them, consistently with preventing illicit distillation and smuggling, and other evils. But in 1883 Sir Leonard Tilley, the Finance Minister, delayed his Budget for a long time, and, when he introduced it, gave as his reason for the delay that changes were being made in the United State tariff of Customs that would have a material bearing upon legislation in this country, and he had to wait until those changes were announced, in order to frame legislation to meet them. The proposition was before Congress on the 3rd March, but did not reach him till the 16th. They proposed to reduce the Excise duty on manufactured tobacco from 16 to 8 cents, and he said in that case we should do the same. He made this statement:

"I may state here, that owing to the fact that the United States have reduced the Excise duty on tobacco and snuff from 16 cents to 8 cents per pound, the Government found it an absolute necessity, for many reasons—although there are other articles on which they would rather relieve the people from taxation—to reduce our duty on tobacco made from foreign leaf from 20 cents to 12 cents."

He found it an absolute necessity for many reasons. He gave us the reasons in the opening part of that speech, when he used these words:

"One proposition alone was, that tobacco should be reduced from 16 cents to 8 cents a pound; another proposition was that it should be removed entirely. If either of these propositions carried, it would become necessary for the Parliament of Canada, for the purpose of preventing illicit trade, protecting the honest trader and protecting our own manufacturing industries, that our duties should be reduced in proportion to the reduction made in the United States. Therefore, if the proposition to reduce the duty 8 cents per pound on tobacco were adopted, it would necessitate a reduction in Canada which would involve $750,000."

I would ask the Minister is not the Excise duty in the United States now what it was in March, 1883, and here we are proposing to put on this 8 cents, when the Finance Minister told us it was absolutely necessary to take them off, to prevent illicit trading, protect the honest trader and protect our own manufacturing industries. That is the difficulty I see in this proposition. The reasons urged by the Finance Minister were so strong at that time that Parliament listened to him, because he presented the matter as an absolute necessity. I believe the Excise duty on tobacco is precisely the same in the United States as it was in 1883, and now we are proposing to put our duty on again. How does the Minister propose now to prevent this illicit trade; and the other evils which the hon. gentleman said would surely and inevitably follow if we did not reduce to the same level as the United States did in 1883.

Mr. COSTIGAN. One of the principal objects of this change is to increase our revenue. At that time it was not a matter of such great importance as it is now. I recollect the statement of the Finance Minister at the time, and I remember the views he entertained. I have not forgotten it, nor had I ignored the importance of the point the hon. gentleman has just made, but I feel confident that the proposed duty can be collected. It is true that no change has been made in the United States, but I feel more satisfied than I did at that time in the capacity of the staff to collect the duties. Improvements are made from time to time, and especially is that the case with regard to tobacco. It has been brought under better control and under a better system of collection than at any previous time. Like everything else, experience leads to improvement. I think the hon. gentleman will admit that the present system of collection is more successful than that of some years ago, because the Finance Minister calculated for a loss of some $500,000 derived from tobacco, and no doubt we should have lost that quantity, according to the reduction made; but on account of a more perfect system of collection, under new regulations, we succeeded in reducing that loss to about one-half. I think that is a very good proof of the improvement in the system of collection. I am quite satisfied that the same thing will occur under the increased tariff now proposed. I do not think that we need fear the amount of smuggling that was feared some years ago. I am quite confident that this amount of revenue can be collected.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the total amount of increased revenue that is anticipated from all the changes proposed?

Mr. BOWELL. The total increase on tobacco, based upon the entries of 1884, would be $773,376. We do not expect as much revenue in the Excise. I deduct from that $60,000. The probabilities are, that we will not receive over $516,000. That does not include cigars.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman has some millions extra revenue, then.

Mr. BOWELL. I hope so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman's estimates be correct, although he will not receive next year that amount, he proposes to impose about two millions additional taxation.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; that is the calculation, based upon the importations of 1884.

The following resolutions were agreed to:—

1. Resolved,—That it is expedient to repeal so much of schedule A of the Act 42 Victoria, chapter 15, as imposes a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem on "endless felt for paper makers," and the following parts of 46 Victoria, chapter 13, intituled: "An Act further to amend the Tariff of Duties of Customs," viz.: Item 7 of section 2 and all of section 5 of the said Act, also to repeal section 9 of the Act 42 Victoria, chapter 15, intituled: "An Act to alter the Duties of Customs and Excise," and to enact as follows:

1. In determining the dutiable value of goods, except when imported from Great Britain and Ireland, there shall be added to the cost, or the actual wholesale price, or fair market value, at the time of exportation, in the principal markets of the country from whence the same has been imported into Canada, the cost of inland transportation, shipment and transhipment, with all the expenses included, from the place of growth, production or manufacture, whether by land or water, to the vessel in which shipment is made, either in transitu or direct to Canada, subject to such regulations as may be made by the Governor in Council, provided that in case of any dispute respecting the proper amount of such inland transportation charges, the Minister of Customs may determine the same, and his decision shall be final in that respect.

2. When any manufactured article is imported into Canada in separate parts, each such part shall be charged with the same rate of duty as the finished article on a proportionate valuation, and when the duty chargeable thereon is specific or specific and ad valorem, an average rate of ad valorem duty, equal to the specific or specific and ad valorem duty so chargeable, shall be ascertained and charged upon such parts of manufactures.

2. Resolved,—That it is expedient to add partridge, prairie fowl and woodcock to the articles the exportation of which is prohibited by section 9 of the Act 46 Victoria, chapter 13.

3. Resolved,—That it is expedient to amend items 18 and 20, section 2, of the Act 47 Victoria, chapter 39, relating to duties of Customs on sugar, as follows:—

1. By adding to the words "sugar" and "sugars," wherever they occur in said items 18 and 20, the words "raw" or "unrefined."

Also by adding thereto the following item, viz.: On refined sugar of all grades or standards, there shall be levied and collected a specific duty of one cent per pound, and thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

3. Also to repeal the rates of duty now payable under schedule A, of the Act 42 Victoria, chapter 15, intituled: "An Act to alter the duties of Customs and Excise," on Geneva gin, rum, whiskey, and unenumerated articles of like kinds, and on brandy, and to provide there shall be levied and collected on:

Geneva gin, rum, whiskey and unenumerated articles of like kinds, a specific duty of one dollar and seventy-five cents per Imperial gallon. On brandy, a specific duty of two dollars per Imperial gallon.

4. Also to repeal the specific duty of twenty cents per pound imposed on manufactured tobacco and snuff by item 61 of section 2 of the Act 46 Victoria, chapter 13, and to provide that the same be increased to thirty cents per pound.

These resolutions shall take effect on and after the 6th day of the present month of July.

4. Resolved,—That it is expedient to repeal so much of sections 125 and 248 of the Act 46 Victoria, chapter 15, and of any Act or Acts amending the same, so far as the said sections or amendments thereto determine the Excise duties to be levied upon the respective articles hereinafter mentioned; and to provide that the Excise duties thereon shall hereafter be as follows:—

1. Upon spirits, as described in sub-section (a) of the above first cited section, one dollar and thirty cents.

2. Upon spirits, as described in sub-section (b) of the said section, one dollar and thirty-two cents.

3. Upon spirits, as described in section (c) of the said section, one dollar and thirty-three cents.

4. Upon all tobacco, as described in the first four paragraphs of the said section 248:

On every pound twenty cents.

Except that cigarettes or cut tobacco, when put up in packages weighing one-twentieth of a pound, or less, each shall pay a duty, now twenty, of thirty-five cents per pound, and damp or moist snuff, when containing over forty per cent. of moisture, when put up in packages of less than five pounds each, fourteen cents per pound, actual weight.

5. Upon tobacco, as described in the last paragraph of the said section 248, on every pound, five cents.

These resolutions shall take effect on and after the sixth day of the present month of July.

Resolutions to be reported.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY—THE WASHINGTON TREATY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

LANSDOWNE.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons copies of despatches, correspondence and papers, having reference to the negotiations at Washington, with respect to the termination of the Fishery Clauses of the Treaty of Washington, during the year 1884, and to the present date, in 1885.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 9th July, 1885.

SUPPLY.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.
(In the Committee.)

Customs..... $800,395

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are the reasons for the increases?

Mr. BOWELL. The increase of $6,225 in Ontario is largely caused by the additional officers who had been found necessary at Suspension Bridge and Windsor. On the completion of the cantilever bridge the Canada Southern Railway required a full staff of officers at the port, the same as we have at Suspension Bridge. We had accordingly to increase the staff by six or seven officers. When the Canada Southern made its crossing opposite Windsor, instead of at Amherstburg, we had to put additional officers there. Their salaries, with small increases at different ports, explain the increase of $6,225. That amount is, however, larger than the actual charge upon the revenue, because at the cantilever bridge at Clifton, I have adopted a new plan of payments, than were formerly made by the railway companies to different officers for extra services, and placed the amount to the credit of the Receiver General, and had therefore to add one or two additional officers at such points, and pay them out of the general fund. My reason for doing this is that I found that officers receiving extra pay were liable to become more the servants of the railway company, or steamboat company, than of the Department. The adoption of this plan involves the placing of a larger number of men at the points I have mentioned; but that is more than compensated for by the amount paid by the railway companies for what are termed extra services. The railways pay $1,500 a year at the cantilever bridge, which amount now goes into the general fund. There is a decrease of $325 in Quebec. In New Brunswick there is a decrease of $2,205. In some of the outer ports I have found there are more men than are really needed, and as they are superannuated or die, I do not fill up the positions, except where officers are absolutely required.

Mr. WELDON. Where is the reduction in St. John?

Mr. BOWELL. There is a saving at St. John. The hon. gentleman will see that there has been a saving of $450 at St. John. Macadam Junction, which was formerly a port, is now made an outport of St. John and the expenses transferred to St. John. The object in doing that was to bring that junction of the railway under the surveillance of the officers at St. John, they reporting to St. John instead of the office here. The gross reductions in the St. John office have been $5,000; the increases amount to $1,550, showing a net decrease of $450, though much larger if the expenses of the Macadam Junction port of $1,400 be deducted, as it should be for comparison.

Mr. WELDON. I notice that Grand Falls has been reduced $2,185, and Woodstock increased $2,335.

Mr. BOWELL. That is for the same reason, precisely, as in the case of Macadam Junction, so that the preventive officers along that line of railway report to Woodstock now instead of Grand Falls.

Mr. IRVINE. Are there any other changes in that district—shifting officers from one place to another?

Mr. BOWELL. Not that I am aware of. I have no recollection of changing the officer from one place to another.

Mr. IRVINE. Does Mr. Beadle occupy the same place as he did last year?

Mr. BOWELL. He was moved up to the junction, nearer to the American boundary.

Mr. IRVINE. That is five miles nearer to the American boundary. Then the hon. gentleman says he shifted Mr. Kilburn, the preventive officer. What object was there in doing that?

Mr. BOWELL. The object was to prevent the hon. gentleman's friends carrying on their avocation, as far as possible. In all these changes I acted on the recommendation of the special inspector, who made an inspection of all the ports along the line of the railway.

Mr. IRVINE. I do not say the hon. Minister has acted improperly; no doubt the inspector gave him good counsel. Nor do I find any fault with him for increasing Mr. Kilburn's salary, because he is a good officer, and he is on the road that leads to Woodstock, where most of the business is done. Nor do I find any fault with him for removing Mr. Beadle from Andover village, which is five miles from the American boundary, and placing him nearer the boundary. But living, as I do, within four miles of the American boundary, and knowing the geography and topography of the country, I ought to be able to give some valuable information. I know every road that crosses the international boundary; the whole frontier is settled, from the lower end of my county to the upper end; the roads lead in every direction, and smugglers are just as liable to go by one road as by another. Now, Mr. Schooley is sub-collector at Centreville, four miles from the American boundary, at $300 a year, and on that road, where there are only a few houses, the Minister of Customs has appointed Mr. Kearney at $200. I have pointed out before that this is wrong, and I point it out again, that these officers should not be on that road, as there is no necessity for them. It is a sheer waste of money. If the hon. gentleman looks at the returns he will find that last year only $335, I think, was collected at that port of entry. It was not for preventing smuggling that Mr. Kearney was appointed.

Mr. BOWELL. If I remember, Mr. Kearney is situated at Florenceville. After the death of the officer at that point, Mr. Kearney was appointed in his place. I did not personally investigate the matter; I took it for granted that the inspectors knew where the officers should be placed, and when that vacancy occurred it was filled. It is not always best to place the officers exactly on the boundary line to detect smugglers.

Mr. IRVINE. Mr. Appleby's father was appointed there before New Brunswick entered the Union, and he was the only man appointed on that side of the river, outside of the town of Woodstock. And Mr. Schooley was appointed in his place, and instead of appointing an officer at Centreville it was thought by the Government that Florenceville was a better place. I think it is simply a wilful waste of money. Mr. Kearney was not appointed to prevent people from smuggling, as any person who understands the country knows.

Mr. BOWELL. I am very glad the only charge the hon. gentleman has against my Department of wilful, wasteful expenditure, resolves itself into the enormous sum of $200, and that is for a preventive officer along one of the New Brunswick roads, not many miles from the Maine frontier. If I have never any greater sin to answer for, I will go out of office with a very clean record.

Mr. VAIL. The strongest charge is that a merchant doing business in the country fills the position of preventive officer and collector of Customs.

Mr. MITCHELL. One of the great difficulties I have had to experience is that the Minister of Customs has always been a little too stringent in relation to the officers in New Brunswick. He does not give salaries high enough, and in several instances, when I have applied for increases, I could not get them.

Mr. WELDON. A man who is an importer should not be a preventive officer.

Mr. BOWELL. The information is, that Mr. Kearney is not an importer. It is utterly impossible to prevent officers who are appointed at $100 and $200 a year doing nothing else for a living. I fully recognise the fact that a large importer should not be a preventive officer, and in cases where I found officers were importing, no matter how small were their importations, I have intimated to them that they should resign. I have made enquiries into this case over and over again, and have found that Mr. Kearney is not a large importer, as represented but that, on the contrary, his purchases are principally made from the wholesale merchants in St. John.

Mr. IRVINE. I never said, in the House or out of it, that Mr. Kearney was a large importer. I stated that he is a resident merchant in the village of Florenceville, and he is a very respectable man. But what I wish to point out is that two officers are there, the one at $300 and the other at $200, to collect $500. I think Mr. Kearney was not appointed for the purpose of preventing smuggling.

Mr. BOWELL. For what then?

Mr. IRVINE. I will not give my reasons just now.

Mr. BOWELL. He was appointed for no other purpose, so far as the Department in Ottawa is concerned. If there were other reasons on the part of those who recommended him, I know nothing of them.

Mr. IRVINE. I have made application to know who recommended Mr. Kearney, and could not get the information. The Minister of Customs refused to give it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. Schooley is a strong and warm supporter of the hon. gentleman, and Mr. Kearney is a strong opponent, and in this lies the secret of the hon. gentleman's continued attacks. He admits Mr. Kearney is a respectable man, but in order to make a case he speaks of his being placed in a little, insignificant place. The hon. gentleman is not doing credit to one of the brightest and most enterprising towns in New Brunswick, and a very important port. I think the hon. gentleman ought, by this time, to give up these uncalled-for attacks, which he makes every Session, on a gentleman whom he admits to be highly respectable.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue says the hon. member for Carleton is opposed to this gentleman because he happens to be of a different shade of opinion from himself. Mr. Kearney is an entirely new appointment. I think it is incompatible with the position of preventive officer to have a man who has been a large importer, and who, while he may be a good preventive officer against other persons, may not be against himself.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. member for St. John—I will not say, begs the question—but puts into the mouth of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Irvine) words which he did not use. I was under the impression that he charged Mr. Kearney with being a large importer from the United States, but the hon. gentleman says he did not know anything of the kind. If he purchases all his goods from any part of Canada the position of preventive officer is not incompatible with his occupation. It happens that Mr. Kearney is not of the political stripe of my hon. friends on the other side, and he gets the enormous sum of $200 a year, and we waste an hour in discussing the question of whether he should be there or not. I told the hon. gentleman he was put there on the report of the inspectors. The only report I have is that the Centreville office is not required, and Mr. Schooley has been either recommended to be placed on the retired list or to be removed to another place where he would be useful. If that is so, I may act on the suggestion of the hon. member for Carleton, and either place Mr. Schooley upon the retired list or move him somewhere else. Of course, it is not to be supposed that I can visit every $100 port in the Dominion; but Mr. Wolfe, the special inspector, reports that the Centreville office is not necessary in the interests of the revenue, but that the Florenceville office is. As the hon. gentleman is so anxious that we should economise, I can save the $300 a year now paid to Mr. Schooley by acting upon his suggestion and removing him.

Mr. IRVINE. I am not sure but that Mr. Kearney and Mr. Schooley are both my personal friends. There are any number of gentlemen in my county who say that Mr. Kearney voted for me at the last election, and I am not prepared to say he did not. The preventive officers in the county of Carleton are very discreet. I do not know one who has interfered with politics, and I was always as personally friendly with Mr. Kearney as I am with the Minister of Customs. I have never said a disrespectful word of Mr. Kearney, but I distinctly state that there should not be two officers on that road.

Mr. SCRIVER. I hope the Minister of Customs was not serious in expressing the opinion that there is nothing incompatible in a man who is engaged in business on our side of the frontier holding the position even of preventive officer in Customs. While it might be true that this Mr. Kearney bought most of his goods in a Canadian city—and on any portion of the frontier, as matters are now, country storekeepers are likely to buy their supplies in cities in the Dominion—still, at certain times, at any rate, these men are in the habit of importing more or less from the other side of the frontier; and I say, from my own experience, that it would be an unfortunate thing if the rule hitherto followed, of not appointing men engaged in business as preventive officers, were departed from.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman would have been a little more fair if he had added what I really said. I said that, where a man was not an importer, and did not import, there was nothing incompatible; but the rule has been, in most cases, in fact, it is a rule of the Department, that if a man is known to be an importer, no matter to how small an extent, not to appoint him, because the temptation is too great.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would point out that any man who is carrying on a mercantile business may at any moment become an importer. I have understood the rule hitherto to be that, although a man receiving less than $400 a year was not prohibited from following any other occupation, he was prohibited from following mercantile occupations, and that if he was a merchant, whether importing at the moment or not, he could not hold a position in the Customs. That, during my lamented friend Mr. Burpee's tenure of office, was the rule which he informed me he adhered to, and I agree with my hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) that it would be very unfortunate indeed, if, even under the circumstances stated by the Minister, that rule was departed from. The trouble is, that if you depart from it in one case you expose yourself to pressure in fifty different cases.

Mr. BOWELL. I recognise the force of that. I would ask the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Irvine) what business Mr. Schooley follows?

Mr. IRVINE. Mr. Schooley was a merchant when he was appointed, and he was notified by the Minister that he must either give up his business or his office, and he gave up the former. He is a justice of the peace, and attends to his business.

Mr. BOWELL. His salary is only $300 a year.

Mr. WELDON. With regard to the Campo Bello district, I understood a collector was to be appointed at Grand Manan.

Mr. BOWELL. A preventive officer has been appointed there, a Mr. Kelly, during the busy season, at a salary of $300.

Mr. WELDON. I think he is member of the Legislative Council in our Province.

Mr. BOWELL. He ought to be a very respectable and responsible man, then.

Mr. WELDON. I wanted to know if it was on account of the vote he gave last winter.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know how he voted last winter. I hope he voted right.

Mr. WELDON. He is one of those legislative councillors who has been living in Toronto for the last two years, and who has suddenly turned up as a preventive officer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In the event of a session of the Local Legislature, I would like to know how he can attend to both duties.

Mr. BOWELL. There is a difference between a preventive officer appointed at $25 a month during the time he is required, and a collector of Customs. He is simply a preventive officer, appointed to look after the smugglers. If he leaves there to attend to his political duties at Fredericton, he will not be paid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid that the Legislative Council of New Brunswick have fallen tolerably low if their services can be secured for $25 a month.

Mr. BOWELL. It only shows the respectability of the service.

Mr. WELDON. There is another matter. The merchants of St. John complain a good deal about the discount which is allowed by the Minister of Customs on the invoices. In February last the Board of Trade presented a petition and passed the following resolution:—

"Whereas we fully recognise that Customs regulations are made with the intent of preventing fraud and protecting the honest importer; but
"Whereas some of the regulations are so interpreted and administered as to practically treat all importers as if their first object is to defraud the revenue; therefore:

"Resolved, That a committee of seven from this board be appointed to consider the subject, and to make such representation to the Government as, in their opinion, may tend to a more liberal construction of said regulations."

Now, Mr. Chairman, there has been great dissatisfaction in St. John regarding the mode in which the importers are treated, some of them men of respectability and high standing. One of them, I know, has been a good deal harassed in regard to this matter of discount. Here is what they say about goods which are sold by discounts from manufacturer's prices—

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I think the hon. gentleman is out of order. We are on the question of salaries.

Mr. WELDON. I think I have a right to discuss the mode in which the Customs are collected. Strictly speaking, perhaps, I may not be correct, but I would like to get the Minister's explanation now.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I do not think it would be regular to have a discussion at this time.

Mr. BOWELL. I am quite willing to discuss the question with the hon. gentleman now. Of course, it opens the whole question of the Customs law, which is an intricate one. I received that resolution and fully considered it, and will be glad to discuss it, either privately or in the House, with the hon. gentleman. It is difficult to carry out the law so as to please all importers and exporters.

Mr. WELDON. The other day some merchants in St. John actually sold their goods at a heavy loss because it turned out that they had given duties they were obliged to pay upon discount. It is a matter of very serious importance in the present condition of trade and the keen competition that exists all around. This question of duties upon discount is a very important one for the merchants of St. John. Of course, if I am out of order in bringing this matter up now, I shall take another occasion of doing so.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I see that the port of Brantford is debited with an increase of salary of $800, of which I do not complain. But I do not think that the Minister of Customs, though he has a good many faults, has the fault of increasing salaries very rapidly in Ontario. I think this sum of $800 should not be debited to that port.

Mr. BOWELL. Quite right. I was going to explain to the hon. gentleman that it remained debited to that port, because Mr. McMichael still remains on the staff at that port until he has been officially located. I am using him now, and have been for some time past, to attend to the duties of different ports where vacancies occur. I have found him so valuable an officer that I am sending him now to the more important ports when the collectors are away on leave. Mr. McMichael is charged with the duty of putting the ports in a greater state of efficiency. He is still charged to the port of Brantford; in another year, probably, he will be charged to some other fund. At the port of Clifton, where he has been for some time, there will be a saving of the amount which was formerly paid to the collector, as he was acting in his place, less the additional amount which we should have to pay Mr. McMichael while there. I have given an increase of salary to Mr. Foster, who was appointed to the Customs some time ago, and who was recommended to me as a good officer, and ought to have an increase. He was receiving only $500, and I made it $600.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think he is entitled to an increase. He was appointed under the Mackenzie Administration some years ago, and was promised an increase of salary before the retirement of the late Minister. That is about the cheapest port in the Dominion, in proportion to the business done.

Mr. BOWELL. One of them.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is about the sixth port for collections, and the charges are about $2,600.

Mr. BOWELL. There was collected $142,841.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I wanted that pointed out. What the hon. gentleman has said with respect to Mr. McMichael is true; there is not a more capable officer in the service.

Mr. VAIL. There is an increase of $1,615 for Annapolis.

Mr. BOWELL. An addition of $100 has been made to the collector's salary. He formerly received $800; he now receives $900; it is proposed to raise his salary to $1,000, which will probably be the maximum for that port. We propose to place the preventive officer, who now receives $100, on the permanent staff, at a salary of $500, in order to look after the American boats running between that port and Boston.

Mr. VAIL. There is an increase of $200 in Antigonish.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not an increase, because there was a preventive officer employed there the year before last, who received $200. He died, and the office was not filled last year. This year, I have added two others, McIsaacs, at $100, and Macdonald, at $100, which makes the $200, as formerly.

Mr. VAIL. There is $105 for Arichat.

Mr. BOWELL. There is a preventive officer at $100, and $5 added to the contingent account of the port.

Mr. VAIL. There is a large increase, $740, at Truro.

Mr. BOWELL. There will be a still larger increase.

Mr. VAIL. I am sorry to hear it; there is no necessity for it.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentlemen evidently does not know what business is done at the port, or he would not say there is no necessity for it. The officer who was there filled a number of different offices, and received only $500 a year from the Customs. He collected $61,000 or $62,000, and that was the cheapest port in the whole Dominion, in proportion to the collections. But we found, when a thorough inspection of the port was made, that there had been gross irregularities—I do not say they were wilful irregularities on the part of the officer, but they arose because he did not give his whole time and attention to the business. I intimated to him that he must give his whole time to the business and I would increase his salary, or he would have to retire. Being over age, he asked to be allowed to retire, and he was superannuated on the basis of his salary of $500. I had to appoint officer Nelson, and give him a salary sufficient to enable him to give his whole time to the business. I have also increased the salary of the clerk, from $500 to $600, making a total increase for the port of $740. That, however, includes an increase for preventive officer McCurdy on the coast, from $60 to $200. I shall have to appoint a packer at, perhaps, $400 a year, in addition, because we are insisting on the work being done at Truro as it is being done at Halifax. The increase of $700 or $1,000 will be more than compensated for by extra collections due to increased vigilance, and the prevention of smuggling, which has been going on at Truro to an enormous extent.

Mr. VAIL. I do not think $200 increase will be wasted if smuggling is prevented. Truro, however, is an inland place, and is very different to a seaport. The goods must come to it over a railway. I do not see why it is necessary to have an extra officer. I am quite satisfied that if the collector of Customs had attended to his duties a year or two ago these irregularities would not have occurred, in an inland place like that. It is true that some of the merchants at Halifax state that the people in the country could get their goods at half the rate of duty, and that there was no use of them applying to head-quarters, because they could not get redress. I do not, however, pay much attention to that, because I think they are apt to complain when there is no occasion for it, and I think the people of the country have a right to have their goods entered at whatever places they choose.

Mr. BOWELL. The port of Brantford is an inland town, but they collect the sum of $142,841 a year. St. Thomas is an inland town, and it has run up, since I have been in office, from an outpost, with a $500 officer, to a port of three or four officers, and collections of from $60,000 to $100,000; but it is a distributing point for that section of country, and Truro is in the same position. As the hon. gentleman says, the merchants of Halifax have complained, and very properly, because goods were entered at that port, without any investigation or examination, and the result has been that goods were imported and sold at much lower rates than the honest importers were able to do. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should find fault that a great importing city like Halifax—

Mr. VAIL. I am not objecting.

Mr. BOWELL—should find fault because I am trying to put Truro, which is an inland port and a distributing point, in such a position that frauds will be prevented, I do not believe there are more honest importers than those of the city of Halifax, in the Dominion, and they deserve protection. The hon. gentleman says that merchants have a right to import and enter where they please. That is true, but if they import at Truro there should be a sufficient staff of officers to prevent the honest importer from being defrauded of his rights.

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. VAIL. Then, as to Yarmouth?

Mr. BOWELL. The collection and importations have increased there very much. The collections amount to $115,527, and I have found it necessary to add another officer at that port, but the increase is not to the extent that appears. The same remark applies to this place as to Annapolis. There was one office last year, which I did not deem it necessary to fill till this year. The present collector does not receive the same salary as the old one, but $200 less, and we have had to add the additional officer to whom I have referred, and a gauger, on account of large importation of oil and liquor.

Mr. WATSON. I notice that in Manitoba there is a decrease of $5,200, there being increases in some items and decreases in others. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain about Emerson.

Mr. BOWELL. The great decrease in Manitoba arises from this cause: that during the boom there were very large importations, and it was necessary to put a large number of officers on the staff. Now, as the Canadian Pacific Railway is being opened from Port Arthur to Winnipeg, a large quantity of goods, which formerly went through the United States in bond and had to be examined at Emerson or Winnipeg, now go through by that road, and the extra staff is not required. I am now reducing the number of those officers as fast as possible. There is also the fact that we made outposts of Portage la Prairie, Regina, Brandon and Calgary, for the accommodation of the settlers and business men of those places. Importations are now coming in, to a large extent, by railway, which formerly came in from Fort Benton by the trails to Fort Macleod, and the collections in those particular localities are falling off. The officers of the Mounted Police act for us, for which they receive a percentage—formerly 10 per cent., which I cut down to 5 during the railway boom, when they were making, as I thought, too much money. Taking the increases in the staff at Emerson, and the transfers, as against the decreases, there is a net decrease of $5,200.

Mr. WATSON. Has the hon. gentleman any intention of establishing an outpost at Minnedosa, the present terminus of the Manitoba North-Western Railway? It is 78 miles from Portage la Prairie, and there is a great deal of business done there, and it would be a great convenience to the people.

Mr. BOWELL. I have no intention, at present, as the matter has never been brought to my notice. I may tell the hon. gentleman that, as far as possible, I resist all applications for outposts, except where it is absolutely necessary, and every outpost established not only adds expense to the Department, but opens the door to the possibility of greater frauds, because we must appoint men at low salaries, at which we cannot get the very best class of men who are acquainted with the business. But if the trade should justify the opening of a port at Minnedosa, we will do so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The vote of $6,000 for the North-West Territories does not show the allowance paid to the Mounted Police.

Mr. BOWELL. There is a reduction of $2,000 on last year, owing to the reduction in the collection of duties by the Mounted Police, and a reduction in the percentage paid from 10 to 5 per cent.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). I desire to ask the hon. Minister what occasions the reduction in the permanent salaries of the port of Victoria. Last year the amount was $17,596, while this year it is $16,596, while that for New Westminster is increased from $300 to $1,300. It seems to me you have been robbing Peter to pay Paul. I hope the hon. minister will rob Paul to pay Peter back again. Possibly, the expenses of Nanaimo, which is now a separate port, were included in those of Victoria.

Mr. BOWELL. That is the explanation; Nanaimo being established as an independent port. It was formerly an outpost of Victoria.

Mr. BAKER. Then, what are the salaries, respectively, of the collector at Nanaimo and the deputy collector at Departure Bay.

Mr. BOWELL. I think we give $300 or $400 a year to the officer stationed on the coast from Nanaimo to Cowichan, merely as a preventive officer.

Mr. BAKER. There is a collector at Nanaimo and a deputy collector at Departure Bay, who was formerly the collector for both of those ports. I want to know what salary he is now getting, that his position has been somewhat reduced.

Mr. BOWELL. When Nanaimo was made an independent port, a collector was appointed, and Mr. Peck remained in the position he formerly held as a clerk. He is assistant to the collector at Nanaimo at the same salary he had before.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman did not state why he wanted $2,400 for British Columbia.

Mr. BOWELL. We have had to put an additional officer at New Westminster, and there has also been an officer placed on the Columbia River, to watch the goods which come up that river into the Kootenay district.

Mr. BAKER. There is no great distinction between the salary of the collector and that of his assistant at Nanaimo. Either the collector should get more or the assistant should get a little less.

Mr. BOWELL. I found Mr. Peck there with the salary he is getting. But I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, and if Mr. Peck was out of the way, I would not appoint a clerk at so high a salary. I do not want to say anything disparaging to the gentleman, but I do not know that there would be any injury done if he were away.

Mr. BAKER. I quite agree with you.

Mr. BOWELL. In justice to the Auditor General, I desire to make an explanation regarding the charges against this item of $18,000 for salaries and travelling expenses of inspectors of ports, and other officers on inspection. When this subject was under discussion before, some hon. gentlemen opposite tried to be facetious at my expense, and I stated that I was not aware why the travelling expenses had been put under the head charged to this item, rather than where they were formerly placed, in the contingencies of the Department. I stated that I thought that was a matter exclusively with the Auditor General. I have found since, however, that he did not place them there. They were placed there by the accountant of the Department, for the reason that all the travelling that took place and which is charged to this item had special reference to disputes in connection with importations, and which legitimately came under the head of the Board of Customs. The travelling expenses of the Minister, the accountant, and the commissioner were placed under that head, because the travelling that took place was for that special service. However, I gave instructions that as that had not been the mode of charging the contingencies in the past, it should not be followed in the future, at least, so far as the Minister and the commissioner were concerned. When the other officers travel on that business, this is the item to which their expenses should be charged. There is an increase of $2,000 for miscellaneous. Last year it was found that $13,000 did not cover the expenses under this item. Some years the printing is greater than others. This year it may be $1,000 less; next year it may be still lower, and another year it may be increased.

Mr. CASEY. Will the hon. gentleman answer the question which I gave notice I would ask when we came to Supply, in reference to the request that Ridgetown, in my county, should be made a port of entry?

Mr. BOWELL. I gave instructions the other day to have a recommendation made out to erect Ridgetown into an outpost, under Chatham, and I propose to remove Mr. Duck from the position he now holds to Ridgetown, to act as sub-collector. I do not think it necessary to make an additional appointment, but I will give Mr. Duck a little more salary.

Mr. CASEY. The arrangement is eminently fair and proper, under the circumstances.

Mr. VAIL. With regard to the outside detective service of the Customs Department, I would ask the hon. Minister whether he intends to keep Mr. MacLaren in the employ of the Department, knowing the very improper course he took last year in order to obtain information as to goods shipped from the United States to the Maritime Provinces? I am told he went to Boston, and there bribed the clerk of one of the largest establishments trading with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, induced him to go into the place of business at night with him and make out invoices on the invoice paper of the firm, to carry with him to the Maritime Provinces, and in other ways obtained information very improperly. I am quite sure the Minister of Customs would not countenance such conduct as this detective pursued. I am not making statements from hearsay, because the whole transaction was subsequently acknowledged and sworn to by the clerk. The young man was removed, became very penitent, and made a full statement of what took place. The following is his sworn statement:—

“STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS, SUFFOLK, U.S.

“I, Charles B. Gilliatt, of Boston, United States of America, in the employ of Delong & Seaman, merchants of Boston, aforesaid, of my own free will and without threat, fear or promise, make oath and say as follows:—

“I say, that while I was in my room at 8 Allston street, Boston, having leave from above firm to stay at home two days, I was called on by John S. MacLaren, a Dominion of Canada Customs detective, about 8th February, 1885, Friday, and about 2.30 p.m. I did not know the man, and never heard his name before. He introduced himself, after a little talk about the weather, etc., in this way: Said he was a Customs detective, and called on me to make a dollar and make one for me. He then told me what he wanted of me, which was to give him information of smuggling and to furnish him with invoices and a few bills of lading from Delong & Seaman, to compare at the Custom house in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton. He also told me that I would get a large amount of money out of it, as well as himself, and that the amount of the fines was to be divided thus: the Canadian Government to receive one-third of the full amount fined each man, and 5 per cent. of the balance to go to a Mr. Wolfe, for collecting fines and forwarding all moneys to MacLaren and his partner, Jack Bonnes, and that the balance of the two-thirds was to be divided between MacLaren, his partner Bonnes and myself, equally. I told him it would not be right for me to do so, and that I would lose my position if I did. He replied that I need not fear; that I would not be known in the matter at all, and that he and the Canadian Government would protect me in all things; also, that he would drop a seizure if he had to make me known at all, and that he would not fine a man or firm if they were not able to pay. To all of this I replied that I would not give him any answer then, but would think it over and let him know the next day, Saturday, when he called about four o'clock, p.m., and made the same promises again, and explained more definitely what he wanted me to do, and then I agreed to give him the papers and information that he required.

“I also saw him Sunday afternoon at his room, No. 1 Hancock street, when he gave me $5 for which I asked him; then I met him several evenings afterwards at No. 7½ Bowdoin square, and there he gave me $20 more. He also told me what he wanted me to get for him, and he named places and ports that he said he must have information and invoices for, of the customers we had there. He also told me at his room, Sunday afternoon mentioned before, that he had made $10,000 out of the seizures he had made; and this he told me confidentially, and seemed to be anxious that I would not say so to any person.

“I then commenced to make out the invoices about Monday night following, and continued to do so almost every evening, sometimes at the office of Delong & Seaman, and two or three times brought a blotter or day-book to my room, and also to an office in Bowdoin square, in Boston.

"MacLaren was down to the office with me once, and looked at the book I was working from, and compared a few bills of lading with the invoices I had made out. I have received four letters from him, three of these since he has been in St. John, N.B., and Nova Scotia, and one before leaving Boston, asking me to meet him at 7½ Bowdoin square.

"Since then I have received one, which I delivered, without opening, to Delong & Seaman. Two of the other letters I had torn up by a special request from MacLaren; the other two I delivered to Delong & Seaman. The above letters, and all that I was to receive, was to be addressed to me under an assumed name of John Gordon.

"I also further state that the making out of the invoices given MacLaren was done in a hurried and concealed way, unbeknown to the firm of Delong & Seaman, or any of their clerks, and I cannot say that the invoices I gave MacLaren were correct, either in regard to the date of invoice or the amount of goods, or in other respects, as I worked late nights at them, and felt sleepy, and afraid that I would be found out at any time. MacLaren said to me that he did not want any case to go to law for settlement, but he would rather settle with about one-quarter of the amount fined than have a case in court. He also told me to be very careful that the firm did not find me at the office, and told me if the firm or any clerk employed with Delong & Seaman found me at the office while after invoices, and working for him, to say that I came down to write a letter. He also wanted me to go to the office of Delong & Seaman at night, after business hours, with him, to get blank bills of lading and documents that he wanted to make the seizures. I did go with him there twice, and he compared some bills of lading I had made out, with original, and examined the blotter; and he, while there, called off, a few invoices to me, while I wrote them down. He asked me to tear up or burn up all the letters I received from him.

"CHARLES B. GILLIATT."

"Subscribed and sworn to by the above named Charles B. Gilliatt, at Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, United States of America, this 14th day of March, A.D. 1885, before me, a commissioner for Nova Scotia, duly appointed and qualified to take affidavits to be read in the Supreme Court, and any court of record in said Province.

"Witness my hand and official seal,

"A. J. McLEOD,

"Commissioner for Nova Scotia.

"The foregoing is a true copy of the affidavit taken before me as above shown.

"A. J. McLEOD.

"Commissioner for Nova Scotia.

"I, A. J. McLeod, a commissioner for Nova Scotia, duly appointed under chapter ninety-six, section fifty-four, of the revised statutes of Nova Scotia, hereby certify that on the 14th day of March, A.D. 1885, personally came and appeared before me, Charles B. Gilliatt, described in the foregoing affidavit, and in my presence subscribed his name thereto, and I duly swore him to the said affidavit, and I certify that the said affidavit was made and subscribed by the said Charles B. Gilliatt by himself, and in his own handwriting, voluntarily, and without threat or promise.

"Given under my hand and seal of office, at Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, United States of America, this 14th day of March, A.D. 1885.

"A. J. McLEOD,

"Commissioner for Nova Scotia."

It seems to me that a man who will be guilty of such conduct as this is not fit to be in the Department. I would be sorry to say a word to encourage smuggling in any way, or to prevent anyone getting information in a fair and proper way, to prevent smuggling; but I think any man who will go to the United States and bribe a young man, as this man did, to go into a man's place of business at night, or at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, and to make use of this, as he acknowledges, was not justified.

Mr. BOWELL. Who acknowledges?

Mr. VAIL. Mr. MacLaren acknowledges himself. I have two or three letters written by him to Mr. Gordon, signed "Jack," or something of that kind, and he acknowledges that he used one of the blank bills he received, and says he intended to fill up the blank bill heads and charge the man with smuggling goods; and while the partner was talking, he would place it on his desk, and charge him with smuggling, and in that way, I suppose, levy blackmail.

Mr. BOWELL. I have most of the letters to which the hon. gentleman refers, but I have no recollection of that letter.

Mr. VAIL. I will read the letters. I leave out certain names, which it would be unfair to bring before the public:

"DEAR GORDON,—I made three seizures in Digby; not a dollar paid; asked time until 1st April; Bear River made 5. Will down the Portland and let you know all. As soon as we return to St. John will send you some money; we will make a big thing out of it. I have not heard from you for more than a week; expect your letters are waiting for me in Digby. Now, don't fail me, and send me every bill at once against Nova Scotia; never mind whether you think crooked or not; I find lots made out by themselves on your bill-heads. Also send me bills of lading and bills for all I have written you for; I trust some are waiting for me in Digby; if not, let me know, as I will have to shut down on some places. Forward all at once, and oblige

Mr. VAIL.

"Yours, etc.

"J. MACLAREN."

"Will not touch Yarmouth until I am finishing up; I have been so busy getting up reports that I have little time to write. If I get your letters to-morrow, Monday, will write. Now send Lunenburg at once, or I will be past it, and do not want to return there.

"DEAR GORDON,—In a great rush; have finished up Digby, Bear River and Annapolis, and take the train to-morrow for Yarmouth; skip it and go on to Pubnico; thence round the shore to Halifax; then through the valley, and finish up and back to Digby to settle. I am afraid it will be small money here. Bear River will pan out well; three schooners tied up there. Schooner Portland tied up; will get Levoze when she returns; also six more vessels when they return, so we have not done badly. It will pan out so far (if the Department will settle them as I report) a few thousand. As soon as we return will send you some money. It will take $300 to pay our expenses for this trip, and I do not want to raise money by note; my cash is on special deposit; a month or so is not long to wait. Now, send as soon as possible, or it will be no use, Lunenburg, Port Medway and all others I asked for, and burn these letters you get from me as soon as read, for fear of trouble. Bear River will do well. Now send me Clementsport at once; we leave this place and Granville, and Bridgetown and valley, until we return from the shore. We are afraid of the snow leaving, so are hurrying up. Your letter I received here; sorry you were blocked in not getting bills. Be sure and send bills of lading for Lunenburg, and send bills with everyone you have done business with. I will use you well; don't fear; all I ask of you is to send the bills, also to keep us posted as things go forward. I downed some of them with bills you thought straight; made false ones on your bill-heads. Be sure and send all of Mahone Bay, Bridgewater; you know our route; we are driving right round the shore to Halifax from Yarmouth, thence by rail to Annapolis; also working Margaretville, etc. I will make you a good summer's work. Now, old fellow, if you have to go down to the office after 10:30 p.m. and write until 3 p.m. for two or three nights, have these posted at once; if you do not I will lose it; so, if you have to sit up all night, do them, and don't make your letters too bulky.

"Yours,

"JACK.

"Lose a night's rest to get me them, and forward at once; not too bulky letters."

"March 14th, 1885.

"DEAR GORDON,—Since writing you we went to Barrington, seized the schooner Pleides and fined her $400. I will be in Mahone Bay to-morrow and down them there, and then to Halifax and up the valley. Now send Clemensport every one of them in full, also send Lunenburg; all we had against there was correct, so was Port la Tour, sorry to say, also send all of Lockeport and bills of lading in all cases, cannot get on without them. What is the matter; I got your last letter all right; I am disappointed about bills not coming forward; look out for a man named Will McDonald; he talks about buying out Durkee. He is from Argyle, Pubnico. Have your address changed if he buys there, and have no talk with him, shun him in every way. I have not settled up with Digby. Now send me all bills of lading for Cape Breton, Antigonish, etc.; you must jump quickly or you will lose it. Send Shelburne all sure, did not stay there or at Lockeport; Bridgewater correct. If you want me to send any dates or anything further, let me know at once. I never got any bills but the two first lots you sent me. If you send them I will rattle the parties and make a dollar for us. It is costing us big money for expenses, hiring teams, etc., and until some time about the middle of April I will not have a dollar, as it takes all I have to run us. Now, answer at once, and let me know just what you can do. Yours,

"JACK."

It appears that he was getting all the information he could, and, at the same time, keeping this man waiting for his money.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). Is he a Nova Scotian?

Mr. VAIL. No; I believe he is from New Brunswick. I have given enough to show that this is a very disreputable affair. No man should be permitted to obtain information in that way. I am sure the Minister of Customs will not justify it, and I do not think a man of that style should be allowed to remain in the Department.

Mr. BOWELL. I have had most of these documents before me. Mr. MacLaren was put upon the special staff, and has been doing detective work for some time. Apart from this particular transaction to which attention has been called by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail), I can say that he has been a very good officer in ferreting out and punishing smugglers. A number of cases have been laid before me, with which the member for Digby is well acquainted, he having visited me in order to get the parties relieved of the penalties which the law imposes, and I pointed out to him different cases where the invoices sent by Delong & Seaman, from Boston, did not agree with the correct invoices nor with the ships' manifests. I notice in most of the letters to which the hon. gentleman refers, a reference to false invoices made by Delong & Seaman and sent to the merchants in the Maritime Provinces, upon which entries were made; but upon investigation it was found that they had their invoices of the same date, covering the same goods, with a large quantity left off the invoice upon which the entry was made; and in order to test the correctness of the invoice in most of the cases, MacLaren was shrewd enough to obtain the ship's manifest, showing that the goods were actually brought from Boston to port in Nova Scotia, corresponding exactly with the invoices which the officers found in the possession of the importers, and which were not the invoices upon which entries were made.

Mr. VAIL. Will the hon. gentleman read that portion of the letter where MacLaren speaks of his exploits?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; he says:

"I downed some of them with bills you thought straight, and made false ones."

It does not say that he made false entries; it is the parties who imported the goods who made false invoices upon blanks that were sent them. Now, I tell the hon. gentleman that MacLaren made a positive declaration that the charges which were brought against him by Delong & Seaman were not correct.

Mr. WELDON. Gordon says he gave him the bill-heads.

Mr. BOWELL. Mr. Gordon, whoever he may be, appears to have been a young man in the employ of Delong & Seaman. I believe, from the information I have obtained and from the invoices, that this establishment was established for the express purpose of doing business with the Maritime Provinces, by granting false invoices, to enable people to defraud the Customs. When I first saw these charges in the newspapers, I instructed the commissioner to write to Delong & Seaman, asking them for all the particulars. The information sent was not thought sufficient, and after receiving the letter which Delong & Seaman had sent to the son of Sir Leonard Tilley, in Toronto, asking him to call his father's attention to the conduct of MacLaren, I informed the firm that if they could establish the facts which had been published to the world, not only would MacLaren be dismissed but he would be severely punished for having committed the crimes of which he had been accused. Messrs. Delong & Seaman wrote, sending copies of these letters. I then referred them, through Mr. Wolfe, to MacLaren, he being the accused party. He made affidavit, that the charges therein were not correct; but he did say that he met this young man in Boston, and in conversation with him opened out his business—I am speaking from recollection upon this point—and was informed that the practice of the firm with which he was connected was the sending of false invoices to different parties, upon which to make Customs entries. MacLaren said: Well, if you will give me that information, you shall have a share of the spoils, of whatever I receive as my share of the seizure. They entered into a mutual arrangement, until this young man was caught, when his employers obtained from him, as I believe, through fear of punishment, the affidavit that the hon. gentleman has read, and then dismissed him, having first promised him that if he would make a clean breast of the whole matter, they would keep him and he should not be punished. Since then I have received a letter from the boy's mother, asking that he should be paid his share of whatever fines were imposed and collected by MacLaren, and which, she alleges, MacLaren promised to give him. I then wrote to Delong & Seaman, telling them that if they would do what they threatened to do, that is, put a case in court—for the hon. gentleman knows that they recommended the merchants in Nova Scotia, the parties to whom he has referred, to resist the payment of any fines which were imposed, and that they would produce evidence to show what a scoundrel MacLaren was—I told them I would assist them in carrying into court any case they selected, and that if they established the charges they had made against MacLaren, he should be not only dismissed but punished. A letter was subsequently received from DeLong & Seaman, asking that all their letters written in regard to this matter should be returned to them, for what purpose I do not know. I did not return any as the matter might come up in the courts. Delong & Seaman never put a case in the courts. Bonus and MacLaren obtained written acknowledgements from the parties from whom they made seizures, admitting that they smuggled, and stating that they made payments in liquidation of fines and penalties. In some cases I declined to accept the settlement made by MacLaren. The evidence was so clear, the smuggling so flagrant, and the fact established that it had continued for years, that I refused to accept the sum mentioned in full liquidation of the smuggling crimes committed, but inflicted additional penalties upon the smugglers, confiscated the goods and intend to sell the vessels. If Delong & Seaman can establish the charges they have made in those letters, I will have the fullest possible investigation. If they establish the charges, and more particularly if that be proved which is stated in one of the letters, that MacLaren himself made false invoices—not only will MacLaren be dismissed from the service, but will be criminally punished. I contend, however, that the letter does not bear the construction put upon it by the member for Digby; on the contrary, it establishes the truth of what is being done from Victoria, British Columbia—I would not say to Cape Breton, because they do no smuggling there—but to the most eastern point of the Dominion, of having two invoices, which is not confined to America, but even prevails in Europe. Possibly MacLaren may have gone too far; he has gone too far if those declarations are correct; but there is nothing more than the statement of the young man who sold himself, and the statement of Delong & Seaman, who are the principal criminals in the whole transaction, to support the accusation. It is not my intention, until the charges, or similar ones, are proved against MacLaren to dismiss him from the service. He has done more to put a stop to the continued and extensive smuggling which has been going on in those Provinces, in the trade between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and Boston and other ports, than all the other officers we have had. I can sympathise with the hon. gentleman, because some of his constituents and others have got into difficulty. I know how members are pestered by persons who want to get relieved from penalties imposed for smuggling. If Mr. MacLaren and the other officers on the special service can, by any possibility, put a stop to the smuggling going on, they will deserve the thanks of the community, as they have received them. I have letters from all the principal merchants of Halifax and St. John—but will not refer to them, for it is not necessary—thanking me for having put these officers in the service, detailing the good that has resulted to honest traders. A large merchant in St. John told me lately that he had a customer who had been fined about $700, who applied to him to use his political influence—because the gentleman is a Government supporter—to have him relieved. That gentleman declined to do so, stating that he had urged on the Department the necessity of putting detectives on duty to prevent smuggling. The party in question then asked the gentleman to lend him $700 to pay the fine. This the gentleman said he did, when the individual said he thought he had a little start of the Customs yet. I give that as an illustration. Strenuous efforts have been made by the Government to prevent smuggling going on with the United States, and the officers are entitled to thanks for what is being done to protect the honest trader.

Mr. VAIL. I think the Minister will admit that I have never hesitated to say that where people have smuggled they deserve to be punished.

Mr. BOWELL. You always said that, and then you asked to have them relieved.

Mr. VAIL. I never did so. I have only asked the Minister to deal with the people of Nova Scotia as he deals with other people. I ask no favor. I was dealing with the hon. gentleman on business principles. I ask that he should deal with us in the same way as he deals with people in other Provinces. I do not believe the people of Nova Scotia any more than people elsewhere.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not say they did.

Mr. VAIL. The Minister need not go more than a few miles from Ottawa, by rail, to find a place where there is more smuggling in one day than there is in the western part of Nova Scotia in six months. It is very well to tell Delong & Seaman that if they bring on a lawsuit and prove what they have stated, this officer will be dismissed. What have they to do with the matter?

Mr. BOWELL. I did not ask them to bring on the case. I said that if they would bring a case I would assist them.

Mr. VAIL. The Minister has evidently not looked carefully at the letters, or he would have discovered a letter written subsequently, on 18th April. That letter is as follows:—

"In making my statement before Mr. Macleod, I omitted to say that when Mr. MacLaren took the blank printed forms of invoices and bills of lading, that he told me he intended to use them in cases where he could not get a clinch on a man, in this way: he would fill out an invoice and bill of lading as though a man had bought the goods from Delong & Seaman, and while his partner Bonnus would attract a man's attention, he would lay them on a desk; then, under the pretence of searching for documents, he would take these up and accuse a man of smuggling the goods mentioned in the invoice and bill of lading made by MacLaren."

He (Gilliatt) acknowledges having done it.

Mr. BOWELL. He does not acknowledge it.

Mr. VAIL. I do not think any further evidence is required; and I am a little surprised and disappointed that the Minister does not intend to make a full enquiry.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not say so.

Mr. VAIL. The hon. gentleman said he had made a certain enquiry; but he did not say he would continue it. I shall be surprised if he does not continue it. Any man guilty of bribing a man to go into his employer's office at night, as has been described, is not a fit man to be employed under the Government.

Mr. WELDON. I desire to draw the attention of the Minister to a question with regard to the discounts which importers receive. It is a fact that manufacturers in selling to jobbers, give them a certain line of discount, according to the amount which they agree to purchase in a given line, and they should get the benefit of these discounts in the Customs offices; whereas, these parties who are sent to the United States manufacturers to ascertain their terms do not get the real terms. The result is, that when the importer, who gets a discount which enables him to sell at the same price as the manufacturer sells to the ordinary buyer, imports a portion of these goods, the Customs officer says the discount is only on so much, and the importer does not get the benefit of his legitimate discounts. There have been many complaints in the city of St. John in regard to this matter, and, as the hon. gentleman knows, a petition was sent to the Board of Trade at St. John, which is composed of a large number of merchants, irrespective of political creeds, and I will read the memorandum attached to it. I may mention, also, as showing the manner in which the St. John merchants are treated, that last year no notice was sent to St. John about the changes in Ways and Means, and the merchants there, after paying the duties band fide, were called on afterwards to pay additional duties. The following is the memorandum:—

"The regulations governing the duty payable upon these goods do not sufficiently recognise trade usage and the actual facts. A manufacturer selling by discounts so arranges the discounts as that the jobber who carries a 'line' of the goods is in a position to sell to smaller buyers at the same discount which the manufacturer would. The jobber having agreed to carry a certain value or line, gets the larger discount, and is privileged to buy, from time to time—to keep his line assorted—at the agreed-upon rate of discount, no matter how small the purchase.

"The information upon which the Customs Department has based decisions upon such goods is evidently incorrect. That is, the rate of discount quoted as the selling rate in the market of home production is not the discount given by manufacturers to jobbers, but that given by the manufacturers and the jobbers to those buyers who are not jobbers.

"It is natural to suppose that when manufacturers are asked by any other person than one whom they recognise as a jobber, the discount on their goods, that they will protect the jobbing trade by quoting the established discount at which jobbers sell.

"The information as to the discounts given by manufacturers to the jobbing trade should be obtained by the Government direct from the manufacturers, and not from published lists or quotations, which do not give the lowest wholesale prices.

"The interest of the importer should be considered as well as that of the protected Canadian manufacturer, in regulating fixed values for the payment of duties."

This system is very unfair to the importers, who have capital and credit, as it really places them at a disadvantage as compared with other buyers. There is another point to which I wish to call the attention of the Minister, and that is, that when small packages are sent, say from Great Britain, inside of larger parcels, unknown to the importer, even though he may be prepared to make oath that he knows nothing about them, he has very great difficulty in getting them through the Customs. Sometimes the packages may be for another person; they are not on his invoice, and he may not know their value, and the result is very great hardship and inconvenience. I think that in such cases, where the persons concerned are men of standing and position, a certain allowance should be made, as against those who endeavor to evade the laws.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman's statement is true, to a certain extent, but it opens up a question which would require a great deal of time to discuss fully. The statement he has made, that where a man imports a bale of goods, and a package or enclosure is found therein, great difficulty is found in making entry, is a complaint I have never heard before. In such a case, the difficulty that the man encounters is the confiscation of the enclosure that has not been invoiced. I suppose the hon. gentleman knows that the law is very positive on that point, and that it reads in this way:

"If any goods are found in any packages which are not entered on the invoice or entry, such goods shall be seized and absolutely forfeited."

If there be an enclosure not mentioned in the invoice, there is no discretion with the officers of the Department. Parliament made that law, and I am not aware that the hon. gentleman took any exception to it. It would take half an hour to give the various reasons for this clause. I confess that I took the same view as the hon. gentleman, until I had experience. The only case in which the detention of the whole of the goods is justifiable is provided for in the next clause. If there be any evidence, by way of correspondence or otherwise, or by the invoice, which would lead to the supposition that fraud was intended by the importer, then the whole of the package is to be seized and confiscated. The law is equally clear as to the principle on which a collector can levy duties on goods imported. If a capitalist, with a large amount of money, can buy 5 or 10 per cent. cheaper than another man, the law provides, so far as the Customs duties are concerned that he shall not have any advantage beyond that which his wealth gives him in the purchase of the goods. The law is clear, and those who administer it have no option in the matter. The difficulty that has arisen is in connection with the system of selling in the United States to merchants in this country in giving them additional discounts, provided they purchase a certain amount of goods, that discount not being made up until the end of the year. For instance, a man gets a certain discount if he buys to the extent of $100,000 during the year, and a different discount if he buys to the extent of $50,000. I should like to know how any law could be framed to meet cases of that kind. The goods should be entered at the price at which they are sold at the time of exportation, and on that the duty is paid.

