I would like to inform the house that when we were defeated in our desire to retain the red ensign, something which had taken place earlier, we wanted to find out whether the government and other members of the committee were taking an uncompromising stand. We showed our desire for a compromise in a design which was produced for the committee, containing the union jack and fleur-de-lis, but we just could not get any support for any flag with the union jack on it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or the fleur-de-lis.

Mr. Monteith: On August 24 last I spoke during the flag debate and dealt at some length with my feelings on the issue. I do not propose to go into more detail in that regard today. I also dealt at some length with the reason that I believed in a matter so personal, so close to one's heart, there should be an opportunity for every citizen to express his or her preference through means of a plebiscite. I believe the majority of Canadians wish to have this opportunity, something which has been strongly borne out by opinion polls across the country.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp):

That the sixth report of the special committee be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to strike out paragraph seven of the said report and substitute therefor the following:

"However, as the final vote of the committee did not reveal a sufficient degree of unanimity for the proposed design for a national flag for Canada, your committee therefore recommends that the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite to be held at the next general election in order that the Canadian people may be given their rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag".

And that the committee for such purpose be revived.

I close simply by reminding the house of the Prime Minister's rather delayed expression to the effect that on anything concerning the flag there is to be a free vote.

Mr. Macaluso: Would the hon. member permit a question now?

Mr. Monteith: I would be glad to.

Mr. Macaluso: The hon. member has stated that it was not until after the vote of October 22 that he told the Leader of the Opposition of the committee's decision. Wasn't the committee still sitting at that time?

Mr. Monteith: I simply said that I had not had one discussion with the Leader of the Opposition concerning the flag question until after the final vote had been taken.

Mr. Macaluso: My question is, wasn't the committee still in session at that time that you advised the Leader of the Opposition of the result of the vote?

Mr. Monteith: I would reply by asking a question. Do you mean to tell me that no member of your party had any conversation with the Prime Minister during the course of the debate?

Mr. Macaluso: I see the hon. gentleman does not wish to answer because he knows the committee was still in session and that he was wrong in telling him.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. Is there any objection to this amendment?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Churchill: A most unusual procedure.

Mr. McIlraith: The objection is on several grounds. The first has to do with the right to refer the report back to the committee. Such a right does not exist because the committee is a special committee, not a standing committee; it is a special committee whose final report has been made.

In support of this position I would refer Your Honour to citation 286 on page 236 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, where it is stated;

> A select special committee ceases to exist on the moment its final report is presented to the house. The report cannot afterwards be sent back to the committee with instructions to amend it in any particular. If further proceedings are desired it is necessary to revive the committee.

That is the first ground of objection. There is a further ground of objection which is even more fundamental, and it is this. It will be recalled that the committee was set up after several weeks of debate on this flag question and it will be noted on reading the motion to set it up that the terms of reference were very special; this is not only called a special committee but it is, in fact, special by its very nature. The reason is easily understood by anyone who bears in mind the history of the flag question in the House of Commons this session. The motion will be found in Votes and Proceedings No. 145 of September 10 and it reads as follows:

> That a special committee of this house, consisting of 15 members, to be designated later by the house, be appointed to consider and report upon the flag question; that the said committee be empowered to report from time to time and that its final report be submitted not later than six weeks from the date of its first sitting; and that the appointment of this committee, its power to report and the capacity of this house to act upon the report be not restricted by any motions now on the order paper.

The point I wish to make in this connection is the following one: Even if it were generally in order to refer a report back to a special committee this would not be sufficient in this particular case. The committee, in its present form, could not be revived by implication or even by a motion, as is sought to be done. What is involved here is the whole charter of the committee, its whole constitution, its whole character. This will be well understood if hon. members would bear in mind its history. It was to report back to the house within six weeks after its first meeting, and its first meeting was held some time in September—I forget the exact date. So even the implied revival of the committee is not effective. Sending back what is sought to be sent back to it for further consideration cannot be effective; it would be a mere nullity because the committee, by its own constitution, does not have the authority or the power to carry out the function which this proposal seeks to refer to it, because of the limitation of time in its constitution.

The authority for a special committee is very limited. It has only the authority given to it by the house. Perhaps I could read an excerpt from Redlich, page 196:

> It remains, finally, to explain the legal relation of a committee to the house as a whole. The main principle to be attended to is that a committee only exists, and only has power to act, so far as expressly directed by the order of the house which brings it into being. This order of reference is a firm bond, subjecting the committee to the will of the house; the reference is always treated with exactness and must be strictly interpreted. A select committee therefore always acts under a special, not a general, authority.

The point I wish to make is that there can be no authority in the committee to do what is sought by the motion for reference back. If the constitution of the committee is to be changed, that of course will require a substantive motion which must be dealt with in the ordinary way. Notice must be given and it must be treated as any substantive motion is treated.

Those are the main grounds of objection. The last, I submit, is not open to any argument at all because of the nature of the instructions the hon. member has sought to transmit. The first hinges on the fact that the committee is a special committee only, and the cases applicable to standing committees do not apply to it.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have only a few remarks to make relative to the points of order raised by the President of the Privy Council on behalf of the government.

The hon. gentleman said the committee must be revived. Well, the amendment itself provides for the revival of the committee, if the minister insists that this should be a condition. If he would read the amendment he would see that the house, in adopting the amendment, would revive the committee if such a course were necessary for the particular purpose of the motion. So this condition has been provided for; even the citations and the precedents relating to this direction for revival have been met.

I turn now to the other point the minister raised. He seemed to think that because the committee had presented its final report it had, ipso facto, died in the literal sense and could not therefore be revived. But I would point out that we are considering not the final report of the committee but merely the sixth report. In logic, if on the presentation of the sixth report the committee were deemed to have come to an end, how could it present its seventh report? The seventh report is a matter of record on the order paper. I would say, therefore, that in so far as consideration of the sixth report was concerned we are not dealing with the final report of the committee and, therefore, for the purpose of the discussion of the sixth report, the committee has not come to an end.

What we have before us is in essence an interim report. Therefore, the argument that having prepared its final report the committee has died does not wholly apply. Certainly the discussion of interim reports, if such reports were delayed or adjourned until the presentation of what might be a final report, could not be curtailed by using this device as a tool to prevent any discussion of any report of a special committee—not a select committee but a special committee—by merely delaying, on the initiative of the government, discussion of any interim report until what is deemed to be a final report has been presented. Nor has there ever been such a rule, because it would serve to stifle any discussion or any amendment of any report of a special committee. My third point is that any references the minister has made that have applied to select committees certainly do not apply to special committees, because there is a clearcut distinction between the two.

I would put it to the minister once again that his arguments against this amendment have been countered, first by the fact that the amendment provides for a revival of the committee for a specific purpose; second, that we are considering an interim report and not a final report; and third, that this is a special committee and not a select committee. For those reasons I put it to you, Mr. Speaker—there may be other reasons which other hon. members of the house may advance for Your Honour's consideration—that the amendment is in order for discussion at this time.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is just one consideration which I would like to bring to your attention and one respect in which this particular special committee is different from, I believe, any other special committee that has been set up by this house. It is different, for instance, from the special customs committee of 1926. It is different in that the order setting up this committee established a particular time limit within which the committee had to work. It was a decision of this house that this special committee should do its work within six weeks, and then it finished.

If it is now considered in order to move an amendment which in its terms revives this committee, we are then reversing by an amendment an order of the house which established a committee for six weeks. We would be restoring a committee without any time limit at all; it could go on indefinitely, because there is nothing in the amendment, presumably, which would prevent that. If it can go on indefinitely, it is entirely in opposition to the original motion which said the committee must end its work in six weeks. I know that arguments can be made for and against reviving by amendment special or select committees; we could argue that matter for a long time. But I do not know of any case, because I do not believe there is any case, where a committee was set up for six weeks to do a job and then an amendment of this type was accepted; because this amendment, if carried, would restore that committee for an indefinite period of time, thereby contradicting the order of the house that it be set up for six weeks.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, you have something of a mixed bag with respect to this point of order. I am afraid that all I am going to do is put another element into the bag for Your Honour to consider. I confess that I am concerned about the fundamental point made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith), now supported by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), namely that in their view there is no way at all in which this report can be referred back to the special committee.

I speak as one who would like to see this matter disposed of as quickly as possible, but it does seem to me that we have to look at the procedural points very carefully. The Prime Minister's contention that the original committee was set up with a time limit of six weeks is one that has to be considered, and it may be that any attempt on the part of the house to revive the committee should take cognizance of that time limit and amend the time limit by setting some other period of time. But it does seem to me to be not quite consistent with the authority of the house to say that, having set up a committee to do a job, we are prohibited from asking that committee to take another look at the matter which we referred to it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit a question on that particular point. Has the hon. gentleman considered the rule about reversing a decision taken in the house in the same session?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, it is because there has been a decision in this session that the committee sit for only six weeks that I think an amendment to revive the committee is not in order unless it takes cognizance of that fact; and I suggest it would be taking cognizance of that fact if it sought to amend that time limit. The reason I have said these things is that I think whatever ruling Your Honour makes on the point of order raised by the President of the Privy Council, Your Honour should keep open the question as to whether or not some amendment to refer back might be in order. I say that because even if—and I think there is a case for it—it can be argued that there is a right to refer back, I have questions about this particular amendment. I have already alluded to one. I refer to the fact that the proposal to revive the committee, if this is going to be done, should deal with the question of its time limit. But the other point that worries me about this amendment is that it deals with the question of a plebiscite. I point out, sir, that there is already before the house a government order, No. 44(A), in connection with which there is an amendment and a subamendment dealing with the question of a plebiscite. I know that hon. members may argue that order 44(A) may never again be called; but the fact of the matter is that at the moment it is on the order paper, is therefore before the house, and it is at least theoretically possible for the present motion to be defeated and for the house to be asked to consider again the other question.

Therefore I ask Your Honour to look at that point. Since the house has already voted on an amendment in the name of the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) with respect to a plebiscite on the flag issue, and since this issue is still on the order paper, is it in order for the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) under another guise to move what is in effect the same question, namely that of a plebiscite? I think there is some real question as to the propriety of this amendment on that ground. But having said that, I wanted to make the other remarks that I did when I first rose to my feet because if Your Honour chooses to rule this amendment out of order, I hope Your Honour will keep open the possibility of the right of the house to refer the question back to the committee, if it so wishes, for a specific period of time.

As I have said, I for one would like to see the house dispose of this question just as quickly as possible. I think the members of the committee have done a good job and we should not call them back again; but I think we should be careful about the procedural proprieties on a matter of this kind.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Would not the adoption of the committee's report wipe out anything else that was on the order paper in connection with this flag issue?

Mr. Knowles: It would not wipe it out, but it would supersede it, and in all probability order No. 44(A) would not then be called by the government. But the hon. member is assuming that the committee's report will be adopted. Until such time as the house has made a decision, both order 44(A) and the motion of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) are before us.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this has been a rather unusual day. We started by asking the government, in accordance with the usual practice, whether or not the motion before the house could be held in abeyance until after questions had been asked. That request was refused by the government.

Canadian Flag

Some hon. Members: By the rules.

Mr. Diefenbaker: By the Prime Minister himself, who brushed it aside and thereby denied to parliament the right—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have the floor now. I know that having been out west—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A point of order is being raised.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that the right hon. gentleman is entirely misrepresenting what I have said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, no.

Mr. Pearson: I did not ask that the rules be brushed aside. I asked that the rules be observed during today, and suggested we would then go on and see what happened.

Mr. Lambert: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister did his part to stifle questions because he was afraid of some questions which would be asked, and let that be clear. He was out west all last week when he should have been in this house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He was out west speaking to the discoloured canines of western Canada, the unclean canines mentioned on election night. Now, having done that, an objection is immediately raised to this amendment. The government do not want anything in the nature of amendments. General objection is taken to an amendment to a motion to confirm a report given by a committee. This is another means to stifle parliament and to strangle parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Hon. members may laugh. They laughed in 1956 when hon. gentlemen opposite did a similar thing and the people did not forget. They laughed when last week evidence was brought out in this house which the Prime Minister should have been here to answer. They ridiculed us. I have nothing more to say as to the consequences, but I know what they will be.

Hon. members opposite now want to prevent an amendment being moved. Let me place before you, Mr. Speaker, examples of what has happened in this connection in the past. A special committee of parliament was set up in 1926 for the purpose of looking into a certain alleged wrongdoing on the part of a minister of the crown, Hon. George Boivin, and also certain administrative officials. A motion was made to confirm the report of the special committee which was set up. This matter is referred to in the Journals of the House of Commons for 1926. When the matter came before the house the motion moved by Mr. Mercier (St. Henri) was that the third and final report of the special committee appointed to investigate the administration of the department of customs and excise be concurred in. Then Mr. Stevens moved an amendment to the motion in the following terms:

> That the report be not now adopted, but that it be referred back to the special committee with instructions to add thereto as sub-clauses to paragraph six:—

And so as to make the record clear I will read the amendment—

> The evidence further discloses that ministerial action has been influenced by the improper pressure of political associates and friends of the minister, or acting minister administering the department, resulting in the suspension and in some instances the abandonment of prosecutions against those charged with violation of the statutes, and in the loss of revenue to the country. Moreover successful appeals have been made to the minister and acting minister administering the department to improperly interfere with the course of justice between the conviction of the offenders and the execution of judgment thereon.

That was after conviction. There was no question of interference by ministers in 1926 or prior thereto. In those days there were only a couple of executive assistants. I think there were one or two parliamentary assistants at the time; in any event there were in 1919.

> The Prime Minister and the government had knowledge for some considerable time of the rapid degeneration of the department of customs and excise, and their failure to take prompt and effective remedial action is wholly indefensible. The conduct of the present minister of the department, the Honourable George H. Boivin, in the case of Moses Aziz is utterly unjustifiable.
> Your committee deplores the practice, as revealed by the evidence, of certain men influential in public life to direct appeals to the minister to relax and depart from the proper administration of his department for reasons of political expediency.

If there is any likeness between this situation and subsequent events it is merely coincidental that I am raising this particular matter.

> Your committee is of the opinion that this practice is detrimental to the best interests of the country and prejudicial to the administration of the department.

Then there is added the following paragraph, which is also included in the amendment moved today by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith):

And that the committee for such purpose be revived.

Now that amendment, Mr. Speaker, to which I have referred is to all intents and purposes the same as the one now presented and put before Your Honour.

Then Mr. Woodsworth, the leader of the labour party at that time, seconded by Mr. Heaps, moved in amendment to that amendment the following:

That all the words after the word "instructions" in the third line of the amendment be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

"1. To add to clause 4 the following: Since the enquiry indicates that the smuggling evils are so extensive and their ramifications so far reaching that only a portion of the illegal practices have been brought to light, your committee recommends the appointment of a judicial commission with full powers to continue and complete investigating the administration of the department of customs and excise and to prosecute all offenders.

2. That the following be added to clause 6: Your committee deplores the common practice as revealed by the evidence, of members of parliament and others of appealing to the minister to relax the regulations of the department for personal advantage or political expediency.

Then there were added two further paragraphs in the subamendment, and then again the words:

And that the committee for such purposes be revived.

The Journals, at page 465, continues:

Mr. Meighen—

—who was then leader of the opposition—

—raised the point that the amendment to the amendment was out of order on the ground that it was foreign to the subject matter of the main amendment.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, as appears at page 468, the Speaker ruled on the matter. I do not want to read it all but one has to read a portion of it because many of the matters raised could almost be contemporaneous in some respects. The Speaker said:

On Mr. Mercier's motion for concurrence in the final report of the special committee appointed to investigate the customs and excise department, Mr. Stevens moved that said report be referred back—

And so on.

To this amendment a subamendment is moved proposing—

And again I will not reread it.

A point of order was raised by the Right Honourable Mr. Meighen on the ground that an amendment to an amendment must deal with nothing but the subject matter of the amendment. It was also argued that the adoption of the subamendment would prevent the house from pronouncing on the proposal contained in the amendment.

And finally the Speaker decided:

As long as Mr. Stevens has asserted his right to express his views by making his amendment he suffers no prejudice, if Mr. Woodsworth using the same right submits a subamendment asking the house to accept an alternative proposition.

Then again, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to refer to the matters raised at pages 472 and 473, the votes on which are to be found at pages 475 and 476. Then there was an appeal from the Speaker's ruling as reported at page 477, continuing through to page 481.

Sir, I now address myself to the argument advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), or at least his reference to this subject, arising out of something which was said before I came into the house by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith), if I understood him correctly, to the effect that because item No. 44(A) is still on the order paper an opportunity may yet be available to Her Majesty's loyal opposition to deal with the question of a plebiscite. I should like to read that particular motion, which is as follows:

That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag; and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and on the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Churchill.

The suggestion is made that this will stay on the order paper and we may come back to it, but let me make this very clear. During our meetings of the leaders of the parties I asked the Prime Minister whether or not this particular motion would be gone ahead with, and I said that we were prepared without discussion at all to have a vote on this subamendment which set out in detail the nature of the formula for a plebiscite, and on my amendment which simply asked for the plebiscite. I said if the Prime Minister would agree to that we would be prepared to let him withdraw items Nos. 44(A) and 44(B).

We believed that the people had a right to a determination, through the operation of parliament, as to the trust to be placed in those gentlemen on the opposite side in this connection. The Prime Minister's answer was that he would not agree to the proposal unless we were willing to consent to a limitation on the time of debate.

That being so I simply ask this question, Mr. Speaker, that you consider the fact that this motion No. 44(A) will not be brought back in view of the fact the Prime Minister made it very clear that he was not agreeable to our suggestion.

I could immediately see the difficulty that the government was in, having stood for the three maple leaves through thick and thin and finally backing out, because we would not have the opportunity of letting the Canadian people know how parliament would vote on a plebiscite. I may say that according to a major poll taken in this country, 60 per cent of the people in Canada are in favour of that procedure. Are we to be denied the right to move an amendment asking for a plebiscite because the government refuses to go ahead with the motion they originally moved? Surely this house is not going to be throttled in that way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They may laugh over there, but they are denying us the right to give the Canadian people an opportunity of knowing how they would vote on the question of a plebiscite. They interrupt, they scoff and they ridicule parliament; but you, sir, are the protector of the rights of parliament.

An hon. Member: You never gave us the chance to make any decision.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who is that that speaketh without knowledge?

Mr. Speaker, you are the protector of the rights of parliament and I ask you to recognize that fact and not deny the opposition the right to move an amendment because there is on the order paper a motion that will never be touched upon by the government. The government would deprive parliament of the right to speak and the right of those who do not agree with the majority to have their cases decided in parliament by a vote of parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you to read and consider carefully what happened in 1926 in the month of June as recorded in Hansard. If you do I have no doubt as to the decision you will make. In other words, I ask you to decide that the amendment is in order, and suggest that to decide otherwise would be placing handcuffs on the members of parliament, preventing them from carrying out their responsibilities. This would also place muzzles on members of parliament.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Those on the other side would like to see that done.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Byrne: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, just look at the hon. member for West Kootenay; he has brains to burn, yet he is the one who is laughing over there.

An hon. Member: East Kootenay.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sorry, I meant the hon. member for Kootenay East.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I wish the Leader of the Opposition would not confuse me with the hon. member for Kootenay East.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I say to the hon. gentleman, for whom I have tremendous respect, that there is no possibility of anyone coming to the conclusion that he and the other member would ever have similar views on anything dependant upon common sense.

I am asking you, sir, on the basis of the record of 1926, and the similarity is very apparent, to maintain the right of the opposition to move this amendment. Otherwise motions Nos. 44 (A) and 44 (B) on the order paper being long since both deceased, we should be deprived of our rights, because the government chose to swallow itself and change its viewpoint after having introduced those two resolutions.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the ground covered by the right hon. gentleman in respect of this request for a procedural ruling, I feel I should say a few words.

What we have done is ask you whether the amendment moved to this matter is or is not in order. I suggest it is important that we have a ruling on this matter because it is an important procedural matter, and I believe unprecendented. Having taken that stand we will cheerfully abide by your ruling, whatever it may be.

We have heard during the last 20 or 25 minutes the right hon. gentleman suggest that we are handcuffing the house and muzzling hon. members by not allowing the house to vote on an amendment dealing with a plebiscite. He has suggested that we are throttling the house. We had a resolution before the house, to which an amendment was moved dealing with a plebiscite, and about which we had 165 speeches made, most of them by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side. We are now asked to consider that these are the same people who are throttled and muzzled. Those speeches were made by members on the opposite side to prevent a vote. We witnessed

23 days of talking about the plebiscite, yet in respect of that procedure advanced by the government—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why didn't you go ahead with the resolution?

Mr. Pearson: —and after 23 days the right hon. gentleman insisted, and I do not quarrel with his insistence, that the matter go to a committee for six weeks. This was a six weeks committee, Mr. Speaker. The six weeks are over and the committee has reported. We ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether or not an amendment sending this matter back to this six weeks committee is in order. That is the question, Mr. Speaker, and we would be very grateful to have your ruling on it. If your ruling is in favour of the amendment, then we will go on with the debate on the committee report and perhaps my right hon. friend will at last feel unmuzzled.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I find it very interesting that the Prime Minister did not take any stand on behalf of the rights of parliament in his intervention just now.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the question before you is whether or not the amendment is in order.

An hon. Member: The same old bunch.

Mr. Churchill: I think it has already been clearly established that it is in order, that a special committee may be revived, as the amendment suggests in the closing words, and that to that special committee as to any other committee of the house instructions may be given letting the committee know what the house wishes. It is a long established practice.

The Leader of the Opposition has cited to you, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the most famous case in Canadian history involving the report of a special committee which was debated in the house and to which an amendment was moved for reference back to that committee. I do not see how anyone can go beyond that case in any decision whether or not, first, a special committee may be revived and, second, whether or not instructions may be given to that committee to do something other than it has done.

As you are well aware, sir, there are appropriate references in the books of rules, Beauchesne, Bourinot and May, and if you wish me to do so I can give you the necessary page references. The three books I have mentioned all deal with the case of a special committee, or a select committee as it is called in England, and the power of the House of Commons to refer committee reports back to committees with instructions to sit again, and reach some other conclusion, either to add to their report or to strike out something from their report and substitute something else. That is what we are suggesting in the amendment now before you.

The problem raised by the government side with regard to the committee being limited as to its time of consideration does not seem to me to be relevant at all under the circumstances. The house as a whole overrides the work of any committee, and what the house has the opportunity of determining according to our amendment is whether the committee might not take other action than the action it has recommended. So it seems to me that the period of sitting of the committee is absolutely irrelevant to the question under consideration.

The other points raised have already been dealt with. The government house leader raised a point about the final report of the committee but it has been indicated already that we are now dealing with the sixth report and not the final report. Finally, I do not see how we can go beyond the decision reached in 1926 in one of the most famous cases in our history dealing with a special committee and instructions given by the house to that committee to take other action.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, there is one point that I believe has not been mentioned which might be mentioned very briefly and which differentiates this situation from what happened in 1926. As Your Honour knows and as was mentioned by the chairman of the committee, I believe, when he moved concurrence in the report, the first vote taken by the committee was on the question of a national plebiscite. The committee has discussed the matter of a national plebiscite and has decided it by voting it down nine to five. This amendment now seeks to have this six weeks committee revived to reconsider the matter of a national plebiscite on which the committee has already taken a decision and voted it down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Three or four members from the official opposition have spoken and I think it is my duty now to call upon the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I am not an expert in parliamentary procedure, but it seems to me that after using all the means at its disposal by the rules, the official opposition is now trying to use one that is forbidden.

When there is talk of reviving a committee to send back a report to it, that is insinuating that the committee still exists and that it can be asked to resume its work. The special flag committee, however, even when it was set up, was meant to disappear six weeks later, so that even parliament is powerless to bring it back to life.

Of course, if the committee report is adopted and then a motion setting up a new flag committee is also adopted, that could be done, but it is impossible to ask that committee to reconsider its report because it has ceased to exist. At the end of the session, every special or standing committee of the house immediately ceases to exist. Furthermore, even at the following session, parliament cannot revive them. The only possible way to extend the existence of a committee would be to make a motion, before it ceases its activities, asking for its continuation but not for its revival after it has ceased to exist.

In my opinion, the house cannot now revive that committee. After the report has been considered and voted upon, I think the house could then, if it so desired, make a motion to set up another committee, for it can do anything it wishes. But the very motion setting up this committee provides for a definite period. Therefore, the matter cannot be reconsidered.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, may I refer to one point raised by the Prime Minister. He said that the committee had dealt with the question of a plebiscite but I should like to refer to Bourinot, fourth edition, page 479, where there is the following:

> A report may be referred back to a committee for further consideration, or with instructions giving them power to amend the same in any respect. In this way a committee may regularly reconsider and even reverse a decision it has previously arrived at.

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I was about to make the same point just made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. However, I think I should point out to the Prime Minister, who in his last intervention apparently thought he had a telling argument, that if he had looked at the report of the committee he would have found that at one point the committee decided unanimously there should only be one flag and then later returned to the matter, opened it up again and reversed that decision. Therefore it is certainly obvious that the committee is not going to be embarrassed at all by having something referred back by the house. I suggest that the house has the right to refer something back to the committee to be reopened while the committee itself does not have that same right.

I did want to mention the time limit. The remarks of the Prime Minister would seem to indicate that a committee of the house was established to sit for a six weeks period. I thought that the committee had been set up to consider the flag resolutions and to bring in a recommendation to the house and that the question of time was incidental, although there was supposed to be some urgency. I think the main point perhaps was to satisfy the Prime Minister's vanity by having a flag before Christmas. But certainly the question as to time limit was regulatory only, and not of the essence. I think the Prime Minister would want to correct the impression he gave the house just now that in setting up the committee its main function was to sit for six weeks.

With reference to the point raised by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) about reversing a decision of the house already made, when we talk about the time limit I suggest that that time limit served its purpose, that the committee obeyed the time limit set out originally and that, as the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith) says, the committee is subject to the will of the house. So it is open to the house to give the committee additional instructions and the question of additional time must be inherent in them.

This is not a case of reversing a time limit already given. That time limit has already had its effect and therefore I suggest that the amendment is in order.

Mr. Speaker: I am very appreciative of the information and procedural advice given this afternoon. Obviously the question is a very difficult one to decide, and obviously I need time to consider very carefully all the arguments advanced and to refresh my mind vis-à-vis them and other precedents which have not been cited this afternoon. Needless to say, I have been doing a little homework on the point, but I would request hon. members to let me consider very carefully the arguments presented this afternoon. I suggest that in the meantime the debate could be carried on without prejudice to the rights of hon. members. I shall do my very best to come to a carefully considered and, I hope, proper decision in as short a time as possible, —I would hope by eight o'clock, if that is humanly possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would it not be better to have over night on this? Your Honour may have done a great deal of work on the subject but I do not think anyone would be harmed if you waited until tomorrow.

Mr. Pearson: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, all hon. members will hope you take all the time you need. If you feel you are in a position to make a decision at eight o'clock, perhaps that would be a good time to do it; but if you need more time I do not think any purpose would be lost because in one sentence the report does mention a plebiscite, and the debate can take place irrespective of your particular decision on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to thank hon. members and assure them I will take as much time as is necessary to arrive at a proper decision.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to second the recommendation of the committee and the motion for concurrence in the committee's report. In his opening remarks the chairman of the committee mentioned that throughout its proceedings he had tried to preserve the impartiality he has exhibited in the house. I know I can speak for all members of the committee when I say that he preserved this tradition of impartiality from the beginning to the end, and all of us were most impressed with the way he conducted the proceedings in the committee.

I would like to say just one word about the suggestion of the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith). I came to know the hon. member very well during the course of our hearings, and I cannot say how disappointed I am in the tenor of his remarks. All of us on the committee held very strong views, and I thought that at the end of our deliberations we had agreed to disagree, if this had to be the case, but that in so doing we would not impute any sinister motives to any other member of the committee. I felt that in his remarks he was imputing motives, and I felt very sad to hear the tenor of the speech which he gave us this afternoon.

After the long and detailed debate that took place previously there really is not too much new that can be said in connection with the flag question, but I think there are one or two points which ought to be made on behalf of the committee's report.

First of all I think the design itself is one which conforms in every way to the proper traditions of heraldry and flag making. Red and white are the national colours of Canada. Many of us felt that the blue being mixed into the previous designs, or into some of them, was improper; but in this case—

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Scott: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: What is your authority for saying red and white are the national colours for Canada?

Mr. Scott: My authority is the evidence given to the committee by various expert witnesses who testified and informed us that the national colours of Canada are red and white and were assigned to us in 1921.

Mr. Churchill: Can you give me the exact words in the proclamation of 1921 that declare red and white to be the national colours? I suggest you cannot.

Mr. Scott: I am sorry I do not have the actual information here but all of us on the committee did follow the evidence of our expert witnesses most carefully and, subject to being corrected, I at least am satisfied, and I think so are most of the members, that these are the national colours of our country and as such they, and they alone, ought to appear on our national flag.

I really did not feel the inclusion of the maple leaf design was very difficult to arrive at, and in this connection I point out the committee had before it literally thousands of designs from Canadians from coast to coast. I believe I can safely say that a ratio of five to one contained the maple leaf and that, therefore, in the minds of a good many Canadians there is absolutely no question of what constitutes the symbol of Canada, that the symbol is the maple leaf, and as such it is included in the recommended design.

I am aware that some members of the committee felt very strongly that a flag ought to contain the union jack and the fleur-de-lis. That is a view we listened to with the greatest of respect and we explored every possible argument pro and con. I respect that view, but in the end most of us came to the conclusion that by putting emblems such as that on our national flag we would be merely giving ourselves a perpetual reminder of the things that divide us, and that it would be preferable to have a distinctive flag that says just one thing, Canada—not French Canada, not English Canada, not ethnic Canada, but Canada.

As I have said, I respect the views of those others; I only regret that I do not share them.

The main thing about the whole question is that it must be decided. Ever since the debate took place in the house I am sure many hon. members have visited their constituencies and have had an opportunity to get around to various parts of the country. Without exception I think almost everyone with whom I have spoken, no matter what their view, whether they wished the red ensign or a new flag, with unanimous voice said that they hoped at least parliament would make a decision.

The one thing which it seems to me is significant about the committee report, and which lends great weight to its recommendation, is that if anything can be said it is that this is a parliamentary flag. This is not the flag of any particular party. It is not the flag of any particular individual. It is the best consensus that we were able to get from the members of all the parties represented on the committee. I know it was not unanimous, and all of us regret that. But as I said in the beginning, we respected each other's views and we agreed that if necessary we would disagree in good faith. I think it is fair to say, however, that this design does command support among all parties in the house. I realize a good many members of the official opposition are perhaps not prepared to support it. But there is support for this design within their party, as there is in all quarters of the house. If anything, this flag is the flag chosen by the parliament of Canada and by nobody else.

I could go on at great length but I do not think it is important that I do so. Many of us feel the whole matter of the flag has detracted from this present parliament. If we had been able to spend as much time and energy discussing other matters such as automation, education and important problems of this nature, the present parliament might have been more distinguished in its accomplishments. At the same time we realize that these events are not within our control. The Prime Minister chose to have a decision reached on the subject at this time. Nobody is quarrelling with his prerogative. Many of us thought it was not an opportune time to raise this question, but at least the Prime Minister had the courage to deal with a subject which has been a most contentious one in Canada for very many years.

I conclude by repeating that this recommendation is the result of a serious study by all the members of the committee. We tried to hear and take account of the views expressed by everybody. It is unfortunate that we could not achieve unanimity but I think the design recommended is a proper one and a fair one, and I hope that in time it will win the allegiance of the Canadian people.

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, in joining this debate today I wish to express my appreciation for the confidence my colleagues placed with me when they chose me to represent them on this committee.

I was all the more happy because I realized the importance of the work this committee would be called upon to perform, taking into consideration all the difficulties it would have to face.

If we recall the numerous discussions which occurred and the various opinions which were expressed during this debate which preceded the creation of that committee, we know that it was not without apprehension that the 15 members gathered to study this matter and endeavoured to reach a solution in order to present unanimously, if at all possible, a design to the house.

Mr. Speaker, the members of the committee dedicated themselves to this task for more than six weeks and some 45 meetings averaging two hours each.

For my part I think I went through a wonderful human experience, because it is certainly a great experience, a difficult but most rewarding one, for 15 men to be confined to a room, sitting in camera for such a long time to discuss but one subject.

What made for an interesting discussion was the fact that each member of the committee expressed his views in all candour. And here I should like to express my appreciation to each and every one of them for the manner in which they acted. I feel it is most unfortunate that we could not reach the complete agreement which would have resulted in a unanimous report, but I do not believe that any member acted in bad faith in not making this possible.

They all expressed their views verbally or by their vote. They were free to do so, since it was their duty, and I respect everyone's opinion.

Mr. Speaker, we are called upon today to approve a report submitted by the committee.

I should like, however, to remind the house that when this debate opened last June the members of our party stated their position quite clearly, namely that every one of us was free to decide, according to his conscience, the position he intended to take in this connection.

Today, this report must be concurred in. I must say that this position still holds and that all our members are still free to approve or reject the committee's report.

However, may I assure the house that the committee's report will have a more than substantial support from the members of our party; I believe that the work of the committee deserves our appreciation inasmuch as the report which has been tabled is well thought out, is the result of work which, in my opinion, could not have been accomplished better.

Since the beginning of the debate today, we have heard various points of view expressed and I should like to comment on them a little.

I do not think that at this point we stand to gain anything whatsoever by referring this matter again to the committee. After six weeks of work the committee has made its decision known and I cannot imagine that by taking up the matter again it can in any way arrive at another decision.

The decision arrived at is the best we can reach under the circumstances. Personally, I cannot accept to return to this committee to reconsider something which I have already studied thoroughly and on which I have already committed myself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Text]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Now, if I may, I should like to say a few words to my friends in the Conservative party. I should like, also, to make a sincere appeal to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). Although I have been in this house for only two and a half years I can remember many occasions on which the right hon. gentleman correctly and strongly stated that, provided sufficient time is allocated for members to express their views on a subject, good democratic government must be assured by permitting the voice of the majority in the house to decide. This is my interpretation of words used by the right hon. gentleman on many occasions.

In my own opinion—and I think this is also the opinion of the majority of Canadians—this house has been afforded plenty of opportunity in the past to discuss this issue and it is time for us to decide by voting on this question. I recognize that all hon. members have the right to express their views one way or another, but I do not think Canadians will condemn them in any way if they put an end to this debate and vote according to their consciences. If members find themselves opposed to the design put forward I think it is their duty to vote against it. But I do not think they have the right to prevent the majority of the members of this house from deciding. It is time we brought this debate to an end and allowed the majority of members to declare their position on the question by their votes. The people of this country have entrusted us with responsibility and we should discharge our responsibility by voting upon this subject. If we are wrong, I am quite sure that Canadians will judge us in the next election. Those who have not expressed the wish of their constituents will be defeated and others will take their places.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I think it is high time for us Canadians to adopt a distinctive flag. If you consider the international situation today, which is getting more and more troubled, it becomes increasingly necessary for Canada to fully establish its identity and to let people see clearly that it is independent from any other nation. I think that by deciding today to give ourselves a distinctive Canadian flag, which will have nothing in common with the emblems of our mother country or the other countries which dominated us in the past, we are taking a step which the whole population has long awaited.

I am sure that in a few years those who will come after us will be grateful to us for making that decision which is a very difficult one, I will admit, and which might bring criticism to several of us, but we are here to face such criticism and to assume our responsibilities.

If we are in this house it is because we have been sent here to make decisions. Today, we have the opportunity to make a decision which, above any other, is of great significance. In my opinion, this decision should be made by a vote according to our conscience so that in Canada, at the beginning of 1965, we could fly a flag which would be a Canadian flag, in short, the flag of the whole Canadian people.

There have been criticisms on the choice of the design. If someone in Canada could suggest to us a symbol more representative of Canada than the maple leaf, I would ask him to rise and suggest it. Up to now we have been unable to find one more representative of Canada. The maple leaf is typical of Canada. Even if that maple leaf cannot be found in every little part of Canada, it must be agreed that, at the present time, this symbol is still the most popular in Canada and does not appear on the flag of any other country.

In my opinion we must all unite in a gesture of Canadian solidarity in an effort to build a strong and united country. Let us prove to all our Canadian citizens that when important matters are at stake we must set aside some particular and partisan interests for the general interest of the country. I believe that today we have the opportunity of doing so.

Finally, I ask all members of the house to set aside their petty grievances, their petty private interests in order to grant our country a truly distinctive flag. I only wish that this flag should receive the unanimous approval of the members of the house.

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate. This is not the first time I have spoken on the matter of a Canadian flag. On May 28, 1963, I took the opportunity to speak on the Canadian flag, the red ensign. I spoke at that time with some emotion because I listed all the matters that I thought should be considered when dealing with the Canadian flag. I said the red ensign was the first free flag I had lived under, and I hoped my family would continue to enjoy living under this free flag. The second time I spoke on the question of a Canadian flag was during this debate.

Mr. Speaker, it was an honour for me to be a member of the flag committee. Reference was made to the fact that the chairman of our committee handled the committee's business very effectively, and I give him full credit for that. But at the same time I must say it was a strange committee. It was a committee in camera, but if any one of our members missed something the day before, he could read it next morning in the newspaper. I went into this committee as a red ensign man. I still respect the red ensign as a Canadian flag. However, at the same time I went into the committee with the understanding and conviction that if the committee could decide on a flag that was acceptable to all people in Canada, I was ready for a compromise. But I was not ready for a compromise between the three maple leaf flag and the one maple leaf flag; I was ready for a compromise which would incorporate the past history of Canada, as set out in the flag I now hold in my hand, incorporating the union jack and the fleur-de-lis.

When I look at the United States flag I see that it is a flag which does justice to their past history; the 13 stripes on that flag represent the 13 colonies that were instrumental in bringing about the United States. I thought a compromise flag should do justice to our past, too. What is wrong with having a flag with the union jack in it? What is wrong with having a fleur-de-lis also in that flag? Some members of the committee and others said this had no connection with France; but the fleur-de-lis is the Quebec flag.

An hon. Member: So what?

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Speaker, somebody said, "So what?" What right have we to pass up our history? Not very long ago three students from the University of Ottawa came here to discuss this matter with me; they wanted to know if I, as a member of the flag committee, could give them some information on it. When I showed them this compromise flag they said, "Why do not the people of Canada better understand what a compromise flag means?" It is exactly the same as the one maple leaf flag approved by the committee, except that it incorporates these two symbols, the union jack and the fleur-de-lis. I am sure if the people of the country were given the chance to vote on these flags by way of a plebiscite—that is, the flag approved by the committee, the red ensign and the compromise flag—we could then say proudly that the people had made their choice.

What right, Mr. Speaker, has this government to make the decision? It is not a government elected with an over-all majority. They have no mandate to bring in such legislation. This government was appointed by the governor general and that is the reason they are in power. Therefore, for that reason more than anything else I think the people of Canada should be given the right and the privilege to decide the flag issue. Only 71 or 72 per cent of the committee voted in favour of the recommended flag, about 28 per cent of the committee members opposing it. Most of them opposed it because it was not a compromise flag.

I should also like to point out that the motion for a plebiscite was voted down nine to five. The second motion, which was for the adoption of only ONE national flag, was carried 14 to 0. However, after two or three weeks of debate we discovered there was going to be a second flag. I brought this matter to the attention of the chairman of the committee and to the attention of every other member of the committee, because all of our discussions from the first day onward were based on the understanding that there would be only one national flag. Then to our surprise in the last week again the question came up: What about a second flag? As a minority group in the committee we had no choice. We abstained from voting because all during the committee proceedings we had understood we were only dealing with one national flag.

The second point I should like to raise at this time concerns some of our discussions. We had heraldry experts in attendance who gave us some very valuable information. We thought the maple leaf design was good because it had the maple leaf as our national emblem; therefore the maple leaf on a white square was adopted because it was a Canadian symbol. Since the union jack and the fleur-de-lis were not in the corner of this flag it meant they were nothing more than emblems.

After my second speech in the flag debate I received thousands of letters from my constituents—and I mean thousands—all of them asking me to support the red ensign. After the first vote was taken in the special committee and the Canadian red ensign was voted down ten to four, it was apparent to many people in Canada that there should be a compromise flag. It was also apparent that the people would be willing to accept it. Therefore, why do the people not get the chance to vote on the proposed flag by way of a plebiscite? In such event justice would be done to everybody. Instead of splitting the people and disuniting them on the flag question the correct thing to do is to hold a plebiscite and the people will be pleased to accept the result. This plebiscite could be held at the time of the next election; it does not require special action.

Again I return to the proceedings of the committee. Thousands of flags were presented for the consideration of the committee. Finally we arrived at the point where we had the original three maple leaf flag with the blue bars at the end, then the flag with a maple leaf on a white square with two red bars at the end, and then the same flag with the other two symbols to which I have referred. They were the last three flags on which the committee voted. By way of the elimination process, which I thought was a very good way, we arrived at a final design. To start with we eliminated by a show of hands various choices until there were four or five flags left in each group. One group represented flags with three maple leaves, some with blue bars and some with no bars. The second group consisted of one maple leaf designs. The third group comprised flags of compromise design. One was a red ensign with the fleur-de-lis superimposed on it. Another had a maple leaf in the centre, another had it on the side, and there was also the fleur-de-lis with the red ensign superimposed on it.

This matter, Mr. Speaker, is of great importance to the people of Canada today. We have been debating the flag issue for some time and the people want an answer. They know parliament is not able to come to a decision which would be adopted by the people of Canada, so for that reason I urge the house to give serious consideration to holding a plebiscite. Thousands of our people have fought in two wars. Many of the people who came to this country looked upon the Canadian flag as the flag under which freedom is the order of the day, under which there is no persecution and there is freedom of speech, freedom to speak one's own language, although the law decrees there are only two official languages, English and French. If you were to ask many of these people of ethnic origin what the Canadian flag means to them, they would point out that one reason so many of them came to Canada and are still coming to Canada is because the Canadian flag stands for democratic freedom. Indeed if we dispose of or do away with the Canadian flag, generations will pass before people will accept another flag as the flag of Canada. Although the committee did not come to a unanimous decision, I had the impression that the members of the committee commenced their meetings with the idea of deciding on a Canadian flag. As the days passed we in this group found ourselves isolated, not because we were the members who stood for the red ensign, but because we were the members who wanted a compromise embodying the symbols of the founding races. I still feel the committee might have decided to recommend the adoption of a compromise flag. Had we done so, I am sure we might have avoided dividing the nation, as it is now divided as the result of doing away with the red ensign, while at the same time using some of the familiar symbols on a flag as recommended to the committee.

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, as the moment for a final decision on a national flag for Canada draws near we are sensible of the trust imposed on every member of parliament to act wisely for all Canadians alive and unborn. If ever there was a time when we should discipline our tongues and elevate ourselves to the dignity of sane and disinterested patriots, this is it. Each of us in this chamber I know loves Canada with a poignancy that is too real to express—our "quiet lakes reflecting the glory of the sky and the shadows of the upland forest; the wide firmament flooded with crimson sunset; the long haggard hills formless and low; the desolate mountains"—places like Heart's Delight, Val d'Or, Red Deer, Nakusp. What flag is worthy of such a land?

Speaking for myself I have come out of the flag committee, after its six weeks sitting with nothing but respect and, I must say, affection and regard for every other member of that committee. I stand earnestly in support of the recommendation of this committee that the national flag of Canada be a red flag of the proportions two by length and one by width, containing in its centre a white square, the width of the flag, bearing a single red maple or, in heraldic terms, described as gules on a Canadian pale argent a maple leaf of the first.

I would remind members of this house that this is the third time a flag committee has been designated in the Commons of Canada. If members care to refer to Hansard of June 17, 1925, page 4364, they will find that a question was raised by Mr. T. Church in which he asked Right Hon. Mackenzie King who was asking for such a Canadian flag and for such a change, and why. The prime minister reported that he had set up an advisory committee consisting of G. J. Desbarats, Esq., C.M.G., deputy minister of national defence; Thomas Mulvey, Esq., B.A., K.C., under secretary of state; A. G. Doughty, Esq., C.M.G., LL.D., dominion archivist, Commodore Walter Hose, C.B.E., A.D.C., director of the naval service; Major General H.A. Panet, C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O., adjutant general, and Group Captain J. S. Scott, M.C., A.F.C., A.D.C., acting director of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

It is I think to be deplored that as a result of very strong objection taken in respect of the composition of that committee, notwithstanding the fact that two of them were on the original arms committee appointed by Sir Robert Borden, it was dissolved without action taken.

You will then recall, Mr. Speaker, that on November 6, 1945, as reported in Hansard, the prime minister appointed a committee to consider and report upon a suitable design. So in fact when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) on September 10, 1964 reported to the house the establishment of a special committee on the subject of a Canadian flag, this was the third time this sovereign nation had made an attempt to establish a banner denoting its sovereignty.

This is a subject not of recent date or of recent concern to Canadians, but is something that goes back a long while. I have before me an article written by John S. Ewart, K.C., in 1907 which appeared in a Canadian magazine. I should like to read two brief extracts from this article. Mr. Ewart said:

> A flag should denote correctly the sovereignty which it represents.

The second extract is:

> Canada's self-respect requires that her acknowledged right of independent self-government, her accession to national rank, and her admission to a footing of equality with the United Kingdom itself, should not only be amply recognized at imperial conferences, but should be evidenced by her flag—by the flag of the Dominion of Canada.

Weeks ago, sir, it was drawn to my attention as a result of our trip to the archives, that the "Royal Reader" of Nova Scotia, a pleasant book for junior scholars, published by the T. Eaton Company Limited of Toronto, and Winnipeg, for 11 cents, portrayed a flag flying over a maple tree with these words: "The union jack our emblem dear guards our maple tree." What we seek now is a change in emphasis. The revered old union jack remains undifferenced and unaltered and will remain as a precious kindly memory of our inheritance, while this sovereign nation now flies its own device and colours in the position of precedence and honour. In October, 1923, in Montreal, David Lloyd George spoke of Canada's contribution in the first world war in these terms: "The maple leaf was embroidered forever on the silken folds of the banner of human history." It is about time, sir, that we recognized this fact at home.

One of the books we discovered at the archives was a little book entitled "The Story of the Union Jack", written by Barlow Cumberland, and in it is "A plea for the maple leaf". Incidentally this article was written in 1897 and Mr. Cumberland stated:

Flags are signals to be used for conveying information to persons at a distance; their details should therefore, be simple in form and be displayed in simple colours.

The maple tree is found in luxuriance in every province of the dominion.

He then stated as we have already heard during our earlier flag debate, that this maple leaf was an emblem of the festival of St. Jean Baptiste, in French Canada, in 1836. He pointed out that the maple leaf was on the colours of the Royal Canadians, the 100th regiment, raised in Canada in 1865, and that it is still worn as the regimental badge of their successors, the Royal Leinster regiment. It is on the northwest medal of 1885, and on the uniform and accoutrement of the Canadian infantry and of the Northwest Mounted Police.

Mr. Cumberland also points out that it has revelled in poetry and prose; is the theme of the songs of our children, and that the stirring strains of "The Maple Leaf" form an accompaniment to our British national anthem.

Everywhere throughout the world the maple leaf has won recognition as the emblem of Canadians, and may well be displayed upon their flag. So, at any rate says Mr. Cumberland. This story was written many years before Canada achieved the dignity of arms.

The committee has recommended to parliament a flag of classic simplicity, consisting only of national colours. I must say that I agree with every word I heard the hon. member for Danforth utter in respect to the heraldic proprieties. This recommended flag consists only of Canada's national colours as provided in the proclamation to which my friend referred, of November 21, 1921. Displayed in the crest is a lion holding in its right paw a red maple leaf.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, during his quite scholarly address of some weeks ago referred to some of Canada's heraldic traditions and devices. Actually since 1868 the maple leaf, in one form or another, has by overwhelming consensus been accepted as emblematic of Canada. The flag colours, that is, the combination of white and red, may be found in the Fenian service ribbon, which was for the period 1866-70 which also covered the Riel rebellion, the Royal Military college flag, the Canada medal ribbon and finally in the Canadian decoration.

This flag sends one message—"Canada". It is in good heraldic taste. The committee's unanimous choice is immediately distinguishable from every other flag in the world and it is conspicuously Canadian in character. From the first day this flag flies it will be recognized I know, as being the flag of this country. It will look striking whenever occasion calls for it to be flown or draped alongside the union jack.

It might interest hon. members to know that the Royal Military college was founded in the year 1876 and since its founding the colours of the college have always been red and white as evidenced by their uniforms. This was, of course, the college of the nation. The original uniform was a red tunic, white trousers and white belt. That hat was a black shako, with white plume and red tip. The sash, which was worn in the wintertime, was red and white striped. In the late thirties, the library was destroyed by fire, but from ex-cadets we know that the R.M.C. flag of red, white and red was flown certainly in 1916 and again in 1918, and many of us on the defence committee have seen it since then. I remember studying it for some time during the past summer.

Now, sir, we find opposition to this maple leaf emblem. I refer to the Montreal Star of Tuesday, September 15, 1964. You will note that the committee was appointed on September 10, 1964. The heading of the article is: "Maple Leaf Out—Diefenbaker; Says Emblem Has No Place On New Flag". The article reads in part as follows:

Mr. Diefenbaker, "taken aback" by this statement—

The reference is to a statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson).

—took to the air waves last night to suggest that the maple leaf had no place in any Canadian flag...

"Now I have no objection to a maple leaf," Mr. Diefenbaker said. "I don't criticize it as a symbol of the country—but can you tell me any country in the world that ever put a symbol on its flag?"

I have been challenged in the house not only today but on previous occasions with regard to a change in my position. I will not deny, sir, that for quite a time I had hoped that Canada's flag would carry the royal badge of three red maple leaves on a white field. There has been a good deal of research into this matter, and it was indicated that Her Majesty, on August 15, 1962, entirely on her own initiative had caused to be created by the College of Arms a banner as Queen of Canada. This was our Queen's personal tribute to this honoured realm, her gift to Canada, the first of the nations of the commonwealth beyond the seas.

This flag when designed was sent by Sir Anthony Wagner, Garter King of Arms, to Canada for approval in 1962 and it was approved by the then prime minister himself, now Leader of the Opposition. Recently we have had occasion to examine this banner carried by our Queen on her B.O.A.C. and Air Canada aircraft, on H.M.S. Britannia, over her several dwelling places in Charlottetown, Quebec and Ottawa, and at every saluting stand where she has presided. I believed that after the royal visit to Canada the significance of the three red leaves on white would be understood by all. Yet on Wednesday, October 28, the evening before the flag committee tabled its report, the Leader of the Opposition referred contemptuously on national television to the "troika flag" introduced in the government resolution.

I had felt, and was confirmed in this belief by some of the best heraldic authorities we were able to consult, that we should follow the example set by Her Majesty in 1962 when she created her Royal flag from the ensigns armorial. Certainly since October 8, 1957, when Hon. Ellen Fairclough issued a news release with respect to the arms of Canada, there was no questioning the fact that our colours were white and red and that our national emblem was three red maple leaves on a white field.

I would also point out to hon. members that on November 21, 1962, the government then headed by the present Leader of the Opposition caused a communication to be sent to the College of Arms through government house advising as follows:

> Needless to say the emblems of particular interest to the government of Canada are those granted in the royal proclamation of November 21, 1921, including "three maple leaves conjoined on one stem proper".

Sir, I thought they meant that. I thought the Conservative party was quite serious in believing that this was the national emblem because on the day that their government was defeated, February 5, 1963, they submitted in written form an answer to my question No. 1,449. The first part of the question was:

> Does Canada have national colours and, if so, what are these colours?

The answer was:

> Yes, white and red.

The second part of the question was:

> Does Canada have a national emblem and, if so, what is the emblem?

This was the answer:

> Yes, three maple leaves conjoined on one stem.

I thought it was fair and reasonable to suppose this was not the "Pearson pennant" or "troika pennant" but was the royal badge. I am simply putting this on the record because I do not want any vilification of this national emblem to detract in any way from the very fine work that has been done by our armed services for something like 40 years in bringing their badges and many of their devices into harmony with our ensigns armorial. But I must agree with the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) that while we must regard a flag as being in the area of heraldry, there is a licence and a freedom to deal with such devices and generally speaking a lot more freedom than there would be in the case of a shield or crest. The flag that has been recommended to the house is a strong and very impressive flag. We have been satisfied that it will meet the heraldic requirements of the most exacting experts in the world.

I know it is regarded that those of us on the government side have changed our position in voting for this proposed flag. By what he said the Leader of the Opposition would have preferred to see us locked tightly to a particular design. Thus he would have been able to gain disagreement in the committee which might have frustrated the choosing of a national flag for decades to come. Quite frankly, sir, in spite of strong feelings on this matter we felt this was a matter of great national importance. I went to the committee with a strong personal preference, as I have said, that the device accepted by the Queen should be recognized as the official emblem of the nation, but with the resolve that my personal preference would not impede the creative work of our committee. I prayed that I might forget my own heraldic notions and views and think only of Canada and her welfare.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, reference was made before the dinner hour by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) to certain items that appeared in the press, and I think I would be doing him a discourtesy if I did not refer to them. He mentioned the fact that a picture appeared in the publication La Voix de l'Est. I never saw this paper but I can assure the hon. gentleman that the picture to which he referred was taken some several days before the creation of the flag committee.

He also referred to press comment in the Recorder and Times but I can assure him I never made a speech on this subject. I did have private conversations with a good friend of mine who is the editor of that paper, and who questioned me with respect to the final report of the flag committee which he had read as it appeared in Hansard. I must confess I did not appreciate that this would be the subject of a press report. This was, of course, my indiscretion. Perhaps in my remarks I was a little undiplomatic but at least I am sure that what I did say I said honestly.

With respect to the visit of the grade ten children from the Peterborough school, it is true that at the request of certain members of the house, and I include among those the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Honey), the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Stenson), and the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. Webb), all of whom were present, a number of children were in our flag committee room; but this was by no means the first such visit. I think the hon. member for Perth will remember that several groups were admitted, and that they moved around and examined suggested designs shown on the walls. On that occasion I did give each of the children a copy of a rather outdated address I made in the house on June 17, 1964, which may perhaps explain some of the press comments in that regard. However, I do not think I disclosed anything which was secret in character, but if I did I pray the hon. member's forgiveness.

I assure him that to the best of my recollection I did not have any conversations with members of the press, in relation to the flag, during the period we sat as a flag committee, nor indeed with my leader, directly or indirectly. I can assure him of that fact.

The hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp), whom I never had occasion to really know before sitting on the flag committee with him, and where I must confess I learned to respect and admire him very much, has referred to the fact that a new flag for Canada should contain in it the symbols of our national origins. I respect his view, just as I sincerely respect the view of anybody who would like to see the Canadian red ensign in its present form continue to fly as the flag of Canada. I am sure there is not anybody on this side of the house who does not love this old flag and feel deeply with respect to what it has meant in our past.

An hon. Member: They like it in Brockville too.

Mr. Matheson: I am sorry I was not able to hear that remark, but I shall be happy to answer questions at the conclusion of my comments. But directing myself very briefly to the matter raised by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale I think I should read to him a letter which was drawn to my attention, a letter written to several papers in Canada by Lewis Grant McNab who served as an artillery counter-battery officer in world war I. He lives at 4250 Sherbrooke street west, apartment 18, Montreal, Quebec and under date of September 11, 1964 he wrote this letter:

> Dear Sir:
> On a recent trip overseas, there was an Anglican clergyman on my continental bus tour. He has a parish just outside London. It is what is known as a royal living, the property belonging to the crown. As such this reverend gentleman has enjoyed close contact with the royal family over a period of years.
> I was talking to him about the current flag controversy in Canada and he told me something which I thought was very interesting. He said that King George V felt very strongly that the commonwealth nations should have a flag of their own which did not embody the union jack, and that if they wished to fly the union jack, they could do so under their own flag.

I took the trouble to telephone Mr. McNab about this, and I may point out he is well known in certain military circles.

I should now like to read from a letter written to me by J. R. B. Walker, a very distinguished scholar enjoying the appointment of Lancaster and Registrar, I believe since 1953, at the College of Arms, Queen Victoria street, London E. C. 4. His letter is dated May 27, 1964, and reads:

> As the union jack symbolizes the union of England, Scotland and Ireland I would have thought it would be rather illogical to incorporate it in the heraldry of any other country; but the sovereign can do anything she pleases, and if she decided that the union jack was to be incorporated in the national symbol of any country in the commonwealth other than Great Britain, her decision would, of course, be perfectly valid.

My hon. friend from Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale, as do I, believes in this exciting development of the commonwealth, and in fairness I think he will recognize that India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Ghana, Malaya, Cyprus, Nigeria, Tanganyika, Sierra Leone, Jamaica, Trinidad and Tobago, Uganda and Malta have all followed the guidance of the College of Arms. Very recently Rouge Dragon, Dr. Conrad Swan, who was in Canada for a few days, informed me that nearly every new nation in the commonwealth has taken instruction from the old College of Arms with respect to national flags, and that the style and pattern of incorporating the union jack in them is no longer followed.

A friend of mine has just passed me an article which appeared in the Daily Gleaner of Tuesday November 17, which shows a plaque recently unveiled in Jamaica. The inscription on the plaque reads:

> On this spot was erected the flag staff from which was lowered the union jack and on which was hoisted the flag of Jamaica to mark the beginning of the independence of Jamaica at midnight 5th-6th August 1962.
> Here also was sworn in the first native governor general of Jamaica, Sir Clifford Campbell G.C. M.G., at 8.50 p.m. on Saturday 1st December 1962. This plaque was presented by Herbert G. Macdonald, O.B.E., J.P.

We must recognize that we are living in a new and changing commonwealth of nations, where new things are expected of us if we are to play the type of leadership role that as Canadians we are expected to play.

Certain comments were made by earlier speakers with respect to the flag of Peru and I feel these must be answered. I feel strongly about this. I referred a few moments before the six o'clock recess to the fact that the Leader of the Opposition had referred to the three leaf flag containing the royal badge as "a troika flag". On the same occasion, on television, in an interview with Mr. Geoffrey Scott over C.B.C.-T.V. on October 28, the night before our flag committee was called upon to present its report, the right hon. gentleman was asked: "Would this be acceptable to you as a national flag?" Mr. Scott was referring to the flag which is now the subject of discussion. The Leader of the Opposition replied: "Certainly we couldn't accept that type of flag". Later on in the program he added: "Not this Christmas or any other Christmas". His words were:

> All I have to say about that, aside altogether from the fact that it shows nothing of our heritage, is that it would be far from being distinctive. As a matter of fact, it would be the Peruvian flag... If we ever get that flag, we would have the Peruvians saluting it anyway.

As I say, I feel strongly about this because only a few hours before the right hon. gentleman taped that broadcast for national television I had produced to the flag committee the admiralty book Flags of All Nations, volume 1, which sets out the national flag and ensign of Peru, the merchant flag and the jack. Not one member of that committee took exception on the grounds that our recommendation was not clearly distinguishable both in its proportions and in its general appearance from the Peruvian flag. The comment made by the right hon. gentleman is therefore in my opinion, completely unfair.

This has been a difficult time for some of us on the government side. If it is felt that we have acted sometimes in a discourteous manner, believe me we have been under tension, too. I do not want the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp) to feel he is the only person who has at times felt trapped. Listening to the attacks made on us with respect to what we thought was an honest effort to find a good flag, one recommended by the highest authorities, listening to it being assailed as a "Pearson pennant" and a troika, we have been disposed to shout at the Leader of the Opposition as Churchill did over the B.B.C. on one historic occasion when his foes across the channel were harassing England with bombs: "You do your worst and we will do our best."

We sought to find an acceptable flag design on the basis of the royal badge. That would not do. On the flag committee we struggled hard to find a strong and distinctive flag which represented a fresh approach. For a moment, indeed, we achieved unanimity—and then we discovered that the Leader of the Opposition was even more contemptuous and scathing than he had been before. I think it is quite impossible to please this angry man. I say to him, in the language of Tom Jones: "I am very sorry, sir, for your unhappiness. Whatever is the occasion of it?"

We have tried to do our best. The original design, I must say, meant a great deal to me. However, I can tell the house with complete conviction that I love this new design.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: You said that about the other one.

Mr. Matheson: Hon. members opposite laugh. But I am wearing the cuff links of the Royal Canadian Legion. Some members are wearing the badge in their buttonholes. I think legionnaires will be interested to compare the proposed flag with their own Royal Canadian Legion badge. It is not that the flag is derived from their badge. Actually each derives its colours and its motif from the same armorial proclamation of 1921—the proclamation referred to by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott). No flag expert in the world can criticize this flag for design, concept or propositions. It meets all the tests for a distinguished flag. It is a flag of dignity and grace, worthy of a great sovereign nation. I believe it has a great purpose to serve in this nation as a uniting factor, something around which we can all rally, together with that beautiful old device, the union jack, which I hope will never cease to fly in this country, not as our national flag but as a flag to be used on proper occasions for demonstrating our allegiance to Queen and commonwealth.

I believe that increasingly this country will be playing a larger role in certain international areas of responsibility. Those of us who have been active in the defence committee and who have taken part in the defence debates can, I am sure, be satisfied that the reorientation of our defence activities is in the direction of peace keeping. It has been manifest from the time of Suez to the present day that it is not helpful for us to continue flying a flag which is a colonial ensign or which appears to some to have that connotation.

In bringing my remarks to a close I should like to refer to an address delivered in England on June 2, 1941 by the grand old man we all honour today, we think of him almost as one of our own. Mr. Winston Churchill, speaking to Canada on June 2, 1941 used these words:

> I speak to you this afternoon from No. 10 Downing street, here in the capital and the governing centre of this battered but indomitable city and island. Our people have been through much in the last few months. They have learned much—and some things they will never forget. But above all they have learned their own strength... no one doubts that we can or that we shall see it through; and that when at length we march again into the light of happier and easier days, Canada will play her just part in laying the foundations of a wider and a better world.

This is not the kind of country that is only for us Scots. Of course we are happy to celebrate St. Andrew's day today, and we will never forget the rock from which we were hewn or the pit from which we were digged. This is the kind of country where a Croat like Frank Mahovlich, a Czech like Stan Mikita, a Frenchman like Jean Beliveau, an Indian like George Armstrong, a Ukranian like Terry Sawchuk or an Irishman like Don McKenney from my own riding of Leeds, or our own Red Kelly in the House of Commons all feel absolutely equal. My good friend the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) has pointed out to me that the first verse of the last chapter of the Bible contains these words:

> And he shewed me a pure river of water clear as crystal... and on either side of the river was there the tree of life... and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations.

I should like to think that may refer to the maple leaf.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. member permit a question? What was the significance of the words he used when he said "The pit from which we were digged?"

Mr. Hellyer: He meant "dug".

Mr. Matheson: Perhaps I was somewhat confused in my scripture. It is: "The rock from which we were hewn or the pit from which we were digged."

On St. Andrew's day some of us are trembling with Scottish zeal. I see many Scots sitting in the house today with tartan ties. Pride in being Canadian does not mean we cannot continue to take pride in our racial origins, be they British, French, or otherwise.

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy tonight to follow the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), mostly because I always feel that if you follow a strong speaker nobody will pay any attention; and certainly I believe that the best chance I may have of getting some attention from the house or indeed from the country is the fact that we have just listened to a speech which contains all the pious platitudes and all those symptoms of that lack of sincerity which have characterized the Liberal party since the question of the changing of our national flag has come into prominence.

Certainly I listened with rapt attention, as so many did, when the hon. member said, "I love this flag". It seems to me there is a line somewhere, "How constant is thy love?" Some of us heard the hon. member on another occasion and have reason to suspect that there was a first love of his when it came to the flag design, which was the three maple leaves. In fact I do not know whether he now claims that he was dishonestly given the credit or discredit for its sponsorship; but he has been blamed by most of us for being very prominent in trying to foist that design on the nation. Certainly he gave every indication that he loves that flag. It is not just those few words of his that characterize his attitude, and indeed the attitude of his colleagues on the Liberal benches, to this question of changing our national flag. In this at least he has been constant in that he is most inconstant, and so is the Liberal party.

I had hoped tonight, Mr. Speaker, to start out by expressing a little admiration at least for the many hours of hard work that the members of the flag committee of this house have put in. Certainly I am sure that no matter how much members of this house have been maligned by the press from time to time because they fail to understand that committee work keeps people out of the chamber, or that other duties keep people out of the chamber, those of us in the house have some appreciation of the amount of effort that has been expended by this committee and how much extra work was undertaken by those members who sat morning, noon and night some days in order to carry out this task. I feel I would not be completely honest if I did not add that I think their burden was unnecessarily onerous because of the insistence on a time limit. Certainly the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), in his few remarks this afternoon on the point of order as to the amendment proposed, put everything in its proper perspective and revealed to us all exactly why the time limit was so important. I think the Prime Minister has revealed to this house and to the country that as far as he was concerned the work of that committee was little more than a sham. He had introduced this most controversial subject in the worst and most political way possible and he expected the committee would bring in something that would allow the government to get rid of its embarrassment as quickly as possible, and therefore the time element was the only point that mattered at all.

I suggest that all of us who are genuinely interested in the question of a flag, those of us who have some understanding of the number of people in this country who recognize the importance of tampering with our symbols in this political, halfhearted or lighthearted way, are bound to take cognizance of that fact. Therefore I have to say that, while I believe the members of that committee have certainly deserved the thanks of this house for the number of hours expended and the way in which they applied themselves to their task, it has been obvious from the outset and it is even most obvious today that the government of this country has done everything it can to make their work meaningless. I suggest that from the outset, from the way in which the Prime Minister set the stage, it was a little unreasonable and really we were asking a little too much to think that the members of that committee would have attacked their task in other than a lighthearted manner.

Consider for a moment how this flag debate started, with the Prime Minister proclaiming to the country loud and long and in the most partisan way that he was going to shove his design down the throat of parliament and give the people of Canada his design for a flag, in place of the red ensign which has been Canada's flag for the last 100 years. I suggest that the tremendous struggle that was necessary to get him to concede this much at least, namely that it should go to a committee, had become so partisan, so violent and stretched out so long that no member of that committee could have undertaken the task without a feeling of frustration; and if not frustration, at least considerable cynicism. I suggest that this degree of cynicism made itself evident as the work of the committee progressed and we saw leaks to the press from time to time; reporters reporting what was going on in a committee which was sitting in camera. I do not care how vehement members may get about a flag or how many may feel it could not matter less, but surely members of this house should feel that no member should sit in this house who cannot be called an honourable lady or gentleman. Certainly the word of a committee that it is in camera is a binding oath that should be as sacred to the members of that committee as any oath could be.

I suggest that only the worst possible foundation for starting a committee, the worst possible approach and the most cynical attitude toward it on the part of some members can account for the most shameful course of conduct on the part of those who wanted to enhance their own reputations by ruining their own good name. Any member of that committee who is accused of deviating in the slightest manner from his duty to keep those proceedings secret should, I think, be most indignant if he is accused unjustly, and most guilty if there is any falling away from his duty at all. I think there should be on the part of those who have been mentioned a very spirited effort in their own defence. Here I must pay special attention to the hon. member for Leeds who has just finished speaking.

I did not try to be complimentary to him when I started, and I repeat my original assertion that I have never heard anything so ridiculous in my life as his statement that he loves this flag. His whole speech as far as I am concerned consisted of platitudes, trite sayings and red herrings.

I was in this house this afternoon when the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) listed what I thought was a most damning indictment against the hon. member for Leeds. He gave chapter and verse the statements which that member had given to the press, and I heard hardly a word from the hon. member for Leeds in his own defence. Certainly I want to say on my own behalf as far as I am concerned my view of the meaning of an in camera meeting, and the duty it lays on each and every member of a committee which holds a meeting in camera to keep silent their proceedings, is a much higher duty than apparently the hon. member understands.

I am not going to be any more charitable to the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman). I know that members on both sides of the house—although those on the Liberal side who were disgusted by him are likely to be quiet and not say anything in this chamber—were disgusted, indeed shocked, by the performance of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra in his attempt to gain for himself all the publicity and glory he could from anything which came out of that committee meeting. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman), who is now known as "Mr. Leakman", certainly received his share of publicity, but I suggest that a member of this house who should have some regard for the duty he owes that committee and the equality that the members of the committee were supposed to share one with another, should at least have the decency to wait till the committee's report was made public to the house before making press statements.

I do not mind revealing, Mr. Speaker, that some time after this occurred I had a conversation with one member of the committee who was very incensed, not only at the fact that this had occurred, but because he felt that what had been said was so wide of the truth in so many respects that he wondered whether we had been released from our obligation to keep silent, and he wondered whether we could not get up and publicly set the record straight. I advised him that I thought that just because there might be sinners on the other side of the house was no reason to emulate them on our side. I am afraid that is a little different from the attitude taken by the Liberals, who whenever they are found at fault ask: And what did you do? This might be a good time to remind government supporters that if some of the sins they commit bear any resemblance to the sins of their previous government, the people of Canada will chastise them as they did the previous government during the last two election campaigns; and I hope hon. members opposite will be prepared to pay the price of their sins instead of sitting in this house and talking to us as though this would absolve them from guilt.

I cannot to this day understand why a time limit should have been set on the proceedings of the committee. The only conclusion I can come to—and I have given it lots of thought—is that the political gain which the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) hopes to achieve by presenting a flag to the country within the time he dictated was most important to him. Members of the house might have gained a ray of hope at the start when the Prime Minister, who had introduced the flag in a most political manner, announced there would be a free vote. We thought for a while that perhaps he was going to give us some inkling of the importance of a flag; that perhaps it was a little more important than just another political issue and a political gain of the moment. Then he explained what he meant by a free vote, and indeed we found he had become a real Liberal propagandist.

Then when the committee was appointed we thought that perhaps one thing had impressed him, and that was that we on this side were sincere in this flag debate on the question how this should be handled. We had thought that even if the government were successful in ramming down the throat of parliament a flag which most of us did not like, passing an act of parliament is not the same thing as a new flag which the people would welcome and accept, and we had thought that at last our long battle to persuade him to send the question to a committee might have left some impression on him. We hoped he would think there was much good in a committee discussing the question and that the people of Canada might have some feeling of satisfaction from the fact that this flag issue had at last been handled in a way which would satisfy the dissident groups in as much as there had been a fair hearing in an unpolitical manner and in a way which reflected the concern for Canada over this issue. As I say, Mr. Speaker, the attitude displayed by some of the members of that committee regarding their duty to be silent certainly shook the confidence of most of us in our sincerity adequately to consider the feelings of the various segments of the population and the various opinions they held.

I must say that no more concrete proof of the sincerity of the government backbenchers on that committee is necessary than that contained in the report presented to us for concurrence today. Those of us who were in the house earlier heard the Minister of Transport

(Mr. Pickersgill) ask one question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to this effect: How about the question of reviving an issue which has already been decided in this session?

Mr. Knowles: Reversing.

Mr. Nugent: Yes, that is it, reversing. The Minister of Transport, in his argument about the question whether the amendment was in order, said that if we were now to send it back to a committee before the house had decided there should be a time limit, we in this house would be reversing a question which had already been decided. My argument to that was that I thought the house can send back to a committee something the committee has already decided, and I said that had been established many times.

If you look at the committee report in which we are asked to concur, Mr. Speaker, you will find that the first question settled by that committee is whether there should be one flag or two. With regard to that, Mr. Speaker, you find unanimous agreement. This committee which we fought so hard to get established, and which we hoped might do so much to at least give the appearance to the people of Canada that the question was going to be handled in a responsible manner by members of parliament, who would be guided by their conscience as Canadians with a true understanding of the meaning of symbols, instead of simply acting as politicians following the party line, voted unanimously that there should be only one flag. I would have thought—I still hope there may be a chance of this—that the Minister of Transport, since he is so familiar with the rules, would side with me when I say that for the committee to bring up the same point later on which it had earlier unanimously disposed of and finished with is clearly contrary to the rules. For them later on to attempt to revive it by bringing in a partisan vote with a different decision than originally arrived at is also clearly contrary to the rules. It is not only contrary to the rules but is an affront to the integrity of the members of that committee. To suggest that all the members of that committee were free to vote independently from any political control by the Liberal party is an insult to the intelligence of hon. members. I suggest that such a thing could not have taken place, as it did, without some direction from the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, I observe that I am touching upon the sensibilities of the Liberal backbenchers, and I suppose I have been a little naïve in complaining about the lack of integrity on the part of the Liberal members of this special committee on the flag. Perhaps I am being naïve in suggesting that this subject is of such importance to the people of Canada, and so sacred to all those who believe as I do in this country, that it should have been treated as something other than a political football. I am not unhappy in many ways about the amount of adverse publicity the press has given members on this side of the house because of the weeks and weeks of fighting we have done to get the flag resolution sent to a committee, but I cannot understand the political legerdemain by which the Liberals have convinced most of the people in this country that it is the Conservative members who are wasting the time of the country by debating the flag issue, when all the time these things are controlled by an absent Liberal party. I do think it is rubbing salt into a raw wound for that same Liberal party now to expect the people of this country to be gullible enough to stand for this sort of contempt of the rules of this house.

We have witnessed in this house day in and day out Liberal contempt for parliament, and this has been apparent ever since the Liberal government was elected, as evidenced by the government's refusal to answer questions, and in their attitude when they have been caught in errors. Certainly what took place last week was a striking example of this attitude. We witnessed the actions of a minister of justice who obviously did not have any idea or concept of his duties.

When the Prime Minister of this country spends his time out west, as he did last week, instead of being here to answer to parliament for the actions of this wayward ministers, surely that is a manifestation of this contemptible attitude. The Prime Minister decided to go on a campaign junket out in the west, which is an effrontery to this country. He talked about now being the time when we need unity in Canada. Surely that is too much for the long suffering people of this country to put up with. How phony can one get in talking about unity? The Prime Minister speaks about unifying the nation and starts out by introducing this flag issue in a political way, making sure that the country is divided. He has taken every step possible to make sure that whatever else happens the reputation of parliament is ruined, and then has the temerity to suggest that the criticism of this house shall be lessened.

He established a committee composed of a bunch of members who find little difficulty in acting with this obvious contempt for the rules of parliament. This is an indication to this nation that their obedience to the whim of the Liberal party is more important than their duty as members of a committee. How then can the Prime Minister have the effrontery to talk about unity in this country, in view of the manner in which he has handled this debate, which has done more to cause disunity than the actions of all people in the last quarter of a century?

I am glad to see the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Forgie) sitting in his place this evening. He is an old friend of mine and I say to him, as an old friend, that there is one thing I have always known about him. That is, he is a good Liberal, and a good Liberal is one who never allows logic or common sense to bother him.

Mr. Forgie: Mr. Speaker, I should just like to point out to the hon. member that he is a far better curler than he is a speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: You are not in your seat.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona has the floor.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Speaker, in the event that the hon. gentleman's remark was not picked up by Hansard, the hon. member said that I am a far better curler than I am a speaker. I do not want to leave the hon. member for Renfrew North alone in this category. I categorized him as a good Liberal, and most of the backbenchers over on that side are good Liberals simply because they managed to get elected. What the Prime Minister would call a good Liberal is an elected Liberal, who always says yes when there is a suggestion that he should do so, and says nothing when there is any question whatsoever about the course to follow because someone has failed to give a signal. I will never forget the situation surrounding the Great Slave lake railway, when someone on that side voted against the bill and all the rest followed suit. Shortly thereafter many Liberal backbenchers were heard to say: I did not mean to vote against that, but Chevrier got up and we had to follow. This is typical of Liberal policy.

I happen to know a few of the members on the Liberal side of this house quite well, and I am happy to say that there are some members over there for whom I have a great deal of respect. I have managed to keep that respect for some of them on most occasions, but I do think now that some of them would get up on their hind legs, accept their duties seriously and say to their leader: Give us something honest to stand for, for a change; act fairly with the House of Commons for a change; quit trying to evade questions; quit trying to be so sneaky; quit being so hypocritical, and make life a little easier for us. I sometimes wonder whether the Liberal backbenchers feel that their Prime Minister has a vendetta against them. It has been a long time since any Liberal backbencher has had self respect enough to get up and say: I am behind the government and I think it is—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have listened to the hon. member for quite a few minutes, and it seems to me that very few of his remarks during that time have related in any way to the subject now before us for consideration. They have been directed away from the resolution before the house. I would appreciate the hon. member's relating, if possible, the remarks he has made to that matter which we are supposed to be studying.

Mr. Nugent: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If I wandered astray, it was because I was considering the report of the committee and the fact that at least at first appearance that committee has blatantly violated the fundamental rules of this house.

I pointed out that the house could refer this subject back to the committee for reconsideration, but certainly it is obvious even to those on the Liberal back benches, who find it painful even to consider the obvious, that for a committee to make one decision and then a completely different decision in the next moment is a very shameful course of conduct, and they cannot even plead ignorance. We all realize that that is the kind of excuse they have been making for so much of the time on that side of the house. I suggest to them if they cannot understand these few remarks, they should remember, with some chagrin, the amendment to the labour code which included November 11 as a holiday, at which time the government was defeated in the committee of the whole, and then consider that all that party had to do on that occasion was bring the subject up again the next day when they had a majority and reverse the decision.

That is what the flag committee did. I suggest that the Liberal members of that committee had to report to the Prime Minister on progress every day. All members of the committee, not just the Liberals or the Conservatives but every member of the flag committee, were unanimous that there should only be one flag. That matter was settled and disposed of, and there is only one explanation for its coming up again. The Liberal members of the committee got their orders from the Prime Minister that this would not do. Joey would have somebody's neck; and so the matter had to be opened up again. That is why the question was brought up again.

I would be happy to hear any logical explanation from any Liberal member of that committee. I must say that they were pretty prompt in speaking to the press while the committee was sitting. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra was a little too quick in getting his story before the public before the house received the report of the committee. What is stopping these hon. members now from getting up and giving us a logical explanation of why they should trample on so obvious a rule of the house?

I hope to say a few words about the design of a flag generally. I want to come back to the remarks of the hon. member for Leeds. He spent a great deal of time telling us what this flag meant in heraldry, the importance of the three maple leaves, and so on. His arguments can be disposed of very simply. As far as I and my constituents are concerned heraldry does not mean one tenth as much as pleasing design. It does not mean one hundredth as much as whether or not the flag stands for something.

The flag that has been presented by the committee, thanks to the efforts of the Prime Minister and the government and those willing co-assassins of Canadian democracy who have supported them, stands for pure political propaganda. It stands for the ability of the Liberal party to prove once again that they can sell a lie to the public faster than the public can catch up to them.

The hon. member referred to a dozen African countries. He did not mention countries like Australia and New Zealand which like Canada have a long, proud history and tradition of established democracy, countries which have a flag that means something to their people because they have a history of which they are not ashamed. I must say I cannot understand Liberal members not having the intestinal fortitude to stand up and tell the house what is meant by a compromise by the Liberal party on a flag. While most of us in the opposition felt that the red ensign was good enough we were ready to compromise. I think the general feeling on this side of the house was that we wanted a flag which would retain some symbol of our history and heritage to show that we are not ashamed of a flag that has flown over this country for 100 years and to show that Canada has 100 years of history of which we are proud.

The difficulty was that on the Liberal side compromise meant only one thing. No flag should fly over Canada which has on it any symbol denoting anything of our history and heritage. That is all. Anything else would pass. Then member after member would get up, like the hon. member for Leeds, and say, "I truly love this flag". I bet you that if it had been a plain, dirty handkerchief he would have been able to say the same thing, so long as it did not have any suggestion of anything indicating our history, our heritage and our traditions. All I can say is that the new flag brought in by the committee stands for the Liberal party.

I do not agree with the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) when he says it is being brought in by parliament and not by any one person. That is nonsense. I think he is being very naïve when he does not concede that it is being brought in by the political power of the Liberal party exercised on the members of that committee. Oh, I admit they were given a little discretion: As long as you have a maple leaf on it, it does not matter. That is what I like, a party that really stands for something. Political opportunism is what the Liberal party stands for and that is what this flag stands for.

I hope that those on the other side who feel I am wasting my time and that the voters of the country are going to say I am wasting the time of the house, because we all know that public opinion says this matter should be wrapped up quickly, are feeling really happy and secure now. I have never seen more typical examples of leadership than those Liberals show who watch to see which way the flock is running, and then run a little faster in order to catch up. As far as I am concerned the duty of members of this house is to try to deal with the business of the house as their consciences dictate, and we can see from the erratic behaviour of those on the other side of the house that they have been trying to do this. But having no consciences they have been wandering willy-nilly wherever political opportunism leads, and I hope they are happy.

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, the time has come to give Canada a distinctive flag, symbol of unity and pride, and I would even say of paternity and sovereignty for Canadians.

This motion concerns the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag proclaiming the sovereignty of our country.

Canada, through its history, has experienced a constant constitutional evolution. It has now become a sovereign state within the commonwealth and the nations. A state is sovereign when it holds supreme soreveign authority at home and when it is submitted to no other country at the international level. Sovereign does not mean independent or absolute, because all nations must submit to public international law.

We can assert with pride that our country enjoys today the eight main characteristics of a sovereign state: the right to legislate, the right to give our legislation extraterritoriality, the right to diplomatic representation abroad, the right to have Canadian courts of last instance, the right to declare peace, war or neutrality, the right to amend our constitution according to our desire and our own decisions, the right to negotiate and to sign ourselves our own treaties, and finally, the recognition of our sovereignty by the other nations of the world.

Several factors and developments have made possible the achievement of such a maturity, but the most outstanding was the Statute of Westminister passed on December 11, 1931, which gave our country its sovereignty and independence within the commonwealth.

There is more than the possession of Canadian sovereignty which is talked about so much in this house, within the United Nations, within NATO and almost everywhere in the world; this real sovereignty must express itself through outward signs which proclaim our distinctive Canadian personality.

Our national impulse for a distinctive character does not in any way hurt our relations with the other members of the commonwealth, with which we are united through a common allegiance to the British crown.

That is the spirit behind a project which promotes the existence of a Canadian sovereignty which can express itself through external signs: a distinctive national flag, a distinctive national anthem and a national day celebrating Canadian sovereignty.

Therefore, the thing is to adopt a distinctive flag, one which would be characteristic of our country, both a flag and an anthem completely different from those of other countries and which would bear our colours and show our national aspirations as truly Canadian and distinctive.

We, Créditistes, had adopted a distinctive flag, we had advocated a diagonal one. We felt that because of its simplicity, it should have been accepted, but such was not the case. The members of this house decided otherwise.

We spent almost three weeks dealing with the flag and then a committee was set up which discussed the matter for six weeks. That committee has brought us its report. Now, since we did not come here merely to indulge in petty politics, but to do things, and because the time has come to give Canada a distinctive flag, we accept the report of the committee. We are pleased to approve it, because the old parties have been calling for the adoption of a flag for such a long time. In fact, they have been doing so for 25 years, but the Canadians have never had a distinctive flag. They are still waiting for it and since we are here to take a stand and act, we are ready to vote in favour of a distinctive flag which will do credit to all Canadians and the entire community.

It is not the first time that such a matter is raised in Canadian politics; in the past, some governments, some associations, certain members of parliament and a great number of Canadians have raised that important issue without avail.

When we consider the origin and background of flags, we note that the union jack has become the national emblem of Great Britain under a royal proclamation of January 1, 1801. We note that the red ensign, authorized in England by Queen Anne in 1707 and by Queen Victoria in 1864, is, under section 72 of the merchant and shipping act of 1894 the proper flag of all ships belonging to British citizens.

If Canadians are really to express their new Canadian citizenship, which they have possessed since January 1, 1947, and a really distinctive patriotism, those two flags no longer suit their legitimate aspirations.

Besides, the order in council of September 5, 1945 clearly indicates that the red ensign will be flown until parliament decides otherwise. The order in council thus recognizes a temporary situation which we must now rectify and define by a specific action, namely by finally adopting a distinctive national flag for this Canada of ours.

Since the last war, public opinion in Canada has constantly evolved in this field and has reached an unequivocal degree of maturity.

Why has the time come to make this decision? It is because our country, Canada, a sovereign state, needs external signs to demonstrate this legal and progressive sovereignty.

If our country has developed to the extent that everyone acknowledges its obvious maturity, we must show this emancipation by means of a truly national and essentially distinctive flag. The pride and the future of our country, and the acknowledgment of our final liberation are at stake.

Most Canadians in this North American country ardently wish to live, not for the mother countries of their remote ancestors, but for the land that feeds them and will feed their sons and daughters, for the land where they will draw their last breath.

Only a really distinctive Canadian national flag will strengthen convictions which presided over confederation in 1867, only a really distinctive Canadian national flag will give concrete form to our common aspirations, our parliamentary and individual liberties, our mutual understanding and our Canadian patriotism.

Mr. Speaker, if the Canadian people as a whole need such a flag, if the Canadian people as a whole insist on it with the support of the political parties, if the whole world recognizes that Canada has reached its maturity and has a distinctive personality, what are we, members of the House of Commons, waiting for to take the necessary step?

I hope this motion will be enthusiastically received and that the house will soon give it by a positive vote.

If we adopt a distinctive Canadian flag, we should also proclaim a distinctive national anthem, for we could not very well look at our distinctive Canadian flag and, at the same time, sing the national anthem of another country. Let us not make such a blunder, which would be absolutely intolerable and ridiculous.

Since a parliamentary committee selected a flag, the government should see to it that a national anthem is adopted at the same time as a national flag. The vote should be taken at the same time on the flag and on the anthem, and one should be just as national and distinctive as the other.

Both our Conservative and Liberal governments have long postponed the granting of a distinctive national flag to Canada. It is their business. We are anxious to have a distinctive national flag but we can wait. For us in Quebec, there are more urgent things to settle in our relations between the provinces and the federal government. But in all these other fields, we do not wish that cultural and intellectual matters be always settled by dint of numbers, nine against one. This is too unfair, too unequal, too despotic. We ask all nationalities making up Canada to try to understand us on a human basis, on an essential basis instead of considering us always by different standards.

We are then ripe for a truly national flag. The failures and the errors of the past are over. Let us face the future and let us consider ourselves as one people made up of human beings having the same essential needs; indeed, there are now 19,300,000 Canadian citizens and in 1967, when we celebrate the centennial of the confederation there will be 20,000,000.

These 19,300,000 human beings have rights recognized in our Canadian statutes. For instance, there is the famous Canadian Bill of Rights passed on August 10, 1960, which states that:

> The parliament of Canada, affirming that the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free men and free institutions.
> It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion, or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely
> (a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person... freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and association, freedom of the press:

Mr. Speaker, that proves that we can do something which is national in scope, something which is truly Canadian, in the realm of the intellect, of the mind, of intelligence. I understand that it is harder and it takes longer to achieve unity when you have ten provinces instead of one and 28 nationalities instead of one, but why do we not follow that example in essential and humanitarian fields.

The drafting of the Canadian Bill of Rights required several weeks, several months and, indeed, several years of parliamentary work; it cost a great deal of money, of effort, of energy and of enthusiasm, but in the end every member of parliament voted for this humanitarian legislation, and the whole Canadian people rejoiced on August 10, 1960, when the bill was given royal assent.

And that was a document strictly Canadian in scope, in dimension, which contained not a single word likely to show our subservience to any other people in the whole world.

Did you give any thought to this initial action finally taken by the Canadian parliament, without feeling obliged to ask permission from any other country, without feeling obliged to repatriate or amend the constitution?

This is proof, Mr. Speaker, proof that we can do the same thing here through our own powers, in this house of representatives of the people, the whole Canadian people, all the people from one coast to the other, and from the North pole to the U.S. border.

But, once more, by a national initiative, like choosing a distinctive flag, each section must recognize the fact that while claiming rights for itself, at the same time it assumes the duty to respect those same rights towards other sections.

Do you admit that? This is what we have to consider before going any further in the life of the whole people whom we want to be Canadian, just plain Canadian and not French Canadian, English Canadian, Scottish Canadian, Irish Canadian, Italian Canadian or German Canadian, no more than American Canadian.

Just Canadian, Mr. Speaker; Canadian on Canadian soil, with a Canadian flag, that is what I am, that is what I want, that is what I hope to see in the near future, for me, my children, my friends, for you, for all of us here in this house, in this parliament, in this government, in this whole country, this Canada, this Canada of ours.

Canada's history is but beginning. The history of confederation is but 100 years old. The past is gone. The past saw joy, it saw grief, it was borne with its faults, its glories; now we see where we stand and look towards the future.

Let us cease to dwell on the differences, and learn to love one another better by looking at such things as we have in common, common essence, Canadian essence, human essence, both human and divine, the ultimate principle of our unity, of our vitality, of our universality.

Because if we are proud enough some day to fly a truly Canadian flag within the limits of our territory, let it be known that we shall also have to be proud enough to fly it throughout the whole world as a really distinctive Canadian flag.

Such a flag will date, we hope, from 1964 or 1967 but let it be, if possible, really Canadian, a true sign and symbol that will rally the minds and actions of the various nationalities making up the Canadian people on Canadian soil.

We will thus be able to sing before that Canadian flag the Canadian national anthem: "O Canada".

Mr. Léo Cadieux (Terrebonne): To use an expression employed by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Nugent), I was one of that bunch of cynical members who participated in the work of the flag committee. So were five Conservative members whom I did not know very well before we began our discussions and whom I have come to respect very much for the way in which they did their work, and also for the sincerity they showed throughout the sittings of that committee.

I wish to take this opportunity tonight to report to you, sir, that this committee was one of the best of any I have known. Every member participating in its discussions was in earnest, trying very hard and very honestly to find and reach a reasonable compromise on this difficult question of a national flag for Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I believe that at the beginning of the discussions, I was faced, like most members of this committee, with an issue that seemed terribly difficult. We had the opportunity during our meetings to listen to experts in the fields of heraldry, history, protocol, and so on, who briefed us, as fully as possible, on the purely technical aspects of this matter.

I think I should say the committee's members reached a decision through a logical process which could not lead them to any other choice than the one which they eventually reached by a majority vote.

First of all, we recognized there are traditions in Canada even if, among the public and the members of the House of Commons they appeared to be ignored. There exists a tradition in Canada, as far as our country's symbol is concerned.

Here, may I underline this—I said it often during the meetings of the committee as the hon. members who sat on that committee may recall—that when we are faced with the question of adopting a national flag, we cannot think of incorporating in such an emblem every glorious event in our history. We must reach as technical and as simple a definition as possible of what a flag should be.

Canadian Flag

A flag is a signal, a message aimed at identifying the bearer, and there is no question of recalling the historical background or trying to encumber such a flag with all kinds of signs recalling the history of the country it seeks to identify.

Such a flag must be readily identified. Consequently, it should be simple. Moreover, it should bear a familiar symbol. During these numerous meetings, several precedents in the history of Lower Canada as well as of Upper Canada were recalled indicating that, spontaneously, in both Canadas, the Canadian people when they wished to identify themselves always showed a maple leaf.

It is the reason why the first inevitable conclusion reached by the members of the committee—and I might even say by the hon. Conservative members who were on the committee—was that the emblem of Canada was the maple leaf.

Somewhat later, we tackled the problem from a rather more legal point of view, shall we say. Then, I remember, I very candidly remarked to my Tory friends that they had themselves made to the solution of this problem an exceptional contribution and that, for one, I was shocked to find that now that we must reach a decision ratifying what tradition had already decreed, they repudiated it.

As a matter of fact, a cursory look at history, as regards this question of a Canadian flag, will show, following consideration of this matter by the committee, that the army has more than 400 military badges bearing the maple leaf and that a Conservative government asked His Majesty the King, in 1921, to proclaim what was to be the emblem of Canada. At that time in the coat of arms of Canada, that emblem was selected, and it was three maple leaves on a single stem.

At first discussion arose as to the colour of those maple leaves. Then, in 1957, again under a government headed by a Conservative prime minister, the colour of those leaves was changed from green to red. And more recently, in 1962, the government under the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), once again suggested that the Queen herself incorporate in her personal flag, as the Queen of Canada, the three red maple leaves on a single stem.

Therefore, I repeat this question to my Conservative friends. Why do you disavow that important contribution you made in our efforts to choose a distinctive emblem for Canada?

[Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne).]

We therefore established in the first place that Canada's emblem should be the maple leaf. We established that because it is an emblem that Canadians chose spontaneously, as I said, and also because it is an emblem known everywhere.

I recall that during our discussions, when we heard, as we heard them so often in the house, that easy oratory recalling that Canadian soldiers had died fighting for the red ensign, we asked one of our own people who was on the battle front during the last war whether that was the actual truth. He admitted not only the fact that, in contemporary times, armies do not fly any flag in battle but also that even the officers take their badges off, so that nothing may identify the brigade or division in the line. And we also heard the testimony of a person who recently visited the cemeteries of Canadian soldiers abroad. This person told us that on every white cross which marked the tomb of a dead soldier, there was a maple leaf showing that this soldier was a Canadian.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that through logic we had arrived at the choice we are submitting tonight. The same applied as concerns the colours of the flag. Once more, we inspired ourselves from the proclamation which, in 1921, established the colours of Canada.

I know that this afternoon a member who supported this motion of the flag committee was asked what part of the proclamation stated that white and red were the Canadian colours. It is to be found not in the proclamation itself but in the interpretation of Canada's coat of arms.

That is why we asked experts in heraldry to tell us, laymen, what interpretation should be given to the coat of arms. It is also through logic that we have been able to determine the importance of this historical souvenir, the genealogy mentioned by our friends opposite. It is in the Canadian coat of arms that we have found the answer.

If you examine them closely, you will see that they include the lion of the Plantagenets, the lion of Scotland, the harp of Ireland and the fleur-de-lis of France when it was ruled by the monarchy. That is Canada's ancestry. The Canadian emblem, the three maple leaves on a single stem, hold the position of honour, under the shield. As far as the national colours are concerned, they are represented by the red and white mantle at the top of the coat of arms.

Technically we must therefore observe the implicit instructions given to Canadians by the royal College of Arms which had been asked to decide what should be our national colours, and our distinctive emblem.

Mr. Speaker, as far as compromise is concerned, the hon. members on the other side must accept the idea that the representatives of the Liberal party have compromised as much as possible. Indeed, we arrived at the flag committee with an emblem which we felt was already accepted by the population, three red maple leaves and two blue stripes. We came out of the committee with a flag bearing a single maple leaf and two red bands instead of blue. It seems to me it is difficult to ask for more from the representatives of a political party.

This afternoon, the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp) asked the following question:

[Text]

What is wrong with the union jack and the fleur-de-lis? There is nothing wrong with the union jack and the fleur-de-lis except that neither is the Canadian flag. The union jack is a foreign flag; it is the flag of England. The fleur-de-lis represents royal France. These flags do not and cannot represent Canada. This was our argument all along, Mr. Speaker.

I hope that hon. members on the other side of the house are not going to pursue this line of trying to discredit the committee. Some of their own members were members of the committee and they were eager to succeed, as was every one of us. I hope they will not try to infer that there was as much cynicism as we are told there was, its having been said that we were a bunch of cynical members. We were no bunch of anything. We were very eager to find common ground for understanding, and I believe we found it. At one time, irrespective of anything which can be said on the other side, there was actually unanimity that there be one national flag only for Canada.

I also hope, Mr. Speaker, that all of the members of that committee who will participate in this debate will be accurate and honest. When we refer to one of the motions voted on in the committee, the motion for only one flag, we omit a very important word. We voted first for one national flag; and then we voted separately for a flag which would indicate our participation in the commonwealth. These are two different questions. We accepted the fact that the flag we were going to choose was going to be submitted as the Canadian emblem, and for that purpose only and exclusively. Therefore I think that in all these discussions we must be strictly honest, as were all the members of the committee when we were discussing this matter.

Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to have to differ from my friend the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith), who sat next to me during all the meetings of the committee. I found him a very nice gentleman, but I am surprised and shocked to a certain extent to hear him suggest that there were instructions to the Liberal members given by the government. I can say most emphatically that I talked not once during all those sittings with any member of the cabinet, especially with the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson): I did meet the Prime Minister many times in the elevator but I did not talk to him except to say good morning, especially in view of the situation I understood we were in. Some members in our party know that even the most innocuous question was left unanswered by members of the committee. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope—I do not want to delay the house—that this committee's recommendation will be carried and considered in the light in which it is offered. I believe the committee did its duty, and I do not think it becoming of any hon. member of this house, especially those who were not members of the committee and who therefore must not of necessity be informed about what went on, to discredit the committee and the members of it who participated so honestly. It is very unbecoming to be submitted to the kind of speech that one hon. member made tonight.

I have nothing more to add, Mr. Speaker. From the way things look I am confident that the committee's recommendation will receive from the house, if a vote is permitted as quickly as possible, an astounding majority; I venture to predict that, Mr. Speaker. If hon. members on the other side are so eager to have the question settled let the matter come to a vote. That is the easy solution. At the suggestion of hon. members opposite we consented to form a committee. This committee held extended sittings; everyone admits that. We have studied the question as objectively as possible. We could not come to complete agreement, and that is unfortunate. We tried very hard to reach full agreement; but we did present a majority report, supported by an important majority.

When hon. members talk of a plebiscite, if they do not accept a majority of ten to four what kind of majority would they ask from a plebiscite? If hon. gentlemen opposite are not satisfied with 72 per cent, what are they going to request from a plebiscite? I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this question has been aired long enough and that we should now proceed with the practical side of the question, which is to vote on this matter.

Mr. J. A. McBain (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I am taking this first opportunity of speaking on the flag issue, as I did not avail myself of an opportunity to do so when it was before the house earlier. There will be some who will say I have already spoken during this debate, and in one sense that is true, as on February 18 I placed a resolution on the order paper asking the government to consider immediately the introduction of legislation which would acknowledge the Canadian red ensign as Canada's distinctive national flag, as endorsed by the Canadian Legion and the I.O.D.E. I had an opportunity to debate this resolution on June 1, but of course you realize that a member is limited to 20 minutes on the debate of a private member's resolution. Therefore at this time I wish to put forward some other thoughts I have had about this subject. These are thoughts I have collected during many interviews in past weeks with my own constituents, as well as ideas resulting from correspondence I have received, not only from the people in my riding of Elgin but from all across Canada.

During two week ends I had the opportunity of being present at quite large non-political gatherings, and I was amazed by the number of individuals who voluntarily expressed their opinions to me about the flag issue. As a result of these conversations I can only come to the following conclusions. The majority of the people in my area prefer the retention of the red ensign as Canada's distinctive flag. Those individuals who feel that now is the time for a new design were not happy with the three red maple leaf design. They are still not happy with the committee's proposed flag with the one maple leaf and the red borders. The third conclusion I came to was that they were discouraged and disgusted with the present parliament, and that the government should get off its high horse and finish the legislative program now on the order paper before bringing the flag issue back into the House of Commons. I might point out that a great portion of the legislative program on the order paper has been on the order paper for several months without members of parliament having the opportunity of discussing it.

[Mr. Cadieux (Terrebonne).]

The first group of individuals with whom I had the opportunity of discussing this issue was made up of 300 people representing municipal and county councils who had gathered together to pay honour to a retiring clerk-treasurer who had served in that capacity for 25 years. These people are retired or serving representatives of municipalities, and have done so faithfully for many years. On two week ends I had an opportunity of visiting different rural fairs, where one has wonderful opportunities of meeting a cross-section of the public and obtaining knowledge as to the feeling of those people about an issue such as the flag issue. I also attended a Labour day celebration last September which brought together people from all walks of life, and again I was afforded the opportunity of taking part in discussions on the flag situation.

At this stage of the debate we are supposed to be discussing an amendment to the committee report, and this ties in with the unity of Canada through a plebiscite, asking that a ballot be taken at the next general election. I hope that this ballot will be taken but that the results will not be related to any specific region. I think that is how it should be carried out, because we know, as a result of various polls that have been conducted, that certain sections of Canada are strongly in favour of the retention of the red ensign, while other areas are predominantly in favour of a new design.

There was a time when I thought the Ottawa area was predominantly in favour of the three maple leaf flag. Last summer we observed a great deal of ballyhoo about the three maple leaf pennant which was being flown on car radio aerials throughout the city. Some people are still flying these pennants from their aerials. I am pleased that the new proposal has changed that design, because I am sure we can all recall having seen some of these pennants that were flown for two or three months and remember that they turned a dirty grey, with the blue colour having faded, and with frayed edges. In fact, I saw one one morning not long ago that was so anaemic in appearance I stopped and asked myself: Is this the design if passed by parliament to which we would pledge our allegiance and the allegiance of future generations? I think we must still ask ourselves this question in relation to the new proposed design.

I recall the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), in speaking to this house, drawing to our attention the fact that the three maple leaf design had been devaluated in one joke shop in the city from 98 cents, which was the retail cost when it first became available, to 19 cents. I am pleased that we are not now witnessing the same type of pennant, with the single maple leaf design, being flown in the same manner, but I do wonder why the Prime Minister has not proposed that a flag with the one maple leaf design, having red bars, be flown on a mast on parliament hill so that members could view it, as he did in respect of his own design.

One morning last week I was listening to a local radio station which each morning conducts a survey about various topics. The listening audience is invited to call the radio station and discuss the topic of the day. The morning I was listening the topic was the design of the flag expected to be presented to the House of Commons on the following day. I was surprised to learn that of ten or 12 telephone calls, only one approved the suggested design.

The same individual wondered why the present leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, when he was the prime minister, did not bring in a measure to make the Canadian red ensign, with or without changes, Canada's flag by act of parliament. One could also go back in history and ask why Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, when he was prime minister, did not make the ensign official by an act of parliament, or bring forth a new design. We know that he took the initial step, by order in council, to make the ensign the official flag to be flown on all government buildings at home and abroad. We could also ask why Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, when he was prime minister, did not make the ensign the official flag by an act of parliament, or bring forward a new design.

I believe the three prime ministers I have referred to were aware of the danger of creating more disunity across this country by presenting a flag that would not be acceptable to a large majority of Canadians.

We of the Conservative party have endeavoured to place before parliament the reasons the present design is not acceptable to a large percentage of Canadians. We will continue to place these reasons before parliament. We have offered time and time again suggestions as to how the government should proceed to regain that lost unity which is evident across Canada, and which has resulted over the flag design proposal.

I wish to give two examples, Mr. Speaker, of how the flag question has created disunity and has divided our populace into two camps. A few weeks ago I had lunch with a resident of Ottawa who related to me an incident that happened to him last summer. During the hot days of July he had left his car parked with the windows open and some person had placed on the inside of his windshield a small Canadian ensign sticker reading "This is Canada's flag, let's keep it flying". As he related the story to me, this could have been on his windshield several days before it was brought to his attention by his young son. He did not tell me whether or not he was an ensign supporter but did say as far as he was concerned the sticker was doing no harm to him or anyone else until several days later when he went to unlock his car to drive home and noticed a young man standing by the car with an object in his hand. This man swore at him and told him to remove the ensign or he would smash his windshield to pieces. Naturally his reply was, "In the first place I didn't put it there and, in the second place, if you attempt to remove it by force there will be more than a broken windshield. It will be your head."

Several months ago, after I had placed my own flag resolution on the order paper, I recall receiving a picture postcard from the city of Toronto which was unsigned, the picture being of the Prince of Wales gates at the eastern entrance to the Canadian national exhibition grounds. The picture showed some 21 red ensigns flying over the top of the entrance and through each ensign there was a big black cross. On the back of the card were the words: "You Englishmen, there will be blood spilled over your ensign if you don't get rid of it".

We saw blood spilled several weeks ago during the flag debate, and spilled right here on the green carpet of this very chamber.

An hon. Member: That was not during the flag debate.

Mr. McBain: It was during the flag debate. Fortunately it was only cow's blood and the incident was not directly connected with the flag debate.

An hon. Member: Why bring it up then?

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): He is speaking in parliament and he has a right to bring anything up.

Mr. McBain: I also wish to say—

Canadian Flag

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just taken his seat has been interrupting from behind the curtain. It is bad enough to have interruptions by members from their seats but when they start to interrupt when standing behind the curtain I think it is time the Chair did something about it.

Mr. McBain: I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am not of English ancestry but rather my grandfather on my father's side came from the highlands of northern Scotland, and on my mother's side my great grandfather was Pennsylvania Dutch of loyal united empire loyalist stock. I was very proud today when the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) directed our attention to the fact that this is St. Andrew's day.

As I say, great disunity has been created in this country since the flag debate was first introduced in the House of Commons. We have had riots in various parts of Canada. We have seen flags burned. We have had an increase in the separatist movement in the province of Quebec. We have seen our armouries raided and robbed. Yes, Mr. Speaker, murders were even committed while this was being done.

When I spoke on my own flag resolution I stated that I was expressing my own personal opinions as well as the opinions expressed in approximately 90 per cent of the letters and telegrams I had received up until that time. That was last June 1, Mr. Speaker, and previous to that date I had received nearly 150 signed letters and telegrams all asking me to support the retention of the Canadian ensign as Canada's national flag. This figure has now mounted to 611. Since June 1 I have received many letters supporting my stand on the ensign but since that date I have received only three letters supporting some other design than the ensign.

In all fairness to those who are writing me in support of the ensign and to those supporting some other design I propose to put on the record some comments from each side. Before doing so I may say that some time ago I received a clipping from the Saint John Telegraph-Journal, being an article written by Jean Sweet. The article is entitled "In My Opinion", and in my opinion it exemplifies the feelings, I am sure, of many millions of Canadians. I am going to quote from the article. This lady says:

> Normally, like most peaceful citizens, I'm a coward about public issues. But I think the time has come to stand up and be counted on this flag matter.
> Most people who ever saw a tree know that big trees rise from big firm roots. If you trim away the roots you weaken the tree. If too much root is removed you have nothing. The tree—that grew slowly over many decades—weakens, falls and decays.
> Loyalties grow the same way, putting down roots in friendly soil. Without loyalities, even misplaced loyalities, man is nothing but a drifting derelict.
> Millions of Canadians grew up as I did in the friendly soil of a Canada we learned from earliest years to respect and view with immense pride. We were taught not to brag loudly and constantly about our land, but instead to know what we had and to feel secure in its tenets.
> Above all our flag has symbolized this land. It has grown with us. From pre-school age we loved the simple but intricately planned design of the union jack, so carefully integrating the major elements of Great Britain. We were proud when we saw the Canadian coat of arms in the fly of the beautiful flag. We sang songs to it. It meant our land.
> Through school days I have no recollection of any "Quebec question". I remember Montreal as a fascinating place I longed to see where, right in our Canada, two languages were spoken and peoples from many other lands settled and lived.
> Above all, as a child I watched the proud Van Doos march through the streets of our town, where they trained, headed by the tall lean figure of Colonel Vanier (I didn't know his name then, not until I met him as our Governor General). From that time I "saw" those proud French speaking troops "fighting for our flag" as news of their exploits trickled home. When we sang "We'll never let the old flag fall" the Van Doos were in the picture, dying in France for that flag.
> Well, as far as I am concerned no one man, no one group of troublemakers, can tell me "here is your new flag". This is a matter of roots, Canadian roots. If my flag can be readily discarded, so can my country and any other belief I ever held in it. It is disturbing and makes me wonder: what next?

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: Tomorrow we will continue with the same business as today, and when that is finished we will call item No. 7 on today's order paper, second reading of Bill C-131, an act to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act; then item No. 51 on today's order paper, second reading of Bill No. 137, an act to authorize certain capital expenditures of the C.N.R.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask when Bill No. C-126 will be brought forward again?

Mr. McIlraith: I just announced the business for tomorrow. I do not know when we will be ready to take Bill No. C-126.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 1, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—REMARK IN DEBATE BY MEMBER FOR LEEDS

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker—

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the house I would like to make a very short statement on the possible order of our proceedings.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rose on a question of privilege, which takes precedence over any statement, and I ask to be heard on a question of privilege before any statement is made. I thought the Prime Minister was rising on a question of privilege.

My point of privilege has to do with a statement made by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson). The statement is to be found at page 10702 of yesterday's Hansard, where the hon. member for Leeds refers to a television interview with Mr. Geoffrey Scott on October 28. Then he says:

> Later on in the program he added: "Not this Christmas or any other Christmas".

That is in quotation marks. I do not object to a person being the chief propagandist of new models and designs for a flag, but that statement was never made by me at any time, under any circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN PROCEEDINGS DURING FLAG DEBATE

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately we were not able yesterday to dispose of the flag committee report, and under our rules, of course, a motion for adoption of a committee report has precedence over other business. I was going to suggest that perhaps we could get unanimous consent of the house to alter our rules to the extent that, if we are not able to deal with this report today, beginning tomorrow we should set aside half an hour each day for questions, notwithstanding the rules; but in order that the discussion on the flag committee report be given all the time to which under the rules it is entitled, I suggest that we alter our hours of sitting so that the half hour would begin at two o'clock, or on Friday at 10.30. Therefore we could spend each day from 2 to 2.30, or on Friday from 10.30 to 11 on questions, and then proceed with the business as laid down by the rules until this committee report is dealt with.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have heard the words of the Prime Minister, but I think there are large gaps in what has been proposed. For instance, this proposition does not deal with statements made on motions by ministers. It does not mention other matters. For example, it does not deal with written or oral questions, on Mondays and Wednesdays, together with notices of motions for production of papers. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the whole of our routine business prior to the calling of orders of the day has to be considered.

This question was raised yesterday as a matter of interest to all hon. members of the house, because it is not only the members on this side of the house who are interested in these proceedings but also hon. members on the other side of the house. For instance, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) obviously would have some questions to ask at this time, as would the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan); and there are also other points.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that he reconsider his position and make a definitive statement, after negotiation dealing with routine proceedings. The urgent business of the house as detailed by the Prime Minister a month ago has been dealt with, with the exception of the present matter and another matter under the Minister of Labour, which it has been the government's choice to defer. I suggest that the advancing of the hours of sitting is quite extraneous to our routine procedure. What is the pressure? I see a shrug of the shoulders and a snicker on the part of the Prime Minister, but what is the pressure in the government's eyes on the basis of the government's announced business?

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister reconsider his position and that he deal with motions; that he deal with notices of motions for the production of papers; that he deal with other routine matters. The government may wish to bring forward some bills; I am sure some of the Prime Minister's colleagues have some interesting matters to disclose to the house. There are a number of matters. I may point out to him that we have only to go back to the earlier editions of Bourinot to discover that on motions the only matters which could be discussed were motions dealing with the business of the house, certainly not motions in the nature of substantive motions such as we are now discussing.

Therefore I suggest that for the period of this debate, and for the period of our consideration of the seventh report of the committee should it be advanced by the government, this item of motions be considered as the first item of government business.

This is a government proposal which has arisen out of a direction of this house which was consequent upon a resolution of the government appointing a committee. We are not dealing with house business in the normal course on motions, and for that reason I suggest to the Prime Minister that he reassess the position and, as suggested yesterday, the government house leader consult with the other party leaders. I think some reasonable accord could be reached in that way, rather than having these proposals laid before the house at this time.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in regard to the suggestion by the Prime Minister that we meet half an hour earlier to facilitate the question period, I should like to state that I believe we can reach the normal question period, deal with the questions hon. members wish to ask, and reach the point of allowing ministers to make statements on motions, as well as deal with all the other regular business before this house by simply allowing the motion now before us to come to a vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Olson: If there had not been ample opportunity to discuss the whole matter of a flag for Canada I could envisage that there might be some reason for carrying on that debate at this time. We have already spent 22 days on this motion, which was moved by the government and which is embodied in order 44 (A). The matter was referred to a committee which has come back with a report, and as far as we are concerned we do not accept the contention that a 10 to 4 vote is not a sufficient majority on which to bring this matter again before the house. We believe there has already been far more debate on this subject than necessary. We believe the people of Canada are fed up with this debate, and we think there is a very simple way of allowing the majority of this house to express its opinion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that he confine his remarks to the suggestion presented to this house this afternoon by the right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, speaking strictly to the suggestion which has been made, we think there is a far more effective way of proceeding in an orderly fashion in this house, and that is by allowing members of this house to vote on the motion before us, following which all the other things will fall into place.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion made by the right hon. Prime Minister is very generous, because it will allow us, if we so desire, to ask questions of ministers from 2 p.m. until 2.30 p.m. Monday through Thursday, and from 10.30 a.m. until 11 a.m. on Friday.

When the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) tells us that we should follow the orders of the day and then revert to the debate on the flag, this is another way the Conservatives are using—and note what I am saying—to delay the business of the house and endeavour to delay as much as possible the adoption of a distinctive national flag.

The Conservatives will carry this stigma before the eyes of the Canadian people, of that I am sure.

Mr. Lambert: This should not bother you; you are not here.

Mr. Caouette: When I hear the hon. member for Edmonton West side with his group, naturally, and suggest that orders of the day be called, after which we could resume the debate on the distinctive flag at leisure, I wonder if that was not settled in caucus, at that little meeting they held this morning.

If this house is not unanimous, I would suggest to the Prime Minister that we stick to the standing orders. The Conservatives can always ask their questions once we have adopted a distinctive national flag.

Mr. Lambert: Why should this bother you, when you are not here?

[Text]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since there does not seem to be unanimous consent may I repeat the suggestion I made yesterday, namely that the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as house leader might call a meeting of the various house leaders to see if we can find any resolution of this problem.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on the last suggestion perhaps I might be permitted to say that I made what I thought was a helpful suggestion, that we extend our hours of sitting so we would have half an hour each day for questions during the period when the rules do not provide for questions because we are discussing a committee report. That suggestion, Mr. Speaker, has not met with unanimous consent; therefore, of course, the house leaders of the various parties could get together to see if they can work out any other arrangement.

CANADIAN FLAG

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Monday, November 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Batten that the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps this decision will have a slight dampening effect on some of the high spirits which marked the start of our sitting this afternoon.

The house will recall that yesterday the hon. member for Humber-St. George's, in his capacity as chairman of the special committee on the flag question, moved concurrence in the sixth report of that committee. The hon. member for Perth, who was also a member of the committee, proposed an amendment to the motion for concurrence that seeks to refer the report back to the committee with instructions to strike out paragraph 7 and substitute something else in its place. On the proposed amendment a point of order was raised by the President of the Privy Council.

It is for the Chair to determine whether the point of order raised by the government house leader is well taken or whether the amendment of the hon. member for Perth should be admitted for debate and decision.

I have had the advantage of hearing the views of several hon. members, which have been most helpful to me in reaching a decision. In addition to the house leader I have heard arguments by the two senior officers of the house themselves, the right hon. Prime Minister and the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. I have also had the benefit of the views expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, who is the house leader of the official opposition and who seconded the motion setting up the flag committee. It has been helpful as well to have had expressions of opinion from the former Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West, and from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who is an acknowledged authority on the rules. There were also brief but valuable contributions to the discussion by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency and the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

I have considered the point of order with care in an effort to reach a decision that takes account of the various arguments that have been advanced, and a decision that is in accordance with the practice and precedents in this country and in the British house whose practice, under our standing order No. 1, must be followed in cases not provided for in our own rules. In reaching my decision I have tried to take into account a number of factors which I will enumerate as briefly as possible.

1. We are here dealing with an unusual matter, namely the establishment of a national flag.

2. It is a matter with a very considerable emotional impact for every one of us.

3. The motion to commit the flag question to the special committee was moved by a member of the government, seconded by the house leader of the official opposition and passed unanimously.

4. As the Prime Minister has said, there has already been a very extended debate on the flag question in the house itself, with 165 speeches over a 23 day period.

5. In that debate the Chair has shown considerable leniency and has not enforced the rules of relevancy and repetition with rigidity.

6. The committee has also considered the question fully and has held no less than 45 meetings.

7. It is the duty of the Chair to see that the rights of members on all sides are fully protected so there will be freedom of discussion and the right of expression will not in any way, be stifled. Parliament is not a court but a forum.

8. The right of freedom of expression, however, should not imperil the right of decision.

Canadian Flag

I have also tried to take account of some of the unusual features of this particular committee, as follows:

1. It was a special committee.

2. It was charged with the task of considering a specific but most encompassing question.

3. It was asked to make a final report.

4. It was given a particular time limit in which to complete its work.

5. Its appointment, its power to report and the capacity of the house to act on the report are not restricted by any motion on the order paper on September 10, 1964.

I have also been conscious of certain factors relating to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Perth which I shall enumerate:

1. It relates to the question of a national plebiscite.

2. The question of a national plebiscite has already been discussed and voted on in the committee; in fact the first vote taken in the committee was on the question of a national plebiscite, and it was rejected 9 to 5.

3. As the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has pointed out, however, Bourinot's fourth edition, at page 479, makes it clear that a committee may reconsider and even reverse a previous decision.

4. A vote was taken in the house itself on the question of a plebiscite on the 1st September 1964, as recorded on page 660 of Votes and Proceedings for that date.

5. That vote, however, was on a subamendment which dealt with details as to what questions should be included in a plebiscite but not with the basic question of whether or not a plebiscite should be held.

6. The basic question of whether or not a national plebiscite should be held, which is the subject of the amendment of the hon. member for Perth, has not as yet been decided by the house.

It will be apparent to all that these various factors which I have just listed, some of which are in direct contradiction with others, make the matter a difficult one for the Chair. We have heard it suggested that the flag committee no longer exists because it was a special committee set up for a fixed period of six weeks and a final report has been made. We have also heard that the matter before the house, however, does not relate to the final report of that committee but to its sixth report. We have been reminded, as well, that committees receive their authority from the house itself and that the authority of the house overrides that of any committee.

[Mr. Speaker.]

In order to reach some kind of reasoned judgment I have looked at all the factors in the situation. First let us look at our general practice with regard to the recommittal of a report.

1. In General, Recommittal of a Report

It seems that it has been our constant practice that when the motion to concur is proposed, the report of a select committee may be referred back to the committee for further consideration or with instructions to amend it in any respect.

> A report may be referred back to a committee for further consideration, or with instructions giving them power to amend the same in any respect. In this way a committee may regularly reconsider and even reverse a decision it has previously arrived at.

(b) Citation 322 of Beauchesne's fourth edition reads in part as follows:

> When the motion to concur is proposed the report may be referred back to the committee for further consideration or with instruction to amend it in any respect.

(c) Paragraph (4) of citation 325 of the same edition of Beauchesne states:

> When a motion is made for concurrence in a select committee report, it is competent for the house to adopt it, reject it, refer it back to the committee or decide that consideration of the report will take place "this day six months".

(d) Moreover, the precedents recorded in our Journals establish that when it is intended to refer back the report to a select committee on the motion for concurrence, the procedure has been to do so by amendment to such motion, and therefore without notice. With the time at my disposal I have failed to find during the last 45 years any instance in contradiction of that contention.

Now let us consider the recommittal of the final report of a special committee.

2. Recommittal of the Final Report of a Special Committee

It has been suggested that a special committee ceases to exist when its final report is presented to the house and that such a report cannot be referred back to the committee unless the committee is revived.

(a) In support of that view, citation 286 of Beauchesne's fourth edition states as follows:

> It is important that the motion for the appointment of the committee should state whether the committee shall report from time to time, for if it should report once without having been given such power, it will be defunct but may be revived. Special authorization should also be given to sending for persons, papers and records.

A select special committee ceases to exist on the moment its final report is presented to the house. The report cannot afterwards be sent back to the committee with instruction to amend it in any particular. If further proceedings are desired it is necessary to revive the committee.

(b) W. F. Dawson, in his book "Procedure in the Canadian House of Commons", expresses a view similar to that set forth in the second paragraph of citation 286, when he states at page 206:

It is possible for the house, on the rare occasions when it does debate a committee report, to move to accept it, reject it, hoist it, or refer it back to the committee with the power to amend, except of course in the case of special committees, which have to be reconstituted by the house before their reports can be referred back.

Mr. Dawson refers to no authority to substantiate his statement. It is likely that since he was the assistant chief of our English Journals branch from 1955 to 1958, and published his book in 1962, he made such a statement having in mind citation 286 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which also appears verbatim in citation 555 of the third edition by the said author.

(c) In support of paragraph (2) of citation 286 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, the author gives as his authority May's thirteenth edition, page 486, and he refers to a procedure in the British house that is indicated as 105 C.J. 201.

Upon examination, the supporting references invoked by Beauchesne to substantiate the second paragraph of citation 286 are not very convincing and do not seem to corroborate the broad statement made by the author. The pertinent reference at page 486 of May's thirteenth edition is as follows:

If a committee, at the conclusion of their inquiry, make a final report to the house, the sittings of the committee are assumed to have been closed; and if further proceedings were desired it would be necessary to revive the committee.

However, in reading the footnotes below this statement, which are purported to be the supporting authority therefor, it would appear that these references are not related to the question of referring back a report but deal rather with cases where it was intended to commit a new matter to select committees which had concluded their work.

One of these footnotes also makes mention of a ruling of the Speaker in the British house in 1893 to the effect that a motion to commit a bill to a select committee on another bill was out of order as the committee, having reported the bill committed to it, had ceased to exist.

The other footnote on page 486 of May's thirteenth edition is the very same reference as the one given as additional supporting authority in citation 286 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, and deals with a procedure in the British house in 1850 which seems on all fours with that of 1893 referred to earlier.

There can be no quarrel with citation 286 in this regard and, in similar circumstances, those precedents probably would be valid in our house. However, other circumstances now prevail.

3. Our Practice

If citation 286 is to be interpreted as meaning that, with the presentation of its final report, a special committee ceases to exist to the extent that it has to be reconstituted, or that it has to be revived by a special motion before that report can be referred back to it, with instructions to amend, it is my view that such interpretation does not seem consistent with our practice.

A review of the comparatively few precedents which we have in this regard would indicate that in no case was a special procedure involved which would provide for the revival of the committee when referring a report back for consideration or with instructions.

What are the precedents?

(a) On April 14, 1919 (cf. Journals, p. 171) a special committee concerning the abolition of titles was appointed without any mention that the committee would report from time to time, and that committee was not so empowered at a later date. On the motion for concurrence in the committee's report, as will be seen at pages 293-4 of the Journals for May 22, 1919, an amendment was moved purporting to amend the report itself. Mr. Speaker Rhodes then stated in part:

When a motion is made for the adoption of the report of a committee, it is competent for the house to adopt it, to reject it, or to refer it back to the committee with or without instructions. Or, a motion may be made for the six months' hoist. I do not think it competent to move to amend the report of a committee.

The amendment was thereupon withdrawn and another amendment was moved to the effect of referring back the report to the committee with instructions to amend it in certain particulars.

(b) In 1926, when an amendment was proposed to the motion to concur in the final report of a special committee on the administration of the department of customs and excise, a sentence to the following effect was appended to the amendment, and to the sub-amendment, namely:

"and that the committee for such purpose be revived".

I would direct attention to the Journals for June 22 and 23, 1926, at pages 461-2 and 464-5.

Since this is the only occasion on which such a phrase was employed, and as the authority for its use is itself in question, it is suggested that the omission of that or a similar phrase would provide meagre ground for ruling a proposed amendment out of order. In any case, the amendment of the hon. member for Perth does contain the phrase "and that the committee for such purpose be revived".

(c) On May 30, 1928, as recorded at page 476 of the Journals, a motion was made to refer back the third and final report of the standing committee on industrial and international relations with instructions to amend it in certain particulars. A point of order was then raised to the effect that the committee, having made its final report, had ceased to exist so far as the reference was concerned, and therefore no other reference with respect to the subject matter first referred could be made.

Although in this instance the house was dealing with the report of a standing and not a special committee, it is relevant to mention here the following statement which is part of the ruling made by Mr. Speaker Lemieux at that time, as recorded at page 3563 of Hansard for May 30, 1928:

So that the practice in the Canadian parliament does not prevent a report, even if it is a final report, of either a special or, better still, a standing committee, being referred back to be amended.

(d) There are other instances to be found in our records to the effect that although the word "final" did not appear in a special committee report, we may assume that it was the final report, and where amendments to refer the report back to the committee with instructions were moved on the motion for concurrence. In that regard I refer to pages 754-5 of the Journals for June 26, 1948, where two amendments were proposed to motions to concur in a report of the special committee on prices. While both these amendments were ruled out of order for various reasons, no question was raised with respect to the validity of referring the said report back to the committee.

[Mr. Speaker.]

4. Conflict between Citation 286 and the Formula in Beauchesne's 4th Edition

Much has been said about Beauchesne's citation 286, which states in effect that a special committee ceases to exist once its final report has been presented to the house. However, there is a fundamental contradiction between the terms of this citation and formula No. 95, which is to be found at page 397 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. That formula reads as follows:

The question being proposed "That the final report of the select standing (or special) committee on ..... be now concurred in,"

Mr. .....moves in amendment thereto, seconded by Mr. ..... "That the said report be not now concurred in but that it be recommitted to the select standing (or special) committee on..... with instruction that they have power to amend the same so as to recommend that .....".

It will be seen that in this formula provision is made for recommitting a final report of a special committee with instructions by way of an amendment, and no reference is made to the revival of the committee.

5. Unprovided Cases

Let us now consider unprovided cases. It must be borne in mind that if the procedure now under review is at all to be considered as an unprovided case, under the terms of our standing order 1 recourse must be made to May's sixteenth edition wherein it is stated at page 642 that when a report is recommitted the select committee with all its powers is thereby revived.

6. The Present Instance

What of the present instance? It has been suggested that the case of the special committee on the flag question is different from others, more particularly in that:

1. The resolution appointing such committee has fixed a limitation on the life of the committee in establishing that its final report was to be submitted to the house not later than six weeks from the date of its first sitting and that the referral back of either the sixth or the seventh report to such committee, after the time limitation provided in the resolution for its existence, goes beyond the decision taken by the house. It may also be said that the committee should again be empowered or reconstituted by a substantive motion after notice. Obviously at this stage of the session, when members' notices of motions have disappeared from the order paper, private members would be precluded from moving such a motion.

It is my view that if paragraph 2 of Beauchesne's citation 286 were to be interpreted as meaning that with the presentation of its final report a special committee ceases to exist to the extent that it has to be reconstituted, or that it has to be revived by a special motion after notice before that report can be referred back to it, with instructions to amend, it is reasonable to say that the committee having ceased to exist on the presentation of the seventh and final report, which was tabled at the same time as the sixth, paragraph 2 of the citation should apply to the sixth report as well. But as I have already indicated this is not, in my view, a valid interpretation of the citation.

I am also of the opinion that the resolution appointing the committee should be considered in the light of the surrounding circumstances at the time it was adopted. If we do so, we see that at that time there was before the house the motion appearing under government orders, No. 44(A), an amendment moved thereto and a subamendment. There was also government order No. 44(B). Both these were suspended by agreement. It has been argued that it is unlikely that these two orders will again come before the house. In that case it would be reasonable to assume that the practical effect of refusing amendments to refer back either of these reports to the committee, with or without instructions, would be tantamount to preventing any decision of the house on the particulars mentioned in such amendments or on any other particulars connected with the subject matter of the question. In other words, to all intents and purposes it would have the effect of limiting the house to accepting or refusing the decision of the committee, and nothing more.

I have examined Hansard and have been unable to come to the conclusion—unless a very narrow interpretation, which would seem to me arbitrary, is given to what was said in the house with regard to this committee—that there was any intention unanimously expressed or any final agreement that the normal procedure should not be followed when the house would be acting upon the reports of the committee.

7. Conclusion

In conclusion I may say that if we look at all the special circumstances surrounding the complex and what seems to be unique problem confronting us, I think, rightly or wrongly, that to a great extent the problem goes beyond the mere strict and rigid technical and procedural sphere and that, for a large part, the answer is to be found in asking ourselves what is fair and equitable, having regard among other things to the surrounding circumstances, the commitments or agreements made, and also having regard to the desirability of not depriving members of certain basic rights through technicalities, real, doubtful or fictitious.

After careful consideration of all the factors involved I can come to no other conclusion but that in the present circumstances the point of order cannot be entertained. It is my intention to put the amendment before the house.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we on this side accept without question your ruling and learned decision. The amendment presumably is in order, and if it were carried the committee would be revived, presumably without any time limit at all. However, the amendment deals with a plebiscite. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition has more than once, and as recently as yesterday, declared his desire to have the question of a plebiscite dealt with at once without further debate. I propose therefore, Mr. Speaker, that we take the vote on the amendment at once.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to put the amendment. It has been moved by Mr. Monteith, seconded by Mr. Rapp:

> That the sixth report of the special committee be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to strike out paragraph seven of the said report and substitute therefor the following:
> "However, as the final vote of the committee did not reveal a sufficient degree of unanimity for the proposed design for a national flag for Canada, your committee therefore recommends that the government be authorized"—

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I dispense?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask, for guidance, whether Your Honour proposes to limit the debate on this amendment to the question of a plebiscite?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: I implied that in my statement, in saying that during the previous days on which this question had been discussed the Chair had been extremely lenient in order to give ample opportunity to any hon. member who wanted to say anything on the flag question, but that in future I thought that the rules of relevancy should be strictly applied.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I take it that you are not making a blanket ruling in advance, but that as arguments are put forward the determination will then be made by Your Honour.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Elgin.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I raise a point of order as to whether the speakers yesterday spoke on the main motion or on the amendment.

Mr. J. A. McBain (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I can probably answer the point raised by the Prime Minister. I mentioned at the outset of my remarks last evening that I was speaking on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Perth, and that I propose to endeavour to do in concluding my remarks today. When speaking on this amendment last evening I also mentioned that in all fairness to those people who had been in contact—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. McBain: I was saying, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Elgin.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Give them some more peanuts down there.

Mr. McBain: As I was saying, last evening I mentioned that I wished to put forward for consideration some passages from correspondence I have received from those who support the new design and those who favour the retention of the red ensign. I was just reaching those comments last night when we arrived at the hour of ten o'clock. As I made that reference, Mr. Speaker, I hope you will allow me to refer to some of the correspondence I have received on this matter. The first letter from which I wish to quote today was received from the chairman of the flag committee of the Royal Canadian Legion. This letter is under date June 10, and he says:

> Many, many thanks for your kind letter of June 5 with which you enclosed copy of Hansard for June 1 which I eagerly perused. I am sure I speak for all members of the Royal Canadian Legion and other loyal Canadians when I say our most grateful and sincere thanks to you and your fellow members of the House of Commons for the tremendous effort you are making in an effort to keep our flag —the Canadian red ensign—flying. I assure you we will do our bit. We had a wonderful convention and I feel sure millions of Canadians now realize that we do have a truly distinctive Canadian flag and whoever heard of the red ensign causing disunity? I was on T.V. C.B.C. and this was one of the points I stressed.

I should like to put on record some feelings of another of my correspondents, who says:

> Regarding the flag issue, my husband and I hold this opinion.
> A spokesman for the French Canadians who are a minority group, says that any flag incorporating the union jack is totally unacceptable to them. What about the majority group of Canadians in every other province who would consider any flag not incorporating the union jack entirely unacceptable to them? Must we accept a minority rule?

Again I wish to quote from other correspondence.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): On a point of order, I should like to know how relevant these letters are to the amendment put forward.

Mr. McBain: I believe the amendment refers to a plebiscite, and I am endeavouring to present this correspondence to show why the people desire a plebiscite. I will not read all this correspondence, but another letter I have received says this:

> We have been and are permitted to fly in this fair country at the present time a flag known far and wide as the red ensign. It contains the union jack, which is truly a known and honoured emblem all over the world. Also on the same flag is the Canadian coat of arms, which is truly Canadian, and while the union jack makes the flag part of the British commonwealth of nations, the Canadian coat of arms identifies this as a Canadian flag.
> The right and justice this flag symbolizes has been fought for by men of our country. This flag was here before a lot of people who are now citizens came here or were born here. If they do not like it they are free to go somewhere else, where there is one they do like. So let's keep what we have, while we have something to be proud of, instead of a few dried up maple leaves, or something else to satisfy Quebec and a few others.

An hon. Member: What has that to do with the plebiscite?

Mr. McBain: I am endeavouring to point out that the flag question is creating disunity. It is pitting one part of Canada against another part. I am showing the feelings of the people in other parts of the country who live outside the province of Quebec. This correspondent continues:

> When the time comes to vote on this flag issue how many members will be coerced into voting for a new flag fearing that if this issue is defeated the Pearson government will call an election. I hope that you will use your vote and influence to retain our present flag, the red ensign.

Then I received a photograph from Winnipeg showing the citizenship court in session in that city. It depicts a swearing in ceremony for new Canadians which was held on March 4, 1964. In the background on the wall are two red ensigns in the form of a V. At the top of the V is the Canadian coat of arms. Below that picture is Her Majesty the Queen. This is a matter which is again creating disunity in Canada.

Mr. Caron: Why do you not speak on the amendment?

Mr. MacEwan: Go to Hull.

Mr. Mandziuk: Stand up when you want to speak.

Mr. McBain: Now I should like to refer to a telegram which has been drawn to the attention of the Prime Minister. This telegram was sent by the Canadian brotherhood of railway, transport and general workers, and is embodied in a letter which reads:

Dear Sir:

I am respectfully drawing to your attention the following resolution:

Whereas local 97, Canadian brotherhood of railway, transport and general workers, St. Thomas, Ontario, do hereby support with strong intent the Canadian red ensign as the national flag of the Dominion of Canada and that no other design or proposed design will be acceptable as a national flag by this local.

This resolution was passed unanimously at a meeting of this local this 13th day of May, 1964.

This letter was signed by the president and secretary.

A few weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, when the representatives of the commonwealth countries were meeting in the west block, we had an opportunity to view the flags of each one of those nations. I viewed them on many occasions and was quite interested to note, as I am sure other hon. members of the House of Commons noted, that six of the commonwealth countries have incorporated in their flag the union jack. I refer to the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia. One day when I was standing outside the west block a tourist came along, and I asked this party to pick out the flag he liked best. I do not know where he came from and I did not ask him. I do not know whether he was from the United States or Canada, but he picked out our present ensign.

Having put forward these views, to satisfy my hon. friends across the other side I will quote from a few letters written by some who desire a flag other than the red ensign. I am sure members will not call me to order when I mention these letters. Here is one which says, in part:

Our country is today facing trying times due to fanatic separatists in Quebec who are the first to benefit by the stubborn insistence of these England-lovers to keep the union jack on our flag. A truly Canadian emblem such as the maple leaf should be the only emblem on our banner and should create greater unity throughout Canada and would serve to abolish the hyphenated Canadianism we now have. We should all be proud to consider ourselves as Canadians first and if we must still fly the union jack we could do so as a commonwealth banner. I cannot understand how anyone who claims to be a Canadian could be satisfied with anything less than a truly distinctive Canadian flag without any foreign symbol whether it be British or French or that of any other country. ...

We have a wonderful country here so let us all unite behind a symbol of which we can all be proud and love no matter what our racial origin was. Let us all be Canadians first and put Canada ahead of Britain, France, or any other country in the world.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The amendment before the house is to refer the report back to the committee for the discussion of a very definite question, the holding of a plebiscite.

The hon. member who has the floor at present is discussing just about anything except the amendment. In view of the very wise remarks you made a moment ago to point out that the debate is restricted to the amendment, I suggest that the hon. member should come back to the amendment or, still better, since the amendment was moved by his own party, that we should take the vote immediately.

At any rate, I feel that the hon. member's remarks are not relevant to the matter under consideration, since he is now reading letters he received. We all got letters about the flag but if we all started reading them, there would be no end to this discussion.

Consequently, I would ask you to call the hon. member to order so that the debate may be concluded as soon as possible.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, it seems rather strange that the hon. member for Lapointe should claim that the remarks of the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. McBain) are not relevant, while almost everytime he speaks during a discussion, the hon. member for Lapointe is the first to make statements which are out of order as regards the rule of relevancy.

There seems to be a rule for the hon. member and another rule for the rest of the house. This is not the first time that he rises on a point of order; whether it comes from the opposition side or from the government benches, if something does not please him the hon. member always takes exception, but when he is called to order, he claims that he is being throttled. Let him bridle his tongue instead of rising on points of order.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think I need any more instruction on this point, but I should like to refer hon. members to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 119 (3), which reads as follows:

> Relevancy is not easy to define. A wrong comprehension of it may have a serious effect on the freedom of speech. Members are often deprived of their right to speak on the pretext that their remarks are irrelevant when as a matter of fact they refer to matters perhaps remote but yet related, even indirectly, to the question under debate. In borderline cases the member should be given the benefit of the doubt. A great deal of latitude must be allowed in the House of Commons which is a forum where every phase of public affairs can be discussed and every member has the right to be heard, even if in doing so he sometimes disregards the rigidity of procedure.

I hope the hon. member for Elgin, having heard the discussion, will do his best to speak to the amendment.

Mr. McBain: Mr. Speaker, in pointing out the attitudes taken in correspondence I have received I was endeavouring to put before this house the divergence of public opinion, in a fair manner to each side of the question about the flag and a plebiscite. I read some comments from correspondence from individuals who prefer retention of the red ensign, and some from correspondence from individuals who prefer the other design.

Mr. Grégoire: Oh, oh.

Mr. McBain: If the hon. member for Lapointe does not wish to hear these expressions of opinion it must be because they irritate him. I suggest that otherwise he would not rise on points of order.

Mr. Speaker, I have tried to be fair to both expressions of opinion in the correspondence I have received. I do not want to draw attention to one other telegram I have received in favour of the retention of the red ensign, but I should like to draw attention to a telegram I received which endorses a new flag. This telegram is from the international association of machinists, local 1975, St. Thomas, Ontario, which reads:

> Members of international association of machinists local 1975 St. Thomas Ontario endorse the idea of a new distinctive flag for Canada.

Yesterday we were informed by the chairman and other members of the flag committee about the diligence of hon. members in attending committee meetings, which sometimes occurred as often as three times in one day. It is gratifying to know that this committee on most occasions had 100 per cent attendance. I might say that I wish other committees of this house had as good attendance at their meetings and did not have to wait for such long periods of time before getting a quorum. I will not refer to the specific committee, as I think hon. members know which one it is. I do wish to congratulate the flag committee for its long hours of devoted work in an endeavour to bring back a report which would be acceptable to parliament.

The flag question has been before parliament for many months, probably for so many that at this time I should review the whole situation so hon. members will appreciate how it developed.