Mr. WELDON. What I want to understand is, why a man who pays only $3,000, at the rate he has agreed upon with the manufacturer, has to pay duty on, say $4,500, 50 per cent. more than he pays. He does not pay on the value of the goods, but on a larger amount than he has paid for them. It is an act of injustice, and is, I believe, an inducing cause for the smuggling in New Brunswick that is so much complained of.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The increase over last year is $8,830. There is an increase of $1,670, resulting from changes which have taken place in consequence of resignations and deaths, and new appointments. They have resulted in an addition of five officers to the staff, or rather four, because one of those officers belong to the Weights and Measures branch, but he is paid $300 as an Excise preventive officer. Then, there are $1,336 for promotions. These have taken place in accordance with the Civil Service Act. Then there are $300 for increases, as the result of examinations. The annual increase of 5 per cent. upon the minimum of each class makes up $6,000 of that increase. The House will understand that when our officers get 5 per cent. increase, they were appointed at the minimum salary on all occasions, and that increase continues until their salary reaches the maximum.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I cannot say that the general result is very satisfactory. I find, although there has been a comparatively small increase in the amount of receipts of Excise, an increase not over 10 or 12 per cent., within the last half-dozen years, the expenses have increased nearly 50 per cent. In 1879 the expenses were $211,000; in 1884, $300,000; and in 1886, $322,000. It appears to me there is nothing to justify this enormous relative increase in the management of the Department. With regard to the $3,000 allowance to Excise officers in Manitoba, to compensate for increased cost of living, I must say that the state of things in Manitoba is not that which formerly prevailed. I do not object to Excise officers or other servants being paid a fair salary, but I must say that the argument which might hold good in 1881 and 1882 no longer applies at all in many, probably in all parts of Manitoba.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is intended to reduce that as rapidly as possible.

Culling Timber..... $71,600

Mr. VAIL. Why this increase of $200 to the supervisor?

Mr. COSTIGAN. With reference to the increase of $200 to the supervisor, that will still leave his salary under what it formerly was. It formerly was $2,600; it is not intended that his salary should be increased further.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It must be recollected that the whole of this business means a cost of $28,000 or $30,000 over and above what we get out of the timber. If the receipts at all equalled expenditure, there would not be much objection to an occasional increase of salaries, but there is a decided objection, as things stand. I would ask what the $8,000 contingencies is for?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That must have been for rent of office, fuel, gas, stationery and repairs, and other running expenses.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In running a small place holding a dozen clerks, $8,000 is a big item for contingencies. I hardly think the fuel and water, and light and stationery will amount to that. What did the hon. gentleman spend for that last year?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I will give that information to the hon. gentleman on concurrence.

Weights and Measures and Gas..... $84,650.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here is an increase of $1,900 in the salaries of inspectors of Weights and Measures.

Mr. COSTIGAN. We appointed an additional officer in Manitoba, and an additional inspector in British Columbia. That involves an expenditure of $800 and $600, and the increase through the whole staff only amounts to $500.

Mr. VAIL. There is an increase of $50 in the salaries of inspectors of gas.

Mr. COSTIGAN. This service is growing. I think any one will admit, when we have extended the inspection of gas to several cities in the Dominion, the increase of $50 is very little.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In the case of a great many other companies, such as insurance companies, where we have inspectors, we charge them to the companies, by way of a special tax. Is anything of that kind done with the gas companies?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No; they have to pay certain fees for inspection when the gas is inspected, to test its purity.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The salary of $800 for commissioner of standards is paid to the deputy head, is it not?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Yes; he is the commissioner of standards, just the same as the former commissioner under the hon. gentleman. This office was created by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it was created in 1873. It strikes me that this item belongs more properly to the head of Civil Government.

Mr. VAIL. I do not see why it should be paid for at all; it should be the duty of the deputy to perform what is required of his office.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It has been allowed for some time.

Inspection of Staples ..... $2,700

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is a decrease of $500, in the amount for the purchase and distribution of standards of flour, etc.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is this $200 to pay inspector Borradaile for work in connection with this service?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. Borradaile is an inspector in the Excise Department, and when a vacancy occurred in Prince Edward Island, that district was handed over to Nova Scotia and made part of the division of which Mr. Borradaile is the inspector. Although I have not been able to meet his wishes and recommend the increase of salary he expected, I am bound to admit that the extra work thrown upon him during the last year entitled him to some consideration, and I preferred to give him the $200 for that year, because he had done special services for it, to giving him an increase of salary, which would become a permanent charge.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is for next year.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The work is going on; this is a compensation for the other.

Mr. VAIL. Mr. Borradaile's salary has been increased two or three times. I admit that he is a good officer, but his salary has been increased quite recently, and I do not see why it should be further increased.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is his salary?

Mr. COSTIGAN. $2,200.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does that compare with the salaries given to other inspectors?

Mr. COSTIGAN. $1,800 is the minimum; $2,400 is the maximum.

Mr. VAIL. How many are receiving more than he is.

Mr. COSTIGAN. There are four, I think, receiving $2,400.

Mr. VAIL. The former inspector did this work, leaving out Prince Edward Island, which cannot be much, for $1,600 or $1,700. Mr. Borradaile is appointed at $2,200.

Mr. COSTIGAN. There was one at $1,700 and one at $1,600, making $3,300.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How is that?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There was an inspector for Prince Edward Island.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where does that saving appear?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I was trying to explain this vote.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But the hon. gentleman stated just now that a considerable saving was made in connection with the inspector; inasmuch as Mr. Borradaile was doing for $2,500 work that had cost $3,000.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That change was made three years ago.

Mr. VAIL. The salaries are out of all proportion to the salaries of the other officers in Nova Scotia. By raising Mr. Borradaile's salary you create discontent among the other officers, and I do not see upon what principle you can give one man a large salary and refuse it to others.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not propose to increase this officer's salary at all. When he went down there it was understood he was to get this increase of salary, inasmuch as he would replace these two officers, which he has done for the last three years. A sum was voted for his salary, making it $2,400, but it was never paid him. I am quite aware that other officers would feel aggrieved if they saw an officer getting an increased salary which was refused to them. I have tried to avoid that cause of complaint, and that is the reason I refused to give him the increase. But we did acknowledge that he had rendered very important services, outside of his regular duties, for which he ought to get this $200.

Mr. VAIL. It is impossible that he can have been doing any work outside of his regular duties. If you give this man $200 extra, why should you withhold a similar increase to the inspector of Customs, for instance, whose duties are much more important, and who does much more work? This man's expenses are all paid, wherever he goes; it is one of the best positions in the gift of the Government. Will the Minister tell us what duties he has performed outside of his office?

Mr. COSTIGAN. He has performed important duties, with regard to the inspection of fish, all through the Province, and has made valuable reports and collected information which will be of value in dealing with this subject. He has consulted over 400 deputies on the subject.

Adulteration of food—To meet expenses under the Act..... $20,000

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is an increase here of $5,000. It will be needed to extend the operation of the Act, and to enforce it more vigorously. Up to the present time it has not been applied to many places, but the public expect that it will be extended to other places.

Mr. WILSON. Has the hon. gentleman made a division of the territory into different sections, in which to send his inspector?

Mr. COSTIGAN. As soon as Parliament votes the money we will divide the territory.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Minister ought to have an idea as to the division of the territory, the probable expense, and the cities he is to include under the Act, before he asks us for this vote.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The larger cities of the Dominion—Montreal, Toronto, St. John, Halifax and Quebec, are now under the operation of the Act, and we desire to include the cities of London, Hamilton, Winnipeg, and perhaps St. Thomas, and some other of the smaller towns.

Department of Indian Affairs—Grant to supplement Indian fund..... $34,938

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does the hon. gentleman propose to do with this money? Is it to impart constitutional learning to juvenile Indians, in order to fit them to exercise the franchise?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is an increase of $2,850. This amount is to supplement the Indian school fund in Ontario and Quebec, to increase the salaries of teachers of schools in Nova Scotia, and like purposes.

Mr. MILLS. How is this money expended?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Through the Indian agents.

Mr. MILLS. There has been some correspondence, with a view of placing these Indian schools—subject to the oversight which the constitution gives the Government—to the educational authorities of the Provinces, a system under which, I think, they could be more efficiently managed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The schools are now inspected by the provincial inspectors, but the appointment of teachers is not made by the provincial authorities. That would involve a complete change of system.

Mr. MILLS. I am inclined to think that the system of industrial schools will be found to be very expensive, and the results very limited.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They have been very successful in the United States, and in certain places in Canada.

Mr. DAWSON. So far as my observation goes, they have been very successful in my district. With regard to these Robinson Treaty annuities, I would like to ask if any progress has been made towards arranging for the payment of the large amount due to the Indians under this treaty. Some correspondence has been going on for a number of years with the Government of Ontario, and it has been held that that Government having got the land, and the payment to the Indians being liable on the land, they should pay the arrears. If this money were put in the hands of the Indian Department, and laid out in schools or industrial farms, or agricultural implements, it would do a great deal of good.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is certainly a wrong to the Indians that that matter has not been settled. It has been pressed on the Local Government, but the answer of the Ontario Government is that this is one of the items to be taken into consideration in adjusting the accounts between the Provinces. I hope it will be settled before long.

Mr. MILLS. I think the Local Government deny responsibility, and say that this is a debt of the old Province of Canada, paid for the so-called Indian title.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The late Government, in consequence of this matter not being settled, advanced a sum of money on account in the meantime, but it has not been settled yet.

Mr. DAWSON. Practically, the Government of Ontario disputed, but they have not wholly denied it at any time.

Mr. MILLS. They contend that this is a matter of the old Province of Canada, that it is not a charge on the land, but was paid precisely the same as the Government paid for the so-called extinguishment of the Indian title further west, for the building of the railway.

Mr. DAWSON. By the Robinson Treaty, it was virtually made a lien on the land.

For Indians of Nova Scotia generally.....$6,032

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here is an increase of $1,000. What is the cause?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is a vote to open a road and to build a bridge at Chapel Island, in Cape Breton, which, it has been reported, would be a great advantage to the Indians in that neighborhood. Chapel Island is a reserve which is greatly resorted to by the Indians. They had a mission there, and they have been pressing strongly for these improvements.

Indians of New Brunswick..... $5,090

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The increase is $200. It is to enable the Department to increase the salary of the agent, Mr. Craig, from $100 to $200 per annum, which is well deserved, and to pay $100 to the Rev. Mr. Cormier, who visits the Indians in King's county.

North-West Mounted Police..... $427,700

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This estimate is calculated on 500 men. For subsistence there is a decrease of $14,600, which is principally owing to the reduced cost of transport. There is a reduction of $27,000 for forage. Considerable quantities of oats are now produced by the settlers, and the Canadian Pacific Railway furnishes a convenience of transport. Hay is also reduced in price.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman proposes to distribute these troops along the frontier, I imagine the convenience of transport would not reduce the forage or the subsistence there very much.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not propose that they shall all be distributed along the frontier. There will be certain patrols along the frontier, but the main force will be stationed at Regina, which is a good distributing point, and there will also be forces at Prince Albert, Battleford, Calgary, Fort Macleod, and all the other principal stations. The charge for fuel and light is increased by $10,000. That appears large. The fuel which, a few years ago, could be obtained within easy distance of the force, has now to be hauled long distances; but it is hoped that we shall soon be able to use coal. Formerly, when there was wood, the police at the stations were engaged in cutting it, to a considerable extent. That is now impossible; besides, the time of the men is too valuable to be employed in that way. It is satisfactory to be able to state that the clothing for the force is entirely made in Canada, with the exception of helmets, and a few small articles.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where made?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The material is obtained by tender, and is made up into clothing by tender.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I asked, because, owing to the great difficulty of obtaining employment for the number of convicts at Kingston penitentiary, it was at one time intended they should make up the clothing for the Mounted Police and the clothing for distribution to the Indians. There is always difficulties about employing convict labor, so as not to compete with free labor, but in the case of Government supplies, this labor might be utilised.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think so. It was found the clothing made in the penitentiaries was not good enough for the soldiers. There can be no objection in the case of the Indians.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Indians like good clothes, too.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are not so particular about the fit.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not wont to question reductions, but I think a reduction on medicines, medical comforts and hospital expenses requires explanation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Formerly, I think, the medicines were bought under orders of the medical men of the Department. They are now being all ordered under the special charge of Dr. Jukes, a medical man of known experience and standing. He has devoted himself to this Department, and I believe he has improved the quality of medicines and medical comforts, while, at the same time reducing the expenses.

For expenses of the Government in North-West Territories including printing, roads, bridges, ferries and aid to schools, etc..... $39,000.

Mr. McLELAN. The following are the details of this item:—Travelling expenses of members of council and officials, $1,000; probable expenses holding elections, $3,000; public printing, $2,000; stationery, telegrams and postage, $500; roads, bridges and ferries, $9,000; aid to schools, $6,000; surveys under 43 Vic., chap. 24, sec. 91, $2,000; rental allowance to clerk of council in lieu of the free residence occupied by him at Battleford, $500; cost of mail service in North-West Territories, $3,000; legal adviser, $200; rental allowance to Hugh Richardson, stipendiary magistrate, in lieu of the free quarters occupied by him at the late seat of Government, $500; safes, indexes, registrar books, stationery, furniture, light and fuel for registry offices, $3,000; light, fuel and stationery for deputy sheriff's offices, $300; miscellaneous, including maintenance of insane patients from North-West Territory in Manitoba penitentiary, $500; clerical assistance, $1,000; registration books, $300; sheriff's books, $300; rent of sheriff's office and rooms for holding court, $600; law books, newspapers and magazines, $500; fuel at Government House, council chamber and sheriff's office, light, messengers, etc., $1,800.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As this is an important item, I would advise that the details be printed.

For the expenses of Government in the District of Keewatin..... $1,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think, since the extension of the boundaries of Ontario, or the confirmation of her claims to the north-west angle, northward to the English River, and since Manitoba has been extended, so as to include the Icelandic settlements, there are really no more settlements in Keewatin, and there is no more reason for having that a separate district than to have the Labrador coast or the western coast of Hudson Bay.

Mr. DAWSON. I think that is a matter which admits of a difference of opinion.

For erection of Mounted Police Barracks.....$10,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is this?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This amount is required for additions, alterations and repairs at the various police posts, particularly Calgary, Battleford and Edmonton.

Surveys of Lakes Superior and Huron..... $18,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. About what sum will be required to complete this, and how long a time?

Mr. McLELAN. About two years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the expenditure be in proportion?

Mr. McLELAN. Next year and the year after it will be a less sum.

Putting in force Act respecting traffic in intoxicating liquors..... $20,000

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is principally the expenditure consequent on the numerous elections going on under the Scott Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does it include payment to the Dominion license officers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; it has nothing to do with that. It is for the elections under the Scott Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It has nothing to do with the license commissioners?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose it costs $500 in each county?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know the amount. It is a large sum of money.

Mr. Fabre's salary and contingencies of his office..... $2,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many immigrants known and ascertained, has this produced, so far as the Minister of Agriculture can tell us?

Mr. POPE. It is not in my Department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In whose is it, then?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is in the Department of the Secretary of State.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He is away, and no information is obtainable, I suppose?

Mr. McLELAN.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is an item I think might very well both stand and be struck out.

Mr. MILLS. We are entitled to further information on this subject, and to know how, if this office comes to be connected with the Department of the Secretary of State, and not with the Department of Agriculture, for what purpose does it exist?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps you had better let it stand for further information. No one seems to care to be responsible for this office.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. On the contrary, I think, the Secretary of State went into the subject at some length.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think we gathered that the Secretary of State thought we had secured one immigrant last year. I am bound to say I am afraid, as far as its value for immigration purposes is concerned, the returns have been exceedingly meagre.

Mr. MILLS. I understood that we had had four Belgians and one Frenchman from that office. That means $500 a man.

Mr. WILSON. We are entitled to some information in reference to this office.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I really think we ought to get some explanation about Mr. Fabre's mission in France. It has now been going on for a long time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the Secretary of State had been here, he would have been able to give the explanation.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman proposes to give $2,500 for the payment of an officer who has not been shown to have anything to do. We had a discussion on this subject earlier in the Session, but the Secretary of State did not succeed in giving the House any information on the subject, though he made it clear that this officer had not done anything for the money. I think, however, that Mr. Fabre did visit two or three places in France, and told them about the extraordinary depth to which snow fell in Canada—some 40 feet, I think.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I am surprised that hon. gentlemen opposite have so much difficulty in granting a vote of $2,500 in order to establish communication with such a country as France. All those who have visited Europe during the last three years, have declared unanimously that were it only for the informations given by Mr. Fabre to Canadians travelling in Europe, this country would be amply repaid for this paltry sum. In fact, since Mr. Fabre has been in France, the people of the continent have come to realise what Canada is. Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner, and many other eminent men, testify that Mr. Fabre has done a great deal towards promoting the interests of Canada in Europe. Letters recently received from Rev. + Labelle show that every day his office is full of people, who go to him for information regarding Canada, whilst our compatriots do not fail to require assistance from him, which is always willingly given, while they are on their voyages in France and other European countries. Through Mr. Fabre, business men have been able to communicate with men in high position in finance, commerce and industry in France. His work has been of such a nature, in the first years of his works that it cannot yet be fairly expressed in figures, though it is none the less real.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman represents Mr. Fabre as though he was travelling through the streets of Paris with an advertising sheet on each side. At all events, if Mr. Fabre is engaged in any business of this sort, why have we not some information, showing us what his success has been?

Mr. DESJARDINS. It is not immigrants that we want to get from France, so much as to establish trade relations with her as well as with other European countries. The hon. gentleman ought to know that efforts are now being made to establish direct steam communication between France and Canada, that a large amount of French capital has already been invested in Canada through the instrumentality of Mr. Fabre. If the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) was here, he could tell the hon. gentleman that in the North-West Territories French capitalists have invested large sums of money, thanks to the information they have received from the agency that we have established in Paris, and that they will be instrumental in sending here a desirable class of settlers. We have the Crédit Foncier, and we may reasonably expect that through Mr. Fabre's efforts we shall soon have more extended commercial relations with France, and I do not know that we should lose anything by it. It is true that it is France; but, after all, France is a country with which we can have communication without Canada suffering in its credit, whatever the gentlemen opposite may think to the contrary.

Mr. McLELAN. In addition to the information given by Mr. Fabre to the people of France respecting Canada, I know that a large number of Canadians visit Paris every year, and that every day in the year Mr. Fabre is called upon to give them information to enable them to prosecute their journey; and if he did nothing more than this, I think the money would be well spent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Whose servant is Mr. Fabre, in reality? Does he not receive a salary from the Local Government also?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Practically, he is a servant, I take it, of the Local Government, rather than ours.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They appointed him, no doubt, and we assist his salary, in order that he may be utilised by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and by the Minister of Agriculture.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If any good work can be done in the way of facilitating connections between this country and France, I have no objection to it. I agree with my hon. friend who has just spoken, that the old times and the historic association which subsisted so long between Lower Canada and France are of a character which might warrant parties in introducing—I do not think many immigrants—but possibly a considerable amount of French capital into this country, and if Mr. Fabre can contribute to that, I am not disposed to grudge a reasonable vote for it. But we have a right to know how far he has succeeded in securing the introduction of French capital into this country, and until the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) spoke, no information was forthcoming on that head. When we get to concurrence, it may be desirable to say something more on this item.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is quite clear that we ought to call on Mr. Fabre to make an annual report for what he has done for his salary?

Mr. DESJARDINS. Reports have been regularly sent in by Mr. Fabre.

Hudson's Bay Route Expedition..... $30,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is going to be done with that sum?

Mr. McLELAN. The ship has gone out there, with additional observers to be stationed there, and to bring away those who were there. It is thus intended to make the survey as complete as possible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What time did she start?

Mr. McLELAN. In May.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the hon. gentleman had any advice from her.

Mr. McLELAN. I had an advice from a point on the Labrador coast. There is no means of again communicating with her until she returns.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this supposed to complete the survey?

Mr. McLELAN. No; she will have to go out again next year, to bring back those who remain this winter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The intention is to make a test covering three seasons.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is the intention. It is supposed that three seasons will show any important change in climatic conditions.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many stations were established?

Mr. McLELAN. Six stations were established last season. One will be abandoned, and it is proposed to continue five stations this winter. There will be two winters' observations and three summers' observations.

Mr. DAWSON. Has the hon. gentleman ordered an exploration to be made of the Ungava channel.

Mr. McLELAN. My attention has been called to that matter. If opportunity permits, some observations will be made there during this season.

Extra Clerks to prepare Returns..... $10,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it the intention that the staff shall be employed so that all returns ordered this Session will be ready when Parliament meets next year, because many returns were not ready this year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The practice has been to again move for returns that have not been brought down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are now about 100 returns that have not been brought down. If this amount of $10,000 is voted, we shall expect the clerks to be employed during the recess in getting returns ready.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, I understand that if this vote of $10,000 is passed, we may expect to get all the returns ordered by the House this Session when we meet again next year.

Mr. MILLS. It would be well if this could be done. I moved for returns early in February. None have come down, with one exception, and that in a mutilated condition.

Commercial Agencies..... $10,000

Mr. BOWELL. This is a new item, to cover the cost of obtaining statistical information in regard to the trade of the country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a curious heading.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; it is, perhaps.

Mr. MILLS. It seems that this information belongs to the Department of the Minister of Agriculture. We have had a volume brought down to us on this subject which was wholly unreliable, so much so that anyone knowing anything about his own constituency found that the information was utterly worthless.

Mr. WILSON. I think we should have some further information on this subject, as in the volume referred to a very small portion of the Dominion was considered at all, and no dependence could be placed on the information contained in it. Under these circumstances, it is rather unreasonable to ask for this sum.

Mr. MILLS. In that volume one party was reported as engaged in the business of hardware whose business was the filing of saws.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That was hardware.

Mr. MILLS. It was rather an extraordinary thing, that an old fellow who would get 10 cents for sharpening a buck-saw should be put down as one of the manufacturers of the country, engaged in one of the industries established by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 1:20 a.m., Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 10th July, 1885.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at half-past One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved,

That when the House adjourns this day, it stand adjourned until tomorrow, Saturday, at 1.30 o'clock p.m., and that Government business have precedence.

Motion agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders are called, I ask the indulgence of the House for one moment, with reference to a personal question. I this morning found some portions of the correspondence which the right hon. leader of the Government thought fit to refer to the other day, and I will present it to the House. I dare say the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Small) and the right hon. gentleman will be glad to get it, as I observed by one of the papers that they are anxious to have it. On the 7th of May I received this letter:

"55 ELIZABETH STREET,

"TORONTO, 6th May, 1885.

"To Hon. Mr. BLAKE, Ottawa.

"SIR,—The undersigned is just down from South Branch, Prince Albert settlement; have been farming in that neighborhood for five years. Been in the N.-W. for 14 years; on surveys 7 years. I would very much like to interview you on matters concerning the Government agents in the N.-W. T., and the half-breeds' villainies practised on C. P. R. surveys, wilful waste of both provisions and cash by J. A., C. E. I have been interviewed by reporters of papers here, but intend keeping my own counsel until I have been at headquarters. I am a ruined, hard-working farmer; have no funds, or would go straight to Ottawa. If you will send me a pass I will go and see you with my Indian, I have here as witness. He is a Sioux that I adopted when a small boy. Now he is a fine young man and a good specimen for the Government to look upon and treat accordingly. There would be no trouble in the west if my intended advice is noted down. Trusting you will kindly comply with my request, beg to remain, Sir, your humble servant,

"J. E. BROWN."

To which I replied—as I presume the right hon. gentleman obtained the original of my letter, and read it correctly; I read from his own statement:

"OTTAWA, 7th May.

"I have your letter of the 6th, and should be very glad indeed to learn from you any facts connected with the management of affairs in the Mr. WILSON.

North-West Territories. I would willingly comply with your request for a pass to Ottawa if it were in my power, but I have no means of procuring railway passes. It is possible, though by no means certain, I may be in Toronto for a few hours within the next few days, and if so I would try to arrange an interview with you, or if I am unable to manage that, I can arrange an interview with a confidential friend of mine, who would note down, for my own ear only, all you should choose to communicate, if this would be agreeable to you.

"Yours faithfully,

"EDWARD BLAKE."

To which I received this answer:

"55 ELIZABETH STREET, 5 a.m.

"To ED. BLAKE, Esq.,

"SIR,—In reply to yours just to hand, your friend can drop a line stating time and place. I will give him a few pointers that will bear weight with them. I think I stated to you in my last that I had to leave my home on the South Saskatchewan, Prince Albert, and after 17 days in snowshoes across the Birch Hills, lakes and plains, arrived at Troy, with just enough to pay our fares to Toronto, which was $56.75, and am now here with no funds, not even a dollar to pay our board. C. F. Miles, D.L.S., invited me up to Dr. Johnson, on Bloor street, to-day, and gave me a recommendation to a Mr. H. B. Proudfoot, D. and P. land surveyor, Clinton, also to George Rainball, D. and P. land surveyor, of Pembroke, that are going out on surveys soon. Now, you will observe, if my name appears at once in any of those charges I shall not get a position on any surveys for a long time to come. So I hope, for my sake, you will not mention my name. They can easily investigate and find out what I state to be correct. If you can put in a word for me and my boy to any surveyor that is going out, I shall be most thankful. Trusting we shall soon have a change of Government for the sake of the whole of Canada, beg to remain, obediently yours,

"BROWN."

To which I replied:

"OTTAWA, 12th May, 1885.

"DEAR SIR,—I have your letter, and will ask a friend to make an appointment with you. I will take care, as you desire, that your name shall not be used to your prejudice. I will not disclose it until you have had ample opportunity of securing an appointment for the surveys this year, if you are fortunate enough to do so. But I fancy there will not be a great deal of surveying done. I should gladly assist you in procuring employment if it were in my power, but I have no means of forwarding your interests in this respect. With thanks for your good wishes,

"I am, yours faithfully,

"EDWARD BLAKE."

I requested a friend of mine to communicate with a friend in Toronto, asking him to seek an interview with Mr. Brown, and my friend received from the friend in Toronto this letter, of which I read all the parts that bear on this matter:

"TORONTO, 23rd May, 1885.

"MY DEAR —, I have had Brown looked up and have seen him twice to-day, and have come to the conclusion that he is trying what he can make out of either side and making the most of it. He has been to see Sir John and claims that he has agreed to appoint him a Government detective at $1,200 a year to drive around the North-West, be provided with horse and conveyance, and so on. He says he is now waiting for a telegram from Ottawa—that he is to have money to pay his expenses to Elkhorn. He showed me a letter he had from Small, saying he had sent him a copy of the Homestead Act, and asking him if he had copies of the letters he sent to Mr. Blake he would like to see them. He says he has not sent copies. I had a friend with me at each of the interviews. I am inclined to think his Indian is the same as has been on exhibition in a King street window for a month, and offered to be leased out for show purposes. He says he wants to sell his information to either party who will pay him, and tells me his cash price to our side is $1,200; on the payment, his lawyer will hand over the roll. He had been indulging, looks hard, and is evidently a tough citizen. I judge he has been fairly educated, has good ability, with a considerable amount of cunning. If I learn anything of the consequence, I will let you know."

Then, after referring to a political matter:

"At this point I got interrupted, and I have not had time to sit down and write letters or anything else. Brown did not turn up on Monday night; considering it was a holiday, I did not think it likely he would be in condition to make an appearance; but he has not put in an appearance since. I think he sees there is little prospect of money, and my opinion, as well as that of those who have seen him, is that he is a dead beat."

I will only say to the hon. member for East Toronto that the shortest way is the best, and if he wanted to see Brown's letters, and had asked me for them, I would have been happy to have given them.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to call the attention of the House to certain words which the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) has put into a despatch which he says was written by me on the 16th of March, which are not in that despatch, and which are not like anything that despatch contains. The words that are really to be found in the despatch to the Lieutenant Governor were those read by the First Minister when he referred to this question:

"It is not necessary to look up parties who have claims. If they care for their interests, they themselves will come forward and establish their claims."

The hon. member for Provencher, professing to make that same quotation from the despatch—and it is marked as a quotation in this report—gives the following:

"It is perfectly unnecessary to look at parties who may have grievances, or who may have some claims upon the Government. Let them come forward and state their claims."

Now the hon. gentleman may be able to say how he has found words like those in any despatch sent by me.

Mr. ROYAL. No doubt the English grammar of the hon. gentleman is more correct than mine, and I am prepared to give him full credit for that. I am not prepared to say whether I read exactly from the document the other night, but I certainly gave the meaning and the sense of it.

Mr. MILLS. Neither its meaning nor sense.

Mr. ROYAL. I have not had, so far, an opportunity of looking at the proofs of Hansard. If I see that I quoted some extract in another language than the official language, or the language in which that extract was written, I will certainly make the amendment in the revised edition.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. Observing the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) in his place, I think it but right to myself and the party of which I am a member to call the attention of the House to the remarks made by him in my absence yesterday, remarks quite uncalled for, and, I am sure, dictated by a feeling that I personally do not entertain towards the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman said:

"When we think of the history of the Ottawa Citizen in the past, it is fruitful of many discussions. The Ottawa Citizen has had a checkered career during some years past. At one time, I believe, it was the property of a Minister of the Crown, held under mortgage; at another time it was the property of the sheriff; at another time it was the property of the tax collector of the city of Ottawa; and I believe it only exists, as has been proved by the public records, by the crumbs and droppings which fall from the Government table, and which it is always ready to take up. And when we think of the history of the gentleman who is the conductor of that journal we have something rather astonishing to remember. We can remember that this purist journalist is the man who was known all over the Dominion of Canada as the celebrated contract broker, as the man who had something to do with securing a large sum of money under the celebrated Whitehead contract, I think he is the last man, and his paper is the last paper, that should charge any hon. member of this House with being a sneak and a spy."

I may say that for three years previous to September last, I had no editorial connection with the Ottawa Citizen, but in September I became connected, with the reservation that during the Session I should not be expected to contribute articles dealing with members of the House of Commons.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I tell the hon. gentleman I have never contributed any article personally directed against any member of the House, since I have been in the House. The hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville), has thought proper to make a personal attack on me, and to resuscitate an old charge. Two years ago, I challenged hon. gentlemen opposite to show in what way I made, or whether I made, these large sums that the hon. gentleman spoke of. In different counties, at different elections, I have met these charges and disposed of them; I have cleared myself before my constituents who have endorsed my course.

The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) deemed proper last January to go to the county of Lennox to make attacks on me, and I there, at a public meeting, disposed of his charges completely; I told the people that under the same circumstances, having the inner consciousness that I had done no wrong, I would, under similar circumstances, repeat those transactions. In all my transactions, I have nothing to regret; I never received any favor from the Government they could not grant to any member of this House; I never approached the Government, directly or indirectly, in any shape or manner, with any object in view that could not bear the most severe scrutiny. I submitted the whole case to my constituents in the city of Ottawa, and year after year was re-elected mayor. Hon. gentlemen think they can brow-beat me by bringing up these charges, but I am prepared to meet them; I am prepared to place my record against the records of those who attack me, confident in the justice of my case. Let hon. gentlemen opposite remember that the only contract-broker we know of, who ever sat in Parliament, was the Speaker of the House of Commons during the Mackenzie Administration, and let them remember that another hon. member, a member of that Administration, had to resign his seat in consequence of his sharing a Government contract, and went back to his constituents, and was defeated. They should remember these things before attacking me, as they do, year after year. I am not afraid of the smallest or the biggest, of the lightest or the heaviest of hon. gentlemen opposite. I am prepared, on each and every occasion, to defend myself against their slanders. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) looks pleased. He has little cause to be pleased; he has no reason to be proud of any hon. member on his side, who, after I had made explanations two years ago and challenged anyone to say then what they had to say against me or hold his peace, will rise in the House in my absence and make insinuations against me. I am prepared to answer these charges before my constituents. Let any hon. gentleman dare to accept the challenge I make; let the best man they have resign his seat and I will resign mine and go to the polls against him in my constituency on all the charges they can formulate.

Mr. VAIL. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I have no doubt the hon. member for Digby has some recollection of resigning his seat and being defeated. After I had served the city of Ottawa in Parliament for three years, a public meeting took place, at which both Conservatives and Reformers were present, the result being that the meeting passed the following resolution:—

"That this public meeting of the ratepayers of the city of Ottawa hereby tender to Mr. C. H. Mackintosh, mayor of Ottawa, sincere thanks for the able, impartial, and strictly honest manner in which the affairs of the corporation have been carried on during his three years' administration of the duties of mayor of the capital."

Amongst the movers of the resolution were Aldermen Masson and Jamieson—two prominent Reformers—and Mr. Henry Bate, another prominent Reformer. Subsequently, at a meeting of the City Council it was resolved:

"That the members of the council hereby express their unqualified approval of the public spirited and judicious manner in which his worship, Mayor Mackintosh has administered the affairs appertaining to the chief magistracy of the Dominion capital during the past three years, and hereby bear testimony to the honesty, impartiality and ability which characterises the discharge of his duties in the responsible position to which the electors elevated him."

And one of the movers of that resolution was Dr. St. Jean, the Reform candidate in 1882, who, in fact, after it was passed, opposed me in 1882; and there were also among the movers of that resolution, Alderman Masson and Alderman O'Leary, two pronounced Reformers of this city. Yet, though I have been tried by my peers, though my constituents have over and over again given their verdict, because a newspaper contained an article which I did not write, or inspire, which I did not even know of and have not read, the hon. gentleman resurrects slanders and cries against me which had grown stale owing to the lapse of years. The hon. gentleman talked about a paper being held by a Minister of the Crown, and held under mortgage. I am not aware that any Minister of the Crown, since I have been connected with the Citizen—I can almost state positively that no Minister of the Crown ever—had a mortgage on or a dollars' worth of interest in the stock of the Citizen Company. If the contention of the hon. member for North Brant is correct, if his statement that we, the Conservative publishers or controllers of Conservative newspapers, can go to the Departments day after day, or week after week, and draw large sums of money from the Government, is correct, how is it, as he represents, that the Ottawa Citizen, which he says I control, is in such an unhappy condition as he says it is, and has been over and over again? How can he reconcile the statement he makes with the further statement that the Ottawa Citizen has been in extremis? The fact that the paper is in that position is proof positive that the Government has not dealt generously, or with sufficient generosity, towards the papers that support it. I have never asked a questionable favor from the Government, directly or indirectly, and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite—any one of them or any number of them—to show that, since I entered Parliament, I have been guilty of one action which would stain my escutcheon as a politician, or bring the blush of shame to the faces of my constituents. Until they can fight me on my parliamentary record, it is unfair and unjust for the hon. member for North Brant to make such an attack upon me. I have never yet taken notice of the slanders heaped on me by newspapers, and my time is too valuable and too precious to waste it in writing articles even on the profound member for North Brant. I have endeavored to live on terms of amity with hon. members. I have never personally written an article in reference to one of them. If I have anything to say in regard to any of them, I will say it to his face.

Mr. BLAKE. As the hon. gentleman has alluded to me, I will say that I did state the facts of his connection with the printing contract, and I may say that I intend, from time to time, to recite those facts, and I would recommend the hon. gentleman, before he fulfils his intention of repeating the operation, as he says he would do on any occasion that offered, to study the Act for the better prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving the expenditure of public moneys, which has been passed since the last transaction to which he refers.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. So far as advice given me by the hon. member for West Durham is concerned when backed by a statutory provision, I may be inclined to consider it, but, if it were tendered on his own biased political opinion, I would be the last man to accept it. The hon. gentleman must not imagine that I was not aware of that Act in relation to fraud. I said that, under similar circumstances, if I were a private individual, I would do the very same thing; and, when he speaks of the printing contract, let me say that the Ottawa Free Press, when I had voluntarily made my statement without being called upon to do so, because I had nothing to be ashamed of, in its issue of January 29th, 1880, said:

"We publish to-day the evidence of Mr. Mackintosh, given in the case Boyle vs. The Globe, and the explanation given by him, corroborated by Mr. Roger, seems to put a different aspect upon the printing contract controversy, in so far as Mr. Mackintosh is concerned. It appears from Mr. Mackintosh's evidence, Messrs. Maclean, Roger & Co., entered into an agreement with him some weeks before the tenders went in that he should join and not compete against them for the parliamentary printing. Mr. Mackintosh's interest to be settled in proportion to the amount of the contract if awarded to them. This arrangement it appears was carried out, Messrs. Maclean, Roger & Co., ultimately purchasing Mr.

Mr. MACKINTOSH.

Mackintosh's interest and not his tender, as was generally understood until now. The evidence seems to exonerate him from the allegations heretofore made, and under the circumstances we now deem it but just to place Mr. Mackintosh's position in a fair light, being neither desirous of doing an injury nor misrepresenting any of the parties more directly interested."

Mr. VAIL. The hon. gentleman for some reason or other has thought proper to bring my name in here. He has stated as a fact that I was a contract printer. I was not a contract printer in any way.

An hon. MEMBER. A contract broker.

Mr. VAIL. Nor a contract broker. I had nothing to do with the printing and never received a dollar directly or indirectly from the Government or anybody else, in this House or outside of it, in connection with any printing contract. I do not know why the hon. gentleman wanted to drag my name in, unless he desired to drag me down to his own level.

Mr. SOMERVILLE (Brant). It appears by what the hon. member for Ottawa has said, that an injustice was done him in attributing to him the authorship of the article referred to in the House yesterday. I am glad to know that the member for Ottawa was in a position to say that it is only at certain seasons of the year that he is editor of the Ottawa Citizen—that during the Session of Parliament, the most important of the different seasons of the year, when the most important discussions take place, he vacates the editorial chair. At the same time, he is the responsible editor of the paper, and he must be held responsible for what appears in that paper. I do not see how he can escape the responsibility for what appears in the Citizen. The hon. member for Ottawa, and the editor of the Ottawa Citizen, has a right to say what he thinks proper in regard to the member for North Brant, and to criticise the acts of the representatives of the people. I am glad to know that the member for Ottawa has an inward consciousness of his innocence in regard to those things which have been matters of history in the past, which have been referred to in the courts, which the judges of the land have taken cognisance of; but I think it will take a great deal of this inward consciousness that he professes to have to satisfy the public that he had nothing to do with contract broking in connection with the printing contracts some years ago. I will not say anything further except that every gentleman who comes here to represent a constituency has a duty to perform, and, in discharging that duty, he need not care for the frowns or the praises of any journal, no matter what its party politics may be. I have been too long used to the abuse heaped upon the Reformers of the country by the Conservative press to heed what is said either by the Ottawa Citizen or by any other Conservative paper. Any one on this side who discharges his duty must expect to be traduced by the organs of the Government. I anticipated that, and I would have been a little disappointed if that had not been meted out to me. I have therefore nothing to say with regard to that. So far, however, as the Ottawa Citizen is concerned, I have had a note sent to me just now informing me that it is at the present time in the hands of the tax-collectors. That verifies the statement I made yesterday, and the member for Ottawa is indignant that I should make any such statement when the facts are just what I said. He argues that the poverty of the Citizen shows that it does not receive a very large share of Government patronage, but in my opinion this only verifies the truth of the old saying that ill-gotten gains never stick. I say these Tory journals can never expect to prosper, or make money as long as they live, as they do, upon the droppings from the Government table. I say that no man who conducts a journal in such a way as that, and who depends upon the offerings of the Government, can possibly conduct an impartial newspaper in the public interest.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh. Order.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I know I am saying something which is very unpalatable to some hon. gentlemen, but it is the simple truth, and I think I am here for the purpose of stating the truth.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I did not desire to say anything personal to the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail), but he interrupted me while I was speaking.

Mr. VAIL. No, I think not.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I understood him to interrupt me while I was speaking, and I then called attention to the fact that the Halifax Printing Company, the firm of the Halifax Citizen, had received $25,000 from the Government of which he was a supporter; and when Mr. Jones, of Halifax, was a member of the company, and the hon. member for Digby himself had been a member of it; and I showed that he had to resign his seat in consequence of that, and was defeated when he went back to his constituents. So far as the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) is concerned, what he says about the Ottawa Citizen does not matter materially to me; but I think he is wrong in what he says about the tax-collector. I do not know where he gets his information, but even if it were true, the fact that a newspaper is in extremis is not absolute proof that it is receiving any favors from the Government. The Citizen has received few favors from the Government; it is fighting its own way, and thus the argument of the hon. gentleman that it is a subsidised organ falls to the ground. It makes absolutely no difference what the hon. gentleman says of myself. Gentlemen far superior to himself, men more profound, at least as profound as he is; men more able, at least as able as he is; men more astute, at least as astute as he is; men more honest, at least as honest as he is, have attacked me over and over again, and what is the result?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think this has gone far enough.

Mr. MACKINTOSH. I have said all I wanted to say and regret I was called upon to say anything.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. This is a personal matter, and I think it has already gone too far. Orders of the Day.

THE OFFICIAL REPORTS OF THE DEBATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A very great latitude, an undue latitude, in my opinion, was granted to the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Mackintosh) in the first place. He threw across the House taunts like "contract broker," to my hon. friend from Digby, without the faintest justification. However, Sir, I rose for the purpose of calling attention to a matter more pertinent, perhaps, to the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) who, if I mistake not, is Chairman of the Hansard Committee. Now, I notice that in the report of the 8th July, when a considerable discussion took place on the adjournment, scarcely one word of it appears. It appears to me there ought to be some regulation about this matter. Occasionally, on the motion for adjournment, statements are made of some moment. Statements were made on that occasion of some moment by my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Watson) and others, and I do not understand why the Hansard reporters should condense, to one line, a discussion which, to my knowledge, took some 20 or 25 minutes. I do not desire this Hansard, which is already unduly long, should be spun out unnecessarily, but still there ought to be some means to members of this House, who take part in the discussions, of knowing whether what they say is going to be reported. On all other occasions, at any rate, a summary of what passed has been given, and it is very often necessary that it should be. Here the whole thing has been expunged, and I do not think it should have been expunged under the circumstances.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I do not know whether the hon. gentleman, in referring to me as the Chairman of the Hansard Committee, implies that I had anything to do with this omission—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, no; I called attention to it.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I have nothing to say except that the instruction to the reporters is to report everything verbatim, and if they do not do it they ought to. I confess I have not looked at it; I do not supervise the report in any way, and should be very sorry to have to do so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not impute any blame to the hon. member on this occasion, but I only called his attention, as Chairman of the Committee, to the fact that a considerable omission was made.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). If we had no Hansard we would have shorter speeches and a shorter Session; and I think it would be more acceptable to members of this House if the Hansard were abolished altogether.

THE WASHINGTON TREATY.

Mr. WELDON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Government when the correspondence and telegrams with regard to the fisheries will be brought down.

Mr. BOWELL. I think I will be able to lay all the telegrams, with the exception of one letter, on the Table at six o'clock. I had them to-day, but when I came to look at them I found one important telegram had been omitted from the list, and I sent them back to the Deputy Minister's office to be completed.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman be able to lay upon the Table the papers connected with the transport regulation, that order abolishing the liberty of transport in United States ports, under the 30th article?

Mr. BOWELL. I have not yet received it. Immediately upon seeing the notice in the newspapers, I instructed the Commissioner of Customs to telegraph at once for a correct copy, as I did not deem it advisable to act upon a newspaper copy; and I have since received a copy of it from one of the forwarders in the West, Mr. Beatty of the Beatty line. I am not prepared to lay that upon the Table until I can investigate the effects that it will have upon some of the old orders.

Mr. BLAKE. I was about to invite the hon. gentleman's attention to that also. I suppose he has an authentic copy of the regulation which is cancelled by this. We have seen it in the papers—I have no doubt correctly—but of course we would like to have an official copy. That regulation appears to be a regulation of 1884, but it is, in fact, a consolidation of the Customs regulations of the United States passed about the time of the confirmation of the Washington treaty. It would be very important to have it. Without it, it is impossible for the House to understand the effect of the order; with it, it is very easy to understand it. I think it has a much more serious effect than the First Minister assumed when he spoke the other day.

Mr. BOWELL. The point to which the hon. gentleman has called my attention suggested itself to me, and immediately upon reading the last circular and comparing it with the provisions of the Washington Treaty, I instructed a clerk of the Department first to go to the law office of the Crown—for, unfortunately, it was not to be found in our Department—and then to consult the library, and to take every means possible to obtain the order to which the hon. gentleman refers, as I found it impossible to know exactly the full meaning and force of the last order without it. Of course it takes a few days to get it, but no time has been lost. The moment the order appeared in the newspapers, instructions were given at once to procure the paper.

SUPPLY.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.
(In the Committee.)

Lighthouse and Coast Service..... $549,990

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of Marine promised to give explanations on points to which his attention had been called by the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt).

Mr. McLELAN. With respect to Weller's Bay light, I may say that a sand bar on point is in course of formation, and until it ceases the lights cannot be permanently placed to lead clear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman's attention was also called to the practice, which was likely to lead to abuse, of lighthouse keepers farming out their places, and employing other persons at inadequate salaries. A statement was made with respect to that matter, and the hon. member for Prince Edward gave an instance of the light at Knap's Point, in which case a statement was made that the man who had been employed as assistant had reported to the Department that peculations had been going on with respect to the supplies. The hon. gentleman promised some information on this matter.

Mr. McLELAN. An investigation was held. It was found that in one of the cases the man appointed had farmed out the work without the sanction of the Department, and when the attention of the Department was called to it, the man who was removed made charges against the lighthouse keeper of peculation. Enquiry was made, and the report was that nothing, except some small article in connection with the lighthouse, had been taken. The man appointed was given notice that he must either attend to the light himself or resign.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister was requested to produce what papers he had on the subject. Has the hon. gentleman the papers with him?

Mr. McLELAN. I did not so understand it. I can, however, send copies to the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand, then, from the Minister, that the practice of farming out—I do not mean employing members of the man's family—is distinctly contrary to the regulations of the Department.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

WAYS AND MEANS—CONCURRENCE.

House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Ways and Means on 3rd March last, and 9th July, the latter to take effect on and after the 6th day of the present month of July.

Mr. BOWELL. The item with regard to labels should be amended by striking out the word "colored." I find that misapprehension as to the words "colored labels," has already arisen, among those who do not understand the technical meaning of the term. They think that it applies to any label printed on colored paper, but that is not the intention. I therefore move that the word "colored" be struck out.

Resolution, as amended, concurred in.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I asked the hon. gentleman to obtain some information as to the quantity of spirits ex-warehoused at certain points, particularly in Quebec, which he promised to ascertain.

Mr. BOWELL.

Mr. BOWELL. I have not been able to ascertain that yet. I will give it to the hon. gentleman to-morrow, or when the Bill is before the House.

Resolutions read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. BOWELL moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 157) to amend the Customs and Excise Acts.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAYS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the resolutions reported from the Committee of the Whole to grant the further subsidies therein mentioned towards the construction of the railways therein described, be now read the second time.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman was to give certain information upon this subject.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. An hon. gentleman asked for some information about the works executed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company on the North Shore line since they acquired it. Of course I cannot give the exact figures, but I will give a general statement. The amounts are: Expended on roadway and buildings to the 31st of December, 1884, $4,936,000, and to the 31st of April, 1883, $4,759,000, the difference, $177,000, being the expenditure made under that head; for rolling stock the amount was very small, $300 or $400; for machinery to the 31st December, 1884, $39,324, and to the 21st of April, 1883, $32,186, the difference being about $7,000, and for furniture a few hundred dollars, the whole being $7,679; paid to the city of Quebec on account of the Palais harbor property, $30,000; paid for the Jacques Cartier extension $150,000; material on hand, $25,000; sundries, $19,600. All these sums, with the amount of $250,000 to be paid for the stock, make over $500,000. This does not include the interest on the amount paid for the stock and other expenditures. As to the improvements to be made on the road, I cannot give the exact figures, but I will give generally the proposed arrangements. At Quebec there will be an elevator or two at the harbor works, and no doubt the line would have to be extended to the embankment in order to give facilities of communication between Palais Harbor and the docks. Of course, besides that, they would require to have sidings and other terminal facilities. Then a number of bridges that are in wood would have to be put in iron, and generally the line would have to be looked after in order to put it on a par with the remainder of the line. This will cost about the sum I mentioned the other day when I brought the resolutions before the House.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman said the other day the company had already expended $250,000 on improvements, and promised to give the details. He has not done so.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, I have. The expense of roadway buildings was about $180,000, and there are the amounts I have stated making the full amount.

Mr. LAURIER. I need hardly state to the House that having the honor to be one of the representatives of Quebec city I take a deep interest in the matter before us, but I have thought it preferable, under all the circumstances, to wait before offering any observations on the subject submitted to the House, until the Government had given us all the details which it had to give on its policy. Leaving aside that part of the resolution which provides for a subsidy to the Edmonston and Rivière du Loup Railway, which, in view of the subsequent proposals becomes of minor importance, the resolutions show us two things: first, that with regard to the policy announced last Session by the Government, of making the city of Quebec the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Government have come to no conclusion and no decision whatever. During the 12 months which have elapsed since the close of last Session, the Government, who had taken power under the Act, to settle that question, have not been able to come to any decision yet. True, last Session the Government took power, in view of the policy which, they said, was essentially their policy, of making the harbor of Quebec the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to provide for the organisation of a company, if they could not bring the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway to an understanding with regard to the purchase of the line from Montreal to Quebec. So far, they have done nothing. This year they have taken exactly the same powers; they do not bind themselves to anything definite, but they ask that the powers given to them last year to effect that object, and which have now lapsed, should be again given to them and extended for a period of two months after the close of the Session; that is to say, failing any agreement being come to between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk for the purchase of the North Shore Railway, the Government may organise a company for the same object. We may ask Will this policy be carried out this year or not? Will it remain a dead letter, as it was characterised by the hon. Minister the other day, on the Statute book? or will it have some tangible effect? I say, whether the Government act or do not act, under the subsequent resolution of the Government with regard to the Short Line Railway, they have dealt a death blow to their so-called policy of making the harbor of Quebec the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as I will show hereafter. With regard to the railway contemplated to connect Montreal with the seaports of the Maritime Provinces by the shortest route and the best route, they have made a selection. They could not come to a conclusion upon the other matter, but on this one they have, and they have selected a route by the way of the International Railway. The Minister of Public Works, the other day, when he introduced this matter to the House, made a statement to which it is my duty at once to take exception. He spoke as follows:—

“The policy of this Government has been to secure the connection of that railway, not only with the harbor of Montreal, but also to extend it to the port of Quebec, at all events, for the summer, and that during the winter months it should communicate with the seaports of the Maritime Provinces, by an extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Montreal. That policy was promulgated and supported by Acts of Parliament passed last Session, by which we voted, for a direct line from Montreal to the seaports of the Maritime Provinces, a yearly sum of money during a number of years, in order to assist the construction of that extension from Montreal to St. Andrews, St. John and Halifax. On the other hand, Parliament, at its last Session, expressed its desire that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be extended from Montreal to Quebec by the north shore of the St. Lawrence. An Act of Parliament was passed to that effect, and certain conditions were inserted, by which the Canadian Pacific Railway could extend its line from Montreal to Quebec, or failing that, certain other conditions were put in the law. Thus the policy of Parliament and this Government has been that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company shall be extended on the south shore of the St. Lawrence down to the seaports of the Maritime Provinces, and on the north shore of the St. Lawrence by the North Shore Railway to Quebec and thence by the Intercolonial.”

I take exception to this language, in so far as it tends to that the policy adopted by Parliament last Session was to extend the Canadian Pacific Railway south of the St. Lawrence from Montreal to the Maritime Provinces. I take exception to this statement in the most emphatic language. I challenge the accuracy of it. I deny it. I say that Parliament never adopted such a policy as that. I say that Parliament never committed itself to any line whatever for the continuation of the Canadian Pacific Railway on the south shore of the St. Lawrence. On the contrary, the policy adopted by this Parliament and recorded in the Act is that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be extended from Montreal by the shortest and best line, wherever that could be found, not south of Montreal, not from any other place, but wherever it should be found, after survey, the best and the shortest on the ground. This was the policy adopted by this Parliament, and the hon. gentleman cannot find a single syllable in the records of this House which can justify the statement he made the other day, that the policy of Parliament was to extend the Canadian Pacific Railway by the south shore of the St. Lawrence from Montreal to the seaboard of the Maritime Provinces. I say more. I say this was not the policy of the Government and, if it was, I should be bound to say, and it would be my duty to say, and I should be warranted in saying, that the Government have been guilty of the grossest deception to this House, because the House never heard, until the 1st of July instant, in the speech of the hon. gentleman, that the policy of the Government was to extend the Canadian Pacific Railway from Montreal on the south shore of the St. Lawrence; that was the first statement that was ever made. We never heard a word of it before, and if it was the policy of the Government, they carefully kept it concealed in their own breast. I repeat that, if such was the policy of the Government, they have been guilty of the grossest deception to the House and the people of this country. Occasions have not been wanting for them to express their views. There has been lurking in the minds of many a suspicion that indeed this was the policy of the Government, that it was in fact what was declared the other day their intention, to extend the Canadian Pacific Railway from Montreal on the south shore of the St. Lawrence; but, if there was a suspicion on that subject, the Government never spoke on it, though time and again they had an opportunity of speaking their minds on the subject. There was a lurking suspicion, and that found its way into the press many times, not only that, but the Minister of Militia last summer had a picnic at Rivière du Loup for the express purpose of talking a little with the Prime Minister on that subject, and he the Prime Minister, had an opportunity of speaking then, and what did he say? Did he say that the policy of the Government was that which has been stated now by his colleague, to extend the Canadian Pacific Railway on the south shore of the St. Lawrence from Montreal? No, as reported in the press, the Prime Minister said on that occasion that the Government had no line but the shortest and the best. If that was the policy of the Government then, the policy has varied since, and if it has not varied, then I say the Prime Minister did not act towards those whom he was addressing with that fairness to which they were entitled. Not only did the Prime Minister give his views upon the subject, but the Minister of Public Works himself had occasion to speak on the matter. He spoke in the month of December at the city of Three Rivers, and he did not then say as he said the other day that the policy was to extend the Canadian Pacific Railway from Montreal on the south shore of the St. Lawrence. He is reported to have made a statement which agreed with the statement of the First Minister, that the policy was to secure the best and shortest line, after proper survey. I say that the action of the Government to-day, coupled as it is with the language we have heard from the Minister of Public Works and even without that, will create in parts of this country, and in several parts of it, a deep sense of regret and indignation, regret and indignation arising, and naturally arising, from the fact that the Government have not kept the promise they made last year to this House, that they have broken the pledge which they then gave to the House and to the public. What is the history of this matter? Last year, when the first measure was presented to the House, the Government took power to decide themselves, without any reference to this House, the selection of the best and shortest line. I moved an amendment on that occasion, to the effect that the choice should not be final, but should be referred to the House for approval. A majority of the House was induced to negative that amendment, but in order to get their followers to negative it, the Government had to make promises to them, and the promise was that no line should be adopted except after the most complete surveys. Sir Charles Tupper, who had charge of that measure, spoke as follows in reference to the motion which I had before the House:—

"It is intended, before any line is adopted, that the shortest and best route shall be ascertained by competent engineers, and the Government shall locate the line upon the report of competent engineers, upon what they find, after careful examination, to be both the shortest and best line."

This was the promise made by Sir Charles Tupper upon that occasion, but, complete and thorough as it was, the Minister was questioned by some hon. members in order to have the assurance if possible more complete than it was. The then member for Lévis, Mr. Belleau, said:

"I would like to ask the Minister of Railways if the Government is disposed to admit the principle, that, besides the engineer, who is to be appointed by the Government to make the exploration, other engineers who may be suggested by the Provinces interested, could be admitted as parties to the exploration."

And the answer of Sir Charles Tupper was:

"We will be only too glad to receive any suggestions of that kind."

Not satisfied with this, the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Grandbois) went on further and expressed his satisfaction and the reason why he would vote against the amendment which I proposed:

"After the very explicit statements made by the hon. Minister of Railways, it will be readily understood that it is my duty to vote against the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec East; otherwise I would have hesitated a great deal, as the county which I have the honor to represent is one of the counties the most interested in having the short line built exclusively on Canadian territory. The resolution states that the shortest and best line will be chosen, which enables me to hope, Mr. Speaker, that the line will really be built on Canadian soil, and will go through Rivière du Loup, as the hon. member for Quebec East has said."

So this was one—not only one, it was the paramount reason for which the member for Temiscouata voted against the amendment, that the Government pledged themselves to have the whole of the lines thoroughly surveyed before they made a choice. Now, I charge this upon the Government, I charge them deliberately on the floor of this House, that they have not kept the promise they made last year. They have broken the pledge they then made. This, perhaps, may be considered hard and strong language, but I use it advisedly, and I repeat that the Government have broken the pledge they gave last year when they said no selection would be made until after the most complete and thorough surveys. After the departure of Sir Charles Tupper, the Department of Railways was put under the control of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, whom I am sorry not to see in his place when this matter is before the House, but I must say in his absence, as I would say in his presence, that strong objections were taken at the time to the Department of Railways being put under his control because he was supposed to be interested in one of the lines which were to be surveyed, and which might afterwards be adopted and selected. The complaints came not so much from the Opposition press as from the Ministerial press. I will quote here the opinion of a Ministerial paper published in Montreal, which is a strong supporter of the Government—it cannot be objected that it is not a most Conservative paper—I mean L'Etendard.

Mr. GIROUARD. An Independent paper.

Mr. LAURIER. An Independent paper which warmly supports the Government, but it offered a good example to some members in reference to the Franchise Bill. That is the only question on which the L'Etendard did not support the Government:

Mr. LAURIER.

"It is really unfortunate from many points of view that Mr. Pope, the Minister of Agriculture, immediately after the departure of Sir Charles Tupper, was charged with the control of the Department of Railways. Rightly or wrongly it is stated that this gentleman has a considerable personal interest in causing the new railway to pass by Sherbrooke. It is even stated that a considerable portion of that railway, of which the hon. gentleman is said to be the quasi or exclusive proprietor, is to be bought by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at an immense profit for Mr. Pope, if he succeeds in getting a route selected which would permit the incorporation of that portion of the road into the new road. We do not know personally how much truth there is in this statement, but we can hardly believe it. But we do not hesitate to say that Mr. Pope should not have been entrusted with the control of these matters as long as there exists the least reasonable suspicion that he has a personal interest to serve in this connection. Not only would he then become a judge in the case, not only would he, one of the chief officers of the State, find himself in a position to be able to serve his own personal interests to the detriment of the State, but such a state of things would create an immoral and dangerous precedent."

Such is the opinion of L'Etendard. Now, during last summer numerous complaints were made in the press that the surveys which were made were not bona fide, were not thorough, but that they were partial. Another paper to which objection will not be taken as being a Conservative paper, Le Canadien, spoke as follows on this matter:

"This exploration is not made. What is now taking place is a farce, a snare, and a sham exploration. The instructions given to the engineers are insufficient, and the engineers are the first to admit it."

L'Etendard, speaking again upon this subject, said:

"The apprehensions of the adversaries of the Sherbrooke line would seem to be, to a certain degree, justified by the fact that Mr. Pope, Acting Minister of Railways, is said to be partial to the extent of not giving to the engineers the instructions necessary to insure an impartial survey of the different rival routes."

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is only fair to the Acting Minister of Railways to say that he stated the other day that he had nothing whatever to do with these surveys. Well, whoever had anything to do with them, the fact remains that the surveys are not accurate, and particularly are not complete. The Acting Minister states that when he took charge of the Department he would not act in this matter. That he entrusted it to the Prime Minister, and that the Prime Minister was responsible for all the surveys. Sir, this story is not new, it is as old as humanity itself. It is the old story—I am not the one, but the woman whom thou gavest to me to wife, she is the one. Whoever in this matter is the tempter, or whoever is the fallen one—whether the Prime Minister was the tempter and the Acting Minister of Railways the tempted, or whether the reverse was the case—and I am rather inclined to believe that the Minister of Railways was the sweet Eve on this occasion—whoever was the guilty one, the fact remains that the subsidy has been granted to, and the selection has been made in favor of a railway in which the Acting Minister of Railways is directly interested, and this has been done after the promises made by the Government last year that no selection should be made except after complete surveys. These promises had been broken and violated. Now, Mr. Speaker, I proceed to show in what manner and to what extent these surveys are incomplete. In the first place, it was generally understood last year that no subsidy should be given to a line passing through foreign territory until it had been ascertained by surveys that it was impossible to find in our own territory a line, not as good, but almost as good as the line over the foreign territory. What was then the first thing to be done? The first thing to be done was certainly to have this line which was projected exclusively upon Canadian soil fully surveyed. A line was suggested by the way of Edmonston and Rivière du Loup. It was then said, and it has been repeated several times since, that as good a line, a line almost as short, and a better line, in respect of gradients and curvatures, could be found upon Canadian soil by the way of Rivière du Loup. Two routes were proposed to connect Rivière du Loup and Edmonston. One was by the way of the valley of the Rivière du Loup, and the other was by the way of Rivière Ouelle. It would appear that both have been surveyed, but we have the reports only of one survey. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Blondeau) complained the other day that the report of the survey of the Rivière Ouelle route had not been brought down, and in this connection it may be interesting to quote the report of the chief engineer which has been laid upon the Table, at page 2, where he says :

"Mr. Crawford was in charge of section E, from St. Roch to Edmonston. His plans and profiles are not yet completed, neither has he reported; but he states that a good line is to be had in his survey. He hopes to have his plans and profiles complete and his report ready by the end of this month.

"Mr. Crawford also had charge of section F, from Rivière du Loup to Edmonston. He is busy with the plans and profiles, and hopes to have them ready early in May, together with his report. He states that a practicable line may be obtained, though the grades will be heavy."

The report which states that the grades will be heavy has been brought down, but the other report, in which it is stated that a good line could be had, has not been brought down. What is the reason that both reports have not been brought down? If two surveys have been made, why did not the Government bring them both down, so that the House could judge whether their selection was justifiable or not? Moreover, it is impossible to say whether this line, the report of which we have not complete, is better or worse than the other line through the State of Maine, which has been selected. But the two lines are subsidised, the one from Rivière du Loup to Edmonston, and the one by the way of the International and through the State of Maine. Now, what is the object of giving these two subsidies? In so far as the object is to connect the harbor of Montreal with the seaports of the Maritime Provinces, this can be done by either line, and consequently there is no use whatever in subsidising the two—the one destroys the other. Whether the line through Maine be the better one, or whether the Canadian line be the better one, the one subsidy destroys the other, and one of them is wholly useless.

But it was very properly stated at the time that the line through Maine should be surveyed, and if so I am at a loss to know why the line by way of Richmond to the maritime ports has not also been surveyed. Time and again the county of Richmond and several municipalities in adjoining counties have petitioned this Government to survey a line which they proposed, and which they contented was as good, and even a better line, than the International. I cannot see any reason why this request was not granted; I cannot see any reason why, in face of the promise made last year, that no selection would be made until after a complete survey had been made of all lines proposed, this line has not been surveyed. The other day the Minister of Public Works, speaking of the line by way of Quebec, of which I shall speak presently, said it had not been surveyed because, looking at the map and tracing a direct line from Montreal to the harbors of the Maritime Provinces, the Quebec route was too great an angle from the straight line. When the hon. gentleman was tracing that line on the map he must have found that Richmond is very nearly on the central point of the line, and is almost the nearest point on the direct line from Montreal to ports in the Maritime Provinces. The hon. gentleman did not base his selection on that fact, and I quite approve of his so doing. It will not do to select a line simply upon the map, for the short line cannot be determined except upon actual survey on the ground, because we know that in railway construction the distance in mileage is not everything, but grades and curves are important considerations. As I have said, the hon. gentleman will find that Richmond is nearly on the direct line between Montreal and the seaports of the Maritime Provinces. But, strange to say, in order to exclude Richmond the hon. gentleman sets the map aside, and to exclude Quebec the hon. gentleman resorts to the map.

There was another line which was proposed, and that was the line by way of Quebec, a line designed to connect the St. Lawrence at Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, and to extend from Quebec City to Canterbury. Upon this line one of the engineers of the Government, Mr. Light, reports as follows. The report is dated 26th March, 1885:—

"Sir,—In my report of surveys, dated 23rd inst., I incidentally directed attention to a line designated "The combination line" to connect Montreal with the Maritime Provinces. I feel convinced this line, if established in connection with a bridge over the St. Lawrence at Quebec, will combine in a marked degree the traffic requirements of Montreal, Quebec, St. Andrews, St. John, St. Stephens, Fredericton, Halifax, and the ports further east, placing all localities on a fair and equal footing.

"This combination line will run from Canterbury, N.B., to Lake Chesuncook, in the State of Maine, and from Lake Chesuncook by the valleys of the Famine and Etchemin Rivers to Chaudière Junction, opposite Quebec, and from thence through the bridge and North Shore Railway to Montreal.

"At Canterbury this combination line will connect with the railway system of the Maritime Provinces.

"Starting from Chaudière Junction the line would traverse the valleys of the Etchemin and Famine Rivers, to the height of land near the village of St. Justin.

"The summit is 950 feet above the starting point at Chaudière Junction, or 509 feet lower than the summit on the line surveyed by me, via the Rivière du Sud. From St. Justin the line would continue its course south-east, and nearly direct to the vicinity of the head of Lake Chesuncook, where it would connect with the line surveyed during the past season by Mr. Vernon Smith, C.E., between that lake and Canterbury.

"The country from Chaudière Junction to Lake Chesuncook, and I understand from Lake Chesuncook to Canterbury, lies in such a low valley or depression that it would appear as being the natural direct route for a line of railway between the Province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, and as being the channel through which nature intended that the trade between these Provinces should flow."

A little further on he says:

"The eastern extension of the combination line from Canterbury to Harvey would give St. John a good connection, while another extension from Canterbury along the right bank of the St. John would continue this system of easy gradients to Fredericton, at which place the River St. John would be bridged, and the line continued, via the head of Grand Lake, for the most part through a flat country, to Salisbury, there intersecting the Intercolonial Railway.

"This line would have a marked effect on the trade with the Maritime Provinces, and would go far to compensate for the increase distance to their ports as compared with Portland, Boston and New York. (See synopsis of distance from Callander to St. John and Halifax, via Chesuncook, App. 6.) It would save about 150 miles of railway to Halifax, and nearly double that to St. John; and should be thoroughly constructed with rails and bridges sufficiently strong to carry the consolidation engines (now so much in use in Pennsylvania), capable of hauling a gross load of 800 to 1,000 tons over its grades, or nearly double that which could be hauled on the Intercolonial Railway, with the same power, and at little additional cost per train mile.

"The railways from the Province of Quebec to the ports of Boston and Portland, although apparently shorter, have to ascend the higher lands of the watershed, which is the boundary, and have therefore much higher summits and steeper gradients. The Ogdensburg and Portland Railway passes over a summit of the White Mountains, in New Hampshire, 1,890 feet above the sea level, with maximum grades of 116 feet to the mile and minimum curves of 9 degrees (633 feet rad.).

He goes on further to say:

"The line would pass directly through the extensive coal fields at the head of Grand Lake, New Brunswick, (mentioned in the reports of the Geological Survey), one seam alone of which is estimated to contain one hundred millions tons of coal, so near the surface that it is quarried and not mined. This mineral, at present almost excluded from commerce in this isolated district, could be carried as return freight, ensuring loaded trains both ways, and bituminous coal, reported to be excellent for forging and other purposes, could be delivered at Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa for $3, $3.86 and $4.33 per ton."

That opinion is the opinion of one of the engineers employed by the Government. It is true that the other day some hon. member attempted to cast some imputations upon the professional character of Mr. Light. It is no business of mine to defend Mr. Light from those imputations. His report is there; the figures are there, and they cannot be challenged by any imputation. Moreover, the only imputation made was simply this: that formerly, while in the employment of the Quebec Government, he had been amenable to certain influences coming from Terrebonne. There are more engineers than one in the country, and there are more sources of influence than one also; and I believe, if in former times the source of influence was

Terrebonne, that source is dry to-day, that the source of influence is now to be found in the county of Compton. Upon this report made by Mr. Light the chief engineer made the following observations:

"Query No. 1.—Mr. Light, on pages 2 and 3, expresses a belief that the maximum grade between Quebec and Moncton by way of Chesuncook and Harvey would be 35 to 40 feet per mile, and that the surveys of last season have established that the grades above mentioned can be obtained between Chesuncook and Harvey.

"Mr. Vernon Smith's survey, the only one made between Chesuncook and Harvey last season, shows maximum grades of 53 feet per mile.

"The line between Quebec and Chesuncook has not been surveyed."

I ask the Government why this line has not been surveyed? Was not the promise made last year, that all competing lines would be surveyed, that only competent engineers would be employed; and when one of the engineers employed by the Government says that further surveys should be made in order to do justice to all parties, what excuse can be put forward by the Government for not having this line in question surveyed?

Mr. COLBY. When did he say that? When did the engineer suggest that this survey should be made?

Mr. LAURIER. I will answer the hon. gentleman in the language of Mr. Light himself. In reply to Mr. Schreiber's statement, that the line between Quebec and Chesuncook had not been surveyed, Mr. Light says:

"I always considered that a survey of this line was most important, and strongly recommended to Mr. Schreiber that it should be made, by telegram dated 1st August, 1884. His reply was a peremptory refusal."

Mr. COLBY. Would the hon. gentleman like a copy of that telegram to assist his argument?

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman surprises me. The hon. gentleman is in the secrets of the Government, but why did not the Government take the House into its secrets, and not some members of the House only? Was the promise made only to certain members of the House, who happened to be in favor of a certain line? Was not the promise made to all the members of the House? The hon. member for Stanstead has certain preferences, for which I do not blame him, in favor of another line, but I have just the same right that he has to be put in possession of the secrets of the Government. I charge the Government with not taking this House in their confidence, and confiding to individual members the information they ought to have confided to the House, and that in not doing so, there was another breach of duty to the House.

Mr. COLBY. I asked for information and received it, and if the hon. gentleman had asked for information, it would have been given.

Mr. LAURIER. I act upon the information given us by the Government, but what I complain of is that the Government had supplied us with incomplete information, and what the hon. gentleman has just now stated goes further to justify the charge I have been bringing against the Government. What was the reason given by the Minister of Public Works for not calling for a survey of this line from Quebec? His reason was that he had taken a map and he had caused to be traced there the different lines, and he found such a difference in the angles that he had to give Quebec up. Here is his language:

"At all events, I asked the chief engineer of railways to prepare this other map, and to show on it the air line from Montreal to Louisburg, that is to say, the straight line from one point to the other. I have had that line drawn, and the Mattawamkeag route is contrasted here with the other lines passing through Quebec and the other portions of the territory, and the result is that this Mattawamkeag route is, at its greatest distance from the air line, distant 20 miles from it; that is to say, that the distance to the air line, from the point which is the farthest on the Mattawamkeag route from the air line, is 20 miles, whilst the most distant point on the other lines through Quebec is 80 miles from the air line. It is impossible that any calculation can show that a line which is 80 miles at a number of points from the air line can be shorter than the other line, which is, at its most distant point, distant about 20 miles from the air line. It stands to reason, though there are curves, that if, instead of putting a curve, you draw a line from Montreal to the extreme point, and another line to the point where it reaches the air line on the Quebec route, and do the same thing for the Mattawamkeag route, you will find that that will make two triangles; and it is elementary that the longest side of a triangle is shorter than the two other sides. Therefore, if the distance from the base to the farthest point of the triangle is 20 miles, the route or distance of the two sides of that triangle must be shorter than that of the two sides of the other triangle, in which the distance from the base to the highest point is 80 miles. Therefore, with all my good-will to my native city of Quebec, with all the desire to do all I could do for it, facts are facts, truth is truth, and I must go by the facts and the truth."

Now, I ask if that was what was promised last year when the Government stated that they would have all the competing lines surveyed by thoroughly competent engineers? The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do, that railway distances are not measured on maps, that they can be measured only on the ground, not only in point of mileage, but in point of grades and curves which cannot be done on a map, and I say this is a dereliction of duty on the part of the Government, in not having a proper survey made, and deciding merely upon a map. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman was quite sincere when he said his heart was almost broken when he had to decide against his native city of Quebec, but I cannot pity him or sympathise with him, because if he had taken the trouble to take even the insufficient reports he had before him, he would have found that the line by Quebec was actually shorter than the Mattawamkeag line: and perhaps it may not be even yet too late to take up these reports and figures, and change his decision, and thus prevent his heart from further falling to pieces, by doing justice to his native city. I invite the hon. gentleman's attention to the figures he will find in the report of the engineers. The chief engineer—I do not pretend to say that he is influenced—in the papers we have before us, reports the distances by way of the line by Montreal and St. John as 274 miles. But the engineer, in making up his distance, conveniently leaves out the existing railways out of the calculation, and strikes across the country a route which is not surveyed, amounting as he says, to 58 miles. I object to this mode of calculation, and if we want to have a fair calculation we must take the figures we have from actual surveys and existing railways, and not from the fanciful figures derived from imperfect information, as it always is imperfect unless based on actual ascertained facts. Now, the actual distance is calculated from Montreal from Bonaventure station, I imagine; but that is not right. The distances should not be calculated from Montreal, but should be calculated from Hochelaga, though that, perhaps, would not be fair if we are to make comparisons with the other line. I think the best starting point is to base our calculations from St. Martin's Junction, which would be the diverging point of the two lines. Now, what are the distances? The distance from St. Martin's Junction to Chaudière Junction, including the bridge over the St. Lawrence at Cap Rouge is 161 miles. The actual distance, as I find it on the time-table from St. Martin's Junction to Petite Rivière Junction is 155 miles, and from Petite Rivière to Chaudière 6 miles, according to a table which I have before me, so that the distance, between these two points is 161 miles. The distance from Chaudière Junction and Chesuncook is 105 miles. My authority for this is the report published by Mr. Light, page 18; but this part of the ground has not been instrumentally surveyed; we have to go on more or less probable figures; but I can give evidence that the figures—though not given on actual surveys, but only on barometrical surveys—cannot be very far wrong, because Mr. Vernon Smith, in his report, at page 27, says: "It is but a little over 100 miles from Chesuncook to Levis." Then the distance from Chesuncook to Harvey is 136 miles, upon actual survey; from Harvey to St. John, by the existing railway, the distance is 66 miles, making a total of 468 miles. Now, let us see what the distances are by the other line, the subsidised line. From St. Martin's Junction to Mile End, 6 miles; from Mile End to Lachine, where it is intended to bridge the St. Lawrence, about 9 miles; from Lachine to Lennoxville, including bridge, 100 miles; the International Railway, 89 miles; from the International Railway to Mettawamkeag, 136 miles, according to the survey; from Mettawamkeag to Vanceboro, by the existing railway, 56 miles; from Vanceboro to St. John, 91 miles; total, 471 miles. So that by these figures, which cannot be disputed, the calculation of the Minister of Public Works and the map are shown to be erroneous. The distance is actually shorter by Chesuncook than by Mettawamkeag. These are the facts, and these facts I submit to the solemn consideration of the hon. Minister of Public Works. Then, with regard to the gradients; some time ago, when we had a discussion on this matter, it was stated as a blemish on the line which I advocate, by way of the North Shore Railway, Quebec, and Chesuncook, that the gradients from Hochelaga to the Mile End were 82 feet to the mile. If that is an argument at all, it applies to both lines; no train can go from Hochelaga to Mile End unless it passes upon that grade. But on the rest of the line which is to be subsidised by the resolutions, from Montreal to Mettawamkeag, the hon. gentleman stated the other day that the grades are 74 feet to the mile. What are the grades on the line from Quebec to Chesuncook? Mr. Light, in his report, says that they are from 40 to 45 feet to the mile; at all events, he says there is a difference of almost 20 feet to the mile between the grades of the two lines. What does Mr. Schreiber say on this point? On page 15 of the report, the statement made by Mr. Light, in the language of Mr. Schreiber, is as follows:—

"Mr. Light, on pages 2 and 3, expresses a belief that the maximum grade between Quebec and Monoton by way of Chesuncook and Harvey would be 35 to 40 feet per mile, and that the surveys of last season have established that the grades above-mentioned can be obtained between Chesuncook and Harvey."

Then Mr. Schreiber gives this as his answer:

"Mr. Vernon Smith's survey, the only one made between Chesuncook and Harvey last season, shows maximum grades of 53 feet per mile."

I do not think this is a fair statement by Mr. Schreiber, because Mr. Smith actually says, in his report:

"By slightly increasing the earthworks, I believe that on a re-survey the objectionable points may be greatly improved, and that the whole distance from Harvey to Chesuncook may be covered with gradients not exceeding 35 feet per mile, and with no curve exceeding 3 degrees or 1,910 feet radius."

So that Mr. Smith actually corroborates the statement of Mr. Light, that upon this line the maximum gradients could be reduced to 35 or 40 feet to the mile; whereas, it is admitted by the Minister himself, and in the reports, that the gradients on the Mettawamkeag line, or some of them, at least, are 74 feet to the mile. This will not surprise anybody, when we look at the statements which have been made with regard to the summits. Mr. Light says that the summits to be overcome on the line I advocate are only 950 feet, and some of the other engineers 750 feet, whereas it is admitted that on the International line the summits to be overcome exceed 1,800 feet; so that there must be a considerable difference in the gradients. I have only taken the figures so far as they apply to St. John; I have not taken them so far as they apply to St. Andrew's or Halifax. With regard to a line to Halifax, I cannot do better than quote from a letter addressed by Mr. E. H. Keating to the mayor and citizens of Halifax, with regard to the two proposed lines.

"If we now turn our attention to the surveys projected across the country from the vicinity of Quebec, it will be found, if any reliance is to be placed in the statements of the engineers who have examined the ground, that a shorter, cheaper and superior line, passing over much lower summits, with easy curves and moderate gradients, involving no engineering difficulties and free from most of the objectionable features of the more southern route, can easily be obtained. This line has been advocated by Mr. Light and is shown on the accompanying map by heavy dashes marked 'combination line.' Although this route presents the strongest possible claims for favorable consideration, it is not shown upon the Government map, nor is it referred to in the report. It passes through a country which is said to need railway facilities and development, it does not involve the construction of as many miles of new railway as the southern route described, and it can be much more cheaply built and operated. For the above reasons, in the interests of the port of Halifax and the Maritime Provinces, and in the common interests of the Dominion, I would most strongly urge upon your committee, the Government of the Province, the city council and the Chamber of Commerce, to leave no stone unturned to procure, if it is possible to do so, the adoption of this route, and to spare no pains to prevent, by all legitimate means, the selection of a line which must inevitably have the effect of diverting to foreign ports the bulk of that traffic to and from the west which is ours by right, and will deprive us of our last visible chance of regaining commercial prosperity. In describing the combination line, which is recommended to your favorable consideration, I will first give the distances as measured and calculated by Mr. Light, and over those portions of the route which are common to other projected lines. I will afterwards refer to any apparent discrepancies in measurement when compared with the distances given in the official report of the Government. The combination line is proposed to run from Montreal to Chaudière Junction over the North Shore Railway, 173 miles, crossing the river by the contemplated bridge at Cap Rouge, near Quebec. From Chaudière Junction the line would traverse the valley of the Etchemin and Famine Rivers, and from thence would run in nearly a direct line to Lake Chesuncook, 105 miles. From Lake Chesuncook to Canterbury, 111 miles, the line follows the survey of Mr. Vernon Smith. From Canterbury to Salisbury, 121 miles, it would either go direct to Fredericton or by way of Harvey and Fredericton. From Salisbury to Halifax, 200 miles, the Intercolonial Railway would be followed. The total distance between Montreal and Halifax by this route will thus be seen to be 710 miles, of which 337 miles require to be built, while to St. John the distance would be 481 miles, with 242 to build, or, in other words, there would be a saving over the southern route of 30 miles from Montreal to Halifax."

And then, speaking of the discrepancies, he says:

"On certain sections there are minor discrepancies between Mr. Light's figures and those given in the official report presented to the Government, which are too insignificant to demand any special notice, as they do not exceed one mile in each instance."

Since the discrepancies are so slight, it is not worth while going into them. Now it may be asked: Do hon. gentlemen opposite, representing the Maritime Provinces, which are specially interested in the line to Halifax, expect that this line, as it is now laid down in the resolution, from Montreal to Mettawamkeag and Fredericton and Salisbury, will ever be constructed, as contemplated in the resolution? If they do, they have greater faith in the resolution than I have. I believe the line will be built to Mettawamkeag, but I do not believe it will be constructed any farther east. There are many reasons which induce me to believe that. In the first place, we have this year an increase of subsidy, but we have no explanation as to the reason of the increase. Last year the subsidy voted was $170,000 a mile for 15 years; this year it is increased to $250,000 for 20 years, but we have not, so far, a single word of explanation as to what is the cause which has induced the Government to make this increase, or as to the principle on which it is based. The whole thing has been left in the dark. The leader of the Opposition the other day questioned the Government as to that, but he could obtain no answer. Not a word has been uttered on the floor of Parliament, not a paper brought down, to show on what principle this subsidy has been increased. Another question that occurs to me is: who are to-day the promoters of that line? We have not a word of information as to that. All we know is, that it is understood this is to be an extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But who are the actual promoters of the line? Who offers to build the line on those conditions? We do not know. And a more significant fact is this: This subsidy has been calculated evidently, and has been brought down to the House—this subsidy of $250,000 a year for twenty years—to build what? A railway from Montreal to Salisbury? No; from Montreal to Mettawamkeag. Such was the resolution when it was introduced. The resolution then provided for the construction of a railway from Montreal to Mettawamkeag, for a line of railway to connect Montreal with the harbors of St. John and Halifax via Sherbrooke, Moosehead Lake and Mettawamkeag. There was not a word of Fredericton or Salisbury. But I understand that certain hon. members from the Province of Nova Scotia went to the Government, and the next day, when the resolutions were introduced, these words were added by a stroke of the pen: That the subsidy should apply, not only as first contemplated, for a line to Mettawamkeag, but also for a line of railway connecting Montreal with the harbors of St. Andrews, St. John and Halifax, via Sherbrooke, Moosehead Lake, Mettawamkeag, Harvey, Fredericton and Salisbury; so that in the course of a night the whole policy of the Government was altered most materially. The Government brought in a resolution to the House, inviting Parliament to vote $250,000 a year for twenty years to build a railway as far as Mettawamkeag. This was the subsidy which, in their opinions, was required to build such a railway, yet the following day they propose that addition to the resolution which will increase the construction of the railway by at least 100 miles of new railway. The promoters of this policy were actuated either by honesty or by greed. In the former case, they demanded a subsidy to build a railway to Mettawamkeag and no further, and I suppose they demanded the subsidy requisite to carry out that object. Is it to be supposed these men would undertake for the same subsidy to build 100 miles more of new railway. If they were actuated by greed only, would they give up the large subsidy? These facts lead me to the inevitable conclusion that the railway will never be built to the harbors of Fredericton and Salisbury except on paper. There is another aspect to these resolutions. The resolution proposes what last year was proposed, that the North Shore Railway should be placed under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway for the purpose of making Quebec the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Government have several times avowed their policy of making Quebec the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir Charles Tupper last year spoke in this significant language on this subject:

"And as regarded the other portion, the only hesitation, the only doubt that existed as to the propriety of expending the $12,000 per mile from Montreal to the harbor of Quebec, arose from the fact that the Government of Quebec had parted with that portion of the railway, and that, at this moment, it did not afford that short and unrestricted line of communication for the Canadian Pacific Railway to make the harbor of Quebec that which it is believed, in the interest of the whole of this country, it is desirable it should be made, namely, the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway."

So that the Government are here committed, in the mouth of Sir Charles Tupper, who was entrusted with the carrying out of their railway policy, to the policy of making Quebec the summer terminus, and this in the best interests, not only of the city and district and Province of Quebec, but of the whole country. On the same occasion, the hon. the Minister of Public Works spoke in even a more emphatic manner. He said:

"In answer to the hon. member for Bellechasse I must say this—the hon. gentleman speaks as if the extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway was not to be in the Province of Quebec. The extension is to be from Montreal to Quebec, and in the Province of Quebec, and for the benefit of the whole Dominion, but especially for the benefit of Quebec. The intention is to make the harbor of Quebec the eastern terminus in summer of the Canadian Pacific Railway. This has been asked, the people and the press have asked it, and we have come down with these resolutions to carry it out; that is to say, we propose to give $6,000 per mile in order that the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway shall be in the harbor of Quebec."

Now a good deal of mystery has also so far enshrouded the policy of the Government. They took power last year, very large powers, they have taken power to organise the company, to subsidise the railway at the rate of $6,000 per mile to Quebec. They had contemplated to use their good offices with the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway to bring them together so that the North Shore Railway might be placed under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, so as to make the harbor of Quebec the summer terminus of that railway. Nothing has been done. Will anything be done this year? They take the same power this year, and they also propose to increase the subsidy. Whether the new arrangements succeed which are contemplated by the Government, whether the Canadian Pacific Railway purchase the North Shore Railway, or, failing this, the Government undertake to form a company to build an additional line from Montreal to Quebec, I say that, by the policy they have adopted, so far as the short line is concerned, they destroy their policy so far as they proposed to make the harbor of Quebec the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They kill with one hand what they profess to give life with the other. The reason is obvious. Suppose that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company purchase the North Shore Railway; suppose, as has been said by the Minister of Public Works, that they build terminal buildings in Quebec, and that they improve the road; still the line will remain a local road, the same as it is to-day—it will remain in the same condition, with this difference that, instead of being operated by the Grand Trunk Railway, it will be operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway. As far as any advantages to the city of Quebec are concerned, as far as the object of making Quebec the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway is concerned, all that will be lost, and the reason is, that in order to make any harbor, whether it is Montreal or Quebec, the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that harbor has to be connected with the winter ports by a direct line of railway. It stands to reason that, though you carry out these resolutions, though you build elevators at Quebec, if there be no connecting line between the summer and the winter terminus, there will be no freight going to the summer terminus. What will take place? The Canadian Pacific Railway purchases the North Shore; suppose they will build elevators at Quebec, as stated by the Minister of Public Works; these elevators are filled with wheat, which cannot all be transported during the summer season; at the close of navigation the elevators are full of wheat; how will that wheat be carried away from Quebec during the winter months? Suppose there is a rise in the price of wheat during winter months? Suppose there is a rise in the price of wheat at Liverpool during the winter months, how will that wheat be carried from the summer to the winter ports, unless there is a direct line of railway from Quebec to the winter ports? It is intended to make winter ports, at St. Andrew's, St. John, and Halifax. Now, will the freight be carried from Quebec to these winter ports if there is no line of railway between the two? It is impossible; the wheat will have to remain there until the following season; and the result will be, that not another cargo will afterwards go to the port of Quebec. So it is manifest, as anything can be manifest at all, that unless there is a direct line of railway between Quebec and the winter ports, though they may on paper make Quebec the summer terminus, it will be only on paper, but the trade will never go to Quebec. It will go to that harbor whence it can be shipped at all times, either by water or by rail. It has been said, by way of objection to the line by way of Quebec, that if you adopt it, a bridge has to be built at Quebec. So say I. I do not deny it, but I say more. I say that the St. Lawrence has to be bridged by the Canadian Pacific Railway at one point or another. It will be bridged, and they have already taken steps to bridge it at their summer terminus, and nowhere else. It will be bridged at Montreal, because they intend to make Montreal their summer terminus; but if the Government are in earnest, and intend to make Quebec the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and if, in accordance with that, the Government used their good offices with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, as they intend to use them under these Resolutions, in order to induce them to acquire the North Shore Railway, they should prevail upon them to make Quebec the summer terminus, and then it will follow that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would be compelled to build their bridge, not at Montreal but at Quebec. They will build their bridge wherever their summer terminus is, and wherever their harbor is connected by a direct line with the sea, and nowhere else. So, if the Government are in earnest, they have it in their power to use their influence with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to make Quebec the summer terminus, and they will bring the short line to Quebec. As a consequence of that policy the Pacific company will have to build their bridge, not at Lachine, near Montreal, but at Cap Rouge, near Quebec. I now address myself to another consideration. The Government have broken the promises they have made to the House; they have not had the surveys made which they were bound to cause to be made; they have selected a line they should not have selected, and which they promised should not be selected until they had full information on the subject. What is the reason? No reason, so far, has been given; no reason has been ever given to the satisfaction of this House, to justify the Government for having done what they have done. In fact, there can be no justification for the Government, after having pledged themselves as they have, breaking those pledges. But in the press of Lower Canada I find some reasons. Reasons are given why this short line has been selected, and if we are to believe the statements made in Lower Canada, not made by the Opposition press, but by the Ministerial press, and not only by one shade of the Ministerial press—because there are two shades; there are men of one hue and men of another hue—but by men of all shades of hue who favor the Government, the reasons given are, that this line has been selected by intriguers. Upon this point I will quote the language of the Ministerial press itself. I will first take Le Canadien, which represents one shade of blue color in Lower Canada. Speaking of the resolution now before the House, it says:

"The railway policy is before the House, in so far as the Pacific Railway extension to the seaports is concerned. It confirms that of last year, in this sense, that the short line by the south receives an additional subsidy. Most of those who to-day are protesting, have prepared, during the Session of 1884, the final adoption of the International and Maine route. When Le Canadien, L'Événement, demanded that before voting thirty millions to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the members should exact the adoption of the northern route, those papers were riddled with invectives. Then was the time to insure the extension of the Pacific Railway through our Province; circumstances were favorable; success was easy. But it was feared that the North Shore Railway would be sold to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and that Mr. Senecal would realise some profit. And first and last, Senecal had to be assassinated, should the Province go to all the devils.

"Such a deplorable policy has had its result; the Sherbrooke route has been adopted; it is the fault of intrigue.

"At all events, it behoves us now to shape our course like business men, and not to lose our time in ridiculous jeremiads. Let ask for compensations."

Then there is another shade represented by a well-known paper in Quebec, called Le Nouvelliste, which, commenting upon this very article in Le Canadien, says:

"It is the Senecal clique that speaks by the mouth of Mr. Tarte.

"As may be seen, the clique submits easily enough to the selection of the Pope route, by the way of Sherbrooke.

"Everything is for the best, since the so long coveted million is at last going to fall into Mr. Senecal's pocket.

"Will the Province be as easily satisfied? The future will tell us.

"What we predicted five years ago is fulfilled to the letter.

"The Chapleau faction and the Pope faction had each their interest: the one, the sale of the North Shore Railway; the other, the turning off of the Pacific Railway towards the International. Isolated, the two groups were powerless; united, they commanded a majority.

"They united, and their union has secured the triumph of the policy which our district and the whole of the Province fought against."

Now, Mr. Speaker, one thing is certain. According to the opinion expressed by all shades of opinions in the Conservative press of Quebec, this policy is not conceived for the public good; but, in the opinion of these two papers belonging to the Ministerial press, it has been conceived in intrigue and for private ends. Whether the policy will assassinate Mr. Senecal, as one of these papers says, or will put a million dollars into his pocket, as the other paper says, it is premature to discuss. I would look at the matter in view of Canadian interests. We, from the district of Quebec, feel warmly upon this subject. But we ask for no favors; we ask for nothing but justice. Last year we were promised that no selection of a route would be made until surveys had been completed. We have reason to believe that these surveys will establish that the shortest and best route to connect the eastern Provinces with Montreal must follow the valley of the St. Lawrence to the harbor of Quebec; and believing this, we ask that these surveys should take place, and if it is then found that they do not justify our contention, we will submit graciously to the inevitable. But if these surveys show that the shortest and best line must tap the St. Lawrence to the harbor of Quebec, then, in the language of Sir Charles Tupper last year, the interests of the whole country are linked with the interests of Quebec. For these reasons I move now:

That all the words after "that" in the said motion be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof: In the opinion of this House, additional surveys are requisite, in order to a sound decision for the short line railway, and it would be premature to adopt any line before further surveys have been made.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has ended his speech by a motion to the effect that additional surveys are requisite in order to arrive at a sound decision as to the best route for a short line railway. Well, the hon. gentleman must remember that when these resolutions were brought down it was with a view of having them adopted as a whole, or, as the hon. gentleman proposes, to reject them altogether. The resolutions propose to extend the Canadian Pacific Railway to the seaboard of the Maritime Provinces, and they have no other object, as the hon. gentleman may see upon reading them. The idea is to make this extension to the Lower Provinces, either by the south shore or by the north shore of the St. Lawrence, and thus give an outlet, in the summer, to the Canadian Pacific Railway at Quebec, and in winter, at the ports of the Lower Provinces. Therefore, if the hon. gentleman's motion should prevail, the whole matter would be delayed for another year; and it is for the hon. gentleman, on his responsibility as a member of Parliament, to support this proposition in the interest of the city of Quebec, a portion of which he represents in this House; it will be for him, under that responsibility, to show that it is in the interest of the city of Quebec, in the interest of the Province of Quebec, and in the interest of the Dominion, that the extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway to Quebec and thence to the seaboard of the Lower Provinces should be delayed in order that additional surveys may be made. Of course, the country will judge which of the two policies is the best. The hon. gentleman has labored to show that when I introduced these resolutions—of course, he was too civil to say that I wanted to deceive the House—but he said that I wished to show that the short line should be on the south shore, and not on the north shore of the St. Lawrence; and he quoted a portion of my speech in support of his view; but unfortunately he had not time to read another portion of my speech, which would have explained the first portion. The hon. gentleman quoted a portion of my speech, but, unfortunately, he had not sufficient time to read another portion of my speech which would have certainly explained the point, because my speech was not one extending over three or four days, but was made on one day and at one time, and therefore the whole speech must be read together. This was the quotation made by the hon. gentleman:

"The policy of this Government has been to secure the connection of that railway, not only with the harbor of Montreal, but also to extend it to the port of Quebec, at all events, for the summer, and that during the winter months it should communicate with the seaports of the Maritime Provinces, by an extension of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Montreal. That policy was promulgated and supported by Acts of Parliament passed last Session, by which we voted, for a direct line from Montreal to the seaports of the Maritime Provinces, a yearly sum of money during a number of years, in order to assist the construction of that extension from Montreal to St. Andrews, St. John and Halifax. On the other hand, Parliament, at its last Session, expressed its desire that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be extended from Montreal to Quebec by the north shore of the St. Lawrence. An Act of Parliament was passed to that effect, and certain conditions were inserted, by which the Canadian Pacific Railway could extend its line from Montreal to Quebec, or, failing that, certain other conditions were put in the law. Thus the policy of Parliament and this Government has been that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company shall be extended on the south shore of the St. Lawrence down to the seaports of the Maritime Provinces, and on the north shore of the St. Lawrence by the North Shore Railway to Quebec, and thence by the Intercolonial."

The portion of the speech which the hon. gentleman did not read, but which he should have read, is further down, at the foot of the same column. It is as follows:—

"I come now to speak of the proposed short line on the south shore of the St. Lawrence. In accordance with the promise made to this House last Session, that the Government would see proper surveys were made, in order to ascertain which line was the best and shortest between Montreal and the seaports of the Maritime Provinces, the Government, through the Department of Railways, gave directions to engineers to go and examine the country and certain routes, in order to see which was most desirable, and the shortest and best for the country, and to secure the object Parliament had in view in voting a certain sum of money during a certain number of years for that purpose. Those lines have been surveyed: (1) from Montreal via Sherbrooke, Moosehead Lake and Mattawamkeag. (2) Montreal via Sherbrooke, north of Moosehead Lake and Canterbury. (3) Montreal via Quebec and Hartland. (4) Montreal by Rivière Ouelle, or St. Rochs and Edmundston. (5) Montreal via Quebec Rivière du Loup and Edmundston."

Therefore, the statement I made and the idea which I intended to convey, and which I did convey in that speech, and in the explanations I gave to the House, was a statement as to the facts—that is to say, that the Government have taken the course which they promised to adopt and which was inserted in the Act of Parliament, that surveys should be made in order that we might ascertain which was the best and shortest route, either by railways built or railways to be built on the south shore, or coming by the North Shore Railway to Quebec, and thence by the Intercolonial to the Lower Provinces. If, therefore, the hon. gentleman had read my speech a little further on, he would have seen that the statement I made was in exact accordance with the Act of last Session. The hon. gentleman says that a promise was given that no selection would be made until after complete surveys had been carried out. The Government did all they could to have perfect surveys made. They employed engineers and expended a large sum of money for that purpose, in order to execute the intention of Parliament, in accordance with the law of last Session. Those surveys were made with as great accuracy as possible. The lines are shown on the map, which I again lay on the Table of the House, and the hon. gentleman will see that the line which the Government recommends, the line which the Government believes to be the best and shortest route is that, which, as I mentioned the other day, is known as the Mattawamkeag line. That line is, according to all the statements and figures which have been laid before Parliament, in the official documents and according to the plan, the shortest. The hon. gentleman has again come forward with a statement of Mr. Light, that another line might be found which would be a shorter line. The other day I showed that it could not be so; that the line advocated by Mr. Light was a line that could not be accepted as the shortest line. The reason I gave—and I tried to show it in as striking a form as possible, after explaining that the line Mr. Light wished to have was what is known by hon. gentlemen opposite as the Chesuncook line, could not be as short a line as the Mattawamkeag line was. I have had another map prepared, which I lay on the Table, and it shows an air line drawn from Montreal to Louisburg. The line in blue shows the line which the Government believes and recommends as the best and shortest route. The other line marked blue up to a common point is the Chesuncook line. I wish to convey to the House and to the country that the line recommended by Government to Parliament is the best and shortest line, and that it is impossible that the Chesuncook line could be as short a line as the Mattawamkeag line. If you draw a straight line from Montreal to the furthest point on the Chesuncook line, and draw another line straight to a common point on the Mattawamkeag line, you have a regular triangle. If you do the same for the Mattawamkeag line, and draw a line from Montreal to the extremest point of this line—on the air line—and continue another line to the common point, you will find a small triangle south of the Mattawamkeag line, while you have a large triangle north of it. As I said the other day, it strikes the eye at once that it is impossible that that line can be as short as the Mattawamkeag line. For that purpose, I will lay this map also on the Table, so that hon. gentlemen may examine both. The hon. gentleman who has moved this amendment has also taken care to defend the Rivière Ouelle route, and he has tried to show—at allevents, that was the inference from his remarks—that the Rivière Ouelle route had not been properly surveyed, that we had not the information wanted, and that we were selecting the Rivière du Loup line. I think my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Blondeau), who has thus been protected by the hon. member from Quebec East, will be very thankful to him for having called attention to this matter. In this matter, as well as with respect to the other line, the Government had no other alternative than looking at the routes as they are, and even now they do not select one route over the other. The proposed grant is to be given to the line, the same as was stated in the Act of 1883. I think the resolution this year is exactly in the same terms. The resolution is:

"For a railway from a point on the Intercolonial Railway at Rivière du Loup or Rivière Ouelle in the Province of Quebec."

Well, the Government did not select a point of departure; they are prepared to leave it as in the statute of 1883, and have the line determined afterwards. But, in order that hon. gentlemen may have the advantage of seeing the road as surveyed from Edmundston to Rivière Ouelle, I have brought this plan, which will show hon. gentlemen the advantages and disadvantages of the line. It is a question of engineering and of cost, and the company who have to build the road will have to select the route which, in their estimation, will be the best, the most favorable, and least expensive, and a line which will give the largest traffic possible. The hon. member for Quebec East has also spoken of the grades on the different lines. Well, I do not suppose that we, as lay members, can begin to discuss all the grades of these different routes, so as to be able to ascertain them. The hon. gentleman said that on one line the grade was 82 feet at one point—I think he said the International line—and he added it did not matter if we had another point or two of the same grade. Well, it does matter, because, if you have a number of these heavy grades, you cannot succeed in making a good line. The hon. gentleman has also made an appeal to the members for the Lower Provinces, who, no doubt, will be pleased to see the great interest he takes in their welfare, and in the future of their Province, and how much he is inclined in their favor! He is afraid that they may be dissatisfied, and he calls their special attention to the fact that the resolution, of which notice had been given, did not, in the first instance, contain the words "Harvey, Fredericton and Salisbury," after the word "Mattawamkeag," and the hon. gentleman is afraid that they may not get the road as far as Salisbury. He says there was a fixed amount of money asked from Parliament, and therefore it was only for a railway which was to be built as far as Lake Mattawamkeag. Well, I am sure the hon. gentleman will be pleased to hear the declaration which the Government makes through me, that in the arrangements to be made with the company to build the railway, and to take advantage of this vote of money, of $250,000 during 20 years, the Government will take care to secure the completion of the railway, not only to Mattawamkeag, but also to Salisbury, and if that is not secured, there will be no subsidy given. We must act in good faith; the faith of Parliament is pledged, and we must take care that that money is employed as Parliament wishes. I think I am explicit enough, and that hon. gentlemen will not have the fears which the hon. member for Quebec East has expressed on that point. Now, the hon. gentleman says that it is all very well for us to speak of making Quebec or Montreal the summer seaport of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but that if Quebec is the seaport of the Canadian Pacific Railway during the summer, it is impossible for that port not to be connected with the seaports of the Lower Provinces, because he is otherwise afraid that wheat may come to Quebec and have to remain in the elevators there when the season of navigation has closed. The hon. gentleman must know that in the case of Quebec as in the case of other seaports, when goods are there at the end of the season, they have either to remain until the next spring, or, if there are railway facilities for exporting them, the owners of those goods take advantage of those facilities. If there is anything at Quebec to be exported which has not been exported during the season of navigation, and it is a necessity that it should be exported during the winter, the Intercolonial Railway is available, and there will be other facilities as well, because there are two other roads by Quebec which Parliament will have subsidised. The first is the Quebec Central Railway, which, when extended by the subsidy voted by Parliament last year, will tap the short line to the Lower Provinces. Then, under these resolutions, when they become law, there will be the road from Quebec to Rivière du Loup, and from Rivière du Loup to Edmunston, and so on. Therefore, the facilities for Quebec will be much greater than they have ever been before; there is no fear, and I am glad to allay all the fears of the hon. member for Quebec East on that point. The hon. gentleman's fears about wheat and other goods remaining in Quebec are because he had in his mind, that we must have a bridge at Quebec. The hon. gentleman seems to be very nervous just now about the prospects of Quebec in connection with all these great works; he will not allow us to wait a month or a week, but we must do everything at once—if this bridge is to be built, it must be built immediately. But about this short line, the hon. gentleman says, no short line, no extension of the Pacific Railway to Quebec, but we must have new surveys and exhaustive surveys, and these will take a year or two, before we decide about this route, and the hon. gentleman says we must make it pass through Quebec. If, by passing through Quebec, we cannot obtain the shortest route, we must make up our minds to pass elsewhere. It is very unfortunate for Quebec that the short line does not pass through Quebec; I am very sorry for Quebec, though the hon. gentleman did not think I could be; but we must look first to the interest of the country at large. The hon. gentleman represents Quebec, and I have no doubt that is the reason he is just now burning with patriotism, and wants all the interests of Quebec to be put aside, or postponed for a year or two, until new surveys are made; and he does not care if Quebec suffers during that time, or for all time to come. All these may be very good and proper sentiments; but I must say that that patriotism may exist and the railway be built. The hon. gentleman must know that we are making large and necessary expenditures now on all sides, which the progress and the development of the country require; but, on the other hand, if a bridge is required, one day or another, sooner or later, at Quebec, the Government of that period will see what policy should be adopted and what should be done; but I do not think the hon. gentleman should call upon us to do everything in one day. We must do what we can to-day; let us build our railway; let us bring the Pacific Railway to that great and beautiful seaport of Quebec; we shall have the short line built, and then see what other works are required. The Government and the Parliament of that period will see whether new works should be undertaken, whether that bridge should be undertaken, whether it will be, as the hon. gentleman said, the interest and the necessity of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build that bridge. I have no doubt that if that necessity imposes itself on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, they, with their great spirit of enterprise, will not hesitate to see what ways and means should be adopted, in order to have that bridge built; but, at all events, I think the country, and especially the Province of Quebec, will be satisfied with the policy of the Government, and see that we are doing quite enough for one Session. The hon. gentleman has stated that he had a great sympathy for me, because I was sorry my native city could not have everything it wished to have, and he thought my heart was broken. Well, I will reciprocate with the hon. gentleman. If his heart is broken to-day, it is because we have no bridge there; if his heart is broken, it is because we have not made twenty or thirty surveys more than we have made; if his heart is broken, it is because our resolutions will be adopted. Well, I pity the hon. gentleman; and he may be sure that I have as much sympathy with him, under the circumstances, as he has for me. Without wishing to extend my remarks further, I must say that the motion of the hon. gentleman for an extension of time, in order to have new surveys, and to prevent the completion of these lines for an indefinite time—a year or two, or I do not know what length of time—the motion of the hon. gentleman, I think, is not one that can be accepted by this House. The hon. gentleman knows that the Canadian Pacific Railway resolutions, and also the Bill, are on the Notice Paper and that we are waiting for these resolutions to be passed to see how far we can go with the Bill. He knows well the whole thing is one scheme, a scheme to complete the great work of the Canadian Pacific Railway; therefore, we ask Parliament to help the Government in adopting these resolutions. There may be on one side or other some interests that cannot be served exactly by these resolutions, but we must rise above these local interests and see what is good for the country at large; we must see whether the interests of the country lie in the passing of these resolutions and of the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill. We believe they do. We have made the best selection possible, under the circumstances, for a short route to the Lower Provinces. We are sorry we cannot satisfy all the views of all our friends on both sides of the House, but we are convinced that these recommendations are the best that can be made under the circumstances, and we hope hon. gentlemen on both sides will help us to make these resolutions become law and complete the great scheme of the Canadian Pacific Railway, by bringing the Canadian Pacific Railway to the seaboard of the Lower Provinces.

Mr. L'ANGELIER. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) and the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) made some disparaging remarks about Mr. Light, evidently thinking that by killing the reputation of Mr. Light they might also kill the line itself. In furtherance of that project, the other day the hon. member for Sherbrooke doubted whether Mr. Light had power to assume the title which he has assumed in the pamphlet written by him. Mr. Light called himself a member of the Institute of Civil Engineers. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) said he had gone to a great deal of trouble in looking through books which contain lists of members of that institution, and could not find the name of Mr. Light. I have been more fortunate than the hon. gentleman. I have Mr. Light's, diploma. Here it is—not a very fresh document; it dates back to 1862, when Mr. Light was admitted a member of the Institute of Civil Engineers.

Mr. HALL. Is he still a member ?

Mr. LANGELIER. I do not think that would take anything of the knowledge he possessed at that time. I do not suppose he has forgotten anything he knew in 1862. If he was then found worthy of being admitted a member of the Institute of Civil Engineers, now that he has been district engineer on the Intercolonial, for I do not know how many years, for the most difficult district, that of Miramichi where that great bridge is erected which cost several hundreds of thousands of dollars, I think he is still worthy of being a member. I may say, however, for the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman, that he is still a member. Another remark was made about Mr. Light which I want to answer at once. The hon. gentleman said he had received a telegram or letter from a Minister of the Quebec Government contradicting Mr. Light's right to another title which he has taken, that of chief engineer of railways for the Government of Quebec. The hon. gentleman says, on the authority of a Minister of the Quebec Government, that such is not the case. I must say that the Minister who gave that information did not know what he was talking about. Mr. Light is still engineer, and is going to be engineer for two years more, at least, of the Government of Quebec. He was appointed by an Order in Council in 1882, for five years, chief engineer of Government railways for the Province of Quebec, and quite lately he has been acting in that capacity. Only four months ago he made an examination of the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway, and the subsidy has been paid by that same informant—for I think I can give his name—on the report of Mr. Light; so that there was very little justification for the statement that Mr. Light was no longer Government railway engineer of Quebec. I can go a little further. As the informant of the hon. gentleman has been trying to damage Mr. Light's character, I think I can give an explanation of the animus he has against Mr. Light. In 1874 the same gentleman was controlling a large part of the stock of a certain railway, and he wanted to float a loan on the London market for that railway. But before doing so he wanted to bolster up his railway by the report of an engineer of reputation, and he selected Mr. Light, as quite competent, at that time, to examine his road and make a report. When Mr. Light had examined it, he said it was better he should make no report, because he found the railway the worst he had seen in his life, and that if he made a report it would not help the hon. gentleman to float his loan on the London market. From that time it appears the hon. gentleman has not been very favorably disposed to Mr. Light. I think that is quite enough as to his character.

On a previous occasion, I stated to this House the importance of the question which is now submitted to us. On several occasions we have been told by hon. gentlemen opposite that the Canadian Pacific Railway was to be a great inter-oceanic line from ocean to ocean, and entirely through Canadian territory. At that time the policy of the Government was not what it is today. Not long ago, when the contract which is now being carried out, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, was before us, hon. gentlemen will remember that when the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) proposed as a substitute for the line on the north shore of Lake Superior a branch going to Sault Ste. Marie, his motion was voted down; it was considered nothing short of treason, at that time, to think of passing the railway through United States territory. We must not forget that at that time the hon. member for West Durham did not propose to spend a single copper of our money on a railway in the United States; he was only proposing to bring the Canadian Pacific Railway to Sault Ste. Marie, on Canadian soil, there to connect with American railways, built with American money.

Now we see quite a different policy adopted by the Government, a policy of building a railway on United States territory with our own money.

Last year, when this question came before the House, a resolution was adopted, which has become law since, that the Canadian Pacific Railway was to be carried to Halifax and St. John. There was not one word about St. Andrews, or Fredericton, or any of those places that are now mentioned. It was simply from Montreal to St. John and Halifax by the shortest and most practicable route, after complete surveys had been made. After that law was passed the Government did not seem to have changed their minds, because, on the 20th July, the Minister of Public Works, being in the city of Quebec, on the occasion of the laying of the corner stone of the examining warehouse, made the following remarks—I take them from the report of the Quebec Morning Chronicle, a Ministerial paper, which I am sure would never dare to do anything to damage the Government or the Minister of Public Works :—

“ That Sir John had just reiterated to him at Rivière du Loup the promise made from the beginning, that the shortest and best line would be selected, that complete surveys would be made, and that no choice would take place before the minutest details were known.”

On the 19th August, at Rivière du Loup, that celebrated lunch took place, which was mentioned by the hon. member for Quebec East, given by the Minister of Militia and Defence; and, if we are to believe some of the Ministerial papers belonging to a lighter shade of blue than those who support the Minister of Militia, only le dessus du panier were invited to that lunch; it was a select party of Ministerialists; and what was the statement made by the Prime Minister, as reported by the Ministerial papers? There was a general expression of opinion amongst those supporting the Government, and in the presence of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia, that the railway should be entirely upon Canadian territory. I do not see that any word of dissent was uttered by any of the Ministers. Those words, according to the Ministerial organs, were used by the members present, and I do not see that there was any expression of dissent from the two or three Ministers who were present, including the Prime Minister himself. So it had become the settled policy of the Government to have the short line built altogether over Canadian Territory. All that has been changed since, and I do not think it is very difficult to understand the cause of that change, because, if we look back a few days before, we find a report of an interview with Mr. Stephen, the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, given by the St. John Sun. The report is dated ten days or two weeks before the Rivière du Loup lunch. Mr. Stephen stated that they had made up their minds to choose the Megantic line, that is, the line now proposed. That was a few days before the lunch, when it was admitted on all hands that an entirely Canadian line was the best. That remark made by Mr. Stephen to a newspaper reporter, is quite sufficient to justify the suspicion that, when the Ministers did not express any assent or dissent to the general expression of opinion of their friends at Rivière du Loup, it was because they had already made up their minds in agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway people, as they had ever done. We have not seen many occasions when these gentlemen have differed with the gentlemen composing the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and I think that at that time the policy of the Government had been decided upon, and that what we have seen since has been only a sham. The surveys were never serious surveys, they were never complete, and they were only a sham, intended to throw dust in the eyes of the people, to make the people believe that the Government had redeemed their promise not to select their line before they had made complete surveys and obtained minute details of each line proposed. I think I can show that the surveys are entirely incomplete. Not only have we not those minute details, which were promised by the Minister of Public Works, and by the Prime Minister, and by other Ministers who have had the opportunity of speaking on the subject, but we have no details at all; and, in regard to some portions of the line, not only have we no details, but we have nothing at all; there has not been even an attempt at a survey, and that not for a short portion only, because I shall show that there are hundreds of miles that have not been touched by engineers. It is known, although Mr. Schreiber speaks as if thirty lines had been proposed, that there are really only three lines proposed. There may be some links which may differ, but there are only three main lines, one known as the Pope line, which it is proposed to take, the Quebec line or combination line and the Edmundston line. There are some differences of opinion.