The first indication we had of the new flag was on May 14, when the Prime Minister invited reporters to his home—I assume that was at 24 Sussex street—and informed them that the government intended to proceed with new flag legislation. On that occasion he displayed several designs that were being considered, and mentioned that the government would stand or fall on the issue.

Three days later the Prime Minister went to Winnipeg to address the Royal Canadian Legion, dominion command, at which time he said he believed most seriously at this time that we should have a distinctive Canadian flag incorporating the maple leaf design. The next day he showed a few designs to a press conference. The next day, on May 19, it was reported that the government was considering designs, and on May 21 that the government had reached a decision, but that decision was not revealed. On May 27 the design with the three red maple leaves on a white background with blue bars at each end was made public.

I wonder why the Prime Minister brought in that type of design; because on looking through the parliamentary guide I noticed the Prime Minister was born on April 23, which is St. George's day. I would have expected the Prime Minister, in recognition of his birthday, to suggest a design that at least had some religious crosses on it.

It is the opinion of the majority of the general public on the question of the flag that it has been badly mismanaged by the Prime Minister and the government from the start. First we were asked to accept one design or there would be a general election. The Prime Minister had his sights set on the unfurling of a flag of this design by July 1 of this year. When that situation did not materialize his sights were set on a second goal, which was to have Her Majesty unfurl the flag while visiting Canada, and I expect she would have unfurled it while in Quebec city. The second goal being unattainable, the Prime Minister has moved on to his third goal, which is to have a flag by Christmas.

I say this whole situation has been badly mismanaged, because parliament was asked to make a decision on only one design, a design personally selected by the Prime Minister. At least three designs should have been submitted to parliament for a decision by parliament. Parliament was asked to make a hurried decision, not as to the choice of a design, but to accept one which was the personal choice of one man.

We hope that on July 1, 1967, Canada will celebrate its 100th anniversary as a united nation. Would it not be fitting and proper to have as one of our major centennial objectives a flag design accepted by parliament or by the majority of Canadians, through a plebiscite later approved by parliament, to be unfurled on July 1, 1967?

Again I must commend the committee for their long hours of objective work carried out in their effort to honestly narrow the field of designs from thousands down to two or three. That committee has reported, but we are still faced with the dilemma of accepting or rejecting one design and one design only. The committee's report would be more acceptable to me if it had given parliament the opportunity through a free and unbiased vote to choose between the one maple leaf design, or a design with the union jack in the upper left hand corner and a fleur-de-lis in the right hand corner of equal proportions. If parliament is not to be given the opportunity of deciding between those two designs there is no other alternative but to let the people of Canada decide between these designs through a plebiscite.

Mr. Rock: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Speaker: You may with his permission.

Mr. McBain: Go ahead.

Mr. Rock: Thank you. Would the hon. member tell me whether the Canadian Legion at their convention in Winnipeg unfurled or displayed the red ensign for the first time, and whether previous to that time the Legion at all their conventions flew or displayed only the union jack?

Mr. Smallwood: You are nuts.

Mr. Winkler: That is wrong.

Mr. McBain: Mr. Speaker, I am unable to answer that question because I have not attended their conventions.

Mr. Winkler: That shows where the Grits stand so far as the Legion in concerned.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, by Your Honour's ruling it may be that this question will be referred back to the committee, possibly on the ground, sir, that the people of Canada have a firmer grasp of reality than the members of this house, which may be so and may not; but it did seem to me that some comments on the questions of reality and symbols might perhaps be in order this afternoon.

When I was a very small boy, Mr. Speaker, if you can cast your mind back to that very remote period of history, someone put in my hands a little book of tales of an instructive, elevating and edifying nature. I presume the idea was to improve my moral character. There may be some question whether or not the effort was successful, but I will not press that point. However, some of what I read has remained with me.

There is one particular story which has remained in my mind and even to this day I can see the illustration that accompanied the story. It was a story which illustrated the stupidity of a dog. The dog was depicted as standing on a low footbridge over a stream. It had just dropped a bone from its jaws in an ill advised attempt to snatch at the more enticing looking bone which was reflected in the water below. Of course the idea of this cautionary tale was to impress on the infant mind the folly of throwing away the substance for the shadow. I would not go so far as to say that the effect of this cautionary tale was very great on my subsequent behaviour; nevertheless this story has come back into my mind as I have listened to the flag debate in the house.

I have noted that we have here the question of symbols and reality. Symbols, of course, are very important to us. We could not live without them. We could not live without the symbols we see on every printed page. We could not live without the symbols we make in sounds with our mouths. But because symbols are so important to us there is a very common human tendency to confuse the symbol with the reality. In fact I think one could go further and say that periodically this tendency to confuse symbol with reality has created many, if not most, of the woes that mankind has brought on itself.

We have only to recall the quite violent and bloody schismatic troubles that arose in the early Christian church over the question of whether the divine blessing should be invoked by the priest raising in benediction two fingers or three fingers. In this case, of course, symbol had not only been mistaken for reality but actually had replaced reality in the minds of those pious people, and with great piety and vigour they proceeded to express their own choice among symbols, leaving reality to fend for itself.

This would lead me to suppose, Mr. Speaker, that as a general rule those with the slenderest grasp on reality are those who are most likely to be concerned with symbols. I have had this confirmed by the correspondence I have had on the flag. I have noted that my correspondents can roughly be divided into two categories, those who take a fervid and emotional approach and those who take a cool and objective approach, and I hasten to add that representatives of each variety can be found supporting each contention on the two sides of this quarrel.

But this leads me to suggest that here we are confusing symbol with reality in a very dangerous way. In my correspondence the cool and objective ones appear to take the position that the symbol itself is of no consequence. They are much more concerned with the reality that lies behind it, and they have become quite impatient with their representatives because they are so concerned with the symbol that they have had no time to get to work building the reality.

There is, of course, one all-important fact about symbols, and this is what concerns those who take the cool and objective approach; namely, that the symbol should be accepted by everyone to represent the same thing. We have achieved that in our language. We do not quite agree over the shape of the letters that are printed on paper, but we have all agreed that these letters, whether we like the shape of them or not, whether we think they are aesthetic or not, represent particular sounds and that a combination of those letters represents a more complicated sound which in turn represents an idea.

I am coming to the conclusion that the Prime Minister may have fallen into this pit of confusion and may have imagined that by creating a symbol he would thereby create reality, seeking, I assume, the very worthy reality of national unity. It would appear to me that the Prime Minister has deluded himself into thinking that if he creates a symbol which he will label national unity he will have thereby created national unity.

On the other hand the Leader of the Opposition seems to labour under the delusion that a symbol can destroy reality. Neither of these right hon. gentlemen seems to be seized of the all important fact that first of all there has to be a reality which can be represented by the symbol; that if there were in Canada a reality which could be known as national unity no symbol could destroy it, no symbol could disturb it. But we should bear in mind that no symbol can of itself create reality. Symbols have no intrinsic value of themselves. They have value only as representing something that is of value.

It may be that there has been a poll which suggests that 60 per cent of the Canadian people wish to have a plebiscite on this issue. I must confess I would have some sympathy for them, because I presume this is an expression of their feeling that they have a better grasp of reality than we have here. But I would also suggest that this is a very unsatisfactory way of reaching these conclusions. I would go further, Mr. Speaker, and warn those who are so fervid and so emotional over something that has of itself no intrinsic value whatsoever that they are risking the reputation of the most important democratic institution in our country.

I have observed on several recent trips to the western part of Canada a singular lack of interest in symbols, a complete lack of interest in the particular design upon which this parliament may finally decide, and a growing impatience with this concentration on symbols to the exclusion of concentration on reality. We were not sent here to play with symbols. We were sent here to create some realities, and I suggest that the Canadian people are seeking from this parliament the creation of the reality of a united, prosperous Canada with a national purpose and a national identity, and we are not going to achieve that by any short-cut of producing a symbol.

I suggest to both the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition that they should bear this in mind; that we should leave symbols for the communication of ideas, where they are important and necessary; that the Prime Minister should not delude himself into thinking he is taking any step toward reality by the creation of a symbol and, equally, the Leader of the Opposition should not delude himself into thinking that because the Prime Minister seeks to substitute one symbol for another this will have the slightest effect on reality.

Furthermore, and I shall turn in a moment to this point, sir, the important point is that it should be accepted by everyone as representing something. I will suggest to you that whatever flag we choose, it will represent reality. It is up to us, as members of parliament, to make sure what the nature of that reality is going to be. It will represent equally well a disunited Canada falling to pieces; it will also represent equally well a united, prosperous Canada with a national purpose.

This flag, whatever it is, will be accepted by the bulk of the Canadian people in a remarkably short space of time as representing Canada. I think it is the duty of members of parliament, it is the duty of the government, to make sure that this symbol, which of itself is not of the slightest importance, has something worthwhile to represent. Let us get on with this and stop making ourselves the laughingstock of the country and the laughingstock in those parts of the world that pay any attention to Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Girouard (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, if I take the floor today it is for the very good reason that I promised my constituents to express, in due course, their point of view on this famous issue of the flag.

Now that there is hope that this matter will soon be settled I wish to make a few remarks.

Were it only a matter of stating my attitude and that of my constituents, my speech would be rather brief. I would only have to say that it is my duty, as member for Labelle, to vote for the distinctive flag chosen by the committee, and against the union jack as a second flag suggested by the government.

I am very much afraid, however, that it is not that easy; moreover I would not be satisfied if I did not take this opportunity to explain the reasons for my choice.

It seems to me that the flag debate will have been a test for confederation. We will have seen and heard people express freely their ideas, their feelings, their love and sometimes their hate toward the proposed symbols and the ideas which those symbols represent. We will have feared, for a while, that this ideological conflict would deteriorate into a racial or cultural one. But since any test is a source of reward, we will have also seen that, through the worse sentimental crises, it is possible to live side by side in Canada and that, all things being considered, the fathers of confederation were wiser than we thought.

For the first time in this house, the French element has seen the English element get panicky, haggle and recriminate; please note, Mr. Speaker, that I believe my colleagues had not only the right but the duty to act as they did. I know that they will now be in a better position to understand why we, from Quebec, are clinging to certain rights which we believe to be fundamental rights and which we want to uphold at all cost.

I have no doubt the house will also have realized that when I spoke of people expressing themselves freely I had in mind the members of the opposition parties and not the government members, for in the Liberal party there is unanimity. Indeed, the Liberal party has always been a party enjoying unanimity; for better or for worse, Liberals vote as one man. And why blame them if it agrees with them?

Even at the time of conscription, when the province of Quebec strongly opposed such a measure, Quebec Liberals all voted solidly; they were returned. Quebec, like the Prime Minister, was opposed to the acquisition of nuclear weapons, and Quebec Liberals voted solidly for nuclear weapons. Quebec was against the interference of the federal government in the field of education, but the Liberals voted solidly for loans to students. Quebec was against the interference of the federal government in the provincial and municipal fields, but the Liberals gave a solid vote for assistance to municipalities.

Mr. Prud'homme: And where does the referendum fit into all this?

Mr. Girouard: That will come.

Quebec strongly opposes the union jack as second flag for Canada, but the Liberals voted for such a recommendation in the flag committee, and I am sure they will vote solidly for the union jack when that proposal comes before the house.

Therefore, to grasp what occurred concerning the flag I must note the behaviour of free members, that is the members of the various opposition parties.

It is astonishing to see how public men, with the same degree of sincerity, can take such different stands on fundamental issues. Such attitudes cannot be explained otherwise than through a study of the Anglo-Saxon and Latin-French temperaments, which are altogether different.

This brief sociological study will not settle anything, I am sure, but if I could convince the house and the Canadian people that the phenomena which are taking place at the confederation level are not monstrosities, but normal reactions for the two racial groups which founded this country, I would have made quite a step toward the dialogue.

The Latin temperament that French Canada inherited is not a conservative one, in the psychological sense of the word. One has but to study the history of France to find how different it is, say, from that of Britain. Latins have violent, if not revolutionary, reactions. In France, an emperor dethroned a king, a king dethroned an emperor, a revolution dethroned a king, republican regimes came and fell one after another. France today has achieved a certain stability through a president who, with the sovereign consent of the French people, acts much more like a dictator.

In the United Kingdom, on the other hand, when constitutional conflicts did occur, it was always to protect the established principles and traditions—

Mr. Drouin: I am greatly interested by the wanton spirit shown by the hon. member for Labelle, but I have yet to see what his comments have to do with the amendment now before us and the referendum it proposes.

Mr. Girouard: Mr. Speaker, as soon—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Labelle and I have the impression that what he has said up to now is just an introduction to his subject.

Mr. Prud'homme: A lengthy introduction.

Mr. Girouard: Mr. Speaker, in this house, as soon as we try to forget politics a little to underline the reality at the bottom of the whole matter, as soon as we try to study the reactions of hon. members, in other words, as soon as we leave small politics, people claim we are wandering from the subject. I say that on a matter like the flag, if the members of the House of Commons had searched their souls before taking a stupid stand, confederation would not have been endangered.

Mr. Speaker, I shall proceed with my study. I was saying that in Great Britain, for instance, the kingdom has broken up, the empire has distintegrated, the commonwealth is in a bad way but has managed to survive; however, the monarchy still remains as a symbol of stability within order.

What I mean by all this is merely that, for the Latin people, vested interests are only worth their usefulness, whereas for Anglo-Saxons, traditions are law.

It must be admitted, in all fairness, that for my English speaking colleagues, who displayed on their ships, on their battlefields, and cherished a flag symbolizing affection for proud Albion through many centuries, it was quite disappointing to witness the removal at one sweep of any symbol on the flag they considered as their own, as their Canadian flag, which, besides, had been acknowledged as such by Mackenzie King in 1945 when he decreed—and this is the irony of fate—that the red ensign would be flown whenever it would be desirable to "erect a distinctive flag"—

Mr. Drouin: Hoist.

Mr. Girouard: Hoist. I am glad the hon. member corrected me, because it is the only sensible thing he has said about the flag.

Besides, those inclined to question the honesty of some of my colleagues need only recall the rousing plea of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) in order to admit that, rightly or wrongly, he was then speaking from the heart.

I feel, however, that some of my colleagues have been more Roman Catholic than the Pope, more English than the British people, more crown conscious than the Queen.

They must keep in mind that the 20th century also has its rights. They must remember that conservative England has, most shockingly, just elected a socialist government, and with the kindly tolerance of Her Majesty herself.

A lot of things were said in the course of this debate and many of them were regrettable.

However, I should like to say that the flag recommended by the committee is not a Quebec flag. If my province greets it so enthusiastically, it is not because it is anti-monarchist; it is not. Nor is it because it is anti-British; it is neither anti-British nor anti-colonial. Quebec supports that flag because it is wholly Canadian.

I should like to pause here a moment to point out the paradoxical situation in which we find ourselves following this epic and emotional debate. I have just stated that French Canada is proud of having a wholly Canadian flag. That is true but I can understand why such an attitude on our part may surprise our fellow citizens.

I refer to the fact that as an ethical group we refuse to have Canada become a melting pot in the American fashion where all citizens would be "Canadians". We want both nations, the French speaking and the English speaking to retain their own identity within one Canada.

We Quebeckers, refuse to surrender our rights to the French language and we struggle, in order that, in Canada, the two languages be official.

We Quebeckers, want to keep jealously our traditions and our civil law.

And yet on the flag issue when the Conservative party, from our leader down, want to give us a flag establishing exactly this ethnic, historic and cultural duality, we say: No. We want one flag for one Canada.

Just as astonishing is the reaction of our English speaking colleagues who always showed a preference for Canadian standardization and who, all of a sudden, offer us half of the flag to put the French fact on it.

Mr. Speaker, if public men have let their feelings run away with them, like children, it is no doubt because public opinion in Canada was diversified and changing, but also because once again the political situation refused to budge to make way for downright honesty—

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Girouard: While commending—

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member tell us whether he is supporting the amendment moved by his party?

Mr. Girouard: I quite understand why the hon. member is anxious to know my stand in that regard, but if he had the kindness, the tact or at least the politeness to wait for me to conclude my speech, I would be very happy to let him know what my stand is in this regard.

Mr. Drouin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has used up enough time for his opening remarks, and I quite understand why it took him so long to get here for we have not seen him for several months. However, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should abide by the decision of the Chair.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Labelle has the floor.

Mr. Girouard: Referring to the fact that the hon. member has not seen me in the house for many months, I leave the matter to the discretion of my colleagues in the house, visitors in the gallery and reporters, who know what to think in this regard. If the hon. member feels so much at ease and if he believes that I am intimidated by his insults, he is wrong, because it is more difficult to say the truth than to insult others, and if he believes that he can thus intimidate me, he is mistaken.

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, I am only asking the hon. member to abide by the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member is familiar with the standing orders of the house and especially the ruling made this afternoon by the Speaker when he invited the hon. members to abide more strictly by the standing orders which compel hon. members to stick closely to the matter under consideration, in this case an amendment to the main motion.

Mr. Girouard: I take the liberty, Mr. Speaker, to remind you most humbly that the previous speaker referred to the Bible for 15 minutes before saying a word about the referendum; yet, he had the indulgence of hon. members.

At this time I venture to point out, before saying whether or not I am in favour of a referendum, that as far as I am concerned my vote is dictated by my conscience and not by the leader of my party.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while congratulating the Prime Minister for being successful in his proposal for a distinctive flag, I must blame him severely for having dragged the Canadian people into an imbroglio which has proven disastrous.

During his election campaign the Prime Minister merely said that Canada would have a distinctive flag.

For the province of Quebec there can be in the flag no sign whatsoever of links with the past. But, for the other provinces, a distinctive flag is a flag representing no other country—

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, again I rise on a point of order. You made a ruling a moment ago, but it is obvious that the hon. member for Labelle is not complying with it.

In the circumstances I ask that he be called to order without delay.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Drouin) should have the courtesy—I know that he is usually very courteous—to let the hon. member who now has the floor go on with his speech and not tell him what arguments he should put forward.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you will be able to have him comply with the standing orders of the house.

[Text]

Mr. Nasserden: On a point of order. We have had these repeated interruptions by the hon. member opposite—not points of order, in fact, but simply interruptions in the course of a good speech being made in the house today. If the hon. member has anything to say, his opportunity will come and he should get up on his own two feet and say what he wants to say when his turn comes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am afraid the Chair cannot agree with the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden). The hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Drouin) rose on a point of order. The point was well taken and the hon. member who has the floor should limit his remarks to the subject matter before us. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Girouard) did say in explanation he was going back in history to indicate why he would vote for or against the amendment and I assume that in due course we will get the final word on the subject.

[Translation]

Mr. Girouard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Before finding out whether we were going to have a referendum on the distinctive flag issue I was trying to define what it is and, in my opinion, it is precisely the difficulty of arriving at such a definition that has caused so much misunderstanding and discussion in this house.

I was saying therefore that according to the Prime Minister's promise, as far as Quebec is concerned a distinctive national flag should not bear any sign of a tie with the past, while for the other provinces a distinctive flag would be one the like of which no other country would possess, and that does not exclude a modified version of the red ensign. The fact that the American flag has 50 stars does not make those of Burma, Australia, Egypt, Pakistan, Syria or Yugoslavia, which also have stars, any less distinctive.

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is obvious that the hon. member for Labelle is now provoking the Chair by not bowing to the ruling you gave a moment ago.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, on this point of order, I understand the difficulty of the hon. member to bow to your ruling, since he is reading a speech written by whom I do not know, but he is thus violating two standing orders at the same time: he is reading a speech and he does not keep to the matter under consideration. I therefore ask you to give a strict ruling. If he cannot deliver his own speech, at least let him comply with the rules in a normal way.

Mr. Girouard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on two questions of privilege. My first question of privilege is to ask you to compel the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) to withdraw his charge against me to the effect that my speech has been written by someone else. I will give afterwards the necessary explanations.

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, I find that the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Girouard) is quite bold, because he is asking the protection of the Chair to make another member withdraw his words, when his remarks are inconsistent with the matter under consideration and he flatly and systematically refuses to abide by the Chair's ruling.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I did not hear the hon. member for Lotbinière mention that the speech of the hon. member for Labelle had been written by someone else. He said: "A speech that could have been written by somebody else." I must point out to the hon. member that this problem often arises because some hon. members read their speeches, a practice to which the Chair has not objected consistently so as to make the debate easier for members of the house.

I do not believe that the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Labelle is well taken. In addition, I remind him once again that his remarks are outside the matter under consideration and that the point of order raised by the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Drouin) is well taken, in that the hon. member for Labelle should restrict his remarks as far as possible to the matter now before the house, that is, an amendment to the main motion.

Mr. Girouard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, Now, on my question of privilege, I would ask the hon. member who said that my speech had been prepared by someone else, to withdraw his words, and since he wishes to have some explanations, I would say to him, first of all, that I am capable of delivering a speech without reading it, and if I read it today, it is on account of the situation. That also, I think the house—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair has ruled on the hon. member's question of privilege and I do not think there is any reason to continue the discussion on this point. I invite, therefore, the hon. member to co-operate with the Chair and return to his speech.

Mr. Girouard: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has left a doubt in the minds of the people of this country on what constitutes a distinctive national flag. However, the Prime Minister did not cope with this doubt, but he took pleasure in amplifying it.

First, he defies the Canadian Legion at Winnipeg and talks only about his three maple leaf flag.

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Labelle is absolutely indecent. He even begins his words in these terms: "As I said."— He is thus directly provoking the Chair, and I think you should use your authority to call him back to order.

Mr. Martineau: I believe that the hon. member will admit that the word "indecent" used with regard to another member is not good parliamentary language. I am certain that you will not allow your serenity to be provoked, and that you will apply the rules impartially as you have always done.

I feel that the remarks of the hon. member for Labelle, up to now, are strictly in order, because he explains the subject matter of the question, which is directly connected with the plebiscite question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, I ask the hon. members to allow the hon. member for Labelle to go on with his remarks at least a little longer so that the Chair may form an opinion as to whether his remarks are related to the subject now before us, and to what extent.

As for the point raised in connection with the use of the word "indecent", it seems to me that the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes did not use it in the same meaning as the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue.

Mr. Martineau: Is there another meaning?

Mr. Girouard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Allow me to add that if some hon. members do not want to listen to me, they can always go behind the curtains, as they do when there is a vote which does not interest them.

Mr. Drouin: Is that what you did last Friday?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would ask hon. members to let the hon. member for Labelle continue his remarks.

Mr. Girouard: Last Friday, Mr. Speaker, I was at a political meeting explaining the events which had taken place in the house during the week.

As I was saying, the Prime Minister went to Winnipeg and talked about one flag only. Later, he came to the house and talked about a second flag for Canada, namely the union jack. Then the Prime Minister came before the house saying that he would leave his members absolutely free to vote on this matter. Some time later he came back to the house and stated that his members would be bound, in view of the fact that the government would consider a defeat on the flag measure as a non-confidence vote. And later on, the Prime Minister told us that his members would be free and that he would not consider the defeat on a motion regarding the flag as a government defeat, and he kept that confusion alive until the day when he stated: We shall go on to the end.

When it was necessary to refer the flag issue to a committee although the government had already spent two months fighting for the three maple leaf flag, its own members in committee voted against it and suggested a single leaf flag.

Mr. Speaker, I heard the members for Lake St. John (Mr. Lessard) and Danforth (Mr. Scott) praise the serious, honest and non-partisan work accomplished by the members of the flag committee.

While I was listening to them I thought I was sitting in the first row at an election meeting; I entertain no doubts about the seriousness and honesty of the members of that committee, but allow me to smile at their non-partisanship in this matter.

A mere glance at the report of the committee shows that, from beginning to end, everything was but a booby trap where one political group was endeavouring to catch the other. The results are quite obvious. Fifteen men who sat for six weeks, scrutinized thousands of proposals and heard a great number of experts, simply realized that the New Democratic party was right in asking for one maple leaf instead of three and that the Prime Minister had made a brilliant discovery when he advocated the two vertical bands which symbolize both oceans. Only, the members of the committee painted the two oceans red.

But, there again, it may be that the members of the committee did their utmost. Caught between the courage, the boldness and the stubbornness of the Leader of the Opposition and the diplomacy, the weakness, not to say the cowardice of the Prime Minister, they proposed a compromise—

Mr. Drouin: I can understand that the hon. member for Labelle wants to lend a hand to his colleagues of the Conservative party in a filibuster designed to delay as long as possible the adoption of a distinctive flag. However, I feel that it is time for you to make a ruling, Mr. Speaker, and to call the hon. member to order. He has not spoken at all on the motion before us.

The hon. member for Labelle imagines that his remarks are in order when he speaks on the proceedings of the committee or on the flag proposed by the committee. That is not the matter before us. In fact, it is an amendment to the main resolution and the hon. member should stick to the amendment itself and not refer to the main motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member for Labelle to bear in mind the suggestions repeatedly made by the Chair since the hon. member started his speech. The point of order raised by the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes was surely well taken and standing orders state that a member must confine his remarks to the matter under consideration. The hon. member for Labelle will surely admit that the Chair was most lenient in his case. I therefore suggest that for the remaining part of his remarks the hon. member should confine himself to the subject matter now before the house.

Mr. Girouard: Mr. Speaker, I now come to the referendum, but I have much displeasure to note once again that French Canadians are preventing other French Canadians from speaking when all they are asking is the respect of their colleagues; unfortunately, those who are asked to respect their colleagues have no respect for one another.

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The fact that I am a French Canadian and that the hon. member for Labelle is also a French Canadian has no bearing on the point of order I raised. I only did so because I think he should adhere to the rules of the house, and also for the sake of other hon. members sitting in this chamber. It is not as a French Canadian that I have requested the Chair to call the hon. member for Labelle to order, for I do respect the hon. member for Labelle. However, I do not believe—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The question raised by the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes and that of the hon. member for Labelle may be interesting, but I repeat that the hon. member who now has the floor seems to be straying away from the rules of the house, in that he is not confining his remarks to the matter under consideration, that is the amendment to the motion made by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten).

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. May I be permitted to call your attention and that of the house on paragraph (2) of standing order 34, which reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker or the chairman, after having called the attention of the house, or of the committee, to the conduct of a member who persists in irrelevance, or repetition may direct him to discontinue his speech.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore ask you to enforce this rule and—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This rule refers to a member who wanders away from the matter under consideration, whereas the hon. member for Labelle seems about to come to it.

Mr. Girouard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is fortunate that the house made a wise choice when electing you to preside over our discussions, a fact which allows the members to enjoy freedom of speech, even if they sit in the opposition.

Mr. Speaker, we shall probably vote this week on the referendum issue, and in order to be agreeable to my hon. friends opposite, I may tell them that I shall vote against the holding of a referendum.

They should be happy now, and I should be able to even better explain the decision I have made, because, as I said in my opening remarks, I shall vote in favour of the single maple leaf flag.

First of all, because such is the wish of my electors, and, then, because I consider it is important for Canada to be identified as much as possible as a sovereign country.

And since I favour the maple leaf flag, I fail to see why I should support the request that this matter be dealt with through a referendum.

However, I take this opportunity to ask the government to please show some logic. Either

Canada is prepared to give expression to its independence, or it is not.

If Canada has attained that degree of maturity, well, long live the maple leaf, and let us do away with the union jack.

If, on the other hand, our nation is to retain the marks of her glorious past, let us adopt the flag put forward by the Leader of the Opposition, that is equal representation of the French and English history on the same flag.

Actually, I wonder what the government will gain by sitting on the fence.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I know that my suggestion will not be acted upon. The great and unanimous Liberal party will do as it pleases, in the best political interest of its members.

As for my colleagues who are listening to me and who understand me, I am telling them very humbly that the time of the vote is near, because whatever the position of each one of our constituents, they are unanimous on one point, and it is that they want us to vote on this issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Girouard: Judging from such approval, Mr. Speaker, you can see that the member for Labelle is not out of order.

An hon. member has the responsibility to vote according to his conscience and according to the conscience of his electors. The majority must prevail. That is the basic rule of democracy. The people will have their say about this decision in the next election.

After all, Mr. Speaker, if a flag is the symbol of a nation many other conditions are required to ensure the success of a country such as ours and those qualities that no country can do without, namely, understanding and love of one's fellow men, should be and are deeply felt, I hope, by every one of us, even though I have strong doubts about this today. Those are the qualities which have up to now and will continue in the future, I hope, to promote Canadian unity.

[Text]

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, at this stage perhaps it might be useful to refer to the original motion before the house. I fully realize there has been a bit of dissatisfaction over some of the remarks made by the previous speaker inasmuch as it was alleged that they were slightly out of order, so I propose to confine my remarks to the amendment as closely as possible. I would suggest that the paragraph of the report having to do with the plebiscite is the one to which I would ask you to direct a good deal of your attention.

We have before us a motion presented to the house by the chairman of the flag committee, who served as chairman with great distinction, and I should like to associate myself with the remarks made in this chamber by every hon. member of the committee who has spoken so far. He conducted the affairs of the committee with great impartiality and with a great degree of fairness. He has conducted himself in his public statements since the committee reported in a manner which would lead one to the conclusion that his statements would not lend themselves to any interpretation other than as being a correct interpretation of what took place. Therefore at this stage I want to say that the chairman of the committee acquitted himself in a manner which reflected credit both on him and on the government which appointed him.

Now, since the original motion, which has now been amended by an amendment which was accepted by the Speaker this afternoon, is relatively short I should like to read it. May I say that while I do not pretend to be an expert on the rules I do claim to have a degree of common sense. In my opinion, if in the judgment of the Speaker of the house the right to refer back to the committee something which the house itself felt should be referred back were denied, then it seems to me that we are placing the committee, which is the servant of the house, in a position of superiority to the house itself. Personally I was very pleased with the decision of the Speaker from that common sense point of view.

The original motion, Mr. Speaker, is in these terms:

> That the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in.

I have taken the trouble to look up the meaning of the word "concur". I realize it is not a long word or a difficult word. Nevertheless the meaning of the word is of most importance to this house and the members of the house in our anxiety to arrive at a proper conclusion. I find the meaning of the word both in the Oxford dictionary and in Webster's is "to agree with". So we have a motion before us at this stage, a motion which has been amended, which moves that the report of the committee be now agreed with by this house.

I suggest that when we say that the report shall be agreed with we are also agreeing with the general proposition that everything that went on in the committee and which is embodied in the report is to be agreed with, which is a proposition I cannot accept. I was a member of the committee and I consider it a great honour to have been chosen.

In view of the fact I have said I was unable to agree with the motion, or the report of that committee, I should like to state that I take that position partly because of its decision not to hold a plebiscite. Having said that I propose to substantiate, if I am able, the reasons I took that attitude.

I should like to make two comments about the attitude taken by the members of the committee. I believe the majority of members came to the committee meetings with a desire to arrive at some decision which would be of benefit to Canada, but the majority also brought with them to the meetings of that committee certain opinions, as reflected by the committee report, that could not help but lead to the conclusion that their maximum compromise involved a substitution of a one maple leaf design for the government sponsored three maple leaf design. That was the compromise in the minds of the majority of the members of that committee. The compromise of simply switching the one maple leaf design for the three maple leaf design did not and does not satisfy me.

The most important feature about a flag is that which it stands for and symbolizes. If you discard these features, or if the country discards them, everything must be discarded and the consideration recommenced. It is my belief that this committee will be remembered much more for the things it eliminated for consideration for inclusion in the design than for the things it incorporated in the recommended design.

Mr. Speaker, before commenting in detail on the committee report I should like to examine the terms of reference. They are most important, and in view of their shortness I should like to read them. They are to be found at page 682 of Votes and Proceedings of September 10, 1964 and read as follows:

On motion of Mr. Favreau, seconded by Mr. Churchill, it was resolved that a special committee of this house—

Mr. Lloyd: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I draw your attention to page 451 of May's Parliamentary Practice, sixteenth edition, and quote to you from the first paragraph as follows:

[Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton).]

A member, while speaking to a question, may not introduce matter which is irrelevant to that question; allude to debates of the same session upon any question or bill not then under discussion—

I should like to quote now from the first paragraph under the heading "relevancy in debate", commencing about half way down, also to be found in that same edition of May's on the same page:

Debate must not stray from the question before the house to matters which have been decided during the current session—

This is the important part:

—or anticipate a matter appointed for the consideration of the house, or of which notice has been given.

I submit that what we would like to hear from those members who favour a plebiscite, and I think they should speak to that point, should be related to the question which should be asked of the public in the form of the plebiscite, and the reasons such a plebiscite is necessary. If we do not follow that course, Mr. Speaker, much of the debate now taking place will be repeated during our consideration of the main motion. There will indeed be a great deal of repetition, and it seems to me that you, sir, must take cognizance of these factors if we are going to maintain any kind of rule of relevancy in this house.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member participate?

Mr. Smallwood: The people from Halifax would appreciate hearing some contribution from you on the red ensign.

Mr. Lloyd: Mr. Speaker, I am entitled to address Your Honour and that is why I spoke on this question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Halifax has risen on a point of order which is obviously well taken. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton is aware that in the course of the debate earlier this afternoon the Chair referred hon. members to a suggestion made by Mr. Speaker today that the rule of relevancy should be respected perhaps a little more strictly than it has been previously in this debate. I would ask the hon. member to keep that in mind.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I said I was going to build my argument on the basis of the motion and then connect it to the question of a plebiscite. I am sure you would not wish to deny me the privilege of doing so. I do not expect any consideration from the hon. member for Halifax, therefore

I am not disappointed. I should like to ask how any person could properly discuss an amendment to a motion without making some reference to the motion itself. It just seems to make ordinary common sense that one must at least make some reference to the main motion.

I had begun to read the terms of reference to the committee on the flag, and should like now to continue to do so. The terms of reference are:

> On motion of Mr. Favreau, seconded by Mr. Churchill, it was resolved, that a special committee of this house, consisting of 15 members, to be designated later by the house—

This is the point I want to bring to the attention of the house, and may I ask your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, in not looking at the clock, as the hon. member for Halifax took up ten or 15 minutes of my time with his long dissertation. I do not know who looked up the citation for him.

To continue with the terms of reference they state:

> —be appointed to consider and report upon the flag question—

I draw the attention of the members of this house to the words "the flag question", because they are found in the broad terms of reference, and were not confined to the selection of a design. The committee was asked to study and report upon the whole flag question.

I submit that the flag question is an important question to this country. I have never acknowledged its urgency by any remarks I have made in this chamber concerning it, but I have acknowledged the importance of this question. When listening to members opposite who call out "question" on every occasion when someone on this side attempts to discuss this matter concerning the report of the committee, I have the impression that they feel it is a crime for any member to discuss this matter. I cannot understand that attitude. Perhaps they do not realize or recognize those things which are important to Canada. Perhaps that is the trouble with a good many of them.

In the process of coming to the question of a plebiscite, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that the terms of reference say that this committee is empowered to report, and that the capacity of this house is to act upon the report without restriction by any motion now on the order paper. In other words, it simply means that this takes precedence. If one were inclined to do so, I submit that he could interpret that part of the terms of reference to mean that anything covered by orders Nos. 44 (A) and 44 (B) could be discussed on this motion in connection with the committee report. Those terms of reference set out specifically that they supersede and override anything else on the order paper which has nothing to do with them.

I find no fault with the committee because the majority of its members felt it was their duty to recommend a design. I have never felt that that was a duty of the committee. I feel that the committee should have chosen to recommend to this house that a plebiscite be held, and that would be perfectly logical and the proper thing to do in keeping with those terms of reference. The whole flag question has agitated various parliaments in differing degrees, and this is what was to be considered and reported upon by the committee.

So at this moment, leading up to the matter of a plebiscite, I think it is very proper for us to examine what took place in the committee, because as I mentioned at the outset of my remarks we are being asked as a house, as 265 members, to concur in a report which was not a unanimous report.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, it was.

Mr. Robichaud: Did you say it was not a majority report?

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): I said it was not a unanimous report. I will not quarrel with the distinguished government house leader. The point is that we asked a question about making a minority report and were told that the report had to be the report of the committee, but that when the motion for concurrence came before the house any member of the committee would be at perfect liberty to get up and express his opinions with regard to the report. That is the reason why I say it was a minority report. All you have to do is to look at the report itself. The report was carried by a vote of 10 to 4. So the house is asked at this stage to accept the opinion of 10 members designated as members of a committee on something that affects almost 20 million Canadians to a very great degree. That is what we are asked to do.

Let us examine the report. We find that in the report the names of the members of the committee are set forth, as well as the names of the members of the subcommittee on agenda and procedure. The fact that the committee held 45 sittings in camera is stated and also that the committee heard 12 witnesses in the fields of history, heraldry, protocol, art and design. The report goes on to say:

> The members of the committee express their gratitude to these witnesses for their efforts in providing detailed information and also to the nearly 2,000 Canadians who submitted flag designs and suggestions.

Then I come to paragraph 5.

An hon. Member: You have read it.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): I have not read it. Paragraph 5 is subdivided into (a), (b) and (c). Subparagraph (a) recounts that a motion was made for a national plebiscite. That is what I am talking about, a national plebiscite. That motion was defeated by a vote of 9 to 5.

An hon. Member: What about 14 to zero?

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): The way things are going this afternoon it is no wonder we get our papers a little mixed up. The motion for a national plebiscite was defeated by a vote of 9 to 5. In the course of some remarks I made in the house on August 13 last I took strong exception to a majority of the members of the house, 133 in fact, having the responsibility of approving a design for a flag which discarded our heritage of the past and substituted a new flag for Canada. I still object to it. I objected to it in the case of 133 people. But now we are asked to agree to the majority decision of 15 people, so everything I said in connection with the matter at that time is enhanced about nine times.

Let the people decide. It was appropriate then and it is appropriate now. That is what was proposed in the committee, but the motion was defeated by a vote of 9 to 5. By the motion now before us we are asked to agree with that decision and I cannot do so.

Subparagraph (b) of paragraph 5 deals with the motion for the adoption of only one national flag, which was carried by a vote of 14 to nothing. I draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that this motion received unanimous support. Yet before the committee's work was completed it was conveniently discarded and completely ignored. The explanation given is that the second flag is to symbolize our membership in the commonwealth and our allegiance to the crown. This has been unnecessary in the past. Why should it be necessary in the future? Are we to consider that the national flag recommended by the committee leads to the conclusion that we will do away with our allegiance to the crown by adopting it? If so, I submit this is another good reason for voting against the motion now before us and in favour of the amendment seeking a plebiscite.

I also have some comments relative to the vote in committee on the motion that the Canadian red ensign be the national flag of Canada. This was defeated by a vote of 10 to 4. By the motion now before the house we are asked to agree that 10 people can decide to discard the flag which has been used, respected, revered, beloved and admired by the Canadian people generally for a period of nearly 100 years. To me any government which suggests that we should approve the taking of the opinion of 10 people in a matter as important as this are themselves not deserving of public approval and should not be in office in this country.

The Prime Minister and his supporters should welcome a plebiscite as a means of solving this difficult problem. In the course of my remarks on the previous occasion I contended that there should have been a non-partisan approach to this matter, that it never should have been relegated into the area of political partisanship at any time, because it was too important. The Prime Minister may have felt impelled to bring the matter before the house, but may I point out that Mr. Mackenzie King did not do so in 1946 when there was a vote of 23 to 1 in favour of a new flag. No doubt he felt the problem was too contentious.

An hon. Member: We are in 1964 now.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): In connection with the whole question of the red ensign I ask the government and their supporters these questions. Do they completely ignore the fact that the Canadian Legion wishes to retain the Canadian red ensign as the flag of Canada? Is it a matter of complete indifference to them that the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire are on record in every part of Canada as favouring the red ensign? Is it a matter of complete indifference to them that some 200,000 people signed a petition to retain our present flag? Is it a matter of complete indifference to the government and the members of the government that they must have received thousands of communications from Canadians imploring them not to discard or destroy the flag which we have been using for nearly 100 years?

These are some of the things which we felt should be pointed out. This one was defeated. According to the report, we are asked to express our agreement just because ten people voted against four. I, for one, cannot possibly subscribe to such an idea. The way this matter has been handled is another great blunder by this government, already noted for its performance in the field of blundering. I cannot support a motion in this parliament that would discard the Canadian ensign from consideration as the national flag of Canada. Remember, the motion is to discard it from consideration as the national flag of Canada. In 1946, as I understand it, a committee reported 23 to 1 to this parliament, to a Liberal government, on a new Canadian flag. Concurrence in that report was never moved by the government of Right Hon. Mackenzie King. He would not accept the responsibility for accepting the committee report at that time. No doubt he had what seemed to him to be good reasons. Right hon. Mr. St. Laurent did not bring the matter before parliament during his term of office as prime minister.

The present Prime Minister decided to have a new flag by act of parliament, giving as his reason that he had promised it during the heat of an election campaign. I contend that is not a good enough reason. It would be much more in the national interest to disregard such a commitment, because the carrying out of a commitment of that nature is much worse than being accused of a broken promise. I declare here and now that I have not and do not prefer any design for the flag of Canada to a greater extent than I do the Canadian red ensign. However, I will say this: I do not rule out the possibility that in the interests of unity in Canada, for the encouragement of a proper attitude by all Canadians from all parts of Canada, an effort should be made to find a somewhat different design more capable of general acceptance. This is the reason I favoured in the committee a design which had incorporated in it the symbols of the founding races of this country, and incorporating also a maple leaf which might be considered as having symbolism with regard to the progress of our country during our growing up period. There it is, Mr. Speaker. There is the design for which I voted. I make no apologies for it. I think it is a very fine compromise.

Now, if it were necessary in the interest of national unity and for the good of the nation that there should be some variation in where these symbols stand, I would be the last one to stand in the way. Some people say we have grown up, and since we have grown up we should run our own show. We should be masters in our own house. I subscribe to that idea. However, it is not necessary to throw out the pictures of our father, mother, grandfather and grandmother in the process. We do not need to do that.

Now, I want to have something to say about this particular feature before dealing with its significance. However before leaving the subject of the Canadian red ensign containing the union jack, I do want to say a word with regard to British justice and its importance to all of us. Many times we hear remarks related to the Canadian Bill of Rights for which my right hon. leader was responsible. I say that the Canadian Bill of Rights was based on British justice; that was the foundation of the bill of rights. By accepting this motion before the house, and I am now speaking in favour of the amendment, we are asked to do away with every symbol indicating we have British justice in this country. This is a far cry from the type of thing to which we have listened in this house during the last couple of weeks. Many people sleep better at night because they are citizens of a country in which British justice prevails. I cannot bring myself to support a motion which discards the symbolism indicating that situation, so I shall vote for the amendment.

On Monday of this week the Prime Minister stated that the people on this side of the house had been doing their best to prevent a vote on the flag issue. I want to say to him, I want to say to any member of the government or any member of this house, that I reject and resent that assertion. I spoke twice in the previous flag debate. I spoke because I believed what I said, and because a very high percentage of the people of Canada believe as I do. It is my opinion that they still do. In spite of this, the government brings forward a motion which asks us to agree that ten people should rule out of consideration the symbol of those things to which I have just now referred.

Now we come to the report of the committee and we find that the flag designs submitted were divided into three categories. Toward the conclusion of paragraph 6 of that report we find these words:

I want to speak about the word "elimination" and the words "agreed procedure". The procedure was agreed, without a doubt, but the elimination took on the character of a decision based on a previous vote. As a consequence, I want to say that the elimination is something which should be stressed in this house for the benefit of hon. members who may not have given the question of elimination the consideration which it deserves. What did we vote to eliminate? We are voting to eliminate the union jack.

Mr. Grégoire: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): This is fine, but I may tell hon. gentlemen that—

Mr. Bigg: You have exposed yourself.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): —it would be the things which they valued most and which are guaranteed to them under the union jack, which would be eliminated if they only knew it. I say they would eliminate the symbols of the Christian heritage of this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): This is what is embodied in the union jack. It is the cross of St. George; it is the cross of St. Andrew; it is the cross of St. Patrick, and it goes back to the time of the crusades. This is what those in the far corner, apparently, are favourable to having removed from the national flag of Canada. We are asked to agree to that elimination. I cannot do so.

According to the report, we find that in the process of a vote being taken, the three maple leaf design was retained by a vote of 8 to 6; the single maple leaf design was retained by a vote of 13 to 1; the design containing the union jack and the fleur-de-lis was rejected by a vote of 9 to 5. Yesterday the hon. gentleman who was a member of the committee, and represents Terrebonne, said in this house that there was one time when there was complete unanimity on the design, and it was the present suggestion. Now I know, at least I feel, that he would not deliberately mislead the house.

I refer the house to this particular paragraph because this is the paragraph which applies. It reads as follows:

> A vote was then taken to determine the committee's preference between the design containing three maple leaves and the design containing one maple leaf.

All they were doing was voting as between those two designs, and it specifically says so in the report.

> The single maple leaf design was retained by a vote of 14 to 0.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drouin: Fourteen to zero.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Now, if the hon. member can understand, I should like to suggest something to him—that seven Liberals, members of that committee, voted against the design which had been submitted to this parliament by the Prime Minister himself. Why did they change their minds. Two or three months ago it had to be three leaves. They were married to the three leaves. But they got divorced awfully quickly; they did not stay together long.

Mr. Roxburgh: I should like to make a statement on a question of personal privilege. The hon. gentleman has just said that members on this side of the house, all of us—

An hon. Member: He said those on the committee.

Mr. Roxburgh: —were committed to the three maple leaves. I should like him to know that right from the beginning—and I made my views known within the party—I have supported the one maple leaf.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): I would accept at its full value any assertion made by the hon. member who has just spoken. If he dissociated himself from the position taken by his party I admire him for publicly saying so. I am speaking in general terms. A few months ago it had to be the three maple leaves, and it could be nothing else.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): But in the committee they changed their minds and voted for one maple leaf—voted against the design submitted by their own Prime Minister.

Mr. Choquette: A question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member raising a question of privilege?

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): It is a spurious question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. gentleman would wish to allow the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) to state his question of privilege.

Mr. Smallwood: Sing "God Save the Queen" and sit down.

Mr. Choquette: Don't make any jokes about "God Save the Queen".

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who now has the floor has no right to say that we were determined never to consider any other design apart from the three leaf flag.

In so doing, he is not speaking the truth. The government introduced in this house a proposal for debate and the Prime Minister always said that he was ready to consider all suggestions.

The statement made by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton is false.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is obvious that the question of privilege of the hon. member for Lotbinière is ill founded; in fact, it is an argument and not a question of privilege.

Mr. Choquette: He tells falsehoods.

[Text]

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Just what I expected. Since we are on a question of privilege I hope you will pardon me, Mr. Speaker, if I explain my conception of what a question of privilege is.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. May I point out that the question of privilege has been ruled out. I might mention, too, that according to the clock the hon. gentleman's time has expired. However, there were some points raised, taking three minutes or so of the time allotted, and they will be allowed.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): I am only anxious to conclude my remarks and I thank you for your consideration, which is exactly what I expect from you.

I believe this whole matter, the committee's report and all the rest, has been mishandled; it is one more blunder in the series of blunders for which the government is famous. I make no apology for saying this. But there is no reason why even at this stage the government could not redeem itself. It could do so by having this amendment carry, by giving its members the right to have a free vote, and letting the report go back to the committee so that the people could decide. Surely this is the right way to settle the matter. It has been stated on many occasions that this is not an urgent question. It does not need to be. I am sure everyone who feels there is a degree of urgency attached to it would be satisfied if it were dealt with at the next general election in the course of a referendum held during that election. My feeling is that the government should seriously consider this course. If they do lose face to a certain extent it will not be nearly as bad as the disruption which I am convinced will follow if this matter is not handled in something like the way I suggest.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, if everybody had been unanimous that the motion should come to a vote immediately, I would have resumed my seat. But I saw another Conservative member who was getting to his feet to discuss the matter. Therefore, I should like to take the opportunity to give some of my impressions.

Today, you made a ruling on the amendment now before us. I shall not discuss that ruling, of course. I only regret one thing and it is that I did not ask for a vote on your ruling, because I think it is parliament as a whole that has authority on the management of the business of the house.

But all that is now over and we are discussing the amendment of the Conservatives which reads as follows:

> That the words "be now adopted", be struck out and replaced by the following:
> That it be referred back to the committee with instructions to strike out paragraph 7 of the said report and substitute therefor the following:
> However, as the final vote of the committee did not reveal a sufficient degree of unanimity for the proposed design of a national flag for Canada—

The quality of the French version is to be noted. I think that the Conservative party could not find one French Canadian among its members who accepted to write this amendment. That is why the French version is full of awful errors.

> —votre comité recommande alors que le gouvernement soit autorisé à prendre les mesures nécessaires afin de conduire un plébiscite...

Imagine "conduire un plébiscite" instead of an automobile.

> ...lors de la prochaine élection générale afin que le peuple canadien soit fourni l'occasion...

You may well smile, Mr. Speaker, because it is really funny to hear such jargon.

> ...qui en est son droit, de déclarer son choix pour un drapeau national.

Mr. Grégoire: That was concocted by the member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Caouette: Once more, I say that no French Canadian member of the Conservative group agreed to translate the original amendment which was drafted in English.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Lambert is not a French Canadian.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, this is the paradox with which we are faced—and it really is a paradox: That parliamentary committee was created at the special request of the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) after a meeting of the five leaders of the political parties in the House of Commons. This parliamentary committee composed of 15 members had not been mentioned previously. But the Leader of the Opposition told us that, without the establishment of a committee which would study the question of a distinctive national flag, he would not consent to put an end to the debate on the flag issue. At that time, some 65 Conservative members had already spoken in the house.

We asked the leader of the official opposition what kind of a majority he was considering should the Prime Minister and the leader of the other parties agree to the formation of such a committee which would present a majority report. He replied: On 15, 13 to 2. That is not a large majority; it is almost total unanimity.

The leader of the official opposition knew in advance that five of his followers would be sitting on the committee. There were seven Liberals, one N.D.P., one Social Crediter and one member of the Ralliement Créditistes, for a total of 15. The Liberal who acted as chairman, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) did not vote but the others did. After six weeks of sittings, the committee concluded its proceedings by a final vote of ten to four. In other words, one Conservative member voted in favour of the recommendation made by the committee. That was not sufficient.

Now that we have the report, we are getting into a marathon similar to the one we had during the debate on the resolution. It is a Conservative "talkathon".

Mr. Speaker, the amendment deals with the very same issue that the Leader of the Opposition raised during the discussion on the resolution. What the Conservatives want seems obvious: waste the time of the house to prevent the government from taking action and to prevent the passage of legislation. Their game is surely to throw the country into another general election which they themselves would have trouble facing, especially today—I know what I am talking about, Mr. Speaker, because even if the Conservatives maintain that the province of Quebec is the only one ready to vote on this issue, I must say that I have been to western Canada to speak to English Canadians, I went to Parry Sound, in Ontario, not long ago, I am going to Toronto next Thursday, to Trinity College, at the Kiwanis club, and in the afternoon, I shall be interviewed on television. Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives can say what they like, and resort to all the tricks laid down in advance by the Leader of the Opposition—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: —English speaking Canadians have had enough of this Canadian talkfest, they are fed up with this waste of time.

An hon. member is interrupting me. Right now I am ready to talk before any association in his riding. I will prove to him that his riding is ready to adopt a flag immediately and without a plebiscite.

One hoax after another has been played on us in the last few days, just as we have been misled since last June with those words: "The public wants a plebiscite."

In 1963, the Conservative members of the province of Quebec said: "We are in favour of adopting immediately a distinctive national emblem." The Liberal members said the same thing throughout Canada and that was part of their election platform, as it was part of ours. Personally, I was elected with a 12,000-vote majority, and a distinctive national flag figured in my program. The Liberals got the greatest number of seats in Canada. The Conservatives followed suit.

The members of the New Democratic party, at election time declared themselves in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag. But this means nothing to the Leader of the Opposition who is certainly touchy, for instance, when it comes to the matter of unanimous consent with regard to a time limit for debates on an issue such as this, one which has been going on for months and months.

Mr. Speaker, we have been elected and the people who elected us trusted that we would adopt a distinctive national flag, here in the House of Commons.

Today, the Conservatives, to play petty politics, strongly call for a national plebiscite. They want to ask the people who trusted us to select the flag they wanted, to vote on this matter.

I have said, on several occasions, that the design of the flag is of little concern to me. My personal preference is clear: I prefer the flag launched across Canada by the native sons of Canada on the one hand, and by some French Canadians from the province of Quebec, namely the diagonal flag, half red and half white, with a green maple leaf.

However, I do not oppose the adoption of another design, provided it is Canadian, provided it bears a Canadian symbol.

A while ago we heard the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton say that he represents a population which respects British justice. We have had French justice also. I am the first to recognize that we did have justice under the British empire.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us look what is happening around the world today, let us look at the countries that have always belonged to the British empire, such as Jamaica, Canada and others. Recently, when the members of the commonwealth parliamentary association met in Jamaica, a little country of about 1,800,000 inhabitants, that just won its independence two years ago, the flag flown on the occasion of that meeting was the distinctive national flag of Jamaica. There is a country that is still a member of the commonwealth but it has its own symbol.

People even went further than that. When the Conservative member attended this meeting, and I think perhaps they were two, the national anthem that was sung in Jamaica, during all their stay there, on the occasion of public demonstrations, was not even the national anthem of the British empire or the Queen. It was the national anthem of Jamaica. In fact, it was sung three times, without any attempt being made to sing or to intone the national anthem of England.

I hear those members telling us that the union jack represents British justice. Very well. However, are we not able, after 100 years, to have our own individual symbols as Canadians while continuing to be part of the British commonwealth of nations?

When I go to any social club, I do not wear my neighbour's suit but my own. Why don't we, as Canadians, have our own symbols and why don't we refrain from hanging on to something that we still respect when it is time, not to part with it, but to express our own feelings with our own symbols as a sovereign and independent nation which can take its own decisions.

We have nothing against England nor against the British empire as such. But we object to those backward persons who would like us to go back 150 or 200 years and seek to have the fleur-de-lis on a distinctive Canadian flag.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Caouette: Do we ask that French symbols be included because we are of French descent.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Caouette: We ask for nothing like that. We say more: if the Canadian symbol, now represented by the maple leaf on the flag proposed by the committee which considered this question, is not satisfactory, then let us remove the maple leaf and put a beaver, or a sheaf of wheat, or indeed anything else, as long as it is Canadian. But to tell us: pass a red ensign with a union jack in the upper corner and a fleur-de-lis at the bottom to remind us of our forefathers, to remind us of what happened in Canada in 1534, 1608 or 1790, etc., we are fed up with those things.

As I was saying a while ago, not only we French speaking Canadians, but also English speaking Canadians—I noticed it wherever I went—are fed up with it, and I shall prove it Thursday when I visit Toronto.

In my opinion, this amendment tends merely to make us waste our time, to carry on our debate until Christmas and after Christmas till Easter. However, I would like to say another thing to the Conservatives, who every day request a question period in order to speak on the flag. We are now discussing the flag issue—I see that the Conservative house leader is in his seat—I formally warn him that there will be no answers to questions on the order paper, that there will be no question period on orders of the day until the vote has been taken on the report of the committee on the flag. We shall comply with the rules. The unanimous consent of the house will not be granted. We want to know if Conservatives are Canadians, true Canadians, or if they just pretend to be Canadians, from whatever part of Canada they come.

I hear whispers coming from the Conservative opposition. They say that I am in collusion with the Liberals. No, I am not. Moreover, I have not been elected—

[Text]

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Is this man going to be allowed to refer to the opposition as a semblance of Canadians?

Mr. Kindt: I was going to raise the same point, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman who has raised this question.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the remarks of the hon. member; however, he can interpret my words any way he wants and it will not bother me in the least. If the hat fits, wear it. It is as simple as that. If it does not fit, do not wear it.

The plebiscite requested by the Conservatives is but a roundabout means to waste the time of the house. This matter was considered by the house before it was referred to the committee. Now that the committee presented its 10 to 4 majority report to the house, this question of a plebiscite is revived.

I say a plebiscite would only delay the adoption of a flag. We are the elected representatives of the people and we should assume our responsibilities as such.

If there is a majority in the house, the Leader of the Opposition can definitely not make me believe that it does not represent the majority of the Canadian voters. That is what they would want us to believe. They say: "You want to impose closure", and the Leader of the Opposition often says this, as well as some other Conservative members. Some closure, when they have been talking as they have from the very start of the flag debate. It is a Conservative political play. If they think of winning back public favour by so doing they are mistaken, for they are tying around their own necks the rope with which they will hang themselves for sure at the next general election.

Instead of only seeking purely political advantages, let us think and act as Canadians.

I said earlier that during the last election campaign we supported the adoption of a distinctive national flag. We were elected on that plank. Now, we would be asking for a plebiscite on this question? They are not saying that the plebiscite would be held immediately, no, but at the forthcoming general election. Should the next election take place two years hence, we would be dealing with the plebiscite two years from now and then, before ordering the plebiscite, we could still discuss the flag question and, once the plebiscite was over and a government elected, from one of the political parties, there would still be members questioning and discussing the plebiscite, because some will not be satisfied.

Mr. Speaker, have you ever heard of a plebiscite being held in the countries I mentioned a moment ago, which surely belong to the British commonwealth and have won their independence, such as Jamaica, Ghana, India, etc., and England herself? Did some people ask for a plebiscite in those countries, to choose a national flag and a national anthem? Have the duly elected representatives of the people no responsibility in such matters?

Think of those smaller countries I just referred to, Jamaica, Ghana, the African countries, that have won their freedom and independence and are still members of the British commonwealth, with symbols of their own on their flags, not a union jack or a fleur-de-lis, but, for instance, a true Jamaican symbol. They did not put a banana on the distinctive national flag of Jamaica. It is only with strictly Canadian symbols such as those that we shall enjoy national unity.

Let no one try to make me believe that if I wear my neighbour's hat, I am wearing my own clothes. There is no doubt about it.

The Conservatives will keep on talking endlessly, but they will be held responsible by the Canadian voters. Let me tell you this. Those to whom I appeal in their group are those who have already taken a stand and come from other provinces than Quebec, because I have met several who admitted to me they were anxious to dispose of this matter and to take action, since their electors were after them as they are after us.

Mr. Speaker, that is the wish I make for all of us, that we act in the interests of Canada. It is true that Canada is a member of the British empire but, as Canadians, we should act in the interests of Canada by incorporating our own symbols in our flag, so that we can be identified as Canadians in every part of the world.

[Text]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? I should like to ask him whether the translation was accurate, in that I understood that member to say that he does not care what is on the flag at all, but mentioned a beaver or a sheaf of wheat as being acceptable, provided the red ensign is destroyed?

Mr. Caouette: I did not say that. I said I wanted a national distinctive flag which could have on it anything which is Canadian, whether it be a beaver, a maple leaf or anything distinctively national.

Mr. Starr: Would the hon. member permit another question, Mr. Speaker? I wish to ask him whether he would agree with the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), that this flag will not bring about the unity of Canada?

Mr. Caouette: Which flag?

Mr. Starr: I refer to this proposed flag.

Mr. Caouette: To which proposed flag do you refer? The hon. member for Lapointe has never said anything like that.

Mr. Grégoire: I never said that.

Mr. Smallwood: You sure did.

Mr. Grégoire: I never did.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. If the former minister of labour wishes to lay such accusations, he just has to submit the text.

[Text]

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege. I wish to say that the hon. member for Lapointe on a previous occasion said that a new distinctive flag for Canada would not bring about the unity of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to point out that I have not yet said a single word about the flag, and that I have been absent for 22 days, the time taken by the Conservatives to discuss this question. And it is a good thing I was away, because that debate depressed all the other members in this house.

I wish to state once more that I have never spoken on that subject and, consequently, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) is mistaken.

[Text]

Mr. Starr: You made your speech outside the house.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, we have just witnessed an example of the reason the people of this country are completely sick and fed up with the party of which the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) is a member. We have listened to him point the finger of scorn at the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and at the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming). Let me suggest to him that if he used those members, of which he is scornful, as examples to follow rather than Hitler, Mussolini, and people of that category, this country would be better off.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Smallwood: You would sooner follow Hitler. You said you admired him.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has no right to lend any motive whatever, and I want to tell him that I shall certainly not follow in the footsteps of his leader, any more than I would have followed those of Hitler or Mussolini whom he just mentioned. It would be better for him if he were minding his own business instead of that of others.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, we heard the hon. member talk about a Canadian flag and suggest that we could have a beaver or a sheaf of wheat on it. Is that not exactly what Adolf Hitler said to the German people when he took their flag away and provided them with the swastika? That represents the same philosophy—destroy your history and tradition, and replace it with something new.

Mr. Caouette: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grégoire: Go back to England.

Mr. Coates: My friend, I am a Canadian.

Mr. Grégoire: I do not think you are.

Mr. Coates: I do not think I am any less a Canadian than you or any other member of this house, and I will stand on that statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to hon. members that very little will be accomplished by a shouting contest between members. I invite the hon. member for Cumberland to confine his remarks to the speech which I assume he proposed to make to this house.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question before he proceeds with his speech? Does the hon. member for Cumberland interpret the presence of only one minister of the crown in the house as a desertion of the Prime Minister's stand on the flag?

Mr. Coates: In view of the fact the Prime Minister's members of the committee deserted his flag completely, I would not be surprised if what the hon. member has suggested is an example of the importance they place on the present flag design. If it should be suggested tomorrow that some other design would be more acceptable and receive a larger degree of support from the country, I am certain the Prime Minister would pass that word along and such a flag would be supported this week. In that event I am sure we would hear all the trained seals say "me too", as usual, and they would stamp their approval on it. At that time we would hear the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) get up and say: I really love this flag. He would say so, no matter what it looked like, provided the Prime Minister approved it.

The speech by the member for Leeds last evening in this house exemplifies the degree of hypocrisy inherent in this whole flag question as far as the government is concerned. Never in the history of this nation have we seen a government as contemptuous of the rights of the people they allegedly represent. It is a government that has displayed on this issue deceit, defiance, delusion, demagoguery, dereliction and a despicable attempt to destroy a dignified symbol that has meant so very much to so very many Canadians of all races, colours and creeds.

What we have witnessed, Mr. Speaker, is this. On May 17 of this year the Prime Minister travelled to the Canadian Legion convention and told the people there that the government was going to have a three maple leaf flag, and that the red ensign was going to be scrapped in favour of this new design which he considered to be more representative and symbolic of this nation's history and tradition.

Mr. Grégoire: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coates: The hon. member says this is wonderful. I hope those members of the opposition will stay and listen to this debate. The Prime Minister stated "I have spoken with a select group of members from the press gallery and told them what I wanted. I told them also how I was going to get what I wanted, by making certain that the members of parliament would not be able to vote on this motion as their consciences indicated, because I was going to make this a government vote involving confidence in the government." We heard the trained seals get up one after the other and say how they supported this flag, how, like the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), they loved it, and then on September 10 the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) finally agreed to set up a committee to determine what the flag design should be.

The committee reports, and what do we learn from the report. We learn that every Liberal member on the committee voted against the design which on May 17 and for every day thereafter until September 10 the Liberal party told the Canadian people was the flag that should be accepted by them without question. We have the committee report before us, Mr. Speaker, and we see that the committee arrived at three designs upon which it voted, the Pearson pennant, the one they now wish us to accept and the one proposed which incorporated our past history and traditions.

I want to say first of all that when the members were appointed to the committee there were those who said that the Conservative members of the committee would go in there as red ensign men and come out as red ensign men, and that it was useless to set up the committee because there would be no spirit of compromise among the Conservative members appointed to that committee. Let me say this, Mr. Speaker. I was truly amazed when I saw the flag design that had associated with it our past history and traditions because in effect it was a maple leaf flag, about which these people on the other side of the house have talked so much, with a very small emblem in each corner which associated today with the past. For anyone to say that the Conservative members appointed to that committee were not willing to compromise would be absolutely and completely ridiculous. As a matter of fact, if I had been a member of the committee I am very doubtful that I would have been willing to compromise to the degree that was indicated in the design that was accepted as the flag incorporating an association with our past. It departs a long way from the Canadian red ensign.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, as dedicated as the members of the committee were, as willing as they were to attend meetings day in and day out and work, I have no doubt, long and diligently in order to come up with a solution, I say that to my mind the flag committee failed. They failed parliament, they failed the Canadian nation. They had available to them a means of solving this problem but because, no doubt, of word passed down to the Liberal members of the committee it was impossible to produce a flag that would have received the unanimous approval of all members of the committee, and thereby have eliminated any debate in the house.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that if unanimous or nearly unanimous approval could be obtained for a flag design there would be no further debate on the matter. Certainly I as a strong advocate of the retention of the Canadian red ensign would not have been happy with such a flag design. Certainly those who wish to remove the union jack from the flag would not have been happy either, but the flag committee would have produced a compromise against which it would have been impossible for any member to argue. But where are we? We are back in the House of Commons because of the regimentation of the Liberal party and the willingness of the members of that party on the flag committee to put their party before the Canadian nation.

I have said on more than one occasion, Mr. Speaker, that the whole point involved in this flag debate is whether or not Canadians are willing to allow the union jack to be removed from the flag. The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) certainly fortified the statements I have made in the past, that they are willing to accept any flag with any kind of design, whether it be the swastika or the black hand of the Mafia or a pumpkin, as long as the union jack is removed.

What could be more ridiculous, idiotic and completely stupid than to consider removing from a flag the nation's history, its traditions and the sacrifices made by generation after generation of Canadians who helped to build this nation and bring it to the point where it is today? I say that such an attitude can only assist in destroying what we have created and that the present government, so willing to do whatever is indicated as desirable by Gallup polls, is not one that is going to strengthen trust in the minds of the people who have some consideration for those who have made a contribution to the building of this nation.

The Prime Minister has put the house in the position where it must do as he asks or he will choke it off and allow no business to be done except to deal with what is apparently his childish pet, a new Canadian flag. The Canadian people must wait for the Canada pension plan, they must wait for the labour code, they must wait for anything else that is of real value and importance to the future of the nation and the way it progresses, because the Prime Minister of the country has the childish attitude that he wants his flag and he wants it now. He is not going to allow parliament to stop him from having it, whether or not he stops the business of this nation. We cannot even ask questions about anything the government is doing now because the Prime Minister wants his flag. What a childish attitude for a man who is supposed to be as big as he is. What a stupid attitude for a man who is responsible for running the affairs of this nation. What a ridiculous attitude for a man who is concerned about unity and about the effectiveness of parliament. The Prime Minister, more than any other man, is destroying the effectiveness of this parliament with this flag issue. Nothing appears to be more important to him than getting a flag so he can say to the people of Canada, "See, I told you that you would have it by Christmas, and here it is." How childish. How ridiculous.

Mr. Byrne: Take another drink; it is a rather dry speech.

Mr. Coates: There is one thing about the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). He does a tremendous job of interjecting but he finds it most difficult to stand on his own two feet and make a speech. This has been the case ever since I have been in the house.

Mr. Byrne: I would not want to make a terrible speech like you are making.

Mr. Coates: My friend, you could not make any kind of a speech, and you know it; that is the only good thing I can say about you. You have the common sense—

Mr. Byrne: That is a rotten speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Coates: I will say this: I would rather have others judge it than you. I would not really depend on your judgment.

Mr. Byrne: I cannot hear you; you are just mumbling.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Reference was made by the hon. member—if I may be permitted to be so loose with the word—to the effect the hon. member was making a rotten speech.

Mr. Byrne: No question about it.

Mr. MacInnis: Is this a parliamentary phrase that is going to be permitted?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Well, the word may be a little strong, but the word "rotten" was applied to the speech. I suppose if it had been applied to an hon. member it would probably be unparliamentary. However, since the expression was applied to the speech, it is not unparliamentary, although it is a rather strong word to use. In any event, I suggest the hon. member for Cumberland be allowed to continue.

Mr. Coates: I cannot say I am really concerned about what the hon. member for Kootenay East thinks of my speech. I was referring to the fact that we are unable to secure any information from the government because of the method adopted by the Prime Minister in allowing this debate to go forward. One matter I should like to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, which is germane to this debate is a question I have on the order paper. It is question No. 1,889 and it has been there since September 9 unanswered. This is a period of three months. The question requests information related to the cost the Canadian taxpayers will have to bear if a new flag design is adopted by this house.

Now, there have been a lot of people who have said—

Mr. Byrne: How much would a plebiscite cost?

Mr. Pascoe: It would cost you your seat.

Mr. Coates: There have been a lot of people who have said they could not care less whether we have a maple leaf or the Canadian red ensign.

Mr. Byrne: It will not cost as much as P.F.A.A. under you.

The Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Coates: The gentleman just has bad manners, Mr. Speaker, and we should excuse him. Ignorance should be excused at all times, whether it is the hon. member for Kootenay East or anyone else.

Mr. Byrne: You are so gracious; I accept.

Mr. Coates: As I say, there are statements to the effect that people care little about what the flag might be. There are some, but I do not agree that there are a lot. There are certainly some people in this nation who have no great concern about whether or not we have a flag. They might care, sir, if they were to realize that this action by this government in producing a new flag is going to cost the Canadian taxpayers a good many millions of dollars, to say nothing of individuals who have a flag now and might desire to have one that does represent this nation.

Here this question lies, unanswered, on the order paper. It will not be answered because of the gag the Prime Minister has applied to this parliament until he gets his childish way and we relent and provide him with a flag.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would permit a question?

Mr. Coates: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: Does he not agree that it would be more honest to tell the truth and say it is the rules which permit questions only before routine proceedings, and that the Prime Minister did offer an opportunity to the official opposition today to have a question period, and they turned it down.

Mr. Coates: So far as I am concerned, there are no degrees of honesty. You are either honest or dishonest. If the hon. member is calling me a liar, then let him look at Hansard of yesterday where the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) explained to the Prime Minister what was going to happen if he did not come forward with a motion that could receive unanimous approval and thereby allow the ordinary business of this house to be conducted while this debate takes place. The Prime Minister refused. He refused him like the spoiled child he is.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Coates: The amendment now before us, Mr. Speaker, is to send the report of the flag committee back to that committee in order that its members might consider the merits of having a national plebiscite carried out to determine through the Canadian people what variety of flag design they consider to be most appropriate as a national flag.

There are many reasons why this seems to be the most logical method of determining a flag for Canada. Certainly we as members of this house have indicated beyond doubt that we are not capable of arriving at a conclusion which would be acceptable to the Canadian people at large while at the same time preventing a deterioration in national unity. Polls have been taken by numerous organizations across this nation.

Mr. Byrne: Including one in Waterloo.

Mr. Coates: The poll in Waterloo South indicated that the Liberals lost their deposit for the first time probably in the history of this nation.

Mr. Byrne: The Tories did not do too well.

Mr. Coates: They may not have done too well but they were certainly an improvement over the Liberals.

Mr. Byrne: How did they do in Cumberland?

Mr. Coates: They did very well in Cumberland.

Mr. Byrne: Westmorland.

An hon. Member: Let him make his speech.

Mr. Coates: As I was saying, polls have been taken at various times across this nation by various organizations and on each occasion the majority of those questioned indicated the belief that a plebiscite is the best answer, the best way of determining the kind of flag which would be accepted by all Canadians.

I have before me the result of one of these polls recently carried out by Telepoll, a CTV program. It was forwarded to me by the dominion president of the Canadian corps association who also urged the government to carry out a national plebiscite. The poll in question states that of the 1,134 persons polled across Canada 51.7 per cent favoured a plebiscite, 33.9 per cent wanted parliament to decide and the remainder had no opinion. In the Toronto area, of 150 persons questioned 53 per cent favoured a plebiscite. Many other polls have been taken and most of them show a higher percentage in favour of a plebiscite than the Telepoll to which I have just referred. However, that is the latest poll because it was taken on November 28, and it is an indication of the continued belief in the minds of the people that they should have an opportunity to decide what the design of our flag should be.

There are many reasons why the people should be asked to express their views with regard to a flag design, but the most compelling reason in my mind is the way in which the situation has been handled by the government to date. I refer not only to designs, though in this respect members opposite have shown a readiness to change their views from week to week as necessary, but because the government has unfairly taken so many actions which have proven to be a source of great irritation to many Canadians. I have a telegram here from a Mr. J. A. Pope of Montreal dated November 27. Mr. Pope, in his telegram, has this to say:

> The flag on the main administrative building at the Royal Military College used to be the union jack. Subsequently I believe the Canadian red ensign flew proudly over that building. Now it has been replaced by a red and blue flag which is supposed to be the college flag. Since the post offices in Canada and the R.C.M.P. fly the Canadian red ensign I am amazed that someone has authorized the removal of the last vestige of the union jack from the Royal Military College at Kingston, Ontario. As you probably know, an independent country, South Africa, incorporates the union jack in its national flag. Bud Drury must be proud of this action.

That is just one of numerous examples of this type of thing happening across this nation at government instigation or, if not at government instigation, known by the individuals who take the action that the government will applaud them for it. The example of H.M.C.S. Yukon flying the Pearson pennant out at sea is just as glaring an example as the one described in the telegram I have just read. The bumper stickers that were to be distributed by the sticker-licker, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis), is another example.

An hon. Member: Where is he?

Mr. Coates: I do not know where he is these days. He is probably trying to recoup his losses from bumper stickers that reproduced the wrong flag. I guess the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) sort of pulled the rug out from under him when he instructed his Liberal—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not see that it is at all relevant to speak about other hon. members, who we must assume are doing their duty.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member is, nor do I care; but I do know that he endeavoured to publicize in what was certainly a most unsatisfactory manner the former flag design proposed by the government. He used government offices and his position for this endeavour. I certainly see nothing wrong in talking about this as an example of the type of action that has been taken by the government to try and convince Canadians that some sort of a maple leaf flag would be more acceptable to the Canadian nation than the present Canadian red ensign, or even the flag design proposed by the committee which involved an association with our past history and tradition. I believe that all these incidents when added up indicate that this house is no longer capable of producing a flag design that is acceptable to the majority of Canadians, even though it may be acceptable to the majority of the members in this house.

Certainly if it is necessary for the official opposition to stand up for the rights of a majority of the Canadian people, then I say it is their duty to do so. There are some people who suggest that we should now desist from talking about the flag or the flag design that the Canadian people desire. They say, "Don't talk about it any more. While the majority of Canadians still desire the same flag they have had for the last 97 years, the public are getting sick of it and you are going to lose popular support if you keep talking about it and holding up the business of parliament". Mr. Speaker, the first thing the people who put forward this argument should consider is that the government decides the order of business in this house; it is not the official opposition—and if the government desires to hold up the business of the country in order to discuss the flag issue, that is up to them and they must take the responsibility for it.

Second, I consider it a matter of principle that we must insist on a flag design which has an association with our past history and heritage. If we believe in this principle, we believe in it today and we will believe in it six months from today; we do not stop believing in it because some people feel that the business of the country is being held up, especially when you know that the government determines the order of business of the house.

I consider it is as important today to insist that the flag of our nation has incorporated in it an association with the past as I did when this issue first came before the house; and I consider that we are as responsible today in insisting that the flag that is adopted by this house must recognize that association with the past as we were when we insisted upon it when the debate began. I certainly hope to see this matter debated until such time as the government is willing to remove the committee report from the business of the house, until such time as it can more constructively be considered, in the light of the more important business that is on the order paper, or until such time as they consider that it is indeed wise to consult the Canadian people and let them determine what we in this house do not seem to be able to determine.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to congratulate you on the wise decision you made this afternoon which makes it possible to hold the door open for a compromise on this controversial subject which has been before the House of Commons and the people of Canada for such a long period of time.

Mr. Byrne: You can say that again.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think it is the desire of the house—and this has just been indicated by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne)—that we should as quickly as possible settle in one manner or another this subject of a distinctive national flag. Not only is there a desire in this house for the debate to be completed as early as possible so that we might get on with the more important economic measures that are necessary to deal with the problems that face Canada at this time, but there is also the widespread feeling across this nation. Your wise decision has made it possible for the house to avoid the mistake that was made when this matter was last before us, namely in refusing to resolve it in the only conceivable manner, to my mind, in which it is possible to achieve resolution at this time; that is to say, by means of referring the matter to the people of Canada in a plebiscite.

When I first entered this debate on August 23, I believe it was, this was the viewpoint I put before the House of Commons. I did so because I was then under the impression that the government, as has been the case in so many other major items of business since it assumed office, had stumbled into this unhappy situation. Nothing that has occurred since that time has changed my viewpoint in this respect. I am still of the opinion that the government has unwittingly blundered into this position and has created the impasse that we now find facing the parliament of Canada and in the first instance, the House of Commons. I am sure that the events of last week, for example, have revealed once again that on basic matters of policy, rather than planning and organizing the business of the country in an orderly fashion the government stumbles and bumbles, to use the classic phrase the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) loved to use when he was a member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. It seems to me that here again is a colossal example of the lack of constructive leadership that has marked the record of the administration ever since it assumed office just over a year and a half ago. So I repeat at the outset of my remarks that I hope that we will be able to vote on this matter of a plebiscite and that hon. members will see fit to get this controversial subject out of the House of Commons and into the hands of the people where it obviously belongs.

When the subject was referred to the committee some two months ago it was hoped at that time that an all party committee would be able to come to a compromise solution which would make it possible for all parties and individuals concerned to reach unanimity. It is now obvious that the committee has not been able to achieve this greatly hoped for objective. I was not a member of the committee and therefore I was not privy to all the deliberations which took place. We have had reports from several of the committee members, which I suppose will be supplemented by the statements of other members. We have also had reported leaks in the newspapers of Canada, which unfortunately did nothing to assist the committee in its very difficult deliberations. It is unfortunate that the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), who has played such a crucial and vital role in this question, was one of those who spoke to the press prior to the tabling of the report which we now have placed before the house.

I am convinced, as I was convinced when I spoke on this subject before that, as many hon. members have outlined, the only possible way we are ever going to achieve a distinctive national flag acceptable to all the diverse parts and elements of Canada is in the typical spirit of Canadian compromise. Because of the circumstances which have already been referred to—the leaks which tended to introduce partisan considerations into the discussions of the committee—it is unfortunate that we have not been able to reach such a compromise.

I was interested, Mr. Speaker, in the comments of the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp). Because of his own personal feelings and his own background, he was one of those who was most enthusiastically dedicated to the retention of the red ensign. It was encouraging to hear him state to the house yesterday that for the sake of national unity he and those from this party who had been associated with him on the committee had been willing to compromise and had voted for one of the three designs which were placed before the committee—the distinctive national flag with the red maple leaf plus the symbols of our basic dual ethnic origins. I think this is a major step forward because, as I have already intimated, the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale was one of those who were passionately dedicated to the red ensign.

It was also encouraging to hear my deskmate, the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming), indicate that he was willing, in the interests of resolving this subject and removing it from the House of Commons at this stage by means of deliberation within the committee, to accept the maple leaf flag which bore the symbols of our dual ethnic origins. This, Mr. Speaker, is the spirit that must be brought into the discussion by all hon. members if we are ever going to resolve this contentious issue.

Last evening I listened to the hon. member for Leeds extolling the symbolic significance of the maple leaf as a distinctive Canadian symbol which is accepted in all the parts of Canada, as well as being recognized abroad as something which is strongly reminiscent of Canada. I agree with the hon. member in that respect. I have always agreed during the course of this discussion that the maple leaf is an acceptable Canadian symbol. Veterans wear it on their badges. It appears on innumerable products made in Canada. When we flew with the air force during the war the R.A.F. roundel was modified by having the red maple leaf within the inner circle. But why is it necessary in adding the maple leaf to repudiate all the symbols of the past? That is the point I want to stress throughout my remarks. This seems to me to represent the spirit of nihilism, which is usually identified with those countries who have a revolutionary rather than an evolutionary tradition.

I am sure that all responsible Canadians would agree that the flag which is one of the three which came before the committee, and which bears the symbols of the past, is a distinctive flag acceptable in all parts of the country. Indeed, I would say it would be more distinctive than the one the committee finally presented to the house, because as has already been intimated this flag strongly resembles the flag of Peru. As a matter of fact at a distance it would be quite impossible to distinguish the Peruvian flag from the one that has been supported by the committee. I know this has been disputed by the hon. member for Leeds, but I have checked into the references in this regard and, except for the red maple leaf in the centre white patch, the recommended flag and the flag of Peru are identical. With this flag we would not be achieving the goal that the government has expressed time after time it wishes to achieve, namely the adoption of a distinctive national flag which could not be mistaken for the flag of any other country. Let us be reasonable in this approach, and let us not assume any position from which we will find it difficult to retreat.

One other matter I had hoped would be dealt with by hon. members on the committee is that we are not dealing with one flag only, but with two flags. The comments of the members of the committee which discussed this matter indicate that this situation was in their minds. Unfortunately we are dealing with a so-called distinctive flag and the union jack.

In dealing with this matter the government has never intimated distinctly what its position is in this regard, and this leaves the government open to a charge of political duplicity. We are going to have a flag which removes the traditions and symbols of our past history, while at the same time adopts another flag which reminds us of a time in our national evolution which we should have forgotten over the years.

It is a major breakthrough in this field, that organizations such as the Canadian Legion have finally accepted the red ensign as Canada's national flag. This matter was referred to by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier-Lasalle (Mr. Rock), who drew attention to the fact that it is only within recent years that the Canadian Legion has flown any flag other than the union jack. I suggest the Canadian Legion has moved forward in its thinking and has now accepted the red ensign. The Orange lodge of Canada, one of the most vehement supporters of the union jack, now accepts the red ensign. The I.O.D.E. has moved forward in its thinking to a position of accepting the red ensign as Canada's distinctive national flag.

We have a government which professes to be moving forward in displaying symbols which represent our progress toward national sovereignty, but which offers on the one hand a national flag devoid of any traditional symbols, while on the other hand attempts to reconcile the irreconcilable, by offering the union jack as a symbol of our allegiance to the commonwealth, in spite of the fact the union jack has been superseded by the red ensign and has been accepted by most of these organizations which were enthusiastically devoted to the union jack.

This whole problem is not new to Canadian national life, and of course it is not going to be resolved in one fell swoop. Nor is this the first parliamentary committee which has presented a recommendation to this house on a Canadian flag. In 1945 a parliamentary committee made certain recommendations, and I think it took a more realistic approach to this problem than the approach taken by the latest parliamentary committee. That committee recommended a modified version of the ensign with a maple leaf on the fly. If the government of that day had had sufficient courage, and had not been so concerned with obtaining votes, this modified version would have been adopted, resolving this whole question once and for all.

One thing that has been said before is of such significance that I think it bears repeating. What is now happening under the present circumstances is that the government is catering to the extremist viewpoint, or at least attempting to do so. The government needs to be reminded that it cannot appease or cater to extremism. A responsible government must provide leadership and take a firm stand. This government has not provided this leadership or taken this firm stand, which is the main reason for our difficulties at this time.

The Winnipeg Free Press heaved an editorial sigh of relief when the 1945 parliamentary committee report was published, and indicated in an editorial that it felt the problem had been resolved. That editorial states that feeling in these words:

> Only two small remnants of extremism survive the earlier controversy. On the one hand, there are still some extreme "loyalists" who want the union jack alone, but to this there are overwhelming practical objections, besides the fact that citizens of the United Kingdom understandably show no enthusiasm for having their flag used by Canadians. On the other hand, there are those who want a flag that does not contain the union jack at all. The Canadian people have continually shown by their actions that the majority feels otherwise.

If I may be allowed to interpolate, this is precisely the feeling of the majority of Canadians today.

The editorial then continues:

> Hence the red ensign has been for all practical purposes our national flag since confederation. Notwithstanding the lack of formal authorization, it has ousted all competing flags. It has withstood every effort to discard it. And it surely will withstand any future effort, for this is the standard under which Canadian soldiers were proud to fight and die in both world wars. It is by consent of parliament in 1946 our national flag "until such time as action is taken by parliament for the formal adoption of a national flag." The other day it was consecrated as such on the altar of Westminster Abbey.
> In the result it may be said that the Canadian flag question is now settled, finally and irrevocably, except for formal recognition by parliament.
> Surely the time has come for this final step. Parliament at the next session should declare the red ensign to be our national emblem.

That is what was said in the Winnipeg Free Press of 1954, and I think it is as pertinent today as it was ten years ago. Let me repeat, the government will not resolve this matter by catering to extremists—those who want nothing but the union jack, and those who want anything else but the union jack. Those are two irreconcilable polarized positions. The government is attempting to bring these two extreme points of view together, and this cannot be done by appeasement.

The proposed flag design now before the house represents the first actual and fundamental departure from tradition that has been put forward at any time during discussions on a national flag. Unfortunately, because of party discipline and solidarity, it seems apparent that regardless of the issue the members of the Liberal party will vote in favour of any government proposal. This fact has been manifested by the actions of the Liberal party throughout the years. To quote the classic phrase, if they do not hang together on controversial issues, they will hang separately. This attitude has been demonstrated by the members of that party on many occasions when it seemed almost impossible to believe that solidarity could be maintained.

The Prime Minister has made this issue the subject of a free vote, because the fate of the government is not at stake. I have spoken to many members about this subject, and many from the other side of the house have urged members on this side to continue the fight for a sensible and reasonable solution. I urge those members to vote according to their consciences, in favour of a referral of this matter to the people of Canada, because that is the only possible way we can extricate ourselves from the dilemma into which we have been precipitated by a government motivated by panic reactions.

An hon. Member: Oh, tut, tut.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think that is the only explanation of the present situation. Mr. Speaker, I heard someone say, "tut, tut". I repeat that I believe that is the only explanation possible, if one is to understand the precipitate action taken by the government in dealing with the great majority of controversial matters. As a result of the discussions of Canadian confederation over the past few months, the activities of the bilingual and bicultural commission, the visit of Her Majesty the Queen and the flag debate I have the feeling that today a more moderate mood is beginning to operate in Canada. As I understand the situation concerning the flag, the issue is not whether we shall have a distinctive national flag but what kind of national flag we shall have. With the voice of moderation now being heard in various parts of Canada I think it would be an excellent idea for the government to withdraw from the dilemma in which it has got itself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Byrne: You are in the dilemma.

Mr. Dinsdale: There is cynical laughter from the other side, but the government has repeatedly withdrawn from impossible postures into which it has got itself, and I am sure that events as recent as last week are an indication of this fact. I am trying to be conciliatory in my remarks tonight. Why not use this method which has ever been the method of resolving hopeless divisions in Canada? The government could safely use it as a face saving device.

From the discussion that has gone on in the press, on television and in the house and from the letters we have received surely we now realize that forcing a flag devoid of traditional symbols through the house is as divisive in certain parts of Canada as a distinctive flag with traditional symbols is in other parts of Canada. This is the problem we face and it cannot be resolved just by cracking the whip on the government side and forcing the issue through the house. In other words, what I am trying to say is that unity will not come out of a flag. Rather the reverse is true: A flag can only come out of unity.

The government has proceeded with precipitate haste in response to the extremism of the separatist sentiment that was rampant just a few short weeks ago in this country. It said that something had to be done to heal the wounds in Canadian confederation. I say, Mr. Speaker, that now that the voice of moderation is being heard, surely the time has arrived for the government to take a reasonable viewpoint on this matter. Just to show how the voice of moderation has been heard in various parts of the country, I point out that not so long ago overtones of republicanism surrounded the flag debate. I am not going to go over old controversial issues but we do know that hon. members of this house have even gone so far as to say that in another ten years the issue facing Canada will be whether we remain as a constitutional monarchy or whether we become a republic. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) has publicly uttered this viewpoint both in and outside of the house and it was obvious that this sentiment was present in the unhappy events which surrounded the visit of Her Majesty. That was a shocking experience for Canadians everywhere.

I feel that one of the high points of the current session was the day when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) rose in this chamber and asked all hon. members to join in an address of loyalty to Her Majesty the Queen. That was a unanimous expression of the opinion of the house. One of the voices that spoke at greatest length and in loudest tones that day in support was that of the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), and I recall a distinguished member of the press gallery, Mr. Charles Lynch, indicating that this seemed to be a turning away from some of the more extreme viewpoints that had been expressed in the chamber and in other parts of Canada. The leader of the Liberal party in Quebec, a former member of this house, Hon. Jean Lesage, has also been emphasizing over and over again the need for a spirit of compromise and reconciliation if we are going to overcome the present difficulties in Canada.

I am going to take the liberty of quoting from someone outside the house who is not necessarily well known in Canada but I think expresses a viewpoint which reflects the voice of moderation of the ordinary Canadian citizen. I refer to Mrs. Henri Vautelet, a distinguished leader of women in the province of Quebec, a past president of the Quebec federation of Liberal women and a woman with many other public services to her credit. She was speaking in Montreal in the middle of November and here is what the article says:

> A prominent French Canadian woman says violence in Quebec province is linked to a world wide pattern of violence and that French Canadians have used their emotions rather than reason in putting their complaints about confederation.
> Mrs. Henri Vautelet, former president of the Canadian association of consumers, said the recent outbreak of violence in Quebec was "the idiotic muddling of a lucidly defendable case".
> "While I cannot escape the evidence of history that today's strains and stresses on the fabric of confederation are 100 per cent English Canada's responsibility, I feel that French Canada must bear the responsibility for our stupid, sometimes ugly, and usually ineffective and mainly emotional handling of the required presentation of our case."

The article goes on to point out that she was guest lecturer at Loyola college and spoke to students in political science. The article continues:

> She said that recent violence in Quebec is a backwash from world wide violence and had little to do with Quebec's resentments.
> "Throughout the more civilized world a strange disease of violence, a free floating hate searching for an objective, and a deliberate abandonment to massed hysteria has struck the younger generation. Since Quebec is part of the world, I am astonished that the obvious connection between the rantings of our young separatists and this malady of the age seems to have been largely overlooked. . . .
> Slogans are not facts but they can be dangerous and substitute too easily, in minds aware of a grievance but a little hazy as to what it really is, for the actual reality of facts."
> She pointed to the "masters in our own house" slogan, used by the Quebec Liberal party during the 1962 provincial general election, as an example of an unproved assertion implying needs that no one has yet defined clearly.
> "For we are masters in our own house here in Quebec in all but crises of war, and we even have the power to protect our minorities in other provinces and to force a revaluation of our Canadian partnership if we used our existing weapons instead of going off half-cocked over minor and all too often unreal grievances."

I think, Mr. Speaker, that there is the voice of moderation coming from a very distinguished French Canadian woman leader.

I think it indicates that there is no longer any need for panic reaction on the part of the government because we are over the crisis.

Now, I have had many letters reach me on this subject. I am not going to read them into the record, but they have repeatedly presented questions that have never been answered in this house and which I find it difficult to answer myself. Perhaps I could pinpoint the problem as my constituents see it if I put some of these questions on the record. First of all, they ask me why the Prime Minister introduced the flag during the opening ceremony of the biennial meeting of the Royal Canadian Legion at Winnipeg. Was the Prime Minister not aware that this is a memorial service dedicated to the memory of some 200,000 Canadians who have paid the supreme sacrifice in defence of freedoms motivated by the values represented in the symbols that he announced would be removed from the Canadian flag? They keep asking me this question. Why was it done in this abrupt and precipitate manner?

Another question is this one. The Prime Minister suggests he is bringing forward the flag question at this time because of an election promise. Does this imply he feels he must discharge all election promises whether they be foolish or wise? My only aside to this question is that if political parties had to discharge all the promises made during an election campaign the country would be in a very sad and unhappy state.

Another question they ask is why the Prime Minister, if he considered this such an important issue, did not introduce the flag question in the speech from the throne, which is the normal method of outlining the business of the house to be brought forward by the government in any particular session? The only answer I have been able to give in this regard is that there was a panic response to the voice of extremism, as I have pointed out in my earlier remarks.

The fourth question they ask is this: If the committee was looking for a distinctive flag which could not be mistaken for the flag of any other country, why did it choose a flag which closely resembles the flag of Peru? I cannot answer that question.

Mr. Byrne: You must have had a letter from John.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, I have a lot of good Johns in my constituency, a lot of good folks, who are seriously concerned about this matter.

Another question I ask is, in a country which has achieved sovereignty by the process of gradual evolution, why has the government suddenly decided to deal with the flag question by the revolutionary process of repudiating the traditional symbols of the past? If I may make an observation on that, I would say we have had several speeches indicating this was the way it was done in the newly emerging nations of Africa. Canada is not a newly emerging nation. We are a nation highly respected in the councils of the world because we have always been a people who demonstrated a spirit of tolerance, good will and mutual understanding.

Another question is, in view of the fact that the restlessness in Canada is a reflection of the fundamental economic changes taking place in Canada, particularly in the province of Quebec where the full impact of the industrial revolution is being felt, why does the government give precedence to issues which divide us rather than concentrate on the basic economic and agricultural problems in Quebec? This question comes from the farm part of my constituency which cannot understand why this issue was hammered by the government all during the month of August. The usual procedure in the house, and I have been here for 13 years, is to tackle a matter for two days and go on to another item of business. Day after day, almost in frantic panic and haste, the government hammered away at this particular issue.

Mr. Teillet: The Tories talked.

Mr. Dinsdale: Here is one that takes us out into the international field. We hear from the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Teillet), who says it was the Tories who hammered away at this. I just say the government determines the business of this house. It was their decision to set aside every other item of business, and for what reason I do not know.

Mr. Teillet: And the Tories talked.

Mr. Dinsdale: The hon. member is new to the house, and does not really understand that the opposition can only discuss what the government puts before the house. We have repeatedly asked for consideration of railway and transport matters which the minister knows, since he comes from Manitoba, are matters of great concern to that province. During a speech in Winnipeg two weeks ago the minister made a vicious attack on the Leader of the Opposition. This has been the tactic of hon. members opposite.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Teillet: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I did not deliver an attack on the Leader of the Opposition, I answered the false charges he had made the week previously.

Mr. Smallwood: You did not.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have a clipping here from the Winnipeg Free Press and the headline on it is, "Shrewd, dangerous, Diefenbaker still Canadian Menace,—Teillet." This is exactly what he said. Again, Mr. Speaker, these are the sort of tactics that do not enhance the reputation of public affairs when we deal with personalities rather than policies.

Before the minister interjected, I was dealing with certain questions. We live in a world which has become virtually a whisper gallery or neighbourhood, due to modern means of communication, and yet is torn apart by the poison of narrow nationalism. Under these circumstances, why is the government raising controversial, chauvinistic, nationalistic issues at this time? This is a question I cannot understand. In a day and age when we are moving towards support of NATO, NORAD and the United Nations, when we talk of the necessity of North Atlantic unity and all the rest of it, we suddenly inject the poison of narrow nationalism.

Finally, here is a question that is heard more and more—particularly since the Prime Minister was in the west last week, because he was asked about this question: Will we have a distinctive national flag for Christmas? He said yes. The flag for Christmas promised by the Prime Minister, according to the committee report, is going to be this flag devoid of our traditional symbols. If it is to be regarded as a Christmas present, why does it studiously avoid any of the symbols pertaining to the Person whose advent gave rise to the celebration of Christmas? I think there is a fundamental conflict in this regard. These symbols, as I have already noted, do not denote colonial obsequiousness, but rather they denote that we have slowly evolved out of traditional western Christian civilization. Rather than repudiating these symbols, we should hold them to us as an example of the fact that Canada is still in the vanguard of bringing the benefits of our free institutions to all the people of the world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Forgie): I must say to the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): I am sure many of my constituents will be keenly disappointed, disgusted, even, that the subject of the flag should again be before the house at this time so close to the Christmas season. The large majority of them are very happy with our present flag, the red ensign, and many of them are more concerned about providing for their families. This year a great number of farmers are finding it extremely difficult to do so, owing to unfavourable crop conditions in many districts as a result of the drought; income is lagging far behind the need; many of them were forced to sell their livestock, their basic herds—

Mr. Byrne: With great respect I would point out that the hon. member is reading a speech which is obviously—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Forgie): This is not the first time that criticism has been levelled against an hon. member for reading his speech and I think the criticism is extraneous.

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): I wrote these words myself and I will deliver them myself. These people are very much concerned about their situation—more concerned than is the man who claimed on television the other night to be a great Canadian. I refer to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays), whom we see very rarely in this house. I am sure not many farmers in the districts which have suffered from the drought would refer to him as a great Canadian, especially those who were forced to sell their livestock at such low price levels, the lowest in many years. If the Minister of Agriculture was such a true Canadian he would be in the house today, because surely it is an important occasion when we are discussing such a question as the flag of our nation. This absentee member referred to himself as a great Canadian. I think he is well aware that no one else is willing to give him that title.

Why has the government refused to allow a plebiscite on this flag question? Why are they so afraid to have a plebiscite on the issue?

An hon. Member: Why are you afraid to have a vote?

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Let us stop to think. Had it not been for the official opposition we would today be flying throughout this country the three maple leaf flag, or the Pearson pennant. The flag committee—

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Forgie).]

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member is not only reading his speech but there seems to be someone reading one just behind him, coming to my ear through the earphone.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Forgie): I cannot conceive of that being a fact.

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): I can tell the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) that I do not intend to read my speech and I am not listening to anyone behind me. If the hon. member would contain himself he will, I am sure, have an opportunity of making his own speech. But for the official opposition that flag would, by now, be the flag of Canada.

I say it was unnecessary to bring this question before the House of Commons, when there is so much other work which could and should be done. It makes one wonder why the government should be so afraid of letting the people have a say in choosing the flag which is to fly over this great country.

All those who have been following this affair know that the committee was destroyed before it was even set up. Everyone realizes this. In the speech from the throne there was no mention of a new flag design and many members on the other side told me that no proposal for one had been raised in their caucus before the question was introduced in the house. If it was considered so important to change the flag, the intention to do so could very easily have been announced in the speech from the throne. A committee representative of all parties could have been set up to deal with the matter before controversy arose in the House of Commons itself.

I would remind hon. members that when it was introduced in this chamber the Prime Minister stated there would be a free vote. As reported on page 3164 of Hansard of May 12 the right hon. gentleman said:

> When the time comes to submit the decision of the government in this matter to the House of Commons I would hope every member of the house would vote as his conscience dictates and that there will be no question of confidence or non-confidence in a party sense.

A few days later the picture changed. The right hon. gentleman was not as strongly supported within his own party on the new proposed flag design as he had thought he was. And a few days later, on May 19, as reported on page 3337, when he was asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam

(Mr. Douglas) to say how the matter stood, he replied:

> The government must stand or fall on the result of the decision of the house. But we have gone out of our way, and I have gone out of my way personally, to let the members of this party know that in a question so personal, so close to their conscience, so deep in their emotions, as a flag, a member of the Liberal party in voting against the design submitted by the government would not be read out of the party for so doing.

So the picture changed. I heard members from every party except one say, in casual talk, that they were strongly in favour of the red ensign but would agree to some modification. Why did the picture change so completely when the Prime Minister said this decision would be taken as a vote of confidence? All the members on the other side, except one or two, ran for cover. What happened to the members of the splinter parties? Why were they so afraid that they covered up and got behind the government? Mr. Speaker, I could read what some members on the other side of the house have said in this regard. The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) is reported as having said, "The people of Canada have never asked for, nor have the people said they want, a flag other than the red ensign". Why should people allow themselves to be scared into accepting a new flag design overnight? Many people have said to me when I have been back home occasionally, "Have you fellows got nothing else to do? What is wrong with the flag we have?" Many people of ethnic groups from all over Europe live in my constituency. They are proud of the flag that we have. In spite of this, I have not heard anyone, when speaking in favour of the red ensign—not even in our party—who was not perfectly willing to accept some modification in the design; but it has been felt that the heritage of our two founding races should be incorporated in the design of a Canadian flag. I believe this was very unselfish on their part.

No one can say that members of parliament have not the right to heed the hundreds of thousands of letters received from many organizations and Canadians. These letters certainly warrant recognition and attention. There have been thousands of postcards and letters received saying, in effect, with regard to the red ensign, "Keep the old flag flying". Thousands of such letters have been received by members of the house, and surely they have warranted recognition on our part. Many organizations have written to members of parliament. Many of us have received requests very recently from such organizations as the Canadian Legion, the I.O.D.E. and others, which we must recognize. One cannot ignore this vast majority of people who hold something dear to their hearts. If one stops to think, one realizes that had it not been for the official opposition in this House of Commons the Pearson pennant would be flying today. I ask the house, what does it look like when compared with our glorious red ensign?

Now another design has been proposed, and in all fairness to the committee I wonder just what happened during its meetings. I have every respect for the maple leaf, but what would this proposed flag look like when the white background became a little dirty? What would it look like flying outside the House of Commons, compared to the wonderful colours in the flag we are flying here today? I wonder what happened to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), who was a member of the committee. How did he vote when the three maple leaf design was considered? This is the man who has taken so much credit for bringing forward flag designs; the man who went to Winnipeg with the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) to try to ram down the throat of the Canadian Legion their choice of a flag, whether the Legion liked it or not. Where was the hon. gentleman who introduced this design, who thought he was an expert on designs and should introduce a flag design and nobody else should have anything to say about it, not even the members of his own party, when the vote was taken in committee?

We know that the committee did a wonderful job and put in a great deal of hard work and many, many hours. But as I pointed out, their efforts were defeated before the committee was even set up. Why should we be faced with this issue in the Christmas month? Some people blame the opposition. How can you blame the opposition in this connection? Consider the error we would have fallen into today if it had not been for the official opposition. Consider what would have been flying over this House of Commons. Can you blame the official opposition because the government has seen fit to bring forward this issue again, when so much legislation is pending? I think the government and their supporters had better take another look at some of the fumbling and bungling with regard to the way in which the business of this house has been conducted. I think it is high time people did not have to tolerate such a ridiculous government. People ask what is going on in this session of parliament. One has only to consider the length of time this house has been in session and the many things that could have been done and which the government should have done, rather than bringing forward a maple leaf flag. Instead of putting a red maple leaf on this design, they should have put a red herring on it.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): I think of all summer when we were debating the flag issue, when they were saying we were the ones holding up parliament; in fact, Mr. Speaker, they did not have the legislation ready.

Mr. Nasserden: The house leader smiles in acknowledgement.

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): When I travel through my vast constituency I meet many Indians and Metis. These people are not worrying about the flag we have at the present time, any more than they worried about their treaty rights agreed upon and signed under the union jack and their great mother, Queen Victoria. These people are not worried about the red ensign; but some of them are worried about what they are going to eat.

An hon. Member: Will a plebiscite help them?

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Many of these people are concerned about what they are going to eat; but they have adopted the red ensign and are proud of it. However, they are wondering about some of the promises of this government. What happened to the Indian claims commission, for example—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): —that was shoved down to the bottom of the list?

Mr. Winkler: A very good question.

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): That is what these people are worried about.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Forgie): Order. This is extraneous to the subject the house is discussing at the moment.

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): These people are not worried about a plebiscite; they would be very happy to have a plebiscite on the flag. I think what I have been saying pertains to the question of a plebiscite. However, Mr. Speaker, there are other matters that these people are worried about today more than they are concerned with our debating the flag, which they are proud and happy to live under. I attended an Indian conference and saw how proud and loyal these people are in regard to the red ensign. They are not concerned about a different flag; they are satisfied with the one they have today. But they are concerned about what they are going to eat this winter. They are concerned about the problems this government promised to do something about. Why should the government be scared of a plebiscite being held?

I heard one member last night challenge us to put this question to a vote. I challenge him to put the question to a plebiscite. I challenge him and the government to go to the people, to call an election, on this issue. Let's have an election on this issue, if they think it is so important and they are afraid of a plebiscite. This is a serious matter. Why are the government fumbling and bungling along? If they are so determined that they are right, let's have an election.

I know it is said we must not fight an election on this issue because the unity of the country will be destroyed. This government has already destroyed the unity of this country, which is at its lowest ebb ever. It is true we do not want an election fought on the flag issue, but if that is the only way the government sees it, let us go to the country. We are not afraid to go to the country on this issue. We know where we stand and we know where the people stand.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member is reading his speech again.

Mr. Winkler: That is better than you. You do not even make a speech. You speak from your seat.

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): I know a lot of people across Canada will be pleased to read that tomorrow. I say to the government: Go to the country on this issue if you want. We are ready to go. As I pointed out, we are in the Christmas month, a time when we should be winding up the work of the house so that we can get back home to our families and our constituencies. But we find ourselves with a government trying to force something down the throats of the people of Canada in order to attain their own ends.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to put my thoughts on record in connection with this flag issue. We are now, after a great many perambulations and circumlocutions, considering an amendment to the report of the flag committee. May I begin by expressing my own personal appreciation of the manner in which the flag committee carried out its duties. I refer not only to the representatives from our own party who were on the committee, but from conversations I have had with various members of the committee I am convinced that a conscientious job of seeking to choose a compromise design satisfactory to the people of Canada was done. The committee succeeded in part and in part only, but they are still entitled to our thanks for the work they did.

The report which was brought in by the chairman was a masterful report. He reported fully, and I am sure that all hon. members of the house had a reasonably full understanding, when the chairman had presented his report, of what went on in the committee. His report was fairly given and I am sure much appreciated.

The amendment to this report advocates the use of a plebiscite in choosing a design for a new Canadian flag. I believe in the principle of a plebiscite and was not converted to this view only recently after the report was brought in. I want to refer to a question I asked on February 24 of this year. As reported at page 136 of Hansard, a time when hon. members will admit we had reached not very far into the 10,000 or so pages of Hansard we have created so far this session, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) the following question on the orders of the day:

> In view of the government's undertaking to provide the people of Canada with a distinctive national flag, has consideration been given or will consideration be given to allowing the people to make their own choice through a plebiscite or referendum from among several of the most popular designs, including the red ensign?

I had, Mr. Speaker, given some thought to the question of choosing a flag for Canada, and the question I asked was not an idle one. It was not a question intended to embarrass the government. It was an honest question asked for two purposes: first of all, to obtain information as to the attitude of the government to the possibility of holding a plebiscite; and second, to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that others were thinking along these lines. Indeed, I was not the first hon. member in the house to mention it this session; it was mentioned by others even earlier in this session. The Prime Minister answered as follows:

> All I can say at the moment, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the procedure which should be followed in this matter is that parliament certainly should be put in a position to decide for or against a particular flag. As to whether it would be desirable to have a popular referendum on this matter so that the people could choose from among a number of designs, I would like to give that matter very careful consideration before agreeing to it.

So that my belief that a plebiscite would be a good and satisfactory means for choosing the design for our national flag is not new.

In his speech this evening the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates) gave the house the results of some public opinion polls which were held in various parts of Canada and which indicate that a great many people across the country, at least in some parts of the country, are seriously considering the possibility of a plebiscite as a means of choosing a satisfactory flag design.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what does the Conservative party stand for in regard to this issue? I cannot speak for the Conservative party but I can speak for myself. I realize I am not the only one in the Conservative party who feels the way I do; there are many others. I also know that some of my colleagues do not agree with me, and for various reasons. And I do not insist that they should. Our party is democratic and the members of our party, ever since my association with it and since I was elected to this house, have been free to express their own opinions in their own way on every occasion. No pressure has been brought to bear on them at any time by our leader or by members of the government. Our members have been free to go their own way and there has been no unpleasantness and no pressure brought to bear. That statement I can make honestly, and it is true despite suggestions to the contrary which have appeared from time to time in the press.

In the first place I think the purpose of every member of the Conservative party is to promote and maintain national unity. We believe the best way to retain and promote national unity is to devise some means of choosing a flag, as a result of which there would be no losers and no winners.

If hon. members opposite support the government in its method of choosing a flag, a great many people in Canada will have bitter feelings toward a great many other people in Canada, and that is a most unfortunate situation. If we chose a flag through imposition a great many people will feel bitterly disappointed.

I should like to know why the government is in such a hurry to adopt this flag. If the government had argued early this summer that there was some urgency about choosing a flag, that argument might have been understood; but such an argument carries no weight at this time, and a course followed along that line of thinking, with such persistence, will do nothing but create friction and develop a great deal of bitterness between the two founding races of this country.

Since early this summer the flag question has become the centre of activity in this House of Commons, and all the government legislation has been built around it. I do not suggest the government euchred us out of an Easter recess, but we certainly did not have an Easter holiday. We did not have a summer vacation, and I am not sure we are going to have a Christmas break, as things appear at this time. The government can be assured, however, that neither bribe in the way of holidays, nor pressures in the way of threats of an election, will prevent me from using every rule in the rule book to see that we devise a method of choosing a flag which will generate the least possible bitterness in this country, but which will maintain the greatest possible national unity.

I suggest there should be no reason for bitterness between our French speaking and English speaking colleagues in this country. However if we persist in imposing a flag on the people of Canada, I see no opportunity of avoiding a great deal of bitterness. I think we can avoid this bitterness by adopting the suggestion that a plebiscite be held, during the next election in order to save expenses. If we co-operate in this way I am sure we can choose a distinctive national Canadian flag of which all Canadians, French and English speaking, can be proud, while avoiding a a great deal of bitterness. We must avoid rushing into a decision. We must avoid these continual pressures, and we must avoid threats of an election. Let us discontinue the practice of tying our legislative program to the flag issue. The members of this house have been under constant pressure since this matter was first introduced during this session. I am sure the members of the house as well as the people of this country are sick and tired of the whole show.

Mr. Thomas: The fact that we have been under pressure and are sick and tired of the whole situation is not something which will prevent me from continuing to discuss this matter, with the hope that a proper and satisfactory solution to the benefit of the people of Canada can be found.

Again, speaking for myself, I suggest that a ballot be prepared for submission to the electors at the next general election containing several suitable compromise designs. In view of all the argument and discussion that has taken place in this house and across the country about the red ensign and the three maple leaf design, neither of those should appear on that ballot. The presently proposed one maple leaf design might be considered as a suitable compromise for inclusion on such a ballot, because it is the design recommended by the flag committee.

In this regard, three proposed flag designs have been distributed in this house within the last 24 hours. They might be designs suitable for such a ballot. Other designs have been of interest to some of our French speaking colleagues in this party, and I am sure those designs are possibilities for submission to the people on a ballot. I think five or six designs in colour and in miniature should be placed on a convenient-sized ballot so as to allow the people of Canada to express their preference. They could do so by marking the figure 1 beside their first choice, figure 2 beside their second choice, figure 3 beside their third choice and so on. I think the results of such a plebiscite should be calculated on the single transferable voting system. That is, all votes cast for the last choice design could be allotted to the remainder. All the votes cast for the second last design should be allotted then to the remainder, and so on until one design had a clear majority support. That is not a new system of voting, but one that has been used in the province of Alberta for many years in single member constituencies. I think that system has also been used in other provinces. That system, used to calculate the results of a plebiscite as has been suggested, would be a foolproof method. No matter which design illustrated on a ballot—provided they were all reasonably compromise design—was chosen by the majority of the people voting, no one would lose and all French and English speaking citizens could be justly proud of it. This would eliminate or reduce to a minimum all bitterness and controversy. I am glad to associate myself with any other members of the house who are prepared to keep this discussion going, in the hope that reason may prevail, that the government in its wisdom may find it possible to follow some line of approach in choosing a national flag which will be less dangerous to national unity than the method of imposing a flag by a vote in this house.

There have been charges of obstruction levelled against our party and I should like to deal with those charges.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Thomas: Not too fast, my friends, not too fast. There have been charges of obstruction and a great deal of criticism, but did you ever stop to think what would have happened if there had been no extended discussion of the flag issue in the house? Have you ever stopped to think what we would have had? We would have had a flag imposed on the people of Canada which even the party that endorsed it would not support in the final analysis. The three maple leaf design was endorsed by the government, but later when they had had a chance to look around and after they had listened to a great many speeches—174 Conservative speeches, was it —on the subject, they decided it was possible to devise and choose a more suitable design, and that is what was done by the committee. So the fact is that the continued discussion did serve a purpose.

The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh) rose in his place this afternoon and said he never did like the three maple leaf design. He made no such statement during the extended discussion of that design. But when the opportunity came to choose a more satisfactory design he was very glad that it was found possible to do so and that a more satisfactory design was recommended by the committee. I say it is just possible that if members of the Conservative party keep on talking for a while we will be able to devise some other design which will bring to government members as well as to all other members of the house, and to all the people of Canada, as much more pleasure as the single maple leaf did as compared with the three maple leaf design. It will possibly be a further improvement over the present proposed design. This is possible.

Why do members criticize us so severely for keeping the discussion alive and continuing to thresh over and reconsider the idea? Much progress has been made. I submit to all members of the house that in this flag issue we are playing for keeps, or we should be playing for keeps. We should not approach the matter lightly. What would have happened if through action of the house we had imposed the three maple leaf design on the country? The country would have had a flag which a great many people did not like and which a great many members of the house did not like. When the sponsors of that flag were faced with a better choice, not one of them stayed with it.

There is no reason at all to suppose that this question is closed. If members of the house will put their minds to it we can just as easily produce a still more satisfactory design. What is the hurry? Why not take our time? After the house has done all it can to provide suitable designs on which the people can vote, why not let the people themselves choose their flag from among the several designs recommended by a committee of the house?

In our amendment we are asking that the flag problem be referred back to the committee. So far as I am concerned I would not say "the" committee but rather "a" committee, because what can we expect if we refer back to the same committee a matter which they in their wisdom have already considered? There were only 15 members of the house on that committee. Why not submit the problem to 15 other members of the house? Set up a new committee with different members on it and let them have a go at the matter. It is very unlikely that they will come up with exactly the same solution as the former committee. I think that would be most wise and that would be my idea of how we should go about this matter. Appoint 15 other members to a committee and let them have a try at choosing a design. If we keep on we will end up with a number of very suitable designs which can be placed on a ballot.

Again I repeat, what is the hurry? If there was hurry last spring then I know of no hurry now. I know that the government of the country promised to bring in a distinctive flag within two years, but surely they have tried. Surely they have made an honest effort to carry out that promise to the electors. If they have not succeeded, at least they have tried and they are entitled to the credit for trying. But there is no hurry now. I can see no need for hurry. So let us take our time and do this thing right. Let us use methods of choosing a design for a new national flag which will tend to prevent friction among the different sections of the country.

I stated that I intended to deal with the topic of obstruction and filibuster. Beauchesne, fourth edition, citation 119, contains this statement in paragraph 2 of that citation:

> In parliament every corner of the country is represented and no rule should silence elected representatives when they think they have a message to deliver. Freedom of speech is a sacred principle and if there is a place where it should be fully respected that place is the parliament of the nation, and it is the Speaker's responsibility to see that this principle is not infringed upon.

In paragraph 1 of citation 119 we find this opinion:

> Delays, multiplicity of amendments and even obstruction must not always be regarded as illegitimate political weapons.

I am going to repeat that.

> Delays, multiplicity of amendments and even obstruction must not always be regarded as illegitimate political weapons.

In paragraph 2 of citation 119, we find these words:

> The mere object of shortening sessions may lead to an undue curtailment of the freedom of speech. The duties of a representative of parliament are too important to be performed in a hurry.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member, while he is looking at Beauchesne, would refer also to citation 149, paragraph (i), which states that a member must not—> —use his right of speech for the purpose of obstructing business of the house.

Mr. Thomas: I have much ground to cover yet, Mr. Speaker, so if our friend does not mind I am going to plow ahead. He will be at liberty to take 40 minutes in due course and make his contribution to the problem of choosing a national flag in some way which will not tend to arouse friction between the various sections of this country.

Mr. Winkler: He can be the spokesman from British Columbia. Nobody else will speak.

Mr. Thomas: I am speaking in support of a plebiscite, and bringing forth reasons why a plebiscite is desirable on this matter. These references in Beauchesne indicate the rights of minorities in the House of Commons to challenge the government's right to proceed when in conflict with public interest. There is provision in the rules, however, for the government to override the demands for change of policy by a minority. This is the closure rule. If the government are sure enough of their position, they can invoke closure and answer to the people for their actions. No government can, therefore, successfully contend that they have been prevented from carrying out their responsibilities through the act of a minority opposition.

If the government are unwise in their method of producing a national flag, let them take the steps to start the action suggested. I would say that any charge by the government now or in the future, that a minority are preventing them from carrying out their responsibilities, is completely unfounded. The government are responsible for submitting business to this house, and if the opposition believe that the government are making a mistake it is their job to use every advantage in the rules, every provision in the rules which is available to them, to prevent the government from making a mistake or taking an unwise action. Surely, hon. members on the government side cannot criticize members sitting on this side of the house for doing the job the people sent them here to do.

Now, in dealing with the flag issue, may I repeat that this is playing for keeps. We do not look forward to having a flag issue or a flag controversy with every change of government. What a situation that would be in this country. This is something which is done once in a generation, once in a lifetime—my colleague says, once in a hundred years. We should not have any talk about changing it again. We are playing for keeps. Why hurry? Why not let us take sufficient time to do the job properly? If the government persists in their present method, then I submit they are planting in Canada the seeds of bitterness for several generations to come. This flag issue is of the utmost importance to our national unity. I believe that the problem should not be approached in haste. No amount of effort no amount of time, and no amount of expense should be permitted to stand in the way of choosing a national flag which is capable of enhancing the national unity of our country.

This afternoon one of the speakers from the southeast corner of the house, I believe it was the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) said that he was elected, and his colleague were elected, on this flag issue. Well, perhaps they were, Mr. Speaker. I do not know what the election issues were in Villeneuve. I was not anywhere near there. I was in western Ontario, in Middlesex West, with one or two exceptions. This is where my campaign speeches were made. I do not remember making any extravagant promises. My main promise was that I had done my best to carry out my duties and I promised if re-elected I would continue to do just that, to do my very best in carrying out my duties as a member. I was re-elected; but to the best of my knowledge there was no mention made of a new Canadian flag in that area.

It is true the Conservative party, in their national conference, had passed a resolution in favour of a national flag, but that was not an issue in our election. May I call it ten o'clock?

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, December 2, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. SCOTT—DECISION ON COMMUTATION OF SENTENCE OF CONVICTED MURDERER

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I want to rise on a point of privilege. One Georges Marcotte is at present under sentence of death and is destined to die tomorrow night for the crime of murder. We have been trying all day to obtain from the Minister of Justice an announcement of the decision the cabinet has made as to whether the sentence is to be commuted to life emprisonment. The Minister of Justice has declined to make such announcement until such decision has been taken. If the decision is delayed any longer, Mr. Speaker, it will make it virtually impossible for those members of the house who are interested in the case to take any action they might deem appropriate in the light of the decision which the cabinet may have taken. I want to raise as a point of privilege that the failure of the minister to make this decision known to us is an infringement upon our rights as members, and is in effect preventing us from taking the action which we might deem necessary.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has to decide whether there is or is not a question of privilege involved here. I have listened to a statement but I have not seen any supporting evidence outside of the mere statement that the minister has not informed the hon. member or some other hon. members about this matter. I do not see any question of privilege in that. The minister is simply carrying out his duty, as far as I know.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, no longer than three minutes ago I spoke to the minister on the floor of this chamber, asking him to make an announcement about this decision, and he again declined to make this decision known to me.

CANADIAN FLAG

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, December 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Batten that the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last evening I was attempting to show cause for submitting the flag issue to the people of Canada in the form of a plebiscite, so that the people across this country can choose the design for a new flag.

By way of a short résumé of one or two of the points I covered I should like to state that I, as well as other members in this party and I believe in common with all hon. members in this house, stand for national unity. It is the purpose of parliament to maintain national unity, and we in this party have been searching for ways and means of promoting that unity and avoiding in every possible way discord among our people. If the government follows its present proposal to impose a flag on the Canadian people through a vote in this chamber, there will be discord. The whole issue becomes a party matter. I am sure the party to which I belong as well as other members of the house will agree that if we can devise some means of choosing a flag which will avoid discord and disunity in our nation we should do so.

The Conservative party has moved an amendment to the motion for concurrence in the report of the special committee to the effect that this matter be referred back to the committee with instructions to consider arrangements for submitting this question to the people through a plebiscite. Speaking for myself in this regard rather than for the party—and I should be glad to associate myself with any member of this house who feels the same way—we should continue this discussion with the hope that some better means will be found for deciding upon a flag for the Canadian people than through a government proposal to impose a flag by action of this house.

To show that there is not unanimity in the country, I have permission from my colleague the hon. member for Elgin to place on the record of the house a telegram which he received this morning from radio station CHLO in St. Thomas, Ontario. I may say that this radio station also covers the Middlesex West area. It reads as follows:

Jim McBain, M.P.
House of Commons, Ottawa, Ont.
Jim: Monday and Tuesday, Doug Hinz conducted a straw vote on "High Gear"—

"High Gear" is the name of the program he conducts in the morning hours.

—re the single maple leaf flag design. For your information, Monday's program showed 80 per cent of listeners against it. Tuesday's program 83 per cent against it. Program attracts listeners from 6.30 to 9.15 a.m. Regards.

Barry Kentner CHLO Radio.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my support for the amendment moved by representatives of the Progressive Conservative party. However, I must explain that I am giving expression to my personal opinion on this occasion and to what I am very certain is the opinion of the majority of the constituents I have the honour to represent. I must again emphasize that in matters of conscience members of our party are free to express their personal opinions with respect to any issue that comes before the house, and like the members of other parties in the house we are not all of one opinion on this question.

Personally I favour the red ensign as a flag that represents the realities of history which, if we go into our history, we find were given voice in Anglo-Saxon assemblies, in the terms of Magna Carta, in the struggle for freedom during the reigns of Edward III, the Tudors, the Stuarts and James II, in the glorious revolution of 1688, in the reform acts of 1832, in the representation acts passed from 1867 up to 1948, in the mother of parliaments in Great Britain that provides for a government and an opposition, which protects the rights of the minority to free expression and which we are very glad to see has found its counterpart in the parliament of Canada.

However, Mr. Speaker, regardless of my personal opinion and even of some of the very strongly voiced opinions of some of my constituents, we are anxious to adopt a flag that will be acceptable to the great majority of all Canadians. We enter this debate in a spirit of compromise to that end. I spoke of this question on June 30 last, Mr. Speaker, and expressed my criticism of the way the Prime Minister had handled this question. I was particularly critical of his bringing this flag issue before the remembrance service of the Royal Canadian Legion convention held at Winnipeg earlier this year, and of other speeches he made on this issue. For that reason I urged support for a national flag that provides for the continuity of our history, with the inclusion of the union jack and all it stands for throughout the whole of our history, as well as the inclusion of the fleur-de-lis which stood for so much in the struggle for freedom in France in the days of long ago.

As I said before, we enter this debate in a spirit of compromise with a view to developing finally a national flag that will bring complete unity to the Canadian people. Referring to my own constituency, Mr. Speaker, I must say I have had the wholehearted support of all the Legion branches in my riding, the I.O.D.E. organization throughout the riding, the Orange lodge and a good number of other organizations, including the women's institutes which have expressed their views very strongly with regard to this question. In addition to that, sir, I have had somewhat over 2,000 of my constituents who have informed me in writing of their views with regard to a national flag for Canada, a flag that will contain symbols of our struggle for freedom, for parliamentary institutions in Great Britain, in France and in Canada.

I hear the hon. member for Leeds asking me to name those constituents. I am sorry, I did not hear correctly, Mr. Speaker; it was somebody else over there. Naturally, I could not do that, because I believe that everyone who wishes to speak in this debate should have that opportunity, and then we should vote on the issue.

Before proceeding further I should like to pay tribute to the chairman of the flag committee and the members of that committee. While there have been some criticisms of leaks from that committee I must say that in my opinion they laboured long and laboured in silence. I think there was less in total leakage from the flag committee than from any other committee with which I have had anything to do in this house over a period of 19 years. I think it is only fair to say that.

Unfortunately, from my point of view and the point of view of the majority of my constituents, and I am sure the majority of the Canadian people, the committee did not produce a flag which will be satisfactory. I must say that I am not enamoured with this flag. I do not like this design. I should like a maple leaf with other emblems on the flag as suggested by a speaker from the Progressive Conservative party, which would then include symbols of the founding races of this country and the other groups that have helped to build up this great nation of ours. That is the reason I am supporting the amendment at this time.

There has been a very strong demand for a plebiscite. I have heard pleas for a plebiscite made by the Royal Canadian Legion, the Canadian Corps Association and other veterans groups. In this connection I would like to place on record in part what they have said in this respect. On November 11 the Canadian Legion presented its views to the cabinet with respect to veterans legislation and other matters, and included a copy of the resolution which it adopted at its convention in Winnipeg earlier this year. That resolution reads as follows:

> Be it resolved that the delegates to this, the 20th biennial convention of the Royal Canadian Legion assembled at Winnipeg 17th-22nd May, 1964, reiterate the stand taken by the delegates of our 18th and 19th biennial conventions that we urge the government of Canada to, by act of parliament, adopt the Canadian red ensign as the national flag of Canada.

I also have here a very interesting letter from Mr. Heesaker, dominion president of the Canadian Corps Association, which contains the following passage:

> Therefore, the Canadian Corps Association, dominion command, again emphatically requests the Prime Minister of Canada, and parliament as a whole, to place this subject before the people, at the next regularly scheduled general election. Let the voters of Canada finalize this matter.

I have received correspondence in similar vein from other veterans organizations, and from reading the papers I understand public opinion polls have been conducted on this issue. I am informed that some 60 per cent of the persons questioned in these polls have asked to have a plebiscite at the next general election in order that they may choose the flag they wish.

We have had nearly 100 years of self government under the British North America Act. So far as I know we are the first country to bring a measure before parliament to change its national flag after nearly 100 years of history. Though that was done by newer members of the commonwealth which obtained their independence in recent years, we are the first country which, having had that long experience of parliamentary government, has brought such a measure before parliament.

I urge members of the government to give consideration to the fact that the veterans of this country have spoken clearly and with one voice on this issue. I am talking about the organized veterans of the country.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Herridge: Other responsible organizations across Canada have also urged the necessity for a plebiscite, and I ask members of the government to give consideration to their representations.

I am quite sure that the symbols we have at present, the symbols in our red ensign, the symbol of the fleur-de-lis, are very dear to many people because they represent such a great sweep of our histories.

I support the amendment to refer the matter back to the committee so the committee may bring in a report containing two, three or four designs which could be submitted to the Canadian people in a plebiscite at the next federal election. I am confident that if this were done—and it could be done at little extra expense added to the cost of the election—whatever decision was reached would be accepted as a majority decision of the Canadian people made with conviction and in good faith.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in concluding my somewhat brief remarks I urge that when every member has had an opportunity to express his views with respect to this amendment and his views on the remaining portion of the flag debate, we should then return to the realities of present circumstances and deal with legislation that awaits our attention.

An hon. Member: They don't have it ready.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit a question.

Mr. Herridge: Willingly.

Mr. Otto: I ask the hon. gentleman to believe that I raise this question for our edification. He mentioned that the fleur-de-lis was at one time or another a symbol of freedom. I think we all recall the tricolour and even the cross of Lorraine, but I wonder whether the hon. gentleman could remind us of the time in history when the fleur-de-lis was a symbol or emblem of freedom.

Mr. Herridge: I willingly do that, Mr. Speaker. I consulted my good friends the Créditistes as to the history of the fleur-de-lis in the development of French democracy.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, of all the many words that have been said on this flag issue and of all the many speeches that have been made, the words Your Honour used, although you are not supposed to make speeches, impressed me more than all the others I have heard. I refer to a few remarks Your Honour made in this house on September 2 last. I believe Your Honour was dealing with a point of order on a subamendment, and you quoted from Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 119(3). I read it in part:

A great deal of latitude must be allowed in the House of Commons which is a forum where every phase of public affairs can be discussed and every member has the right to be heard—

Sometimes we doubt that.

—even if in doing so he sometimes disregards the rigidity of procedure.

Then you went on to say, Mr. Speaker; and these are the words I refer to in your very short speech:

Basing myself on this principle, and in view of the highly charged emotional context of the issue, it seemed to the Chair that members should be dealt with in a most reasonable fashion.

I would say that if in your wisdom, Mr. Speaker, you could have in some way impressed upon the Prime Minister of this country those two points, this flag debate would have been finished weeks ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIntosh: Hon. members on the other side laugh, but let me just repeat what you said, Mr. Speaker:

Basing myself on this principle, and in view of the highly charged emotional context—

I think we would all agree with that. And the flag issue is not the basic issue; the basic issue with which we are dealing, although we may be speaking about a flag, is the unity of this country; and that is very basic.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIntosh: As Your Honour has said, this issue should be dealt with in a reasonable fashion. I contend that this is all the opposition has been trying to do ever since we began this debate. We have asked the Prime Minister to treat it in a reasonable fashion. In fact I am one of those who contend that it is not our place to decide on this flag issue; it is an emotional issue that should be decided by the people. It has nothing to do with the social welfare of the people or the economics of the country. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that if you in your position could even now impress these two points upon the Prime Minister I am sure this debate would be finished today.

Some hon. Members: Yes?

Mr. McIntosh: Some hon. members say "Yes?" The reason we are dealing with this issue now is that it was an election promise. Coming from the west, I wonder about some of the other promises made by hon. members opposite. There are not very many Liberal members in the chamber. One promise that was made in the west that is perhaps more important to the west than the promise of a flag was the $2 a bushel for wheat. When is that promise going to be kept?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIntosh: In fact some of the western members mentioned a figure of $3 a bushel. What has been done about that election promise? I just wish to say a few words on this matter, Mr. Speaker. Instead of the price going up, it has been going down. I refer to the price of Durum wheat mentioned in this house the other day.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McIntosh: This is in order. I am talking about the promises the government made. They have said the flag was an election promise, and that is the reason the Prime Minister introduced this issue into the house. We contend there is more important business for the House of Commons to deal with than the flag issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIntosh: We ask ourselves, why was this issue raised in the first place? Why was it raised at the time it was? Why was it not mentioned in the throne speech, if it was so important? We can give hon. members opposite the answers to these questions. They may have different answers, but we know why this issue was introduced. It was because legislation was not ready.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIntosh: They laugh, Mr. Speaker. Do they want me to point out those pieces of legislation that had to be withdrawn after being introduced into the house? There were two or three such cases, and it is not necessary for me to give the details. I have said before that there is other and more important legislation to be dealt with. Some of this is legislation that could be dealt with in a very short space of time. In our opinion the flag question cannot be dealt with in a very short space of time; as Mr. Speaker has said, it should be dealt with in a reasonable manner. I repeat that all we are asking is that it be dealt with in a reasonable manner.

Members of the New Democratic party are very anxious that the bill dealing with the labour code be brought before parliament. We are also anxious that this be done.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

In my opinion, you should call to order the member who is speaking at this moment and ask him to keep to the subject under discussion. Furthermore, I would ask you to render your decision immediately, as you did yesterday, and suggest to the hon. member that he confine his remarks to the subject under discussion.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: It might be helpful at this time to indicate to the house the understanding of the Chair. The discussion should relate to the amendment. If we assume that a member is going to speak for 40 minutes, I do not see any particular harm in speaking generally for five minutes, but the other 35 minutes should relate to the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winkler: What about the farmers in Quebec? Why don't you make a speech about that situation? Come on; stand up.

An hon. Member: He is not allowed to speak over there.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out once again that your remarks impressed me for this reason. We are speaking on the amendment and raising the question that this whole matter should go to the people in the form of a plebiscite. Because Your Honour made those remarks, to my mind what I have been saying is directly related to the issue before us; in fact, it is the strongest argument that I have.

This is the reason it should be decided by way of a plebiscite. I refer to the two points that Your Honour raised. I do not understand why backbenchers opposite should say it is not relevant. We just wish to deal with legislation that should be dealt with at the present time, and this question has been raised time and again. This is another reason this matter should be decided by a plebiscite, namely that there is important legislation with which we should deal. I refer to the rail line abandonment legislation, for example. That is another matter that is very important to us in the west. Perhaps it is not so important to the people in the east; it appears to me that to some of them the question of a flag is more important. As far as I am concerned, this is a strong reason for this question being decided by a plebiscite.

My second reason for suggesting that the question should be decided by a plebiscite I take from the remarks of the seconder of the motion, the hon. member for Danforth. I refer to just one paragraph of his speech for the moment, in which he said:

> I am aware that some members of the committee felt very strongly that a flag ought to contain—

I would point out that he was speaking for the committee:

> —the union jack and the fleur-de-lis. That is a view we listened to with the greatest of respect and we explored every possible argument pro and con. I respect that view, but in the end—

I emphasize this last part; the hon. member refers to those in the committee.

> —most of us came to the conclusion that by putting emblems such as that on our national flag we would be merely giving ourselves a perpetual reminder of the things that divide us—

Well, Mr. Speaker, whoever heard of the coat of arms of our country being something which would divide us? I submit that this conclusion which was arrived at by the committee is based on a false or erroneous premise. Certainly the union jack will not divide us. I ask the members of this House of Commons, what will the maple leaf do to us? It has already created another faction which did not exist before.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. McIntosh: To some people—perhaps not to those who are anxious to get this through and are calling "carried"—a national flag represents the deepest emotions of the heart. It means heroism, self-sacrifice, courage and love. I do not think there is anything there which would divide us regardless of which province we come from. I suggest that this is another reason why this issue should go back to the committee and to the people by way of a plebiscite.

Further on in the hon. member's speech he said:

> The one thing which it seems to me is significant about the committee report, and which lends great weight to its recommendation, is that if anything can be said it is that this is a parliamentary flag. This is not the flag of any particular party. It is not the flag of any particular individual.

I think had I been helping the hon. member with his speech I would have said "Nor is it the flag of any particular country". It does not, as the hon. member tried to point out, signify unity. Unity is not something which can be legislated, as we all know, any more than a flag can be created by an act of parliament. A flag is merely a bit of coloured cloth until people take it to their hearts, and that cannot be ordered by decree. This flag to many of us is still just a piece of coloured cloth which may come to mean something to us if it is the selection of the people of Canada as a whole.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that the report of the committee is not realistic. It means nothing. In my opinion the flag they have recommended is a nebulous design because it means nothing. The hon. member for Leeds a day or two ago said that the maple leaf represented Canada, and he referred to some publication he had obtained from the parliamentary library. That publication stated that this flag represents all Canada. However, the hon. member neglected to say that the writer of that book died roughly 100 years ago. It did represent all Canada at that time, but not today. When that book was written Canada stopped at the great lakes. Since that time a much larger and greater country has developed, and certainly the maple leaf is not seen west of the great lakes. Therefore in my opinion it does not represent Canada. I would say that each group in Canada should have some representation on the flag to which their hearts are attached.

The hon. member for Kootenay West, who spoke a few moments ago, told us what the union jack meant to him. I have heard members from Quebec say what the fleur-de-lis means to them. I hope I respect that meaning, and in return I would ask those members from Quebec to respect the fact that the union jack means something to me.

I should like to refer to a speech made in this house some time ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, who is a returned soldier. He was speaking on what the flag meant to him and referred to the days of liberation after both world war I and world war II; I believe he served in both. The hon. member said the red ensign began to mean something to him when it was waved not by people of Canada but by people liberated by Canadians from oppression and tyranny. As the hon. member said, he realized at that time that the red ensign also meant something to him. I was born an Anglo-Saxon and I served a number of years in the army. Because of those two facts I like the red ensign, and as I say the union jack means something to me.

At this time I think I should put on record what the red ensign means to our veterans organizations, and I should like to read a letter put out by the president of the Canadians corps. I think this letter was sent to every member of parliament. It is dated November 27, which actually was about three days before this amendment was moved. It is addressed to all members of the House of Commons and reads as follows.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I refer to Sir T. Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, sixteenth edition, page 470, which reads:

> Although it is the duty of the Speaker to interfere in the first instance for the preservation of order, when, in his judgment, the occasion demands his interference, it is also the right of any member who conceives that a breach of order has been committed, if the Speaker refrains from interfering (either because he does not consider it necessary to do so, or because he does not perceive that a breach of order has been committed) to rise in his place, interrupting any member who may be speaking, and direct the attention of the Chair to the matter, provided he does so the moment the alleged breach of order occurs.

May I also refer to page 451 with respect to the subject of relevancy of debate. It says:

> Debate must not stray from the question before the house—or anticipate a matter appointed for the consideration of the house.

We have numerous illustrations of this principle being followed, and I would ask the Chair to direct that what we are concerned with here is the question of a plebiscite and nothing else.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should attempt to answer the point of order. It is all very well to cite principles, if hon. members are able to find citations, but those principles have to be enforced. If I may refer the hon. member to standing orders, standing order 34 (2) says:

> Mr. Speaker or the chairman, after having called the attention of the house, or of the committee, to the conduct of a member who persists in irrelevance, or repetition, may direct him to discontinue his speech, and if then the member still continues to speak, Mr. Speaker shall name him, or, if in committee, the chairman shall report him to the house.

In this type of debate, dealing with this type of subject, it seems to me the Chair should at least be given wide discretion, and to follow subsection (2) of standing order 34 is just not called for at this time. I am watching and listening very carefully to the remarks of the hon. member, and I would ask hon. members to trust my judgment to interfere if and when in my humble opinion it is necessary to do so. Up to the moment, although the hon. member has been speaking quite generally, he is working toward a conclusion and to that extent should be given the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, if I could make your job any easier for you perhaps it would help if I read the last paragraph of this letter, which is rather unusual. It says this:

> The Canadian Corps Association, dominion command at this time reiterates that no change in Canada's present national flag should be made unless the government is so instructed by the citizens of Canada by means of a plebiscite vote held in conjunction with Canada's next general election.

Everything I am saying is related to the amendment now before the house. I also remind the hon. member for Leeds that this is the first time I have spoken on this issue either inside or outside the house. I could become irrelevant by repeating something he has said in regard to this issue, but I would be off the subject so I will refrain from doing so.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to read what the Canadian corps has to say about what they wish the Prime Minister would do, and I suggest it is exactly the same as we would like the Prime Minister to do. They say:

> The right hon. Prime Minister Pearson and some of his associates have, during the past few days, called for British fair play and justice.
> The Prime Minister has, therefore, substantiated the veterans of Canada's demand that our present government must not eliminate from Canada, the flag of justice and freedom, the Canadian red ensign.
> The Canadian Corps Association, dominion command sincerely hopes that with the latest events in parliament, that the members of the House of Commons will take a closer look at these disclosures and then decide whether to be stampeded by irresponsible people whose only aim is to remove from Canada all the things that we, as Canadians, have been proud of for years.