Mr. LESAGE. Too many.

Mr. LANGELIER. These are the only three main lines proposed. In the Edmundston line there are some portions proposed to be different in some of the surveys. By some it is proposed to run through St. Roch des Aulnets, by some through Rivière du Loup, but the main line is the same. It is proposed to run through Quebec, to use the Intercolonial, as far as possible, and then to give a new line to connect with Edmundston. As far as the other two lines are concerned, it is the same thing. There are a few links upon which there may be some difference of opinion, but the main features are understood, and it is only to throw dust in the eyes of the members and to complicate matters that Mr. Schreiber can state, as he does in his report, that 30 lines have been surveyed. It is only to make those who do not read his report through believe that he has gone to the greatest trouble, that the Government have gone to the trouble of surveying 30 lines, whereas only three lines have been attempted to be surveyed, and only portions of them, as I shall show.

Let us take, first, what I may call the Quebec line, the combination line passing through Quebec. To show the insufficiency of the surveys last summer, I may say that it was the general talk in the city of Quebec that we were being trifled with by the Government; that the surveys were not sufficient. Everyone knew that Mr. Light, who had been entrusted with the survey of the line from Quebec, had been supplied with such a small staff that it was scarcely enough to run a division line between two farms; it was perfectly ridiculous; so much so, that at the unanimous desire of the City Council of Quebec I had to write to the Minister of Public Works, to call his attention to it, to point out that the people of Quebec considered that they were trifled with in the way the surveys they had demanded were being carried out. I received a very polite answer, as one always does receive from the Minister of Public Works, dated from Broadview, as he was on his way to the North-West, stating that he would transmit my letter to the Acting Minister of Railways, with a recommendation to carry out the suggestion of the letter. I do not know what he may have written, but I see the result, that what I was complaining of has remained, the same state of things has been left to the last moment. An insufficient staff was given to Mr. Light, and not only that, but he was actually prevented, by a telegram from Mr. Schreiber, as he says in his report, from exploring a line which he thought was the best line; and now Mr. Schreiber gives as a reason why such a line should not be taken that it was not surveyed, when it was not surveyed because he peremptorily refused to allow it to be surveyed.

I will now examine the report of the line called the Pope line, passing through Sherbrooke. I call it the "Pope" line, because it is better known by that name than by any other; and I think it would never become a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway line if it was not the "Pope" line. One portion of that line it is proposed to run from St. Lambert to Chambly. Between these two points there are no surveys at all. Mr. Davy, the engineer who was in charge of the survey, says that the country is very easy. Of that I do not complain, because it is an easy thing to find a good location for a railway in any part of that country. Let us see what he says about the other portion, from Chambly to Lennoxville. We have his report here, in which he says that he did his work hastily. It was not so complete as it ought to be, to ascertain exactly what the location of a line should be. There are only two miles and a-half less by the line he proposes than by the Grand Trunk; and here I may remark, en passant, that Mr. Davy is entirely mistaken when he says that the line passes through a country which is badly in need of railway facilities. Any member of the House who will look at the map will see that no portion of the country in the Province of Quebec is better supplied with railway facilities than this portion. There are two complete lines of railway from Montreal to Sherbrooke; one is the Grand Trunk, and the other is the Montreal, Portland and Boston and the Waterloo and Magog Railway, and the proposed line will run at a distance of not more than ten miles from each of these two railways. At page 18 of the blue pamphlet, I will read what the engineer says, to show with what care the survey has been made:

"The eastern half of this survey, between Chambly and Sherbrooke, passes through a difficult country for railway location, making it impossible to thoroughly explore it in one season."

He was only given one season, and he says it is impossible thoroughly to explore it in one season. Now, we had been promised to have a thorough and complete survey of all the lines proposed before any selection was made. Then, the report we have before us gives no information of the Pope line, or the International Railway, as it is officially called, from Lennoxville to the crossing of the Moosehead River, which is already built. We ought to be put in possession of the character of that road, or the important features of it. All we know is what can be gathered from the previous reports of the Minister of Railways. We know there are grades on the railway of 74 feet to the mile; but we know nothing of the curvature. We are only given the maximum curvature or the maximum grades on each line. It is ridiculous to ask us to decide on a route with no more information than this. Suppose a railway should have only one mile grade of 100 feet, and another line should have 100 grades of two or three miles, of 80 feet to the mile; the first line would be infinitely the best. But we cannot judge, because we have no information on that point. Now, from Moosehead River to Mattawamkeag, we have the report of Mr. Spofford and Mr. Burpee, who were the engineers employed to survey and locate the line. Mr. Spofford tells us that he has only located six miles. Out of the 135½ miles, only 69 miles have been carefully located. What does he say of the balance, the 66½ miles? I will read what he says at page 35 of the report:

"The distance by these surveys is 135½ miles, of which 69 miles are carefully located; the remaining 66½ miles are located upon the map from a carefully run preliminary line."

There is what we were promised as minute details of this line. Further on, he speaks of the crossing at Moosehead Lake:

"This large and picturesque sheet of water has been considered by engineers a formidable obstacle in the way of a short line from Lake Megantic to Mattawamkeag, necessitating a long detour in order to pass either south or north of it. Fortunately, there are two islands lying some 12 miles from the south end of the lake and extending nearly across it, which suggested the idea of crossing the lake, and thus saving a long detour to the south. The survey and soundings show that the crossing of the West Narrows from the mainland to Deer Island is 400 feet in length, with a depth of but 5 feet at the ordinary stage of water. There can be no objection to filling in the greater part (if not, in fact, the whole) of this crossing.

"The main channel of the lake is between Deer and Sugar Islands, and is 2,400 feet in width, with an extreme depth of 34 feet at the ordinary stage of water. A draw-bridge would be required here, for the passage of the small steamers which navigate the lake when free from ice. There has not been an opportunity to examine critically the nature of the bottom, but indications are that it is a firm, gravelly deposit, which would furnish a good foundation for piers, and make it practicable to drive piles, if thought desirable to do so, in the construction of a bridge.

"The East Narrows, between Sugar Island and the mainland, is 650 feet wide, with an average depth of about 6 feet at the ordinary stage of water. The greater part, if not all, of this crossing, can be made by an embankment. A draw-bridge might be desired, to admit of direct water communication between Lily Bay and Greenville but, in my opinion the exigencies of the case do not demand it.

"The saving in distance effected by thus crossing the lake, instead of skirting the south end of it, is in the vicinity of 13 miles, of which several miles would require a large amount of earth and rock work."

So it seems that, first of all, he does not know anything of that most important portion of the lake, the portion 2,400 feet long, with a depth of 34 feet. Then, he admits that it would be necessary to have a draw-bridge, and I would call the attention of the House to this fact. All railway authorities agree in saying that it is better to lengthen a line, even by several miles, if by so doing you can avoid a draw-bridge. Everyone knows the danger of draw-bridges. I do not think there is any draw-bridge which has not been the scene of a very serious accident. Even if the construction of the bridge were possible, it would cost an immense sum. Engineers do not know what the amount would be. There has not been an opportunity to examine, critically, the nature of the bottom, but the impression is, that it is formed of a gravelly deposit. Surely this is not furnishing the House with those details which have been promised. As to the grades and curvatures of this line, here is what Mr. Spofford says :

"This line was run with a view of adopting a maximum grade of 66 feet to the mile, but the topography and distance indicate that a lighter grade can be used in the location. I have, therefore, laid upon the profile a continuous grade of 1.07 feet per 100 feet, or 56½ feet per mile, for 12½ miles, and for 4½ miles a grade of 53 feet per mile, with 2,000 feet of level grade between them."

He adds :

"It is possible that the 1.07 grade can be reduced still further, by increasing the length of the line at Mountain Brook. It is also possible that an entirely different line might be obtained, giving a little more distance, by following another branch of the river, which runs several miles north of the branch followed, but heads near the same point. This long grade is the chief drawback to this route, though not so objectionable as it would be if opposed to the anticipated traffic from the west. However, all efforts and investigation made with a view to discovering a lower summit upon this general route have been unavailing."

He goes on to say :

"Leaving Pleasant River valley, the line runs in a generally easterly direction, over an undulating surface, with no very long grades, though the topography of this section of country necessitates considerable curvature in the alignment at some points. Grades of 1 foot per station can be adopted, with, perhaps, one exception—that upon the east side of Mud Brook, between stations 970 and 1,115. There is some question whether the distance necessary for a 1 foot grade can be obtained here, and I have laid a 1.10 per 100 feet grade upon the profile, to which the location can be adapted."

All this is mere guess work. There is nothing settled. Mr. Spofford says that all efforts and investigation made with a view to discovering a lower summit upon this general route have been unavailing. We will see what that highest summit is which it has been found impossible to reduce. Here is a most damaging feature of the line, which we find in the report of Mr. Burpee, which is annexed to the report by Mr. Spofford. Mr. Burpee, at page 40, says that there is a summit of 950 feet to overcome—besides the height already reached—which is not to be overcome by the combination line. According to other information I have obtained since, and which is to be found in the smoking room, there is not only 950 feet to be overcome, but more than 1,100 feet. But let us take the lower figure, and that is the figure given in Mr. Burpee's report, which is an official report, and let us see how the matter stands. It is admitted by railway authorities that a rise of 20 feet is equal to an increased distance of one mile. If we make a calculation, we will find that the 950 feet in question will be equal to an increased distance of 47½ miles. The survey of that portion of the line from Moosehead River to Mattawamkeag has been so imperfect that the two engineers in charge, Mr. Spofford and Mr. Burpee, do not give a calculation as to the cost. Those engineers have too much respect for their characters to give an estimate—they do not give even an approximate estimate of the cost of the line. How could Mr. Spofford give an estimate of the cost of crossing Moosehead Lake? He admits that everything is uncertain, and all authorities are agreed that it is a very difficult place to cross. As to the line from Mattawamkeag to St. Andrews and St. John, we have no information given, but the road is to follow the existing line. In one portion of Mr. Schrieber's report it is proposed to build a new line from Mattawamkeag to St. Croix crossing. No survey has been made of that portion of the line, which is 58 miles in length. I understand the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) to say that it has been surveyed. If such is the case, we have not been given information on the subject; and if the Government had that information we should obtain it.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. LANGELIER. When the House took recess, I was endeavoring to show that the surveys of these proposed lines were quite incomplete. So far as the Pope line is concerned, a survey has not been made from St. Lambert to Chambly; and from Chambly to Lennoxville it is imperfect. The grades are bad, and Mr. Davy says that it is not sufficiently explored. From Moosehead River to Mattawamkeag the surveys were made by Messrs. Spofford and Burpee, the former locating only six miles, and out of 135½ miles, only 69 have been carefully located. Further on in the report it is stated that the difficulty of crossing Moosehead Lake has been considered by engineers a formidable obstacle in the way of a short line from Megantic to Mattawamkeag. The curves and grades are bad, according to Mr. Spofford's report, and the survey is so imperfect that Messrs. Spofford and Burpee do not even attempt to get an approximate estimate, and out of 135½ miles, only three are level. Then as to the two routes, one follows entirely existing lines, and the other also, with the exception of two missing links, one from Harvey to Fredericton, and the other from Fredericton to Salisbury, amounting to about 137 miles. So far as this line is concerned, there are 133 miles which are completely unsurveyed, according to the reports which we have, and for 66 miles there has been no location on the ground, so that there are 203 miles of the proposed line which have not been surveyed and located, or nearly one-half of the total mileage which is only located on the map.

I come now to the Edmunston line. One of the proposed locations of that line is by way of Rivière Ouelle, and we have very little information with regard to it. We have a report of Mr. Crawford, to the effect that his plans and profiles are not complete, but he understands that it is an easy and good line.

So far as the Rivière du Loup line is concerned, Mr. Crawford says it is pretty difficult, but he gives some details of his survey.

I come now to the combination line, and here again the surveys are not completed, and we have not the information to make a selection. A portion of this line is well known by Mr. Light, and it has been explored to some extent, but other portions have been located simply on the map, and I do not think that with regard to it we have sufficient information to make a good selection. The circumstances under which it has been imperfectly surveyed have already been alluded to. Mr. Light, in his report, replying to Mr. Schreiber's objection, that the portion of the line between Quebec and Chesuncook had not been surveyed, says:

"I always considered that the survey of this line was most important, and strongly recommended Mr. Schreiber that it should be done, in my telegram dated 18th August, 1884. His reply was a peremptory refusal."

This would almost justify the idea that Mr. Schreiber did not want the line to be surveyed for fear it might appear a better line than the one he had selected. If Mr. Schreiber had been convinced that a good line could not be found there, no one can doubt that he would have ordered that survey. It is most probable that he knew that the result of his survey would be against his contention, and, therefore, he did not want it to be made. There is the less excuse for him in having prevented the surveying of that line in the fact that there would have remained, looking at the map, only about 40 miles to survey, from the end of Mr. Wicksteed's survey to Lake Chesuncook, where the survey of Mr. Vernon Smith commences. The line proposed by Mr. Light crosses the New Brunswick and Canada Railway at Canterbury, and thence there is a short link to be built to Harvey; and another link from Harvey to Fredericton, and from Fredericton to Salisbury. The line from Harvey to Salisbury is the same as the line advocated by Mr. Schreiber; and that length of 113 miles is entirely unsurveyed. I am told that there has been a private survey of it. Why it has not been surveyed by the Government on this occasion is most extraordinary. The surveys are quite incomplete, and should be completed, before we are asked to come to a decision upon this question. We are asked to make a leap in the dark. In order to show how incomplete the surveys have been, I will quote from Mr. Vernon Smith's report, page 27:

"On a re-survey the work might be lightened and the gradients reduced, by keeping a more northerly route than the one instrumentally measured, skirting the south shore of Telos Lake, following the line of the canal to Webster Lake, and thence by the natural valley of Webster stream and chain of lakes to the Penobscot, near to the present crossing of the survey."

This shows that Mr. Vernon Smith either had not sufficient time or had not sufficient instructions to make a survey, as he says that perhaps a better line might have been found. Now, here are the facts: On the Pope line the surveys are very imperfect—on that portion of the line between Montreal and Sherbrooke, and on the portion between Moosehead Lake and Mattawankeag. No survey has been made between Mattawankeag and St. Croix, nor between Harvey and Salisbury. As for the rest, the line is to pass on existing railways.

Now, I think I have proved that the surveys are entirely insufficient for the House to come to a conclusion upon them; and I now come to the second point of my argument. If we are to take as the basis of our judgment the surveys which we have, and which, in my opinion, are entirely insufficient, our judgment should be in favor of the combination line, because the information, such as it is, justifies that decision; and here is the proof—I will give the distances according to the document we have. I do not know where the distances which have been given to the House have been taken from; but in order to put our opponents, who favor the Pope line, in a position to contradict me, I will give the location of each portion of the line and its length, from the official documents. On the Pope line, from Montreal to Lachine and back to St. Lambert, the distance is 22 miles. In his report, Mr. Schreiber always speaks as if it were proposed to start from St. Lambert; but the line is to be from Montreal to St.

John or Halifax. How is it to reach St. Lambert? It cannot be by a bridge in front of Montreal; for this reason: Some ten years ago a well known railway engineer, Mr. Legge, prepared the plan of a bridge, which was to be a high bridge. It was to start from Hochelaga station and cross over to Isle Ronde, below St. Helen's Island, and thence direct to St. Lambert. The building of that bridge was opposed by all the steamship companies whose vessels sailed to Montreal. Although it was proposed to build a high bridge, those companies were afraid it would obstruct the navigation of the St. Lawrence and increase the current to such an extent as to seriously interfere with traffic, and the idea of that bridge was given up. At present it is well known that the gentlemen of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company intend to build a bridge from Lachine to Caughnawaga; it is also well known that the railway is partly built from Mile End station to Lachine by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and to reach St. Lambert the line will have to go by that bridge and that line, and traverse a distance of 22 miles. I take the figures given by Mr. Light, and this distance must be added to the distance given by Mr. Schreiber. A most extraordinary fact is this: Mr. Schreiber gives it as an objection to the line by the North Shore Railway, that the highest grade is 82 feet a mile, but he does not say what is well known to those who know anything of the North Shore Railway, that the only grade of that kind is between Hochelaga and Mile End; and he entirely omitted to say that that same grade would apply to the line he is proposing. It is impossible for him to pass anywhere else than through Lachine or Caughnawaga; he must go to Mile End, and must overcome the same grade. He leaves that, however, entirely out of his calculation.

From Montreal to Lachine, and back to St. Lambert, there are 22 miles; from St. Lambert to Chambly, by the Montreal, Portland and Boston Railway, 20 miles; from Chambly to Lennoxville, by the new line surveyed by Mr. Davy, 80 miles; from Lennoxville to Moosehead River, by the Pope line, 89 miles; from Moosehead River to Mattawankeag, by the new line surveyed by Messrs. Spofford and Burpee, 136 miles; from Mattawankeag to Macadam Junction, by the European and North American Railway, 62 miles; from Macadam Junction to St. Andrews, by the New Brunswick and Canada Railway, 44 miles. Total, 453 miles. These figures are easy to controvert, if not correct; I have taken them from the documents we have here. On this route there would be 216 miles of new line to be built; that is to say, 80 miles surveyed by Mr. Davy, from Chambly to Lennoxville; and the portion surveyed by Messrs. Spofford and Burpee from Moosehead River to Mattawankeag, 136 miles. Now, if we take the combination line to St. Andrews, here are the distances: From Montreal to Chaudière Junction, by the North Shore Railway, 172 miles; from Chaudière Junction to Canterbury, by Lake Chesuncook, 216 miles. I take that, because it is the distance given by the city engineer of Halifax, though the official documents give the distance a little shorter. I do not want to be charged with exaggeration; I put the highest distances when they are against me. If I take Mr. Vernon Smith's report, I find that he makes the distance a few miles shorter. From Canterbury, by the New Brunswick and Canada Railway to St. Andrews, 63 miles, making a total from Montreal to St. Andrews, by that location, 451 miles, out of which there are 216 miles new line to be built, from Chaudière Junction to Canterbury.

Now, I come to the distances to go to St. John. I take again the official documents: from Montreal to St. Lambert, 22 miles; from St. Lambert to Chambly, by the Montreal, Portland and Boston Railway, 20 miles; from Chambly to Lennoxville, by new line surveyed by Mr. Davy, 80 miles; from Lennoxville to Moosehead River, by the International line, 89 miles; from Moosehead river to Mattawankeag, as located by Messrs. Spofford and Burpee, 136 miles; from Mattawamkeag to Macadam Junction, by European and North American Railway, 62 miles; from Macadam Junction to St. John, by the St. John and Maine Railway, 85 miles. Total distance to St. John via Sherbrooke, according to those official documents, 494 miles, out of which there are 216 miles of a new line to be built, namely, 80 miles from Chambly to Lennoxville, and 136 miles from Moosehead River to Mattawamkeag. To the same place on the location proposed by Mr. Light, the combination line, we find the following figures: from Montreal to Chaudière Junction by the North Shore Railway, 172 miles; from Chaudière Junction to Canterbury, 216 miles; from Canterbury to St. John, by the St. John and Maine Railway, 91 miles; making a total distance from Montreal to St. John, by the combination line, of 479 miles, out of which there are 216 miles of new line to be built from Chaudière to Canterbury, the same as in the line to St. Andrews.

From Montreal to Halifax via the Sherbrooke line, the distances are as follows: from Montreal to St. Lambert, 22 miles; from St. Lambert to Chambly, via the Montreal, Portland and Boston Railway, 20 miles; from Chambly to Lennoxville, 80 miles; from Lennoxville to Moosehead River, via the International, 89 miles; from Moosehead River to Mattawamkeag, the Spofford and Burpee location, 136 miles; from Mattawamkeag to Macadam Junction, by the European and North American Railway, 62 miles; from the Macadam Junction to Harvey, by the St. John and Maine Railway, 19 miles; from Harvey to Fredericton, unsurveyed, 18 miles; from Fredericton to Salisbury, unsurveyed, 95 miles; from Salisbury to Halifax, by the International, 201 miles; total, 742 miles, out of which there are 329 miles to be built, namely, from Chambly to Lennoxville, 80 miles; from Moosehead River to Mattawamkeag, 136 miles; from Harvey to Fredericton, 18 miles; from Fredericton to Salisbury, 95 miles. Let us take the same localities, Montreal to Halifax, by the combination line: from Montreal to Chaudière Junction, 172 miles, by the North Shore Railway; from Chaudière Junction to Canterbury, passing by Lake Chesuncook, 216 miles; from Canterbury to Fredericton, a portion of the link that has not been surveyed, 40 miles; from Fredericton to Salisbury, not surveyed, 85 miles; from Salisbury to Halifax, by the Intercolonial, 201; total, 724 miles, out of which 351 miles of new line will have to be built, namely, 216 from Chaudière Junction to Canterbury; 40 from Canterbury to Fredericton; and 95 from Fredericton to Salisbury. The distances which I have given compare as follows: to St. Andrews there is a difference of two miles in favor of the combination line, to St. John 15 miles and to Halifax, 18 miles. This is taking the best view possible of the line through Sherbrooke, because I have taken the new links that are proposed to be built.

If, in order to go to Halifax, instead of using the link from Harvey to Salisbury, it was proposed to use the Intercolonial Railway from St. John to Halifax, the line would be 28 miles longer still, as follows: 66 miles from Harvey to St. John, by the St. John and Maine Railway, and 75 miles by the Intercolonial Railway, from St. John to Salisbury, making 141 miles, against 113 miles from Harvey to Salisbury, by the new line; making 770 miles to Halifax by the Sherbrooke line. I do not, however, want to give that disadvantage to the Sherbrooke line, because I suppose that the new links will be built to shorten the distance.

So much for the absolute distances and lengths of the two lines proposed. Let us now come to the other points to be considered, and the comparison is still more in favor of the combination line. Great stress has been put by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) and the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) on what they call the air line. They take the map and say: Is not that line shorter, when you go straight, than when you have to go round. That would be very well, if a line of railway could be built as the crow flies, but, unfortunately, railway trains do not fly. They have to follow the ground as it is, and it is much more difficult to divert vertically from the straight line than to divert laterally. These gentlemen always speak of a straight line laterally, and they say: Your line will divert laterally from the straight line; but they do not state that their line will have to diverge vertically from the straight line, and that is worse. It will have to overcome an extra summit of 950 feet more than the combination line, making, according to railway authorities, a difference of 47½ miles, at the rate of a mile for each 20 feet of extra summit to be overcome. I have already quoted Mr. Burpee's report, which is to be found at page 40 of the Blue Book, and some of the reports I have had since show that it is worse than that. The difference of the summits to be overcome would be, not 950 feet, but 1,152 feet, which would make the additional length 57½ miles for the line by Sherbrooke instead of 47½ miles. I am not going to insist very much on that; I am only refuting the argument of those hon. gentlemen. I say we are not in a position to judge. The Government should have given a complete tabular statement of the grades and curves and summits, of the heights to be overcome, and even the computation of the railway engineers, of the length on each line, taking into consideration the practical lengthening of each line due to the grades and curves and summits to be overcome. We do not know exactly the comparative length of each line. That should have been given, but we are left in the dark. We have the maximum grades and curves, but the maximum may be realised in one line only once, and in another line it may be realised a hundred times.

Another very important fact which must not be forgotten is this: Supposing there is the same summit to be overcome—but in one line it is to be overcome once and in the other twice—it makes all the difference in the world, because it stands to common sense that when a railway train has gone down a very heavy grade, the power lost is not accumulated for ascending the other grade which must be ascended. It is lost for all practical purposes. Those gentlemen have been insisting very much upon the examination of the map. If we judge by the two lines on the map, it is their condemnation. If we look at the country to be traversed by each line, we find that the line through Sherbrooke crosses the mountain diagonally, whereas the combination line crosses the chains of mountains longitudinally, which makes a great difference. It is not proposed to cross all these mountains with tunnels. The summits of these mountains must be overcome by lengthening the distance to be passed. So the map itself is a condemnation of the line advocated by those gentlemen, unless they are going to cross by tunnels everywhere, in order to have an air line. This shows that their mode of calculation is misleading, and cannot be taken into consideration in making a practical decision.

Again, if we are to pass through American territory, it must be admitted on all hands that we should try to have the shortest possible distance crossing that territory. The combination line has 40 miles less of American territory to traverse than the line passing through Sherbrooke.

The line through Sherbrooke leaves aside the eastern part of the Province of Quebec, east from Montreal. All the benefits supposed to be derived from the Canadian Pacific Railway for the heavy expenditure which had been incurred for that road are going to be lost for all the eastern portion of the Province of Quebec if we allow the line to be constructed through Sherbrooke; whereas if we adopt the combination line, all these advantages will be much greater, not only for Quebec, but for Three Rivers, and all the other localities on the north shore of the St. Lawrence.

Another strong objection, to my mind, against the Sherbrooke line, is that it is sure to be tapped by American lines at Mattawamkeag, as will be seen by looking at the map. From Mattawamkeag to Bangor there is already a railway built, and which is only 40 miles in length. Then, from Mattawamkeag to St. Andrews, the nearest point, there is 106 miles, and to St. John there is 147 miles; so it is evident that the line will be tapped at Mattawamkeag.

The line through Sherbrooke will also necessitate the construction of a second bridge at or near Montreal. It is well known that it is proposed to build the bridge at Lachine, so that there will be two bridges at Montreal. There is no bridge at Quebec, and if the Canadian Pacific Railway should pass by the combination line Quebec would get a bridge. When the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) spoke of the importance of Quebec having a bridge, in order to have the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, he was answered, by the Minister of Public Works that the bridge would not contribute to bring the traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I say this is entirely wrong, and I speak from the authority of the business men of Quebec. This question has been discussed a great deal, and the business men of Quebec are all of the opinion that without a bridge or a ferry it is impossible to bring the traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway to Quebec, even in the summer. The great advantage in having a bridge at this point is in connection with the grain trade. Quebec is a good place for storing grain during the summer season. When the European markets are not good the grain may be stored there, and exported as soon as the markets improve. Supposing grain is stored in Quebec to await exportation; as soon as navigation is closed, if there were no bridge at Quebec, it would have to be brought back to Montreal, and then taken through the Lachine bridge; whereas, if this bridge is built at Quebec, grain may be exported at any time; and when the immense docks at Quebec are completed, very great facilities will be given for storing and loading grain. But, on the other hand, to use the expression of one of the Quebec merchants, without a bridge at Quebec that city would be a cul de sac in winter, where grain would be stored without any means of removing it.

Moreover, it is admitted that if the Pacific Railway passes through Sherbrooke it will still be necessary to spend a million and a-half to build a branch to Quebec, but that amount will be saved if it is taken to Quebec on the short line. It is proposed by these resolutions to vote one million and a-half to the Canadian Pacific Railway to go to Quebec, and half a million to take it through Edmunston; and something like $3,400,000 (the present value at 4 per cent, of $250,000 a year for twenty years) to carry it through Sherbrooke. But if we adopt the combination line, all the money that it would be necessary to expend by way of Sherbrooke would be saved.

Another important fact to which I wish to call the attention of the House, to show that it was a preconcerted plan, agreed upon last year, to select the location through Sherbrooke, is this: that the combination line, which has so many advantages, was not even shown upon the map which has been distributed to members of this House. The line which was shown as being a line located by Mr. Light was, on the contrary, a line that was condemned by Mr. Light, that is, the line going to Hartland. Mr. Light himself was prevented from adopting that location on account of the heavy grades and sharp curves.

Now, the hon. Minister of Public Works tried to show that if the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Quebec East was adopted, it would militate against the interests of Quebec, because, as he said, the resolutions proposed by the Government would then be thrown out, and the proposal to take the Canadian Pacific Railway to Quebec would also be thrown out. But, Mr. Speaker, suppose the resolutions were thrown out, what would Quebec lose? I do not suppose that the rejection of these resolutions would have the effect of removing the rails on the North Shore Railway between Quebec and Montreal. It is proposed to give the North Shore line to the Canadian Pacific Railway, that is all. We already have that line, and it is not proposed to give us any line that we do not possess. It is now controlled by the Grand Trunk Railway, but it would then be controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is better for the interests of Quebec, for the local traffic, that the North Shore Railway should be controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway rather than by the Grand Trunk Railway, because it will give us greater facilities for commerce between Montreal and Quebec. But as far as the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway is concerned, it does not matter to Quebec whether these resolutions are adopted or not; we will not have the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Quebec, but we shall have two lines of rails between Quebec and Montreal, which will be controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Another important point on which we have not obtained information, although we have repeatedly asked for it, is this: The line through Sherbrooke is called by all the newspapers, even by those supporting the Government, the Pope line. The line is principally owned by a member of the Government. The other day the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) made an enquiry, the object of which was to ascertain whether it was proposed to acquire that line with the money it is proposed to vote. No answer was given to that question. What does that silence imply? It implies that the railway is to be purchased. It is not only going to have the advantage of being brought into connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, but the road itself is to be purchased with the money this House is now asked to vote. We never have been able, however, to obtain any information on this point from the Minister of Public Works. That hon. gentleman has given very full information on points that are of little importance; but on this essential point, not one word of explanation has been vouchsafed by him.

The hon. gentleman said that if the Canadian Pacific Railway were taken to Quebec by the North Shore it must be understood that grain carried there at the close of navigation must remain there the whole winter, as goods are now stored in Quebec until the opening of navigation. That is exactly what we are complaining of; that is what we desire to prevent. It is not proposed to remedy it by these resolutions. We want some means of communicating with the Canadian railway system in winter as well as during the summer. We shall gain nothing by the road proposed by the Government.

The Minister of Public Works mentioned that the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) wanted everything done at once. The Minister of Public Works wants to have the matter respecting Quebec left over to another Session. What would be the use of building a bridge at great expenditure if the Canadian Pacific Railway traffic had taken another channel. If the traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which it is hoped will be very large, passes by the Sherbrooke route, the company will be obliged to expend a large sum for terminal facilities, either in the United States or in the Maritime Provinces, and they would not sacrifice all that expenditure in order to come back to Quebec. It is well known that when trade has adopted a certain channel it cannot be diverted, unless there is a very great difference in the advantages, and there will not be so much difference as to lead the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to come back to Quebec.

We should not be called upon to pronounce an opinion on the documents before us, which are unsatisfactory, and I therefore move the following amendment to the amendment:—

To leave out all the words after "thereof," in the amendment, and insert the following: In the opinion of this House, additional surveys are required, and should at once be undertaken in order to obtain a sound decision as to the proper route for the short line railway, and it would be premature to adopt any line before further surveys had been made.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) and the member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) insisted that if the combination line were adopted it would be impossible to go on with its construction, because the Legislature of the State of Maine would not meet for two years. That is entirely a mistake. It would not be necessary to have a meeting of the Legislature, because the laws of the State of Maine provide for the incorporation of railway companies without having recourse to the Legislature. There has been no amendment to that law. At chapter 120 it is stated :

"Section 1. Any number of persons, not less than ten, a majority of whom shall be citizens of this State, may form a company for the purchase of and constructing, maintaining, and operating a railway for public use in the conveyance of persons and property within this State, and for that purpose may make and sign articles of association, in which shall be stated the name of the company, the gauge of the road, the places from which and to which the road is to be constructed, maintained and operated, the length of such road, as near as may be, and the name of each town and county in this State through which or into which it is to be made; the amount of the capital stock of the company, which shall not be less than $6,000 for every mile of road proposed to be constructed, of the gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches, nor less than $3,000 per mile for any narrower gauge, and the number of shares of which said capital stock shall consist, and the names and places of residence of at least five persons, a majority of whom shall be citizens of this State, who shall act as directors of the proposed company, and shall manage its affairs until others are chosen in their places. Each subscriber to such articles of association shall subscribe thereto his name, place of residence, and the number of shares of stock he agrees to take in said company.

"Section 2. Said articles of association shall not be filed and recorded in the manner provided in section 3 of this Act until the capital stock named in section 1 has been subscribed thereto in good faith by responsible parties, and 5 per cent. paid thereon in cash to the directors named in said articles of association.

"Nor until there is endorsed thereon or annexed thereto an affidavit made by a majority of the directors named in said articles, that the amount of stock required by this section has been in good faith subscribed, and 5 per cent. paid thereon in cash as aforesaid, and that it is intended in good faith to construct, maintain and operate the road mentioned in such articles of association, which affidavit shall be recorded with the articles of association as aforesaid."

Mr. SHANLY. It may possibly be supposed, when I rise to speak on a question of this kind, that I rise to speak with some authority; but I would state, at the outset, that I am entirely unable to form any opinion respecting what may be called the engineering merits of the two lines. I am, on general principles, in favor of a thorough and complete examination, for I know that vast sums of money have been wasted in various public works of this country and elsewhere, by not making complete examinations. I had not the advantage of hearing the earlier part of this discussion, as I was accidentally absent from my seat when it took place; but there was a debate took place a week or two ago, prior to my having had the privilege of standing where I now stand, and I have been reading that debate, in order, amongst other things, to arrive, if possible, at something like the merits of the question. And I was grieved to find in that debate that certain members who advocated one line in preference to the other thought it necessary to descend to personalities, perhaps, Sir, under the same rule which has been ascribed to certain lawyers, not of a high class, of course, when your case fails in argument abuse your opponent's counsel. That seems to have been the case with the hon. gentlemen to whom I allude. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall) and the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) thought fit to assail the private and professional character of a gentleman whom I hold in high respect, both privately and professionally, Mr. A. L. Light, in whose character, as a professional man, I have entire confidence, as I have in his integrity as a man. Now, Sir, I think when people descend to use such an argument as they used against Mr. Light, they cannot have very good faith in their own case. As regards the plans and surveys, and everything else, I say there is nothing before us which would enable any engineer decidedly to state that one line is a better line than the other; and, therefore, it is, that I rise, not to discuss the merits of the line, but I feel I would be neglecting my duty, I would be false to my friendship, if I were to fail to rise and defend my friend, who has not an opportunity of defending himself. And, Sir, because I think there is not sufficient information before us to enable us to judge as to the comparative merits of these lines, I shall act upon that opinion, and shall support the amendment. I have nothing to say, further than this: that the proper course is to make a complete and thorough survey of the line before any subsidy is voted.

Mr. WELDON. I disagree with my hon. friend from Megantic, and I rise to state why I shall vote against the amendment. This is a question of great importance to the Maritime Provinces; it is a burning question throughout the length and breadth of those Provinces, as we feel the great necessity of having a line giving us connection, within a short time, with the western systems of railway. The Intercolonial Railway, so far as the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are concerned, is regarded as one which is almost useless for commercial purposes. Unfortunately, in times long since, a portion of the territory of New Brunswick was taken off by the Ashburton Treaty, which, in that respect, I believe was an act of injustice to us, and despoiled us of our territory; and the result is, that the State of Maine is there like a wedge, separating those two portions of the Dominion, one from the other. If I thought it were possible that we could have a short line through Canadian soil, I should have been willing that such a line should be constructed, but it is practically impossible, and we are obliged to cross through the State of Maine for the purpose of connecting the Maritime Provinces with the great Provinces to the west. We have been advocating this line for years without help—that is, the Megantic line—until, for the first time this year, we found the people of Quebec coming forward to help us to get such a line. Some of them are opposing our opportunity of getting this road—not on the old cry, that we must have a line through Canadian territory, but on the ground that there is a shorter line by Quebec than by Megantic. I am not going to enter into a discussion with regard to surveys and matters of that kind. In the last Session, when we had a resolution of a similar character, when the hon. member for Quebec East moved that the matter should not be left with the Government, but that the subsidy should be voted by Parliament, I felt it to be in the interests of my constituency and my Province, as well as the Maritime Provinces generally, to vote against my hon. friend on that occasion; and now, as the Government has decided the matter, I am prepared to endorse their action in this case. There are a number of different lines, and we find that the engineers, like the doctors, disagree, and who is to say which is right. We cannot afford to wait forever, or until these full surveys are made. We want the connection, and we want it as fast as possible. I agree with the hon. member for Megantic, that if it is not built within a reasonable time, trade will turn in different channels and will continue to run in those channels, and while Quebec is contending against the Eastern Townships about this line, we are suffering in the Maritime Provinces. We are suffering in the Maritime Provinces, and by the time these differences are settled, we shall find that traffic arrangements have been made to carry the traffic to those ports to which nature has given greater advantages than ours possess, and we shall be left out entirely in the cold. Now, there are three lines which have been referred to. First, there is the Megantic line. Then, Mr. Light brings forward the Chesuncook line. This is the first time we have heard of this line; and while we are talking of interested parties in Sherbrooke, we must remember that Mr. Light—although I do not wish to damage his reputation—is largely interested in the bridge to be built at Quebec. Although we have the opinions of different engineers, the responsibility rests on the Government and on the engineer they have selected; and if their engineer has selected the Megantic line, I think we, who are unskilful and unprofessional men, should adopt that line. In our Province, as I have said, we have been agitating for this Megantic line. Last winter, for the first time, a deputation was sent from the city of Quebec to our people; but that deputation, although received with every respect and courtesy, were told plainly that so far as our people were concerned the Megantic line was the line they wanted, and the line which they believed was in the true interests of the people of the Maritime Provinces. While Quebec is to have the summer port, we desire to obtain for the Maritime Provinces the winter port. Then, the combination line is put forward to compete with the Megantic line; but since the last debate took place a line is proposed by Mr. O'Sullivan, the only claim advanced in favor of which is that it is all on Canadian soil; it crosses the mountains in a direct route from Grand Falls to Moncton, but Major Robinson and Captain Henderson found it impossible to get a line where he proposes to carry his. But I protest against that line on another ground, because the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are hand in hand in endeavoring to get this short line, and I think weight should be given to the fact that every member from the Maritime Provinces is in favor of the Megantic line, and that the line proposed by Mr. O'Sullivan in his letter is one that would leave St. John and St. Andrews, and the whole valley of St. John, without any advantage whatever. We complain that when we go to Montreal we have now to travel 100 miles eastward before we can turn our faces towards Montreal, and Mr. O'Sullivan proposes to give us another line, which will compel us to go farther still. We have not only this line surveyed, but a charter has been granted in Maine for a line across that State. The hon. member for Megantic has called attention to the railway law of the State of Maine, and has pointed out that we need not wait until the Session of 1887 in order to obtain a railway charter, because the law of that State provides for it; but my hon. friend forgot to point out all the steps that have to be taken. Every company, after certain things are done, and when it is approved by the Railway Commissioners, obtains an endorsed certificate, and that certificate being filed, the company becomes de facto and de jure a corporation, but it is also enacted as follows:—

"Every corporation organised under this Act, before commencing the construction of its road, shall present to the Board of Railroad Commissioners a petition for approval of location, accompanied with a map of the proposed route, on an appropriate scale, and with a profile of the line on a vertical scale of ten to one compared with the horizontal scale, and with a report and estimate prepared by a skilful engineer from actual survey. The Board of Railroad Commissioners shall, on presentation of such petition, appoint a day for a hearing thereon, and the petitioners shall give such notice thereof as said board shall deem reasonable and proper, in order that all persons interested may have an opportunity to appear and object thereto. If the Board of Railway Commissioners, after hearing the petition, shall approve the proposed location, and that the public convenience requires the construction of such road, the corporation may proceed with the construction of their road."

In the case of larger roads, application must be made to the Legislature for a charter; and so far as I have been able to ascertain, the general law adopted in Maine is for the purpose of enabling parties to build short lines, pretty much as we do by our Consolidated Railway Act, without application to the Legislature. Now, we have to consider that a charter has been granted by the Legislature of Maine for a railway across that State, to connect with our system. If we ask to build a line across the State of Maine, which will divert the traffic from other portions of that State, we cannot expect them to authorise a line which would draw the traffic from the Penobscot and Bangor districts to New Brunswick and Quebec. I feel that this is a matter which cannot be delayed; I believe that it is in the interest of the Maritime Provinces that it should not be delayed. What we want is a union with the western system of railways, in the hope of getting a portion of the traffic that passes over that system. Give us the line, and then I am not afraid of the energy and enterprise of the people of Halifax, St. John and St. Andrews, and of the counties through which those roads will run, finding means to counteract the natural advantages which the American ports possess over them. That is for us to do. What we ask this Parliament to do is to give us a helping hand, to enable us to form a connection with that system of railways, and leave the people to develop, by their own energy and enterprise, the trade which we think we are entitled to. I do not wish to detain the House any longer; I only desire to give the reasons why I shall vote against this amendment, because it is calculated to produce delay and to injure the interests of the Maritime Provinces, for I fear that if we let this opportunity slip, many years may elapse before we shall get another. We may find that these railways cannot wait until we get over our differences, and the consequence will be that the traffic, instead of coming to our Provinces, will be diverted to the cities on the seaboard of the United States, to which nature has given advantages over us; but we hope by this line to counteract them and get a share of the traffic.

Mr. GIROUARD. I rise to say a few words to explain the vote I intend to give, and my remarks will apply to the amendment as well as the resolutions. The railway resolutions have two objects in view: first, the purchase of the North Shore Railway, and second, the construction of what is called the short line. With regard to the purchase of the North Shore Railway, I would remind the House that last year, when the Quebec railway resolutions came up for discussion, I expressed the view that it was unfair to deduct from the indemnity payable to the Quebec Government the sum of $6,000 a mile for the road from Montreal to Quebec, either to purchase the North Shore Railway or to build a new road. I protested against the Government retaining a sum out of the Quebec indemnity for that purpose. I could not do more, because the Province of Quebec was interested to the extent of $2,300,000. However, my protest was made, and holding to-day the views I expressed then, I feel called on to vote against the first resolution, for the purchase of the North Shore Railway out of the $960,000 which forms a portion of the indemnity to the Quebec Government. The ground I take is, that in the past we never deducted anything from railway company subsidies, under the pretence that the Canadian Pacific Railway might want to purchase the roads these railway companies were intending to build. Take, for instance, the Canada Central road, which was subsidised to the extent of $12,000 a mile, and the Callander and Gravenhurst, only a branch line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, from Callander to the railways leading to Toronto, which were subsidised $12,000 a mile; and in both cases the full subsidy was allowed. I do not see, therefore, why the Quebec Government, which has built a railway from Quebec to Ottawa, a portion of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, should not receive $12,000 a mile for the road from Ottawa to Quebec. Now, as to the short line, it is true Parliament committed itself to the building of a short line last year, but only to a certain extent. It did not commit itself to building a short line that would cost about four times more than what was contemplated last year. Last year we voted $170,000 a year for fifteen years towards the construction of that line; to-day we are asked to vote $250,000 a year for twenty years: that is to say, last year the sum of one or two millions of dollars was asked to build the road; this year the sum of about $5,000,000 is asked. The case, therefore, does not stand in the same position at all. The hon. member for Stanstead (M. Colby) laughs, but I would ask him if $250,000 a year for twenty years at 4 per cent. with sinking fund, does not represent about $5,000,000 capital. Last year I entertained the same views as to the commercial utility of the line, which I still hold. I never thought we could divert traffic from Boston and Portland during the winter months to Canadian ports, for besides the climatic difficulty, there is the difference in distance to contend against. Though last year I was willing to vote $170,000 a year, to meet the wishes of the members of the Maritime Provinces, I did not believe it would have the effect of securing to Canada the traffic which now goes by Portland, Boston and even New York. If I could see that the building of this line would make any great difference in the trade of the Maritime Provinces, I would be willing that we should expend a few millions of dollars to obtain that result, but I believe the advantages by Portland and Boston cannot be overcome by building a line which, though 100 miles shorter than the existing lines in Canada, will still be too long to compete against Portland and Boston lines. I, therefore, cannot give my sanction to the expenditure of so many millions, for the mere purpose of giving to the Maritime Provinces a road which, after all, will only be of local advantage. We have already spent $42,000,000 in building the Intercolonial, which is our chief means of communication with the Maritime Provinces. To maintain that road costs us $2,000,000 a year, which, some years, is met by traffic returns, and in other years is not. There is no doubt that the result of building this short line upon the traffic of the Intercolonial would be such that the revenue of the Intercolonial will fall far short of the expenses. I believe the short line will take at least one-half of the Intercolonial traffic, so that we will be called upon to pay, not merely the $250,000 asked to-day, but a million dollars a year to meet running expenses of the Intercolonial. For these reasons, I cannot give my consent either to the purchase of the North Shore road or the construction of the short line; and as to the proposition of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), to have further surveys made, I do not see any advantage that will accrue from spending another $30,000 or $35,000 on new surveys.

Mr. TASCHEREAU. The question which is now submitted to the House seems of such great importance to me, and will be also of such importance in the discussion on the hustings at the next general elections, in the district of Quebec, at least, that I cannot let it pass over without giving some of the reasons which induce me to vote in favor of the Government's resolutions. In the district of Quebec, two great questions are agitating the public mind: the first is the question of the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which Quebec desires to possess within its limits; the second is the question of the short route, which the population of that city and of some of the neighboring districts claim with loud voices. The first question seems now settled by one of the resolutions laid before the House, which guarantees, in the most formal manner, the prolongation of the Canadian Pacific Railway line to Quebec, where it should find the summer terminus; and, had it not been guaranteed in that way by the Minister of Public Works, I certainly would not vote for the resolutions altogether. Upon that question there should be then no difficulty in voting for the resolution, and reproaches should reach no one who would vote for it. The second question, the question of the short route that the present resolutions definitively determine, vid Sherbrooke, is a more ticklish question, and will surely excite dissensions in the minds of a good number. It is quite certain that, besides having the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, should the old city of Quebec become one of the links of the short route, and connect Montreal with the ports of the Maritime Provinces by a bridge over the St. Lawrence, between Cap Rouge and St. Romuald, the old city of Quebec would derive from these immense advantages, and would, in the near future, see added to the list of its glorious titles the more lucrative title of a rich, commercial, manufacturing and maritime city. But, Mr. Speaker, let us consider, first, that the question of a short route from one point to another is not a question which can be decided by the law put on the Statute Book, but is a question of geography, laid down by nature itself. And I don't see anything else in the resolutions now submitted than this: that the Government, at the instance of the people of the Eastern Townships and of the Maritime Provinces, is going to subsidise a line of railway from Montreal to the Maritime Provinces vid Sherbrooke, like it has subsidised the North Shore Railway, from Quebec to Ottawa, like it subsidised the Lake St. John Railway, the Quebec Central Railway, the Rivière du Loup and Edmundston Railway, in the Province of Quebec, and so many other railways in other Provinces. If it is not the short route, will that subsidy make it? Certainly not. If the short route is vid Quebec, sooner or later the trade will find its way through this last-named city. Like the water that has been diverted from its natural channel always seeks after its natural course, and, if not prevented by artificial work, always ends in finding it, the trade may, for some time, be diverted from its natural channel, which is the shortest, but will always end in finding it also. And, Mr. Speaker, nature cannot give all to the same place. If nature gave Quebec one of the finest ports in the world, if it gifted Quebec with one of the most magnificent sites of the world, surrounded it with so many charming places, who can blame nature not to have put this admirable city on the shortest route between Montreal and Halifax? And as it is this route that we are trying to find, because the trade, blind and unpoetical as it is, instead of seeking on its way after beauties of nature, charming and adorned places, looks always after the straight line, which is the shortest way from one place to another, we must then adopt, to subsidise it, the route which is proved to us as meeting the most the needs and exigencies of trade. It is here no question of sentiment, but a question of business; it is no question of predilection for one place or another, but a question of commercial necessity. In fact, it is a question of commerce, which has its own indisputable rules. Then, we must not look at it and judge it through the prism of our personal sympathies, but with the severe and impartial eye of business men. For my part, then, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the personal sympathies that I might have for the city of Quebec, which is dear to me for more than one reason, notwithstanding the fact that I desire, as much as any one, its progress, its prosperity and its material grandeur, I cannot, after having seriously studied the papers and reports laid before us, attentively listened to the reasons given on each side, do otherwise than give my assent to the resolutions which contain the choice of the short route through Sherbrooke. And what I stated before is the first consideration upon which I based my opinion, a consideration merely of general interest, completely disengaged from sectional and local interests, which may sometimes lead the mind in a false direction. In the second place, I must recollect that I am here, not as a member of the city of Quebec, but that I represent here the county of Beauce; that this county is formed partly with Eastern Townships directly and largely interested in the completion of the International Railway, which goes through them; that this line crosses a part of the county of Beauce, which part would derive great advantages from the prosperity and of the success of this line. If a part of the county of Beauce has its market at Quebec, another part of the same has it at Sherbrooke, and that is the new part of the county which requires the most for its development, easy access to markets and real marks of encouragement. And, besides, will not, after this, the lower part of the county of Beauce be connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway by the Quebec Central, which the choice of the route through Sherbrooke will assure and accelerate the completion of, giving to the parishes along the Chaudière River and the large townships of Marlow, Linière, Jersey, Shenley, Gayhurst, etc., easy access either to Quebec, Sherbrooke or American markets. Another reason: When the subsidy of $211,000 had been voted last year by Parliament to assure the completion of the Quebec Central Railway, which now has to be completed all through the county of Beauce, was it not granted because this road was considered as an important feeder of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to which it was to be connected at some given point within the State of Maine? Although I was not, last year, a member of this House, and although I was not present at the conferences which preceded the grant of this subsidy, I always thought, however, that those $211,000 were granted largely upon that consideration. The same interest which existed last year, and brought the Government to the granting of this subsidy, prevails again to-day. And were I to vote to-day against the present resolution, would I not undo what my predecessor did last year, and contribute to unbuild the Quebec Central and decrease its importance, which he contributed so much to build and increase its importance, working in this connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, of which it will be, as I already stated, an important feeder. Many reasons, then, induce me to give my vote in favor of the resolutions brought by the Government: 1st. Reasons of general interest and then reasons of a secondary value, consisting in the immediate and considerable advantages which my constituents would derive from their adoption. I cannot forget that I represent, in this House, a county exclusively composed of farmers, and that the interest of the agricultural class must stand for me, in the first place, before the commercial and manufacturing classes of the cities. In voting down those resolutions altogether, what would be the result for Quebec? The question of the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is decided in their favor this year, and which will become within a few weeks un fait accompli, will be left one year more to the mercy of political eventualities; and who knows what may or may not happen in a year's time? Why let the occasion pass without giving Quebec that great and long-sought-for advantage of becoming the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Sir, in voting for the resolutions, I believe that I will vote in the interests of my constituents, agriculturists and farmers, in providing for them new markets for their products, new accesses to those markets and consequently in increasing their chances to reach wealth and prosperity. For a long time past this question has been before the public, and my intention has always been well formed to give this question the most serious consideration and give upon it a vote completely independent of party links, if the policy of the Government upon this question were not, in my opinion, completely a just and legitimate one. After having studied the question most carefully, I am happy to declare that the opinion I formed upon it is in accordance with the policy of my party and of my leaders, and that in this circumstance, as in many other instances, I may, together with the accomplishment of my duty as a conscientious member, give them the help of my vote. It only remains for me now to beg pardon from the House for the errors I must have been guilty of in using a language which I am not very familiar with, but it was my desire to be understood by all, and I hope that in consideration of my good will you will excuse my temerity.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). This is a question which is of especial interest to the people of the Maritime Provinces and also to the people of the Province of Quebec, but we regard it in no sense as a provincial question. It is a question which is rather national than provincial in its character, involving, as it does, the commercial interests of this whole country. I regret that the hon. members from Quebec have felt it their duty to oppose these resolutions. I regret that these amendments have been offered, because I had hoped that the resolutions would have received the unanimous support of the hon. members of the House, no matter to which political party they belong. The object of these resolutions is to secure for our own people the future trade of this country and to use it to build up our own seaports. This is a laudable object, and one which should enlist the sympathies of every member of this House; and it is because I believe these resolutions will attain that important object that I feel it my duty to support them. I do not intend to refer to that portion of the speech of the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment, which refers to making the city of Quebec the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I can only say that in my opinion there can be no difference of opinion as to the fact that the claims of the St. Lawrence route, as a summer route for our traffic, are superior to those of every other. The natural advantages of that great river, improved as they have been, from time to time, by large expenditures of money, have already secured for it a very large percentage of the foreign trade of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. If hon. gentlemen will refer to the Trade and Navigation Returns they will find that in the year 1884, of the foreign imports of those provinces, 70 per cent. came via the St. Lawrence, and about 30 per cent. via other routes. In the exports, the difference was still more marked. Upwards of 90 per cent. of the foreign exports of those Provinces went by the St. Lawrence, and less than 10 per cent. passed through the United States in bond. I do not, of course, include in these figures the exports and imports to the United States. These figures, however, show that the St. Lawrence route has already a practical monopoly of the foreign trade of the west. It is my desire, and I believe it is the desire of every member of this House, from whatever part of the Dominion he may come, to see its control of this traffic not only established but extended, to see it in the future embrace not only the trade from our own North-West, but to embrace the transcontinental trade that we hope will be developed, and also to draw into the same channel a large portion of the exports of those States which lie between the great lakes and the Rocky Mountains. I trust, too, that when this trade is developed the enterprise of the merchants and business men of the city of Quebec, with the facilities which they will possess when it is made the summer terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, will secure for them a large share of that traffic; for, in my opinion, the importance of that city, the importance of the River St. Lawrence as a great highway for trade, can never be ignored. The value of this great river in this respect, as well as its beauty and the grandeur of its scenery, were referred to early in the present session by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé) in his usual eloquent style; and, Sir, I feel that it is a source of pride to every Canadian to know that that magnificent river which, for natural beauty and for the grandeur of its scenery has no rival, and which in the past has contributed so largely to attract foreign travel to our shores and make this country known, occupies at the present time the very first position on this continent as a great natural channel for trade and commerce. Sir, I feel it to be the duty of this Parliament, and I hope it will always be our endeavor to strengthen its claims to that position, so far as it is possible to do so by legislative action. But while I endorse the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Quebec East, in regard to this matter, I cannot endorse the views he has expressed with regard to the winter outlet for our traffic. When we come to deal with the question of a winter outlet we have a very different and a very difficult matter before us. The first question, and one of vital importance, is the question of distance. This question of distance in the past has been so serious a matter that it has defeated every effort of the Government to carry this traffic over the Intercolonial Railway to the seaboard; and, although we now adopt the shortest and most direct line possible, it still presents itself as a very serious obstacle to the commercial success of this scheme. This question of difference of distance between our own line and the lines leading to American ports is one which can never be entirely removed; it can only be reduced to a minimum, and I believe every hon. gentleman will agree that it is not only important, but absolutely necessary, that it should be reduced to a minimum. I believe every member of this House agrees, and the hon. gentlemen who support this amendment also agree, that the policy which was adopted by the Government last Session and which then received the sanction of this House, is the only true policy, namely, that the shortest and best practicable line should be adopted. Well, Sir, it is in pursuance of that policy, after an entire season has been passed in making surveys, and upon the report of the Government engineer of railways, that the present route has been selected. We must all admit that we have largely to depend upon the experience and the judgment of engineers in these matters. I feel that it is a matter for regret that in the present instance we have so much difference of opinion; that some engineers should advocate one line and some another; that some of these engineers have been willing to stake their professional reputation on the assertion that the respective lines which they advocate are the best. And, Sir, we have a gentleman and an engineer of undisputed ability and wide reputation in his profession stating in the House to-day that there is not sufficient information before the House yet to enable any engineer to give an opinion upon this question. Well, Sir, when I find so much difference of opinion, I have decided to give my faith to the judgment of the Government engineer of railways, for I feel that there is no higher authority to which I can appeal in the support of the choice which the Government has made, and as a guide to the action of the House in this matter, than the authority to which I have referred. Then there is another important consideration which has been referred to by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon). I believe that it is shown to be the shortest and best practicable route that will meet the interests of all the important seaports in the Maritime Provinces. It is true, I believe, that a shorter line can be obtained to the Port of St. Andrews to the south of this line, and a shorter line may be obtained to the port of St. John to the south of this line. It is possible, if we can rely upon the opinions which have been expressed by some of the engineers, that a somewhat shorter line could be obtained to Halifax and Louisburg to the northward of this line. The difference of distance, however, between any of these lines which I have referred to, and the line which has been selected, is, in any case, but trifling, and this may, therefore, be regarded as a compromise line. While the interests of no one of the seaports in the Maritime Provinces have been considered of paramount importance in this matter, the interests of all have been properly guarded. Then there is another consideration which is of importance. As the hon. member for St. John correctly said, the people from every section of the Maritime Provinces have been for years looking to this route for direct railway connection with the west. Practical business men have been devoting their attention and energy to this matter, with the hope of securing the construction of this line. It must be borne in mind that we are not proposing to build a Government line of railway, but that the subsidy we are offering is given as an aid to private enterprise, as an inducement to capitalists to enter upon the construction of this important work. The views, therefore, of practical business men become important in this matter. And while in the one case we have these facts, that through private enterprise a company has been organised some years and chartered to construct a line of railway through Maine over the very route indicated in the resolutions; while a large amount of private capital has already been expended in surveys and in promoting this enterprise; while we have every reason to believe that with a sufficient subsidy capitalists will be found ready and willing to construct this line, we have no good reason to hope that the same result would be accomplished if any other line were adopted. We have no reason to believe that capitalists will be found to construct any other line that has been proposed. I intended to refer to the objection offered to this line on account of its running through Maine, and the danger that some have apprehended, that lines would be constructed to divert trade in that direction. This matter, however, was dealt with on a former occasion, and I shall not allude to it. I will, however, allude to the matter which has been referred to by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard). He has spoken, in the first place, of the amount of this subsidy, and said that the amount would be equal to a capital of $5,000,000. The hon. gentleman must have overlooked the fact that this subsidy only continues for 20 years; and the leader of the Opposition, on a former occasion, gave as the amount which this subsidy, capitalised, would represent, and if I recollect aright it was about $3,400,000. That would be equivalent to about $10,000 per mile on the length of the line to be constructed; and when we have regard to the cost of the line, of the character that this road will require to be, it will be apparent that that will only be sufficient to pay about half the cost of the work remaining to be constructed, and a large amount of capital will be required in addition to the subsidy to secure the construction of this work. I will also refer briefly to the prospects of this line. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has expressed doubts as to whether this line can ever be made a commercial success. I do not wonder that he has expressed those doubts. I have already alluded to the disadvantages under which we labor, from our geographical position, in the Maritime Provinces. I feel that the competition which we will experience from the American lines will be very keen. I recognise the fact that it is absolutely necessary that we should avail ourselves of every advantage we possess to the fullest possible extent. What are our advantages? Railway traffic is usually classed under three heads: The ordinary freight traffic, the passenger traffic, and the mail service and express business. From the Canadian railway returns I find that of the gross receipts about two-thirds are derived from freight traffic and one-third from the other sources. From the best information I have been enabled to obtain from the public returns of the leading American railways, whose accounts of receipts and expenditures of the different classes of traffic are kept separate, it appears that of the gross receipts from freight traffic about 80 per cent. is required to pay the working expenses, leaving about 20 per cent. for profit; of the gross receipts from passenger travel about 60 per cent. for working expenses, leaving 40 per cent. for profit. The importance, therefore, of a large passenger traffic will be apparent, as it brings larger profits. Those incidents of traffic are governed by somewhat different principles. In moving freight, cost is the first consideration. With the mail service, time is the first consideration; cost is the second. With passenger traffic, time, safety and comfort are the great considerations; cost is secondary. As the result of the operation of those principles, freight traffic usually seeks its ways to the seaboard by the shortest route. Passenger travel, on the other hand, inclines to a longer land journey, and makes the ocean voyage as short as possible. While, therefore, from our geographical positions in the Maritime Provinces, we are placed at some disadvantage as competitors against American lines for freight traffic, we have some advantages in the competition for passenger traffic. But it must be observed that many conditions are necessary to successful competition. Not only must the shortest and best route be selected, but the line itself must be of the best description. The roadbed must be of the most permanent and substantial character, one on which the highest rates of speed can be attained, combined with the greatest safety. The rolling stock must be of the best description, and it must be equipped with all the comforts and conveniences which modern travellers consider desirable and necessary. I believe if those conditions are met, the Canadian line in point of time has an advantage, while so far as regards comfort and safety it can be made equal to any possible line of travel between America and Europe; and if these important advantages are turned to profitable account, the Canadian lines will be placed in a vastly more advantageous position in the competition for freight traffic. In the first place, it will have a profitable business upon which it can with certainty rely, first-class ocean steamships would be brought to the Maritime ports in greater numbers, the competition which would result, combined with an abundant supply of cheap fuel, always available, and a shorter ocean voyage, would reduce the rates of ocean freights to the lowest possible point, to a point below any which could be quoted on any other seaports on the American coast. Then another important advantage would be secured, by placing this line under the control of one company. I admit it is not an essential consideration, but I regard it as a very important one. I admit that, in the main, traffic will be governed by ordinary commercial rules, and that the line of railway which can deliver freight at its destination at the least cost to itself, will, in the end, win traffic from its competitors. But where other things are equal, or nearly so, it is well known that the ownership of a long line of railway practically determines the destination of its entire freight traffic; and, Sir, under such circumstances, with a line of the best description constructed and thoroughly equipped, controlled and managed by one company throughout, I feel that we might hope in the future to overcome the chief difficulty with which we have to contend in the Maritime Provinces, and that we might reasonably expect to see the great and growing traffic of the west which, during the summer time, will always find an outlet by the St. Lawrence, in the winter season successfully directed to the seaports of the Maritime Provinces. I shall not longer detain the House at this late hour, and this late period of the Session, but I believe that in the resolutions which are now proposed by the Government we are laying the foundation of a sound and successful enterprise. I trust, Sir, that the amount of the subsidy which is offered will be found sufficient to induce capitalists to construct this line of railway. I trust that the same men who, with such remarkable energy and ability, carried forward the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and with a rapidity which is unprecedented in the history of the world, will also be induced to undertake the construction of this line, and that the people of the Maritime Provinces, who have been looking to this projected line of railway for many years, for a direct and intimate connection with the sister Provinces in the west, will at last realise what they so long hoped for, and that this line will also become part of our great transcontinental railway, which in future is to connect our seaports on the Atlantic with those on the Pacific coast.

Mr. TEMPLE. I wish to say a few words on this subject, which is rather an important one to the people of the Maritime Provinces. I wish to deal with two routes, that is, the southern and the northern route, and the route proposed by

Mr. O'Sullivan. In order to do so I shall give the figures and the distances of the two routes, and I will endeavor to show the entire impracticability of Mr. O'Sullivan's route, not by my own knowledge of the route altogether, but by a survey that was made by Major Robinson, under the British Government, in 1848. Some hon. gentlemen in this House seem to be disposed to ignore entirely the Maritime Provinces. The road proposed under these resolutions has been in contemplation, and has been spoken of by the people of the Maritime Provinces for a number of years. They have been looking forward to its completion, and I hope we shall now have it completed under these resolutions. I trust, Sir, that the hon. members of this House will not vote down these resolutions. Although we live down by the sea; although we are down-easters, as the Yankee might say, yet, living in the east, we live where hon. members from the west receive the first light of day. And I might say also that we have some bright and shining lights from the east in this Parliament—we see them all around us; and I trust that when this vote is given, hon. members will consider us, and not leave us altogether in the dark. Now, in the first place, I propose to deal for a few minutes with Mr. O'Sullivan's pamphlet. He says:

"The supporters of the southern route in one sweep arrive at the conclusion that the shortest route is by Sherbrooke and Moosehead Lake, and to prove this they take up the plan to show that the Edmundston line forms two sides of a triangle.

"St. Thèrese and Moncton are two points that must be common to the trunk line of the Dominion, whatever route is chosen between these points, unless that the entire interests of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Cape Breton, as regards railway communication with the west, centre in St. John, N.B., which has not yet been admitted by any one."

In the first place, he ignores entirely St. Andrews and St. John, and he goes across the country from Grand Falls, as I shall show. He goes on:

"The choice of route for the short line from Montreal to the Canadian winter seaports should not be made from a local standpoint; but it should be made from that high, impartial standpoint, where may be united and centered the most and greatest interests, both national and commercial, of the entire Dominion."

I agree with him in that. As far as I understand the resolutions, I believe we are to adopt the shortest and best practicable route, and this was the understanding, I think, of the resolutions last year. Now, what does that mean? We cannot go 100 miles beyond that, even if we were ever so willing to do it; that is my opinion; otherwise I would agree to this line; but it goes across the Tobique Mountains, as I will endeavor to show:

"And if it can be proved that as good a line and as short a line can be had on Canadian soil, to fill the above conditions, as can be had on United States soil, it seems to me that any man who has the least spark of patriotism or who values his oath of allegiance should vote for the all-Canadian route."

There is no doubt about that, and I think we would all vote for it; but, as I said before, under the resolutions we cannot do it. Now, I will show the House that Mr. O'Sullivan is in error as to the distance. The distances of the northern route are as follows—I take these figures as given by Mr. O'Sullivan himself:—

	Miles.
Montreal to Quebec.....	172
Quebec to Rivière du Loup.....	116
Rivière du Loup to Edmundston.....	80
Edmundston to Grand Falls.....	40
Grand Falls to Fredericton.....	130
Fredericton to Salisbury.....	85
Salisbury to Moncton.....	13
Total.....	636

That is the distance of the northern route. But that is not the route Mr. O'Sullivan proposes; but had he been honest in his convictions he would have taken this route instead of the route he has proposed. Mr. O'Sullivan's northern line is as follows:—

	Miles.
Montreal to Quebec.....	172
Quebec to Rivière du Loup .....	116
Rivière du Loup to Edmundston.....	80
Edmundston to Grand Falls.....	40
Grand Falls to Moncton.....	200
Total .....	608

A difference in favor of Mr. O'Sullivan's route of 25 miles. Mr. O'Sullivan calls the distance from Grand Falls to Moncton 168 miles; but that is straight across the country, although, if a line could be constructed there at all, I am sure it could not be done under 200 miles. I know that country very well; I have travelled over it year after year; it is a very mountainous country; and the River Tobique runs through it for over 60 miles. It is impossible to construct a railway across that river; it would cost millions upon millions of dollars to build 100 miles of railway through that country. To prove that, I will show by Major Robinson when he surveyed that country, in the effort to get an all-Canadian route from Halifax to Quebec. It was to be a military road, and therefore he was forbidden to go near the boundary line. If he had struck the River St. John at Woodstock or some other point near the boundary line he could have got on without any trouble; but going through the centre of the country, it was impossible to find a practicable route, so that he had to abandon the attempt. Now, I will give you the distances of the southern route:

	Miles.
Montreal to Chambly.....	20
Chambly to Lennoxville .....	80
Lennoxville to Moose River.....	89
Moose River to Mattawamkeag.....	135
Mattawamkeag to Harvey.....	81
Harvey to St. John.....	64
Total.....	469

The distance from Harvey to St. John is put at 60 miles in the reports; I put it at 64, and I am sure I am right. Taking Mr. Schreiber's report after I made up this statement, I find it shows a difference in the mileage in the case of each of the routes. According to Mr. O'Sullivan's figures, the northern route to St. John from Montreal, by way of Quebec, Rivière du Loup, Edmundston, Grand Falls and Fredericton, is 599 miles, a difference in favor of the southern route of 130 miles; but, as I said before, under the resolutions it would be impossible for us to adopt this line, if we were ever so willing to do so. I will take the northern route again, and the distances are as follows:—

	Miles.
From Montreal to Quebec.....	172
Quebec to Rivière du Loup.....	116
Rivière du Loup to Edmundston.....	80
Edmundston to Grand Falls.....	40
From Grand Falls to Moncton.....	200
Total.....	608

The southern route is as follows:—

	Miles.
Montreal to Chambly.....	20
Chambly to Lennoxville.....	80
Lennoxville to Moose River.....	89
Moose River to Mattawamkeag.....	135
Mattawamkeag to Salisbury by Fredericton.....	194
Salisbury to Moncton.....	13
Total.....	531

Showing a difference in favor of the southern route of 77 miles. So that he is wrong in all his figures, and they are mystifying in every way. Taking Mr. O'Sullivan's own figures, from Grand Falls to Moncton is 167 miles across a straight line over the mountain, which still leaves a difference of 52 miles in favor of the southern route, although he had made it himself 25 miles different in his own favor. All this proves that Mr. O'Sullivan's report is entirely wrong, as regards distances, and is impracticable. No doubt Mr. O'Sullivan is a clever man, for it takes a clever man to misinterpret statements and mystify figures, as I fear he has done in his report. I said I would show where he had made an error, in reference to the country over which he proposes to take this line. I will show the House his line is utterly impracticable, according to explorations that have taken place years ago. Major Robinson, in his report of 1848, says:

"The fourth obstacle is the broad and extensive range of the highlands which occupy nearly the whole space in the centre of New Brunswick, from the Miramichi River north to the Restigouche. Some of these mountains rise to an altitude exceeding 2,000 feet.

"The Tobique River runs through them, forming a deep valley or trough, which must be crossed by a direct line and increase greatly the difficulty of passing by them.

"This river runs directly, and all the roads going east or north-east have to cross this valley.

"The lowest point of the ridge, overlooking the Tobique River, at which any line of railway must pass, is 1,216 feet above the sea. Then follows a descent to the river of 796 feet in 18 miles, and the summit level on the opposite ridge or crest between the Tobique and Restigouche waters is 920 feet above the sea, or a rise of 500 feet above the point of crossing at the Tobique water. These great summit levels which must be surmounted form a serious objection to this route."

He goes on to say:

"The fifth and last obstacle to be overcome, and which cannot be avoided by any of the routes, is the mountain range running along the whole course of the River St. Lawrence, in a very irregular line, but at an average distance on it of about 20 miles. It occupies, with its spurs and branches a large portion of the space between the St. Lawrence and the Restigouche River. The rocks and strata composing the range are of the same character and kind as the Tobique range. The tops of the mountains are as elevated in the one range as in the other."

And the peculiar formation of the strata and general course of the valleys and streams renders it most improbable that any further explorations to improve this direct line through New Brunswick would be attended with much success. Unwilling to abandon the direct route through the centre of New Brunswick, by which, if a line could be successfully carried out, the distance would be so materially shortened as is apparent by the mileage given in route No. 4, it was determined to use every effort to decide either the practicability or impracticability of such a line. To this end large parties were employed the whole season. Winding up he thus condemns the line. That part of the direct route (Nos. 3 and 4) viz., the line from the bend of Petitcodiac by Boistown to the Restigouche and the St. Lawrence, crossing the range of New Brunswick mountains, having to surmount two summit levels of 1,216 and 920 feet, causing heavy grades and increasing materially the cost of transport; passing through a totally unsettled and wilderness country; involving greater difficulties in the transport of the materials necessary for its construction, and supplying food to the laborers engaged in its formation; excluding the towns and settlements on the Gulf shore, and so preventing the development of the vast resources of the country to be derived from the fisheries; and also inflicting a serious loss to the interests of the main line, and to the intended branch from the City of St. John, in New Brunswick, is, notwithstanding its one great advantage of diminishing distance, recommended most strongly to be rejected. Of course, so far as we are concerned in Fredericton, it is not material which route the line takes. If it goes by Mattawamkeag, under the resolution, it passes through Fredericton; if it goes to the north, it passes through Fredericton; but I wish to see the line carried out in accordance with the resolution now before the House. Owing, of course, to our geographical position, the road will strike us on any point. Mr. O'Sullivan has said in his winding up, quoting Sir Walter Scott:—

"Breathes there a man, with soul so dead
 Who never to himself has said:
 This is my own, my native land."

I will say, in response to that, in the words of Temple :

" There lives a man who is so base
As other men's figures to deface,
All in his own, his native land."

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before recording my vote upon the question now before the House, I desire to explain it. As I said a few days ago, when the Government moved these resolutions, when I thought it my duty to say that these resolutions did not fully meet my views. As I said then, they comprise three perfectly distinct questions, which are merged into one sole motion. These three distinct questions again come to-night under the same form, and the Government, who are asking us to vote the present resolutions, ask that we should vote first the grant to the Edmunston Railway secondly, the choice which they have made of the Short Line, and thirdly, the Pacific Railway extension to Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I wish the position which I am taking to be well understood. The hon. member for East Quebec (Mr. Laurier) comes here with a motion in amendment, asking that all the words of the main motion be struck off, and that his proposition be adopted by the House. If that motion of the hon member is adopted, the three resolutions moved by the Government are put aside, and we are left with no alternative, except to pass condemnation on the Government. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this may be fully subservient to the interest of a political party, but that it is not at all in the interest of the country, and for that reason I shall pronounce against the amendment of the hon. member for East Quebec (Mr. Laurier), because I find that he lays aside all the questions whose happy solution would be in the interest of the country at large and of the district of Quebec in particular. It does not follow, Mr. Speaker, that I am in favor of the resolutions of the Government; on the contrary, I make these restrictions for the moment, but when the time comes to vote on the resolutions, I shall record my vote against them. The sub-amendment moved by the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier) has the same bearing. It strikes out, it is true, all the words contained in the main amendment, but it substitutes similar words to them, and the only difference is the provision that the surveys to be made will be made at once. I do not object to such a provision, as I would have no objection to declare, with the hon. member for East Quebec, that the Government should have kept the promises which they have made both to Parliament and to the country; but I will add this, if we adopt the sub-amendment and the amendment, we lay aside all the resolutions, while I only object to one, or perhaps to two, of the questions involved in the resolutions, such as proposed by the Government. For the same reason, therefore, I shall vote against the sub-amendment of the hon. member for Megantic. Sir, what is the end which is sought to be attained by the present legislation? The object is to secure to the Maritime Provinces, or at least to a seaport in the Maritime Provinces, the shipping of the western traffic, the Pacific trade. At the present time Montreal is the terminus of the Pacific Railway, and as such the distribution point of trade. The traffic may take two routes; it may take the southern route or the northern route. If the traffic, when it leaves Montreal, immediately takes the southern route, a bridge must necessarily be built at Laachine; then the laws which regulate trade will apply there as they will elsewhere; and if, to-day, we are discussing before the House the choice of a line which is pretended to be shorter, if the Government have made their choice, which is that of the Mattawamkeag line—because they pretend that that route is the shortest of any—in preference to a line which would run through Canadian territory, for the same reason, when the traffic once gets on the other side of the river, at Montreal, it will take the shortest line, and as it will only have 297 miles to go to Portland, it will go to Portland, and will never go to the Maritime Provinces. Here, Sir, is an argument which I used some ten days ago in this House, which has never been answered, and which cannot be answered. If we cannot avoid altogether these grave inconveniences, we have at least at our disposal a powerful means of extenuating them, and it is this: If the traffic, instead of taking the southern route, takes the northern route, and goes down to Quebec, then Quebec, instead of Montreal, becomes the great distributing point for trade from Quebec; the traffic would have to go 317 miles to reach Portland. If we take St. Andrews, in the Maritime Provinces, as the nearest port to Quebec, from Quebec to St. Andrews the distance is 258 miles. These figures are taken from the reports brought down by the Government; these figures are given by the Government engineer, Mr. Schreiber, himself. Therefore, from this point of view, Quebec becomes the point of distribution of trade. The traffic coming to Quebec by way of the North Shore Railway, it follows necessarily that the shortest route, the winter port which is nearest to Quebec, is in the Maritime Provinces, either at St. Andrews or even at St. John, to compete with advantage against Portland. But as long as the flow of trade is not directed towards Quebec, as long as traffic will be allowed to go from Montreal to Portland, we cannot expect to keep the trade on Canadian territory. For that reason, and for that reason only, I shall pronounce against the line which goes through Mattawamkeag. With regard to the promises made by the Government, I do not wish to say any more about them; I have expressed my views on that question the last time I spoke in this House. I believe that, in the interest of the country at large, in the interest of the Province of Quebec, and more particularly in the interest of the district of Quebec, the Short Line which goes through the city of Quebec ought to be chosen. I regret that the hon. member for East Quebec (Mr. Laurier), who pretends to represent here more especially the interests of his city, or, at least, the interest of his constituency; I regret the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier), the chief magistrate of the city of Quebec, instead of serving the interests of their party, by making a motion whose result would be, if it was adopted, to deprive the city of Quebec from all the advantages which these gentlemen ought to strive to secure for it—I regret, I say, that instead of making that motion, they have not made a motion in the direction of my remarks, in the direction of the true interests of the city of Quebec, of the district of Quebec and of the country at large. I hope that when we shall have voted against the amendment of the hon. member for East Quebec, and the sub-amendment of the hon. member for Megantic, the time will have come when we can move an amendment embodying the opinions which I now express, and which, I have not the least doubt are the opinions of most of the hon. members of this House. I do not intend to fully discuss the question. The hon. members who spoke before me, the hon. members for Megantic and East Quebec, have given figures which have proved that the line passing through Quebec is even shorter than that which it is sought to-day to impose upon the House. I say to impose, and I do not think that the word is too strong. At all events, I do not wish for the moment to go over these figures again, but I say this: There is one well-established fact which the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Lesage) pointed out in this House the other day, and it is the diversity of opinions expressed by the different officers employed by the Government in the survey of these various lines. This diversity of opinion on figures and facts, which are in their line, which are within their province, ought to open the eyes of hon. members of this House. I believe that, under the circumstances, the Government ought to give us more extensive surveys, and should give us an opportunity of examining the figures which have been given. I believe that it was one of the chief means employed by one of the hon. members who advocated the Short Line via Sherbrooke. He has pretended that Mr. Light was a man who went to work with his eyes shut, who had given figures which were not accurate; but we find that if we take the figures given by the Government engineer to contradict these figures, we stand face to face with the same inaccuracies, with the same interests, and perhaps with interests which are even greater. I believe that, for these reasons, the Government, seeing that these officers have not come to a uniform decision, seeing that the men whom they have employed did not agree on the surveys which they had made, ought to postpone their decision, and even hold an investigation, to verify the reports which have been laid before the House. There are some of these reports which, if they are not accurate, are an insult to this House, and those who have made them ought to be punished. There are men who have come and stated things in dishonest reports, and who have tried to mislead public opinion, and even hon. members of this House. They are men who, if convicted of dishonesty, should not for a moment continue to hold the position which they now occupy, and to control, as they do, the destinies of the country, the same as the Deputy Ministers do. For the reasons I have just stated, I believe that in the interest of the city of Quebec, in the interests of the Province of Quebec and of the country at large, we should vote against the sub-amendment of the hon. member for Mégantic, because this sub-amendment does away with all the propositions made by the Government, and even against the amendment of the hon. member for East Quebec. As I said awhile ago, when the main question comes before the House to be voted upon, I hope that we will contrive to move an amendment which shall better express our views, and which shall be in the interest of the country at large and of the Province of Quebec.

Mr. HALL. I do not propose to take up the time of the House in regard to the merits of this question, in addition to the remarks made by me the other evening, but these remarks have been criticised by two hon. members to-night: one questioning their propriety, the other their correctness. It was very natural and commendable that the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Shanly) should come to the defence of his colleague and friend Mr. Light. So far, however, as the question of propriety is concerned, the House is to bear in mind that the question before it was, whether the surveys, which had been made at great expense to the country and which demonstrated that there was a practical line by a certain route, should be set aside, on the impressions of Mr. Light as to a theoretical line of his own. As it was within my personal knowledge that his professional views heretofore had proved not only erroneous, but disastrous to my Province, I felt justified in making, under these circumstances, reference to those matters, and my statements, in those respects, have not been controverted, and could not be controverted, because the facts alleged were matters of record. As to the statement I made about the use of titles by Mr. Light, the impression has been conveyed by the hon. member for Mégantic, that my statements were inaccurate. I can only say that they are not. I stated that he was not in the employment of the Government of Quebec. I knew it personally, and I have the certificate of a provincial Minister, to that effect. The only statements in contradiction is, that under an Order in Council, Mr. Light had the right for two years to use the title of engineer of the Province of Quebec. Whether, now that his services have been dispensed with as such engineer, he is entitled to use that designation or not, is for hon. members to consider. The answer to the other statement I made, as to his not being a member of the Institute of Civil Engineers, is that a good many years ago he was a member of that institute, he has written a letter to the Quebec papers, stating that he intends to renew his subscription, and again become a member of that institute. It was within my own knowledge that his use of that title was criticised by the institute itself, and that it appeared by the catalogues, for many years past, that he was not a member of that institution, and the only answer to my statement, is that he has formerly had that right and intends to avail himself of it hereafter. My statement, therefore, is not, and has not been disputed; but unless I made this explanation, the remarks of the hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langeher), might have led the House to imagine that my statements were incorrect.

Mr. FOSTER. This matter is one of great importance to us in the Maritime Provinces, and by that I do not wish it to be understood that it is not of equal importance to all the Provinces, because there is no Province whose interests are not affected by it. I was sorry to hear a statement from the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) (and I hope the spirit in which he made it does not actuate many members of this House), that he was willing last year to vote a small amount of money, by way of soothing the feelings of the people in the Maritime Provinces, towards a project in which he had not much faith, but he was not prepared to vote any more money to encourage what he believed to be a chimera, or something like that. I have a great respect for that hon. gentleman, but I think there are many members in this House who believe that, in view of the opening up of trade between the Maritime Provinces and the Upper Provinces, this is a line which will pay, and that there is a great deal more than a chimerical idea in it. The hon. gentleman stated that we built the Intercolonial Railway for the people of the Maritime Provinces. "We" is a very large person, sometimes, but "we" does not mean the member for Jacques Cartier or even the members from Quebec or Ontario alone. All the Provinces of the Dominion assumed the debt for the building of the Intercolonial Railway, and I think nearly one-half of that line runs through the Province of Quebec. At any rate, if not, the longest part, the most expensive part, runs through that Province, and that is the part which brings in the shortest returns. So it is not merely the Maritime Provinces which were interested in building that railway. The people of the Maritime Provinces have some claims to be considered in this respect. We contribute, in common with the larger Provinces, to the canals, nearly all of which are in the upper Provinces. We cheerfully contribute our proportion of the cost of deepening the St. Lawrence and making that great waterway which we hope it will be; and I think we have a claim, which we have a right to prefer, that this short commercial line should be completed, and that the Maritime Provinces should be joined, as closely as their geographical position will permit, with the older sections of the Dominion of Canada. I think that derives additional importance from this: We speak a great deal of the through trade, and it is a very important thing in connection with this road; but there is also the interprovincial trade. When the Provinces formed a Dominion, and when, more especially, the National Policy was adopted, the Maritime Provinces were, to a larger extent than before, thrown upon the older Provinces of the Dominion, and they were, to a greater extent, thrown off in matters affecting their commerce and trade with the United States, especially with the Eastern States. So it becomes us, more than ever before, to overcome every geographical difficulty which it is possible to overcome, by opening up the shortest commercial route between those Provinces and the Upper Provinces, and to develop the interprovincial trade as much as possible. I do not understand the present discussion to be upon the advisability of having a short commercial road of that kind. After the vote of last year, when the principle was settled by a large majority, after the amendment proposed now by the member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), which does not attack the principle at all, but simply desires to delay the embodiment of that idea, I think it is not seriously contemplated in this House to antagonise the idea of building, as soon as possible, a commercial line between the Maritime Provinces and the west. The amendment of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) is simply a motion for delay. I watched the hon. gentleman very carefully in the course of his speech, to see if he gave any sufficient reasons for further delay in putting into execution the principle to which we are all agreed. The main reason which he gave for delay was that the Government last year had made a pledge that the subsidy should not be granted or the railway built until reports had come in from competent engineers. The hon. gentleman said the Government had not carried out that pledge, and hence his amendment. Now, I think the Government has carried out its pledge, both literally and in spirit. Some five or six different surveys have been made; they have been thoroughly gone over by the Government engineer. He says that they are amply sufficient to enable the Government to base the location of a line upon them. But the hon. member for Quebec East is not satisfied with the number of surveys. He says there is another line which ought to be surveyed, the combination line. Now, it is interesting to note the change of base which my hon. friend has taken since last year. Last year he based his motion for delay on the ground that there was another route on all-Canadian soil, very nearly as short, and, on the whole, he believed it to be a good one, and that it ought to be adopted, in preference to going through American territory. A large part of his argument last year was based on the Rivière du Loup and Edmunston route, and especially the desirability of having the line through all-Canadian territory. Now, it has been shown by the surveys that there is a considerable difference in distance between that and the so-called American route. My hon. friend this year, just as Parliament is ready to put the idea into execution, comes forward again with a motion for delay, but this year it is not based upon the patriotic necessity for having an all-Canadian route. He himself goes against his argument of last year, because he bases this further claim for delay upon the ground that the combination line of Mr. Light will be shorter and better than the Megantic line, but which combination line runs for a long part through American territory. So that although he shifts his ground, yet he is always consistent in asking for delay. Now, Sir, to what limit must this go? Five surveys are made, and yet the hon. gentleman asks for delay in order that another one may be made. If we delay another year and five more surveys are made, is there any probability that my hon. friend will not come back next year with another motion for delay, because, forsooth, Mr. Light or some other person may have made upon paper a line which he declares to be better than any one that has been surveyed already? If my hon. friend bases his arguments upon Mr. Light's figures, I think he has his answer very well from the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly), himself an engineer of large experience, who stated that, in his opinion, no surveys had been made, so far, which would warrant any person in being certain about the comparative merits of either line. My hon. friend also argued that the Edmunston subsidy and the Megantic line subsidy were antagonistic; that one cut out the other; that if one was given the other would be useless. Now, I do not subscribe to that opinion. I think the Megantic route and the Edmunston and Rivière du Loup route run through very different sections of country, and meet the requirements of very different sections of country; and even if the Megantic route be subsidised, there is very good reason, from a New Brunswick point of view, and from a Quebec point of view, why the Edmunston and Rivière du Loup route should also be subsidised. My hon. friend also gave, as a reason for his amendment, that no company had come forward to build this Megantic line. Well, I think that the House, and all hon. members who have given the least attention to this matter, will agree with me that the promoters, and the company who will undertake to build the Megantic line, are within sight far more than the promoters and the company who will take up and carry through the combination line. My hon. friend then tried to make capital for his amendment by saying that the line south of the St. Lawrence had resulted from intrigue. I am not going to enter into that question, except to point out that the proof which he offered for his assertion is not such as will be satisfactory to this House. The proof that he gave consisted of extracts from newspapers in Quebec and other parts of the country. Well, I need not remind my hon. friend that newspapers say some very astonishing things about almost every public man who comes within the eye of the people, and my hon. friend would be the last man who would be willing to be judged in this House, either as to motive or as to practice, by what correspondents or editors of newspapers might say about him. These were the reasons given by my hon. friend, and I ask every hon. gentleman in this House if these reasons are sufficient to justify delay in a work of so great urgency? I do not think they are. But after these apparent reasons of the hon. gentleman, I think he gave the real reason why he sought delay last year, and why he seeks delay this year, and that was, that by some means or other he has persuaded himself that the future of the city of Quebec, as a summer port, depends upon whether this line goes south of the St. Lawrence or passes north of that river and crosses near the city of Quebec or goes by it. Now, what are the competitors of the city of Quebec, as a summer port? Well, in summer Quebec would have as competitors Montreal, Portland and Boston; and if this route goes through it will have as competitors the Maritime Province ports. It is for any member to decide whether or not Quebec will be put in a different position in competition with those other ports, provided this road is built, or provided it is not built. As summer ports, Quebec and Montreal are now in competition. They will be in just the same position when the road is built by Megantic, and no more. The competition between Halifax, St. John and Quebec, as summer ports, is, with all the differences, in favor of Quebec. There are some 300 miles distance in favor of Quebec, and whatever would go there as a summer port, without this line being built, will go there if the line be built. When you come to the other side of the question, and consider what are the competitors of St. John and Halifax and other winter ports, you find those competitors to be Portland and Boston, great cities in the United States. There is a competition in which St. John and Halifax and the Maritime Province ports stand at a disadvantage, if the distance and the kind of a road are at all against them; and even if you have the very shortest line, and the very best road, and the very best equipment, from the central point of Montreal down to the Maritime Provinces, you give them all they can do, in order to make a fair competition for any considerable portion of the trade with ports which lie much nearer Montreal, so far as distance is concerned. This House should pause before, for the sake of getting this road on the north shore and having a bridge built at Quebec, it runs the risk of making this road 50 or 60 miles, or even 30 miles longer, and takes away from its chances in the keen competition it will have to meet for this great through traffic with the winter ports in the United States. I have very little else to say with respect to this subject, except this: I do not believe in this policy of delay. As the member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) said, while we are squabbling among ourselves about the combination route, and the Megantic route, between which, it seems, there is very little difference, but in which all the geographical lines and the tendency of the investigation so far go to favor the Megantic route—while we are squabbling about these rather unimportant particulars, it may be that the trade of the great North-West will take a set and current, which it will be very difficult, if not impossible, for us to turn. Trade and commerce do take sets and tendencies, and when once trade gets into a certain channel, it is very difficult to get it removed to other channels, and it is of the first importance that just so soon as the Canadian Pacific Railway is open for through traffic from the Pacific, at that very moment, if possible, or as soon after as possible, there should be this uninterrupted communication with the Maritime Provinces by the very shortest possible route; and, if possible, this line should be controlled in the interests of the great through line, in order that the trade, at its inception, may be drawn to our ports and through our channels. For these reasons I am against a policy of delay. As regards the Maritime Provinces, we speak the sentiments of nine-tenths of the people when we say that this is something in which they have a deep interest and sympathy, and they will thank no public man in this House for depriving them of this communication for years, and making them run the risk of entirely losing it. Here, now, is a proposition by which we believe this line can be constructed and carried to the Maritime Provinces. No one knows what the complexion of affairs may be, or who may be the members of this House, or whether, if it is put off one year, it may not lead to its being put off for years and years, until the project may ultimately come to be abandoned. So I say we ought to vote against a policy of delay, unless some stronger reasons can be given than those that have been adduced this afternoon. But there is a stronger point than all. Without Maritime Province ports the view is taken that this great undertaking on which we have spent so much money, and the burdens of which we shall have to bear for many years, is uncompleted. We not only want summer traffic but we want winter traffic as well. We not only need summer ports to do our general business, but winter ports as well, and we can secure trade for them only by building the very shortest possible line of communication between the great central channel of commerce and trade and the sea coast, through whose ports we expect to do a great part of this business. Much depends, from the point of view of the Maritime Provinces as well as of the rest of the Dominion, upon the best facilities being afforded for interprovincial trade. Not only on the ground of promoting interprovincial trade, but on the ground of the necessity of securing through trade in the interest of the country as a whole, as well as of the Maritime Provinces as the winter port system, I strongly plead for no more delay. Let us vote the resolutions; let us have the communication, and then depend, as the hon. member for St. John says, upon the energy and business capacity of the people of the Maritime Provinces to hold up their own end of the commercial progress of this country, and make for themselves a future in this Confederation which will be both prosperous and satisfactory.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). I promise not to detain the House more than a few minutes. But on a question of this importance and on the settlement of it must greatly affect the prosperity of the Maritime Provinces, I think it is the duty of members who represent constituencies in those Provinces to give utterance to whatever sentiment they may have on this question, because they will not only be criticised for their actions here, but their actions may be criticised twenty-five, thirty or forty years hence. It will greatly depend on the success of the line we may adopt here now as to the character of the criticisms that may be brought on the heads of those on whom the responsibility rests of adopting a line. I am not at all in sympathy to-night with advocates of delay. I think we have, perhaps, had too much delay in dealing with a matter of this importance, but I must admit this, that we ought to be in a position not to ask for delay, we ought to be in the position of having all the requisite surveys, explorations and plans before us, in order that we may be able to judge as to what route will be most profitable and advantageous to the Maritime Provinces, and to the Dominion generally. With that feeling I am in full sympathy. The delay asked last year was based on similar grounds to the application made this year, namely, that we had not possession of sufficient information; that we wanted more information. The House granted the request. It was desirable for the Maritime Provinces to have the contract entered into; but the Government considered that it would be in the interests of the Dominion that the delay of one year should take place. What for? In order to have sufficient information on which to base our judgment this Session. Have we that information now? It will perhaps be presumptuous to offer an opinion, because I am not an engineer, and do not pretend to understand the different terms of an engineer's report. Yet, what do I find? I find that a man who has recently been returned to this House, a man most capable of expressing an opinion on this subject, an engineer of great reputation, tells us, that with all the attention he has been able to give to this subject, having read the discussions on it, having examined the plans—he, as an engineer, cannot state to the House or the country that he could make a choice between these routes, because the surveys are not sufficient. Well, Sir, if he is not in a position, how am I to say—how are the Government to say, and decide, that this is the best route? For that reason, I am in sympathy with the idea that we are not in a position to-night to give that intelligent vote that I think we should give on such a matter as this. I think it is much to be regretted, when the Government acceded to the request of the House to give them a delay of one year, they did not cause such surveys to be made as to enable them and us positively to say, not only that they had struck a certain line, but to say that they had struck the best line, and would be able to lay before the House reports upon which they could confidently claim that it was the best. We find that an engineer who appears to be pretty eminent in his profession—I do not say, for I cannot say, that his information is correct—but on his authority, he states that there is a line over all-Canadian territory that is shorter by, it is true, only  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles, than the one we are asked to adopt. Well, even if it were 10 miles or even 25-miles longer, I say we should not throw it overboard in favor of one through American territory. I say we should be willing to put ourselves to some little disadvantage in order to get such a line as that. I do not know whether this gentleman is accurate or not, but I will give you his figures, in order that they may be recorded as part of the discussion, because it is not only to-day, but hereafter, that our action will be criticised, and this will have a tendency to show upon what information the vote was given. He points out that from Montreal to Moncton the distance is 550 miles, by a route over all-Canadian territory, while by the route which is now proposed the distance is 551 $\frac{1}{2}$  miles, or a difference of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles in favor of the all-Canadian route. He gives you 172 miles from Montreal to Quebec, about which there is no dispute, because it is already built; he gives you 66 miles on the Intercolonial Railway, about which there is no dispute; then there are 105 miles which are not built, and which may be speculative. Then from Edmundston to Grand Falls there are 40 miles already built; and from Grand Falls to Canaan, 148 miles, which may be altogether speculative, and which I am not prepared to say is correct or not. Here is how he arrives at it:

"From Moncton to Canaan the Intercolonial Railway runs in a nearly direct line for Grand Falls, and by measuring on the plan and adding 10 per cent. for curvature, the distance from Grand Falls to Canaan is 148 miles, making the whole distance from Grand Falls to Moncton only 167 miles; while by Mr. Schreiber's roundabout way via Fredericton the distance is increased to 232 miles."

Now, Sir, if that is a practicable route, I think hon. gentlemen will see these will be pretty nearly the distances.

Mr. WELDON. That would not benefit the valley of St. John.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). Yes; I agree with the hon. gentleman, so far as St. John, York County, Sunbury and Charlotte are concerned, it would not benefit them to go to Moncton, but we are told that here we are not to consider small localities, but the great interests of the whole Dominion. I have as much sympathy with St. John and these other counties as anybody has, but we are told not to go past the shortest and most practicable route, for the purpose of favoring certain localities, and St. John is a small locality compared with the whole Dominion. Do not misunderstand me as saying that St. John has not its importance, but it should not divert us from the most practicable, straight and direct route. Now, it appears to me that it would have been worth while for the Government to have had that route surveyed, so as to be able to give us positive information. I am going to vote for the resolutions, but I do it with great reluctance, but I am moved to do so on my own Province being generally in favor of this line, because the people of Sunbury, York, St. John, and the western counties, are almost unanimously in favor of it. One reason may be, because it passes through that portion of the Province, and may be of benefit to it. At the same time, if I were firmly convinced that these figures I have given were positively correct—but we have not the information to enable us to say that they are—I would not vote in favor of the other line, but would vote in favor of this, because it would give us a line in our own territory, and a shorter route than the one we are asked to vote for. We are asked to build 360 odd miles on the one, as against 252 on the other. There is another consideration. My hon. friend from King's, N.B. says we should not encourage delay, because once traffic sets in in certain directions it is difficult to divert it. There is something in that argument, but I fear that notwithstanding our obtaining the route which is now proposed to this House, and for which I intend to vote—I cannot help expressing the fear that when we do get it, it is not going to be so great an advantage to the Maritime Provinces as we hope it will be.

An hon. MEMBER. We will risk that.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). Well, I express that fear, because there is already a line from Montreal to Portland, at a distance of 272 miles, and that is controlled now by the company into whose hands we all hope the short line will be thrown, when it is completed, that is, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, so that the whole line will be under one management. That is only 272 miles, and when in winter through traffic reaches Montreal from the western portion of our Dominion, the people will look upon it simply with a commercial eye, and when they are asked: Will we send the traffic over the short line or to St. Andrews, which would be 430 miles instead of 272, I think, Sir, they will take the road which gives them 272 miles instead of 430, and send it to Portland. I would hope and wish that it would be otherwise, but I am afraid that would be the result. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mitchell) says I am mistaken as to the Canadian Pacific Railway having full control from Montreal to Portland. I had understood that they had some running powers, but I am not in a position to say. Notwithstanding, I think they will find it to their advantage to acquire control over it, in order to have only 272 miles of railway instead of having 430, and if they go to St. John, 472 miles, or to Halifax, 248 miles more. I am expressing these fears because I cannot help entertaining them, and that is another strong reason why I feel that we ought to have had these other lines surveyed before we were called on to vote. There is another matter to which I would like to draw the particular attention of the Government. In the explanations or the assurances which have been given, I have not understood that the Government have yet made it clear that their intention is, after this vote has passed the House, and when these subsidies are granted, and the contract is entered into for the purpose of carrying into effect the law which will be enacted upon these resolutions, to insist on the parties who undertake to construct this line securing the lines that are already built to St. Andrews, to Fredericton and to St. John. Hon. gentlemen must understand that the first point where this line will strike the existing system of railways in the Province of New Brunswick is at Mattawamkeag.

Mr. WELDON. No; it is in the State of Maine.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). Mattawamkeag is not in New Brunswick, but the New Brunswick system runs into the State of Maine; and the first point it strikes to reach the New Brunswick system is Mattawamkeag. From that point it goes to Macadam Junction. From that point, to St. Andrews, it takes one route; to St. John, it will have to proceed over the same route for some distance; and to Moncton or Salisbury, it will have to go as far as Harvey, and then branch off again, and go by a new line to Fredericton, then across the St. John River to Salisbury, by an entirely new route, and then proceed on the Intercolonial Railway to Halifax. So that there are three different branches which this company, when they enter into a contract with the Government, would have to secure or obtain running powers over—one to St. John, another to St. Andrews, and a new line to Salisbury. I have followed the discussion and have read the speeches which have been delivered on this question, and it has not yet been made clear to me that it is the intention of the Government, before entering into a contract for the building of those portions of the line, to see that the company have running powers over those different roads.

Mr. WELDON. All the roads west of St. John are under one management.

Mr. LANDRY (Kent). But they are not under the management with whom the contract is to be entered into, and arrangements would have to be made with that one management. Now, I have given expression to fears I entertain; and notwithstanding those fears, notwithstanding the great regret I feel that we are not in a position to make a more intelligent choice to-night, yet, as the great majority of the people of New Brunswick favor this short line, I reluctantly vote for it, although I should not feel that reluctance if I were sure these figures were correct.

Mr. COLBY. I trust I shall be in a position shortly to relieve the anxiety of my hon. friend, a gentleman in whose candor and discernment, and in whose desire to do the right thing, I have the most abundant confidence. My hon. friend would see his way clear in this matter did he not think that we should have further information with regard to the all-Canadian route. He assents to that proposition. He, like every loyal Canadian, would desire most earnestly, were it possible, that the short line should be an all-Canadian route. There can be no two sentiments about that. Unfortunately, however, by the Ashburton capitulation, as it is sometimes called, the State of Maine is so far projected into the Dominion of Canada that the northern boundary line of that State is more than 100 miles north of a direct line drawn from Montreal to Moncton. Consequently, it is absolutely impossible, in the nature of things, that a short line from Montreal to Moncton, the common point for Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, could be built entirely through Canadian territory. Now, I know I must be very careful in commenting on engineers, after the rebuke I have received this evening; but a gentleman who I suppose to be an eminent engineer—for all engineers seem to be eminent—has given us his views—a Mr. O'Sullivan. I never heard the name before, although I have no doubt of his eminence and ability, and his very great candor, and every word he utters should be received as Gospel, because he is an engineer. Mr. O'Sullivan has laid before this House a paper which I have in my hand, in which he advocates an all-Canadian route. I, having the same anxiety my hon. friend has, to find this short all-Canadian route, have taken a little pains to investigate the grounds on which Mr. O'Sullivan forms his opinion. I made enquiry at the Department, addressing a letter to the engineer who made the survey of the line from Rivière du Loup and Rivière Ouelle to Edmunston, Mr. Crawford, in order to ascertain the correctness of Mr. O'Sullivan's data. Mr. O'Sullivan gives us the distance over the North Shore Railway from Montreal to Quebec, and he gives the distance from St. Rochs to Edmunston as 105 miles. In his profiles connected with his report he gives the summit on that line as 750 feet. I thought that to be a very important fact if true, and I enquired from the engineer, who gives me his statement over his own signature, that this summit, which is represented as 750 feet, is 1,520 feet. The engineer, however, reports that there is another line by which, although at an increased distance, a lower summit, though not so low as Mr. O'Sullivan represents, could be obtained, and says:

"Although the above are the summits of the different lines, a lower pass than either was crossed at the St. Francis River on the Rivière du Loup line, namely, 900 feet above high water in the Bay of Chaleurs. To make use of this, however, it is necessary to take a portion of each survey and the line is lengthened. The distance will then be:—"

And he gives the distance as 140 miles instead of 105 miles. Now, in order to get the line 105 miles long, you must surmount a summit 1,520 feet high, and in order to attain so low a summit as 900 instead of 750 feet, you would have to adopt a line lengthened by 35 miles; and yet this candid engineer does not take the trouble to inform us of that fact. Then his next point of departure is Grand Falls. He draws a straight line across the country to a point called Canaan. My hon. friend from Kent thinks we should have more information as to that. The Government was not destitute of information with regard to the line from Grand Falls to Moncton or to the bend of the Petitcodiac, as it was formerly called, nor was any hon. member, who was in this House at the time of the great Intercolonial Railway discussion, ignorant of the nature of the country through which that proposed line was to pass. It was a matter of public discussion; it is of public record; it is to be found in the official documents in the possession of the Government, and the Government would have stultified itself had it attempted to run a line which had been surveyed and re-surveyed by Major Robinson, years ago, in order to ascertain the short line from Moncton to Quebec, and which had been found impracticable. Major Robinson says:

"It is quite impracticable as a railway route.

"The 4th obstacle is the broad and extensive range of the highlands, which occupies nearly the whole space in the center of New Brunswick, from the Miramichi River south to the Restigouche. Some of these mountains rise to an altitude exceeding 2,000 feet. The Tobique River runs through them, forming a deep valley or trough, which must be crossed by the direct line, and increases greatly the difficulty of passing by them. The lowest point of the ridge, overlooking the Tobique River, at which any line of railway must pass, is 1,216 feet above the sea. Then follows a descent to the river of 796 feet in 18 miles, and the summit level on the opposite ridge or crest, between the Tobique and Restigouche waters, is 920 feet above the sea, or a rise of 500 feet above the point of crossing at the Tobique water. These great summit levels, which must be surmounted, form a serious objection to the route."

He gives many further objections; I will not trouble the House by reading them at this hour:

Mr. COLBY.

"Unwilling to abandon the direct route through the centre of New Brunswick, by which, if a line could be successfully carried out, the distance would be so materially shortened, as is apparent by the mileage given in route No. 4, it was determined to use every effort to decide either the practicability or impracticability of such a line. To this end, large parties were employed the whole season."

What is his summing up:

"That part of the direct route (Nos. 3 and 4), viz., the line from the bend of Petitcodiac by Boistown, to the Restigouche and the St. Lawrence, crossing the range of New Brunswick mountains, having to surmount two summit levels of 1,216 and 920 feet, causing heavy grades, and increasing materially the cost of transport; passing through a totally unsettled and wilderness country; involving greater difficulties in the transport of the materials necessary for its construction, and supplying food to the laborers engaged in its formation; including the towns and settlements on the Gulf shore, and so preventing the development of the vast resources of the country to be derived from the fisheries; and also inflicting a serious loss to the interest of the main line, and to the intended branch from the city of St. John, in New Brunswick, is, notwithstanding its one great advantage of diminished distance, recommended most strongly to be rejected."

I would say again this was the official information; this work had been done at the expense of the Imperial Government years ago, and here is a map accompanying the report, laying down the exact route, which is the route of Mr. O'Sullivan, until it comes within a few miles of Grand Falls. The engineer says the country between Grand Falls and the Tobique River is of a most objectionable character; that you must either commence above or below, in either case of really increasing the distance. So my hon. friend is censuring the Government for not having made this survey, when the Government had all these facts in their possession, which, however strong their desire to take up an all-Canadian route, made it impossible for them to do so. What is this appropriation for? We are endeavoring to promote a line from Montreal to the Maritime Provinces. Now, this line would have been surveyed if the Government had not been in possession of the fact that it is 130 miles longer to the city of St. John than the short line by way of Megantic. But it is apparent that it is 150 miles longer to St. Andrews; it leaves New Brunswick out in the cold. This northern route—much as we might desire it, if it was found a short route, a practicable route to Moncton—being 130 miles longer to St. John and 152 miles longer to St. Andrews, is, in view of the policy of the House, as pronounced last year, an absurd and impossible route, not worthy of discussion. It does not meet our requirements in any possible way. The question before the House is this: Is it necessary to take time to make further surveys, in order to ascertain the practicability of the different routes. I venture to say no hon. member can, after this explanation, made upon the authority of official documents, say it is necessary to waste any more time, in order to ascertain whether the all-Canadian route is one which answers the requirements of the resolution. The next line which comes before us is that surveyed and recommended by Mr. Light, the line from Quebec to Harvey. A survey of that line was made by Mr. Light, at his own special instance. He was employed as the engineer, because the people of Quebec had confidence in his high professional standing, and in his fidelity to the interests of the city of Quebec. For that reason he was selected, and the route he surveyed from Quebec to Harvey was the route of his own recommendation. But he himself condemned that route after examination, and the hon. member for Megantic admits that he condemned it. Do you want more time to survey this route which Mr. Light himself has condemned? You do not want more time to examine that route. What comes next? It is the route which Mr. Light last winter proposed. Knowing that his own route would be condemned, and finding that a good route had been found to Mattawamkeag, he put in a supplementary report, recommending his combination line. I interrupted the hon. member for Quebec East in his argument, in order to put him right. I asked when Mr. Light pointed out his combination route, or expressed his wish there might be a survey of it, and he stated that in August last Mr. Light sent a telegram to that effect. I asked for a copy of that telegram and obtained it. It has no reference to the combination route. The hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier), says a suspicion must attach to Mr. Schreiber because he did not make that survey. What does Mr. Light say? Here is a copy of his telegram, dated 18th August, 1884:

"Came in from survey Saturday night; have finished twenty-five miles of good line. But I think we are not rising fast enough on first fifteen miles to get easily over the summit. Consider desirable to put on a supplementary line, beginning at summit and running out near St. Henry, some forty miles long, so as to gain elevation quicker; also, line up the Etchemin, joining the present line, about sixty miles from St. Charles; but have not sufficient staff to do so; should like authority to employ two small additional parties of my own selection for about one month; the expense will be trifling compared with the issue."

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny). Why was he refused?

Mr. COLBY. That raises another question entirely. I believe $57,000 is the expense incurred in these surveys already, and that the appropriation had been anticipated. I felt it to be my duty to criticise, and with deserved severity, from my standpoint, the report of Mr. Light. He has given it to be understood that he wanted a survey of the combination line to Lake Chesuncook, that is not true. His mind was running to Hartland, and his idea was to find a better route from the St. Lawrence up to Hartland than the one he was taking. His first idea so far as any evidence has been given, with regard to the combination route, was taken from Mr. Vernon Smith's report in which he says that, looking towards Quebec, there seems to be a good country in that direction. Then, putting what Mr. Light knew of Wicksteed's survey and Vernon Smith's survey, it was natural to infer that there was a good route through there, and I have never expressed the opinion that there might not be a good route. But Mr. Wicksteed's was simply a barometrical survey, no other having been put on the line, and Mr. Wicksteed says the barometer was unreliable. I say no engineer has a right to say: "Here is a line so many miles long, with certain curvatures and certain gradients," when there has been no instrumental survey at all, and where, from the point at which his survey diverges, to Lake Chesuncook, about 50 miles has never been stepped upon by an engineer.

Mr. LANDRY (Montmagny). There are 113 miles on the Mattawamkeag that have not been surveyed.

Mr. COLBY. I am coming to that. I am not complaining that it has not been surveyed, but I say that an engineer has no right to pledge his professional reputation that the grades will not exceed 40 feet to the mile, that the curves will not exceed a certain degree of curvature, and so on, upon such insufficient data as Mr. Wicksteed's survey of a portion of the road, which was barometrical and not instrumental. It was a fair criticism, a legitimate criticism, and my hon. friend, who has just come into this House and spoken for the first time to-night, to the great delight of both sides of the House—a gentleman of high professional standing, and no one has a greater opinion of his ability than I have—who chivalrously defended an absent friend, should, I suggest to him, have considered whether, in doing that, he might not have been doing injustice to others. I did not go out of the record to attack Mr. Light's reputation. I know nothing of his character or reputation, but I took his reports and criticised them fairly, and pointed out inaccuracies of the most glaring character, inaccuracies in his map and in many other respects, and I judged him by the record, and not by anything outside of it. High and eminent as he is, the more careful he should be. He must expect that members of this House will criticise his statements, as I did, in the spirit of fairness, and in no other spirit whatever. The hon. gentleman, not intending it, I presume—I am sure he would not have done it if he had listened to the debate—should not have charged me with going beyond the record to attack an absent gentleman. I attacked a gentleman who was present in the report which was before us, and I am not liable to the castigation, or blame, or censure that my hon. friend from South Grenville (Mr. Shanly) unintentionally, I believe, attempted to inflict upon me. Now, with regard to this route, admitting that this combination route is a good route, then I say it is a longer route—and there is no sophistry that can cover that up. It is a longer route to St. Andrews by 40 miles, to St. John by 30 miles, and to Halifax by 30 miles, aggregating to all these ports more than 100 miles, and I can clearly show by the figures which are admitted, with the exception of one correction which I have to make, with regard to the Lachine distances, but the House has been wearied in regard to that. I have this objection to the combination road, or to any other road in that section, and I call the serious attention of the House to this: There is a certain point to which we ought to go, in order to meet the wish of the Maritime Provinces, because they have just claims; having contributed with all other parts of the Dominion to the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway, they should be permitted to participate in its immediate advantages. But I say there is a point beyond which we ought not fairly be asked to go. Now, Mr. Light, the special advocate of that route, tells us in his report that in order to carry his line out it is necessary to build a bridge at Quebec, which he estimates will cost $5,000,000. It is a magnificent bridge, there is no doubt about it; I am told by those who have seen it that it is a most magnificent structure, as it has been photographed and published in some of the illustrated papers. He says it is necessary that the Government, in order to construct that bridge, should give a guarantee of 4 per cent. for twenty-five years upon $5,000,000, which means the exact subsidy which we are asked to give to this short line in the Maritime Provinces. This combination route can only be carried out by swallowing up the entire subsidy in crossing the St. Lawrence, before even making a start for the Maritime Provinces. Now, is this country prepared to do that? The Maritime Provinces do not ask it; no one in the Maritime Provinces asks anything of the kind. You are not doing it to oblige them. Whom are you doing it to oblige? If you do it at all, it is to oblige a certain section, a certain locality, which is entitled to as much consideration as any other locality, and which, in these same resolutions, will receive a large sum of money. There is no man in the Lower Provinces that asks it. But in order to oblige that locality alone this Dominion is asked to spend $5,000,000, before even we make a start towards the Maritime Provinces. Now, to my mind this is a fatal objection to the whole project of a route by Quebec. I say to our Maritime Province friends that if they are willing to wait until this country is prepared to guarantee 4 per cent. for twenty-five years upon $5,000,000 to build an unnecessary bridge across the St. Lawrence, and another $5,000,000 to carry the road to the Maritime Provinces, they may just as well throw up the whole thing at once, for I do not believe the people of this Dominion, or their representatives in Parliament, are prepared to go that far. I say this is an unnecessary bridge, for it is unnecessary for any purposes that we require it for. We do not need it for the Intercolonial Railway. The Intercolonial Railway has its outlet, and a good one it is, by the way of Lévis, and the Grand Trunk, and the Victoria bridge at Montreal. Were I a citizen of Quebec I would not feel that a bridge crossing the river nine miles away and making Quebec simply a way station on that throughfare was of any advantage to the city of Quebec. I should feel that Quebec was benefited, by being made a terminus, by the fact that transhipment had to be made there, by the fact of the ferry, but I should not feel that it was going to increase the importance of the city of Quebec to have a thoroughfare pass nine miles away from it. It is just like a railway passing through a man's farm, where he lives several miles from the depot. It does not help his farm to have the railway go through it; the advantage he gets is his proximity to the depot. And the city of Montreal will get no advantage in that sense from the Lachine bridge. The traffic will come down and will pass it. Montreal people will not see the railway, unless they have the curiosity to go up eight or nine miles and see the heavy trains pass. But I say there is no actual advantage to the city of Quebec which would justify the expenditure, and even if there were a great local advantage, it is not an advantage to the Dominion of Canada at large, and it should not be placed as an incubus upon this road. I say it is weighing down this necessary road which is in the interests of the Dominion at large, and of the Maritime Provinces especially, it is weighing it down by an unnecessary five millions. The Lachine bridge will have to be built. It is a portion of the Ontario and Quebec system; it is to be built as a commercial enterprise: it will be built in any event, and not a dollar of this subsidy will be taken to construct the Lachine bridge. No request will be made to Parliament for one dollar to construct that bridge. It is as good as built now. In fact, very able men in this city, who have a high reputation, are examining it, with a view of tendering for its immediate construction, which is sure to be realised in the immediate future. That bridge will be no expense to the country whatever. Then why burden this great and necessary enterprise, so important to the Maritime Provinces, by an unnecessary debt of $5,000,000, or $3,000,000, or whatever the sum may be, for the construction of an unnecessary bridge—unnecessary in the sense I have indicated—at Quebec? Admitting all that Mr. Light claims for the combination line, however hopeful it may be—as it would be hopeful, if he spoke upon actual data—but admitting all he claims for it, the building of this very expensive bridge is an insuperable obstacle to that route. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will come lastly—no, not lastly. Here is another route: there is the air line, as shown on the map, between Montreal and Moncton. There is the route advocated by one man, Mr. Graham, called the air line. I will not discuss it; I will simply say this: I suppose it is the desire of all that this road shall be a practical road, a satisfactory road, and that it shall cost as little as possible to this Dominion. Now, that air line, if it should be built, would have to be built as a new road. You would have to build from Montreal to Richmond a line running straight along the Grand Trunk, a line wholly unnecessary.