Perhaps I should say that I read the last paragraph first. At this time on behalf of the Canadian Legion particularly, and veterans generally, I should like to place on record what General Charles Foulkes, former chairman of the chiefs of staff had to say about a cartoon which was detrimental to veterans, as reported in an article in the Toronto Telegram of May 6. The article is headed "Ridicule—how quickly we forget". I believe that statement to be true, and perhaps it is our fault here that we forget so easily. The general had this to say:

> A recent cartoon in the Ottawa Citizen depicted two apparently inebriated legionnaires expressing disapproval of the Prime Minister's proposal for a new Canadian flag. While I have no inclination to get into the controversial flag issue, I must take issue with the cartoonist and the Ottawa Citizen for publishing this most insulting cartoon, which attempts to associate the views of the veterans of two wars to those of two inebriates.
> Perhaps some of the legionnaires do imbibe a bit too much in their haunts in the various Legion halls, but we should remember that these were the same individuals whom we exhorted to come forward and fight in the mud of France and Flanders. I suspect that many of those who are now poking fun at these old veterans were not too conspicuous in the actual fighting of the last war.

I believe that is true, because of an investigation which was carried out to find out who was responsible for putting this cartoon in the Ottawa Citizen. The general continued as follows:

> I rarely speak out on such occasions but to allow such an impression to get abroad that the views of the Canadian veterans can be assumed by such a cartoon is just too much for some of us to take. The newspaper concerned may have forgotten that the men they are lampooning are the same men who withstood the savage attacks at Vimy and Cambria and the Somme. Those of us who saw the fighting in Sicily, Normandy, and Germany are indeed very sympathetic towards the heroes of France and Flanders and take serious umbrage to those like this cartoonist who make fun of the old veteran who still likes his pint of beer, but in his day offered his life in order that we can now enjoy the freedom of the press.
> To have affection and pride for a flag and symbol which was once the flag of battle seems to be misunderstood by some, perhaps it is because they never had or wanted to see that emblem in the heat of battle. Be that as it may it hardly behooves any of us who fought under that flag to make jest or fun at his expense. How do we know what he may have suffered or sacrificed while serving under this emblem?
> How soon we forget! How easy it is to take a crack at the burned out veteran and his pint of beer and his affection for the flag he fought for. But it was his sacrifice and that of thousands who never came back, that make this free discussion of a Canadian flag possible.
> Do what you like about the flag, but don't dare lampoon those who fought to make this free decision possible.

I agree with the general. As a result of the heated argument that has taken place on this issue, and in an attempt to find some solution to our problem, I have read the speeches of many members of this house to ascertain whether I could find some common ground, or a common denominator. I should like to refer to Hansard of November 30, which was last Monday, and particularly to the remarks of the hon. member for Danforth, who had this to say:

> —it would be preferable to have a distinctive flag that says just one thing, Canada—not French Canada, not English Canada, not ethnic Canada, but Canada.

Canadian Flag

I should now like to turn to another statement by the same member, as recorded in the same volume of Hansard.

Mr. Marcoux: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I am finding it difficult to pick out anything that is relevant to the amendment now before us in the speech being made by the hon. member. His remarks seem to be relevant to the main motion but without relation to the amendment. Perhaps I should refer again to that citation from Bourinot. The hon. member seems to be anticipating a matter appointed for the consideration of the house which is not the subject matter of the amendment.

According to citation 119 (3) of Beauchesne's fourth edition, relevancy is not easy to define. However, in view of the number of speeches we have had for so many days, and in view of the decision taken by Your Honour yesterday on the matter of relevancy, I think the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek is out of order and should be called to order.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak on the same point of order. I am not surprised that the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency has attempted to prevent my colleague from speaking, because he is one of those who, in a speech some time ago, recommended that closure be applied.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The difficulty of the Chair in attempting to maintain relevancy and avoid repetition is self evident. I do not wish to be involved in one procedural argument after another. Hon. members must discipline themselves to a certain extent.

Perhaps I can help hon. members in this way. It seems to me that the amendment now before us for consideration deals with the holding of a plebiscite. The house has already reached a decision on the subamendment having to do with the four questions that were suggested should be asked through a plebiscite. We do not have to deal with that matter again. The opinion in that regard can be found at pages 6912 to 6920 of Hansard of Monday, August 17.

We are now dealing with the flag question in relation to a plebiscite, and it seems to me the questions to be asked are, should we have a plebiscite or should we not have a plebiscite? What are the reasons for holding a plebiscite? That is the question before the house at the present time, and I am sure hon. members will do their best to help the Chair by trying to be relevant and trying to avoid repetition.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. Marcoux: Mr. Speaker, may I remind you that the amendment is even more specific than the question of whether a referendum should be held or not. The subject of the amendment is to refer the report back to the committee with instructions to change a paragraph and replace it by another. The matter of a plebiscite is relevant but it is not the main point of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith).

I must point out to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot that I am not stopping anyone from speaking, but I ask the speakers to restrict themselves to the matter under consideration. I said earlier that I was in favour of closure, and I still am.

[Text]

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I have been trying to establish the reasons why we should hold the plebiscite and I prefaced my remarks by saying that my main reason stemmed from two statements you yourself made in the house. I will repeat them again for the benefit of the hon. member, who I understand believes in closure. The Speaker said that this issue has a highly charged emotional content and should be dealt with in a reasonable fashion. That is all I am asking the House of Commons to do, to deal with this issue in a reasonable fashion, to deal with the people of Canada in a reasonable fashion.

I also said that to my mind, and you may not agree with me, the flag issue is not the basic issue, and I will have something to say about the province from which the hon. member comes in a few moments. I went on to show the reason why I think there is a mutual channel which we can all follow, if we will, in that time and time again the speeches by members on both sides of the house have expressed the desire that we want to be Canadian. I should like to repeat a few remarks that were made by the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac (Mr. Latulippe). As found on page 10711 of Hansard of November 30 he said:

> Do you admit that? This is what we have to consider before going any further in the life of the whole people whom we want to be Canadian, just plain Canadian and not French Canadian, English Canadian, Scottish-Canadian, Irish Canadian, Italian Canadian or German Canadian, no more than American Canadian.

In other words, apparently all of us are of the view that we want to be Canadian and, if so, maybe we are going at this problem the wrong end first. We all say we want to be Canadian regardless of what country we came from or where our ancestors came from, and we have one thing in common. Can we work from there? Maybe a plebiscite will help us to do so.

For the benefit of some of the Quebec members who may not have travelled extensively in western Canada I am going to read a portion of a letter I have received from a constituent which may startle them. I think we in the House of Commons must face facts if we are going to settle our problems. This constituent's letter reads in part as follows:

> This also raises the Quebec question. Surely it is time someone said "enough". The militant group which is supposedly reflecting public opinion in Quebec are like a labour union and every concession is a confession of weakness. They do not set a limit to their aims. All they want is more. Surely there must be enough intestinal fortitude on the part of someone who will say "no, this is it". Surely it is time for Canadians—

Here he repeats something that we all have in common.

> —not English Canadians, French Canadians, Scottish Canadians, Russian Canadians, etc., to forget all their previous ancestries and be one thing only and that is Canadian.
> You as a member of parliament have a voice in the affairs of Canada and surely there are enough good Canadians of all political and racial backgrounds and creeds in the house who will be prepared to stand up and speak for Canada. If you do not and it is not done soon there will be no Canada as such in our lifetime. This small militant minority cannot be allowed to destroy our heritage for their own peculiar and selfish ends. I can assure you that they are being sponsored from without.

I say again that the flag issue is not the basic issue. The basic issue, and the reason we should have a plebiscite, is to preserve what unity we have in Canada, not to divide us more but to try to bring us together. To me it is apparent that our primary need for unity in Canada today is between the people of the province of Quebec and the people of the other nine provinces. The question that has been asked many times, to which we from the west have not received an answer, is, what does Quebec want?

An hon. Member: Quebec.

Mr. McIntosh: If we do have a plebiscite we may possibly find out during the course of the plebiscite or during the course of our discussions with other members of the House of Commons what Quebec wants. We have asked this question on numerous occasions and we have had different answers. I am being very frank when I say that some of my people in the west think that Quebec hates the union jack and will accept any emblem on the flag other than the union jack. I am told by some of my colleagues on this side of the house that this is not so. I am also told that the premier of Quebec said: "We do not care what flag the House of Commons chooses; we will not fly it anyway because we have our own flag". I do not know whether that is right, but if it is then I say to the members from Quebec: Why should they try to impose on us in the rest of Canada outside of Quebec a flag we do not want?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest that the hon. member try to restrict himself to the plebiscite, why it should be held, how it should be held, when it should be held.

Mr. McIntosh: And the reason why it should be held, Mr. Speaker. That is what I am trying to express. The rest of Canada does not understand Quebec. I have editorials here written by people who are supposed to be authorities in Quebec pointing out what they want, and if this is what they want then certainly the rest of Canada cannot tolerate everything that is written in these editorials. I will not read them.

Mr. Marcoux: They do not understand the Conservatives either.

Mr. Smallwood: You want closure.

Mr. McIntosh: I would say to the hon. member from Quebec who has just interjected that I do not see how he and his party can criticize the rest of us because he entered the house as a member of a party which subsequently split, and now the two groups apparently cannot understand each other.

An hon. Member: Where is the hon. member for Three Rivers?

Mr. Grégoire: Where is Balcer? Where is Martineau?

Mr. Caouette: Where is Pigeon?

Mr. Pigeon: He is here.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcoux: Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to leave the house to attend a meeting of the special joint committee on the Canada pension plan at 3.45?

[Text]

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, as my time is rapidly running out I will eliminate some of the remarks I was going to make. I would say that I have been thinking about the decision I must make in regard to this issue and, as I said before, it is an emotional issue. I do not think it is an issue that we as members of parliament should decide. However, I have tried to assess it and in doing so I have made a summation of what I believe the red ensign stands for. I also have made a summation of the French Canadian viewpoint, as I see it. I have a great number of citizens of French Canadian origin living in my constituency. I would say that they are real Canadians, and I am not taking anything away from the people of Quebec. I say that the majority of them are great Canadians. There are one or two exceptions, but I do not want to name them.

I say that if there is to be a choice of a flag by means of a plebiscite, you should leave the Canadian red ensign as one choice as the veterans have requested. This is a request of certain Legions in our country, you could say the majority. Certainly it is a flag that we have honoured for a number of years. There may be reasons why it should be changed. I know that I am biased; I am prejudiced about it. Since I am prejudiced, I will lean over backwards because I represent a large number of people of French Canadian origin and let them put on this flag any emblem that they desire. I am proud of the contribution the French people have made to Canada. I am particularly proud of the contribution the French Canadians have made to my constituency. They are great constituents. I may not get many of their votes, perhaps I will not get any of them. Nevertheless, I represent these people at the moment.

In so far as my summation of the red ensign is concerned, I want to say that when its design is examined dispassionately without prejudice or unreasoned emotion, it can be seen that every desire of our multiple religious, racial and cultural backgrounds is answered. If we aspire to religious and racial tolerance and the attainment of our national objective by negotiation, while maintaining loyalty to ideals rather than narrow nationalism, then our Canadian ensign represents us in a manner that no simple combination of colours or numbers could do. A flag with great depth of meaning capable of representing our complex idealism, it also represents not only our varied traditions and cultures, but also the single aspiration of the Canadian people as a whole, in a manner which a new design could not possibly match.

By understanding the ensign through a study of the elements in the flag, we may better understand ourselves, and will see that all of us can proclaim it as our symbol of unity, the ideal flag for a country like ours. The ideal of unity by negotiation is also the very basis of our country, Canada. First, our French forefathers negotiated the Quebec Act which guaranteed the religion, language and civil law of the French. Then our British forefathers refused to join in rebellion and decided to settle their differences with their King by negotiation. They knew that the British system of justice was a tradition of great value, and to save it they were prepared to abandon their homesteads and start anew.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Drouin): I must interrupt the hon. member to inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, since the flag debate was resumed at the beginning of the week hon. members on both sides of the house have expressed their views and I wish to take this opportunity to state mine.

Mr. Speaker, I know that on both sides of the house, among government members as well as within the ranks of the official opposition, or even within the New Democratic party and the Thompson group, there is no unanimity about the adoption of a distinctive national flag. On the other hand, on the government side there is no unanimity on the choice of a distinctive flag, whether it be the three maple leaf design already proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) or the single maple leaf design recommended by the committee.

At the outset of the session the Prime Minister himself introduced legislation concerning the adoption of a three maple leaf flag, as well as the union jack, to indicate our membership in the commonwealth and our allegiance to the crown.

Generally speaking the Canadian people did not like the way the Prime Minister—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I submit that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is continuously out of order when he talks about the three maple leaf flag while the house is considering the proposed single maple leaf flag. Therefore, I would ask you to call the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is customary for the Chair to give all members taking part in a debate some time to come to the point and I suggest that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm did not go beyond the rights usually granted.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, yesterday—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order or on a question of privilege?

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. While a Conservative member had the floor yesterday, the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Drouin) interrupted for the same reasons as those referred to a while ago by the hon. member for Lapointe.

I wonder if the hon. member for Lapointe is not right when he very humbly and respectfully submits that the remarks of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm are entirely irrelevant since he is dealing with something else than the amendment now before us.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I should like to draw to your attention that the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Drouin) is not in his seat at the present time.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I wish to quote a few legal precedents and parliamentary citations in connection with the point of order raised by the hon. member for Lapointe, and I apologize for not being able to quote them in French but Mr. May's treatise has not yet been translated from English to French.

I shall read the citation in question—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think I am sufficiently informed to make a ruling now.

The present Speaker does not have to follow the line of conduct adopted yesterday by the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes, but should rather make rulings in accordance with the attitude taken since the beginning of the debate by the Speaker himself.

The Chair is of the opinion that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm has complied with standing orders until now and I suggest that he resume his remarks.

Mr. Langlois: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I wish to speak to the point of order that has just been raised and I maintain that, according to Beauchesne—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair has given its ruling on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) and the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) now has the floor.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I think—

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I only wish to quote Beauchesne and May on the matter. Otherwise, I will have to appeal your ruling.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair was satisfied with the comments put forth a moment ago and gave its ruling. If I may, I would suggest to the hon. member that if he is not satisfied with that ruling, he is not following the proper procedure. There is another one, and I invite him to use it if he is not satisfied with the Chair's ruling.

Mr. Langlois: I respectfully accept your advice and I appeal your ruling.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I congratulate you on your impartiality in the chair.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Did the hon. member for Mégantic say that he appealed the ruling of the Speaker or that he accepted it? I did not quite understand him.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I appeal your ruling.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. member for Mégantic has some doubt about a ruling made by the Deputy Speaker. We might now inform the Speaker of the objections made against the ruling.

Mr. Langlois: With pleasure, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm has been out of order since the beginning of his speech.

I spoke to a point of order raised by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) and I tried to quote, in support of my point, the fourth edition of Beauchesne and the sixteenth edition of May, but the acting speaker merely said that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm was in order.

I respectfully submit that the hon. member was out of order and I sought to quote May and Beauchesne to prove my point.

Mr. Speaker, I appealed your ruling, because I could not quote May and Beauchesne.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Mégantic will undoubtedly have the courtesy of allowing me to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm so that I can reach my own decision as to their relevancy.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, considering that an hon. member is appealing a ruling, should you not call a vote on the ruling?

Canadian Flag

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member for Villeneuve will be the first one here to take into consideration the special circumstances involved and to co-operate with me so that I can judge whether or not the remarks of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm are related to the matter now before the house.

Mr. Pigeon: On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I would not want you to overrule the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes who was in the chair previously. I think his ruling was made honestly and according to his experience and conscience.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would ask the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to co-operate also with the Chair and to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying a while ago, at the beginning of this session the Prime Minister brought forward legislation concerning the adoption of a flag with three maple leaves, and of the union jack to symbolize our ties with the crown and the commonwealth.

Hon. members on both sides of the house were dissatisfied with the Prime Minister's move. There was no unanimity either on this side of the house or on the government side.

Later on the Prime Minister retreated four or five times and decided that the whole matter would be referred to a committee of the house.

I wonder why at the beginning of the session, instead of selecting himself the flag design with three maple leaves and the union jack, the Prime Minister did not choose to refer the whole matter to a committee of the house which would have selected a national distinctive flag and then reported to the house—

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

It seems to me that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm has now had enough time to come to the heart of the matter. I think it would be high time to call him to order and to ask him to speak to the amendment before the house, which deals with referring back to the committee the report on the flag, so that certain recommendations included in that report—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member wishes to take part in the debate at this time. In my opinion, he should allow the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, who had merely started his remarks when the Speaker took the chair, to resume his remarks so that the Speaker may rule as to whether or not they are relevant.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, may I make a remark?

I agree with the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes on that point because that is precisely what I meant to say a few moments ago.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to see the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes in the chair. It was decided to rule out—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

In my opinion, the remark made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm was not at all considerate of you. He said that he would like to see someone else in the chair. And yet, you are performing your duties remarkably well. I feel that is an insult on the part of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hold the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes in high esteem and I was flattered by the remark.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, since the three leaf flag proposed by the Prime Minister has been rejected by the committee, we are now being asked to adopt a flag with a single red maple leaf and two red stripes.

I consulted an expert in botany who told me that red maples grow mainly in the United States, especially in the state of Virginia.

I would have preferred a green maple leaf representing the sugar maple which grows in several Canadian provinces, though not in every one, I admit.

Some hon. members are against the inclusion of one or three maple leaves in the Canadian national flag, because maple trees do not grow in all Canadian provinces.

I must point out to those members that lions appear in the Canadian coat of arms. I have never seen a single one in our forests and yet they appear in the Canadian coat of arms.

As for me, Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the maple leaf flag, even though I would have liked it to contain a green leaf instead of a red one, and two blue stripes instead of red ones to represent the oceans.

In my opinion, it is time our country had a single distinctive flag.

If our flag were to contain symbols of our past, either English or French, or those of German, Italian or other minorities, it would be quite complicated and uninteresting.

I support the flag with a single maple leaf and will vote for it and against the union jack.

I cannot understand why—

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

In my opinion, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is still not speaking to the matter under discussion. If you will allow me, this time, to give you the opinion I wanted to express a while ago, it might throw some light on the point of order I raised.

I maintain that the Speaker of the house used an argument which seems based on a citation found at page 111 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which reads as follows:

[Text]

Relevancy is not easy to define. A wrong comprehension of it may have a serious effect on the freedom of speech.

[Translation]

I agree with that, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

Members are often deprived of their right to speak on the pretext that their remarks are irrelevant when as a matter of fact they refer to matters perhaps remote but yet related, even indirectly, to the question under debate. In borderline cases the member should be given the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. Speaker, if we consider the matter under discussion, which is the resumption of debate on the motion of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten), seconded by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott), that the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in, and the amendment thereto of the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith), and refer to May's sixteenth edition, page 451, we find the following:

Debate must not stray from the question before the house to matters which have been decided during the current session—

This is the part which Beauchesne does not stress:

—or anticipate a matter appointed for the consideration of the house—

Right now what the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) is speaking about is a matter anticipated to be taken into consideration later, after we have disposed of this motion and the amendment thereto of the hon. member for Perth. I humbly submit, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is out of order. I base my argument on May's sixteenth edition, page 451, in submitting that the hon. member is anticipating the subject of a future debate and is not considering what is the question before the house at the moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that the argument which the hon. member for Mégantic is now submitting to the Chair is fully justified. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm knows the rules; he must keep to the matter under discussion and limit his remarks thereto. What is relevant is not so much how he will vote on the main motion but the stand he wants to take on the amendment submitted to the house. Therefore, I ask him to limit his remarks to the specific matter now before the house.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I noticed earlier that some members have referred to farm problems in eastern Canada and they have been permitted to elaborate easily on that subject, although we are now discussing the motion under consideration.

I am going to end my remarks by saying this: It would be a pity for the house to adopt two flags, instead of just one, namely the single maple leaf flag and the union jack, because I know that even on the government side the second flag is far from being unanimously accepted—I mean the union jack, which is the symbol of our membership in the commonwealth of British nations and of our allegiance to the crown.

Mr. Cyr: Will the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. Pigeon: By all means.

Mr. Cyr: Since as he pointed out, the hon. member will soon be through with his speech, in order to help him, could he tell the house whether he will vote for or against the motion for the holding of a plebiscite?

Mr. Paul: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just asked a question is not in his seat and, consequently, he should not be recognized, in my opinion.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I said how I would vote but I do hope that this parliament, while respecting the opinion of those who do not share mine, will choose one national flag, not two.

Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Pigeon: I hope the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) and the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Pepin), as well as other hon. members, will vote against the second part of the resolution calling for the adoption of the union jack.

I expressed my point of view and I hope this flag is adopted without delay.

Mr. Cyr: Might the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Pigeon: Certainly.

Mr. Cyr: Will the hon member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm vote for or against the motion concerning a plebiscite?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I wish to tell the house that I shall vote against a plebiscite.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Gundlock).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caouette: Dispense.

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I see that I have some friends in the house today who are not always here when I have the honour to speak. I would say at the outset of my remarks that I rise to support this amendment and agree wholeheartedly that a plebiscite should be held to settle this very controversial question. I know that hon. members and the Canadian public, as a matter of fact, have heard a great deal about the flag. Some hon. members have stated very clearly inside and outside the house that we have probably heard too much about it. However, this is the point we are considering at the moment, and I do not believe we should be guilty of merely passing it over. We have our duty to carry out in the house as representatives of the people. As I have said previously on several occasions, I believe in my view we are here almost as delegates. This is certainly my view when we consider the correspondence we have received on this question, some of which I have here. We are not just here to represent our constituencies, but in view of the representations that have been made to us I believe we have to take the further step of making up our own minds. It is my view that we are delegated to putting forth our views on the different aspects and facets of the flag question.

The question before us at the moment is whether there should be a plebiscite to decide this issue. I said earlier that I support the amendment. I want to say a few words later as to my reasons for supporting it. I believe this amendment is necessary. It was necessary earlier, as many hon. members have said when advocating an amendment of this kind, but it is more than ever necessary today. In my view it is necessary that we have a plebiscite on this issue because it is one that is so important to the people of Canada; it is one that has so much emotion wrapped up in it. But even more than that, many people feel it is almost an issue of conscience. Frankly and personally, Mr. Speaker, I feel that way myself. It has gone beyond being a political matter; it has gone beyond being an emotional matter and I think it is one of conscience, not only to members of this house but to the country as a whole—and I mean Canada as we know it. A great deal has been said about what Quebec wants and what other parts of Canada want.

I think it is a matter of conscience which Canada as a whole might be able to settle. There are many arguments against a plebiscite and it does have drawbacks. But in an issue such as this I would firmly support it, and I believe the question would be settled much more readily. There are reasons—here I am not necessarily speaking for the members of the official opposition—why all members of the house, including members opposite should support the plebiscite, and I should like to put forward as reasons for holding a plebiscite today more than at any time previously one or two arguments.

On August 22 last the Toronto Telegram in an editorial carried headings such as this : "Ask the people"; "Too big for compromise"; "A vote cannot be free"—referring to a vote in this house. This brings up the point that there was a time when many of us in this house thought that if we were allowed a free vote we could probably come up with a flag suitable to many people in Canada. I am referring to a distinctive flag. I am not speaking of any particular flag at the moment, although as I pointed out before on several occasions in this house I am obliged to put forth the views of my constituents in this matter, and I have a few of their letters here. Many of them date back as far as May and run through to October. Many support a plebiscite and I will refer to them in a moment. I also have letters criticizing some of the action which I have taken in the house, and some of the words I have spoken. But as I said a moment ago, we members of parliament are delegated to put forward our views. I have had at least two letters which have criticized what I have said in the house in connection with the vast number of letters I have received concerning my presentation of the views of the majority of the people I represent.

I referred a moment ago to an editorial in the Toronto Telegram. This editorial contained some very strong statements which I think are relevant today. For instance, the editorial commences:

> The Canadian ensign must not be lowered without the consent of the people.

I agree with that, Mr. Speaker. This is not a new view; the editorial is dated last August. The editorial continues:

> No decision of the House of Commons, by free vote or otherwise to strike our historic ensign and replace it with a pennant of the Prime Minister's choosing can be construed as expressing the consensus of the nation.
> The voice of the people can be heard, on this issue, only through a national plebiscite.

These words appeared in a paper which is not usually known for supporting a particular political party, certainly not the one sitting on this side of the house at the moment. But I think it is quite a fair editorial, which is the reason I am quoting from it. It goes on:

> None would seriously suggest that all controversial issues before parliament should be resolved by plebiscite or referendum. That is not the way our system works. A government having received its mandate pushes ahead with its legislative program and stakes its life on its success or failure.
> But the flag issue is different.

I should like to take exception to the way the government has handled this question. A moment ago I referred to an editorial which said that the government, having received its mandate, pushes ahead with its legislative program. As I recall it, the flag question did not appear on any legislative program; in other words, it was not in the throne speech. As was said earlier many times in this house we now conceive it to be a political flag. Even after the question has been sent to a committee I still feel this way. That is why I agree with the amendment to refer the matter at some time—I am not urging that it be done quickly—to the people on a plebiscite, perhaps at the time of an election or at some other opportune time.

I mentioned earlier that I thought there was all the more reason to hold a plesbiscite now than even at so short a time ago as ten days. I know you will forgive me, Mr. Speaker, if I transgress a moment, but I am sure you will call me to order if I go too far. I should like to mention some actions taken by the government particularly in the very recent past. As far as I am concerned all through this session there have been examples of government ineptitude. In spite of things which I have said in the past, things I am saying today and things I will say in the future, I am proud to stand here and think that I have a few friends in the house on both sides. But whether that is so or not, I do have a great deal of respect for the cabinet.

Another point to give strength to my argument that we should support a plesbiscite at this time is this.

Should a government with that kind of record bring in a flag in the manner it has done, in spite of all the arguments which have been presented against it both inside and outside this chamber?

We in this party have been accused of speaking during this debate because it is politically expedient to do so. Quite frankly I think the government in pushing forward its present design as quickly as it possibly can is doing nothing more than indulging in political expediency.

On occasions we have sat quietly in this chamber listening to a good deal of talk, and I do not wish to become involved in a wrangle this afternoon; but on some occasions when we have been on our feet we have been fulfilling our duty here, by using the only means open to us to prevent the government from acting only on the principle of political expediency.

Many derogatory remarks have been made by hon. members on the opposite side about the speeches we have been making in the past about the flag question. Many of those statements have been made outside this house, or carried from this house and presented to the Canadian public through the news media. A great many people in Canada have little or no access to events taking place in this country, other than by radio, television or newspaper. I am not in any way being critical, but it is for that reason we get on our feet in this chamber and make statements about the actions of this government.

I do not intend to go into detail about the actions of the government, which have been under discussion in this house in the past few days, but it is because of those actions and the attitude of the government that I pose a question as my strongest argument against this government's procedure on the flag question. That is, should a government with such a record be allowed to present its choice of a Canadian national flag in this hurried, politically expedient manner?

The editorial to which I referred a moment ago stated that the question was too big for compromise. I think that editorial is of such importance it bears repeating at this time, although I am not sure that it has been read.

An hon. Member: Repetition.

Mr. Gundlock: I have not said that I am repeating this article, but only that it may have been read before in this chamber. If the hon. member knows it has been read, I hope he will correct me and indicate where on the record it is to be found. If the hon. member cannot do so, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that I should be allowed to read it in support of the argument I am making this afternoon.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member has invited someone to point out the grounds on which he is out of order. The hon. member is patently out of order when reading from documents reflecting upon debates of the House of Commons or matters that are before the house. I draw your attention to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, citation 157 (5) at page 132, which reads as follows:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

I hesitate to call the member to order in view of the fact he is reading from the Globe and Mail, which is a newspaper recognized as reflecting the opinions of the party itself and not of individual members.

I should like to further read from citation 157 (6) as follows:

> "The rule is quite clear, that the quoting of a newspaper, an author or a book which reflects upon debate before the house, either directly or indirectly is entirely out of order, because members are here to give their own opinion and not to quote the opinion of others..."

It is quite clear that the hon. member is out of order in this respect, but I hesitate to bring him to order because he is quoting from a recognized Tory newspaper.

Mr. Gundlock: In regard to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should perhaps state that I have apologized to you on several occasions for being a member who is not too conversant with the rules, however, in this case I am not quoting from the Globe and Mail, and in the second place the hon. member has only made one of his usual contributions to this house.

Mr. Byrne: Would the hon. member identify the document from which he has read?

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I think, now that the hon. member for Kootenay East has indicated to his electors that he is present in the house today, we can get on with the debate.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I am present on every occasion the house is sitting, so that remark was unnecessary. Will the hon. member identify the document from which he read, or intends to read?

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Speaker, I think I identified the article earlier. I am quoting from the Toronto Telegram of Saturday, August 22. I hope you will correct me if I am wrong, but I have observed members on all sides of this house almost every day quoting from newspaper articles.

Mr. Byrne: That does not make it right.

Mr. Gundlock: They have done so in substantiation of their arguments, and I think quite rightly so. I have attempted by quoting from certain articles to indicate public opinion to this house, and if I am wrong in doing so I hope you will inform me, Mr. Speaker. I have no wish to offend the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), any other member of this house, or the rules.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member for Lethbridge might be allowed to read at least part of the editorial, if not the whole of it, because the citation referred to by the hon. member for Kootenay East relates only to an editorial to the extent that it reflects on the proceedings within the house. If the editorial from which the hon. member for Lethbridge wishes to quote has reference only to a debate in the house, then he is not out of order. To be out of order the article would have to reflect on the proceedings of this chamber. I might say it is very difficult for the Chair to rule in respect of this particular article until such time as it has been read.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have placed anything on the record which reflects on the proceedings of this house, and I certainly have not quoted the article completely. I should like to quote it, but if it is offensive in any way perhaps you will so inform me and I will then go on to another part of my speech.

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Gundlock: It is not carried. This is the usual contribution that I hear from certain members. I said earlier that there were strong views on this issue a long time ago, and I think there are even stronger views today in support of a plebiscite than some months ago or even as recently as two weeks ago. I could quote letters I have containing strong views expressed by my constituents. I have one letter here to which I might refer. As a matter of fact, I will quote it exactly:

> It would be unthinkable for me to do anything but support the red ensign because my son, Douglas, who won the D.F.C., flew under that flag for 52 trips over Germany. Unfortunately he was shot down on his 52nd trip.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, he goes on to support the action of the French and sympathizes with the other racial group. He supports them, but yet he says it is unthinkable for him to do anything other than support the red ensign. How then in the light of all the arguments that have been put forward in the house can we really settle this matter in the house, particularly at this stage of the discussion?

Much has been made of the divisions in the ranks of parties. I suppose there are, but I really do not see anything wrong with that. I think it is a very good thing so far as a matter of this type is concerned. As I said earlier, if we had had a completely free vote it would have been nice. I think we could have accomplished something because I have heard of no one in the house or outside it who is not in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag and always has been. Some people prefer this, some people prefer that and some people prefer something else, but in the first place there is no one who does not consider that we should have a distinctive Canadian flag. So we go on from there.

The committee considered the matter and made a recommendation to the house which has resulted in the amendment now before us that many of us are supporting. The situation became impossible when the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) indicated very frankly that we would not have a free vote in the house. It was stated very clearly outside and inside the house that the government would stand or fall on the matter. Then there was a battle, which I do not need to review, that led to the establishment of a committee. So I think the only proper way out is to have a plebiscite.

We do not have to rush. We do not have to have the plebiscite now or even at the next election. I think there is plenty of time and I believe that time would do a great deal to solve this problem. I am only expressing a personal opinion, but if the national anthem suggested in another resolution had been put forward 20 years ago as the flag issue has been at this time the issue would probably have been a much more controversial one than the flag issue is today. What do we hear today? Very little, if anything, about a national anthem. Yet 20 years ago it would have been a very hot issue in my opinion. I am not quoting anybody but only offering this opinion in support of the idea that time might help to resolve the whole situation so far as the flag is concerned. If lots of time were taken and a plebiscite were held I think a great deal of the animosity would disappear.

I am going to conclude shortly, Mr. Speaker, so that those who are impatient may have an opportunity to put forward whatever views they like. Some time ago in the debate I pointed out something with respect to my constituency in particular, about which I am very proud. I have not heard of any other area doing the same thing in order to promote good relations between residents of Quebec and those of the other provinces of Canada. I mention this again because I think it is one more argument in favour of a plebiscite. I am referring to students going back and forth all summer between Alberta and Quebec for the purpose of spending even as short a period as two weeks in the other province. I think this is a great example. It provides us with the courage to support this sort of thing and adds some weight to the argument I put forth a moment ago.

Let us take a little more time, whether it be a year, ten years or 15 years. Let us have a little more of this sort of co-operation. I will be through in a moment if the hon. member wants to ask a question. With a little more of this sort of thing I think the animosity would break down very rapidly. Once again—I use the word "again" because I think there has been some deterioration—Canadians would appreciate one another as they did a short time ago and would go on from there to a much greater fulfilment. I cannot conceive that a plebiscite on this matter could do any harm whatsoever so far as this kind of relationship is concerned.

Does the hon. member want to ask a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the energy of the hon. member now holding the floor seems to be gradually failing him, would you grant him the privilege of sitting down to end his speech?

Mr. Speaker, somehow I feel you did not hear my question.

I should like you to allow the member to terminate his speech sitting down.

[Text]

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Speaker, I did not quite understand the question but I think I got the tail end of it. I want to tell the hon. member that if he thinks I am weak it is only because I was trying to be rather calm and nice this afternoon. On some previous occasions I have become a little excited, but if the hon. member wants something along that line, that is fine with me. I thought I was putting forward certain arguments this afternoon in a calm and reasonable way. Quite frankly, it is such interjections as that which has just been made that sometimes spoil the relationship here in the house. I guess I am speaking on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, but this is one of the reasons that the house itself, not this party nor that party but the whole house, is blamed and criticized throughout the country for spending so much time and doing so little. I was very careful to stay away from touchy subjects this afternoon. There are a great many things along this line that I should like to emphasize. This is the kind of thing, Mr. Speaker, that is spoiling the image of this house. I was speaking in a very calm, and I thought a reasonable way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; there was really no point of order in the matter raised by the hon. member for Lotbinière. I suggest that the hon. member for Lethbridge return to his subject.

Mr. Choquette: Remain seated.

Mr. Gundlock: There are some members of this house, Mr. Speaker, who make their remarks through you. I would be glad to continue my speech seated if the Speaker would allow it.

The other day an hon. member said he was of the opinion the Prime Minister had revealed to the house and to the country that, so far as he was concerned, the work of the committee had been little more than a sham. He had introduced this most controversial subject in the worst and most political way possible, and he expected the committee would bring in something that would allow the government to get rid of this embarrassment as quickly as possible. Therefore, the time element was the only point that mattered at all.

There is something happening right here in the house, at the moment, during the debate on this amendment. Why are we not allowed a question period?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Miss LaMarsh: We are sticking to the rules of the house.

Mr. Gundlock: Yes, but I ask why? Would you like to explain it?

Miss LaMarsh: If my hon. friend will permit a question, may I ask him if he is not aware of the rules of the house? He inquires why a question period is not allowed. May I suggest to the hon. member that the simplest way possible of achieving that is to sit down, shut up and let the matter come to a vote.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I ask you to rule whether or not the intervention by the Minister of National Health and Welfare is a point of order or just one of those irrelevant interventions that should be ruled out entirely? I ask, was it a point of order raised by the minister?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; the minister rose to ask a question and the hon. member for Lethbridge sat down. I assumed he was allowing the question. Whether or not it was in order, the Chair has very serious doubts. Perhaps I should suggest that it was out of order to the same extent as the remarks which were being made by the hon. member for Lethbridge, which I assume prompted the question.

Mr. Gundlock: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will not refer to the interjection. I will be through in just a moment, and I know I will get a hand for that.

This question was not part of the legislative program. I said earlier, and I would now inform the minister who just came in, that I was sorry other members had to leave this debate to go to a committee. I believe the minister has just come from the committee, and I wish I had been able to attend. However we cannot be in two places at the same time and I felt it was important that I take part in this particular debate. Before the minister returned to the house, and you will bear me out in this Mr. Speaker, I expressed great admiration for the ministers of this government, not the government as a whole but the individual ministers. I do not believe I can say very much against any of them. I say this for the information of the minister.

I see my time is just about up, so I shall not embark upon another subject. We may have other opportunities to do so. I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members opposite for their patience.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): The intervention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) in this very important debate reflected an attitude typical of government arrogance when she said that everyone should sit down and shut up. This has been her only contribution to national unity in this respect. I want to make my first remarks in this debate relevant to the remarks that were made by the restless member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) who, in his egotism as the leader of an 11 member party which includes himself, said yesterday that he knew the opinions—

Mr. Langlois: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Starr: —of all Canadians in every riding.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; the hon. member for Mégantic is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Langlois: It will not be long, Mr. Speaker. Is the hon. member for Ontario, who is a former minister of the crown, aware of the fact that there are 13 members in our party and not 11? He should learn to count up to 13 at least before he makes any such remarks.

Mr. Starr: Let it be 13. They will have a lot less after the next election because Liberals will be elected in their seats in Quebec. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, it is still a provincial party. This hon. member professes to know and understand the feelings of the people of Canada, in every riding in Canada. I am making my remarks relevant to his speech of yesterday on this same amendment. He says that what we are trying to do in submitting an amendment for a plebiscite is to play politics with this issue. In the next breath he says that what he is doing is what the people in his riding want him to do. Well, what is playing politics? We are doing what we believe the people in our ridings want us to do, and that is to preserve the traditions of this country as well as its symbols.

I wonder if the people in his riding wanted the Canadian red ensign what his position would be? I have no doubt in my mind he would play politics by asking that the Canadian red ensign be retained in order that he may satisfy the people in his riding. If that is playing politics, then he is playing the worst type of politics on this issue that anyone has played in this House of Commons yet. I was rather ashamed to listen to him yesterday when he compared Canada to the emerging nations of Africa and other places in this world. He said they were proud to wave a new emblem in conjunction with their emergence as a nation. I was ashamed, because we in Canada have existed as a nation for almost 100 years. We have traditions of which to be proud. We are not emerging as a nation.

This is his attitude: He wants to do away with the traditions of this country; he wants to start fresh with Canada as an emerging nation like those in Africa and Asia. He does not want to be reminded of what has gone on in the past. I ask him this: What about those Canadians who have memories of the past, memories that are deeply rooted in their hearts? Has he no feeling for those people? Is he not prepared to give them an opportunity to express their views on the type of flag they want? This is what a plebiscite would do.

Why is there such tremendous impatience on the part of the government, and of certain other hon. members, regarding this important question? Why are these tremendous pressures being imposed? Why is there this terrific pressure on parliament to get this through at a certain period of time? They say a symbol has no significance. If that is so then I ask the Prime Minister, the government and other hon. members, why are they so determined to change the present symbol for one that has no tradition of any kind at all?

The flag committee was set up by parliament, but the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) made it very clear at the outset that this party would only be satisfied if a substantial portion of the membership of that committee came up with a recommendation, and it was pointed out very clearly that this would have to be 80 per cent or more.

Mr. Robichaud: Is this democracy in action?

Mr. Starr: I will come to you later. You should look after the baby seals. You are not doing a good job on that yet.

The whole attitude has been to wipe out all tradition. It has been one of "anything at all for a flag; let us get rid of tradition." The committee had under consideration a compromise flag which, if submitted with other designs to the Canadian people, I feel would have been agreeable to them. A poll has been taken which indicates that over 60 per cent of the population want an opportunity to say what flag they will have from now on for all time. The people want that opportunity, but this government and certain other hon. members in the house refuse to give them that opportunity.

They have refused to give the people the privilege of expressing their opinions. They are adamant in their attitude. They tell the people, "We will give you a flag and you will have to take what we are giving you." It has been argued that this new emblem will bring about national unity. This is a fable, Mr. Speaker, because already it has created disunity in Canada where disunity never existed previously.

Unity is a very important matter to discuss. I feel that a plebiscite would bring about unity in Canada. The government and others say that the flag is a symbol of unity, but I do not believe that issues so emotional as the flag are the root of the troubles between Quebec and Canada.

Does anybody for a moment think that the issuing of bilingual cheques will bring about unity in this country? Does anybody think that the translation of Beauchesne into French will bring about unity? Does anybody think bilingual stewardesses on the air lines will bring about unity? Does anybody think that the parliamentary telephone book being translated into French will bring about unity? Does anybody think the flag will bring about unity? No. The causes of disunity are more deeply rooted. To say that the flag will bring about unity is a complete fable.

I want to say with all sincerity and honesty to hon. members opposite, particularly to those who are members from Quebec and to the members of the Creditiste party, led by the egotistic member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), it is obvious that there is an organized effort on the part of those members of this Grit government, from the province of Quebec, and on the part of others, to inject themselves into this debate from their seats on points of orders, and in any other way they possibly can. We had an example of it here today and it is shameful, disgraceful conduct.

This is an important subject and they should be on their feet expressing their opinions, not trying to interject while other hon. members are speaking. I say to them in all sincerity, because I believe this is true, that they are doing something which is a discredit to themselves and to the province of Quebec, and I say that by that sort of behaviour they are antagonizing the rest of Canada against them—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: —and that they have no one else to blame but themselves for that attitude. I think they should take part in this debate and express their opinions rather than trying to stop others from doing so.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, may I—

Mr. Winkler: What are you rising on?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to be put off by any phony point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member for Leeds rising on a point of order or a question of privilege?

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, I challenge the comments of the hon. member on the matter of relevancy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I asked the hon. member for Leeds whether he is rising on a point of order?

Mr. Matheson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. My point of order is this, that the fourth edition of Beauchesne, page 111, citation 119(3) says:

> Relevancy is not easy to define. A wrong comprehension of it may have a serious effect on the freedom of speech...in borderline cases the member should be given the benefit of the doubt.

We agree with this; but may I point out that Sir Erskine May, at page 451 of his book on parliamentary practice, dealing with the relevancy of debate says:

> A member, when called to speak, must direct his speech to the question then under discussion, or to a motion or amendment. ...Debate must not stray from the question before the house...or anticipate—

And that is the word I stress, the word anticipate—

> —or anticipate a matter appointed for the consideration of the house—

The present motion is one which reads as follows:

> That the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in.

We are not now debating that motion. We are debating the amendment moved by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith), seconded by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp), which reads in part:

—your committee therefore recommends that the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite to be held at the next general election in order that the Canadian people may be given their rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag; and that the committee for such purpose be revived.

I point out that we have before us the motion to which I have referred, the motion of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten), seconded by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott), and that there is anticipation on the part of the hon. member, who is talking about things not strictly related to the question of returning this matter to the committee. In this case there is no possible limitation of debate because we have the broad motion before us, but we have listened for some 13 minutes to the hon. member and I do not recollect any real reference on his part to a plebiscite or referral to committee. Certainly I think this is out of order, and the only way we can bring some kind of order to the debate is to have a ruling.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the difficulties facing the Speaker on a matter such as this in applying the rule of relevancy; but may I point out that I have been checking the debate of yesterday and have found that the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) was not interrupted by the Chair at all and failed to observe the rule of relevancy until he got to the last five minutes of his speech. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron) mentioned the word "plebiscite" once in the course of a scholarly and philosophical discussion on symbols and he was not interrupted, any more than was the hon. member for Villeneuve, by anybody on the Liberal side of the house nor by the Chair. Therefore I would say that when on those occasions the rule of relevancy was not strictly enforced, it can hardly be invoked now against members on this side of the house who are surely at liberty to make comments on statements made in the course of the debate by various other members, and discuss general matters pertaining to the subject under discussion. To be held down strictly, as is now suggested by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), when other members of this house were not held down strictly, would be an infringement of the rights of Her Majesty's loyal opposition.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), I also appreciate the difficulty the Speaker has in determining whether this may be a borderline case when considering the question of relevancy. I do not think, however, it is a satisfactory argument to say that because one member was able to violate the rules of the house, all speakers following him ought to be granted that same privilege.

Mr. Olson: At page 451 of May's sixteenth edition it states very clearly:

Debate must not stray from the question before the house...or anticipate a matter appointed for the consideration of the house—

I think the hon. member for Leeds made a good and sufficient argument when he said that there is a matter before the house, namely the main motion, that does in fact allow members to deal with all things such as the matter of design, the question of the maple leaf, be it a single maple leaf or three, the red ensign and anything else relating to the flag question. But I believe debate on the amendment to the motion that the committee's report be concurred in must be restricted to whether or not the committee, considering the whole question of a flag, should be given instructions to recommend to this house that a plebiscite be held.

I think it is perfectly clear from the citation in May's sixteenth edition to which I have referred that until we get back to the main motion, and while we are discussing this amendment, any discussion of any matter related to the flag other than whether or not it is desirable to give the committee instructions on a plebiscite, is out of order. I believe that while, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) said, a number of members have violated this rule of relevancy, that certainly cannot be considered a reason for allowing all those speaking afterwards to transgress the rules of the house.

Mr. Smallwood: That should be worth a trip to Africa.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member going to speak to the point of order?

Mr. Starr: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Speaking to this point of order, I would say that I am not a learned member like those who have expressed themselves so far; as a matter of fact I have not read some of the citations to which reference has been made today. It is good for one to hear these things. But, Mr. Speaker, I have to rely upon your fair judgment, for which I have a great deal of respect, and whatever Your Honour rules will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: One hon. member who participated in the discussion of this point of order referred particularly to the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette). While the point of order was being discussed I glanced for a minute or two at the speech delivered yesterday by that hon. member and saw a number of references to the question of a plebiscite. But be that as it may, certainly the rules are there and there is nothing the Chair or hon. members can do about that. It is the responsibility of individual members taking part in debate to keep in mind these rules and try to abide by them. Certainly the point made by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) is well taken; the citations that he gave are exact and to the point. I know that the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) who has the floor at the moment will keep this in mind in the course of his remarks.

Mr. Starr: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, in the remarks I have been making today I have at all times kept this amendment and the plebiscite in mind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: I believe that if a plebiscite were submitted to the people of this country we would come out of this with one national flag. If we do not have a plebiscite and we adopt the flag that has been recommended, we will have four or five different flags flying throughout this country forever. We would have this flag; no doubt Ontario would adopt the red ensign—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: —the union jack will be flown in Newfoundland and probably other provinces, and the fleur-de-lis will continue to fly proudly, as it has in the past, in Quebec. No one will know which is the Canadian flag, because wherever he travels he will see a different type of flag. This is what is going to happen. But, Mr. Speaker, through a plebiscite being held there will be the opportunity for the majority of the people of this country to express their opinion in a democratic fashion as to what the national flag should be; and the rest of the people will certainly accept the decision of the majority of Canadians.

I personally believe in tradition, but this flag has no tradition whatsoever, in my view, and it has not in the view of thousands of people across this country. There is now a very concentrated and fanatical effort to do away with traditions in this country; they are being chipped away a little at a time, until eventually they will all have gone. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is a definite fanaticism on the part of the Prime Minister and the government to do away with these traditions. They believe we should have anything but the red ensign. First of all they introduced the three maple leaf flag; we had to have that. Then the flag question was submitted to a committee. Now another design has emerged and they have forgotten about the three maple leaf design. If that design was so important to them then, why is it not important now? Now this design is the most important thing. This leads me to believe that the design is not so important as the fact that this is the culmination of an effort to do away with traditions in this country. In no other way can the government's attitude be explained. They want to obliterate these traditions. They want to tear down the red ensign. When you do that, Mr. Speaker, I submit you are tearing out of the hearts of many Canadians a symbol which they hold dear and have held dear for many years.

The question posed in one's mind is, why is this being done? Why not give the people of this country an opportunity to say what they want in this regard? Why is parliament trying to ram this design down the throat of everyone in this country? Well, it is not parliament because we in this party certainly do not believe it is right; but this government is trying to ram this design down the throat of parliament and the throat of the people of this country. I submit that this question should be referred back to the committee. I believe they finally decided on three or four designs out of the thousands submitted to them. They could look at them again. Among the three or four designs there may be a choice for the people, and these designs could be submitted to them in a plebiscite.

It has been said that a new flag was promised. It has been said Canada needs a distinctive flag, I ask, Mr. Speaker, how distinctive is this new design recommended by ten members out of 14 on this committee? Is it more distinctive than the red ensign was? Is it distinctive when you cannot tell it apart from the flag of another country? I do not think the word "distinctive" should be used at all. I think that is a camouflage, because certainly this flag will not be distinctive in any shape or form with another country flying a flag similar to it.

Why are we rushing through this very important issue? It is said that we are doing this because it was a political promise made during the heat of an election. Many promises were made at that time. Why try to jam this through? Why not concentrate on the scholarships promised the students of this country 10,000 of them?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Starr: What about the national development corporation?

Mr. Robichaud: On a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Well, before a point of order is brought by the minister, I assume he wants to suggest that the hon. member who has the floor is not strictly relevant, and by anticipation I think I would agree with this. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) will, I am sure, wish to heed once again the suggestion of the Chair and try to be relevant to the subject before the house.

Mr. Starr: You are quite right, Mr. Speaker, and I bow to your ruling. I can only say that I get carried away by what has been foisted on parliament and the people of the country, instead of our considering other matters more important to the economic situation than this symbol the government tries to camouflage as unity in Canada.

In conclusion I would appeal to the Prime Minister and to the government to unite together in this matter, refer it to the committee, and have the committee come back with a recommendation that the issue be submitted to the people at the next available opportunity when cost would be minimal—probably at the next election. The good judgment of the people of the country will be known through the ballots cast, and I think all of us can unite under a flag which will be acceptable to all of Canada.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Grégoire: Dispense.

Mr. Simpson: —this is the second opportunity I have had to take part in this very controversial and very important debate on a very important subject. I should like to point out, as I did on the other occasion I spoke on this matter that I wish to represent the feelings of the people of my constituency on this question. In that respect I will be brief, Mr. Speaker, as I particularly wish to deal with the question of a plebiscite.

First of all, I should like to say that I feel it is the duty of every member of this house to bring to the attention of the house the views of the people he or she represents. I think we should all respect those views. We know there are a number of members, particularly on the government side, who have not taken part in this debate. That is their business, but I do not think they should criticize members on this side of the house who know it is their duty to express the views of their constituents. As I have said before, the people of Churchill constituency have on many occasions shown me in no uncertain terms that they are strongly in favour of retaining the red ensign. But knowing them as I do I am quite sure they would be perfectly willing to accept a modification of the ensign. I also know they are extremely willing for me to express their views and are also anxious to express their own views on the matter by way of a plebiscite.

I have mentioned before that I have received between 150 and 200 letters dealing with the flag question during the summer. Without exception each and every one of the people who wrote to me personally expressed his or her strong support for the red ensign. I am sure that for the past day or so all members have been receiving mail in this regard, and my mail has continued as well. I received a letter from a lady in Bowsman, Manitoba, pleading that the opportunity be given the people of Canada to decide the issue for themselves. Another letter which I received yesterday is one of a kind which I doubt very much any other members have received. Actually it is a telegram sent by an ordinary working man whom I know very well, and I can stand here and state that I do not know for certain his political affiliations. However, he has seen fit to spend $2.50 or $3—whatever it costs—in order to send this telegram from Thompson, Manitoba. He says:

> If you settle for anything other than the red ensign I will leave Canada and settle in some other country.

That is the feeling of a person who has spent good money to send me a telegram.

An hon. Member: Let him go.

Mr. Simpson: It might be one less vote for the hon. member, I do not know. But these are the views of the people I represent. Hon. members may say I am standing here obstructing the business of the house or wasting our time, but I would be perfectly willing to sit here for a very long time listening to the opinions of constituents of members on the other side of the house with regard to this question.

Mr. Grégoire: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I would suggest that members who speak from behind the curtain should not be permitted to do so. If they have not the courtesy to stay in their seats they should certainly not be allowed to make comments from behind the curtain.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson) has the floor and he should not be interrupted.

Mr. Grégoire: Question.

Mr. Simpson: The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) is standing behind the curtain calling "Question". I do not know whether he wants to ask me a question, but I will say to him at this time that he cannot expect to learn anything unless he does ask a few questions. However—

Mr. Rock: In that case, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question if he would permit it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Churchill has the floor. If he wishes to receive a question the hon. member can, of course, put one. But unless he relinquishes the floor he should not be interrupted.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker, I was just replying to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), who was asking a question. As I said, my time is limited, and I am sorry I have to put a roadblock in the way of his lifelong drive for higher education.

It is very interesting, having been the subject of criticism from government members, for members on this side of the house to consider the views of those members, and to consider the views expressed through editorials in various newspapers across the country. I should like to read several paragraphs from an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Telegram of August 22, and in view of the many quotations by government members from editorials I suspect they must heartily respect the views contained therein.

This particular editorial in part states:

> The Canadian ensign must not be lowered without the consent of the people.

That is a very interesting and understandable statement. The editorial then continues as follows:

> The voice of the people can be heard on this issue only through a national plebiscite.
> None would seriously suggest that all controversial issues before parliament should be resolved by plebiscite or referendum. That is not the way our system works. A government having received its mandate, pushes ahead with its legislative program and stakes its life on its success or failure.
> But the flag issue is different.

We have been criticized on many occasions by government supporters because of our previous contributions to the flag debate. How they ridiculed us for not accepting a suggestion to have a hasty vote in this house which might have adopted the three maple leaf design, the choice of the Prime Minister, as Canada's national flag. That is the flag which many of them said—as they did about the first version of the Canada pension plan —was the ultimate. It is interesting now to note what many of them said in this regard. Let us look at some of the statements of those members who criticized us and suggested we were obstructing the business of parliament.

First of all I should like to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp), as recorded at page 6957 of Hansard for August 18, 1964. The following question was asked:

> In view of the minister's statement that it will be a free vote, will he say whether the government would continue in office if the motion were accepted?

The minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of Canada speaks for this party and is the house leader. He will answer. I say this to my hon. friend, that it will make no difference to the votes of the people on this side of the house whether this is a free vote or whether it is a vote that may result in the defeat of the government.

I should like to underline the next line which reads:

> We believe in this flag individually.

At that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce was referring to the three maple leaf flag, and he said, "We believe in this flag individually." In view of that statement we on this side can only assume that the vast majority of the members sitting on that side of the house at that time believed in the three maple leaf flag, although perhaps individually.

At page 6962 of Hansard for the same date the hon. member for Eglinton said:

> Mr. Speaker, there is only one way by which Canada will have a national flag, and that is by the decision of this parliament. Let us live up to our responsibilities; let us get down to the business of making a decision. I do not mind a debate, but let us not have a filibuster; let us not have indefinite debate which has no purpose other than to avoid the taking of decision.

Again the minister at that time was speaking about the three maple leaf flag. While he is not in the house at the present time, I hope he will have some very serious second thoughts about those remarks.

The minister then went on to say, as reported at page 6963 of Hansard:

I invite my hon. friends opposite, and particularly the Leader of the Opposition, to abandon their negative role, which gets its best representation by this futile subamendment and which is doing so much damage to his party, and for that reason to the country, and join with the Prime Minister in achieving—

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Simpson:

—another great step forward in our development as a nation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a debate which took place during this session, and which is certainly not relevant to the amendment now before this house. I should again like to put on the record and quote from a decision made yesterday by Mr. Speaker who said:

I implied that in my statement, in saying that during the previous days on which this question had been discussed the Chair had been extremely lenient in order to give ample opportunity to any hon. member who wanted to say anything on the flag question, but that in future I thought that the rules of relevancy should be strictly applied.

For the last ten minutes the hon. member has been discussing matters which are not pertinent to the amendment.

Mr. Simpson: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. I have been leading up to the point of showing why a plebiscite should be held in this regard. If the Minister of Fisheries will contain himself and remain in his seat until I have completed my remarks, I am sure he will agree that I have made a valid point.

I will continue on from the point at which I was interrupted.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The point of order raised by the hon. Minister of Fisheries is well taken, and I take this opportunity to remind the hon. member who has the floor that the rules of relevancy have to be respected. I invite him to limit his remarks, as quickly as possible, to the subject matter of the discussion now before the house.

Mr. Simpson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was attempting to bring attention to the fact that, at the time of the previous debate, hon. members on the government side of this house also discussed matters such as a plebiscite, and at that time said there should be no plebiscite and no subamendment. They suggested we were only holding up the business of parliament and that what we should do is vote on the flag before parliament at that time. Had we followed their suggestion this house may have made a very bad decision.

There remain only two lines to the paragraph from which I was quoting and I should like to put them on the record. The Minister of Trade and Commerce then said:

—and join with the Prime Minister in achieving another great step forward in our development as a nation.

The minister was inviting the Leader of the Opposition to join with the Prime Minister in voting in favour of the adoption of the flag design before the house at that time.

I would just like to quote very briefly a few remarks made by the Prime Minister during that same debate, as part of my argument that a plebiscite should be held. On June 15 the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) said, as found on page 4318 of Hansard:

The government's responsibility is to decide on policy, to present that policy to parliament for consideration, and they hope support, and to stand or fall on the decisions parliament takes. If parliament decides that it cannot support a government on a matter of major policy, our system does then provide for a referendum, a referendum to the people in an election.

That was one of the first times we heard an election threatened in the flag debate. The Prime Minister, of course, goes across the country and says that the opposition is trying to force an election. I come now to the important words of the Prime Minister as found on page 4319 of Hansard.

Mr. Greene: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: You are not in your own seat.

An hon. Member: Yes, he is.

Mr. Churchill: He has been moved.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Renfrew South has the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Greene: I would refer Your Honour, if I can be heard above the cackle of the geese across the floor, to citation 148 of Beauchesne, fourth edition, page 127. Paragraph 3 of that citation reads as follows:

> Reference to debates of the current session is discouraged even if such reference is not irrelevant, as it tends to reopen matters already decided.

Mr. Bell: What has been decided?

Mr. Greene: With respect, Your Honour, I submit that the hon. member's speech such as it is, apart from being directed at taking up the time of the house and for no other purpose—

Mr. Winkler: That is not for you to decide.

Mr. Greene: —is based entirely on references to other speeches that have been made, and I submit with respect that this is contrary to citation 148, paragraph 3. In view of the Speaker's admonition of yesterday, I submit with respect that the hon. member should be ruled out of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Renfrew South, he will have noticed while reading three lines from paragraph 3 of citation 148 of Beauchesne that the learned author has reference to matters already decided. Unfortunately the matter now before the house has not yet been decided.

Mr. Simpson: I have only three more brief references to make to the remarks made by the Prime Minister and then I will lay my case before the house. On June 15, as I mentioned, the Prime Minister said as found on page 4319 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I believe that the time has now come for the government, in our tradition of responsible government, to take action by submitting this resolution to parliament for decision. Parliament will then take the responsibility and parliament will decide. If the government resolution is defeated, then on a matter of such major importance the government has obviously lost the confidence of parliament.

In the same speech, as found at page 4321 of Hansard, the Prime Minister went on to say:

> In my view, the time has come for a further and final change.

I want you to take note of this, Mr. Speaker, because this is one reason I say there should be a plebiscite. The Prime Minister said that the time has now come for a further and final change. He made this remark following remarks he made outlining the history of the red ensign. So we can take it from this statement that the Prime Minister feels that when a final decision is made by the house on the flag, that is it for all time.

There are further interesting remarks of the Prime Minister to be found on page 4323 of Hansard. After reviewing events leading up to approval of the three maple leaves conjoined on one stem as the national emblem of Canada, he had this to say:

> In the light of this, Mr. Speaker, can there be any doubt that the design recommended in the resolution is a proper one, with Canadian history, Canadian tradition and official sanction on the highest levels behind it?
> It is because this design has such a history and because, with the blue sea to sea border, it makes a striking and beautiful flag, that the government is putting it before parliament in this resolution. The single maple leaf, I repeat, has not the same historical and heraldic significance—

These are the words of the Prime Minister on June 15.

> —even though it also, with the blue borders, I am told, makes a very attractive flag.

So we have the words of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp) and of the Prime Minister lauding the design which they proposed at that time as being just about the ultimate in flag design; and not only were they quite prepared to accept it but they expected the house to accept it also as quickly as possible. It is also very interesting to read an editorial that appeared in the Ottawa Journal of August 28 in relation to the very matter about which I am talking. The editorial is entitled, "Mr. Pearson's 'Discovery'" and reads as follows:

> The government lacks gumption. N.D.P. leader Douglas asked whether committees could be put to work while the house is engrossed in the flag debate. The question appeared to take the Prime Minister by surprise. He understood there would be a meeting of one committee next Tuesday. Then he brightened. Why, yes, he said, Mr. Douglas' suggestion should be considered so that while the flag debate went on "some useful work might be accomplished".
> Mr. Pearson has been ready enough to groan about the flag debate taking more than 15 sitting days in the house. But whatever he may think of opposition tactics, it is his duty to see that the business of parliament is done. After 15 days of debate Mr. Pearson has to be told by the opposition to get the committees to work and the idea suddenly hits him as a good one! Leadership?

So far as obstructing the business of the house is concerned, we all remember the action taken by government members on September 3 of this year—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the remarks of the hon. member at this point are relevant to the question before the house. To my mind it seems to me he is discussing the question of proceedings of the house and this seems to be rather remote from the point which we should be discussing, the amendment to the motion.

Mr. Simpson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will just conclude these brief remarks and then I will refer—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. member's remarks are not relevant I do not think he should continue to put them on the record. To my mind the editorial he has just quoted has nothing at all to do with the subject matter of the discussion at this time.

Mr. Simpson: I have completed the editorial, Mr. Speaker. I am referring to the charges of the government in regard to obstruction and I am saying that we all remember the action taken—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Simpson: —by the government supporters on the 3rd of September when the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) moved the adjournment of the flag debate which was then in progress so that the house could get on with other important business. His motion was supported by the official opposition but it was opposed—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member would kindly revert to the specific question we are supposed to be considering at this time, namely the amendment having reference to a plebiscite.

Mr. Simpson: Very good, Mr. Speaker, I am going to introduce the reason why I feel a plebiscite should be held, but I should like to refer very briefly to remarks made by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto). In his speech during the flag debate he said in his concluding paragraph, as found on page 7034 of Hansard of August 19 last:

> I plead with all hon. gentlemen to say what they have to say in loud and clear tones. By all means, all members should express their opinions, but they should not pervert this debate by moving amendments, subamendments and more subamendments. I beg you to help in concluding this debate, so that we may give the Canadian flag back to the people, to whom it belongs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, he says we should give it back to the Canadian people to whom it belongs. I say we will do that by means of a plebiscite. Yesterday, I believe it was, the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Cadieux) made an impassioned speech in which he referred to the diligent work of the flag committee. I agree wholeheartedly with him, that they worked very diligently in performing the task which we put before them. As I recall the words of the hon. member for Terrebonne, he wanted to know, with reference to the plebiscite, what kind of majority we—meaning the Conservatives—would accept when we were not willing to accept a majority of 72 per cent of the committee?

Now, with all due respect to this statement by the hon. member for Terrebonne, I feel this was a political vote recorded by members who, two months ago, undoubtedly would have voted for the three maple leaf flag had they been given that opportunity. I say that the justification for a plebiscite on this issue is that the flag issue differs vastly from any legislation which may come before this house. When legislation comes before this house, it must be admitted by all hon. members, on most occasions members will vote along party lines. They vote knowing that they are fully responsible to their constituents. If their constituents do not like the party line they are following when they vote on this legislation, then they will suffer the fate of many politicians at the next election. However, the legislation can then be amended or changed by future governments or parliaments. As the Prime Minister said, when this issue is settled by parliament it will be final.

Mr. Byrne: It does not say that in the resolution.

Mr. Simpson: Your Prime Minister said it. If you do not believe your Prime Minister, that is not my fault.

Mr. Byrne: He is not going to be there forever; he is not going to live forever.

Mr. Simpson: It is a good thing he is not in the house to hear you say that.

The difference between the flag issue and legislation is that we do not send legislation to a plebiscite. As I pointed out, and as I will point out further, we are being asked by the government to decide on the question of a flag. Many members who would have voted for the three maple leaf flag were certainly not voicing the opinions of their constituents and therefore may have been tossed out at the next election. However, these people would have been stuck with that flag.

Mr. Byrne: It was not a bad flag, after all.

Mr. Simpson: He says it was not a bad flag. The hon. member says we have a new choice in front of us, so let us get on with the job so that we can all get home.

You may rule, Mr. Speaker, that what I am about to say is not relevant to the debate.

However, I am wondering why it is we have not heard anything about the Prime Minister's plan to fly this new flag in front of the parliament buildings. He flew his own design for three or four days so the people could get a look at it. I did not agree with that policy at the time. I am wondering why he wished to fly his own flag but apparently has no intention of flying this flag in front of the buildings.

If I may return to the question of the flag committee and the plebiscite, the hon. member for Terrebonne was quite perturbed to think that 72 per cent of the members of the flag committee voted in favour of the one maple leaf flag, so why should we have a plebiscite? As I said before, we must realize that the same 72 per cent that voted for the one maple leaf flag were more than anxious to vote for the three maple leaf flag a little less than two months ago. The people of Canada do not change their views that quickly. I tell you that is the reason we think this question should go to the people.

I should like also to leave this thought with the house, Mr. Speaker, and particularly with the citizens of Canada who may be harbouring any thoughts that the official opposition have been belabouring this matter unduly long, or that they have been obstructing parliament. I leave this thought with those people who have been so vocal in lauding the special committee that was set up to decide the flag question. Again I say I respect the diligence which they displayed. However, I say to you, and I say to them, if it had not been for the diligence and noble work of the official opposition during the previous flag debate, Canada would now have foisted upon it the three maple leaf flag which this committee about which we are talking rejected.

Mr. Byrne: It was a compromise; be fair.

Mr. Simpson: I agree that compromise is a very worthy means of doing business. However, all you people have been doing who sit on that side of the house has been ridiculing the job of the opposition. They have already proven their point, that the committee and the house did not support the three maple leaf flag. Again I say this matter should definitely go to the people to be decided upon. I know how the people in my area are going to vote because they have told me so.

Mr. Byrne: All of them; what percentage?

Mr. Winkler: There are two Grits, we think.

Mr. Simpson: There are a few of them I have not seen during the summer, but not too many.

Mr. Rock: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Simpson: Not now; my time is coming to a close.

Mr. Rock: After your time has been exhausted?

Mr. Simpson: Yes. I know the way the people I represent feel about this matter. I know they want to have a voice. They have been told by the Prime Minister that when parliament decides on the kind of flag Canada is going to have, it is going to be final. If something is going to be that final, then the people themselves are the ones who should decide it. Hon. members across the way do not go along with the suggestion that this be done. However, they will probably find out, to their sorrow, that they are wrong.

It is my opinion that if a majority of the people of Canada decided on a particular design then practically everybody in the country would be willing to support it. The people I represent would be willing to support it if they were given an opportunity to vote on it, but they are not going to support something decided by a group of people voting along party lines.

We on this side have been criticized because some of our group are going to vote one way and some another. I would like the members opposite to know we are proud of this. We feel everybody should have the opportunity to vote according to conscience, as our constituents desire us to do. But that is not the way hon. members wanted it when they were trying to get the three maple leaf flag through so rapidly earlier this year. The majority of them, with but one or two exceptions, signified their intention of accepting that design knowing full well, as I said previously, that the Prime Minister announced it would be final.

What do they think of their members on the flag committee who have now indicated their preference for the one maple leaf flag? I think they should be very appreciative of the fact that the official opposition took the attitude it did earlier this session and made such a noble effort to prove to the government and other supporters of the three maple leaf design that it was not what they thought it was.

Mr. Rock: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said he would allow me to ask him a question when he finished.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson) had the floor. Does he allow a question at this stage?

Mr. Simpson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rock: Last February, when the leadership of your party was in question—

An hon. Member: It never was.

Mr. Rock: —why did the Conservative party adopt a resolution at the Chateau Laurier favouring a distinctive national flag for Canada?

Mr. Churchill: What relevancy has that?

Mr. Rock: If your party wanted the red ensign as a distinctive flag you would have said so in the words of that resolution.

Mr. Simpson: May I ask the hon. member what he is reading from?

Mr. Rock: I am not reading.

Mr. Simpson: Then I am very sorry I cannot accept his interpretation of what went on at our conference.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, when the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson) was speaking the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), and some of the other less bright members on the benches over there, were making snide remarks that neither you nor the hon. member for Churchill could hear, and I think this is not parliamentary. It is not good manners and should not happen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I fully agree with the hon. member, but I can assure him the Chair is cognizant of this type of remark from both sides of the house.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member moved forward in his seat and pointed his finger and asked us to answer his question. We were simply complying with his request.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More).

Royal Assent

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, on rising—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I beg the indulgence of the hon. member for Regina City but there are some messages which should be read by the Chair.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 3, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

SIR WINSTON CHURCHILL

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT OF TELEGRAM ON NINETIETH BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the pleasure to inform the house that I have received the following telegram:

The Honourable Alan Macnaughton,
Speaker of the House of Commons, Ottawa.

I am deeply grateful Mr. Speaker for your charming telegram of good wishes.

Winston Churchill

PRIVILEGE

MR. DOUGLAS—DECISION ON COMMUTATION OF SENTENCE OF CONVICTED MURDERER

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday the hon. member for Danforth complained about the fact that the Minister of Justice had not made a statement with reference to the Marcotte case. I understand that in the interim a decision has been reached by the cabinet and a public statement made by the Minister of Justice. It seems to me that the House of Commons is entitled to first hand information on a matter of such far reaching importance as this, and I think it only proper that on motions a statement should be made by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice with respect to this case.

CANADIAN FLAG

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, December 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Batten that the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, after my colleagues who also sat on the flag committee, I wish to express my congratulations to the member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) for the manner he chairmanned such an important committee as the flag committee.

I also wish to express my gratitude to every member of that committee and state how glad I was to work with them on that committee. When he asked me to sit on that committee, my leader greatly honoured me, together with the citizens of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, whom I am pleased to represent in the House of Commons.

Like other members before me, I wish to say that, once I had accepted to sit on the flag committee, I dedicated myself to this task with the utmost sincerity and attended the various meetings feeling completely free and willing to make the best possible choice for a flag. I refrained from speaking to the Leader of the Opposition for the duration of our proceedings.

I want to say right away that no order was given to me, directly or indirectly, as to the position I was to take at the meetings of the committee. If instructions or orders had been given, either directly or indirectly, I would simply have resigned, because I felt absolutely free to act as I saw fit and to the best of my ability.

I would not wish to review the whole report submitted the other day by my colleague, the member for Humber-St. George's. However, I would like to draw the attention of the house to some of the resolutions or decisions arrived at during our meetings.

First of all, I wish to say that the result of the vote, recommending a national plebiscite speaks for itself. I would also like to point out the fact that all our discussions were centred on the adoption of a single flag.

Subparagraph (b) of the fifth paragraph of the report clearly indicates that we all agreed, since the adoption of a single national flag was passed by 14 to 0.

I also wish to point out to the house that throughout the sittings of the committee, which lasted about five weeks, and during the debate in this house, government members sitting on the committee made much of the three-leaf flag. Referring to tradition, they pointed out that the three red maple leaves on a single stem were the only emblem which could appear on our national flag. However, after such a lengthy discussion, they all voted against a national flag with three maple leaves. Many suspicions are aroused and we are prompted to ask ourselves if it was not previously arranged before the establishment of the committee, that the flag contain a single maple leaf. But I will not dwell on this subject and will immediately refer to other considerations.

However, I must emphasize most especially the resolution introduced on October 22, 1964, which reads as follows:

[Text]

—that this committee select only one national flag, and that such selected flag be recommended for adoption by parliament.

[Translation]

Obviously, up to that time, it was our intention to select a single flag for Canada; yet, the resolution now before us calls for the adoption of two flags.

It is well known that I have always been in favour of a single flag, as is my party. All my efforts were directed toward that end during the discussions of the flag committee.

I must admit, however, that I was sorely disappointed at the final meeting when another resolution asking for the adoption of a second flag, that of a foreign country, was submitted to the committee.

I like clearcut attitudes and I propose, before going ahead with my remarks and to avoid interruptions from my friends opposite, to clearly establish my stand on the national flag issue. My views are based on information I gathered in two questionnaires completed by my constituents.

Before going any further, as I said, I put the question to the members of the committee during its deliberations. Here was my question: Why adopt two Canadian flags? What is the purpose—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ricard: —of having two Canadian flags? Give me the name of another commonwealth nation which has two flags, if you can. Why go against the aspirations—

Mr. Speaker: The house is now considering the matter of a plebiscite and not that of one, two, five, six or seven flags. I would therefore ask the hon. member to deal with the plebiscite.

Mr. Ricard: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your direction, but I was laying down the basis of my argument to justify my position toward the plebiscite, and as some members opposite are anxious to hear my views on the matter, I want to say forthwith that I shall vote in favour of a plebiscite.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Ricard: In this, I do respect the will of my electors. I have here before me a questionnaire I sent to my electors and in which I asked the following question:

Do you believe it would be preferable to hold a referendum on this matter?

There were 216 answers favouring a referendum, whereas 155 were against. I am therefore respecting in every respect the wishes of my constituents and to those who dare shout in the house, I would say: Stand up and tell us how you intend to express your opinion in regard to the plebiscite.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will go on maintaining order as you have done so well up to now and that you will pay no more attention than I do myself to those interjections from the other side of the house.

In the event that the plebiscite should be refused and that we are called upon to vote on the choice of a distinctive flag, I will act as I did during the proceedings of the committee and I will vote for the flag with a maple leaf on a white field and two red stripes. However, I want to add that, as far as the second part of the resolution is concerned, I shall support neither the red ensign nor the union jack, and I would ask hon. members, especially those of the province of Quebec, to make their position known as clearly, honestly and sincerely as I am doing now. That will take only 30 seconds of their time. I therefore ask the members from Quebec to rise, if they still have the courage to do so, if they are not entirely silenced by party discipline, and to tell their constituents how they intend to vote. I am convinced that the constituents of hon. members on the other side of the house would be interested to know the latter's views on that matter.

Since committee meetings began I have received a number of representations and letters, which I forwarded to the committee chairman, and which I also acknowledged.

It is interesting to note that I have received until now—the last letter reached me yesterday—a total of 100 letters from various parts of the country. For instance, I got 28 from the province of Quebec and they are all in favour of a distinctive flag. Out of 34 letters from the province of Ontario, 14 were in favour of a distinctive flag, 18 for the red ensign while two of my correspondents would like to see a mixture of both so as to show our dual culture. Out of 14 letters from British Columbia three are in favour of a distinctive flag, nine for the red ensign and two for the union jack with the fleur-de-lis. I received eight letters from Alberta, out of which one was in favour of a distinctive flag and seven for the red ensign. In short, out of those 100 letters, 52 were in favour of a distinctive national flag, 44 in favour of the red ensign, while 14 were for the red ensign with the fleur-de-lis.

All this simply indicates that opinions vary concerning the choice of a flag for Canada. I am saying that by giving the people of Canada an opportunity to express their opinion on this question, we would simply acknowledge a privilege of which they would like to avail themselves. In urging a plebiscite there is no question of trying to hide facts or to prevent the people of Canada from expressing their views but merely of giving all Canadian citizens an opportunity to make their opinions known to their members of parliament and to the government, so that there will be no danger of causing a rift in the nation.

During the discussions before the appointment of the committee as well as during those that followed, members of parliament, especially those from the province of Quebec, said that the question was one of national unity and that the adoption of a flag would promote national unity.

During the proceedings of the committee, you should have heard certain members of the province of Quebec declaim their speeches and tell us how much national unity would be damaged or hurt, if we were to adopt a flag in which the union jack or the red ensign would be included.

I suggest that Liberal members should read in particular the speech made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, on February 5, 1896. I also suggest that they should read the recommendations made by Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King and Louis St. Laurent, who are considered the most brilliant prime ministers Canada ever had. They will see that, far from discrediting the union jack and the red ensign, those former prime ministers recognized and stated that there could be no Canadian national flag which would not include the union jack or the red ensign.

I ask my hon. friends opposite why they now deny what their leaders themselves have always professed?

Mr. Drouin: That is not true.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes says: "That is not true". I suggest he read page 2096 of the Hansard for November 13, 1945, where he will find the words spoken by Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent and Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King.

But there is an authority even closer to us who gave us his appreciation on national unity. I am speaking of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), who made an explicit statement at a press conference in Quebec as published by the Quebec Chronicle on February 2, 1962, and I quote:

[Text]

He warned that if the union jack is dropped completely from a Canadian flag this might cause a deep rift among Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, our party has not advocated anything else since the beginning of the debate, and it is not because I wish to be recognized as a supporter of the union jack or the red ensign that I quoted these words; on the contrary, I only wish to allow the house to judge by itself the soundness and value of the allegations of our friends opposite.

We were also told that the fleur-de-lis had no signification for French Canada—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must confess that I am wondering about the relevancy of the remarks of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot in connection with the amendment now being considered.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, it is simply because a plebiscite was suggested in which the Canadian people would be asked to decide on the symbols of the French race as well as those of the English race, and this is the reason why I am presently making these remarks.

We were told that the fleur-de-lis had no meaning for French Canada—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Ricard: —and I will point out, Mr. Speaker, that if you read the speech delivered by the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Cadieux), you will find that he followed the very course of action I am advocating at this moment. Furthermore, knowing you have always discharged your duties with impartiality, I do not see how you could deny me a privilege which has been granted to other members.

Mr. Drouin: The hon. member for Terrebonne spoke before the amendment was proposed.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, you will admit that it is difficult for a member to follow closely the text or the notes he prepared, while members from the other side of the house are continually interrupting.

With your leave, I should like to say this: "If you have the courage to stand up and give us your impressions, do so"; you will at least gain the admiration and confidence of your constituents.

Mr. Drouin: We are so convinced that we are ready to vote at once.

Mr. Ricard: Just tell the house how you will vote on the second part of the resolution. Are you going to vote for the union jack?

Mr. Girouard: Go on, say it.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, as I said, we have nothing to conceal. We do not intend to deprive the people of anything. All we want is that the flag which will be flown throughout Canada will be acceptable to every part of the country and, in my opinion, a plebiscite is the best and the fairest way of allowing the Canadian people to vote on the flag issue.

Mr. Speaker, it is claimed that Canada must have a flag within two years because such was the promise made by the present government.

Let our hon. friends opposite tell us what their government has done about appointing a minister for eastern agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must admit to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot that I fail to see how the comments he is now making could be truly relevant to the matter before us.

An hon. Member: He was out of order right from the start.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to give an opportunity—

An hon. Member: He is not "pertinent"; he is "patineux"—skating.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I only wanted to give the members who are not courageous enough to speak up, the opportunity of showing that the only thing they can do is to interrupt the one who has the floor and who is making remarks of which they do not approve.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I can but repeat that the only purpose of the Conservative party in advocating a plebiscite is to afford the Canadian people an opportunity to express their views—

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I have just heard a member on the government side shout: "Filibuster".

It must be remembered that if it had not been for this filibuster, Canada would now be endowed with the three maple leaf flag, which flag even the Grits have disavowed, after having sung its praise for at least three months.

This was the result of the attitude of our group. If, on the other hand, people were allowed to speak their minds, several would stand up and express their own aspirations and those of their constituents.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I repeat that I shall vote for the plebiscite, for I am convinced that it is the best way to provide the people with an opportunity to state their views.

If the plebiscite is turned down, and so that nobody will be able to say that I have opposed a distinctive flag, although this flag is not entirely to my taste, I shall vote for the recommendation of the committee.

I challenge Liberal hon. members of the province of Quebec to give their views on that matter. But, as far as I am concerned, I shall vote neither for the red ensign nor for the union jack.

Again, I ask hon. members opposite to have enough courage to rise and put their views on record.

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

A while ago the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot imputed feelings and opinions to Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent concerning the flag issue. I would like to refer to Hansard—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is not a question of privilege but an argument. If the hon. member wants to set forth his point, he will be able to do so by taking part in the debate.

[Text]

Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, I should like to—

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which concerns all members of this house.

I would like to point out that with the present speaker, we have just broken a record in the house. It seems that the fact is worth mentioning: This is the 200th speech given on the same subject. It is like a hockey game; when Maurice Richard scored his 500th goal the game was stopped so that the puck could be presented to him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Grégoire: If you allow me to state my question of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member should come to the point quickly because there does not seem to be a question of privilege in what he has just said.

On the other hand, the Chair realizes that the hon. member should have the opportunity to submit his argument.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege deals precisely with what is going on today for the first time in the House of Commons. I should like us to confer the "Order of filibuster" upon the hon. member who is about to deliver the 200th speech on this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The alleged question of privilege raised by the hon. member is not any more legitimate than the one raised by the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes. I recognize the hon. member for Kent (Ont.).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I feel the hon. member who raised the question of privilege should have enough knowledge of what takes place in this house to know that he did not have a question of privilege, and that he was interrupting the debate on a phony point. He also stood up while you were on your feet, defying the Speaker. He has been doing so constantly ever since he came to this House of Commons.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to point out through you to the hon. member for Lapointe that in rising to speak on this question I make no apology to the house or to him. I want the record to show how I feel about the flag question and this debate, and how the constituents I represent feel about the flag question and this debate. I intend to support the amendment because it will give the people in my riding and across Canada an opportunity to express their views. Once those views have been expressed perhaps some of the members of this house will realize that they have not been presenting the views of the people they represent but rather their own views when speaking about this emotional and delicate subject.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, in spite of the levity of the remarks coming from the opposite side of this chamber, some of us feel that this is a very serious and emotional matter which affects all people in Canada and has a direct bearing on this so-called unity the government has been trying to promote. Some of the actions of the government are having exactly the opposite effect across Canada.

In my riding we have residents of both basic Anglo-Saxon and French origins, of whom we are very proud. We do not have any bilingual or bicultural problems because we all went to school together, grew up together and work together, and are proud of each other's culture, heritage and efforts as Canadians. That is as it should be.

A plebiscite is necessary on this flag question because of the great diversity of opinion which exists in Canada, and certainly in that part of southwestern Ontario I represent. I am sure that most Canadians want a distinctive national flag. The question is not whether we want a distinctive flag but, as we all appreciate, what symbols should appear on such a flag.

As we have heard today, whenever we stand in our places to put opinions on the record we hear charges of filibuster and charges that we are prolonging this debate. How can those accusers justify that criticism in view of the fact that during the 60 days the government has been proposing a distinctive Canadian flag it has wholeheartedly proposed two distinctive flags? That fact in my opinion justifies the belief of the Conservative party that the people of Canada should have a choice as to what should be Canada's distinctive national flag.

A great deal of criticism has been expressed through the press and on the radio about the character and length of this debate, suggesting that perhaps nothing new can be said regardless of the number of speakers taking part. Some of that criticism may be justifiable; we all make mistakes, and none of us is perfect. However, anyone who runs down parliament is certainly not doing this country any service whatsoever. The fact that there has been a difference of opinion as to the flag to be chosen, resulting in the production of a second distinctive national flag within a few months, justifies the stand taken by this party in this house. While it is true that ordinary citizens, men and women whom I am very proud to call my neighbours and friends, are sometimes confused, saddened and disgusted by what has transpired during the course of this debate, surely they should have an opportunity to hear the arguments on all sides of the question so as to be able to make up their own minds and decide by plebiscite what flag should be adopted.

In the early stages of this debate it is true that perhaps most hon. members of this house felt we had reached an impasse. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that when the solution of a committee was arrived at there were sighs of relief on both sides of the house and throughout the entire country. We felt that here was the solution we had been seeking for days; here was an opportunity for members of the house, working together on an all-party basis, working earnestly and in harmony, to provide a solution for this thorny problem that would meet with the favour of parliament and the country at large.

I know that my colleagues who were members of that committee went to its meetings with a desire to come up with a compromise flag that would settle this problem once and for all throughout Canada. I assume that the members of all other parties who took part in the deliberations of the committee went to its meetings with the same desire. We are all aware that the committee worked hard day after day to resolve this very problem. The citizens of this country, like all members of the house, thought it was the aim of the committee to come up with a compromise that would take into consideration the views expressed in every part of the house, and that the committee would try to decide upon a flag that would be acceptable to all the people of Canada; not to a political party, not to a certain section of Canada, but a flag that would represent what all members of the house were striving to obtain, a flag of which all Canadians could be proud. We know that the decision made by the committee would provide a flag for Canada for years to come, and this was why its deliberations were so important and why the committee was regarded so seriously by all members of parliament.

We feel that a plebiscite is now necessary, Mr. Speaker, because in my personal opinion the committee did not come up with the compromise that was expected of them. As far as I can ascertain, and I have followed the debate very closely, there were three basic divisions in the house. First of all there was the government's proposal of a flag with three maple leaves on a white background. There was the proposal on this side of the house that the union jack should be retained as part of any new flag. There was the proposal that the fleur-de-lis of France should have a prominent place on the flag. There was also the proposal that there should be a single maple leaf. It was my feeling, and I am sure that of many members of the house, that the committee would take into consideration the desires expressed in all parts of the house and come up with a composite flag embodying the principles that had been advocated for days, a flag perfect in its composition and pleasing in design, a flag that would be acceptable to members in all parts of the house and to people in every corner of this great nation.

Not only were many members of the house disappointed with the committee's recommendation, Mr. Speaker, but there was tremendous disappointment throughout the entire nation that such a flag did not materialize. Indeed, when we learned following the sittings of the committee that such a flag design had been submitted there was absolute dismay. We felt that such a flag was free from any political implications, that it embodied the principles expressed in all parts of the house, and we personally felt after seeing it that it was a flag that could be justifiably displayed with pride in every part of this nation because on it were the traditional sysmbols of the two great founding races and the traditional symbol of one red maple leaf representing the very Canada we are trying to preserve.

There is a play on words, Mr. Speaker, involved in any consideration of the report of the committee. One can either say "what a compromise" or "what compromise". This is one of the basic issues we are faced with today. Many of us feel that the suggested flag was no compromise but simply an alteration. We still have a flag of one party for the nation. This is not what the people of Canada want. This is what we feel is wrong so far as the flag proposed by the committee is concerned.

In assessing the whole situation we could be wrong, Mr. Speaker, and all we are asking is that the government give the people of Canada the opportunity to indicate whether the government is wrong in its assumption that the people want the one red maple leaf flag, or that we are wrong in assuming that the people of this great nation do not want such a flag. Such a course seems completely justifiable and fair.

We have heard that a plebiscite can be too expensive. We have heard that the mechanics of a plebiscite are such that it would be a cumbersome procedure. We have been told that it is the function of parliament to make decisions, and that there should be no need for a plebiscite. But, Mr. Speaker, are these justifiable arguments to use when we are speaking about the future of our nation, when we are worried about the problems of unity or disunity, when we are dealing with a subject that has so great an emotional impact? Are these arguments not futile? Do they not have the taint of partisan politics? Do government members opposite honestly feel that a plebiscite would not solve this problem, or are they not taking the position that because the opposition has suggested a plesbiscite it must necessarily be wrong? Do they feel they should be ashamed if they allow the people of Canada to make a choice? Do they feel that people will look down on them as having retreated from a policy? Is this what the trouble is?

In a situation as serious and important as this, I think any political party on either side of the house that provides a solution as workable, as simple and as conclusive as a plebiscite will serve the nation's interests and carry out the obligation that parliament is established to fulfil. A plesbiscite would do something that has been necessary from the very beginning of the discussion of this matter. It would take the problem out of partisan politics where it never should have been put in the first place.

As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, I make no apology for taking the time of the house to express my views, because I feel very strongly about this most serious matter. I know the people in Ontario and all the other provinces are really concerned and worked up about this matter. When we go out amongst the people we represent, and I think this is true in every riding in Canada, the people say they are tired of debate; they are tired of the flag question, they want to see an end to it, they want a solution. But, Mr. Speaker, they still take sides; they still have their original convictions. A man who is a red ensign supporter when asked if we should let it go to a vote and if he would accept the new red maple leaf flag, will invariably answer "Let us settle the issue; let us get on with the business of the nation, but don't dare let them replace the red ensign."

The same situation exists on the other side. The advocates of the maple leaf flag want the issue settled. They feel we are wasting time; but if there were a danger of the issue being settled by the adoption of a compromise flag, the union jack or a red ensign, they would be the first to object. They would say "Keep on with the battle".

This is the position in which we find ourselves. We were at an impasse before, and we are at an impasse now. It is my opinion that the men on the flag committee should have had the fortitude, the diligence or the courage to set aside partisan politics, to set aside outside influences, to start thinking about Canada as a nation and come up with a compromise flag that included all the basic principles. What a golden opportunity, Mr. Speaker, they had to go down in the history of this nation as statesmen. This was not done, and it is most unfortunate that it was not.

Here we are. We must ask for a plebiscite. I must ask for a plebiscite. The people I represent are overwhelmingly in favour of being given an opportunity to make their wishes known. There is one other factor that we have in a plebiscite. There is always the basic fear that if a government promoted flag becomes the standard of the nation and the government should change in the years ahead, then since a precedent has been set the same dreary process could be gone through again to change the Canadian flag. It is true that after the experience of this parliament no government in power would be likely to attempt such a step. However, the mechanics of our system do lend themselves to such an event taking place.

It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that this government should allow a plebiscite. Then this matter would be taken out of partisan politics, not only for today but in the future as well. Once a majority of the people say "This is our flag", there would be no attempt by any political party, short of a revolution, to make a change.

It is for this reason I find it difficult to understand why we are running into opposition when we make this request of the government to have a plebiscite. Let the people decide. Let the people vote. We on this side of the house are not sure whether 37 per cent of the population favour our stand or 97 per cent. It is equally true that the government are not certain whether 37 per cent of the population favour their stand or 97 per cent. If we had a plebiscite and the people decided, it would not matter one iota; politically the flag would be a dead issue. Let the people decide.

I am uneasy about the fact that the government is blocking the attempt to have a plebiscite. It causes me concern, because if we do not have a plebiscite we are only hiding our heads in the sand, since in my opinion at the next general election the people are going to decide this flag issue. If we have an election now, six months from now or three years from now, this is going to be an issue. How can we avoid it? We can say, as members of parliament, that we cannot go to the people on this issue; we cannot have a division in the country on this issue. We all know that out in the open this will not be a political issue. We all know there are major differences between the political parties in this house with which the parties will go on the hustings. We will have our political battles on the platforms, in the newspapers and over the radio.

However, we all know as well that in the bitter battles on the side roads, in the villages and little towns, those people who feel that their desire for the red ensign was not carried out will be attempting a vendetta against the present government. Conversely, it is equally true that those who are in favour of the three maple leaf flag will feel that their wishes have been trampled upon and they will be determined to make this an issue. It does not matter how we try to deal with this issue, we are going to have to vote on it. Why not have the issue out in the open? Why not have a plebiscite?

There is one basic difference if we do not have a plebiscite. If we have an election campaign in which the flag will be a fait accompli, regardless of the wishes of the people, we will create havoc with the unity of this country. I feel I speak for every member in this house when I say that national unity is our prime concern. We have had too many speakers who have tried to drive a wedge between groups, perhaps not by their speeches but by their actions. When we try, as we have done in this party, to put across our proposals we are told we are putting forward proposals for Anglo-Saxon Canada.

This is not true, Mr. Speaker, because most of us on this side of the house represent dual ridings. When we try to put our side of the question on the record we hear challenges of filibuster and of our holding up the work of the house. We in the house realize this is an exchange between parties, but the damaging impact back in the country is that our people think this is Anglo-Saxon versus French Canadian, and the damage done is immeasurable. That is why I feel so badly when I hear hon. members opposite interrupting us. This is too serious a matter to treat with levity. It is too serious for the well being of our nation in both the near and distant future.

As I have pointed out, the members of the flag committee had an opportunity to become statesmen, and to go down in history as statesmen. I say the members of the government could go down in history as statesmen if they let the people of Canada decide this issue. If there is one thing Canadians cannot stand it is arrogance, and the one thing which will make a Canadian madder than anything else is for him to be told what he must do now and what he must do in the future.

It would be so simple to have a plebiscite so that Canadians from coast to coast could be Canadians and could feel proud of the fact that they had their little say in the choice of a Canadian flag. It would not matter one iota what was on the flag if the people of Canada, not a political party, put it there.

We speak of Canadian unity. How can we have Canadian unity when the most emotional problem we have faced in a decade is thrown into the political arena? So long as it is there, there will be two sides to the question, not only in each province but in each county, township and town. This problem has created division, and the only way out of the impasse into which we as a parliament have got ourselves, and into which the government has got itself, is to let the people of Canada make the decision. That is an honourable way out, and we as an opposition are not proposing it for political gain. We cannot take the credit for it, but I feel the government would be commended if it agreed to hold a plebiscite. Further, the people would be proud of the government if it gave them the opportunity to vote on this issue.

As I say, we cannot take the credit for suggesting this because the idea did not come from us but from our constituents, who earlier this session flooded our desks with their letters and telegrams on the matter. I would not want my name to go down in history as one who advocated a rigid, uncompromising design for a Canadian flag, and that is why I am proud to have the opportunity to stand up this afternoon and give my views frankly and openly.

Despite the publicity that has been generated from coast to coast about the stand taken by our party on this issue, may I point out we are the party which said "Let there be a compromise". We are the party which said "Let there be a plebiscite". We are the party which said "Let the people of Canada decide". This is our position, and it would be interesting to know what position will be taken by hon. members opposite. Are they more concerned with partisan politics than with the wishes of the people they represent? Are they more concerned with the tally of votes than with the basic principle we are facing today?

I am sure hon. members opposite do not want to find themselves in that position, and I respectfully suggest that a plebiscite gives them an out. If they advocated a plebiscite they would have nothing to be ashamed of and could walk with pride. But how can they justify taking a position which tells the people of this nation "You cannot decide this. We as members of the Canadian government will make your decision for you, and what we decide will be your flag from now on". I do not want to be put in that position, and I fail to see how hon. members opposite could want to either. This is why I find it hard to understand why they do not at once accept the plebiscite proposition. If they did then we could get on with the business of the nation, something which I believe all hon. members want to do. It is as simple as that. Let the people decide.

Mr. Rock: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? He has suggested that if there is no plebiscite there will be strong feelings among those who support the ensign and those who support a new flag. Is he suggesting that if there is a plebiscite there will be no feelings between groups which adamantly support the red ensign and other groups which support the new flag? Is he suggesting a limit on campaigning in a plebiscite?

Mr. Danforth: If we put this matter into the hands of the people and held a plebiscite, then with the majority of the Canadian people having taken a decision there would be nothing to be gained for political purposes. There would no longer be partisan politics in the flag issue, something with which the House of Commons is swamped today.

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, since the debate this afternoon must necessarily centre on the topic of a plebiscite I trust I may be allowed to develop a theme which arises when national symbols are changed without recourse to such a method of doing it.

As most hon. members of the house are aware, I am a supporter of the red ensign as the flag of Canada, and for several sessions I have had a bill on the order paper proposing its official adoption by parliament. But because I and many of my colleagues support that flag we have been accused of jingoism, phony patriotism, extremism, sometimes English colonialism and other times sentimental symbolism, and other diversionary epithets of the new nationalism.

I believe I must repudiate the arguments of those who say it is childish to cherish a symbol of man's aspirations or achievements. A symbol can sum up the best or worst of a man's mind or a man's soul. Symbols are the essence of communication between man and his God. The art and science of symbolism distinguishes man from animal.

Man's alphabets are written symbols; his languages are sound symbols; his religions are rich in symbols; his music, sculptures and paintings are symbols. It has been said of one cathedral raised by man to the greater glory of God that it is "frozen music"; it has been said of another that it is a "nightmare in stone". Symbols attend man's birth, his marriage, his religious, social and other activities as he goes to and from upon the earth; they wait upon his death. By them, he creates; by them, he destroys. Not least of all, they symbolize his political conceptions and his political perversions.

The memory of man will not forget for a very long time to come a certain man who took the symbol of the swastika—a good luck symbol older than ancient India—reversed it and made it a symbol of genocide as a political art. Another man, lesser in evil than he, took the fasces, for 2000 years a symbol of the grandeur of Roman achievement in law and political administration, and perverted it into the obscene symbol of a political mafia.

Only last week members of this house paid tribute to a man who symbolizes for millions of people of diverse tongues and races what we may call the terrible twentieth century in which we live. Our own Prime Minister described him as "a man of parliament". Perhaps because he is a man of parliament that man did not mock symbols. When winged swastikas fired the skies over England's cities and the earth opened to swallow the women and children of England and bury them beneath the wrecked symbols of their homes, then was seen the V for victory sign; then was heard its counterpart in music.

These symbols were evident everywhere. They were important not only to those in Great Britain but to members in this House of Commons who were aware of them in their offices in this building, and who returned to this chamber from those offices to lead Canadians to make the greatest effort and sacrifice in men, money and material that this nation has ever made. Mr. Speaker, the man who led the greatest effort against the greatest odds we have ever seen spoke and achieved through symbols. Which of us will forget the defiant arrogance of his words "Some chicken, some neck", uttered in this chamber to the French prophets of doom.

Of this man of symbols Mr. Harold Wilson has said "If Winston Churchill could write his own epitaph it would simply be this:— 'He was a good House of Commons man'." And as a good House of Commons man, Mr. Speaker, Winston Churchill holds dear the symbols of the House of Commons, the symbols of parliament and the symbols of the Queen in parliament. No one is more rationally aware than he that the principles of the United Kingdom constitution which are in turn the principles of the Canadian constitution are the principles of republic. But no one is more rationally aware than Winston Churchill, that man of parliament, of the role of tradition, habit and symbols in preserving ancient institutions after effective power has passed elsewhere. No one knows better than he how important this role is to political stability. It is those principles, in combination with those traditions, habits, symbols and institutions, which make parliamentary government of the United Kingdom type the kind of government which is most deliberately initiated today.

We know that many times in recent years attempts have been made to transplant the British parliamentary system. Many of these efforts have failed and the nations which have made this experiment have slipped into dictatorship because the leaders imported the machinery of the British parliamentary system but scorned the symbols, or mistook the meaning of the symbols. These were not men of evil intent; they were either men of the intellectual elite who looked upon a symbol as an emotional crutch for a lame-brain, or they were irrational men who read into the symbols the meanings of their private hates and fears.

Let us consider another symbol, one which lies before us. In the centre of the chamber rests the mace. It is a symbol of royal authority, the symbol of the authority of this house, a symbol of your own authority, Mr. Speaker. In ancient times it was a symbol of the union of church and state.

Mr. Byrne: I think this would be an appropriate moment to raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker, since a reference has been made to your authority. Simply for the record I wish to draw to your attention the fact that the hon. member is out of order on two counts. First, he is reading his speech, in the second place he is in no way discussing the question of a plebiscite.

Mr. Speaker: I must disagree with the hon. member's last contention. Symbols are important to this country, and the hon. member is relating that to the value, in his opinion, of a plebiscite. As to his reading his speech, he has rather full notes but it is not the first time members have had full notes.

Mr. Ormiston: I appreciate the observations of the hon. member for Kootenay East. I hope that at some suitable time we may hear his views on this whole subject. I was certainly trying to associate the symbolism of the past with the symbolism of the age in which we live. We must attempt to do this if we are to be in a proper position to carry out a plebiscite, because in the event of a plebiscite there will be a need for the study of symbols.

I was referring to the symbol which we see before us, and I was about to say that in ancient times archbishops carried it as they rode beside their kings into battle. They carried a mace instead of a cutting weapon so they might do their duty to their king by bludgeoning his enemies instead of offending God by shedding blood. Upon such niceties of symbolism have the multiracial British tolerated one another's eccentricities and survived. Some of those eccentricities and traditions survive in this chamber to the present day. I can recall from a study of English history that at the time Cromwell was in the British House of Commons he noticed the mace lying on the table and cried "Take away that bauble".

That is what has happened today, Mr. Speaker. I believe that in this chamber today we again hear this cry "Take away that bauble!" in that we are taking away some of our symbols. I am afraid we hear this on the treasury benches too, benches so largely filled with ministers who were schooled and trained in the dictatorial branch of our democracy. We hear it from their men in the grey flannel suits, men bought and paid to erase the symbols of monarchy and to substitute the symbolic image of a man who never was—a man who was not in this house when his ministers two-faced a crisis—

Mr. Byrne: Order.

Mr. Ormiston: —a man who was not in the house because his ministers sent him to a prairie Coventry, not because he had broken our constitutional principles but because he might observe them. We hear: "Take away the red ensign". We hear: "Take away the Queen's picture from the citizenship courts". We hear: "Take away the word 'dominion' and the word 'national' from government doors and letterheads."

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must agree with one of the recent objections that this is not really germane to the question of a plebiscite. The hon. member is giving a personal opinion. I was trying to follow the hon. member in his symbolism as it dealt with a plebiscite and I thought he had a point, but when he goes on to pictures and things like that he is away off the mark.

Mr. Ormiston: Mr. Speaker, I will try to confine my remarks to the true meaning of symbolism.

Mr. Byrne: How are going to do that if you keep reading?

Mr. Ormiston: If we take away everything which reminds us that we inherited a democracy—our traditions, our habits, and most of all our symbols—certainly we have lost part of the element of democracy. The men who say this have now come to the point where they are prepared to move, and I would suggest that some members on the other side of the house are moving, not openly but stealthily, slyly and surreptitiously on the floor of this house against the prerogative of the crown.

This may seem a harsh statement to those not schooled in constitutional matters, but only the Queen of Canada can appoint a flag for Canada. Yet never in all the statements made over the months inside and outside the house by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and some other ministers of the crown, or in the motions drafted by them and placed upon the official records of the house, has there been reference to that constitutional fact. Surely at some period or other, upon some occasion or other, it might be thought that the Prime Minister would be proud to tell this house, in the manner in which Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent was proud to tell the house on February 3, 1953 with respect to the royal style and title, that: "It is Her Majesty who will determine, who will announce by proclamation what the flag will be for Canada". Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent was, and is, a great constitutional lawyer. He was a good minister of justice and a good prime minister of Canada. He left those two positions, the two highest political offices in the gift of the Canadian people, the better for his holding them.

I ask now, Mr. Speaker, do those ministers of the crown who sat to the left and to the right of Prime Minister St. Laurent when he spoke those words, and who sit on the front benches today, believe that he demeaned himself when he said:

> It is Her Majesty who will determine, who will announce by proclamation what her royal style and titles will be for each one of the several realms of the commonwealth.

Do these individuals who listened so intently at that time now repudiate as colonialism the words of this Liberal, this constitutional lawyer, this minister of justice and attorney general of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that in the present circumstances the hon. member is entitled to criticize the action of the government in bringing forward this matter for discussion, or the terms of the motion or anything else of that nature; but to impute motives to ministers which, to say the least, are subject to suspicion as stated by my hon. friend, is not correct. The hon. member may disagree with the actions which have been taken but I do not think it is right to impute motives to ministers who happen to hold a different opinion from that which is held by the hon. member. It seems to me that he is away off the point of a plebiscite, how it should be held, where it should be held, when it should be held and if it should be held.

Mr. Ormiston: I thank you for your direction Mr. Speaker, but I was just pointing out that there was a great deal of difference between the statements of the former prime minister and the terms of the resolution, which asks that the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially the flag of Canada. I am sure I can join with the previous member who spoke in saying that there must be some recourse to the people of Canada, because certainly the government has not taken the option which has presented itself.

I read into the record the Queen's prerogative. This has not been considered at all, and it seems to me it is only fair that the government should use every available opportunity and every channel to make sure that the people of Canada are given a fair voice in what will be a national symbol for many years to come. It is beyond me why the government are reticent to take this step. Surely if the government is sure of its judgment it should not be afraid to call a plebiscite at a suitable time, which of course would be at the time of the next election. On that occasion the government would be able to judge by the results of the plebiscite whether or not they were justified in their actions.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would only say that the situation which we are presenting gives the government that alternative. It gives the people of Canada a choice and it will destroy forever the statements, or the thoughts which are behind the statements, that what we have today is a political flag.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the amendment before this Chamber, which asks the government to hold a plebiscite whereby the people of Canada would have the opportunity at the next federal election to express their views on the adoption of a distinctive flag for Canada. Before I commence my remarks, Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate you on reaching the very difficult decision you had to make—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think in the present circumstances no reference at all should be made to the Speaker. I hope there will be no bad references, but there do not have to be any good ones either.

Mr. Hales: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and will proceed with my remarks.

I should like to say at the outset that the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) will not have occasion to accuse me of reading from notes because I will try to keep away from notes as much as possible; I intend to speak from the heart. I intend to speak on behalf of the conscience of thousands of people in my riding—yes, millions of people in Canada—who want a chance to express their views by means of a plebiscite. I plead for them, Mr. Speaker. These people have a right to be heard, in my opinion, and I think it is up to the government to provide them with the opportunity to say which flag they prefer. This may be my last opportunity to speak on behalf of these people, so before this government pulls down the Canadian red ensign, which has stood for so much—honour, history, love, sentiment and tradition—and replace it with another flag, I would beg the government to let the people make their choice. Whatever steps are taken, or whatever choice is made we should remind ourselves that it will be made for our children and our children's children, and will be our flag for centuries and centuries to come.

This is an emotional matter involving a moral and personal choice, and with all the power and persuasion at my command I plead with this government, and particularly the Prime Minister, to let the conscience of the people of Canada be heard. Let us have a plebiscite at the next election. It would not be costly and could be handled very easily, allowing the people of this country an opportunity to express their views. I am sure the Canadian people feel that this debate has lasted long enough. The public polls which have been held in recent days indicate that over 60 per cent of the people want a plebiscite. Why do they want a plebiscite? I suggest it is because they desire an opportunity to express their views and because they want this flag question taken from the House of Commons.

It is within the power of the Prime Minister to remove this question from this chamber and allow the people to voice an opinion by plebiscite. He brought this flag question into the house and he is the man who can take it out. We as the opposition did not bring this subject before parliament. I am sure that every loyal Canadian, given the chance to express an opinion, would accept a choice made by a plebiscite. Why does the Prime Minister delay putting this question to the people in the form of a plebiscite? Important business which this house should now be considering, such as the labour code legislation, implementation of the Gill report recommendations, pension and railway legislation and all the other important matters could then be dealt with.

There are those who will ask why a plebiscite is necessary. The hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) just asked whether we did not think that by holding a plebiscite we would arouse hard feelings. May I suggest to him that perhaps hard feelings might be aroused; but at least the people would have a chance to express their feelings, and that is the opportunity we wish to give them. In answer to those who ask why a plebiscite is necessary, I should like to remind them that we want to see the other side of the coin during this debate. Why have we not heard from those on the government side of the house, their reasons why a plebiscite should not be held? What is wrong with putting this question to a plebiscite?

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) did on one occasion make reference to a plebiscite and suggested that if Sir John A. Macdonald had held a plebiscite we may never have had confederation. My answer to that suggestion is that Sir John A. Macdonald was a man of sound judgment and knew that confederation was a matter concerning legislation and constitution, and therefore that a plebiscite was not necessary. However, on an emotional issue, such as the choice of a flag, different considerations must be studied.

I challenge my friends on the government side of this house to stand in their places and tell us their reasons for thinking a plebiscite is not the proper way of deciding this issue. When I spoke on August 31 I challenged my hon. friends to defend the position they have adopted. I refer to them sincerely as my friends, members such as the hon. members for Durham (Mr. Honey), Brantford (Mr. Brown), Renfrew South (Mr. Greene), Carleton (Mr. Francis), Wentworth (Mr. Morison), Halton (Mr. Harley), Hastings South (Mr. Temple), Peel (Mr. Beer), and Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh). Have any of those hon. members risen in their places and defended their position on the flag debate or told us why a plebiscite should not be held? The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) was so anxious to give the report of the flag committee he gave it to the press before the committee presented it to the house. Why has he not been on his feet in this chamber to defend the position his party has taken on the flag issue, and told us why there should not be a plebiscite?

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I have made my position very clear on the question of a plebiscite, and if the hon. member would take the time to turn up my speech in Hansard, and the speeches made by many other members on this side of the house, during the 22 days of debate covering this whole subject, he would find ample information as to why we take this position. I think he should read my address in this chamber before making such remarks.

Mr. Hales: He still has an opportunity to express his views as to why we should or should not hold a plebiscite, and I invite the hon. member to take the opportunity of doing so.

Have we heard from the members of the treasury benches on this subject? Out of 26 we have heard from only four. Is that an honest and sincere effort on their part? I think Her Majesty's loyal opposition is entitled to the views of members on the opposite side on this subject, and they should partake freely in this debate. Let them stand in their places and present their views.

A plebiscite is necessary in my opinion for the following reasons. It is necessary because this issue affects the conscience of every Canadian. It is necessary because the symbols making up a Canadian flag are based on tradition and history and are held near and dear to the hearts of every Canadian. I do not think such a thing as a flag can be the subject of legislation. People must be given a choice, and a chance to express their view on something so important to them as a flag. The people want a voice in this matter, and who is to know how they feel unless they are given an opportunity to voice their opinions.

No one can tell exactly what are the views of the public on such an important matter as a Canadian flag. We have had ample evidence of that fact here in this chamber. The right hon. Prime Minister and his government introduced a flag in this house that he felt was the flag which would be accepted by the whole of Canada. In spite of the fanfare, public relations, bumper stickers and miniature flags, that flag was turned down by a committee of this house by a vote of 14 to nothing. That would indicate a great difference of opinion within this house; yet we are now being asked to accept another distinctive flag for Canada. I do not think such a choice can be made properly here in this chamber.

One cannot assess public opinion accurately without holding a plebiscite. Perhaps I can illustrate that point in this way. A plebiscite was held in 1942 on the subject of conscription. One might have expected that in a riding such as Waterloo North, the residents of which are predominantly of German extraction, the vote would be two to one against conscription. When the vote was counted the outcome was exactly the opposite. The people had voted two to one in favour of conscription. The same holds true of the province of Quebec. When the vote was taken on the question of conscription it was expected that perhaps 5,000 or 10,000 people would vote for conscription, but when the ballots were counted it was found that 376,188 in Quebec had voted for conscription. So one never knows what the public are thinking on these matters that are so close and dear to them. Just as the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) found out that the flag he introduced into the house was not acceptable, so we might be quite surprised to find out in a plebiscite how people are thinking on this very important matter.

Let us briefly look into the history of plebiscites. I am a great believer in turning back the pages of history to find out what has been done, and what we should do. As far back as 1517 Erasmus, the great philosopher, stated in very precise language that all power and authority over people rests on their consent and that title by conquest is a fallacy. In 1527 Francis I of France, perceiving the political value of the principle, used it as a weapon of diplomacy. Henry II used self-determination; it is very interesting to note it was not referred to as a plebiscite in those days, but rather self-determination, for assuming control of Toal, Metz and Verdun.

Now we come to the period when the method of popular consultation or self-determination enjoyed its greatest use. From 1855 to 1866 scarcely a year passed without some endorsement of the plebiscite method. Napoleon's treaty with Cavour contained a clause providing for consultation of the inhabitants. The treaty of Prague on August 23, 1866, terminated the war between Prussia and Austria over the spoils they had seized from Denmark in 1864. Article V stated that Prussia could only incorporate the duchies if a free vote or plebiscite was taken.

In the case of the separation of Norway from Sweden in 1905 several joint committees were set up and meeting after meeting was held to decide what the solution should be. A plebiscite was proposed. The result settled the issue and today we have the two separate countries of Norway and Sweden. The island of Bartholomew in the West Indies was given to France by the Swedish cabinet in 1877 but not until a plebiscite or self-determination vote had been held.

Australia has used the plebiscite on several occasions and most recently to determine whether or not the communist party should be allowed to operate in Australia. New Zealand used the plebiscite on the liquor question. Ghana used a plebiscite for deciding whether or not it would be a republic and so did South Africa in 1960. We are all aware that in the United States all state constitutions except one contain provision for taking a poll of the people, or holding a plebiscite. So we find plebiscites have been used down through the years. They are very necessary and have played a part in solving many difficult problems.

We only have to think of how often plebiscites are used at the municipal level. Right in my own city this month two plebiscites are being held, one on the question of Sunday sports and movies and the other on fluoridation. Why are they being held? Because these are matters that are personal to the people and close to their consciences. Do the people of my city criticize the aldermen for using a plebiscite? Do they accuse them of not being able to make up their minds as members of the council? No. No such suggestion has ever been made. The people are anxious to have the opportunity to express their views according to their own consciences on matters so personal to them.

Therefore I maintain that in deciding the flag issue, an issue so close to the consciences of the people of Canada, we should give the people the opportunity to decide through a plebiscite. As I said, plebiscites are not new. They have been used through the ages. I cannot understand why the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) does not see the advantage of a plebiscite. One would think he would jump at the opportunity. Even Francis I of France, as I stated, recognized the political value of the plebiscite as far back as 1527 and used it as a weapon of diplomacy. Great diplomat that the Prime Minister is, one would think that he too would use the plebiscite, this weapon of diplomacy, as one way to find the answer to this difficult problem.

Indeed, Liberal governments have used plebiscites on two occasions. One was held in 1898 to settle the issue of prohibition and one was held in 1942 on the question of conscription. So this would not be the first time that a Liberal government has used the plebiscite.

I believe I have given enough examples, Mr. Speaker, of the many instances in which a plebiscite has been used to settle major issues to prove the value of a plebiscite from the point of view of the results that can be obtained. Finally, I say, not only what I said at the beginning of my speech, but also when speaking in the flag debate on August 31st last: A plebiscite should be held. It is the only answer I can see for such an important issue involving a moral and personal choice, an issue which 265 people out of 20 million cannot decide. This has been proven over and over again.

It is quite evident, Mr. Speaker, that public opinion is snowballing in favour of a plebiscite. People realize it is the only answer and the only way to settle this great problem. People are even expressing their great gratitude now to Her Majesty's loyal opposition for saving Canada from adopting the three maple leaf flag which this Liberal government intended should be thrust upon us. That same flag was turned down by the Liberal members of the committee. Yet that was the flag that the government would have had Canada adopt. To my mind this illustrates what a difficult problem is involved in settling this issue and how easily it might be settled by means of a plebiscite. We want an opportunity for self-determination. In my opinion it is the only way out. I say again that I will vote for a plebiscite. I will vote for self-determination. I should like to close by quoting a paraphrase of an ancient Nordic policy to this effect:

> On minor affairs the few decide; on great affairs the many.

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have an opportunity, along with many other members, to put on the record my beliefs and the beliefs of my constituents on this issue. There are many members on all sides of the chamber who will not be speaking on either the amendment or the motion itself. Whether this course has been chosen either because they feel that the issue can best be handled by not speaking at all, or they feel that others have already adequately expressed their own feelings, I commend those members for their self-restraint. If, however, there are members in this chamber whose silence has been prompted solely by partisan considerations or, even worse, implicit or explicit threats, I pass on to those members of parliament my sympathy for their situation and my scorn for their cowardice. For my own part, I intend to speak now but not again on this subject. I apologize to no one for this decision which I arrived at fully and freely after a soul-searching consideration of my duties to the people of the Northwest Territories whom I represent, in so far as I am able to understand those duties.

The house is about to vote on an amendment to instruct the special flag committee to change the recommendation which that committee arrived at by a majority vote of its members. This committee was, as we know, an all party committee, and numerically speaking its decision was absolutely clear. Why then, it is asked, should the matter be sent back? The answer to this question, Mr. Speaker, is absolutely clear also. At no time has a case been made in this house as to why we should have a new flag at all. In the absence of such instructions from the Canadian people, none of us as individuals and no political party in this house, has either a mandate or even the right to tamper with the symbols and the feelings of the Canadian people.

Who was it, I want to know, who took it upon himself to decide that a change was not only necessary but that it must be made now? What evidence did the government have that had been accumulated to cause it to forsake other social and economic national goals to pursue this matter now? This afternoon, as I walked over to this chamber and looked up at the peace tower with the Canadian red ensign flying from it, as I do quite often, I had to ask myself again, what is all this about? I for one am not dedicated to the retention of this particular flag. However, I do not find it offensive, nor am I in the throes of some demoniac obsession to tear it down from the flagstaffs all over this nation. Before I can support a vote that would change this flag, someone is going to have to convince me that not only is such a change warranted now but that that change would somehow or other make better Canadians out of all of us.

I have serious doubts also, Mr. Speaker, if most Canadians, given a choice through a plebiscite, would insist on the urgency of the change at this time or perhaps even a change at all. So far, the only argument I have heard is the claim by some, but not all, of the government supporters that this flag is a commitment of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) to the Canadian people. Well, I for one have to have a more serious reason than that for the removal of a traditional flag and its replacement by another. Surely the need for a flag must be based on reasons that we can see here and now, and that historians will be able to see in the future, and that are more serious than the suggestion that we must now change the flag solely as an attempt to placate an insecure and accident prone Prime Minister who may otherwise not achieve a place in Canadian history.

Like most other Canadians this week, however, I felt sorry for the Prime Minister in this matter that he is trying to handle. However, I do not intend to help tear up the red ensign to bind the wounds that the Prime Minister and his fellow cabinet ministers have inflicted on themselves and the country. Aside from the fact that no case has been made for this change of flag, there are other reasons, compelling reasons, why no further action should be taken unless at the specific request of the Canadian people through a plebiscite. There is ample evidence from the speeches made in this House of Commons, that some members are either totally misjudging the moods and desires of their constituents or are purposely misstating the situation. I am not here talking about members like the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) who said in this house during the flag debate on July 2, 1964, as reported at page 4949 of Hansard, that members should pay no attention to their constituents' wishes in this matter, but should rather follow their own intellectual inclinations. I have difficulty believing that in constituencies of similar make-up, located side by side in this country, two extreme and diametrically opposed positions on the flag actually exist. However, if one were to believe the Liberal members of parliament, that is the situation.

I contrast this situation, Mr. Speaker, with the way in which the Conservative party know and respect the attitude of our fellow colleagues in this party from the province of Quebec on this issue. These members have reached a conclusion on this matter and, generally speaking, all of the members from the province of Quebec from all parties in this house reflect a unity of objective and purpose on this matter. I know that; I understand it. I respect it, and it makes sense to me that that situation exists. But how in the light of this can you explain the stand being taken by some government members from other parts of the country, other than as blind obedience to the whim of a Prime Minister who has lost his grasp on reality?

I suggest that a national plebiscite would show whether or not a majority of Canadians want the present flag removed and replaced. I would even go a step further. I sincerely believe the only reason the Prime Minister is refusing to accept a plebiscite is not so much because he and his cabinet members have no regard for the opinion of Canadian people but because he is terrified of the outcome of such a straw vote taken from one end of the nation to the other. He is desperately afraid that a majority of Canadians would see no urgency in this matter, that same majority of Canadians who denied his party and himself political support in the last general election.

The Prime Minister has said in the house that he is a great believer in the majority decision of a special flag committee, a committee which he can load with Liberals and those of similar easy principle. But he is not willing to listen to a majority of Canadians and I want to know why not. I want to know what commitments were made by the Prime Minister, and to whom, that he would obliterate the union jack before the end of 1964, for there is no other explanation to clear up this weird and pathetic obsession with the flag.

There is another reason why I believe we should hold a plebiscite. It is because no Canadian can seriously accept, as the serious choice of parliament, the design recommended by the flag committee. For that reason the amendment should be supported. You will remember some months ago the ecstasy with which the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) and the Prime Minister regarded the three maple leaves on the white background with the two blue bars. This was Canada. This was the flag of the Prime Minister's dreams. It was perfect; but now the same Prime Minister and the same hon. member for Leeds say, "If you think that was good contemplate, if you will, a white background with two red bars and one red leaf, because this represents Canada."

In the Montreal Star of November 20 I notice a report relating to symbols, in which the government announced the appointment of a man to handle the merchandising of the Arctic owl, Ookpik. I want to read the pertinent sentence where it says this man will have particular responsibility for Ookpik, the Arctic owl used internationally as a Canadian emblem. Yet we are told the reason we must proceed with the flag committee report is that one red leaf is Canada from coast to coast to coast, that this is Canada around the world. But now we find the government appointing someone to promote Ookpik as another international Canadian emblem. One is led to wonder what might have happened to the Canadian flag had the Eskimos of the north been transferred to the province of Quebec. Perhaps it would have been Ookpik on a red background with two white bars.

I mention these things to highlight the point I am trying to make, that in view of what has happened no Canadian can take seriously the sort of nonsense the government is advancing as a Canadian flag for all time.

I am a young man, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact only 32 years of age this very day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rhéaume: I am not completely devoid of a sense of historical or traditional values, nor am I unmindful of the sacrifice of two world wars that many people, particularly veterans, whether rightly or wrongly have come to associate with the Canadian red ensign. Of course I am equally sure that it is only because there are many people in the country who escaped the sacrifice of those times, and who do not associate that sacrifice with the flag under which Canadians fought, that the Liberal party has dared to make the Canadian Legion and veterans official organizations objects of ridicule.

In 1945 when some, but not all, of the boys were coming home the Prime Minister we have now would not have dared this. His courage would not have been up to this, just as it has deserted him so often in the presence of other serious domestic issues. It is very easy now, in 1964, for the Liberal government with its professional image builders to go about the country debasing the traditions of the past, following an old Liberal tactic of building themselves up by tearing others down.

I urge the house to vote for a plebiscite as the way of giving the people of Canada a chance to show whether or not they want the traditional symbols in the red ensign replaced. I want a plebiscite to give the Canadian people an opportunity to say whether from an aesthetic or an historical point of view they are happy with a flag which has nothing on it to link it either with the future or with the past. This country was French for many years and my own ancestors lived here during the time it was under French rule. They played a small part in helping to build it. It is equally true that after the battle of the plains of Abraham Canadian history took a new turn under the English. I do not think the adoption of a new flag devoid of all reference to those two founding races would in any way change history or in any way make up for those previous conflicts.

At the present time our country is very conscious, in a bitter and hurt way, that it was founded originally by the French and the English. Perhaps hon. members will say it is not very important for us in 1964 to put anything on our flag which will serve to remind people of the contribution of the English and the French. But the flag we are choosing, or the flag which will be chosen, should be flying 200 years from now and it should be extremely important to every member of this house that 200 years from now, regardless of where Canada has gone in those centuries our people are reminded of the fact that for mny years this country was French and that for many years it was English and that those in the Canadian House of Commons in 1964 were not ashamed to put symbols on the flag to remind people of these facts.

I have said that no one has yet convinced me there is a compelling and urgent reason to change the flag we have. Although I have no particular personal commitment to the Canadian red ensign, before I will participate in the removal of this flag, someone on the government side has to convince me that the need to change it is founded on something more important than the fact that on April 8, 1963, the government of this country changed.

I am happy to see the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) back in his place.

An hon. Member: We have missed him.

Mr. Rhéaume: It would not be accurate to say we have missed him. But it is still nice to have him back because on this very subject, the necessity for a change, the hon. gentleman said one evening that we had to have a distinctive flag and that his definition of "distinctive" was "anything without the union jack on it".

Mr. Dupuis: Or the fleur-de-lis. Put the facts straight.

Mr. Rhéaume: I am happy to have the minister back because I should like to get the latest quotation on those three leaf bumper stickers. Last time I heard, they were about $25 a thousand—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has for the last several minutes been straying from the question before the house, that is, the question of the plebiscite.

Mr. Rhéaume: You must admit, Mr. Speaker, I am responding to interruptions from the Minister without Portfolio who insists on trying to put something on the record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I realize the minister interjected a remark, but he interjected that remark in reply to a part of the hon. member's speech which was out of order.

Mr. Rhéaume: The minister is aware he can always rise on a question of privilege if he wishes to do so. But he should not interject from his seat because it may be difficult for the Hansard reporters to identify the source of the interruption.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. A moment ago the hon. member quoted me as saying that, to me, a distinctive flag is any emblem which does not bear a union jack. I want him to know that this is not true.

When referring to my remark, he forgot to add what I said at the end: any emblem bearing neither the union jack nor the fleur-de-lis.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no question of privilege. The hon. minister merely wishes to correct what he considers to be a mistake in the hon. member's reference.

It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, notices of motions for papers, public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

The house resumed from Thursday, October 22, consideration in committee of Bill No. S-27 respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada—Mr. Brown—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Number of directors.

The Chairman: When the committee rose on October 22 last, clause 1 of the bill with an amendment proposed thereto by the hon. member for Timiskaming and an amendment to the amendment by the hon. member for Lapointe was being considered. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Cowan: You may remember, Mr. Chairman, that when this bill was up for consideration six weeks ago today I was making some remarks with regard to the subamendment. I am quite prepared to support the subamendment because I believe the general telephone users of Canada are entitled to more representation on this board than is now accorded to them.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

When I spoke six weeks ago I referred to the letter which the presidents of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways had written in 1961 to the hon. member for Three Rivers. In this letter they pointed out they had lost a 30 year contract with the C.B.C. which went to the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, which company, the Bell, had undercut them on the tender by 25 per cent. When I read the letter to the house on December 21, 1963, on our discussion of the C.B.C. estimates, I read these two paragraphs from the joint letter which was signed by Mr. Donald Gordon and Mr. Emerson:

> Assuming that it is in the national interest to maintain competition in the communications industry, we think you will agree that such competition cannot be preserved if one group is permitted to quote depressed rates in the competitive situation and to obtain recompense through higher rates for other services.
> Public long distance telephone rates in Canada are 50 per cent or more above comparable rates in the United States which are regulated by the federal communications commission.

They went on to point out that the Bell Telephone Company, having undercut competitors by 25 per cent in a competitive field, would make good the losses on that contract by raising rates elsewhere in other fields of endeavour.

And better prophets, Mr. Chairman, never spoke, because we now have a report that the Bell Telephone Company is seeking an increase in rates in ten exchanges in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec at this very moment. There is a very interesting angle to this application for increases. I was interrupted by the clock six weeks ago today as I was about to read a Canadian Press dispatch which I saw in the Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph for May 2, 1964. I think the committee will be interested in a little history on this matter. This small dispatch says:

> The Bell Telephone Company said Friday, May 1, it has asked the board of transport commissioners for permission to boost rates in ten telephone exchanges in Quebec and Ontario.
> A company spokesman said the exchanges in question have all outgrown their present rate group, and should be reclassified.
> The increases would range from ten cents a month for a two-party line in St. Remi, Quebec, to $1.35 on a one-party business line in Kitchener, Ontario. The two Quebec exchanges involved are Grand Remous and St. Remi.
> The company announcement said telephone rates for an exchange are governed by the number of phones in its local dialing area.

Immediately after this debate concluded six weeks ago I wrote a letter to the board of transport commissioners of this government asking them for a formal announcement regarding the rate increase that the Bell Telephone was seeking, as it was stated that a hearing was about to be held. You will be very interested, Mr. Chairman, in the reply which I received from the board under date October 28, a letter signed by Mr. C. W. Rump, secretary. The upshot of this letter, which runs to three pages with appendices attached, is very interesting. Mr. Rump tells me that the Bell Telephone Company has not asked for an increase in rates. He simply says it automatically gets an increase in rates. So you can see, Mr. Chairman, that the board of transport commissioners is taking very good care of one of the organizations placed under their control. The three page letter advises us that as the number of telephones in an exchange area increases or decreases, the board of transport commissioners requires that the rates go up as the number increases in view of the increased service which becomes available, and that the rates go down in an area where the number of telephones decreases. One of the interesting statements in this letter is as follows:

> The grouping of local exchange service for rate-making purposes is designed to recognize the varying value of service as between exchanges of different size and the factor of increased expenses associated with increases in the size of exchange areas. Growth of telephone service within a particular exchange area not only increases the range of calling available to customers but also increases the cost of furnishing service as a result of the necessity of interconnecting all customers within the exchange area.

You will be interested to know, Mr. Chairman, that in this letter the board has sent me, every single one of the ten applications pointed out there were now more telephones in the area concerned than there were before, and all have been authorized to move up to a higher rate grouping. Arthur, Ontario, for instance, moves up from group 2 to group 3. Cardinal, Ontario, moves up from group 2 to group 3 and Grand Remous, Quebec, from group 4 to group 5. Kitchener-Waterloo goes up from group 7 to group 8 and Victoria, Ontario, goes up from group 6 to group 7. St. Remi, Quebec, went up from group 3 to group 4. It is very interesting to note that the Bell does not even ask for a rate increase for its phone service. They have the board of transport commissioners hogtied to the point that the commissioners have established a table which gives the Bell Telephone Company the right to increase its rates every six months if a survey of the number of phones in operation in a given area proves that the number has gone up.

You may remember, Mr. Chairman, that several members of the railway committee last July, when the Bell Telephone Company officials were before it, asked whether it was not correct that as the number of telephones went up the rate to the individual subscriber might go down, on the mistaken belief that the larger the sales the lower the unit price. We were given the very smiling answer that as the number of telephones went up, of course the rate went up because you were able to talk to more people.

When we pressed the officials of the Bell Telephone Company on that point, we were advised that the cost of servicing an increased number of telephones was astronomical. I was advised that it took one telephone line to connect one phone to another. If there are three phones it took three telephone lines, and as the number of telephones increased the cost of putting up the lines greatly increased. As reported at page 429 of the committee report for Tuesday, July 7 last, Mr. Scrivener said:

> The economics of communications are such that every user must be interconnected with every other user. If you have two telephones, it takes one line to connect them.

I thanked him for the information and then he went on:

> If you have three telephones, then it takes three lines to interconnect them. The more telephones you have, the more complex are the interconnections in order to permit each telephone user to speak to the other. This involves us in the complexity of a metropolitan area like Ottawa, Montreal or Toronto as opposed to a small rural community where there are a few telephones and where a simple switchboard will interconnect them. Therefore, with telephone service, the cost of providing it tends to be upward as you increase the complexity of the interconnection.

We should like to see a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada for a hearing with regard to the interconnections between the Northern Electric Company and the Bell Telephone Company, as there are many questions about the Bell Telephone Company to which the board of transport commissioners is either unwilling or unable to secure the answers. I sincerely believe that if we had as members of the increased board of directors people suggested by the hon. member for Lapointe and the hon. member for Roberval we would get some of these answers in a hurry.

In connection with the July 31, 1964 mailing of dividend cheques to the shareholders of the Bell Telephone Company they had a very nice piece of puffery regarding how well the Bell Telephone Company were doing, and this interesting statement was made. Previously they had told me that as the number of phones goes up so does the rate, because it takes more wires to connect each individual subscriber. But here we have enclosed with the dividend cheques for the period ending July 31, 1964 a pamphlet which states, among other things:

Improved training and better operating procedures have had something to do with these reductions, but they are mainly the result of the increasing use of automatic switching equipment—

It is funny how this economic method does not apply to local service.

—represented by direct distance dialing service, and the development of more economic long distance transmission facilities, such as microwave radio relay—

Intercity calls that at one time required the attention of at least four operators, and ten minutes to establish a connection, can now be dialed by the subscriber himself, in mere seconds, without an operator's help.

I am happy to tell the committee that I spent eight days hunting in Labrador at the beginning of October. I was 36 miles east of Wabush City near Ross Bay junction, and in flying around the area not only hunting but also inspecting the Grand falls of Labrador the pilot showed me the Emeril station of the Bell Telephone Company and the Sauna lake station of the Bell Telephone Company, and he advised me that I could telephone all over Labrador and that these stations took phone calls through to Scotland. I was quite interested in the fact that there are no lines between the stations, that I could see. In fact, when I got down on the ground I wanted to call for an extra aircraft to fly to Grand falls. We went over to the telephone on the railway line at Ross Bay junction and we called Wabush lake and Labrador City. As I said, they have no telephone wires, but operate this service through a microwave system. We made our call successfully.

This little pamphlet then goes on to state:

Microwave systems can transmit large quantities of information over great distances and difficult terrain more economically than is possible with wire and cable systems.

Mr. Scrivener told me that with a normal system a wire was required for every telephone. The pamphlet continues as follows:

Savings through the use of microwave do not generally apply on short range intercity calls, but are substantial on long-mileage transmissions.

Technological advances are benefiting all long distance telephone users—

[Mr. Cowan.]

This pamphlet then states:

Improved long distance service and rate reductions have been accompanied by rapidly growing use of the company's long distance facilities.

Then they give us the very interesting information that within the last 25 years, between 1939 to 1964, long distance rates for a three minute, daytime, station-to-station call have come down drastically. The examples they give are terrific. This is one example. In 1939 a three minute, daytime, station-to-station call between Ottawa and Quebec cost $1.40, and in 1964 the same call cost $1.10. That is a reduction of 30 cents, or a reduction of 21.4 per cent.

Here is another example. In 1939 a three minute, daytime, station-to-station call from North Bay to Montreal cost $1.70, and in 1964 the same call would cost $1.20, or a reduction of 29.4 per cent. Those calls are between points serviced by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

They give two more examples of terrific savings. A three minute, daytime, station-to-station call between Montreal and Vancouver cost in 1939, $7, whereas in 1964 the same call would cost $3. That represents a reduction of 57.1 per cent. That phone call would have to travel over publicly owned telephone services in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. There has been a reduction in the same type of call between Toronto and Calgary. In 1939 the call would cost $5.50 and in 1964 would cost $2.70, or a reduction of 50.9 per cent. Those calls would have to go over publicly owned telephone services in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

It is very interesting that in respect of the long distance call examples they give where the service is entirely within the confines of the Bell Telephone system the reductions are 21.4 per cent and 29.4 per cent whereas, when they have to use publicly-owned services, such as for a call between Montreal and Vancouver, or Toronto and Calgary, the reductions are 57.1 per cent and 50.9 per cent.

When we were examining the Bell Telephone people during the railway committee meetings we asked them why they wanted to increase the number of directors from 15 to 20, and received the rather interesting reply that sometimes their vice presidents are sick. I imagine their vice presidents must suffer from gout more than any other disease. They said they wanted to be able to maintain a quorum and could do so by increasing the number of directors to 20. I do not believe that is the right answer, because if you make an examination of the financial set-up of the Bell Telephone Company you will find that more than one third of the stock, or 34.6 per cent is held by large financial institutions. Institutional investors, insurance companies and pension and mutual funds own one quarter of the company. The 93 largest investors, none of which is an individual, own six million shares of Bell Telephone Company, or 21.5 per cent. You can well imagine the scrapping that is going on among those 93 larger investors about who is going to be represented on the board of directors.

The Bell Telephone Company has issued some publicity in connection with a hearing that the board of transport commissioners has called. Personally I would like to label that hearing in advance as a joke. The Bell Telephone Company officials have pointed out that the company requires 7 per cent return on its money and they are going to have to raise another $1,250 million in the immediate future for expansion purposes. If they require that much money for expansion purposes in the immediate future one can rest assured that these large insurance companies, investment institutions and banks are going to be asked to buy Bell Telephone Company stock, and one can well imagine that those companies will want to be represented by a director on the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company in order to have a finger in controlling their heavy investments in this monopoly.

I could not agree more than I do with the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, who suggested a while ago that this monopoly should be nationalized. I could not agree more than I do with the hon. member for Lapointe and the hon. member for Roberval in their wish to have representatives of the common people on the board of directors of this monopoly. I back up the hon. member for Greenwood and the junior member for Halifax in their demands that there be a supreme court ruling requested by the cabinet as to the ownership of the Northern Electric Company by Bell Telephone. If the company's interest in the Northern Electric Company were sold it would have money on hand that is needed for the expansion required, to which they refer in the publicity which is now being released prior to the hearing called for by the board of transport commissioners.

Mr. Chairman, I could go on reading extracts about the history of the Bell Telephone Company. I have exposed the fact that they receive a special rate from the Canada Post Office Department for sending out their bills each month. This special rate does not apply to other organizations. The Bell company prints its own bills and calls them service charges, because the service charge is the same month after month, such as $5.75, and they get a preferred rate from the Canada Post Office Department. This preferred rate is made available to a few other giant companies which are able to print their statements with regard to indebtedness, but the small grocer or coal man whose bills vary from month to month has to send them out sealed as first class mail.

In the province of Ontario we have a special tax exemption applied to the Bell Telephone Company in the city of Toronto. The Bell Telephone Company receives a tax exemption on a large proportion of their real property. I have a letter in my hand from Allan A. Lamport, an ex-mayor of Toronto, dated October 26, 1964 which states:

> I am enclosing clipping as per my promise Friday night when I saw you.

The clipping is from the Toronto Telegram of October 1 and states:

> Board of control yesterday backed Con. Lamport's demand that the Bell Telephone Co. be required to pay full city realty taxes.
> The Bell, by special provincial legislation, receives an annual exemption amounting to $455,000. The firm still pays $3,000,000.

Mr. Lamport's letter reads as follows:

> This is also to advise you that the legislation is provincial which relieves the Bell Telephone Company, as shown in the clipping. We do not relieve the hydro or the gas company of part of their assessment. The Bell Telephone Company do a good job and a creditable one, but it is difficult to understand why they can get exclusive and specific special treatment. You could compare them with the wiring system of the hydro or the piping system of the gas company. Neither of these is relieved and one is publicly-owned. The other, namely the gas company, is privately-owned by the stockholders in the same way as the Bell Telephone Company. I trust this covers the query about which you had asked me.

I draw this to your attention to show you the way in which the Bell Telephone Company argues for special consideration. Yet, as the member for Halifax has stated, this company has grown beyond the bounds of a monopoly and has become an empire, and requires more serious control than is now being exercised by the board of transport commissioners.

I support the subamendment wholeheartedly, because five more directors of the type outlined by the two hon. members would provide a searching examination of the Bell Telephone Company, which is long overdue.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Chairman, we are dealing once again today with the notorious Bill S-27 providing for an increase from 15 to 20 in the number of directors of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

An amendment was moved providing that five directors should represent various groups, namely the federal government, the province, the municipalities and the last two, various organizations that have a certain importance and can exercise an influence on the general public so that the company would not set up all alone the rates to be charged to the customers.

It is generally realized that the rates charged by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada are much too high, especially in the Quebec region because in the case of municipalities located ten or 15 miles away, the company has doubled its long distance rates.

In my opinion, the more customers one has, the lower rates should be. However, if you examine the company's operations, you will see that the contrary happens. Its rates increase with the number of telephones and extensions.

The speech made on October 22 by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) contains a very important point that I should like to draw to your attention.

I shall speak right away of the ownership of Northern Electric Company by the Bell Company of Canada. It must be remembered that we are not speaking merely of a telephone company but of an empire; we are speaking of an organization whose gross income amounts to $471 million a year. This company has gained so much importance that it is more powerful than many governments in the world today. Its services should at all times be carefully controlled.