Mr. LANGELIER. Why not take the Grand Trunk?

Mr. COLBY. Why don't the lion and the lamb lie down together? Perhaps when the millennium comes and Sir Henry Tyler and Mr. Stephen are willing to pool everything—which I hope, in the interests of this country, they will not do—when they are willing to give up to each other all the advantages each possess, when they are actuated by that great and universal benevolence, then, perhaps, the suggestion of my hon. friend may be carried out. But no man can seriously say that this scheme is practicable; and our Maritime Province friends want to be served by the Canadian Pacific Railway. They want a line to run across this continent, a consecutive line, under one management, not broken into by any other road whatever; they want the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that is what this appropriation is made for. No hon. gentleman in this House supposes the Grand Trunk is going to give up 76 miles of its main line on a great thoroughfare running from Montreal to the Atlantic, for the convenience of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and, if they did, it would be done at a cost fully equal to the cost of building a new road. Then, I say you have got to commence at Montreal and build a new road, if you take that air line. But nobody wants it, that I ever heard of; no interest in this country wants it; nobody is asking for it, except this gentleman, who has wasted a great deal of ink in the newspapers in various sections of the country, as an advertisement, perhaps, as much of himself as of the line which he espouses. If I had time I could point out the physical difficulties that belong to this air line, and which are well known to gentlemen familiar with that locality. I will come lastly to the line which is the short line, which is the short line upon the map by measurement, which is believed to be the short line and is actually the short line to the Maritime Provinces. That line has been surveyed; we have the result before us, with all its difficulties. This eminent engineer, this gentleman of high standing, as no doubt he is, who has urged the northern route, has given us an illustration of what it is. We have it in the smoking room and we have it here. He places himself behind the shield of truth, and with that shield he gives us a plan drawn upon a horizontal scale of 50 miles to 1 inch, but for every inch there is 100 feet, if you go perpendicularly. That is holding up the mirror to nature. It is like a toy-mirror which boys use. If the mirror is turned one way, a man is a pigmy, but if it is turned the other way, he appears to be high in the heavens. It is an absurd caricature. Does any man suppose that a railway line would run up a mountain side as is shown in this plan? That profile, I say, is a caricature. The elevation which he points out there is distributed over 80 miles of distance, and amounts to less than 17 feet to the mile, and yet, if you look at the map, you would imagine the line was going over one of the Himalayas. If the mirror were held fairly up to nature the elevation would be almost undiscernable to the eye; it would not amount to more than  $\frac{1}{10}$  of an inch—it would be only a speck. Yet, this gentleman who holds up this distorting mirror places himself under the shield of truth. The short line route has been surveyed. It goes through as good a section of country as can be travelled, in order to get from Montreal to the Atlantic coast. We cannot have prairie, for it does not exist. But the grade from Montreal to Sherbrooke does not exceed 53 feet to the mile, and that is a very practicable grade, as everyone knows. Now, as regards the grades on the International—and here we see the candor of the gentleman who has been held up here as a disingenuous engineer. Mr. Schreiber, in his report, states the fact that there is a 74-foot grade on the International, and on every road going by the southern route he indicates a maximum summit of 74 feet. He makes that statement without mitigation or explanation. I have the report of Mr. Ramsay—I will not read it, on account of the lateness of the hour, but I will lay it on the Table—who located the line, and he says it was constructed with a maximum of 66 feet, because at the time the road was built, although they expected it would become in the future a portion of the through system, there was only a small subsidy and a comparatively small municipal subscription, and they were obliged to make the cost of construction conform to their financial condition; but he said it was built with reference to reductions; and a small expenditure, without involving any increased distance, would reduce the maximum to 60 feet to the mile. And yet that is the most objectionable point of the whole road. That route has been surveyed; it is a practicable route. It is a compromise route, and that is a very important matter. This line is for all the Maritime Province ports, not for St. Andrews alone. If it was, another route would be selected. If it was for St. John alone, a different route would be taken. If it was for Halifax alone, no better route could be taken. But St. Andrews and St. John have conceded something, in order to meet Halifax, which is the most remote. Who are asking for delay? Do the members representing the city of Halifax? Does the member representing St. John; does the member for Charlotte, representing St. Andrews? Are those members representing those districts, for the benefit of which, particularly, this road is to be built, saying: We are dissatisfied with this matter; the surveys have been insufficient; we want you to take more time, and to be sure you are right? No; those gentlemen who are most interested, whose constituencies are most interested, who have examined the question with the most care, stand shoulder to shoulder, differing as they do politically; the member for St. John joins the members for Halifax, and the member for Charlotte, representing St. Andrews, will stand by them on this vote, saying: We are satisfied with the survey and satisfied with the Megantic route; we do not wish delay, but we want the road to be built with all reasonable dispatch. Then, this line has been proved, by instrumental surveys, to be a practicable route. It is the short route; it is the best commercial route, for it passes through the State of Maine, in a way which will give it a larger trade than would be secured by any line running north of it; and this line is endorsed almost unanimously by members from the Maritime Provinces, irrespective of party, with one or two possible dissentients. It is for the benefit of the Maritime Provinces that this appropriation is being made. They have examined the question because they are interested parties. I venture to say that while the Blue Books of some hon. members have been locked up, others have been studying them at night, and they have come to an almost unanimous conclusion that this route is in the interests of the Maritime Provinces. Who is to stand in the face of these facts and gainsay them? If they are satisfied why should we not be satisfied? Ought we not to be satisfied? The results of further surveys of the different routes would not alter the conclusion reached, and, in fact, no further surveys are needed. I think the case for further delay is entirely unfounded. No case has been made out. The requirements have been fully met by the official documents, and every other point has been met, and there is no necessity for further surveys. And I believe this House will, with very great unanimity, come to the conclusion that this line should be built now, as the Provinces want it, in such time that the channels of trade will not have got worn and set, and the trade of the great west can be taken down to the Maritime Provinces. The members from the Maritime Provinces, one and all, desire this to be done by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and by no other corporation. And we have evidence of that feeling in the position taken by their representatives. I have a report from Mr. Petersen, the engineer of the Atlantic and North-Western, stating that he has gone very carefully over the matter, and fully endorses the opinion of the Government engineer. What does Mr. George Stephen, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, say. He says, in a letter read by the hon. member for Halifax, that in his opinion that is the best route in the interest of the country, and he does not admit his willingness to embark in any other enterprise, but is ready to proceed immediately with the construction of this road. Then all the parties interested in the Maritime Provinces and the Maritime ports, particularly the corporation which is to build the road, which aims to build the road, which is the only corporation which will build the road—all these are unanimous, and it is only the cavillers, only those who want to make political advantages, with few exceptions, who desire to obstruct or delay it. I say, with some few exceptions, if it is obstructed, it is for local considerations of that kind, which are not essential to the carrying out of the main enterprise, or for the sake of embarrassment.

Mr. GILLMOR. I had made up my mind that it was not necessary for me to say anything on this subject, but my hon. friend from Stanstead has rather enthused me, and

I wish to make a few remarks. The hon. gentleman has not magnified the importance of this enterprise, so far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, and I am as much interested, and my constituency is as much interested, as any constituency can be. More than 40 years ago, energetic and enterprising men undertook to construct a railway from St. Andrews to Quebec, before this unfortunate Ashburton Treaty was completed. At the time we commenced with our preliminary surveys and explorations that treaty had not been decided, and some 35 years ago we commenced operations on a railway known as the St. Andrews and Quebec road, and during all those years, my constituents have been looking for a short line to Montreal, and they perceive now that their expectations are about to be realised. With regard to what my hon. friend from Quebec has said, that it was his opinion that the whole operation would end when they reached a particular point at Mattawamkeag, I must say that I do not share that fear. About nine years ago the Acting Minister of Railways and the hon. member for Stanstead, when this enterprise of the International line was about being commenced, without any expectation of receiving any aid, came to the Maritime Provinces, and to the county I represent, to look over the prospects and see if they could get the people to take any interest in the enterprise, so as to carry it to completion. If the object at that time was to go to Mattawamkeag, then to Portland and Bangor, I think they would have turned their attention to Portland and Bangor rather than coming to the Maritime Provinces. I believe the object of the projectors of the International line was to make the shortest and best connection with the Maritime Provinces, rather than to reach the ports in the State of Maine; and I have never seen any deviation, from that time to this. I do not think hon. gentlemen need have any fear of the road reaching Mattawamkeag, with the intention of stopping there, and letting the trade go to the United States. It would be out of place for me, even if I were able to do so, to go into the question of distance and curves and grades, and it would serve no useful purpose, but I am satisfied myself that the International is the shortest and best line, as a compromise line, for all the Maritime Provinces, and I am satisfied if we do not get that line, we will get no line in the Maritime Provinces. With regard to its cost, taking into consideration that the Maritime Provinces have paid their proportion of the $100,000,000 towards the construction of our great transcontinental railway, the subsidy now proposed to continue this railway from Montreal to the Lower Provinces, amounting to $3,400,000, is not a large appropriation for the benefit of the Maritime Provinces. If this line does not give us all the trade coming from the west, it will give us that which is quite an equivalent to the cost—a short, speedy, and cheap inter-provincial communication. I have been a little amused to hear my friends from Quebec charging that the present Government are going contrary to the interests of Quebec. During the whole time I have been here, Quebec has been paramount in the interest and favor of the Government, and never until this time has the Government been charged with neglecting the interest of Quebec. On the contrary, it has been said that the Government were unfairly influenced in favor of Quebec, and I think the Minister of Public Works, and the Ministry as a whole, have no idea of neglecting Quebec, and it is rather to their credit that, in a matter which is in the interest of the Dominion as a whole, they have had the courage of their convictions, irrespective of party or local interests, and that they have understood the true line to select for the best interests of the whole Dominion. Furthermore, this great Canadian Pacific Railway must be one great continued whole. I do not know whether they can construct the line on the present subsidy, but if this road is to be constructed at all, as I understood by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), it is to be constructed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I know that it was the opinion of my late lamented friend, Mr. Isaac Burpee, who was not ill-informed on these questions, that this was the most desirable line, and that if a subsidy were granted it would be built on this route. I have his opinion in this regard in my desk at this moment. Of course, our different constituencies in the Maritime Provinces may think that each one should contend for his own particular locality; but I think, if our people were present, they would know that many things have to be decided here on the principle of give and take—the principle of compromise—and I am glad that so many, irrespective of party, have concluded to support this line. One evidence that this is a practical line is the fact that private parties have invested hundreds of thousands of dollars in it, and if they embark in this enterprise it is not likely that they will build the line to Moosehead Lake or River and let it stop there. They did not undertake to do that. They knew that there was a practicable line across Maine to Mattawamkeag on the European and North American line. On the strength of the practicability of that route, they have invested large sums of capital. That is an evidence that it could be built. A fresh evidence of the truth of that survey is given in the reports. The hon. member for Megantic, (Mr. Langelier) to-day endeavored to show that it had high grades, that it crossed the Moosehead Lake, and that there was some 30 feet of water there; but these statements carried evidence of truth and correctness, because they did not disguise the facts. It would be very easy, if it was desired to practice deception, to make the depth of water 5 or 6 feet; if a convenient engineer had been there, he could have made 6 feet as well as 30; but that statement bears truth on its face. I do not wish to say anything about the character or the capacity of engineers. They are very much like other men, and a good deal more so, sometimes; but some of them have very convenient scales and measurements, and I think some new light must have entered into the brain of this engineer when he discovered this combination line. It was made very plausible on paper, but I do not think it speaks much for any gentleman's reputation that he can lay out a route without having surveyed it. I knew Mr. Light when he was a young man, something like thirty years ago, and when he was employed on the St. Andrews and Quebec line. At the same time, without going into the question of the different routes, I think you have only to look at the maps to see that you cannot get any shorter line than that by way of the International line; and that it is practicable is evident from the fact that hundreds of thousands of private money has been already invested in that line. One very great objection urged against this line is that private means have been invested in it. I think it is, perhaps, unfortunate that the Acting Minister of Railways, many years ago, before he ever dreamed of being Minister of Agriculture or Minister of Railways either, invested his energies and his means in that line. But I do not see Mr. Pope's line mentioned in the Bill. It is the shortest practicable line that can be obtained from Montreal to the Maritime Provinces. If this subsidy is granted it will be given to some company. It seems to be imagined by some that this company are going to take out of their subsidy a large amount of money to enrich some private individual. That is not my experience of companies; they do not usually give their subsidies away. If the company can utilise the International line for their own interest to carry out this great scheme, what objection is there to it? I do not wish to see public money voted to enrich any private parties; but there is no objection to existing lines being utilised. There was no wrong in the parties engaged in this International line many years ago, to secure a direct and practicable route to the Maritime Provinces, embarking in it; and in order to carry out this great scheme of a railway from ocean to ocean,

Mr. GILLMOB.

I see nothing unfair or improper in utilising that line or in building a new line, just as they choose, so long as it serves the public. I have expressed my views about this great undertaking before. That is past; the money is expended, and the great transcontinental line is now nearly completed to Montreal. The next thing is to reach a port in the Maritime Provinces. I do not wish to draw any comparisons; but I am glad to see that no one is opposed to continuing the line to the Maritime Provinces, except the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard). He seems to think that Canada has done enough when it has built the Intercolonial Railway. This is the first time I have heard it asserted in this House that the Intercolonial Railway was built for the Maritime Provinces. The Intercolonial was much more important in the interest of the Western Provinces than of the Lower Provinces. The Upper Provinces had no ocean port for six months in the year without going to the Maritime. If the Province of Quebec has not been considered in regard to railway expenditure, I should like to know what Province has been. That Province has the North Shore line; it has the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway; it has the Edmunston line; it has the Central Quebec line, which will connect with the short line we contemplate; and in what respect has that Province been slighted or neglected? I think it comes with ill-grace from a Quebec representative to oppose this measure. Now, I will vote most heartily for the measure. I am opposed to delay; I think there is no argument or reason for delay; I believe the International line is a practicable line and a shorter line than any other that can be had, and therefore I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. BOSSE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I feel it my duty as a representative of the city of Quebec, not to allow the occasion offered by the adoption of these resolutions to pass without expressing my opinion on this subject, and without stating the reasons which have induced me to form this opinion. It is particularly in view of the position taken by the hon. member for East Quebec (Mr. Laurier), and by the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Langelier), mayor of Quebec, and by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), that I owe it to my myself, as I owe it to my constituency, to declare, as emphatically as it is possible, that I believe I would not be doing my duty towards my constituents and towards the electoral division of Quebec Centre if I did not give my fullest and most unswerved support to the resolutions such as they have been introduced.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOSSÉ. (Translation.) The hon. gentlemen are saying "hear, hear;" but let them wait a moment, and perhaps they will not say it with such irony. I say my full and unswerved support in favor of the resolutions which have been introduced, not because I approve the three resolutions in full, but because, in order to obtain the Pacific terminus for Quebec, we must take the resolutions as a whole, without dividing them, or without taking them apart, one from the other, and I must lay aside the objections I may have against what is called the short line. I am satisfied that the welfare of the city to which I belong depends on the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway being at Quebec. For a long time we have fought to attain this end, and now that we are near the result it would be unfortunate to let it slip. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) has declared that he would vote against the amendment and the sub-amendment which are now proposed. He has stated that he would do so because he thought that by his vote he would run the risk of causing Quebec to lose the terminus. At the same time, he declared that he would move an amendment to one of the resolutions—if I understood aright, to the resolution which is connected with the short line. He has not seen—and that is where he made the mistake—that his motion in amendment would necessarily involve the result which he seeks to avoid, by voting against the amendment and the sub-amendment which are now proposed. The three resolutions which have, no doubt, been dictated by what the Government considered to be in the interest of the various localities which they concern, are, by the declaration of the Government, urged upon us as a whole; they must be adopted as a whole or rejected as a whole; they must stand or fall as they are. It is not in our power to divide them or to parcel them out. If I thought the thing would be possible perhaps I would not follow the course which I have adopted. But it is because these three resolutions are submitted to be adopted or rejected together, that I am obliged to concur in the adoption as a whole. I said that the Pacific terminus at Quebec is, for us, a matter of the greatest necessity. That terminus, by itself, and the fact that it will enable us to get rid of the monopoly from which we have so long suffered, are, for me, the two great considerations which induce me to take that course. The city of Quebec has, for many years, maintained itself by its lumber trade and ship building. Either directly or indirectly, Quebec lived upon those two industries. Unfortunately, both disappeared at the same time. About the same time, or a short time thereafter, disastrous fires destroyed the greatest part of our city; and if the experience of other cities had repeated itself among us, the cities which have exclusively lived upon their lumber trade have inevitably disappeared with running out of the industries which supported them, and the same thing repeating itself in our midst, Quebec was doomed, but there was among us such vital forces that, notwithstanding those disastrous circumstances, Quebec has been able to maintain itself and to increase somewhat. Thanks to the success of its industries, thanks to the establishment of manufactures, it has not only kept up its population, but even became more prosperous than it was in the best days of the ship building and square timber trade. But those industries, started under such different circumstances, notwithstanding their prosperity, were not as thriving as they might have been, had they not groaned under the tariff which was imposed upon them by the Grand Trunk Railway, the North Shore Railway and Richelieu Company. Labor was cheaper than in surrounding towns and cities, land was also cheap and the manufactures have been able to sustain competition. But that competitor has become disastrous for us. The rates imposed by the Grand Trunk on the south shore of the St. Lawrence; the still higher rates imposed by the Grand Trunk since it controls the North Shore Railway; the corresponding high rates of the Richelieu Company, have almost isolated us from the rest of the Dominion. The Richelieu Company found profit in it, and so did the Grand Trunk Railway. I have not much to say against them, as business men, but in order to get rid of them, I have everything to say, because it was making Quebec powerless, and causing it to be deserted for ever, if that style of thing continued. Such is the position in which we found ourselves, and I say that to get out of that position we would have sacrificed everything. I say that, if by these resolutions, our position is changed, and if, added to that, we obtain the Pacific terminus at Quebec, there is not a Quebecker who, by studying the facts and weighing them, seeing what we will come to if that state of things continues, and what will be the position in which we will find ourselves if we obtain the control of the North Shore Railway, by the Pacific and the terminus, I say there is not a Quebecker who will not vote in favor of these resolutions. We have a choice to make. We have to choose between the position which we might hold if we wish for the resolutions, or that in which we actually are, and which will perpetuate itself if we do not obtain redress. It is the short line which appears to be the bugbear, but I do not see any reason that we should feel anxious about. In my opinion, it cannot be for Quebec a source of anxiety, and for these reasons: It will never enter anybody's head that when western trade has once reached Montreal it shall take this short line and run over three, four or five hundred miles to go to the various seaports of the Dominion, and that it will not stop at Montreal, where it is already to take the steamers, or according to circumstances, that it will not go down to Quebec to be shipped from there. This so-called short line cannot draw the western trade by that route, because it is too long, and it cannot compete with Montreal, because the cars, on leaving Montreal, will have hundreds of miles to run over to reach the seaboard, instead of the produce being shipped from Montreal. It cannot be objected that the building of a bridge at Lachine will open a new route, and that consequently the trade will be directed towards Portland and other American ports. I do not see that there is a serious danger of that kind, because the distance between Montreal and Portland is 300 miles, and Portland is 300 further from Liverpool than Quebec is. We would have to suppose that trade would take, willingly, this longer route of 300 miles by rail and 150 miles by water to reach Liverpool. It is said that there would be compensation in the cost of freight, that there would be compensation through the greater amount of trade in those cities, but they are large enough to compete for ever, I do not say temporarily, against the advantages offered by Quebec and Montreal. If, unfortunately, we have at Quebec a society which has caused so much damage to the trade of that city, let us hope that by the force of circumstances it will soon cease to exist, to the greatest benefit of Quebec, and even of those who belong to it; and even if such would not be the case, even if we had to fear the competition of Portland and Boston, have we not already the Victoria Bridge, which gives a right of way to cars which do not belong to the Grand Trunk Company, and do we not know that their rates have lately been reduced from $14 to $4.50. Do not these rates represent what would be the cost to a company of building a bridge. And do we not all know that this bridge has been built in such a way as to allow the laying of a double track at a much lower cost than that of the building of a new bridge. All these considerations tend to show that the danger which is pointed out in the direction of Portland and Boston already exists, if it exists at all, and if trade is to take that direction it has already taken it at the present time. Therefore, I do not find in that short line any disadvantage which can compare to the great advantage which we are to derive from the Pacific, but the hon. members for Montmagny, East Quebec and Mégantic say that the surveys which have been made for this short line have been inadequate. Far from me the idea of saying that I can decide, from the returns brought down, that one line is better than another. None of the proposed lines are absolutely located, or recognised as practicable. But again, I say that I see no danger to Quebec from the short line. I cannot stoop to that consideration, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately, our harbor is closed for six months in the year; we cannot think, during that time, of being benefited by these advantages. During six months only our port is open to navigation, and it is only during that time that we can derive the advantages which I have mentioned. It would be perfectly useless to have the short line during winter, because we could derive no benefit from it, because we could only see the trains going over a bridge nine miles away from us. In summer I submit that it would be perfectly indifferent to us that the short line should pass via Quebec, because the trade will stop there to be shipped, and would not willingly go over hundreds of miles by rail to reach seaports at more remote points. I repeat that in spite of all that has been said and of all that has been done we will have the Pacific Railway terminus at Quebec. The argument is brought forth that our position is the same as it was last year. This, Mr. Speaker, is not so. Our position last year, let it be remembered, was that given to us by a law which enacted that $960,000 would be appropriated to the purchase of the North Shore Railway in case the Pacific Railway could make the necessary agreements. A delay of six months was allowed to make these arrangements, which were entirely optional with the two companies. After those six months, if the arrangements were not made, the $960,000 were to be appropriated for the construction of a new line to be built, which was to be organised. Such was then the position, but such it is not now. A year ago everything was optional; each company could conclude to not enter into these arrangements. Now, as the Government tell us, the arrangements are complete and final. The particulars of these arrangements have been stated to us. The Grand Trunk Railway Company has agreed to sell, upon certain stated conditions which I will discuss. The Pacific has also, we are told, agreed to purchase the road on the terms imposed by the Government. That position is altogether different from that in which we were last year. Last year there was an offer to sell or to buy. Today the conditions are settled, agreed and determined. As we are told by the Executive, it is a final settlement, and all that is required is the sanction of Parliament. Sir, I believe in the statement made by the Executive on the subject. I believe in it, such as it has been made to us; the more so, as I rely upon the honor of the one who made it—upon the honor of the Government, in whose name it has been made; and for another reason, because no Government would survive such a statement if it was not fully executed and followed to the letter. This is for me another guarantee, as, for my part, I state it emphatically, if these arrangements, such as they have been pointed out to us, if the policy which was enunciated to us was not carried out, I would be the first to condemn the Executive for misleading the House and the first to withdraw my support from them. This, Mr. Speaker, satisfies me on the question whether we shall have the terminus, and I take it for granted that the terminus will be given us within as short a delay as possible. But we are told: Supposing that we should have it, that would give us nothing, because we have no winter port; but we forget the crossing, we forget that the crossing is one of the conditions of this contract under the existing law, and that consequently the produce can be carried over from Quebec to Levis during the whole of the winter season. We also forget the Bill now on the Paper, by which the navigation will be kept free opposite Quebec throughout the winter; but we forget something more, we forget that there is not only the grain trade, which can be carried on during fall and winter, we forget the shipment of grain through Quebec during summer; we also forget the enormous exportation of square timber which comes down from Ottawa during summer, and which, owing to the operating of the North Shore Railway by the Grand Trunk, has only come down by water, because the Grand Trunk Company has until now always refused to carry it; we also forget what could be done with the cattle trade, which must necessarily come to Quebec, thus saving to the shipper the enormous losses which they suffer between Montreal and Quebec. I say that for these conditions our port must take a very large development. I may be mistaken, but I say from the fact that the Grand Trunk Railway will be relegated to the South Shore, while the Pacific Railway Company will be in the same position on the north shore, that a bright future lies in store for us. These two great companies will wage a keen and legitimate competition to one another, and bring to our ports the enormous traffic of the western part of the Dominion; and even if we should only get a small portion of this traffic, there is quite a difference between that prospect and the disadvantage under which we have labored until now. To attain this end we cannot afford a delay, which has often proved so fatal to us. Have we not already favored to lose the benefit which the legislation of last year had secured for us. We have on Paper a legislation giving aid to the Pacific Railway Company. These resolutions, according to the hon. Minister of Public Works, form a part and parcel of the resolutions which are now under discussion. They must all go together. If, to-day, we should lose the opportunity of obtaining the terminus at Quebec, where would we be a year from now, with the unexpected changes of all kinds which might come up. I say, moreover, that we will have lost the opportunity this year of controlling the company and of securing the terminus for Quebec. In a year from now the coercive means which we have now and which can be utilized will have ceased to exist, and we will not be able to control the Pacific and bring it to our port. I see in the postponement and in the fact that we should lose the only opportunity afforded to us, something which would be unfair towards the city of Quebec. For these reasons, and as I do not wish at this late hour to enter into other considerations which might be favorable to the adoption of these resolutions, I must vote against the amendment and the sub-amendment and in favor of those resolutions.

Mr. FISHER. I believe that this is a question of the utmost importance, of national importance, and not only of interest to the Maritime Provinces. A question in which all and every part of the Dominion should take part and think well over before deciding upon it. The proposition of the Government is probably an effort on their part to repair, as much as lies in their power, the great evil which they entailed upon the country when, a good many years ago, they located what is called the Intercolonial Railway. I believe it is in consequence of that mistake, which was protested against by hon. gentlemen on this side, that to-day Canada is called upon to grant a large subsidy to build a short line to connect the Maritime Provinces with the rest of the Dominion. It is not my place to decide so intricate a question as that of the engineering capabilities of the different routes, especially after the expression from a high professional authority which was given this evening. I allude to the expression of opinion which the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly) gave, and I think the House may congratulate itself that he arrived here so opportunely as to be able to give a timely warning to Parliament, a warning it will be well to take to heart and ponder on before casting our votes. I am not going to enter into an elaborate discussion of the various comparisons of distances and grades over the different routes. That has been done by hon. members who have already addressed you, though I think I have some data to go on, but, at this late hour, it would be out of place to allude to this question at any great length. I cannot refrain from alluding to one or two points brought forward by hon. gentlemen who support the resolutions. The Minister of Public Works alluded to the obvious absurdity, that of any triangle, the two sides might possibly be shorter than the one. Of course, we know well, when a triangle is formed of straight lines that is impossible; but when we find one side of the triangle shaped like a corkscrew, it is quite possible that it might be longer than the other two. I am not in a position to state whether this is the case or not. I will not attempt to decide the question of railroad mileage, but as long as there is question about it, I feel bound to support the amendment of the hon. member for Quebec East. When the hon. Minister of Public Works spoke of that base of a triangle, he alluded to it as being as nearly as possible an air line. I presume we can take an air line between the points of Montreal and Canterbury, because I find, on looking at the map, that all the various routes proposed, even those that go to St. John and St. Andrews' converge on Canterbury. Therefore, I think the portion of the line eastward from Canterbury may be almost disregarded in the comparison of distances. If we take the air line from Montreal to Canterbury, the Minister of Public Works says that line goes at every point some 20 miles from the present proposed route; while, if the Quebec route be taken, the air line is, at one point at all events, 80 miles distant from it. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) alluded to all the lines proposed. I had imagined even he was going to omit the line which he alluded to as the line of one man, and I confess that I almost feared to have the temerity of being the only man who referred to it. When the hon. member for Stanstead spoke on this question, the other evening, he alluded to the rush for this subsidy. He said: Now, at all events, there are several Richmonds in the field. I do not know if the hon. gentleman has any idea of making a pun, but I thought that, at all events, there was one Richmond, the seat of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, which had a claim for this short line route. The hon. member for Stanstead said Mr. Graham was the only man who advocated that route. I am not going to advocate it, because I do not consider myself to be in a position, any more than the House, to decide on the merits of the question; but before going into the question of that particular route, I wish to allude to some things which relate particularly to the proposition before us. In this respect, I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether, in the proposition now before the House, there is any arrangement made as to how the subsidies therein contained are to be disbursed to the companies which may take up the undertaking? In these resolutions there is nothing which intimates how the money will be paid, whether at a certain rate per mile of the road constructed, or upon certificates of the engineer, or in what way. I believe in the other House the Minister of Justice said this money was to be paid out at a certain rate per mile of the road constructed. If that is the case, I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether the whole mileage from Montreal to Halifax is to be considered, or only the mileage that is to be constructed, and not the mileage that may be taken now as built. These two propositions would involve very different operations. From the remarks of the hon. member for Westmoreland, I am inclined to think this money is going to be paid for the line that is to be constructed, because he said the subsidy of $3,500,000 will amount to $10,000 a mile for the 330 miles which have to be constructed by this route. The Government, however, has not given us information on this point. But when the hon. member for Stanstead spoke, he alluded to the taking over of lines from St. Lambert to Chambly and Chambly to Lennoxville, etc., instead of having to build a new line from Montreal by the line round the back of the mountain to Lachine, across the Lachine bridge, and from Lachine to Chambly, and from there north of Waterloo to Lennoxville or Sherbrooke. We do not know which is the proposition of the Government, or how this money is to be paid out to the company who undertake this work; and, if the proposition of my hon. friend from Stanstead is to be taken as the true proposition, namely, that the bridge at Lachine and the various portions of railway now built between Chambly, West Farnham and Sherbrooke are to be taken, we must add a considerable number of miles to the distance to be calculated from Montreal to the objective points in the Maritime Provinces. Then, perhaps, we would find that the one side of the triangle is not shorter than the other two sides. My hon. friend from Stanstead said this bridge at Lachine was going to be built. I would not dispute his statement of that point, in regard to which he should be well informed as one of the originators of the Atlantic and North-Western Railway, under whose charter that bridge must be built if he is not now one of the shareholders. He also stated that the people of Montreal would not be able to see the traffic going over that bridge. If that is the case, it seriously affects the people of Montreal and the whole of the calculation. In the consideration of this question there is a lot of information which we have not before us. We do not know the line of railway to which we are asked to give this subsidy. Therefore, I contend that we are not in a position to state whether the subsidy should be given as proposed in these resolutions, to a line by Sherbrooke, Mattawankeag, Frederickton and Salisbury. There is another point which is a reason why it is not necessary we should not decide to-night, or even this Session, in regard to this matter. My hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby) says the people of the Maritime Provinces want this railway immediately. One would imagine that the resolutions involved the immediate commencement and completion of this road; but the Minister of Public Works, in answer to my hon. friend from Sunbury (Mr. Burpee), said that the company were to be given two years to commence and four years to finish the work. Then, it is evident that there is no necessity for this great haste to night. It will do no harm to wait until next Session before finally deciding upon the route, and in the meantime we may be able to get the additional information which is necessary for the Government, for the engineers, for the House and for the people of Canada, before deciding upon this question. Great stress was laid by my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Hall), and other hon. members, upon the air line. In looking at the map, I find that the air line from Montreal to Canterbury passes through the town of Richmond, goes on from there and passes to the north of the International line, 25 miles at least, I am convinced. Well, Sir, that route which my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby) rather made fun of, the Richmond line, starts from the town of Richmond and proceeds almost coincident with the air line eastwards to a point called Portage, on the boundary line between Maine and the county of Beauce, in the Province of Quebec. It then proceeds just north of Chesuncook Lake, only about 15 miles at the farthest point away from the air line between Montreal and Canterbury. Then from the north side of Chesuncook Lake it follows what is called section B of the Government survey, to Canterbury. If the merit of that road is considered, it will be found that if an air line must be the shortest, then the line from Richmond must be a shorter line than is the line south of Moosehead Lake, and by the International. The only objection to that line that I understood the hon. member for Stanstead had, was that the whole of it had to be built; and he also said that the Grand Trunk from Montreal to Richmond was not available for this purpose. Well, that is a very wide question, which involves the question whether this country is absolutely dependent upon only one railway corporation. I do not think we are so dependent; I believe that we can obtain our objects without begging the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build this line. But that seems to be the stand taken by the hon. member for Stanstead, and other hon. gentlemen. Then there is another point to which I wish to allude. Within a very few miles of that line there is already communication with the city of Quebec. Within a few miles of Portage, the point to which I alluded, on the boundary between the county of Beauce and the State of Maine, we have the Quebec Central, and it has an extension by the Etchemin valley; and I understand from those well acquainted with the facts that that distance is only 30 miles. But if we should not take the Grand Trunk at the line from Richmond eastward to Portage, I believe it would be more in the interest of this country that a line should be taken from the northern bend of the International, near Lake Megantic, and go to Portage, which would be a line inside our own territory, and then, joining the line from Quebec by the Etchemin valley to Portage, strike across the State of Maine to Canterbury, which would give us less distance in the State of Maine, while it would also open up one of the best of our counties in the Province of Quebec, the county of Beauce. And if the line was taken from Richmond eastwards, we would find that the great county of Richmond and Wolfe would be opened up and greatly benefited. The hon. member for Stanstead seems to think that the only person who was interested in this line was Mr. Graham, of Richmond. The hon. member forgot that the Government of this country has been appealed to by petitions from the county of Drummond, and from various municipalities in the county of Richmond and Wolfe, asking a survey of that line. That line has not been surveyed by the Dominion Government, and why? This is a question which somewhat puzzles me, because of the very obvious fact that that line passes through the town which is represented by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), who is considered, I believe, one of the most prominent supporters of the Government in this House. Early last fall a public meeting was held in Richmond, asking that gentleman to induce the Government to try a survey through his county, but the Government did not try that survey. I believe the answer given to that request was that it was too late in the day. Well, Sir, I happen to know that after that time other survey parties were sent out to survey the line between Sherbrooke and Montreal, to the north of Orford Mountain. Certainly, if the season of the year was not too late to survey that portion of the proposed route, it could not have been too late to try a survey from Richmond eastward. One would suppose that the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, who was a supporter of the Government, and would naturally be supposed to be interested in the county which he represented, would, as an assistance to his county, have endeavored to obtain the survey of that line. And, Sir, did I not know the peculiar circumstances of the hon. gentleman, I would not think it possible to explain that fact. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite will say that it was impossible that any such line could be carried through. Well, Sir, one might have thought so, but I think I have seen enough of hon. members opposite to know that they are quite ready to get a little money spent in their counties whenever they can. It does seem an extraordinary thing that the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe should not have attempted to find a line through his county, which would have been, perhaps, a better line than the one proposed. Why did he not do it? The only reason I can think of is the fact that, as I know, that hon. gentleman is more intimately connected with the International railroad, more intimately connected with the city of Sherbrooke, in which he resides, more interested in that portion of the country, than he is in the county which he represents. Sir, this is one of the reasons why it is important that this question should not be decided to-day. I believe this is one of the reasons why we should take more time to ponder this question, before we vote upon it, because I contend that there are suspicious circumstances connected with this matter, and they are suggested to my mind in consequence of what I have just stated. When I find that an hon. member who is a supporter of the Government in this House does not try to benefit his own county, but in consequence of what I know to be the greater personal interest that he has in another direction, he prefers to see a line carried outside his own county—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I do not think the hon. gentleman should attribute any personal motives to the hon. member.

Mr. FISHER.

Mr. FISHER. I will withdraw the expression, certainly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would call your attention to the noise and discourtesy shown to my hon. friend by gentlemen on the other side of the House. I think your attention might have been called to that, also.

Mr. FISHER. As I said, I withdraw the expression attributing interested motives to the hon. member. I can only say that I would be glad to be able never to think anything against a member of this House; but, Sir, I am at a loss to imagine what could have actuated that hon. gentleman, when he refused what was evidently to the advantage of his county. Sir, I find that this question not only involves the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, but I find that it is surrounded by other circumstances, which I consider so suspicious as to make me unwilling to decide upon this question to-night. I find that it is stated by hon. gentlemen opposite that the only company in this country which is able to perform this work is the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I find that in a letter signed by Mr. Stephen, president of that company, he states that that company is ready to undertake the building of that road. The letter is addressed to two hon. members of this House, who represent the city of Halifax in this House.

"To M. B. DALY and J. F. STAIRS:

"SIRs,—Referring to your letter of the 16th of June, on the subject of the proposed short line between Montreal and the seaports of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, I have to say that the route indicated therein (that proposed in the Government resolutions) is, in the light of our present knowledge, the best that has been proposed, and this route is preferred by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to any other that has been suggested. I will say, further, that it is the desire of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to take up this scheme as a natural and necessary supplement to the Canadian Pacific Railway as it now exists. The company will be ready without loss of time to enter into negotiations with the Government for carrying out this project, as soon as the necessary legislation is obtained.

"(Signed), GEO. STEPHEN."

Now, I think, in view of the facts which occurred this Session, this is an extraordinary letter. It throws a good deal of light upon the question. It is only three or four weeks since this company came to us in forma pauperis, asking for assistance to carry out their original contract, to do the things which were specified to be done in the contract. But the building of this short line is not mentioned in the original contract. When the Government asked Parliament to grant the company this assistance, they told us it was going to be just sufficient to enable the company to carry out the terms of the original contract. Now, what do we find? We find this same company offering to undertake the most onerous obligation, practically coming to the country and saying that they are ready to undertake a vast work, while hon. gentlemen opposite say that the work is so vast that this subsidy would be but as a drop towards that end. Yet we find this same Canadian Pacific Railway Company which, a few weeks ago was so poor, are now ready to undertake this great enterprise. But there is another and a worse aspect to this question. When this letter was written, on the 16th of June last, it is evident that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were desirous of undertaking this new contract and of carrying through the short line to the Maritime Provinces; and at the same time they were negotiating for assistance in order to carry out their original contract. At the same time that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were negotiating with the Acting Minister of Railways, who brought down the resolutions to this House for giving them assistance, they were proposing to the Government of this country to undertake an obligation by which they would have to buy from that same hon. Minister the railway which he owns in the Eastern Townships of the Province of Quebec. It is true I have had suspicion as to the reason why the short line was adopted; but when I found that letter, and saw the statement made about the Canadian Pacific Railway, I confess my suspicions became almost a moral certainty, and subsequent evidence in regard to the matter was such as no disinterested person in this House or the country could afford to overlook. It is a most improper state of affairs. If I were to characterise it in the way I should like to characterise it, you, Mr. Speaker, would probably call me to order, as using expressions contrary to the proprieties of the House. I therefore will not do so, but I state again that it is a most improper thing that the Minister of Railways, at the same time he was negotiating with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to afford them relief in their embarrassment, in connection with the enterprise of building a railway across the continent, should have been engaged in receiving propositions, and the company engaged in considering an undertaking to enter into another contract, which would oblige them to either buy or secure favorable running powers over a line which is owned by the Acting Minister of Railways. The hon. gentleman told us that he himself was so much interested in the International that he could not have anything to do with the resolutions. He told us he was so interested in that railway that he could not bring down the resolutions for the short line, and the First Minister brought them down; and at the same time the Minister of Agriculture knew he was himself a party negotiating with the Canadian Pacific Railway with respect to the short line. This state of affairs is very suspicious, and it leads us to believe that the determination of the Government to insist upon the adoption of the short line, in which is included the International, is a policy hasty, ill-considered, if not unconsidered, and I believe all independent-minded members in this House should support the amendments moved by the hon. member for Megantic and the hon. member for Quebec East.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was somewhat surprised to hear the remarks made by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher); I was somewhat surprised at the line of argument he adopted and at the amount of ignorance he showed, especially in regard to the Intercolonial Railway. The hon. gentleman commenced his remarks by attacking a line of railway for which I hold myself as specially responsible as any member in this House. If there is any member to whose activity, public conduct and strenuous efforts the location of that line may be attributed, I believe that man is myself. And then the hon. gentleman casts reflections on the location of the line, and attempts to throw on the Government, at this day, the responsibility of determining that location. When he endeavors to place that responsibility on the Government alone, he is ignorant of the events of that time. I was a member of the Government of that day, of which my respected and hon. friend the First Minister was the leader. Was the Government alone responsible for the location of the line? No; Parliament, by an immense majority, adopted the location. We find the leaders of the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs voting for that location, and yet we find the whole blame thrown by the hon. gentleman on the Government, if blame there was. I want to make no excuse for the location. I assume my share of the responsibility, as a member of the Government of that day. It was a location approved by Parliament and by the British Government, which aided us in raising money, and guaranteed a certain portion of the cost of the construction; and looking at the result, there is no reason to be ashamed. I assume, so far as one individual can, the responsibility of that location. Let us see how the leaders of the Liberal party voted on that question. With the exception of Mr. Workman, there was no member from the Province of Quebec who voted against it. Among those who voted for it were Sir Richard Cartwright, Messrs. Geoffrion, Holton, Joly, Pelletier, Poser, Tremblay, and others. If the hon. gentleman is conversant with the position of any of those members, and with the proceedings that took place, he would not say that the Government of that day alone were responsible for the location of the Intercolonial, but that Parliament almost unanimously supported it. I am not making this statement in extenuation of the act. I do not wish to relieve myself of any responsibility connected with it. I repeat, as I did in 1867-68, that the location was justified by the necessities of the country, by considerations for the future security of the country, and by what would best serve and conserve the interests of Canada. I was a little surprised at a remark made by my respected friend, the member for Jacques Cartier, for whose opinions I have great respect and who manifests a great deal of that independence which I myself occasionally exhibit. I was surprised that that hon. member made a mistake in referring to the position of the Maritime Provinces. The hon. gentleman stated that the Intercolonial cost $42,000,000. I am not prepared to say whether my hon. friend has overstated the amount or not, but this I will say, that the people of the Province of New Brunswick do not thank the people of Quebec or Ontario for the outlay upon the Intercolonial Railway. It was our due; it was a matter of treaty; it was part of the bargain. It was a concession they were bound to give us, and I appeal to my right hon. friend to say whether I am not stating the facts, in saying that in the bargain, which was the foundation of the legislation which led to Confederation, it was not stipulated that that road was one of the conditions of the consummation of the Union. What right has the hon. member for Jacques Cartier to cast in our teeth that we have had more of the public money of Canada than was proper, or than we were entitled to receive; that we were indebted to Canada with regard to the Intercolonial Railway, and the outlet for us which it afforded. We, in the Maritime Provinces, have desired and have always shown our desire to develop the country in the west; $100,000,000 are being spent in lands and money on the Canadian Pacific Railway, from Montreal, to the Pacific Ocean. Who gets the benefit of it? Do we, in the Maritime Provinces get the benefit that you do here in Ontario and the Western Provinces? Do we participate in the enjoyment of these advantages which you will enjoy in the building and running of that road? Certainly we will not. And if we have not those privileges; if we cannot enjoy the advantages of that enormous outlay, surely we ought not to have that cast in our teeth, when we want a short line of communication, when we wish to perfect that system, when we wish, having Montreal and Quebec as summer ports, and an outlet for that country, is it not right, when we have winter ports, when we have St. Stephen and St. John, and Halifax, open at all seasons of the year, is it not right that we should have those privileges, and is it proper to have it cast in our teeth that we got so much advantage by the building of the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. GIROUARD. I never said so.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I withdraw the remark. I am not going to discuss the merits of these lines. I think, after the able speech—the magnificent speech, if I might so term it—the forcible, energetic and earnest speech of my hon. friend from Stanstead, it would be inconsistent for me to take up the time of the House in discussing the relative merits of the two lines. But I will take up a few minutes in discussing the impossibility of carrying out the ideas of those who speak about an air line, which was dilated on to some extent by the hon. member for Brome. The hon. gentleman talks on a subject about which he knows very little. That question was better understood, and as fully discussed in 1867, and certainly better discussed than it has been during the present Session. These surveys of Major Robinson were fully before Parliament, before the Parliament of that day, and perhaps few men took as much interest in the discussion of that matter as I did; and I tell the hon. member for Brome that notwithstanding the various surveys made on that occasion there were but two lines that Parliament entertained the slightest idea of accepting. These were the Intercolonial Railway, as at present located, or Major Robinson's northern line, and his survey by the valley of St. John. The third line ran through what was a sea of mountains.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). What?

Mr. MITCHELL. British Columbia is indignant that I should use a portion of the title that the leader of the Opposition applied with reference to his Province. The central or air line was looked upon at that time as an impossibility, and was rejected, and but two lines were discussed, as I have said, with any probability of being adopted. I merely speak of this to show the almost impossibility, the great improbability, of any sane man accepting an air line through our country, no matter how short. There is one passage which I do not think I have looked upon for 15 years, but in the report of the middle line of Major Robinson, my impression is that there is one 13-mile section of that road which will cost about one-third the cost of the whole Intercolonial Railway, thus showing the improbability of ever building a line such as the hon. member for Brome talks about, as an air line.

Mr. FISHER. I did not allude at all to Major Robinson's line.

Mr. MITCHELL. No; the hon. gentleman did not, but the hon. gentleman talked of an air line which would go through very much the same country as Major Robinson's line. He did not allude to Major Robinson's line because he did not know anything about it—that is the fact of the matter. The hon. gentleman has chosen to refer to the views and feelings of an hon. gentleman who is not now in this House—the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), and he speaks of that hon. gentleman being so dead to the interests of his county as to advocate a line which passed by his own county, and he went so far as to impute motives, which were scarcely in order, according to the rules in this House. Does the hon. gentleman forget his own position? Does he recollect that the county he represents is in close proximity to the line he was opposing? What will his constituents say when he goes back for election, when they quote the speech he made to-night; when they ask him what county he represents; if he represents the county of Brome, which is in close proximity to this line, or if he represents the city of Quebec, or some of the ports of the Lower Provinces. What answer will the hon. gentleman make? I am afraid he will not be quite as cool as he was to night in making his speech. He also took occasion to refer to another hon. gentleman who was not present—the respected member who is Acting Minister of Railways in this country. I think his remarks were certainly not such as he ought to have made with reference to a gentleman who has occupied the high position he occupies, who possesses great parliamentary and practical experience, and who, with all due regard to the hon. member for Brome, possesses quite as much alike of the confidence of the country and of Parliament as the hon. gentleman himself, and I think a good deal more. It has been my honor and pleasure to occupy a position in the same Cabinet with that hon. gentleman, and a position in Parliament along with him, and I say that when the hon. member for Brome made these remarks, I felt ashamed of him attempting to impute motives to the Acting Minister of Railways. They would be unworthy of him if he entertained them, and they were as unjust as they were uncalled for. I will not, at this late hour of the night, occupy the attention of the House; but I will give him one more hit before I part with him, and it will apply to the gentlemen who sit beside him—I refer to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) and to the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Lange-lier). They all sounded the same keynote and rang the changes of delay, procrastination, put off. What has been the cry of these gentlemen against the Government of the day? What has been my own cry? Too much procrastination, too much put off, too much delay; and yet in one of the most important concerns which relate to the Maritime Provinces, it is to be put off to the injury of the country, and of the constituency I represent. We, in the Maritime Provinces, have our rights. When we entered this Confederation we did so believing we would get our just rights; we have never got them. We went into this Confederation believing that we would get even-handed justice; we have mighty hard work to get it out of these western people. When we put our assets into the Treasury of this country we put in valuable assets, representing every dollar of our debt. What did the Upper Provinces put in? They put in rotten institutions, like the Grand Trunk Railway, with $46,000,000 of debt. The right hon. Premier smiles at that. When he was asked about it, he said it was a first-rate asset—a railway stretching all through Canada. We may follow it up with the canals; and when we get a distribution of money for railways or other public works, what do we find? Where we get a dollar, $10,000 goes to Ontario—save and except Nova Scotia, because when Sir Charles Tupper was here he always looked after its interests; and when one of these important works which our Province demands is under consideration in this House, we find all kinds of obstacles put in the way to cause delay and procrastination, and to throw it over for another year. Now, I am just going to conclude with one piece of advice to the Government, and it is this: I find in these resolutions, in addition to the short line, that we are going to take over the North Shore, and we are providing for a line to be built to Edmunston. That is all right enough; I do not object to that; it goes to New Brunswick. But in this North Shore deal I do not know what terms the Government have made with the Grand Trunk Railway Company; but I find, in the statement made by the hon. Minister of Public Works, that the Government take over this line from the Grand Trunk, and, as near as I can make out, they give $592,000.52. They also take over the $250,000 of stock which, I suppose, they pay for at par. Then I find such terms as expenditure on roadway and buildings, $176,000; expenditure on rolling stock, machinery, furniture, etc., $7,609; Palais harbor, $30,000; Jacques Cartier line, $150,000; and sundries, $19,000. Now, I want to give the Government a little bit of advice about this matter, which, I suppose, they will take kindly, though they very seldom do. If they are going to let the Grand Trunk Railway Company cover up any little steal in this matter, I pledge my word that I will look after it. I do not want the Grand Trunk, under cover of getting paid for any improvements on the road, which I am willing they should get, to make a steal of $200,000 or $300,000 into the bargain: and I want to warn the Government. Let any man see what improvements the Grand Trunk has put on the North Shore. They have wooden bridges, with only ten or twelve years of life, and the cars have not seen a paint brush for years. You can see the same thing all through; and I would ask the Government to have these things properly investigated before they give the Grand Trunk half a million dollars, without knowing what it is for. In conclusion, I intend to support these resolutions, and to vote against the amendments.

Mr. LAURIER. I wish to give an answer to the statement made by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) when he took my friend the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) to task, because he had stated that the Government were responsible for the selection of the route of the Intercolonial Railway. The hon. gentleman took exception to that, and said the responsibility was shared by Parliament. I want to refer the hon. gentleman to a motion which was moved by Mr. Dorion when the Bill was before the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the year before. You refer to the year before the act was done. Never mind what his opinions were before he changed them.

Mr. LAURIER. I will answer that. That motion of Mr. Dorion was voted down; the hon. gentleman knows it:

"That it be an instruction to the committee to amend the Bill so as to provide that the location of the line of the Intercolonial shall not be adopted without the previous assent of Parliament."

That was voted down. The following year I know the question was raised again, and was voted down by Parliament, because, otherwise the guarantee of the Imperial Parliament would have been lost. So that the answer he made to the hon. member for Brome was not very strong.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has simply confirmed the statement I made.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Langelier to amendment :

To leave out all the words after the word "thereof" in the amendment, and insert the following: In the opinion of this House additional surveys are requisite, and should at once be undertaken, in order to a sound decision as to the proper route for the short line railway; and it would be premature to adopt any line before further surveys have been made.

Amendment to amendment negatived.

Mr. LESAGE. (Translation.) I move, in amendment to the amendment:

That all the words after "that," in the amendment, be left out, and that the following be inserted in place thereof:—

The House does not now concur in these resolutions, but that they be referred back to a Committee of the Whole House, with instructions to amend them as follows:—

By striking out from the first clause the words "via Sherbrooke, Moosehead Lake, Mattawamkeag, Harvey, Fredericton and Salisbury," and by adding at the end of the said clause the following words:—

The said subsidy to be given to the company which will build the line, which will be found to be the shortest and most practicable after complete instrumental surveys of all the lines which may pretend to obtain this result.

Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the night, and especially after the long discussions which have taken place, it is no time to make a long speech. Still, I cannot allow the remarks made before the House by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), with regard to the different lines which may reach Canadian seaports, to pass by without contradicting certain statements which he has made. The hon. member for Stanstead began this discussion by referring to the through line on Canadian territory, and he endeavored to point out that that line would be 139 miles longer to St. John and 159 miles longer to Halifax. I shall leave that line aside, as I have no vouchers in my possession to prove the contrary, and I will deal at once with the other lines which he has criticised more especially for the benefit of his own cause. The hon. member for Stanstead has himself stated that Mr. Light had made a report in the course of the year 1884, and that it was in the course of the winter in the same year that he had informed the engineer of the Department of the existence of a new line which he called the combination line, and to support his statement he read the telegram which Mr. Light had addressed to Mr. Schreiber, the chief engineer of that Department. Well, I think that my hon. friend made an error of fact. In the course of the summer of 1884 Mr. Light was actually making an instrumental survey of a line from the St. Charles Branch Railway to Churchill Lake. That is not at all what we call the combination line, and what Mr. Light was asking the Government to cause to be surveyed, but a new line passing through the Etchemin valley, and which had already been barometrically surveyed. This was the true combination line, and that gentleman, by playing upon words, will not mislead public opinion on this, even by reading the telegram. And I refer to page 25 of Mr. Light's report to prove my assertion. Besides, I will quote that part of the report which is addressed to Mr. Schreiber, and which reads as follows:—

"COMBINATION LINE.

"I beg leave to direct attention to line (marked No. 3 on the general map) which was explored as far as the summit and favorably mentioned in my report on the reconnaissance made in July last. Starting from Chaudière Junction it would traverse the valleys of the Etchemin and Famine Rivers to the height of land near the village of St. Justin.

"This summit is 950 feet above the starting point at Chaudière Junction, or 509 feet lower than the summit on the line surveyed by Rivière du Sud. From St. Justin the line would continue its course south-east, and nearly direct to the vicinity of the head of Lake Chesuncook, from whence it would connect with the line surveyed during the past season between that lake and Canterbury.

"From data on hand, there is every reason to believe that grades not exceeding 35 to 40 feet to the mile can be easily obtained in both directions, by this route from Chaudière Junction to Canterbury.

"This line appears to me to possess advantages peculiar to itself, which I have deemed it my duty to point out in a special report."

The Hartland line is a line from the St. Charles Branch Railway and not a line from the Chaudière to Hartland. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to bore the House with these particulars, but the question is of such importance that I desire that it should be well understood before taking a decision. Besides, the hon. member for Stanstead went so far as to state that the engineer of the Department, Mr. Light, had found a line which was very important and very easy to finish, but that for the time being it was not thought advisable to grant it, because it was too late, and he admits himself that the line was exceedingly advantageous. Such is the sum of the demand I now make to the House. When Mr. Light, in August, 1884, was asking the engineer of the Department to cause an instrumental survey of the said line to be made, it seems to me that it was time to grant it. People now cry out, and in order to defend their position they say: "The route is, perhaps, superior to that which we have adopted, but you have come too late." Well, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is never too late to defend a question in which the Province of Quebec is interested, from Montreal to Quebec and from Quebec to the Maritime Provinces.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question.

Mr. LESAGE. (Translation.) It seems to me that the hon. members opposite might allow me to explain. As a rule, I do not uselessly take up the time of the House. I never made a four hours' speech on the Franchise Bill, nor no six hours' speech on the North-West troubles. Now, Sir, to come back to my subject, my friend the member for Stanstead has stated that Mr. Wicksteed has made an inadequate survey, with imperfect instruments, of the River Etchemin. This is false, but I say that, until now, you have not had an adequate survey, neither for this line nor for the others—a survey which would be sufficient to allow you to decide such an important question. He said that the combination line was longer than that from Montreal via Sherbrooke and Mattawamkeag. He has quoted figures in support of that statement. I hardly know where he has taken them. At all events, they cannot be very positive, since he admits that the combination line has not been surveyed. He appealed to our hon. friends the members for the Maritime Provinces. He told them that that combination line should not be adopted. Still, after waxing very pathetic in his expression of a well-known sentiment, he comes forward and states that the combination line is by far the longest. How can that be, since, at the beginning of his speech he said that the line advocated by Mr. Light had not even been surveyed? How does he know it, then? Well, Mr. Speaker, this combination line, which is said to be unknown, but which is perfectly well known, that line is the shortest and most direct, it is the one whose curves are the least, whose grades are the lowest. And the hon. member for Stanstead has done nothing else but to state a fact which he has not proved. It is very easy to say that a line which one favors is shorter than another, but how could he prove it? It is by the reports of engineers, and there are none before the House. True, we have some reports with regard to a certain line, for instance, 40 miles of which are unsurveyed. The combination line, such as represented by the reports before the House, is the shortest and the most advantageous, as I will show by the following figures:—

† The distances via Passadumkeag and Mattawamkeag are based on the assumption that the extension eastward from there to Moncton will be carried to St. John and over the existing lines of railway.

* These estimates are based on the assumption that the syndicate carry out their intention of bridging the St. Lawrence at Lachine, and building a line from Lachine to Sherbrooke. In the last estimate via the combination line to Harvey, the Quebec bridge and connecting lines are estimated for single track, in order to institute a fair comparison with the Lachine bridge.

I am not bound to rectify the figures of the hon. member for Stanstead, which, with his ordinary eloquence, he has so well laid before the House, and especially before the members from the Maritime Provinces. I will simply say to the House that I do not make of this question a sectional issue, but it seems to me that when we come before the members from the Maritime Provinces with the above mentioned figures, and when our opponents come and say: Here are other figures—it seems to me that we have a right to express a doubt as to what is before the House. What I ask is a minute and thorough survey, and I only ask what is fair. But a line is forced upon us without an accurate survey, without giving us any reasons based upon the reports of enquiries. It is intended to make us accept a line from Montreal by way of Mattawamkeag to St. John, and we are told that it is the shortest line. I do not wish to contend that it is not the shortest nor the most favorable line; but at least let it be proved to us by figures and reports made by competent engineers. Let it be proved that the Sherbrooke line is the best, and I shall lay aside all other considerations, and I will be ready to vote in favor of the resolutions. But it is not when the chief engineer of the Government admits, himself, in his reports, that a great portion of this line has not been surveyed, when he has not even given any plan or profile before the House calculated to set aside our statements that the levels reach from 1,800 to 2,000 feet, that we can decide with a knowledge of the facts; and more than that: for the purpose of the case, the reports of the engineers who were sent to survey this Etchemin line have been falsified, and consequently this shows their perfect fairness and their ability, which ought not to have been questioned. Therefore, I hold that the reports, incomplete though they may be, are truthful, until the contrary is shown to me by other and more complete reports, applying to the whole distance of the three lines mentioned, so that we may decide with a knowledge of the facts. That decision taken by the Government proves, moreover, this fact: that we have not been placed on equal footing to compete with other lines, and before this day I have had occasion more than once to remind this Government of the promises which they had made to me, that a full and complete instrumental survey of that important route would take place, and always without any results. The interest I take in this line will surprise no one, when I say that apart from the reasons above mentioned, that the county which I have the honor to represent would have been crossed over from one side to the other by this important line, had it been chosen, as it should have been, were it not for the evil influences which are known. I flatter myself that I am doing my duty at the present time, and when the promoters of the famous short line via Sherbrooke come here and say that the surveys made by Mr. Wicksteed were made with imperfect instruments, when it is known that that gentleman was in the employ of the present Government, receiving his instructions from Mr. Schreiber, sent by that gentleman to answer to the fair demands of the promoters of the line of the valley of the Etchemin River, to survey that magnificent route and do justice without fear or favor to all interested parties, I am astonished at the arguments brought forward to-day, about imperfect instruments, and I ask, if it were not intended to play a farce, or make light of the reputation of engineers, whether qualified or not. I do not know this to be a fact, but I have strong doubts about it. Now, Sir, in answer to the charges brought against Mr. Light, because it was his misfortune to be compelled, by force of circumstances, to make a report which was favorable to the line of the Etchemin River, I shall read a letter addressed to the editor of the Montreal Gazette. I have no doubt that it will please the House, and above all, my hon. friends opposite, to see how he refutes the gratuitous charges which have been made, both in this House and outside. The letter reads as follows:—

“To the Editor of the Gazette:

“Sir,—My attention has been drawn to the following statement in your parliamentary report of the debate on the short line question on Wednesday last:—

“Mr. Hall supported the Government line from Montreal via Sherbrooke and Mattawamkeag, as being shorter than the combination line, and with easier grades and curves. The professional standing of Mr. Light, as well as the feasibility of his line, was open to question. Mr. Light assumed the title of ‘Member of the Institute of Civil Engineers for Great Britain,’ but his name could not be found in any of the rules of that institution. Neither was he Government engineer for the Province of Quebec as he styled himself, two years having elapsed since he filled that position in the construction of the North Shore road. It was Mr. Light who recommended the change from the shore to the Terrebonne line, which cost the Government over a million dollars more than his estimates.

“Mr. Colby said he opposed the Light combination line, and declared that it had not been accurately surveyed. In order to make the line appear short, Mr. Light had made no allowance for curvature, nor were his reports upon it reliable. Moreover, Mr. Light’s road would involve the building of a bridge at Quebec which would cost seven millions, and would necessitate a subsidy as large as that proposed now for the whole line. Mr. Light’s mythical line would, therefore, be not only longer, but more expensive than the line now under discussion.

“Your parliamentary editor concludes from these: ‘The speeches of Messrs. Hall and Colby presented a very fair analysis of Mr. Light’s claims to consideration for his reports. Mr. Hall made a strong point in reference to Mr. Light’s connection with the North Shore Railway, while Mr. Colby left him, literally, without a leg to stand on in his dissection of Mr. Light’s report, and his exposure of its palpable dishonesty.’ My official reports to the Government are on record, and should contain the answers to any criticism of their merits. In answer to Mr. Hall: 1st. The combination line I propose is shorter to St. John and Halifax, and practically shorter to St. Andrews than the Mattawamkeag line, and is infinitely superior to it in point of gradients and curvatures. My report upon these points has been endorsed in every respect by Mr. Keating, C.E., of Halifax, a member of the Institute of Civil Engineers, and I have no hesitation in saying it would be similarly confirmed if it were referred to a committee of engineers of standing. 2nd. I was elected a member of the English Institution of Civil Engineers in 1862. My name does not appear on this year’s roll because I omitted to renew my dues, but I have not in any way forfeited my rights of membership. I was reappointed Government engineer of the Province of Quebec in June, 1883, for a further period of five years. The change of line of the North Shore, via Terrebonne, made on my recommendation, endorsed by both Mr. Shanly and Mr. Sandford Fleming, was not an additional cost to the Government (although it perhaps may have slightly exceeded my approximate estimate), but a saving as compared with the shore line. The extra cost of the road was principally caused by the great excess of quantities on the Quebec end, located before I took charge of the work. By reference to Hansard I find that Mr. Hall, by way of excusing himself from making invidious charges against me, says ‘that I made similar insinuations and charges against the Government engineer, and also made reflections upon the staff which had been selected.’ In reply I would say that I did not mean to make charges, insinuations or reflections against any one, but merely defended myself against misquotations and misrepresentations. Mr. Hall himself also misquotes me unfairly when he says (speaking of my remarks, page 5), ‘that this line termed the International has been traced by way of Sherbrooke and Lake Megantic. He (Light) speaks of a line that ‘has been traced.’ The line has been built and in operation for the last five years, with four trains passing upon it daily. Yet Mr. Light has the unfairness to speak of it in his report as a line that ‘has been traced.’ What I did say (vide page 5) in describing the International line: ‘This line termed the International line has been traced via Sherbrooke and Lake Megantic, to be carried across the State of Maine through Moosehead Lake, and from there to Mattawamkeag, on the Maine Central railway.’ Thus Mr. Hall omits all words after Lake Megantic to make a point against me. Mr. Hall further says: ‘The altitude on this theoretical line has only been barometrically surveyed,’ although on page 4 of my preface I distinctly state that ‘the summit had been tested by spirit levels,’ a careful series of which were backed up from the line surveyed, to check this important point.

“Now for Mr. Colby. This gentleman occupies some two and a-half pages of Hansard with charges and allegations against me. First, he says in effect that I illustrate my report by a map in which the line between Lachine and Sherbrooke is very incorrectly laid down. At the time the map was arranged it was impossible to ascertain exactly where it was proposed to pass this line, and it will be seen from the remarks of Messrs. Laurier, Colby and Sir Hector Langevin, on page 3076 of Hansard, that this matter is still unsettled. Although, for this reason, the position of the proposed line could not be exactly shown, yet the distance from Lachine to Sherbrooke of 104 miles as given in the body of my report in appendix 6, pages 17 and 18, is quite as short as any location will probably make it; thus showing there was no intention to deceive. Second, Mr. Light tells us about this combination line running from Chaudiere Junction to Chesuncook Lake, where it connects with the other surveyed line, and he tells us that the distance would be 105 miles. If any gentleman will take a ruler and draw a straight line on the map he will see that the distance of an air line is 105 miles, and Mr. Light knows that through that country you must allow twenty-one miles of curvature, so that instead of being 105 miles the distance should be 126 miles.’ The actual distance between the points above named, in a straight line, is less than 100 miles. At the foot of page twenty-three of my report on the line ‘instrumentally surveyed’ it will be seen that this latter line was 5 per cent. longer than an air line between the extreme points. This extra length was caused by curvature and is the percentage due to that item. The line by the Etchemin Valley passes over much smoother ground than the line instrumentally surveyed. Therefore the amount of 5 per cent. that has actually been here allowed for curvature is ample. Again, Mr. Colby says that, ‘if you read his report you will find that he gives you the grades and the curvature, and the summits and distances, although there has never been an instrument put over the route, and no man knows anything about the grades or curvatures or summits, except what Mr. Wicksteed obtained on the portion of the same line, by a barometrical survey with an unreliable barometer.’

“Mr. Colby is probably unaware that a careful barometrical survey of some 75 miles of this line from Chaudiere Junction to Baker lake was made by myself in the spring of 1884, and a favorable report then made on it by me to the chief engineer. In this survey I passed over every foot of the line and carefully examined the whole of it. Subsequently the summit height was verified by a series of checks taken with a spirit level from the datum of the line instrumentally surveyed, establishing exactly the true height of this summit above sea level, leaving no doubt that the grades reported by me and even less could be obtained. The grounds for this opinion are so fully stated on page 2 of my supplementary report, that I refer the reader to them.

“As to the cost of the line from Montreal to Mattawamkeag, I would say that a bridge must be built either at Lachine or at Quebec. If a single track bridge is considered sufficient in either case, I estimate that the new work, exclusive of constructed lines, would cost, via Lachine and Mattawamkeag, $11,200,000, and via Quebec and combination line, $10,500,000, so that $700,000 could be saved by crossing at Quebec. Whether the line I advocate be adopted or not, I contend that I have done my duty to the Government and the country without fear and without prejudice. Time will tell, and the ground will always be there to prove who is right in this question.

“Believing, that in common fairness you will insert this,

“I am, dear Sir,

“Your obedient servant,

I will not insist any further, nor will I give all the figures which might show in the most unanswerable manner, the position which I hold at the present, because they have already been given to the House on previous occasions. Now, as regards the arrangements made by the Government to do justice to the claims of the city of Quebec, by giving it a summer terminus of the Pacific within the limits of that city, I have no desire to discuss them. I am ready to accept on this subject the opinion of the interested parties represented in this Parliament by the distinguished members, and outside by the board of trade, the city council, its business men, its citizens’ committee, etc. Therefore, we have in that quarter all the guarantees required. It would be more than foolhardy on my part to express my views before having their opinion on the subject. Still, Mr. Speaker, the House will allow me here to express my candid opinion that as regards the satisfaction to be given to Quebec by the purchase of the North Shore Railway, or of another independent line, controlled by the Canadian Pacific, and considered as a summer terminus at the harbor of that city, but as regards what I have always considered myself, as the true and only vital question for the district of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. I refer to the extension of the Pacific from Montreal to the Canadian ports on the Atlantic. It is towards obtaining this result that we should have directed all our efforts. Indeed, what use is it to the district and the city of Quebec to have a change of name effected by the North Shore Railway; let it be called the Pacific instead of the Grand Trunk, if at the same time the Pacific is allowed to have its real extension through the townships to a certain sea port, which will eventually be called Portland. I say, Mr. Speaker, that in so doing you deprive completely the whole district and the cities, from Montreal to Quebec, from all the advantages which we had expected, would be derived from the Pacific trade. For, on account of distance, maritime freight, and insurance, you drive all the western traffic towards American ports, and what is more, we furnish the money to obtain that result. For that reason I say that the real question for the districts of Three Rivers, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces is that which relates to the short line with regard to distance, grades and curves to reach Canadian seaports with the greatest possible facility. If I make a distinction in the resolutions from the standpoint of the advantages which the inhabitants of Quebec might derive from the adoption of the third resolution, by leaving them sole judges of their own interests, and if I am ready to adopt their way of thinking, I desire to be more explicit as regards the features of the second resolution. The choice which the Government has made of the line through Sherbrooke and Mattawamkeag, as the shortest and the most favorable—and that is the object of the present sub-amendment, which I hope, for the reasons above given, will be accepted by the Government.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Lesage), to amendment.

2. By leaving out section 4, and instead thereof inserting the following one:—4. And whereas no arrangement has taken place between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the North Shore Railway Company for the acquisition of the North Shore Railway by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and whereas the Canadian Pacific Railway has done nothing yet in the way of constructing a new line between Montreal and Quebec, it is expedient, in the interests of Canada generally, as well as in the interests of the Province of Quebec, in order to better assure the construction of the continuation of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the maritime ports, to amend the Act passed during the last Session of Parliament, 47 Victoria, chapter 8, so as to enact that the line of railway intended to connect Montreal with the maritime ports by the shortest and most practicable route should pass by the port of Quebec."

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

PRAYERS.

PRINTING COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved that the ninth report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament be adopted. He said: This report was presented yesterday and it refers to the printing of a number of documents in the usual way. Reference was made to the committee of the question whether an extra edition of the Geological Survey report should be printed for distribution, and the committee, after carefully considering the matter, recommend that the present edition be considered sufficient. Communication was had with the Geological Department, and it was found that they have about 650 copies of French and English which could be distributed if the House so desired, but the policy adopted in the past is that the House distributes two copies to each member and the Department itself sends one copy to each member, so each member gets three copies; this particular report is published by Dawson Bros. of Montreal, with their imprint, and is sold at their establishment to those who desire to purchase it. The price of the volume for this year, according to the statement of Dr. Thorburn is $3.75. It was thought by the committee that it was not desirable to change that policy, because the supply of three copies to each member, with the permission to each person who desires to purchase any volume or pamphlet, was thought to be sufficient, and they therefore do not recommend the printing of the extra edition necessary for distribution among members. There is another part of the report which is simply a matter of internal economy. The committee recommend that Mr. Romaine, of the proof-reading branch, shall be hereafter known as the Superintendent of the Printing of the Sessional Papers of Parliament. Every one knows that the term "proof-reader" in no way represents the work which Mr. Romaine has to do. All the Sessional Papers are referred to him from the committee and he goes through them, sometimes takes from them duplicates, and, when a number of tenders are submitted, classifies them, and supervises generally the Printing of Parliament. It is understood that this does not in the slightest degree affect or interfere with the position which Mr. Hartney has so well occupied as Clerk of the Printing Committee; he still will be the organ of communication between the Printing Committee and this practical printing branch of Parliament.

Motion agreed to, and report concurred in.

FIRST READING.

Mr. McLELAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 159) for facilitating the navigation of the River St. Lawrence in and near the Harbor of Quebec.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPERIOR COURT OF QUEBEC.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that on Monday next the House resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolutions:—

1. That it is expedient to provide that there shall be paid to the Senior Puisné Judge of the Superior Court for the Province of Quebec, residing at Quebec, if the Chief Justice resides at Montreal, or to the Senior Puisné Judge residing at Montreal if the Chief Justice resides at Quebec, an annual salary of $1,000 in addition to his other salary.
2. That such salary shall be paid out of any unappropriated moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman promised to give us some information to-day as to his course in regard to what is on the paper and as to what is not yet on the paper.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th and 5th items will be proceeded with. The 6th will not be proceeded with, the 7th will stand and will perhaps not be pressed, the 11th will be withdrawn, the 12th will be dropped. Mr. Andrew Allan has gone to England for the purpose of making arrangements about different steamers of required strength and power. The 13th and 14th will be withdrawn. There will be a measure introduced granting certain lands under certain conditions to the officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers of the volunteers who served in the North-West.

Mr. BLAKE. What course does the Government intend to pursue in regard to the Temperance Bill, and when are we to have the Supplementary Estimates?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is not a Government measure, so we will not interfere with it; the Supplementary Estimates will be brought down Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose the hon. gentleman is not in a position then to state when the House will prorogue.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. POPE moved the third reading of Bill (No. 153) to amend the Acts respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and to provide for the completion and successful operation thereof.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman promised to bring us down some information the other day.

Mr. POPE. With respect to the point brought up about the item of $2,500,000, I am informed it really is not in the other and means nothing.

Mr. BLAKE. It means nothing at all; then you had better strike it out.

Mr. POPE. With respect to the 100 miles spoken of by the hon. member for West Ontario, the cost of making the usual allowance of 13 per cent. for shrinkage, was $2,640,000; the company received $2,630,000. I do not know how the hon. gentleman made up his figures, but that is the cost furnished to me by the engineer. The hon. gentleman says there is land besides, but the land is covered a good deal by this loan. With regard to the item of rolling stock, he said that the Order in Council was signed or passed immediately after Sir Charles Tupper left. It is quite true it was signed then, but the arrangement was come to with Sir Charles Tupper. I returned the 1st of May, he was temporarily absent, and I signed the Order in Council acting for him, but the whole thing was made up by him. It occurred in this way. The rolling stock was calculated in the first place by the Chief Engineer on the main line and branches, amounting to $1,700,000. It was changed, and properly changed, so that they were only to furnish rolling stock for the main line. That made the difference between what was actually given and the estimate.

House divided on motion for third reading.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means. He said: I desire to amend a resolution that was passed yesterday in which there was an error in the Excise duty. The resolution reads:

"Except that cigarettes or cut tobacco, when put up in packages weighing one-twentieth of a pound, or less, each shall pay a duty now twenty, thirty-five cents per pound, and damp or moist snuff, when containing over forty per cent of moisture, when put up in packages."

The word "except" is left out. This imposes a duty altogether different from that which was intended by the Inland Revenue Department. I ask the House to resolve itself again into Committee of Ways and Means to amend that resolution, and if the House concurs, then to refer the resolution to the committee upon the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not understand that that course is at all regular. The committee cannot amend a resolution unless a resolution gets back to it. The resolution is concurred in, and then forms the subject of the Bill.

Mr. BOWELL. I have enquired into the practice in matters of this kind, and I am informed that if the House resolves itself again into Committee of Ways and Means, and adopts this resolution, when we go into Committee of the Whole upon the Bill containing the clause that has already been passed, I then move this resolution in the committee upon the Bill, with instructions to substitute it for the one which has been passed.

Mr. BLAKE. It may be that is the practice, but it is not the practice that the hon. gentleman stated to us. He asks us to go into Committee of Ways and Means to amend the resolution—that is what I object to. If what the hon. gentleman proposes to do is to go into Committee of Ways and Means to pass another resolution, it will be time enough for us to consider it when we see the Bill in committee.

Mr. BOWELL. Perhaps I was not as clear as I ought to have been, but that is what I intended to convey to the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BOWELL. I propose to re-enact the whole resolution and substitute for the one we passed, the following:—

4. That it is expedient to impose upon all tobacco, as described in the first four paragraphs of section 248, of 48 Vic., c. 15:

On every pound twenty cents, except that cigarettes, or cut tobacco, when put up in packages weighing one-twentieth of a pound, or less, each, shall pay a duty of thirty-five cents per pound. And damp or moist snuff, when containing over forty per cent of moisture, when put up in packages of five pounds each, and over fourteen cents per pound actual weight.

On damp or moist snuff, when put up in packages of less than five pounds, on each pound twenty cents."

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain what the difference is between this and the resolution which we have passed.

Mr. BOWELL. The only difference between this and the resolution which we have passed is that if the resolution, as it was passed last night, remains upon the Statute Book, it would enable all snuff put up in five pounds packages to pay a duty of fourteen cents per pound, while that which is put up in larger packages would pay a higher rate of duty; consequently the effect would be that it could be all put up in these particular packages, and I am informed that it is the policy of the Department to prevent that. The present resolution will have this effect: Dry snuff now paying twelve, will pay twenty; that was the intention under the old resolution; moist snuff that now pays eight, will pay fourteen; wet snuff in small packages that now pays twelve, will pay twenty.

Mr. BLAKE. What does it pay under the resolution that we passed.

Mr. BOWELL:

"Packages weighing one-twentieth of a pound or less, each shall pay a duty now 20, 35 cents per pound, and damp moist snuff when containing over 40 per cent. of moisture, when put up in packages of less than five pounds each, 14 cents per pound actual weight."

This resolution was evidently drafted under a misapprehension of the law as it exists, because it does not convey the intention of the Department. When the resolution was placed in my hands, of course, I put it before the committee in that shape. It will be much clearer that way.

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me quite different, as far as I can judge.

Mr. BOWELL. The difference is more particularly with reference to the weight of snuff, which is not mentioned at all.

Mr. BLAKE. I find wet snuff mentioned here, and it pays 20 cents on each pound. That, of course, is a different rate of duty from that which the resolution we have carried would ascribe to it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am quite new to the practice which is proposed to-day, and I do not at all intend to accede to it. It seems to me contrary to first principles that we should be called upon to-day, in the committee, to pass a resolution inconsistent with and contradictory of that which we have passed and concurred in, and which is the foundation of the Bill. I do not understand that the House can be called upon by an independent proceeding to pass another resolution, quite different in effect, and containing different provision from that which we agreed to the other day. It is a contradiction of our decision. Of course, our findings are not like those of the Medes and Persians, are not irreversible, but they must be changed. I can see it would be essential to get back the resolution which we have already passed and to amend that resolution, else, when we come to have this resolution reported, we shall have two different resolutions of varying import and effect upon the same subject matter, which seems to me to be a most extraordinary procedure. It may be the practice of Parliament, but it is certainly inconsistent with the general practice of Parliament, with logic or with common sense.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It almost looks as if we ought to put both these resolutions in although they are utterly contradictory, and then strike out one. I do not remember any similar case to this occurring before. No doubt these resolutions in Ways and Means have been altered time and again, but they had already been got to the stage of the second reading of the Bill, which makes all the difference in the world. The proceedings with respect to all these money Bills require to be carefully studied, and although I do not want to embarrass the hon. Minister of Customs there is, it seems to me, no escape from the dilemma stated by the hon. member for West Durham.

Mr. BLAKE. I should like your ruling on the point of order, with the authority.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I understand the member for West Durham objects to the resolution now before the committee as being out of order, the committee having already had a resolution on the same subject before it. It is true a resolution has been passed by the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject; but this is intended to increase the duty, and it varies the other resolution in that way. The rule that I consider brings this within the authority of the committee at the present time is this:

"But every new duty must be voted in committee. So strictly is the rule enforced which requires every new duty to be voted in committee that even where the object of a Bill is to reduce duties, and the aggregate amount of duties will in fact be reduced, yet if any new duty, however small, be imposed, or any existing duty be increased in the proposed scale of duties, such new or increased duty must be voted in committee either before or after the introduction of the Bill." (May, 687; 19 English Commons Journal, 330.)

Also:

"But it must always be borne in mind that any duty or increase of duty must be previously voted in Committee of Ways and Means, and then referred with instructions to the Committee on the Bill." (155 English Hansard, 991; 132 English Commons Journal, 112.)

This resolution is in fact an increase of duty and is a proposition which comes regularly before the committee.

Mr. BLAKE. The resolutions which were read are quite distinct and clear, and no one complains of them. If a new duty is proposed to the House of Commons it must be voted in Committee of Ways and Means. If it is an existing duty according to the law of the land which it is proposed to increase, and that is the increased duty spoken of, it also must be proposed and voted in Committee of Ways and Means. That does not at all affect the question whether having this Session made a determination as to what the duties shall be and having a resolution on our records and embodied in a Bill we can with that unaltered propose another duty, which is another and a conflicting duty. The new duty and the increase of duty spoken of are duties to make a change in the law of the land as it now stands, either to make a duty or increase a duty, but not in the slightest degree affecting the general rule of Parliament, which is that two inconsistent propositions may not be assented to at the same time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not in any way an inconsistent proposition. At the very first meeting of the House of Commons we may vote that a certain duty shall be placed upon an article. Subsequently exigencies may arise, which may require an additional duty to be imposed. We may raise the duty half a dozen times during any given time, and no doubt precedents to that effect can be found.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not say that the duty may not be raised. I say there is a general rule that we cannot do it in this way.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The resolution is that 5 cents shall be added and there is a proposal of 20 cents, and altogether the duty would be made 32 cents.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I think the resolution is in order on the ground I have stated, and it is competent, as no resolution is yet embodied in the Bill finally passed in this House—that it is competent for the committee to increase the duty.

Resolution reported.

On the question that the resolution be considered,

Mr. BLAKE. On Monday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That will postpone prorogation another day.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not think it will. There is such a thing as more haste and less speed. The hon. gentleman is some times very slow and sometimes a little too quick. The Minister of Customs was a little too quick in introducing his Bill the other day before he knew what was in it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman's extra quickness will throw us over a day.

Mr. BLAKE. The laws and constitution of Parliament throw us over a day.

Mr. BOWELL. I wish the hon. gentleman distinctly to understand that I did not introduce the Bill not knowing what was in it. I knew the resolutions that were passed. It was subsequently found by the officers whose duty it is to administer the law, that they had made an error in drafting the resolution.

Mr. BLAKE. So the hon. gentleman was willing to change it.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes. I am not like the hon. gentleman who never changes his opinions; I have not arrived at that stage of perfection yet.

SUPPLY.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Canadian Pacific Railway—Subsidy..... $2,800,000

Mr. POPE. That is the balance of the $29,000,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think 10 per cent. was to be reserved until the work was completed.

Mr. POPE. Not on the subsidy, but on the loan.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought there was a certain percentage reserved on the subsidy.

Mr. POPE. No, not on the subsidy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will state how many miles remain to be completed at the present time—how many miles are in such a state that they cannot be accepted just now.

Mr. POPE. There are about 200 miles to be completed. I think there are about 140 on which the track is laid and to be completed in October.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where do these 200 miles lie?

Mr. POPE. In the Selkirks and west of them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At this present moment what is the position north of Lake Superior? Are the company actually running bi-weekly or tri-weekly trains?

Mr. POPE. They are not running trains; they are doing so much ballasting and that kind of work that they cannot run trains yet, but they expect to run them in October.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What information does the hon. gentleman possess as to when they will be able to run trains from end to end?

Mr. POPE. I could not fix a time earlier than October.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman expect it then?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman was to have given some information asked for by the hon. member for West Durham, touching a certain deviation of part of the road which was swept away, or was in danger of being swept away by an avalanche, and as to what length would have to be substituted.

Mr. POPE. There will be a change in the road of about 18 miles. The engineer reported that the further he considers the matter, the better he likes the change; that it will prevent, at all events, all bad snow slides and things of that kind, and will be a better road.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand the Minister to say that 18 miles comprises the total amount of new road, or that 18 was the distance added?

Mr. POPE. That is the new road. About 3½ miles is the additional distance.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman know the grade along these 18 miles?

Mr. POPE. About 160 feet.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not along the whole 18 miles?

Mr. POPE. No; that is the maximum.

Mr. SHANLY. Are these 18 miles so far advanced in construction as to lead to the expectation of being finished this fall?

Mr. POPE. Yes, in October.

Intercolonial—Miscellaneous works..... $6,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a very small amount considering the sums we have had to vote for the Intercolonial Railway. But again, although it appears to be of little use, I must call attention to the inexpediency of taking these little votes on capital account. Surely $6,000 is hardly the sort of sum which should fairly go to capital account. In all cases where we make a charge to capital account, it should be for some important, definite, specific object.

Mr. POPE. That has always been the annual vote.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is just what I object to. When the hon. gentleman or his predecessor has got into a tight place in the management of the Intercolonial, the recourse has been to charge as much as has been wanted to capital account. The consequence has been—not solely from that cause, of course—that our Intercolonial capital account has swollen steadily by millions of dollars a year, of which these little items in the long run go to make up an appreciable part. A few years ago it amounted to $36,000,000; it is now up to $45,000,000, and I fully expect to see it up to $50,000,000 within the next three or four years.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman will see that any branches we build are charged to capital account.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We are not going to build branches with $6,000.

Mr. POPE. I was speaking of capital account generally.

Mr. MULOCK. What are the items that make up this sum.

Mr. POPE. General expenses.

Mr. MULOCK. I understood it was on capital account; what are the items of the capital account?

Mr. POPE. It may not be expended, of course. It often happens that there are claims extending as far back as the time the road was built, and it is a proper thing to charge them to capital account. If they are large claims we will come to the House with them.

Mr. MULOCK. Is this $6,000 to pay claims?

Mr. POPE. Anything of that kind.

Mr. MULOCK. What is meant by the term claim?

Mr. POPE. They might be land claims that remained unpaid; they might be damages for right of way, damages for water, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. MULOCK. Is that the nature of the indebtedness for which this $6,000 is asked?

Mr. POPE. I say any small claims of that kind may be paid out of this sum. There may be larger claims brought before the House.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman is asking for $6,000 to be applied on capital account. There must be a foundation for his request. It will not do to say that there may be a case. The hon. gentleman gives us a suppositious foundation for his request, but before the House is asked for $6,000 or any other sum to be expended on capital account, I think the committee has a right to know what it is for.

Mr. POPE. I have answered the hon. gentleman as well as I can.

Mr. MULOCK. I am sorry the hon. gentleman has exhausted himself in this little effort. He says there may be cases, but his explanation is absolutely nothing; he does not mention any purpose for which this sum is asked, and I think the committee will not be justified in voting it when he tells us that he is absolutely unable to give us any statement of what is the nature of the account for which this money is asked. His deputy is there, and he could tell us. He has stated it may be this or that, but he has not told us what it is for.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman ought to understand that this is not a vote for actual work done, but for cases which may arise during the year 1885-86. My hon. friend is not a prophet, and cannot foresee the necessity of a repair here or there or a small claim springing up, and in order to provide for future possibilities there is always a vote of this kind in our services.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would be a very fair argument for asking for such a vote chargeable to income. I quite agree with the First Minister that in the working of a great railway like the Intercolonial Railway, these unexpected expenditures may occur; but although the sum is small, this principle of charging these sums to capital account is one I have thought it my duty to call the attention of the House to, because it is liable to abuse. The case is not on all fours with that of a private company. When a private company makes such additions to capital account, it has to pay interest on them; but in our case millions are added every year to capital account, and no sort of check or control is placed on the natural disposition of the administrators of the railway to gratify this or that locality. That is the reason I object to these charges.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite understand the position taken by the hon. gentleman; and it is well worthy of every consideration whether the capital account of the Intercolonial Railway, like any other finished work, should not be closed as much as possible, and should not be increased definitely for a number of years. But all we can say is that in this case we are following the practice which has obtained from the time the Intercolonial Railway was initiated until this time; but it is quite worth considering whether a change should not be made in this regard. But that is quite different from the argument of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), that we should say what accidents might happen in 1885-86, and how this money should be applied. I hope there will be no accidents, but we should have the money if accidents should happen.

Mr. MULOCK. I would remind the First Minister that we are now in the fiscal year 1885-86, and I question if this $6,000 is for any unexpected items. The capital account of the Intercolonial Railway has been increasing by millions of dollars, and is this item of $6,000 the only item on capital account? If so, it has a peculiar significance. It is manifest that there is something in this item we do not understand. If the Minister says at present he has no idea whatever as to the application of this money well and good, we shall know about that next year; but I think there is a distinct object for this particular item.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is a "nigger in the fence," no doubt.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not mean that; but having regard to the gigantic nature of the work, it appears to be too small a sum to stand simply as a vote of credit.

Mr. McLELAN. There are other sums for capital account and they are stated; but with respect to what the Acting Minister of Railways has said as to the claims for the rights of way or other claims. I know as a matter of fact that there were very many owners who declined at the time the payments were made, to accept the sums awarded for right of way, on the ground that they were too small. I dare say there are a number of these sums standing out, and the owners may at any time come forward and say they will accept settlement, or their representatives may present themselves, and it would be unjust not to be able to meet them. Most of them are very small sums, and the hon. gentleman has taken this amount for a number of years to meet these incidental claims as they may arise.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The words used are "miscellaneous works," not claims at all, and I question whether the Auditor General could pass a demand for damages when you take a vote for works. I see that, in the Supplementary Estimates, an amount of $53,000 is asked for, to pay contractors on the Intercolonial Railway the amounts decided by the commissioners.

Mr. MILLS. The argument of the First Minister would have had more force if we were voting Estimates for the future, but it so happens that the year for which this appropriation is made has closed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; this is for 1885-86.

Mr. MILLS. The Minister says, with regard to the capital account, that there is a great deal in the argument of my hon. friend. A few years ago, there were a number of second-hand cars purchased for the purpose of carrying coal, which were bought from some railway on the other side, and were found to be utterly useless, though they were to replace others that were worn out. That was charged to capital account, and, since my hon. friend retired, nearly $10,000,000 have been added to capital account in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. In this way the capital account may be increased indefinitely. I can understand, where a few miles of new road are built, that that might be charged to capital account. I can understand that, where a large amount of stock or equipment is required, in addition to that usually used on the road, in consequence of increased traffic, that might be charged to capital account, although I think there is some doubt as to the propriety of adopting that course, but the Government have, during the past seven years, charged to capital account the repairs on their locomotives and the stock purchased to replace the stock already worn out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has always been done.

Mr. MILLS. He has not shown that it has always been done. It has been done since the hon. gentleman has had charge of the road, but it is a most improper proceeding, because it conveys an erroneous impression as to the actual expense for working the road for the year. The hon. gentleman has charged to capital, I think, $1,400,000 during the past year, and I venture to say that no portion of that can properly be charged to capital account. We have gone forward from year to year largely increasing the capital account of the Intercolonial Railway, so that, during the past seven years, that account has been increased by nearly $10,000,000, which ought to have been charged to the ordinary expenses of the year in which they were made. If the hon. gentleman kept his accounts properly, if the capital account was closed and the expenses for repairs and renewals were charged to the ordinary cost of working the road, we would see exactly what the condition of the railway is, we would see how far it was from being a profitable enterprise, we would see how far in the location of the road the hon. gentleman sacrificed the public interest. But, in the way the accounts are made up, they are altogether illusory.

Mr. MULOCK. When I made my remarks, I did so in the line I took on account of what fell from the Acting Minister of Railways. He gave the committee to understand, in a vague way it is true, that this fund was to meet existing claims.

Mr. POPE. No, I did not.

Mr. MULOCK. He said it might be claims for right of way. Of course, all the right of way has been acquired many years ago, so that must be for the past. The First Minister has given another explanation. He says it is to pay for contingencies in the future. Then the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says it is to pay for claims to be made for right of way not yet settled. The committee can draw its inference from all this as to the purpose for which this particular fund is to be voted. I think the explanations of the Minister of Marine established the fact that this item is to pay some indefinite liability in reference to the past which may be presented, and which may not; not for the purpose of paying damages or anything in the future in regard to which no cause of action exists, which is the explanation the First Minister offered to the committee.

Mr. WELDON. Some time ago I made a motion in regard to return tickets. Has there been any action taken to extend the time within which return tickets are available? Complaints are still made in the papers in regard to that matter. I pointed out on a former occasion the inconveniences to which parties are subjected under the present regulation, and I had hoped the time would be extended.

Mr. POPE. The time has been more than doubled. We found the difficulty before was that they paid no attention to the time, but the time has been extended.

Mr. WELDON. There is another matter to which I wish to call attention. I hold in my hands a letter which I will read to the committee in regard to the carriage of coal from Spring Hill to St. John, as compared with other places. Here is the letter:

"DEAR SIR,—Will you please bring the following facts under the notice of the House as a specimen of the way we are protected in the Maritime Provinces. How is it that we in St. John are charged $24.65 freight on a carload of coal from the Spring Hill mines a distance of about 164 miles, while a carload will be taken from Pictou to Quebec, a distance of 680 miles for $10. You will see that this is not mere assertion as I have sent you the proofs.

"It is also true that we are charged as high or higher rates from St. John to places on this Intercolonial Railway, say a distance of 100 to 150 miles, than goods carried from Toronto and Montreal to Halifax. It does seem very unjust that we should be treated as aliens and foreigners when other portions of the Dominion have the full privileges of citizenship."

I may say that this is from a political supporter of the Government. Here is a bill of lading for $24.65 on a car load of coal, which is a difference of $14.65.

Mr. POPE. The rate to St. John for all manufacturers is the same, 85 cents a ton.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the exact cost per ton per mile on the Intercolonial Railway from Spring Hill to Quebec?

Mr. POPE. The distance is 560 miles. On a car load of 10 tons, the freight would be $16 and some cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would hardly exceed a  $\frac{1}{4}$  cent per mile per ton, which is a very low rate. In England a  $\frac{1}{2}$  cent per ton per mile is considered necessary to pay expenses of transport. Does this rate pay expenses?

Mr. POPE. We get  $\frac{3}{10}$  of a cent, and when our cars are loaded back that pays well. I think that rate just clears it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Does that allow anything for repairs?

Mr. POPE. When our cars are loaded back, we have enough, at any rate, to pay the wear and tear.

Mr. WELDON. When the hon. member for West Durham moved for a return with reference to the Intercolonial Railway this Session, the hon. member for Megantic stated he understood coal was carried on the Intercolonial Railway from Pictou to Quebec at $10 a car.

Mr. STAIRS. I think the case the hon. member for St. John has made out is so extravagant that it carries its own contradiction. The idea that a car load of coal should be charged $24.65 from Spring Hill to St. John and only $10 from Spring Hill to Quebec is so extremely absurd that there must be some mistake. If you will take the rate mentioned, you will find that the car load carried at $10 must have been a hopper car of 6 tons and the other must have been a car containing 17 short tons.

Mr. MULLOCK.

Mr. VAIL. What is the difference between the rate for coal from Spring Hill to Quebec, and that from Pictou to Quebec? Could the hon. Minister say?

Mr. POPE. No, I could not.

Mr. SHANLY. I think the Minister of Railways and Canals puts the case very gently when he says that we make nothing out of three-tenths of a cent a mile, and that it is part of the price that we pay for the luxury of running a Government railway. I have always been entirely opposed to the practice of running Government railways, even although we beat all other companies in the lowness of our rates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to put a question to my hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Shanly), because it bears closely upon the possible and probable future, not merely of this railway, but on a good many other questions of very grave importance. Would he, than whom nobody is better able to judge, say what he considers that such an article as coal might be carried for so as to clear expenses, making reasonable allowance for wear and tear, in his judgment? Three-tenths of a cent, as I gather from him, is too little. Now I tell him frankly why I want to get the information, because I do not wish to take him or the Minister by surprise. Very important questions are now arising in connection with the development of the North-West as to the conveyance of coal. If coal can be carried so as not to involve a loss at three-tenths of a cent on the Intercolonial Railway, where the grades are not very serious, it is quite clear that very moderate rates might be imposed—and I think in that ought to be imposed—in the North-West on the conveyance of coal along the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. SHANLY. Do I understand my hon. friend to put that question to me?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes. It is not regular, but I would like to have my hon. friend's opinion.

Mr. SHANLY. I suppose it is the liberty allowed in committee. I do not care what the advantages of a road may be, I think  $\frac{3}{10}$  of 1 cent cannot possibly be otherwise than a losing rate. In fixing the rate at which to carry coal, you must first know what the characteristics of the road are. Upon a road of good characteristics  $\frac{3}{10}$  of 1 cent might do, but it would be a losing business upon a road of worse characteristics. We must be entirely guided by that. But I know that the characteristics of the Intercolonial Railway are such that it is impossible that coal or any other freight can be carried over it for  $\frac{3}{10}$  of 1 cent per ton-mile, and leave anything at all in the shape of profit.

Mr. PAINT. When Mr. Brydges was at Halifax the Chamber of Commerce put the question to him, when he had the management of the Intercolonial Railway: What are you going to do with the empty cars? He said he was going to carry coal back, that he would utilise them for that purpose. Well, I suppose that is what the Government are doing at present. But there is this in the way. There are a number of steamships carrying coal for something over $1 a ton to Quebec and Montreal. There is rivalry.

Mr. BLAKE. Do I understand the Minister to say that three-tenths of a cent per ton-mile is the rate that has been charged for some time from the mines of the West? Has that been cut down?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Is the hon. gentleman quite certain that three-tenths of a cent is the rate?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. WELDON. What is the rate charged from Pictou to the Londonderry Steel Works?

Mr. BLAKE. Can the hon. gentleman say that there has been any change made in the rate he speaks of for two or three years past?

Mr. POPE. No. There is this difference: Our cars now carry 20 tons, and my hon. friend knows that when you carry 20 tons to the car you can do it for less than when you haul only 10 tons to the car. We have increased the capacity of our cars for the purpose of reducing the rate.

Mr. McDUGALD (Pictou). The Intercolonial Railway is not a commercial road, but it was built chiefly for the purpose of developing interprovincial trade. If three-tenths of a cent per ton-mile is a very low rate, I think we can find quite as low rates on some of the commercial roads in the United States. I have here an article from the Mining Engineer, of New York, of the 16th May, in reference to railway rates, which I will read:

"Some years ago a distinguished iron master, after examining this country and recognising the value of our magnificent deposits of coal and iron ore, expressed the opinion that the great distances to which our raw and manufactured material have to be transported, will always prevent effectual competition with the English works.

"No doubt our 'magnificent distances' are a serious drawback; but the minimum rate at which our railroads, canals, and grand lake and river systems of navigation can carry heavy freights was not appreciated and the influence of distance on price was correspondingly exaggerated.

"Coal, coke, grain and ore are charged the lowest rates, and some of the figures have reached a marvellous minimum. Some of the roads are to-day carrying grains from Chicago and St. Louis and other points at, it is said, from $2 to $2.50 per ton of 2,000 lbs. from 10 to 12½ cents the bushel. The distance from Chicago to New York harbor by the Pennsylvania Railroad is more than 1,100 miles, and by some of the shortest routes nearly 1,000 miles, so that the rate of nearly two mills per ton per mile has been reached. It is not claimed that the rate is remunerative as an average to be applied to all the freight moved; but some years ago, when economy in every item of cost had not attracted the attention or been practised as strictly as it now is, one of our best known engineers, at that time attached to a through road, showed conclusively that all over $2 a ton that could be received for freights for empty cars returning from New York to Chicago would be net profit. At present there can scarcely be a doubt that the actual cost on long hauls over our best managed roads leaves a net profit on the two mill rate. It was shown in the Engineering and Mining Journal, a few months ago, that the 'pool prices' fixed by the railroad companies themselves for Cumberland and Clearfield coal would leave the main lines about three mills per ton-mile on a haul of a few hundred miles only, and we have since shown that the pool prices have been heavily 'cut' at the expense of the carrier.

"The anthracite roads have always collected heavier tolls; but when anthracite coal was sold here by auction in 1877, at a minimum average of $2.35½ per gross ton f. o. b., some of the roads carrying on a percentage rate must have received less than one cent per ton-mile. The Reading reports show that its cost for hauling coal from the Schuylkill field to Port Richmond (about 100 miles) does not exceed one quarter of a cent per ton-mile; and there can be no doubt that the Reading, if once in strong financial position, could take the lion's share of the anthracite trade from all its rivals. The Grand Trunk Railway, though it was before the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, and roundly abused as a monopoly, carried iron ore on a rate of even less than half a cent a ton-mile, and coal at but little more."

Mr. McMULLEN. A return with respect to the character of coal on the Intercolonial was ordered three months ago, but it has not been brought down. Such a return would have furnished all necessary information. The grades and curves of a road have much to do with fixing the rates. There is no road in Canada over which freight can be so easily carried as the Canada Southern. If the grades on the Intercolonial were equally easy, coal could be carried at a low rate; but with grades and curves as at present a rate of ¾ of a cent per ton per mile entails a loss.

Mr. VAIL. A very large amount of money was due from the Londonderry Iron Works for freight. Has the amount been collected?

Mr. POPE. It has not all been collected, but it is all secured.

Mr. BLAKE. Has anything been done towards collecting the accounts for sidings to various factories, which sums appear in the Public Accounts as amounts due to the Government?

Mr. POPE. There is some difference of opinion about the amounts.

Mr. BLAKE. In the Public Accounts they are represented as debts due. I want to know whether they have been adjusted?

Mr. POPE. My recollection is that they remain unsettled. Negotiations are going on with respect to them.

Mr. BLAKE. In view of the enormous profits made by establishments under the National Policy and the high prices charged for goods, it seems strange that these people should leave their just debts unpaid.

Applying air brakes to 100 engines..... $ 73,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would give some information.

Mr. POPE. Up to the present time we have had the ordinary brakes in use. We have found them not only expensive, but dangerous. Trains could not be stopped with them as quickly as with improved brakes. After a good deal of pressure brought to bear on the Government by those who patronised the road, we felt it to be in the interest of the country to obtain the most improved brakes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Whose patent is to be used?

Mr. POPE. The Westinghouse.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman yielded to the pressure last year, for there is a large sum in the Public Accounts for the application of the Westinghouse air brake.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. An item of this kind should be taken out of ordinary income. To place charges for air breaks to capital account, which is supposed to represent permanent improvements, seems questionable policy.

Mr. BLAKE. How much has already been spent on the application of the Westinghouse air break?

Mr. POPE. I cannot state.

Mr. SHANLY. When these 100 engines are supplied with the air breaks, will that finish the equipment of all engines on the road?

Mr. POPE. All but 15.

Mr. BLAKE. How many engines are there on the road?

Mr. POPE. 160, I think.

Mr. VAIL. There were $32,500 expended last year.

Mr. BLAKE. This is all charged to capital account.

Mr. POPE. This is a new thing, and we think it properly belongs to capital account. We have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite that in repairing rolling stock we charge it to capital account, but we do nothing of the kind. Our running power has gradually increased from $1,000,000 in 1877, to $2,170,868 this year; and as we require more rolling stock to keep pace with our traffic, we charge it to capital account.

Mr. BLAKE. You carry very little more, you have earned a little more money last year than the year before, but the increase in capital account goes rolling on.

Intercolonial Railway..... $ 2,400,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice that the hon. gentleman has made certain alterations in the items. There is a decrease of $100,000 in the charge for locomotive power, $40,000 for maintenance, and $30,000 for general charges, while there are increases of $35,000 each on car expenses, and station and train expenses. How is the saving on locomotive power to be effected?

Mr. POPE. I am informed that that is expected to result from the heavier new engines which we are putting on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you expect less traffic?

Mr. POPE. No; but we expect the greater power of the engines will enable us to do the traffic with less expense than we did before.

Mr. MACKENZIE. How many of these powerful engines have you got more than last year?

Mr. POPE. We have about 60.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Between last year and this? I notice that the expenditure was $820,000 for last year and $720,000 for this?

Mr. POPE. We got five or six new ones between last year and this, and the old ones have been put in very much better repair.

Mr. MACKENZIE. So each of these new and powerful engines is to save you $20,000 a year?

Mr. POPE. We think, as the old engines are in so much better repair and we have so many new ones, that the traffic will cost us that much less.

Mr. BLAKE. It is pretty difficult to apprehend from the hon. gentleman's statements, what the real condition of things is. A little while ago, the hon. gentleman made a statement, which had often been made by Sir Charles Tupper, namely, that the rolling stock of the Intercolonial Railway was always kept up to the handle—that the engineers were not allowed to fall back at all, and this was done at the expense of revenue. Now he says that he is going to save $100,000 this year on locomotive power, because the engines are in so much better repair than last year, so it would appear that they were in a state of disrepair last year. If you have 160 engines or so in the regular course of things, some of them will be wearing out more or less, occasionally one will get smashed from accidents, and so on. But as I understand the rule of the road is that whenever an engine gets behind in efficiency and requires repair, or when an accident happens, the engine is taken in and made right again. If this is so, I do not see how they could have been so much worse last year than this, that you will save $100,000 on locomotive expenses.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman knows that when an engine gets old and is in its last day, it costs more to keep it in repair than a new one. The Minister states that he has put out of use a number of these old engines, and is getting new ones, and the expenses required to keep these new ones up to the standard will be much less than the old ones, which were finally condemned and put out of use, and therefore there will be a less expenditure for locomotive power.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman knows that an estimate is one thing and actual expenditure is another. Last year we actually expended $750,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You have the expenses then up to the 1st of July. We would like to know the scale of expenses up to that date.

Mr. POPE. We have not got it.

Mr. BLAKE. But the hon. gentleman said a moment ago that it was $750,000 and he must have it or he could not have stated it. He could not have been prophesying when he told us the exact expenditure.

Mr. POPE. We have not got it this year. I gave the hon. gentleman what it was the year before.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The normal expenditure seems to be about that amount all the time. In 1883 it was $767,062, so that the hon. gentleman last year took $60,000 more than the normal amount, and now he claims to be saving so much.

Mr. POPE. I cannot speak as to 1883.

Mr. BLAKE. Could the hon. gentleman state the average price of coal supplied to the Intercolonial Railway last year for locomotive purposes.

Mr. POPE. I am informed about $2.70.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That is impossible. When I left office I let several contracts at $1.59.

Mr. POPE. The figure I gave includes handling, and so forth.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it supplied under contract?

Mr. POPE. It is now.

Mr. BLAKE. With several mining establishments or with one?

Mr. POPE. Two this year.

Mr. BLAKE. Was any tender made?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. And is the coal delivered at the pit mouth and handled by the Intercolonial Railway from the pit mouth, or how is that?

Mr. POPE. It is delivered at the junction on the Intercolonial Railway cars.

Mr. BLAKE. Which mines have the contract?

Mr. POPE. The Spring Hill and the Pictou.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the contract price?

Mr. POPE. The Pictou mine, $1.55, and the other, $1.83.

Mr. BLAKE. Then the price which the Intercolonial Railway pays for the coal is $1.55 and $1.83, but the price at which it is charged in the working expenses is $2.73, the difference being the estimated cost of handling. Of course, there would be the cost of putting it into the Intercolonial cars at the pit. The cost of transporting it to the point of consumption, and the cost of loading it from time to time into the engine on which it was consumed; but how this would amount to $1.18 a ton I cannot understand.

Mr. POPE. It is calculated that the transport costs 50 cents, and the handling 87 cents more.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the average of the mileage of that 50 cents haul?

Mr. POPE. I could not say; the calculation is made over the whole road.

Mr. PAINT. What is the total yearly consumption?

Mr. POPE. I think the contract for this year was for 140,000 tons.

Mr. SHANLY. I presume the whole road is now worked by coal?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Eastern Extension Railway ..... $ 75,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the special reason for separating this? Is it not part of the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. POPE. It never has been included in the Intercolonial Railway, because we have been operating it for a short time, and we may not, perhaps, operate it very long; I do not know as to that. If I had put the accounts together, I have no doubt the hon. member for West Durham would have complained, and I have separated them to accommodate him.

Mr. BLAKE. This is the good bargain we made in Nova Scotia. I think we paid $1,284,000 for this road.

Mr. POPE. For the other railway with it—the Pictou Branch.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all. We had the Pictou Branch; and now this line costs us something like $75,000 a year to work it, and the receipts of the road do not equal the $75,000; so that there is a deficiency in the working of the road, besides the interest on the investment. Then the hon. gentleman said he did not know that we were going to have it very long. That is a hopeful and assuring statement after the account the hon. gentleman gives. Has he made a new contract with the Short Line Company to part with this valuable piece of property?

Mr. POPE. None made yet.

Mr. BLAKE. What premium does he expect to have to pay in order to become relieved from this white elephant of his?

Mr. POPE. I thought the hon. gentleman said relieved from the eloquence. The hon. gentleman has not treated this matter very fairly. We purchased the road at very much less than it cost the Nova Scotia Government; but we also purchased the Truro Branch, which is a good paying piece of road, and I contend we made a good purchase. I do not expect to make much money out of the running of this road, nor do I expect to lose anything. I think when we took it over it lacked something like $2,000 of paying expenses; but I think it is now paying, and the Pictou Branch will pay about $30,000.

Mr. VAIL. I hope when the hon. Minister makes an arrangement with a company to take this line, he will remember that the Local Government paid a large subsidy to this road, and will give a quid pro quo for it.

Prince Edward Island Railway..... $ 210,000

Mr. BLAKE. What is the price of coal carried over the line?

Mr. POPE. $2.70, delivered on the Island by the mining company.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the annual deficit in working the road.

Mr. POPE. About $90,000.

Windsor Branch Railway..... $ 20,000

Mr. POPE. The profits and cost of maintenance about balance.

Lachine Canal..... $ 300,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the policy of the Government as to this?

Mr. POPE. $300,000 is a re-vote. To pay final estimate, section 11, $82,000; spring bridge at Cote St. Paul $6,000; St. Gabriel basin, $69,000; chains and booms and additional work in basin $20,000; settling claims of arbitration, etc., $111,500. This will close the account for Lachine.

Cornwall Canal..... $106,000

Mr. POPE. This is a re-vote also. It is to be expended on the works at the upper entrance; a channel made and the construction of a new lock and weir, estimated to cost $400,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was any part deepened to 12 feet?

Mr. POPE. Yes; this gave a depth of 12 feet.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All through the canal?

Mr. POPE. No; that will be done in the future. $106,000 is all we want for this year.

Williamsburg Canal—Construction of entrance and lock at head of Rapide Plat Canal..... $ 120,000

Mr. POPE. This is for work at the head of Rapide Plat Canal, which is estimated to cost $250,000. The deepening of the channel at the entrance is estimated to cost $80,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What is the object of building these locks? Unless the Government intend to proceed with the enlargement of the Beauharnois, the Cornwall and other canals, there is no object in building these two locks there.

Mr. POPE. The reason for building these at this particular place is that there was less water there than at any other point on the St. Lawrence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What depth will this give?

Mr. POPE. Fourteen feet on the mitre sill. I felt so strongly that the hon. member for East York was always right that I have carried out his policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE. My policy has not been carried out. We should wait for the discussion of the entire system, whether it is to be deepened to 12 or 14 feet, before doing anything of this kind. The hon. gentleman is aware that the revenue from canals has been decreasing instead of increasing, and now the trade demands the abrogation of all canal tolls, and we are proposing to incur works which are unnecessary unless they are required as part of a complete system. I think the action of the Government is premature.

Mr. POPE. I think it is very desirable that this should be deepened. We have done nothing more than is necessary for the trade.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Some little time ago, the Minister, or his predecessor, stated that further examinations were going on over the whole of the St. Lawrence channel from Kingston downwards, and that he expected to lay on the Table a statement showing what the estimate of the cost of deepening the channel to 12 or 14 feet would be. Has that work been proceeded with, and has the hon. gentleman got any information on the subject? In my hon. friend's time, there was a great deal of doubt and dispute as to what the cost would be, but that is a good many years ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Of course a considerable sum has been spent in the Galops Rapids since then.