As for the subsidiary of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, namely the Northern Electric Company, other members have pointed out that the Bell Telephone Company of Canada owns all the shares of the Northern Electric Company as the result of an interpretation of the clause empowering the company to be a shareholder or to conclude agreements with other companies doing business in the telephone field.

The fact that the Northern Electric Company has a short telephone line in the city of Montreal was used by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada as a pretext to take over that giant Northern Electric Company which provides the Bell Telephone Company with all the wires, cables and other fittings it requires.

I am not necessarily scandalized by the fact that the Bell Telephone Company produces the cables and wires it needs. But it must not be forgotten that the Northern Electric Company is not satisfied with the large market guaranteed by the Bell Telephone monopoly, but the customers of the latter have to buy from the Northern Electric Company everything they need in that field. The Bell Telephone Company of Canada then turns to its subsidiary, the Northern Electric Company, to meet the demands of that vast market.

Northern Electric, on the other hand, competes with small Canadian companies on the everyday market by manufacturing cable, wire and other similar equipment. In my opinion, it is almost impossible for these small Canadian companies to compete with Northern Electric under the circumstances we have just described.

This famous Bill S-27, in my opinion should not have been taken up today; if the Conservatives had continued their filibuster with regard to the flag issue, an hour would have been saved and thus a vote could have been taken one hour earlier. But as we are now studying Bill S-27, we must talk on and on to say that we do not object so much to its object, namely to increase the number of directors on the board from 15 to 20, for this may not have much effect on their actions. But, once again, if we could have known exactly what the reason was for requesting an increase in the number of directors from 15 to 20. Is it to pay a little less income tax? Is it only that? I think that instead they should have reduced the rates to their subscribers, which in turn would have much reduced their income by that much and, consequently, their income tax would have been reduced accordingly.

One must not forget that we refer to a gross income of $471 million a year. I believe this is a huge amount of money. Therefore, instead of arranging for the shareholders only to benefit from this large amount, the rates should have been lowered in order to give satisfaction to subscribers who are using the telephone a great deal, particularly the industries and trades of all kinds where the telephone is absolutely essential, as otherwise business would suffer. Therefore, this service is absolutely necessary.

In my opinion, the government should have an observer in that industry which has become very important, and it should appoint a representative. Also, if the province had a representative to see what is happening within that firm and to defend the interests of the public, we might see that some changes are occurring in many areas, and it may become easier and less expensive to obtain a telephone.

As I already stated, in view of modern inventions, space, distance, roads are shortened, if I may say so, because telephone communications may be established for instance, between Quebec city and Ottawa, within a few moments. The telephone is, therefore, a public necessity for a multitude of persons.

In my opinion, we should avail ourselves of the opportunity afforded by the consideration of Bill No. S-27 to discuss the opportunity of delaying for six months the passage of this bill, in order to allow the Bell Telephone Company of Canada to reconsider its point of view and admit on its board five directors representing, in short, the general population in each of the provinces where the company operates.

I believe that the federal government should, in such quarters, have a spokesman possessing in this field the knowledge required to assert the rights of the subscribers, since it is very hard for a subscriber to assert his rights.

Today in the province of Quebec when a claim is made to the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, it is not even possible to enter an office to state one's point of view. You go in a room, and you find there a series of telephones you have to use to state your grievances, without being able to see the claims attendant at the other end of the line. You just have to speak in a small black hole, in the telephone mouthpiece, while the other voice comes to you from the other end of the line.

You no longer have democracy, it seems to me, when things reach that stage because a company, as such, ought to have representatives. When we want to make a complaint, we should be given the opportunity to do so personally to somebody in an office instead of being compelled to use the telephone to speak to some unknown and invisible person. I think they have become a little too independent. That company has become so big that its unsatisfactory way of doing things is achieving damaging results.

There is also the matter of the "princess" telephone, which was supposed to be some kind of a marvel. The user is charged $12 or $13 for it, in addition to $1.25 a month for service. But if he has the service discontinued for six or seven months and then wants it again, he literally loses the sum of $15 and has to pay for the telephone once again.

I think it is time to tell this company to take the time to reconsider the facts. If company directors wish to increase their numbers they should agree in the future to the appointment of men who would represent plain ordinary people, the mass, who, when they have grudges against the company, could then get in touch with an individual representing either the provincial or municipal authorities. This representative could then speak his mind, insist on and protect the rights of the subscribers, because nowadays one is not free to subscribe to the telephone service and cancel it the day after. It has become a must in this century. We have to subscribe to telephone service even if we do not like it and are not too pleased with the service.

Nowadays the telephone is often used to play hoaxes. Those who complain are told that it is impossible to track down the culprit, that the system is automatic. Rather than have his telephone cut off, the subscriber must put up with those phone calls night and day. Moreover, the subscriber must continue to pay all the time and his complaints are to no avail.

I think that that passage of Bill No. S-27 should be delayed six months, because there are several more important pieces of legislation to study. We do not care whether the number of directors is increased to 20, but we would like to obtain justice for the subscribers, to have the service improved and representatives appointed to hear the complaints and deal with the matter when necessary. There is something else, Mr. Chairman, when we have to use telephones during an election we are charged an extra $50 at the outset. This can become unreasonable when 10, 15 or 20 telephones are installed in various committees. The telephone is very useful at election time, just as at any other time, and extra charges should not be made during an election.

Why pay more at election time for identical service? It might be objected that, since the phone is used more often, this might explain the higher rates. I do not think a telephone is used constantly during the 60 days of an election campaign. It is there to receive calls rather than to make them. I am of the opinion that it is also to the discredit of the company that it should ask so much for its service simply because they know that during an election campaign, people have to use the telephone. It is not surprising, therefore, to see the company register a gross income of $471 million a year. I think it is preposterous that such a company should have an income like that.

If there were a federal representative among the directors of the company, we could have questioned him this afternoon and secured from him the necessary information, that is to say why rates go up when there are more telephones, whereas the greater the number of subscribers to a newspaper, the cheaper the cost of printing it. Should it not be the same in the case of the Bell Telephone Company? If in one week 100 new subscribers are accepted, 100 new telephones will have to be paid at once but after a few months that expense will be written off.

A $6 or $6.50 charge is made when a telephone is installed but that gives rise to paradoxes. I have a telephone at home at 3200 St. Vallier east, in Quebec city, and another one at 576 St. Vallier. One moves but keeps the same telephone number and asks the company to change one's address in the telephone directory and to register the telephone in the name of Lucien instead of Georges; I was then told that such a change could be made, that it would be the same as having a new telephone, and that I would have to pay another $6.50. That is utterly ridiculous. Last year the number at 3200 St. Vallier was 172; the city changed the civic number but the subscriber was not charged any surplus at that time. However, there is a charge if you change Christian names.

Mr. Chairman, whenever things like that happen, it makes me a little angry. If in order to change a number some moving about were required; but no, they can remain at their desk and correct the name and address in the telephone directory, and the Bell Telephone Company collects $13 or $14 immediately. This is a net profit, not a gross one.

We would have many other things to say on this matter but our time is limited, 20 minutes only; so we must merely attend to the most pressing things.

What I think is most disgusting today, is that we have to discuss a bill like this one, whereas we could have allowed our hon. friends to keep on speaking about the flag—and they enjoy it indeed—and we could thus have saved the house a whole hour which would have enabled us to vote sooner.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I think about a month ago somebody referred to this hour as the telephone hour. I believe it is an appropriate name. It not only signifies the number of hours that have been devoted to this bill but I suppose it is an indirect compliment to the type of advertising that has made the Bell Telephone Company famous. In the many sessions during which I have listened to the debate surrounding this particular bill, I have heard outlined all of the sins of which the Bell Telephone Company is supposed to be guilty. During the earlier part of the debate I heard reference made to a point which I am not going to pursue because it was adequately refuted, namely that the Bell Telephone Company has been unfair to French speaking Canadians in Quebec. I think the point was adequately refuted, principally by members who realize that the president of the Bell Telephone Company, Mr. Marcel Vincent, is an excellent example of the type of business people that the French speaking community of Canada can produce.

Second, Mr. Chairman, I think that—

Mr. Grégoire: Are you trying to make a racial issue of it?

Mr. Mackasey: I cannot say whether the hon. member is standing or sitting because basically there is not that much difference.

Mr. Grégoire: I was just asking whether you are going to make it a racial issue. You would be doing wrong if you did.

Mr. Mackasey: Well, Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the hon. member if I misunderstood his remarks. I think they were speculative.

The main charge made against the Bell Telephone Company is that it is big and that it is operating in a semi-monopolistic field. I do not feel it has anything to be ashamed of on either count. As I mentioned previously in debate, I can understand the philosophy of socialism and I respect those who believe in it. They feel that Bell is the type of company that should be crown operated, or placed under the jurisdiction of the federal government. I have no intention of debating the pros and cons of that philosophy but, Mr. Chairman, I do not think this hour is the appropriate time to bring forward the many grievances raised by the hon. member for York-Humber and others. There is a proper medium through which such grievances should be exposed, factually supported, or rejected by representatives of the company.

I do not always disagree with my good friend from York-Humber. I am one of those who are happy he did come back from his hunting trip in the north, and I think all of us shared in his bounty by having a little bit of caribou meat. Further, I am always happy when he is gathering up bits and pieces of information to present to the house in his very unique style; but in all fairness to the Bell Telephone Company I do not think these are the type of things that should be discussed on this bill.

The bill simply asks that the board of directors be increased from 15 to 20. I agree with many of the things said during the debate by members of the Social Credit party and other hon. members. I think we are entitled to a fair explanation of why things are so paradoxical in the pricing of the Bell Telephone Company commodity, and why an increase in subscribership should mean an increase in price rather than the reverse. But I do suggest this is not the time for such explanation.

Many things have been said about Northern Electric. I do not think that normally I have to spring to its defence, but I feel very close to it since so many thousands of its employees reside in my constituency. But whether the relationship between Bell and Northern Electric is legitimate or logical is again something for the board of transport to determine, and not for hon. members during private members' hour.

There is, however, a fundamental issue at stake, namely the degree to which members of the house desire to go in interfering with the actual administration of companies, whether they be semi-monopolistic or private corporations. I feel it would be a dangerous precedent to place on the board of directors a number of persons not named by the shareholders of the company, but by the governor in council.

The fundamental thing which has been overlooked throughout this debate is that the Bell Telephone Company is a perfect example of what we like to think should be a large corporation, one that spends its money in this country, one that is owned by the people of Canada, one that operates as fairly and squarely as it can under the rules specified by the board of transport, one whose financial balance sheet can stand the close scrutiny not only of members of the house but of those watchdogs who at all times are looking for abuses of the rules and regulations which permit the company to operate.

Recently the Bell company pleaded that it cannot operate on its present ceiling of rates. Perhaps it is wrong. We cannot determine that now, but at least we know that the relationship last year between its profit and operating capital was just slightly over 6 per cent. There are other facts we cannot refute, such as the fact 97 per cent of the shareholders are Canadian citizens and that 93 per cent of the shares are held by Canadian citizens. What other criteria do we want for any company that operates in Canada?

The Minister of Finance has a desire, as he expresses it, to Canadianize corporations operating in this country. Whether it is possible to do this through legislation, raising Canadian ownership 25 per cent, is a question which is debated in all financial circles. Many think it is impossible and others think it is imperative. But here we have a company, admittedly operating in a field that is semi-monopolistic, which is 97 per cent Canadian owned numerically, with 93 per cent of the total value of its shares owned by Canadians.

So far as I am concerned it is simply a matter of philosophy as to whether this type of operation is best administered through crown corporations or is best left in the hands of private industry. I respect people whose views differ from mine in this regard, except that I cannot see, if the Bell Telephone Company were made a crown corporation, that it would be any smaller, any more efficient or any more Canadian than the 93 per cent content it has at the moment. Further I have to say I would shudder to see the Bell Telephone Company made a crown corporation and subjected to the criticisms levelled at such organizations as the C.B.C. and the C.N.R. by people who, at times, are more interested in headlines than in facts.

The Social Credit party has moved an amendment which is simply an expansion of the original amendment proposed by the New Democratic party. The N.D.P. amendment asked that one of the new directors be appointed by the governor in council, and the Social Credit, with their usual generosity, have suggested that three be named by the governor in council.

As an admirer of the N.D.P. I am rather amazed that its philosophy in this particular instance and that of the Social Credit party could be so similar. Charles Lynch's column today advances a different theory. He comments on a speech made out west by one of the Tory members which suggested that the head of Social Credit out west become, what he knows he is, a good Conservative.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I suggest we treat the Bell Telephone Company during private members' hour in the same way as we treat all other corporations, namely objectively. Legislation of this type involving a request for changes in internal management is usually treated objectively on the basis of the particular question before the house. The problem before the house is not whether the Bell Telephone Company's rates are justified or whether its relationship with Northern Electric is good or bad. It is simply whether approval should be given to a request to increase the number of directors from 15 to 20.

On the basis of the testimony which was given in an objective manner by representatives of the telephone company, as will be found in the fourth report of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines we have no right to assume that the company wishes to increase the number of its directors merely in order to satisfy some people who hold large blocks of shares. It could be so, but we have no right to assume it is the case. The hon. member for York-Humber, advancing this theory, told us that large blocks of shares were held by banks, lending institutions and trust companies. I would say: What better endorsation of the company could there be? The regulations protecting the safety of investments and of people's savings are strict, yet trust companies and the like are permitted to invest in the Bell Telephone Company. I think this is something on which the company should be commended. We who are close to the insurance act know that an endorsation of this type is not given to every corporation.

I would appeal to members of the committee to allow this bill to go through. All the grievances which may or may not be justified can very well be aired at the proper time and in the proper place, that is before the board of transport commissioners. If the relationship between the Bell Telephone Company and Northern Electric is not a proper one, then the courts of the land can be asked to make a decision on that question. It is not proper for us to take advantage of the private members' hour to hold up a legitimate request by the company, that in order to modernize its activities in a period of expansion it should be permitted to increase the membership of its board from 15 to 20. So I appeal to the committee to get back to a sense of objectivity and reach a decision strictly on the merits of the case, and on the particular question which is before us.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, the arguments used by the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) in favour of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada did not convince too many of us.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

In my opinion, the fact that this company is not government-owned constitutes an injustice to the people of Ontario, Quebec and elsewhere. It is an injustice because this is an essential public utility.

I feel it is urgent for the provincial governments concerned to take over, not only the Bell Telephone Company, but the other independent telephone companies.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I cannot see why some people persist in defending such company. I am not ready to say that the whole administration of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada is bad. Sure there are gaps; but a principle is involved here: such a public utility service should become publicly owned by the provincial governments concerned.

Besides, in the province of Quebec—

Mr. Choquette: May I ask a question?

Do you know that Mr. René Lévesque is in favour of nationalizing the telephone?

Mr. Pigeon: I thank the hon. member. I was precisely coming to this question.

The Catholic farmers' union, at its last convention, recommended that the government of the province of Quebec should take appropriate steps to nationalize the Bell Telephone Company of Canada; St. Jean Baptiste societies did likewise.

I hope that at its next session the Quebec government will introduce a legislation to nationalize the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. Moreover, I am convinced that the province of Ontario will do the same if Quebec acts first.

[Text]

Mr. Brown: Could I ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the amendment?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, you will decide whether I am out of order.

Power companies of the province of Quebec have been nationalized. Are the people of Quebec worse off for all that?

Mr. Turner: May I put a question to the hon. member?

Does he advocate the nationalization of that company for economic or nationalistic reasons?

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, there are both economic and nationalistic reasons. It is disgraceful that in the 20th century such a company could have so much control.

In Montreal, for instance, there is no competition against the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. The people are at the mercy of a single company.

I feel that it is abnormal in a democratic country for the Canadian people to put up with a trust of that kind.

I hope that Mr. René Lévesque will follow his convictions in a positive way by introducing at the next session of the provincial legislature a bill to nationalize that company. I am convinced that the province of Ontario will follow suit as well as the other provinces.

Mr. Béchard: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Did the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm advocate the same thing about nationalizing electricity during the 1962 provincial election campaign?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, first of all, I did not take part in the 1962 election campaign.

It is a matter of principle. The arguments put forward by the hon. member for Verdun are, in my opinion, out of date. They do not stand up in 1964.

[Text]

Mr. Peters: I rise to ask through you, Mr. Chairman, whether in view of the number of inquiries which have been raised with regard to this bill the sponsor would be willing to withdraw it?

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

CANADIAN FLAG

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Batten that the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, when we interrupted the debate at five o'clock to go into private members' hour I had been describing what seemed to me to be an obsession of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) to push the report of the special flag committee through the house as quickly as possible to avoid letting the people of this country have a say in whether or not they wanted a new flag at all, and I remain unconvinced that the government has any evidence whatsoever that the majority of the people of this country find the Canadian red ensign offensive.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, no sooner had this special committee been set up than the Prime Minister took to the press, in keeping with what I call his pathetic obsession, and said, "We shall have a flag by Christmas that will be based on the maple leaf design." I ask you, are these the actions of a responsible person in touch with reality?

I asked about this strange compulsion of his and I wondered if in fact a commitment was being pursued, not a commitment to the people of Canada as a group, but to people within his own party within regions of this country, a commitment to the effect that he would wipe out the traditional symbols of this country before the end of 1964.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member may remember that before five o'clock the Chair enjoined him to limit his remarks to the matter before the house at the moment. Perhaps his remarks at this point are introductory, but I would ask him to revert as quickly as possible to the particular point we have to consider at the moment.

Mr. Pugh: If I might speak on the point of order raised by Your Honour, may I say I think the hon. member is speaking on the necessity for a plebiscite. When he says the people of Canada want this opportunity rather than be at the mercy of the strange compulsion of one who wanted to thrust the flag on us, two things bear relation to the fact that the people of Canada do want a plebiscite—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is not a point of order at all.

Mr. Rhéaume: Mr. Speaker, with deference I shall accept your advice. I believe myself to be in order, but in view of the fact that this is the second time the Chair has brought it to my attention I shall discuss specifically the need for a plebiscite.

I shall close my statement with words to the effect that I shall be voting in favour of a plebiscite, in favour of the amendment. There is no doubt in my mind what will be the fate of the amendment and the main motion. I expect the amendment will be defeated and the motion itself subsequently passed. I believe that the Canadian red ensign will be hauled down from the flagstaffs of this country before Christmas. I believe it will be the responsibility of the Prime Minister alone that this great UN man, this un-man and his ungovernment will be remembered in history as being in 1964 a petulant and perverse Santa Claus, the man who, as a Christmas present for his nation took away from his people their cherished national symbols and left in their place a petty division that will remain in this country for a hundred Christmases to come.

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak at this time about this problem before the house I must express my appreciation that I have not been greeted with the levity from the other side of this chamber that met an earlier speaker today. I only rise to speak because I think there is nothing in this debate which should give cause for levity. I speak, not because I care about the flag we might have but because I care about Canada and the unity we must achieve if we are to fufil our destiny.

I do not speak in a happy vein because I do not feel that way about this particular issue. I had hoped I would not have to make this speech in this house, and that before now common sense would have prevailed because of the overwhelming evidence we have observed that, rather than enlarging the feeling of unity, we are destroying what unity we now have.

I remember reading something one philosophical writer wrote who put my position in words which I will have to paraphrase, as I do not have the quotation. He said, as I remember his remarks: Let us at least talk about it, you wisest of men, even though it seems bad; silence is worse because all truths suppressed become poisonous. I think talking about the issue, even though it seems bad, will in the end accomplish something.

I feel something has been accomplished since I spoke last, when I introduced a subamendment dealing with what I thought should be included in a plebiscite. At that time I remember saying that I did not think anyone who wished to achieve anything could build a sound and good case if he had to destroy and demean others who had other ideas. I think you will recall, as will the house, that at that time those who believed and felt emotionally, deep in their hearts, that the Canadian red ensign represented the sacrifices of sons, daughters, mothers and husbands whom they did not wish to forget but wished to see honoured, were demeaned and scoffed at. I have not seen this take place in the debate since that time, and if I have accomplished nothing else by my efforts, I am proud that that sort of nonsense has ceased.

It was rather strange to me, having this assignment put into my hands tonight, and looking forward to carrying it out, that I received a pamphlet, which I gather is published by the C.B.C. This is not indicated, but the material appears on a C.B.C. program. It is entitled "Flanders' Fields", and on the cover it says "They are too near to be great. But our children shall understand when and how our fate was changed and by whose hand." I think those words are prophetic and in line with the reason I am speaking tonight in support of a plebiscite.

Those people can be forgotten and might well be forgotten as a result of the proposed action of an apparently inevitable decision that this house is being rushed into by those whose purposes we just do not understand. I know of no reason whatsoever to deal with the flag issue, unless it is that there are those who are completely impressed with the idea that by doing so they will bring greater unity to Canada. I could support such a move if the evidence was of such a nature, but there is no evidence of this nature.

I take it from what I have read and heard that this may satisfy a group which now has some dissatisfaction. This is not a group confined to one province, and I want to make that clear because I do not speak in that vein. This action will create another group which will not have only a problem, but deep bitterness. This will be a most unfortunate factor in the progress of our country for years to come.

To my way of thinking the amendment proposed is a sensible one, having in mind the evidence we have before us. It is an amendment which will allow the people to make the decision, rather than the decision being made by 265 of us here who, in the ordinary event, would speak convincingly, knowing what was wanted, what we were supposed to do, and what was right. In spite of the heavy mail, I would be the last one to suggest, however, that I have evidence of what all my constituents want. Certainly if my mail gives a similar indication to that given by recent polls, which today are accepted as having a margin of error not greater than 5 per cent, I have overwhelming evidence that my instruction is to use every effort at my command to see that this apparently inevitable decision is not taken by this house.

One of the members who spoke before me during this debate—one of the few members from the other side who has spoken, the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Cadieux)—asked what more we wanted than 72 per cent of the committee supporting the design as recommended in the report. I suggest to him that that does not mean too much, because 20 years ago a committee of this house, composed of men as dedicated I presume as those who served on the latest flag committee, approved the report by a vote of 95.8 per cent. An astute leader of that time recognized the consequences of adopting a report that had received even such an overwhelming majority as that, and the report was never moved for concurrence and never dealt with by the house.

I wonder, in the present circumstances, which in my limited knowledge appear to me to be far more dangerous in their potential divisiveness than the circumstances surrounding the report of the committee 20 years ago, whether the wise course has been followed in moving concurrence. I have read much about this debate and listened to many expressions of opinion, and when I spoke before I said I did not understand the Prime Minister's apparent obsession with this matter in light of the evidence. One individual who expressed himself on this matter commenced his comments by saying:

> What bugs Pearson? Is it love of exerting power over others against their will? Is it a misguided streak of Tom Sawyer adventure in his nature that leads him to go his own way? It could be; but I am inclined to think he took on a job too big for him and is showing an obduracy that inevitably causes trouble.

I do not like to engage in personal comments on matters of substance such as the one now before us, and it has not been one of my traits. I have a rather charitable nature that precludes me from indulging in personalities. But we have come to the point where I have to speak strongly because I feel I have no other choice.

I am reminded, as I proceed to make my case for a plebiscite, of the remarks of the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) when he spoke in seconding the motion to concur in the report. As found on page 10694 of Hansard he said in his last sentence:

> I hope that in time it will win the allegiance of the Canadian people.

What stronger evidence could you have than that? Even though he is supporting concurrence in the report at this time, he recognizes the dangers in rushing into this inevitable decision. Let us face it. None of us is so silly that he or she does not recognize what that decision will be when the vote comes. I have never indulged or found much pleasure in standing before a mirror and speaking and gesticulating to find out whether or not I was effective. It has tried me sorely in sitting here throughout this debate and listening to those who have been trying to contribute sincerely and with some cause to a proper solution of this matter, to note that in speaking to the other side of the chamber and other sections of the house they have been addressing what appears to be a stone wall. Any member who has looked around the house, seen the attitudes and heard the interjections and the nonsense recognizes what the situation is, because it is evident there are no open minds in other parts of the house.

I think I cannot make my case properly without referring to some of the remarks made by other speakers in this debate. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), the great lover, spoke in this debate. I have listened to him speak several times on this subject. I know that he would have to cry a wee drop if the red ensign came down. He said that. I know that he would love the Pearson pennant. He belaboured my leader for calling it the troika flag. You would think that my leader was the first to suggest that this pennant was the troika flag. I should like to remind him that the idea of calling it the troika flag originated with the Postmaster General (Mr. Nicholson) who, in speaking outside the house about the three maple leaves design, said that one was for the English, one was for the French and the other was for the rest of us. That was what gave rise to calling it the troika flag. It was the troika love of the hon. member for Leeds. When I heard him say that he loved the flag recommended by the committee I wondered whether he had been playing the old children's game we used to play of picking petals off a daisy and saying "I love you, I love you not". My experience was that you did not always wind up with "I love you"; but apparently he has had a run of luck far beyond anything I have ever heard of before.

In making my case for why I think there should be a plebiscite I want to refer to the speech of my colleague, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Girouard). I want to quote some of his words as found on page 10731 of Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. More: I am always glad to have evidence of the sort of attention being paid to my remarks by those who most of the time make remarks while seated, and who I think must be handicapped and are probably drawing the disabled allowance. When I have something to say I choose to stand on my feet and to say it in the proper, responsible manner. My colleague from Labelle uttered these words:

> We Quebeckers want to keep jealously our traditions and our civil law. And yet, on the flag issue, when the Conservative party from our leader down want to give us a flag establishing exactly this ethnic, historic and cultural duality we say: No. We want one flag for one Canada.

He went on to make a decision that I regret because I cannot accept it as a positive decision in the climate of this country today. I do want to say though that in his remarks there were words that gave me much to consider, words that I think were clear in trying to explain why we have a difference of view on this matter. I think he dealt with the subject very well and had he been able to accept the statements I read and on that basis have reached some degree of conciliation I believe that both of us could have had a part in doing something of great service to our country.

One of the finest speeches I have heard in all the time that this issue has been before the house was made this afternoon by my colleague, the hon. member for Kent (Ont.) (Mr. Danforth). I do not have the ability to speak in the same fashion as he did because he approached the status of an outstanding orator in the way he made his remarks this afternoon, and his evident sincerity could not be denied by anyone. I think his remarks put the case for a plebiscite clearly and distinctly and, as I say, I am sorry that minds seem to be closed to doing anything or considering any course that might accomplish what we want to accomplish and would overcome the difficulties and the results that we now face.

I am not one who appreciates levity when we are speaking about serious matters and I do not appreciate interjections that do not really bear on the subject which comes from the other side of the house. I often regret that remarks made in this way get into Hansard. I regret that in a debate of this kind a minister of the crown should be on Hansard as having told a member to shut up.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. More: I think it is a shame. I remember that when the hon. lady first entered the house she sat on this side and one day I introduced myself to her in what I thought was a very friendly fashion. She said to me: "I have got a sharp tongue. I am glad you did it today because after I speak you might not feel that way." I said then that if she wanted to be treated like a lady all she had to do was act like one.

I do not challenge that those who were members of the committee were diligent and worked hard at their task. I am not, however, able to agree with the result of that dedication and effort. It has not been what I expected or what the country expected. As I say, without any question they worked extremely long hours and held many meetings. I do not want to make exceptions, but I do want to say that from what I have learned I think the chairman of this committee acted properly at all times. I think we owe it to a chairman in a difficult position like that, when he comes out with completely clean colours, to express our sentiments publicly and give him credit for it. I want to join with all those who have, by their remarks, honoured him. The first time any member of the committee said anything or did anything the chairman felt was not true or was not fair, he immediately stopped him.

The flag this committee brought forward may well become the flag of Canada. At this stage I am not prepared to forecast. I do say that if it does, then the years ahead will be most difficult. I say this, sir, because we have evidence from the polls that have been conducted from time to time that this is an emotional issue charged with the memories of sacrifices that a great many of our people hold dear. We should recognize this fact sincerely and not demean those memories. There will be bitterness if this flag is adopted. I believe all serious minded members of parliament should seek to avoid this at all costs. On the basis of polls conducted in the area, I believe that the overwhelming majority of people want the Canadian red ensign maintained as our flag.

However, I have no doubts whatever that they are prepared to conciliate and to try to reach common ground with those in Canada who do not agree, on the basis that they would be allowed to participate in this decision. I think they would accept the result, and this would remove the bitterness and bring us all together. Each of us, in our way, would have played a part in solving this problem in our country. The other day I picked up the Gazette, I think it was, and found a little poem by Christine L. Henderson entitled "(Don't) Rally Round the Flag!". This refers to the committee report, and reads as follows:

Fifteen learned men for 40 days
They thought and thought,
But alas, why think
When Learned Thought arrives at naught!
Yet for their Nation and with great elation
At 2,000 flags they gaze in a maze
At the wealth of knowledge these displayed!
—Tradition, history, symbols pied,
And heraldry and what else beside!
—Now they come to the Head and present
A Flag, (yes, a flag of sorts) with good intent—
—One leaf and two red blobs, there's nothing in it!
(A child could have done it in a minute.)

Feelings such as these are not confined to one who writes poetry, and I say that knowingly. When large numbers of our Canadian population have sacrifices made on the field of battle which they wish to remember, this parliament is not doing its duty when, for the sake of trying to be on the winning team or to achieve political advantage and become known in history as those who did it, they seek to rush us to this inevitable solution.

Last year I had the privilege of spending a month in Europe. There were some 80 of us, because I joined a tour who went from country to country. Most of us were Canadians. There were Canadians from Quebec and from every part of Canada. We started off by meeting what we felt were some rebuffs as we went along. Finally we discovered we were being mistaken for tourists from another country. We got a Canadian red ensign and put it on our bus. From that time forward our reception was different. It was one that we welcomed because it indicated that everywhere we went this flag was recognized and we were treated as Canadians.

I recall well that our tour did not include Vimy. We were in Brussels at night and we were supposed to head for Paris. There were arrangements that we were going to be pressured to keep. However we said we did not care; we were willing to miss lunch if necessary in order to go to Vimy. We went to Vimy. It was a windy day. We got out of that bus, and there was this beautiful monument to the sacrifices of thousands of Canadians. If I remember correctly there were 6,000 marked graves and about 12,000 names of those who were never found, never identified. The Canadian red ensign was flying in that brisk breeze. I stood there with my Canadian friends from Quebec, and I am telling you that after three weeks on the road in that bus, most of us felt we were home. When you pull that flag down around this world, as you seem set to do now regardless of the consequences, something is going to be lost, and lost forever. I for one, sir, have to make a contribution, regardless of the criticism, to try to wake up the members of this parliament to a situation that, to say the least is dangerous to the future of this country.

I know of no other way, Mr. Speaker, now that we have reached this stage, than to forget that we are on different teams, to forget that we represent different parties, and to conclude that we are all Canadians; that we have one duty in this regard and that is to get politics out of this question in order to give people a chance to play a role in making a choice and contributing toward a better and more united Canada.

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I had not expected to speak on this amendment. However, in the last few days I have seen some actions on the part of some hon. members opposite, a very few in number, and especially those in the small group in the corner who have been doing nothing during this flag debate except interjecting, raising phony points of privilege and contributing nothing to the debate.

I support wholeheartedly the request for a plebiscite in this flag issue. This party has fought for the retention of the red ensign, or a modification of it. We have fought for the retention of the symbols which are so dear to many of us in this country—the union jack and the fleur-de-lis. But we have seen our efforts failing. They have failed because the minor parties have co-operated with the government in making agreements behind the curtains, and have left us to fight this issue alone. We had hoped some time ago to get the support of the minor parties, because in 1963 the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) said of the N.D.P. that they had received the embrace, if unwelcome, of the communist party of Canada. In the absence of this support of the minor parties we are endeavouring to put the issue before the people on a plebiscite. The Minister of Transport, also in 1963, said that the leader of the Social Credit party was the most pathetic creature he had ever seen in his lifetime. He said he had a Pepsodent smile and a nice hair cut. Therefore we must get this issue before the people.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has caused great disunity across this country by his appointment of the "B and B gang" and by bringing the flag issue to this house. The only way to settle it is by way of plebiscite. We have looked for support from the other side of the house, but what do we find? The hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) is not afraid to express his opinions. But as for the rest of the members opposite, they seem to be afraid to speak their minds. We have heard nothing from the hon. gentlemen on the front benches, save the intervention of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) yesterday when the former minister of labour was speaking. We also heard from the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) when an hon. member on this side from Nova Scotia was speaking in favour of the red ensign. The hon. member for Kootenay East said that it was a rotten speech; but I would remind him that if we are not to stand up in this house to express our views as to a national flag, then we must take the matter to the people. Then yesterday, to the astonishment of this house—I do not think this has ever happened before—when a member of this party was speaking a minister of the crown, the minister of health and welfare, interjected and said, as reported at page 10780 of Hansard:

> May I suggest to the hon. member that the simplest way possible of achieving that is to sit down, shut up and let the matter come to a vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Smallwood: Yes; hon. gentlemen opposite clap and enjoy that. I see even the "minister of bumper stickers" is back and is clapping.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have listened to the hon. member with as much indulgence as possible during the last few minutes but I would invite him to confine his remarks to the matter which is being considered by the house.

Mr. Smallwood: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I was explaining why we should have a plebiscite. Hon. members opposite keep interjecting or raising their voices but I am prepared to answer any questions they might like to bring up.

As I say, we want to put this matter to the people, which is the only way to clear up the issue. The Prime Minister brought before the house a flag and informed us it was going to be his flag. He also informed us that the red ensign was too close a resemblance to the merchant flag of Great Britain. He wanted to rescind the red ensign in consequence, and force upon the people of Canada a flag which resembled the Russian merchant flag. This is why we want the people to vote on this issue. We want democracy in this country, which is why we want a plebiscite. I understand that the Prime Minister received a telegram from the communist party supporting the proposal for a new Canadian flag, which makes me stop and wonder why this issue is being forced on the Canadian people. That is why we are demanding a plebiscite.

Mr. Barnett: Then vote for it.

Mr. Smallwood: You see what we are up against, Mr. Speaker? These little babbling brooks down at the end are at it again tonight.

We hear a lot being said to the effect that this is an appeasement to the province of Quebec, and I do not like to hear that. I am sure there are many people in the province of Quebec who would like a plebiscite on the flag. In this connection I should just like to quote this brief article written by Peter Stursberg:

> The Liberal party has drifted toward the right, into the hands of the mediaeval Montreal Liberals who don't really care about Quebec or the French Canadians but are ready to use them to stay in power.

We do not like that, Mr. Speaker. We want the people to vote on the flag. There are hundreds of farmers in the province of Quebec in great need of help. They are starving and neglected. The Prime Minister was questioned when he was at Amherst, Nova Scotia, and was asked whether he thought Quebec would approve of any flag without the fleur-de-lis on it, and he replied that the Quebec members in the cabinet would decide what the design would be. Again I do not agree with that. I think it is time this matter came before the Canadian people.

As I have said before, we have farmers in Quebec in need of assistance. We find there is much more important business to bring before parliament than this flag issue. We should have the labour code before this parliament rather than the flag issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Smallwood: I therefore move, seconded by my hon. friend from Kindersley (Mr. Cantelon) that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Aye.

Division

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.). Had I voted, I would have voted for the motion.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are there any additional pairs to be declared?

The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the division bells on the motion to adjourn the flag debate brought the moment of truth to the government members. Ever since Monday, government members have been making interjections calling for an end of this debate. When they had the opportunity to put off the flag debate and get on with more pressing business of parliament—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pascoe: —they voted to keep the debate going.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; the hon. member knows he cannot reflect on a vote of the house. I suggest that perhaps at this point he should limit his remarks to the amendment now before the house.

Mr. Pascoe: I was just trying to pave the way to asking if now government members would refrain from interjecting.

I am taking part in this debate on the amendment to the report of the flag committee because I consider it is my duty to do so. I consider that it is the duty, the direct obligation, of each member of parliament to explain to his or her constituents how he or she stands on this very emotional flag issue. Each member should have regard for his or her responsibilities to constituents and make a declaration for or against the attempt to thrust on Canadians this red and white flag, when there is no evidence that anyone but the most rabid government supporters want it. There has been no country-wide call for a red maple leaf flag. There is no indication how such a flag would be received. I should say that there is every indication that it will not be received and will arouse nothing but antagonism in the country.

Surely, in a decision as emotional and personal as the selection of a flag under which they and future generations will live, the Canadian people should make the choice. It is for this reason we are calling for a plebiscite. As I have said, it is up to each one in this house, whether on the opposition side or the government side, to state clearly on Hansard, the official record, his or her position regarding a plebiscite. We should give the reasons for our stand. I think too, Mr. Speaker, we should put on the record how our constituents feel about a plebiscite. I am sure all members have been told how their constituents feel. I know that I have received many letters, and a little later I will put a few of these on the record. We in the opposition are making our stand for a plebiscite very clear. Government supporters, not only the 47 Liberals from Quebec but those from English speaking areas of Canada, should do the same. As I have said, they have an obligation to their constituents.

Ever since Monday we have heard very little from the government members except hoots and jeers. Apparently government members wish to cut off discussion on the flag as quickly as possible—at least, we thought they wanted to stop the debate, until they had an opportunity a short time ago to do so. Evidently they want to have the red ensign scrapped and a new red and white flag substituted, with as little public involvement as possible. This must be the explanation for their attempts to cut off debate; there is no other reason apparent. They want to force a flag vote in the house and then tell the Canadian people they must accept it. This appears to be government strategy. Apparently the strategists have counted noses in the house and are sure that, with the continued support of the minority groups in the far corner who want anything but the Canadian red ensign, they can win the flag vote. Perhaps they can win the flag vote with the help of those against having the union jack anywhere on our flag. However, this forced vote will not win flag support across Canada. Only a flag decision by plebiscite will do this, and it is for this reason we are calling for a plebiscite. We believe there should be complete public involvement in any choice of a new flag. Only by holding a plebiscite can this be arranged. That is why so many of us will be speaking on the issue between now and Christmas. We will continue to present arguments for a flag plebiscite. If the government members remain silent I am sure their constituents will wonder why. I think their constituents already know why government supporters sit in silence in their seats, and in this connection I have a clipping I should like to read to the silent government members entitled "The folly of silence".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. member that he cannot quote editorials in newspapers which reflect on a current debate in the house.

Mr. Pascoe: With all due deference, Mr. Speaker, this editorial does not reflect on a current debate but on the behaviour of some hon. members. It is dealing with why so few government supporters speak. It is also a very strong argument for a plebiscite, which is why I want to put it on record. The article is as follows:

> It is the utmost folly—it is just short of suicide—to take the position that citizens of any country should hold their tongues for fear of causing distress to the immediate and sometimes tortuous policies of their leaders.

I think that is a good argument for a plebiscite because it refers to the feelings of citizens of the country. This statement was made by the late Wendell L. Willkie. It is folly for citizens not to speak out against stubborn leaders on matters of great concern to them. Ordinary citizens, of course, cannot state their views here in the house, but they can certainly do so outside. That is why we are supporting a plebiscite, so the people are given a chance to speak outside.

Mr. Byrne: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pascoe: After I am through. I think this brief quotation sums up the argument for a plebiscite. The reference to holding tongues reminds me that there is a great deal of tongue holding among hon. gentlemen opposite. We have a very emotional issue facing us, involving the possible scrapping of a flag steeped in history and which is symbolic of the foundation and character of our country. There should be no wall of silence anywhere in this house. Every hon. member should get up and explain to their constituents just how they stand on this matter.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is determined no other government business will be given priority over the flag. He is the one who will decide whether we continue the flag debate or turn the attention of parliament to more pressing items, such as the labour code and the railway question. As a result of the stand which has been taken by the Prime Minister it appears there will be many more days, perhaps weeks, taken up on the flag debate, which means there will be plenty of time for government members to explain why they are determined to foist a new flag on Canadians and why they do not want to give the Canadian people the chance to express their views on a plebiscite. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the people should have the opportunity to decide whether or not they want a flag stripped of all the symbols of our history and tradition. They should be able to vote on an issue brought on by pressure which is not exerted by all parts of Canada. As you yourself said, Mr. Speaker, in your ruling on Wednesday on the amendment, the flag issue has a great emotional impact on everyone.

If most of the government members mean to take no greater part in the debate than to jeer, then at least all members of the flag committee should speak. They should answer these three questions: Why was the Canadian red ensign rejected so flatly by all Liberal committee members? Why was there a unanimous vote in the committee that Canada should have only one flag, and then a sudden change of mind and a later amendment to have two flags? Why was the proposed compromise flag bearing the symbols of our past history turned down? These are the three essential questions that each member of the flag committee should answer during this debate.

Perhaps I am doing the Liberal flag committee members an injustice when I suggest that they intend to remain silent. Perhaps each one is going to speak. I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) will find it difficult to refrain from baring his innermost thoughts. He finds it so easy to make revelations to the press. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra—and I think I am in order in bringing this out—received 41.7 per cent of the total vote in his constituency.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member must have some doubt whether this is relevant. At this stage of the debate, or I suggest at any time, he cannot refer in such a personal way to another member of the house.

Mr. Pascoe: I was just trying to bring out the point that none of the members of the flag committee were speaking for the majority of the people, which is why I think there should be a plebiscite.

In answer to my challenge to all members to speak and make a sort of report to their constituents, I want to make my own stand clear. I have already spoken in favour of the Canadian red ensign and I see no reason at all why it should be scrapped. It is a beautiful flag steeped in 100 years of tradition. However, Mr. Speaker, in the interest of national acceptance some modification of the red ensign is proposed, and I would agree with this. My stand is that some symbols of our past history must remain, because a country which does not honour its past has a very uncertain future. What is wrong with preserving our past history as an example for future generations? In a speech reported in Hansard at page 4651 of June 24, the Prime Minister said:

> Attachment to tradition is an important element in a country that wishes to progress.

These words have a direct bearing on our effort to have a plebiscite on the flag issue.

The Newfoundland member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin) is reported in Hansard of June 30, page 4912 as saying that we should "retain those things of our past for which we have so much genuine affection and loyalty". I certainly agree with that statement. If the flag debate continues perhaps he will stand up and repeat this laudable statement. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) speaking in French in the house last week called for British justice. This is a tradition of Canada and it is symbolized by the union jack in our flag. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) in the course of a recent television interview referred to our form of British government. This is also part of our tradition represented by the union jack in our flag. I mention these comments in order to emphasize our contention that the people of Canada should be consulted by means of a plebiscite before their present flag is taken from them.

To put it directly on record I will read again in part the amendment we propose to the report of the flag committee:

> However, as the final vote of the committee did not reveal a sufficient degree of unanimity for the proposed design for a national flag for Canada, your committee therefore recommends that the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite to be held at the next general election in order that the Canadian people may be given their rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag.

I think that clearly outlines the situation before us.

In an earlier speech I referred to the hundreds of letters I have received from constituents in support of the Canadian red ensign. At that time I listed the many references in them to the need for deciding the flag issue by means of a plebiscite. I will not repeat those statements now. I will merely say that many of the letters I receive continue to support the stand taken by my party on this flag issue. This is in direct contradiction to press reports which seek to indicate that public concern over the flag has declined. I have received letters recently from towns in my constituency supporting our stand on this issue. I received three today, from one of which I quote the following:

> As my representative at Ottawa, please insist on the inclusion of the union jack in any proposed flag. In the interests of Canadian unity we should have one flag only.

Members on the government side who have expressed opposition to a plebiscite claim they can speak for their constituents. I agree that under our democratic system of government we were elected to vote as parliamentary representatives on behalf of our ridings with respect to all political and economic matters, with regard to which decisions can be altered later, if necessary. But voting to substitute a single maple leaf flag for the red ensign is something very different. This is a very emotional issue. It is an issue which calls for a majority decision by the Canadian people. As our amendment suggests, this could be sought at the next election, which will probably come by or before next June. Canadians will be better prepared to accept the result of a plebiscite than they are to accept the result of a vote on party lines in parliament. I would think the Prime Minister would welcome this means of solving a difficult problem.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Pascoe: I agree with the speeches made by the hon. member for Kent (Ont.) (Mr. Danforth) and the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. More) who pointed out very cogently how the Canadian people would be affected if the flag were changed.

May I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. J. E. Walker (York Centre): May I have the leave of the house to revert to motions?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have leave of this house to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, December 4, 1964

The house met at 11 a.m.

CANADIAN FLAG

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Thursday, December 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Batten that the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last night I was presenting submissions in support of the amendment to the flag committee report. This amendment calls for a plebiscite which would give to the Canadian people an opportunity of making their own decision on the flag issue. The proposal is to hold a plebiscite during the next federal election, which I said was likely to be held by or before next June.

I commented on the wall of silence on the government side during this flag debate, and especially on our call for a plebiscite. There certainly has been a wall of silence over there, except for the jeers and heckling as we speak out for the millions of Canadians who resent the attempt to scrap the Canadian red ensign. I stated that it is the obligation of each one of us to state very clearly for the Hansard record his or her position on the flag issue, and especially on the call for a plebiscite.

I point out that if the Prime Minister continues to insist that the red and white maple leaf flag have priority over more important government business, such as the labour code and the railway problem, this debate will carry on until Christmas. This will give each member of parliament plenty of time to explain why he or she is for or against the flag plebiscite. I am sure the Canadian people are waiting to hear from the Liberal members why it is so necessary to rush the flag vote, and why they are opposed to a plebiscite. Perhaps they are not completely opposed, but they certainly have not stood up in their places and spoken one way or the other.

We on the opposition side are making our stand in favour of a plebiscite very clear. Government members, not only the 47 Liberals from Quebec but those from the English speaking area of Canada as well, should do the same. They certainly owe it to their constituents to make their position clear. If they are opposed to letting the Canadian people decide the flag issue for themselves, then surely they are expected to explain to their constituents why they are taking this stand.

Emotions have been arised across the country. What each member is doing in regard to the flag question is being watched very closely. Statements have been made that a plebiscite on the flag would cause ill feelings and would create divisions. I believe a clear appraisal of the situation would reveal that any change in our flag, without holding a plebiscite, would be much more divisive. Some hon. members may not accept that statement but I repeat, and ask them to consider carefully, that greater divisions will be created if a flag is imposed on Canadians without a plebiscite to allow them to make the choice for themselves.

We realize that plebiscites or referendums are not the usual procedure under democratic government, but they do have a place in issues affecting the people in a particular manner. The changing of a flag is just such an issue, and that is why we are stressing the need for a plebiscite. Plebiscites have been held on other occasions to settle emotional questions of great concern to the people. The 1942 plebiscite on conscription was held to allow the Mackenzie King government break an earlier commitment not to call up men for overseas service.

If I may be permitted to refer to local matters, I would point out that in the coming Ottawa civic election a referendum will be held on fluoridation and Sunday sports to let voters decide these issues themselves. It has been argued that we are in parliament to make decisions but Ottawa has a mayor, a board of control and a council, yet they are referring these matters directly to the people because of their significance to each individual voter. In my own constituency there was a referendum in the municipal election on the question of building a new hospital. The people there have a mayor and reeve who could have decided the matter, but they put it up to the people to decide and I am happy to report that the people decided in favour of the hospital.

Press reports claim that public interest in the flag issue has dropped off. This is not the situation in my constituency, and I am sure it is not in a great many other constituencies. I admit we are not receiving as many letters on the flag issue as we did just after the Prime Minister unveiled his three maple leaf design, but most of the correspondence I receive from my constituents still carries a note in support of our stand. As I stated last night, I am receiving letters every day asking us to continue out stand on the flag issue. I have one here that I received yesterday and I want to put it on the record again. It reads:

> Dear Sir,
> As my representative at Ottawa, please insist on the inclusion of the union jack in any proposed flag. In the interests of Canadian unity we should have one flag only.

I am sure government members have received letters from the Canadian Corps Association, and that they will agree with me its interest and concern in the flag issue are not dropping.

Our members have made reference to the stand taken by the Canadian Corps Association. I should like to place on record in order of the dates on which they were received a number of letters from this association to show that the demand for a plebiscite is continuing; indeed, I believe it is increasing. On April 20 the Canadian Corps Association said in a letter that the government's course of action in this matter should be determined only by a plebiscite. On June 8 the association wrote:

> With such divided opinion throughout Canada on the flag question we cannot understand why Mr. Pearson will not allow the people of Canada an opportunity to choose between the Canadian red ensign and his new suggested maple leaf choice.

At that time it was three maple leaves. Then on August 5—interest in the need for a plebiscite was still continuing and growing—a letter from the corps stated:

> The Canadian Corps Association dominion command again emphatically requests the Prime Minister of Canada and parliament as a whole to place this subject before the people at the next regular general election. Let the voters of Canada finalize this matter.

That is exactly what we are asking. Then on November 27, only a short time ago, another letter came from the corps as follows:

[Mr. Pascoe.]

> The Canadian Corps Association dominion command at this time reiterates that no change in Canada's present national flag should be made unless the government is so instructed by the citizens of Canada by means of a plebiscite vote conducted in conjunction with the next general election.

I have read those four letters and referred to the dates on which they were written to show that the demand for a plebiscite is continuing. The Canadian corps represents a very large body of opinion.

In conclusion I express the hope that supporters of the government will express their views on the subject of a plebiscite in the course of this debate. As has been said many times, we all realize that the scrapping of a flag is a very emotional issue. I have spoken on this matter before, but I feel compelled to speak again on this amendment to express my views. I hope all members across the way will take the opportunity to express their views. The Canadian people think they should be allowed to decide for or against a new flag. We also believe this. In all sincerity I say that a decision on the flag by means of a plebiscite would be much more widely accepted than the compulsory imposition of a flag selected by a divided vote in parliament.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler).

Mr. Byrne: Things must be getting tough.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate those remarks from the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). They are typical of what he might interject into any debate, particularly when I am involved. I would like to say once again that I would certainly appreciate hearing his views from the floor, and not from his seat. First of all I would like to refer to Hansard for December 3, 1964, page 10,803, the right hand column, where Your Honour, in correcting the speaker who had the floor, used these words:

> It seems to me that he is away off the point of a plebiscite, how it should be held, where it should be held, when it should be held and if it should be held.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, you feel those are the points which are relevant in this particular debate. I agree with those points and would like to add one more, with Your Honour's concurrence; that is, why it should be held. On that premise, and in connection with the amendment that is before us, I would like to make a few remarks.

I believe that we as members of the opposition are fulfilling a very useful purpose in this debate. We are fulfilling a very useful purpose today, as we have during all this session thus far. It is obvious that the government and some members of other parties do not agree with the holding of such a plebiscite in our fair country. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I also am not too imbued with the idea of a plebiscite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winkler: I believe I made that very clear in my speech in this chamber on August 12, which was one of the earlier speeches in the debate after it had been resumed. On that occasion I pressed the government and pleaded with the Prime Minister to send the question to a committee. After that date I had the pleasure of attending an international conference and was away from the house for a considerable period of time; and of course when I returned on September 8 the house was still seized with the resolution presented by the government.

I believe that today the opposition has no other course to follow. The government has put the opposition in such a narrow position, without endeavouring to display any degree of co-operation, that we have no alternative but to take this course on behalf of the people of Canada, and I believe the majority of the people of Canada; the figure of 60 per cent was quoted in a recent poll, but I believe it is 64 per cent. I believe we have the right to speak for these people, and if it is their wish that we have a plebiscite, I am willing to accept their judgment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winkler: I believe, Mr. Speaker, that had the government moved in the proper direction and at the proper time in sending this question to a committee, it would have been resolved.

I had not intended to use these words at this juncture of my remarks, but I am forced to do so. The manner in which the subject was presented to this house by the Minister of Transport indicates to me that the old philosophy of the days of Mackenzie King has been adopted. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the ghost of Mackenzie King is now treading the corridors of the House of Commons, because one can determine that the presentation of this subject, which will have divisive results in our country, is an endeavour to put on the opposition the blame for any crisis that occurs. They seem to be following the course of allowing the crisis to become imminent and then stepping in and solving it as the benefactors of the electorate. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that the Minister of Transport has indeed been in communication with the previous prime minister and maybe even received some direction, because the plan is working quite well thus far and he has the opposition, as I said, in a very narrow corner.

Mr. Greene: Has the opposition ever been anywhere else?

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I think the humiliating defeat the hon. member for Renfrew South suffered in Toronto should be enough to keep his mouth shut for a few days, unless he wishes to rise in his place and make a speech. He is another one of those professional hecklers we could well do without.

I ask that hon. member and this house, Mr. Speaker, whether the flag debate of today is of such consequence to this country that we can afford to ignore every major daily newspaper. It may be that the government members are now considering a referendum, even though it may be undesirable to them. Because of my great respect for individuals outside this house and for the officers of this house, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to name any minister or bring the Prime Minister into this, but in view of the picture presented to us today by various newspapers in this country I believe there should be some change of heart. I have here the front page of the Montreal Star, the front page of the Montreal Gazette, the front page of the Toronto Globe and Mail, the front page of last night's Toronto Telegram and the front page of last night's Toronto Star, all of which seem to put the government in a pretty sorry mess. Where is the great zeal on the part of members on that side for the people of this country? Where is the great feeling they have for the pension plan? Where is the great feeling of those members in regard to medicare? What has happened to the government's attitude in regard to the labour legislation for which we are all waiting? What has happened to the government's attitude in respect of many of the other things about which we have heard so much? Because of the obvious situation presented by the newspapers of this country perhaps the government will change its mind and give serious consideration to the amendment respecting a plebiscite which is now before us.

Mr. McIlraith: Why do you filibuster the way you do?

Canadian Flag

Mr. Winkler: The President of the Privy Council has used the word "filibuster". Let me remind that hon. gentleman, whom I consider as a friend, that while I have not taken a daily count, at the last count I took of the measures dealt with by this house the number was something over 60. If my memory serves me correctly that is well beyond the number of legislative measures dealt with during any session by any parliament.

Mr. McIlraith: That is good government.

Mr. Winkler: You cannot have obstruction on the one hand and good government on the other hand. Had it not been for the opposition, where would these measures now be? In this regard I will give as much credit to my friends on our left as we take ourselves. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, let us have no more remarks from the President of the Privy Council about a filibuster.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to read to you and to the house from an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of Monday, November 23 having regard to a speech made by the Prime Minister. I do not think the government or its supporters will deny these words by the right hon. Prime Minister, who said, as reported in that article:

> "We have spent 23 days in the House of Commons debating the flag—which I think is too long —but those 23 days were at a time when normally we should have been having a holiday so while we may have spent a long time we have not sacrificed parliamentary business in doing it," he said.

Does that smack of obstructionism, Mr. Speaker? I now turn to the transcript of an interview of the Minister of Agriculture. It is perhaps a good thing we are having the flag debate at this time because that minister can stay away from the house now without his absence being too conspicuous.

Mr. Moreau: Where is Mr. Balcer?

Mr. Winkler: I may remind the hon. member for York-Scarborough that as I read of the situation in the newspapers these days, if it were not for certain events things would be a little different there as well.

The Minister of Agriculture had this to say on November 25 during an interview on the national broadcasting system:

> —and I don't think that there has really been as much obstruction lately as we had during the summer recess—or when we should have had a summer recess.

The Minister of Agriculture says that during the summer months there was obstruction, yet the Prime Minister says the business of parliament was not sacrificed during the summer months.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Speaker, we are not dealing with the obstruction of parliament, we are dealing with an amendment. If the hon. member is going to use the rules of this house to filibuster, he should filibuster by the rules.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I am making these remarks in an endeavour to convince this house that we should have a plebiscite. The hon. member for Broadview, like many other members on that side, should make some contribution to this debate instead of remaining in his seat interrupting. If he signifies that he will do so I am prepared to resume my seat and listen to him. The hon. members can continue this program of interference but they will not bother me, because I know their minds are closed on this issue.

Let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this house that I have one more reason for advocating a plebiscite. We now have one flag design before us, of a basically red colour. Such a design has no appeal whatever in many parts of the country. I have the privilege of returning to my constituency each week end, and since this design has been presented to the house I have observed a tremendous amount of displeasure on the part of my constituents.

Miss LaMarsh: Then vote against it.

Mr. Winkler: I believe the people of Canada are beyond this now. Although they dislike it and find it is not desirable, I think they are beyond it. But the government does not seem to be interested in the lunch pail men of this country. I believe that the people who carry lunch pails in the province of Quebec are a little different from the people who carry lunch pails in the province of Ontario, but regardless of their province, their aims and objectives in life are very similar. This matter is of little significance to them. What is of significance to them is a brighter and better future for their families, and if they were called upon to make this decision it would be a very simple one for them to make. I believe the government would be very surprised to find that the red ensign would receive a tremendous amount of support from all these people.

To remove every vestige of our history from the design we are going to have to accept if we do not have a plebiscite to determine what the people desire is in my estimation a retrograde step. It is well known in the history of the world that those who forget their past may well have greater difficulties in the future. I do not know whether all hon. members have had the time to read the column by Bruce West in this morning's Globe and Mail, but I believe they will find that it expresses the thinking of most people. Let us not deny, Mr. Speaker, let not one member of the house deny, that there will be a tremendous number of members on the government side of the house who will vote for this particular design knowing full well—

Miss Jewett: That the committee recommended it.

Mr. Winkler: —that they are voting against the desires of their people. I will tell the hon. member for Northumberland—

Miss Jewett: That the committee recommended it.

Mr. Winkler: —that the Liberals on the committee, in a final act of desperation, found themselves in the position of not being able to accept anything else.

Miss Jewett: What about the 14 to 0 vote?

Mr. Winkler: If you want to make a contribution, madam, rise in your place and make your own speech. Don't bother me.

Miss Jewett: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Winkler: I will accept questions when I am finished.

Miss Jewett: I just want to ask about the 14 to 0 vote.

Mr. Winkler: I would be glad to accept that question.

Miss Jewett: Fine. I have already asked it. What about the 14 to 0 vote?

Mr. Winkler: I should like to comment on the 14 to 0 vote. It is a very simple thing.

Miss Jewett: Good.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Don't use big words, because she can't understand them.

Mr. Winkler: It was a Liberal trick within the committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winkler: I do not care what the reaction to that remark is; I tell you that is what it was. If you are faced with a decision involving an apple which is perfect and another apple which is imperfect, which one are you going to choose?

An hon. Member: The perfect one.

Mr. Winkler: Absolutely; and if you make this decision preferring pears and there are no pears, then you have no alternative. That is the truth. You know it and every member of the committee knows it. Let us be truthful about this matter. Members on the other side of the house do not like this thing and do not want it, but they are forced to take it. I am not going to ridicule it because I might find myself standing up before it some day. I am that honourable, as I think every member on this side of the house is. Nevertheless, when we are faced with something that is second rate, for goodness sake let us give the people of the country, 64 per cent of whom have now stated they want a poll, the opportunity to vote in a plebiscite, or let the government say they will put something on this flag representing our past. This design is bland. It has no crown, not a single point of association with our past.

Mr. Munro: You are ridiculing it.

Mr. Winkler: Maybe that will be all right for you, but there will be a few members from Toronto who will rue the day they supported this flag. Make no mistake about that. As I approach the end of my remarks I should like to refer to this article by Bruce West which I feel is an honest and sincere effort to set the situation straight, as it should be. I say, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. West in his article this morning reconciles the situation that exists between our two great provinces, and I think he does it very well. He indicates that the flag debate is becoming very wearisome to him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winkler: He goes on to say:

> Believe me, I do not enter into this argument in this space merely to fill up some blank paper.

Do not believe either that the opposition is acting from any such motive.

> The words which have already been written and spoken on this matter would, if compiled in book form, probably provide enough volumes to build a modern great wall of China along the entire length of the Quebec-Ontario border. However, in spite of my best intentions, I often find it difficult to just sit here saying nothing while the battle ebbs and flows. I consider it to be not only my right to comment on it but my obligation. For one thing, I believe that the wishes of a great and extremely important segment of our people on this matter are not only being ignored but disdainfully and even contemptuously ignored. This, I think, is a shameful thing, and if I can help express their side of the argument I intend to do so. One particular puzzling aspect of the long flag debate, both in parliament and on the streets, is the fact that somehow we who favour the retention of our century old banner are now being singled out as the villians in the piece. We are accused of helping to sow disunity in this country by refusing to go along with the proposal for a new Canadian flag.

This is true. This is part of the trick to which I referred earlier, and one of the reasons I would be prepared to put the question to a plebiscite and stand on what the people had to say. Mr. West goes on to reconcile the whole matter. I have before me a speech that was delivered in Toronto in regard to the problem as some people try to portray it; but Mr. Robarts, the premier of Ontario, has approached it from the point of view of trying to unite the country. I am afraid those on the other side of the house do not have as full an appreciation of what they are doing to Canada. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and all members of the house, was there a problem before the Liberal party came into power in this country? Was there a problem between Quebec and the rest of Canada? No, there was no problem. Why should there be a problem now, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Hales: Divide and rule.

Mr. Winkler: It is a very sad and sorry thing that this sort of thing takes place for political purposes, and I am afraid that is the case. That is all the more reason why a plebiscite should be held. As I said earlier, I am not too much imbued with the idea, but when the government comes along in this way and uses these tactics I can only say that this must be their motive.

I also have here the text of a speech delivered in Toronto at a similar sort of meeting by one Mr. Fernand Guindon, a French Canadian from eastern Ontario. He expresses his thoughts on the question very well. I believe more attention should be paid to the sensible attitudes that people put forward rather than trying to pick on the small things which cause trouble. I should like to read an excerpt from this speech. As I say, it was made by a French Canadian who lives in eastern Ontario. He said in part:

We French Canadians in Ontario have not only received fair treatment for our own particular problems. We have also shared with all Ontario citizens the benefits of progressive policies which have developed this province and made it prosperous.

The same doors are open to every citizen of Canada. Do you hear the province of Ontario squealing because of a recent announcement that it pays more taxes than any other part of this country? I think not. Should they not, then, have the opportunity of saying what kind of flag they want? Would a plebiscite not achieve this purpose? Then let all the people across the country accept the result.

Mr. Moreau: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Winkler: Yes.

Mr. Moreau: Is he suggesting now that we should have a weighted vote, depending on the amount of taxes we pay?

Mr. Winkler: No, I did not say that. This is another typical Liberal trick that the hon. member is using. I will admit that the hon. member is in attendance quite often, but he has not said much lately. I believe the people of Scarborough would like to hear his views on this issue.

Mr. Moreau: I should like to express my views by a vote.

Mr. Winkler: We know how they will be expressed.

Miss LaMarsh: You have not told us which apple you like.

Mr. Winkler: If the minister would mind her own apples she would get along better around here.

Mr. Regan: I was attempting to follow the hon. member closely, and with interest. I understand he made a complaint that the people of Ontario pay more taxes than any other area. I ask the hon. member if he would not agree that this is because of the fact that the rest of Canada has to bear the tariffs to protect Ontario's industries and provide a captive market for the products of Ontario?

Mr. Winkler: The other night, Mr. Speaker, I believe I referred to the hon. member but one word was missed in Hansard, so I will repeat the reference today. I referred to him as the brash and junior member for Halifax. If he looked after the problems of his own constituency and voted properly on this question, he might have a chance of coming back. In addition, I do not like the way he takes my words out of context.

I meant to ask, do you find any of the arguments that arise in Canada today coming from the province of Ontario? You do not. No one hears that voice. I make this statement precisely for the benefit of the hon. member for York-Scarborough. You do not hear any of these arguments coming from the province of Ontario. I do not criticize anyone else because it may be that if we were to raise these points we could get closer together. I believe, too, we should let the people on both sides, whether they are revolutionary or whether they are not, whether they are vocal or whether they are quiet, decide the issue by means of a plebiscite, and perhaps then we could achieve some unity in this country. Perhaps some day the Minister of National Health and Welfare will find I am hammering my desk for her, although I do not know.

I should like to say to the house that I believe there are three alternatives open to the government today. We have one before us right now in the form of an amendment providing for a plebiscite. The government, of course, could accept the amendment and we could go forward with a plebiscite. The second alternative is that the Prime Minister and the cabinet could decide to drop the whole issue and maintain the status quo until a more opportune time. The third alternative would be the application of closure. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, what has been discussed with government members. We have the amendment, and I wonder which of these alternatives the Prime Minister has informed government supporters he is going to follow. Whichever one it is, I should like to remind him that we refuse to change our position.

Miss LaMarsh: Let us vote.

Mr. G. D. Clancy (Yorkton): Some weeks ago I spoke in this house and said I was opposed to a plebiscite. I gave my reasons. I said I did not want to see bitterness engendered; I did not want to see a wedge driven too deeply between the various groups in our country.

I have changed my position, and I want to put it on the record. I am going to vote for a plebiscite. Let me tell you why. As I look across the house I find there is not one member in this house who represents an area west of Toronto. Oh, I apologize; there is one. I have changed my position and I am going to give you the reasons for that change.

Mr. Groos: Would the hon. member also change his position and admit that there is at least one other member from the west sitting in the house today?

Mr. Clancy: Once again I apologize. I have been around here so long that when the new boys walk in I do not always recognize them.

Now, I am going to make my position clear. I am voting for the plebiscite. I am not bilingual, Mr. Speaker, but I want to draw attention to one fact. I believe the French word for rabbit is "lapin". I suppose the plural would be "les lapins". Well, watch those on my far left vote; watch them bolt for the curtain.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this house has voted to continue the debate on this plesbiscite question, I am happy to take some part in the discussion because I am fully in favour of allowing the population of Canada to rule on this very emotional question of a flag for this country.

We have a distinctive Canadian national flag now. As I pointed out in speaking on the original motion on August 24 last, orders in council passed in 1924 and 1945 bear that out. It is referred to five times as a distinct or distinguished flag which certainly cannot be confused with that of any other nation. If there are some minds which cannot distinguish the Canadian red ensign from other flags, I see no reason why the entire nation must be brought down to the mental level of those who cannot tell the red ensign from any other flag. We do not have to descend to the lowest common denominator.

The Prime Minister, when speaking before the Royal Canadian Legion in Winnipeg on Sunday, May 17, in the second paragraph of his remarks stated that there was too little of the emotion of patriotism to be found in Canadians. I sincerely hope that I will not be carried away by my emotional approach to the flag. I hold it in the highest respect, in the highest regard, and I always will, despite what action may be taken by this parliament in a vote that may come before Christmas, although I sincerely hope not. The things for which the flag stands were created by the experiences of a great people. Everything for which it stands was written by their lives. The flag is the embodiment not of sentiment but of history. It represents the experiences made by men and women, the experiences of those who lived and those who died under the flag. It is not something to be laughed at. Last night I expressed my convictions and I expressed the opinions of the majority of the voters in the riding of York-Humber, as fine a constituency as there is in the city of Toronto. I hope you, Mr. Speaker, did not hear the laughter behind my back by people I did not wish to identify and therefore did not turn around.

Canadian Flag

The Prime Minister, speaking in the House of Commons on June 15 last, said "This is a serious, a solemn and historic occasion . . ." You can tell from the chatter behind the curtains how serious and important they consider the event. This is a serious, a solemn and historic occasion, as the Prime Minister said. Might I have order, Mr. Speaker? It is just a small request.

Mr. Speaker: I must say I think you have very good order and rapt attention, certainly better than a great many others.

Mr. Cowan: The Prime Minister said:

—this is a serious, a solemn and historic occasion and I venture to hope, as I also mentioned a moment ago, that the debate will be worthy of the occasion.

I would like to congratulate the Speaker on the ruling he made—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have not got the authority with me, but many years ago Mr. Speaker Glen said it was not hardly proper to even smile at the Speaker let alone comment on anything he has done or said. Of course if you are dissatisfied with his decision you can always move a motion, but please leave the Speaker out of this debate.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Speaker, I was well aware of the rule, but I am on Hansard as having expressed the wish to congratulate you. I have been cut off in my wish, but you can take it as read.

I would like to remind the members of this Canadian House of Commons that charity covers a multitude of sins, and flags can be used to cover a great deal of inaction and indecision. They are trotted out at times of stress and strain and thus serve as a divertissement from other questions that should be before the house.

I sat in opposition after being elected in June, 1962 until the house was dissolved in February; I suppose you can say from June to February but I prefer to say from September to February. I sat on the other side of the house in the fall of 1962, and at that time I was very interested in the remarks by the then leader of the opposition on December 19, 1962. I quote those remarks from Hansard:

It is a traditional and fundamental right of parliament to vote taxes before they are collected and to approve expenditures before they are made. When these rights are ignored, when they are violated, parliament itself is being violated and we are taking a step toward its destruction. No matter how wide a circulation we give and no matter in what form, to the bill of rights, and no matter how much we talk about Magna Carta and the bill of rights, no matter how emotionally we may wrap ourselves up in parliamentary or national flags, both these rights I have mentioned are being deliberately and systematically violated by the present government.

I am wondering if this party has been committed, as we are told by some people, to bringing before parliament a distinctive national flag within two years from April 1963. I am wondering why we are wrapped up emotionally in national and parliamentary flags rather than in questions that should be occupying our attention at this time. I have looked over the speech from the throne in 1963 and the speech from the throne in 1964. The speech from the throne read on May 16, 1963 stated:

The greater Canada that is in our power to make will be built not on uniformity but on continuing diversity . . .

"Unity in diversity" is quite a phrase. I do not use it. The words contradict each other. However, the speech from the throne in May, 1963 stated:

The greater Canada that is in our power to make will be built not on uniformity but on continuing diversity . . .

They tell us the present flag is causing offences in certain parts of the country and that therefore we need a new flag that will not cause the offence which some people claim it occasions them. I say if there is some objection to the union jack in the Canadian red ensign then let us follow the fine, high sounding words in the speech from the throne on May 16, 1963:

The greater Canada that is in our power to make will be built . . . on continuing diversity . . .

In that speech from the throne we were promised that the parliament of 1963 would establish a Canadian development corporation. Where is it? We were told there would be a new department of agriculture act to be placed before us—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but I do hope he is approaching the question of the plebiscite and that this is all preliminary to moving in that direction. I hope these preliminary remarks will be relatively short because the question before the house is the amendment, and the amendment deals with the plebiscite.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Speaker, I have said before and I repeat that I am 100 per cent behind holding the plebiscite, but I am wondering why we need to hold a plebiscite on a question that was never even mentioned in the speech from the throne. I am wondering why we should be spending our time discussing a matter that was never mentioned in the speech from the throne in 1963 or in the speech from the throne in 1964. There were many references to pieces of legislation to be passed by the parliament of 1963 and the parliament of 1964, but those pieces of legislation are shoved aside and suddenly we are presented with the proposition that the government has promised somewhere, somehow, sometime that it would produce a distinctive Canadian flag.

If you, Mr. Speaker, feel I should not mention the lengthy number of items referred to in the two speeches from the throne in 1963 and 1964, items that have not been implemented, then I will lay aside that portion of my remarks. But I am certain all hon. members of the house know very well the questions that have been pushed aside because of the government's action in bringing in the flag question at this time.

Dealing with a plebiscite, personally I would rather see the government withdraw the flag committee report completely and just let it die on the order paper, let it die at the time of the Christmas recess. But if it will not follow that sensible course of action, which was the course followed in 1945 and 1946—and I have had lengthy discussions on the matter with the chairman of the flag committee of 1945 and 1946, and with one of the members of that committee who is sitting in the house today, God bless him—I wish it would pay attention to the fine example set under the leadership of Mackenzie King, who used to be held in high respect by the Liberal party when living. But of course Mackenzie King dead is Mackenzie King dead, and today we have smarter men than that great man who held the office of prime minister longer than any other Canadian. He let the flag committee report go to the wall in 1946, and I suggest the same treatment be given to the flag committee report of 1964.

Among the items mentioned in the 1963 speech from the throne—and I apologize to the Speaker for referring back to it—was a promise that the committee on privileges and elections would review the Canada Elections Act. I asked if any action had been taken on that, but the government's answer is that that committee met in 1963 but the session ended before the committee could report. If the committee discussing the Canada Elections Act in 1963 was allowed to die at the time that the session ended in 1963, then I would point out that is a very good precedent. It ranks with the flag committee report of 1945 and 1946, and I think we should follow the same practice in 1964 and just let the committee report go to the wall when we adjourn for the Christmas recess.

The government's present intention of giving priority to the report of the flag committee is putting this parliament in a strait-jacket. Not only is it putting the opposition in a strait-jacket; it is putting the government into one as well. They would like to take some necessary action to bring the trustees of the S.I.U. before a parliamentary committee, but since we are allowed to discuss only this flag question we may not be able to take the action required to bring these trustees here. We have to stay with the report of this flag committee, we are told, until a decision has been reached. I sincerely suggest that the entire report be withdrawn and that we proceed to government business which requires the attention of the House of Commons and which should be on the order paper at the present time.

I have admired those speakers who are defending the red ensign, and I regret that it should be necessary to defend the red ensign in this dominion which has been built up under the wing of, and with the help of, the British empire. I have admired those people who have pointed out that our discussion of the flag question has brought changes in the position taken by the government with regard to the matter, and I sincerely hope the discussion we are now pursuing—and it will continue until the Christmas recess, I assure you, Mr. Speaker—will result in further action by the government which will be of benefit not only to Canada as a whole but to the government party as well.

There have been quite a few retreats. I regret to use that word but, being a Liberal, I hear it so often it just comes naturally to me. There have been quite a few improvements—I will use that word this time—in the government's actions in connection with this matter. Hon. members will recall that on May 19 it was to have been a government bill, absolutely a government bill. I could read from Hansard of May 19, 1964 if it is legitimate to refer to previous debates in the current session, and draw attention to an exchange between the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and the Prime Minister.

Mr. Nowlan: Let us not evade the question any longer. We are now told that the government is going to put a design before parliament. Does the government accept responsibility for it?

Canadian Flag

Mr. Pearson: The government will indeed take responsibility for the design which is submitted to the House of Commons.

That design later turned out to be the three leaf design. On May 19 we did not know what it was. But the Prime Minister said the government would accept responsibility for the design. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam then asked a question and the Prime Minister replied:

The members have had an election pointed at their heads like a gun in respect of every decision that has been made in this house on policy matters since we took over the government. I have pointed out, and I think I should make it quite clear, that when the government submits to parliament a matter of policy—and this is certainly a matter of policy—the government must stand or fall on the result of the decision of the house.

Then the right hon. gentleman went on to say he did not intend to hold it against any member of the Liberal party who voted against the design. But this was certainly a matter of government policy. Where is that three leaf flag today, Mr. Speaker?

Then we retreated again—I am sorry; we withdrew. We withdrew to a free vote on August 21.

An hon. Member: It was not a retreat?

Mr. Cowan: I said we withdrew, and the statement then made by the leader of the government was:

There has been criticism that the government was attempting to influence a decision in its favour by the threat of an election if it were defeated on the issue. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I stated at yesterday's meeting and I am glad to repeat it to the house today that in our view votes on the resolutions and on amendments to them will be entirely free. That is, an election will not be at stake on such votes.

That is a most interesting statement, because I have another statement here by the Secretary of State. Speaking in Toronto on June 13 the Secretary of State told a press conference that the flag was "nevertheless a government proposal and that a defeat on the question could cause an election". I ask you, Mr. Speaker, where is the three leaf flag of June 13? I have quoted the Secretary of State himself.

We were told that this question would never go to a committee, that it was a matter to be decided by the full parliament of Canada in all its majesty and with all its capabilities. Well, we improved our position by withdrawing to previously prepared positions and putting the question into the hands of a committee. This was as a result of the discussions we had on the flag during the summer months.

Out went the three leaf flag. We now have a one leaf flag. I maintain we should hold a plebiscite among the people of this country from Vancouver island to Newfoundland to find out what they want on a single transferable vote basis with a few suggestions put before them including the Canadian red ensign. I know what will command the majority vote in this country and that is why I say "Put the red ensign on the transferable ballot".

Speaking about our improvements and withdrawals, we were to have a new flag on July 1. It was going to look terrific. Well, the same flag is still flying that was flying when this country was built up, and it will continue to fly from that same flagstaff. Then we were to have a new flag so the Queen could come over here and lower the jack in the red ensign and run up the three dying leaves of the new flag in October. But October, too, has come and gone. Now we are told we will have a new flag by Christmas. Mr. Speaker, we are going to have a flag by Christmas; it will be the red ensign with the jack in the hoist.

Mr. Winkler: Where are all the hecklers now?

Mr. Cowan: I understand from a ruling made by the Chair last night while the hon. member for Moose-Jaw-Lake Centre was speaking that it is not in order to quote from a newspaper editorial written during a current debate. I cannot figure out in my mind whether an editorial which appeared in Le Devoir on August 22 was written during the current debate or not. At that time the debate was on the three leaf flag. We are now in the course of a debate on a plebiscite in connection with a one leaf flag, and if there is a ballot I should like to see the red ensign on the ballot. May I quote from an editorial written in August?

Mr. Speaker: With the greatest of interest and the greatest of sympathy for the hon. member, may I say that the question before the house is not a general discussion on the flag; it is whether or not we should have a plebiscite. The hon. gentleman, I know, was just warming up to deal with this question of the plebiscite. I do not know how long it takes. Perhaps he could confine the remainder of his speech to the question of a plebiscite. The subject of the flag and all the movement surrounding it is one which can be discussed on the main flag motion, but now we are dealing with the amendment, which concerns a plebiscite.

Mr. Cowan: I was hoping that some comments I was about to make would provide information to those who will be voting on this question of a plebiscite. As to relevancy, I thought we had wide latitude. I was here the other day and heard the way an admitted draft dodger referred to men who had lost a leg in the first world war, or an arm in the second world war as "resembling Canadians." That apparently was relevant; he was not called to order. Yesterday or the day before I heard a cabinet minister tell an hon. member of this house to sit down and shut up. So I know the latitude accorded to us in this debate is very wide.

On this question of the plebiscite I should like to point out that this editorial of August 22 last says we now have a government led by a man who, one day in May, claims he is discussing a national policy of the utmost importance; yet in the month of August he says it is a free vote and everybody can do as he likes. With a plebiscite it would be a free vote and 19 million Canadians would have an opportunity of telling us what they think.

I have already drawn the attention of the house to the fact that the party in the seats of government does not hold a majority of votes from the electors who put us here. I am the member for York-Humber, with 20,000 votes behind me; I had 24,000 votes cast against me. I hope and pray that I represent a majority of the people in York-Humber. I know I do on the red ensign question, but on other questions of the day I hope and pray that I represent always the majority opinion of the people of York-Humber and not solely the opinion of the minority who put me into parliament with 20,000 votes in a 44,000 vote election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cowan: I say we have not a clear mandate to put a flag before the nation on a single vote of parliament; this party does not have 50 per cent of the votes. Two by-elections were held quite recently. It is a sore subject in some quarters and perhaps I do not need to name where they were held, but I would point out that in regard to the vote in those two by-elections—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Churchill: Go ahead.

Mr. Cowan: —the party in power did not receive a majority of the votes; yet we have a spokesman for the Liberal party going down into New Brunswick and announcing that 90 per cent of the people are in favour of the proposed flag. This statement was made within two weeks of the two by-elections in which the party in power did not obtain 50 per cent of the votes. Boy, if that isn't inflation I never did see it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cowan: They obtained 47 per cent of the vote on November 9, yet it is said that 90 per cent of the people are in favour of the one leaf flag. The same spokesman who was in New Brunswick stating that 90 per cent of the people were in favour of this flag was in Victoria, B.C., in August. As reported by the Victoria Times we learn that the question of the flag is settled; everybody is in favour of the three leaf flag. The Victoria Times of August 14 says:

> There is definitely no chance of a federal election this year and prospects are unlikely in 1965, transport minister J. W. Pickersgill said here today.
> The federal cabinet minister pooh-poohed any question that the issue of Canada's new flag could precipitate a vote.
> "The public has decided the flag question. It is settled", he said emphatically.

This is the Victoria Times. This is the three leaf flag that the member for Leeds loves so much. If the question was settled on August 14, why are we debating the matter in December of 1964, except to force a plebiscite of the people? Let us get the opinions of those people who are the backbone of and who are this country in the last analysis, and let us not have the decisions of people sitting in these seats and sitting here, in a great many cases, with a minority of the votes behind them.

I certainly believe that in a plebiscite, if three or four suggested pennants were before the public, the red ensign would carry an overwhelming majority of the vote; because with a transferable vote only a majority vote can win the day, which is not the case when you put eight or nine flags up for grabs and one gets, say, 31 per cent of the vote and you say therefore that everybody will go for it. If there were a transferable vote of the nation on this question of a pennant you would find that the red ensign would top any such plebiscite that was held.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that statements have been made that this is going to be a free vote. A free vote is one where the government does not fall if the vote goes against it. I would like to comment on some facets of this. We are going to have a free vote on this question of the amendment and a plebiscite. The question of the amendment and the plebiscite will be decided by people who, as I mentioned when speaking on August 24, have sincere hopes of senatorships, or diplomatic appointments, or who would like to be judges.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cowan: It is a free vote, however, and those who would like to go to Kuala Lumpur, Scotland, Copenhagen or Russia, are also free to vote as they like, just as it was free for them to make these trips around the world. They do not make any reports to the government at all; they just come and go. They are here at times of stress and strain to vote, and they are away on other occasions. I think the government should have a board in the outer lobby setting out these members who so willingly sacrifice their time and are absent from home to go to Copenhagen, north Russia, south Siberia and the far end of China. The names of these members should be shown, because the country does not realize the sacrifices that many of these people make and are going to make on their behalf in connection with this free vote. They draw learned conclusion in their own minds and consciences, but there is no report made to parliament as a whole; there is no written statement as to what they picked up for the guidance of members of parliament. Just those who participate in travel at government expense know what they have learned; and frequently they are defeated in the following election, so the vast store of knowledge they have acquired is lost to the nation as a whole, more's the pity.

Mr. Churchill: Along with their bumper stickers.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize this to point out that there cannot be a free vote in this Canadian House of Commons. I was not in the house when it was suggested that the sessional indemnity should be increased to $18,000 a year. I left for Toronto on a Friday afternoon train and was not in the house on the Monday when it was voted on. I was in the Gravenhurst-Orillia district talking on a matter that was of interest to the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and the Department of Transport in connection with a suggested canal from lake Muskoka to join the Severn river.

I was there when this increase was voted, but I will state that if I had been in the house I would have voted for it, because I think the $18,000 a year indemnity is necessary to the great majority of members of the House of Commons. But I would like to present some figures regarding salaries of $18,000 or more a year.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: They don't want to hear it.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will not mind my interrupting. I think the record should be kept straight. Parliamentary committees, associations, or members going on those various trips to C.P.A., I.P.U., NATO and Canada-United States meetings are the subject of subsequent reports to parliament in each case. I think the hon. member will find that in each case those reports are recorded in Hansard. Certainly I know of at least three such reports, and I know of two reports which will come to the house in due course. I am sure the hon. member did not wish to imply that hon. members who are representing their country in foreign countries are not carrying out their duties in the proper manner, because I wish to assure the hon. member that they are. I have seen the reports, and those reports are then filed with the house. I am sure the hon. member meant something else.

With regard to the $18,000 indemnity, I do not see how this has a bearing on the question before the house, which is the matter of a plebiscite on the flag question. Would the hon. member try to confine his remarks to the question of a plebiscite, whether it should be held, where it should be held, how it should be held.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have your statement that you know three or four such reports have been received. I know of 30 trips that have been taken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cowan: With regard to the matter at issue, I simply point out that we are all the product of our experiences. We are all the product of our education, and our decisions are guided by our past experiences, by our present status in life and by our hopes for the future. We do have hopes for the future for ourselves, for our families, for our loved ones and for the country as a whole. The fact that some of us have a French background dictates a manner of thinking and voting. Those who like myself have an Anglo-Saxon background have a different approach to the questions of the day.

A study of history is of great value to us. I cannot help but repeat my request that this committee report be allowed to drop. We have all heard of the great victory of the king of Epirus over the Romans in Italy. King Pyrrhus then said, "One more victory such as this and the war is lost." When thinking of that great victory of the Greeks over the Romans do not forget that he is the one man in history regarded as having been able to prevent the growth of the Roman empire, had he wished to do so. For some reason, probably because Greek cities did not give him the military support necessary, he turned back from his approach to Rome and ravaged southern Italy and Sicily. He is known particularly for his epigram, "One more victory such as this and the war is lost".

King Pyrrhus had a greater claim to fame than his military victories in southern Italy and Sicily, which were indeed tremendous. Another epigram has been and will be associated throughout history with King Pyrrhus. After ravaging Sicily for three years, he is the man who has been described as introducing the phalanx to Italy. His outriders were mounted on elephants brought in from Egypt. After leaving Sicily he decided to go back to Greece and—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cowan: Those voices come from the serious, honest and high minded members who have handled this whole question in the way it has been handled. That is the group that continually shouts "Shut up and sit down".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cowan: I was pointing out that as King Pyrrhus left Italy for Greece he said to the hosts assembled around him, "What a battlefield I leave here for Carthage and Rome".

I suggest that the flag issue should be dropped. Our hopes will govern the votes of many of us, and at $18,000 per year or $1,500 per month, with 40 months from now until the end of the life of this parliament, this is a $60,000 question. I ask you to vote in favour of the plebiscite, and vote for it wholeheartedly, so as to let the country decide this question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to know whether an hon. member has the right to impute motives to others for the way they vote?

[Text]

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, before I commence my speech on the flag question I should like to compliment the hon. member for York-Humber for his splendid address.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kindt: May I also suggest that if every member of the Liberal party was honest and studied that speech I am convinced they could not find anything wrong with it, and I challenge all those Liberal members to stand in their places and voice their opinions on this subject. There is not one among you who has made a speech, so we can rightfully accept the attitude expressed by the member for York-Humber as the official attitude of the Liberal party, and it should be presented as such. We all know that as trained seals you have not the fortitude to depart from the position which has been taught you and speak your minds with intellectual honesty, as has been done by the hon. member for York-Humber.

The hon. member for York-Humber has stated categorically that the committee report should be dropped and that we should go ahead with the other important business of the house. How many times has that suggestion been made in this chamber during the past several days? Almost every member who has spoken during this debate has made that suggestion, but it has fallen on the deaf ears of the members on the Liberal benches.

As that hon. member suggested, there is no clear mandate for adopting the flag which has been recommended by the committee as the national flag. Let us consider the red flag which has been recommended by the committee. It represents a complete change from the three maple leaf design originally presented to the house.

The right flag for this nation, if a change is to be made from the red ensign, has not yet been discovered or presented to the Canadian people. One cannot discover the right flag by appointing a committee, setting time limits and holding guns to their heads. That cannot be done. If the Liberal members would just stop and think about what they are doing they would realize that in order to produce the kind of flag of which we can all be proud it must be discovered, just as discoveries are made in the physical sciences.

Let us consider, for example, the discovery of Salk vaccine for the control of poliomyelitis, or the discovery and production of insulin by Banting and Best. Another example might be the discovery and development of the Bell telephone. Those were all discoveries.

Discoveries are also made in the social sciences. Consider for example the lady who sat in Boston with needle and thread and sewed together the flag of the United States. She carried out her work from the heart. She made a discovery with which everyone agreed, and it became the official flag of that great nation the United States of America.

I do not believe, by the very nature of the job they were assigned to do, a committee can go to work in camera, supposedly, and produce a flag satisfactory and suitable to this nation. That cannot be done. Instead of appointing a flag committee, as we did, it would have been much better to assign the task to the Canada council. I think we have a group of people there who could have taken much more time to consider this matter and given it much greater consideration. I am certain they could not have done a worse job than the committee did.

Mind you, it is not the fault of the members of the committee. They are all good men and I think they worked hard, but the task assigned to them was an impossible one. What we have got now was fully predicted by certain members of the press and by certain members of the house who said before the committee was appointed that it would not produce anything that would be acceptable to the people. Anyone who knows how matters of this kind are dealt with knows that the committee was charged with an impossible task.

I see the Minister of National Health and Welfare in her seat. Having charge of health matters, she would know that discoveries in the field of health must be worked on not just tomorrow or the next day but often for years before a remedy is ready to be made available to the public. When something is discovered it is often by accident. Someone imbued with the spirit of research goes ahead and works out the problem. The same thing has to be done in the field of social science with regard to the production of a flag. What I am trying to say is that the committee was placed in an impossible position.

One thing about which I am somewhat fearful in regard to a plebiscite is that we still have not a basic flag on which the people could vote. One flag that was suggested was a modification of the red ensign. I am certain that no one on this side of the house has objected to a compromise. No one has said that the red ensign must be accepted lock, stock and barrel. In fact it has been said that the two founding races should be represented on the flag, and that there are many compromises and changes that should be made. But to deviate 100 per cent from the red ensign and throw it out completely will not satisfy the people of Canada. Now, Mr. Caouette—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows he has to refer to hon. members by the constituency they represent and not by name.

Mr. Kindt: Well, it was in the newspapers. I have reference to the front page of the Toronto Daily Star for December 3, 1964. In an address in Toronto the hon. member for Villeneuve made the following statement:

> "English Canadians" are not to blame. Reaching agreement in parliament on the choice of a flag will not achieve national unity.

In other words if the recommendation of the committee for a single maple leaf design is accepted this will not bring about national unity, according to the hon. member for Villeneuve who has spoken so vociferously in favour of blindly supporting this particular design as the national flag of Canada.

In reviewing the matter I sometimes think the Liberal party has chosen this time to bring forward a discussion on the flag in order to make it serve as a red herring and draw attention away from other problems facing the government. There is no doubt there are important matters that should be discussed, and it would be far better to get on with the discussion of them.

When the Liberal party brought forward their estimates, the house leaders got together and there was no trouble in getting the estimates through. When any other legislation has been brought forward which has been in the best interests of the people of Canada we on this side have always co-operated. But as the official opposition we have a right to point out those things that we feel are not in the best interests of Canada.

I say "in the best interests of Canada" because in my opinion the Liberal members are no more in favour of the recommendation of the flag committee than are the Conservative members of the house. But the fact is that we in the official opposition are being blamed throughout the country for talking on the flag in order to hold up other business. The effort is being made to have the people of the country believe that we are to blame because we wish to debate the flag issue. It might be that the best thing to do would be to dump the whole matter into the lap of the Liberal government and let them fight about it. The Liberal members are already divided on the question. They are already voting like seals—

An hon. Member: Flattery will get you nowhere.

Mr. Kindt: —but when they go back to their constituencies they will see what their people have to say about the matter.

There are one or two other matters that have come to my attention. I come from Alberta where maple trees do not grow so there is nothing in the maple leaf design that thrills me one bit. I would vote against it on the ground that it contains the maple leaf. I want something on the flag that depicts my province. I do not believe the people of eastern Canada should force this particular design down the throats of other people in Canada, particularly in those parts of the country where maple trees do not grow.

There is no urgency about the flag. We have had the union jack for 100 years. I should like to tell you a story about what a French waiter in the dining car said to me the last time I came east.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the story the hon. member is about to relate refers to a plebiscite.

Mr. Kindt: It is 100 per cent related to the plebiscite that we are proposing in the amendment. He knew I was a member of parliament and he asked me what I thought of the flag. He said that he thought the people should have a vote on the flag. He went on to say that we have had the union jack for 100 years and that he was not too much interested in whether we had another flag or whether we had the union jack. He said "What difference is it going to make to me? What I want is security." In other words, what he wanted was a pension. He was thinking about a pension and those other things which would give him security, and he went on to talk about them.

So if you go out and talk to the man on the street you will find he is not worked up about this flag issue. There is no urgency, therefore, and the taking of a plebiscite to decide a flag might just as well be deferred for the time being. Let us get on with other matters that are more important and are needed to a greater extent by the people of this dominion.

As the hon. member for York-Humber has said, we have a flag. I look out my apartment window at about five minutes to eight in the morning and see the red ensign being unfurled above the peace tower. It is a great thrill to see that flag go up and unfurl; the wind catches it and then it floats in the breeze. It is now floating above the peace tower, and it is there every day. Let us keep it flying. The people of my riding are saying, what is wrong with the flag we now have? Give us a chance to vote on it and get on with the business of the country, but do not let that fellow Pearson take away our red ensign. This is the mandate I have; it is what my people are saying.

The other day I attended a meeting put on by the Legion at Barons, in Alberta; about 400 or 500 people were there. They talked in a jocular way about everything in connection with the flag issue and the question of a plebiscite. They were all in favour of a plebiscite. I have come to the conclusion, for my own part, that the only method by which unity in Canada can be maintained is to have this flag question decided by a plebiscite. The people you approach in your constituency know just about as much about the flag of a nation and have as much ability to decide what position to take with regard to a flag as any member of parliament. In other words there are some issues that come before the House of Commons that lend themselves to a decision by the voters. They should be given an opportunity to vote on this issue before we adopt an official flag for Canada.

A vote in this house based on a political report and a political flag will never preserve the unity of this nation. I feel just as the hon. member for York-Humber felt, that unless there is a plebiscite this assembly is not in the position to take a vote on this particular flag and thrust it down the throats of the people.

I have letters referring to such matters as the fact that this is a red flag. I do not say this is something that was taken into consideration by the committee, but people say that red is the Liberal colour. Blue is the Conservative colour. I know that every party has a particular colour. Here are the Liberals coming in with a 100 per cent red flag. According to the letters I receive, people from one end of the country to the other are drawing attention to this.

Mr. Matheson: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question at this point?

Mr. Kindt: Yes.

Mr. Matheson: I ask the hon. member, in fairness, if he is aware of the fact that it was a Conservative government that recommended to King George V that our national colours be argent and gules, that is white and red?

Mr. Churchill: It is not right.

Mr. Matheson: Is he aware of that fact, that the national colours are white and red?

Mr. Churchill: That is not right.

Mr. Kindt: I will say this, that if I were appointing a committee to decide on a flag I would never put anybody on it who knew anything about heraldry. I would pick some sensible, ordinary citizens who knew what the problem was and let them go to work to decide on a flag. Do you mean to say that the lady who, with her needle and thread, sewed together the flag of the United States at Boston knew anything about heraldry? She knew nothing. It is these people who think they know something about heraldry and know nothing who sit on these committees and produce the type of thing we have here.

Mr. Matheson: Does the hon. member know that Betsy Ross did receive technical advice from experts in heraldry before she sewed this flag?

Mr. Kindt: You are absolutely wrong when you say she had technical people advising her at the beginning. Be that as it may, we are not talking about technical people. I see that the time is now one o'clock.

Mr. Cowan: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has called the attention of the Chair to the fact that it is one o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Speaker, you may remember that when time ran out at one o'clock I wished to ask a question of the hon. member. I wish to ask the hon. member for Macleod, who was being interrupted by the hon. member for Leeds, if he does not agree with me that this is the time when "Hark, the heraldry angels sing"?

Mr. Kindt: I agree with you very much.

In concluding my remarks I wish to say the government has no mandate to decide the flag issue and therefore that issue should be placed before the people in a plebiscite.

The government made mention of the flag in the dying days of the last election, saying that if returned to office it would try to provide a new flag, but that was not something which made it mandatory on the government to act. What was meant by that was that if it received a majority, and continued in office for four or five years, the subject of a flag could be introduced and it would do what it could do to arrive at something which would bring greater unity to Canadians and preserve the degree of unity we have now. However, as a result of the people's vote in that election we must deduct that the government is not in a position that it has a mandate to change the red ensign.

Mr. Olson: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Kindt: Furthermore, they are being kept in office by a group that wishes to retain their $18,000 a year.

Mr. Olson: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Kindt: They are—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. The suggestion which he is making now is entirely out of order and I would ask him to confine his remarks to the matter which is supposed to be discussed and considered, the necessity and advisability of holding a plebiscite.

Mr. Kindt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The next point I wish to make is that there is no urgency to the flag issue and hence, as the hon. Liberal member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) said, it should be withdrawn and more important and urgent business placed before the house. How can any reasonable person blame the opposition for being opposed to the proposed flag?

I say we should place the flag issue before the people in a plebiscite, and keep the red ensign flying from the peace tower, all across Canada and throughout the world until something more acceptable is found than the political monstrosity concocted by the political flag committee.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, on rising to support the amendment I should like to start by reading part of it:

> However, as the final vote of the committee did not reveal a sufficient degree of unanimity for the proposed design for a national flag for Canada, your committee therefore recommends that the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite to be held at the next general election—

Mention has been made of the fact that there was a vote in the flag committee of 10 to 4 in favour of the one maple leaf design, and the question was asked, "What is the significance of four votes against the proposal"?

Mr. Winch: Against ten votes.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, against ten; but I would like to point out that each vote in that committee represented about 1,250,000 Canadians, which means that about 5,500,000 Canadians do not favour the design recommended by the majority of the committee.

Mr. Winch: How about the 14 million who do support it?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): This is the point I am getting at, that in the interests of national unity some process must be found whereby we can arrive at a flag of which all Canadians can be proud. It has been said that the one maple leaf design is one that does not stir the imagination, and that there are millions of Canadians who do not feel strongly one way or the other. In my judgment a flag that does not raise some emotion, some feeling of patriotism and some enthusiasm in the hearts of Canadians is not worth having. A flag of that sort would be of little use to any country.

Flags are intended to represent the things, the principles and the traditions we hold dear. If the committee had come up with a unanimous or a virtually unanimous recommendation I would have supported it, but a unanimous recommendation is not possible unless recognition is given to the various large groups and traditional factors which make up Canada's total population. But it failed to do this and as a result failed to produce a design which was unanimously acceptable to the committee.

A little over a week ago I happened to turn on the television and I saw the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) being interviewed. He was at his benign, gracious best, the soul of reasonableness, and he was explaining to the Canadian people how this government was one which governed by consent, as all governments govern by consent. He was the soul of reasonableness. In practice, however, we are finding that this government is one which is trying to govern by coercion and pressures of various kinds. First we were to have a free vote on the flag question. Then it was said the result of the vote would determine the life of the government, and government supporters were pressured into line. This is why it is important that the Canadian people should be allowed to decide this issue. The Minister of Transport makes a reasonable statement that Canadians should be governed by consent. I agree with that. But if the minister does indeed hold these views they are not evidenced in practice today. I have the highest respect for the Minister of Transport and I do not believe he is a callous hypocrite who would intentionally try to mislead the Canadian people by telling them something he does not practise or believe in. All I can conclude, therefore, is that his influence in this cabinet is virtually nil, because if it intended to carry out his proposition the government would welcome the opportunity to ascertain the wishes of the Canadian people with respect to a flag.

I hesitate to digress, because it is not my intention to be out of order, but as time goes by and especially since he took up his present portfolio, the Minister of Transport—and I do not intend to be offensive to him in any way—reminds me more and more of some phrases in a musical which was popular about a hundred years ago.

Mr. Byrne: Order.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I will desist. The hon. member across the way does not want to hear it so I will leave it for some other time.

Mr. Byrne: Sing a carol.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Well, if I were to mention this musical the Minister of Transport would be honoured because it is about a very famous person. The lines go something like this:

> He has made with the aid
> At least of a geist
> Two books in the native vernacular,
> And the trips of his ships
> In a host on the coast
> Is something really spectacular.

But that is only in passing. I want to get back to my theme. I have a lot that I wish to say. We believe that the government should listen to reason. It is not too late. We believe the government should recognize the desires of the Canadian people and not continue to pursue a program which cannot be anything but divisive. After all, at the present time it has become clear that the purpose of the government is not to construct and evolve a flag which would have a unifying effect. It has become clear from the work of the committee that from the government's point of view one thing is absolutely necessary, namely to banish the union jack and any other symbols of one of the great races of Canada from our present flag. The purpose of the government at the present time is not to create, but to tear down and banish forever those symbols which millions of Canadians hold dear. The government has never committed itself publicly to doing this. In the election compaign the Liberal party never took the people into its confidence in this regard and therefore by no stretch of the imagination have they a mandate to do this.

It is therefore essential that the Canadian people should have an opportunity to vote on a plebiscite at the next election to express their views on this subject. None of us know with any certainty what the majority of Canadians or what large groups of Canadians think on this subject. There are of course opinion polls, but only a fair amount of accuracy attaches to them. One thing is clear: Canadians are divided on this issue and the longer we pursue it and are forced to pursue it the greater the division will be. To impose such a decision upon Canadians without giving them adequate opportunity to express their views would be the most divisive action of all. If the government really believes that the introduction of a new flag would have a unifying effect and that Canadians would accept it, hon. gentlemen opposite should welcome the opportunity to allow our citizens to express their views in a plebiscite.

Some contend it is only those who are old enough to have served in one of the great wars who have any interest in the symbols of those things for which this nation stands. It is said that people of younger ages are all in favour of doing away with them. I find no evidence to support this view, although I quickly admit there is very little evidence to the contrary, either. But I did read recently that a boys' magazine took a poll among 2,000 of its readers between the ages of 8 and 18 and that the returns were split almost evenly between those who wanted the union jack and those who favoured a flag without any trace of the union jack. This indicates that even the young people of the country are divided on the issue. As I have said, for some reason which it is difficult for me and for the average Canadian to understand the government is bent on eliminating these symbols from our flag. It wishes to get to the point of no return as quickly as possible so that nothing can be done about it.

We counsel mature consideration. We say this is a matter which could be desperately divisive as far as Canada is concerned, should a flag be imposed on the Canadian people which a large group is loath to accept and which another large group would detest. This is not the way to go about obtaining Canadian unity. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the question that naturally arises in our mind is, what is the motivation of the government? What pressure are they under? Why do they persist in this course? One explanation, of course, would be—and I am not suggesting it is the correct one—that somebody, perhaps the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), has a sort of mania about this and his mind is blocked to anything else.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I think I am dead wrong on that; I am not suggesting that is so —but that eliminates a possibility. It may be based on a distorted reasoning, namely that by eliminating the symbols that the various groups of Canadians hold dear you will arrive at a kind of neutral situation where these divisive elements will disappear. In my judgment that is entirely wrong. There was a similar situation in the island of Cyprus when they tried to get a flag for that small country. The Greek majority thought that it should be one thing; the Turkish minority wanted their colours and their symbols in the flag. They could not arrive at any agreement and they would not agree to accept both suggestions. Each side wanted the right to veto what the other believed in. So they arrived at a nondescript thing which I believe is a map of Cyprus, and so on—I think there is an olive leaf in it somewhere—that is something comparable to the recommendation of the flag committee of this House of Commons. It cannot be said by any stretch of the imagination that this has brought national unity to the island of Cyprus.

Mr. More: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If the members to the extreme left are not interested in the debate, I would like the opportunity to hear what the speaker is saying, and hear it clearly. I wonder whether Your Honour would ask them to desist from the half dozen loud conversations that are going on at that end of the chamber.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): The question is, where is this pressure coming from? I would be very surprised if it is coming from the province of Newfoundland, for example. I see no great body of public opinion there that is intent on banishing the union jack, for example, or the red ensign. I am sure this pressure does not come from Nova Scotia, from Prince Edward Island or from British Columbia; nor does it come from Alberta or Saskatchewan. There is not one member in this House of Commons—if we are the ones to decide—from the province of Saskatchewan that favours doing away with the union jack as one of our historic symbols. The pressure does not come from Manitoba, and I am sure it does not come in any great measure from the province of Ontario. I am logically forced to conclude—

An hon. Member: That it comes from Quebec.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): —that it certainly does not come from the province of Quebec. I will explain why.

Mr. Ricard: That disappoints you over there.

An hon. Member: All that are left now are the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I say that, Mr. Speaker, because the only argument I have heard the government or any spokesman for it advance as to why these symbols should be eradicated from our national flag is that they are archaic vestiges of a long dead, long past, colonialism. If that is the reason, it does not jibe with the reasoning of the province of Quebec—at least the province as a province—because as I recall it, their provincial flag, which I presume has the affection of all citizens of that province, consists of a white cross and four fleur-de-lis on a blue background, the symbols of old France. I think that is a very attractive flag and I respect the viewpoint and the good taste of the people of the province of Quebec who hold this flag in high esteem. I know that even if they did not do this, and felt that these symbols were an anachronism, they would surely not expect Canadians generally to eliminate from the national flag the symbols they love, before they had put their own house in order and eliminated from their own flag these equally archaic symbols of dead colonialism. I know Quebec people; many of them are among my closest friends, and I know they would not advance such a preposterous suggestion as that.

Where does this leave us? There is still some group that is pressuring the government to eliminate these symbols from our flag. I do not know who they are; but the government is obviously committed to this program and are embarrassed by the fact that they were not able to do it quickly. I suppose they took a straw vote of the membership of the house and found there were more people, collectively, in the other parties that would vote for them than there were in their own party that would vote against such a proposition, and they snatched at it to cause embarrassment and division in all parties in this house. Here was an opportunity to shove something through parliament quickly, and they were pressured in this way. As a result of that course of action, they have been saying ever since, with various degrees of politeness, "Stop talking. Bring this matter to a vote".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): They say, "Sit down and vote". The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) puts it in slightly different terminology. I believe she said to an hon. member, "Shut up, sit down and vote". But anyway, Mr. Speaker, this is what they advance. There is a reason why this course is not acceptable at the present time, and I will come to this point in a moment. In making this point they have practised the ruse that is as old as time itself. I am rather amused by the fact that one or two gentlemen of the fourth estate, the press gallery—and these men look upon themselves as people who are objective, incisive, shrewd and worldly-wise; and they are, with perhaps one or two exceptions—have fallen for the ruse the government has used, which was old when Ali Baba and the 40 thieves were around. One or two of the gentlemen of the press have been taken in by this ruse. It is an old trick of pickpockets, from time immemorial, that when their victims begin to get suspicious, they point at some innocent bystander down the way and scream "Thief", and everybody goes after him and the pickpocket disappears up the alley. This is what the government has been doing all summer; they have been saying, "The terrible opposition are preventing parliament from getting on with the country's business". I want to point out that it is not the opposition that is holding up government business. The opposition has no choice as to the program of business which is laid before parliament. This is the 27th day the government has taken the view that the elimination of the symbols which millions of Canadians hold dear is the most important problem facing the government of Canada. I know of no other government in the world that is so confused it believes its most urgent task is the abolition of its national flag.

The government can stop this waste of parliament's time immediately, if it is a waste. They can stop it in various ways. The most obvious way of stopping it would be to accept this amendment and take this divisive subject out of parliament, allowing the Canadian people to make a decision. They could stop this waste of parliament's time, if that is what it is, almost as easily by calling other government business on the next sitting day. The government could have done that 25 days ago. What has happened to the labour code? Why has the government not brought that on? What has happened to the C.N.R. financing legislation and the Canadian pension plan?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member for Queens will agree with the Chair, that he is straying from the motion that is before the house at the present time.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I am pointing out that by agreeing with this amendment to refer this question to a plebiscite the government will immediately clear the decks of parliament for other business. I am also saying that that is not the only way this could be done. The third way it could be done, if there is no other government business ready at this time, is to accept this amendment and adjourn parliament for the Christmas recess.

Mr. Dupuis: Let us vote and see what happens.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): If the minister will get up and state on behalf of the government that they accept this amendment, then I will—

Mr. Dupuis: This is to be a free vote. I cannot say that for them.

Mr. Herridge: We heard all about the free vote just before lunch.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): The most important point I want to make with regard to all of this, and this is the point that seems to have missed the grasp of the government entirely, is that this is no ordinary piece of legislation. If it were a financial bill, or any kind of legislation which could be corrected, repealed or amended by another parliament, I would gladly have someone state the position on behalf of myself and others and let the issue come to a vote. I would be glad to let the government stew in its own juice as a result of its errors.

However, this is a more serious situation than that. There is an old tradition that no parliament can bind a future parliament. However, if we do what the government proposes we will in effect be binding future parliaments, because the flag is something that should be permanent. If this report was concerned only with a flag to fly over Canada during the life of this government I would let it go through immediately, but I have my country's future in mind and at heart, and I think it is shameful if parliament allows this nefarious piece of legislation to be carried out, perpetrating on Canada a permanent flag that millions of Canadians will not accept. A flag is something that cannot practically be changed. Although there may not be anything in the constitution which would prevent a future parliament from changing the flag again, surely we do not want the flag changed every parliament. This government acts as though it were going to be in power forever. There is no telling what the next parliament will be like. It may be entirely different from this one.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I hear an hon. member from one of the splinter parties, and I agree with the view that he has expressed. I am not suggesting the party to which I belong will necessarily form the next government, because I think the next parliament will probably be more fragmented than this one. One of the reasons for this belief is that the present government has condemned the official opposition with a vitriolic flood of abusive propaganda, but have also condemned themselves by their own acts.

Mr. Herridge: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I am not surprised that one of the hon. members of the N.D.P. applauds.

I should like to illustrate what I am going to say with a very homely illustration, Mr. Speaker. My contention is that if the government wanted to get on with the other business of the nation now, all it has to do is agree with this amendment. They refuse to do so. They refuse to bring on other government business. They refuse to do what Mackenzie King did in 1946 or 1947—let the report die on the order paper and prorogue the house.

Mr. Choquette: This is 1964.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I know this is 1964.

Mr. Choquette: Come back to the present.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Whatever we allow to happen now on this issue will be permanent. We have an obligation to do a good job, and to do something that will be constructive and bring Canadians together. Therefore I feel that a plebiscite is one of the ways by which this can be done. If we find out what the Canadian people want in the way of symbolisms on their national flag we could then perhaps adopt a flag which would be acceptable. Perhaps the best way of doing this would not be by allowing them to make a choice from a number of completed flag designs, but by giving them a choice of symbols they would like included on the flag. I am sure that if that choice were given to the people the maple leaf would be one of the symbols chosen. I am also sure that the union jack would be one of the symbols chosen. I am not sure that the Canadian coat of arms, the fleur-de-lis or some other things, would be among the choices.

If the Canadian people were asked to choose three or four symbols from among a number, parliament would then know their feelings and a panel of experts could then design a flag incorporating the chosen symbols, and parliament could then adopt it.

Mr. Speaker, as one hon. member has already said, this is not something in respect of which there should be winners or losers, regardless of who they may be. This is a circumstance in which all Canadians should act in unity in order to have something of which each and every one can be justly proud, perhaps not for the same reason, but something that means something to each one.

I think it is divisive to try to insist that certain symbols, which millions of Canadians hold dear and cherish, should be eliminated from their flag. You cannot achieve unity by any one group pretending that if they do not recognize the other group it will disappear and go away, as it were. It is a fact that we are made up of two founding races and an intermixture of many other races. This is a fact. It would be folly for me as a Canadian of Scottish extraction over several generations to make myself believe or to do anything that would lead me to believe that all Canadians were of the same background as I am. Therefore I am willing to allow Canadians of every origin to be represented in the flag; but I want the same privilege for myself.

This is a time for the government to reassess the situation. I would implore them to consider supporting the amendment.

An hon. Member: Let us vote and you will see.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I would suggest there are other ways in which this very contentious matter could be removed from parliament. I started to say a while ago that I wanted to illustrate the situation by a very homely analogy. When I was a teen-ager and a young man back on the farm, we always threshed in the fall of the year in a fairly wet climate and when some member of the threshing crew wanted to have a rest and did not want to carry on with productive activity he just made sure that a couple of really soggy sheaves went into the machine, whereupon the machine was fouled up and had to be shut off to be cleaned out. This is what the government is doing and has been doing all summer. Every day, day after day, it throws into the mill of parliament this very contentious question of the flag and how it should be designed. The result is that it will not go through the mill itself and it prevents other important business from being done.

I think my time has just about expired, Mr. Speaker, but there is a crucial point I want to reiterate. A government, especially a minority government, has no right to impose legislation which, in a practical sense in any case, cannot be repealed by a future parliament. Therefore unless this action can be taken with the unanimous consent of every party and every faction in the house, and unless it has almost 100 per cent support from all language groups and all racial backgrounds from every part of Canada, it should not be in a partisan manner in this way. It should not be done because the implication is that when the government goes out of office, as it will, the succeeding government would normally be bound to change the flag, and this no Canadian would want. The flag should be at least as permanent as the constitution, and at least as difficult to amend as the constitution, and in most countries amendments of the constitution requires a two thirds majority vote, or something of that sort, over and above the normal requirement for legislation.

If this flag is going to be imposed upon us there are large segments of the country that will not accept it with grace. There are millions of people who will resent it and to whom it will be an affront. Therefore if it is going to be imposed on them in this way, the least the government can do, this government which has discovered this theory of which it is so proud, the principle of opting out—and this may seem a bit ridiculous but the opting out principle can apply—is to allow the provinces that do not want this flag to opt out and not have it fly over those provinces.

I believe my time is up and I will continue my remarks on the main motion.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I wish to refer to page 10701 of Hansard for November 30 last where the following remarks of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) are recorded.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Webb: I quote:

With respect to the visit of the grade 10 children from the Peterborough school, it is true that at the request of certain members of the house, and I include among those the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Honey), the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Stenson), and the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. Webb)—

These remarks resulted from the chastising or taking to task of the hon. member for Leeds by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) because of the action and conduct of the hon. member for Leeds when he was a member of the flag committee. I say to the house that this quotation is untrue. It is a downright lie.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Smallwood: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Webb: I say to you that I had no knowledge—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have done my best to follow the hon. member's argument but I cannot see the relation to the question of a plebiscite.

Mr. Churchill: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Furthermore, the use of the word "lie" is far too strong and I am sure the hon. member realizes that. Shall we say "misunderstanding" or some other equivalent word?

Mr. Webb: I was trying to put the matter in its true context but I will gladly withdraw the word "lie". I did not know of this visit to the flag committee room until I was invited on the day that the group was here by Mr. Howard, the students' teacher. The hon. member for Peterborough has also denied this charge.

Since for many reasons the number of those members who are in a position to put forward their independent views is very limited and since I speak for people outside the House of Commons I have again taken advantage of my right to have my say in the hope that by raising certain points and problems the government will reconsider their announced course on the flag question.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Read on.

Mr. Grégoire: We want a vote.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says "read on". I want to assure him that we in this party have no paid script writers. My speech was written by me last night and the night before after the house closed. I say to these hon. members that if they were less interested in their beauty sleep and more interested in putting forward the views of their constituents on the floor of the house, we would have a better parliament.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Listen to the parrots over there.

Mr. Webb: I have lots of time.

Mr. Grégoire: Filibuster.

Mr. Webb: It is far from my purpose to indulge in destructive criticism alone. It is sufficient to say that the course of action upon which the government has decided would be disastrous to the unity of Canada. It is certainly better to consider now whether we are right or wrong, especially when we can do something about it. Such action as is contemplated by the government would be very serious for this Canada of ours.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. We should note something unusual which is happening in this house. This is the third speech being pronounced by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. Webb) on the flag issue.

In hockey when a player scores three goals, we say that he did the hat trick. I will be glad to send him a hat on the occasion, because three speeches in the house can well be compared to three goals in hockey. My congratulations to the hon. member for this brilliant feat.

[Text]

Mr. Webb: I want to thank the hon. member for those congratulations and I shall look forward to hearing his speech on the flag.

Mr. Grégoire: I will vote on it.

Mr. Webb: Such action as is contemplated by the government would be very serious to this Canada of ours, to its history and geography, its economic and trading position, its status as a world power, its people, culture and way of life as well as its traditions. Up to the time this government came into power the Anglo-French heritage was one of the most important distinguishing features of our country. The two cultures existing side by side—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Webb: —each maintaining—

Mr. Speaker: Order; I am sure the hon. member realizes that the two cultures are very interesting, especially to me. Nevertheless, "plebiscite" can be translated into either English or French, and the same principle applies either in English or in French. Let us speak about the plebiscite.

Mr. Webb: I am not quite clear on your ruling, Mr. Speaker. The two cultures existed side by side, at all times believing in a plebiscite, and each maintaining a distinct identity and each complementing and contributing to the other. The other ethnic groups have made and are making increasing contributions of their own. Areas in Ontario have been settled by the Germans and Dutch. There are large Ukrainian communities in the western provinces.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already indicated to the hon. member that, while this is extremely interesting, it is not on the subject. Surely, after a mild suggestion like that the hon. member will confine his remarks to the plebiscite.

Mr. Webb: I believe, Mr. Speaker, there has been a lot of latitude granted to the many speakers who have preceded me.

While Canada is physically part of the new world it has never cut its ties with the old world. Through thick and thin Canadians have maintained their democratic way of life. Democracy and equality go hand in hand.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Webb: You cannot believe in one without believing in the other. At this time, what is more democratic than deciding on a major issue in this country. When you are denying the Canadian people a vote, Mr. Speaker, there is neither democracy nor equality.

There are many other fine qualities in a democracy, such as ideals, honour, loyalty, which are precious and must be protected with great care. This is what the Progressive Conservative party is trying to do today. If these qualities are not protected they will be broken as a result of careless handling, such as is the case in this flag debate. It is a matter of regret that a truly secret ballot could not be taken in this house. I am certain that if this were done the outcome would be different. It is no secret that this issue is tearing at the very heartstrings of many hon. members opposite. Those members, as well as some cabinet ministers, are suffering a great deal; their own consciences tells them they should support the plebiscite, and yet they are faced with party loyalty. It is difficult to understand why the government cannot agree to have a plebiscite at the next general election. The House of Commons, and especially the government, would win praise from many people who at this moment have lost complete confidence in their administration.

Perhaps at this time it would be well to put on the record some remarks made by someone outside our country. Sometimes we are put to shame by the recognition which other nations give to their appreciation of the heritage they have received from Britain. A few years ago Richard Nixon, then vice president of the United States, said this:

> No people in history owe more of their heritage to another than the American people to the British.

He cited the English language, the common law and parliament, freedom of speech, assembly, press and religion, as Britain's proud legacy to the nations of the world. He went further and stressed how his country had benefited by British capital investment when the United States was an undeveloped country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely, the hon. member will endeavour to stick to the amendment to the motion which deals with a plebiscite.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the whole of the debate, and as I said before a great deal of latitude was allowed previous speakers and many editorials were read into the record. I fail to understand the restriction at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Order; I think I should answer that. A few days ago it was indicated that considerable latitude had been given at the time the main motion was before the house. An amendment has been moved to that motion and under our rules, as it was announced at the time, the Chair should endeavour to keep the house strictly to the amendment. Surely we can count on the co-operation of the hon. member. Ample latitude has been given for days and days during well over 185 speeches, and I think we are entitled now to stick to the amendment.

Mr. Webb: And yet—

Mr. Ricard: Before the hon. member resumes I would like to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that we have been hearing interruptions ever since he started his remarks. I would point out that those making the interruptions are French speaking members who are so tender about their rights in the House of Commons. Being myself a French Canadian I feel ashamed to have those of my own blood making all these interruptions, and I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to enforce the rules on them so that decorum may be re-established in the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Standing order 34 (2) clearly provides that when an hon. member persists in irrelevance—and Your Honour has already called him to order four times; so, if that does not indicate irrelevance, then I do not know what does—Mr. Speaker may direct him to take his seat. I believe, therefore, that the rules should be applied, since you referred to strict relevancy, and that you should be adamant and order the hon. member to discontinue his speech.

I think we should all abide by the rules. Incidentally, I should like to point out, if I may, that the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) knows absolutely nothing about procedure.

I understand that the burden of treason is heavy on his shoulders because of the way he voted yesterday.

Mr. Grégoire: He speaks in English.

Mr. Choquette: I would like the rules to be observed and that you should ignore the member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, since he is an ignoramus.

[Mr. Webb.]

Mr. Ricard: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. On behalf of all the members on this side of the house, I asked that the rules be observed. I understand that the hon. member felt that those remarks were addressed to him personally, since he is one of those who always interrupts and since he took it upon himself to stand up and try to discredit me.

Mr. Choquette: Poor you.

Mr. Ricard: I do not feel any twinge of conscience for the way I voted yesterday and as far as my constituents are concerned.

What I asked the Chair is to apply the rules in the case of the hon. member who just rose and who continually interrupts.

In asking you to call the hon. member to order, I should like to point out that the hon. member for Lapointe is also one of those constantly making interjections.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. For once I support the statements made by the hon. member for Lotbinière. I say that we are ashamed of the attitude and of the treason of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot.

I should like to refer to standing order 34 (2) since the Conservative member who has the floor made reference to freedom of speech. I refer to the standing order which provides that when a member persists in repeating things which have already been said—I would like to point out that according to statistics compiled at eleven o'clock this morning, the word "plebiscite" has been said 3,743 times exactly. Consequently, the hon. member has no reason to claim that he has not had full freedom of speech.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask you then to enforce standing orders and to prevent the repetition of things which have already been said 3,743 times. In my opinion, that is sufficient evidence of the freedom of speech granted to members of the house, even for those who are repetitious.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The Chair wishes to thank hon. members for the spate of advice, good and bad, tendered it. However, the Chair feels that the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. Webb) is doing his best and I am sure he will follow the suggestions made by the Chair.

Mr. Webb: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Why not a plebiscite?

Mr. Grégoire: Three thousand, seven hundred and forty four.

Mr. Webb: The disturbing elements in favour of a new flag stem from a conspiracy of non-Canadians who have set themselves to wreck Canada and the whole commonwealth. I have heard many times lately from some of my friends that they do not fear communism and are not afraid of the dangers of war caused by aggression. I do not agree with them. I fear war; I fear communism and the results of aggression.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I must tell the hon. member, I hope for the last time, that he must stick to the matter under discussion. He knows perfectly well the subject under discussion is the plebiscite. Will he please discuss it?

Mr. Webb: I have here a letter dated October 17—

An hon. Member: Another.

Mr. Webb: I think if the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) were in his office licking those three leaf bumper stickers he would be kept busy.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have the right to call to order a member whose remarks are not in compliance with the rules. Moreover, if the hon. member wants a sticker, I think it would be a good thing to stick one on his mouth.

[Text]

Mr. Webb: I imagine the price has gone down, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dupuis: You are going down.

Mr. Webb: I have a letter here from Martha J. Shangraw of Verona, Ontario—

Mr. Grégoire: If you read it you will have to table it.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that for the small sum of $50 the people of Lapointe could buy a parrot and send it here where it would do a more effective job than the hon. member. This letter is signed by Mrs. Martha J. Shangraw, a lady who had 41 relatives in the two world wars and who lost four sons.

I have another letter here asking for a plebiscite—

Mr. Grégoire: Three thousand, seven hundred and forty five.

Mr. Webb: The lady who wrote this letter said the red ensign is a beautiful flag and she sees nothing wrong with it. She points out that her father was not born in this country but came here from Denmark.

I have another letter here asking for a plebiscite—

Mr. Grégoire: Three thousand seven hundred and forty six.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, you have given a certain amount of latitude to the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. Webb) but it seems to me that hon. members opposite and those to my left are taking a great deal more latitude than is proper under parliamentary procedure.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I very much regret these interruptions but surely the Chair does not have to act as a schoolmaster continually. I have made a few suggestions to hon. members and I hope they will follow them.

Mr. Webb: They do not disturb me in the least, Mr. Speaker. I am just hopeful these hon. members will some day grow up. I have another letter here asking about a plebiscite. It is from a Mr. James Cummings. He says that it is pretty late in the day and that we must all be sick of the flag debate, but the great mass of non-vocal Canadians cannot understand why parliament must be pushed around by a minority government and why this issue cannot be decided by a plebiscite. I have one or two other messages here, Mr. Speaker, but you might rule them out of order. I have here, too, a copy of the order in council which was passed in 1945 declaring that it will be proper to fly the Canadian red ensign within or without Canada whenever the place or occasion—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Langlois: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not have anything against the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. Webb) especially, but I believe he has been out of order for some time. He is now reading to us an order passed in 1945 concerning the red ensign. I agree that if we confine ourselves entirely to what is said in Beauchesne's fourth edition it is difficult to define relevancy. As the author says, a wrong comprehension might have a serious effect on the freedom of speech and in borderline cases members should be given the benefit of the doubt. However, if we turn to May's sixteenth edition we find at page 451 the following:

A member must direct his speech to the question then under discussion...debate must not stray from the question before the house or anticipate a matter appointed for the consideration of the house.

What we are considering today is an amendment put forward in the name of the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith). The main motion is something which will come before us in the future in certain circumstances, that is to say, if this amendment should be defeated. We would then be speaking on the main motion and have an opportunity to deal with the subject in general terms. Furthermore, the hon. member is continually reading either from letters or from notes, a practice which is not in accord with our rules.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, once and for all to make the hon. member stick to the subject under consideration, that is, the question of a plebiscite. If the rules were enforced I think it would shorten many of the speeches being made in this house.

Mr. Webb: I want to thank the hon. member for his consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I believe my time has just about expired. I assure you that if I have not been relevant to the motion before us, on the next occasion I will try to be more relevant. Today we are living in a world of turmoil and our only hope is our faith in God and the simple fruits of His teaching, together with the history and tradition of our past. More and more we hear about patriotism and I suggest in closing that real patriotism is when we understand that Canada is a nation, not a denomination.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): May I say at the outset that I am in favour of the amendment and in favour of the proposal that a plebiscite should be held.

I take this view because, among other things, the people of Canada are only now beginning to find out the truth behind what went on in the flag committee. In the second place, I am in favour of the amendment because I do not think the government ever had a mandate to introduce a new flag. I will return to this subject later. My third reason for supporting the amendment is the confusion and indecision of the government previously with regard to its proposed flag, the Pearson three maple leaf flag, which has been withdrawn and dumped into the ash can. My fourth reason is the lack of unanimity within the flag committee.

Before proceeding further I should like to pay a tribute to the chairman of the flag committee, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten). He ruled that committee with a very firm hand. He was fair in the extreme—a lot more fair than many of the Liberals who are sitting in the house at the present time and who apparently do not want to hear anything at all about the flag. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's saw that the business before the committee was carried out properly and in an orderly fashion.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I should like to point out that this is the third speech made by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Pugh) on the matter of the flag. Since he has made the hat trick during this debate, it gives me pleasure to send him a hat with a red maple leaf.

[Text]

Mr. Pugh: Can I have a ruling, Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: There was no question of privilege. I understand you were making some preliminary remarks and that you were about to deal with the subject under discussion.

Mr. Pugh: I suppose it is difficult for some hon. members to realize that remarks appreciative of another member who has carried out a most difficult task as chairman of one of our committees should be well received. As far as privilege is concerned, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) is a great authority on privilege, and what he said comes in at one ear and goes out the other. That is all the attention his remarks deserve; nothing more and nothing less.

Today we are considering an amendment to the motion for concurrence in the report of the flag committee, an amendment which would require a plebiscite to be held at the time of the next election giving the people the right to declare their choice with regard to a national flag. The amendment is based on the fact that the committee did not reach its decision with sufficient unanimity. As was stated earlier, some 72 per cent of the members were in favour of it. I would point out that the last time a flag committee reported, 95 per cent of its membership expressed approval of the flag chosen on that occasion. But for some reason or other that flag was never brought before the house. I do not need to remind Your Honour who the prime minister of the day was but I must commend him on at least one thing—his common sense in not bringing forward an issue so divisive for Canada.

I think it is essential that everybody in Canada should be given a chance to express their views on the Canadian flag. I believe the designs put to the people might well be the three designs which the committee finally considered. The Canadian public is only now becoming aware of those designs. In passing, I wonder why more curiosity was not displayed on the part of the press in this regard. I wonder why pictures of those three designs were not published widely throughout Canada. The first was the Pearson flag, three maple leaves on a white background with blue edges. The second, the one chosen, was the one maple leaf, on a white background, bordered with red. The third flag was exactly the same as the flag finally chosen except that it bore the symbols of our past superimposed upon it, in other words, the union jack and the royal flag of France showing the fleur-de-lis. These three designs were not arrived at indiscriminately. In other words, the committee decided in its own right that they would group the flags in three set groups. Then we had a finalist in each one. In other words, the committee gradually cut down the number of flags in each group so that we had a final flag. It is this final flag in each group which I believe, if this amendment is agreed to and the whole matter is referred back to the committee, could form the basis of a plebiscite for the people of Canada. I do feel, however—and I will refer to the question of mandate later—that the majority of people in Canada would answer in the negative if they were given the opportunity of a plebiscite and asked whether they wished to change the flag we have at the present time. I feel absolutely positive about this, Mr. Speaker.

Now I will say a few words about the mandate, because it is to this mandate that my constituents have referred when they have said to me, "You must demand a plebiscite so we can say exactly what we wish". There is no qualification in that whatsoever. I have only to go back to the last election campaign, when there was some news received in British Columbia that there would possibly be a new flag, and candidates—

Mr. Smallwood: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, and with all due respect to you —and you have my complete sympathy— could Your Honour possibly convince people over there that they should show some dignity in parliament, and would Your Honour ask the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) to resume his seat and act like a parliamentarian, instead of—well, I will not describe the way he has been acting. I would like a little dignity to be maintained in this house.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a point on this question. This is the fourth time today when the speaker who had the floor was not being interrupted or interfered with in any way, but members of the opposition have risen and stated there was interference with the hon. member. That being the case, I think it is up to the Chair to indicate whether or not there is interference with the hon. member having the floor, rather than letting these remarks appear in Hansard, as has been the case, regrettably, today, when there was not interference.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, and so that the remarks on Hansard may be accurate and complete, members on the other side of the house, and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) in particular, have been infringing the rule which I will give Your Honour; I refer to rule 12(1) dealing with order and decorum in the house. It is quite proper for us to call the attention of the Chair to this interference with the progress of debate in the chamber. Order and decorum should be maintained, under that rule, and if people are constantly interrupting or, as the hon. member for Lapointe was doing, standing up on the other side of the chamber and talking to the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) loud enough for us to hear on this side, that is surely interrupting the member who has the floor and who is endeavouring to present his case in the debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

Since only a small group of Conservatives are making speeches, which are mostly prepared speeches, could we suggest that they hand them over to the Clerk of the house in order that we may vote immediately on this important flag issue?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Since the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) has accused certain hon. members of taking no account of the decorum in this house, I respectfully submit that the useless debate going on today is deliberate filibustering and that Conservatives are destroying the whole decorum the House of Commons was enjoying—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grégoire: —by constant repetitions, by saying one ridiculous thing after another and by attempting to throw a monkey wrench in the works.

If the Canadian people has no confidence in parliament, the responsibility rests with the Conservatives and the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Plourde: That is right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grégoire: To satisfy their own pride and ambition, the Conservatives are holding up the business of the country, and I strongly protest against such an attitude. They will bear the responsibility and the consequences of this state of affairs.

[Text]

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Speaker, the point I drew to your attention was that the hon. member for Lapointe was standing on the other side of the house with his back to Your Honour, and he has been doing that continuously. That is what I was drawing to Your Honour's attention, regardless of what the house leader had to say.

Mr. Speaker: I am glad to say that it is almost four o'clock and I am sure we can start a new regime immediately. I should add that the point raised is reasonable and well taken. Standing order 12 (1) says:

> Mr. Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the house without debate.

The house is nice and quiet at the moment, and I do hope we can continue in that vein.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank all hon. gentlemen who have contributed to my speech. I am sure that when I send the one copy home it will be read with very great interest.

As I was saying, one of the reasons for my believing there should be a plebiscite is that there was no proper mandate, certainly not from my constituency. As I said, news finally sifted down to the province of British Columbia that there might be some question of a flag raised in the last election, and it was a question put to all four candidates when they were attending four-party meetings. Those four candidates represented the Conservatives, the New Democratic party, the Liberal party and the Social Credit party. When the question was put to them as to what they would do about changing our Canadian flag, their answer in each case was specific and without qualification: "We will not change the present Canadian flag. It is our flag, and we will fight for it". I say this, Mr. Speaker, because it has been leaked all over the place exactly how the voting went in the committee. There is no question about it, the Liberals, the members of the New Democratic party, the Creditistes and the Social Crediters all voted against our Canadian flag, the red ensign. This has been leaked out by the press. I will not mention any names, but that was the result of the vote. It was leaked out, incidentally, by a Liberal.

Mr. Bell: Mr. "Leakman".

Mr. Pugh: In any event, to go back to the question of mandate, no one wishing to come to Ottawa and represent Okanagan Boundary heard anything about this, nor did they receive a request that the flag should be changed in any way, shape or form. This was the voice of the people. They elected me, but they also voted for the other candidates all down the line. I am wondering whether this did not happen in a great many more constituencies. I know that it certainly happened in the province of British Columbia. Therefore I wonder, just as the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) did this morning—another Liberal—what mandate we do have. The member for York-Humber made no bones about it; he pointed out that numerically he was here after having received a minority of the votes cast. He pointed out that numerically many, many of those members sitting on the government side of the chamber and in other parties, including our party, were here without receiving 50 per cent of the votes of their constituents. In fact very, very few members of parliament are here today with a majority vote from their constituencies. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, one asks, has there been a mandate? Then one asks, is there not a great deal of truth in that which the member for York-Humber brought forward this morning? It is true that people are sent here from everywhere in Canada, but it is an extraordinary thing that only one Liberal feels the government did not have a mandate. This is an extraordinary thing. Were the Liberals elected as Liberal members, or were they elected to come down here and throw Canada's flag into the ash can, and that is about what their action amounts to?

I do not think there is any clear mandate which can be relied upon. There has been a small amount of party literature circulated. I was very careful to watch for literature of other parties in my constituency, but I do not remember anything—

Mr. O'Keefe: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Pugh: —about a proposed change in the flag of—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. O'Keefe: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Pugh: —Canada which would indicate to the people—

Mr. O'Keefe: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have recognized the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. O'Keefe: Mr. Speaker, I am a little tired about being told—

Mr. Pugh: Why do you not sit down?

Mr. O'Keefe: —that we are throwing Canada's flag in the ash can. Perhaps the hon. member opposite would read order No. 44(B) where he will see that the Prime Minister's motion—

Mr. Churchill: What is your point of order?

Mr. O'Keefe: —is to the effect that the union jack may be continued to be flown as a symbol of Canadian membership in the commonwealth of nations and of Canada's allegiance to the crown. Surely that is not throwing Canada's flag in the ash can.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Speaker, I have yet to be convinced that the United Kingdom flag, or the royal union flag is Canada's flag. I recognize and appreciate the tone of the hon. member's voice. He is obviously from Newfoundland, and I can understand his concern, as I understand the concern of the chairman of the committee, about the actions of the government in this regard. If he will ask the members of that committee, and no doubt that information has already leaked out, he may find out what changes were made in that resolution at the last meeting of the committee, and then perhaps he will be satisfied that what I am saying is correct. Perhaps the hon. member will study again the original resolution which was brought forward by the government. What did that resolution suggest? It referred to the red ensign, not to the Canadian red ensign, whereas now you are referring to the union jack. The union jack is certainly not the red ensign and is not Canada's flag. Please do not try to confuse the issue. The hon. member from Newfoundland should be concerned because of the way this proposed flag was brought forward, and the second rate position into which the royal union flag has been placed, for certain obvious purposes.

Mr. Speaker, I did use the word "ash can". I will not use that word. The Canadian red ensign was turned down by the committee. I have explained this fact to the people of my riding, and that is one reason they demand a plebiscite. They feel they are now getting the real story of what took place at the committee meetings, and are beginning to understand that the report of that committee as it appears on the order paper does not give a clear picture of what took place.

The reason I recommend that three flags be presented to the people of Canada for a choice is that the people wish to have a say in which flag should be Canada's national flag. If the red ensign is turned down as the first choice, then the people will have made that choice. Had the efforts of the committee in arriving at its conclusion been represented accurately—

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Pugh: If what we are presently discussing is carried, that will be marvellous.

After the red ensign was turned down in the committee by all members other than Conservative members, the Conservative members did their level best, as the members of that committee will testify, to produce a flag which would incorporate something symbolic of our past, such as the union jack and the fleur-de-lis. I do not agree with certain statements made by committee members who said that the fleur-de-lis could not form a part of a Canadian national flag because no French Canadian owed allegiance to royal France.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe that the member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Pugh) is entirely out of order. I would like to point out to the Chair that the Conservatives, who claim that this debate is important, at this moment only number 10 out of 95; and among those 10, one voted against the plebiscite, namely, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer). When they claim that this debate is important and when only 10 are present in the house, it is evident that there is something wrong somewhere. Furthermore, they are always talking about something else than the matter under discussion. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to be stricter and to call them to order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order. The fact that only 10 Conservative members are present does not mean that the rules are violated.

However, I may add that the hon. member who has the floor is out of order because he is not talking about the matter before us at this moment.

[Text]

I will repeat that in English, if I may. The fact that there are only ten members of the Conservative party in the house does not make the hon. member in order or out of order. The fact that the hon. member is not speaking to the question before the house for consideration does, however, make him out of order. The amendment having to do with a plebiscite is the subject now before this house for study.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, on this point of order, I should like to point out that the attendance of the Conservative members in this house this afternoon has been as good as, if not better than that of the members of any other party.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order, order. I do not think the question raised by the hon. member as to members' attendance in this house has any relation to the subject now under study. The hon. member who made reference to attendance was himself out of order. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to point out to the Chair that 10 Conservative members are worth at least 150 members of the other parties.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I must point out to the Chair that the hon. member for Three Rivers is not at the present time in his seat and that he should not be recognized.

Mr. Grégoire: Yes, it is true that the hon. member for Three Rivers is not in his seat.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order, please. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to point out to the Chair that the hon. member for Three Rivers was not in his seat when he spoke.

There are six members of our party in the house now, that is 50 per cent, and they are worth at least 95 Conservatives.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order. The fact that the hon. member for Three Rivers was not speaking from his seat was taken into consideration by the Chair. Now we will listen to the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary.

[Text]

Mr. Skoreyko: I should like to speak to the question of privilege, or on the point of order, raised by the hon. member for Lapointe, Mr. Speaker, and his reference to the number of Conservative members in the House of Commons. I want to put on record the fact that the Conservative party has never abdicated its role in this house on the flag debate, as has the Creditiste party on a number of occasions when none of their members were in their seats.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order, please. I think the Chair has received sufficient advice as to which members are in their seats and which are not in their seats, and as to how many members are in the house, and as to how many are absent. Perhaps now we can have a little order so that we can listen to the rest of the hon. member's words of wisdom that are going to be placed on record.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: The Speaker is not supposed to comment on the debate.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Speaker, apparently I have been ruled out of order because I have not been referring to the plebiscite. I suggest with the greatest respect that about every 15th word I have used has been the word "plebiscite".

I know, Mr. Speaker, that the substitution in the Speaker's chair will make no difference with regard to any remarks that have been made or any remarks I am about to make. As I have said, I feel there are a number of reasons for a plebiscite, and I am referring to those reasons and nothing else. I mentioned that the people of Canada are only now finding out about the decision of the flag committee. I mentioned the fact that I did not believe there was a mandate. I mentioned the fact that there was confusion and indecision arising out of the government's proposal, namely, the Pearson flag, and I said finally that to my mind there was not sufficient unanimity in the decision of the flag committee for us to accept it. The main motion was for concurrence in the sixth report of the flag committee, but I have had the opportunity—

Mr. Grégoire: There are only nine Conservatives in the house now, because another one has just left.

[Text]

Mr. Herridge: Don't take any notice of that.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether it would not be better to use the word "duck" in reference to that hon. member, than the word that has been used.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pugh: I have put forward these four points and, when I was so rudely interrupted again, I was about to say that since the committee made its report on the flag I have had the opportunity of visiting my constituency. What I am putting forward today represents the very things that have been said to me and impressed upon me by my constituents. They tell me that for the reasons I have been putting forward and which I intend to keep on putting forward they feel they have a right to have the final vote themselves on the flag question by way of a plebiscite. I am not quite sure whether they want a plebiscite at the present time or at the next general election but it would save expense if it were held at the next general election and that might well be the time to have it.

Because of the interruptions, Mr. Speaker, I hope you will not mind while I pause for station announcements and to look over my notes. I said that confusion had come out of the flag committee and I mean just that. A great deal of the confusion was caused by the good public relations story written by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) which was blatantly published right across Canada prior to the committee report being presented to the house.

Mr. Grégoire: Now there are eight Conservatives here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Could we have order, please.

Mr. Grégoire: That is terrible.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Speaker, do we have to listen to that? I ask you to put that man out of the chamber so that I may continue my speech uninterrupted by him every five seconds. You must do it and I am asking you to do it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can assure the hon. member that the Chair is listening with great interest to what he is saying. I am sure he will realize it is impossible for the Chair to make sure there is 100 per cent attention to everything that is said at all times. I assure the hon. member that I will protect him and protect his right to speak without interruption, if in the opinion of the Chair there is a disturbance that prevents hon. members who want to listen to him from having the opportunity and the advantage of hearing what he has to say.

Mr. Pugh: May I ask one more thing, Mr. Speaker. I have been watching the clock fairly carefully, but in view of the numerous interruptions and the speeches which have been interpolated into mine, I wonder whether you would advise me by what time my speech has to be concluded.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This is not a proper question to the Chair. The hon. member has 40 minutes to speak and he will be allowed 40 minutes.

Mr. Pugh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was referring to the confusion which has arisen over this matter and I mean just that. A great deal of that confusion has been generated by the pre-leaking or pre-publication of a story by a member of the committee which was grossly unfair and aroused quite a bit of indignation.

When I was in my constituency I was questioned about the laughter that went on in the committee. The people of Canada are worried about the flag that has been produced by this committee, a flag with laughter attached to it, a flag with a tactical advantage attached to it. I have only to refer to newspaper reports at the time. "Strategy is Big Blunder", says one Liberal member of the flag committee. Another one says, "Tactics Fell Through", or something like that. It does not really matter. The point is that people asked me about this.

One member went on to say that there was a tremendous amount of laughter, that the Tories in the committee were completely baffled, that they were apparently taken off base and so on. When I discussed the matter with my constituents they told me in no uncertain terms that for this very reason they would like to have a vote on the flag. They want a vote and they should get it. If there was any laughter in that committee or any amazement on Tory faces it was due to one thing, that when the Pearson flag with three maple leaves and blue borders was being considered not one Liberal voted for it. Every Liberal voted against it. To me this means one thing, and it means one thing to the people of my constituency and to many more in British Columbia and elsewhere. It is why they are asking for a plebiscite. They are asking for a very good reason. They do not want a laughingstock flag. They do not want a tactical advantage flag. They do not want a strategic retreat flag or anything like that. They want to be able to look at the flags and decide for themselves.

I could quote the rather blatant language that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra used. If the laughter meant anything to the Tory members of the committee it meant just three things. The Liberal members were laughing at their leader and their cabinet. They had said they were going to stand or fall on the three maple leaf flag and they made it a matter of confidence. They bedevilled parliament with it all the way through. The second reason why they were laughing was that they had kept all of us here throughout the spring and all during the summer and fall by shooting the flag at us, instead of dealing with important business. They tried to make out it was an important issue. The third thing they were laughing at was the people of Canada themselves. That laughter was hollow. Let us not produce a hollow flag as a result of it. That laughter was based on those three things, and by producing this flag at this time they have kept everybody in the country in an uproar and a state of unrest.

The Liberals have said to the people all across Canada that we are not getting along with the business of the house. What utter balderdash. That is not true. I think we have made a fair go at things in this session of parliament and it is time the people knew it. If we have spent 23 days on the flag the people should realize that we have been here for nearly 10 months. The people should realize that we were here all summer and that 23 days does not add up to much compared with ten months.

My people are annoyed about this matter. They say they have been bamboozled on the flag question from the beginning. We know the truth now and they jolly well should know the truth. I am not going to say any more now, although I have quite a bit more additional material. The people are annoyed at various things that have appeared in newspaper articles, one of which, as I say, was published prior to the committee presenting its report to the house. This was a most disgraceful thing. There was no reason for it whatsoever. The time of publication might have been an error on the part of that hon. member, but as the chairman of the committee knows I objected strongly to him at the time. I wonder how he feels? I wonder why he has not made a speech condemning this man, not because he allowed the article to be published prior to the presentation of the report but because of the misinformation he tried to feed the people of Canada. My people are annoyed about this and this is one of the reasons why they want to have a voice in the choosing of their own flag. They want to have a plebiscite. They want to be able to talk and make a decision outside of this flag committee. I was proud of this flag committee up until the very last morning. I was proud of it because I thought the members made an honest effort to get together. Certainly many of the members had fixed opinions at the start. There was no question about it. The Liberal members had a flag, and perhaps they bent over backwards when they voted for another flag. I think the other parties tried to be considerate.

When you look at the background of some of these members who were on that committee, you could not expect anything else. They were fixed in their determination to bring in a flag. I do not believe, for instance, that all members of the New Democratic party would agree with what their member finally decided. They have expressed this view in the House of Commons. In fact, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) said that a plebiscite is necessary. I agree with him 100 per cent. I only heard part of the speech delivered this morning by the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan). When I left I thought rather deeply about this speech and I asked myself, in demanding a plebiscite is this man a radical? I asked myself, is he a person who is not a Liberal who somehow got in there? Then, I thought, no, I can look around the Liberal benches and realize, since I have friends over there, that a good proportion of them believe a plebiscite would be a good thing.

Mr. Grégoire: Ready for the question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; the hon. member who has the floor has the right to continue his remarks without being interrupted.

Mr. Pugh: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winkler: Before the hon. member proceeds, and since there was a break at this point, I wonder if he would clarify one point for me? It is the first time I have heard it raised in this house so far as I recall. I have listened with interest to his remarks, and would he reaffirm the statement that the Liberal members on the committee, in fact, did vote against the design that was proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson)?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; this point raised by the hon. member may be very interesting. Certainly, it seems to me that the point was made previously by the hon. member who has the floor. However, it does appear to the Chair to be a little remote from the amendment which is under consideration.

Mr. Pugh: I rather think the hon. member who posed the question has run into the same thing in his riding as I have and, no doubt, as a lot of Liberal members have as well. It is this: How was it that 14 members in the committee could have voted for a flag if they did not want it? The answer is very simple. There was no vote for that flag. There was a preference vote between the three maple leaf flag and the one maple leaf flag. These were the only two flags left before the committee. We were asked for our preference. We Conservatives could not vote for the three maple leaf design. Were the Liberals going to vote for the three maple leaf design? Well, after sweating it out here during the summer and most of the fall, you would have thought that possibly the Liberals would have voted for a flag which had been put to us on a take it or leave it basis. You would have thought that. I am glad the hon. gentleman did pose the question because a lot of people do not understand there was a preference. However, everyone voted against that Pearson flag; no one voted for it, not even one teeny, weeny, little Liberal.

Now, to me, it is a shocking thing—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; in the remaining minutes the hon. member has at his disposal, I wonder if he would limit his remarks to the subject matter of the debate?

Mr. Pugh: Well, yes, Mr. Speaker; if I had another 20 minutes, I would go on—

Mr. Grégoire: No, no; spare us.

Mr. Pugh: If I had another 20 minutes, I would go on extolling the virtues of the hon. member for York-Humber, the one Liberal who spoke this morning. I would recommend to the people all over Canada that they read his speech. I would recommend that they take his speech to heart. I would recommend that Liberal members should take it to heart. I hope that when you open your mail and when you read your newspapers or listen to other news media throughout Canada tomorrow, you will really take these remarks to heart because, in my opinion, they present the crux of the whole situation. As I say, Mr. Speaker, if I had 20 minutes I would take portions of that speech and put them forward.

However, may I content myself by saying, in conclusion, that there is merit, not only merit but absolute necessity, in the idea of holding a plebiscite at the present time. My reason for saying this is that the people of Canada have before them something that goes deeper than a little piece of legislation which is brought before the house. It goes to the very depth of our being, our historical background, and all of those things which count. This is not something that can be settled as easily as some legislative matters.

However, there is a far more important factor in my opinion, and that is that parliament is not the place to settle the flag question. This flag issue should be removed from parliament now so, as some hon. members suggest, we can get on with other more important business. I have another reason which I feel is cogent and irrefutable, and that is that so far as the public are concerned the flag question has become political in the extreme. I feel that if there is any choice made in this House of Commons, people all over Canada are going to remain divided on this issue. There is not going to be any settlement of it by a vote of this House of Commons. There will always be a substantial number of people who will feel the flag has been railroaded through. Later on, it will be felt that the flag has been railroaded through by a minority or, as the hon. member for York-Humber has said, by a minority of minorities, because most members who sit in this house are here on minority votes.

As I said before, I do not want a flag that is the laughingstock of the country, or one that was brought about by tactics. I want a flag that I can look at, just as I look at our Canadian flag today, a flag that has my respect, a flag which I know has the respect of the nations around the world.

Mr. F. J. W. Fane (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped I would not have found it necessary to make a second speech on the flag issue and make it today. I say that I had hoped I would not have been called upon to make a speech at this time because it was my hope, my vain hope, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) would have smartened up to some extent by this time and would have seen the handwriting on the wall or listened to the voice of the people of Canada demanding that the flag issue be settled by a plebiscite. Either that, or it should be dropped entirely because we want to continue with the flag that has been Canada's for so many years, at least until it becomes possible to choose a flag that will represent the wishes of the vast majority of the people of Canada.

It is amazing that in their wisdom the Prime Minister and the government have not seen fit to call this debate off. It is not the opposition that is continuing the debate; it is the government. The majority of the people of Canada wish to have a chance to say what flag shall be Canada's for all time to come. This is not a today, tomorrow or next year deal. When the flag is chosen it will be forever.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There are conversations going on across the aisle, something which is highly reprehensible and which makes it difficult for the Chair to follow the speech being made. If hon. members wish to continue their conversations I invite them to do so outside the chamber.

Mr. Fane: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, although I must say it does not worry me because I have been interrupted many times from the people on my left. As I was saying, the vast majority of the people of Canada—

Mr. Grégoire: Only six now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fane: As I remarked, Mr. Speaker, the leader of "la canaille à gauche", that is the rabble to the left does not worry me a bit, but I can tell you that whenever he carries on in this way he is degrading the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. May I invite the hon. member to return to the subject of his speech. I realize the hon. member was interrupted and I have tried to co-operate with him, but I would ask him to co-operate with the Chair and deal with the subject matter of the debate.

Mr. Fane: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, the people of Canada should have a chance to say whether they favour a new flag or not. They should have a chance to choose a flag which they can respect and, if necessary, fight for. It should be a flag worth that. The choice of a flag is for keeps and the majority of the people realize this.

The action of the Prime Minister makes me wonder who is blackmailing him and why he must pass on this blackmailing to parliament and the people of Canada. We are being presented with a flag that the majority of the people do not want pushed down their throats. I do not need to tell you where I stand, Mr. Speaker, because I am sure everybody in the country knows that the hon. member for Vegreville, Alberta, stands for a plebiscite on the flag issue. I also stand for the continuation of the Canadian red ensign as the flag of Canada, at least until we get something else that is worth standing for, looking up to and fighting for, and we sure have not got anything like that brought before us yet.

It has been suggested that the flag was the subject of an election promise in the 1962 and 1963 elections, but I can assure you it was not an issue in my constituency. I have told you previously that whenever I was asked about the flag I made it perfectly clear what flag I stood for, and why. In fact I got a standing ovation at each one of my meetings where I was asked about the flag. There were six candidates in my constituency and none of them mentioned the flag at any of the 12 joint meetings we had, and in addition to those meetings I had 45 meetings of my own. I believe 86 per cent of the eligible voters in my constituency voted and I got approximately 70 per cent of their votes. For that reason I believe I have a mandate to continue the attitude I have towards a plebiscite and a flag for Canada.

I know that the flag committee worked assiduously. It held 45 meetings in six weeks. Its members were chosen from all parties in the house and I know they were most fortunate in having such an estimable member as the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) as their chairman. Nobody can point a finger at anything wrong in what he did or said during the time he was chairman of that committee.

I am not qualified to say anything about how the committee did its work because I was not a member of it. I was perhaps a little too set in my ways on the Conservative side because, in the light of what has happened, I would not have given up one little bit of my support for the Canadian red ensign. However, I must say I was very shocked at the result of the committee's deliberations in bringing forward a flag that is not distinctive in any way. It certainly has got a red maple leaf, a dead maple leaf on it, but its background is exactly the same as the flag of Peru. How can that be considered a distinctive Canadian flag? The maple leaf alone is not adequate to make it distinctive. Though I hold the maple leaf in high regard it is not distinctive of Canada, except as an emblem used during war and on Canadian exports. In the part of Canada from which I come a great many of the people do not know what this is all about because they have never seen a maple leaf.

Before I get into trouble I intend to read the amendment which is before the house because I have to have something to follow and if I read this I will be speaking within the narrow lines of what I may speak about; I do not want to get off the track because I do not like to be called to order. The amendment moved by my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Monteith) is as follows:

> That the sixth report of the special committee be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to strike out paragraph 7 of the said report and substitute therefor the following:
> "However, as the final vote of the committee did not reveal a sufficient degree of unanimity for the proposed design for a national flag for Canada your committee therefore recommends that the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite to be held at the next general election in order that the Canadian people may be given heir rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag".
> And that the committee for such purpose be revived.

That is what I have to talk about for the rest of the time allotted to me.

I am amazed that so far only three of the members of the flag committee from the government side have seen fit to stand up and make their reports to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada. The five members from the Conservative party have made their reports. As to the members from the smaller parties, I believe none has so far made his report.

An hon. Member: There is one; the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott).

Mr. Fane: I am sorry. I am reminded that the hon. member for Danforth, of the New Democratic party, has made his report. I regret I omitted him. But the situation on the other side of the house is a very strange one. One wonders what is happening in the Liberal party. Have these people been told they must not speak? Are they afraid to speak? Surely they are not just zombies, now, unable to make up their minds about anything. One member has said his piece. He said it very well today and he is worthy of respect throughout Canada. As to the other two members who spoke from the government benches, the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Cadieux) made a good and sensible speech while the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) was his usual self. We will leave it at that.

This is only part of what we fail to understand. We wonder why during the last election spokesmen for the government said nothing about this intention to introduce a new flag. I suggest there was one good reason for this silence. Had the Liberal party come out and shown the people of Canada the flag they proposed to foist on them there would be 75 fewer Liberals in this house today. The people of Canada would not have accepted such a proposal no matter what they might have felt otherwise. I believe this to be a fact.

Speaking of the plebiscite, if the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the government are so sure they are right and that the people are behind them in their wish to have a new flag for Canada, why are they so afraid of letting the people express their views at the time of the next election? The cost would not be very great. In any case considerations as to cost would not deter the present government because they spend money like water, like a drunken sailor does, or is alleged to do. The amount of money it would cost to conduct a plebiscite on the flag issue at the time of the next election would be very small compared to the cost of the election itself. Indeed, about the only extra cost would be the extra ballot papers required and the transportation of those ballots to a central place for evaluation. Presumably less division would be created in Canada if the ballots were all brought to Ottawa and counted here. This flag issue is one which has divided Canada and set one part against another. And all this has happened for no good reason at all, because this issue is nothing but a phony issue; it is not a real issue in this country.

The people of Canada have a flag which they have looked up to and for which they have fought. Many thousands of Canadians have died under it. Though we did not carry it along with our advancing columns during the war, it was behind us. It was there. So we can say we lived under that flag, we fought for it, and many died for it.

In case anyone here has forgotten the constituency that I represent, let me remind him it is a constituency comprised of some 45,000 people. There are people of 40 different national origins there. There are 6,100 Anglo-Saxons. There are 30,000 whose origin is in some part of central Europe and 1,300 people of French Canadian origin. In addition there are 1,300 of our original citizens—the people we call North American Indians. Also living in this constituency are 3,000 people of German extraction, besides many of Norwegian, Swedish, Danish and Finnish origin, as well as representatives of almost every other nationality one cares to mention. I would say that 90 per cent of these people want a plebiscite. They want a voice in choosing the flag which will fly over them, a flag they will be able to respect. That is what they say. I think that if the plebiscite were held there would be an almost 100 per cent turnout of electors because, as I have said, in the last election I believe 86 per cent of the electors of my constituency turned out to vote.

I have had many, many letters from and many, many interviews with various people in my constituency. I said in my last address that only three people had told me they stood for the three maple leaf flag. I have had one letter supporting this new flag with one red maple leaf on a white background, with red borders at each end of the flag. This man wrote to me, "Let's stop talking about it and get on with the business of Canada".

Mr. Fane: That is one man out of 45,000, which is not a very big percentage.

Mr. Brewin: One wise man.

Mr. Fane: I might also say, Mr. Speaker, that the N.D.P. did not do too well in my constituency, and they are not likely to do well in the future either. I am just stating facts which have nothing to do with me, but just with them. Thousands of people have told me, "Let's have a plebiscite and let's say what flag we want". That is my mandate, Mr. Speaker, and that is why I can stand up today in this house, or on any other day that I am allowed to do so, and say these things; and what I have said I will say anywhere, because I am willing to stand behind anything I have said.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit one question?

Mr. Fane: I certainly will permit one question from my hon. friend.

Mr. Leduc: The hon. member has mentioned that he stands behind every word he has said. Would he stand behind his word when he said that the people in his riding did not know what a maple leaf was?

Mr. Fane: I said that the vast majority of my people had never seen a maple leaf, and that is quite different. They know what a maple leaf is supposed to look like, but they have never seen one, because they do not grow in my part of the country.

Mr. Dupuis: You don't have any money there? You can't travel and see them?

An hon. Member: Not from selling bumper stickers.

Mr. Fane: Oh, I could not take a trip to Asia and all over the world, as did the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis). I do not have the government behind me at the moment.

Mr. Dinsdale: He was selling stickers.

An hon. Member: Haven't your people seen pictures of a maple leaf?

Mr. Fane: You can see a replica or depiction of something almost anywhere, but until you come to this part of the country you probably do not see maple leaves in real life.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Fane: How profound, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dupuis: Question.

Mr. Fane: I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that after all these interruptions members of the various parties who have been yelling for the question to be put think I am going to sit down and let it happen. How wrong they are, because I am just not that type. I wish to say again that it amazes me that all the Liberal members do not rise in their seats and say where they stand on this flag issue. Are they scared? Are they brainwashed? Are they just following orders, like the trained seals they are emulating? They will not get up and speak; they only speak from their seats. They will not get up and identify themselves. Are they sitting on the fence in the hope that they will get some reflected glory because they did not say anything? They are plenty vocal at other times, so why do they not get up and speak in this debate? Why can they not get up and state where they stand, in some way other than just sitting in their seats and interrupting those who hope they have something to say in which their people will be interested? That also goes for the other parties, the lesser groups in this house. They are not carrying their weight in this debate; they sit around and yell "filibuster" and let it go at that. That is their contribution. What a contribution, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

REPRESENTATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE NAME OF LAPOINTE CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-66, to amend the Representation Act.

He said:

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it will only take me two minutes to explain this bill. Its purpose is to change the name of the electoral district of "Lapointe" to that of "Jonquière".

I should remind the house that such was the promise made by Liberal candidates during the last election.

As a matter of fact, I wish to point out that this promise was made by the former Liberal member for Lapointe, Mr. Augustin Brassard, at a public meeting attended by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), who applauded and said the promise would be kept.

The promise was also made by the Liberal candidate during the 1963 election campaign.

It was also taken up by the Tory candidates during the 1962 and 1963 elections.

It was also promised by the N.D.P. candidate in 1963; that party had no candidate in my riding, in 1962.

In fact, I was the only one not to promise that. I felt that it should not be part of my platform, but it was promised by the Liberal candidate and former member, for the riding, before the present Prime Minister, who was then leader of the opposition. That promise was made with the approval of the present Prime Minister, and in his presence. Since the Prime Minister now seeks to keep his promise concerning the adoption of a national flag within two years, I am sure he will want his party to keep the promise made by its candidate in the riding of Lapointe, just as he is making praiseworthy efforts to keep his pledge with respect to the adoption of a distinctive flag.

Mr. Speaker, I did not make that promise during the election campaign, but afterwards, I received many such requests from chambers of commerce, service clubs and the municipalities of Jonquière, Kénogami and Arvida. I even received some from tourist associations, etc., because all feel that by substituting the name of Jonquière for that of Lapointe, it would be easier to locate the riding in the interest of the tourist industry and others.

Mr. Speaker, the constituency of Lapointe has been named after Jean Lapointe, the first farmer in that area. The name of Msgr. Lapointe, the first bishop of the diocese, is also mentioned.

Mr. Choquette: And Ernest Lapointe.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lotbinière has just mentioned the name of Mr. Ernest Lapointe. But in the opinion of all, the riding was so named in honour of the first farmer of the district, Mr. Jean Lapointe.

Under the circumstances, there are no political implications involved. As a matter of fact, the provincial riding bears the name of Jonquière, and since the largest city of the county is called Jonquière, there is every indication that this name would be more appropriate and, at the same time, more suitable for the people.

Representatives of all political parties have submitted requests to me and the Liberal member for Jonquière in the Quebec legislature told me himself that he approved this change of designation. It must be remembered that he also represents a large number of electors.

Therefore, I submit that this bill deals with a change of name only and does not involve any government policy. It is only a matter of granting the wishes of the electors of that riding.

It has been said also that consideration of that bill could be postponed until redistribution has been completed because the limits of some ridings will change.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to make it clear that the limits of the riding of Lapointe will not change because our region is rather remote, a national park a hundred miles long cuts through it and there is not a house, post office or resident near it. Therefore, nothing will be added to it.

In the area itself, the four constituencies are extremely well divided, proportionately, according to new standards adopted in the legislation concerning redistribution.

No changes are expected in our area.

Mr. Speaker, before ending my remarks, I would like to say that if the house welcomes this change of name, it will be an all-party agreement. One group will not be allowed to take credit for it more than another because it is a matter where there is no room for politics. I am not asking this change for a personal advantage but for that of my constituents.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Grégoire: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dupuis: Could the hon. member tell the house whether the constituency of Lapointe also includes the municipalities of Arvida and Kénogami? If so, does he not think that he should include the names of Kénogami and Arvida and change the present designation of his constituency to that of Kénogami-Jonquière-Arvida?

Does he not feel that, should changes be made a few months from now, following the redistribution—and time only will tell—should the municipalities of Arvida and Kénogami be removed from the riding of Lapointe, it would be wiser to wait until the establishment of the new redistribution since everything could then be settled in a more useful and permanent way?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Minister without Portfolio has asked that question, and I wish to tell him that I have had representations from the Jonquière, Kénogami and Arvida chambers of commerce, as well as from social clubs in Kénogami and Arvida. All these organizations requested, almost unanimously, that the name of the electoral district be changed to Jonquière only, and not to Jonquière-Kénogami-Arvida.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Representatives from the various service clubs in the towns of Arvida and Kénogami made representations with a view to changing the name of the electoral district to Jonquière, and that opinion was unanimous throughout the district.

The representatives of owners' leagues in Jonquière and Arvida also requested that it be named only Jonquière, and not Jonquière-Kénogami-Arvida.

Moreover, it is not always advantageous to represent a riding with a compound or long name like St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville. In fact, I remember hearing the Minister without Portfolio say that the name of his constituency is rather long. I can even recall that two years ago he said that St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville was a rather long name for an electoral district, and I think he was right at the time.

Mr. Speaker, since the representatives of the four parties of the riding of Lapointe as well as the Liberal member for Jonquière at the legislative assembly unanimously agree that the constituency of Lapointe should bear the name of Jonquière, I feel that we should pass this bill. It would then be a move made by the four political parties, not only by one. We would thus meet the wishes of my constituents, in general those who live in the riding of Lapointe, and I would be happy if the promise made officially by the Liberal candidate, in 1962, in the presence of the present Prime Minister, were kept. All the voters in the riding of Lapointe would then be satisfied.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question? He is probably aware that in English we sometimes say that a rose by any other name would smell as sweet. I am sure there is a comparable expression in French. I am wondering whether we would feel the same about the hon. member, whom we have got to know and love as the member for Lapointe, if his name were changed. Would he smell the same with a different name?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) may rest assured that, within a month, he will have heard the name of the constituency Jonquière often enough so that this name will become as favourably known as it was in the past.

Mr. G. C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, we heard the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) mention the promises made by the former member for Lapointe, by the former candidates and by the provincial members.

But apart from the statements which were made in this house by the hon. member for Lapointe, I have no personal knowledge of any representations which would have been made—

Mr. Grégoire: In Montreal.

Mr. Lachance: —either by the electors of this riding or by the various organizations, chambers of commerce, municipalities, etc. Mr. Speaker, changing the name of a riding is just as serious as changing the name of an individual, and the hon. member for Lapointe must have very serious and interesting reasons to put forward this request, but the house must study this question as seriously as it would for any other riding.

He spoke of the representations made to him.

As I just said, I personally did not get any. I never heard about that. It may be that I did not happen to read certain newspapers of that area which might have dealt with the question, but I never heard about it in my riding, in Montreal or in Ottawa.

Mr. Grégoire: No wonder.

Mr. Lachance: Have representations been made also to other authorities, to this government or to the chief electoral officer?

I could not say but I never heard about it.

Now, as the hon. member for Lapointe said, the name of the riding would be changed as a result of representations made by candidates or members. It could be a good reason for discussing the matter. That is what we are doing today.

But I do not feel it is sufficient reason to pass the bill as hastily as all that, without giving it very serious consideration.

A moment ago the hon. member for Lapointe referred to the forthcoming redistribution. Perhaps the boundaries of this constituency will not be changed but, there again, the hon. member can give us no assurance.

Indeed, the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) told us that other cities and towns might be interested.

If an inquiry were made, perhaps we would find that both Arvida and Kenogami are interested in having their name given to the constituency now called Lapointe.

There are other municipalities in the constituency of Lapointe. I am sure that the hon. member for Lapointe knows them very well because he has surely visited them. There are, in addition to Jonquière, the municipalities of Larouche, Bourget, Taché —great names—

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I would point out to the hon. member for Lafontaine that there are no municipalities of Bourget and Taché, but that there are the townships of Bourget and Taché.

As this hon. member seems to have absolutely no information about my constituency, I am not surprised to see that he was not aware of any representations—

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hon. member may disagree with what is being said by the hon. member for Lafontaine. The point he is raising now is refutation. It is not a point of order. The hon. member for Lafontaine.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of course, of the store of knowledge of the hon. member for Lapointe, but I think he must know whether township municipalities exist. When one mentions a township or a municipality, it is for the purpose of an enumeration and I note that after the towns of Larouche, Bourget and Taché we also find Labrie and Bégin, for example—

Mr. Choquette: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Does the municipality owe its name to Hon. Joseph D. Bégin, a great friend of the hon. member for Lapointe?

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I cannot—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, there is in fact a municipality of Bégin. The name has existed for a long time; it is a parish where respectable persons are living and I could not perhaps say as much about the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Lachance: I should like to add that the constituency of Lapointe was established following the 1941 census. It was created in 1947 under a new legislation, and it was first represented by Mr. Jules Gauthier.

Mr. Grégoire: A notary from Jonquière.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I did some research in order to find the origin of the name of this constituency.

The hon. member for Lapointe referred to a certain Jean Lapointe, a farmer of that district.

People I met told me that there might be some relationship between the designation of that riding and the name of a great Canadian, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, as well as that of Bishop Lapointe, at one time teacher at the Chicoutimi seminary and also vicar general of the Chicoutimi diocese, who died in 1947.

It should also be noted that the hon. member for Lapointe did mention it a few moments ago.

If we refer to a speech which is probably the first made by the first member of parliament for Lapointe in this house, we can read this, among other things, as reported in Hansard for April 4, 1950, page 1559:

> The county of Lapointe the name of which recalls both Mgr. Eugène Lapointe and his namesake the former minister of justice, owes to him—at least to a great extent—its existence as a distinct unit.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the first hon. member for Lapointe is apparently recalling—and this was in 1950, shortly after the setting up of the county—that that name has some connection with those of Mgr. Eugène Lapointe and the Hon. Ernest Lapointe. However, he did not mention the name of Mr. Jean Lapointe who was no doubt an honourable gentleman but only referred to Mr. Ernest Lapointe and Mgr. Lapointe.

Now, it could be that that name was chosen to commemorate the name of Mr. Jean Lapointe, but, personally, I think that if the house is of the opinion that Hon. Mr. Ernest Lapointe was a great statesman and if the name of Lapointe should be changed today, I would be very sorry to see that name disappear when it commemorates such important men as the former minister of justice, that great French Canadian statesman.

I also noticed several other things. The citizens of the city of Jonquière would certainly be very pleased to see the name of the riding changed to Jonquière. The hon. member for Lapointe told us that some people in Arvida and Kénogami were also in agreement.

I said that personally I had never heard of it. I would think that the people of Jonquière would not want to be accused of selfishness with regard to the other two large cities of that riding by having the name of the riding changed.

I congratulate the hon. member on the love he feels for his riding. But I do not think he should let his love strangle and kill it by wanting to give it a new entity through a new name, for instance.

There is no doubt that this matter of redistribution, which is to be carried out soon, is extremely important at this stage. I do not think the house has given adequate consideration to this problem to be able to take a decision today. There is a committee which has been established through legislation passed by the house to study the problem of redistribution. I believe, and the hon. member for Lapointe is quite aware of it, that representations could be made to the commissioners and other people whose function it is to study the problems of the new redistribution.

That is all I have to say. I know that the hon. member for Lapointe is interested in this matter. I commend him for it. But we are interested too in having more details. I should appreciate it very much if the hon. member for Lapointe would send us copies of those resolutions from municipalities or organizations, if any. We must admit that within a municipality or an association, there could be one group in favour of a certain project while the other would not be. I do not know whether the majority of associations within his riding wish the name to be changed. I do not know whether there is a majority of municipalities or cities in favour of that change.

The hon. member for Lapointe said he made no promises. I congratulate him for this. He did not promise to change the name. I suggest he must feel very comfortable, whether a change is made or not. Therefore, if the hon. member for Lapointe made no promises in this regard his electors should not hold anything against him in the event of the name of the Lapointe constituency remaining as it is.

Mr. Grégoire: It is impossible, Mr. Speaker, because my constituents, far from holding a grudge against me, are satisfied with me.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I submit that before the house decides to change the name of a constituency, particularly when it is a constituency bearing the name of great men whose names went down in history, the matter has to be considered very seriously. Moreover, all those of this riding who are represented by associations or groups of the various political parties, and even those who are not interested in politics, must be heard. Otherwise, it would remove famous names from the electoral map, thus creating a most important precedent.

Mr. Grégoire: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Lachance: Certainly.

Mr. Grégoire: After hearing the hon. member for Lafontaine, I feel he would probably be in favour of holding a plebiscite in his electoral district, in this connection. Is that what he means when he says that everyone would like to be heard? Is that what he is suggesting, that a plebiscite be held in the district of Lapointe?

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I am in a good position to answer this question, for I have not spoken of a plebiscite but only of the resolutions put forward by various public organizations. The hon. member for Lapointe introduced the subject himself, saying he had received representations from various municipal councils, public organizations, chambers of commerce and others.

I have not seen as yet the resolution by those public bodies or those municipalities.

I do not know if the hon. member for Lapointe has resolutions from those public bodies. This is not a question of a plebiscite. I did not say that the voters of the constituency should cast their votes to decide if it must change its name, if it must be called the constituency of Lapointe or if it should changed to the constituency of Jonquière or, as suggested or mentioned by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis), to the name of Kenogami-Jonquière-Arvida.

We are prepared to accept the word of the hon. member for Lapointe when he says that representations were made to him. Only we did not see those representations, and we would be interested in questioning those people through some committee which might be interested in hearing them. Changing the name of a riding is a very serious matter.

Those were the remarks I intended to make on that issue. I am not against the change, but I would like this matter to be considered more closely by a special committee or by the privileges and elections committee.

Mr. Grégoire: How many members would sit on the committee? Would this matter be referred to a parliamentary committee?

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a committee which could examine the case quite properly, the privileges and elections committee.

However, Mr. Speaker, I was talking more particularly about the committee which is looking after redistribution at present. That was the agency I was referring to when I mentioned that a committee or a public body could be appointed to examine this question.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Lafontaine (Mr. Lachance) for his speech on the bill before us. I agree with his views and on the way he looks upon the situation.

First of all, I think the constituency of Lapointe, as was clearly pointed out by the hon. member for Lafontaine, was named after great public men, two great French Canadians: Monseigneur Lapointe and Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe.

As French Canadians we are proud that the name of one of our great Canadians who distinguished himself in public life be preserved forever in our memory through the designation of a county, an electoral constituency in the province of Quebec.

Here may I recall a souvenir going back to the first days of the war. It seems that I can still hear Hon. Ernest Lapointe, one fall evening, speak for Canada in bidding godspeed to those of us who were about to go and defend our liberties outside the country.

It was most edifying to hear Hon. Ernest Lapointe, and I am convinced that it was especially so across French Canada where the people were particularly proud to see the fate of Canada in the hands of such a great man.

There are also many other reasons, as mentioned by the hon. member for Lafontaine, why we should keep the name of Lapointe for the county represented in the house by the sponsor of this bill. I think the hon. member for Lafontaine made a strong case when he suggested that the whole question be fully considered before a decision is reached. There is also the matter of redistribution and I am afraid the county of Lapointe will not be spared.

There again, changes will be made and, for all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the hon. member for Lafontaine is perfectly right.

I cannot but wonder in seeing that the present member for Lapointe who usually attaches so much importance to Canadian names and who calls for special attention concerning anything of interest to French Canadians, has thought of suggesting a new name for his riding. He may not have done so deliberately, but if we agreed to the change, we would be responsible to a certain degree towards our fellow citizens for insinuations to the effect that we do not show enough regard and respect for the memory of a man who has played such an important role in Canadian politics, Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. But, personally, I think that changing the name of a riding, as was so well said by the hon. member for Lafontaine, is somewhat like changing the name of an individual. It must be done only if the reasons for such a change are sufficient.

I am sorry to tell the hon. member for Lapointe that I think the reasons he put forward are not important. I like to see the whole people of a riding pay homage to one of our compatriots who gave the best of his life, in saying that they live in the riding named after one of our great Canadians, namely Ernest Lapointe.

Mr. Speaker, I have other reasons to oppose the change of name—reasons that I would rather keep to myself—and I believe that as a representative in this house, I do not have to grant any consideration to the hon. member requesting such a change. For all those reasons, I shall oppose the adoption of this bill.

[Text]

Mr. John Mullally (Kings): Mr. Speaker, the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) reads in part:

> Paragraph 25 of that part of the schedule to the Representation Act, dealing with the description of the electoral districts in the province of Quebec, which describes the electoral district of Lapointe, is amended by substituting for the word: "Lapointe", the word: "Jonquière" at the beginning of the said description.

In essence its purpose is to change the name of the riding. Like the other two hon. members who preceded me I regret I have to oppose this request by our good friend from Lapointe.

I should start out by saying that the constituency of Lapointe arose out of a report by a committee that was appointed following the census of 1941 to change the representation of the various constituencies. That committee reported in 1947, and the substance of the report can be summarised in these few words: "The committee recommends a new constituency, known as Lapointe, to be created out of the western half of Chicoutimi."

When the report of that committee was incorporated in the Representation Act of 1952, which the hon. member seeks to amend, it said, speaking of Lapointe:

> The Representation Act, 1947, chapter 71, 11 George VI, states:
> Lapointe, consisting of the city of Arvida and the towns of Kénogami and Jonquière, together with that part of the county of Chicoutimi situated west of the western limits of the townships of Gagné, Tremblay, Chicoutimi, Laterrière, the western part of the townships of Lartigue and Lapointe situated west of the Boisvert river (Cyriac) together with the whole territory situated north of the townships of Falardeau, Bégin, Labrecque, and west of a meridian line passing through the northeast angle of the township of Falardeau.

That is the description of the hon. member's riding.

It might be interesting for the house to know—and this relates to an observation made a few moments ago by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis)—that this is not the first effort to have the name of the hon. member's riding changed.

On January 15, 1957 the then hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Girard), who was an independent member, introduced Bill C-11 for the purpose of changing the name of the electoral district of Lapointe to that of Jonquière-Kénogami-Arvida. The bill was read for the first time and did not come up for debate subsequently that session. I believe, Mr. Speaker, this indicates that the suggestion made by the Minister without Portfolio has some merit because, as I understand it, the three largest localities or cities in the hon. member's riding, according to the 1961 census, are Jonquière, with a population of 28,000 odd, Arvida, with a population of 14,000 odd and Kénogami with a population of 11,000 odd.

I would like very briefly to relate the history of various efforts made during the past 12 years, since the Representation Act of 1952, by members representing different constituencies to have the names of their constituencies changed. From the very quick bit of research I did I find there were 20 bills introduced during those 12 years to have the names of constituencies changed. This is probably not a correct figure because in some instances they were repetitions of previous efforts that were unsuccessful, or which did not come up for debate in the house.

Of these 20 attempts that were made only five were successful. I shall review them quickly and indicate which were successful, but in most cases it will be found that rather than changing the name of a constituency there was merely added another word to make the name more meaningful, and representative of all the area covered by the riding.

The first effort to have a name changed was in the 1952-53 session when Mr. Studer attempted to have the riding Swift Current changed to Swift Current-Maple Creek. That was not successful but in the following session a successful attempt was made by Mr. Harrison to have the name changed to Swift Current-Maple Creek.

In 1955 the present hon. member for the riding of Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. McWilliam) was successful in having the name Miramichi added to the riding of Northumberland in New Brunswick. In 1957 Mr. Girard, in the instance I have just mentioned, attempted to have the name Lapointe changed to Jonquière-Chicoutimi. This did not come up for debate and, of course, no change was made. In 1959, Mr. Fréchette attempted to have the name Témiscouata changed to Rivière-du-Loup-Témiscouata. The bill lapsed. In the same session the hon. member now representing Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) attempted to have the name of the territory of Keewatin-Franklin changed to Northwest Territories. He made a number of attempts before he was finally successful. In 1960 there was an effort by the hon. member for the constituency then known as Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Rapp) to add the word "Tisdale" to the name of the constituency, and the hon. member was unsuccessful. Again in the same session the hon. member for Yukon was unsuccessful in having the name Keewatin-Franklin changed to its present title.

In the session 1960-61 there were at least four attempts to have the names of ridings changed. This time the hon. member for the constituency then known as Humboldt-Melfort was successful in having the name "Tisdale" added to the other two names of his riding. An attempt was made by Mr. Asselin to have the name Montmorency added to Charlevoix. It was unsuccessful. Mr. Valade sought to have the name of his riding, St. Mary's, changed to Camilien Houde. He was unsuccessful.

In 1962, the hon. member for Yukon was successful at last in having the name of the riding of Keewatin-Franklin changed to the Northwest Territories as it is now, and the representative for the constituency then known as Nanaimo, Mr. Matthews, was successful in having the name of that riding changed to Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. The then hon. member representing Inverness-Richmond, Mr. MacLellan, attempted to have the name of that riding changed to Inverness-Richmond-Cape Breton West. He was unsuccessful. The then hon. member for Halifax, Mr. Morris, sought to have the name of that riding changed to Halifax, Dartmouth and County, but he was unsuccessful.

In the more recent sessions of 1962-63 and 1963 the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Bélanger) attempted to have the name Montmorency added to that of his riding but he was not successful. Now in 1964 we have before us the bill brought up by the hon. member for Lapointe asking the house that the name of the constituency of Lapointe be changed to Jonquière.

My hon. friend from Lafontaine (Mr. Lachance) supported by an hon. member opposite gave proper reasons, in my view, why the name of Lapointe should be retained. Despite what the sponsor of the bill had to say, I believe this riding was named after a great Canadian statesman, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. The hon. member in introducing this bill told us, as far as I can gather, that the main reason for seeking a change was that all the other candidates and party leaders except himself had promised the name would be changed. In view of what happened in that riding during the election I would imagine that the hon. member, who of course was successful, would be superstitious enough to be reluctant to have the name altered in any way.

I am opposing a change in name for three reasons. First, as I said, I believe this riding was named for a great French Canadian, Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, a statesman who made an outstanding contribution to the public life of this country. I am sure this view will be shared by those of my colleagues, and others, who come from the province of Quebec and who would, I am sure, be unhappy to see the name of this gentleman taken from its present place. I could speak at length about the contribution made to Canadian public life by Mr. Lapointe but I do not think this is the occasion on which to do so. But I think it would be wrong for us to make any effort to change the name of a riding which was, I am sure, called after this great French Canadian statesman.

My second reason for opposing this bill is the fact that we recently set up a redistribution commission to bring about necessary changes in the constituencies of this country. In these circumstances I think it would be premature to make any effort to change even the name of a constituency. I do not think there is any good reason for the request contained in this bill. From rumours most of us have heard it seems every riding in the country will undergo at least minor changes and it is almost inconceivable that the riding of Lapointe will be an exception.

My third reason for opposing any change is this: I believe that before we can accept a proposal of this kind, logical reasons must be advanced in its favour. I do not think such reasons have been advanced on this occasion. The hon. member said this change had been promised, but advanced very little by way of further justification. I would point out that any change of this kind is bound to result in some confusion. Difficulties are bound to arise when anything of this nature is done. For these reasons I have to oppose this measure.

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with sustained interest to the arguments put forward by one side and the other, in the discussion of the bill now before the house, to have the name of the Lapointe constituency changed to that of Jonquière.

I have listened to the arguments offered by the hon. member who is the mover of the bill, and in support of his bill, he referred to the numerous representations from various public bodies in favour of the proposed change.

It is quite possible that the people in Lapointe riding are as anxious to have the name of their constituency changed as they are to have their member of parliament replaced. But I do not think too much attention can be given to his suggestions.

The name of Lapointe is of course a short name easy to remember. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be well to strongly advocate simplification, clarity and concision in riding names, so that they may be more easily understood by the people than complicated and endless names like those of Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie, St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville, Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière, Winnipeg South Centre, Winnipeg North Centre, Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Speaker, if you ask the man in the street, the layman, in what riding he lives, in what riding he must vote, when the riding is called Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale, Okanagan-Revelstoke, surely there are people who may be very much confused with such complicated designations. That is why I am strongly in favour of a simplification of the names of those ridings, because, after all, those ridings are represented by members and must be well known by the people because they are in the final analysis in the public interest.

The simpler, the clearer and the easier to understand things are, the more people have a chance to understand them—

Mr. Matheson: Yes.

Mr. Choquette: —as is pointed out by my hon. and distinguished friend from Leeds. Indeed, Leeds is a name which is easy to remember, all the more so because its member is one of the most admirable and most distinguished citizens, and his contribution to the House of Commons is always exceptional.

Mr. Speaker, no doubt the hon. member for Lapointe had serious reasons for submitting his bill. It would, indeed, have added to his personal prestige to be credited with a change of name.

Still, I am surprised to see him insist so much, with such gusto on electoral promises which may have been made by former members of parliament or Liberal candidates for the district of Lapointe.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that so far as electoral promises are concerned, we are doing splendidly. The new redistribution bill has, after all, been passed during the present session and the speakers who have preceded me think highly of it. Redistribution will make possible the geographical adjustments and divisions which are needed; it will make it possible also to change names where it seems imperative to do so.

In my opinion, the bill submitted by the hon. member for Lapointe is only precipitating events because the commissions which will have to hold public hearings and people who will have complaints to make about the limits of the ridings where they vote or which they represent will have an opportunity to state their views fully at those public meetings.

It seems to me, therefore, that trying to precipitate changes is simply going too fast. Of course, it is a characteristic of the Ralliement Créditiste always to go farther than necessary—

Mr. Bélanger: Forward.

Mr. Choquette: They ask that family allowances be doubled, that old age pensions be increased, that retirement age be reduced to 65 years of age, that income tax be decreased and that even students be granted salaries. One must not be surprised then when those people make such absurd remarks—

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the bill before the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for Lotbinière allow me a question?

I do not know if I misunderstood him. It was not his intention perhaps, but in reading over Hansard, he will realize no doubt that his words did not reflect his thoughts.

Did he mean to say it was impossible to increase family allowances or to reduce the retirement age?

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. This question does not deal with the problem before the house at the moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, to return to the subject, we are certainly in favour of family allowances—

Some hon. Members: This is not the subject.

Mr. Choquette: We are in favour of increasing family allowances, but to return to the subject, Mr. Speaker, as a member favouring an increase in family allowances, I will continue to discuss the bill now before us.

Mr. Speaker, the name of Lapointe has great lustre, as the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Mullally) pointed out a few moments ago. This is a name that can also have some semantic value and can be analysed. And when one reads the explanations given in Larousse on these words, one sees that the word "pointe" cannot better describe the member representing the constituency of Lapointe.

For instance, the word "pointe" means—

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, I would recall that a while ago you called the hon. member for Lotbinière to order.

At this moment, does he wish to speak about Ernest Lapointe or about the member for Lapointe?

If he is talking about the present member, he is out of order. If he attributes this definition to Ernest Lapointe, he should say so. However, Mr. Speaker, when one does not know what to say, one should consult the dictionary.

I would like to point out to the hon. member for Lotbinière that it is six o'clock.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, the word "pointe" also means a very small quantity. That gives a very good description of the hon. member for Lapointe: a very small quantity. It also means—

Mr. Grégoire: Small, yes, but it penetrates everywhere. Just like the point of a needle, which seems to be the effect I have had on the hon. member for Lotbinière.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Venom also penetrates.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. Would the hon. gentleman resume his seat, please. The hour for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could put a question to the acting house leader with respect to the business of the house for next week. If by any chance the current debate on the flag is not concluded in the early part of the week, could there be consultations as to the possibility of setting aside a day to deal with the Canada labour code?

Miss LaMarsh: I will be glad to bring this to the attention of the house leader, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, December 7, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Seventh and eighth reports of standing committee on public accounts—Mr. Baldwin.

CANADIAN FLAG

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Friday, December 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Batten that the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

Mr. F. J. W. Fane (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, when I had to stop speaking on Friday afternoon because of the advent of five o'clock and the private members' hour, I had reached a point in my address where I was saying that I hoped the Prime Minister would either listen to the pleas of 64 per cent of the people of Canada who have called for a plebiscite or withdraw his motion to introduce a new flag at this time. Since then I have had that request reinforced by the knowledge that people are not now saying "Let us stop talking about the flag issue", but they are saying "Let it come before a plebiscite so it can be taken out of politics and the people of Canada can decide what they want to do about a new flag, the flag that is going to be their flag forever". This will be their flag not just until another parliament and government are elected. This time the flag is for keeps. There will not be any backing up on it after it is approved, whether the people like it or not.

I inquired of the government what was the great compulsion to have this issue settled now. Who is blackmailing the Prime Minister? Why must he pass this blackmail on to the rest of Canada? Why must he pass it on to parliament and demand that we decide an issue that is so divisive? Nothing could be more divisive than to have the flag decided by the members of parliament because, on the whole, they were not given a mandate to decide it.

I also wondered what had happened to the great Liberal party which forms the government. Its members were very vocal, especially when in opposition. Why can't they get up now and make their personal feelings known to their constituents and to Canada as a whole? They just sit back like a bunch of zombies. A few of them are always—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I can appreciate the hon. member's line of argument, but the point at issue is the plebiscite.

Mr. Fane: Yes, sir, the point at issue is the plebiscite, and I am asking why they do not get up and talk on that point at issue. They act as if their brains have been picked. They act just like bodies moving around not of their own volition. Three of them have spoken already, but where are the rest? I would like to mention names but I shall not. Surely these silent members have decided views. Surely the people they represent have decided views. Why are these members so silent, except when they interrupt from their seats and try to hinder others who do wish to speak on this issue?

Mr. Grégoire: Question.

Mr. Fane: The little turkey gobblers are at it again.

Mr. Caouette: Speak about something you know.

Mr. Fane: The hon. member says to speak about something I know. I was a farmer and kept turkeys on my farm. Listening to the party on my far left makes me thing that this is killing time for turkeys on the farm.

Mr. Grégoire: You are more interesting when you speak about the farm.

Mr. Fane: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Lapointe would only talk about what he knows he would be forever silent.

Mr. Grégoire: I know something about a filibuster.

Mr. Fane: Mr. Speaker, I was saying that the people of Canada want to be consulted, and they should be consulted. The Prime Minister and his government should either withdraw this motion or agree to hold a plebiscite at the time of the next general election. The people of Canada could then decide what they wish to do about the flag, whether to keep the present one or accept the one which was chosen by the committee.

By the way, that latter flag is not distinctive. The only distinctive thing about it is the red maple leaf. Why could they not have chosen a green maple leaf or something like that? If they wanted to have a maple leaf, why could it not have been green so as to show the surging life of Canada? Canada has a great future. In time to come Canada will probably be the leader of the nations of the world. Why have a dead maple leaf on our flag? Why not a green one to show the nation's surging life? With that thought I will close my remarks.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): On rising to take part in this debate one cannot but be conscious of the time which has passed in discussion of this matter. One is conscious also of the time which has elapsed by reason of continual delays on the part of the government itself with regard to this whole question.

One of the things which impresses me greatly in this regard is the priority which the Prime Minister has given to this issue during the last several months.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Nasserden: By his interruption the hon. member opposite reinforces my argument that the government feels there is some great urgency attached to this particular measure. I am very conscious of what has taken place. The Prime Minister eloquently drew our attention to what he called the urgency of this question when it was first introduced, and this sense of urgency on the part of the government and its supporters has not decreased.

We need only look at what has happened during the past few months to realize, however, that the sense of urgency spoken of by the Prime Minister was something he had pulled out of his head with regard to this measure. All the opposition groups in parliament have asked that this issue be given a lesser priority than certain other measures which should be brought before parliament in order that something might be done directly for the benefit of Canadians.

In the last few days the third, fourth and fifth parties have shown—and this is an interesting development—that they are willing to barter away the urgency of the other priorities in order that this particular measure may be disposed of as quickly and as carelessly as possible. The Prime Minister as the chief executive officer of the House of Commons has been the architect of a variety of measures of closure with respect to the business of the House of Commons, but no single action has held up the work of the House of Commons to such an extent as his rugged insistence that this measure should be disposed of before others are brought forward.

We can think of the report of the committee itself, which was not altogether the report that I imagine the Prime Minister himself expected but nevertheless a report that brought in a recommendation that rejected the first and foremost premise upon which the Prime Minister presented the new flag design to parliament. I refer, of course, to that often stated objective of his, that we should have here in Canada a flag not to be mistaken for the flag of any other country. In fact, I believe that by this action he has reinforced the reputation he has gained as a rejecter of much that has been brought forward by his own cabinet colleagues throughout the debates this session. I want to refer to them very briefly in order to remind the house of what happened. There was the presentation of the first Gordon budget, the variety of pension plans that were presented to parliament—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nasserden: —what took place on the division of the powers of the Minister of Agriculture, and now this latest—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. When the motion was before the house considerable leniency was allowed, as all hon. members know; but we are now on the amendment, and the amendment deals with a plebiscite. It does not seem to me to be in order to deal with matters which may or may not have been dealt with before. It seems to me that hon. members should confine their remarks to the plebiscite, how it should be held, if it should be held, where it should be held and why it should be held.

Mr. Nasserden: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am very happy to say that I was just getting along to that part of my remarks. It is not only members of the House of Commons who believe that a plebiscite should be held on this particular question; great numbers of Canadians believe that a plebiscite is the only fair and the only just way in which question can be decided.

This does not only apply to Canadians in the higher age group, but also to young Canadians. Many of these people believe that if they have a part in the choice of a Canadian flag, whatever the final decision of the majority of Canadians they could accept that decision and bring that flag into their hearts and minds and daily living much more closely than any flag imposed by parliament. An article which appeared in the Moose Jaw Times-Herald referred to the fact that teenagers, as other Canadians, deplore the waste of time in parliament on this particular measure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nasserden: I see the hon. member opposite and one or two others applauding that statement. It was their leader, the Prime Minister of this country, who chose the priorities. He has put this issue above all other issues for consideration by the parliament of Canada. He has done this in the face of an opposition that has said it does not want to pass this measure; and he has chosen this course despite the fact that there is a wide ranging view across this country that denies that this measure should be given the substance and the priority that the Prime Minister of this country has chosen for it at this particular time. Let the hon. member opposite and those others who applauded applaud again, and get up on their feet and tell us why we should pass this measure. The hon. gentleman opposite is one of those who has refused the plea of his Prime Minister to get up and defend this resolution.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nasserden. He has refused, as have 95 per cent of the members opposite.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order, please. I would ask the hon. member to keep to the matter before the house, which is the question of a plebiscite.

Mr. Nasserden: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I hear hon. gentlemen opposite applauding, as does the hon. member for Lotbinière, who has not contributed anything to this debate. All I can say is that time and time again by these interjections they show their disregard for parliament and for the right of the minority, however small that minority might be, to state its views in the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order. I think the hon. member is giving me the practice I need. May I again ask him to keep to the subject which is before the house at this time.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I was only going where those on the other side of the house led me. I was speaking about the plebiscite at the time they led me along this course, and I have no apologies to make to anyone for that. I was recounting when I was interrupted by hon. gentlemen opposite what the teen-agers in Moose Jaw think on the flag question. One of them said:

> I feel that a plebiscite should be held to get the opinion of the majority of the Canadian people.

That opinion was expressed by a 17 year old student in grade 12. Another one said:

> It would be simpler and much more effective to let the Canadian people themselves vote for the flag they want to represent their country.

Another one said:

> It is my opinion that the government conduct a national poll and from this they would be able to obtain a national conviction on the topic.

Another one said:

> I think the opinions of the whole of Canada should be considered in the form of a plebiscite in the next general election.

We cannot help but ask ourselves this question. Why has the Prime Minister gambled so frivolously with the time of parliament and with the will of the Canadian people by taking the time that has been asked of parliament for the consideration of a measure for which there is widespread lack of support throughout the country? I have not heard a single person say that he is in favour of the new design submitted to parliament by the committee which was set up by the House of Commons. Search out the newspapers. How few or non-existent are the expressions of the Canadian people endorsing this design which has been brought forward by the members of the committee. Search out the problems which face the people in all parts of the country today and ask yourselves whether the priority placed on the measure is a priority which is justified in view of these problems, which are before the Canadian people.

Therefore for those reasons, while this debate has its deplorable aspects, nevertheless in the face of the tactics employed by the Prime Minister the official opposition has no other course than to take the action we are taking at the present time. The Prime Minister and hon. gentlemen opposite cannot afford to think they can hide behind the rules of parliament even in this debate or in any other debate in the House of Commons. What the government is asking is for the careless acceptance of this proposal, not for a day, not for a year, but for many years and perhaps for all time.

I say to you, sir, and to the members of this house that the Prime Minister must assume the guilt for this travesty he is making of the time of parliament. He has committed his party and the government of Canada to this thoughtless gesture, this careless venture. When we say "Let the people decide", we cannot help but wonder why hon. gentlemen opposite have not taken part in this debate if this matter is as urgent and as justifiable as they say. Surely someone among the members on the other side of the house has some argument to bring forward which could change the minds of those who sit on this side of the house if the case presented is the case the government say it is. And if it is not the kind of case they say it is, then why give it the priority in this house that it has been given?

Mr. Moreau: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nasserden: As soon as I have concluded my remarks. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman this question. Why has he failed to come to the aid of his Prime Minister in this debate?

An hon. Member: He doesn't need it.

Mr. Nasserden: Why has he failed to place upon the record his reasons for taking the course he will undoubtedly take when the vote eventually comes?

Mr. Moreau: Would you like an answer?

Mr. Nasserden: Just as soon as I have completed my remarks we will be glad to hear from the hon. member for York-Scarborough. With regard to the holding of a plebiscite on a new flag, I make no secret of the fact that I am not one of those who think a plebiscite is the last word in the deciding of this particular issue. But when one considers how the matter was brought before parliament initially, what other course could a responsible opposition employ to bring before parliament the wishes of vast numbers of Canadians? What other course is open to parliament, not only to the opposition but to the government itself, to obtain a true expression of what Canadians want in regard to the choice of a national flag?

The Prime Minister said at the beginning of the debate that one of the reasons for the priority given this matter was what was taking place in the province of Quebec. He brought in the whole picture of national unity.

[Mr. Nasserden.]

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Nasserden: He referred to the whole question of national unity and what this measure might do to meet the urgency of that particular problem. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that there are other things the government could do not only in that old province of Quebec but in other areas of Canada where attention is needed that would be of far greater moment than the measure now before us. I want to say also that if the Prime Minister and the government think that by the passage of this measure they can possibly slough off the electorate of the province of Quebec with the thought that they have done something for them, when the real and major issues at stake in that province have been left untouched, then I think they are acting most unwisely. They are acting in a way that is detrimental to the future of the nation and to national unity itself.

This flag that we are asked to endorse, which we on this side of the house say should be put before the Canadian people in a plebiscite along with other designs; this measure that the Prime Minister wants to push through parliament, could well become the symbol of discontent more than any other flag Canadians have ever had in the past if little or nothing is done to meet the everyday problems that face Canadians not only in the province of Quebec but in the other provinces as well. When we consider that the Prime Minister has already told the people of Canada that he is making the gesture of giving them a flag, while at the same time he brings before parliament another measure enabling him to say that the union jack will continue to fly to represent our connection with the commonwealth, what a hollow gesture this is. It is one of the shallowest manoeuvres ever to be undertaken in Canadian history.

I am surprised that so few from the government benches have spoken in this debate. Surely some of them must have some opinions to express on the advisability or otherwise of holding a plebiscite. I can think of many members across the way who must have opinions in this regard. I think of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. McNulty), I think of the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Moreau), who interrupts from time to time. I think of the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Mullally), the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. O'Keefe), the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Temple), the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh), who I believe made an apology the other day; the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Cashin). I think of some of those on the front benches, and I ask myself what manner of government we have in Canada today whose front bench members can remain so silent on a question so near and dear to the problem of national unity.

Why is there this silence? Why is the Prime Minister not in his place in the house during the greater part of this debate?

Mr. Moreau: Why is your leader not here?

An hon. Member: A nice gesture on your part when a man is sick in bed.

Mr. Nasserden: I do not say the Prime Minister should be here all through the debate, but if this is the greatest thing to come before this session of parliament, if this is the most important matter that will come before this session of parliament, surely the Prime Minister should take some time to listen to the debate on this measure and try to get something of the atmosphere in which it is being carried on.

We have not had that kind of interest on the part of the Prime Minister with regard to this important matter and, Mr. Speaker, it should be of interest to him to answer the call for a plebiscite. After all, the design submitted by the committee is not the design he submitted to parliament. As soon as one thinks of that, of course, one thinks of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson). I recall his remarks earlier in this debate. The three maple leaves flag had inspired him. There was something about it that was truly Canadian. It would carry Canadians forward to a greater measure of national unity.

Mr. Matheson: Will the hon. member admit it is the royal badge of Canada?

Mr. Nasserden: Yet in the special committee the hon. gentleman voted against it, as did all his colleagues on that committee. All the Liberal members of that committee voted against the design that had been brought forward by their own Prime Minister, a design for which the hon. member for Leeds was supposed to be responsible. What was the situation when that design was presented to parliament and throughout the six weeks when we debated it while they sneered? Each one of them privately and publicly, though not in the House of Commons, was issuing statements to his electors and to the newspapers and radio stations in his riding about what a great design parliament had before it, and was saying that parliament should accept it with speed for otherwise great damage would be done to national unity. Yet they went into a committee of the House of Commons and destroyed that design. Now they tell us that they have come up with a design that will enhance national unity. This is the question that Canadians in all parts of the country—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order, please.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, that is not the question. The question that is before the house at the moment is whether this matter should be referred back to the flag committee for a recommendation that there be a referendum. I submit, sir, on all the authorities that have already been cited during this lengthy debate, and particularly the dicta from May, that we do not have a right now to anticipate a point that is clearly not in order, and that is the merits of a particular flag which will be debated after this matter of the referendum has been decided upon.

At this time I submit that the hon. member has a right to discuss only the referral back to the committee for a recommendation on a referendum. The merits of a particular design is a subject on which he can talk at full length, without any limitation of debate, on the main motion, that is the motion to concur in the sixth report of the committee which is before the house.

Mr. Churchill: While you are considering the point raised by the hon. member for Leeds, Mr. Speaker, will you take into account the fact that when the hon. member for Leeds was speaking on the amendment he never once mentioned the question of a plebiscite. He spent a great deal of his time talking about the design of a flag. I do not believe it is fitting that the hon. member for Leeds should be the one to raise a point of order at this time when a member on this side of the house is talking, because he himself was not within the rules for one minute during the course of his remarks on that day. If the ruling is that only the plebiscite must be mentioned, you might also take into consideration that this is not a debate in the fashion of Gertrude Stein where you say a rose is a rose is a rose, or where we must be limited to saying a plebiscite is a plebiscite is a plebiscite. This would make nonsense out of the debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): I realize it is difficult to keep saying a rose is a rose or a plebiscite is a plebiscite. However, I do believe there is enough in the amendment before the house at this time for the hon. member to keep to the point that is under study. It has been drawn to his attention on several occasions, and I know he does not want to make the task of the Acting Speaker any more difficult than it is, so he will endeavour to keep to the point.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I have never left the point. The hon. member for Leeds and the shilly-shallying shell tactics of those on the government benches, who yesterday wanted the three leaf flag and today want a one leaf flag, provide the best argument that can be put forward for Canadians to have a plebiscite on this important matter. The government cannot make up its mind, and this is plain to see. Government members would take any design so long as it is not the Canadian red ensign. This is one of the facts that have emerged out of this debate. The hon. member for Leeds has been most guilty in that regard. I believe that is the reason he raised the point of order in the way he did. He feels the burden of his guilt.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order, please. The guilt of the hon. member for Leeds does not excuse the hon. member for being out of order. May I draw to his attention again, for the fifth time—I do not know what rule applies—that he should not be called to order too often. May I ask him to co-operate with the Chair and keep to the subject under study.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I may say that perhaps the last word or two were out of order, but I was only led along that path by the things that were said from the opposite side of the house. There should be some fairness in this debate right across the line.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nasserden: Somebody says "Oh, oh". If hon. gentlemen opposite have something to say, let them get up and say it. They say these things while they are seated, and they do not get on the record.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): You were attacking the Chair.

Mr. Nasserden: No one was attacking the Chair. If I may return to the matter under discussion, that is whether or not a plebiscite should be held, I want to emphasize what I just said; that the statement made by the hon. member for Leeds, reinforced by members of the flag committee from the Liberal party, reinforced by the decision made about the design that was presented to parliament, represent the best arguments for a plebiscite that any one could wish to have.

However, there is a further argument, and that is the silent, unnamed members of the house who are either afraid or careless of presenting their views on this question of a plebiscite, and they must be considered when we are dealing with this whole problem. When members across the way come to us and tell us they are glad we are requesting a plebiscite on this question—

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Only one.

Mr. Nasserden: I can say this, it certainly was not you who asked for a plebiscite on this question. I would not be proud about that, either, if I were the hon. gentleman.

Today we are considering whether or not there should be a plebiscite on an important matter such as this. We were told at the beginning of the debate by the Prime Minister himself that this was vital to national unity. If it is vital to national unity, and a great portion of the Canadian people are not in accord with what is being done, then that particular aspect of this situation should be taken into consideration, whether those people live in one part of the country or in another part of the country. As we hear the interjections that come across the floor, we wonder why hon. members do not make speeches. We wonder why 90 per cent of hon. members opposite have failed to answer the call to national unity uttered by their leader, the Prime Minister, during the discussion of this measure. When approximately 60 per cent of the Canadian people are in favour of a plebiscite on this important question, why is it that the Prime Minister would destroy his own party, destroy this parliament and the image of parliament as well, on a question such as this? The hon. gentleman laughs, but as time goes on that laugh will change to something else just as it did during the debate a week ago when charges were made and many hon. members laughed at them.

We hear a great deal about trying to get on with the business of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nasserden: The hon. gentleman opposite says this is the business of parliament. I was glad to hear that interjection.

Mr. Rock: Who said that?

Mr. Nasserden: There were so many speaking I could not tell which one said it, but someone opposite did. This is the business of parliament, and that is what we on this side say. It is the responsibility of members to make sure that this government does not take action that in the final analysis might do more to hurt Canadian unity than to enhance it. After all, that is the purpose for which the measure was brought before parliament, as stated by no less a person than the Prime Minister.

When we consider whether or not we should hold a plebiscite, I cannot help but look at the empty seat of the Prime Minister and wonder why he is not in that seat during the greater part of this debate.

Mr. Rock: What about your own leader?

Mr. Nasserden: My own leader, at the present time, happens to be sick in bed. The hon. gentleman knows that, but he still refers to it because he thought I would not know about it.

Mr. Rock: I just mentioned the fact that your leader is not here either.

Mr. Clancy: Oh, get lost.

Mr. Nasserden: Well, we have the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Greene) here. Why doesn't he tell us why we should not have a plebiscite? Is he one of those who hope he is going to become a judge, or sit in the Senate; or does he want to take a trip somewhere?

Mr. Greene: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, any time I want to speak in the house I can assure the hon. member I do not need any help, aid, or improvisation from him; and when I do speak I shall have a little more to say than he has to say, and I shall not do any filibustering or hold up the business of the house when I am speaking.

Mr. Nasserden: Well, I will say this for the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Rock: He is honest.

Mr. Nasserden: I did not say that, Mr. Speaker, but that does not mean I would not agree with it. The hon. gentleman of course, had ambitions in another place. He was one of those who were frustrated here—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nasserden: They shake their heads, Mr. Speaker, and I will take their word for it, but I know one of them opposite was frustrated, as was related in one of the leading newspapers.

Mr. Greene: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has stated I am frustrated. I would point out the only frustration I feel is at the prostitution of parliament being carried on in this filibuster by hon. gentlemen opposite.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): Order, please. Both hon. gentlemen who have spoken are out of order. There is nothing in the amendment which mentions frustration on either side of the house. I am afraid if this keeps up on both sides of the house the only frustration that will result will be the frustration of the Acting Speaker. May I once again ask the hon. member for Rosthern not to make my task any more difficult, and may I ask those on the opposite side who keep shouting "order" to give me the privilege of calling somebody to order when he is out of order.

Mr. Clancy: On that point—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tardif): It has been decided that point is out of order. It is out of order for you as well as for me, because it has nothing to do with the subamendment.

Mr. Clancy: But generalizing, Mr. Speaker, it has been said there is frustration in the house. There certainly is.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I want to say I am frustrated too. The government does not want to submit this issue to a plebiscite. I am not going into what the hon. gentleman opposite said because Your Honour has stated the matter is disposed of, and we want you to have a happy time in the chair today.

All I will do is put on the record the reasons for which I think a plebiscite should be held. I only regret hon. members opposite do not want me to do that. At least this is the only conclusion I can draw from these interruptions. The decision by parliament to designate a Canadian flag is one of the most important decisions parliament could ever take. There are thousands of Canadians who think parliament has spent too much time on this issue—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nasserden: Hon. gentlemen opposite are applauding.

Mr. Grégoire: We are too.

Mr. Nasserden: And the hon. gentleman in the far corner wants to get honourable mention, but really and truly I cannot think of anything good to say about him today in that regard.

Mr. Grégoire: You never have anything very good to say.

Mr. Nasserden: I am not going to be drawn into that, Mr. Speaker. There are many reasons why Canadians in all parts of the country should speak out on the question of the flag they want. If we are to accept the views that have been expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite—and they have been few in number—Canada has not had a flag, and this procedure we are engaged in is the adoption of a new flag. Then surely it is of sufficient importance that Canadians, great and small, in every part of the country should be given an opportunity to choose from a variety of recommendations.

It may be said that this would divide Canada, but in all sincerity I say it could not divide Canada any worse than Canada is divided today by the divisive practice employed by the government and the Prime Minister in pushing this matter through parliament. If the opposition has a primary job in parliament it is to preserve the rights of minorities, a task which is not easy on a question such as this.

When we think of the number of Canadians who are growing tired of the time wasted in parliament, because of a Prime Minister who has given such priority to this matter, we cannot help but wonder why he is not in his place today. We cannot help but wonder why he does not give some attention to the requests that have been made. When I say that I take nothing away from him or his image because I know at times he has to be other places, but surely we could see him some time during the course of this debate. This is one of the questions which go unanswered day after day, and it is one I find most disconcerting when I think of the image of parliament and of the slogan used by hon. gentlemen opposite, "Let's get on with the business of parliament." If the Prime Minister really felt this matter warranted such priority he should be in the house to give it proper attention.

Under normal circumstances I do not believe a plebiscite would be the best course to take in a matter such as this, but in view of all that has happened, in view of the way this issue was introduced and of what has taken place since then, I think a plebiscite is the only recourse available to us in order to preserve some of the unity that we hold dear. I regret that apparently the Prime Minister and hon. members opposite do not hold that view.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Grégoire: How many speeches has he made on this subject?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is a question from an hon. member who has not participated in the flag debate.

Mr. Grégoire: I will vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Churchill: I shall answer him immediately. This is the third time for me to speak in the debate on the flag.

Mr. Grégoire: A hat trick.

Mr. Churchill: I have the courage of my convictions in this matter. I consider this to be a serious matter, and I think members of this house should participate in the debate and advance arguments either for or against.

Mr. Grégoire: I have heard them all.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Lapointe spends his time interrupting and making a mockery of the House of Commons.

Mr. Grégoire: No.

Mr. Churchill: I waited before rising because I thought some members from the Liberal party would rise to take part in this debate. We have heard two members of the Liberal party advance reasons why they propose a new flag should be adopted. The hon. member for Leeds, who was the progenitor of the three maple leaf flag with the blue borders and the hon. member for Terrebonne, who was on the committee, gave us the benefit of their views on this subject. They were the only members of the Liberal party who advanced any reasons for the adoption of the proposed flag, and of those two only the hon. member for Terrebonne said anything about whether or not a plebiscite should be held. We heard from the ranks of the Liberal party a very profound and courageous speech by the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), a real contribution to a debate of an extremely serious character.

Now, I thought there would be some support from the Liberal party for the proposal now before the house. It makes for a debate when opposing views are presented in this chamber. That is the purpose of debating. We are putting forward our case; the other side should be putting forward their case, if they have one. It makes it very difficult when members on the government side do not enter into the debate. Obviously they have no interest in this matter; they are fainthearted with regard to the flag now proposed, or else they hesitate to put on the sackcloth and ashes and tell us they were all wrong six months ago when they were talking about the three maple leaf flag with the blue border.

I intend in the course of this debate to put forward two reasons why this matter should be referred to the people. But I propose, in leading up to those reasons, to deal with matters which have been mentioned by the hon. member for Leeds and the hon. member for Villeneuve, because those gentlemen have presented a point of view to which I am opposed, and in the course of this debate I think I am justified in drawing attention to their remarks and giving an answer to them. I also hope to deal with other matters, all leading up to the two main points I intend to make during the course of this debate. I appreciate the nature of the ground rules which have been staked out. All I ask is the same privilege that was extended to the hon. member for Leeds, the hon. member for Terrebonne, the hon. member for Villeneuve and various hon. members who touched on other matters rather than the question of a plebiscite; and I hope I shall not be asked to use the word "plebiscite" in every other sentence.

In the speech he made to the house the hon. member for Leeds once again brought us information which I consider to be inaccurate. I refer to his interpretation of the proclamation of 1921, which he uses as a basis for advocating the adoption of the proposed flag now before us, the flag with the white centre and red borders having a red maple leaf superimposed in the centre, as recommended by the committee. I dealt with this subject when I was speaking in August, but apparently I did not convince the hon. member for Leeds, who has repeated in this house the argument he used on that occasion. Consequently I must again draw the attention of the house to the fact that I believe the hon. member for Leeds and others, including the hon. member for Danforth, have been misled by the interpretation given to the royal proclamation of 1921.

They have stated here that the national colours are red and white, and I say they have no evidence that such national colours were ever established. I said in August and I say again now that the committee which drew up the proclamation of 1921 and delivered it to the government of that day said nothing in its brochure, which was published later, about the establishment of national colours. No reference was made to them in subsequent brochures until the one published in March of this year under the present Liberal government. The others said nothing about Canada's national colours being red and white. I say the information supplied to us to the contrary is misinformation and should be rejected.

My second point is this, and I reiterate it because of the statements which have been made with regard to the coats of arms as determined in 1921. The only maple leaf which was coloured in red was the maple leaf resting in the paw of the lion, and it was put there for the express purpose of commemorating Canada's sacrifice in the first world war. It represented Canada's losses in that war; 60,000 Canadian young men lost their lives in that struggle. That is why the red maple leaf was incorporated in the coat of arms. I argued in August, and I do again, that having used a red maple leaf for this purpose it is disgraceful to abandon it now and use it for some other purpose, as has been done in the revised coat of arms and as is being done in this proposed new flag. The red maple leaf on the coat of arms represents the sacrifice of the first world war. Is this Liberal government going to wipe that out and forget about it? I say, no.

An hon. Member: Put it on the flag.

Mr. Churchill: And it should not appear on the flag of Canada, a red maple leaf. We should go back to what it was originally, a green maple leaf as was determined in the proclamation of 1921; because in that proclamation the red maple leaf was mentioned and given its proper heraldic term, gules, and the three maple leaves were given their term "proper" which means "in their natural state" which means green.

The coat of arms was revised a few years later. I say it was improperly revised, and that our government was misled by that revision and that a correction should be made. I say that the red maple leaf should not be used on a flag of Canada; that the red maple leaf represents the blood sacrifice of Canadians in the first world war, and it should be retained for that purpose. If the Liberal party intend to wipe that out, let them conduct another revision of the Canadian coat of arms from which this flag is being drawn —the references are always to that. If this message could only get across to the people of Canada—and this is why we suggest referring this question to the people of Canada—we believe they would reject the proposed new flag because it improperly uses the red maple leaf.

This committee was set up after a rather lengthy debate in the House of Commons in the expectation that some solution would be found, through the work of the committee, that would be acceptable to the house, to parliament and to the people of Canada. I commend the committee for its diligent work. I regret to say that the committee failed in its task because it did not come up with a solution that is satisfactory. I have given one reason why their solution is unsatisfactory. We had hoped that some compromise might be effected during the work of that committee. The stand taken by our party in the debate in August and September was very largely this. We wished to retain the Canadian red ensign, modified, if you like, in the fly, replacing the coat of arms with the maple leaf, adding the fleur-de-lis and recognizing the history and traditions of our country, which would constitute a distinctive and acceptable Canadian flag.

When the committee met I entertained some hope—not very much—that the committee would bring forward a design somewhat along that line. I had hoped that the committee would start with the design approved by the parliamentary committee of 1946, which voted 23 to 1 for a modified Canadian red ensign, with the shield removed and a golden maple leaf placed in the fly. I thought the committee, starting from that point, would perhaps add the fleur-de-lis; because I have always thought—and this is where I have been mistaken, as I have discovered from the debate in the house during August, September and this month—that the fleur-de-lis should have more prominence on our flag than it has just in the coat of arms. I will point out where I have been mistaken in that belief as I proceed with what I have to say.

The committee, which started off with great expectations, ended in failure; and it ended in failure because the Liberal members on that committee did not apparently deal with anything in the nature of a compromise in which our history and traditions would be recognized, because they rejected any reference to our past and rejected the flag which was brought in with the blare of trumpets last May by the Prime Minister. They threw out the three maple leaf flag with the blue borders and substituted the white flag with a red maple leaf and red borders.

Where was the compromise? There was no meeting of minds with regard to the position put forward by the Conservative party, and we represent quite a number of people in Canada; it runs into millions. Why could there not be a meeting of minds? We have had pointed out to us that the Conservative members on that committee endeavoured to bring about a compromise by superimposing on the red and white flag the union jack in one corner and the fleur-de-lis in the other. Quite frankly I did not think that was a very attractive design, but it was a sincere effort to bring together opposing points of view. But the committee rejected that design and insisted on bringing before us a new design, falsely called a design based on Canada's alleged national colours.

Mr. Matheson: Nonsense.

Mr. Churchill: Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, a reference to the people of Canada becomes more urgent than ever. We went through a debate in which opposing points of view were presented; the committee sat for a lengthy period—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Churchill: —it rejected the personal choice of the Prime Minister and brought in a flag which is not a compromise solution. Surely under these circumstances a reference to the people of Canada is essential. I believe that had a suitable compromise been produced, giving recognition to the history and traditions of this country as we have maintained right from the very first, and with greater emphasis placed on the maple leaf—which to my mind is acceptable as a symbol of Canada, but not as a flag—which the hon. member for Leeds and others have talked about so frequently, it would have been acceptable. Here were the two points of view, and surely the committee could have arrived at a solution, not necessarily acceptable to individuals here and there but something that would assist parliament to come to a decision with regard to this very important matter.

I am very disturbed, sir, that during the course of this debate we have not heard the position of the Prime Minister and members of the cabinet. They are non-participants; they do not take part in debates in the House of Commons.

Mr. Rhéaume: They are writing codes of ethics, which are very important.

Mr. Churchill: They leave it to other members of their party. We are interested, and I am sure the people generally are interested, in knowing what is the attitude of the Prime Minister. We know the attitude of the member for Leeds; he said just the other day that the proposed flag, and I quote his words:

—meets all the tests for a distinguished flag. It is a flag of dignity and grace, worthy of a great sovereign nation.

He said substantially the same things last summer with regard to the flag which he was then putting before us.

Mr. Rhéaume: He will say whatever he is told to say.

Mr. Churchill: What is the position of the Prime Minister? Because we have not heard the point of view of the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, I say that a reference to the people is essential. Let the people know where the Prime Minister, the leader of the Liberal party, stands. Are they to accept what he said last May and June with regard to a flag? The present proposed flag is not the one he was talking about last June. With regard to what he said on June 15—which was the last time he participated in a debate in this house except for comments on rules and procedure —do the things he said six months ago hold true today? There should be some leadership given in this country, and that leadership should come from the Prime Minister; and he should be supported by members of his cabinet, if they are confiding in each other these days. On June 15 the Prime Minister said:

—I believe that a national flag of the kind described in this resolution—

That was the three maple leaf flag with the blue borders:

—that will be exclusively Canadian, will bring us closer together; give us a greater purpose of national identity and unity.

Then in the same speech he went on to say:

I know, also, that a flag issue is bound to raise strong and deep and genuine emotions.

He went on to point out—and these are his own words as reported at page 4321 of Hansard:

In my view, the time has come for a further and a final change.

The further and final change in June was to a three maple leaf flag with blue borders.

Now where are we? If you have a final change in June—the personal choice of the Prime Minister—and you reach a situation in November, six months later, where the Liberal party proposes another flag, where is the final change and what is the position of the Prime Minister? We need to know the Prime Minister's position on this matter, and then having got that position let us refer the matter to the people of Canada for a decision. The Prime Minister's final change, according to his own words, is that:

—it should be based on three red maple leaves because that is our formal and historic emblematic link with our Canadian past.

We are now down to one red maple leaf. Is that our formal and historic emblematic link? I should like an explanation of that remark. I should like to know what the Prime Minister says about the flag now proposed. He said of the other one that because its design had such a history and went with the blue sea to sea border, it made a striking and beautiful flag. What has happened now to the sea to sea border? Have we abolished the Atlantic and the Pacific? He said at the time that the single maple leaf has not the same historical and heraldic significance. These are indeed conflicting points of view, and I should like to know where the Prime Minister stands today. Let him guide parliament. Let him guide the people of this country. If he is now prepared to reject the three maple leaf design let him say so publicly, and let him tell us his reasons.

He also said with regard to the resolution on the order paper providing for the three maple leaf flag with the blue borders that that resolution did indeed mark a break with the past. Strangely enough, in saying that it made a break with the past he was also telling us that the proposed flag of that day had great historical significance derived from the past. So how do you break with the past and yet retain the historical significance derived from the past? I should like an explanation of that, and I should like the Prime Minister to tell us whether the present proposed flag represents a break with the past or whether it is founded on a historical link with the past.

I have expressed my regret, sir, that we have not heard from the Prime Minister and members of the cabinet. They have become silent. We have heard from only two members of the Liberal party with regard to the present flag. We heard from the leader of the Creditiste party when he spoke in this house on December 1, at which time he was applauded by members of the Liberal party. I was here and listened to his speech, and I saw the approval which came from the government side. Therefore I would have to assume that what he said then represented the views of the Liberal party. Nobody on that side of the house has criticized him for what he said on that occasion; therefore I would say they must agree with his views. Last June he said that he did not feel the flag issue could strengthen national unity in Canada, and I do not recall even then that the members of the Liberal party found fault with his speech on that occasion. He told us on December 1, as reported at page 10742 of Hansard:

> I have said, on several occasions, that the design of the flag is of little concern to me.

He cares not what the flag is. He went on to say:

> —if the Canadian symbol, now represented by the maple leaf on the flag proposed by the committee which considered this question, is not satisfactory, then let us remove the maple leaf and put a beaver, or a sheaf of wheat, or indeed anything else—

Now, Mr. Speaker, what stage are we at with regard to the Creditiste party? The leader of that party, supported by his own members and applauded by the Liberals, says he is not concerned—

Mr. Greene: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Churchill: —with the nature of the flag at all.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. An hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. gentleman has a very hard time discerning just what is going on in this house, but with the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, I think the subject matter of the debate is supposed to be the holding of a plebiscite, and for the information of the hon. gentleman that is the topic on which he is supposed to be speaking. With respect, I would ask that Your Honour keep the hon. gentleman in order, if he has it within himself to speak within the rules of the house, and not permit him continuously to abuse the rules.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I can now understand very clearly why the hon. member for Renfrew South was not elected as leader of the provincial Liberal party. He lacks the intelligence to understand a sound argument.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre now speaking to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Renfrew South?

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Churchill: I certainly am, Mr. Speaker, if you think it was a point of order. I suggest I am strictly in order, because I am developing the thesis that there are two main reasons why this issue should be determined by the Canadian people and not by this House of Commons. I want the same privilege that is afforded every other hon. member of the house to develop my thesis without interruptions such as that from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre will recognize that another hon. member has the right to raise a point of order and that the Chair should be allowed to rule on the point of order.

Mr. Nasserden: May I just speak to the point of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am wondering whether anything can be served by having a long discussion of the point of order. The Chair recognizes what are the ground rules of the debate, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre mentioned at the start of his remarks, which are that the debate is supposed to deal with an amendment now before the house. In beginning his remarks the hon. member did say that he intended to lead to the question of a plebiscite, and I assume that is what he is doing now. I did have some doubt whether his reference to the position of the Créditiste party was really relevant to this particular point, but in any event I take it that he is leading to the question of a plebiscite and I should like to hear the continuation of his speech.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I am not only leading up to it but I have been on the subject all along. I was pointing out that the position of the Creditistes is certainly important for the very simple reason that that party has been supporting the government all during the present session, and the statement—

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, that must be denied. If we look at the record of all the votes taken in the house since the beginning of the session we will see that those supporting the government are the Conservative party, or that their members were absent during votes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. That is a point of debate.

Mr. Grégoire: They used to be out of the house when there was a vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, it is a rather strange thing when the leader of the Creditiste party will say in the house in the flag debate that the design of the flag, to use his own words, "is of little concern to me". Then he went on to say, as found on page 10742 of Hansard:

> However, I do not oppose the adoption of another design provided it is Canadian—

He also said:

> ... let us remove the maple leaf and put a beaver, or a sheaf of wheat, or indeed anything else—

No member of the Liberal party objected to that statement, and it is customary in this house in a proper debate for people to answer arguments of which they do not approve. I say, sir, that in view of the fact that the Creditistes have taken this stand it is incumbent upon us to draw this to the attention of the people of Canada, because I believe that people who are going to say they care nothing about our national flag, that they do not care what is on it—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Churchill: —who will say "or indeed anything else"—

Mr. Grégoire: A question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) are dishonest, for we have never said that we were not interested in the flag, but rather that, regardless of what flag is proposed, provided it is Canadian and distinctive, we will accept it in a spirit of co-operation with all the citizens of our country. In this regard, the hon. member's remarks are dishonest, for we have never spoken those words.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not believe there is a question of privilege in what has been raised by the hon. member for Lapointe. It is rather a point of debate. If he thinks that the position of one of his members or of himself is being misrepresented by another hon. member, he has an opportunity later in the debate to set things straight if he believes this should be done.

Mr. Grégoire: We have to put it on record that he is dishonest, and he should know it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Churchill: I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that you have joined with me in encouraging the hon. member for Lapointe to enter the debate—

Mr. Mandziuk: He will never do it.

Mr. Churchill: —and show his courage and his honesty. He accused me of being dishonest, but I will accept the fact he is honest and let him enter the debate and display that honesty to the rest of us. I do not overlook the fact that the Créditiste party has a following in this country, and I have heard from their leader that he has support not only in his own province but elsewhere throughout Canada. But my argument is that when a party in this house say they do not care what the flag is, that they do not care what is on the flag, the people of Canada should be aware of that fact. I say that for this reason. Suppose this issue came to a vote in the House of Commons and the votes of the Créditiste members determined the issue. These are the people who would determine for all Canada what the flag would be—

Mr. Grégoire: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: —and according to their argument it might not have on it a red maple leaf or a green maple leaf. It might not have on it a beaver or a sheaf of wheat. Through the mouth of their leader they say "or indeed anything else". But what would it have on it?

Mr. Grégoire: Something Canadian, not British.

Mr. Churchill: This verges almost on subversive tactics, Mr. Speaker, the destruction of things that are treasured by Canadians. I say now, Mr. Speaker, that during the course of the debate last summer and from the action of the committee I have discovered that no compromise on the issue of the flag is possible in the present House of Commons, and that is why the issue should be referred to the people. We have had this clearly demonstrated by the failure of the committee. After all its meetings the committee failed to come up with a compromise. I said earlier that I was under the impression months ago that a suitable compromise would be the addition of the maple leaf and the fleur-de-lis in prominence on the Canadian red ensign. I was wrong.

Mr. Grégoire: May I ask a question? What would the fleur-de-lis represent on that flag?

Mr. Churchill: I think the fleur-de-lis would represent on that flag what it represents on the provincial flag of the province of Quebec. It would represent the traditions of a great race, and I have been an admirer of the French race.

Mr. Grégoire: We can laugh at that. That is a joke.

Mr. Churchill: I considered that the fleur-de-lis would be representative of the history and traditions of the French race in Canada.

Mr. Greene: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Churchill: If Mr. Speaker will allow me additional time.

Mr. Grégoire: We want something Canadian.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is allowing a question by the hon. member for Renfrew South.

Mr. Greene: Would the hon. member tell us whether, in making the statement that the fleur-de-lis would represent Quebec adequately on the flag, he is speaking for any organization in Quebec or whether there has been any such request by any popular organization in Quebec, including his own party; or whether this is just his own idea?

Mr. Churchill: I will answer the question. I regret that the hon. member is unable to follow an argument very closely. I said it had been my opinion several months ago that the fleur-de-lis would represent French Canada on our flag but I have found out during the course of the debate and as a result of the proceedings of the committee that I was wrong. That is why I say the people of Canada need to know the situation, because hundreds of people have written to me and friends have spoken to me who have been in favour of a compromise, and in their opinion it was always that the Canadian red ensign should be modified in order to give greater recognition to the French founders of this country.

Mr. Grégoire: Did you ask the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer)?

Mr. Churchill: I say we have been wrong on this point and those people who are still writing to me about a compromise are unaware of the circumstances. They are unaware that we have been told in the house by members of the Liberal party, by members of our own party and by members of the Créditiste party that the fleur-de-lis would be unacceptable as a compromise symbol. This is a grave disappointment to me. I have been under a misapprehension all these years in that regard. In talking about maintaining the history and traditions of the two founding races of this country I had always thought that these symbols would be satisfactory for that purpose.

I say that no compromise is now possible because of the facts that have been brought out in debate in the house and by the work of the committee. That being the case, the people of Canada should be made aware of the situation. Therefore the most suitable thing to do in respect of the whole flag problem would be to put it in abeyance for a very considerable time until there is an opportunity for greater knowledge of the facts right across the country. The second point I want to make, in conclusion—

Mr. Grégoire: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: Well, I will conclude and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) can get up and make a speech. The other day the hon. member was handing out appropriate insignia to the various members who participated in the debate. I should like to confer upon him the order of the eviscerated chicken unless he gets up and makes his speech on this flag issue.

Now, sir, I want to say this, that in light of the attitude taken by the Liberal party, the statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) six months ago, by the member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) and others, and the actions of the Liberals on the committee, the policy of the Liberal party throughout the whole course of this thing has been the destruction of the Canadian red ensign. I hope the people of Canada realize this. The Liberal party will take anything except the Canadian red ensign, anything except something on our flag to represent our history and our traditions. What other conclusion can be arrived at than that the Liberal party aims at the destruction of the red ensign? Six months ago the hon. member for Leeds loved the three maple leaf flag with the blue border. Now he loves the one with the white and red on it. Where does the Prime Minister stand on this question? We have not heard. I say, sir, that the reason this whole matter should be referred to the people by way of plebiscite is the action of the Liberal party. We have now found out what they want to do, clearly and distinctly, through the work of the committee plus their inactivity in this debate, plus statements they have made in the past. They want to destroy the Canadian red ensign and they care not what is substituted in its place.

Mr. Matheson: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please; the hon. member's time expired a few minutes ago.

An hon. Member: Let the member for Leeds make his speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions can be asked of the hon. member who just resumed his seat only with the consent of the house, because his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Matheson: May I ask the hon. member these two question? First, does he not agree that the three maple leaves on one stem was, in fact, the Canadian emblem on every Canadian red ensign since 1868? Second, is it not a fact that the words in the royal proclamation—

> And upon a royal helmet mantled argent doubled gules the crest, that is to say, on a wreath of the colours argent and gules—

—do, in fact, determine the colours of Canada to be red and white?

Mr. Churchill: In answer to the first question, I may say that I am aware of the fact the three maple leaf design has been on the Canadian flag, and it should have remained there in the colour green. I accept it as a symbol of Canada and I have never objected to it as a symbol of Canada. I do not believe it should ever be made the main part of a Canadian flag.

In so far as the second question is concerned the hon. member, drawing from his knowledge of heraldry—perhaps I can assist him in this—has reached the conclusion that because the mantle under the helmet is described as being red and white, that this constitutes the national colours of Canada. I say there is no authority for that statement. I suggest to him that he produce the evidence from the books of heraldry to show that they constitute the national colours. They may constitute the colours of the monarch whose helmet is there, but not necessarily the colours of this country. If he will examine the coat of arms for Australia and the coat of arms for New Zealand, he will see that there is no mention of national colours in their coats of arms. As I pointed out earlier today, the committee that sat on this problem in 1921, and to whom the hon. member paid tribute, as I do, said nothing in their descriptive booklet with regard to Canada's determining at that time that her national colours would be red and white. I said further that having used the red maple leaf for the sacrifice of Canadians in the first world war it could then not be used as a Canadian flag, and therefore would be rejected as a national colour.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time I have risen to participate in this debate. If there are those who do not wish to participate in it, that is their privilege. I have spoken now at least four times, but only twice in this year. The other occasions on which I spoke were January 21, 1962 and November 21, 1962 which, by a peculiar coincidence was just 41 years after the date on which King George V is purported to have wanted to incorporate, as the Canadian flag, the three maple leaf design, which has been now abandoned. The three maple leaf design certainly had some merit. I suppose most of the designs which came before the flag committee had some merit.

When the flag committee was established I hoped, as I presume most of us did, that they would be able to come up with a proper decision which would be acceptable to everybody in this house. I, for one, did not want the matter decided that way. I think the matter should be decided by parliament if it is possible. I believe this is our job and this is the reason we were sent here. We were given a mandate by the people, not necessarily or only to fulfil election promises because we live in a dynamic society, a changing world. In any event, the people who voted for me expected me to put what talents I have to work to solve the problems of the day as they arise. Some people are saying, therefore, that we have no right to decide this matter by means of a plebiscite; that we should decide it in parliament. I rather supported this view up until the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and his government made it impossible for me to vote freely in this house. They forced us all to take a partisan attitude. A free debate would have permitted us at least to instruct each other, if not provide us with better ideas on how to act like gentlemen and on how the people in our own districts feel.

This is what I have done. I challenge anyone to say this is not so. I hear remarks in the corner to the effect that I have spoken four times already and this will be another empty contribution. Hon. members should at least do me justice by reading what I have said before they condemn me. These four speeches were as long as I am permitted under the rules. I stated what I sincerely felt. No one could construe from my words that I had anything but the greatest respect for that other great race of people, the other partner in confederation, for whom I have great admiration and affection. What do I get? When I get on my feet I get abuse, hisses and catcalls. If any member doubts my word, he has only to read Hansard. I do not want to name the man who said these things, but at one point he went so far as to say I would be rubbed out. Those are the exact words. His name does not appear on this page of Hansard to which I shall refer. I do not know if he was not identified or if he was talking behind his hands so that the Hansard reporter could not get his name; but I know who he was. I am not going to say who he was, but his exact words can be found at page 6938 of Hansard for August 17, and they were, "We will rub you off." By no stretch of the imagination can anybody take any meaning from that other than it is the language of the underworld. I hope the hon. member did not mean it. I hope he was not speaking for any group of people when he said that. I spoke from my heart and in my speech there was not one word which anybody could say was narrow-minded, controversial and so partisan that I should have been subjected to that type of abuse.

The only reason I mention this today is because the same type of remark is being made, and I do not think it is the type of remark that will keep partisanship down. I have been trained to control my temper. Perhaps at times I may sound a little warmed up but I shall never get to the point where I threaten the life or safety of another hon. member of the house.

I expected at the time that, after seeing it in Hansard, the hon. member might deny it because it is the kind of talk Canadians dislike. By rights we could have asked the Speaker to have him removed from the house. The fact that such a threat is made under the protection of parliament does not add any lustre to it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. It seems to me that having made this point the hon. member should go on to discuss the amendment before the house.

[Mr. Bigg.]

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, if I have gone a little beyond the bounds it is because I am trying to show that if this type of attitude persists in parliament and creates the kind of atmosphere we have, then the press and T.V. commentators can assume we have lost our heads and are no longer fit to make a proper decision on this subject.

I started out by saying I wanted parliament to decide this question, but how can it when threats are made on a person's life? I hear groans opposite, but I point out that that remark has never been removed from Hansard and is to be found at page 6938.

Only one man on the opposite side got up on his feet and gave his true and unchanging attitude to this whole matter, the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan). He made a courageous speech and I can only assume he must speak for the Liberal party because they have not repudiated or refuted him. No hon. member on the other side got up and took exception to what he said. I believe it is the duty of hon. members not only to oppose arguments put forward by the opposite side of the house but also to qualify such definite statements as appear to be entirely in opposition to the stand taken by one's own party. In the absence of that I can only assume the hon. member has the approbation of most of the members in his party. If the rest of them do not agree then they must be 100 per cent behind the three maple leaf flag which was originally introduced and upon which the Prime Minister said the government would stand or fall. Then he said there would be a free vote, but the ink was hardly dry on Hansard before he returned with a different proposition, a double flag for Canada.

If there was an election promise that we were to be seized of this question and had to decide it before going home for Christmas, why did the government not stand behind its pledge to have one flag for Canada, one flag for one nation? It was a courageous act on the Prime Minister's part to introduce a motion on the flag issue, but it was not particularly courageous on his part to back down almost immediately, and to continue to back down until now we have reached the position where a flag recommended by a parliamentary committee is before us, a flag originally proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), a single maple leaf flag.

You may argue all you like about the colour, and design but to my way of thinking this decision to abandon the three maple leaves and adopt one maple leaf was nothing but a political gimmick. Those who staked their political future on the three maple leaves back in May have forgotten them completely. They now say they believe in a gentlemanly compromise, but it is hard for me to believe this is a gentlemanly compromise.

It is hard for me to believe that the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson), who was the spiritual mother of the three maple leaf flag, could be convinced by a short argument in a plugged committee—plugged in the sense that there were more government members on it than we had on it—that he should abandon the child of his own imagination. I can only assume he was told to do so. I know he is a man of great courage and conviction, but I cannot understand why he did not stand up like the hon. member for York-Humber and fight this thing to the bitter end.

Mr. Matheson: May I ask my hon. friend if he does not feel it makes very good sense that there could be several really excellent possible flags for a country, all of which in one way or another tend to relate to or dignify the heraldry of that country or the history of that country? Does he feel there must be only one right flag for a country?

Mr. Bigg: No, I do not think anything I said suggested that at all. I am talking about why I insist on a plebiscite, because parliament has made a political football out of this thing. The question has gone beyond that of design. We have made a political football of this, perhaps on all sides. I am not accusing the government alone of doing this. We have been driven into a corner where we are perhaps putting up too strong an argument for a particular design which we happen to prefer, but I certainly do not see anything wrong in my standing on my feet and saying I prefer one particular design, or in the hon. member for Leeds supporting his spiritual child. No one would criticize him for doing that. In fact this is all so reasonable that a member of his own party agrees with me.

But when the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) says, "I will have anything that is not British," surely this is a partisan point of view. Why not something that is partly British? I do not object to any design which may have some connection with the French race, whether remote or not. Personally, if I had to design a flag—and I know a little about heraldry—I would like to see the union jack quartered with the lily banner of France. This would represent the marriage of two nations and would be correct in heraldry. It would designate the differing points of view and loyalties but show them co-operating together.

I hope my contribution to this debate has been positive. I have tried to find the proper compromise. At no time have I said I want to ram the union jack, or any other design, down hon. members' throats. I believe in democratic free speech. I believe in it to such an extent that I did not make a point of it when a threat was made against me. I thought the important thing here was to decide, if we could, on some compromise—if we must. I do not think any member of the Conservative party has said: We must have the red ensign and that alone. If we were rabid about our British connection, surely we would make no objection about having the double submission to parliament. I want one flag for one nation. I had hoped we could reach agreement by compromise on such a flag. If we had started with a clean slate and kept it out of politics and if the Prime Minister had not risked the life of his government on it, we might now have something like the lilied banner of France, and the union jack quartered in our national flag.

Some day Canada may be a republic; I do not know. We may be moving in that direction. If such should be the will of Canada as a free democracy, I suppose I must accept it. I am not a great royalist, but I still believe there are many ways in which the British commonwealth is of great help to Canada. I think the monarch as referee under our parliamentary system is still essential to proper debate, to British justice and to that loyalty which unites us all in one big, happy family. There were many people in Quebec who went out, perhaps to jeer the Queen as she passed. But when they saw the cultured woman who went by, in all her majesty and simplicity, a woman who speaks the two languages, English and French, as well as any member of this house, they began to change their minds and were even proud of her. And all I want to do, is to present my attitude toward democracy and co-operation in such a way that members will perhaps be proud of me. I mean by this that I love the French nation. I am trying to learn the language so as to be able to speak to Canadians of French origin in their own tongue.

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder in what way the remarks of the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg) are related to the amendment now before us and calling for a plebiscite?

I suggest that the hon. member should be called to order so that we might vote without delay.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have to say that the point is well taken. I have the impression that the hon. member is somewhat distant from the question we are discussing today. His remarks are very interesting and the Chair has been following them closely but perhaps at this time he might wish to relate them to the point which the house must consider.

Mr. Bigg: Possibly I am trying too hard to make my point. But I do not think the House of Commons is in the mood any longer to discuss this question in the way it should. This is because we have made a political football out of it. And, as I have said, perhaps I have some responsibility here; perhaps some of the things I have said could be considered in that light, though I hope they cannot. But this issue has become a political football, and in the circumstances the argument I put forward in favour of a plebiscite at this time is one based on the wishes of my own people in the Athabasca district. They want a plebiscite. I do not have the facilities to conduct a Gallup poll but I sincerely believe the majority of them want an opportunity to make their views heard on this particular subject. I do not only mean those who vote for me, by any means. I have received letters from people who I know as well as any politician can ever know do not vote for me. Yet they have sent letters—

[Translation]

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to point out, for the record, that there are only six Conservative members in the house at present. Therefore, only six are interested in the debate.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a question of privilege.

An hon. Member: They are all reading the new code of ethics.

Mr. Bigg: The people of my riding want a plebiscite and I would be delinquent in my duty if I did not tell the members of this house how they feel. That is, surely, my first, second, third, fourth, and every other duty, namely to do what the people back home want me to do. That is why they sent me here and that is what I have to do. This is why I have no difficulty whatever controlling my temper; I will stand here and represent them no matter what is said. They want a plebiscite. They want a chance to express their opinions because—and I think I can say this quite properly—they think we have abdicated our position here; they can have no faith in any decision we may reach, now, in the House of Commons on this subject.

As to whether or not we are engaged in a filibuster, let me say this: On September 8 we had a vote in this house as to whether or not we should end the flag debate and get along with more important matters. The Liberal party voted 100 per cent to carry on the debate. Apparently they did not want to carry it on themselves; they wanted to hear us. Well, we are doing what this house voted to do; we are carrying on the debate. And I think the debate could soon be put into its proper perspective if we were to vote on whether or not we should hold a plebiscite.

There are arguments that a plebiscite should not be held because that is not the Canadian way of doing things. I remember the last plebiscite. It was during the war and a plebiscite was taken to decide whether or not individual Canadian citizens should be forced to bear arms in the service of their country. The questions on that plebiscite were worded in such a way that they were difficult to understand and interpret. It may well be argued that if a plebiscite is hard to understand and if its results may be misconstrued it has serious defects. But I am convinced that plebiscites are not without value and that they are legitimate and normal when a parliament has got itself into a position where it cannot carry out its duty properly. I am convinced we are in that position today and that it is my plain duty to vote so as to give the people a chance to get us out of the unholy mess we are in. The people have their ideas. They want to be heard and I believe they have the right to be heard. They have asked me as their representative, as their member from Athabasca, to make their views known in no uncertain terms, because they agree with the fourth estate and the representatives of other news media in what they say to the effect that we have not done a very good job here in parliament on the flag.

I do not intend to accuse members of being partisan in anything they have said or done since the start of this debate. I do not believe in accusing other people. I believe that if you accuse other people of being crooked, the accusation carries within it an indication of your own character. I would advise the people who accuse me to read my speeches and see whether I am a narrow Anglo-Saxon. They might even look into the latter statement more closely. I have in my constituency people of other origins, and sometimes from people of those other origins I get letters saying: Why do not the two great founding races, so-called, get together on this question and behave like gentlemen? Our native people say: We kept our side of the treaty, why don't you keep yours? They were promised conditions in which to live superior to those they had. They were men of honour, and they expected to be dealing with men of honour.

The position taken by our own French speaking members is often regarded by members of the opposition as a horrible example of disunity within this party. I can give an explanation of this. It is not possible to expect unanimity, even on such a matter as a plebiscite, because in our party we are individuals, each and every one of us. Our leader has been accused by people outside the party, of trying to ram this plebiscite idea down our throats. I believe the idea of a plebiscite is very largely backed by the members of our party, although we are not unanimous. It would be strange if 95 men at any time—if they were men of thought and courage—were able to say they were absolutely unanimous and could find no reason for difference. If this was human nature, if this was the Canadian way and we could expect 20 million people to be unanimous, why would we need this institution? Surely it is to decide whether a question such as the holding of a plebiscite can be resolved here like gentlemen, having free speech and tolerance one for another.

I repeat again, Mr. Speaker, because I do not think it can be repeated too often in this atmosphere, that I do not deny to people of French origin or people who merely live in Quebec, perhaps, their full opinion on this matter. I do not object to any symbol which they may want incorporated in their flag. The only reason I have stood up for the red ensign myself is because since a child I have considered it my flag. Since 1921 it has in fact been our legal flag, and is until parliament decides to the contrary. Since 1944 it has been confirmed, and was confirmed by a Liberal government at that time who thought that perhaps Canada was not mature enough to accept the responsibility for changing its flag and perhaps putting on that flag something entirely new. There are arguments in favour of that point of view. I do not object to giving the people of Canada the opportunity to remove the union jack or any part of it from our flag; I merely make my own contribution and say that I like the union jack, and I know why—because it stands for British justice. Is it strange that a man like myself, who spent 23 years in the mounted police, should have some respect for that flag which flies every day outside our detachments? It is a lifelong habit of respect, if nothing else. But I do not expect everybody to respect that flag; all members of this house were not mounted policemen. We do not have unity even in the army on this subject; there are many servicemen who do not want to retain the red ensign. They have the right to get up and say so, if that is their opinion. And many of them are of British origin.

If you read all the speeches in Hansard, Mr. Speaker, on this subject I think you will find that most of those which have come from this side of the house have been reasonable, well thought out, factual and even unimpassioned. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I am sometimes surprised at the restraint with which we accept the barbs; I am surprised at the way we accept hisses and catcalls when saying merely that we like the flag under which we serve.

Surely it is not strange that men should stand up and say, "I respect this flag because I served under it". I wonder what citizen of the United States would even dare get up and say, "Let's pull down old glory". We are a very tolerant people; we allow people to get up and say, "Get rid of it and everything British, regardless". That was said in this chamber this afternoon. I have not said, "Let's shoot them. Let's take them out and hang them", or that sort of thing. A member has a perfect right to say that he wants no part of this flag to be retained as a symbol; but I would object very strongly if, having voted on the matter and having decided on one particular design, he said he was no longer going to be loyal to that flag and serve under it. The hon. member has not said that and I am not accusing him of it. Surely we have a right to stand up and put forward our views in connection with those things we love dearly. I do not only love things that are of Anglo-Saxon origin, but I love things of French origin; their literature, songs and the people themselves. There are times when I wonder whether this feeling is mutual. I do not like to wonder about these things; I do not want ever to wonder whether we are a united nation. But people talk that way sometimes. I like to hope it is only because they are taking things a little too seriously; that their passions are aroused by things said over here, or things which they think have been said over here. These things do make people angry.

I believe I am making my point, Mr. Speaker, that in this atmosphere we cannot decide this matter like gentlemen and therefore we should let the people decide what they want in this regard, who after all are a little more removed and can be more dispassionate than we in this house. The people should be given the opportunity to make their views known in this matter. There are objections to this course being followed. It is said that we cannot put this problem to the people in a reasonable manner. I think we can. I do not think there is any haste in this matter. I do not see any reason why, even though the government has in the past committed itself to something—I think they committed themselves to a foolish promise—they cannot withdraw this matter. I would admire them more if they withdrew as gracefully as they can and said, "Really there is no haste. We made our promise to bring this subject forward and intended to dispose of it in parliament; but we have got to the point where we cannot". I do not think we can, and therefore I believe the only solution is to send it to the people. I do not think it is beyond our legal brains to draw up a plebiscite that would be fair and would allow everybody to vote on this question. I do not think it would be very difficult to decide upon one of a number of designs in this manner. I would suggest that the most important thing to be decided is whether or not we are going to have the red ensign or some modification thereof, or a complete denial of that type of flag. If that is what the Canadian people want, what is wrong with there being two votes on the question. We could get rid of the first question first and then decide, if we can, between the three maple leaf design, the one maple leaf design, or four, five or six designs. At this juncture I do not think it is a question of design. I do not believe this is bothering most of us. It is a question of method; it is a question of whether we can make a rational decision of some kind with a gun at our heads—economic, perhaps.

I do not believe most of us are here to earn a living. It is a tough way to earn a living, if that is what it is. Some of us like home life. So don't use that kind of economic gun, because it doesn't work. Some of us would come here for nothing; some of us would pay to come here and have the privilege of putting forward the views of our people at home. Men on both sides of the house have paid; members of the Liberal party in this house have served their country with great distinction and great personal sacrifice, perhaps even to the point of death. How much their services in this house have contributed to their early death, I do not know; but these people did make great contributions. I am not going to say—and never will—that because a man sits on the opposite side of the house he has no contribution to make; and I hope there are men over there—in fact, I know there are—who will not write me off as nothing but a partisan, because I am not.

If a plebiscite is put to the people, the three maple leaf design may well be resurrected, and if the people of Canada vote for that flag, I will do the same as the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) and serve under it. He and I served under the old flag and I am certain we will do it again. I know it is that kind of thing that will bring us out of this difficulty. Let us have some of this spirit now, and co-operate; let us admit that we are in a boghole and resolve this difficulty. Let us admit that we have called each other too many names and have been impatient with each other. I hope that my speech today will induce members to let bygones be bygones so that we may have a free vote, a vote free of political pressures of any kind. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that is what we came here for. This would be far and away better than holding a plebiscite. However, I do not think there are ten men in this chamber who believe we can decide this question here fairly and squarely, because it has already gone too far. I accept responsibility in this regard. On behalf of myself and my party I do not say the fault rests with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). It certainly does not. I share the responsibility with him. I am not speaking for the rest of my party but I am speaking of my impressions from what the rest of my party have done when this matter has been discussed—unless they have had secret meetings which I have not heard about. The Leader of the Opposition has merely been expressing the feelings of our party arrived at in a democratic way; we are democratic in our party and in our country. There are times when we have to take a stand somewhere, especially when we have this political and economic gun put to our heads. We are forced into a corner in which we have to make decisions that perhaps would not be made if people had the courage of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan). I am quite sure he made his decision all on his own. It is a mistake, to my mind, for the rest of the Liberals to be silent and to suggest that the whole case has been made for their flag. If I were the hon. member for Leeds I would be disappointed if my colleagues did not rise and speak in the debate in this house. They knew they would be here, because they planned it. They had no legislation or anything else—

Mr. Greene: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Bigg: Yes.

Mr. Greene: I wonder whether the importance that his party puts on this question is indicated by the fact that a while ago there were six members of his party in the house, and now there are 12? If this question is so important why is there not a better representation?

Mr. Bigg: The hatchet men of the Liberal party are at work again. These interruptions come from the same area at about five minute intervals.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bigg: I hear groans coming from hon. members opposite. Is there anybody else who would like to ask a question? At least the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Greene) stands on his feet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Apparently an hon. member is accepting the invitation of the hon. member for Athabasca.

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: Mr. Speaker, I think every argument in favour of a plebiscite has been mentioned in the various speeches made to date.

In the last several days the speeches made in the house have only been a repetition of the same arguments, whether valid or not, according to the member who makes his contribution.

Can the hon. member for Athabasca tell us why the Conservative party goes on rehashing the same points instead of giving the house an opportunity of deciding for or against the Conservative amendment concerning a plebiscite?

[Text]

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the cooperation of the hon. member in instructing me in my parliamentary duties, but I am trying to make a positive contribution in the few minutes I have at my disposal, and if I waste them I suppose that is my responsibility and my loss. At the present time I am sitting on the edge of my chair in anticipation of the contribution the hon. gentleman will make, which will show me in better manner than the short lecture he has just given me how he will contribute to the united stand to be taken toward this new flag. I should like to be convinced I am wrong. I should also like to be convinced that he, as a French speaking Canadian gentleman, will give me my right to make my points, even though they be made poorly and weakly, and then I assure him that I will sit here quietly in my seat for another 40 minutes and listen to him with close attention. The translation system which the Conservative party was instrumental in putting into this house makes that possible. Again I can only regret that my efforts at learning "la belle langue Française", have so far been somewhat abortive.

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: Mr. Speaker, to answer the hon. member forthwith—

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should remind the hon. member for Athabasca that he has just about one minute left in his allotted time, and if he invites questions the time taken must be charged to him.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to invite any controversial questions. I had hoped I was putting forward principally ideas of my own as to why we need a plebiscite. It is obvious that the interjections and questions are not relevant to the point at all but are merely efforts to interfere with the time allotted to me. The hon. member for Renfrew South can carry on reading his paper or join the rest of his party in the lobby; they are not in the house either. I did not bring up this question about the attendance in the house, which we all deplore. This question was brought up by the hon. member for Renfrew South. I did not mean to mention it during the flag debate, but I will now. I should like to know where the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has been during the flag debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member; his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of pursuing the Conservative filibuster, but since I am asked to make a speech, I shall cut it down to five words: I am against a plebiscite.

[Text]

Mr. G. H. Doucett (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with keen interest and attention, and despite the absence of many, to the many speeches which have been made on this issue. At the outset of my remarks may I point out that in a democratic country we cannot all be of the one opinion, and I am in favour of a plebiscite on this issue. I think that if the entire population of this great country of ours had the opportunity to voice their views and opinions there would be a greater degree of unity and satisfaction than would be the case if a flag is selected by this house and forced on the people. Regardless of the fact that this choice may be the flag which becomes the flag of Canada, it will not be the flag of the majority. I am not of the opinion that questions such as this should be decided by 265 representatives in this house. I agree, as do many others, that in most cases that is right; and the position is stated by Mr. Bruce West much better than I could state it.

Mr. Brewin: May I ask the hon. member a question. Does he not think that decision by parliament is the traditional British way to decide things; and is he not a strong supporter of British traditions? I believe he is.

Mr. Doucett: I am just going to explain that, Mr. Speaker. The selection of a flag is different from many other questions, in fact from all of them. There are no experts or specialists who can select or determine what should be the flag of this country. I should like to quote Mr. Bruce West, who says this:

> All I can say is that we did not introduce this contentious question into our country's affairs. It was introduced by the advocates of the new flag. Let them demand a new flag if they choose to do so. This is their right, as citizens of this country. But when some of us object to this proposal, let the blame for spreading disunity fall upon the heads of those who introduced the proposal, not upon those who exercise their right to oppose it.
> Much has been said about how undesirable it would be to hold a nation-wide referendum on the flag question, on grounds that the ordinary man in the street should be content to leave this matter in the hands of his elected representatives. Ordinarily, I would agree with this theory.

That answers the point made by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). Mr. West continues:

> But not in the case of the proposed new flag. For one thing, every Canadian is fully qualified to make a decision on this particular matter.
> In fact, I'd like to see even the children have a chance to express their views. Second, I do not believe that in the case of the flag our members of parliament are actually representatives of our people in the broad sense although they are, of course, in the legal one. You know and I know that the cards in this important game are politically stacked in Ottawa in such a way at this time that the true wishes of the people have become greatly obscured.

I have read that because it is a very good editorial. I have said that I am in favour of a plebiscite. I am happy to have this opportunity to voice my view and the views of many of my constituents and many other people, groups, organizations and individuals, many from a great distance, who have written me letters and who have sent me petitions. They are deeply concerned regarding the heritage and traditions of our country.

At the outset I want to go on record that the whole flag issue is, as I said when I spoke on August 25, a very important one though not one of immediate urgency. Decades have come and gone and Canada has gone forward. So let us, I suggest, lay a proper foundation for the selection of what touches on the very soul of our nation. I am more and more convinced that the only way this nation can have any reasonable degree of unanimity in a problem as emotional as this one is by a plebiscite.

It has been suggested that the reason for bringing about a new flag is to have a purely Canadian flag for the nation. If this is so, then it must be one that is the choice of the people. What other way can we get the democratic opinion of our entire population than by giving them the opportunity to voice their views in a plebiscite?

The navy has always had its own flag, the white ensign. The R.C.A.F. has had its flag with the blue background, and the army has used the red ensign. All these flags have one thing in common, the union jack in the upper quarter. Over the years these flags have come to mean much to those who have served in the forces and have therefore become part of our heritage and the focal point in rallying the nation in times of emergency. I say that a plebiscite would be most fair to those gallant men and women who have served this country, in that it would give them the opportunity to voice their own likes or dislikes. To prevent this now would seem to me to strike at the very foundation of our nation and discount entirely our past heritage. It would mean that we would be turning our backs on the many glorious sacrifices made in the past that have built up this country to where it stands among the nations of the world today.

These sacrifices were not made by one ethnic group alone but by individuals of all groups who had come to regard Canada as their homeland. As a Canadian I am proud of this heritage and these sacrifices, and I see no legitimate reason for tossing them out without giving all our people the chance to voice their views in respect of this important matter.

In this fast changing world, Mr. Speaker, are we trying to establish a new Canada today, something which began in 1964 and which posterity will look upon as dating from 1964? Yes, Mr. Speaker, a plebiscite is what thousands of Canadians want. We have been made aware of this through the petitions which have been addressed to the house, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the members of his cabinet and to individual representatives of the different ridings. The people feel it is their democratic right to have the right to decide on their nation's emblem.

I further realize that feelings in regard to this important issue are mixed, but to what extent is one of the things that I think is unknown. They are mixed and we cannot be sure as to the situation. We do not know whether 30, 40, 50 or 60 per cent, or what percentage, hold a particular view; but if a plebiscite is held it will establish to what degree and satisfy all.

There are many besides those who have spoken in this house who have endorsed a plebiscite and the democratic right and privilege of the people of the country to voice their opinion. I should like to quote from The Legionary of July, 1964:

> The Legionary therefore takes what is probably the last opportunity available to make one more appeal to the Prime Minister to let the people of Canada decide this crucial question. We do so because we earnestly believe a national plebiscite is by far the most clearcut way of settling the problem once and for all, and because we sincerely believe it is the only means of avoiding, so far as it is possible to do so, making it a partisan issue. Even if a "free" vote of M.P.'s and senators were allowed there would be a natural tendency, human nature being what it is, for government supporters to vote for the government's own design, and it is far from certain that a parliamentary vote on an issue of this nature would accurately reflect the feelings of the whole people of Canada.
> As we said in our May issue: "In a free democratic country, where public opinion is neither regimented nor suppressed, instances occur when the people are stirred to the innermost depths of heart and soul. Then it is that government by the people, for the people, is given true effect by a national vote on the issue at stake, and on that only."
> The Legionary believes that the flag question is such an issue and again strongly urges the Prime Minister to let the Canadian people decide it, one way or another, through a national plebiscite. It is the most democratic way of solving this problem. It is the only way to ascertain what the people really want. And the request for a plebiscite is sure to be warmly supported by all Canadians of good will and moderation because, no matter what the result, if the issue were settled by a parliamentary vote only, grave doubts would arise in the minds of a great many citizens that it represented the will of the people. These doubts would linger on for many years and would remain a serious obstacle to the attainment of national unity.
> So please, Mr. Prime Minister, let the people decide. It would be a statesmanlike solution and might well be a nation-saving move.

Now, those are the sentiments of the Legion which has, I suppose, upwards of a quarter of a million members. Many of their comrades who served in the war paid the supreme sacrifice and are not here to tell their story. I said before, and I repeat, I feel the government got off to a wrong start by introducing a definite design. This contention has been borne out by the report of the flag committee. The committee voted 100 per cent against the proposed three leaf flag. Surely, Mr. Speaker, when an issue tugs at the very soul of a nation great care should be taken in arriving at a solution. Each citizen should be given the democratic opportunity to express his or her opinion. In my opinion, if this were done it would do a great deal to curtail much of the controversy which the choice of a flag has created and bring about a greater degree of unity in our country, which the fathers of confederation endeavoured to create by binding us together in one great family.

I say, give the people a voice. They will remember our great inheritance. By the same token, we are the custodians of a sacred trust. Let us remember the religious emblem which permeated the coronation of Queen Elizabeth II. Let us recall the significant reply given by Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, the then prime minister of Canada, when he was asked why the new Queen had been proclaimed in Ottawa as the defender of the faith. He said that this was a Christian country. As a Christian country, I believe the majority of the people wish to retain the emphasis of the cross in our national flag. The cross is primarily the symbol of the Prince of Peace, the Saviour of the world. Every city, town and village throughout Canada has a church building upon which there is a cross as a symbol of worship and racial tolerance.

Like many hon. members who have already spoken in this debate, I have received many letters and petitions from individuals and organizations throughout the country concerning the way in which the flag should be selected. Since I have received many petitions, I should like to quote from just a couple. First, I should like to quote a short portion of a petition coming from my own constituency of Lanark, which I have the honour and privilege of representing:

We, the voters of Lanark county, go on record as being opposed to the proposed new flag—or a new maple leaf flag to replace the red ensign. Every Canadian should be given the right to vote on this vital matter by means of a national plebiscite.

I said before, Mr. Speaker, and I say again, there are no experts in this matter of deciding a flag; there are no specialists in this field. It is purely a matter of emotion and sentiment. It is for this reason I am so definite and strong in my conviction that the only equitable way of bringing about maximum unity is to allow the people to go to the polls and decide by means of a plebiscite.

I should like to quote now from a letter from the Canadian Corps Association which, on many occasions, has been in favour of the red ensign. I quote:

The comments of our Prime Minister that those who support the retention of the Canadian red ensign are endeavouring to pressure the government into an election have been made by him to simply confuse the flag issue. It is not the supporters of the present Canadian national flag who have been pushing this flag issue to the priority decision position that it has at this date reached in parliament, but it is the Prime Minister's personal endeavour to place his flag design on the flag poles of this country that has resulted in this issue reaching such controversial prominence. With such divided opinion throughout Canada on the flag question, we cannot understand why Mr. Pearson will not allow the people of Canada the opportunity to choose between the Canadian red ensign and his new suggested maple leaf choice.

It is true that the government is elected by the people to change or set policies from time to time with regard to the conduct of this country's business, i.e. Canada's pension plan, income tax rates, baby bonus, agricultural policies, national defence policies, immigration policies, etc. However, the changing of Canada's national flag cannot possibly be classed in the above general business procedures of our country. We, as Canadians, do not feel that we want Canada's national flag to be changed from time to time at the whim of the various governments. Does our Prime Minister not realize that millions of citizens living in Canada today of voting age will still be alive for another 50 or 60 years, and therefore why should 265 members of parliament whose average years in office are approximately 15 to 20 years, choose the flag which all Canadians would then be expected to respect during their entire lifetime? This is the reason why a plebiscite on the flag question is most necessary...

We would also like to point out in this letter, that the Canadian Corps Association, dominion command, considers the advice of the Prime Minister that a referendum on the flag would cost over $10 million is again simply another smokescreen in the flag question. Those who support the retention of the present Canadian national flag have not urged that the flag plebiscite need be conducted immediately—

—we do not wish to see our government waste money either, for it is the people of Canada who supply the money. The flag question ballot could be placed in with the regular voting ballots in the next scheduled general election of this country, and there most certainly is no need of either an election to be called, nor a $10 million immediate referendum when the question can be placed before the voters of this country, when the next regular general election is scheduled, and in the meantime the present national flag should be flown as it has been for the past many years until the people of Canada signify to the contrary.

Our organization fully realizes that there are many important national problems before the present members of the House of Commons that should most definitely take precedence over the flag question, and again we reiterate that it is not the supporters of the retention of the Canadian red ensign as Canada's national flag who are forcing this issue to the foreground in parliament.

In conclusion, I would like to mention that for the past half a century or more, this country's prime ministers and members of parliament have always indicated that Canada's veterans' views were respected statements by citizens who had served their country well in war, and were continuing to serve it loyally in peace through the welfare and service work of their organizations. During the past few weeks because of our present Prime Minister's open-combat attitude against the veterans organizations' views on the flag question, politicians, newspapers and general citizens have openly ridiculed the ex-servicemen who down through the years since 1900 have served Canada both at home and abroad. This type of criticism by those particularly in government authority has damaged the prestige and character of "service organizations" and we trust that it was never the intention of our present government to do so.

That is signed by the president of the Canadian Corps Association. As mentioned in that letter, there is no rush.

Much discussion has been given by many concerning the design of a flag, as though we never had one. It is strange that we should exist as a nation for nearly 100 years, sending our representatives to all corners of the earth, with our armed forces serving on every continent and recognized as Canadians wherever they have gone, yet our present government has wasted valuable time stirring up discord and resentment in every part of Canada.

Distinction is something that is earned. Culture is something that time creates. You do not build culture trying to destroy another, or denying that it exists. You give free vent to all worth-while cultural influences. Surely it is not wrong to look back over our shoulders at yesterday. The fact that we are still predominantly British and French in outlook is what really makes us Canadians. If we forget sentiment and abandon tradition we may court extinction rather than distinction. We cannot live in the past, but we can live by it. A country which does not honour its past has no future.

This is no time for party politics. We should rise above it. The democratic world is watching. This is a matter in which history is being made, and some day a boy may ask his father to tell him the story of our flag and the father should be able to say, "Son, it was our finest hour." Let us see that our efforts are such that the generations to come will be able to say, "Son, it was our finest hour."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I hear remarks of "dispense" and "question." That indicates the attitude of mind of people across the aisle and on the far left. They know in advance what I am going to say. Their minds are made up, but I can tell them they do not know what I am going to say.

Mr. Grégoire: You have already said it.

Mr. Chatterton: If the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) would listen for a moment he might learn something. It is unlikely that he will do so but it is a suggestion he might follow. I am speaking on the amendment which in effect proposes a plebiscite on the question of the national flag.

At the outset let me say that I am strongly opposed to the principle of a plebiscite—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chatterton: I hear applause from the other side, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps they will hear me out on why, in spite of my strong convictions against the principle of a plebiscite, I nevertheless feel that under certain circumstances, including the present, the advantages of a plebiscite overbalance the disadvantages.

An hon. Member: What about the political considerations?

Mr. Chatterton: Responding to the interjection from the other side may I say the political considerations are entirely from those on that side.

In conveying to hon. members my conviction against the principle of a plebiscite when it is up to parliament, the governing body, to accept the responsibility, I would like to relate that when I was in local government in British Columbia, before I became a member of this house, on many occasions I decried the provincial legislation in that province which required consent of the people—in effect a plebiscite—when in my opinion the local body of government should have had the responsibility or right of decision. Yet in spite of my strong aversion to the principle of a plebiscite, I nevertheless feel there are valid arguments for supporting the proposal at this time.

The mere fact that, in spite of my convictions as to the principle of a plebiscite, I have arrived at my present position must surely indicate—at least it does to me—that we have arrived at a sorry state when we have to resort to this measure. If the whole issue of a flag had been approached in a different manner the question of a plebiscite would never have arisen. For example, if the same approach was taken by the present government as was taken in 1945-46, I doubt if this question would ever have occurred to anyone in the house.

An hon. Member: They never had a decision.

Mr. Chatterton: Mr. Speaker, I hear from the other side, from some person who is afraid to stand up and make a speech, that there was no decision. There was a very clear decision from the special joint committee of 1945-46; but the difference in procedure at that time and today was this, that in 1945 the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons was set up to propose a national flag for Canada and it was not told in advance that this or that flag for the preference of the government or the prime minister.

The committee entered upon that debate with a completely open mind. No instruction was given to them as to what they might or might not do. As a result of this approach the 1945 committee came up with a recommendation. As a matter of interest only, the recommendation happened to be the Canadian red ensign with the shield replaced by a maple leaf. The pertinent point is that the committee came up with a recommendation based on a vote of 23 to 1.

Mr. Moreau: Fourteen to nothing.

Mr. Chatterton: That vote of 14 to nothing was, of course, the committee's vote against the flag proposed by your Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson).

It is unfortunate that after the committee reported in 1946 the government of the day neglected to take action. But the fact remains that if the flag question with which we have been dealing had been approached in the same manner, and if the government had proposed the adoption of the report, there would certainly have been the odd person here and there who would raise objection, but generally speaking there was a consensus. To me, the question of the flag is akin to certain matters which are defined in the British North America Act. In other words, I feel that questions such as the flag should be treated as constitutional amendments, and that only when there is general consensus among the major groups within Canada should a change be made. If this question had been approached as it was in 1945 and had the report been acted upon by the government, then the question of the plebiscite would not have arisen. As it is, the manner in which the government opened this flag question has created difficulty and disunity. I intend to quote from certain newspapers across the country to substantiate my contention that the manner in which this question was raised has resulted in disunity. Because of the disunity which has been created it becomes necessary, unfortunately, to proceed with a plebiscite as the only way out of the dilemma in which we find ourselves.

There are one or two alternatives and if the government were to accept them a plebiscite would not be necessary. However, I doubt whether the government will accept these alternatives; I will come to them later. On the basis that the government is determined to pursue its present course I believe a plebiscite is the way out, because this government is creating and compounding disunity.

In support of my contention that the government's approach to the flag question is creating disunity I would quote from the Victoria Daily Colonist of May 29, 1964 which says, referring to the proposed change in the flag:

> Such attempts were resisted by Mr. King and Mr. St. Laurent but their successor, Mr. Pearson, is now leading the attack on the pretext of unifying the country.
> Why the change? It doesn't require much insight to realize that Mr. Pearson is after additional seats in the House of Commons and thinks this is one way he can get them.
> No matter what his scheme there can be no doubt that the Pearson way of handling the flag issue has caused bitterness that goes very deep; that it is bound to weaken the country; and that it will not satisfy those who have been and still are shouting for a nation made up of a partnership of states.
> Certainly, Mr. Pearson has no right to expect that his arrogant action will be applauded or accepted by millions of his fellow Canadians.

Perhaps I can relate my personal impression of this disunifying action. What has disturbed me more than anything else, and I speak with the utmost sincerity, is the reaction which has been created, certainly in British Columbia. I agree that most of this reaction is not justified. But it exists and it makes the necessary reconciliation very difficult. This reaction has been caused by the manner in which the Prime Minister and the government have treated this question of the flag—a very emotional one. Incidentally, I may say that those who are interested may read the speech I made in this house during the previous debate. I come from an area which is probably one of the most pro-red ensign parts of the country, but I have been most conciliatory. As a matter of fact, I have been blamed by many people in my riding for being too much so. I read from an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail of June 16, 1964, of which this is the opening paragraph:

> Prime Minister Lester Pearson's claim that he has pressed the issue of a national flag at this time to promote national unity is now no more than a bad joke—a sick joke. It is painfully apparent that he has succeeded only in encouraging disunity.

The first point I am trying to make in justification of the holding of a plebiscite is that the present course of the government is continuing to create disunity and that, therefore, a plebiscite would be the least objectionable course open to us. I wish to quote an editorial which appeared in the Vancouver Province of October 31, 1964. These opening paragraphs refer to the flag debate creating disunity:

> Undue prolongation of the flag debate. ...would bring about a general election which would be fought on the French-English issue, would set province against province, group against group and would jeopardize confederation.
> The foolish tragedy of all this is that the whole flag argument is a phony, politically-manufactured issue of relatively little importance compared with the urgent and important agenda confronting parliament. And yet it has been allowed to stalemate the nation's business and threaten a minor civil war.
> Mr. Diefenbaker and those who support retention of the red ensign are told they will destroy Canada if they don't knuckle down to Mr. Pearson's new flag. They are warned that on them rests the onus of responsibility.

This is an enormous distortion that should not be allowed to hide the truth. And the truth is that the ugly, nonsensical dilemma in which Canada finds itself is the direct result of pathetically inept leadership on the part of Prime Minister Pearson and his little coterie of brain trusters.

If the Prime Minister has an ounce of statesmanship he will recognize the danger of his foolish flag policy and withdraw his flag proposals until times are more propitious.

I have shown that the procedure adopted by the government in regard to this flag question has tended to create disunity. May I digress by saying that in my opinion the right in Canada to hold a plebiscite is not reflected only by our statutes, but by the British North America Act. It is reflected also in the minds of people. I think the most unfortunate part of this flag debacle is the fact that in the minds of people, particularly those in western Canada, there has been created a suspicion which will take a long time to overcome. It must be overcome, and I believe that every member from those parts of Canada is duty bound to try to overcome it. But the fact is that this suspicion has been created and it has tended to destroy the mental attitude of the people toward understanding our difficulties in Canada.

I now come, Mr. Speaker, to the way in which the flag question was handled by the flag committee set up during this session. At the time the flag committee was set up—I believe that was on September 10—I think there was a genuine desire in all parts of the house to arrive at some compromise conclusion that would have been satisfactory or at least reasonably acceptable to most groups across Canada. To my mind that feeling was very obvious from speaking to members on both sides of the house. I believe that if the feeling which was prevalent at that time had prevailed when the committee was considering this question—I hope I am not wrong in saying this—they might have come up with a conclusion which would have been reasonably acceptable to all groups within Canada. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Prime Minister perhaps largely because of misjudgment, in his statements immediately after the flag committee was set up tended to prejudice the chance of the committee's arriving at a near-unanimous and acceptable report.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chatterton: I am giving my reasons for believing that the present and past procedures of the government make it necessary or advisable to have a plebiscite. According to the transcript of the program "Conversation with the Prime Minister", on Sunday, September 13, 1964—that was just three days after the flag committee had been set up—the Prime Minister was asked a question by Mr. DePoe. This is the question:

Just time for one more quick question—perhaps a very quick answer, sir. Are we going to have a new flag by Christmas?

The Prime Minister: We are going to have a new flag by Christmas. It's going to be a distinctive national flag and it will be based on this historic and proud emblem of Canada, the maple leaf.

I was watching television at that time. I believe the committee had been set up on the previous Thursday, and I was most hopeful when it was set up that an acceptable conclusion would arise out of the committee; but when I heard the Prime Minister on that Sunday night I said to my wife, "There isn't a hope". Mr. Speaker, whether or not the Prime Minister meant that, in my opinion those statements of his made it extremely difficult for the members of the flag committee to go into the committee with a completely open mind and a sincere wish to arrive at an acceptable compromise.

I should now like to quote from the Victoria Daily Times of September 17. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that the Victoria Daily Times is a good newspaper but it is not one that has been renowned for its support of our party. In this article, written by Mr. Frank Rutter, it is said:

Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson Wednesday night brushed aside any question of a personal compromise on his new Canadian flag.

A crowd of 750 people who came to shake his hand at a coffee reception held by the Liberal party cheered wildly as Mr. Pearson rededicated himself to his maple leaf design.

He made it clear that he expects the House of Commons special committee to approve and the house itself to adopt the recommendation without further fuss.

I maintain that with a committee operating under those circumstances, whether or not its members did in fact make the sincerest effort to arrive at a compromise, in view of those remarks of the Prime Minister in advance of the committee meetings it certainly made any recommendation of the committee suspect in the minds of a great number of people.

Another reason I say a plebiscite should be held is this. I believe the flag committee could very easily have arrived at a recommendation which might have been accepted by this house with no or with very limited debate. I say this of my personal knowledge, Mr. Speaker. I believe that one of the flags considered by the committee would have been acceptable to members on both sides of this house if there had been no debate or argument as to the design subsequently. I refer now to one of the three final flag designs to which the committee had boiled down all the designs. As the house knows, the committee divided all the designs they had received into three groups. The first group was based on the single maple leaf, the second group was based on the three maple leaves, and the third group were those that contained the union jack and/or the fleur-de-lis. From each of these groups the committee selected one as the best design.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chatterton: I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that if a design had been selected such as I am going to describe, the question of a plebiscite would never have arisen. To repeat, I maintain that if the design I shall describe had been selected, the question of a plebiscite would not be before us today. This particular design, for the record, is exactly the same as the one finally selected—that is, the red maple leaf on a centre white background and a red border at each end—except that there are two small additions. In one red column there is a small union jack, and in the other red column a small, equally sized square with three fleur-de-lis in it. As soon as the committee report was filed, I believe on November 29, I became curious as to what this flag looked like. I happened to get a copy of the flag and it immediately seemed to me that this was a perfect solution. This design had many advantages. In the first place, it was not a political flag; it was not a flag proposed by the Conservative party, or any other political party. It was apparently a design of the experts on the flag committee. That design has as its central motif a maple leaf; it is a maple leaf flag.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. In spite of the suggestion made by the hon. member to the effect that what he is now saying is relevant to the question before the house, the Chair has very serious doubts about it and it seems the hon. member is now discussing the question of the work done by the committee. He says that if the committee had reached a different conclusion or had made a different recommendation, then a plebiscite would not have been necessary. To my mind this is rather far fetched in the line of relevancy. I would ask him to relate the argument he is now proposing to the Chair to the subject matter under discussion.

Mr. Chatterton: Mr. Speaker, if I may eliminate my references to the findings of the committee, I am trying to state the case that under certain circumstances I for one would not support a plebiscite, but that under the circumstances which prevail I would support it. I am trying to describe these circumstances which do prevail, and one of the factors which make up the circumstances is that I believe there is a design which might be acceptable, which would therefore eliminate the necessity for a plebiscite. This particular design I have described could, I believe, be acceptable to members on both sides of the house, and I hope I am not too optimistic when I appeal to the Prime Minister and to hon. members opposite to take another look at the question of design. A design which met the requirements of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition would surely eliminate the need for a plebiscite.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we are not very far from arriving at such a design. To me, the whole question whether we should have a plebiscite or should not is not necessarily one which the people have the right to determine. I believe that if the members of this house came to a consensus on a selected design and there was no major group in the house which took strong exception to it, then I for one would not for a moment consider the necessity for or advisability of a plebiscite. I think the whole question boils down to the selection of an acceptable design.

There is at the moment an amendment before the house, and on the basis of the present amendment I could not within the rules move another amendment which would bring about what I have in mind, which is reconsideration by the committee of a design which might be acceptable to groups in all parts of the house. Such a design, of course, would eliminate the necessity for debate. I would go as far as to say that if such design were agreed upon by even the two major parties I would, under those circumstances, support the government if it were to invoke closure in order to bring about a design which is acceptable to the majority of the groups within Canada. I do not know whether it is too late to do this. I do not know whether the positions of the various parties have hardened too much. But I would make an appeal to the members on the other side of the house. I have spoken to many members from all parts of the house, and I must say I had hoped that we might reach agreement in spite of the recommendations of this committee. I have spoken to individual members on an individual basis, and they agree with me that possibly there is a design which would be generally acceptable and which would eliminate all necessity for extensive debate, and certainly obviate any stipulation that there be a plebiscite on the flag question.