Mr. POPE. I have not the latest estimate, but I will bring it down to the hon. gentleman.

Welland Canal..... $ 500,000

Mr. SHANLY. I would ask the hon. Acting Minister of Railways and Canals if this $500,000 for the Welland Canal is estimated to be enough to give the 14 feet depth throughout.

Mr. POPE. No, it is not estimated that it will complete 14 feet throughout but it makes a beginning.

Mr. SHANLY. It will be money well expended. We have never yet had the full benefit of the Welland Canal enlargement. The largest vessels now in use on Lake Erie and the other "upper" Lakes draw 14 feet. In fact there are no vessels of 12 feet draft, which is the present available depth of the Welland Canal, because vessels will not be built specially to suit that work in its present incomplete state. We must, as it were, do away with the natural barrier separating Lake Erie from Lake Ontario by giving such depth to the canal as will allow of the largest vessels descending into Ontario, and every dollar we expend to that end on the Welland Canal is, in my opinion, much better applied than what we are expending on the river below the foot of lake navigation. No matter to what depth we make the river and St. Lawrence Canals navigation available there will still always be transshipment from lake to river vessels. Therefore the Welland Canal should be deepened as speedily as possible so as to allow the largest vessels to pass down to where river navigation begins. Transshipment will almost always be the rule at that point because it will pay best to transship. A small tug can take through the river part of the route to Montreal the cargoes of two large propellers put into barges. For the propellers with their powerful engines to be put to do the river work would be a use less waste of power; putting a man to do a boys work. Some years ago when my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was at the head of the Public Works Department he very wisely took steps that the two entrances to the canal should be at once constructed for a depth of 14 feet. Increasing the depth throughout now between the two end, or "water," locks is rather a question of raising the banks than lowering the bottom of the canal. While the enlargement of the Welland Canal was being debated at that time I was absent from Canada, residing in the United States, but taking the interest I have never ceased to take in our canal navigation I addressed a letter on the subject to the Hon. Mr. Kirkpatrick, the present Speaker, and from that letter he read a portion which I find reported as follows in the Hansard of that year:

"The Welland Canal never can perform its proper functions so long as larger vessels can put in at Buffalo than can come down to Kingston, and it seems really too bad, with our long canal experience in Canada, the improvements now entered upon should be deliberately planned on an imperfect and insufficient model. I have always contended that until the foot of Lake Ontario be made for Montreal what the foot of Lake Erie is to New York—the great transshipping point from lake to lake (and river) craft—we never will be in a position to compete on equal terms—where we should be able to do so on much better terms—with Buffalo."

I also find, looking over some documents relating to the same subject, that about 1873, I think it was, a large number of vessel-owners submitted a memorandum to the then Minister of Public Works, in which they said:

"We are fully certain that the tolls on the tonnage of vessels and their cargoes, that will pass the Welland Canal on a draught of 14 feet of water, over and above what will pass if the draught is restricted to 12 feet only, will more than meet the interest at 5 per cent., and a sinking fund of 1 per cent. on the amount necessary, say $1,000,000 or more, required to deepen the canal and harbors at the extremities to the desired depth."

The same memorandum states that the forwarders and owners of vessels would be willing to pay twice as much per ton for canal tolls in a vessel drawing 14 feet of water as they would be willing to pay where vessels were restricted to 12 feet draft.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is precisely with that object that the late Government did take steps to make the Welland Canal 14 feet. I know it was my hon. friend's intention at the earliest possible moment to give 14 feet depth to the Welland Canal. That bears very forcibly, however, on the whole question as to the wisdom of some of these expenditures immediately after discussion.

Mr. SHANLY. Expenditures at other points?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend's contention is right, and speaking personally I have always thought that there was an immense deal in it—not merely for the reasons my hon. friend has stated, but because it is constantly known to the trade that barges are used as floating warehouses which these large vessels cannot be, except at great expense, when they come down from Montreal. We ought to be careful about undertaking the expenditure of large sums of money for the deepening of the water way between Kingston and Montreal, and it is in that direction that I was enquiring from the Acting Minister of Railways as to the estimated cost, and what general determination the Government had come to, because, although there was good reason, I suppose, to finish the Cornwall and Lachine

Mr. SHANLY.

Canals, there can be no good reason for constructing locks at 14 feet at points like Williamsburgh.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The deepening of the Lachine Canal was practically to extend the harbor of Montreal.

Mr. SHANLY. Quite true, and very properly.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There was no difficulty at all about the necessity of having 14 feet depth of water. I am exceedingly pleased that my hon. friend from Grenville has expressed himself as he has about the inutility of enlarging the other canals at the present moment. The existing locks are quite large enough for barges. If we have to depend upon them, as I think we must, in the transmission of grain to a large extent, enlarging these locks to the size of the Welland, seems to me at present out of place. I am sorry I am not able to express myself more fully.

Mr. VAIL. I observed the other day a statement that the Government have lowered the canal tolls, which, if true, is a matter of considerable importance when large appropriations are being made for the improvement of the canal system. Now, if we are going on expending money from year to year on these canals, and if we are going to give up the tolls on them, I should like to know where we are going to get a return for the money expended. I have no doubt that the improvement of the canals will increase the trade to a certain extent, but at the same time we ought to consider that promises were made when this money was voted, that a fair return should be made to the country for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I would like to understand from the Minister whether it is already determined upon to commence the work.

Mr. McCALLUM. I am surprised to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Digby. If the Government think proper to lower the tolls in order to benefit the trade of the country and get the trade of the North-West to come by the St. Lawrence, I am sure the country at large will be benefited in other ways. I am an old man, but I hope to live to see the day when the canals of this country will do a much larger business than they are doing now. Then we must also consider the question of the elevation of grain at Kingston, the cost of which would have to be added to the expense of taking grain from that port to Montreal. I believe that the deepening of the St. Lawrence will cost an immense amount of money, and we should pause before we undertake it. But I am sure that the Welland Canal ought to be deepened to 14 feet, and then we should raise the locks from Thorold to Lake Ontario, which, I believe, can be done with $1,000,000, and could be completed by the opening of the navigation in 1887. I am satisfied that if the Welland canal is improved, it will pay, whether the Government refuses to give the people a free toll or not.

Mr. VAIL. We were told in this House over and over again when these appropriations were asked for, and when we were asking for small sums for the Maritime Provinces, that this canal expenditure would be returned to us. But we have had no return, and now it is proposed to increase the expenditure.

Mr. SHANLY. This question of canal tolls will be more keenly agitated from year to year. It is impossible to look at the canal returns without confessing, however humiliating it may be, that after the large expenditures we have made, at this moment our canal system stands a failure. The hon. member for Digby asks how are we going to get a return for our large outlay without charging tolls. I say that if we were doing the largest trade that could possibly be done through the canals, the tolls collected would still be the smallest part of the benefit the country would derive from the canals. Therefore, I say, that in the present state of the canal trade—and it cannot well be worse—if we can increase our trade by throwing off the tolls altogether, I, for one, would heartily go for throwing them off. It is in the increased trade that the country really is to get a return for the expenditure.

Mr. VAIL. Will the Minister tell me what the reduction has been, and what the rate is at present.

Mr. POPE. It is two cents a ton now, and it was twenty before.

Murray Canal..... $170,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to have full information about the position of work on the Murray canal. The work should have been in a much more forward state than it is. The quantity of work to be done is comparatively small, and I think it was four years ago that a sum on that account appeared in the Estimates. It is the opinion in certain sections of the neighborhood that an error has been made in the locality chosen. I should be glad to know what further information the hon. gentleman has on the subject.

Mr. POPE. I have no further information on the subject. The contract was let on 4th August, 1882. The amount was $1,140,655. In 1884, $286,100 were paid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When is the contract period for completion?

Mr. POPE. I do not know.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought it was to be completed before this date. How many feet of water will there be?

Mr. PLATT. Is the cost of dredging Presqu'île harbor to be paid out of this vote?

Mr. POPE. It is part of this contract.

Mr. PLATT. Have the contractors undertaken the dredging of the harbor or did the Government let the contract to the contractors who are at present doing the work.

Mr. POPE. The contract was let for the whole work including the dredging.

Mr. BOWELL. The contractors for the whole work let the dredging to Mr. Murray, of St. Catharines. The cost of the work is not separated. The dredging of the harbor will cost from $50,000 to $75,000.

Mr. POPE. The depth of water required is 11 feet. I have been informed by persons engaged in the navigation of the Bay of Quinte that it did not allow a depth of more than 10 feet.

Mr. BOWELL. 12 feet at the lowest point.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is well known that the water falls in particular seasons very much lower than the average; and if the canal is to admit a depth of 11 feet, care should be taken that the navigation in the bay should exceed that.

Mr. POPE. The report of the chief engineer is that there is a depth of 12 feet in the bay.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has anything been done of late years to remove shoals and obstructions?

Mr. BOWELL. Not for seven or eight years. The bay was sounded by an engineer when this question was under consideration. There are two points at which there is low water. One, at Nigger Island, where there is a lighthouse, and the other just below Trenton. But the depth of water at those points was 12 feet.

Mr. PLATT. The report of Mr. Page says that 11 feet is all that can be depended on, and Mr. Rubidge states that 11 feet is all that can be depended on without incurring considerable expense in improving several places in the bay.

Mr. BOWELL. That will be when the lake is low.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; at present there are 12 or 13 feet. Has the hon. Minister any report of the progress of construction, of the difficulties met with in the progress of the works, and as to whether time is undoing what the Department has been doing for the last few years? Will the hon. gentleman tell me in what way the payments are made to the contractors, in proportion to the work done, and how does the Minister obtain a knowledge of the number of yards excavated?

Mr. POPE. We obtain it from the engineer.

Mr. FERGUSON (Welland). That is always done by cross-sectioning previous to the work being done, and then cross-sectioning afterwards.

Mr. PLATT. What I want to find out, is, whether the contractors are paid for the amount of excavation, or for the number of excavated yards they remove.

Mr. POPE. I am told it is the excavation that is paid for. It is like any other work, of course the engineer takes cross-sections and then afterwards he measures up the work.

Mr. PLATT. Last year a certain amount of excavation was done for which a certain amount was paid. This spring it was found that nearly half of the work had to be re-excavated. Will that have to be paid for twice.

Mr. McCALLUM. I suppose that it is like any other contract, the engineer will take his soundings and as the work is done, he will measure up the excavation on the scows by progress estimates. The filling in would I suppose be a question of damages.

Mr. PLATT. If the contractors are to be paid for the re-excavating as fast as the sand fills in, it will cost us from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000, as the sand is filling in very rapidly during the winter and early spring, there being sometimes as much as 50 to 100 cubic feet in a single movement. I would suggest that, under these circumstances, something should be done to protect the canal from the influx of this moveable sand, and that the Government should make immediate enquiry as to the character of the work. Something has been said with regard to the depth of the canal, and I would ask the hon. gentleman, if any representations have been made as to the width of 80 feet at the bottom and 100 feet at the top being sufficient.

Mr. POPE. I may say that both of our engineers have reported that the sand is not filling in, and that it was all a mistake. Mr. Page also gives his opinion that it is wide enough. Mr. Page and Mr. Rubidge both say that it should not be wider. Of course everybody likes a wide canal. At the same time, our engineers report that 80 feet is enough for the business of the canal.

Mr. PLATT. We do not know how much the business will be, but the object of having it, say 150 feet wide, would be to prevent it filling up so rapidly by the sand. This canal has been the result of very much agitation, but the original promoters had better grounds for urging on the Government that it should be made than those who have urged its construction in later years. The hon. member for Grenville has told us that the character of the vessels doing our lake trade has changed so much of late years that even a 12-foot canal is comparatively valueless at the present time. I find that in Mr. Page's report of 1867, he says:

"The principal reason urged in favor of a canal connection between Lake Ontario and the Bay of Quinté, is the advantage which it would confer on commerce by enabling vessels of the class which navigate the lake to avoid the dangers in the vicinity of Long Point during the stormy seasons of the year, by passing through the comparatively sheltered waters of the Bay of Quinté. In order to secure this, the draft of water, should be at least equal to that of the Welland canal, through which vessels drawing 10½ feet can pass. This would render it necessary to take advantage of the full available depth of the Bay of Quinté, which, as before stated, would be 10 feet at the very lowest water, and fully 11 feet at ordinary low stages of the bay and lake."

Now, Mr. Chairman, we find it necessary to deepen the Welland Canal to 14 feet, or 3 feet deeper than it is, intended to make the Murray Canal. Again Mr. Page says:

"It will be observed that the reasons referred to as having been urged in support of this undertaking are entirely of a commercial nature, and though evidently of considerable importance, it may be questioned whether the advantages which the work if executed would confer upon the general navigation would warrant so large an expenditure."

The expenditure referred to was $860,000 instead of, as at present, $1,265,000. In view of these circumstances and of the changes which have taken place in the character of the vessels which navigate the lakes, it is important that nothing should be done to lessen the comparatively small advantages which are expected from the construction of this canal. As to the question of width, this canal is constructed without locks, and it is expected to be kept open by the current of water flowing from bay to bay, and the engineers think that with a width of 80 feet this will not be sufficient to keep it clear, and if we are to keep a dredge there constantly, in order to keep that canal in working order, or at a sufficient depth for these large vessels, the expense will be all the greater. The probabilities are that at the time the early promoters of this canal were urging its construction, it would have accommodated three-fifths of the number of vessels navigating the lake. It is doubtful now if it will accommodate more than two-fifths or one-half of the class of vessels Mr. Page mentions in his report. There is no use of talking of deepening the canal unless you deepen a large portion of the Bay of Quinté. Therefore, I do not entertain any very brilliant ideas as to the future usefulness of the Murray Canal. I hold that its usefulness has, to a great extent, been destroyed by the route the Government saw fit to choose. I do not intend to protract the discussion, only in order that information may be given to the House as to the character of the report upon which the Government based their decision as to the route. We recently heard a great deal about the liberty that was taken by members of this House in criticising the acts and reports of Government engineers. I do not intend to criticise the acts and reports of the engineer who made the last survey, but I wish to point out that the representations made in the Order in Council of the 23rd of May, 1882, upon which the present route of the Murray Canal was accepted, were made entirely from the report of Mr. Rubidge. A prior survey had been made by Mr. Page, and I want to point out some of the contradictions in these reports. The Minister, in making his recommendation to Council, on the 23rd of May, 1882, says:

"That from such report it appears that of the points examined with a view to their adaptability as a port of entrance from Lake Ontario, specifically the points known as Weller's Bay and Presqu'Isle, Presqu'Isle is by far the most commodious and best harbor on the coast, having excellent anchorage and enabling a large number of vessels to lie land-locked, secure from all winds; further, that the route having this harbor as its western terminus is the one best adapted to the requirements of an extended river navigation."

Now, the words in Mr. Rubidge's report, on which, I suppose, that recommendation is founded, are these:

"And the fact of its being longer than the No. 2 route, should not be deemed a serious objection, inasmuch as the excess in distance between the bay and the open water of Lake Ontario lies through the land-locked harbor of Presqu'Isle."

Speaking of the same point, Mr. Page, the chief engineer, says:

"Were the channel through Presqu'Isle harbor made, the unavoidable difficulties to be encountered in navigating it would still present an insuperable objection to the adoption of route No. 1."

Now, we have the two engineers directly contradicting each other as to the character of Presqu'Isle harbor. Upon this same point Mr. Rubidge says:

"The larger class of propellers which run in for shelter usually anchor off Calf Pasture light. A vessel bound down the lake, and desiring to enter Presqu'Isle harbor by the new channel, must alter the course about 100°."

Mr. PLATT.

Now, let us see what Mr. Page, who, I suppose, is an engineer of equal ability, says on the same subject. He says:

"A vessel approaching Presqu'Isle must, before getting in range of the inner lights, with a view to entering the harbor, change its course fully 270 degrees, which, in certain winds, it is barely possible to do. When up with Salt Point the course must again be changed to north-westerly, so as to clear 'Calf Pasture shoal' and enter the wider portion of the harbor; in fact, the direction of the entrance, crookedness and insufficient width of the channel, are found by masters of vessels to prove serious obstacles to its being used either as a harbor of refuge or for commercial purposes."

Mr. McCALLUM. What date is that?

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Page's report was made in 1867, and Mr. Rubidge's in the fall of 1881. Of course, the answer will probably be that certain changes have taken place; the chief argument is, that the entrance to Weller's Bay is a changeable channel; but Mr. Rubidge proves that the entrance to Presqu'Isle is likewise a changeable channel.

Mr. BOWELL. No, he does not.

Mr. PLATT. Yes, he does; I will show you. The Minister represents:

"That the total length of the canal proper via Weller's Bay is 4 miles 680 feet, while the length via Presqu'Isle, is 6 miles 660 feet, or a difference in favor of Weller's Bay, in point of length, of 2 miles. This difference is not, however, held to be of weight, inasmuch as the excess by the Presqu'Isle route lies through the land-locked harbor of that place."

Now, I have here a report, as to which time cannot make any difference. Mr. Rubidge says:

"A comparison of distances from a point in the lake (viz., E.S.E.,  $\frac{1}{2}$  east, half a mile from the main light), which may be taken as common to the navigation into Presqu'Isle harbor and Weller's Bay, shows that the distance from the point mentioned via Weller's Bay to the Bay of Quinté is 7.37 miles, whilst that via Presqu'Isle harbor is 9.81 miles, showing a difference of 2.44 miles (or 25 per cent.) in favor of Weller's Bay."

Now, what does Mr. Page say as to that? He says:

"A comparison of distances from a point in the lake which may be taken as common to the navigation into Presqu'Isle harbor and Weller's Bay, shows that the length from this point via the harbor and route No. 1 to the Bay of Quinté would be fully twice that via Weller's Bay to the outlets of either routes No. 2 or No. 3.

"Weller's Bay, however, lies in the direct line of the proposed navigation, and has now the full depth required; whereas the entrance to route No. 1 lies entirely out of that line, and can only be approached by a circuitous channel, to be dredged through Presqu'Isle harbor. It therefore appears that the distance from the mouth of the latter to the Bay of Quinté in route No. 1 should be compared with that from the Weller's Bay entrance to routes Nos. 2 and 3 to the Bay of Quinté. This would show the length via the former route to be about three times greater than that by either of the other two."

Now, there we have a direct contradiction of the representations of the Minister when he laid this matter before the Council. The Minister tells the Council that the cost of an 80-foot wide canal via Presqu'Isle would be $721,000, and that the cost of the same kind of a canal by the Weller's Bay route would be $1,229,000. We find that already a mistake was made in the estimate, because the Council decided on a canal to cost $721,000, whereas the present estimate is $1,260,000. A comparison being made with the cost of the Weller's Bay canal, which was estimated at $1,229,000. Mr. Page's estimate for that canal was $860,000, and the Government must have had this report before their eyes at the time they made their selection, and I merely point out that in the matter of cost a representation was made to the Council which the facts do not bear out nor justify. These representations were made to the Governor in Council by the Minister:

"That with reference to the route via Weller's Bay, it appears to be a fact, from the evidence obtained, that the channel across the bar at that place is of a shifting character, and that its position or direction is not to be depended on after a storm; also, that while the harbor affords good holding ground and deep water, it gives no shelter from the heavy sea rolling in from the lake before south-westerly or westerly gales."

I believe the report of Mr. Rubidge justifies those remarks, so far as the bay is concerned; but Mr. Page, in his report, says of Weller's Bay:

"In 1857 this opening (speaking of the opening in Weller's Bay) is represented to be 100 rods wide, with a channel 150 feet wide and 14 feet in depth; and in 1861 the channel appears to have been 200 feet in width and a depth of fully 14 feet.

"It will thus be seen that from the time when the opening was first made the channel has continued to increase in width."

Mr. Rubidge says:

"It is not improbable that this bar may continue increasing to such an extent as to cause the beaches to unite opposite the cove, in which case Weller's Bay will once more become a lagoon."

Here they are complaining of the shifting sand and the shifting of that entrance to such an extent as to make it unreliable, when the chief engineer tells us the depth is 14 feet and the channel has increased in width.

Mr. BOWELL. Is not that being accomplished now by the action of the water? Is not the entrance to Weller's Bay being narrowed down by the action of the waves and the shifting sands?

Mr. PLATT. I have heard no report to that effect.

Mr. COCHRANE. Why did you want the lighthouses changed?

Mr. PLATT. I will deal with that presently. With regard to the shifting sands, here is what the chief engineer says:

"From what could be ascertained as to the original line of the beach and ridge, it appears that the action of the lake has been such as to carry the sand, of which it is composed, from its original position, and deposit it in such a manner as to increase the width of the bank without materially encroaching upon the area of the bay.

"The fact that the sand has not, so far, been deposited to any extent in the bay, is evident from the material in the bottom consisting of clay, with no stratum of sand over it."

These are Mr. Rubidge's remarks regarding the action of the water:

"By this it will be seen that the action of the lake has been such as to carry the material of which the beach was composed and deposit a great part thereof in deep water inside the bar (where was formerly good anchorage), thereby greatly increasing its width and encroaching upon the bay."

The sand does not encroach upon the bay. Every practical man who has taken soundings has failed to find a stratum of sand there. Thus we see the chief engineer, Mr. Page, contradicts Mr. Rubidge in this important respect. I am told that the channel is not narrowing, that there is a space a quarter of a mile in width of a channel there now, with 16 feet of water. That does not look like narrowing, to any great extent. So far as the change in the direction of the channel is concerned, those lights were never built in range with the deepest channel. The contention was, that the lights had better be built as they now stand and the channel changed by dredging. To say that that channel is not, at present, all that is desirable, is no argument, because it could be easily made so by very little dredging or by changing the lights. An expenditure very much less than the cost of dredging Presqu'Isle would keep Weller's Bay channel permanently open and in range with the lights. I hope the hon. the Minister of Customs, who knows so much about these range lights, will take a note of this, and see that not a summer passes until those lights are made what they should be. I have been simply attempting to show that the Government, in the selection of the route, have chosen a longer route, a route in which we find great difficulty, on account of difficult entrance, and in which the cost of construction is going to be a very great deal more than it would have been by the other route. We know, according to the engineer's reports, that the other is a shorter route, and has a harbor equally good, and more easy of access than Presqu'Isle harbor. The mariners of the lakes have decided, almost unanimously, that Weller's Bay harbor is the best, and that Presqu'Isle harbor would seldom be used by them. The difference between the reports of these engineers, which I have been showing the House, is more marked when we come to the report Mr. Page has made on Mr. Rubidge's report. It appears that the Government decided upon the route of the Murray Canal on

Mr. Rubidge's report, without considering Mr. Page's report. Mr. Rubidge's report did not pass under the eye of Mr. Page until the Government had passed an Order in Council in favor of the Presqu'Isle route. Then, before the contract was let, Mr. Page examined the report of Mr. Rubidge, and sent in the following memo. to the Government:

OTTAWA, 6th July, 1884.

"The lowest tender is that marked L, and the highest is marked C; as, in most cases, the lowest is, I believe, considerably below the fair value of the work, and the highest is probably quite as much above it. In short, it is thought that rates such as would form a mean between the lowest and highest would enable a contractor to execute the work satisfactorily and leave a fair margin for profit. But although there is every reason to believe that the lowest tender is below the value of the work, it is nevertheless 75 per cent. higher than the estimate submitted by Mr. T. S. Rubidge and recited in the Order of the Honorable the Privy Council, dated 23rd May last.

Tender L amounts to .....	$1,140,625
To which must be added the following items:—
Superstructures of road and railway bridges.....	35,000
Land damages.....	10,000
Superintendence and contingencies.....	75,000
	$1,260,625

Mr. T. S. Rubidge's estimate is..... $721,000

"It has been considered proper to draw attention to this matter in the manner above stated, for the reason that one of the main features of the case (the cost) has been erroneously represented, a result which alone has a tendency to give the impression that other questions of importance may have been inadvertently overlooked."

Here is a commentary on Mr. Rubidge's report which the Government might have taken into consideration; and had they considered it, they might have chosen a different route from the one they selected. Mr. Page proceeds to point out that Mr. Rubidge's estimate is $721,000, instead of $1,260,000. Being called upon to explain how it was the tenders so much exceeded his estimate, he explains by saying he did not allow for "rip-rap" and "quarry waste," etc. Mr. Rubidge's report, from end to end, seems to be one elaborate argument in favor of the Presqu'Isle route, as though he had started out with the determination of securing the selection of that route. Mr. Page, I believe, holds that opinion, too. I understand that Mr. Page never sanctioned the report of Mr. Rubidge, and that he told practical men he never would sanction it; that Presqu'Isle Bay was not so easy of access, that it would be more expensive, and the difficulty of entrance would prevent vessels from using it. Much has been said about the shifting sands in Weller's Bay; but I would ask what about Presqu'Isle harbor? Has that harbor not changed? Is the entrance to it what it was years ago? Mr. Rubidge says not. He says:

"That portion of the beach on the mainland extending westwards from the sand banks, referred to above as having been washed away since 1861, was probably swept by the prevailing current (which has here a general set to the westward) across the entrance of Boat harbor to Shoal Point shoal, as the former is now closed and Shoal Point appears to have made toward the west and north on the shoal.

"The old channel or passage into Presqu'Isle harbor, between the Middle Ground and Shoal Point shoals, is also found to be silting up and narrower than formerly. It now lies north of the line of Salt Point range lights, which at one time led directly through the passage, whilst north and east of Salt Point the channel has increased in depth and width."

Here is a description of a magnificently changeable channel, and this is the channel which is chosen because of its permanency, while the other is rejected because it consists of changeable sands.

Mr. PAINT. I rise to a point of order. I think this speech is too long, and I ask your ruling in reference to this matter.

Mr. PLATT. I am about to close my remarks which should have been made two years ago.

Mr. BOWELL. They were made.

Mr. PLATT. They were never made since the selection was made, and hon. gentlemen have no idea of the feeling which exists among the sailors and the mariners of Lake Ontario as to this selection.

Mr. BOWELL. What route did Mr. Page recommend ?

Mr. PLATT. He recommended a route from the Bay of Quinté to Weller's Bay. I want to tell the House that strenuous efforts were made to induce the Government to select a better course. Friend and foe petitioned the Government; delegations came down; memorials came down, and a friend of hon. gentlemen opposite got the names of every vessel owner and every master and mate trading on the lake that he could find, and they spoke unanimously in favor of the Weller's Bay route; but we could not get even a survey of that route, though it was cheaper than the route proposed by Mr. Page. We discovered what we thought would be a better route than that proposed by Mr. Page, but could not induce Government to order a survey. I will point out one reason why I think the Government steered clear of Weller's Bay. Here is a letter written from Brighton, and addressed to Sir Charles Tupper:

" BRIGHTON, 20th March, 1882.

" MY DEAR SIR,—We have just been informed upon reliable authority that the celebrated George W. McMullen is at the town of Trenton, and has induced the municipal council of that town to call a special meeting this evening, for the purpose of appointing a deputation to proceed to Ottawa to oppose the Presqu'Isle route of the Murray Canal.

" This McMullen Brothers have quite recently purchased a considerable tract of land on the easterly side of Weller's Bay, and are desirous of having the canal enter that bay, in the vicinity of their property, in order to enhance the value of their possessions.

" I enclose herewith a rough sketch of the McMullen lands, and the place where they would like to have said canal enter Weller's Bay.

" I have the honor to be, Sir, yours most obediently,

" THOMAS WEBB."

Mr. COCHRANE. A supporter of yours.

Mr. BOWELL. A leading Grit.

Mr. PLATT. It shows that Mr. Webb, being interested in the Presqu'Isle route, thought the only thing he had to do was to hang up the name of McMullen before the Government, and there was no danger of that route being selected. I make no charge against the Government, but this gives color to the suspicion that the Weller's Bay route was shunned by the Government, for fear that incidentally a person by the name of McMullen might reap advantage from their action. I believe that suspicion is well founded. Since so much has been done to reduce to the minimum the benefits likely to flow from the construction of this canal, I hope that the Government will see that the width is what it should be and that the sides are thoroughly protected. If completed according to contract the probabilities are that the canal will prove a useless ditch, and the expenditure will be money thrown away.

Mr. McCALLUM. The hon. gentleman said he ought to have made this speech two or three years ago. I am sorry he did not make it before the Government went to this expense, I question whether this expenditure is going to be of much benefit to the country, but I know that every member from the hon. gentleman's county has urged upon the Government that it had a substantial claim for certain lands to be set aside long ago, for the purpose of building this canal. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman has urged that upon the Government, but now he says he should have warned them long ago. After the Government has decided and has gone on with the work, he finds fault with the work and with the engineer, and you would think that the hon. gentleman knew more than all the engineers in the country. He says the Murray Canal ought to be 100 feet wide. What vessels does he think will enter that canal? It depends altogether upon the slope of the banks whether the sand will slip into the canal or not. If he is opposed to the expenditure of money on the Murray Canal, he ought to propose a vote of want of confidence in the Government. I do not think there will be much benefit in it, but it has been undertaken, and he is dissatisfied because it did not go just where he wanted it. In best canals built through sand, the sand will slip in, but means have been taken to shut the sand out in other canals, the Burlington Bay Canal, for instance. The moment he finds that the Government have approved of building this canal in the interests of his constituency, he pitches into the Government for a useless expenditure of money. I agree with him; and if he brings in a motion condemning the expenditure, I do not know that I will not vote with him; but this has been agitated by his own people and by his own supporters strongly, and in every Parliament by the members for Prince Edward county and the adjoining counties, and now he says that the mariners of this country advocate another route. If I am well informed, this man McMullen sent a man through the country and paid his expenses to get the vessel-owners to recommend a certain route. What right had the Government to expend the people's money if they did not think that the counties adjoining these works had a claim on the Government for the money set aside for building this canal? I believe that was the substantial reasonable way urged for building this canal.

Mr. PLATT. I found no fault with the Government for expending money in this particular part of the country. I only said it was of doubtful benefit and the Government ought to be careful. I believe the Government made a huge blunder when they selected the present route, and I have heard a good many complaints from vessel-owners. If the canal were good and useful where it is, it would be as much benefit to my county as it was then. We feel aggrieved because the least possible benefit will be derived from it, principally on account of the direction it has taken.

Mr. BOWELL. Ever since I have been in Parliament we have had an annual debate on this subject. After an appropriation was placed in the Estimates for the purpose of surveys, and after the engineers had made their reports, the Minister of Railways and Canals recommended this route as being the best and the cheapest. If the hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to refer to all the reports, he could have made a good deal stronger case in favor of the adopted route than he has made in favor of his favorite route. The hon. gentleman might have gone back 85 or 100 years, and have found reports on this subject, and he would have stated the matter more correctly if he had said that Mr. Page never made his reports from his personal examination of the surveys of that canal. I am speaking under correction, but I think Mr. Page generally made his reports from the reports of other engineers. As far back as 1854, Mr. Page reported, or rather set forth, the disadvantages that would arise from the selection of the Weller Bay route, and if the hon. gentleman has not seen that report he will find it in the general collection of reports upon this subject. Every one of these reports differed as to the cost, ranging from £40,000 to $1,000,000. I have taken some trouble to go through all these reports, and I find that Mr. Page never reported in favor of the route which the hon. gentleman prefers. The only report in which he ever made any direct recommendation was to enter by Stoneburg Cove. By the adoption of that route it would have run through the same portion of country as is now traversed by the present canal. Now, so far as the quicksand is connected, the information of the Department is that there is no quicksand. I went over the whole of it myself, and though I am not a judge in these matters, I came to the conclusion that where hundreds and thousands of tons of material were taken from the bottom and the sides of the canal, and piled upon its banks, if the material was of the nature of quicksand the pressure from above would shove it down to the bottom. But there have not been any slides, as mentioned by the hon. gentleman, but in dredging out that material they brought the dredging machine close to the bank and took out the material, as much as possible, from under the bank, and they did that purposely so that the banks would fall in. I do not think this Government ever considered the question as to whether Mr. McMullen was to be benefited or not. If the hon. gentleman would take the trouble to refer to the files of the Belleville Ontario, he will find a long letter from Mr. George McMullen, stating positively that it was of much greater advantage to them personally to have the canal route where it is, than it would have been if it had taken the other route, to which the hon. gentleman refers. When he says that the canal was diverted for the purpose of injuring the pecuniary interests of those parties, he could not have seen the letter.

Mr. PLATT. I saw the letter.

Mr. BOWELL. Then you could not honestly have come to the conclusion that the canal was taken from that route in order to injure those parties. The fact is, the Government obtained the fullest information before they made any selection; and, upon the report of their engineers, they chose the present route. I am convinced time will show that the action of the Government is correct, in taking the route from Weller's Bay. The channel to which the hon. gentleman refers is being filled up, and it is gradually changing, and the lighthouses will have to be changed, in order to enable vessels to get into Weller's Bay with any degree of safety. I called the Minister of Marine and Fisheries attention to this matter the other day, and he promised to look after the matter. It is within my recollection that a portion of this channel used to be a fishing station, and I remember years ago when people used to drive teams from Presqu'Isle Harbor on to the fishing stations. That has since been washed away. That deposit has gone to some other part of the bay, but it is now re-forming again in the same way. No doubt the hon. gentleman will some day find the same bank formed that existed when he and I were boys. As far as the shipping in the channel of the Presqu'Isle harbor is concerned, that channel is not now where it was when the original surveys were made. A large amount of money was expended by the late Government in dredging and straightening that channel. The entrance to the harbor there is of a gravelly rather than a sandy nature. When this gravel is removed it will always remain open.

Mr. COCHRANE. I have read the reports, and I think this work will be in the proper place. I disagree entirely with the hon. member for Prince Edward. I am well satisfied that canals cannot pay; but the question is, whether this canal is going to be a benefit to the trade of the country. I should like to know why this canal is not going to benefit trade, when we know that the coast of Prince Edward is the most dangerous in Ontario. There are more wrecks on that coast than on all the other coasts of Ontario put together. If large vessels come through the canal and pass down to Presqu'Isle harbor and Bay of Quinté, and avoid the Prince Edward coast, why should the trade not be benefited? I should not be at all surprised if the head of St. Lawrence navigation was ultimately at Presqu'Isle harbor. I do not understand why we cannot ship on barges there as well as at Kingston. When the weather is heavy, large vessels carrying grain could come through the channel as far as Presqu'Isle and transship into barges. I remember distinctly when there was a fishing beach where the channel now is. The reports of engineers show a shifting sand bar, and that the lights are now out of range at Weller's Bay. The channel has completely changed; so, if the range lights were as before, vessels would run aground. The channel does not now change. It was dredged in 1871, and has become wider, and may now be regarded as stationary. All we want to do is to change the direction of the channel to make it one of the best harbors on Lake Ontario. This canal is going to be of great benefit to the carrying trade of the country, and if it does not pay directly, it will recoup us indirectly, in the shape of trade. The hon. member for Prince Edward has quoted reports from the engineers respecting the Weller's Bay scheme, but he did not tell the committee that if that scheme had been adopted the water in Weller's Bay would have been so increased that it would have acted as a funnel, and carried away the canal, unless it had been held by stop-locks.

Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.
(In the Committee).

Repairs, &c., Harbors and Slides..... $87,000

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is a reduction of $2,250. The repairs on the Ottawa River are $5,000 less than usual.

Expenses in connection with Land and Cable Telegraphs ..... $23,250

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The extent of the cables and telegraph lines is greater now than formerly, and the staff has necessarily been increased. Nevertheless, the total is less. The amount for repairs in 1884-85 was $31,900, and for this year $33,200. The increase is exactly for the same reason.

Telegraph Lines, B.C. .... $34,500

Mr. MILLS. What is the cause of the reduction?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is a reduction of $3,000. We expect, by changing the line on a certain portion, to effect a reduction in the staff, by using, for a portion of the distance, a telegraph line of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MILLS. What is the staff of this line?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A district superintendent and 32 operators and assistants.

Mr. MILLS. How much of the amount is for staff, and how much for repairs, etc.?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Staff, $21,200; repairs, $13,300.

Telegraph and Signal Service generally..... $9,500

Mr. WELDON. I would like some information on this item.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This covers the offices of headquarters and travelling expenses, superintendent's salary and travelling expenses, stationery, and unforeseen expenses in connection with telegraph and telephone service.

Mr. VAIL. Has there been any decision arrived at with regard to extending the cable to Sable Island?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is in the Department of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is not in his seat at the moment. The cost will be considerable, but I believe that a telephonic service has been established between two or three points on the island, so that communication may be had in that way.

Mr. WELDON. It is important, not only to the interests of Canada, but in the interests of the mother country and the United States, that this line should be established, and I think if representations were made to these countries, they would unite in the work, and it would be the means of saving both life and property.

Mr. McLELAN. I may say that we consider the cost too heavy to be undertaken at present, but a boat has been placed there as a means of communication for the present.

Mr. VAIL. I observe that the amount of this service is the same as last year, so I am afraid the Minister of Public Works has overlooked the petition which I sent in for a telegraph line at Westport and Briar Island, which is very much needed. They have no communication now, except overland, a distance of 40 or 50 miles. I am sure there will be no loss to the revenue, because the receipts will fully cover the interest.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am afraid that amount is not covered. However, the Supplementary Estimates, I hope, will be down early next week, and the hon. gentleman may be able to see what is in them.

Mr. VAIL. I think the Minister knows what is in them.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Well, I think I do know something about them, and perhaps my hon. friend can tell by my laugh whether that item is in them or not.

Mr. VAIL. I can only judge from the past. I have seen the hon. gentleman smile before, but there has not been much in the Estimates to show that it amounts to anything. If he gives me a hint that it will be in the Supplementary Estimates, I will be satisfied for the present.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman will see that I must learn by experience. Once a Minister smiled, and it cost a good deal to the country.

Agent and Contingencies, British Columbia..... $4,000

Mr. VAIL. What are these contingencies? It appears to me there are a great many votes for British Columbia.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not think my hon. friends from British Columbia find that there are many. The items are: Salary paid to Mr. Trutch by my Department, $600; the accountant, Mr. Macdonald, $1,200; the engineer, paid partly by my Department and partly by the Department of Railways, $360; messenger, $400; stationery, $200; fuel, $200; advertising, etc., $200; and travelling expenses and contingencies of the office, $840.

Mr. WELDON. Is this the only office Mr. Trutch fills?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He is the agent of the Dominion there.

Mr. MILLS. Does the hon. gentleman know the total amount of salary Mr. Trutch receives? I think he holds several offices.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He is, in the first place, a pensioner under the arrangements of the Confederation Act. In addition to that he receives, I think, $1,200 as agent of the Dominion, and $600 for the services he renders to my Department from time to time. Of course, if I had not his services, I should have to employ an engineer of my own, who would cost a great deal more. I think this is an economical arrangement as we can have. Of course, when the railway works are completed, most likely some other arrangement will have to be resorted to.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). I think there is a saving of about $1,500 in that Department. The resident engineer received at one time $2,100 or $2,200, while Mr. Trutch receives $600 for doing the same amount of work.

Mr. BLAKE. How much does Mr. Trutch get altogether?

Mr. BAKER. I believe about $5,000, and $5 a day when travelling.

Post Office—Amount required..... $2,651,837

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is the hon. Postmaster General erecting any other post office in Ontario, except Brantford, into a city office, this year.

Mr. WELDON.

Mr. CARLING. Not this year.

Mr. MILLS. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would tell us generally what the increases are for. I suppose they are for new offices being established.

Mr. CARLING. Yes; there are new mail routes being established in the different Provinces by rail or by stage, and of course new offices opened and additional officers appointed.

Mr. WELDON. The largest increase appears to be in salaries.

Mr. CARLING. The annual increases amount to a very large proportion.

Mr. MILLS. There is a very large increase in British Columbia.

Mr. CARLING. Since the Northern Pacific Railway has been opened, there has been a daily mail from Puget Sound to Victoria, which formerly had only three mails a week. Then, we have established a mail monthly to Port Simpson, and we have also a mail to Kamloops, and as far as the Canadian Pacific Railway is laid.

Mr. MILLS. Will the Northern Pacific be used throughout the entire year, or does the hon. gentleman expect to send the mails by the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. CARLING. Of course, the hon. gentleman will understand we do not pay anything for the mail service on the Northern Pacific; all mails are carried free over American lines; but of course, as soon as our own line is finished, a daily mail will be established on that route.

Mr. MILLS. And will this mail from Puget Sound to Victoria be continued also? The reason I ask is, that if there are no places to be supplied between Puget Sound and Victoria, of course that line would necessarily cease, as soon as the Canadian Pacific were used for the carrying of the mails.

Mr. CARLING. Of course, the American mails will have to be transmitted from Puget Sound to Victoria.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). With regard to the erection into city offices of offices that had been on the commission plan before, I have a few words to say regarding the officials. I am glad the hon. gentleman has erected the Brantford office into a city office, but I regret that it is the occasion of great hardship to a number of faithful men who have been in that office for a number of years, and in consequence of the change have lost their positions. Of course, there is no political significance in it, because they are in political accord with the Postmaster General himself. The postmaster says that under the Civil Service rules he had no option but to discharge these men. One of them has been 12 or 15 years in the service, and they all, of course, are anxious to retain their positions. I think there ought to be some provision made for these cases, as their claim is certainly stronger than that of those who may have passed the Civil Service examination. I take this opportunity of asking the hon. gentleman when he thinks he can give Belleville and Brantford letter carriers? Kingston has letter carriers, and I think the post office in Brantford equals that of Kingston.

Mr. CARLING. I think before long the delivery by letter carriers will be established in Brantford. It is one of the most prosperous cities in the west, and the receipts amount to over $20,000. With regard to the clerks in the office, of course the hon. gentleman will understand that, according to the Civil Service Act, I cannot appoint any one who has not passed his examination. These young men were engaged by the postmaster as his officers, and were not salaried officers of the Government. They were aware we were about to establish Brantford as a city office, and should have taken an opportunity to pass the examination. Had they passed, the Government would, of course, have given them preference.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The last communication I had was that, if the hon. Minister would retain them in their positions and give them an opportunity to go up for an examination, they would avail themselves of it. The period had passed when the examination was held, and the next examination would not come off for a few months, so that, in the meantime, they could not present themselves. The Act might be amended, so as to give them a few months delay, if they were not ready to pass at once.

Mr. HESSON. I endorse what my hon. friend has said. I have had occasion to interest myself on behalf of one of those young gentlemen. It appears to me that where a number of men for years had done their duty faithfully to the public, although not in the employ of the public, the Government should recognise their services, by retaining them in some capacity, under the new state of things. The postmaster himself objected to the change, because I believe it is going to reduce his receipts, but the young men were in favor of it; and now, when they find themselves on the road, I believe he refused to allow them to go up for the Civil Service examination. If that be the case, they should be continued in the service, until they have an opportunity of passing their examination.

Mr. CARLING. I cannot alter the Act, but I am sure there will be every disposition on the part of the Government to take a liberal view with regard to these officers. I am glad hon. gentlemen have mentioned the subject.

Mr. TROW. What accommodation is given to the settlers at Rainy River, Fort Francis locks, about 100 miles from the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. CARLING. I believe there is a post office established at Fort Francis, and one will be established in a few weeks at Rainy River.

Mr. DAWSON. There is a post office at Fort Francis, one at Rapid River, on Rainy River, and one at Rainy River; three in all. The mail going from Rat Portage to Rainy River is irregular; some arrangement should be made to have a mail twice a week instead of one every week in summer, and once a fortnight in winter. There is a very large settlement now at Rainy River.

Mr. WILSON. In St. Thomas we have every right to expect to have a city post office there. The revenue from St. Thomas has been greatly increased, and is increasing very rapidly, and the population would warrant the Government on deciding to establish the St. Thomas office as a city office. The Postmaster General should take into consideration the propriety of making St. Thomas a city post office. Owing to the situation of the town, and the fact that it covers a great deal of ground, free delivery of letters would be very advantageous. The post office will move into its fine new building within a few days or weeks, and it would certainly be desirable to have it established as a city post office, and provision made for free delivery of letters.

Mr. CARLING. There can be no doubt that flourishing towns, such as St. Thomas, St. Catharines, Guelph, Stratford and Chatham, will, in a very short time, a very few years, be established as post offices, the same as Brantford. But the revenue of those cities and towns is nothing like the revenue derived from Brantford. That of Brantford amounts to between $20,000 and $21,000, whereas the revenue of St. Thomas office, at the present time, only reaches $13,000. Of course, as the Minister of Public Works has erected fine buildings at St. Thomas and Stratford, no doubt they will, in a very short time, be established as city post offices, and free delivery extended to them.

Mr. INNES. I am glad to hear that it is the intention of the Postmaster General to establish free delivery at no remote date in the cities mentioned. If the hon. gentleman is in view of free delivery being established at Brantford, I think Guelph is entitled to it also. The revenue, if not so large as that of Brantford, is very nearly as high, and according to the last census our population is larger.

Mr. WILSON. Our receipts are increasing very rapidly. Our population would compare very favorably with Brantford or Belleville, as we have about 12,000 people. It may be that the people of St. Thomas do not receive so many dunning letters.

Mr. DAWSON. There is a very large postal business done in Prince Arthur. Last year no less than $315,000 passed through the money order office. The town has now 6,000 inhabitants, and the post office is kept in a little wooden building. That is hardly suitable for such a large and growing town, especially as it is going to be one of the cities of the Dominion. When the revenue will permit, I hope a building for the post office will be erected.

Mr. CARLING. My attention has already been directed to the importance of having a post office built at Port Arthur, and I think the Minister of Public Works has had the matter under consideration. It is not, of course, proposed to erect one this year, but with the rapid growth of the town, no doubt the Government will be able, in a few years, to erect a building for post office and Custom house purposes.

Mr. LANDERKIN. While the Postmaster General is giving great attention to cities, I desire to remind him that in many offices in rural constituencies there is not more than one mail a week. The country post offices are self-sustaining, and the Minister would make them even more so if he gave them a more efficient service. If he would give a postal service every day, he would be doing something that would justly entitle him to the thanks of the people, and the revenue of the offices would warrant the change. I hope that before long the post offices in rural constituencies will obtain a full measure of justice.

Mr. CARLING. Every attention is being given to the rural districts. There is hardly a case in which, where a petition has been sent in for better service than a weekly service, that we have not given a semi-weekly or a tri-weekly or daily mail. Whenever petitions are sent in by any district, especially a rural district, every attention will be given to the application.

Mr. INNES. After considerable delay it was decided to give additional accommodation to the post office at Guelph; $1,000 was voted last year for the work, but through some misunderstanding nothing has been done. I understand from the Postmaster General alterations will be made soon and I hope they will not be forgotten.

Mr. CARLING. My attention has been called to the want of accommodation in the post office. A room occupied by the Inland Revenue Department is about to be given up to the post office, and it will give sufficient accommodation for the purpose.

Mr. McMULLEN. Drew and Smithurst post offices are only served by a mail twice or three times a week. A petition was sent in last year, praying that one of these post offices might be abolished and the other removed to the railway station. If that were done we could have a mail every day. If the Postmaster General looked into it, he would find that there could be increased accommodation given without any increase of cost.

Mr. CARLING. I shall be glad to make a note of what the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to call the attention of the Postmaster General to an office in the south riding of Grey, called Glen Eden. Last year a petition was sent to the Department, asking for a daily mail service; I am not aware that it has been granted. I think this office is of sufficient importance to deserve a daily service, and that the receipts would be sufficient to pay for that service.

Mr. HESSON. There is no service, probably, more valuable to the people than the post office, and I think I do no injustice to any other Department when I say that the Post Office Department is very ably administered. But I believe it would be a mistake to comply with all the requests that the Postmaster General receives from the various constituencies. I have myself a great many favors I would like to ask of him, but I know the Department are doing the best they can, and I do not like to ask too much of them, and embarrass the working of the Department. There is no doubt that the people in cities have greater postal facilities than do the people in the country, many of whom have mail communication only twice a week; therefore, I think that the Minister should not neglect the country in favor of the city. I also think that a reduction in the letter postage ought to be made as early as possible to 2 cents, and if I am spared till next year, I shall endeavor to induce the Minister to make that reduction. It may decrease the receipts, but we do not expect the Post Office Department to be self-sustaining in a country so extensive and so sparsely settled as Canada, and I do not think the people will object to drawing upon the general revenue of the country in order to give them increased postal facilities.

Mr. VAIL. In the United States they have increased the weight of the letter to one ounce. I do not know that the receipts of the Department in Canada would warrant the Postmaster General in reducing the rate from 3 cents to 2 cents, but if he could give us that increase in the weight, it would be a great boon to the public.

Mr. CARLING. The questions of the reduction of postage and the increase of weight have been considered by the Department; but I think the hon. gentleman will agree that in view of the greatly increased expenditure which we have made to extend postal facilities, we could hardly reduce the postage at the present time. Last year the American Government reduced their postage from 3 to 2 cents, and though they had a surplus at the time, of $2,000,000, at the end of the year I think they had a deficiency of something like $5,000,000. We have lately been doubling the postal facilities in many cases, and we have opened a great many new offices in British Columbia and the North-West, and the great distances between the offices in those regions have necessitated a greatly increased expenditure.

Mr. VAIL. In the matter of post office accommodation, I do not think the balancing of the accounts ought to be considered. There is nothing the people value so highly, and there is no purpose for which they contribute so willingly, as the postal service. I, therefore, hope that the Postmaster General will consider this from the point of view of the public benefit, rather than from the point of view of making the accounts balance.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). I desire to draw the attention of the Postmaster General to a defect in the mail facilities through recent changes in the time tables of some of the railways running from Toronto west. I am not aware of the relationship existing between the Department and the railways, sufficiently to know whether the Department can control the running of trains; but the hon. Minister is doubtless aware that a close relationship must exist between the two in this regard. The train leaving Ottawa in the morning reaches Toronto just late enough to miss the early mail trains from that city westwards. The result is, that mails leaving here are delayed in Toronto, and reach London three or four hours later than they would reach it if the train left here so as to reach Toronto in time to catch the western mail. It not only affects the city of Toronto, but all the districts lying west along the main line of the Great Western, and also the Sarnia branch. The main line of the Great Western has, perhaps, to some extent, the advantage, from the fact that the same train that reaches London carrying the mails goes right through, while the mails on the Sarnia branch are delayed in London until the next day. A very slight change in the time tables of the trains carrying the mails would allow the distribution of mail matter along the post offices on the Sarnia branch at three or four o'clock, or at least in the afternoon of the day preceding. Of course, I know the Postmaster General cannot absolutely control the matter, but perhaps representations to the railway authorities would facilitate the earlier distribution of mail matter.

Mr. CARLING. The mail that leaves here at 11 p.m. by the Pacific does not reach Toronto in time to connect with the Great Western going west. The mails, however, are sent forward by the earliest train leaving after they arrive, either by the Canadian Pacific Railway or Grand Trunk. Every effort is made at Toronto to push forward the mails going west.

Mr. CAMERON (Middlesex). A gentleman leaving here for the west and going by the Canadian Pacific Railway to Ingersoll can catch the train going west from that point and reach London at noon, whereas, if he were to go to Toronto he would not reach London until 6 p.m. If it were possible to arrange to have mail matter for London and district sent to Ingersoll, there would be an earlier distribution.

Mr. FARROW. The mail that leaves here by the Canadian Pacific Railway arrives in Toronto shortly after 8 o'clock, and the Grand Trunk does not leave till 9:25. If clerks were on the train, the mail matter might be forwarded by that Grand Trunk train.

Mr. CARLING. I am quite sure letters are sent on by the train leaving Toronto immediately after the arrival of the mail. There has recently been a change in the time table, which has prevented connection being made. We have, of course, no power to regulate the time of the trains; but we do everything we can to secure connection at Toronto.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) has referred to a matter of very considerable public interest, and that is with respect to a reduction of postage and increased weight of letters. These are two entirely distinct propositions. I can understand how the Postmaster General might object to a reduction of postage at the present time, when there is a falling revenue. If we were enjoying a period of prosperity, the loss would be more than restored by the increased number of letters. The question in regard to increased weight of letters is a somewhat different one. It would not seriously affect the revenue. The mails are not over-weighted, and it might be possible to increase the weight from half an ounce to one ounce. This change might make a difference to some persons carrying on correspondence, and might enable people to write longer letters or write them on better paper.

Mr. CARLING. No change of that kind can be made without changing the Post Office Act. The Americans adopted the change on the 1st July. We shall have an opportunity of seeing what the result will be, and what the loss of revenue will be, and then we will be better able to judge of the matter.

Mr. MILLS. Then the hon. gentleman has not made any calculations as to the number of letters going through the post paying double postage.

Mr. CARLING. I have not.

Mr. SCRIVER. I observed, not long ago, that the post office authorities in the United States estimated that a considerable loss would result from the reduction of the rate of postage from 3 cents to 2 cents, the amount being about one-tenth of the revenue.

Towards deepening Welland Canal to 14 feet throughout..... $500,000

Mr. VAIL. Is it understood that it is the intention to deepen this canal to 14 feet. I did not understand it so this afternoon.

Mr. POPE. The intention is to give 14 feet navigation.

Mr. SHANLY. How soon is it contemplated that this expenditure will result in giving you 14 feet on the Welland.

Mr. POPE. If we had been able to let the contracts, it would have been completed by July or August next, but I have no doubt now it will take next season.

Trent River Navigation .... $113,000

Mr. VAIL. What do the receipts of this canal amount to ?

Mr. POPE. This is for constructing locks and the improvement of navigation between Lakefield and Balsam Lake; only a certain portion of the system has been in operation.

Mr. VAIL. I find that a certain sum is put down annually for expenses and repairs, and it seems to me a very large expenditure, unless there are receipts from it. Surely there must be some tolls. It seems an easy thing to vote these large sums for Ontario, while we, in the Maritime Provinces, find it difficult to get $1,000 or $2,000 for a pier, or some other small work, which may be of importance the whole year around—while this canal is only used in the summer and autumn months.

Mr. MULLOCK. The hon. gentleman does not understand the geography of the country through which this canal passes, though, of course, it is quite right for any hon. gentleman to obtain all the information on this or other proposed votes. We are not now discussing the question as to whether or not the country has pledged itself to this Trent Valley Canal. That section of country has been looking forward for a long time when it might have a great canal system connecting the northern system of waters with Lake Ontario. Whether this system will be as successful as it is hoped for, I am unable to say. There are various theories expressed on that point, but the House, some time ago, pledged itself to this system of internal development, and I suppose if the House should now discontinue this work, considerable sums already expended would be rendered useless. Perhaps the Minister will inform me if I am correct in saying that this is part of a scheme for a through system ?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. MULLOCK. The idea being to continue this expenditure, until ultimately you connect the northern waters with Lake Ontario, by means of a canal system.

Mr. SHANLY. Georgian Bay and the Bay of Quinté ?

Mr. MULLOCK. Yes. Before concluding, I would like to ask the Minister of Railways if he can give us an idea when the canal system will be completed ?

Mr. BOWELL. Part of that canal was built in 1818.

Mr. POPE. Of course, these works are quite independent of other works, of which surveys have to be made, but the time when they will be completed is a matter which cannot be decided yet. For instance, there is the Fenelon Falls Canal, for which Mr. Manning is the contractor, and which is to cost $120,000, and to be completed this year; the depth of the water is to be 5½ feet. Then there is the Buckhorn Canal, George Goodwin, contractor, and the cost, $91,600, and that will be completed this year. Then there is Burleigh Canal, George Goodwin, contractor, and the cost $176,700, of which $60,000 is to be expended this year.

Mr. MILLS. This was under the Ontario Government once.

Mr. BOWELL. Before the late Dominion Government went out of power, they passed an Order in Council transferring the whole of the Trent works to the Local Government; but the Local Government failed to carry out the provisions of the law to make the transfer valid, and when the present Dominion Government came into power we thought the work of sufficient Dominion importance not to carry out that arrangement, and we annulled it. I might mention to the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Vail) that part of these works were built soon after 1812, when the scheme was first adopted. Some of the locks were getting into decay, and in order to utilise the inland waters as much as possible, those locks, and that portion of the canal, particularly, at Chisholm's Rapids, have been put into repair, to keep them from rotting, so that when the system is complete they can be used.