With regret, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I must now support the proposal for a plebiscite in spite of the fact, as I have pointed out, that I am strongly averse to the principle involved. As to what should be covered by a plebiscite, that is another point; but if this question were referred to a committee, I would hope that the committee would come up with two designs, and I do not think the red ensign should be one of them.

If this question were to be covered by a plebiscite, I think the designs which the committee should come up with are these. First of all, the committee grouped some flag designs into three kinds. I say that the committee should consider two groups of various designs. Everyone seems to be agreed that a new flag should be based on the maple leaf, which would be its main motif. Then the committee could recommend that two flags be submitted to the people from which they could choose. The first flag should be based on the maple leaf but carry no symbols of our heritage, our traditions or our past—as the present one recommended by the committee. The second one should be a design something of the order of the one I have described. It too should be a maple leaf design but should carry something of our history and of our past. I know from what some of my colleagues who are French speaking have told me that they are not anxious to have the fleur-de-lis on the flag. But let me tell them that the people in the west consider that the contribution made by our French speaking colleagues is a most important one and they would like to see some indication on the flag of the major contribution they made to Canada.

May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Walker: I see a quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. Chatterton: Mr. Speaker, I hear members opposite yelling "question". Of course, when they had a chance to call "question" they did not make use of it. Last Thursday night it was moved that the debate be adjourned so that we could go on with other business but at that time, of course, members opposite were in favour of continuing the flag debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I might mention to the hon. member that this is the second time in the course of his remarks he has offended against one of the rules of the house that requires members not to reflect on votes of the house. So I would ask him not to refer in this particular way to the vote which was taken earlier in this debate.

Mr. Chatterton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I accept your ruling. Sometimes it is difficult to stick to the rules in the face of provocation.

I want to conclude briefly the remarks I was making before six o'clock. I said that I was opposed in principle to a plebiscite but that the circumstances were such that I thought a plebiscite was the only course open to the house in view of the situation to which the government had brought us. I still think at this late stage that although positions have hardened, particularly the position on the government side, there is room for manoeuvre, room to arrive at a conclusion which might eliminate the necessity of what I consider would be an unfortunate plebiscite. I say that because if we did have a plebiscite, no matter what its terms might be, it would tend to continue and perhaps even deepen the disunity that has been caused by the raising of this question. But at least after a plebiscite I believe the people would accept the decision that might be made, whatever it might be. But if the decision is to be made on the basis of the present course of the government, then, Mr. Speaker, judging by what a great many people in my area have told me, it will take a long time, a generation or more, for those people who feel so strongly about the flag that they considered was our flag, to overcome the feeling that something has been taken away from them, something which they have revered, something they thought was an essential part of Canada as they saw it.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, unless the government is prepared either to postpone the flag issue or unless they wish to consider a further referral to the committee so that the committee can come up with a proposal that will be acceptable generally to the various groups within Canada, I maintain that the only alternative, and a regrettable one, is to refer the question of a flag for the decision of the people of Canada, and in my opinion the decision should be made simpler by having two designs submitted to the people.

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am going to be brief. I did not intend to speak in this debate, but since the last flag debate I have had so many letters and so many comments on the way this matter has been conducted in the house that I am almost forced to say a few words.

On Armistice day, when I watched the parade with the four red ensigns being carried at the front, I felt sad and with heavy heart I said to myself: Is this going to be the last time we will see our grand old flag being used on Armistice day? I was standing in front of the west block and a gentleman and his wife came along. The Canadian red ensign was flying side by side with the stars and stripes. This man spoke to me and he said, "Why do the people of Canada want to throw away the red ensign?" He looked with pride at his American flag. He reached over and stretched it out and stretched out the red ensign and his wife took a picture. He said, "I want this picture for fear the red ensign will not be seen flying again beside our stars and stripes."

I was in St. Catharines over the week end. Having been born near the water, I love boats. On the prairies we do not see many boats and I spent a lot of time at the Welland canal watching the boats of almost every nation in the world go through the locks. On their masts they all flew the Canadian red ensign along with the flag of their own nation. As to the ships that were coal burners or diesel types, the white in the flags they were flying had become dirty, but the Canadian red ensign stood out with its loud colours. It is a very picturesque sight.

While I was standing there talking to some people, one man said to me, "You know, the Canadian red ensign looks great on those ships." I said, "Yes". He said, "Why are the people in Ottawa trying to throw it away?" He did not know I was a member of parliament or that I was standing up for it. He gave me quite a talk on his feelings about throwing away our heritage, all our past experience, for a flag with none of our traditional symbols on it.

These are just a few of the comments I wished to make on some matters that have been brought to my attention since the flag debate took place a few weeks ago. I am still getting quite a few letters. Here is one from the Canadian Corps Association, which reads in part as follows:

> The Canadian Corps Association, dominion command, at this time reiterates that no change in Canada's present national flag should be made unless the government is so instructed by the citizens of Canada by means of a plebiscite vote held in conjunction with Canada's next general election.

I do not know why those sitting on your right, Mr. Speaker, are so afraid to let the people decide. I believe this is the fair method. We are down here to make rules and laws, but I do not believe a minority should decide on an issue upon which the people of Canada are so divided. I am one of those who are willing to go along with the opinion of the majority after the people of Canada decide. If it is the majority wish to have a distinctive Canadian flag, I would go along with that. I was born in Canada and spent my whole life here. I was not overseas in the first world war, but as a boy of 16 I offered my services and was led by the Canadian red ensign. I was proud to be one who marched behind it.

I said my remarks would be brief, Mr. Speaker, but I felt that because of the way things have been handled in this parliament this issue should be decided by the people. If they choose the red ensign, that is O.K. If they choose a distinctive Canadian flag, that is fine. I cannot see any of the traditional symbols of Canada on the flag that has been proposed. As I have said, I just wanted to make a few comments on these matters. I am still receiving letters about the flag. I have received 154 letters from my constituency and 152 of them have asked me to stand up for the red ensign. Oh, yes, I received one letter from a man I know very well. He said, "why should we worship England all our lives?" I answered that letter and I suggested that regardless of the flag upon which we decided, he would not be satisfied unless it had the hammer and sickle on it. I also received a letter from a 15 year old school boy. He did not say what kind of a flag he wanted, he just wanted a change. The other 152 letters asked me to stand up for the red ensign and to bring this issue before the people of Canada.

I hear a few railbirds down there, Mr. Speaker, but they do not say much. I am sorry I do not speak French, and your speeches are not worth the bother of putting on earphones.

With these few remarks, I will resume my seat, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I, too, did not intend to take part in this debate. I took 20 minutes of the time of this house during the last debate, and I do not regret it. I tried my best not to say anything that would provoke anyone else. I have sat in as many parliaments as any man in this house except one. In the 25 years I have been here, I have never sat in a worse conducted parliament; I can say that truthfully. I am not referring to the Speaker or the Deputy Speaker. They have had an impossible job, and for the life of me I do not know how they control themselves. It is ridiculous, the things they have had to put up with, and mostly from members on the government side. We on this side know enough to keep our mouths shut and remain quiet when there is someone speaking from the other side. Apparently all hon. members opposite want to do is make interjections to try to confuse the person who has the floor.

I have a few things I want to say and because I have only a few things I wrote them out during the supper hour. I am one of those who has to either speak without notes or follow my notes closely. I do not want anybody razzing me about reading my speech. I am not going to read it all, but if I have to throw it away it will be all the worse for you. As I see it, there is only one excuse for bringing the flag resolution before the house and that is the lack of preparedness on the part of the government to introduce other important legislation. I could add that the legislation which has been introduced was withdrawn and redrafted before it even had a change of being passed by parliament. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) used the flag issue to stifle parliament for his own selfish, personal advantage. He used the flag issue also to kill time in order to get more important legislation ready to bring before the house. What an excuse that is. It has cost the Canadian taxpayers millions of dollars. If I were the Prime Minister of Canada and responsible for introducing a controversial subject such as the flag, I would at least be in my place in the house to hear what members had to say about it.

I have a clipping here from a newspaper that is very favourable to the government. I would not quote from any other newspaper because I want to be very fair to them. This comes from the Winnipeg Tribune.

There was nothing wrong with Prime Minister Pearson's speech to the Royal Canadian Legion except its object.

He chose this occasion to haul down the red ensign.

The speech was in reality a declaration of Liberal government intent. At the same time it was an attempt to justify a new emblem on the grounds of national unity. The case was unconvincing.

Prior to his visit to Winnipeg, Mr. Pearson had let it be known that his government would stand or fall on the flag issue. It is the government which has selected this particular time to force a showdown.

It is this newspaper's opinion that the timing of this flag proposal is bad. If the main purpose is to consolidate unity it is a peculiar approach for, as witnessed at the Legion meeting, the dominant reaction is disunity. Unfortunately, too, the Prime Minister's approach leaves little ground for thoughtful consideration. He asks, in effect, for a surrender of what is known for something unknown. He entertains a mystique about the price of unity which he is unable to articulate.

In addition to poor timing, the method of introducing the design was odd. In Ottawa last week a high level press conference made it clear that the Pearson government would stand or fall on the new flag. The following day in the Commons Mr. Pearson said that a new design had not been decided upon. At the Legion meeting on Sunday, he left the impression that only the maple leaf motif was firm. Yet the next day Mr. Pearson unveiled his choice at a press conference.

Just how much the cabinet was apprised in advance of all this is unknown. But certainly parliament has been kept completely in the dark.

I might mention at this point that the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) made a statement in the house to the effect that this subject was never brought up in the Liberal caucus, and nobody knew anything about it except a few at the top levels of government.

In attempting to force an absolute decision in this ill-defined region, the Prime Minister has created a maelstrom. It is true that he has attempted to reduce the problem to straight political terms but unfortunately this does not provide the flexible basis required.

He has placed himself and his government on the record to introduce a new flag. He has rejected the proposal for a national plebiscite and insists that the issue must be decided on a free vote in the Commons. But then he has also added that the result would be interpreted by his government as a vote of confidence.

In other words he is prepared to fight an election on the issue. He is willing to jeopardize national unity in the hope of political advantage but he is unwilling to seek an expression of opinion in a plebiscite in which the issue would be the flag, not seats in parliament.

This places the M.P.'s in a position where they no longer will be truly free to exercise their judgment on the merits of a flag. Instead they will have to weigh the significance of the consequences, a government defeat and, even worse, an election to be fought on the design of a flag.

Such an unpleasant encounter could scarcely be an ingredient of unity. It would also be mischievous and perhaps seriously harmful, for surely the problems of this country cannot be resolved in the flag alone.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Cardiff: You will get the question soon enough, don't worry about that; but you will not be satisfied with it after you get it.

We have a great number of people all over Canada who would vote for a truly Canadian flag if for no other reason than unity. On the other hand the great majority of our people would much sooner have what we now have than take a chance of separating Canadians even more than they are already. There is only a very small percentage of people in Quebec who are separatists or revolutionists, thank God. We even have a few in this House of Commons but they are still a little afraid to stand up and be counted because of their extremist neighbours.

A lot of legislation was introduced before the flag debate started, and most of it had to be taken out again and redrafted because it had not a chance of being passed by parliament in its original form. The Canada pension plan has been redrafted four or five times.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I think the hon. member will admit he is straying far afield and I would ask him to return to the subject matter before the house.

Mr. Cardiff: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, because I do have a great deal of respect for you.

This is a quotation from a letter sent to all hon. members by the Manitoba branch of the Christian action movement:

> The red ensign probably commands a greater following than any other individual flag design submitted to the committee. Though, unfortunately, the flag has been made a party issue, many rank and file Liberals prefer to retain the red ensign but out of party loyalty may avoid overt opposition. The flag should not be a party issue, or the subject of a personal battle.

I do not know how many Christians we have in the house but, believe me, we would be better off with a few more. I am now going to recite a piece of poetry and then, you will be glad to know, sit down:

> Our flag, our flag, our glorious flag,
> The emblem of the free;
> It proudly flies in every clime, it floats on every sea.
> Beneath its grand old sheltering folds,
> There never treads a slave,
> Before it tyranny must sink to an unhonoured grave.
> Unfurl it free to every breeze,
> Long may it wave on high,
> The ensign of the bravest race
> That dwells beneath the sky.
> Beneath it stands the empire vast,
> Girded in power and might.
> Ready, aye ready to defend its honour,
> And ready to defend its right.
> Our flag, our flag, our glorious flag,
> The symbol of the free.
> Our flag invincible on land,
> And a flag that rules the sea.
> Our red ensign,
> Why trade it in on another?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, on two other occasions I have spoken on a resolution on the flag, or on one of the amendments. On June 20 I did my level best to try to plead with the house that we in Canada must always remember we are a country of minorities. I tried to remind the members that we should be an example to all the new countries of the world where several languages and several races have to get along within the same geographical boundaries.

On that occasion I reminded the house that most of us in Canada do not favour the technique of the plebiscite. It is foreign to the system of parliamentary responsibility we have learned to trust, but I pointed out that there are certain occasions which touch the heart and affect the rights of minorities when we have to consider whether we should use the plebiscite technique or not.

In that speech of June 20 I reluctantly supported a plebiscite, on the grounds that looking back at the last plebiscite we had during the war, on the conscription issue, the speeches made in the house on that occasion contained all the arguments that could be used against holding a plebiscite; yet a plebiscite was held, and when it was finished Canadians found it easier to accept the will of the majority than they did in 1917 in the first world war when conscription was imposed by parliament. When the rights of the individual are affected, when matters close to the conscience are affected, there is sometimes a place for the plebiscite. That was the burden of my remarks on June 20, though I did not succeed in making many converts.

I want to remind the house of what I said on that occasion. All the veterans of our country have asked for, through majority votes in their Legions, is that a plebiscite be held. They have promised if a plebiscite is held to honour any flag which the majority may choose. What more can you ask of them?

The same is true of the other organizations. I would point out that if the government turns down the formal request of the official organization of most of our veterans it has done something which everyone of us in Canada will live to regret. Surely after what they have done they deserve our best consideration.

In the second place I want to remind the house that according to Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, speaking in this house as prime minister, by a single resolution here in parliament the guarantees to the French language could be taken away. I suggest that if we set a precedent in this debate by taking away an emblem of a minority culture, we are setting a precedent for things to happen in the future when passions are aroused which will tend to break this country apart. I say this slowly and deliberately with no sense of malice whatsoever. If someone moved a resolution in this house to take away the rights accorded to one of the founding races of this country I would expect every person on the Conservative side to fight as long as they could within the rules to protect the rights of that group. This is what is happening today.

I do not know what percentage of the people of this country wish to retain on the flag an emblem of their tradition and their past. I do not really know, but I am aware that it is sizeable. Certainly if one third of the people of this country want to have something of the union jack as a reminder of their great history, their rights must be considered if we wish to maintain this country as a democratic country of minorities. Rightly or wrongly the flag is one of the symbols of one of the founding races of this country. As I said earlier, this speech of mine on June 20 did not make much of an impression across the way. But on August 20 I tried again and this time, in the middle of that long debate, I asked that this question be considered by a committee. I laid down four basic principles which could, I thought, have united this house and the whole country behind the work of that committee. These principles were apparently not considered by the government. It was not until after the long Labour week end, after a motion on the Thursday by the New Democratic party that the debate be adjourned so that the house could go on to more important business; it was not until the Tuesday after the week end, when the Créditiste members had come back from the rural seats and said they wanted to adjourn the debate because the people demanded it, that the government, saved by a narrow squeak, realized that every opposition party was united behind the idea of sending this matter to a committee. It was only after 22 days of debate that they let the question go before the committee. Did they consider the four basic principles which were laid down by the opposition—and I was speaking on behalf of the opposition that night?

What were those four principles? First, that in a matter such as the flag we should all strive, regardless of whether we are Conservative or Liberal, to start off with the largest possible percentage of the people behind it. That was the first principle. It was wrong to take a personal flag, a party flag, and force it on parliament saying: If you do not accept it there will be an election. We fought against that blackmail, and with the help of all the opposition parties we forced the government to place this question before a committee, after 22 days of the time of this house had been wasted in discussion. I say this loudly and clearly, Mr. Speaker, because I believe you know we are speaking from the heart on this subject on this side of the house. It would make no difference to us if all the people of Canada were to turn against us as long as we remain faithful to what we consider to be the right. It is not a question of counting noses in this house or even across the country. Above all our party divisions the people sometimes expect that we should, on certain occasions, stand up in this house and say what we think as individuals. This is what I am trying to do.

What was the second principle I enunciated at that time? It was that on any flag the symbols and the background of the two founding groups should be there in equal parts, neither superior and neither inferior. I said this not because I was unaware that our country today is a multiracial country but because I thought it is recognized that certain understandings were reached in the early days which we must honour today. The flag now put forward ignores this fundamental principle.

Third, I said there should be something on the flag to represent the humility which any country should have if it hopes to have a future. And the only way I knew for us to do that was to put something of religious significance on the flag. Because of the faith which is accepted by the vast majority of people in the western world, the only thing we know as a generally accepted emblem of religious significance is the cross—and I say this without wishing to assert the superiority of the Christian faith over other faiths. But in the flag of Canada should be expressed that humility, that acceptance of the fact that there is a greater power than ourselves.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

I just want to know if the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) is now talking to the amendment.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A point of order has been made by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis). Perhaps the hon. member was not addressing his remarks strictly to the question before us at the present time, which is the matter of the amendment to the main motion. Possibly he would want to relate his remarks to the subject matter of the amendment.

Mr. Hamilton: I bow to your judgment, Mr. Speaker, but if what I was saying is not relevant to what a plebiscite should contain, I do not know what is.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. With respect, I would like to suggest to the hon. member that the question before the house is not what a plebiscite should contain but whether or not there should be a plebiscite.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Speaker, perhaps it has passed your memory for a bit, but I would like to read from the motion:

> —the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite to be held at the next general election in order that the Canadian people may be given their rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag; and that the committee for such purpose be revived.

Certainly if we are going to revive the committee I would suggest, with deference to Your Honour, that you have to discuss what the terms of reference of that committee are going to be. That is why the previous committee failed. That committee was formed; they took five members from one party, seven from another and one from each of the others. But they did not have any terms of reference beyond the general reference to go into committee. If there had been basic terms of reference to produce a flag that would meet the wishes of the house, I believe such a flag could have been produced. To put it very bluntly, Mr. Speaker, that committee should have been instructed to bring out a flag that would get the support of the two major parties here, with the support of one or two of the others if they wished; a flag that would be unanimously accepted, in effect, by the majority of the two main parties. That committee did not have any terms of reference and they ended up voting purely on party lines, with one exception.

However, I would like to leave that point. If it bothers the hon. member, I know that at his own expense he got thousands of flags printed and they are no good to him any more; but that was because of his own cupidity and it is up to him to get out of that mess. If he is a little angry today, he should not blame it on me; he should never have allowed his Prime Minister to bring it in.

Mr. Herridge: It was a poor investment.

Mr. Hamilton: What is the situation now? We have no certain way of knowing, but all sorts of polls have been taken from one end of this country to another. These polls, lacking anything better, are the best indication of what is the feeling in the country. One particular poll is taken every week. This poll showed at one time that a certain percentage of people of the people of Canada wanted a plebiscite; the last one showed that another percentage wanted a plebiscite. This figure has been quoted many times but I will quote it again. In the 11 cities covered by this poll 60 per cent of the people asked for a plebiscite three weeks ago; only 33 per cent wanted parliament to make the choice, and the balance had no opinion. If that is the best information we have from the cities, what would the figure be if you took a survey of the country areas, where people hold more closely to their traditions and institutions? I think it is safe to say that two thirds of the people of Canada do not want the members of this house to take away from them something that is a matter between themselves and their God. They want the right to choose the flag under which they serve in peace and in war. Ignore that, on the other side of the house, at your peril; because ultimately you must answer to these same people.

I want to make that very clear, Mr. Speaker. We are going to be watching very closely to see that every man stands in his place and is counted. We want the members of every constituency to be counted, and I could go along the front benches and the rear benches here and name them all.

An hon. Member: Then let us vote.

Mr. Hamilton: We want to know why they have sat idly and silently here when a matter affecting the whole spiritual basis of our country is being decided. And they claim they are under a free vote. The hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) performed a great service for the Liberal party when he told the truth. The Liberal government that was thrown out in 1957 had become historically famous and notorious because it was a party of trained seals. This one is down on its knees waiting for free handouts from the Prime Minister. This is the party which ignores 60 per cent of the people; which ignores a Legion, representative as it may be of only part of the veterans of this country but who surely deserve the right to be listened to when they ask for a plebiscite. But you have closed your ears; you have closed your minds—

Miss LaMarsh: We have quite a few veterans over here.

Mr. Hamilton: —to anything or anyone who suggests that these people should be listened to.

Miss LaMarsh: Wait until you have had some service before you speak for the veterans.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Speaker, the distaff side of the house has spoken.

Mr. Grafftey: Not very honourably, either.

Mr. Hamilton: I would like to give you another fact, Mr. Speaker. The Gallup polls only measure a very small number of people but they do try to give some evidence of what the people in the country are thinking. The latest figure we have had from a Gallup poll, I believe, indicates that approximately 50 per cent of the people polled want some form of new flag; but it also indicates that 42 per cent want the present flag, and about 6 per cent have no opinion. This means, Mr. Speaker, that we are dealing with a flag for which there is no majority of support as yet, because it is a new flag, and the house is being asked to accept it. In other words, because 50 per cent of the people want a new flag, all the rest must accept it. I would suggest that when a Prime Minister wanders about this country speaking on one hand about unity and reaching out with the other hand slapping his party down into miserable conformity, to divide this country by bringing in a flag like this, those actions should be spoken of in language that everyone can understand.

Why do we want a plebiscite? First of all, I do not think there is any chance of persuading any person in this house to accept views other than those he has made up his mind on: I do not think there is any chance of making one vote's difference or change here. But it is our duty to fight on as hard as we can to give the people a chance to speak on something that is their right, namely to decide the flag that flies over them. The fairest way now, in view of the attitude in the house, is to let the country decide; and if the decision is made in a plebiscite that will give them their right to express their will; the minority will obey the wish of the majority. I also point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that many of us have fought very hard to get here and none of us likes the burden of elections. But this government, now wracked and torn with dissension as it is, faltering in its last few months before it disintegrates, has to face up to the people one day; and when they do each member opposite will have to stand up and answer for his actions.

Those from the poor areas of Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes will have to go before their farmers, who have the lowest income of any part of Canada, and say, "We have not done anything for you; but look at the beautiful white and red flag". Ask them then about your wonderful fight for this new flag, which not one of you stood up and supported. When I say "not one", I use that expression in the euphemistic sense of "very few". We want a plebiscite held.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Several conversations are going on across the floor and this is unbecoming to the dignity of the house.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Speaker, some of the debate across the house is due to the provocative nature of my remarks. Hon. gentlemen opposite are usually quiet and mannerly and act like $1,500 a month men should act; but since they have chosen me for their target I am glad to accept their challenge. I should like to make my views clear, and my time is running out. I suggest that we hold a plebiscite to give the people the chance to decide the matter.

I do not know whether you will rule me out of order, Mr. Speaker, but before you take any action in this regard, what I want to discuss now is the type of things which the committee should recommend as matters to be dealt with on a plebiscite which will make sense. We have already suggested to the house that the plebiscite should contain four choices. Obviously with the three maple leaf flag shot down in flames the proposed committee flag will have to be left as one of the choices on a plebiscite. Because of the strong emotional feelings for the red ensign, that will have to be left off. Therefore I am going to propose at this time, as a suggestion from an individual member of the opposition and not from a party, that there is still one chance for us to come out of this matter united. I suggest we realize the strength of feeling behind the traditional, distinctive national flag we now have, but at the same time realize the strength of feeling which would be created by a brand new flag. My suggestion is that we get down to basics and realize that most people in this country are not ashamed of their past, be they English or French. We would all like to have on our flag our own symbols. If the union jack is not acceptable because it is an indication of subservience to a colonial structure, let us take off the union jack the two crosses, one white the other red; one standing for the cross of St. Louis which was flown on the ships in which Jacques Cartier landed here in 1534, and the other the cross of St. George which was the standard of John Cabot when he landed here. I know that many French Canadians do not regard John Cabot as the equal of Jacques Cartier, but that is a small consideration in the achievement of unity. I know that the Scots, the Irish, yes and the Welsh, will feel a little unhappy that their symbols have been removed. But for the sake of unity I suggest that if we had the two flags of the two founding races, the two crosses, we would have both insignia that I and my party want to see.

I think that if there was a willingness in this house to reach some sort of compromise instead of complete division, and we could get 80 to 90 per cent of the members together—and they could come together on this—if the government still wanted to fight for a maple leaf flag I am sure that not one of us would oppose the emblem of the maple leaf centred on the two crosses. Whether it was a green or red maple leaf I do not think would bother us too much. But if this flag compromise were reached, I would hope that the background would be either blue or red. I say that, because who wants to see a white flag flying over Canada? Colour is very important to us.

The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent) had his own suggestion about a flag. He unveiled it in his counties and found wide acceptance for it. He tried it out in deep dyed ensign country and it was found acceptable there. Why would it not be acceptable to the members of parliament here?

[Mr. Hamilton.]

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. gentleman would permit a question. I do not want him to yield the floor until he knows why I have risen. Is he prepared to answer a question?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes.

Miss LaMarsh: Perhaps the hon. member would tell the house why it is that he takes such strong objection to what he alleges is a design proposed by the Prime Minister of Canada and then has the temerity to suggest his own design to the house?

Mr. Winkler: Surely that is his right.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for her question, because that is the very point. We discussed alternatives long ago. We said we should not put forward a party flag.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle had, I realize, some qualms himself as to whether the line he has been taking during the last few minutes was acceptable and in order. It is the impression of the Chair that the question of what should appear on a plebiscite was discussed for many days during the original debate and was voted on, and I am wondering whether at this stage the debate which has been held in this house and on which there was a decision should be revived. I thought the hon. member should be given an opportunity to state his point briefly, but I feel it might be better if he did not unduly extend his remarks in that direction.

Mr. Skoreyko: I rise on a point of order, but only because I want you to extend to this house the proper degree of fairness. Your Honour allowed a question from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) which I thought was completely irrelevant, and then reprimanded the former minister of agriculture, who did a tremendous job for this country, when he made a statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that his words are rather strong. The Chair did not reprimand the hon. member for Qu'Appelle but was as discreet as possible in asking him to be relevant. The Chair had no way of knowing what question would be asked by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh). She was allowed to put a question after this was requested and accepted by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. Whether the question was in order or was not in order the Chair could not decide in advance.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to go to the final stages of my speech, and I am watching the clock very closely. I should like to say to my hon. friend who questioned me that many of the members in our party wanted to bring forward suggestions months ago but thought that the whole principle was wrong. We thought that if a party brings forward an idea automatically opposition is built up to it. We had hoped that the committee, which had the basic principles at heart, would come up with something which grew out of the committee, and that is the reason we held back. The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska mentioned this matter once but he was not on the committee. The point is that the committee did not accept any basic terms of reference, made no effort to get complete unanimity from both major parties, and as a result it failed.

I want to conclude, Mr. Speaker, with a statement which I make with very great caution because it is one I have pondered for many months. I want to make absolutely clear to hon. gentlemen opposite that when I stand up and vote in the house on the amendment we have before us, and finally on the main motion, I shall be voting on the selection of a Canadian flag. I believe in one Canadian flag, not two, and when the next motion comes up I am going to do all I can to persuade as many members as I can not to vote for a second flag so there will be no union jack flying over Canada by any resolution of this house. I want to explain why I am going to take that stand because it may make some sense to some of the people over there with regard to how they may vote on the particular amendment now before us. You are being asked here to vote on a plebiscite.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Dorchester has a point of order, I believe.

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I find it surprising that you should let the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) go on when his remarks are not related to the matter under discussion, especially after calling him to order three or four times. We are not talking about the flag but about whether a plebiscite should be held. Consequently, I would ask you to call the hon. member to order and remind him to keep to the matter under consideration.

[Text]

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Speaker, I know you must be getting tired of these points of order because if you cannot do your job by now there is not much hope for you. I suppose the hon. member has earned his $1,500 a month by that intervention.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hamilton: I want to conclude with a statement I think may have some sense and some meaning to my hon. friends from Newfoundland, from the maritimes, from British Columbia and parts of Ontario. This I know, that many members on the other side have indicated to me privately that they are only voting for this flag because they think the union jack will be flying alongside it. I want to say here and now that the union jack is a proud flag—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hamilton: —but it is not my flag. It is the flag of another country. I fought hard for it in the war.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May we have order. I think the hon. member for Qu'Appelle will agree with the Chair that his reference to the particular subject matter he was just mentioning is obviously beyond the terms of the amendment now under consideration.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Speaker, I think it is very clear that before the people vote in a plebiscite they have to know what the implications are. I want to make absolutely sure the people know that if a plebiscite is turned down by the house there will be only one flag when this matter is finished. Many people in this house on both sides are prepared to vote against the second resolution.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hamilton: Therefore the choice now in voting on the amendment is in your hands. I want to make that very clear.

On the question of the debate itself, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the contributions of those who have remained silent when the time came for them to speak have been confined to raising points of order and questions and making interruptions and interjections. Their contributions indicate that they do not have freedom of expression of opinion.

Mr. Winkler: You are hamstrung.

Mr. Hamilton: Members of this party have got up and expressed their views absolutely in accordance with their consciences, and we are proud of one another that we have had the courage to stand up and say what we think. These gutless wonders whose contribution is silence or heckling, who are not willing to get up on their feet and say whether they are for or against this flag, hope that no one will look at the votes and that in this way they will be able to get away with it. This is not a free vote on the other side. They do not want to speak because they know the orders are out not to speak. They have not got a free vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member's remarks are not relevant to the amendment under consideration.

Mr. Hamilton: This is all the more reason for a plebiscite. This is why we need a plebiscite. We need a plebiscite because this house needs a detergent to clean out all these garbage cans, to clean out all those people who are more concerned about remaining here for four years than they are about going out and telling the people what they have done, who are more concerned about keeping the house from doing its legitimate business. When many segments of the population are crying for action, all they get is long debates on the flag. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) brought the flag into the house and he can get out of the situation in two or three ways, by agreeing to a plebiscite, by letting the matter go back to a committee, or by withdrawing the matter entirely and taking it off the order paper. Those are the ways. The people of the country are going to hold this parliament responsible for not doing things which have been undone for the last year and a half. There is only one guilty group and you are looking at them right now to your right, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Charles J. M. Willoughby (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I greatly regret and it is indeed amazing and at least ironic that it should be necessary for the members of the loyal opposition to rise repeatedly at this time in the house and sincerely plead with the government of the day with all the power at our command not to abrogate the democratic principles which all of us were elected to uphold. I rise at this time to endorse the amendment that a plebiscite should be held. I do so not only because I sincerely believe that this would be in the best interests of national unity but also because I feel that by doing so I am representing and expressing the wishes of the majority of the constituents whom I have the honour to represent. I would challenge every other member of the house to rise and speak for his constituents in the same manner.

An hon. Member: They are not allowed to.

Mr. Willoughby: I would particularly challenge all members from British Columbia to support the amendment. I am confident that in doing so they would be representing the wishes of the majority of their people.

Mr. Winkler: All of British Columbia.

Mr. Willoughby: I ask every member if he is willing to sell the democratic rights of his constituents down the river of political expediency over the flag issue by denying them the privilege of expressing their individual opinions. How often we have heard that we, the elected representatives, even though nearly all of us were elected by a minority vote, should not hesitate to take the responsibility of selecting a flag for all future generations, and at the same time discarding without the expressed wish of the people that which has been our national flag for most of the time since the birth of our nation. With this attitude I most heartily disagree.

What is the compelling urgency about settling such an emotional issue? Most people never heard of the flag issue during the last election and they certainly did not mark their ballots to decide the issue. They voted to send representatives to the House of Commons to carry out legislative duties on behalf of their constituents. I feel that a national flag certainly does not fall into that category. It is an emotional issue, Mr. Speaker, that should be held over until the next election when a plebiscite could be conducted by means of a transferable ballot.

Why the urgency? During the last world war we were faced with the possibility of conscription. The prime minister of that day, in his wisdom, would not undertake conscription without a plebiscite. If ever there was urgency for a decision, Mr. Speaker, it certainly was during that time of war. We all hear expressions of opinion from across the country, and particularly from our constituents. We see the results of polls being conducted, but they are not always reliable. I know the majority of Canadians want a plebiscite held. Recently I listened to a radio broadcast in which the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) participated. I note he is back in the house and he may be able to correct me if I misinterpret his remarks. He was being interviewed with regard to the flag, and what did he say? The words he used were to this effect: I do not know if the majority of the people in my constituency would be in favour of the suggested design, but I do know they want to see the matter settled.

Of course, the people of Canada are sick and tired of the way the flag issue is being handled. I am, too. However, I was interested in hearing the member for Medicine Hat admit he did not know how the majority of his constituents felt about this design. If this be true, perhaps under those circumstances he would agree that the only way he could find out would be to support the amendment to hold a plebiscite. I believe this applies to every constituency in Canada. After the people decided, they could forever hold their peace. Why all the urgency, Mr. Speaker? Why all the unnecessary delay of important business when the amendment could be passed so that we could get ahead with those matters which were promised in the speech from the throne, such as the labour code and other unfinished business? Incidentally the flag was never mentioned in the speech from the throne. Suddenly we were faced with a demand for a flag by July 1; then again for the Queen's visit, and now we are supposed to have a flag by Christmas. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the decision on a new flag must be left to a plebiscite. It is too important to do anything else.

It is not too late for the government to listen to reason. I hope they will listen to reason. The present adamant program is so destructive of our national unity that it is doing damage beyond repair. The obliteration of our national symbols, which most Canadians cherish, is destructive in the extreme and cannot be creative of national unity. The only feature of this government's obsession to force a flag on Canadians that could be helpful eventually would be to make future generations flag conscious. This discussion has awakened the people to the real significance of something we have accepted as a matter of course. We have neglected to impress upon our rising generation, as well as upon our adult generations, the true significance of these symbols.

What does history really mean to our country? It has been said, unthinkingly I hope, that people could not care less about a flag. They say that any old rag will do. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this signifies nothing more nor less than complete ignorance of the real significance of our most important emblem. We should learn from this experience the importance of educating our young people with regard to such matters. We could well follow the example of our United States friends along this line. As the Prime Minister said in the house, this is a serious, a solemn and an historic occasion. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is indeed just that. It is an historic occasion, and I hope the record will show that we acted with forethought and wisdom; that we did not allow ourselves to become an arrogant dictatorship, but we chose the method of true democracy. We referred the matter, not hurriedly, not impetuously with political bias, but with careful instruction to the people so that they could properly exercise their thoughtful judgment in choosing what our national flag must be for all generations to come.

It is said that the majority of the committee made a recommendation which should be acceptable. It is my impression that the majority of Canadians are concerned and do not find this design acceptable. I could be wrong, but I am agreeable to leaving the decision to a plebiscite and I will abide by the decision of the majority. The report of the committee set up in 1945 was approved by a majority of 95 per cent. The report of this recent committee was approved by only 70 per cent. Prime minister Mackenzie King, in his political wisdom could see that a decision supported by even 95 per cent could cause serious national disunity, so he never presented the report to the Commons. During the following 11 years no other Liberal government would dare subject the country to such a division. The 1945 report never reached the Commons.

I most urgently suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it would be the part of great wisdom if this report could be withdrawn and either forgotten or have the matter left to a plebiscite as suggested by the amendment. If this were done, it would have a double barreled effect. First, it would remove a most dangerous, divisive subject from the political arena. Second, it would also allow us to get ahead with more important legislation, which would be in the best interests of the country. What is of secondary importance is that it would allow parliament to have a long overdue recess, so that we could return to our constituencies and clear our brains of the cobwebs everybody has been collecting in the house. We could then return to our duties here, better informed and more refreshed to continue with our responsibilities. If this session represents the "continuing diversity" which was mentioned in the speech from the throne in 1963, we have sure had it. Ambiguities of this kind have certainly not been constructive or in the best interests of our country.

If the decision in 1946 was to drop the flag issue—a wise decision I know—probably by reversing the figures 46 to 64, the same decision today could be one of the greatest wisdom. Failing this, a plebiscite is the only sensible answer. However, it would seem that the government has developed a complete mental block regarding the issue. Its obsession to have a new flag regardless of the consequences has created a psychiatric problem in the House of Commons.

It would seem from the way the flag issue has been brought in and out of the house—consuming about one tenth of our time that could be given to important legislation—that it is brought in and not purely to gum up the works, and also to make those of us who have the courage to stand up and speak for what we sincerely believe to be the wishes of our constituents, to appear to be obstructing. If defending the rights of the people against arbitrary rule, if defending the people against not being allowed to vote in a plebiscite is to be classed as obstruction, then I am proud to be one of those on the list.

If there was anything to be gained in the interests of our country by refusing a plebiscite, I might be agreeable to some reconsideration. I have not heard any expression of objection to having a plebiscite, except the same old argument that the committee has brought in a report and we must accept it. Without a plebiscite we can only create disunity. It has already been admitted by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) that reaching agreement in parliament on the choice of a flag will not achieve national unity. I understand a quotation was made to that effect the other day and I did not hear any contradiction from the hon. member.

What we want is national unity. Let us leave the flag question to the people of Canada so that we will not create disunity. Supporting the amendment is the only true and loyal way we, as Canadians, can work in the best interests of our country. I ask all hon. members, regardless of party, not to deny the people of Canada their God given democratic rights. Let us all support the only method democracy knows as being truly democratic. Let us support the amendment so that the voice of the people may be heard and that Canada can continue as a united country. I plead with the government, I plead with the members of the house to please reconsider. Otherwise I am afraid it may be too late.

[Mr. Willoughby.]

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should apologize for barging in on this one-party debate, but I am going to take the chance and make a few observations tonight with respect to the issue that is before the house. First of all I would like to remind the house that the position of our group has already been set forth as being a free vote—each and every one—

Mr. Rhéaume: He said that with a straight face.

Mr. Matheson: If he said it, it is true.

Mr. Patterson: I notice that the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Rhéaume), not satisfied with making his own speeches, and he has made plenty of them, has to take part in other people's as well.

Mr. Rhéaume: I am not ashamed of speaking up.

Mr. Patterson: If you were, you would be ashamed all the time.

Mr. Rhéaume: You will go to Africa, too; you go to Africa next.

Mr. Patterson: I wonder where you are going? Each member of the Social Credit party will be expressing his own point of view as he votes on this issue. So far as my observations tonight are concerned, I am expressing my own views and my own opinions relative to the matter before the house. Furthermore, lest the hon. member for Northwest Territories insists on interrupting, I am going to say what I have to say in far less than 40 minutes.

Mr. Skoreyko: You never made a 40 minute speech in your life.

Mr. Patterson: I could not say that for you, my friend.

Mr. Skoreyko: It is obvious you have not read Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, my purpose tonight is to voice my personal support for the amendment that is now before the house. Might I point out that the idea of a national plebiscite was set out by my colleague, the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) on February 27, 1964 as recorded at page 315 of Hansard, and I refer to part of the statement he made at that time:

> I think the solution lies in having a committee set up that will choose perhaps four or five designs out of the some 2,500 or 2,900 designs that have been submitted, and put these on a ballot. They should include the red ensign, and should be put to a referendum of the people, with a transferable vote, so that each individual would choose the first, second, third, fourth and fifth in the order he preferred—

He also outlined other steps he felt were necessary or advisable in order to conduct this in a satisfactory manner. Evidently this suggestion caught the imagination of the Canadian people, and also the Conservative party, and as a result there has been a growing conviction that this would be the most democratic way of settling an issue so controversial in nature. The hon. member mentioned various steps that should be followed in conducting a plebiscite, but I shall not go into them in detail tonight because I realize I would be quite out of order in doing so.

Though, of course, the vast preponderance of correspondence from my constituency favours the red ensign, there is some which indicates the contrary, and I believe this is true of every constituency from coast to coast. Therefore I believe that in order that this question may be resolved satisfactorily or at least as satisfactorily as possible the idea of a referendum should be taken under consideration, and arrangements made for it to be held some time in the future. I think there are several reasons why such a course is advisable. We have already had an extended debate on the question of a flag for Canada and I believe we have dealt with the subject in every conceivable manner. Every angle has been considered. Controversy has raged and I believe the very fact that this debate has consumed so much time is an indication that we should submit this issue to the people and find out what their wishes are.

This matter was submitted to a committee and I am sure all of us hoped that the committee would be able to arrive at some satisfactory solution. Perhaps we were naïve in thinking it could, in the light of the positions taken by the various parties before the committee was set up. But we did hope they would be able to find some compromise design acceptable to the committee and to the members of this house. The result was disappointing, in spite of the commendable work the committee did. I do not think we should detract from the excellent work of that committee. But despite its efforts it was unable to arrive at a design which commanded the support of the great majority of its members.

The committee has made its recommendations. It has submitted a design which has been placed before the house; but I fail to find much enthusiasm for the flag which is proposed, even on the part of those who are convinced we should have a new flag. I fail to find many who are in sympathy with the new design which has been submitted to us.

Mr. Herridge: Hear, hear.

Mr. Patterson: I had the opportunity of attending the commonwealth parliamentary association conference and as I walked up the lawn of the University of the West Indies I saw the array of flags and studied the red ensign in a prominent position; I tried to visualize how our flag would look had the design submitted to us been flying on that occasion. I must confess I could not get enthusiastic about the proposition. I thought it would be very anaemic and washed out in the line-up of the flags which had been designed by the other nations. Because of these various considerations I do believe this matter should be submitted to a plebiscite so that the people of Canada can voice their individual convictions—not just their views, or their opinions, but their convictions—with respect to a question as controversial as this one.

In saying this, I am not taking a new position. Some time ago, speaking on the idea of a new flag I suggested that this proposal should be allowed to lie on the table for a while to permit some cooling off time. Well, perhaps we have had that. But I also suggested that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) should give consideration to the holding of a referendum on this important issue. I am still of the same opinion and when the vote is taken on this amendment I intend to vote in support of the amendment.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): I desire to speak on this amendment for two reasons. I realize that the people across this country are completely fed up with the way in which this parliament has handled the flag question. People in all walks of life and of all ages are in a complete turmoil over what is happening here in Ottawa. They are asking why this dissension has arisen over the flag. They are asking why it is necessary to have a new flag now. They are asking why the Pearson flag was changed and whether the flag proposed by the committee represents a compromise. These are the questions which people are asking their members of parliament.

Why not wait until the next election and hold a referendum or a plebiscite at the same time as the nation chooses its candidates for the federal parliament? Why is there this urgency about having a new flag now? This is the question which is uppermost in the minds of most of our people. They are tired of this flag matter; they are completely fed up with it.

We are told—or at any rate we were told a couple of weeks ago—that a general election might come at any time, even this winter. Newspapermen are saying that nowadays the west can take an election even in the middle of winter because of the improvement which has been made in the roads in the western provinces. There were confident predictions of an election at least in the spring of 1965. So why not refer this question to the people at the same time?

It has been said that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has promised he will bring in a new flag inside two years. But two years will not be up until next April and if some of the pundits are correct we may have an election by April or shortly thereafter. Why not give the people a chance to express their choice? What is wrong with a referendum? If those who advocate a new and different flag feel the country really wants it, they have nothing to lose by placing their confidence in the national choice. In this way the people would be satisfied and the government would be satisfied because they know, they tell us, that their design will win. So who would lose? What is the government afraid of? Do its supporters feel that their confidence in the new design is not well placed? This is the only conclusion I can reach—that they must have very little faith in their design. I am sure that if a referendum were held on the flag question and the Canadian red ensign did not receive a sufficient number of the votes, even the strongest supporters of the red ensign would realize that it had died a noble death, and accept the result.

There is something strange about this whole question of a flag having to be settled now. We were told we had to have a flag by July, then by November 11, and now by December 25. Why the urgency? There is something strange about this whole question. We were told first of all by the Prime Minister that he would give his party a free vote on the question. Two weeks later he took that away and said no, the government would stand or fall on the question of a new flag. The whole of the Liberal party said it was Pearson's pennant and there would be no committee. That was said at one time. However, they went back on that; they had a committee. Then, lo and behold, every one of the Liberal members on that committee voted against the three maple leaf design that was before the house prior to the setting up of the committee. It is a shame that in this debate two or three members of the Liberal party have not stood up and explained the reason for the change in the attitude of that group. Not one Liberal member has explained this.

An hon. Member: They are not allowed to speak.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Could they not just inform us of their reasoning? This is a place for debate, and surely we are entitled to such an explanation if they want us to accept this flag. If they have faith in their persuasive powers as speakers, surely they believe in themselves enough to be able to stand up and explain the reasoning behind the fact that one day it had to be a design of three maple leaves, with three colours, and now we are back to one maple leaf and two colours. Does it not matter to them what they have on Canada's flag? It is a symbol that is supposed to represent Canada for years and years and years to come. Does it not matter to them what it is composed of?

I would be quite prepared to accept the new flag if the majority of Canadians wanted a new flag; but one thing that bothers me, Mr. Speaker, about this whole flag question is that we have seen the government vacillate from one flag design to another with no reason or explanation as to why this has been done. We are only clear on one thing—at least I am—and that is that the government will not accept any flag that bears any relationship whatsoever to Great Britain. This is the one conclusion I can come to.

Miss LaMarsh: What about the union jack?

Mr. Grégoire: Question.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I have always been in favour of feeling out the public on this question; I have always been in favour of trying to determine whether Canadians want a new flag. During my last speech on the flag question I was interrupted two or three times by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) who quoted from previous speeches I had made as reported in Hansard. Anyone who reads those speeches can clearly see that at page 1318 of Hansard of 1960-61 I said this:

> I agree with the hon. member who proposed an amendment to the resolution.

The resolution at that time was that a national referendum be taken on a flag. I said that I agreed with the amendment, which referred the whole question to a census. Then I went on to state what I thought should be in the census form with regard to a national flag. The other speech which I made on the flag prior to taking part in this debate was during the same year, on February 17, as reported at page 2183 of Hansard. At that time the census had already been taken, or was being taken, and I said:

> The questionnaire should be sent out, or the people should be canvassed on whether they want another flag.

I am still of that opinion; government spokesmen have not convinced me that there is any real urgency in this question and that it has to be settled before Christmas. I am not convinced that we have to accept a new flag or that the majority of the Canadian people want a new flag. I am sure there would be no opposition in this house to a new flag if the government could stand up and prove that the majority of Canadians want and desire a new, truly distinctive flag with no reference whatsoever to either of our two founding races. If they could stand up and say this, there would be no opposition to the idea. If they could stand up and prove to us that this flag must be brought in by Christmas or by December 31, whichever date they would like to choose, there would be no opposition to it.

I noticed on Telepoll a few weeks ago that this question was put to Canadians. Of the people canvassed, 6 per cent had no opinion, 33 per cent said we should accept the committee's report, and something like 61 per cent said that it should still, even after the committee had brought down its report, go to a plebiscite; that the Canadian public should decide which flag we should have.

Many questions remain in my mind, Mr. Speaker, as to why the government has changed their mind on this question. They have changed their mind with regard to the original design introduced in this house and are now supporting the design contained in the committee's report. I have met many people across Canada in recent months and most of those to whom I have spoken prefer the three coloured design submitted by the Prime Minister some six months ago. Since then we have had the report of the committee. Of course they would prefer neither design, if they had a choice. I speak of the majority of persons with whom I have spoken on this question.

On one hand we are told that an election is imminent, and we wonder why a plebiscite could not be taken at the same time. Then on the other hand we see an article in the Edmonton Journal of August 8, 1964, wherein the Canadian Press seemed to think that this whole flag question is to be settled before an election; that it is the government's purpose to settle this question long before an election is held, so that it will not cause disunity between the two founding races of this country. They apparently thought in August that this whole question had to be settled long before an election, and at that time of course there were not so many rumours around the hill that an election would be held in the spring of 1965.

Mr. Rhéaume: They are not so anxious now.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): An hon. member says they are not so anxious now. I suppose he is referring particularly to the events of the last few weeks in this house, which have caused a great deal of concern across the nation. However, I do not wish to refer to them in my speech on the flag at the moment. I am sure the whole house would like to hear from some government members on this subject. We have just heard a very good speech by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson). That member of the Social Credit party outlined his position, and his reasons were the same as mine, namely why is there this urgency now? What is the harm in submitting this question to a plebiscite? Let us take a national count on a plebiscite so that there is no disunifying effect. I should like to hear some hon. member on the government side give the reason why this matter cannot be decided through a plebiscite. Why must it be decided now? What are hon. members afraid of?

Mr. Korchinski: Because they have no legislation ready.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That is right. This must be the underlying reason why we are now debating the flag question. The government brought in the labour code some weeks ago. We are now informed it has been amended and is not ready to be brought in again.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): However, I do not want to deal with that matter now.

The Canadian Press pointed out in the Edmonton Journal for August 8, in summarizing the whole flag fanfare, that if the flag question was one of the issues in an election it would mean a slim majority for the Liberals in the House of Commons. Then the editorial goes on to say that it might create a great deal of disunity in the country.

Mr. Grégoire: We are ready for the question.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): These interruptions are certainly interesting, particularly having regard to the corner of the house from which they come. We all know the devotion of that party to Canada's present flag. One question which remains uppermost in my mind is whether they will support a new flag, if one is chosen, as much as they have supported the old one.

Mr. Grégoire: That remains to be seen.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That is exactly it, and I have my doubts, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Grégoire: We have more faith than you.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Well, if the hon. member would like to make a speech he can follow me.

Mr. Grégoire: May I ask the hon. member a question. I am wondering whether he wants us to speak so as to pass the time. Has he nothing else to say, and is that the reason he invites everyone to speak?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That was not a question really. The hon. member asked me why I wanted him to speak; it was because I thought he wanted to say something and was interrupting me. I thought he had more than he could hold in his brain and wanted to release some of it. If that is the case I will take my seat and allow him to speak.

Mr. Grégoire: I am being brainwashed by you now.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): There is no question but that there is something strange about this whole flag question. Why has the matter to be proceeded with now? What is so strange about it? These questions confront me daily. I have reached the conclusion, as have a great many people across Canada, that the only desire the government has regarding a flag is to remove any attachment to symbols which date back in our history and remind us of our British traditions.

Mr. Grégoire: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Is this the last step or just the first step? What is going to be next? Will our money system be changed? Will the Queen's picture be removed? Is that to follow? What about the British system of law?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Are we to remain under British law or will the government want to change that? What about our parliamentary system of government? Are we to form a new republic? These are questions many Canadians are asking.

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Certainly.

Mr. Moreau: How many plebiscites have they had in Great Britain?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): This question has no relevance at all to the debate. I was expressing my concern over the flag question. Where will it all end?

An hon. Member: When will it end?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): It will end. Certainly it will end. Perhaps it will end after I have finished speaking, I do not know; but it would end a lot quicker if hon. gentlemen would stand up and tell us, first of all, why this matter has to be settled now, and second, why it cannot wait until next spring when, according to all the pundits, we are supposed to be having an election. What are hon. members opposite afraid of? Have they no confidence in their decisions? They tell us that the majority of Canadians want a new and distinctive flag with no reference to Great Britain. Why cannot they take this matter to the people? Then everybody will be satisfied. The only conclusion I can draw is that they are afraid. They have no confidence in their decisions on this question. There are many questions such as these which remain in my mind and will continue to do so as long as hon. gentlemen opposite sit silent. What is to come next?

We have heard some reference made to changing the constitution. Is this coming next? Are we to become a republic? The ultimate question is: Where are we going?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Hon. gentlemen call order. If they had any faith in their decisions they would rise in their places and explain why we cannot take this question to the people by way of a referendum. Not one hon. member opposite will rise to answer the fears which exist in my mind and in the minds of many Canadians. Why are they satisfied with any flag? It does not matter whether it has three colours or two colours, one leaf or three leaves, as long as it has no resemblance to our connections with Great Britain or to either of the two founding races. Why are we to be ashamed of our past? Why are hon. gentlemen opposite not proud of the traditions Canada has upheld over the years? I can only conclude that these hon. members are ashamed of the British system of law on which Canada has been founded.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): All we get are catcalls, Mr. Speaker. One would much prefer to have some reasoning.

Mr. Cashin: You are right, there.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I see it is ten o'clock, so may I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Ninth report of standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Pennell.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

PROPOSED CHANGES IN PERSONNEL OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce) moved:

That the names of Messrs. Woolliams, Fairweather, Nugent, Rhéaume, Simpson and Hales be substituted for those of Messrs. Grafftey, Irvine, Millar, Muir (Lisgar), Noble and Stenson on the standing committee on industrial relations.

Mr. Speaker: It has been moved, if I may have unanimous consent, by Mr. Walker, seconded by Mr. Winkler—

Mr. Grégoire: No unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: I am informed it is not customary for a member of Her Majesty's loyal and royal opposition to move changes in committee personnel in this way. It is the practice to have the whip of the government party suggest these changes. Therefore I would like to put it, with the consent of Mr. Walker—

Mr. Grégoire: No.

Mr. Speaker: —that he, seconded by Mr. Winkler—

Mr. J. A. Walker (York Centre): I wonder if I may speak to this for a moment, Mr. Speaker. The other night I attempted, in co-operation with other parties in the house, to move these committee substitutions. It is something we all desire, but I was unable to get consent. I have certainly no objection to this, but I would like to suggest, if the house is agreeable, that the complete motion, which contains names of members of other parties, be embodied in this motion.

Mr. Churchill: Agreed.

Mr. Walker: If the house would agree to allow me to do this sometime during the day's proceedings I will be very happy to have it done.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker—

[Text]

Mr. Smallwood: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Caouette: It is all right; I will sit down when I am finished.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, under ordinary circumstances we do not object to names being substituted for others on the committee which was mentioned by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler). However, under the present circumstances we believe that the discussion concerning the flag has priority over any amendment, suggestion or motion whatsoever. Until the flag issue is settled so that Canada may have a distinctive national flag, we will not give unanimous consent to the house.

[Text]

Mr. Walker: It would not take any time away from the flag debate if the house were to agree to allow me to do this at ten o'clock tonight.

Mr. Caouette: No, no.

Mr. Winkler: May I point out that this is the proper time in our procedure for such a motion to be put forward. I would not have done this in the manner I did but for the fact that it is very necessary that these changes be made so the committee may proceed with its work. It does not matter what business is to be brought up in the normal course of events, whether the flag debate or a debate on any other question; this is the correct procedure to be followed, and I would ask that permission be given to the government whip to proceed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, may I suggest that unanimous consent is not required.

Mr. Churchill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: If the government whip, acting on behalf of the leader of the house who is a cabinet minister, rises at the proper time to make such a motion, I suggest he is perfectly able to do so under our rules. The reason it was possible for him to be denied that right at ten o'clock the other evening was that he was seeking unanimous consent to revert to motions—

Mr. McIlraith: But the house was on motions.

Mr. Knowles: It was ten o'clock and consent was sought to revert to motions. At this point, while I see objection to the hon. member for Grey-Bruce trying to make a motion without consent, I do not think the official government whip needs consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion it is necessary that the unanimous consent of the house be obtained in order that such a motion can be adopted without 48 hours' notice. Evidently the chief government whip may introduce such a motion, but he must give 48 hours' notice, and that motion can only be adopted 48 hours hence. However, if it is to be adopted immediately, the unanimous consent of the house is required, and we refuse it.

[Text]

Mr. Walker: Then I give notice that I propose to submit these names tomorrow at this time on motions.

Mr. Lambert: If I may briefly intervene on a question of procedure—

Mr. Speaker: I do not wish to cut the hon. member short, but I now have the assurance of the government whip that he will submit these and perhaps other names tomorrow. In the circumstances, in order that we may get on with the other business before the house, this will be called tomorrow.

Mr. Lambert: Well, there is a point that is wrong.

CANADIAN FLAG

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Monday, December 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Batten that the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): I have just a few more words to say on this flag question and the position in which parliament finds itself now concerning it. I pointed out last evening that I have long been of the opinion that this whole question should have been submitted to the people at the very beginning by way of a referendum or plebiscite.

Speaking to the amendment now before the house, I can only repeat my earlier contention in this regard. It was brought in initially with very little forethought. It was not even mentioned in the speech from the throne. The whole house has been continually confused as to why we are faced with the flag issue now. Away back in late June we argued that the question, if it was to come before the house, should first go to a committee. We tried then to get the question referred back to the people in the form of a referendum. We are trying once again to have this done.

I realize there is a percentage of the population of Canada which does want a new flag. I have no objection to a new flag if the majority of Canadians desire one, but it has long been my opinion that a flag is the symbol of a country that should be respected by everyone. It should not be a flag born in haste, one that perhaps represents one of the founding nations of our country and not the other, or is more favoured by one of our founding nations than the other; one that has political tinges, or anything of that order. I have long been of the opinion that a flag should be favoured by the majority of the people, who will respect it, hold it dear, revere it and serve under it proudly. I think a flag should bear some relation to the history of our country; and a flag, above all, should aid in bringing greater unity to a country. This flag and the manner in which this whole question has been handled have convinced everyone, I am sure, that it has done nothing to unite Canada but has in fact done more to disunite this country than any single piece of legislation that has been before this house for a good many years.

I have wondered why there is urgency now, why this question cannot be referred back to the people in a plebiscite. There has been much talk of an election next spring and I ask, would it not be better to settle the whole question to everyone's satisfaction at that time? If the government are so confident that the majority of Canadians want a new flag and are prepared to accept the committee's recommendation for a new flag, why is there the urgency of pushing it through now? Why not wait until an election is called and settle this question by way of a referendum? The only conclusion I can come to is that perhaps it is a stopgap; perhaps other legislation is not ready; perhaps they want to tease and torment the country and tear the country apart.

This is what this whole debate has been doing. The country is completely fed up with parliament's action on this flag question. I am sure the opposition did its duty in representing the large number of Canadians who showed in one way or another that they were opposed to the flag originally submitted by the Prime Minister; and surprisingly enough a large number of Canadians—this has been shown by all kinds of polls that have been taken week after week—are still opposed to the flag submitted by the committee.

It was my understanding that the committee would do its utmost to bring about a compromise. In a way one might term the committee's recommendation a compromise flag, but a compromise in only one direction. They retained the maple leaf idea and did away with one of the colours. Many people have long thought that the colours red, white and blue meant something; they respected those colours. Now we have one less colour on the flag and two less maple leaves. There is nothing on it to really signify our history, to dignify our country. In my opinion there is really nothing on it that Canadians across the country can worship, respect, and to which they can pay homage.

It has been pointed out that the government, while they promised a flag in two years, did so in such a manner that only a certain part of the country heard of the promise. The two years have not yet expired, and to a great many people it is questionable whether the government has a mandate to bring in a new flag. As I have said, during the last election it might have been mentioned in some parts of the country that a new flag would be designed within two years, but there was no mention of the disappearance of our historic emblems from the flag or that it would be a completely new flag which would erase our past.

The country is completely fed up with parliament's action on this flag question. It is the government's duty to bring in the business for the house to debate. I feel it is high time we passed on to more urgent legislation, legislation which is required across the country. For example, the labour code, railway financing and rail line abandonment are matters which should be discussed, using our time in a worth-while manner instead of holding a lengthy debate on this flag question at a time when there is considerable opposition across the country to this flag as well as considerable doubt whether the government has a mandate to bring in a new flag.

As I said last evening, I am surprised to see government members on the flag committee willing to accept a flag design which completely erases our past. Are they sure that all Canadians are of the same opinion? Are they sure that all Canadians desire and will support the flag which has been suggested by the committee?

An interesting comment was made by Conn Smythe which I think bears some relation to the question whether or not the government has a mandate to bring in a new flag. He said:

> Now, all the experts in radio and television and the press are saying people are tired of the flag issue.

I certainly agree with that.

> These experts are very often wrong. Last week the Vancouver Lions proved this point.

They certainly did that.

> The millions to whom the Canadian ensign means so much are not tired of the ensign, and want the flag issue settled in a democratic manner. What right has a minority government, the great number of their members never having received a mandate from their constituents, to keep on forcing the flag issue? And now that this government is under the shadow of suspicion with respect to bribery and corruption, how can they expect the people to respect a flag of its choice? Why doesn't Mr. Pearson shelve the flag issue now, get on with our national business and, at the next election, give the people of Canada a chance to vote on this issue—

It is as simple as that. This whole issue should be shelved, and at the next election it could be solved to everyone's satisfaction. I think this would satisfy practically everybody in the country.

It is with that thought in mind that I move this debate be temporarily set aside so that the many questions on the government's activities in domestic and foreign matters may be answered by the ministers, and in order that government business dealing with the labour code, C.N.R. financing and provincial-federal matters may be dealt with immediately.

Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), that this debate be now adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must advise the hon. member that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), has already spoken during this debate, and therefore under our rules cannot second the motion.

Mr. Mandziuk: I second the motion, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Mandziuk.]

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Brown: I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. Mitchell: I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted against the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I was waiting to see if a Conservative was going to take the floor. Moreover, I must point out that, according to my information, the flag debate will not come to an end before the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) is back in the house. That goes to show how one man's illness can delay parliament for a whole day. In fact, we cannot vote today because the leader of the official opposition is ill.

Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have of participating in this debate which has already lasted 29 days. During that time, 93 hon. members spoke once, 33 made two speeches, 18 took part three times in the debate and two spoke four times. Consequently, 146 members made 229 speeches.

You will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that that is truly freedom of speech.

In addition, the moment I say "plebiscite", that word will have been said 4,081 times since the beginning of the flag debate. That is what we call freedom of speech and even freedom of repetition.

Mr. Speaker, at present—

[Text]

Mr. Kindt: On a point of order, the hon. member is not speaking to the question before the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I had just spoken the word "plebiscite", pointing out that it had been spoken 4,081 times, which now makes 4,082 times.

Up to now, the debate has been going on for 119 hours, and when multiplied by the number of members, or 265, this makes a total of 31,535 hours of lost time. There are also the personnel of the house, interpreters, translators, the Clerk of the house, the second clerk assistant, pages, reporters, etc. As a matter of fact, I am told that the personnel includes 60 officials, which makes a further total of 7,140 hours.

There are also 125 members of the press gallery. This makes a total of 14,875 hours lost by the members of the press gallery who listened to this flag debate.

There are also the Hansard subscribers. It is said that they number 12,000 for the English version and 4,000 for the French version, that is a total of 16,000. If you multiply that number by 119 hours, supposing that the subscribers read Hansard, you get 1,905,000 lost hours.

We have now reached 1,958,555 hours.

Mr. Dupuis: What about those who read the papers?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, supposing that six million people spend an average of five minutes a day reading what is said about the flag—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I listened with great attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Lapointe and I must admit that I have serious doubts about their relevancy.

The hon. member might perhaps tell me how the statistics he is quoting are related to the proposed amendment now before the house.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I feel that in mentioning the cost, or the eventual cost of holding a plebiscite in Canada, the hon. member for Lapointe is strictly in order when discussing the Conservative amendment with regard to a plebiscite. It would be an ideal way of allowing the Canadian citizens to express their opinion. Under the circumstances, I am of the opinion that the hon. member for Lapointe is being relevant in speaking of the cost in time and money of holding a plebiscite in Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: To the extent that the remarks of the hon. member for Lapointe will be connected with the matter under consideration, in the way indicated by the hon. member for Villeneuve, they will certainly be relevant.

Mr. Grégoire: Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I have learned to distinguish between sophisms and syllogisms, I have learned that with syllogisms one can argue in two ways, either by induction or by deduction. Today, my argumentation is quite simple, I proceed by induction. That is why, in the light of the figures I am going to quote, you will notice that the conclusion will be drawn automatically and that is why I shall keep on quoting those figures.

Mention has been made of newspapers. If we take for granted that about six million people take an average of five minutes a day to read what is published on the flag issue, this amounts to 140 minutes for 28 days. Six million people reading an average of 140 minutes amount to 840 million minutes, or 14 million hours.

If we consider now the news bulletins on radio and television, which take an average of ten minutes a day—it is more, but let us assume it is ten minutes. This amounts to 280 minutes in 28 days. With a minimum average of six million listeners and viewers, this amounts to 1,680 million minutes or 28 million hours.

We now have, Mr. Speaker, a grand total of 43,958,555 hours on the flag issue.

If the average salary is $3 per hour, up to now the flag debate has cost $131,875,650.

Mr. Dupuis: At the least.

Mr. Grégoire: At the least, Mr. Speaker.

Up to now there has been spent $131,875,650 on the flag, not to mention interest. Those figures only represent lost time.

Let us figure out the cost of materials. In the official report appear about 1,200 written pages on the flag issue. Now, with two columns to each page and an average of 62 lines to a column, this makes 124 lines for every page of Hansard.

I found that each line measures 2¾ inches, or a total of 30 feet per page. Since each page contains 341 inches or 30 feet of text, for 1,200 pages this makes 37,500 feet, or 7 miles of text. You get on the Queensway, you leave it at the other end, and the text on the flag is still running.

If you consider that there are 1,048 words per page, you get a staggering total for 1,200 pages. All that about the flag; 1,257,600 words spoken about the flag.

Mr. Speaker, you will agree that no one can ever complain that freedom of speech—freedom of repetition and freedom of obsession for madmen—does not exist in the House of Commons.

And now multiply all that: the number of pages, the amount of energy, the amount of calories burnt for the flag, the number of hours, the amount of dollars, and divide that by whatever you want, you will come to a single conclusion, that some lunatics are still walking about.

Mr. Lambert: Some are standing.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, 18 members of the Conservative party each spoke three times. Eighteen hat tricks during the same season, that is almost a record. Two spoke four times, and that is an even more impressive record.

I would like to apply to the members of the Conservative party the sentence which was uttered by the Greek hero at the Thermopyles, and I will quote the Greek text in order to simplify things:

Ou kataiskunô opla ta iéra
Oud'en kataleipsô ton parastatein
Otô'an stokeisô

Mr. Speaker, that is the Conservative party, and I am not afraid of saying so to their face.

Mr. Dupuis: Translation please.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I would like to parody a vituperous statement made by Cicero in his famed Catiline Orations where he was attacking Catilina, the Roman despot. By substituting the name of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) for that of Catilina, I would say, with Cicero:

Quo usque tandem abutere Diefenbaker, patientia, nostra?
Quamdiu etiam iste furor tuus nos eludet?
Quemquem ad finem sese effrenata jactabit audacia?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dupuis: There are two official languages here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member concluded his remarks?

The Chair cannot determine whether his last words were intended to close his remarks or not.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lapointe knows that rather serious difficulties could arise during the discussions in this house should the hon. members be allowed to speak in another language than the two official languages of the country, for instance in Greek or Latin.

Mr. Grégoire: I will translate each sentence:

Quo usque tandem abutere Diefenbaker patientia nostra?

To what extent will you, Diefenbaker, abuse our patience?

[Text]

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi raises his point of order I would say that even if the hon. member for Lapointe is quoting in Latin, he should know that he cannot refer to any hon. member by name and should refer to him by his constituency; and in the case of the Leader of the Opposition, I suggest by his title.

Mr. Grafftey: That is right.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Since it went so well with the text; it was rolling out—

I shall translate it, Mr. Speaker.

Quo usque tandem abutere, Diefenbaker, patientia nostra?

To what extent will you, Diefenbaker, abuse our patience?

Quamdiu etiam iste furor tuus nos eludet?

How much longer will thy furor make game of us?

Quemquem ad finem sese effrenata jactabit audacia?

To what extremity will thy unrestrained boldness let itself be carried away?

That is a text, Mr. Speaker, which really applies to present circumstances.

If I may, I shall make a French quotation which will also apply perfectly to the situation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the quotation the hon. member intends to make will be relevant to the discussion.

Mr. Grégoire: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is a quotation by Corneille. In Corneille's The Cid, Don Diègue, in his old days, speaks out his bitterness, his rage, when he cries out:

O rage, ô désespoir, ô vieillesse ennemie, n'ai-je donc vécu durant tant d'années que pour voir en un jour flétrir tant de lauriers.

That applies well to the Leader of the Opposition: rage, bitterness, implacable old age, those are the incitements behind the actions now taken by the Leader of the Opposition.

That is why we have a debate like the one that is going on today: 43,958,550 hours. That is where the Conservative party is leading us; $131,875,550; that is what it costs. Enough words, if laid end to end, to cover the trans-Canada highway, from coast to coast. You will admit, Mr. Speaker, that this must have lasted long enough.

I do not know whether the Conservatives will understand, but they have spoken at length, more than freedom of speech should allow generally; this is not freedom, but abuse, a tremendous abuse of the freedom of speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. In my opinion, the present remarks of the hon. member are not really related to the matter under discussion, namely the amendment to the motion now before us.

I would ask the hon. member to restrict his remarks to that matter.

Mr. Grégoire: Very well, Mr. Speaker, I will close with four verses by François Villon which express exactly my idea on the plebiscite we are now discussing, and through which the whole Canadian population would vote on a flag proposal. In my opinion, the request is for something which is unnecessary. There are here representatives of the voters. Let everyone take his responsibilities and vote according to the wishes of his constituents.

The four following verses of François Villon illustrate quite well my thought:

Dans un vieux cimetière.
Un fossoyeur creusait,
Il fit jaillir de terre un crâne qui dormait.
"En veux-tu du vieux frère" me dit-il,
mais je refusai.

This is an example of the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition. As the grave-digger, he tries to dig up in an old cemetery the traditions of other countries and he offers me a skull, but I am not interested.

I am ready to accept something new for our country, something which would really represent Canada and not a foreign country, something which would give us a little more pride in the future of our country, that is a really distinctive flag which we could call our flag and would not be the fleur-de-lis or the union jack. It would be the flag of Canadians living in Canada.

[Text]

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton West.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of incurring your censure but in the spirit of the remarks that have been permitted this afternoon and the personalities engaged therein, I might say that the braying of jackasses is the loudest noise heard in the barnyard. Also may I say that there are no fools like those who laugh at themselves.

[Translation]

I am speaking here to those who might seek to hold a certain power of veto over us and prevent us from expressing our views. Every hon. member has the right to express his opinion in the house and without commenting on the vote we have just had, this afternoon, it is obvious that opinions are divided here on the issue, both on the government side and the opposition side. We have not failed to notice it.

At the beginning of the debate on the motion which gave rise to this discussion, the Prime Minister agreed to a free vote on the flag issue. Consequently, we are all free to express our feelings.

I find it strange that certain young parliamentarians should be willing to muzzle anyone, since there are differences of opinion. I grant them the right to stand up and discuss this matter. After all, the debate centres in this assembly. Since opinions differ, we are here to express them.

I can well say to the hon. members that, on a tour in my native province over the week end, I realized again that opinions vary greatly—

Mr. Drouin: Might I ask the hon. member a question at this point.

Mr. Lambert: I will allow the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes to ask a question later on, when I have completed my remarks.

[Text]

I make no apology, Mr. Speaker, for speaking on this question this afternoon. It may be that some people feel this debate on the flag has exhausted the supply of ready headlines or that there is no juicy scandal to uncover or discuss, and it might have been interesting to have had orders of the day last week, or even this week.

Mr. Rinfret: More insinuations.

Mr. Lambert: I am not saying there are; the hon. member can read the newspapers for himself. I think the suppression of the opportunity of clearing the air in this regard creates more slander and scandal if that is the case.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to the hon. member that perhaps at this stage he would want to return to the subject matter of this debate.

Mr. Lambert: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I apologize to the Chair for having been provoked into a minor excursion, shall I say, but hon. members, in so provoking me, are breaking the rules themselves, of course. They have no right to speak; therefore if their remarks appear on the record I am sure the Chair would grant me a certain latitude in challenging them.

I would have thought the situation was clear to those people who, because they are in favour of a certain proposal, say this debate is finished, that there is no further need to speak. They say "I have spoken. I am in favour. Therefore those of you who are against this have no right to speak".

Mr. Olson: You have spoken three times.

Mr. Lambert: I beg to differ with the hon. member for Medicine Hat. I have spoken fewer times in this debate than he has. This is my second opportunity since the resolution was introduced. I also hope to make this my last contribution.

Coming from where I do, and with my own personal ancestry, I think this matter calls for the expression of the individual's point of view. To me the flag of my country is something more than an amendment to the customs tariff or the discussion of a redistribution bill. Perhaps I am completely different in this regard from other hon. members, but that is the way I feel. I have always indicated that I felt this question from its inception should have been approached by asking the people of Canada for a personal expression. After all, a flag which is imposed on the people will not be one which is readily acceptable. This flag is not born out of revolution. It is not a symbol of revolution. This flag is a symbol of agreement, and I think there is a clear distinction.

Many people ask why Canada could not emulate some of the new countries, or our great neighbour to the south. Their flag was adopted out of revolution. The majority of the new flags we see today have been adopted out of the granting of independence which is akin to revolution. In respect to some of them one might also question whether, if the people had been given the opportunity, they would have challenged the design of their flag.

I would have thought this matter could easily have been resolved by a plebiscite, as was suggested in another debate, so that people are not identified and we do not point the finger at this or that region. In this matter I consider that no region is pre-eminent; I consider western Canada just as important as central Canada, the maritimes or any portion of the country. No one has pre-eminence in this regard. Therefore the views of the people from one end of Canada to the other stand on equality. I find it passing strange that in arriving at a design for a national flag a large part of the Canadian people must divest themselves of symbols which they cherish and hold dear.

I am not making a case for any particular flag or any particular design. It is my feeling that the flag of Canada can only be that which is accepted by the people and not that which is accepted by a majority here, because respect for a flag cannot be generated by the iron heel of a dictum. Acceptability on the part of the people of Canada can only result from desire and respect.

I do not think there is any difference in the application of my argument to the Canadian flag and the Canadian national anthem. It could only be ill conceived that the people of Canada would faithfully and conscientiously sing a national anthem which they did not respect in their hearts. Only as an aside, Mr. Speaker, I find it extremely regrettable that we did not deal with the resolution relating to the national anthem, about which I think there is general agreement, before dealing with the Canadian national flag, so the national anthem would now be settled and not be the subject of a prospective debate in an atmosphere which has now been created by a divisive expression of opinion.

The plebiscite as suggested by the amendment, to be held at the time of the next general election, whenever that may be, to facilitate administrative details, after a cooling-off period, would not generate the divisive atmosphere which some people fear. I believe that if Canadians were given a chance to express their opinions they would accept the flag chosen by the people, even though they did not agree with the choice. A choice made by a generous majority of the people of Canada I am sure would be accepted by the minority favouring a different design.

I do not intend to deal with the nature of the design now before us, though it certainly can be related to the plebiscite advocated by the amendment and is the result of a majority choice by a committee which has considered this question conscientiously. However, what may be one man's meat may be another man's poison, and I am not qualified to say to my neighbour that I am choosing a flag for him. In respect of that sort of thing I feel the people should have the right to express an opinion.

It was announced last week that we in this chamber may have to make a decision on the matter of capital punishment at some time in the future. Surely that is a matter which must be decided as a result of the dictates of one's conscience. It may be a matter that some hon. members feel their constituents should decide. Be that as it may, I think the flag question is one which goes even deeper into considerations of conscience. I think it must be concluded logically that the motives of individuals who enlisted voluntarily for service during the last war, and on other occasions, are the same motives behind the feelings of citizens for their own flag. This feeling is sometimes very inchoate and difficult to define.

I do not wish to attempt to repeat the arguments which have been made by many hon. members in this house on this and on previous occasions, but a plebiscite would provide a tremendous advantage to the members of this house in the choice of a distinctive Canadian flag. I respect the opinions of hon. members who have stated they desire a particular flag, though I have some grave doubts as to whether those members who talk about a distinctive flag know exactly what they mean. Some members in their speeches in this house have gone so far as to suggest that they would be prepared to accept a tic-tac-toe on a dishcloth design, providing there was no vestige of the union jack on it. That is a very regrettable attitude.

It is difficult for me to understand why anyone who has had the opportunity of serving abroad, and who has observed the Canadian flag as it now is, as declared by order in council, would feel that it is not distinctively Canadian and something of which all Canadians can be proud. I certainly have observed this flag flying in foreign countries and must say that I have always looked upon it in those circumstances as the flag of Canada. If parliament—and by parliament I mean this house and the other place—should decide, by the appropriate means, that this flag shall be changed and that something else shall be the flag of Canada, such a decision would not preclude the parliament of Canada from consulting with the people of Canada about the precise design they favour for a distinctively Canadian national flag. I am not referring to a symbol of Canada but a Canadian national flag, and for that reason I say again that a plebiscite is both logical and the proper thing under the circumstances.

In speaking at this time I find it difficult to determine how a vote on the motion to adopt this report, should it carry, could in any way change the present order in council. Great emphasis was placed on this point when the flag question was first introduced because, as stated by the order in council, the red ensign shall be Canada's flag until parliament declares otherwise. This is the first time of which I am aware that there has ever been the slightest suggestion that the House of Commons alone is parliament. One can see that there may be a very difficult procedural argument in relation to legislation being sent to the other place as the result of a committee report. Of course we have not had any disclosure of the government's intention in this regard. The approval of a committee report while there are other matters on the order paper would seem to me to be insufficient to ground any change in that order in council.

I find some difficulty also in communicating the wishes and desires of this house to the other place on the basis of merely a motion for concurrence in a report. This is by way of digression, I realize, in so far as the amendment is concerned, but I believe I should raise the point at this time if others have not done so already. There are many other things I would have liked to mention which this house could have been discussing at this time. I am not going to do so, Mr. Speaker, except by saying that the order paper is chock-a-block with very important matters on which ministers of the crown are anxiously awaiting approval. But it has been their responsibility to introduce these questions in priority to this other matter. It is not a case of the opposition seeking a debate on this matter. The government must accept this responsibility for having advanced this matter and put forward a timetable. Therefore, I say very definitely—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; I hate to interrupt the hon. member, but I am sure he will agree with me that this is a digression, and that he is not really relating his remarks at this time to the matter before us.

Mr. Lambert: If government members accuse the opposition of delay, Mr. Speaker, and also a discussion of the plebiscite, the opposition has offered an alternative to the vote for concurrence. Certainly I would put it to Your Honour that a reference this way to these matters which might be occupying the house is quite as much in order as the speech which preceded me and which was permitted. I do not like to suggest that the Chair is making a differentiation, but there has been a considerable latitude indicated. I do not know that the speech which preceded had any more reference to a plebiscite, except that there was a sort of exercise in Social Credit mathematics of the kind that has been rejected out of hand for many years. It has been rejected because it has never been a matter of government policy at any time in the provinces where this so-called political theory may have held sway. The hon. members down there speak from their seats and that indicates the extent of their contribution.

Now, I would say again in bringing my remarks to a close—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lambert: I hope that hon. members who are interested in speaking on something will be given the liberty of speaking. When it comes to the remarks that preceded mine, I trust that the house will be as forbearing when these hon. gentlemen embark upon their lengthy discourses on monetary theory. I find it very interesting to see the forbearance of the house when these hon. members are speaking on certain bills during private members' hour, at which time we get barrel full after barrel full of nonsense. I suppose it is a question of which foot the shoe is upon. As long as they feel disposed to speak, then their digestion will tell them they have that right; but as long as someone else is speaking their digestion may curdle and tell them that the debate must be brought to an end. However this is a matter of give and take and I trust that they will be able to give as well as take.

Again I say that in my opinion the solution out of this impasse in which we find ourselves is to have a plebiscite, to give the people the opportunity to make a choice. After all, we have had many suggestions from on high. We have seen many newspapers, radio and television comments, each man having the right to express himself. If a news editor has every freedom to write as many times as he wishes in a newspaper column, then I have a right to reply in this house. Why then should hon. members be accused of carrying on an interminable debate? Debate is the exchange of ideas, the putting forward of ideas, sometimes not only once or twice, but three times. If certain people write on a certain subject and put forward the same idea many times over in an effort to convince their readers or their listeners, I think that this is legitimate. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I support this amendment and urge upon hon. members that they support it.

[Translation]

Mr. Guay: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Lambert: Surely.

Mr. Guay: On July 2, 1964, I had an opportunity to speak about the plebiscite; I then asked the opposition why it was that in 1961, when the opposition suggested that the government in office hold a referendum on the flag at the time of the decennial census, the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) rejected this procedure, but today he suggests what seems to him an easier procedure, that is holding the referendum at the same time as a general election.

I put that question and I did not get an answer.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, to begin with I shall answer that I do not know in which circumstances the hon. member asked his question.

I believe that, at that time, I was in the chair just as you are now and that I was not interested then in the contents of the debates.

But, in answer to the question put by the hon. member, I would say—if I understand his question well—that he suggested to hold a referendum on the flag issue at the time of the census. Since he received no answer, I am unable to comment on it, but I wonder whether, in the circumstances, the census legislation allows such a referendum.

Mr. Guay: Through an amendment to the legislation.

Mr. Lambert: Perhaps with an amendment to the act, a referendum might have been possible, but I do not know whether we did something along those lines before. It may be also that the way the hon. member made his suggestion was the right procedure, but I do not think he can say now that he was denied an answer because an answer has never been given to him.

Mr. Dupuis: Would the hon. member allow me another question?

Mr. Lambert: I see that the Minister without Portfolio is back from his trip.

Mr. Dupuis: Would the hon. member not agree that during the six years of Conservative administration, the present Leader of the Opposition had all the time required to propose a referendum or to agree to the request of the Conservative member for St. Boniface who had suggested to his own government a referendum on that issue? Why did the Conservative government, which had the power to do so, not comply with the request of the hon. member for St. Boniface?

We know that that suggestion was rejected or considered of little interest and, besides, the bill I myself introduced in the house proposed an amendment to the census legislation so that the opportunity of the census could be taken to put the question respecting a new distinctive flag and a distinctive national anthem.

Mr. Lambert: Well, in answering the minister's second question, I will reply in part to the hon. member who directed the first question to me, namely that in the case of questions asked at a census, it is extremely difficult to keep secret the identity of the person invited to make his or her choice on such a thing.

Mr. Dupuis: Answer the first part of the question.

Mr. Lambert: As far as the first question is concerned, I will say this. There were so many shortcomings in the business of the country when we came into office that we centered all our energies on farm and other programs in order to improve the national economy.

Mr. Dupuis: That was in 1961, and I asked why—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the Minister without Portfolio that we are not in committee and that the hon. member who has the floor should not be interrupted.

Mr. Lambert: I will answer briefly by saying this. At that time—this is a personal opinion—there was less unanimity than today and we have seen considerable changes in the last five years.

The minister knows very well that before he became a minister, he had not travelled much in the country and that I travelled much more than he.

Mr. Dupuis: That is a gratuitous statement.

Mr. Lambert: Perhaps I did not travel as much as he did, since he was absent for long months.

Mr. Dupuis: Do not let jealousy get the better of you, my friend.

Mr. Lambert: On the other hand, I might say that in another four or five years, the atmosphere will be very different indeed. To illustrate the point, I might say that, with regard to the anthem "O Canada", the attitude throughout the country has thoroughly changed in the last ten years, of which fact, there is every evidence. I might say the same thing with regard to bilingual cheques. It took a little time to convince the public.

That is my answer to the hon. member.

Mr. Dupuis: I might just point out that my hon. friend did not answer my question.

Mr. Drouin: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Lambert: Go ahead.

Mr. Drouin: Inasmuch as a few moments ago the hon. member was in favour of adjourning this debate, did he not indicate in this way that the discussion had lasted long enough, and does he not think it appropriate to put the substance of the matter to the vote, so that all hon. members may express their views?

Mr. Lambert: I should like it to be clearly understood that the adjournment of a discussion is by no means the end of that discussion, as the hon. member knows very well.

It is just a matter of deferring a question in favour of more significant issues.

If the hon. member showed more interest in the legislation on the order paper, he would support the amendment relating to the adjournment of this discussion so that we might consider other matters provided therein.

Mr. Drouin: That is not an answer.

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the amendment I must at once say that the remarks I shall make are my own and I accept full responsibility for them. Though my colleagues may not agree with what I have to say, there is one thing they do agree with, and that is my right to say it. I intend to present some arguments in favour of sending the report back to the flag committee, and in doing so I hope to deal with the various phases of the whole question. Also I hope to relate my arguments and statements to the question of a plebiscite.

First of all, I would like to refer to the remarks I made on the flag question in the debate on the speech from the throne on February 27 last, which are recorded at page 315 of Hansard for that day:

> I should like to make a few remarks about this business of a national flag. We really get into deep water when we start talking about a national flag. I realize that. I think the solution lies in having a committee set up that will choose perhaps four or five designs out of the some 2,500 or 2,900 designs that have been submitted, and put these on a ballot. They should include the red ensign, and should be put to a referendum of the people, with a transferable vote, so that each individual would choose the first, second, third, fourth and fifth in the order he preferred and, by the process of elimination, we will then have over 50 per cent of the people voting in favour of a particular flag. That will take all of us off the hook and put the responsibility where it belongs, on the shoulders of the people.

I should like to enlarge on this suggestion by saying that in addition to holding a plebiscite the votes recorded in it should be sent to a central point, preferably the city of Ottawa, for counting. In this way there would be no way of knowing in which region any particular vote was cast. There would be no way of telling who voted for a particular flag and there would be no evidence of regionalization. If this method were adopted I believe we would get a flag supported by the votes of possibly 85 per cent of the population.

The transferable ballot in a plebiscite is not something new. As a matter of fact for a number of years it was used in general elections in the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Prittie: Until you got in.

Mr. Leboe: Someone says until I got in, but I did not get in; I am down here.

Mr. Prittie: Until your party got in and cancelled it.

Mr. Leboe: There were reasons for that but I do not think they have anything to do with the flag debate.

If we proceed to hold a plebiscite in that way we will get the true feeling of the people, and I am of the opinion that the result of a plebiscite would have much more permanence than the procedure we are following now because a new government could easily change the design again, and that is a point which should not be forgotten. It has been said that the youth of the country want a new flag. If so, 18 year olds and over should be allowed to vote in the plebiscite.

Some people say a new government would not follow the procedure we are following today, but I would remind the house it is the tame bull that kills the farmer. It is not hard to imagine that a new government under new leadership might wish to give the people of Canada the democratic right which is being denied to them under the procedure which is being followed today.

I am of the opinion that the whole approach to the flag question to this date has been negative. This is another reason why a plebiscite should be held. It is my sincere belief that the purpose of bringing about this debate is to eliminate the union jack from the present flag. In my view this is a completely negative approach and I am certainly not in favour of such an approach.

Those who are supporting the stand against a plebiscite may be saying: If we get rid of the union jack we get rid of crosses which stand for Christian principles; we shall eliminate them from our symbols entirely; we shall find ourselves in the position where there are no crosses in our flag, no symbols to represent the Christian principles for which we stand. Those individuals who wish to see the union jack disappear from our flag may well be saying: There will be no symbols to remind us of British justice; we are now building up for ourselves in this house and in the country a new type of justice so we do not need to rely on traditional British justice. There is our democratic origin to be considered. We know that the birthplace of democracy is the place over which the union jack is flying. This is an emotional and a personal issue. What are we doing when we eliminate the union jack from our flag under the procedure being followed today? We are denying the people of Canada a democratic right in accordance with the traditions they inherited from Britain. Are we setting aside the democracy of old for a new type which denies people the right to say what they want in certain circumstances which involve a personal matter? This, in my view, is exactly what we are doing. We are eliminating the crosses. We are eliminating the memory of British justice; we are eliminating the memory of true democracy.

One of my hon. friends said to me the other day he did not like the idea of a plebiscite because the red ensign would win. Maybe he is right. I do not think any of us know what design would win; we cannot be sure until or unless a vote is taken on this question. I believe everybody has the right to stand up in the House of Commons and give their personal opinions. One would suspect, from reading the newspapers, that there would be many more opinions expressed from speakers on the other side of the house. In refusing to yield to the request for a plebiscite the government, according to polls, is frustrating the will of 68 per cent of the people of Canada.

I could not help recalling a television program the other night in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) used some high-sounding phrases about a code of ethics for cleansing the inner sanctum. But I want to say to him as plainly as I can that the procedure which has been followed and the action which has been taken on this flag question will make the spectre in the Department of Justice look like an angel. I am convinced that the procedure being followed today is a deplorable procedure and that the people, if denied a plebiscite, will recognize it as such when the time comes for them to cast their ballots. Of this there is no question in my mind: You cannot deprive the people of this country of the right to express themselves, because there comes a time under the constitution when the people have this right whether we like it or not. Their voices will be heard. But I do not think it is altogether wise to hold a plebiscite on this matter at the time of the election. Why should we not do this at a more appropriate time instead of on an occasion when the issue is confused by the consideration of other issues and when many people, voting as they will vote, will be depriving themselves of the opportunity to vote in favour of some good program which an individual may have in his platform?

I believe a plebiscite is needed to satisfy the promise made to this country that parliament, which is composed of the Senate, the House of Commons and the crown, will deal with this matter. The order in council of 1945 stated it was parliament which would deal with this question. I would remind the house of some statements made by the Prime Minister as recorded on pages 4308 and 4309 of Hansard of June 15. Remember, we are about to ask the House of Commons to concur in a report. It is my view that this is where the stumbling block lies as far as parliament is concerned. This hope of settling the question in parliament is associated with the request for a plebiscite. As reported on page 4308, the right hon. gentleman says:

> Until such time as action is taken by parliament for the formal adoption of a national flag . . . the red ensign may be flown.

He is quoting from the order in council of 1945. Later the Prime Minister went on:

> I proposed in that statement on January 27, 1960, the submission by government to parliament of a measure which, if accepted by representatives of the people in parliament, would, I hoped, settle the problem of a national flag by agreement on a distinctive design which, unlike the red ensign—a flag never given formal sanction by parliament—could not be confused with certain United Kingdom or colonial flags and which was easily identifiable as Canadian.

Note, that he said he hoped this would settle the problem. He knew that the procedure which is being followed would not necessarily do so. As for the proposed flag being distinctive, I wonder if he would like to fly the flag of Peru alongside the design we are now considering and see just how distinctive it is. Further, it is not the flag that makes a country; it is the country that makes a flag. Later on, the Prime Minister stated:

> I do feel, however, that there should be a Canadian national flag which could not be mistaken for the emblem of any other country—

He was quoting from a letter he had sent out to various people. What a joke. A flag has been offered to us which is so like the flag of Peru that it is difficult to tell the difference between them. The statement went on:

> —and which, by its acceptance, would be a strong unifying force in our country.

Is this what we have found out in the course of the present debate—that this is a strong unifying force? I say to you, Mr.

Speaker, that it is anything but that. Here is another quotation:

> A Liberal government will establish a distinctive Canadian flag—

He had been saying previously that parliament would establish this flag, but as reported at page 4308 of Hansard he said:

> A Liberal government will establish a distinctive Canadian flag within two years of taking office.

Is this what is happening today? Certainly it is what is happening. It is not parliament that is being asked to deal with this problem, in my view. The Prime Minister is carrying out this commitment; but he is not doing what he said previously he would do. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say that we need a plebiscite to get us out of the position we are in. Parliament is the House of Commons, the Senate and the crown. I am confronted with the moral obligation which I have quoted from the pages of Hansard, namely that the Prime Minister must allow parliament—that is, the House of Commons, the Senate and the crown—to deal with this matter. I believe that the way we can get out of this dilemma is by holding a plebiscite, with the result of the vote of that plebiscite being given by the chief electoral officer to the Senate of this country so they may introduce a measure in this respect—as spoken of by the Prime Minister himself—a measure that can be concurred in by the Senate, the House of Commons and the crown. Therefore parliament would act on this question. I have heard it suggested that another order in council may be passed to annul the order in council of 1945. I say that if this happens, the whole argument has no foundation; we should not be dealing with the question at all.

I believe the question should be referred to a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate. In my opinion the Senate of this country ought to be in on these deliberations. Such a committee could choose a number of good designs including the present Canadian flag. I believe that an example of a design that could very well be acceptable under these circumstances and submitted in a plebiscite is the one suggested to me by the hon. member for Halifax. This was a very simple design in which the three maple leaves took the place of the union jack, and the union jack was placed on the shield in the present position of the three maple leaves. Nothing would be taken from the present flag, nothing would be added; only the prominence of the union jack would be changed with that of the three maple leaves. In my view this is one good design that could be submitted in a plebiscite. Instead of that this matter was placed before a committee that was frozen from the very beginning. As many hon. members of this house know, it was a joke around the House of Commons, after the flag committee was formed, that they knew immediately what the end result was going to be. What did we accomplish in that particular committee? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is another reason why we should hold a plebiscite on this matter and submit a number of designs to the Canadian people. The House of Commons and the Senate could provide a committee that would give us those designs, and we would therefore be fulfilling our obligation in passing them on to the people of this country in a plebiscite.

What did we do in this flag committee? We took the three maple leaves and replaced them with one maple leaf. This got the Prime Minister off the hook; it was no longer the Pearson pennant. But then the flag committee was immediately confronted with another problem; they now had the flag suggested by the members of the New Democratic party. So what happened? We folded, like a television camera, the three maple leaves into one and turned the blue bars into red. That is all we did. Basically it was the same design as that with which we started. That is all the flag committee accomplished, Mr. Speaker. In concluding my remarks I want to say that any individual in this country knows as much about what he wants in regard to a flag as does any member of parliament. But this is not true with regard to legislation that comes before this House of Commons. In the case of legislation we are able to carry out a certain amount of research—not as much as we would like to carry out, by any means—and we are able to listen to the speeches of people in the House of Commons who perhaps have more research facilities. In this way we are able to judge the matter from the experience of many members of this house who have a great deal of knowledge of the matter under discussion. But on the question of a flag, any person on the street knows just as much about the flag as you, Mr. Speaker, myself or anyone else; it is a very personal and emotional problem. Therefore I say that we should take advantage of holding a plebiscite on this question. I am also convinced that the backbenchers of the Liberal party would be doing their leader and the frontbenchers a very good service if they would rise and support a plebiscite and take their leader off the hook.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I intend to be brief in my remarks but I welcome the chance to make it clear that my views have not changed since I spoke on this matter last summer. The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) this afternoon gave us a great dissertation on wasting time. He should have said this to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) who introduced this whole flag question and the debate in the first place. However, the hon. member's harangue to my mind did not make any more sense in Latin or Greek than it would have in French or English. This man has been carrying on a one-man filibuster for days now. For example, I was looking through the first pages of yesterday's Hansard and saw that on those few pages he had 21 entries—and he accuses us of filibustering. None of us on this side can tie that record, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Grégoire: Don't make me laugh.

Mr. Winkler: Pay your phone bill.

Mr. Moore: In support of a plebiscite I would like to present what I consider to be the main reason for holding one. In attempting to force certain flag designs on the people the government is completely ignoring those who want to retain the flag we have had for many years, or at least some symbols from it. To be fair I would point out that one man on the government side is attempting to retain the symbols, and I give him full credit for that. We heard a very fine speech from the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) this afternoon and we realize that some hon. members in other parties are also attempting to do this.

Many speeches have been made in this debate by members from Quebec. Those members are practically all, if not entirely all, in favour of a new or different flag, regardless of the party to which they belong. I respect their views because it is obvious they are trying to present the views of their constituents. Regardless of the views of their party, these members at least have spoken for their people, and no one can quarrel with that; it is political honesty. But what about the members of the government; have they been as honest? In my opinion they definitely have not. Many of them speak, of course, from their seats; but they do not rise—with few exceptions—and tell us what their constituents want. We should certainly like the reasons for the abandonment of the flag which we now have for something else, or for what appears to be anything else. It does not seem to make much difference as long as we abandon the flag we have. I am sure the constituents of hon. members opposite would be very interested to hear what they have to say on this matter. It is natural that some constituents always like to criticize their member, and I do not think they should be robbed of this pleasure. But how can they criticize their member if they do not know what he thinks about an emotional issue?

It is surprising that many young people feel the need for a plebiscite, although I have heard statements to the contrary. The boy scouts magazine polled a number of boy scouts on this issue, and boy scouts are a fine example of young Canadians. The result showed that over 50 per cent of them wanted the red ensign. Over 35 per cent, I must admit, wanted the three maple leaf flag, but everyone has forgotten about it now. Less than 15 per cent wanted a one maple leaf flag.

The need for a plebiscite has been mentioned in various publications throughout the country. I should like to put on the record only those excerpts from these clippings which deal with a plebiscite. For example, the Rural Co-Op for May 12, 1964 carries the heading "Does majority or minority rule?", and in connection with the flag question has this to say:

> How many quiet responsible Canadians want a new flag—brand new with no traditions behind it? Or a new national anthem? Until that fact is established all the hollering about a Canadian flag and a Canadian anthem is just that: a lot of hollering by extremely vocal persons who must have something to holler about . . .
> Only a referendum can show whether a majority of Canadians want a change—or whether we are subject to rule by the loudest shouters.

Here is another clipping from the Daily Colonist, Victoria, B.C., entitled: "It's a label, not a flag". I refer only to the part which deals with a plebiscite. This article says:

> The flag, which traditionally expresses our pride and our freedom, is being taken away without the consent of the majority of the people. Mr. Pearson could resolve this by a national plebiscite . . .
> The flag is a basic issue and should be resolved not by an election, not by mere politics, but by a national vote in itself, for itself.

Lastly, this is a clipping from the Toronto Telegram for August 2, 1964, an excerpt from an article entitled, "Ask the people":

The voice of the people can be heard, on this issue, only through a national plebiscite.

Then it goes on to mention that the flag issue is different from a political issue.

In my opinion, the idea behind sending this problem to a committee was to obtain a compromise. But we did not get one; what we got was another label similar to the three maple leaves which was suggested at the time the committee was set up. It is my understanding that the committee had the chance to come up with a compromise which contained the symbols of both founding races. This was mentioned this afternoon. One of the three final choices bore the symbols of both founding races, but this was overlooked. That is why I say the committee did not come up with a compromise when it had the chance. I would have accepted this choice because it was a compromise. The Canadian coat of arms contains the symbols of four founding races, but this was ignored.

What do I consider to be a compromise when I speak of compromise? We have, you might say, the two extremes. We have, on the one hand, the strong supporters of the previously recommended three maple leaf flag; on the other hand we have those who support the red ensign. If we are to reach a compromise we must put something of both races on any compromise flag which is recommended by a committee, and I maintain that no symbol of the red ensign is on the flag proposed by this committee. To those who say that a plebiscite would disunite the country, I concede only that it should not show regional results. Only by showing regional results might disunity be caused. But a plebiscite would get this government out of a bad spot.

This Liberal government has shown that it does not care what is the design of a new flag so long as it does away with any symbols of our heritage. That is so obvious that this point does not need enlarging upon. The whole flag idea was brought forward last summer just before a summer recess in the hope that the house would pass it. If that had been so, of course then we would have been given a recess. Once again now, before the Christmas recess, there is the same hope. This is a typical example of the government's political manoeuvring. We are told: "Pass it, or no Christmas recess". Perhaps they have not said that in so many words, but we get the idea. This does not sound to me like real democracy in action.

The other day the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Ormiston) spoke on the question of symbols in connection with his support for a plebiscite. He delivered an interesting and well prepared speech. There has been a tendency lately in this country to do away with symbols. The same tendency exists to do away with pleasing art. A prime example of this is the monstrosities of so-called modern art which we have in our Canadian air terminal buildings. To me this is evidence of a sick society, and this is the sort of thing which seems to get support from this government.

Why should we consult the people through a plebiscite? Who asked for a new flag in the first place? This was not the promise I heard, Mr. Speaker, in the last election campaign in my part of the country at any rate. What I heard were promises of $2 wheat. I even heard the promise of $3 wheat; that is $3 for the first 300 bushels that a farmer produces. Then there were promises of giving the country two ministers of agriculture. But I heard no promise about a flag. We sometimes wonder now how many ministers of agriculture we do have.

Mr. Slogan: Three.

Mr. Moore: Someone says three, but some say none. I did not notice the government being anxious to keep these promises and these were the promises in which the people in my area were most interested.

I mentioned a few minutes ago the members from Quebec, and I do not think I was hard on them. These members obviously want a new flag. But I would ask them, and I would ask others who say a plebiscite is not necessary, to consult their constituents as to whether they would rather have a new flag which perhaps would divide Canada—and I think they are all aware of this—or that we spent our time giving them some much needed assistance in their problems. Have these members asked this of the eastern farmers, whose incomes are so meagre? Strangely enough, we see today the symbols of Christmas on the office doors of many hon. members as well as inside their offices, and this is very fine. But I notice that these are on the office doors of the very members who want to do away with symbols. How do they justify acceptance of traditional Christmas symbols while at the same time rejecting those traditional symbols on the flag? That certainly does not make sense in my opinion.

In conclusion I would urge the government, and particularly the Prime Minister, to give some consideration to those Canadians who do not agree with the Prime Minister in his desire to remove the Christian crosses from our flag by Christmas.

Mr. Lawrence Watson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate in order to put forward some of my views about the necessity for holding a plebiscite across Canada to decide this issue for once and for all. I am sure it is the feeling of most people in Canada that a plebiscite is the only means by which this issue can be settled. It is also my belief that the majority of the people in Canada do not have a desire to change our flag.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is the one man in Canada who, as head of this government, has a feeling that we should have a new flag, and is in a position to at least attempt to push it through the house and force it upon the people. In western Canada we often use the expression "taking the bull by the horns," and I believe that is exactly what the Prime Minister is attempting to do in forcing this change upon the Canadian people who, like the members of this party, will not accept such a change.

There is no urgency for a new flag, as evidenced by events which have taken place since last summer when the flag issue was first introduced. In June, as I remember, there was an attempt to rush the new flag design through by July 1 so that it could be hoisted at that time. I need not remind hon. members that that did not take place. The next urgent deadline was the time of the Queen's visit to Canada. The Prime Minister, and I presume government members, hoped to be able to hoist the new flag when the Queen was visiting Canada, but again that was not possible. The Prime Minister has now set a new date for the hoisting of a new flag, and is in hopes that this can take place before Christmas. I suggest one of the Prime Minister's faults in proposing this flag question lies in his continuous setting of deadlines. It must be very disappointing to him, having set two deadlines within six months, not to have at least met one of them.

It is evident by the events that have taken place in the house as a result of motions to adjourn the debate that the government members, along with the majority of other members, feel the need for greater discussion on this subject. I should like to see some government members stand in their places and tell us why we so urgently need a change in the present flag.

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I am still wondering if the hon. member's remarks are pertinent to the amendment before us, that is whether or not we should have a plebiscite on the flag issue and the reasons for so doing?

I admit the hon. member's remarks are most interesting, but, in my opinion, they are not related to the subject under consideration.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Gelber): I am sure the hon. member will address himself to the subject of the amendment.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I was leading up to that subject, and was about to suggest that we have not heard from more than one government member as to why we need a change in our flag. We in this party suggest that we do not need such a change because the present accepted flag is satisfactory. In view of that fact, and the government's apparent desire to make a change, I believe we should have a plebiscite and let the people of Canada make a decision once and for all on this issue.

The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) said this afternoon that the only reason for a change in the flag lies in the fact that some people want to get rid of the union jack. I agree with that hon. member and feel that that is the only reason for a change.

There has been only one member on the other side of the house who has stood up in his place and agreed that that was the only reason for such a change. I do not believe he is the only member of the Liberal party in this house who represents a riding where the majority of constituents feel the same way. It has been very evident from the speeches made by members of other than the government party that we do not agree with them in this regard.

If one refers to a poll carried out by a western newspaper last spring he will find that at that time 82 per cent of the people contacted were in favour of retention of the red ensign. I do not believe that we must always retain the red ensign, but if there is a change I feel that we should change to a modified version of.

If we are to have a change, in order to maintain whatever unity still exists in Canada it must be the result of a plebiscite.

Canadian Flag

Invariably, many people are unhappy about the results of a general election, but they accept those results. I am sure the people of Canada would be happy to accept the feeling of the majority of the people of Canada as expressed by a plebiscite. Surely the people of Canada for the most part desire that this whole mess be cleaned up. I suggest it can be cleaned up appropriately, and in the best way possible, by holding a plebiscite, settling this matter for all time.

I should like to refer to a newspaper clipping in relation to a poll of members of parliament on the flag issue. The date is June 12, and at this time there were 120 Liberals for the proposed flag, 1 against and 2 undecided; there were two Conservatives for the flag, 72 against and 8 undecided. The New Democratic party was split with 10 for the flag, 5 against it and 2 undecided. There was 1 Créditiste for the flag, 6 against it and 4 undecided. I believe the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner) pointed out last night that a poll was still being conducted with regard to the question of a plebiscite. At the moment 60 per cent of the people are in favour of a plebiscite, and I believe last June the figure was 62 per cent or 63 per cent. This is evidence of the fact that the feelings of the people have not changed, and that there should be a plebiscite.

I believe that members of parliament were sent here to legislate, to change laws, but when we are dealing with an emotional issue such as the flag everyone in Canada should have an opportunity to make his choice known. I am making it quite clear that I am going to support the amendment for a plebiscite. It is evident from what has happened since this flag debate started, and from the fact that the committee voted almost unanimously against the three maple leaf flag, that that particular flag has been set aside. I am sure the flag committee did a wonderful job of attempting to come up with a design that would appeal to the majority of people.

I have a clipping here, Mr. Speaker, and the heading on it is, "The Great Canadian Debate". I should like to put some of this on the record because I realize that the people of Canada feel this is what has taken place here. This article says that in 1892 the British admiralty created the red ensign by adding the Canadian coat of arms to the fly of the British ensign. This flag has been flown on ships registered in Canada. The article indicates that perhaps this was the start of the great Canadian flag debate, and that was some 70 years ago. I quote from that article:

> In 1918, at the Olympics in Paris, the Canadian team paraded behind a maple leaf flag devised for the occasion. Perhaps that was the first time a distinctive Canadian flag complicated the simple choice between the red ensign and the union jack.

Then, on October 1, 1945—

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will no doubt find me obstinate, but all the same, I would ask you to remind the hon. member who has the floor that since the present debate deals with the question as to whether or not a plebiscite should be held, the merits of a flag over another should not be discussed.

I would therefore ask you, Mr. Speaker, to tell the hon. member to deal with the plebiscite instead of the merits of the union jack or of any other flag.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Gelber): Yes, I would ask the hon. member for Assiniboia to direct his remarks more specifically to the amendment and the question of a plebiscite, with which we are dealing at the moment.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): On the point of order, may I say that when the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) was speaking he wandered all over the place. He was never once called to order. I am sure that after what he has said the debate is wide open for anyone in this house.

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have just heard, if the simultaneous translation was correct—that the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) was never called to order.

I must point out that the hon. member for Lapointe was called to order at least three or four times.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Gelber): I do feel the hon. member for Assiniboia should direct more of his attention to the question of a plebiscite, the subject we are discussing at the moment.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I was merely trying to bring out the facts in relation to the great flag debate and why we should have a plebiscite to settle it once and for all. As I was saying, in 1892 they were arguing over the flag. This is now 1964 and there are only a few days left until Christmas.

If we are going to make a decision on this matter, then hon. members should decide to hold a plebiscite and eliminate all this argument as to whether we shall have this flag or that, or whether we want a new flag at all. I think this is a question, whether we want a new flag at all. How else can a decision be made except by a plebiscite We can make a decision here, but that is not going to make the people happy. As I said before, we in this great democracy of Canada like to think that a decision involving an issue as emotional as this flag will be made by the people. I do not believe there has been such an emotional issue as the flag since I came to Ottawa. I must admit that some very emotional things occurred during the last two weeks, but they were related to a different topic and I will not become involved with that.

I should like to return to this press clipping, Mr. Speaker, because it does relate to a plebiscite. I quote:

> Finance Minister J. L. Ilsley replied that the red ensign was being flown under authority of order in council P.C. 5888 and tabled a copy of the order. He added: "The red ensign flew from the tower of the houses of parliament from the days of confederation until 1904."
> The order in council recalled that a 1924 order had authorized use of the ensign on Canadian buildings outside Canada—

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: Mr. Speaker, once again I raise a point of order. I wonder whether the present debate is on the merits of the red ensign and the union jack or on the holding of a plebiscite?

I would like you to call again the hon. member to order and this time abide by your ruling, otherwise this will become a circus.

[Text]

Mr. Churchill: On that point of order I respectfully draw the attention of the Acting Speaker to the fact that we have now had three interruptions from a member of the Créditiste party. On Friday the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) interrupted proceedings in the house on 23 occasions during a two hour period. Today the hon. member for Lapointe spoke for 15 minutes on subjects that were irrelevant to the debate taking place.

We cannot have two types of rules in the house, special rules for members of the Créditiste party and more stringent rules for members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, and I respectfully suggest, sir, that you ignore points of order raised by members of the Créditiste party in view of the special consideration that has been given to the hon. member for Lapointe. All we ask is the same privilege in the House of Commons that is afforded to other members of the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, that is just like the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) who, in the absence of the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), musters enough courage to bring charges against him—

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Gelber): Order. I think we have had enough discussion on this point of order. I would ask the hon. member for Assiniboia to direct more of his attention to the question of a plebiscite. I think there is reasonable latitude given inasmuch as, in his opinion, various aspects of the problem which he has been discussing would be solved by a plebiscite. However, I do not think that is carte blanche to go over the entire field of the Canadian flag. He should be given some latitude but I would ask him to try and direct his attention more specifically to the question of a plebiscite.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall try to relate this to the plebiscite and I thought I had explained that to the hon. member. There is one more paragraph I think I should quote:

> Premier John Smallwood of Newfoundland said, "Even if we're the last people on earth we'll continue to fly the union jack. It is first and foremost our flag in Newfoundland."

I am sure the people in Newfoundland are no different from the people in Vancouver, at the other extreme of Canada, and I am sure that if we have a national plebiscite as true Canadians they will accept the result of it.

Mr. Boutin: Question.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): The hon. member just sits there. If he would like to get up and make a speech I would gladly sit down to allow him the time; but if he is going to interrupt continually—

Mr. Choquette: He made his speech yesterday.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): This is an extract from another newspaper clipping:

> There is a growing suspicion in the minds of Canadians that Prime Minister Pearson and his government supporters are now afraid to submit the "flag issue" to the people as a plebiscite or referendum. Having successfully split the country wide open on the issue the Liberals fear the results of a "flag vote" that would publicly record the disunity.

Mr. Byrne: Please identify the source.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): This is an article from the Sudbury Daily Star of August 21, 1964.

An hon. Member: That is a good Tory paper.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): I am not familiar with the politics of the papers involved, but I have another clipping here from the Kingston Whig-Standard and possibly some hon. members could identify its politics.

Mr. Webb: Senator Fraser's—Liberal.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): Dealing with the argument that a vote in the house would represent the true feelings of the majority of people, the Kingston Whig-Standard says:

> It will do no such thing; what it probably will do is reflect the feelings (whether true or not) of members of parliament.

Nobody can tell me that all the people in my riding think the way I do, nor that all the people in the riding of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) think the same as he does.

Mr. Choquette: He is a Conservative; you know that.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): That is fine, I am glad to hear it.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): He has seen the light.

Mr. Watson (Assiniboia): I could continue giving reasons why I feel we need a plebiscite, but I shall conclude by saying that on the day our gracious Queen left Canada I went up to the flag committee room and saw a flag hanging on the wall which was the choice of the 1946 flag committee—the red ensign with the coat of arms removed and a single maple leaf in the fly—and when I looked at that flag I thought it was a reasonable solution and one I could support. I would say it was a far more sensible flag and more reasonable solution than the one recommended by the present flag committee, and in saying that I am not saying anything against the flag committee members.

However, that flag was not accepted in 1946 and I feel that to settle this sorry mess into which the Prime Minister has got us he must agree to leave the question to a plebiscite so that the people of Canada may have a voice in the choice of what will be our national flag.

[Mr. Watson (Assiniboia).]

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): I note, Mr. Speaker, that very frequently during this debate there comes nothing from the other side except senseless repetition of the word "question." Mr. Speaker, there is a question all right. The Canadian people are asking, wherever you go in English Canada: What kind of politics is the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) playing in his nefarious flag policy? I would remind hon. members who keep repeating the word "question" that that is what the question is. It is spreading across the nation and it is a question which will only be answered by the ballot box, whether the Prime Minister and his administration decide to give us a plebiscite or not.

I rise at this time to support the amendment so ably proposed by my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Monteith) and seconded by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp). The amendment before us has no doubt been placed on record, but perhaps I may be allowed to read it again. It is:

> That the sixth report of the special committee be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to strike out paragraph 7 of the said report and substitute therefor the following:
> "However, as the final vote of the committee did not reveal a sufficient degree of unanimity for the proposed design for a national flag for Canada, your committee therefore recommends that the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to conduct a plebiscite to be held at the next general election in order that the Canadian people may be given their rightful opportunity to declare their choice concerning a national flag".

It concludes:

> And that the committee for such purpose be revived.

This is a most reasonable request; it is a very democratic suggestion. It is a cogent amendment, one which is democratically sound, and it deserves the support of all members of this house. It asks that a plebiscite be held at the time of the next general election in order that the Canadian people may have an opportunity to express their views on a national flag.

This government, in the course of its present nefarious policy, has shown its usual characteristics of Liberal dictatorship and autocracy, making sure that the Canadian people are not given a voice in this matter. The reasons behind the government's refusal to accept the request made by the opposition regarding a plebiscite are deeper than they might appear; they are deeply hidden within the ramifications and machinations of the party opposite, both here on parliament hill and across the country. The policy followed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in catering to one racial and geographical section of this country as against all the rest of Canada combined strangles and stultifies the voices which have been raised in support of our worthy emblems. You will note, Mr. Speaker, that I have used the plural and said "worthy emblems". I have done so because there are others which are as worthy to be our national emblems as many which have been mentioned. But they have been utterly ignored. The worthiest of these is, I submit, the Canadian red ensign.

In calling attention to the need for a plebiscite I would certainly join with all other hon. members in commending the committee of 15 which worked so hard and so long in the performance of its duties. The members of that committee worked diligently, I will admit, but I cannot congratulate them on their decision. If I may use a colloquial phrase, the dice were all loaded against there ever being a chance that the Canadian red ensign would become the flag of the committee's choice. The dice were loaded by the Prime Minister against there ever being a chance that the union jack or the fleur-de-lis would be present on any flag presented to us by the committee. After considering the design which the committee finally chose I can only say it underlines the need for a plebiscite so that the wise counsel of the Canadian people can guide us, by a majority vote, in the selection of a flag.

It has been said that after the first long, unproductive debate on the flag, anything we might say now would be repetitive. I am reminded of the story of a coloured minister of the gospel in the south who was asked by an admirer of his preaching how he managed to convey his thoughts to his parishioners on the plantation. He replied: "I tells them about their sins of omission and commission and I tells them again, and then I tells them what I told them." That is just what the opposition in this house has the duty of doing today.

I want to point out that this flag is a bicoloured flag. On the Canadian civic scene today we hear a lot of hyphenated expressions preceded by the syllable "bi". Biculturalism and bilingualism are examples. In my opinion red and white do not form such a good combination, from the point of view of colour, as we had on the first flag which was presented to us. The trifoliate flag was at least a tricolour—red, white and blue. Down through the years this country has sung "Three Cheers for the Red, White and Blue". That song cannot be sung with reference to the flag now offered us because it is only a red and white flag. I have heard the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) attempting to convince us in this house that Canada's colours are red and white. This is another question upon which the people should help make a decision. The hon. member tried to establish that these colours were law, that they were irrevocable. I submit this is not so. I listened to the hon. member for Leeds in the last debate on this subject lauding what he tried to put forward as the sound qualities and impeccable heraldic principles underlying the flag which was first presented to us. I listened to him again on Monday, November 3, as he made his excuses for his new heraldic hallucination while he dropped the red, white and blue trifoliate flag into the political mire in favour of this bicoloured, red-ended table cloth. After all that has been said in favour of the flag put forward by the committee, the flag now espoused so readily by the hon. member for Leeds, I want to ask him one question in this regard: Would it suit the people of his constituency and of the city of Brockville? I submit it would not.

On August 17 last, speaking on this question, I stated that the Liberal party members were brainwashed and gagged when it came to forming and expressing their views on this flag question. I repeat it now. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that I said the herd of trained seals on the government backbenches were living on an iceflow which was becoming uninhabitable and which was rapidly breaking up. The members of the other parties in this parliament as well as the Canadian people generally saw that prophecy come true the week before last in the terrible spectacle witnessed here when the sins of omission and commission on the part of this government were aired. That is all I am permitted to say at the present time in that regard, Mr. Speaker, but I trust that future inquiries and reports will bring out the truth there. I say to the Prime Minister, stop this strife and contention by giving the Canadian people their right to choose by referendum; that inherent right which they have always possessed. That right is built right into the Canadian red ensign in its Christian, democratic crosses and in the insignia contained in the Canadian shield on the flag. I say to the Prime Minister, just tell the people, "Yes, I think it is best that we vote on this. We do not need to go to the bother and expense of calling an election for that purpose, either; but at the next general election, whenever it is required that it occur, we will attach this plebiscite to the ballot and we can settle this matter peaceably among ourselves". How all hon. members on both sides of this house wish that the Prime Minister would make an announcement along those lines; then he would be doing something for the unity of this country. But no, so far our pleas have been of no avail and, like the coloured minister, I have to tell the Prime Minister again and quote Cowper as I did before:

> The age of virtuous politics is past, and we are deep in that of cold pretence. Those we thought were patriots are grown too shrewd to be sincere and we too wise to trust them.

What a situation this House of Commons has come to. What a situation the affairs of this country have come to. After the opposition motion to adjourn this flag debate the other evening, when the Liberal party voted to continue it, I was talking to a lady who had been in the members gallery that evening. She said, "Poor Canada. What a pity. What a sell-out to one province. What is the purpose of this question?" Then she said, "Are not our emblems, so useful and so well respected down through the centuries, of any use to us any more, that they do not let the people decide this?" She concluded by saying —and this could be ominous, but I sincerely hope it never will be—"You can begin to put the barbed wire up at any time; things will be worse before they are better".

Mr. Byrne: She was in the Tory gallery, obviously.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I have a few quotations that I would like to place before the house, Mr. Speaker, with regard to my argument that the Canadian people should be given their rightful opportunity of declaring their choice of a national flag. I have here "The Canadian Military Journal" of Dominion day, 1963. This was quite a while ago and a great deal of time has been taken up since in this flag debate. With regard to the opportunity that should be afforded our people of racial origins to decide this question, "The Canadian Military Journal" says as follows:

> French speaking Canadians should remember—back through Canada's history to Quebec in 1774. They would find that brave group of men, and women too, French and English speaking, all striving to set a foundation on which a future nation could be built.
> The cornerstone had just been laid. It was the Quebec Act which they, especially the English governor, Sir Guy Carleton, had striven to have worded in such a way as to assure that they and their children, and those to follow them, would live in perfect harmony—a country with two languages and the four freedoms, as we know them today, but with one spirit and purpose—to live and work together.

That is what we have to do in this country, if it is to survive. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it will survive if democratic principles are followed and dictatorship and autocracy are discarded here in this chamber. I will continue to read from "The Canadian Military Journal" of Dominion day, 1963. That was a very fitting day for these things to be said, was it not, Mr. Speaker:

> They should also remember that the national defence of Canada was supplied with material and paid for by England right up to the first world war—yes, and 100 years earlier in the war of 1812-14 when English and French speaking Canadians fought and died side by side, as brothers, to keep this Canada of ours. French speaking students, and those who lead them, should reflect on that before they talk separatism. Let's talk unity—sincerely and constructively—not like politicians who change their tunes to suit each audience, then forget it.

I think that is a very fitting and timely quotation. "However as the final vote of the committee did not reveal a sufficient degree of unanimity"—I am quoting the words of the amendment—"for the proposed design for a national flag for Canada", I would like to make reference to what I term, for my own purposes, exhibit No. 2, which is a letter from the Canadian Corps Association dated April 20, 1964, addressed to the Honourable Lester B. Pearson. I should like to correct that title; it should be "The Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson" —Prime Minister of Canada, Ottawa. The letter reads:

> Honourable Sir:
> The Canadian Corps Association, dominion command, continues to support firmly, the retention of the Canadian red ensign as Canada's national flag.
> It should not be the decision of one person, nor of any political party, to eliminate the Canadian red ensign as Canada's flag, which it has been for almost 100 years.
> The government's course of action in this matter should only be determined by a plebiscite.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, I hear mutterings of "Order". I contend that this exhibit is in order because it brings to the forefront the need for democratic principles to prevail in the form of a plebiscite, and that is what the amendment is talking about. This letter continues:

> Petitions to the Secretary of State prove now that the Canadian red ensign is the majority choice of Canadians. Has the government no confidence in the citizens of Canada?

It is well that all hon. members should ask themselves that question, because it is a cogent question today:

> Let them decide this question at the polls.

I heartily agree with that sentiment and I am not afraid of it in so far as it is an obligation upon me personally:

> Our veterans organization strongly urge that the question to the qualified voters of Canada should read: Do you favour the retention of the Canadian red ensign as Canada's national flag? The yes or no answers should then determine the final design concerning Canada's national flag.

I have commended the committee and I wish to commend the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) and his colleagues who found there was no compromise in the minds of the great majority of the members of the committee. Nevertheless they went ahead and did their duty, even though they were outnumbered from the start, and purposely so as a result of the policies pursued by the government in connection with that loaded committee.

I have before me another timely quotation, even though it goes back to June 3, during the first phase of the debate. This is a quotation from one of my home town newspapers, the Napanee Beaver. In an editorial headed "Rally round the flag" the Beaver says:

> It does seem a simple enough thing to define a flag, at least for dictionary makers. It is not so easy for prime ministers...
> As his self-imposed deadline approaches Mr. Pearson may find that the flag—symbol of unity in most lands—will become a symbol of disunity in Canada.

How true is that prophecy today. I also received a communication from the Canadian Corps Association, as did all hon. members, dated November 27. They say in their letter:

> The right hon. Prime Minister Pearson and some of his associates have during the past few days called for British fair play and justice.
> The Prime Minister has therefore substantiated the veterans of Canada's demand that our present government must not eliminate from Canada the flag of justice and freedom, the Canadian red ensign...
> The Canadian Corps Association, dominion command, at this time reiterates that no change in Canada's present national flag should be made unless the government is so instructed by the citizens of Canada by means of a plebiscite vote held in conjunction with Canada's next general election.
> Yours respectfully,
> E. V. Heesaker.

How timely and directly relevant, Mr. Speaker, is that communication to this discussion. As the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Watson) pointed out, there are many well founded articles available, and I have another here. This is an article by Mr. Bruce West in the Globe and Mail for December 4 concerning the flag issue. I hear someone laugh.

Mr. Choquette: I am not laughing at you. I am not even listening.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Hon. members opposite might well take into consideration the well chosen words of Mr. Bruce West.

Mr. Moreau: They are already on the record.

Mr. Alkenbrack: He says:

> Let the people speak on this matter and settle it once and for all. Take the question out of politics and into the realm of the heart and soul of Canada, where it belongs. When the people of Canada themselves have spoken, I for one will be willing to abide by the decision.

And so I too will be willing to abide by the decision.

Mr. Byrne: When was Bruce West elected?

Mr. Alkenbrack: He continues:

> Make no mistake about it, there are extremely important principles involved in this question. It is not merely a matter of whose piece of bunting has the most eye-appeal. The flag question is symbolic of several more vastly important ones to this country. Among them is this one: Shall we, in common with the eagerly emerging nations, turn in some strange shame from our great heritage and past or shall we use them as a proud and solid foundation upon which to build our future?

Next I have a letter which I think all hon. members received. It is an open letter to the members of the House of Commons and the Senate from the Christian action movement, Manitoba branch. They say:

> Dear Sir:
> We are among those many Canadians who fear the implications of the removal of the union jack from our flag. The union jack signifies our continuing association with the commonwealth. Why are Mr. Pearson and his followers bent on removing it? Is it an initial step in severing this connection?

There, Mr. Speaker, is another point I should like hon. members on your right to cogitate. This letter continues:

> We believe that if Canadians understood this to be the case they would be overwhelmingly opposed to the proposed change. Mr. Diefenbaker, who has often been unfairly called an obstructionist, is defending the right of our people to make a choice.

Hon. members will forgive me if I insert the word "very" before the word "right" in the last sentence there, to try to make it more emphatic, although it is emphatic enough. The letter goes on:

> Mr. Churchill has given an excellent account of the history behind our flag.
> The red ensign probably commands a greater following than any other individual flag submitted to the committee. Though, unfortunately, the flag has been made a party issue, many rank and file Liberals prefer to retain the red ensign but out of party loyalty may avoid overt opposition. The flag should not be a party issue, or the subject of a personal battle.

He is not referring to the ensign, but to the flag, whatever it may be, which is finally adopted by this country. The letter then continues:

> The first and second points in our statement of policy are:
> 1. Allegiance to the crown and the preservation of Canada as a constitutional monarchy;
> 2. The preservation of national sovereignty and the strengthening of the British commonwealth.
> We hereby petition you to take a stand in parliament in favour of retaining the red ensign as our flag. We believe this would help restore Canadian unity. The best step, however, would be to drop the issue; or to let the people decide in a plebiscite in the next election.

We believe that such a course would assist in restoring Canadian unity, and I am sure the majority of hon. members in this house also hold that belief.

I have in my hand a communication from the loyal Orange alliance board dated November 30, 1964, which expresses favour for the retention of the red ensign. In part this communication reads as follows:

> We present for your comfort and consideration the following observations, which appear to us to be right and proper: There has been much said on the flag issue and, we have reason to believe, a lot has been left unsaid. Even that which has been said has not been given due and proper examination.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, the action or the lack thereof on the part of hon. members to the right of Mr. Speaker gives a good example of their failure to give this question due and proper examination.

The communication then continues:

> A profound thought is expressed in the book of Proverbs, chapter 18, verse 13, reading:
> "He that answereth a matter before he heareth it,—it is a folly and a shame unto him".

This communication concludes by stating:

> We do sincerely hope and pray that the eyes and ears of all members of the House of Commons may be opened so that God's truth may be made known to them and that they may fervently serve us in peace and righteousness.

The division of the house this afternoon an hour or so ago consequent upon the motion of the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner) was timely and indicative of the situation as it now exists here today, and makes the position of the government regarding the flag an untenable one. We have indicated in truth and by our vote that we now have a flag which hon. members have indicated they respect, and that indeed nothing further need be said in this regard. In other words, we do not need further debate on this question. However, the government and its supporters, with the exception of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), have by their votes indicated that they are of the opinion this debate should be continued. They have indicated their agreement that more should be said regarding the flag.

Again I point out that the government benches are silent, just as they were silent during earlier stages of this debate. Conspicuous by this silence are most of the Liberal members from Ontario who have not only been brainwashed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and René Lévesque, but gagged by the ponderous and divisive machine that the Liberal party has created, which would destroy and take away from English Canada those emblems which have been ours for more than 160 years in this country.

I use that number of years because it was in 1785 that the United Empire Loyalists landed at Adolphustown in the united counties of Lennox and Addington, where I live. That has always been a time measurement factor in that area. Many memorials are in the memorial cemetery there dating back to 1785. This record pertains not only to Adolphustown, but to many areas across the country from Halifax and Saint John, to the St. Lawrence river and along the great lakes, where British institutions and democratic principles first took a foothold, were born and propagated in this country.

I have attempted to put forward these points in favour of the amendment, and in closing I should like to say that I support the amendment and favour a plebiscite because I feel Canadian people should be given the democratic right to make this momentous choice. Once that right has been given to them we can then return to our consideration of more productive business for the betterment of Canada.

Mr. Albert Horner (The Battlefords): May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate and I make no apologies for doing so. A matter that affects every Canadian now and for generations, the making of a change in the flag design, is of the utmost importance. The government has made such a mess of handling this issue that the only way out is to allow the Canadian people to decide at the next election by means of a plebiscite. Why are members opposite so opposed to a plebiscite if they are so sure the maple leaf design will win? The trouble is, Mr. Speaker, they are not sure at all.

Since we have returned to the flag debate my mail has been increasing and all the letters I have received endorse the stand we are taking on having the matter decided by a plebiscite. The polls that have been conducted in the cities indicate that a majority of the people approached were in favour of a plebiscite. If polls were conducted in the rural areas, they would show a large percentage of the people were in favour of a plebiscite. I received one letter from a man—a very honest man—who stated that even though he had not voted for me at the election he was 100 per cent in favour of having the matter decided by a plebiscite. He was solidly behind the stand of this party for having the question of a flag decided in that way.

The question of the flag is one of vital importance, Mr. Speaker, and its importance is based on two main points. First, it is one of the most emotionally charged issues with which the House of Commons has been asked to deal. If it is not properly handled it could seriously jeopardize the dreams of the fathers of confederation. The matter of choosing a flag is not ordinary legislation. The House of Commons is called upon every year to debate the speech from the throne, supply, the budget and so on. Laws are made and modified every day in this house. However, it is only once in a hundred years or so that parliament is called upon to approve a flag which would then be flown for generations to come. A flag is not something we can change in a day because the majority of the members of the House of Commons so desire. Let us remember that once we have a flag it will always be there. It will be there throughout our lives.

There are Canadians in Canada who say that the very nature of the flag issue imposes upon us the task of solving the problem without endangering the unity of Canada in any way. We hear many members opposite say, "Let us vote". I challenge them to let us have a plebiscite. The trouble is that there is a tendency among some Liberals and some newspapermen to dispose of the flag issue by ignoring certain fundamental facts, and thereby deliberately misleading the people of Canada. The first, and most important—

Mr. Choquette: Who wrote that speech?

An hon. Member: Let us hear from you.

Mr. Winkler: Let us hear you make a speech; you have not got the fortitude.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The hon. member is reading his whole speech, which is absolutely out of order. We are thoroughly fed up with things in this house and with members who read speeches written by somebody else.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; the hon. member has no right to suggest that an hon. member's speech has been written by another.

Mr. Winkler: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) always interferes in this particular manner, but never wishes to express his own views. We wish that if he had the intestinal fortitude, he would get up and express his views on this subject.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Grey-Bruce is out of order to the same extent and in the same way as the hon. member for Lotbinière was.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The hon. member says that I do not want to get up in order to express my opinion. This is not so, since my views are clear and definite. I am against the plebiscite and against a member reading a speech in the house.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please; may I suggest to hon. members that we return to the subject matter of the discussion and allow the hon. member for The Battlefords to continue his remarks?

Mr. Olson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We know it is contrary to the rules for members of this house to read their speeches. Since it is obvious the hon. member for The Battlefords is reading his speech we should give our permission, take it as read and have it recorded in Hansard. Then we could get on with the business of the house.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, that is one of the most shameful allegations that has ever been made in this House of Commons. The hon. member has indicated that the member for The Battlefords—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please; the hon. member has suggested, as has been done on many occasions before, that the hon. member is possibly reading his speech and it should therefore be tabled. I think the remark should be taken in the spirit in which it appeared to be made. I urge hon. members to co-operate with the Chair and co-operate also with the hon. member for The Battlefords by giving him a chance to make his speech. The Chair recognizes, and all hon. members know, that hon. members are not to read speeches, although some members take the liberty of referring to extensive and copious notes. Perhaps this is what the hon. member is doing now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): Thank you, Mr. Speaker; for a few minutes I will stick fairly closely to my notes, and then I am going to put them down. Perhaps hon. members opposite will wish I was still reading.

Mr. Choquette: Who wrote that speech?

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): I have noticed the absence of Mr. Kent from the house, and perhaps that explains why we have not heard any speeches from hon. members opposite. They have no ghost writer. I wrote this speech myself, if that information is of any help to the hon. member who sits there in his seat and chortles at me. The first and most important fact that many people have ignored since the flag debate began is that the Liberal party stands for two flags whereas the Conservative party stands for one flag.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order and I will stand my ground to the end, because it is obvious that we are now victims of a filibuster that downgrades parliament. The hon. member is reading every word of his speech and he does not have the right to do that, because it is against the rules of the house. Therefore, I would ask you to watch him closely and you will notice that he is unable to take his eyes off his text a single second. Since he refuses to comply with the rules, I would ask you to order him to resume his seat.

[Text]

Mr. Winkler: If I might speak to that point, I think the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) should read the Prime Minister's code of ethics and maybe he would be a little more gentle in his approach to this matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, about the point of order raised by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler). I would like to know who are those gentlemen in the house; are they those who force this degrading filibuster on us or those who wish to encourage progress?

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. The point raised by the hon. member for Lotbinière is to some extent well taken. There are any number of citations to indicate that it is contrary to the rules to read speeches, but on the other hand a certain degree of leniency has been allowed in the course of this debate and I would suggest that that same leniency and generosity be extended to the hon. member for The Battlefords. At the same time I would ask him to try and make the Chair's task a little easier by not following his notes too closely.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to make your task difficult. At the same time I want to let it be known to the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) that in spite of all his interruptions I will continue to speak. The Liberal party advocates that those who want to show their respect to the commonwealth can fly the union jack—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I ask the co-operation of hon. members who seem to be exchanging remarks that are a little strong, across the aisle. I ask the co-operation of all concerned in order to allow the hon. member to continue his speech.

Mr. Winkler: I would ask you, sir, to ask the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) to contain himself.

Mr. McIlraith: And the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for The Battlefords.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party is in favour of two flags and are against those who want to keep something of their past and who want to fly the union jack. The Liberal party wants to break away from the past—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. The Chair has to voice an objection in connection with the hon. member's speech, not because he is referring to notes but because he is straying some distance away from the subject which we should be discussing, namely the amendment. I would ask him to restrict his remarks to the particular point mentioned in it, the plebiscite.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I am leading up to it but I hope I do not have to mention plebiscite in every sentence or every other sentence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No, but it should be mentioned once.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I have not been speaking for many minutes and I think I have mentioned it three times already. The word "distinctive" in the Liberal dictionary sometimes means camouflage of our history, our traditions and the flag which has been honoured by our forefathers who founded this nation. National unity in Canada cannot be achieved by diplomatic methods in which Mr. Pearson is the accomplished professional.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. The hon. member must know he cannot refer to another hon. member by his name, particularly in the case of the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Opposition who should be alluded to by their titles or official positions in the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. Could you suggest to the hon. member to take off his glasses for a minute so that we may know to what extent he is reading his speech?

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) on a point of order.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Horner) would supply Your Honour with a copy of his notes so that you might be able to determine in advance whether any of his speech is in order or not.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I think the government of today is acting in exactly the same manner as an ostrich which puts its head in the sand; what it cannot see it simply ignores. We in this party are opposed to two flags. We believe there is one Canada, one nation, and that there should be only one flag. Some of the Liberal members opposite are very pleased with the idea that a few Conservative members did not go along with our party, but soon they will find out how their colleagues will vote on the second resolution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Even if the Chair wants to be indulgent and co-operative with the hon. member I do not think he can be allowed to discuss the second resolution at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) who conducted a poll to see what his constituents thought about a plebiscite. I think it probably explains the feelings of the people in Quebec far better than do the hon. members opposite who represent people in Quebec. That poll showed that of the letters he received in answer to it some 216 favoured the plebiscite and 155 were against it. I wish hon. members opposite would get up and tell us why they think there should not be a plebiscite.

Mr. Cardiff: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I object to the interruptions which are coming from the other side of the house. That man over there does not know how much he has to know in order to know how little he knows.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): I could not agree more with the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cardiff) in his comments last night. He is one of the senior members of the house. He told us he has been here for 25 years and this was the worst parliament he had ever seen. I am sure there are many people in the house and throughout the country who agree with him.

When I was home a couple of weeks ago I had a talk with some of the people back there. I talked with one man in particular, an average, good, solid Canadian citizen who asked me, "Have you fellows nothing better to discuss than the flag?" I told him we had, but that it was the government which introduced legislation which we have to pass or oppose. He said, "Well, in that case you fellows are doing the right thing. I think the Prime Minister is a fairly clever man but I think he should know we would like to have a say on what flag we want." I went to a polling and I overheard a man saying to the returning officer: If they would just let us do this on the flag question we could settle it in a day. The deputy returning officer agreed with him, and I could not agree with him more.

I know that members opposite are annoyed because this debate is continuing. That is because it has aroused the people of this country. I should like to hear members opposite speak up. I should like to hear what the hon. members for the city of Halifax have to say about this. I should like to hear from the members who represent Newfoundland. I should like to hear from some of the members from Ontario, from those who represent Toronto ridings in this house. I should like to hear the views of the members who come from British Columbia, especially the opinions of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Groos). There is only one member on that side who has had the courage of his convictions, the courage to stand up and say what he thinks.

An hon. Member: What about Kootenay East?

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): Oh yes, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). He feels very badly because he had aspirations to become minister of labour. But since that failed he has taken to reading Beauchesne.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows the question before the house and he should relate his remarks to it.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): That is right, Mr. Speaker, but hon. members opposite are leading me away from it.

About ten days ago the Prime Minister was speaking to a federal convention in Saskatchewan and he told this convention we were going to have a flag. But I do not think he placed a time limit on it this time, October or Christmas. He said the government had prepared legislation dealing with agriculture.

Mr. Winkler: Where is it?

[Mr. Horner (The Battlefords).]

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): He made it known that we in the opposition were the ones who were obstructing this program. But we are interested in seeing this legislation, particularly if it affects eastern agriculture. If members opposite will agree to drop this subject and let us get on with these other important matters no one would be better pleased than ourselves. I know a flag is a symbol, but you cannot eat it and you cannot educate a family on it.

We are being very reasonable in asking for a plebiscite. We heard about a free vote in this house. What a joke. First, the Prime Minister said: We will have a free vote. But I suppose that after hearing the opinions of their supporters they found that the flag proposal was not likely to carry. So they said: You can still have a free vote, but if the government loses there will be an election. With an election gun at their heads, some of the members had to swallow themselves—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member restrict his remarks to the subject under discussion?

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): I am doing my best and I think I will get there but I believe hon. members opposite must be answered.

Other members, I know, have been reading articles in the course of their speeches. Here is one from the Sudbury Daily Star. It concerns a plebiscite and it states this under the heading "Fear Plebiscite on Flag?":

> There is a growing suspicion in the minds of Canadians that Prime Minister Pearson and his government supporters are now afraid to submit the "flag issue" to the people as a plebiscite—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member. Although he is correct in saying that a number of articles and editorials have been read into the record there is a distinction which has to be made somewhere, and I can assure him it is not easy to make that distinction. But the rules clearly prevent the reading of articles or editorials which comment on a debate which is actually going on in the house or which reflects on such a debate. The editorial which the hon. member has begun to read is, surely, in this category because the very first sentence clearly reflects on this particular debate. I think the hon. member would be out of order in reading it.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): This editorial was printed before the present debate started.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am afraid the learned author Beauchesne in his fourth edition does not make that distinction.

Mr. Pugh: Before you give a final ruling on that point, may I point out that there has been editorial comment here and there throughout Canada on this subject, and many speakers have read editorial comment into the record. I think the important thing to decide is not whether or not this article can be read into the record at the present time or whether it refers to the necessity for a plebiscite. Obviously the first words in this editorial do refer to a plebiscite, and with respect I feel Your Honour should take this article somewhat out of context and say that it is germane at the present time. In other words, if I may put it in another way, if the hon. member wishes to stand on his two feet and say, not for his own constituency but for other constituencies—if he referred to Sudbury—that as a result of reading an editorial he is led to believe that the people in that constituency do desire a plebiscite, he can do so. If Your Honour rules he cannot read the actual editorial, surely he may paraphrase the editorial and put its views before the house.

Mr. McIntosh: Further to the point of order, I would suggest that the word "plebiscite" coming in is incidental. Surely from time to time, ever since the question came up in this house, there has been talk about a plebiscite and it should not be out of order simply because the editorial has the word "plebiscite" in it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that the Chair is concerned with the rights of all hon. members and that in reaching decisions reference has to be made to the authorities, and some guidance obtained from them. If the hon. member would read May, Bourinot or Beauchesne he would know that this question has been dealt with on many occasions. Beauchesne, in citation 157, says it is out of order to read in a debate any extract which reflects on any proceedings before the house. In other words, if an editorial is directed at the very subject matter of a debate in the house, expressing an opinion, perhaps, for or against the way in which a debate is being carried on, it is the suggestion of the authors that this cannot be read because a debate should be the expression of hon. members' own views. I suggest the hon. member should bear this in mind.

I certainly would have no objection if he were to paraphrase the views of other people and make their views his own. But the rule is there, and it has to be respected.

Mr. McIntosh: Could he not agree with this editorial and then go ahead and read it?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That would be against the rules.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): In short, then, the government fears a plebiscite because when polls were taken in some of the larger cities it was found that the people wanted a plebiscite. They also found that in nine out of the ten provinces of Canada the large majority favoured the red ensign. The only province where the people favoured this other flag with the dead maple leaf on it was Quebec, and even there people were not 100 per cent in favour of it. I cannot understand why this matter has to take up so much of the time of the house—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): It was not even mentioned in the speech from the throne. It was not mentioned in the election campaign in the province of Quebec. Probably the Liberal party was running four different campaigns—one in Quebec, one in the maritimes, one in British Columbia—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: These remarks are not germane to the subject matter of the debate. Perhaps the hon. member will confine his remarks to the motion which was moved earlier.

Mr. Nasserden: With all due deference, Mr. Speaker, I believe they are germane. This is one of the reasons for advocating a plebiscite. It is because of the duplicity of the party opposite in the—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member for Rosthern would allow the hon. member for The Battlefords to make that argument.

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, I implore the Prime Minister of this country to use his good judgment in this connection and let this question be decided by a plebiscite. I ask him to let the people of this country decide. I for one will accept the flag for which the majority of the people of this country vote. I do not like to say too much against the proposed flag design because it might possibly be our flag some day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Horner (The Battlefords): Hon. members opposite applaud; but they are still afraid of the plebiscite. They have tried to ram this thing through parliament, with the worst possible diplomatic sense. I am surprised at our Prime Minister and hope he will retreat in this connection before it is too late.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Bow River.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fisher: Glad to see you back.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I hope the spirit that is supposed to govern us at this time of the year governs the debate tonight. I noticed that the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) welcomed me back. I was in that part of the country—may I say this in an introductory way—where there does not seem to be very much support for the New Democratic party. I think they had 3 per cent of the vote in my riding, and I do not believe it is going to increase next time. But I did not intend to get rude or personal. I had hoped that the spirit of the debate would be like the spirit of Christmas; and when I speak of spirit I do not refer to that which perhaps some people indulged in during the supper hour. I have not yet spoken one word in this debate on the flag.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: Somebody says "Oh", but the record will bear me out. I would like to say, let us make certain that we know the issue that is before the house right now. The question before the house is a motion to adopt the committee report and an amendment thereto as to whether we should have a plebiscite. You may rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that the remarks I have scribbled out on paper will be directed to that issue.

I might say that one reason I have not previously made a speech on the flag—and I trust I will receive the attention of the house—is because I am one of those—and perhaps I need some sympathy in this regard from some of my friends from French Quebec; I do not know—who has been steeped in British tradition. My family came to Alberta four generations ago and I was steeped in British tradition. When one is dealing with any kind of tradition, be it French tradition, British tradition, Ukrainian tradition or German tradition, he sometimes tends to speak with a certain degree of prejudice. It is for that reason that up to now I have refrained from making any remarks in this debate.

My first question is this. Why, as a member of the Conservative party, would I not vote tonight for the adoption of the report? I have given this matter serious thought, the people of my constituency of Bow River have given it serious thought and the people of western Canada have given it some serious thought. The reason I cannot, in all fairness with my conscience, vote for the adoption of the report tonight is the fact, and I say this with all seriousness, that if we are changing the flag we now have, surely the people of this country—and I am going to have something to say about that in a few moments—should be able to make known their views in this regard. We know what the Telepolls and the Gallup polls have said; we know that some 50 per cent of the people of this country would like to have a plebiscite. With that in mind, Mr. Speaker, I felt it my duty to speak tonight on a matter I have refrained from speaking on previously.

I would remind the house that we have now been sitting for 206 days. I would also remind the house that the debate on the flag last summer lasted only 20 days. There may be a place—and I am one of those who believe this—for a filibuster; but I do not believe that on such an emotional and important question as the flag itself and its symbols, which stand for liberty and freedom as we know it, or our traditions, 20 days of debate and the few days we have taken on this occasion is a real filibuster, when we have sat in parliament for 206 days. A message has been got across to the people of this country, as I found out when I was absent from the house. The hon. member for Port Arthur brought this to my attention. During the time I was absent from the house for a week I made four or five speeches in the province of Alberta and one in another province. We have been told that the people of this country believe this parliament has become a decadent institution because all we have discussed during the 206 days has been the matter of a flag. I felt, after listening to the message of the people, that it is time somebody set the thing in its proper perspective and pointed out that there has been no filibuster on the flag.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: They laugh, Mr. Speaker. One tenth of the time has been spent on this question. Can we call that a filibuster? I say, and I am not ashamed to say it, that there are great issues in this country and when they arise there is a place for a filibuster. I am not saying this is not the place.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Woolliams: I believe this is relevant, Mr. Speaker, because we have been charged with filibustering. Let us look for just a few moments at some of the things that have happened in the past. I draw this analogy. I recall that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill)—who is not in his place tonight; and I make nothing of that—said on one occasion in the debate on the question of class or kind that if he had to speak for 50 days, that legislation would never pass, and he was prepared to do it.

There are instances where a filibuster is probably necessary. We have heard the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), who tonight is absent and is generally leaning up against the wall making noises, talking about a filibuster and parliament. This makes me sick, because the house will recall that when his party split up like chickens that had left the sitting hen, and spread all over the place, he said they would filibuster parliament for 100 days until they were recognized as a party. These are the people who have been throwing the spearheads and the charges during the last few weeks. I do not know what I will be called after this speech, but I have been called a hawk, a spearhead and even a piledriver; and Mr. "Leakman" —no, I mean the member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) tonight in the Telegram accused me of being a Chinook wind.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has no right to refer to this as a leak, because he knows perfectly well that he was struck by the full force of the hose.

Mr. Woolliams: All I have to say to the hon. member is, what a hose. Coming back to the subject of a plebiscite, I would vote for the adoption of the report now, and so would many other western Canadians, if we were sure this was not a foot in the door for other things. I believe this is relevant, Mr. Speaker. We would vote for it if we were sure in western Canada that we were not going to destroy, first of all a strong central government in Canada, that we were not going to destroy next the Governor General, that we were not going to destroy next the crown and many of the other institutions and traditions for which we stand. I say this is relevant because the people of Canada want a plebiscite. I say that the government of this country have no mandate to implement a flag which the Canadian people do not want. That is why the Conservative party, a national party which has governed Canada equally in time with the Liberal party, demand tonight on the floor of this house a plebiscite. The Conservative party were backed by 59 per cent of the people and they are asking for a plebiscite. Since when are 59 per cent of the people to be ignored?

Mr. Winkler: It is 64 per cent.

Mr. Woolliams: Some hon. member says it is 64 per cent. Since when are they to be ignored? So in other words, not only have we a minority government, but a government which is in a minority on this issue as well.

Let me ask this question. I hear some of my hon. friends starting to holler across the way. They swell out their chests like farm roosters and say to themselves: Let the Liberals and Conservatives kill themselves off and everything will be great for us. We have been hearing that for 25 years, but those hon. members are still sitting in their small little groups making small little speeches.

Mr. Dupuis: Would the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly.

Mr. Dupuis: How does the hon. member know that the government is in a minority unless he permits the house to take a vote?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I have never seen genius until tonight. I will answer that now. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), their leader, went across this country talking about a distinctive flag. Did he ever describe to the people of Ontario or to the people of the maritimes that a distinctive flag would require the removal of the union jack?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Woolliams: I say that that is a minority view.

Mr. Dupuis: Do you want me to answer that question?

Mr. Danforth: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Make your own speech.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) has the floor.

Mr. Woolliams: I hear the Liberals yelling "Question", and so are those in the splinter parties, because we know they are working together at the present time; but as long as I have a voice in my body I will express the view of the people I represent. If hon. members opposite think that by asking simple, childish questions they are influencing anybody in the press tonight, they are not. As far as I am concerned they can get up and make their own speeches. I know that some of them are frightened to talk about a plebiscite. I know that the members from Ontario and the maritimes are more frightened of this issue than any which have faced this country for a long time. But it will never be said of this side of the house that the Conservatives do not fight. I am ready to fight as far as this issue is concerned, and I will not be silenced.

My hon. friend asked me a question and I shall ask him a question and answer it in my own way.

Mr. Dupuis: I can answer it too.

Mr. Woolliams: You can make your own speech later and I shall be most interested to hear it. My question is this: Will the vote of parliament speak for the people? My answer is simple. I say tonight that if I sat down and no other member spoke on this issue, whatever the result in this parliament the people of Canada have not spoken. Because of the discipline in their party and the discipline of their whip to get them to vote in a certain way, hon. members opposite are voting against their own constituents in order to keep the Liberal party together.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should address the Chair.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, because I turn away for a moment to speak to my hon. friends does not mean I have forgotten that you are there, believe me. Let me ask this question again: Will the vote of parliament speak for the people? I say no. There are many Canadians today who want to retain the red ensign.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On different occasions I have watched the Red Skelton show. Tonight I am seeing the best performance he has ever done.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria).]

Mr. Woolliams: Let me say this. I would rather have the dignity of Red Skelton than the hoodlumism of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette). I have watched him in his seat in this House of Commons and I say he does not do his constituents justice. He is neither dignified nor judicious in his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) raised a question of privilege which was obviously unacceptable to the Chair. I suggest to the hon. member that he should not retaliate.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that one should probably turn the other cheek but when an hon. member in the house will not stand to sing "God Save the Queen" I say he is not judicious and that he is not dignified.

Mr. Winkler: He is not a Canadian.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I feel I am justified in rising on a question of privilege.

I was just joking earlier and making fun of the hon. member who was ridiculous. Everybody thought he was ridiculous and was laughing at him.

Now, he has just made a rather unpleasant and spiteful remark. He said that I did not have the courage to rise when the "God Save the Queen" was sung. I think he is referring to the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Plourde) who remained seated when the "God Save the Queen" was sung.

Mr. Speaker, when any national anthem is sung, one must be courteous enough to rise. This is what I would have done had I been here on that occasion, even though I hope "O Canada" will officially become our national anthem.

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Plourde) kindly resume his seat. The hon. member has raised another question of privilege which is perhaps a little more justifiable than his first one. Although I do not think there is a real question of privilege involved perhaps the hon. member was justified to make the correction he did to the assertion made by the hon. member for Bow River. But it seems to me that we are not going in the right direction when we allow these questions of privilege and points of order to interrupt the hon. member who now has the floor; and I would ask the hon. member for Bow River to limit his remarks to the matter which is specifically before us at this time.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Now that the hon. member has had a chance to satisfy his conscience perhaps we can remain at ten o'clock and hear him sing "God Save the Queen" in this house to justify himself.

Now I ask the question: Where did the Prime Minister at any time during the last election define what he meant by distinctive?

Mr. Dupuis: Do you want an answer?

Mr. Woolliams: You listen and you will get one. I ask this question in all seriousness. It is very easy to use the word distinctive. If you use the expression "a distinctive Canadian flag" in Alberta it means one thing. But if you use the word distinctive in the province of Quebec it may mean another thing. Both places have a right to draw their inference in that regard. But when one is electioneering and says: "I promise to bring in a distinctive flag", then I think he owes the public a duty; and particularly when one is leader of a party he must assume responsibility and spell out what is meant by distinctive.

Therein lies the whole problem, Mr. Speaker. If this meaning had been spelled out, perhaps tonight members like me would not be so serious in asking for a plebiscite on this matter. We believe we should have a plebiscite on the matter because this meaning has not been spelled out. I am quite confident that the people in Toronto believed that when the Prime Minister referred to a distinctive flag he meant something of meaning to Canadians, that the symbol to be used was perhaps the fleur-de-lis or the union jack, but certainly something held dear to the hearts of Canadians and has stood for freedom and liberty, as well as Canadian traditions, as we know them. As long as we allow someone to suggest that that which is believed in by one province is the same thing believed in by every other province, we are failing and misleading the public. In this regard the government has no mandate whatsoever.

Other great leaders, most of them Liberals, have spelled out quite adequately what they meant. Right Hon. Mackenzie King, and Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, both Liberal prime ministers, never envisaged a flag for Canada without also envisaging the inclusion of symbols which led one to believe that we are part of French and British background. Further than that, the majority of Canadians have in their hearts a feeling of brotherhood and friendship for every race. On other occasions in this house I have said that many Canadians originated in Europe and other countries of the world, but came to Canada leaving their prejudices and hatreds in the countries they left. Whether they were Germans who hated the French, French who hated the British, or vice-versa, they came to Canada as a new land and were able to be friends over the back fence with their neighbours, regardless of their ethnic origin.

Many communities in western Canada are made up of Canadians of ethnic origins other than British and French, yet they have the right to speak in reference to the flag of Canada, just as do the French and the English Canadians. I have never been more serious in my life than I am now in suggesting that all Canadians at this time have a right to a voice through a plebiscite. At the risk of repeating something which has been said often during the last several days, I do not believe the government has a mandate in this regard, and should not force a flag, chosen by some means other than by the majority voice of Canadians, down the throats of Canadian citizens.

If the majority of Canadian people through a plebiscite choose the flag which was approved by the flag committee, I shall stand with as much dignity as any other Canadian when that flag is unfurled as the Canadian flag, as I would when any other flag was unfurled, including that flag which has been ours since confederation. However, because of the multiplicity of the effort now being made in respect of a distinctive Canadian flag, members of parliament do not have a mandate to vote here as they might feel they should, or vote because of political expediency, but must speak on behalf of the people they represent.

In that regard, Mr. Speaker, I feel sympathetic toward the people of French Canadian origin, and I must say they appear to have unanimity in what they do. However, I should like to ask them in all sincerity to remember that we can only build a united country by co-operation and unanimity. We can never thrust down each other's throat those things which are unacceptable. We must exercise tolerance and co-operation toward each other in our differences of opinion in order to unite this country and build a great nation, and we must perform those exercises of co-operation and tolerance in the selection of a flag of which we can all be proud.

Some hon. members will no doubt suggest that already a committee has studied this question and come to decision. That is not quite a completely true statement. I have before me three different flag designs. While I realize I am not permitted by the rules to display these designs in the house, I should like at this time to describe them. One design has a maple leaf with a red band on one side to the left with a union jack, and a red band to the right with a fleur-de-lis. I understand that design was turned down by the committee.

We have another design which embodies three maple leaves with a blue band to the left and right. When the committee voted on this design they decided, rather than turn it down, to retain it until they had made a choice between that design and the design embodying one maple leaf with a red band on the left and on the right. Finally the committee had to make a choice, and this choice was forced by a squeeze play. I do not intend to suggest any motives behind this situation but I do believe that the people in this country question seriously the motives behind this forced choice. In any event, the committee report refers to a design with one maple leaf with a red band to its left and right, as the committee's choice for a distinctive Canadian national flag. That is a false, wrong and completely incorrect statement of what occurred. The committee stated that it preferred that flag to the Pearson pennant which embodied the three maple leaves and the two blue band design. The committee did nothing more than choose the design now before us in favour of the Pearson suggestion.

The people are confused as to what decision the committee made and, if they are confused in that regard, surely they are confused as to any design selected by this parliament. Therefore, they are entitled to express their opinions through a plebiscite. One might ask what problem the committee did solve, and whether it was unanimous in its solution. Had the committee decided that the flag now before this house was the flag for Canada, over all designs submitted to it, that would be a different proposition and we would be out of order now in continuing this debate. That, however, is not the situation.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Let us be frank in our assessment of the decision made by the flag committee. When we were in government there were more Conservative members on committees than Liberal members, C.C.F. members, New Democratic members or Social Credit members. Of course, it is only in the last few years that there have been Social Credit members in this house at all, but that is neither here nor there. Committees are set up with the majority of members being members of the government party. That same situation prevailed in respect of this flag committee set up by this Liberal government. That committee decide by a majority vote exactly what the government intended. They really did not solve the problem with which they were faced.

I realize that some hon. members will say that we on this side asked that a committee be set up, but in answer to that suggestion I say that as long as a committee works in the way that committee did, while it performs a function, it is not performing the kind of function that was expected or asked for. The function we expected that committee to perform is not reflected in its report, which in effect states that the committee rubber-stamped a certain flag design. I am certain that no flag design was even considered until it had been approved, and I suggest that is the fact.

Most Canadians are thinking today of what Liberal spokesmen have said in the past in relation to their right to express an opinion in regard to something of this importance. In this regard I should like to quote—not from an editorial—what Jack Doupe said about this subject. What he has to say is an historical fact and I am sure it will not be disputed by any member. Mr. Doupe said:

> More typically Canadian, and more effective, than these private bills is the sort of event—of which there must have been countless others—that J. W. Pickersgill reports from the 1943 Quebec wartime conference in his account of the Mackenzie King papers:
> "Later that same afternoon, while walking in the Citadel grounds with one of his secretaries, Mackenzie King (Pickersgill quotes) 'saw the Canadian flag and the union jack flying side by side in the grounds.' "

This is what happened, and this is the opinion expressed apparently by the Minister of Transport, Mr. Pickersgill, who said he had arranged this the day before. He is supposed to have said:

> "I had been put out when I saw the union jack and Canadian flags flying one beneath the other—the Canadian flag beneath the union jack, the day that Churchill arrived." He had subsequently spoken to Churchill about flying the three flags side by side and had then given directions that this should be done. "I can now say," he wrote, "that this was done with agreement between the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the Prime Minister of Canada." He added that both of them agreed that "the Canadian flag should come in the centre".

On that occasion he approved the flag which was approved by order in council. I say that Canadians are entitled to express their viewpoint. When the leader of the Liberals went out electioneering in Ontario he described a distinctive flag, and he described the kind of flag that would contain some of the elements of the Canadian ensign, particularly the union jack. I am sure that to be fair with the French Canadians, and I want to be fair, when he spoke about a distinctive flag in Quebec he left the impression that the union jack would be off that flag. I say that is the kind of impression, that is the kind of attitude which disunites this country and does not unify us.

I suppose we always quote from those people in other parties whom we respect. What about Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, what did he say? This is what he said when dealing with this subject. He had great influence in Canada and I am sure no one would deny that fact in this house, particularly those who come from Quebec. He was steeped in French culture, understood their problems and understood the province and its relation to the rest of the country. I do not know of any leader in my time who had more respect from the country. This is what he said and these words are as true tonight as they were then when he uttered them.

We hear the uproar when one of us raises his voice with regard to our flag. There is no unity in this parliament on this subject. There is a sham unity in the Liberal party. I say this, if you fellows would get up and speak your mind, you might possibly say something about what goes on in your caucus. This is what right hon. Mr. St. Laurent, a former prime minister said, that as long as a new flag divided Canadians rather than uniting them there should be no change in the flag. I endorse that stand tonight. I would say that 70 per cent of the people in the riding of Bow River and the people of western Canada endorse that stand. I think they are entitled to express their views by means of a plebiscite.

Mr. Choquette: When did he say that?

Mr. Woolliams: My friend does not know when he said anything because all he does is mumble from his seat. He never makes a speech in this house that is worth while, and I am tired of that kind of hoodlumism.

I say that this matter should be put to a vote for another reason. Many of us in parliament are more serious than we have ever been before with regard to national unity and confederation. People in western Canada were asleep on this subject, and perhaps in other parts of Canada as well. They are awake today, and they are worried. I say that the responsibility for the delay in this House of Commons rests with the Liberal government because they are the ones who brought in this problem at a time when there is sensitivity about confederation, when every Canadian—French Canadian, English Canadian and every other Canadian—wanted to unify this country, to keep this country together as it was created in 1867. We realize that French Canada and English Canada were one at the time of confederation and then they brought in one province from the maritimes. Canada then grew to ten provinces. We are only going to keep confederation healthy when we take the kind of responsible action that does not erode confederation, particularly at a time when there appears to be some sensitivity about it. This sensitivity has been aggravated because of the political expediency of those people who would like to put in their pocket one group of votes.

I ask this question: How much can the bosom of a nation stand? This is not unifying this country. How much can we stand at this time?

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Woolliams: Let me just have one word about the committee itself. My friend has said "Carried" again. Again, I say to him that is the kind of nonsense we hear. This is the place where free speech is made possible. When we cease to have free speech—

Mr. McIlraith: Let us have a vote.

Mr. Woolliams: I know the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) will be fair. He knows that when he sat in opposition they debated issues on many occasions to the extent that there appeared to be a filibuster.

Mr. McIlraith: We always let them come to a vote.

Mr. Woolliams: I think he stood on his rights and had a sense of responsibility, and I suggest to him that I stand on my rights tonight with that same sense of responsibility.

Mr. McIlraith: Will the hon. member permit a question? Will he not agree that other members in parliament have a right, after a full debate, to have the question put to a vote?

Mr. Woolliams: My answer to that, Mr. Speaker, is very simple. I am glad my good friend asked that question. If I thought tonight that the members who sit on the Liberal side of this house spoke for the people of Canada, we should have a vote now. However, they do not speak for the people of Canada. The hon. member for Ottawa West knows as well as I do that when the Prime Minister spoke of a free vote, he put a gun right at their ears. He said look, if you have a free vote we will shoot your brains out because we will have an election. Is that the kind of mandate the Liberals got from the people? I say to him that is not the kind of responsibility which I know the member for Ottawa West believes we should have so far as members of parliament are concerned. I believe that question was only asked to try to put me off the rail.

I have one more point to make. Why do I say the report of the committee should be examined? I say this in all sincerity and with all the good will that can be mustered in this House of Commons; there was a committee set up and that committee was supposed to be working either in camera or in confidence. There are two kinds of committees. If a committee sits in camera, anything that goes on in that committee must not be told while the committee is sitting. Then there is the kind of committee that is confidential. Anything that goes on in that committee cannot be disclosed. One member of the Liberal party gave an article to a newspaper in this country and leaked all the information from this committee. I am not so sure it was not done deliberately, because I am not so sure this member may not have been dancing to the tune of others. I say this to you, if he knew his responsibilities, having leaked information from a committee sitting in camera or a confidential committee, he should stand in his place tonight and resign. He thought I had forgotten this issue, but that is what he should do.

Some hon. Members: Resign, resign.

Mr. Deachman: I rise on a point of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker. On the morning of October 30, which was a Friday morning, I came into this house and at the opening of business I asked if the house wished to send me to the committee on privileges and elections. It was pointed out specifically to the house that if any member had a charge to lay at that time that member should lay a charge. I watched while the hon. member sat in his seat, just as he is sitting now, with a handful of charges in his hand, ready to rise. However, for some reason or other he could not do so. His pants were nailed to his seat. The opportunity was given to him, but he did not rise, he did not squeak—

Mr. Woolliams: I may squeak but I do not leak.

Mr. Deachman: I am not finished with my point of order and I have the floor.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I do not think this is a question of privilege at all and I do not intend to yield the floor.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. This is one battle that the Speaker is bound to win. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) is entitled to make a statement. He has made a statement and I think we have all heard it. I would hope, in view of the fact that the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) has only three or four minutes remaining, he would use them very usefully.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any three or four minutes in the past I have used so usefully because I say this man usurped his responsibility. That is my answer in that regard.

Mr. Deachman: On a question of personal privilege—

Mr. Speaker: There is one way to settle the dispute. If any member wishes to charge another and he is quite serious about it, let him move a motion.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect to you, if we were to move motions every time we wished to criticize the actions of hon. members opposite we would have nothing but motions in the house. But I would say in this matter that his own secretary was typing that very article days before it was published.

Mr. Deachman: With respect, Mr. Speaker, this matter was ruled upon by Your Honour. Your Honour will no doubt recall that the hon. gentleman had ample time on that occasion to rise and make his speech—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This line of talk is getting nobody anywhere and I have pointed out the proper procedure to follow. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra has made his statement and I think the hon. member for Bow River is entitled to four minutes extra, if he desires them, on account of the interruptions.

Mr. Woolliams: I must confess, Mr. Speaker, you are always more gracious than I appear to be, and I appreciate your courtesy in this regard. In summary I would say there was never a true mandate given so far as the flag is concerned, and the Canadian people are entitled to a plebiscite. When we hear it said, "Let parliament speak" I am afraid of that because it will speak for only a minority of the people, not because this is a minority government but because hon. members opposite will be speaking for a minority of people in their ridings.

I would ask hon. members to give this serious thought because the Conservative party can only fight this so long. The red ensign may come down on every flagpole in Canada. I would like to be standing in some of the ridings with certain hon. members when that happens. Now I want to end with a little poem.

Mr. Knowles: Author?

Mr. Woolliams: The author is Eldon Woolliams. It is only four lines but I wrote it in all seriousness:

God and the soldier all men adore
In time of trouble—and no more,
For when war is over, and all things righted,
God is neglected—and the old soldier slighted.

Remember that under our flag the liberty and freedom of this country were fought for and maintained by men who gave their lives, and by some who are still with us today and who gave their health.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a small contribution to the debate. I have been somewhat confused by the use which the official opposition makes of the results of Telepoll in connection with the idea of having a plebiscite. I am rather bothered by it because it was only a week or two ago that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), their house leader, was raising questions with regard to this particular program and the questions that it asked.

It is quite true that a week ago Sunday this program reported that it had asked some 1,100 people in major cities across the country whether they would like to have a chance to vote on the flag, in other words a plebiscite, and a majority said they would.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fisher: I am very pleased hon. members have that much confidence in Telepoll and its surveys, because I do not have that much. Hon. members may wonder why. Just a week before that Telepoll conducted a survey in which it reviewed parliamentary troubles and the fact that we seem to be having difficulties with parliament. It gave the case for Mr. Pearson and the case for Mr. Diefenbaker and then asked this question, "Whose side are you on, Mr. Pearson's or Mr. Diefenbaker's?" Hon. members on the Conservative side should remember that the results were much stronger for Mr. Pearson than they were for Mr. Diefenbaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fisher: I suggest that the great faith they put in Telepoll indications in favour of a plebiscite should be immensely weakened, unless they are prepared to accept the result of the poll of the previous week which indicated that the Canadian people are overwhelmingly on the side of the Prime Minister and are overwhelmingly against the Leader of the Opposition in so far as their attitude to parliament is concerned. I just felt I should draw this to the attention of hon. members, since so many of them have used this argument in favour of a plebiscite.

The other point I want to talk about is that a number of hon. gentlemen have tended to speak as veterans and legionnaires and the last hon. gentleman who spoke suggested that by voting for a new flag and having the red ensign come down we would in a sense be doing a disservice and acting disgracefully to the memory of legionnaires and veterans. I do not think that those of us who want a new flag should stand up and pound our chests about the fact that we served during the war, but I would like to tell members of the official opposition that a great many people who belong to the Canadian Legion do not accept the Legion's stand for the red ensign. I am one of them. I can tell hon. members of one Legion post in my riding which has 127 members. The secretary tried to get up a petition to support the Legion's stand on the red ensign but he could only get 26 signatures out of a membership of 127.

I want to make it very clear to members of the official opposition that I think they are being extremely unfair in wrapping themselves in a patriotic and chauvinistic sort of label in this whole question about the flag. We happen to feel, whether we are veterans or not, that we owe no apology to anyone in suggesting a new flag.

I want to touch on another point made by the official opposition which says that in rejecting the red ensign we would somehow be rejecting Christianity. Our friends to the south happen to feel they have a Christian country but I do not think they are going to suggest that the stars and stripes are Christian symbols. I have always felt that stars were the symbol of communist Russia or Mohammedans. If you look at all the national flags in the world, it is remarkable how few Christian countries, or countries which claim to be Christian, have Christian symbols on their flags. I think it is an extremely retrograde argument to suggest that those of us who are in favour of a new flag are willing to turn our backs on our whole Christian heritage.

I should like to suggest that speakers for the opposition have made their point and presented their arguments time and time again. After 29 days, do they not feel they should let us have our chance to vote on this question? We have sat here patiently, the majority of us, listening to them. Now give us an opportunity to vote on the question before the house. If they want to make this stand, they can do so. The previous speaker was proud to point out that he was a member of a major party. Well, I say this to hon. members to my right: You are a major party; this is a decision to be made by parliament; go to the people at the next election on the flag issue; say "If we are elected we shall bring back the red ensign". You can do that. You are a major party. You have a great leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fisher: An election will come sooner or later and that is your opportunity. You may come back here with a majority and bring the red ensign back and throw out this un-Christian thing the rest of us want. I suggest you consider that, instead of holding up the majority of the members of this house and so many members of your own party who would like to get on with other things.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member accept a question? I should like to ask him which flag he was willing to accept six months ago?

Mr. Fisher: The flag which was the choice of either the government or the committee which considered it.

Mr. Churchill: There was no parliamentary committee six months ago.

Mr. Fisher: I know, but there was a government which undertook to bring in a distinctive national flag. They brought one in and I would have been in favour of it.

Mr. Churchill: I take it then that the hon. member is prepared to accept any flag which the present government may bring in?

Mr. Fisher: Yes, I am quite prepared to accept any flag which the present government brings in, because the present government has the responsibility; and our responsibility is to vote on their proposal, not to delay endlessly and forever.

Mr. Webb: I should like to ask the hon. member a question. Would he tell the house which flag the Royal Canadian Legion has accepted as its flag?

Mr. Fisher: My understanding is that the Royal Canadian Legion wants the red ensign as the Canadian flag. If the hon. member is referring to the allusion I made to a particular branch of the Legion, the executive of this branch thought it would reinforce the dominion command by getting a petition from all its members. And all it could get was 26 out of 127.

Mr. Webb: I was speaking of the Legion as a whole.

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): After listening to two of the more leather lunged members of the House of Commons I am sure you will think, Mr. Speaker, that anything I have to say is like the calm after the storm.

One of the reasons I am speaking on this question tonight is that I wish to comment on a statement made by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) when he told us he was willing to accept any flag which the government might introduce. My contention is that this government has no mandate to bring in a flag for Canada, neither has this parliament. I agree the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) promised a new flag for the Canadian people, provided he was elected as head of the government party. It may be this was one of the reasons he was denied the majority he had sought in the last election. However, neither in his talks to the electorate nor in other public statements did he say he intended to remove completely the symbols of our heritage from the flag, or cut out all vestige of our founding races. I do not believe the government is capable of deciding on a flag which will represent this nation until the end of time.

I should like to read from Quebec L'Action. This is what it had to say about the government's action in this regard:

The confusion of our era, the complexity of situations and the flood of problems require strong governments everywhere. The confusion of the ordinary citizen can only be handled by governments that know where they are going. For months and months, Canada has had the weakest government since confederation.

There is a great deal more along these lines but I wish to confine myself to the subject before us, so I shall not quote further. The actions of the government so far bear out what this article says. First, the party opposite put forward a flag consisting of three leaves on a white background. Eventually they dropped this because it did not have the support of one of the larger minor parties. This was the flag to end all flags. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) who was one of the designers, I understand, got up and told us what a wonderful flag it was. Now he is just as sure that the white flag with the red borders and the maple leaf in the centre is the flag which will fill the bill. So I do not think there is any doubt the government is incapable of presenting a new flag which will represent this nation.

As a matter of fact, government supporters, and particularly members of the government on the front benches, have never given any satisfactory reason for the adoption of a new flag in the first place. In this regard, the Toronto Telegram had this to say:

The Canadian ensign must not be lowered without the consent of the people. The voice of the people can be heard on this issue only through a national plebiscite. Here is a matter which touches the hearts—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. Perhaps I should have brought this to the attention of one or two of the previous speakers. The hon. member will understand there is nothing personal involved, but it is my duty to call the attention of the house to citation 157 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, subsection (6). Perhaps I should read this.

On the 17th March, 1933, a member quoting a newspaper in debate was ruled out of order by the Deputy Speaker who said: "The rule is quite clear, that the quoting of a newspaper, an author or a book which reflects upon debate before the house, either directly or indirectly is entirely out of order, because members are here to give their own opinion and not to quote the opinion of others. . . .Members may quote an article or a book stating facts, but a commentary on any proceeding or any discussion in the house, with the object of swinging an opinion to one side or the other, is out of order."

In view of what is said in this citation and in several others which could easily be quoted, I conclude it is not in order to quote editorials or articles which would tend to influence a debate one way or the other. Hon. members are called upon to give their own opinions.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. There were only a couple of lines left.

The fact of the matter is that this is far too important a matter to be settled by parliamentary compromise. There might be some sense in having parliament settle the question if there were a possibility of compromise, but this house has shown it is not prepared to compromise in order to settle this matter. No compromise can be reached because the government refuses to make concessions. Compromise means meeting half way or coming to terms by giving up part of a claim. But there is nothing to show that the government was even prepared to give a little, in connection with the stand of the official opposition, in order to reach a compromise on this question. I refer to the situation in the house and in the committee; they were not prepared to compromise. On the other hand, I have not yet heard a supporter of the present proud flag who was not prepared to accept some compromise on it. The only way you can reach a compromise is to have co-operation on both sides, and if one refuses to compromise then compromise is impossible. This, Mr. Speaker, is the situation in this parliament.

The flag was considered by the committee. That committee was chaired by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten), a man for whom all members of the house have a great deal of respect, and I share that respect. I wish I could say the same in regard to some of his colleagues on that committee, but unfortunately I cannot do so. I cannot do so because the committee report showed that there was no attempt on the part of the government members on that committee to compromise, to meet half way the views of those representing the official opposition. I would point out to you, sir, that the official opposition, as of the last election, represents 2½ million Canadian people. Are we going to deny the right of 2½ million people to have some say in what is going to be on their flag? I leave that for individual members to think about for themselves.

There were several reasons, of course, why the committee failed. I believe one of the reasons was that it came too late, after positions had hardened in the house. We had asked for a committee at the beginning and I believe that had this been brought about before all the parties had hardened in their positions we could possibly—and just possibly—have come up with a compromise flag that would have satisfied all Canada. But there were other considerations in the committee. The committee studied over 2,000 new designs. They were given a deadline by the Prime Minister; they were pressed for time. Any hon. member who has sat on a committee faced with a great volume of work coming across the committee desks knows that you cannot do a proper job if you are pressed to get it done by a certain time. I think that had the committee, even this committee, had time to sit until, say, next spring they could even at this late date have brought in some kind of a flag that may have been acceptable.

This brings to mind the question, why this unseemly rush to foist a new flag on the nation? Why is it given the highest priority in government business at this particular time? This is something members of the official opposition just cannot understand, particularly when we should be concentrating on measures to assist our national well-being rather than debating issues that are going to divide our nation. If the Prime Minister had been well advised I think he would have followed the example of another illustrious Liberal prime minister, William Lyon Mackenzie King. Mr. King carefully avoided any attempt to foist a flag on a country that is initially divided not only racially but linguistically and culturally. Mr. King declined to have debate on this sort of issue because he knew how divisive it would be. He knew that bringing such a matter before parliament could only divide the nation. There was another Liberal prime minister who had sense enough not to bring a new flag design into the House of Commons, whether it was going to be decided by a plebiscite or not. He was smart enough to know that if he brought this divisive problem into the House of Commons it would do the nation no good. Unfortunately the present Prime Minister has ignored these gentlemen who so ably led his party for so many years. This is the tragedy of the present Prime Minister.

We hear from government members, particularly members of the cabinet, when they are touring the country that the official opposition are obstructing the work of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I get some agreement from over there, Mr. Speaker, which indicates that they have all been deluded into thinking that we are obstructing the country's business. But let me point out to hon. members something they should know already, namely that the government decides the priority of business for parliament.

Mr. Winkler: They are supposed to.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): They initiated this issue of the flag and introduced the debate at this time, in spite of the fact that they had no mandate to do so.

Mr. Winkler: At the expense of the poor eastern farmers, as well.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): They did it at the expense of getting something done for the poor eastern farmers; and that includes the constituency of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) who represents, I understand, a number of those Quebec farmers who would like to have federal assistance.

Mr. Winkler: Where is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays)?

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): In their stubborn insistence, government members want the flag resolution adopted even before they find out whether the majority of Canadians want a new flag. They want this flag for Christmas. I think it would help the country a great deal if somebody whipped up one of these new flags, hung it on the Christmas tree for the Prime Minister and let him have it for Christmas.

Mr. Winkler: Hang the whole government as well.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): But let us not have people running around this country telling other people that we are obstructing the work of parliament, when the man who can take off the flag priority and bring in legislation for the good of this country is the Prime Minister, who should be sitting over in his seat right now and is not there. I am referring to the leader of the Liberal party.

The government says the flag is more important than the labour code.

Mr. Winkler: No respect for Canada.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): That it is more important than the new pension scheme.

Mr. Winkler: No respect for the old people.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): That it is more important than legislation to help the farmers.

Mr. Winkler: No respect for the farmers; that is true.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): No respect for anyone. Actually there is a growing suspicion, not only in this house but across the country—

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): —that the government is mortally afraid of a referendum on the flag issue. I will let the hon. member speak later; he can make a half hour speech. There is a growing suspicion as I say, particularly in view of the recent poll, that the government is much afraid of a referendum on the flag issue because it knows that a great many people would vote to retain our flag in its present form, or at least some modified version of it. The government is afraid, because it has ignored the Canadian way of settling differences. Because we are of different races does not mean we are a melting pot in the sense that we consider our American cousins are. We must settle our differences by compromise because we have to live together and respect each other's wishes. But the government wants to present the Canadian people with an accomplished fact. The government hopes that by giving the Canadian people an accomplished fact now it will be forgotten when the next election is held. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that it is underestimating the great regard in which this flag is held in the hearts of millions of our people.

Mr. Winkler: History will prove that.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): On an earlier occasion when speaking on this issue I asked the Prime Minister to give consideration to withdrawing the resolution until such time as the people of Canada could voice their opinion on the flag issue. I think it is only fair to ask the same question again. Let us bend all our efforts to bring unity to our country before the one hundredth anniversary of its confederation, and having achieved that unity we will have something to symbolize. Perhaps on that momentous occasion we will be able to raise a new Canadian flag brought about by compromise, and the wisdom of the people of our nation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I must say I have no apologies for entering the debate at this time. The Conservative party represents at least one third of the voters of Canada, as at the last election. There has been no disposition on the part of the government to take into consideration the views of this large segment of the Canadian people. No compromise has been offered. In fact a compromise of the views represented in parliament has been rejected both in the house and in the committee. We in the official opposition feel that it is in direct contradiction to our national concept of democratic rights. Completely ignoring the views of any minority is repugnant to us. To ignore the views of a large segment of our population on a matter as important as the flag is nothing less than scandalous. Once again I ask the Prime Minister to withdraw his flag resolution, in the interests of national unity, until the people of Canada have indicated their wishes in this matter.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the raucous applause which greets me from the other side of the house and which pays tribute to me. This is only the second time I have risen in a good many months during which the flag debate has been before the committee and the house. Therefore I think I have some reason for speaking on the matter at this time. There are many aspects of the flag question on which I should like to speak, and I think I can speak with some force and perhaps spirit. But having read your rulings, Mr. Speaker, and knowing that we have an amendment before the house which calls for a plebiscite, so far as it lies within one Irishman to follow the rules of relevancy strictly and to deal strictly with the legality of this amendment I intend to speak only about the plebiscite, which I am sure will be a relief to you, sir, and possibly to others as well.

The first suggestion I would make in the few minutes remaining to me tonight is this. If the government or if parliament had decided to hold a plebiscite, the debate which has been going on for a long while now would have been relatively short. Much as many of us may disapprove of the design of the flag, much as many of us, and I particularly, disapprove of any change to a flag which has been recognized as the flag of this country for many years, we would have been prepared to accept the judgment of the Canadian people had the matter been submitted to them, and had there been an affirmative vote one way or the other as to the design of a flag. That of course has not been permitted, which is one of the main grievances of the official opposition, and I think one of the main grievances of the Canadian people. They are disturbed over the way this matter has been dealt with. If the people had been given the chance to speak and the matter had been referred to the Canadian public and a verdict arrived at, we would not be sitting here tonight debating the flag. Reluctant as some of us may have been to accept that decision, we would have accepted the decision of the majority of the Canadian people.

We are now charged with delay, with filibustering, and so on and so forth. There are two answers regarding whether there has been delay; and undoubtedly there has been a protracted debate. The first answer, which was referred to by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat and I am sure it has also been mentioned many times—one cannot help speaking in this debate without referring to the arguments advanced by other speakers—is that this is an emotional matter, as everyone in this house realizes, and because of the feelings of one's own constituents one has to speak and express one's views.

But this flag issue should never have been brought into parliament at this time. There is no reason in the world why, in the middle of a legislative program which had been outlined to us, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) should throw in this flag issue, just as though he had thrown the overalls into Mrs. Murphy's chowder—and it has created almost as bad a smell. That is one reason for this protracted debate at this time.

Having brought in this issue, disrupted parliament without any authority or mandate and, I say kindly, without any judgment, we have had this issue thrown at us by this government; yet when we ask that the Canadian people be given a chance to express an opinion, we are denied that request, at least up to now. I would judge from the way in which hon. members opposite treat this amendment, that it is their intention to vote it down, so that we will have no plebiscite granted to the Canadian people on this matter.

Those are two reasons for this long debate and delay. If this plebiscite had been accepted I am sure the prolonged debate would not have taken place, but that the issue could have been decided within a few days rather than in as many weeks. Under those circumstances the responsibility for any delay which may have occurred rests squarely on the shoulders of members opposite, and particularly on the shoulders of the right hon. Prime Minister, who has projected this flag debate at this time, disrupting the whole procedure of Canadian parliament. This is a highly emotional issue which has disrupted the nation and created difficulty for each and every one of us in our constituencies and in our own hearts and minds. We have been asked to deal with this issue in short order and produce a flag by Christmas. The people of Canada do not appreciate having a flag rammed down their throats in the way in which this matter has been handled.

We have been given reasons why a plebiscite cannot be held. We have been told that in the first place a plebiscite is contrary to Canadian practice and procedure. Some of us here, and certainly one or two members opposite, yesterday took part in the Ottawa civic elections as ratepayers and voters. What did we vote for at that time? We voted for individuals, and also as to whether there should be fluoridation. Surely that was a referendum, and is a referendum not a form of a plebiscite? We also voted as to whether or not there should be Sunday sports. Was that not a plebiscite? We are told that a plebiscite is contrary to Canadian practice. That is nonsense, when right here in this city gentlemen on that side as well as on this side took part in a referendum or plebiscite—call it what you will. There is no basis for the suggestion that a plebiscite is contrary to Canadian practice.

We are told that we cannot depart from accepted practice; but what is this government doing? It is departing from accepted practice in every piece of legislation it proposes. What is co-operative federalism except departure from an accepted practice? What about the various other matters which have been brought before this house? Certainly to some extent they have been departures from ordinary practice. Surely pension bill No. 1, No. 2, No. 3 and, I suppose, No. 4, if that is a matter still on the back burner, are departures from the accepted practice of this parliament. I suggest there is absolutely no justification for the argument that we cannot hold a plebiscite because it is contrary to the ordinary and conventional practice of this country.

We have also been told that a plebiscite would be disruptive of national unity. National unity is something very near to the minds and hearts I am sure of all members of this house. I wonder whether one promotes national unity by injecting a highly emotional and disruptive issue of this kind at this time and in this manner into the business of parliament, while at the same time suggesting that by holding a plebiscite the national unity would be disrupted. This is being done at a time when members of this house do not have the authority or a mandate to decide that such and such a flag shall be adopted as the national flag of Canada. Surely that method of procedure is not conducive to the attainment of national unity. Any suggestion in that vein is sheer nonsense.

Regardless of the merits of a referendum, no one can tell me that if the Canadian people are consulted and allowed to make a decision on an issue of this kind it is going to be disruptive of national unity. Certainly a decision made by a group of men sitting on the treasury benches, accepted by the majority of a house of minorities, is not the way to achieve national unity. One does not achieve national unity by ramming something such as a flag down the throats of the Canadian public. That is the attitude taken by the government, and that is all that can be said for it.

Since there is to be no plebiscite and the Canadian people are not to be consulted, I wonder where this flag is to be flown. It will be flown over the peace tower, of course, when and if it is authorized by the parliament of Canada. My friends to my left in the N.D.P. section of the house have said that Conservatives are beginning to adopt Mr. Mackenzie King as one of their patron saints. I would not go that far, but it was Mr. Mackenzie King who, by his order in council, said that the flag which is flown today over the peace tower is to be the flag of Canada until it is changed by a decision of the parliament of Canada. The flag to be flown after such a decision is not the flag chosen by this house, but a flag chosen by this house and by the members of that other place. I do not know by what legerdemain this proposed white flag will fly by Christmas. However, when it does fly, if ever, it will fly over public buildings in Canada, but where else? Will it fly in Newfoundland or will the union jack fly there? Will it fly in Quebec?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Nowlan: I hear some hon. members say "yes". I can tell you, sir, that it will not fly universally in the maritime provinces, nor will it fly universally across Canada generally, because it will not be the adopted flag of the Canadian people. We will set back Canadian acceptance of a Canadian flag by at least 25 years as a result of the way in which this government has dealt with the matter, jamming it down the throats of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may ask the house leader a question? I am wondering for obvious reasons whether the government will consider asking this house to set aside tomorrow and perhaps the next day to deal with the Canada labour code?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I hope that tomorrow we can proceed to a consideration of the Canada labour code legislation at the conclusion of the flag debate.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, December 9, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BALCER—REQUEST FOR CLOSURE TO END FLAG DEBATE

[Translation]

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. For weeks, and even months, the House of Commons has been witnessing an unparalleled debate which is completely paralysing the business of this house and transforming it into a debating society where it is impossible to reach any decision whatsoever. Freedom of speech must be respected, but we should not act in such a way that this house be deprived of its main duty, which consists in making decisions.

That is why I deem that in this discussion on the flag the whole gamut of opinions has been heard, and should we extend it any further we would but prejudice the rights of parliament and the higher interests of our country.

Therefore, I believe that it is my duty to rise on a question of privilege and invite the Prime Minister, or one of his ministers, to give notice that he will make use of standing order 33 to have this question settled without further delay by applying the rule of closure.

[Text]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was not speaking with the authority of this party.

MR. DEACHMAN—REMARK IN DEBATE BY MEMBER FOR BOW RIVER

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. As reported in Hansard for Tuesday, December 8, at page 10956 the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) said these words:

> Well, Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect to you, if we were to move motions every time we wished to criticize the actions of hon. members opposite we would have nothing but motions in the house.

Then he went on to make the following specific statement with respect to myself:

> But I would say in this matter that his own secretary—

That is, my secretary:

> —was typing that very article days before it was published.

This refers to the article over my by-line in the Citizen of October 29. This is false; there is not a shred of evidence for it. I am quite sure that my secretary, if she had to, would give affidavits to that effect.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deachman: Sir, I ask that this statement be retracted. It is a false statement and I cannot let it stand on the record. It imputes things to me that I do not want remaining on the record, and it is completely false, without a shred of evidence. I ask that the hon. gentleman in all honesty retract the statement, which he cannot substantiate in this house.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Well, Mr. Speaker, all I can say in answer to a phony question of privilege is that there has been another leak.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker. I request a retraction and I appeal to you for a retraction of this statement, which is not a fact but an outright falsehood.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: You had better lay a charge.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would like to call to the attention of hon. members in the house citation 145 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which says:

> It has been formally ruled by Speakers in the Canadian Commons that a statement by an honourable member respecting himself and peculiarly within his own knowledge must be accepted, but it is not unparliamentary to temperately criticize statements made by a member as being contrary to the facts; but no imputation of intentional falsehood is permissible. A statement made by a member in his place, is considered as made upon honour and cannot be questioned in the house or out of it.

Various references are quoted in that citation. In view of the statement by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra I suggest to hon. members that we follow the direction suggested by Beauchesne, namely that his statement should be accepted. If any hon. member does not care to accept that statement, then another proceeding is open to him. That proceeding is to move a motion on his own responsibility.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no point of order.

Mr. Pugh: Yes, there is. On a point of order, this statement was made yesterday in the House of Commons. The hon. gentleman who rose just now on a question of privilege should have risen at that time. Obviously he was a little confused in his mind as to whether he had done it. He should have risen at that time and protested. A question of privilege certainly cannot arise at this hour, one day later.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the hon. member has a good question of privilege and has risen at the first available opportunity. Any hon. member is entitled to review what has been recorded in Hansard.

Mr. Bell: He was here last night.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that the matter has been satisfactorily settled.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deachman: With respect, Mr. Speaker, the statement made in this house is false. I have asked for a retraction of what is a false statement. By affidavit—and I could bring a bushel of affidavits—I could prove that this statement is false. I do not want a false statement standing against my name on the record of the House of Commons, and with all respect I ask the hon. gentleman to retract his statement, as I think any hon. gentleman in this house should, having made a statement of that kind.

Mr. Speaker: Might I suggest this to the hon. member for Bow River. There was much heat in the discussion last evening. I happened to be in the Chair at the time, and perhaps it was because I was in the Chair that we had such a heated discussion; I do not know. But I suggest to the hon. member that in the circumstances he should, as according to the authorities he must, take the word of the hon. member with respect to the sentences complained of.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I have always appreciated the gracious manner in which you have regulated the procedure of this house, but I have no hesitation whatever in staying with the remarks I made last evening.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know what are the courses now open to me respecting this false statement, which stands on the record and for which the hon. gentleman intends to make no apology whatever.

Mr. Speaker: I think I have heard enough from two hon. members at least to pose a question which I should like to study in light of the authorities, so I will take the matter under advisement and try to bring in a decision as quickly as possible.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CHANGES IN COMMITTEE PERSONNEL—MOTION TO PROCEED TO ORDERS OF THE DAY

Mr. J. E. Walker (York Centre) moved:

That the names of Messrs. Woolliams, Fairweather, Nugent, Rhéaume, Simpson, Hales, Munro, Rideout, Byrne, Brewin and Martin (Timmins) be substituted for those of Messrs. Grafftey, Irvine, Millar, Muir (Lisgar), Noble, Stenson, Foy, Laverdière, Habel, Orlikow and Knowles on the standing committee on industrial relations.

That the names of Messrs. Howe (Wellington-Huron), Rideout and Leboe be substituted for those of Messrs. Paul, Klein, and Marcoux on the special joint committee on the Canada pension plan.

That the names of Messrs. Leduc and Cyr be substituted for those of Messrs. Laniel and Lessard (St. Henry) on the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

That the name of Mr. Kelly be substituted for that of Mr. Munro on the standing committee on banking and commerce.

That the names of Messrs. More and Walker be substituted for those of Messrs. Chatterton and Cameron (High Park) on the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of standing order 44 to move what is known as a superseding motion. Perhaps I should read standing order 44, which is as follows:

When a question is under debate no motion is received unless to amend it; to postpone it to a day certain; for the previous question; for reading the orders of the day; for proceeding to another order; to adjourn the debate; or for the adjournment of the house.

Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 195, gives us direction with regard to the moving of such motions and states that motions of this kind are as follows:

"That consideration of the question be postponed to—(date)." "That the orders of the day be read." "That the house proceed to (name another order); or that the house proceed to the next business."

I would also draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that on May 14, 1956 a motion of the kind I propose to move was moved in this house. On that occasion the then government whip, Mr. W. G. Weir, had moved a motion for the substitution of a number of names on committees. Hon. Walter Harris, seconded by the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) moved, under standing order 44, the following motion:

That we do now proceed to the orders of the day.

That was an undebatable motion which was carried, and we jumped over all the intervening items and went straight into government business. It is therefore my contention that one has the right today, on this motion moved by the government whip, to present a similar motion.

My motion could read exactly as Mr. Harris' motion read, that the house do now proceed to the orders of the day, but I point out that last night at ten o'clock the government house leader indicated that if we did finish the flag debate today the item of government business to be called would be order No. 77, having to do with the Canada labour code. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, believing that this motion is in order, believing that it has precision in that it directs precisely what we would go to rather than just that we move to something else or that we adjourn, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas):

That the house do now proceed to government order No. 77, namely "House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-126".

Mr. Speaker: I listened with a great deal of attention to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, especially when he was reading standing order 44. Perhaps I might respectfully suggest, and I think I am right in this procedure, that the Chair would feel better about the motion if it did not seem to conflict with standing order 18, and if it were changed to read that this house now proceed to the orders of the day. I do not think it is necessary at this time to read standing order 18, but I make that suggestion to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I was aware of standing order 18 (2) when I drafted my motion, and in a sense I alluded to it when I pointed out that the government house leader indicated last night that the first item of government business to be called after the flag debate would be government order No. 77. For that reason I felt it appropriate to name in my motion the precise item, but if Your Honour feels that it trespasses on order 18 (2), which gives the government the authority to call government items in the sequence it thinks fit, I would be willing to accept the change in my motion which the Chair has suggested. In view of the announcement made by the government house leader last night it would have the same effect if my motion were worded as Your Honour suggests and we were to proceed immediately to government orders.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the government will reserve its right under rule 18 (2) to call government orders in such sequence as the government may think fit.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must remind the President of the Privy Council that this is not a debatable motion at this time. It is my duty to put this motion, which I believe to be in order, before the house. Then the house will dispose of it as it desires. It is moved by Mr. Knowles, seconded by Mr. Douglas, that the house do now proceed to orders of the day. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those against will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Knowles) which was negatived on the following division:

CANADIAN FLAG

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, December 8, consideration of the motion of Mr.

Batten that the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

At the beginning of this afternoon's sitting the deputy leader of the Conservative party, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), suggested and asked that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), who was not at his seat then, should move some kind of motion to apply definitely the rule of closure in the case of the flag debate. I strongly support what the deputy leader of the official opposition suggested this afternoon, to the effect that a member of the government or the Prime Minister himself should move immediately a motion to apply the rule of closure so that the matter of the flag can be dealt with once and for all.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) has the floor.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, are these Christmas carols which we are having from the lower end of the chamber, or are these hon. members motivated by Christmas spirits or otherwise in engaging in this performance at the moment?

Mr. Mandziuk: Christmas nuts.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes. At ten o'clock last night, Mr. Speaker, when I discontinued the remarks I was making on the amendment which is before us I had suggested that a decision on this matter had to be made by parliament because that is set forth in the order in council which established our flag. I refer to the order in council passed under a preceding Liberal government under the aegis of Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, which stated that this flag would be the flag of Canada until the parliament of Canada decided otherwise.

I am a little intrigued as to just what the mechanics are to be whereby the parliament of Canada defines and fixes the flag of this nation. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, we have before us at the moment a motion for concurrence in the report of a committee, and it is that motion which we are debating today and have been debating for the last few days. Is this motion going to be construed as a definitive action on the part of the House of Commons to establish the flag of Canada, or is there going to be some other motion following this or some other legislative process brought in which will help establish this flag?

After all, this motion deals only with the report of a committee of the House of Commons. The parliament of Canada consists, as you well know, Mr. Speaker, of Her Majesty the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons. I am wondering what action will be required in this matter on the part of the Senate. Are they going to have a concurring resolution, or just what will be done to establish a legislative decision of the parliament of Canada.

As I have said, all we have before us at the moment is a motion for concurrence in the report of a committee of the House of Commons. Surely that is not going to be the end of this matter. I think before we have a vote and finalize this debate the government should take the House of Commons into its confidence as to the legislative processes to be taken to establish this flag once we have adopted, if we do adopt concurrence in the report of this committee.

Certainly as far as I know the hon. gentlemen in the other place have not had a committee dealing with this matter. Are we going to ask them to concur in the report of a committee on which they had no representation and of which they have no knowledge? Are they going to set up a committee to study this matter? What are to be the mechanics to establish this as an action of the parliament of Canada? This is something on which I think we have the right to be informed, because this matter involves more than just passing a motion.

The hon. member for Port Arthur, who I am sorry to see is not in his seat now, said last night "After all, the government will change. A Conservative government might be back in office", as I am sure it will be following the next election. Then, he said, that government could bring in another resolution on another flag, or another legislative enactment, re-establishing the red ensign as the flag of Canada.

In the opinion of this party we cannot change flags in the way some hon. members would apparently change shirts. We think there is something more important than that in a flag. If parliament decides on a flag I think that flag is binding on the people of Canada, and we certainly do not want to be put in the disgraceful position of shifting flags every time there is a change of government. So there is no substance whatever in the fact that because, generally speaking, we are individually in support of the red ensign or some modification thereof—a design showing our historic traditions—if the government changes and this party comes back into office the flag of Canada will also be changed according to our will at the time.

A flag is a much more important matter than that. We are legislating not only for the people of today but for Canadians of the future. I think this question must be treated much more seriously than it has been treated heretofore. Therefore we are particularly interested in knowing by what legislative process the parliament of Canada is going to express its judgment regarding what should be done.

The flag proposed in the report of the committee has had removed from it all the emblems, the traditions and the heritages of which I think all Canadians are proud. We resent that. We do not think we should have a flag of that nature. If this flag with all the tradition and history of a century or more is going to be hauled down simply because the House of Commons passes a resolution, and perhaps the Senate passes another resolution, then that is a very undignified and improper way to change a flag bearing the traditional emblems of a century or more.

I just now recall a few lines from the poem by Charles Wolfe, "The Burial of Sir John Moore after Corunna" as follows:

> We buried him darkly at dead of night,
> The sods with our bayonets turning,
> By the struggling moonbeam's misty light
> And the lanthorn dimly burning.

This government wants to bury this flag by the dark shades of night without any more action than a resolution in the House of Commons. That, sir, is not good enough. In the old days of imperialism when one nation won a war, defeating another, and the flag of the defeated nations was taken down a guard of honour was supplied by those who had won the battle, and they saluted the old flag as it was taken from the mast and a new one was hoisted. We are going to have nothing of that kind apparently, but instead a resolution passed by a possible majority in a minority House of Commons. The resolution if passed by hon. members would then be sent to the other place where somehow or other these things are all going to be cooked together and we are going to have a new national flag.

That is one of the main reasons we have been anxious in this party to have a plebiscite. If a plebiscite is held and we obtain the concurrence of the majority of Canadian people, as strongly as any one of us feels individually on this matter, the people of Canada having had an opportunity of speaking, we will be prepared to accept their choice. However, without that opportunity, and particularly because of the vague and indefinite procedure before us, and I do not think even government members know what is to be the procedure, we are not prepared to accept a change in this way.

We as Canadians I think should learn something more of our past, and we as Canadians have been lacking in our appreciation and recollection of history and tradition. We have been poor in maintaining our traditions, historical sites and monuments, as well as about other matters which contribute to the tradition of a nation. I remember that a few years ago we had here in the city of Ottawa the old Supreme Court of Canada building. It was a blacksmith's shop or a stonecutter's hut which became the Supreme Court of Canada building. It was a rather poor and meagre building, but in that building was enacted a great deal of the constitutional history of this country. A few years ago we tore that building down because we wanted to make parking spaces for 12 or 14 automobiles, and one of the great historical sites of this country disappeared.

I also remember a strange debate that took place in this chamber, and I am sure the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith) will also remember it, because he and I crossed swords emphatically on that occasion, regarding the demolition of the west block. The government at that time was determined to have it destroyed and some of us kept the debate on those estimates going so long, parliament was dissolved before the estimates were passed and the building was not destroyed. That is why today we still have that beautiful building rather than one of those ghastly monstrosities of yellow, black, purple and red sheets of plastic overlooking Wellington street.

I have mentioned those things as examples of the fact that we have been very derelict in our attempts to preserve tradition. I suppose it is in keeping with that practice and philosophy, or the lack thereof, that we propose now to go ahead and tear down our flag, erecting a new one without any tradition, sentiment or regard for our history. I think that a large number of people are not prepared to do that at this moment. I am not suggesting for a moment that our flag should be the red ensign, per se. As I said last night, and on other occasions, I personally prefer the red ensign but I do not care whether our new flag is the red ensign or some modification thereof, but I do believe that a great majority of Canadians, regardless of race, want to see something of our traditions and history emblazoned or recorded on that flag.

While this is not the place to discuss designs I should like to mention that I saw a flag several days ago in a picture appearing in the Dartmouth Free Press of Nova Scotia which was proposed by a naval officer. It was a distinctive flag with a large maple leaf on it. I think it was printed in black and white, as the Dartmouth Free Press I do not believe has a colour press. The flag had a large maple leaf and superimposed thereon a small union jack, and superimposed on the union jack a large fleur-de-lis which maintained at least some reference to the two great founding races of this country. Somebody has suggested that to adopt this kind of flag would evidence traces of feudalism or subservience. I wonder how many Canadians believe that to be the case. I do not believe there is one in 10,000 who would believe that, because if this is subservience I should remind the members of this house of the flag of South Africa, where the bitter memories of the Boer war are more alive than any bitter memories we have in this country. On that flag they have the flag of the Capetown colony and the Orange free state, with a small union jack as well.

Those are some of the things which I think warrant this matter being referred to the people in the form of a plebiscite, so that a decision can be made without haste but carefully, and after due consideration. Those are some of the reasons we in this party have urged that there should not be haste, but rather a referral of the question to the Canadian people. This is a highly emotional issue.

Sometimes I become irritated by people who assume that we who speak in this house on this issue do so for some political purpose. Politics do enter into discussions in this chamber whatever is being considered, but I suggest that there has not been politics, in the political sense of the word, behind the reaction taken by most of us on this flag issue. This issue means a great deal to us individually, and a great deal to our constituents. It means a great deal not only to Canadians of today but Canadians of the future, and that is why we have urged time and time again that there be a plebiscite.

If there is not to be a plebiscite, Mr. Speaker, I guess we have to accept that verdict, but certainly we cannot be accused of being poor Canadians or obstructionists because of the attitude we have taken up to this time. I have attempted last night and today to put my own views forward on this issue because personally I believe that hundreds of thousands of people feel very strongly about this issue, and I think their opinions should be voiced in this house.

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to the amendment to the motion to concur in the committee report I feel that I should first of all place on record my intention. I intend to vote against the committee report, as a result of which I feel responsible for setting forth some of the reasons for my decision in this regard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. May I bring to the attention of the hon. member that the debate at this stage is not on whether the hon. member should vote for or against the report of the committee but how he is going to vote on the question of the amendment to the motion for concurrence in the report.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I was coming to that immediately, Mr. Speaker. I was about to follow up by saying that I intend to vote for the amendment put forward by the official opposition asking that the whole question be referred back to the committee and that a plebiscite be held to determine Canada's national flag.

There are a number of things I want to put forward with regard to why there should be a plebiscite. I want to refer first of all to something that was said last night by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). All of us, of course, cannot be television personalities or newspaper columnists. For a long time I have not had very much faith in newspaper columnists, including the hon. member for Port Arthur. He makes the suggestion that we should go ahead and get this thing over with, and when the Conservatives come back into power they can bring in another flag resolution. This matter touches the emotions of all Canadians but he would toss it off very lightly. We expect this kind of attitude from the Liberal party but I always thought that the New Democratic party was a little more sincere.

Miss LaMarsh: Ha, ha.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): The hon. lady says "ha, ha".

Miss LaMarsh: I sure do—ha, ha, ha.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I should like to direct some remarks particularly to her in regard to the question of a plebiscite. We in western Canada are under the handicap of having no news media that will bother to print the truth. I refer to the Southam chain of newspapers. The people of Alberta, more particularly of northern Alberta, do not receive a proper interpretation of what goes on here in Ottawa. The Edmonton Journal absolutely refuses—I am talking about a plebiscite.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member says what he has been saying is pertinent to the subject, but the Chair has some doubts about it. I would ask him to relate the remarks he is making now to the particular amendment before the house.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that the situation we are faced with in northern Alberta because of the attitude of the Edmonton Journal is that many people do not appreciate what the stand of our party has been in regard to the flag question. They do not appreciate that we are asking for a plebiscite. This is my entire point when I am talking about the attitude of this chain of newspapers in Alberta. They are so biased that it is really pathetic. They are nothing but apologists for the Liberal party and they really have not got very much to apologize for, Mr. Speaker, have they?

In that part of the country we have this situation, when the fact of the matter is we have been telling our constituents that we want a plebiscite because this issue is an emotional one and one that should be decided upon by the people as a whole. We have been arguing off and on for a number of months about redistribution and its effect on representation in the house, and this has a very direct relationship to the whole question of whether or not we should have a plebiscite on the emotional issue of the flag. The whole question is whether or not we in Alberta are entitled to two more seats and two more members to vote against what the government is now trying to put forward as a national flag.

The strange thing is that we have asked the government time and time again for a plebiscite to decide Canada's flag. We have said that this is an emotional issue, that it means a lot to the people of Canada, that it cannot be decided in the heat of what I call the Ottawa fever, in the biased political hotbed that is Ottawa. This matter should be above politics and it has not been. Let us put the blame where it properly lies. The government introduced this divisive issue into the house and they have carried on with it because in my opinion they do not have any legislation ready to put before the house. They charge us with being obstructionists and filibustering on the question of the flag, and whether or not there should be a plebiscite. I charge them with having no legislation available, no plans available—

Mr. McIlraith: Give us a chance to call our legislation—

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): —to help our people.

Mr. McIlraith: —by voting on the flag.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Why did the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith) not stand up and answer the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) when he wanted to know how the government was going to go about implementing this thing? Why does he not take us into his confidence and tell us how he is going to do all these things?

An hon. Member: He does not know.

Mr. McIlraith: Because it is irrelevant to the debate before the house.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I bow to the hon. gentleman's greater knowledge.

Mr. McIlraith: You should follow the rules occasionally.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): If we could get back to the question period there are some interesting questions we would like to ask the hon. gentleman, too.

An hon. Member: Who else got furniture?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): My hon. friend says "Who else got furniture". That would be a nice question.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question. If his party wanted to have a question period over the past week why did his party not agree to the proposition for a question period put forward by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): The hon. gentleman, of course, is in charge of the business of the house and he could have arranged this very easily.

Mr. McIlraith: I asked why your party would not agree to the proposition put forward by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to both hon. members that the subject matter the house is supposed to be considering now is not the order of business but the question of an amendment to a motion having reference to the holding of a plebiscite.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I agree with that, Mr. Speaker. I want to deal with the other aspect of why the Liberal government refuses to give the people of Canada the opportunity to decide on their flag by a plebiscite. Over the years the Liberals have ruled this country by dividing it. In my opinion the basic principle of Liberalism is that the country has to be divided and in political chaos and then they can rule. This arrogant bunch think that only they have any ability or should be allowed to rule in Canada. I suggest that these people have deliberately created some of the political chaos in Canada by perpetuating the flag debate and refusing to accede to our request for a plebiscite. They have done this deliberately because they think they can get away with the same old Liberal tactics of dividing the country. "Divide and rule; keep the people upset and we will rule." This has been the Liberal attitude for a long, long time. But I think that the people of Canada will have another decision to make about what the government has been doing over the past 18 months, about their many failures.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member's speech is not relevant in any way to the question before the house.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): With respect, Your Honour, what I am saying, and I can put it in very simple language, is that the Liberals have refused our request for a plebiscite because they would like to create political chaos in this country and portray us as obstructionists, as the people who are filibustering the flag debate. I say that we need a plebiscite on the flag to take the issue out of parliament so that the people of Canada can decide on what their national emblem shall be, without any of these side issues coming into the picture. I say to you very respectfully, sir, that this has an important bearing on the whole question of a national flag and whether or not we should have a plebiscite. I say this is the meat of the problem. Why do they refuse us a plebiscite? They have no answer other than to say, "You are the elected representatives and you should decide."

I disagree with that on a number of counts. The first is that this House of Commons is not truly representative. Redistribution has not taken place and therefore it is not a question we should decide, but one that should be decided by a plebiscite. My second reason for disagreeing is that the Liberal party has created so much political chaos that the people of Canada have no idea what the true situation is. A situation which is so highly emotionally charged should not be decided here.

This is a minority government. This is a government of regionalization. This is a government which does not have a mandate to make this kind of decision. They have not made any other decisions—why should they make this one?

The roving Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) is not in his place at the moment.

Miss LaMarsh: You have not been here for a month.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) keeps interrupting. Perhaps we should see about some of the things that the truth squad should have been investigating. The first point I am making is that this is a minority government, and the second concerns the political chaos which has been stirred up by the Liberal party and the Liberal press.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Somebody says order. I am suggesting the people of Canada do not have a true appreciation of what is going on or of why we want a plebiscite. All this is relevant to the question now before us. I suggest one of the things we should endeavour to accept in public life is responsibility, and I suggest the press has lain down on its responsibility in reporting the flag debate. I suggest further that the press is a bought press, that there is not any freedom in it any more. There certainly is not any freedom in the press which serves my area, especially on this particular question of whether or not we would be better off to have a plebiscite. The press in my area publishes articles which it thinks are favourable to the Liberal party, but will not publish anything that is unfavourable.

Earlier this year we talked about a plebiscite on a different flag which had three maple leaves on it. I think the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) will recall the three maple leaves. We hold a similar position in respect to this flag which has one maple leaf, but I do not know whether that minister has ordered a number of these new flags. Perhaps having been once burned he is going to wait and see. However, I am sure he will keep his eye on the business part of the transaction and see the flags are got when they are needed. The question is whether it should be up to him and his colleagues to decide the flag, rather than the people of Canada.

Mr. Godin: What about parliament?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I suggest this is an emotional issue which parliament should not be asked to solve. It is not a question that should come before parliament.

Mr. Grégoire: Are you afraid to take your responsibility?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): It is not a question that should come before parliament because it is one—

Mr. Grégoire: Are you afraid?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): —that crosses party lines. It is an emotional one.

Mr. Dupuis: May I ask a question?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Surely.

Mr. Dupuis: Why is it that when your party was in power for six years it did not hold a referendum? Why did it not give the Conservative member from St. Boniface the chance to pass his resolution dealing with a plebiscite on the flag and the national anthem? Why didn't you support the bill I introduced in 1961 asking the Conservative Tory government to use the national census to ask the feelings of each Canadian on those national symbols? You could have asked a few questions from door to door and it would not have cost a cent. You were in power then and you had six years in which to do that. You didn't do anything when in power, and now in opposition, you want our Liberal government to do what your Conservative government refused to do.

[Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson).]

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I did not know whether the Minister without Portfolio was going to make a speech or not. There is a very simple answer—

Mr. Dupuis: Answer my question.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): If you will allow me. There is a very simple answer, that we had a flag passed by a Liberal government in 1945, under order in council, and about which we were quite happy. We had—

Mr. Dupuis: That is not the truth.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): —a national flag—

Mr. Dupuis: That is not the truth.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): —a flag which represented our history, a flag which did not allow various entrepreneurs to make a profit on it, a flag which suited Canada.

Mr. Dupuis: Answer my question.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I did.

Mr. Godin: The hon. member has just said the Conservative government was very willing to go along with the 1945 order in council. Why should he feel his party should choose the flag of this country?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I did not say our party was going to choose anything. I said we were quite happy with the flag we had and still have.

Mr. Dupuis: What about your Tory convention asking for a distinctive flag?

An hon. Member: Why don't you go back to Africa?

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Go to the jungle.

Mr. Dupuis: Answer that question.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): The minister, of course, is in the flag business and should know all about these things. I do not know whether he is in the furniture business or not. We have not heard that.

Mr. Dupuis: You were my best publicity agent.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): But I do know that I can fight under the red ensign, that this is a flag which I can live under.

Mr. Grégoire: That is a British flag. That is the British naval flag; it is not a distinctive flag.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): So far as I am concerned—

Mr. Smallwood: A lot of us fought under it, which is more than you guys did.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I would like to point out to all hon. members, including those sitting close to the hon. member who has the floor, that he should be allowed to continue his remarks uninterrupted.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Do you not think that there are many repetitions? To my knowledge, it has been repeated at least 50 times that the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) sold stickers, and at least 200 times that, formerly, there were three maple leaves and now there is only one. If they have nothing new to say, it seems to me you should call them to order and demand that they put an end to these repetitions which are against the rules.

[Text]

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): This is the same hon. gentleman who stood up in his place and said, "Unless our little party is recognized we will filibuster for 100 days."

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I did not say that; the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) did, and said at that time: I shall fight to the death to ensure that their rights are not recognized. Unfortunately, he did not die and our rights have been recognized.

[Text]

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I see my hon. friends are a little touchy on that subject. They are a little touchy on the question of whether or not they should break away from that great and noble party we know so well in Alberta, which the leader of the Créditistes said set them back 10 years. He said other things as well. He said that Social Credit nationally was a fizzle and they should have a new party. My hon. friend keeps talking. He likes to interrupt but he does not like being interrupted.

Mr. Grégoire: You did not dare to interrupt me yesterday.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Horner) has the floor and I again ask hon. members not to interrupt him.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): If I may go on, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Grégoire: We have heard it about 25 times.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): We have seen this flag debate used as a political football by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). We have seen him trekking around the country with a flag kit and new words to "O' Canada" when he should have been here looking after his ministers. But we have not seen any major legislation put before us. We have not seen any major policy changes.

An hon. Member: You have not been here.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I have been getting some furniture ready.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): We have seen a government which has wallowed through 18 months of administration like a bull moose in some of the swamps in Jasper-Edson, not making any decision except for this one petulant decision that we must debate this flag issue. This is the essence of the argument. Should we as a country be content to follow the lead of a minority government which has not proven itself, which has not done anything at all for the nation? Should we accept its word on the subject of a national symbol, or should we ask the people? That is the essence of the argument. We say—

Mr. Grégoire: Let's vote.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Ah, the parrots in the corner are getting lively again. They say "Let's vote". I say, let the people vote on it. They are the ones who will have to live under this flag for years to come. We do not believe a flag should be changed every time the government changes. After all, if that were the practice we would need to change the flag fairly soon. That would not be a good practice to follow at all. Let us hold a plebiscite at the time of the next election and allow the people to decide what our national symbol should be. Let us put forward three or four distinctive designs, preferably designs which have something to do with our heritage, something to do with the history of Canada. If hon. members opposite do not like the history of Canada, I am sorry for them. We in western Canada come from people who fought for their country by hard work and toil. We come from a pioneering stock. The people of Canada feel very strongly about this question of a plebiscite. They are in favour of deciding it in the way this amendment proposes. Speaking for myself, I have no confidence whatever that this government is able to handle a matter so important as the choosing of a flag. The government has been unable to handle anything else.

There are no specialists when it comes to deciding upon a flag. Each one of us has to decide for himself on this particular emotional question. I will say this to the house: If people were to come in from outside Canada and try to tear down our red ensign and trample it in the mud we would resist them, we would fight them. But here we find the Liberal party doing the same thing from inside Canada, yet they want us to accept it lying down.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): We have no confidence in this government. The people of Canada generally have no confidence in this government. We are getting less confident every day. As new revelations come out we are more sure than ever that this government should not be allowed to decide what our flag should be, but that we should put the question to the people and let them decide the issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the hon. member.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to receive and answer a question from the minister?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Certainly.

[Translation]

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said a moment ago that the Liberal party had chosen a flag in 1945. Is he not aware that, when making this decision the government said that the red ensign could be used until parliament decided to select a new flag? Why did the hon. member conceal this fact, when he is or should be aware of it?

[Text]

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I am not hiding any facts. Of course, the very terms of the order in council were "until parliament should decide otherwise".

Mr. Dupuis: You should have said that.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I am saying it now for your benefit. I am also saying to the hon. member that it was his parliament and his Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) who brought this flag debate before the House of Commons, in place of legislation which would be of benefit to this country. It is his Prime Minister who is running around the country with a flag kit. It is his party which has made parliament the shambles it is today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): The seals laugh. This country is governed by an executive council or the cabinet. For heaven's sake let us have some leadership out of them, something more than a complete shambles on the treasury benches.

Mr. R. E. Forbes (Dauphin): I am taking part in this flag debate because I think this is one of the most important issues to be decided in this country in a long time and I believe it should be decided by the people of Canada by a plebiscite and not by the members of a minority government.

Naturally, as a descendant of United Empire Loyalist stock, I feel that I should participate because my forebears played an important part in the history and development of this country. Further, I think it is important that any design chosen as a flag for Canada should embody a symbol of our sovereignty and I believe the Canadian red ensign is a symbol of the united effort of the English and French settlers which made Canada the great country it is today. I have a right to express my own beliefs and I feel it is only fair that the Canadian people should have a right to express theirs through a plebiscite.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has stated that he introduced the flag resolution in fulfilment of an election promise. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that no mention of a flag was made in the federal constituency of Dauphin during the election campaigns of either 1962 or 1963. However, I can point out that the Liberal candidate in the Dauphin constituency and others who spoke on behalf of the Liberal party promised, among other things, a two price system for wheat, and a support price for beef, hogs, eggs and other farm products to be based on regional averages, and calculated quarterly; they promised also they would study the rough fish problems of commercial fishermen and that they would launch a program to provide free milk to school children across the country.

I can assure the Prime Minister that if he would bring forward this legislation which would mean something to the farmers of Canada and to our economy, we in the official opposition would give our full support without a prolonged debate. Since this legislation has all been put aside and a new flag for Christmas is all that apparently matters, we in the Conservative opposition have a right to register our protests on behalf of the Canadian people who do want the matter decided by a plebiscite, the only fair way. Instead of the promised legislation the Prime Minister introduced the flag resolution and I ask, why? At one time the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) took part in the flag debate. I wish to refer hon. members to page 6959 of Hansard, where he expressed concern about the leadership of the Progressive Conservative party. Let me assure the hon. minister that we on this side of the house have every confidence in the leadership of Right Hon. John Diefenbaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Forbes: But, as one who is an ardent believer in the two party system, I personally am deeply concerned about the leadership of the Liberal party at this time. When I think of the able leaders of that once great Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mackenzie King and that great statesman whom all Canadians loved, Mr. St. Laurent—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have listened with great interest to the hon. member for the last few minutes and I would think that the remarks he has been making until now will lead him eventually to the consideration of the amendment before the house at the present time. I would entreat the hon. member to keep that in mind and get to the core of his subject as quickly as possible.

Mr. Forbes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was just coming to that, but I was prefacing my main argument with a few incidentals. I made reference to the great leaders of the Liberal party in the past and I have just one or two more sentences on that subject. The opinions of these great leaders of the Liberal party in the past on the subject of a flag have been placed on the record many times, and their contribution to the history and development of our country. I fear for the future of the Liberal party under the present leadership, if the flag resolution is any indication of his ability as a leader. I am at a loss to understand why a man with a reputation as a great diplomat would introduce such a divisive and controversial issue.

Mr. Speaker, the number of letters and telegrams that I have been receiving from my constituency indicates that the majority want the red ensign retained as Canada's flag. I need not mention the various organizations such as the Canadian Legion, the I.O.D.E. and the L.O.L. who are requesting my support for the red ensign. Mr. Speaker, the maple tree is a thing of beauty, but I am sorry that I cannot say the same thing about the proposed maple leaf flag. As one man said to me recently, it is more of a banner than a flag. Although he did not indicate his politics to me in any way, I feel he may have been a Liberal. In any case I was happy to have him in my office. He is a retired air force chap and said he felt the present Liberal minority government has no right to impose its will on a whole people, as it is doing with the flag, because it is a minority government. I say again, if the government is determined to have a new flag this should only be decided upon by a majority of all the people voting upon it in a referendum or at another election.

The flag which the committee has asked us to accept, Mr. Speaker, has no tradition behind it, except perhaps the colours red and white which are taken from the red ensign. At the risk of being repetitious I am just adding my voice to the others raised in protest throughout Canada and here in this House of Commons against this red and white maple leaf flag replacing the Canadian red ensign which has flown so proudly in Canada and abroad all these years, and has been honoured by all. Immigrants coming to Canada have been swearing allegiance to this Canadian red ensign of ours. To me the red ensign is more than a bit of bunting; it stands for and exemplifies the hopes and aspirations of many generations of every ethnic group who have sought, and found, security and happiness beneath its folds.

I am sure no one wants to think that next year or the year after, or indeed even in 50 or 100 years from now, there should be any necessity for changing our flag. This is why we must decide right now. This matter has already caused so much disunity in this country, and this could easily happen again if at some future time any group was successful in putting enough political pressure on another weak and vacillating government. We in the Conservative party believe that this flag question has been handled in the worst possible way and we feel that the only way the people in our nation will be satisfied with any settlement of the question is to have a plebiscite. We should remember that we are settling this matter for all time and we should not hesitate to take all the time necessary to do it right.

Many people have spoken of symbols and what the symbols on the flag are supposed to represent. It is the emotions and memories the flag evokes which make this such a serious matter to so many people. There is no doubt that many people in this country believe that a flag symbolizes not only the greatness of this nation, but certain facts about Canada and its history that we are proud of and that we hope will remain a permanent part of our future. To these people the removal of known symbols from our flag is a declaration of intention to destroy that part of our Canadian way of life.

Mr. Speaker, the controversy over the flag really boils down to one simple question: Do we have on our national flag any symbols of our history and traditions, or do we not? This is the one question on which we think there should be a national referendum. Some people may be opposed to a referendum or plebiscite because they feel there are too many practical difficulties in the way of permitting a decisive expression of opinion on the flag design. To my mind this is not necessary at all. The question need simply be asked: Should our flag have symbols and traditions? A simple "yes" or "no" is all that would be required, and I suggest that the work of the flag committee would then become relatively simple. I believe that an overwhelming majority of Canadians are in favour of retaining some symbols on our flag and I also believe they have a right to stand up and be counted on this important question.

I believe there is a great deal of misunderstanding in this country about the meaning of symbols. I am aware that many people believe that the presence of the union jack on our flag symbolizes some sort of subservience to Great Britain. I am aware that this feeling is strongly held in the province of Quebec and even to some extent in other parts of the country. We in this house know there is no question of subservience, and therefore that feeling is just plain nonsense. I am surprised that some members of this house continue to foster such notions and use such arguments. To me this is like the argument that there should be no statues in churches because some people say this suggests idolatry. Just because some people use this silly argument it has never stopped churches from having statues, because they know very well they are not their idols.

In exactly the same way I want to see the union jack kept on our flag as a proud declaration and reminder of our democracy, passing on the British heritage of the parliamentary system and type of justice. This symbol is very precious and meaningful to most Canadians. No one can say that it mars the beauty of the flag design and the only argument for its removal is the silly one that some people foster a false interpretation of what it stands for.

The argument I might make to my French Canadian colleagues to enlist their support for this symbol is to remind them that it is not just the people of Quebec who are anxious that their right to their religion and language should be maintained. Western Canadians are every bit as devoted to the preservation of French Canadian rights as they are to their own. When there is misunderstanding of the French devotion to their language, responsible people in western Canada do not add strength to superstitions or ill-informed and harmful remarks. The one thing that is uppermost in the minds of responsible Canadians is that the right of individuals must be protected. In our democracy we take pride in the fact that Canadians have a right to be different. We conform to the rule of law but we do not ask the conformity of our neighbour to our particular brand of behaviour. The French Canadian's right to speak his language and retain his customs is cherished by the western Canadian and understood by him, just as he cherishes his own right to have his own language and customs. Once one right is taken away, all rights might soon slip away.

Western Canadians wish to have a fleur-de-lis on the national flag. It is a symbol and a reminder that Canada does have a history that we are proud of and that both races have made great history in building up this great Canada of ours. To me the decision of the flag committee would be acceptable if they had taken a flag with these two symbols on it. The symbols are small while the maple leaf is large, appropriate I would say to the philosophy that while we are proud of our history and traditions and intend to build on them, Canada's greatness lies ahead of us and the large maple leaf symbolizes the forward look of optimism of all our people. The two symbols are not just a reminder of our past; their position on the flag is also an indication of the future. They are placed wide apart, a symbol of their determination that both languages have a place and each culture is necessary and part of our strength. This could show the determination that each will survive and be respected and cherished as a separate entity in a united country.

I suppose that every symbol can be misunderstood. People can say the wrong things about anything. The choice of responsible people is to take the path of courage, and one does not deviate from the right because the weak or the ill-informed may criticize. It is my belief that our flag needs these symbols as a reminder to every citizen, from whatever part of the country he comes, that his way of life is cherished and respected by other Canadians who have a different culture and who ask of him only that he gives the same respect to their way of life.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let the Canadian people vote on the flag in another election or by a referendum as suggested in the amendment by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith). Why all the rush about a new flag before Christmas? Is this the only way the Prime Minister could bring about an election, or was this what he had in mind when he suddenly introduced the flag resolution, which had not been included in the speech from the throne last February?

The Prime Minister has been known to change his mind. I suggest that if he would change his mind on this issue, it would be to the advantage of his party and himself to submit this matter to the electors of Canada and they could make the decision at the next federal election. I hope that the Prime Minister will reconsider and withdraw his motion even at this late date, and submit the issue to the electors.

Mr. C. F. Kennedy (Colchester-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting for some time to have an opportunity to put forward a few views on this important question and on this amendment to refer the matter back to a committee in order that the people of Canada might have the chance to express their opinion on the subject. I have waited because there are so many members in this house who have not yet risen to speak in this debate, and I would think that this question should be as important to them as it is to me. I have already expressed myself briefly previously, and I intend to be brief again today. I still contend that the people of Canada should have the opportunity of expressing their opinion on this question, and I put forward these reasons for feeling in this way.

During this debate an inference has been drawn by some government members, the very few who have spoken, that a new flag was an election promise. If it was, it was a very indefinite one and must certainly have been regional, because there was no mention made of a flag in the last election campaign in which I participated. I would be glad to oppose anybody from my area who would come forward and say that it was his intention to vote in favour of destroying our present flag.

In my opinion, the action which is being taken is not a creative move at all. It is simply a move to destroy what we have. It is simply a move to remove a symbol, of which many people of this country are very proud, from our national flag. This is proven by the willingness of the government to accept almost anything, provided it has no connection with the red ensign. I am referring to the union jack part of the red ensign when I say that. Hon. members opposite should—and I challenge them to do so—stand up and say why they do not like the union jack portion of our present flag and why it should not be represented on a new flag. I have yet to meet anybody who could put up an argument as to why it should be obliterated from a new flag.

Among the loyal Canadians in this country are the veterans who stood and fought for our country, and they have been most adamant that our national symbols should be preserved. A symbol means, or should mean, something to a person. If it were not for symbols—and symbols include literature or anything representing the past—our coming generation would learn nothing of the past. Under the symbols we have had thus far this nation has progressed. We may not have reached the highest goals over the years, but we have stood for the principles which underlie the British and French traditions handed down to us. Why then, without permission from the people, has parliament the right to vote on this question and throw away these things which mean so much to so many people?

How many people in this country have participated in several wars in order to defend the principles to which I have referred, the basic principle of which is freedom? When I speak of those who participated in the wars I am referring not only to those who actually took up the sword and fought on the battlefields, but also to the vast number of people who supported our soldiers and made it possible for them to be effective and to put forth everything they had, many of them giving their lives. Surely the opinions of these people, our veterans should have some direct bearing in this regard; and as far as I am aware they are adamant that we should not lose our present flag which bears the symbols for which they have stood over the years. If we as a group remove these symbols, I am afraid we will only leave bitterness, dissension and possibly division among our people which will last for many years.

Some people say we should forget the past and look only to the future. I would say that anyone who makes such a statement is only deluding himself. History is a recording of the past, and history is a part, and an important part, of any person, race or nation. Man's personal and intellectual history begins when he is born and ends when he dies. A nation continues to make history, and I hope Canada's future history will be as glorious as it has been in the past.

No doubt there are many things in our past history which we should like to forget, but on the other hand there are also many achievements of which we are proud. If we did not accept and remember the lessons of history we would still be a primitive people. As a matter of fact, our very survival, even militarily, is based on lessons learned from previous struggles. "The past is a fact, the present is fleeting and the future is unknown."

Mr. Speaker, I conclude these brief remarks regarding this question which has been before this house for so long by stating that I regret that we have had so much discussion about the flag issue and that the important business of this house has been put aside. I have no idea how much more discussion there will be on this question, so I urge the government with all my heart to again consider taking this question out of this house, and bring before us some of those things now on the order paper for which the people of this country have been waiting. These matters are important, and should be dealt with as quickly as possible. I am sure the majority of Canadians feel that these things should be done in priority to any discussion about something which is in effect a change in our symbolic past, and which means so much to us that it should be preserved and taught to future generations.

Mr. Joseph Slogan (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I think I am considered as one of the less vocal members of this house, and that I usually try to speak with some common sense. I hope that the people on the other side of this house who interrupted my speech some months ago so consistently will refrain from doing so today.

I speak at this time because I feel obliged to put on record some of the wishes of my constituents. I am obliged also to present some of the views held in my constituency.

At the outset I should state that these views about a design or the necessity for a plebiscite are not universal. There are some differences in the opinions of the people in this country, as there often are in this house, and I think we must put those differing points of view in proper perspective. Because of these facts I support our position in asking for a plebiscite.

On June 24 I received a letter from one of my constituents who said:

> I feel that this is not a matter to be settled by a handful of members but that it should be put to the people, and it will be with concern and great interest that your defence of this issue will be observed.

I hope I will not be accused of filibustering or of delay. I hope that I am living up to my responsibilities as a member of this house. After listening to the speeches of other members during this debate I feel that they also are living up to their responsibilities. I do not agree with all of them, and certainly they have not agreed with one another, but I respect their courage in standing up to present their views and to reflect the views of their constituents.

At the same time I regard the members on the other side of the house as not living up to their responsibilities. Perhaps they have been gagged by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), or some curtain of silence has been dropped around them. In honesty I feel that on the question of a plebiscite, or on any other question associated with the flag, the members on the government side of this house have not lived up to their responsibilities by maintaining a silence. Surely their constituents would like to know their views and how they are being represented. These members are not accepting their responsibilities. I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Aurora Banner of July 29 under the heading "Liberal M.P.s should take wheel". The article reads as follows:

> We have had poor drivers in Ottawa before. We have even had governments with engines missing, and we have had governments with no engines at all. Now we have a government with a poor driver at the wheel. We suggest that it is time for some of his own party members riding in the Liberal backseat—including our own member, Mr. John Addison—to reach over and try to put the old bus back on the road.

It is obvious that many members in this house are not speaking for the people they represent. Therefore the people should be allowed to speak for themselves. I have no argument with members on the other side of this house as to whether they are in favour of the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag or with the retention of the red ensign, but I do think they should have the courage to get up on their feet and express in no uncertain terms their feelings on this issue. One member of the government party did stand up and voice his opinion. I think he has carried out a service on behalf of his constituents.

I do not believe the members of this house do express a composite view of the people of this country. I wonder whether members on the opposite side of this house are so devoted to the stand taken by the Prime Minister that they do not now have the courage to stand up and express their views.

In asking for this plebiscite I should like to emphasize that we in this party who have taken part in the debate on this amendment have not attempted to delay passage of this resolution or the passage of the business of the house. It has been almost on the insistence of the opposition that the government has passed what little legislation it has passed. I can only laugh when I hear some hon. members from the government side, while speaking in other parts of the country, talk about the obstruction the Conservative party has perpetrated on parliament, while in the same breath they list all the legislative items that have been passed during this session. Those members cannot have it both ways; we are either obstructing or you are not doing your jobs as legislators, I think you are misleading the public in this regard.

As far as a plebiscite is concerned, our position has not changed. We have always advocated a plebiscite on this matter. I should like to refer to a speech made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) on July 22, over the national television network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, in which he stated:

> We have endeavoured to stop this headstrong and stubborn rush of the government. We want the people of Canada to have a chance to have a say in the matter and suggested that a plebiscite be granted to the Canadian people in order that they could determine their wishes. Such a plebiscite could take place at the next general election. Among the questions to be asked might be such as: Are you in favour of the red ensign? Are you in favour of the red ensign with changes made thereon to show both heritages? Are you in favour of the three maple leaves joined together? Are you in favour of the one maple leaf?

Our position has been consistent in calling for a plebiscite right from the beginning of the flag debate, and we are still being consistent in calling for one now. I spoke earlier in the debate and at that time said that I favoured this matter being taken out of the House of Commons by referring it to a committee of the house. If the government wanted this question removed from the house, why did they not refer the matter to a committee originally? They wasted the taxpayers' money by their obstinacy. They wasted the time of the house by keeping the debate going in this chamber when the matter should have been referred to a committee in the beginning. Finally they did agree to that suggestion and I said at that time that, should the committee report indicate disagreement, and it has, then we should have a national referendum. I am of the same view today. My view has not changed in this regard. If members will refer to my speech in August they will see that I said exactly the same thing. If they did not listen to it the first time I would certainly recommend that they listen this time. I suggested that this committee, although it might not be unanimous, could do a great service for this country.

Mr. Godin: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Slogan: I will permit it at the end of my remarks. I have only 40 minutes and I have a two hour speech prepared. I will try to cut it a little shorter to leave the hon. member a couple of minutes in which to ask me a question. I suggested at that time that this committee would render a great service to the country by bringing in a report which would narrow down the designs exactly in the manner in which it has reported, but because of the fact that a small group of people could not agree I could not see that in this larger house we could have any greater agreement. So my suggestion was that we should take the recommendation—

Mr. Godin: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is suggesting that the committee could not agree on a design. I would appreciate it if he would refer to the 14 to nothing vote for the design now before the house.

Mr. Slogan: Obviously the hon. member, as he did in my last speech, is trying to trap me and get me off the rails, but I will answer that question.

Mr. Godin: Why did you say the committee did not agree?

Mr. Slogan: Obviously the hon. member did not understand the vote in the committee. The vote of the committee was not to adopt that design but to adopt that design in preference to two other designs.

Mr. Godin: As the best design.

Mr. Slogan: Therefore he is under a very grave misapprehension if he thinks the committee was unanimous. The hon. member says that the vote of 14 to nothing was a unanimous vote by that committee approving that design as the flag of Canada, but that is not so. It was a preferential vote in which the members of the committee were expressing their preference with regard to three designs. That was the basis of the unanimous vote which the hon. member is now trying to use to mislead the people of Canada.

In further answer to the hon. member may I say I have here one of his fine campaign advertisements and I see nothing here about a Canadian flag. The hon. member says that the solution of the eastern farmers' number one problem, the cost-price squeeze—

Mr. Godin: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member raising a point of order or a question of privilege?

Mr. Lambert: Make sure it is privilege.

Mr. Godin: On a question of privilege, the hon. member has just read from an advertisement pertaining to my campaign in the last election. He said there was nothing in my platform about a distinctive Canadian flag. I request that the hon. member read the relevant paragraph in my publicity, which is in both English and French and which he has in his hands, in which I advocated a distinctive Canadian flag as part of my program.

Mr. Slogan: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's point is very well taken. In fact, he got me so off guard that I never did get the last sentence. At the bottom of his list of priorities that he was suggesting—he did not put it in the top line but in the bottom line—he did refer to a distinctive Canadian flag. He did not say one without the union jack. In any event, I think we are getting away from the point. I should like to debate this matter if Mr. Speaker would permit me, but I am sure he would rule I should not. If the hon. member had remained quiet I could have continued with my speech with the result that the time of the house would not have been wasted and we could have proceeded a little farther with the debate.

To come back to the question of a plebiscite, Mr. Speaker, as has been suggested in many newspaper articles I think that the debate in the House of Commons has often laid the house open to ridicule. It has resulted not only in ridicule in Canada, in fact, but Canada is being held up to ridicule abroad. For this reason I think this question should be removed from the house by the government approving our amendment and holding a national plebiscite at the next general election.

In support of this view may I say I had the privilege recently of being a member of the NATO delegation which visited Germany and France. We visited our air division and army brigade at Soest and Zweibrücken and it was interesting to note the reactions of our servicemen to what is going on in the House of Commons regarding the flag. Those of us who made that trip recall meeting Mr. Bernard Kaplan at a reception held by our NATO ambassador in Paris, and I should like to refer to an editorial in the Edmonton Journal of June 26 last in which Mr. Bernard Kaplan, Paris correspondent for the North American newspaper alliance, is quoted as referring to the flag question in this way:

> He says the affair is regarded by western Europeans as "a kind of political curiosity in the middle of the twentieth century."

The editorial quotes the Paris newspaper, Liberation, as saying:

> It is a fortunate nation that is able to quarrel over such an issue.

The editorial is entitled "Laugh or Cry?" This shows how the ridiculous stubbornness of the Prime Minister is regarded. He has forced the house to debate an issue that would be far better removed from the house. I might also refer to another newspaper dispatch from Washington in which there is the following:

> But Americans continue to view our predicament with a certain amount of inner amusement. "Canada is considering a maple leaf flag design," reports the Washington Daily News. "Now how about the 'Maple Leaf Rag' as a national anthem?"

This is the type of reaction abroad and I think it certainly adds nothing to the prestige of Canada that our neighbours in Europe and the United States are looking at us in this light. If we were to remove this question from the house and leave it until the next general election when tempers and emotions would have cooled down, the people of Canada could then be asked to determine the matter by a plebiscite, which is the proper way to bring this question to a logical conclusion.

As I have said previously, as one who is neither Anglo-Saxon nor French, as a Canadian it grieves me to see how this flag issue has divided the country. If we are going to adopt a distinctive national flag the time to do it is when the country is united. Certainly the divisive tactics employed by the government in this issue cannot hope to unite the country.

First of all we had the commission on biculturalism which did a great deal to divide and crystallize the positions of the two founding races. Now we have the flag debate which is doing the same thing. The government should accept a referendum, get the matter out of the House of Commons and proceed with the legislation which it says it wants to present.

Mr. Grégoire: Then let us vote.

Mr. Slogan: We had a vote.

Mr. Grégoire: When?

Mr. Slogan: We had one this afternoon.

Mr. Grégoire: That wasn't a vote on the flag.

Mr. Slogan: Speaking from behind the curtains they are very vociferous, but when challenged they run away with their tails between their legs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member should not be interrupted, particularly by someone who is not speaking from his seat in the house. I would ask hon. members to keep that in mind and allow the hon. member to continue without being interrupted.

Mr. Slogan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate your graciousness in rising to reprimand the hon. member—

Mr. Grégoire: I deserved it.

Mr. Slogan: —who is speaking from behind the curtain and who admits he deserved it. I think many hon. members privately would prefer a plebiscite. The Ottawa Citizen of May 13 had an article headed "Put flag issue to voters."

Barry Mather (NDP—New Westminster) has called for a national plebiscite on this question.

If it could not achieve unanimity I think the best the committee should have done was to have narrowed the choice down to two designs. I think both sides were willing to accept a certain degree of compromise. On one side were the proponents of the three maple leaf flag, and on the other the proponents of the red ensign. It is perfectly obvious, because of the amount of emotion engendered in this debate, that neither of these designs would have been acceptable to the other group. For that reason my original suggestion was that the committee would do a great job by narrowing the choice to two designs, one of which would be acceptable to the proponents of the red ensign, with its main ingredient being the retention of the union jack and the fleur-de-lis, and the other the single maple leaf design.

Mr. Matheson: May I ask the hon. member a question? If he is suggesting that a plebiscite be restricted to two designs would it not make sense that the two designs be those which received the most votes in the committee, namely the three maple leaf flag and the one maple leaf flag?

Mr. Slogan: You want to have your cake and eat it too. I said I thought that in the spirit of compromise there should have been two designs, one that would satisfy the opposition to the three maple leaf design and the other which would satisfy the opposition to the red ensign. I would have been much happier had the committee recommended two designs instead of one. Both designs could then be put on a ballot in a plebiscite at the next general election.

There is a large section of people in the country which has strong emotional ties to the union jack. I do not believe the wishes of these people should have been overridden. I believe they should be taken into consideration in a plebiscite.

Back on July 21 the Montreal Star printed a small article headed, "Red Ensign Advocated by 149,465." I quote from that article, which said that the office of the Secretary of State had received 149,465 signatures on letters and petitions since July 1945 favouring the retention of the red ensign as Canada's national flag. This shows there is some sentiment in the country.

What about some of the polls that were conducted? If we are talking about a plebiscite perhaps we may conjecture a little on the outcome of it. There was the Gruneau survey which showed that in nine provinces the red ensign was leading and that in the province of Quebec the three maple leaf flag was leading, but because of the preponderance of opinion in Quebec, on a national basis there were more votes for the new design than for the red ensign.

In view of this, what has the government to fear from a plebiscite? If these polls are accurate to any degree—and I am not saying they are—surely a plebiscite would solve the question for the government.

A large number of regional polls were conducted showing that the red ensign led the new flag by varying majorities. There was one held in Winnipeg and one in Newfoundland. The one in Winnipeg showed that 41 per cent liked the ensign as compared with 32 per cent for the three maple leaves. I could quote these articles at length. Norman Campbell in the Ottawa Citizen went to the trouble of dividing the letters received by the Prime Minister into five categories, one category calling for a referendum on the flag issue. The Ottawa Journal reported a 350 foot petition presented to the Prime Minister, advocating the ensign, sent from communities in Toronto and southern Ontario.

It is not just the Conservative party which is calling for a referendum. The Toronto Telegram of August 22 printed an editorial saying the voice of the people could be heard on this issue only through a national plebiscite. It said this was a matter which touched the hearts, emotions and loyalties of virtually all Canadians, and a parliamentary vote which would destroy the country's flag would foster strong feelings for years to come.

If that is not enough proof let us look back to 1961 when the Prime Minister was leader of the opposition. He was being interviewed on the radio, I believe. I am reading an excerpt from the Amherst Daily News of December 29, 1961. He was asked the question: "How would you poll the people on this?" The right hon. gentleman, who was then leader of the opposition, replied:

> We would poll the people when they have a general election and if they don't like the idea of a distinctive Canadian flag which cannot be mistaken for that of any other country they will let us know in no uncertain terms.

What has happened to the opinion the right hon. gentleman held in 1961? I realize hon. members opposite are in a precarious situation. They cannot say anything because if they back the Prime Minister today he may change his mind tomorrow and perhaps they do not all want to be as inconsistent as he has been.

Then there was another question addressed to the Prime Minister. He was asked whether he thought the country needed this symbol to hold us together. And the right hon. gentleman—he was then the leader of the opposition—replied:

> Yes, I think it would be a good idea to have a flag, a distinctive Canadian flag, in the interest of national unity.

[Mr. Slogan.]

He went on to say:

> We should try to solve this problem in a manner which would create the minimum of division and the maximum of unity.

We agree with all those sentiments and ideas put forward by the right hon. gentleman at that time and I, for one, can say I had a much greater regard for the Prime Minister when he was leader of the opposition than I have had for him since I have seen the way he holds the reins of government today.

Indeed, one reason for the desirability of holding a plebiscite on this issue is the inconsistency shown by the Prime Minister. The hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) indicated in the course of one of his speeches that the first flag chosen was the personal design of the Prime Minister and that it had not been placed before the caucus of Liberal members. The Prime Minister also indicated when this matter arose that parliament either had to choose this design or face a general election. I call that political blackmail. As a result of the views subsequently expressed on behalf of this party the Prime Minister backed away from that suggestion. There might have been other reasons. In support of this contention I will quote a headline from the Toronto Globe and Mail of June 18. It refers to the Prime Minister as regarding both flag votes as a confidence test. If we go on to July 20 we see that in the Toronto Telegram there is another headline: "Accept My Flag or Else, Warns a Defiant Pearson". The article says:

> Mr. Pearson is laying down the law with fire and fury after a breakdown of all-party talks on a firm agenda for the next month.

Well, the fire and the fury have turned into smoke which has camouflaged the real intention of the Liberal government. A month later we read the following headline in the Montreal Gazette: "Free Flag Vote—Pearson Calls Off the Whips". What was the reason for this? Let us consider another headline which appeared in the Chronicle-Telegraph on August 12—"Election on Flag Could Kill Liberals". So perhaps there are various political reasons why the Prime Minister has been vacillating and changing his mind. But those reasons are not based on principles; they are not based on the interest of national unity. They are based directly on the political advantages the right hon. gentleman had hoped to gain by being the one who would bring in a distinctive national flag. He was leader of the opposition when the former prime minister, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) brought in the bill of rights. That is a great monument to my hon. friend. But there is no monument to the right hon. gentleman, the present Prime Minister, and there is not likely to be one if we can judge from the performance of the party opposite.

At the beginning of my remarks I spoke about unity. I referred to the position taken then by the right hon. gentleman when he said that if elected prime minister he would ask the people of Canada to express their views on this matter and leave it up to them.

Mr. Winkler: That is all we are asking.

Mr. Slogan: Even if this issue were completely removed from the House of Commons I do not think it would be any great loss to the country. In fact, Le Devoir on August 22 had something to say in this regard. I quote from a translation:

> Let us not deplore the possible death of the Pearson project. The adoption of this project is not a matter of life or death for this country.
> Let us rather deplore the inconsistencies of a chief of government who in May last drew premature praise from us though events now force us to realize that in a matter of principle he is somewhat lost in a fog.

I wish the Prime Minister were in his place. He is very seldom there. I do not think he really likes the House of Commons.

Mr. Grégoire: What about you?

Mr. Slogan: You are not in your seat, either.

Mr. Grégoire: I am here, though.

Mr. Slogan: Not all there.

Mr. Winch: The Prime Minister has work to do, though.

Mr. Slogan: I have said it is difficult to achieve a unifying symbol in a country which itself is not unified. I claim that the country today is not united. It does not take a magnifying glass to see that. This confederation of ours seems to be bursting at every seam. The Prime Minister, in bringing forward this issue, has sown the seeds of discord across this country.

Mr. Grégoire: That has been said at least 600 times before.

Mr. Slogan: I deplore the fact that this issue has become an issue between the French speaking and the Anglo-Saxon Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Slogan: It is obvious and I could prove my contention if some hon. members would contain themselves.

Mr. Winkler: Who is saying "no"? Ask yourselves that question.

Mr. Dupuis: That issue divided your party, not Canada.

Mr. Winkler: I simply asked: who is saying "no"?

An hon. Member: It is dividing the Liberal party.

Mr. Dupuis: Your party is divided, not Canada.

Mr. Slogan: If the federal members from Quebec who believe in democracy would allow me to speak I will finish what I have to say.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Slogan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) has always demonstrated that he has more brains in his seat than on his feet, and I ask him to contain himself.

Mr. Grégoire: Now you are right. Now I agree with you.

Mr. Slogan: Canada is made up of several groups of people—the Anglo-Saxons, the French and those of the third element. One of the reasons I am in favour of a referendum is that I think the Anglo-Saxon and the French fact has been played up out of all proportion. In my riding the Slavic and the German people are twice as numerous as are the Anglo-Saxons and the French. In this debate I am trying to portray some of their views. We have no antipathy toward either of those other groups. In fact we consider ourselves good Canadians and we consider our French neighbours and our Anglo-Saxon neighbours to be good Canadians, too. I grew up in a community where we began the morning in school by singing "O Canada" and ended it by singing "God Save the Queen".

We had no antipathy to either of those anthems. For a while we had the union jack flying over us; then we had the red ensign. We had as much devotion for one as for the other. I hope that as good Canadians, if any other design is voted for, we would show the same devotion to it. But, Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the views of all Canadians could be presented in this house without their being called down, because I as a gentleman object to that type of behaviour in this house.

Mr. Grégoire: Be serious. Ready for the question.

Mr. Slogan: It is quite true that the Liberal party has modified its stand on this question a number of times and—

Mr. Grégoire: You said that two minutes ago.

Mr. Leboe: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think this has gone on long enough and it is not contributing anything to the debate. This hon. member, who is now sitting at the back here, is piping away and piping away, and I am getting fed up with it.

Mr. Churchill: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I want to reinforce what has just been said. Special privileges in this house are being allowed the member for Lapointe and I think it is high time standing order 12(1) was applied in order that we may have the maintenance of order and decorum in this house. The member for Lapointe is the worst offender and yet he has not been called to order by the Speaker. He should be named and put out of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Starr: Nobody would miss him.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Actually, I believe that the worst offenders against the rules of the house are the Conservatives who rehash continuously the same things, and we cannot help but bring it to their attention. They have reached the point of stupidity, and we show them they are being ridiculous. They should be expelled from the house.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The point raised by hon. members is well taken, but I believe I should bring to the attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that the hon. member who interrupted was brought to order on a number of occasions in the course of the speech now being made by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Slogan).

Mr. Churchill: No, not once.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would ask the co-operation of the hon. member for Lapointe in allowing the hon. member who has the floor to continue and conclude his speech without interruption.

Mr. Grégoire: Yes, Mr. Speaker; but he does not have to repeat himself.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Mr. Slogan: Mr. Speaker, if anybody has repeated himself for the umpteenth time in this house, it is the hon. member.

Mr. Starr: And he has said nothing.

Mr. Slogan: I would hope he would bear the same good will toward me as a member of a minority group from the prairies as I bear toward him as a member of French Canadian origin from Quebec.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on that point I would like to take—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Springfield has the floor. If the hon. member for Lapointe wants to raise a question of privilege or a point of order he will have to be recognized by the Chair; but I would suggest it might be more appropriate to extend to the hon. member the courtesy of concluding his remarks.

Mr. Grégoire: On a question of privilege, then, I would like to say to the hon. member for Springfield that I have nothing personal against him, that I admire him very much; but I cannot approve of the way that whole group is acting.

Mr. Churchill: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Springfield.

Mr. Slogan: Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my remarks very shortly because I think my time is just about up. As I said at the very beginning, I am not here to fan any fires of racial hatred or anything else. I am speaking as a Canadian who loves his country, wants to see his country united, wants to see his country prosper in the world, and wants to see Canadians able to hold their heads high when they talk about their country. I believe I am expressing some of the views which should be taken to heart by all members of parliament. I think that in a spirit of good will we can thrash this question out, but it is perfectly obvious that this House of Commons cannot reach a decision on this matter without creating a great deal more disunity, without creating a great deal more animosity and bitterness and without opening many more wounds in the flesh of this country. I do not want to see this happen. I think we should have unity. I believe we as a parliament have failed our country by not being more unanimous in our views on this subject; but those views, though they are not unanimous, are strongly and loyally held in the interests of Canada. For this reason I believe this question should be referred to Canadians themselves who should have the opportunity of reaching a final decision on the matter.

It would be easy for me, perhaps, to cast more ridicule, to fan more fires, and perhaps this would win me a few votes from one side or the other; but it would really do very little toward solving the problem before us. After all, a man must indeed be very small if he would sell his convictions for a few votes which might re-elect him to a House of Commons that is bitter and rudderless. To serve in such a house would indeed be a very empty prize. I do not believe we should allow that type of disunity to be the result of the question before us, and because of this I sincerely recommend to the Prime Minister and the house that they support our call for a national plebiscite.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. Millar).

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. C. E. Millar (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate for the second time I cannot help making a comment regarding our friends in the other parties who are continually saying, "Question, question". I cannot help feeling that this indicates the type of consideration we would get from those people if by any unfortunate chance they ever formed the government of this country. I think the fact that I have only spoken in this house on only two occasions indicates that I have been somewhat reluctant to express my views with regard to the flag issue.

I am well aware that this parliament is subject to considerable criticism because of the extended debate on the question of a new flag for this country. However, whenever I have an opportunity to speak to these same critics I generally try and pin them down by asking this question, "Do you accept the present design for a new flag for the Dominion of Canada as proposed by the Prime Minister of this country?" The immediate answer, of course, is "No". It is true that many of them believe we should have a new flag, but those who accept the present proposed design are very few. I then go on to indicate to these same people that in so far as the official opposition in this house are concerned, we are faced with one alternative and one alternative only. We are in the position where we either accept this flag or continue to debate it. I think I can safely speak for this party when I say that we choose to continue the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There are conversations across the aisle, passing between hon. members. I took the liberty yesterday to bring this to the attention of the house and I do so again. It is rather unbecoming and certainly offends the dignity of the house. I would ask hon. members to desist from this practice.

Mr. Millar: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is possible that these hon. members cannot hear me. The present Conservative amendment suggests that the people of Canada are entitled to the opportunity of indicating their feelings regarding a new flag for this country. I do not think this is unreasonable. I do not think it is undemocratic. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the present government is in a very delicate position; I repeat, a very delicate position.

Mr. Choquette: Your party is in a disastrous position.

Mr. Millar: Should the privilege of asking questions be restored this house, that position would be made quite apparent and some of our friends across the way who are now laughing might possibly consider the matter not quite so humorous. This government does not command the support of the majority of the voters of Canada. It is a minority government and I question its right to attempt to force upon the people of Canada, and the correctness of its attempting to force upon the people of Canada, a flag design which is not acceptable.

The present Prime Minister during the last election campaign—

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I should like to call your attention especially to subsection 2 of standing order 34 which reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker or the chairman, after having called the attention of the house, or of the committee, to the conduct of a member who persists in irrelevance, or repetition, may direct him to discontinue his speech—

Mr. Speaker, do you not feel that the remarks made the hon. member have been repeated over and over again?

In fact, those statements have been constantly repeated in the house and I would ask you, under standing order 34 (2) to direct the hon. member to discontinue his speech because he is constantly repeating himself.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Caouette: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that, with his knowledge, the hon. member for Lapointe could translate without too much trouble from French to Greek, so that Conservative members would understand precisely what he is doing at present.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Middlesex East.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to give a ruling on this matter.

Do you not feel that what the hon. member is repeating has already been said?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has listened to the point of order of the hon. member for Lapointe.

The remarks that the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. Millar) is making now seem pertinent to me. Besides, I have noted that his speech, up to this stage, had the character of an introduction, and I presume that in due time he will come to the amendment now before us.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order and your ruling—

Mr. Lambert: There is no appeal from the ruling, no comments to be made.

Mr. Caouette: No, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I can make comments, to say that there is no need to make repetitions at this stage.

When the hon. member for Winnipeg North South—

An hon. Member: Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Caouette: —or South Centre rises over and over again to ask you to call to order hon. members who repeat what other members have said, I think that it is time now for you to decide whether the hon. member who has the floor is in order or not. Personally, I feel that he is not, because he repeats what others have already said.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has already made its decision to the effect that it is satisfied, for the time being at least, that the hon. member who has the floor is in order.

[Text]

Mr. Millar: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If there is any member in this house who, to the disgust of us all, repeats himself more than anyone it is the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire).

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member who has the floor will want to co-operate with the Chair and try to limit his remarks to the subject matter of the debate.

Mr. Millar: With all respect, Mr. Speaker, I think I had just stated—and I will repeat it for the benefit of the hon. member for Lapointe—that the present Conservative amendment proposes that the people of Canada shall have the opportunity of indicating in a democratic way whether or not they want a new flag for Canada. If that is not pertinent to the present amendment then I am prepared to apologize to the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, in paragraph 2 of standing order 34 it is also indicated that a member may not repeat things already said. That was the basis for my point of order and what the hon. member just said has been repeated at least 200 times in this house.

Indeed, you are aware of it yourself because listening to it seems to be boring you.

Therefore, you should endeavour to see to it that the same thing is not repeated too often. Indeed, those things were not repeated two, three, five or six times, but at least 200 times to date, and it is on that point that I am asking you to call the hon. member to order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has made a ruling on that.

I think that the hon. member for Lapointe is giving a somewhat too strict interpretation of the standing order he is referring to. In fact, during a debate I think it is obvious that hon. members making contributions must necessarily repeat to a certain extent arguments put forward by other hon. members taking part in the same debate.

The hon. member who has the floor now is referring to the motion itself and it seems to me that he cannot be accused of repetition, and it is on that point that the hon. member for Lapointe based his point of order.

The Chair's ruling is that the hon. member for Middlesex East is entitled to repetition and that he should be allowed to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise once again on a point of order.

Even though, according to your ruling, the hon. member has the right to repeat himself, I must point out that we are considering an amendment concerning the flag issue, namely whether a plebiscite should or should not be held.

Well, the hon. member does not speak to the point at all. He has been speaking of everything except the plebiscite. Now, this afternoon—

[Text]

Mr. Winkler: There are all kinds of other things involved.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: —the Conservative deputy leader suggested that closure be applied and that the vote be taken immediately—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not feel there is any point of order in the remarks just made by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette).

I followed as closely as possible the remarks of the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. Millar). They seem entirely relevant to the amendment now before the house and I ask the hon. member for Villeneuve to co-operate in allowing the hon. member who has the floor to proceed with his speech.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the hon. member for Middlesex East—

Mr. Dupuis: Est-milieu.

Mr. Caouette: —being heard. I simply abide by the standing order which requires—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Villeneuve is only repeating the argument he put forward a moment ago.

The Chair is perfectly aware of the standing order the hon. member is referring to and will see to it that it is respected should it feel the hon. member for Middlesex East is violating it.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, again on a point of order. The hon. member does not keep at all—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

The hon. member for Villeneuve is raising for the third time the same point of order on which the Chair gave a ruling.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to appeal your ruling, I just want to say that the hon. member who has the floor must respect the rules of the house.

Mr. Lambert: You too.

Mr. Caouette: I hear the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) tell me that I too—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member who has the floor must, of course, follow the rules of the house, and the hon. member for Villeneuve must do so also.

Since there was a ruling on that point, I shall ask the latter to abide by it so that the hon. member who has the floor may proceed with his remarks.

[Text]

Mr. Millar: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There seems to be some difference of opinion as to whom I must satisfy in this house—you, Your Honour, or the self-appointed speaker we have in the Créditiste party. I have no difficulty in making a decision in this regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This is not a point of order, but a question of privilege.

Is the hon. member entitled to mention my interventions concerning the nature of his remarks, the speech he is delivering, which is entirely irrelevant to the matter we are discussing at this moment, that is the amendment to decide whether or not we should hold a plebiscite in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to give a ruling on this point.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Middlesex East.

Mr. Millar: Thank you again, Mr. Speaker. I was about to suggest that the present Prime Minister came to the city of London during the election campaign and spoke to some 5,000 people, all good Canadians, though not my supporters, yet he made no mention of a new flag for Canada at that time.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Millar: That is true.

Mr. Caouette: Talk about the plebiscite. Order.

Mr. Millar: What I have said is the fact.

Some hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. Millar: Perhaps I should resign. If the hon. member will keep quiet I will repeat what I have said.

Mr. Caouette: Oh, no, do not repeat.

Mr. Millar: The present Conservative amendment proposes that the people of Canada shall have the opportunity of indicating in a democratic way whether or not they want a new flag for Canada. Does that satisfy the hon. member?

An hon. Member: You read very well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Canadian Flag

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Villeneuve raising a point of order?

Mr. Caouette: Yes, I am raising a point of order.

What has this vote to do with the amendment we are now discussing, namely: Are we in favour of a plebiscite or not?

The hon. member should confine his remarks to that question.

The flag issue, the design of the flag are irrelevant.

The fact that we should have a distinctive national flag is completely irrelevant to the Conservative amendment which calls for the holding of a plebiscite.

Let the hon. member tell us why he is in favour of a plebiscite or against it.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps that will satisfy the hon. member but it does not satisfy the Chair. The hon. member at this moment is obviously inviting trouble, and I would ask him to co-operate with the Chair, because the rules of this house apply also to him. Will he please limit his remarks to the subject we have before us.

Mr. Millar: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Am I allowed to indicate that I appreciate the extension of my time provided by the interjections of hon. members.

Last Monday in the city of London I had the opportunity of speaking to some 160 school children. It was suggested that I speak on the flag issue. I submit that this subject is relevant. I was hesitant in speaking about this matter in view of the controversial nature of the debate now taking place in this house. However, I attempted to give the history of the flag debate up to this time, including an outline of the method of selection used by the flag committee. At that time I had three photographs of the proposed designs. The suggestion was made that these pupils from grades 6, 7 and 8 be given the opportunity of voting on the various designs. I indicated my agreement with this proposal, but unfortunately I had forgotten to bring a copy of the red ensign, which is presently Canada's flag.

Mr. Caouette: It is not.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Millar: However, that was soon remedied.

An hon. Member: It is so.

Mr. Plourde: It is not.

Mr. Millar: I think it is relevant and pertinent that I indicate the results of this vote.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Millar: The Pearson pennant, which has been rejected, received 55 votes. The composite design received 18 votes. The single maple leaf design, which is the current proposal, received three votes, and the red ensign received 85 votes.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to the point of order.

I notice that for a quarter of an hour the present speaker has been scratching his back against the desk behind him; he falters, the words fail him, he says nothing, he does not know what to say. In that case, he should sit down and let us vote.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I recognize the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Brewin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I suggest to hon. members that even if the member for Middlesex East is being slightly repetitive and irrelevant this is not new, so we might as well be patient and listen to what he has to say without further interruptions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Villeneuve has suggested that the remarks of the hon. member who has the floor are not relevant. It is the opinion of the Chair that the argument he advanced is, to a considerable extent, irrelevant to the matter of the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It seems to me that the argument he has advanced would indicate that he is proceeding by induction in the same way the hon. member for Lapointe did yesterday.

Mr. Millar: I thank you again, Mr. Speaker. In self-defence I should like to say to the member who has just suggested I do not know what I am talking about, that if he will give me an opportunity to do so, I will show him that I do know what has been happening.

I am speaking about the plebiscite, Mr. Speaker, and that seems to be a pertinent subject. I had just finished indicating the results of a plebiscite held in a classroom in the city of London. The point I should like to make at this time is that if the results of this vote are any indication of the feelings of the people in my riding then I have every right to be standing in this house and speaking in the manner in which I am speaking.

Mr. Grégoire: No.

Mr. Winkler: Certainly.

Mr. Caouette: Why not vote on the amendment?

Mr. Millar: Why don't you fellows go outside and settle the argument and let me talk?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to the hon. member that he direct his remarks to the Chair. The Chair is listening very attentively to them.

Mr. Millar: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. You are absolutely right. I suggest that other people in the house should do likewise rather than addressing their remarks to me. Following the ballot held in this schoolroom I gave the children the opportunity of asking questions which I answered to the best of my ability in a strictly non-political way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Millar: Well, I was at least fair enough to suggest to that class that the next member of parliament who addressed them might be of a different political faith than that represented by myself. To get back to the questions, there was one question I could not answer. A young lad about 10 years of age spoke up and said: "Mr. Millar, why do the people of Canada not have the opportunity to vote on the new flag?" What I should have done was suggest that he direct that question to the Prime Minister of the country.

The present government has tried to justify the introduction of this controversial issue on the ground that it will unite Canada. I suggest that if the division throughout Canada is indicated by the division in this house and the present controversy, the Prime Minister of the country has done the greatest disservice he could possibly do, and that the only way the situation can be remedied is to take this issue out of the House of Commons.

I for one, Mr. Speaker, question the design of the present flag. I question the sincerity of the present leader of the government. Where is the Prime Minister who stood up and said: "I support the tri-maple leaf flag and I am prepared to have my government stand or fall on that design"?

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Millar: Where are those few members on the government side who stood up and took up the time of the house trying to justify that design as having historical significance, and as being the only flag design acceptable in this situation? Where are they today? Where are those members of the government who blindly support the government and refuse to stand up in the House of Commons and justify their position? Are those the people who continually say "question, question", and are prepared to vote blindly?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Millar: Mr. Speaker, as I said before, I question the design of this flag.

Mr. Grégoire: Dispense.

Mr. Millar: In support of my stand I should like to read a letter into the record. I think all members should listen to this, particularly those French Canadian members who are so interested in interrupting me. This letter is written by one, Lord Elgin, at Quebec. The date of the letter is September, 1847.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am wondering whether that letter is relevant to the amendment before us.

Mr. Millar: If it is not relevant I am prepared to have it struck from the record. It is dated Quebec, September 27, 1847 and is written by one, Lord Elgin.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Reading letters dating from 1845 or 1847 is really too much. Do you think the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. Millar) abides by the rules? We of the Ralliement Créditistes, as well as some members of other parties have both feet on the ground. People ask why the Tories are filibustering; it is precisely because they are up in the clouds, they balk. We expressly object to this letter being read, and we request that the hon. member be called to order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I see that the hon. member for Quebec West shares the apprehension of the Chair as to whether this letter is relevant to the debate or not. However, it is not easy to give a ruling before the letter has been read, at least in part.

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, as this letter goes back to 1847, that is over a century ago, it is exactly the reason why I object to its being read.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Middlesex East has the floor. As part of his argument he proposes to read a letter which may be perfectly relevant, or which may possibly be relevant to the debate. It is impossible for the Chair to determine that until the letter has been read, or referred to to some extent. I would invite the hon. member to continue his remarks and perhaps as he proceeds to read the letter it may be easier for the Chair to make a decision.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand that the hon. member for Middlesex East is reading to us a letter dating back to 1847. Does he imply that we in the House of Commons are Indians? What does he mean by his letter?

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Mr. Speaker will have the privilege of rendering a decision on this interesting point tomorrow.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 10, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

CANADIAN FLAG

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, December 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Batten that the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Monteith.

Mr. C. E. Millar (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of the debate at six o'clock last night I was questioning the authority of this minority government to impose a new flag on the people of Canada without giving them the opportunity of indicating their feelings in this regard. Further to that and in support of this position I would like to read into the record a letter dated Quebec, September 27, 1847.

Mr. Grégoire: Dispense.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I ask the hon. member whether the letter is relevant to the question of a plebiscite that we are discussing at the present time.

Mr. Millar: I consider it so, Mr. Speaker. Should you rule that it should be stricken from the record, I am prepared to accept your decision. This is an authentic copy of a letter taken from the public archives of Canada reproduced as one of a series appearing weekly in the London Free Press. It is from one James Bruce, Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, to Earl Grey, dated Quebec, September 27, 1847, and reads as follows:

My Dear Grey:

I write from Quebec and shall not trouble you with a long letter. We have been well received here. The St. Georges and St. Jean Baptiste societies turning out together for the first time and the president of the former wearing the maple leaf, the Canadian French emblem...

I repeat, Mr. Speaker:

—wearing the maple leaf, the Canadian French emblem...

My question, Mr. Speaker, is this. Is it the intention of the Prime Minister, the leader of a minority government, to destroy a Canadian flag bearing the heraldic symbols of all the founding races of this country and substitute a flag bearing the traditional symbol of only one of these founding races? The Prime Minister has suggested that the prime purpose of the introduction of this flag in the House of Commons at this time is that a new flag will serve to unite all of Canada. With this principle I think all Canadians agree, but with the method adopted and with this suggested design many of us disagree.

Again I ask, Mr. Speaker: surely the Prime Minister of this country does not seek unity under a distinctive Canadian flag in a design such as now proposed, which in effect destroys all reference to the Anglo-Saxon traditions, substituting for this present flag a new flag design bearing only a single maple leaf which was recognized 120 years ago as the Canadian French emblem. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that our French Canadian members in this House of Commons would not support this position. They themselves have stated on many previous occasions that they are not anxious to have the fleur-de-lis, the traditional emblem of France, as a part of a new Canadian flag, similar to the flag design presently used in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Grégoire: Question.

Mr. Millar: I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this is more than just a debate on a new flag for Canada. The way this house is divided at present indicates that there is a basic principle at stake. Those members who support the government on every division indicate that they would be prepared to support any design as a new flag for Canada. Their attitude seems to indicate the feeling "Who cares about a new flag for Canada or what the design shall be? Let us vote and get the issue over with". I suggest that there is a much deeper issue involved and that those members who so freely call "Question, question", indicating that they are prepared to vote, are by the same token indicating that they are prepared to deny that same right to the people of Canada.

Mr. Caouette: No, sir, that is not right. That is stupid.

Mr. Millar: The hon. member for Lapointe has had someone tabulate the number of times the word "plebiscite" has been used in this debate. He further quotes statistics in this regard as to the possible waste of time in this house. I should like to suggest to him that if a similar tabulation was kept of the number of times the word "Quebec" had been used in this house he would not find the comparison quite so humorous.

In this same regard, I deplore the remarks that follow when one of the French Canadian members of this party stands to indicate his support for this party in a division. Surely any hon. member who has the courage of his convictions and is prepared to stand up and be counted for or against his party is entitled to that same decency and courtesy which is due to any hon. member of this house. I for one respect the right of any member in this regard, and I do not feel that a member deserves the boos and catcalls of his fellow members.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Millar: I am pleased to hear that some of the hon. gentlemen opposite are satisfied. I feel the same way, I can assure you.

It would appear that the government is determined to follow this course of destruction, or should I say desecration, of the red ensign. If such is the case; if this government is prepared to ignore the people of Canada and their basic democratic right to indicate their feelings in this matter, may I make one final plea to the Prime Minister. When the Canadian red ensign is finally taken down from the peace tower of the House of Commons, could that red ensign be placed in a position of honour in the memorial chamber of the same peace tower, to indicate that those Canadians who served in Canada's armed forces have not died in vain and that they have not been entirely forgotten by the grateful people of Canada.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a motion for concurrence in a report of a committee moved by the chairman, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten), and an amendment moved by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith). I should like immediately to ask the government what is its position in this regard. The Prime Minister has not made the government's position clear. Does the government accept the recommendation of the committee, and will the flag recommended be the flag of Canada? If the report is concurred in, will the government take action to make this new flag the flag of Canada? Those are some of the things about which the house has a right to know.

What action will be taken by the government to carry out the terms of the order in council of 1945 which clearly set out that the red ensign shall be flown as the distinctive flag of Canada until parliament otherwise directs? These are things we would like to know, for in the intervening months since the Prime Minister made his speech in the house, at which time he said it was a solemn and historic moment in the history of Canada, these questions have not been answered.

Naturally there are a number of other questions that come to mind. What of the three leaf flag? Has it been dropped by the government? Does the Prime Minister now reject the three leaf flag that was the cornerstone of his argument then? These are things we want to know. However, all we have found out as yet is that the government and those associated with them seem agreed on only one thing, namely that whatever the national flag of Canada may be they are almost unanimous in the view that under no circumstances shall it in any way reveal or show or exemplify the symbols of our British or French sovereignty, or the heritage of our past. The Prime Minister has said that the flag to be determined on will be one that will bring about unity within this country. The experience of the last few months has been that while unity was promised, division has been the offspring.

I commence with that general challenge to the Prime Minister to answer these questions that are in the hearts and minds of the Canadian people. The house will agree, I am sure, when I say that while the debate has gone on for some weeks the viewpoint of the government has never been given since the declaration made by the Prime Minister in June, at which time he made it clear that the three maple leaf design with the two blue bars was the only flag for Canada. It had history, heritage, dedication, as well as a declaration behind it of His Majesty George V. None of these things is apparent today in the recommendation of the committee.

I refer for a moment to the report of the committee to lay the foundation for my argument in connection with the need for a plebiscite for Canada and for Canadians, believing that a plebiscite should encompass not only those who ordinarily would be permitted to vote on the occasion of a general election but as well all Canadians 18 years and over; for the younger Canadians will be the ones who will live the longest under whatever flag is determined upon.

Now, it is of interest that in the committee a motion for a national plebiscite was defeated by a vote of 9 to 5. It is of even greater interest that the adoption of only one national flag was carried by a vote of 14 to 0, only to be altered later apparently following further discussion and deliberation; that the red ensign was not to be the national flag of Canada was determined by a vote of the committee of 10 to 4. Those four were the Conservative members of that committee.

Then, finally, an elimination took place. All this is necessary if one is to understand fully the need for a plebiscite. An elimination took place, and I should like to quote from the committee report so there will be no misunderstanding. There were two classes of flags; class B, those containing one maple leaf, and class C, those containing the union jack and/or the fleur-de-lis. I quote from the report:

> Elimination by an agreed procedure left only one design in each category. A vote for the retention of each finalist was then taken with the following results:
> A—The three maple leaf design was retained by a vote of 8 to 6;
> B—The single maple leaf design was retained by a vote of 13 to 1;
> C—The design containing the union jack and/or the fleur-de-lis was rejected by a vote of 9 to 5.
> A vote was then taken to determine the committee's preference between the design containing three maple leaves and the design containing one maple leaf. The single maple leaf design was retained by a vote of 14 to 0.

It is made perfectly clear by that vote that it was a preference as between two designs that were before the committee. This is the committee report in part, most of which will have to be, as we say, placed before the Canadian people. It was then moved:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to provide that the Canadian red ensign may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canada's membership in the commonwealth of nations and of her allegiance to the crown. An amendment was moved to substitute the words "royal union flag, generally known as the union jack" for the words "Canadian red ensign."
> The amendment carried by a vote of 7 yeas, 2 nays and 5 abstentions.

There is the background of the matter set out objectively and fairly by quotations from the committee report. What actually happened was that the committee expressed a preference, as I said a moment ago, for the single leaf in an elimination process over the three leaf flag that the government had advanced as its design the first time.

Now, sir, I want to refer to the stand we took on November 9 as to the course that might be adopted, following the report of the committee. I am quoting from page 9877 of Hansard of November 9, 1964:

> We were unable to agree with the suggestion that we should apply to ourselves a self imposed closure, but my own feeling is this. In so far as the flag debate is concerned, this represents the views of my caucus, the caucus of the Conservative party—
> I think quite a number wish to express themselves on this matter. That does not mean they will be repeating themselves more than once, but they have their views to express and they do not intend to have imposed on them anything in the nature of closure, other than, of course, if the government chooses in its wisdom to bring about that measure; and we will come to that matter if it arises. We do feel however, that in order to expedite the business of the house Canadians as a whole would expect us to vote on the question whether there should be a plebiscite.

Then I went on to ask consideration for that view. Now I want to summarize our position on the report. We cannot accept the recommendation contained therein. The Social Credit party, with one or two exceptions, accept it. The socialist party—they have a maple leaf on their literature—will accept it with one or two exceptions. The Créditistes embrace it because they do not want anything connected with the British tradition on the flag of this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: During the progress of that committee we made alternative suggestions with which I shall deal later on. We wanted to bring about in a spirit of compromise the assurance that what would be arrived at would meet with general support across Canada. What was advanced in the committee by the Conservative representatives after the red ensign had been turned down was a design I did not know of and of which I was never informed; I had no information about it until I read a report which a member of that committee gave to the press before that committee reported.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was advanced by our members, after first standing on the red ensign, was a flag consisting of two red bars, one bearing the union jack and in the other the fleur-de-lis and in the centre a maple leaf on a white background, in other words representing the two original races of our nation unified with all the other races by the maple leaf. That is what they tried to bring about, again without success.

I would emphasize this fact; that during the entire progress of the committee I refrained from discussing this question with members of that committee so they would not feel in any way that the course they were to follow was dictated in any manner, shape or form. Now we have before us a flag—

Mr. Deachman: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, and it is a serious one. Mention has been made of an article I wrote and of the fact that there was no communication on the part of the right hon. gentleman with anybody before the decision of the committee was brought down. I have in my hand the Globe and Mail for Friday, October 3 and I wish to read the following—

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is not a question of privilege. I never mentioned the hon. member. Has he a guilty conscience?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Yesterday when the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra rose on a question of privilege I referred him to Beauchesne, citation 145, which is to the effect that when a member makes a statement it should be accepted by the house. If other members are not prepared to accept such a statement they have to bring a motion and take responsibility for it.

No charge has been made against the hon. member so far in the address of the Leader of the Opposition, and if citation 145 protects the hon. member to my right surely it would operate in this case, too.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is perfectly and patently clear that the Conservative members of the committee in introducing their alternative, after the refusal of the committee to accept the red ensign, changed or altered their submission in order to show not only the British tradition of our country but the French as well. They did that to indicate the degree of entire objectivity which characterized the Conservative representation on that committee.

That is the background to the question. I now ask the house—and I intend to answer the question—why do we want a plebiscite? Sir, it is because there is division within our country—

Mr. Grégoire: You have made it.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, the prattlers prattle, but we had nothing to do with introducing the flag question. Did we bring this matter before the house? Has it become a divisive action for a party in the House of Commons to stand against a proposal which a government advances when that proposal does not represent the views of millions of Canadians?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are calling for a plebiscite because we trust the people of Canada to arrive at some decision which will be generally acceptable. I believe this with all my heart, that if this matter were allowed by the government to stand in abeyance, no one suggesting any retreat or departure or deviation from the parliamentary course; if it were allowed to stand and if at the next general election a number of questions were asked in a plebiscite, then whatever was believed by a majority in this country as shown by such a plebiscite would be acceptable to all Canadians, because we are all desirous of bringing about unity in the national purpose and for national ends.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Grégoire: Not true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I cannot translate into understandable words those interruptions, but no doubt they are intelligible to the hon. gentleman who is making them.

Sir, there are many people in this country who want the red ensign. There are many others who want a red ensign with a change therein so as to recognize the contribution made by the two original races. Some there are who, convinced by months of propaganda, now want the three maple leaf design. After all, it was a concept which was widely advertised, and it was placed on stamps by coincidence. There are Canadians who like that design. Certainly the Post Office Department, though I admit the Postmaster General did not know anything about this—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —had that stamp issued. It was just what some call the purest of coincidence, in keeping with the fact that ministers opposite apparently do not communicate with one another or pass on information.

My correspondence shows there are fewer people who want the one maple leaf design, the recommendation of the committee. You can understand that. You cannot expect the Canadian people to be able to follow the peregrinations of a government which started out with a three maple leaf flag, said it was the only true Canadian design, that it was based on history, heraldry and structure, and then changed its mind. One hon. member said it was a flag design that was sanctified as well; he stated that it was full of historic meaning, symbolic validity and national appeal. It was, he said, the only flag that could be accepted.

I point out that we asked for a plebiscite as far back as May 20. When I asked for a plebiscite and it was suggested there should be a submission of the question to the people by way of referendum, the Prime Minister said that course would not be followed. All the way along we took the stand that, after all, it is the people who are going to live under this flag who should have a say as to the nature and design of that flag.

So that the record will be complete, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that on July 22, when speaking on the national television network, I said we wanted the people of Canada to have a say in the matter. I suggested that a plebiscite be granted to the Canadian people in order that we could determine their wishes. I said that such a plebiscite could take place at the next general election. Among the questions to be asked—and I set them out—I suggested: Are you in favour of the red ensign? Are you in favour of the red ensign with changes made thereon to show both heritages? Are you in favour of the three maple leaves joined together?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Grégoire: No.

Mr. Woolliams: Listen to the conscientious objectors.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, a few short weeks ago those who now prate and interrupt were in favour of that which today they condemn.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I also suggested the question: Are you in favour of one maple leaf? Since then I would also add: Are you in favour of that which was presented as an alternative and a compromise by the Conservative members of the flag committee?

Mr. Grégoire: No, no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it is just an echo I am hearing, but it certainly is not intelligible.

Mr. Grégoire: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): It is a reflection on Quebec, I'll tell you that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hold to the opinion that order and decorum in this House of Commons is extremely important. It is in the tradition of our two races, and it should be maintained. It is incorporated in our standing orders. I would refer to standing order 35:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of Her Majesty, nor of any of the royal family, nor of His Excellency or the person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof.

May I appeal to hon. members that when an officer of the house in the person of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is making a speech, which no doubt is quite a physical effort, he should be given due respect and attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind questions at all, but it is difficult to speak against a cacophony. It is like a symphony continuing while one speaks.

Mr. Nowlan: One of the broken ones.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

An hon. Member: Sit down, little squirt.

Mr. Grégoire: —may I ask a question—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I had come to the point where I said that included in the plebiscite should be the design submitted by Conservative members as an alternative in order to bring members together, namely the one to which I referred earlier. There are some who say if we had a plebiscite we would divide this nation. Plebiscites have been held in the past that did not have that effect. Plebiscites are held on matters which have an emotional effect. Plebiscites have been recommended by such prime ministers as Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mr. Robert Borden—when he was in opposition—and Mr. Mackenzie King on matters that touch the heart and the sentiment of a people. No one can successfully argue that members of this parliament on either side have ever let the Canadian people know that, standing as they did for a distinctive flag—and I think each and every one did—what the Liberal party had in mind was a flag devoid of anything suggesting our British heritage or indeed our French heritage.

The arguments have changed in connection with the holding of a plebiscite. Your Honour will recall that the Prime Minister, when speaking in June, said it would take time; that was an argument against it. He said, speaking of the plebiscite of 1942 on conscription, that it required many months from the introduction of legislation on February 13, 1942 to the announcement of the result on May 11, 1942. That was the excuse in June, that it would take time. I do not think anyone will say any more that this excuse is tenable. On more than one occasion we advanced this idea. Some will say this would create discord in the nation; that elections, as the Prime Minister said, are by constituencies and that the cleavages would be highlighted in a plebiscite in the same manner as in an election. Well, Mr. Speaker, if there is any danger of dividing the country, that could be met by the votes being counted not by provinces but by a central committee, so there would be no indication as to how any one province voted but they would vote one and all as Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The next objection was that it would cost millions of dollars, $10 million and more. Nothing of the kind, if held at the time of a general election; and with all the billions of dollars that are being spent, if it did cost $10 million that would be a cheap expenditure to bring about within this nation a feeling of unity in this regard.

Would it be divisive? Is Ottawa divided as a result of the fluoridation and Sunday sport plebiscite of the other day? Every argument advanced is dissipated by the facts of life. We in this party trust the people. We want the people to have the right to speak. We want to know that whatever flag is chosen is the flag Canadians want, not one imposed by concealing from the Canadian people the true facts about the kind of distinctive flag they intended to advance. Now they are supported by their allies in this house.

That there is uncertainty about this is revealed by the fact that the government itself has changed its view. I do not want to recall in detail the change of viewpoint, but is it not a strange thing that a few months ago the government said "Three maple leaves or disunity in Canada"? Only Her Majesty's loyal opposition stood against that statement, and hon. gentlemen opposite called it obstruction. They said they had a design which would unite the Canadian people. Then when the committee met they swallowed their views and went contrary to that which they said was the only design for Canada.

The Prime Minister said that a one maple leaf design was not acceptable, that it would not be suitable, and I will refer to that in a moment. What happened? Why the change? During the months of May, June, July and August these hon. members opposite, with their allies, were talking in favour of the three maple leaf flag, describing it as the only one. Then suddenly, overnight as it were, they changed their attitude. Were they right when they tried to push down the throats of Canadians the three maple leaf flag? Were they consistent when they abdicated from their previous position? I would be glad to hear the answers to those questions.

I said a moment ago that they educated the people into believing that the three maple leaf flag was the only flag. Let us just review events for a moment, because this shows that these hon. members opposite did not know themselves where they stood. They were united in support of something they jettisoned at the first opportunity. They tell me that a plebiscite is not necessary. If, Mr. Speaker, a plebiscite had been taken of the views of government members in May, June, July and August they would all have voted in favour of the three maple leaf flag. But what do they say of it now? They have changed their views, a not unusual course on the part of this government.

Hon. gentlemen opposite started out on this education process on April 17 when, as I said a moment ago, the stamps were issued by the department of the Postmaster General. On April 17, when the Prime Minister was asked in the House of Commons whether this was the chosen design, the design elect, he said it was pure speculation. Yet all across Canada, on that day and on following days, a picture of the three maple leaf flag was printed in the newspapers.

Then on May 14 the Prime Minister unveiled his flag to newsmen, tastefully draped on the mantelpiece at Sussex drive. On May 14, when asked in the House of Commons whether this was going to be Canada's flag, he said that no decision had been made. On May 16 the Postmaster General explained in an interview the symbolism of the three maple leaf design, stating that one leaf represented the English, one represented the French and the third represented those of other origins. That was the view of someone in his department and was not the fact. It had no basis in fact, for one has only to—

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, the hon. gentleman cannot interrupt me now.

Mr. Speaker: The Postmaster General is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, this matter was raised during the last speech made by the right hon. gentleman. At that time I rose and stated that when his government were in power they issued a press release stating what the three maple leaves stood for. It was not this government which initiated that particular explanation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that statement came from the same department. All I have to say in that connection is that that was unadulterated nonsense. In 1868, when the coat of arms of Quebec bore three maple leaves on one stem, was anybody thinking at that time of other racial origins? In 1868 in the province of Ontario, when that design appeared on a memorial plate of Ontario, was anybody thinking then about this? They could have been thinking of those of German or Dutch origin, because there were some 220,000 of them in Canada; but this had no basis in fact. It was simply part of the softening process of this government to bring about a flag which the Prime Minister desired.

On May 17 the three maple leaf flag was unveiled before the Royal Canadian Legion. The Prime Minister disavowed the ensign and talked about his maple leaf flag. On May 18 he revealed the design to the press at Winnipeg. Then he denied in parliament that a decision had been made. On May 29 he brought the design before parliament, and then placed on the order paper a resolution containing two parts. This is a resolution which should be placed on the record because it indicates, Mr. Speaker, that the government did not know where it was going. One of the reasons we want to bring back a sense of reason is to give the Canadian people the opportunity of saying what in fact they want. The resolution then read:

> That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to establish officially as the flag of Canada a flag embodying the emblem proclaimed by His Majesty King George V on November 21, 1921—three maple leaves conjoined on one stem—in the colours red and white then designated for Canada, the red leaves occupying a field of white between vertical sections of blue on the edges of the flag—

The resolution also provided:

> —that the royal union flag, generally known as the union jack, may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canadian membership in the commonwealth of nations and of our allegiance to the crown.

Then, sir, on the basis of the authorities and by virtue of the power possessed by Your Honour, you divided that resolution into two resolutions.

During the progress of the debate—and this shows how uncertain the government has been of its stand—the members of the government marshalled all the arguments of heraldry. The Minister without Portfolio went into the flag business. He had 100,000 of them made. I do not know, in the bankruptcy proceedings in connection with these flag designs, who is responsible for them or whether they will be designated as plain ordinary furniture; all I know is that they said our opposition to the three maple leaf flag was disruptive of Canadian unity. They tried to bludgeon us. They tried to threaten us. First of all they said there would be an election. Then they talked of closure. But Her Majesty's loyal opposition stood for what it believed in; a matter of principle, not an expedient to be adopted to meet every changing wind of public opinion.

Hon. gentlemen opposite said that because they had a majority in parliament, with the help of their complacent supporters and the complacent support of third parties, therefore indeed they were infallible in their viewpoint. They could not help but be right. Walter Lippmann once said in this connection the idea that because you could command a majority, therefore you were right, is heresy. He said it was heresy to think a majority could do no wrong; that there is no higher truth than the transient opinion of contemporary majorities, and there is no higher law than the ambitions and manoeuvres of the persons the people are persuaded to elect. He said that was also heresy.

When the government found they could not push us around they changed their viewpoint from that which they held at the beginning, that unless this resolution was passed and everybody voted in the right way the vote would be regarded as a vote of nonconfidence. When the opposition took a strong stand they then said no, it will be a free vote. The freedom of that vote will be indicated by the attitude the members on that side have taken toward the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) who is treated almost as a pariah.

Why deny our historic past? Why say that we should not have on our national emblem something of the greatness of our past, and something of the French contribution? History tells the reason. In 1776 what could one expect of the French colonists in Canada of that day, who only had a few years under British rule, but that they would rebel? That is what the leaders of the army of the 13 colonies thought, but the French stood firm.

What happened in 1812 when the United States commander, General Hull, said to Canadians "You people surrender or things will be terrible because we will overrun you and destroy you"? The answer given by the French Canadians was "We shall not surrender. We stand behind those institutions which have given us freedom."

When I hear hon. members sitting opposite in this house, and some of those to my left, ridiculing the possession of British citizenship by Canadians, I am reminded of the words of Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, who occupied the position you occupy, Mr. Speaker, and who gave his 17 year old son on the field of sacrifice in the first world war. He said:

> If you ask me why I am a British subject, and why I wish to remain one, I reply...that I prize most those institutions that secure me most strongly in our rights and liberties; and am proud to be a sharer in that great work of advancing peace and progress throughout the world, for which the British empire stands.

That is the view of French Canada today among those who are being responsible in their positions.

Mr. Grégoire: Who said that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not speaking about that hon. gentleman; I am speaking about the great heart of French Canada. Is it not time that we recall something of the change of thinking on the part of the Prime Minister? On June 15 as recorded at page 4322 of Hansard he said this:

> Indeed, the three joined red maple leaves have for us a historic and heraldic significance which, in my view, make them preferable on a flag, to a single maple leaf which has not the same significance and has not, in fact, any formal emblematic authority—

What happened, Mr. Speaker? Do you expect the Canadian people led by ideas such as that not to be able to determine that they have been misled?

The Prime Minister then said in summary that heraldically and historically that was the only suitable flag, and I want to make this clear because this shows the political attitude of this government and their willingness to change their viewpoint. It is very much like the position of Mr. Dooley, who said "This is what I think, but if you do not agree with me I am prepared to change my view." One cannot run a government that way.

This is what the Prime Minister said when dealing again with the three maple leaves design:

> It is because this design has such a history and because, with the blue sea to sea border it makes a striking and beautiful flag, that the government is putting it before parliament in this resolution. The single maple leaf, I repeat, has not the same historical and heraldic significance even though it also, with the blue borders, I am told makes a very attractive flag.

That was what the Prime Minister said in June, that the blue borders indicating Canada from sea to sea in fact make the flag more attractive. Where are the blue borders on the flag proposed today that were so attractive in June? Then dealing with the argument about history the Prime Minister said:

> It is argued, Mr. Speaker, and I can appreciate the strength of the argument, that the flag of this resolution ignores our past. In my view it does not.

Then he said:

> In light of this, Mr. Speaker, can there be any doubt that the design recommended in the resolution is a proper one; with Canadian history, Canadian tradition and official sanction on the highest levels behind it?

The members on that side of the house do not themselves know what they want. What they argued in June they have repudiated in September. Yet had it not been for the Conservative party, as Her Majesty's loyal opposition, we would now have the flag of the three maple leaves design; and we might have had it on July 1, the original deadline. The government then thought it would be good to have that flag for the visit of the Queen in October, but again there was a postponement until Christmas.

Is it not clear from reading what was said by the Prime Minister that the arguments which we advanced had some basis in fact? If that is not so, why did the members of the Liberal party on that committee, without direction, without suggestion and without even telepathic consideration, suddenly see the light and decide that the views of the Prime Minister in June were entirely without basis in fact? Perhaps we are to interpret what took place as an indication that the Liberal members on that committee revolted against the Prime Minister's flag—perish the thought. Did they act with such unanimity because they had been given instructions? I suggest that was not the case.

They have now suggested that a plebiscite would be disruptive. I should like to refer to the criticism of the Progressive Conservative party for taking a stand on a plebiscite. We have been condemned and reviled, and called obstructionists.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, one can take a donkey and give him arguments, but one cannot give him the sense to understand.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I immediately assure you, Mr. Speaker, that had no reference to anyone. It was just a philosophical observation.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I think this is justified on my part, because we have heard enough falsehoods and lies this afternoon concerning what happened in the House of Commons during the last three or four months.

I think the leader of the official opposition is listening to me. When he said, a few moments ago, that, with the complacent support of the third parties in the house—he did mention us, if not by name, by implication—the three maple leaf flag was changed to a design with a single maple leaf, and that everybody had complied with the wishes of the government—

[Text]

Some hon. Members: Order.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: I can understand the Conservatives not enjoying having the facts thrown in their face, but they will get them nevertheless.

Mr. Speaker, the setting up of the parliamentary committee to consider the choice of a distinctive flag was suggested by the Leader of the Opposition and nobody else.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is no point of privilege. I have sat here and listened to this—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and all I say is that a speech is in order if the hon. gentleman wants to make it.

Mr. Speaker: I am quite sure that if the hon. member for Villeneuve wishes to take part in the debate he will have an opportunity in due course, but I do not see a point of privilege. No particular label or name of any particular party was used. The term could be applied to anyone in the chamber.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I entirely agree with you, Mr. Speaker, but I think you went a little wide there.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Villeneuve is really engaging in an argument, not a point of privilege. An opportunity will be provided in due course for the hon. member to take part in the debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, I do not intend to participate in this debate—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I am asking you whether one raises a question of privilege when one tries to prevent someone from lying in this house?

[Text]

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there was no such word used. I do not want to interpolate anything in my speech that might cause exacerbated feelings on the part of the hon. gentleman but if he is interested he might refer to what he said about various Liberal members now sitting in the government during the last election campaign. I will use those statements whenever the opportunity demands; I have them here. The hon. member speaks of words that shock his finer sensibilities. He referred to the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis), who certainly made the hon. member's life miserable during the last election campaign—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —as an imbecile, fool, animal, bloodsucker, and dishonest leader.

An hon. Member: For once he was right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With a flow of non-vituperative language like that I can understand that the hon. member would be shocked to associate himself with any animal. I could go into that at length but I really do not want to. It has been said that because we dared to take this stand we have therefore been obstructive. Because we have taken a stand on behalf of the Canadian people and their rights it has been said that we have held up parliament.

Canadian Flag

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All I have to say in that connection is that the Prime Minister spoke in Hamilton, and that was not the view he expressed there. In fact he said that the 22 days that had been spent on the flag debate before the committee was set up were not lost. He boasted at that time of what his government had achieved. He said that nothing was really lost because we would have had a vacation at the time if the house had not been sitting.

Again, there is the argument that it is costing Canada millions of dollars for the sitting of parliament. Sir, the members of this house receive their pay whether or not the house is sitting, and the total cost per week does not run into millions of dollars. I have mentioned the cost and the results. The Prime Minister made the situation perfectly clear when he set out in detail the tremendous record of achievement. So there will be no mistake, so that all may read, in his interview with Mr. Berton he said:

> We have spent 23 days in the House of Commons debating the flag, which I think is too long, but those 23 days were at a time when normally we would have been having a holiday so while we may have spent a long time we have not sacrificed parliamentary business in doing that.

I want to thank the Prime Minister for that clear and unequivocal statement, which clears up the situation. I have already dealt with what happened in the committee and I am not going to repeat what I have already said in that connection. However, I want to point out now that we in this party believe, with all Canadians, in a distinctive Canadian flag, but we say that such a flag should have thereon the union jack and we also say it should have thereon the fleur-de-lis. You say to me that the Conservative party is trying to impose its viewpoint on one province. Not at all. We are not trying to tell any province or any group of people what they should do. We are Canadians who put the nation first, and we ask that the Canadian people as a whole shall make the decision.

Let me tell you that I speak as one of mixed origin. I can look at both sides of the question. On one side I am of German and Dutch origin. My people came to Canada 150 years ago. The German people made their contribution to this country in the area of Nova Scotia around what is now Lunenburg when they came there in 1750. In western Ontario and eastern Ontario many of the United Empire Loyalists were of German or Dutch origin. We are not separating people by origins in that way. We are building Canada.

It is said that the union jack is a foreign flag. I saw an argument advanced the other day that any flag with a union jack on it would be a sign of subservience because it is foreign. I do not answer that except to say that Right Hon. Mackenzie King never had that view, and Mr. St. Laurent never had that view. Yet we are to erase the whole of our past; that is what we are asked to do. We are asked to forget the legacy of the missionaries, explorers, nation builders and statesmen of the French race, to wipe out the legacy of Champlain, Frontenac, Lafontaine and Cartier, to wipe out the contribution of the British to Canada.

No other race has that viewpoint. The British and the French came here because of freedom in this country. They founded here a country that was the first in any part of what is the commonwealth today to have religious freedom, the first in which slavery was abolished, and the first country in which representative government was developed. These are our traditions, and we are asked to wipe them out.

We are asked to sanctify disunity by supporting a flag that will bring about greater division. As a matter of fact the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), whose views receive frequent reference in the house, speaking at Quebec city on February 2, 1962, realized what the divisive effect would be of not having a union jack on any distinctive flag when he used these words:

> Mr. Pickersgill said the union jack was too intimately associated with Canadian history to be completely abandoned for the sake of other designs. He warned that if the union jack is dropped completely from the Canadian flag this might cause a deep rift among Canadians.

Those were wise words.

Mr. Pickersgill: Whether those were wise words or whether they were not, they were not my words.

An hon. Member: Misquoted again.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have just quoted from the Canadian Press dispatch, and this is not the first time the hon. gentleman has had to repudiate a statement he has made. I can understand that he may have some objection to the fact that I characterized his views as being wise.

The stand we have taken has been a stand for unity within the country. I recall an hon. member speaking on June 30, at which time he waxed poetic in regard to the three maple leaves. He said this was a flag on which our young men would see visions and our old men would dream dreams. This was the hon. member for Leeds dreaming in June, and forsaking in September the principles for which he then stood. This shows the fast change in thinking of those who dream dreams in June and have nightmares in July and August.

I say to the hon. gentleman opposite and those associated with him that we believe this matter should be submitted to the people. I believe the Prime Minister would take the greatest step forward if, knowing the division within the country, he were to announce that this matter should be given what is sometimes described as a hoist. It should be given time. Place it before the Canadian people at an election and let the people decide. I say to them, to the majority, you may trample on our viewpoint; you may ridicule the stand we take; you may decry; you may, when you vote on the question of a plebiscite, possibly boast that you have triumphed if our request is turned down. However, it will be no triumph for Canadian unity. I am not interested in party triumphs on this question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am interested in my fellow Canadians. I hope this applies to those sitting on the opposite side of the house, and I am not speaking for those who would tear the flag down, as they have said over and over again.

An hon. Member: That is a lie.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I heard a word, but in fact I am not at all sure. In fact I might say that I did not hear it and I hope I will not hear it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am one of those, Mr. Speaker, who are fortunate in that I cannot hear all interruptions.

I should like to see action taken that would bring about unity. However, we have stood, we have fought, we have upheld what we believe to be an important matter of principle. There is another report of the committee, No. 7. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, in that connection, whether in the event this question is voted upon by this house, the other resolution will come up immediately; with this proviso, that we should have our question period restored by the consent of the house. Many questions have arisen in the last ten days which demand answers and which I know the government is desirous of answering. What does the government intend to do? Does it intend to proceed with the motion to concur in that other report? I hope the Prime Minister, when he replies, will let the house know.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if the right hon. gentleman would like a reply at once—because it may be that we will have a vote after his statement and I might not have an opportunity then—I should like to tell him that it is the intention of the government to ask the chairman of the flag committee to move concurrence in the final report as soon as this debate concludes. Whether that can be done immediately after the conclusion of this debate will depend, of course, on the time of day this debate ends.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the Prime Minister say whether it is the intention of the government to have the second motion for concurrence passed by the house?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think there should be provision made between the two debates for a question period. We have already made a proposal to that effect, and I hope we can get unanimous agreement to provide for a question period between the two debates. If that can be done, we have no other item of business to put before the house, to give precedence to that order over the one I have just mentioned, the seventh report of the committee. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman would allow me to ask him a question at this moment; that is, if he is agreeable now that we should have a vote immediately on the amendment and on the main motion for concurrence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I recognize the desire of the right hon. gentleman to be fully advised, but the course we will take will be determined in the light of the circumstances.

Mr. Knowles: That sounds like Mackenzie King.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are two or three matters of legislation upon which we have been pressing for the consideration of the house. Indeed, we have moved the adjournment of the debate in order to permit of these matters being considered. We also joined with our colleagues to the left in the house in the vote in favour of calling orders of the day so that all these matters should receive the consideration of parliament.

Now, sir, I summarize my views and those of the party I have the honour to lead. I know that what I say will have no effect on the thinking of hon. members opposite or of those who support the report of the committee. I think a grave error will be committed and Canadian unity will suffer if this flag design is adopted. It is just another step, many Canadians feel, along the road. Within the last few days a Liberal member has prophesied that within 15 years Canada will be a republic. We in this party do not accept that belief. During the past months great harm has been done to the unity of the nation, greater than during any other period of my lifetime. I say that after measured consideration.

We are not going to build a nation with two flags; we will not make Canada into a nation by building states within a state. These things are the antitheses of everything for which in the past all our prime ministers have stood. Our view is that a new flag is not this nation's greatest need. Our responsibility is to build a nation, for no flag will bring about unity of a nation; the unity of a nation will bring about a flag which is acceptable to all.

The beliefs we have advanced have been deeply felt. I know there are some who say we are too emotional on this question. Mr. Speaker, the things of the spirit bring about those feelings. We have spoken for a flag which would bring with it a spirit of remembrance and honour for those who discovered this land; a flag which would have on it an exemplification of the richness of Canada's past. We have spoken for an emblem, the union jack, which has never on this North American continent been an emblem of oppression or dishonour. We have spoken for an emblem under whose folds our churches, our schools, our religions, all the precious things of our lives, have been protected and guaranteed. We have spoken for the millions in this land who cherish that emblem and whose voices are stilled. Some say we should apologize for that stand. God forbid that in this country we should apologize for standing for those things which made this nation great.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yesterday an American sent me a calendar showing the United States flag, the original one which Washington carried at Valley Forge, and the first Betsy Ross flag. On that calendar were these words of Woodrow Wilson, great philosopher president of the United States:

> The flag is the embodiment...of history. It represents the experiences made by men and women, the experiences of those who do and live under that flag.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I am about through. I ask this house: In what way does the design now proposed embody our history? It denies Cardinal Newman's saying that all greatness rests upon the shoulders of past generations. In what way does it represent the sacrifices, the experiences, the achievements of the past? Are we to eradicate the past, to remove all vestige of the things which brought my forefathers here on both sides, and the forefathers of hon. gentlemen everywhere in this house? Edmund Burke said all human society was a partnership between the living and the dead. This design denies that partnership. There is nothing in this design for memoried sorrow or old renown. There is nothing for those who with sword and crucifix went into the wilderness where they left their names and often their bones as a sacred heritage for us all. There is nothing for those who came in the glorious days of French Canada as explorers and navigators and builders. There is nothing of the heroic and legendary pioneers, tales of whose courage are our common glory.

The reading of history proves that a nation which forgets its past condemns its future. This design forgets our past. Individuals and nations cannot ignore the fact of a nation's past when determining the shape of its future. Are we as Canadians to have a flag which treats our memories, our past sacrifices, all the milestones of greatness as irrelevancies? Let Canadians have an opportunity of saying what they want. That is the fight we fought. It is the fight we are continuing to fight. Had it not been for us, you would have the design which is now disavowed. If viewpoints change so much in three or four months, is it beyond the realm of possibility that, should this new design become our flag in a few months hence, Canadians as a whole will feel their past has been forgotten? Once done, I can see no change for the future. I make this last appeal: Do not tear down in this nation the whole history of our past.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): With permission, I wonder if I could suggest that in the circumstances we might forgo the private members' hour in order that after 240 speeches on the flag question we might be able to come to a decision on this matter before six o'clock?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): No, Mr. Speaker; we want to hear from the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), who has not spoken on this subject for six months.

Mr. Speaker: Are there any pairs to be declared?

It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions for papers, private bills and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSITIES AND COLLEGES OF CANADA

Miss Pauline Jewett (Northumberland) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-36, to incorporate association of universities and colleges of Canada.

She said: I am honoured to have been asked to introduce this bill in this chamber. The purpose of it is to incorporate a new nation-wide, bilingual body to replace two existing organizations. The new body is to be known as the association of universities and colleges of Canada—l'association des universités et collèges du Canada. This will replace two existing organizations, the national conference of Canadian universities and colleges, commonly known as the N.C.C.U.C., which is a non-incorporated body, a voluntary association of universities and colleges, and the Canadian universities foundation, commonly known as the C.U.F. which is an incorporated body.

The purpose of combining these two existing organizations into a single new organization is primarily to facilitate the work of the universities and colleges of Canada in their task of promoting higher education in this country. No new tasks are being given to the association of universities and colleges in this field. It was necessary, however, that the new body be incorporated because it will be taking over the functions of one of the previous bodies, the Canadian universities foundation, and one of these functions was the distribution of federal grants to the various universities; and it is of course necessary to be an incorporated body before this can be done.

There will be ample opportunity to discuss the bill in detail when it goes to committee should any hon. members wish to have fuller information. I might, however, draw on the evidence which was given by the president of the new association, Principal J. A. Corry, of Queen's University. In the course of the evidence given before the committee on banking and commerce in the other place on Wednesday, November 4, 1964, Dr. Corry stated:

> We are not interested in any new departures, but only to develop further the kind of things we have been doing and to do them more efficiently. We discovered in the last few years that the secretariat, which tries to serve both the voluntary association and this corporation—

He is referring to the secretariat of the Canadian universities foundation and the N.C.C.U.C.

> —gets involved in a great deal of duplication in bringing the same material before both bodies. That occurs at a time when the universities are under such heavy demands and when we do not want to be engaged in any kind of wasteful effort that we can possibly avoid.

Then he goes on to say:

> There is one other reason I wish to mention. The Canadian universities foundation as presently organized is such that, as we have discovered, there is no satisfactory way of ensuring that we get on to the present corporation a fair representation of the universities of the different regions and, of course, of the universities of the two official languages. The new proposal is a way of trying to meet that serious objection through the present form.

Dr. Corry goes on to give other reasons for the establishment of the single, new, nation-wide bilingual organization. It is important for us to bear in mind that this request comes from all the universities and colleges of Canada that are now members or are eligible for membership; they number 46, I believe. These are both English and French speaking institutions, and are to be found in the schedule to Bill No. S-36. It was at their request that this bill was brought forward in the other place, where it has been passed, and it is now being brought forward here. I trust that all hon. members will want to do whatever we can to assist the universities of this country to do their job as well as they can. If they all feel, as I do, that one of the best ways for them to do their own job most effectively and most efficiently is through a single organization combining the two existing organizations, then I hope we will do all we can to facilitate this request.

I understand there is a possibility that some members of this chamber intend to filibuster this bill today; indeed the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) was kind enough to tell me that they did not intend to let it pass, the reason being, I understand, that they are not prepared to let any measures pass that come to us from the other place. I find this very disturbing because the association of universities and colleges—which as I say, represents all institutions at this level of learning in Canada—is very anxious to get its new form and get down to business under its new organization.

As I have already indicated, it is a bilingual organization. It is one of the organizations which we, surely, in this country want to do all we can to help develop, since as we all know there is a tendency nowadays for many professional and other organizations to split off into their English and French sections and become two separate groups. This association of universities and colleges is not doing that, and therefore it seems to me we should give it even more support than we would ordinarily.

I make a plea, therefore, that there not be any attempt made to talk out this bill on grounds which relate to another matter entirely. It is in a sense pure accident that it went through the other place first; it could have gone through this house first, and if we had agreed to the principle of the bill it would have passed this chamber and then gone to the other place and, I assume, would have passed there as it has already. Indeed, should there be any filibuster on this bill, any extended discussion simply to talk it out, I would point out the following.

[Translation]

May I quote the words of the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) himself, as recorded on page 10927:

—that is not freedom, but abuse, a tremendous abuse of the freedom of speech.

[Text]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I am interested in the concept, and I think this house should support the concept, that universities and colleges are not provincial things in the area of their concern. Universities are, by the very nature of their establishment, things of the world, and I believe that any attempt to promote that aspect of their concern should have the wholehearted endorsement of this house. I was very interested in the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett), who is sponsoring the bill, saying that we in this house are anxious to help the universities. I would think that as well as speaking in this house she would be taking some steps to see that the treasury benches have paid some heed to her plea, because the Canadian universities foundation has had a long-standing appeal to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) for increased grants both capital and operating. That is an aside, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure it will be dealt with in a budget that will come before us very soon.

I have listened for an anticipated objection, of which the hon. member for Northumberland has given the house notice, from the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). I cannot imagine a more cynical way to attack another place or another part of parliament than to hold up this type of bill, if this is to be the case. I hear no denial so I am going to go on with this aspect of my remarks. If the hon. member for Lapointe finds objection in the other place or to the other place, he has the avenues available to him that the promoters of this bill have had. Private—

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I see that the debate concerning Bill No. S-36 is centred around my supposed intentions as stated by the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett). I did not object to her statement because I thought that it was insignificant.

However, I would point out to the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Fairweather) that he should inquire about what we are doing and listen to our statements before he makes any comments in this respect, and then he may talk about our intentions.

I disregarded what the hon. member for Northumberland said. She came to my office and, suddenly, she mentioned what I am supposed to have told her, but distorting my thought. I did not say anything.

Under the circumstances, I say to the hon. member for Royal that I never made any statement in this respect, and I would ask him to talk about Bill No. S-36 without referring to our intentions.

[Text]

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted with this reassuring news that the house has nothing to worry about, and I will certainly not take another minute. All I have to say is that we on this side support the objectives in what is a straightforward piece of legislation which is entitled to the enthusiastic support of all hon. members.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I for one will not attempt to anticipate any remarks that may be made by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) or indeed any other member of the house. I rise simply to say that I listened with interest to the introduction of the bill into our house. I notice that its objects are to foster and promote the interests of higher education in Canada. I also notice from a brief examination of the schedule that it appears to be a very representative organization, as proposed in the bill, of the institutions of higher learning in Canada. Therefore I am pleased to join with the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) and the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Fairweather) in indicating my wholehearted support of the bill and of the purposes which those who are seeking to develop this organization have in mind.

I agree with the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Fairweather) that those of us who are members of this house should perhaps, in approving the passage of the bill, indicate that we feel this house has a responsibility to take steps to foster and promote the interests of higher education in Canada to a greater extent than we have in the past; and I hope there will be an early opportunity for us to discuss all aspects of our responsibilities in more detail than I feel it would be in order to do under the bill which is now before us.

I am sure my colleagues will join with me in doing what we can to support them in the passage of this bill through the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, we heard, a while ago, the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) advising us of the intentions expressed by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), today or yesterday—I do not quite know—in connection with Bill No. S-36; the hon. member for Lapointe and our party must be given their due.

We feel that Bill No. S-36 is logical and we see no objection to Canadian universities and colleges grouping together in an effort to achieve definite goals and specific aims in their field of endeavour. I was pleased to note that, in clause 10 of the bill, it is specified that the official languages of the association will be French and English and that, in clause 11, the head office of the association will be established in Ottawa, the capital of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the preamble to the bill reads as follows:

Whereas the National Conference of Canadian Universities and Colleges, an unincorporated body, hereinafter called "The Conference", and the Canadian Universities Foundation, a company incorporated pursuant to the Companies Act by letters patent dated February 4, 1959, hereinafter called "the Foundation", have by their petition prayed that it be enacted as hereinafter set forth, and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the petition.

There are at least 15 clauses in the bill as well as a schedule listing the colleges and universities which will be members of this new association.

The hon. member for Northumberland said earlier that we would not allow the bill to be passed. It is not because we have anything against the universities and colleges, but because we have a slight grudge against the other place. A bill was introduced a long time ago—my remarks are perhaps out of order, but it is precisely because there is some discrimination against a province which requested the passage of a bill that we object to the passage of other bills. There is a limit to everything. I feel that the patience of the people's representatives, of the members of the house has been overtaxed. We have responsibilities, and I think that any bill likely to promote the development of our country should be considered on its merits, irrespective of political partisanship. We believe that there is in this house some partisanship which should not prevail here. We are ready to pass bills in the best interests of the population or a certain segment of the population needing or asking for more freedom and justice to which they are entitled in every field of our national administation.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, we are in favour of this Bill No. S-36, and as soon as the other place acts fairly towards a certain province, namely British Columbia, we will be ready to pass this bill and we will not raise any objection to it or to the other bills now under consideration for one, two or three months and which have been discussed every Thursday or every second Thursday.

Mr. Speaker, Bill No. S-36 will enable colleges and universities, as I said earlier, to look after their own business, to help as much as possible students now attending those colleges and universities or those who will do so in the future. We see that this bill aims at furthering higher education in Canada. I think that students are in a position to help in that respect because they are so directly concerned and because it will be their problems that the association of universities and colleges of Canada will be studying.

Section 3 reads as follows:

Subject to the by-laws which may be enacted from time to time pursuant to section 7, the membership of the association shall be composed of the universities and colleges named in the schedule to this act, and such other corporations, organizations or bodies as are from time to time admitted to membership pursuant to this act.

Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note that colleges and universities in all parts of Canada will be members of that association. In fact, there are members in Nova Scotia, Alberta, Quebec, Manitoba, British Columbia, Ontario. It seems that all the provinces will be represented, or that colleges and universities in every part of the country will join the association.

In my opinion, colleges and universities show that they have a sense of unity, which is preached so often in this country. Since those university or college students are getting a higher education, they recognize the need for association, the necessity of uniting in order to reach the objectives peculiar to their situation, to their condition or the need for them to help one another.

Mr. Speaker, if one considers Bill No. S-36, one sees that the University of Montreal, Laval University, Loyola College in Montreal, the university of Trinity college, the University of Toronto, the University of British Columbia, Carleton University here in Ottawa, the University of Ottawa, the Collège Jean-de-Brébeuf in Montreal, in short all the recognized universities in this country will be members of the association, as well as our leading colleges.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that this is a good movement. The students of our universities and colleges are taking a worth-while step; they are making a commendable effort in order to promote higher education within our country.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to say more on the bill before us. However, I should like to say once again that our intention is not to stand in the way of university or college students, but to bring to reason the members of the other place who are delaying a piece of legislation that everybody has been looking forward to for a long time. Under those circumstances, although we earnestly support the principle of Bill No. S-36, we think that eventually, in a week or two, we will have an opportunity to pass this bill without discussion.

But in the meantime we feel it is our obligation and responsibility to say that if democracy does exist in Canada, the time has come to make it clear that the members of this house are not the only ones who have to exercise democratic principles, but that the other place should also respect the soundest principles of democracy in action, a democracy respecting all the people, the provinces, the organizations, the individuals, but especially the province of British Columbia, as we have been requesting for some two or three months.

Mr. Speaker, we are in favour of Bill No. S-36, but we could not let it pass today. However, we will not hesitate to do so as soon as we have evidence that democracy is working in Canada.

Mr. Jean Chrétien (St. Maurice-Laflèche): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say in connection with this bill, but I should like to commend the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) for the moderate tone of his remarks on the legislation under consideration.

I was struck by the spirit in which this measure was prepared. That is precisely the kind of spirit which should exist in Canada. The bill recognizes the two official languages at the same time as the universities and colleges of Canada.

I understand why the hon. member for Villeneuve says that his party and himself cannot, at this time, permit a vote on Bill No. S-36, an act to incorporate the association of universities and colleges of Canada. However, may I make a suggestion to the hon. member?

I understand that the Créditistes may be somewhat angry because the Senate has not yet granted a bank charter to a certain group of citizens from British Columbia. However, I believe that the Créditistes would attain their objective if they confined their opposition to bills concerning the incorporation of new chartered banks or other corporations. But considering that the purpose of this bill is to create an association of Canadian universities and colleges, I believe that if it were passed this afternoon, the hon. member for Villeneuve and his supporters would promote their case, because the population might feel that the group supporting the member for Villeneuve is analysing the situation and showing enough broadmindedness to accept a very important measure which is thoroughly characteristic of our country and which reflects the new spirit which must prevail in this country.

If his group permitted this measure to be passed this afternoon, it would promote, as I said, Canadian unity.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up much time, but I do want to speak in support of this bill which has been advanced by the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) on behalf of a very responsible body in Canada. Anything we can do to assist universities I think should be done. In this particular instance the cause is a very worthy one.

I have risen as well to condemn the attitude taken by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) who stated that he was in support of the measure, but at the same time held the threat over this house that he would not allow the bill to pass, and that his party would not accede to it until the other place had met the request he has made. I think his remarks in regard to the other place are irrelevant, and that the attitude he has taken on behalf of his party is certainly a threat, if not implied coercion.

Mr. Grégoire: Make me laugh.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member who is now interrupting is attempting to make a mockery of the House of Commons, where the right to free speech is enjoyed except on those occasions when that hon. member interrupts. I hope one of these days the Speaker will name him.

The leader of the Créditiste party is bordering on hypocrisy by speaking in favour of the bill yet refusing to pass it, or alternatively promising that it will pass within two or three weeks, knowing full well that this house may soon adjourn for the Christmas recess. He has stated that he is not going to permit the passage of this bill, but disguised his purposes by suggesting that he is in favour of it. I have risen to register my objection to that kind of action.

This bill has come from the other place and has been approved there. Its objective is worthy. The explanation given by the hon. member for Northumberland has satisfied this house, as far as I am concerned, and I think it should be allowed to pass immediately.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Villeneuve would allow me a question.

Mr. Caouette: Surely.

Mr. Lambert: No, a question cannot be allowed, as the hon. member has already spoken.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hon. member for Villeneuve has completed his remarks.

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in this bill. Throughout my adult life I have been in support of anything which will assist in promoting education, but I must admit I am somewhat at a loss in that there is no explanatory note in the bill itself. The only thing on which I can base my support of the bill is the remarks the hon. lady made and also the fact that there must have been a reason for the bill being passed by the other place.

As I said, I understand the purpose of the bill is to promote facilities that will bring our educational institutions closer together, so that their representatives may discuss educational matters and put forward opinions with the end in view that the educational facilities of this country will provide a better and more advanced education for our young people. However, should the bill not be approved at this time I should like to see some explanatory notes put in it. I foresee that the house will adjourn or prorogue and this bill may come up a second time in the other place. I hope that will not be necessary but if this should happen I suggest to the hon. lady that some explanatory notes should be provided, as is done with all other bills, whether private or public, so that people who have not followed the debate in the other place or even in this house will be able to become more familiar with the bill. However, the hon. lady has given a good explanation of the bill, and based on that explanation I am prepared to say I am in favour of it.

[Translation]

Mr. G. C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, I intended, a minute ago, to direct a question to the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette).

I understand that another member of that party will probably speak presently, but considering the attitude of the hon. member for Villeneuve and his seemingly hearty approval of the principle of this bill, I would ask him whether it would not be advisable to permit second reading of the bill, so that it could be considered in committee, and let the third reading stand.

That is my suggestion.

I am wondering whether the hon. member for Villeneuve and his colleagues would be ready to accept that suggestion.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak on this bill, but in view of the awkward—I was going to say the dishonest way in which the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) has—

[Text]

Miss Jewett: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, did I hear the hon. member say "dishonest"?

Mr. Grégoire: I said "a dishonest way to introduce the bill".

Miss Jewett: I would ask the hon. member to withdraw that. There was nothing dishonest about the way I introduced the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I am sure the hon. member for Lapointe would not wish to have that remark remain on the record.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if proper attention is paid to the wording, one finds that the word "dishonest" was used; I have not said "déshonnête", I said "malhonnête".

Mr. Lambert: It is the same thing.

Mr. Grégoire: It can be seen that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) does not understand the subtleties of the French language.

Mr. Lambert: Much more than you think.

Mr. Grégoire: It is perhaps the reason why he is still mistaken.

In view of the awkward way this bill has been introduced by the hon. member for Northumberland, I believe it is my duty to go over what she stated in her introductory remarks.

We do not object to this bill, Mr. Speaker. I see in the bill a list of the universities which were mentioned a moment ago; I see the name of Laval University, which is a great institution; there I studied philosophy for a year, under qualified teachers, and I had the opportunity of obtaining a diploma. Besides, I studied for several years in the law faculty. I also obtained my B.A.—even if I attended the Jesuits' college, the B.A. was granted by Laval University.

I see the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Pepin). I believe he was once a professor at Laval University.

Mr. Pepin: No.

Mr. Grégoire: No. Not that one; he was not lucky enough to enter such a great university.

Now, I notice also the names of colleges such as Brébeuf—

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, has not the hon. member for Lapointe just proven what was put forward by the hon. member for Northumberland, that is that the hon. member for Lapointe and his colleague, the hon. member for Villeneuve, were going to resort to all kinds of tactics to preclude the passage of the bill this afternoon? It is precisely what the hon. member for Northumberland asserted.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, something is wrong. He is the fourth member of the Liberal party who has risen to speak on this subject; three Tory members have spoken. I am only the second Créditiste to take the floor, and you say that we are the ones blocking the passage of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Liberals are a bit off their figuring today.

Besides, I feel I am entitled to speak at least once on a bill to incorporate the association of universities and colleges of Canada.

The hon. member for Northumberland quoted remarks I had made, but then I had figures in support of them. I feel I have the right to repeat them once again since the hon. member left the door open and to correct the impression she wanted to create.

When I say: "It is no longer freedom of speech, it is licence or abuse", 229 speeches had been made and 119 hours had been spent on the same matter. But we have been considering Bill No. S-36 for barely 45 minutes.

That is the reason why I say this bill was introduced in a dishonest way, because a 29 day debate is compared to one which started only 45 minutes ago. This bill was introduced in an incompetent manner, and I do not hesitate to say so.

Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that I could see institutions like Brébeuf college, St. Marie college—I must find out why the Jesuits' college, St. Charles Garnier of Quebec is not in this list for, in my opinion, the rector of this college, Father Larivière, is an extremely competent professor. For a long time he was chairman of the classical colleges in the province of Quebec, of which the Jesuits' college was a member.

This bill is to incorporate the association of universities and colleges, the conference of universities, the foundation of classical colleges. St. Charles Garnier college of Quebec was a member of the foundation of classical colleges, since its director was the able and competent president of the said foundation for several years.

I, therefore, wonder if this is not due to an oversight. But in any event, to make sure no error has been made—

[Text]

Miss Jewett: That kind of question can be asked when we go into committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: And we intend to ask it when this bill is studied in committee. But first, I wanted to point out this fact, and the hon. member for Northumberland will agree that it was normal and natural, when I saw the list of the colleges, that I should expect to see first, Laval University and St. Charles Garnier college of Quebec. I was pleased to find Laval University, but I must note that—at least at first glance—no classical college of the city of Quebec is included in that list.

I remember quite well that the St. Jean Eudes college and the Quebec seminary belonged to the classical colleges foundation of the province, which would be part of the association of universities and colleges of Canada.

At any rate, we cannot object to this bill, because colleges and universities have contributed a great deal to the development of our people. Grouped together, those institutions will then be in a better position to set forth their demands. They will have a stronger voice.

It is shameful to find that this year 700 young people were turned away from Laval and Montreal universities for lack of space in the medical school. I would like to conduct a survey among the fathers of those young people; these parents have perhaps denied themselves in order to send their children to public school for seven years and to secondary school for eight more years. The fathers of many of those young people probably were unemployed masons, plumbers, bricklayers, carpenters or electricians who could have constructed buildings for medical faculties. But none the less, those youngsters are refused admittance to those universities after they have completed seven years of primary course and eight years of classical studies. This is a shame in a country like Canada.

This is a scandalous state of affairs when we take into consideration our responsibilities in this regard. The provincial government may say its mea culpa when it accepts such a situation in the province of Quebec and in Canada in this 20th century.

Grouped together, the colleges and universities will be stronger and more vigorous in denouncing these scandals which occur in Canada; I am happy to have the opportunity to mention it.

Universities will then be able to point out to the federal government that it is grabbing all taxes although the provincial government has priority needs, including education.

Unfortunately, the provinces cannot meet all the needs in matters of education because they lack sufficient funds, since the government in Ottawa occupies most fiscal fields.

Mr. Pepin: Yes, that is true.

Mr. Grégoire: That is right, it is quite true; it is a fact. The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Pepin) has just put it in Hansard. He said: Yes. Is not education a primary need in Canada?

Mr. Pepin: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Grégoire: Is it true, or not, that the provinces need more revenue to satisfy their educational needs?

Mr. Pepin: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Grégoire: Is it not true that the federal government is collecting the greater part of taxes in Canada?

Mr. Pepin: That is quite possible, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, the statistics are there to prove it: 60 per cent are collected by the federal government, 20 per cent by the provinces, and 15 per cent by the municipalities and school boards. The federal government he denies everything he said while he crumbs to the provinces.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Grégoire: It is a fact which the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska cannot deny. Since he became a member of parliament, he denies everything he said while he was a university professor—

Mr. Pepin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Everything the hon. member for Lapointe said about me regarding the past is a lie.

Mr. Grégoire: It is not I who says so. Everywhere in the province of Quebec the students are saying: we used to trust Mr. Pepin but since he became a Liberal member in the federal parliament, he is just like the rest of them.

Mr. Pepin: On a point of order Mr. Speaker. I do not agree that the hon. member for Lapointe speaks on behalf of all the young people of French Canada.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order; I should like to ask the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Pepin) if the word he used a moment ago is not a most unparliamentary one?

[Translation]

Mr. Pepin: On the contrary, Mr. Speaker. I have been most considerate and gentle in my remarks. I simply denied the hon. member for Lapointe the right to speak on behalf of French Canadian youth. He said that all our French Canadian young people were disappointed with the ideas I was defending now. I cannot see how the hon. member for Lapointe can speak like this on behalf of our young people in French Canada.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I did not speak on behalf of French Canadian youth, not in the least.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order; perhaps the translation was not correct. If it was not, then of course I will accept the explanation given by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I did not say the whole French Canadian youth; I said: Wherever we go we meet young students who tell us how disappointed they are with our politicians, because they had confidence in the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, but since he became a Liberal he is now like the others.

That is what I said. If the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska would go back in the province of Quebec from time to time he would find out what the people think of him. He had a brilliant future, but as soon as he became a Liberal it changed.

Mr. Caouette: That altered his future.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Those remarks have nothing whatsoever to do with the matter under consideration, and I hope that you will call the hon. member for Lapointe to order.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I think the point of order raised by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska is well taken. I suggest to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) that he confine himself to the principle of the bill to which we are now giving second reading.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I thank you, but if you read Hansard again, you will see that it is the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska who made the first interjections which were out of order; it is he who wandered from the subject and who delays the debate by his many interjections.

In closing I would like to say that we approve the role of our universities and colleges. As soon as they are united, they will be able to speak more forcefully to the federal government in order to expose its attitude at various levels. They will be stronger in their claims and to obtain for the provinces that greater source of revenue they need to meet the priority needs of education at the present time. Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

[Text]

Miss Jewett: Question, question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Is the house ready for the question?

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I do not have more time at my disposal to discuss a matter which is of interest to Canadians all across the country.

I might say that I support this bill but, on the other hand, I should like to ask a few questions to clear up some minor points which seem to be obscure in the bill itself. Those points might be included in the bill, but when I read it I did not see them. Therefore, I should like to have further explanations on this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have to interrupt my observations, but I must point out to you that it is six o'clock.

[Text]

Miss Jewett: Filibuster.

Mr. Grégoire: Well, you speak about it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order; the hour for private members' business has expired.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

CANADIAN FLAG

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Batten that the sixth report of the special committee on the Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): We have now reached a point at which we must consider whether or not the report which has been presented by the flag committee should be concurred in.

Surely, before any vote is taken in this connection we should be told where the government stands on that report and on the flag design presented by that committee for adoption. The last occasion on which we were provided with information by the government as to its stand on a flag design was when the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) spoke in this house in favour of a three maple leaf design on a white background with blue borders. That was not the design which is proposed by the committee for adoption. It was not the flag design supported by the majority of the members of that committee. And certainly there is no assurance, and none has been given to this house, that the design to be selected by the government if the report of the flag committee is adopted is the design which the majority of that committee indicated they preferred.

Still further, we have been given no reasons by the government to explain the silence of its supporters with regard to the design recommended by the majority of the members on the flag committee. We should know the reasons why the government thinks differently today about what is desirable in a flag design—why its opinions are not the same as they were when the Prime Minister told us why he considered that the flag which should be flying from the flagpoles of this nation should have three maple leaves on a white background with blue borders. We should certainly be told why the Prime Minister believes today that a flag with one maple leaf on a white background with red borders is representative of Canada as a nation and acceptable to its people.

In addition, we would like to hear the views of various other members of the Liberal party. They should tell us why they feel today that this particular flag ought to be adopted, when not so very long ago they were telling us that a flag with three maple leaves was the only possible flag for Canada and indicating what it represented in the way of history and tradition.

I feel we should have the benefit of the views of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) who is deputy leader of the party opposite and its chief spokesman for the province of Quebec. We should know why he feels today that a red bordered flag is more appropriate than the Pearson pennant which he embraced so readily when it was proposed by the Prime Minister.

Without doubt we should hear the views of the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne), the man charged with the responsibility of caring for our history and traditions, the man who is the guardian of all that is traditional in this nation. He should tell us why he feels we should embrace this one maple leaf flag which is now proposed.

We should hear, also, from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Tremblay). After all, is he not the man who must take responsibility for removing from the citizenship courts of this nation the picture of our Queen? Let him tell us what flag he feels should be placed in these citizenship courts as a symbol of our past history and traditions. I suggest to hon. members opposite that they get out of their love seats and stand up and explain why we should now embrace a flag design which differs in such a marked way from the one they told us only a few months ago was the only flag for this Canadian nation.

In this regard I should like to read a short letter which appeared in the Yarmouth Herald, Nova Scotia, on September 2. It states:

> If one takes a British red ensign and emblazons upon it the distinctive arms of Canada it still remains a foreign flag.
> But, if one takes the national flag of Peru and emblazons upon it a maple leaf—the leaf of a tree by no means distinctively Canadian, and of which there are several different varieties across the country—

And, I may add, a leaf which does not appear in some provinces of this country:

> —it immediately becomes a distinctive Canadian flag, and not foreign at all.
> Being neither British nor Peruvian in origin, my mind is not closed to an explanation of this piece of baffling wizardry. But I am, at the moment, completely confused.
> Yours truly,
> Robert B. Blauveldt

I may say to that gentleman, he is not the only one in this nation who is confused; indeed there are many in this House of Commons, including myself, who become completely confused when they watch the footwork of this government when it comes to the means of determining what should be the flag of this nation. Not only are they unwilling to accept a flag which contains in it symbols of our past history and tradition, but they are unwilling even to provide themselves with reasons for now shifting, if they are, from a three maple leaf design to a one maple leaf design. They tell us that we should vote. What are we to vote for? Do we know what this government will do when the flag committee report is adopted by this house—if it is? Have we any assurance that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) will not then pass an order in council indicating that the three maple leaf design shall be the flag of our nation, which is his design?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: The report is there.

Mr. Coates: "The report is there", my hon. friend says. What guarantee have we that this report will be enacted in any way? Many reports have been adopted by this house with regard to which governments have taken absolutely no action. How do we know this is not going to be the case in this instance? How do we know what design the government will decide upon? Certainly there used to be a leader of the Liberal party who looked into crystal balls and came up with decisions. Maybe that is all right for Liberals, but Conservatives want facts. We want to know where these various ministers stand with regard to the flag design they are eventually going to foist upon this Canadian nation, a design which has no association with our past in any way, shape or form.

There are many implications in the report of the flag committee. We demand an explanation from this government as to what it is going to do about the report, and how it is going to do it, before the house can look forward to our acceptance of this report. We have noticed in the past, and in the recent past, that the Prime Minister sometimes likes to find himself in other places when questions should be answered in this house. In the past we have been put in a position where we could not secure the answer from the Prime Minister, when he found it best to be somewhere else in this nation. But this is not going to be the case with regard to the report of the flag committee that is before the house at this time, and we will get answers to the questions we are asking now or this report will not receive the concurrence necessary for it to be enacted in this house—and it is just as simple as that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coates: This arrogant silence we have had to contend with from this arrogant government for too long now, on this matter of vital importance affecting every Canadian in every part of this nation, is not going to continue if there is to be any hope by this government of having the report of the flag committee accepted, even on a division. Certainly if the government desire the degree of unity that they talk about so often in this house, I suggest to them that the Prime Minister of this nation come into the house and indicate to us that they are willing to accept a flag design which has contained in it symbols of our past, of the history and tradition of the founding races of this nation. I suggest that he indicate that he does not want a near-Peruvian flag as the national flag of this country, that he saw some merit in the great speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) in this house today, that there is real merit in the stand that has been taken in this house by the official opposition in regard to—

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to bring to your attention the fact that from the outset of his remarks, the hon. member who now has the floor, has not addressed the Chair once. Since he has very few interesting things to tell we would ask him at least to address the Chair.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. Will the hon. member resume his seat.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, that is the inconsequential type of interruption that has been forthcoming from that quarter of the house. It should be ignored because it has absolutely no merit, and there are no manners associated with it either.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coates: Every time a member rises in this house and starts to talk about history and tradition we hear from those who have no desire to continue the past history and tradition of this nation; they go blabbering on with inconsequential interjections, unwilling to listen to reason, unwilling to listen to anything; willing only to force their will on the Canadian nation and blot out—

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

If the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates) wants to vent his spleen on some of his colleagues, let him not turn toward the members at the other end of the house. We called order simply because he was addressing the members of the house instead of the Chair, as he should do. He has not been addressing the Chair for exactly three minutes and he is talking about the point of order made by the hon. member who rose before me.

Canadian Flag

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I would ask the hon. member who has the floor please not to invite the type of points of order which we have been getting over the past few minutes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It is no use commenting on points of order made by other hon. members, once the Chair has ruled that a point of order is not in order. Would the hon. member please proceed.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your ruling but I can only say that it is a cause of some irritation to a speaker when members such as the hon. member who has just taken his seat—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hon. member should realize that the Chair has taken that into consideration, and that is why I am inviting him to resume his speech.

Mr. Grégoire: Question.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, it would appear that as long as I speak about the matters which I feel must be involved in a flag design for it to be acceptable to me, there will continue to be interruptions from those who do not wish to see the symbols of our past represented in the design of a flag to which they can bow down and adhere.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think one could at least say this about the flag design which was embraced by the government last May, that it could be anchored to a degree to events which had occurred in our past. This was the main argument of the Prime Minister when he proposed this design and gave his reasons for adopting it when he spoke in May. But surely we have a far different situation today, for we have a flag design proposed which is completely new, completely devoid of any associations with our past, with no associations with the traditions of this nation or with the fact that we have been a nation for 97 years. This is a flag that would probably be most suitable for a new nation on the continent of Africa, a nation which is emerging, having been given its democratic rights as of now. But how ridiculous it is that a country which is 97 years of age is proposing to adopt a flag design that is so similar to the flag of Peru that the only difference is that one has its coat of arms in the centre and the other has a maple leaf.

[Mr. Plourde.]

Mr. Matheson: That is not true.

Mr. Coates: I hear "That is not true" from the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson). Let the hon. member for Leeds stand on his feet and say whatever he wants about his love story, or whatever it is he wants to speak about, but let him do it in his own time and not mine.

Mr. Matheson: Would the hon. member permit a question on this matter. Would he kindly tell this house, having made that statement, the proportion of red-white-red on the Peruvian flag compared with the recommended flag; and would he also tell us all the colours which are involved in both these flags? Because he is not telling the truth.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might have been the father of the other flag, but if he is the father of this one it is illegitimate all the way. Because unless you become a mathematician or an upholsterer or a dress designer or a furniture dealer there is absolutely no way to associate this flag with any facet of Canada's past, and indeed it bodes ill for Canada's future if this is where we are going in the matter of selecting a flag design which is supposed to be representative of a nation 97 years old, and a good many hundreds years of age in development.

Surely we in this house are correct in demanding from the Prime Minister and the other ministers I have already named an explanation as to how we are going to have a distinctive flag, one which is representative of something. If Canadians have been shocked up to now by what this government has been trying to do to arrive at a flag design, it is nothing in comparison with the shock they are going to feel when they see this flag flying from the flagpoles of the nation. That is when the shock treatment will really set in—when the people see this meaningless flag flying from the flagpoles of the nation, having replaced the beautiful flag which today flies from the peace tower and from every other flagpole across the country.

We have not yet arrived, Mr. Speaker, at a position where we in this house can take a vote on the flag committee's report; and we will not arrive at that position until the Prime Minister is ready to come into this house and explain why he, in the words of the hon. member for Leeds, loves this flag today when his love affairs with the last one was constant only until the flag committee was set up.

Mr. Barnett: Would the hon. member permit a question. Would he be prepared to give his assurance to the house that if the Prime Minister does come in and make a speech on the flag we can then proceed to have a vote on the flag committee's report?

Mr. Coates: I thank the hon. member for giving me this degree of control over the Progressive Conservative party, which allows me to make decisions for every member therein. Unfortunately I am not in a position to have that type of control; nor do I want it. As a matter of fact, I believe that the action of the members of this party, following a definitive explanation by the government as to what it will do about the new flag once a vote has taken place on this motion, will indicate the position taken by this party in respect of the expected order in council. A vote having taken place in respect of the motion now before us will lead to some recommendation being made to the other place. One must hope that the honourable gentlemen of that place will have some consideration for the feelings, as they have been expressed, of the people of this country. Surely no responsible government would wish to shirk its responsibility in this regard.

Is it too much to ask the Prime Minister to indicate to this nation why he feels there should be a new and distinctive Canadian flag? After all, he is the man who has placed this House of Commons in the position where it has been for months, considering this question. Surely we can expect that the Prime Minister will stand and abide by a vote on the recommendation of the special committee on a Canadian flag, yet we have heard little or nothing from his supporters about that recommendation. Surely it is time that we should hear from the treasury benches as to how they feel about a distinctive and different Canadian flag. Surely we should hear from those individuals who voted for this proposed design in the committee and proposed the committee report now before us. Surely this is the time when we should hear from the ministers of the crown, who are responsible for the direction of this country. What can we expect from this government in the way of direction? Surely they consider themselves responsible to the people of Canada.

The government which now proposes that we adopt this flag is the same government which proposed last June that we adopt the flag with the three maple leaf design. At that time the suggestion was made that that design was the one most acceptable to Canadian people. That was the government's statement. They have now changed their minds. If they find they must change their minds, and they are not sure, as is obvious, which flag is the flag to be adopted by this nation, surely they must realize that the people of this country should be given a choice.

The government now urging the adoption of the flag, as set out in the motion we are now discussing, is the same government which has changed its mind about the flag and about the time the flag must be adopted. Their argument seems to be that we should adopt the flag advocated by the majority of their members.

As a result of this attitude we have been subjected to a tortuous debate. We have been held responsible for this debate because we will not agree that the presently proposed design, recommended by the committee, is the most acceptable to the people of Canada. We do not intend to allow the House of Commons to be placed in a position of voting for or against something which is favoured only by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and others who occupy government benches. Those gentlemen feel that the proposed design is the one acceptable in this country. Those are the same ministers who favoured and supported the three red maple leaves design as presented by the Prime Minister. Perhaps they were impressed with that design because it was proffered by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, we are anxious to hear from the Prime Minister and his supporters as to their feelings in support of the flag proposed by the committee report now before us for concurrence. I am sure they could satisfy their desires at an earlier date if they produce answers to the many questions which have been asked. Surely they cannot expect overwhelming support for their proposal, or any support at all, when they, at the same time, continue their attitude of complete silence, which has been apparent since the committee's recommendation was presented to this house.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be in reference to the fact that we have not heard from the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) about this report from the flag committee, which was set up by this House of Commons. This is not a majority report, in view of the fact that almost one third of the members voted against it. It is very strange, indeed, that the Prime Minister of this country has offered little or no support for the recommendation proposed by a committee made up of members, the majority of whom are his supporters. Surely his silence is an indication of childishness and petulence, and an apparent display of contempt for parliament. This attitude is an example of the great disregard for the wishes of the people that this government has adopted. Surely it is only a matter of common courtesy on the part of the Prime Minister of this country to stand in his place and give us some indication of his reason for asking concurrence in the report of a committee of this House of Commons.

This issue has been alluded to as one of the most important measures to come before this house in a great number of years. No one in Canada will dispute the fact, whether they want a change of flag, or not. Surely, in view of that fact, the Prime Minister of this country should stand in his place and answer the questions asked by the members of the house. I think tonight of the many times during my school days when I had the task of putting the union jack on the rope and hoisting it on the flag pole. I think also of the action taken in later years by the government of Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King which gave to Canada a new flag in the form of the red ensign. There is a lot of history throughout those years and a lot of that history was Liberal history. There is no question in so far as that is concerned.

Earlier in the day when I listened to the Prime Minister count the number of speeches that have been made on this question I thought of the questions that are going unanswered in this country today and I could not help but think that he would have been better employed inquiring into other activities that certainly interest Canadians and must interest him as the chief administrator of the country. The changing of a flag is not a simple measure such as a money bill or many of the other changes that parliament makes in statutes. In my view it is a part of the constitutional set-up of the country and I am surprised that throughout this debate very little attention has been given to it by the chief guardian of the constitution of the country, the Prime Minister himself. In saying that, I know he has to be in other places at times. He has many duties; but the Prime Minister of this country has no duty that is greater than his duty to sit in his seat in the House of Commons when an important measure is under consideration, and we had hoped that we would have seen him more frequently.

I think too tonight of the traditions of this country. I am in the unhappy or happy position, whichever way you want to look at it, of not having either a French or English background. I believe that most Canadians of my generation with a background not altogether dissimilar to mine want no part of the feuds that have been a part of the history of this country. It may be said by some, and I believe this is the argument of the Prime Minister, that perhaps because of these feuds, these things that have happened in the past, there should be no reference to the founding elements of this nation in the new flag. But as one of those who have never been a part of either of the two founding elements of the nation I cannot help but feel that we in this parliament today are in much the same position a firm is that decides to change its name, or when an organization decides to make a new beginning. But I ask you, sir, in all sincerity, how can a nation make a new beginning without some of the foundations upon which it was originally built?

When I look at the recommendation that has been made to parliament by the committee and consider the action that was taken by the Liberal members of the committee, I must say that, while I do not want to reflect on them, the decision taken by them in the committee indicates to me that they must not have been consulted when the Prime Minister brought in his three leaf design in the first place. It may have been his design, but the design that was endorsed by the Liberal members of the committee was another design altogether, and the outstanding fact to be remembered in this whole matter is that not a single Liberal member of that committee went to bat for the Prime Minister's design.

The thing that bothers me about this whole matter is this. We have heard a great deal of talk about unity among those who sit on the benches opposite, unity among the members of the government opposite and the unity they have given this nation, but when it came to supporting the design they had supported earlier in the house when it was brought forward by the Prime Minister the Liberal members of that committee did not give evidence of that unity. How can they ever explain the inconsistency of their position? Is that not the reason why the Prime Minister's seat is empty tonight? He cannot come into the House of Commons tonight and explain away the inconsistency of that position. That is why hon. members opposite are very silent so far as that particular matter is concerned.

There are those in the house who have referred to the union jack as a foreign flag. They have referred to the fact that the fleur-de-lis is something foreign.

Mr. Caron: Yes.

Mr. Nasserden: The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) says "yes".

Mr. Caron: Yes.

Mr. Nasserden: And he repeats himself. But when I go into the province of Quebec what do I see? I see the fleur-de-lis flying from the flag poles.

Mr. Caron: I never liked it.

Mr. Nasserden: The hon. member for Hull says he never liked it.

Mr. Caron: No.

Mr. Nasserden: And he agrees again. But when I go into the province of Quebec I see the fleur-de-lis. When the people there have their parades you see the fleur-de-lis. Those of us who come from other than English or French stock are not ashamed that the French were a part of the founding elements of this nation, or that the English were part of the founding elements of this nation. That is one of the reasons we would like to see on the Canadian flag not only the union jack but also the fleur-de-lis.

I cannot imagine the guardian of our constitution, who after all is the Prime Minister of our country, countenancing an action that would wipe out in one fell swoop all of the history of this country. What complicates the whole matter is that from those Liberals who sit behind him in the house we have had during the debate so far this wonderful show of unity. There has just been one dissenting voice from all those on the benches across the way. Is that not an outstanding fact, one to be noted by history and one to be noted by the people in every part of this country?

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. Nasserden: I would be glad to answer any questions.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nasserden: I can tell you one thing, Mr. Speaker, those are easy questions to answer. It will not be so easy for those who ask these questions when they go back to the electorate of this country in the election that will follow. The answer to some of these questions is to be found in the almost quarter of a million views that have been transmitted either individually or collectively to the Prime Minister and members of his cabinet by means of telegrams, petitions, letters and designs that have been submitted from every part of Canada. This government—

Mr. Grégoire: Name them.

Mr. Nasserden: —this careless Prime Minister, says this flag will be adopted in the name of national unity. How can there be the unity necessary when so many people have taken the trouble to write letters, send telegrams, sign petitions or submit designs? I imagine, in addition, that there have been those who have individually attempted to influence members on the other side of the house, just as they have tried to influence members on this side of the house on this important matter.

I hold no brief for any particular design tonight, Mr. Speaker. I want to say that I believe this is one of the saddest days in Canada's history. We see the Prime Minister's empty seat following the vote on the amendment and we know, whether through design or carelessness, the Prime Minister of this country is allowing this debate to continue without his intervention to shed some light on what the government proposes to do following concurrence in the report. I think thousands and thousands of people tonight will be wondering what manner of parliament we have in Ottawa.

Mr. Grégoire: We want the names.

Mr. Nasserden: Someone says, "We want the names". They are the unnamed Canadians—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nasserden: They are the unnamed Canadians who cannot sit in this House of Commons because they have sent others here to represent them. An hon. gentleman opposite made an interjection which I am not going to answer. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the people across Canada expect the Prime Minister of this country to give more attention to a matter such as this than he has shown in this cavalier dismissal of his responsibilities, this abdication of his responsibilities as the guardian of the constitution. He should give the opposition and the house some indication of the course the government intends to follow after concurrence in this report.

I do not wish to say any more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Nasserden: After all that applause, I think I may continue for a while. I see the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) smiling. He is in a genial mood tonight. He was one of the two cabinet ministers, I believe, who took part in this debate. Surely tonight, in that expansive mood, when he is in a position so close to the Prime Minister that he must know what is going to happen, he will want the rest of us to know as well. I do not want to say anything more in that regard. I see the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau).

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, does the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Boutin) have a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): What is your point of order?

Mr. Boutin: Mr. Speaker, since everybody seems happy to see the smile which brightens up the face of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp), why not suggest to the house that his smile be substituted for the maple leaf, on the distinctive flag?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) has the floor.

[Text]

Mr. Nasserden: I want to thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. This is the type of point of order that we have had throughout this debate, or so-called point of order. It gives us some indication of the seriousness with which hon. gentlemen opposite have taken this whole matter. I am not going to try to reply to it at all.

There are one or two things I want to say about the flag of Canada before I do conclude my remarks.

Mr. Grégoire: This is the fourth time you have concluded.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, when one has such an attentive audience it is difficult to conclude. I do want to say, in all seriousness that a Canadian flag with a red maple leaf in the centre, in my opinion, will not inspire that devotion from the people of Quebec that all of us would like to see. I say that because I believe the people of Quebec would rather see a green or gold maple leaf in that arrangement. I may be mistaken about this, but that is what I believe as a result of the observations I have been able to make during the last four or five years when I have been in that province. I want to say this, too—

Mr. Grégoire: In conclusion.

Mr. Nasserden: I regret that there have been all these interruptions which have made my remarks such a hodge-podge. I see hon. gentlemen opposite laughing. This is hardly the time when hon. gentlemen opposite should be laughing because, after all there is a lot more hangs on the decision that is about to be made in the House of Commons once a vote is called than hon. members realize at the moment.

When you are planning to change the symbol of a nation as is envisaged by the present government it ill becomes those on the government benches who have a majority in the House of Commons, with the assistance they receive from the other parties, to treat as lightly as they do the whole matter under discussion.

I wish to say in conclusion—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I am sure hon. members would like the hon. member for Rosthern to bring his speech to a happy conclusion.

Mr. Nasserden: There can be no happy conclusion in a debate such as this when the Prime Minister is not in his seat.

Mr. F. J. W. Fane (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I think I should first ask you to have a bale of thistles brought in so hon. members on my far left will have something to keep them busy while I am speaking. I am amazed that tonight of all nights, after one of saddest days we have experienced in Canada, no one has come forward on behalf of the government to make a statement on the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to a new national flag.

Certainly a semblance of a flag was picked out by the committee that worked on it, but what real Canadian in Canada wants a flag which is not Canadian and which is not distinctive, but which is the flag of some other country—except that it bears a dead maple leaf in the middle in place of the coat of arms of that country?

Mr. Barnett: Nonsense.

Mr. Fane: The flag of Peru. Look at the list of flags. We are not getting a distinctive flag, if this is the flag the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) intends to impose on us. In any case, he should be here. He should make a statement telling us exactly what we can expect and what we shall be voting for when we vote on this motion which is now before the house.

I for one am not prepared to accept statements by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) as the spokesman for the government. I think the Prime Minister himself should make a statement and, failing him, a senior cabinet minister on the front bench whom he trusts, or should trust. If the right hon. gentleman feels it will compromise him to tell the people of Canada what national flag we are to have, why can we not hear from one of his senior colleagues instead of from a backbencher sitting in the front row over there, one who sets himself up as a heraldic expert?

One cannot expect anything better from this government, however. They are afraid to get up and speak. All except three have been afraid to rise during the last part of this debate. Not a cabinet minister spoke. That certainly shows disrespect of and disregard for the feelings of millions of Canadians across this country. Who is pushing them? Who is blackmailing the Prime Minister? Who is blackmailing the government? Why do they not have enough intestinal fortitude to get up and make statements in this house? They are extremely vocal at other times; ministers have been travelling all over this country of ours making speeches.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am wondering whether the remarks of the hon. member are really relevant to the resolution before the house. At the moment it is a motion for the adoption of the sixth report of the special committee on the Canadian flag. It seems to me that arguments advanced by hon. members should be in favour of or against the adoption of the report, and I should like the hon. member to refer his remarks to the subject matter of the discussion.

Mr. Fane: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, but I think any remarks I have made were very relevant to the debate. However, if you want to know right now exactly how I feel on the flag which has been picked out for us, let me say I feel it is not adequate. I am not in favour of its being the flag of Canada and I never will be. I served in two wars and I was proud to fight under the flag we had; and I wonder how many of the two or three million ex-service men and women in this country would be proud to serve under the travesty of a national flag which has been presented to us today. We may have to call it our national flag but believe me I am one who is most unwilling to accept it.

An hon. Member: And you represent how many?

Mr. Fane: I represent, as I told the house earlier, people of 40 different national origins and I speak as one who received an over-all majority in the last election. Anyway, I want to say that the flag which the committee picked out is not distinctively Canadian. It has a red maple leaf on it. Maple leaves only turn red when they are dead. If there is to be a maple leaf on the Canadian flag it should be a green maple leaf to show the surging life of this nation. As I said the other day, Canada is a growing country, a country which in the course of a few years will be greatest country in the world. We shall be the leader of the nations as, today, the nation to the south of us is the leader of the nations. I predict that for Canada, and I have lived here for many years. I wonder now, as I have wondered for quite some time—in fact, ever since we began debating the choice of the flag committee—how the Liberal members on that committee can reconcile their choice of a flag with that of their Prime Minister. What must the Prime Minister feel like when every one of the Liberal members on that committee repudiated his choice of a flag.

Mr. Grégoire: Oh, that has been said.

Mr. Fane: That is something that is beyond understanding. It is beyond my understanding, at least, and if it is beyond my understanding it is beyond the understanding of a great many other people. What does the Prime Minister think of that? Is he going to resign because his appointees on that committee turned him down? There were seven of them. They turned him down to a man and woman, every one of them. I believe that is a slap in the face for the Prime Minister whom they claim to love so much.

An hon. Member: Absence makes the heart grow fonder; they certainly must love him.

Mr. Fane: This flag is supposed to create unity in our nation. I think the people who believe that are very blind. This flag will not create unity, and there is no other way to look at it.

Mr. Choquette: Your party is divided, that's for sure.

Mr. Fane: What about yours? I think my hon. friend from Lotbinière should join his pals down in the corner and eat thistles with them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fane: Why, Mr. Speaker, they get so impatient that they begrudge me even a drink of water. As I was saying, the unity of Canada is something for which everybody in Canada should strive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fane: I am very glad to have approval from all quarters of the house for that statement, because I think everybody should be prepared for a little give and take if it will provide the unity that is required in this country. All the give should not be—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question?

Mr. Fane: You sit down, and I will answer a question when I have finished.

Mr. Grégoire: Then I rise on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Grégoire: Actually, it is a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker; I would like to call it a question of privilege. Could the hon. member sometimes change the tone of his voice a little?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. please.

Mr. MacEwan: If you had half the guts that man has, you wouldn't say that.

An hon. Member: More fascist behaviour.

Mr. Fane: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that the unity of Canada is something that is paramount in this country of ours and there should be no question about that. Why cannot everybody get together properly? I said there must be give and take on all sides, from all parts. It should not be expected that one side will do all the giving and the other all the taking. The sacrifice has to be equal, and until people are prepared to make an equal sacrifice in this country Canada can never hope to be united. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in the constituency from which I come the people are united. I have told the house there are people of 40 different national origins there, and we are united.

We figure that we are Canadians. We have intermarried; we have joined together. Our customs were all different, but we have joined together and made one culture in the area in which I live. Why cannot Canada as a whole, as a nation, do that? It is just a case of listening to some mountebanks, demagogues who would endeavour to destroy our nation. Whether they have taken the cue from people within this country or from without, I do not know; but I hope to heaven it did not originate within this country. It must be from without, and somebody fell for a smooth, fast talker. That is where the difficulty started in this country.

I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I stand for unity in this country and I will never stir up national animosity in any part of Canada. Personally I will never do that; I never have and I never will. If I can display feelings like that, why cannot all the people in this parliament get together and arrive at a proper flag—not just a flag, any old thing, because any old rag just will not do for this nation of Canada, I assure you, Mr. Speaker. A flag should provide unity. If we can get some togetherness, some give and take on all sides, from all parties, we would be a lot better off. Then we might get together and develop a flag—but not this one. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that is how the people I represent feel also. Again I must say that it is an insult to parliament, it is an insult to the people of Canada that the Prime Minister has not seen fit to take part in this debate. Preferably he should have started the debate off, but he should come into the house and make a statement as to what he thinks about it. Is he scared that his party will repudiate him again? They should not, if he does that.

I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the majority of the provinces in our nation have spoken out definitely and decisively against this flag. So far as my area is concerned my constituents wish me to support the red ensign. As I have remarked several times before, we are prepared to give up part of our red ensign. We would wish to have some of the symbols of our heritage, the heritage of Canada, on our flag. This is a very serious time in the life of our nation and I think the Prime Minister should be here to make his statement.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, there appears to be in this chamber considerable hurry to get along with the business of choosing a national flag. This is one of the most important matters that the parliament of Canada has ever been called upon to decide. I have pleaded before, and I do so again, that we should not be in such a hurry to take action which we or those who come after us have reason to regret. A flag is the symbol of a nation. It becomes very important to the people of a nation. Therefore we should take all the time that is necessary. Neither time, effort nor expense should be permitted to stand in the way of choosing a national flag which will tend to promote national unity in the country rather than discord.

This afternoon we disposed of one question and we are now speaking to the main motion for concurrence in the recommendation made by the committee that we adopt the flag with the red bars at the ends and with a red maple leaf between those bars. This afternoon the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked what comes next. Is the government, he asked, willing to accept this recommendation of the committee? No answer has been given to that question. The government have not put themselves on record as to whether they are willing to accept the committee's recommendation in the way of a flag. Then again, what procedure will be used if and when the house does adopt the recommendation of the committee? How will the house proceed to give effect to the committee's recommendation?

Another question which was asked was: What becomes of the two resolutions now on the order paper numbered 44A and 44B? The first of these was the one placed on the order paper by the government—by the Prime Minister—recommending that this house adopt the three maple leaf design. What happens to this resolution? Resolution 44B, also put on the order paper by the Prime Minister, calls for the house to adopt the union jack as the commonwealth flag or as the flag of the empire. Then there is another resolution, No. 45, dealing with a related topic, the national anthem. These are questions which I believe this house has a right to have answered before we come to a vote on this matter. Surely it is not too much to ask that the Prime Minister or some member of his government should undertake to satisfy the house and make the position of the government clear in regard to these questions.

The party to which I have the honour to belong, in common with all other parties in the house, is doing, I believe, whatever it can to promote national unity in this country. Opinions may differ as to how national unity can best be promoted. There are honest differences of opinion regarding the procedure which should be adopted with this end in view. Our party has taken the stand that for the government to impose a flag by a vote of this house is not the best way to promote national unity. We have the right to present our view and to urge our view upon all hon. members of the house. We wish national unity: all parties are working for national unity. How can we have national unity, however, without a reasonable compromise between the two elements in our population which are causing the disputation and trouble at this time?

Compromise, Mr. Speaker, presupposes a giving on both sides. The English speaking people in this country wish to retain on our national flag some symbols of our past heritage. But we are quite prepared to accord the French speaking people in this country a similar privilege—that they should have some symbolism of their past history also on our national flag.

I understand the feelings of our friends. They are quite willing to forgo any symbolism of our French heritage in Canada provided they can, at the same time, eliminate all the symbolism of the British heritage in connection with our country from our flag. The English speaking people are not prepared to accept that arrangement entirely, but they are quite prepared, as far as I have been able to learn, to compromise.

I sent out 4,000 questionnaires to the people in my area. I blanketed the area which was covered and sent the questionnaire to every family within that area. I have received something in the neighbourhood of 1,000 replies, of which 50 per cent have expressed favour for the retention of the red ensign. About 40 per cent expressed favour for that flag which has no symbolism of the past, namely the three maple leaf design proposed by the Prime Minister.

The significant fact is this. The majority of supporters of the red ensign are willing to accept a compromise. If our French speaking colleagues in this country were willing also to accept a compromise, I am sure there would be no difficulty in selecting a national flag. Our French speaking colleagues have a right to express their opinions, feelings and allegiances, but I do feel that they have not shown a willingness, as have the English speaking people, to accept a compromise. Surely that is what we need—a compromise. We must consider both sides. If we can select a flag acceptable to both our founding races, I am sure that every other ethnic group will also accept that choice.

While referring to the two founding races, perhaps I should state that I believe most of us have forgotten that the two original founding races of this country were the Indians and Eskimos. The flag now being proposed does not embody any symbolism of those two races. What consideration has been given in the design of the proposed flag to Canadians who have come to this country in the last 97 years? Surely it is not too much to ask that the acceptable Canadian flag be a compromise of the feelings not only of the two founding races of this country, but of the feelings of the many thousands of Canadians from other countries.

Surely it is not too much to ask that we take our time and try to select a suitable design. I cannot understand why we should hurry in our selection of the Canadian national flag. Pressure has been put upon us ever since the flag issue was brought before us so many months ago. Our whole legislative program has been built around the flag issue. In fact, since the throne speech our debate and legislative consideration has been associated with the flag issue. We talked ourselves through both an Easter and summer recess. Now, in anticipation of a Christmas recess, none of us knows what to expect. What will happen? Who can give the answer? It is a good thing that we passed legislation creating nine statutory holidays per year. Thank goodness we can at least count on those.

The special committee on a Canadian flag recommended something which I do not feel is an honest and genuine compromise. It does not embody any symbols of our past. I give credit to the members of that committee for doing their best under these highly emotionally charged circumstances. However, in blindness to public opinion, they have brought forward something without historical symbolism, without recognition of the contributions of the two founding races, and without recognition of the feelings of the majority of the Canadian people, and for those reasons I cannot accept the committee's recommendation. I must, therefore, in all conscience, vote against the committee's choice.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that some genuine action toward compromise should take place. I think some compromise should be adopted which I can take to my constituents in Middlesex West and say: We could not retain the red ensign, but at least 75 per cent of the supporters of the red ensign have accepted this compromise, and we recommend that this compromise be accepted. As the situation now stands, I can only say to those members of my constituency who are Legion supporters that the recommendation of this special committee of the House of Commons is not acceptable on the grounds that it does not incorporate any symbols emblematic of our past history and traditions. That is not good enough, Mr. Speaker.

The government is seized with the responsibility of adopting measures supported by the majority of the people of Canada. The opposition must criticize, constructively, and has done so. It has suggested that we compromise by holding a plebiscite. Surely the government, in light of all the criticism and objection about this flag procedure, should be prepared to withdraw this resolution and send the question back to the special committee, or perhaps to a new joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate. Let us make a new effort to solve the flag issue. There is no hurry to adopt a new flag. We are not now going to have a flag by Christmas, even though this recommendation is adopted, and provided the Senate lives up to its usual record for speed. Let us try again in a committee to come to some compromise. Perhaps a committee made up of members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons could bring in some new ideas, so that we could adopt a flag which is, or will be genuinely accepted by the Canadian people. Perhaps as a result of the establishment of such a committee a compromise could be acceptable to both English and French speaking Canadians. Perhaps then there would be no losers or winners on the flag issue, but acceptance of a flag which would promote national unity rather than bitterness in the eyes of Canadians throughout this nation.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to touch on one other situation, namely that this government does not have a mandate from the people of Canada on the subject of a Canadian flag. It is a fact that the government is a minority government, but I do not hold that against them. They are doing the best they can. We know they have a big majority in the house on the flag issue and we know they have been well supported in the house during the 20 months they have been in office. But there was no mention in our area of a flag without symbolism of our past being imposed on the people of Canada during either of the last two election campaigns. This may have been an issue in some places. I believe the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) said it was the issue upon which he and his colleagues were elected, or at least one of the main planks in their platform. It was not a plank in any platform in our area and for that reason partly I say that the government did not have a clear mandate from the people of Canada to change our flag.

The promises made in our area included a national pension plan which involved an increase in old age pensions out of the first contributions made to the plan, an increase in old age pensions without any increase in taxation, which we will admit had a very attractive sound to the people. Then there was the promise in regard to wheat. We were to have $3 wheat on the prairies. This was a very attractive plank in their platform. We were to have a support price of $2.40 for soybeans in southwestern Ontario.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. It may be that the hon. member's comments are relevant to the motion now before the house but that is not readily apparent to the Chair. I would ask the hon. member if there is any way that these comments and remarks can be related to the motion now under consideration.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Speaker, I was pointing out that to my mind the government has no clear mandate to impose a flag on the people of Canada. I was outlining the problems and issues that were a part of the election campaign in our area and I was going to make the point that the flag was not one of those problems and issues in our part of the country, but these other things were. All of the kinks were to be taken out of the Department of National Defence and out of government administration in general. We were to have a greater measure of world peace. The country was to come closer to Utopia than ever before, but there was no mention of the flag issue.

With the government having no mandate to impose a flag, the only suggestion I can make is that unless the government can find some way of approaching this problem other than simply imposing a flag by a vote of the house, unless we can set up a new committee of the Senate and the House of Commons or a new committee of the house alone and keep on trying to find a satisfactory design, then I think the only fair thing for the government to do is to withhold the imposition of a flag until they get a new mandate from the people of Canada. I think they probably need a new mandate in other respects as well. I think the whole policy envisaged by the government aimed at creating national unity, of which the flag is only one part—the opting out provision, the rewriting of our constitution, the British North America Act—all of these things together with the imposition of a new flag should be taken again before the people so that the people may have a chance to express their confidence or lack of confidence in the government. We need an election before a flag is imposed by a vote of the house.

The contract of confederation was entered into in 1867. That is 97 years ago, and for 97 years it has worked and served Canada. Some will say not well; some will say that it has served us well. But I should like to take the house back over the years to those days when confederation was under consideration and to place on the record the feelings of the leaders of the two parties then, including the leader of French Canada at that time. The Conservative leader, of course, was Sir John A. Macdonald. His attitude toward the empire, toward Canada and toward the flag is well known. In 1884 he spoke in Toronto on the future of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is perhaps the greatest monument to his courage and resolution. These words of his are to be found on page 36 of J. Pope's "Flag of Canada" published in 1912. These were the words of Sir John A. Macdonald:

> This will be 10 days from London—

He is speaking of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

> —to the new city of Vancouver on the Pacific coast. The run across the Pacific to Yokohama may be made in 14 days; the whole trip will thus be made in 24 days from London to Yokohama, a saving in time of at least 20 days over the route via Gibraltar and the Suez canal. The English colony of Hong Kong may be reached by the Canadian Pacific Railway in less than 30 days from England, or 16 days less than by Gibraltar and the Suez canal.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member because his remarks are, of course, of great interest. But it does seem to the Chair that he is straying rather seriously from the matter which he should be considering, the adoption of the sixth report of the special committee on the Canadian flag. Again I say it may be that these quotations are related to the question whether the house should adopt or reject the committee recommendation, but I would suggest to the hon. member that perhaps his remarks should be a little more relevant to the subject matter.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Speaker, these remarks do have a definite relationship inasmuch as they indicate the attitude of the Canadian political leaders in 1867 regarding the flag of Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. My very respectful suggestion to the hon. member is that what this house has to consider is the opinions of the political leaders at this time and not as they were in 1867.

Mr. Thomas: If you will bear with me for one more sentence, I will come to the end of this quotation. These are the words of Sir John A. Macdonald:

> During all that time the traveller will never be out of the sound of the British drum and may always have his eyes resting on the union jack.

Now, we come to the attitude, and this is a shorter quotation, Mr. Speaker, of Hon. George Brown, that great Liberal leader in 1867 during the debate on the formation of confederation. This is concerning a flag, and George Brown, that great leader of the reform party was ever a staunch upholder of the union jack. In the course of the confederation debate, he said:

> It may be that some among us will live to see the day when, as the result of this measure, a great and powerful people may have grown up on these lands—when the boundless forests all around us shall have given way to smiling fields and thriving towns and when one united government, under the British flag, shall extend from shore to shore.

Again, we have mention of the British flag which in those days was the union jack. Here we have the Conservative party and the Liberal party representatives speaking with no objection to the union jack. Then we come to the opinion of Sir George Etienne Cartier, who in those days was the great French Canadian leader from Quebec. He was equally strong in his devotion to the British flag. This is a report in the Quebec Morning Chronicle of May 23, 1862, and reads as follows:

> The vote against the militia bill of 1862 was recorded, as we know, against a measure which was to provide, in a better and more efficient manner, for the defence of the country. We feel, therefore, that we fell in defence of a measure, the passing of which we considered necessary to secure us the full enjoyment of our free political institutions, under the protection of the glorious flag of old England.

Now, there was no dispute in those days when confederation was set up; the flag was acceptable to all elements of the country—to the Conservatives, to the Liberals, to the people of Upper Canada and to the people of Lower Canada. There was no feeling whatever, no objection to the use of the union jack. It has only been of late, apparently, that an objection has developed to the use of the union jack. This sentiment may change. There are about 5.5 million people in Quebec and there are about 3.5 million of those people, I believe, who speak no English but speak French only. There are about 10.5 million people in Canada who speak English only. Now, our problem at this time is to get together on a compromise flag, a flag to which all people can subscribe and in the selection of which there will be no winners and no losers.

I have a letter here written by a group of distinguished people which has a distinct bearing on the selection of a national flag. Bits of it have been referred to a number of times but the letter, which is not long, has never been used. There are parts of it which have never been used. This letter is signed by a group of distinguished Canadians such as Dr. D. G. Creighton, professor of history, University of Toronto; Dr. Eugene Forsey, director of research, Canadian Labour Congress. I may say that I called Dr. Forsey just to make sure that this was a genuine letter and that the sentiments expressed in this letter were honest, and the real sentiments of the people concerned. I was assured by Dr. Forsey, when I read him excerpts from this letter, that the letter was genuine and represented the opinions of these people. The other signers are, Mrs. H. A. Dyde, Edmonton; Dr. W. L. Morton, professor of history, University college, University of Manitoba; T. H. B. Symons, president and vice chancellor, Trent University, Peterborough; Jean Palardy, author, film director, Montreal; Dr. Denis Smith, assistant to the president and assistant professor of politics, Trent University, Peterborough; David M. Harley, barrister and solicitor, Toronto; Eric McLean, music critic, Montreal; Walter Pitman, head of the history department, Kenner Collegiate, Peterborough. He used to sit over in one of those seats. Then, there is Dr. Macgregor Parsons, Red Deer, Alberta and Scott Bull Symons, assistant curator in charge of Canadian collections, Royal Ontario museum, Toronto.

This letter was addressed to the Prime Minister under date of May 27, 1964, and it is just as pertinent today as it was then. I quote:

We have thought deeply about the flag issue, and believe it necessary to write this open letter to you as an expression of our common feelings. May we emphasize that we do not speak as political partisans, but only as concerned Canadians representing several parties.

We applaud your decision to seek a distinctive national flag for Canada, and recognize your courage in doing so. We believe, as you do, that the flag should be a source of national unity, and that it should be unmistakably Canadian in character. However, we protest that the single leaf flag is neither of these things. Its only advantage is that it is innocuous, that it produces tepid approval, mild disapproval, or indifference, and that it can therefore be adopted without any display or strong feeling whatever.

Mr. Grégoire: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; I regret that I have to interrupt the hon. member, since it is now ten o'clock.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WOOLLIAMS—LETTER TO BANFF ADVISORY COUNCIL FROM NORTHERN AFFAIRS MINISTER

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I think when you hear my question of privilege you will find my argument irrefragable. It arises out of a letter written on September 19, 1964 by a minister of the crown. My question of privilege affects my personal responsibilities to my constituency; and when I read the last paragraph of the letter, which as I say was written by a minister of the crown, I think, Mr. Speaker, you will also find it not only affects my responsibility as a member of this house but also the responsibility of any other person serving his constituency as a member of parliament.

This letter was addressed to the Banff advisory council, Banff, Alberta and was written by the minister of northern affairs. I should like to quote from the last two paragraphs. The letter is lengthy and I do not want to take up a lot of time. If any hon. member wants the whole letter read I am prepared to read it, but my question of privilege involves the last two paragraphs, which I am sure the house will find interesting and I trust, Mr. Speaker, you will even find shocking. The second last paragraph reads:

> I was most interested in Mr. Woolliams' reference on page 10040 of the debate to my letter to council of November 4, 1964. I am curious to know by what means Mr. Woolliams received a copy of that letter which he has subsequently used for partisan purposes which I do not think are in keeping with the kind of relations which I would like to have with the Banff advisory council.

Now we come to the crux and the meat of it.

> If the council would like me to send copies of all my correspondence with them, I would be glad to have that advice from you, and act accordingly.

The last paragraph is what I find shocking, Mr. Speaker, which I say affects my responsibility to my constituency and the responsibility of other members. It reads:

> I sincerely hope that Mr. Woolliams' remarks were not requested by the Banff advisory council or by any member of the council.

It is the last sentence with which I come to grips. This is it:

> I would hope that the council will conduct its relations directly with me at all times.

What this minister has done on this occasion, and what he did when he met that council, was threaten it. He said "You have to deal with me or I will not consider any of the suggestions made by you". I suggest that is irresponsible and an erosion of the responsibility of any member. This is a shocking letter, and I am sure the Prime Minister is shocked to know that one of his ministers has written in this manner to the people of the constituency of Bow River.

CANADIAN FLAG

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Thursday, December 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Batten that the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, in the very limited time remaining at my disposal I should like to continue the promotion I put forth last night for a genuine compromise flag, which would be something that all Canadians could support, ending this contest without winners or losers.

Reaching a compromise is similar to horse trading. The seller starts with his top price and the buyer starts with his bottom price, and then a step by step process takes place to reach an agreement. After conferring with some of my colleagues I have decided to move the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk). This amendment is designed to clear away the brush, leaving the way open for a real compromise flag. I move:

> That the sixth report of the special committee be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to strike out in paragraph 7 all the words after "Canada" and substitute "be the Canadian red ensign."

And that the committee for such purposes be revived.

Mr. Speaker: It has been moved by Mr. Thomas, seconded by Mr. Mandziuk:

That the sixth report of the special committee be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to strike out in paragraph 7, all the words after "Canada" and substitute "be the Canadian red ensign."

And that the committee for such purposes be revived.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will come to the amendment which has just been proposed when I deal with the votes that have already been taken by the committee whose report we are now considering. I believe I am the 71st member of parliament to take part in this discussion. I was the first of 174 speakers on the original flag resolution, and I am the 71st in this second discussion involving the flag recommended in the committee report.

Last evening it was suggested that before a vote is taken the views of the government should be made clear in respect of the committee report. Indeed, the impression seemed to have been created last night that if only the Prime Minister, speaking on behalf of the government, would give his view on this matter we could then go ahead and take a decision. So I am very happy indeed to oblige this morning and I hope the result which was indicated last night will be realized after I have spoken.

The question was asked last night, where does the government stand on this matter? I would point out first, Mr. Speaker, that what we are considering is not a government motion but a motion for concurrence in the report of a committee of this house, a report which is before this house not as a government motion, a report on which every member of this house has the right and the duty to vote as a member in a free vote. It is not, therefore, a question of where the government stands; it is a question of where every member of this house stands.

I am speaking this morning as one member of the house who is Prime Minister. I am speaking for myself, but I am also authorized to state that every member of the government, as a member of the government, supports the recommendation of this committee; and we are very happy indeed to have with us in this support not only members of the Liberal party but also members of opposition parties, including front bench members of the official opposition.

I was asked yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition what steps the government proposes to take if this report of a committee of the house is adopted by parliament. I can assure him, as I assured the house last June in answer to a similar question, which answer appears on page 4319 of Hansard, that if the recommendations in this report are accepted by parliament the government will then take the necessary action to implement those recommendations. The recommendations of the sixth report of the committee provide for a distinctive Canadian flag.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the Prime Minister goes on, may I ask him this question. If parliament concurs in the committee report, what are the plans of the government with regard to the Senate?

Mr. Knowles: Abolish it.

Mr. Pearson: I dealt with this question last June, but I am glad to deal with it again. This is not an unreasonable question by my right hon. friend.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There have been so many changes since June.

Mr. Pearson: There is one respect in which there has been no change since June, and that is the official opposition have prevented a decision being taken on this matter.

If the recommendations of this report are accepted by the House of Commons, they will be considered by the Senate. If they are accepted by the Senate, they become recommendations of parliament and the necessary formal steps will be taken afterward to bring these recommendations into effect. My right hon. friend knows, I think, what those steps are. In any event, I put them forward previously and I will be glad to go into that later.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will it be by resolution in the Senate?

Mr. Pearson: Actually the formula will be laid down to the house if and when the recommendations are accepted. I would be very happy indeed, if the houses of parliament take positive action in regard to these recommendations, to associate a former prime minister and privy councillor with me in the formal steps that will be later required.

The recommendation of the committee for a Canadian flag was criticized yesterday by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition in what I thought was an impressive speech, although I did not agree with it, largely because the design for a Canadian flag embodied in these recommendations eradicated our past; that the maple leaf flag somehow eradicated our past, the maple leaf flag as the national flag of Canada, with which will be associated, though not as a national flag, an emblem which will recognize the association with the commonwealth of nations and our loyalty to the Queen.

This does not, Mr. Speaker, eradicate our past. This recommendation for a distinctive national flag, far from eradicating the past, salutes the Canadian future, the future of a great, united Canada, with many races, many peoples, two founding language groups, and many people who are proud to be Canadians. Yesterday, the right hon. gentleman said, and I think I am quoting him correctly, that to forget the past is to condemn the future. Who is doing that in this house, Mr. Speaker? Who is forgetting the past—

Mr. Churchill: The Liberal party.

Mr. Pearson: —and who is condemning the future?

Some hon. Members: You are.

Mr. Pearson: Is it condemnation of the future, the adoption of a Canadian national maple leaf flag?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Those of us in the house who are of British descent do not forget our past, our traditions, our mother country and—

Mr. Korchinski: You sure act like it.

Mr. Pearson: Some hon. gentleman opposite says I act like it. I will let my own record speak for that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Am I supposed to be forgetting my British past because I look forward to my Canadian future?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I dislike speaking about myself, especially on an occasion like this, but I believe I have given evidence in my own life, in my own career, in my service in peace and war, of my devotion to the British past of this country, my devotion to the symbols of that past, my willingness to serve under those symbols when it was necessary to do so; and I do not apologize to any hon. gentleman in this house for my devotion to that past and my dedication to a Canadian future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Yesterday the right hon. gentleman, in some moving words about the dedication of the French speaking element in this country to the British institutions and the British symbols of this country in the past, talked about the great heart of French Canada being, as he felt, with him in the stand he has been taking. To support that position he quoted from the words of a man from Quebec who has made his mark in Canadian history, Mr. Speaker Lemieux, who said many years ago—and perhaps the right hon. gentleman will forgive me if I requote this:

> If you ask me why I am a British subject, and why I wish to remain one, I reply . . . that I prize most those institutions that secure me most strongly in our rights and liberties; and am proud to be a sharer in that great work of advancing peace and progress throughout the world, for which the British empire stands.

Those words, Mr. Speaker, are a moving illustration of much that is best in our history, but they are also an indication of how history changes and how important it is for us to change with it. The past can and must be honoured, but surely the past must not be permitted to prevent the changes that are necessary to adapt to the future; and if Mr. Speaker Lemieux were in the house today he would not be able to speak in exactly those terms. He would not be able to talk about the British empire in the way he talked about it in this quotation, because principles may not change but institutions do change. The British empire has changed. We do not talk about the British empire now in the sense that we talked about it 25 or 50 years ago, and quite rightly so.

There is no British empire in that sense. There is a commonwealth of nations of which an independent Canada is a part, an independent Canada which is proud of these traditions, proud of the principles on which our political life is based; but an independent Canada which now feels it should have the symbols of its independence, as we have been getting them over the years. Changes have taken place and we adapt, surely, to those changes. Someone has said that a country which ignores the lessons of history is condemned to repeat its tragedies. We do not ignore the lessons of history when we support Canadian symbols for Canadian nationality.

We, Mr. Speaker—and this is an indication of the change I am talking about—who served in the Canadian forces from 1914 to 1918—and I served in both the Canadian and the British forces—knew that whether we were serving in the British forces or in the Canadian forces we served under the union jack, not the Canadian red ensign. None of us saw a Canadian red ensign in those years.

Mr. Churchill: That is not right, and you know it.

Mr. Pearson: None of us saw a Canadian red ensign in those years.

Mr. Churchill: You didn't serve in France, either.

Mr. Pearson: No, my service was very undistinguished, I admit; but I served—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: —and I served, as a Canadian, under the union jack and was proud to do so. It was not until 1945, by order in council, that the union jack was replaced by the red ensign as an official flag for Canada. At that time we all remember that a great many sincere people in Canada opposed that change. Many who are now worried about the change from the red ensign were worried about a change from the union jack, but I think we all agree now that this was a desirable and an inevitable stage in our national progression.

What we are doing in regard to the report of this committee is discussing, considering and, I hope, approving a recommendation of a parliamentary committee which is carrying out in its recommendation the injunction of an order in council passed as far back as 1945; and yet we are supposed to have rushed into this matter. I would ask hon. members to remember that this was authorized by order in council, and I do not recall those hon. gentlemen opposite who were in the house at that time taking exception to this action by order in council, not by parliament. The order in council recommended the adoption of the red ensign, a provisional recommendation pending decision by parliament. We are asking parliament in 1964 to take that decision on the basis of a report; not on the basis of a government resolution—that procedure has been altered—but on the basis of a report from one of its own committees in which all parties in this house were represented. Are we now to be refused that right of decision, Mr. Speaker, on grounds that we are ramming this through?

When it was first put forward in 1945 by order in council it was a provisional decision, and we are now asking that this provisional decision be changed to a parliamentary decision in 1964, a parliamentary decision for a Canadian national flag to which the party I have the honour to lead has been dedicated in resolutions at party conventions through two election campaigns as a specific commitment and, unlike other political commitments that I know about, a political commitment to be carried out if possible, or to be attempted if possible within two years of taking office; that is to say by next April. I can imagine the criticism to which we would be subjected in the 1965 session of this parliament if we had not taken that kind of action which we said we would take in a specific time period.

The committee that was set up when the earlier debate on this subject indicated that no easier, quick agreement was going to be reached by a free decision of this house worked hard, effectively and sincerely, and I would like to join others in congratulating its members of all parties and particularly, if I may, its chairman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Eleven out of the 15 members of that committee accepted the flag design recommended in its report; 11 out of 15. That is 70 per cent, or a little more, of the membership of the parliamentary committee; and among those 11 are representatives of every party in this house including the official opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: The right hon. Leader of the Opposition has taken the position that if there had been two more, if there had been 13 out of 15 and not 11, no further debate would have been necessary and the matter could have gone to parliament for a quick decision. If there had been only two more, we would not need a plebiscite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: We would not even need 74 speeches on the report of the committee. No delay would have been required. I am very, very sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the committee was not able to secure those two extra votes. I appreciate, however, the position of those four members who could not accept this recommendation, a position very honestly, sincerely and firmly held. The right hon. gentleman yesterday had something to say about the report of this committee and the various votes, and an amendment has been moved this morning which was put forward as a compromise, something on which perhaps—

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that was the expression used; it was an honest effort to find a compromise.

Mr. Churchill: As a preliminary to a compromise.

Mr. Pearson: I stand corrected, Mr. Speaker; it was put forward as a preliminary to a compromise.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps that makes me even a little more suspicious about it. Preliminaries can sometimes take a good many weeks in this house. The committee considered a motion for a national plebiscite. That was defeated, and I will not say anything about it. They considered the adoption of only one national flag. As pointed out by my right hon. friend yesterday, the motion for one national flag was carried 14 to 0; and of course we all agree that there can be only one national flag. Then the committee voted on the Canadian red ensign as the national flag for Canada. That motion was defeated by 10 to 4. Now as a preliminary to this compromise we are asked to send the report back to the committee and have them reverse that decision, which was 10 to 4 against the red ensign, which is now to be sent back to be voted on.

That is indeed a pretty far reaching preliminary. But I would point out to my right hon. friend that when that vote was taken on the Canadian red ensign, to the preservation of which as a Canadian national flag he and his supporters are dedicated, that did not prevent, and I am glad it did not prevent, the Conservative members on that committee considering other designs and, indeed, supporting other designs, including a design which they favoured strongly and which was not the Canadian red ensign but which did have symbols of our British and our French associations.

The right hon. gentleman took strong exception to Liberal members on that committee swallowing—I think that was the word he used—the three maple leaves flag and, in the interests of getting the maximum amount of support possible for a Canadian national flag, accepting another maple leaf design. They considered this matter in exactly the same light, I assume, as did the Conservative members on that committee after the red ensign vote was defeated, and they also cast around for other designs which might be satisfactory to the committee.

Therefore we find other votes were taken. The three maple leaves design was retained by a vote of 8 to 6, but the single maple leaf design was retained by a vote of 13 to 1. I honour the members of the committee from this side of the house for the compromise they were willing to make to get the maximum basis for support, and I do not think, Mr. Speaker, they should be criticized for that any more than the other members of the committee should be criticized if, after taking a vote on the red ensign, they also looked around for some other flag which would receive the maximum amount of support.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, 11 of the 15 members of this committee agreed on a red and white Canadian flag built around the symbol of the maple leaf. The right hon. gentleman wonders why they deserted what he and others have called my flag, the one with three maple leaves. I wonder what he or his supporters would have done, Mr. Speaker, if I had tried to impose my will upon the Liberal members of that committee so as to force a majority committee report on a design which had previously been put forward in this house by me, thereby attempting to make that committee report what hon. gentlemen opposite would have called a government design. What kind of committee would it have been then?

Therefore the committee, in the exercise of its judgment, its wisdom and its desire to get a recommendation for a flag which would have a strong basis for support from every party—and it succeeded in this—made the recommendation which it did. I congratulate the committee on that recommendation, and I think the work they have done justifies the decision that was taken some weeks ago to set up this committee.

I remember, Mr. Speaker, that at the time we on this side agreed that the debate on the resolution should be brought to an end until this committee was set up and had reported we were accused of abandoning our position. We were laughed and sneered at for retreating. I remember some very strong words which the right hon. gentleman, the Leader of the Opposition, used in Fredericton when he arrived there for an important occasion and learned about the committee being established. It turned out to have been a very good thing to do, I think, and I hope the right hon. gentleman will agree with me in this and will therefore feel a little differently about committees than he did on November 13, 1945, when he spoke on a resolution to set up a joint parliamentary flag committee. At that time he spoke in terms which indicated that that was the worst possible course which could be taken by this parliament. As reported at page 2090 of Hansard for November 13, 1945, the right hon. gentleman said:

> So that when an amendment was moved by hon. members on this side of the house the other day, the idea behind it was that instead of putting this matter into the cockpit of a committee where there may be engendered passions such as resulted from the placing of a similar question in committee in South Africa, we suggested that the government face the issue as a government—

Well, Mr. Speaker, we all agreed that this matter should go to a committee. We did not face it as a government in that sense; we sent it to a committee. That committee, as we hoped it would, brought about greater unity in the search for a design which would appeal to the greatest possible majority in this House of Commons. That was the purpose in setting up the committee, and I think that purpose was achieved.

Now, Mr. Speaker, are we, in face of that work which has been done, and as proposed by the right hon. gentleman, to ignore, to reject, to abandon this report? The right hon. gentleman said yesterday that it would be a step forward if we would only postpone the whole matter and forget about the report. Mr. Speaker, it would be a step backward if we were to do this, and it would prevent this matter being decided for the indefinite future.

In a very interesting television broadcast in June of this year the Leader of the Opposition—this broadcast has been referred to previously, Mr. Speaker—used these words: "It is parliament's responsibility to look after this matter". A little later, again quoting from the text of his broadcast, he said:

> You say, should it go to the Canadian people. I say no.

And again—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman is simply quoting excerpts. I said there should be a plebiscite. I said it at that time and I have continued to say that. But I did say that there should not be an election fought on the question of the flag.

Mr. Pearson: The right hon. gentleman will have to give his own interpretation to his words, but his words also included this expression.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, you read it.

Mr. Pearson: I will read more if it will make him feel any better. The right hon. gentleman said:

> Put this matter of the flag before the Canadian people and I fear the results.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, that is what I said.

Mr. Pearson: Then we are agreed on that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind the applause. What I said was, do not put it before them as an election issue. I advocated a plebiscite. Throughout the remarks which the right hon. gentleman is quoting he will find that over and over again I advocated a plebiscite. But I did say, do not put this matter before the Canadian people as an election issue, he himself having threatened to put it forward in an election and then having to withdraw.

Mr. Pearson: I really do not want to be unfair to the right hon. gentleman, but surely to clear this matter up the best thing to do —and I will be glad to do this as soon as the procedure makes it possible—is to table the full text of what the right hon. gentleman said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Mr. Pearson: In any event, Mr. Speaker, the matter is now before parliament. We on this side as members of this party, with one exception—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: An honourable exception.

Mr. Pearson: Well, there are more exceptions on the other side. I would be happy, Mr. Speaker, to compare the quantity of exceptions but not the quality. In any event, we accept these recommendations, Mr. Speaker, and my right hon. friend opposite rejects them. That was made clear by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition yesterday.

It has been said that we should drop this matter. Some very earnest and sincere appeals have been made to us on this side to drop it because it is premature and controversial. It has been suggested that it is premature and that, after the stand that we on this side have taken, after the development over the years and after decades of nationhood, it should be postponed indefinitely. Mr. Speaker, what would be gained by that?

Would there be less controversy over a change next year, the year after or the year after that? Would the refusal to face up to this matter now not increase the controversy in the years ahead? Would there be a real chance of getting the kind of parliamentary support for this report which I hope even now we will get? Would there be any chance of that if we did nothing next year, the year after, or the year after that? Would there be any less controversy about the design next year, or would there be any more chance of finding a generally acceptable solution next year? Mr. Speaker, I think this is the time to act, especially after the consideration that has been given to this matter over the months. Let us have a decision on this matter now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, some hon. gentlemen opposite seem to indicate that we on this side cannot be serious about this matter, and cannot be as passionately sincere as they profess to be. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition indicated this yesterday when he said we had deserted the flag that we had put forward, and that if we had been as serious about that flag as they are about their red ensign, which they partially abandoned at least in the committee, we never would have deserted that which they sneered about a few months ago as being the Pearson pennant.

Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned I put forth that design after a great deal of thought, consideration and discussion with experts of one kind and another—and we have lots of flag experts these days—as what I thought to be the most appropriate and most beautiful design.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And the one with the historical significance.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, and the one which has historical significance; indeed it has. The three maple leaves have historical significance; and so has the single red maple leaf, as has been pointed out.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, then may I ask the Prime Minister why it was that when he spoke in June he said the single maple leaf had no such historical significance.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not recall using those words. I am quite willing to admit that in my view the three maple leaves have more historical significance than the single maple leaf, but the single maple leaf appeared on the arms of Canada, and I do not think anybody is likely to depreciate the significance of the single maple leaf, which not only has historical but a great deal of other significance, as anyone who has ever served in Canada's forces knows.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: What the right hon. gentleman is suggesting is that I insist on my personal preference in this matter; that I insist on the flag of the three maple leaves design in spite of the fact that 11 out of 15 members of a parliamentary committee, representing every party in this house, recommended the single red maple leaf on a white background, and red and white are the national colours of Canada and have been so for a long time.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Pearson: The right hon. gentleman now has suddenly acquired a deep affection for the three maple leaves—

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Pearson: —with blue borders—

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It does seem to me that the right hon. Prime Minister is entitled to—

An hon. Member: Let us keep the record straight.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would you kindly take your seat. It does seem to me that there is such a thing as courtesy. However, is your point of order a serious one?

Mr. Rapp: It is very serious, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure the Prime Minister would not wish to leave an error uncorrected in the record. He has stated time after time that the flag committee recommendation was approved by an 11 to 4 vote. At no time was there a vote of 11 to 4. Our chairman never voted, and the record should show that the vote was 10 to 4.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's preoccupation with this question of order. It is quite true that the vote which took place was 10 to 4, but the chairman of that committee has moved concurrence in this report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I think therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is fair for me to say that of the 15 members of that committee 11 support the recommendations of this report.

Mr. Rapp: That could be, but the vote never occurred that way.

Mr. Pearson: I quite agree that the vote was 10 to 4, because the chairman did not vote. Normally the chairman would only vote if there was a tie and he was required to break that tie. Mr. Speaker, when the three maple leaves design was before this house the right hon. Leader of the Opposition referred to it in the following terms: "I have seen better trademarks."

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Mr. Pearson: Unfortunately there has been a great deal of depreciation and sneering about the maple leaf as an emblem on a flag. I do not understand why hon. members opposite take that attitude toward this symbolism of Canadianism. I suggest it is unfortunate that the impression has been created in certain areas and quarters that the maple leaf is not worthy of being a national symbol of Canada on a flag, and I hope that when the dust of the debate has cleared away, if this recommendation carries, we will all be proud of the fact that the central feature of our flag is a red maple leaf.

The next criticism that has been levelled at us on this side is that if it is not the Pearson pennant, as it used to be called, it is somehow or other a flag design put forward to appeal to only one section of our population. It has been suggested time after time since last June, in speeches made by members on the other side and in statements made outside this house, that this has been done by the government, and now presumably by the committee, as the result of some kind of deal with one part of Canada—with Quebec—and that somehow this is Quebec's flag. Mr. Speaker, nothing could be more malevolently designed to stir up division and controversy in this country. It is untrue and it is unworthy.

Mr. Caouette: Dishonest.

Mr. Pearson: And dishonourable; and nothing could be more prejudicial to national unity in our country at this difficult time than these anti-Quebec flag and other insinuations. I think I join nearly every member of this house in deploring these divisive and demagogic tactics. To suggest, Mr. Speaker, that to introduce or support a maple leaf flag, whether three maple leaves or a single maple leaf, is to surrender to Quebec is an insult not only to our French speaking fellow Canadians but to those English speaking members of this house and English speaking Canadians outside the house who support these proposals—and many do—for the best and the most patriotic Canadian reasons. When this controversy and debate are over I hope we can somehow remove from consideration by parliament the feeling that any one part of Canada is more concerned in this matter than any other part of Canada, because this is a Canadian proposal we are submitting to parliament.

The issue now before the house, Mr. Speaker, is the right of parliament to come to a decision. Arguments have been repeated over and over again in the discussion. Statistics show how many speeches we have had and how many days we have devoted to this discussion. Surely no one inside or outside the house can argue that parliament has not had adequate opportunity to consider this matter in committee and in the house. Of course free and full discussion is absolutely essential to the parliamentary process, but full and free discussion is not the same as obstruction, as the prevention of a decision on a matter after discussion.

We have rules, and we have used them very sparingly. I hope we will never have to use them except very sparingly in emergencies. We have a rule to prevent this kind of thing. It is called closure and it is used practically every week, sometimes nearly every day, in the mother of parliaments at Westminster. Fortunately we have not had to use it very often in this parliament.

An hon. Member: 1956.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, it was used in 1956, and do not ask me to explain or apologize for the way it was used then.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You voted for it.

Mr. Pearson: I voted for it; indeed I did. I voted for it, but let me remind the right hon. gentleman that after what he said about the use of this rule in 1956 and after his commitment to remove this rule from the standing orders, what did he do about closure? I hope he will pardon me for mentioning this but his intervention made it necessary. The rule was retained, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The right hon. gentleman supported closure in 1956 and flouted parliament, and he cannot explain it.

Mr. Pearson: No doubt it was retained by my right hon. friend and his government because they may have thought it might be necessary to use it in the future to prevent obstruction and filibustering. We have had a great deal of discussion on the matter before the house. The issue, therefore, is not now the right of debate, not the right of free and full discussion in parliament. The issue now is the right of parliament to make a decision after debate. If the official opposition or any opposition, because they feel so strongly about this matter, claim the right to prevent any vote by using the rules, then the government or members on this side of the house who feel equally strongly and sincerely have the same right to use the rules to bring about a vote after full discussion if that is the only way a decision can be reached. The other alternative is dissolution and an appeal to the people on the prevention of a vote.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, we will not have to follow either of these courses. But if we on this side are not to be prevented from exercising the right of decision, then the members of the opposition should show some responsibility by not prolonging the right of discussion until it becomes obstruction. Otherwise, Mr. Speaker, a minority can impose its will on a majority by ultimatum, and this has been suggested in this debate. "Withdraw your measure or alter it and your tactics concerning it to suit us or we will bring parliamentary business to a standstill."

This would make a mockery of parliament and the parliamentary process. I am sure the right hon. gentleman does not contemplate or approve that result. Perhaps he will permit me to quote what one of his predecessors, Sir Robert Borden, had to say on this point on April 9, 1913, as found on page 7389 of Hansard. He said:

> No one is more ready than I to acknowledge that liberty of speech and freedom of debate must be preserved, but I venture respectfully to suggest that these privileges must be observed and maintained under such conditions that they shall not be allowed to degenerate into license and obstruction.

Our friends in the New Democratic party have indicated they do not believe in the application of closure. They are not opposed as a party, and apparently some of their members are not opposed as individuals, to the recommendations of the report. I believe some of them will support those recommendations, from the record of votes we have already had. But they feel it is quite proper, and I am not criticizing them, to use the rules to stop debate on recommendations which they may not necessarily be going to oppose, so we can be forced by the rules to debate something else which they wish debated. That is not closure to bring about a decision, Mr. Speaker. That is a form of closure, using the rules, to prevent a decision by altering the course of debate. They have the right to do that. They have the right to use the rules for that purpose. If they can secure a majority for the application of the rules to alter the course of debate and postpone the discussion of a particular subject, they have that right.

Parliament's decision on this matter was assumed to be necessary 20 years ago. I repeat, is it to be prevented now? The government is not imposing anything on parliament. It is asking for respect for parliament's right to decide after full and complete debate. If we reject that right, then parliament becomes meaningless. That, Mr. Speaker, is the issue. The government proposes and parliament disposes. The opposition has a right and a duty to oppose, to criticize, to clarify, to hold up, but does not have the right to prevent a decision. I repeat, if it can do this then the parliamentary process is meaningless.

I hope, therefore, very sincerely that it will be possible to have an immediate decision on this matter after all the discussion that has taken place concerning it and, indeed, when every possible point of view has been put forward time and time again. It has been said that we on this side have no mandate to proceed with this matter. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition has argued that this is a deeply controversial issue, it is a divisive issue, and that we have no mandate to proceed at this time.

Parliament, Mr. Speaker, has a mandate to decide. It is said we are a minority government and we should not bring forward this controversial measure. We are a minority government, but this is not a minority parliament. So I hope this parliament will be given the right to exercise its fundamental duty; that is, to decide after a full and free debate.

Notwithstanding what some hon. gentlemen may have said in the heat of debate across the chamber, we on this side have one thought only in asking parliament to come to a decision on this matter, to decide one way or the other. We are concerned, as

hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned, with the unity of our country. We have, as they have, pride in its progress, and we have confidence in its destiny. We are sincere in that feeling. To help reach the goal of a great, united Canada, to which we are all dedicated, I believed and I still believe we should have a national flag that stands for Canada, that flies as a symbol of Canada alone, that neither dishonours nor betrays the past but looks to the future; a flag that will say one word and that word is "Canada".

For this national purpose I believe a design is required which is solely Canadian, and that will be accepted as such by all Canadians. If, Mr. Speaker, the absence from our national flag of symbols which to a large part of our people seem to represent early differences, if that is the feeling among a very substantial proportion of our population; if there is almost unanimity in that part of the population to secure the adoption of a flag which will look forward and not backward to symbols of its own origin or any other origin; and if that feeling is shared by at least a large proportion of other Canadians, whether a majority or not I do not know, whose background is not the same as Canadians in Quebec—if it is necessary to have that kind of flag which without rejecting our past looks to our future and in that way will bring us together, is the absence of those earlier symbols from a Canadian flag too much of a sacrifice for the rest of us to make in the interests of unity in this country? Well, I suggest it is not a sacrifice at all, especially when the symbol takes the form of the maple leaf which over the years has meant so much to every Canadian in war and in peace and has become so deeply a part of our symbolic history. This is especially true when the other symbol of our past, which has appeared on our flags in the past, the union jack, is to be recognized in another way.

The hon. member for Leeds, in his intervention a few days ago quoted one or two words from a speech given in Montreal in 1923 by Right Hon. David Lloyd George when he was receiving the freedom of that city. I wonder if I may quote the rest of that sentence. At that time Mr. Lloyd George was talking about Canada's military tradition after the first war, the sacrifices, triumphs, glories and tragedies of Canadian participation in that war. He was dealing with the second battle of Ypres, and he said:

> The Canadian heroes—they fought it, they fought it through the whole afternoon, they fought through the dusk, they fought against all the principles of scientific warfare right through the night, and when the dawn came the position was saved. And more than that. The maple leaf was embroidered forever on the silken folds of the banner of human history.

Has the time not come, Mr. Speaker, to embroider it now on our own national banner? Surely those of us who do believe that the time has come and who support this change in our flag can honestly and sincerely feel that in doing so we will be helping to bring all Canadians closer together in a new pride in their country and all that it has meant and can mean.

So, Mr. Speaker, I appeal for a decision now, a decision of parliament after the discussions we have had over the long weeks; a decision of parliament on this report, a report not of the government but of a committee of parliament; the recommendations in a report of a committee of parliament concurred in by the representatives of every party in this house. I appeal, Mr. Speaker, for a decision by this parliament in which all the people of Canada are represented. I appeal also to all members, once a decision has been taken, a decision of parliament, to accept it and rally around the decision. I appeal, Mr. Speaker, to the Leader of the Opposition to put his great authority and prestige behind this decision, whatever it may be. He and those who have supported him on this issue have fought long and with a passionate sincerity for what they believe. I hope we will be given the same credit for passionate sincerity in putting forward what we believe.

I ask the Leader of the Opposition, a privy councillor, a former prime minister, a dominant parliamentary figure for many years, if the decision of parliament is to support the recommendations of this committee, to join us in saluting Canada's new maple leaf flag. I ask him to help us rally a united parliament behind that flag, if this is the decision of parliament, as it is raised high to fly over Canadians who honour their past and respect their traditions, Canadians who also face the future in confidence and faith, in unity and in strength, and who wish to face that future under their own national symbols.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I spoke at length yesterday and I do not intend to traverse the arguments I advanced then or the course of that debate. I rise simply to refer to one or two matters arising out of the Prime Minister's speech.

I was particularly interested in his concluding remarks in which he called on the opposition to rally around Canada's flag. Apparently that speech was written for use after parliament had decided the way the Prime Minister wishes it to decide, because as yet that appeal has no effect whatsoever. We are discussing the question as to the nature of the design of Canada's flag, and until parliament makes its decision there is no reason for anyone to answer a specious challenge such as he has just placed before us.

I am going to mention just one fact because it must be clarified, and it is this. In all that speech, covering the areas that he desired to cover and of course detouring from those he did not wish to cover, he was unable to make one argument to support his stand that those people sitting opposite, the government of today, had any mandate from the Canadian people to bring about a flag upon which no vestige of the union jack is to appear. As a matter of fact he was challenged several times during the election campaign—I believe twice—to say what he had in mind and what the Liberal party had in mind for a distinctive national flag. On no occasion did he answer that.

As far back as 1961 he gave an interview in Amherst, Nova Scotia, in which he spoke of a distinctive national flag and he was asked this question. In that distinctive flag—and I am simply paraphrasing because I do not have the material before me—in that distinctive flag would you remove the union jack, and his answer was "I am not telling you."

He puts up the old argument that we who oppose this are therefore opposed to Quebec. That argument I hurl back at him and into his teeth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are not trying to impose a flag. We are trying to give the Canadian people an opportunity to say what that flag shall be, because there was no mandate to the Liberal party in 1961 through 1963 that gave them any authority on the part of the people of Canada to thrust our past aside.

We are not trying to impose a flag on any province or portion of Canada. Our endeavour, I repeat, is to give the Canadian people an opportunity to determine a matter that was never before them excepting in a nebulous way. Indeed, the Prime Minister was most careful to say, when he was injecting these suggestions, that because we oppose the viewpoint expressed by the flag committee we are anti-Quebec.

What did he say in Amherst? He said the choice of the flag would be made after consultation with the ministers from the province of Quebec.

Mr. Pearson: That is not true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who brought this—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I have to rise on a point of privilege and tell my hon. friend that that statement is not true and never was said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right.

Mr. Pearson: It has been denied. It was denied by me immediately after the purported report of the broadcast.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the recording is still available. We have a complete transcript of that speech. It was he who first brought this up. It was he who said the choice would be made—a completely unworthy statement on his part—and he has been trying to run away from it since because he realized its import. On the same occasion when he was asked "What are you going to place on the flag?" his answer was the courageous one, "We won't tell you; we are not letting you know." Therefore there was no mandate.

The reason I mention mandate is because of his rather thinly veiled threat of closure. Well, we have heard these threats before. First he said the government would stand or fall on the three maple leaf flag. Then when he found himself in a position where he might fall he decided not to stand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then he backed away from that and said "If you don't watch out you are going to have an election." It was at that time I said an election fought on this issue would not be beneficial for Canadian unity, and I still have that viewpoint. He said "You will have an election," but we did not cringe; we did not gasp in the face of the threat, so what did the Prime Minister do then? He followed the customary course of backing up and saying "Of course there should not be an election." So the course has been to tell us what he is going to do and place the veiled threat before the house.

In this case, however, he knows he has these allies of his who sit over in this corner, the Créditistes. Allies they are today, but only a few short months ago they were unworthy in every way. I can place on the record some of the statements that were made regarding these hon. gentlemen, statements made by Liberal members, statements made by the Prime Minister ridiculing their policies, statements made by leaders of Liberalism, not the least of whom is the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis). He is a great tribune. He went through the province of Quebec and excoriated Social Credit; he showed that it was an ally of Hitler and Mussolini. People believed these hon. gentlemen. However, today they are all together. What a family relationship this is.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have the floor.

Mr. Caouette: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

I should like to know the connection between the statement of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the choice of a distinctive national flag.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman will wait, I am going to satisfy his curiosity for information in a moment. I am glad he asked that question, because only the other day that well known democrat, that believer in parliamentary democracy, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), was all ready, apparently, to move the previous question and impose closure. Now that he has the approval, the approbation in anticipation, of the Prime Minister I am sure it will not be long before the water boys of the Créditistes again operate to help the government of the day, and we can look forward to a motion on their part to carry out the wishes of the Prime Minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do hope these interruptions are real questions of privilege, because otherwise they would be out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Imputing motives to members of this house may give rise to a normal question of privilege.

It is presumed that we intend to support the government. That is untrue, but at least we are sufficiently honest and politically conscious to support the good measures submitted by the government, because we do not consider ourselves as members of the opposition but as members of the House of Commons, of the Canadian parliament.

I deny the Leader of the Opposition the right to question our intentions and our honesty in the circumstances.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not deny the hon. gentleman political conscience. He did not refer to conscience; therefore I take it—

Mr. Grégoire: Yes, I did.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —there is significance in the fact that he placed before the word "conscience" the word "political". It is of political conscience that I am now speaking. The fact is that the other day it was this hon. gentleman who threatened this course of action and I expect, as I said a moment ago, that it will not be long before the allies of the Creditistes will join with the government to bring in this motion which the government is loth to bring in but can support if they have the benefit of its introduction by their Creditiste allies.

Mr. Pepin: Apologize to Balcer.

Mr. Grégoire: What about Balcer?

Some hon. Members: What about your deputy leader?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are in the process of hearing some very interesting speeches today, and I do hope we can continue to hear them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is a very fine spirit of levity apparent, and I am glad the house is receiving my words in that kindly way that always characterizes this chamber, except on occasion. I started by saying there was no mandate. I now quote, for the benefit of the house, what has been said in this regard. I have had to send to my office to get material, so perhaps it will not be in the order it should be, because I had not expected the threat of closure today.

I do not mind; let them do it. But the Canadian people will not forget that because the government could not convince, they decided to throttle parliament by bringing in closure. Let that be perfectly understood.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In 1917 a measure was brought before the House of Commons to produce a system that did contribute to Canadian disunity. I refer to the conscription measure. It was brought before the house and in the course of the arguments against it Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe said this:

> I contend that this house has neither the mandate nor the authority to pass such a measure. Now, this action on the part of the government becomes even more arbitrary when it is accompanied by the rigorous application of the rules of this house which are actually imposed upon us. It is assuredly tyrannical—I believe the word is still within the limits of moderation—to employ the gag in order to have such a measure passed by a parliament such as we constitute just now.

Mention was made of Sir Robert Borden. I am going to quote some of the statements that were made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in this connection. In 1911 and 1912 there were great debates in this chamber. They talk about our debating for 22 days in connection with the flag.

Mr. Grégoire: Thirty two.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As I said yesterday, the Prime Minister made it very clear in a speech in Hamilton that there had been no interference with the legislative program because, after all, all that had been sacrificed were the holidays of members. Sir, let me now place before you what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said.

Mr. Grégoire: Dispense.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He was dealing with a question that has now been suggested by the Prime Minister. For weeks the debate went on in 1911 on the question of reciprocity. The minister of finance of the Liberal party and Mr. Patterson—I forget what portfolio he held —returned from Washington with what was to be a treaty between Canada and the United States. The Conservative party opposed that, and week after week the argument went on. I have read the press of that time, and the press said there was obstruction because the Conservative party went on and on in that regard. Finally Sir Wilfrid Laurier dissolved the house and his government went down to defeat.

In 1912 the Conservative party brought in legislation in connection with assistance to the British government for naval construction, a measure that would not be acceptable today and was greatly divisive at that time. The Liberal party opposed it; they stood firmly. I do not know how many weeks the debate went on, but it was a lengthy one. I have some of the press clippings of that day, in which it was said how unfair it was for an opposition so soon after an election to stand against a government which had a majority; not a majority dependent on allies, but a majority in the house. Finally the Conservative party introduced closure and the legislation respecting the navy went through. It went to the Senate, the Senate turned it down, and it never came back because the Liberal party was right in its stand. The Conservative leadership realized, after the fullest discussion had taken place, that such was the fact.

It is well to read what took place when the question came before the House of Commons in the session of 1912-13. Closure was moved on April 9, 1913, as recorded at column 7411 of Hansard. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Hon. J. D. Hazen rose in their places, and the speaker was the leader of the opposition. Mr. W. B. Northrup then rose and moved that Hon. J. D. Hazen be heard; he was one of the Conservative ministers from the province of New Brunswick. Then Sir Wilfrid said:

> When you have a majority in this house, that is what we have to expect from you—shame!

They are not my words; they are the words of one of the greatest parliamentarians in all Canadian history. Then the motion was put and was carried.

Sir Wilfrid spoke later on, as reported at column 7430, as follows:

> But no; he had not a word to say, but to apply closure in anticipation—

Then at column 7432 he is reported as saying this:

> During the 15 years I was in office it sometimes happened that friends came to me and told me that I was not doing justice to myself or to the party, but that I should impose closure, as had been done in many parliaments. Sir, I am a Liberal of the old school; I have been brought up in the school of Fox and of the old leaders of the Liberal party; and I could not bring myself to the point of depriving a minority in parliament of such a valuable weapon as it would be deprived of by the introduction of closure. Perhaps I was wrong; perhaps I was too generous. Nay, I was not; I would rather stand here today, having refused, after the 15 years of my administration, to impose closure, and having decided to abide by the old rules. The rules of the house are intended to apply to the discharge of the duties which the house owes to the country, and to the sovereign.

A few sentences later he said:

> It has been charged against us that we have delayed the business of the house, that we have prevented it from going on.

That has not been charged here because the matter has been cleared away by the Prime Minister's frank statement which I quoted earlier.

> Sir, I deny the charge altogether; there is not a word of foundation for it. If the business of the house is not more advanced than it is, the fault cannot be laid at our door, but at the door of the other side.

And that, Mr. Speaker, is the state of affairs today. Indeed, when the Prime Minister gets out on the stump on some of these trips of discovery, he speaks of the wonderful record of this government and of how much legislation it has got through. That is when he is outside the house. Sir Wilfrid went on:

> It is quite true that when we came to the first of April, supply had not been voted, and the financial year was at an end; but if supply had not been voted before that, whose fault was it? Was it that supply was demanded and was refused?

Then as reported at column 7433 Sir Wilfrid went on to say this:

> Everybody knows that whenever a measure of public importance was brought to our attention we gave it our best consideration, and it was passed.

That is our position today, Mr. Speaker. Every piece of legislation this government has introduced and carried along has been passed. Indeed, we have been so anxious to get the government to produce the legislation it has not got that we have supported the adjournment of the house so the government might bring these measures forward. Then Sir Wilfrid Laurier continued:

> It is true, sir, that we opposed a certain measure. It is true that we opposed the bill for naval aid. We did that with all the might at our command; we did it with all the means at our command under the rules of the house. Am I to be told that in the exercise of this power of strenuous opposition we did anything which is not in accordance with the best traditions of parliamentary government?

Mr. Speaker, his words of 1913 come back to us today and can be applied to the present circumstances. He continued:

> Sir, at all times in this house, at all times in the mother of parliaments, there have been questions upon which the minority thought it owed it to itself to offer the most vigorous opposition possible. Under the rules of the house it is expected that the two sides of the house shall carry on the business, as was stated by my right hon. friend today, and so it is generally; but there are occasions, I repeat, when the opposition or a minority owes it to itself, on account of the strong views it holds upon some public measure, > to oppose that measure with all the force at its command.

What we have done is to carry out the concepts of parliament espoused by a great parliamentarian. Then Sir Wilfrid continued and said that the remedy is not closure, that it is not the application of brute force. He said the remedy is an appeal to the people. He continued, as reported at column 7435 of Hansard:

> The people, after all, are the judge and the jury. The people, after all, are the parties to pass judgment as between the government and the opposition—

Then he said:

> I am sure it was not a pleasant task that my right hon. friend performed today; and, for my part, when I compare my conduct with his conduct, I am proud that I resisted all applications for closure, and that when the time came I appealed to the people, as I did on reciprocity.

Then as reported at columns 7435 to 7437 he uttered some words which are very significant. He set out the number of times when closure had been applied when there had been obstruction. Then he said that in every case the opposition was right, as it is right today.

The Prime Minister asked me why we did not abolish closure. We had the measure ready for the house but there were other matters to be dealt with. We believed in priorities in matters which deserved immediate attention. A committee on procedure was set up but did not bring in the recommendation in question. At all times we said we would not impose closure and we followed that course, although we did not in fact abolish it as we said we would. Though the legislation was ready, when defeat came to us we could do no other than accept defeat and go to the country.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the right hon. gentleman would not mind my making a purely factual reference. The right hon. gentleman will recall a motion which he brought in to refer the matter to a committee. On that occasion I, speaking on behalf of the official opposition at that time, offered to support the immediate abolition of closure. So the right hon. gentleman could easily have done this that very day without any further debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that interruption is most beneficial. I ask the hon. gentleman now, holding the belief he did with regard to closure, how is he going to vote when there is a motion in this house?

Is he going to follow his principles or follow his party?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman has addressed a direct question to me and I know, in the way he always does, that he will let me answer it equally directly. I said at that time that we would support a government which had an overwhelming majority in carrying out its mandate from the people. I did not say that we believed there should be no form of closure, but I said—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winkler: Wiggle, wiggle.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely, Mr. Speaker, I can be allowed to speak; I have listened to hon. gentlemen opposite. I said that we were not going to obstruct the government which had a clear mandate for which it had twice asked the people. I say to the right hon. gentleman that we twice asked the people of Canada to give us a mandate for a distinctive Canadian flag, and I suggest that that mandate should also be respected.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that question turned out to be the usual unobjective ejaculation without sense or reason or fact to support it. As a matter of fact, I quoted from the hon. member's statement yesterday and he ran for cover. I pointed out what he said, that without the union jack there would be division in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I denied that statement yesterday, and there is a rule of this house which states that when an hon. member quotes from a press report which is not in quotation marks, and an hon. member says that it is not an accurate account of what he said, the member's word must be accepted. I made whatever statements were made in Quebec, and those statements were not correctly reported in the press. I indicated that fact the following day, and the right hon. gentleman has no right to take the original report and quote from it. This same thing has happened on many occasions, and I suggest that the right hon. gentleman should stop questioning the words of other hon. members.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have had a search made to obtain the denial that the hon. member mentions, but there has been no record of it which anyone has been able to discover. However, the hon. gentleman was in a difficult position in this regard. After all, in the shadows standeth Joey. If there is any misunderstanding about who "Joey" is, let me state that the premier of Newfoundland has said that there will be a union jack and, as far as he is concerned, nothing else. Mr. Speaker, how uncertain is the course of the government in this connection; because having wiped the union jack aside, and having said it should not be part of Canada's flag, they are now going to have a second one. But we say, put them together.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that he stop making fatuous and nebulous threats, because we have received too many of them. Do not have your allies make your motions, or allow them to make threats because we are not in any way—

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman has invited this, so I must give him some assistance. Do not make threats and expect those in the Creditiste party who support you on every occasion to pull you out.

Mr. Grégoire: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say to the leader of the Creditistes, what did those friends of his say about him only a few years ago? The minister of health, speaking in Calgary said Réal Caouette should not sit in the House of Commons. That is what they thought of him then. Today there is a wonderful feeling of co-operation between—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Today there is a wonderful feeling of co-operation between the members of the—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Two wrongs do not necessarily make a right. Do you have a question of privilege?

Mr. Grégoire: I have a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition said exactly the same thing in my constituency, and his candidate lost his deposit in that election.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I never directly or indirectly made any such statement, and the hon. gentleman knows that what he has said has no basis in fact.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. All hon. members realize that during political campaigns there is a certain lyrical quality to statements.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I want to quote now—

Mr. Grégoire: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to quote from the hon. member again and mention that—

Mr. Grégoire: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Grégoire: On the same question of privilege, the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Do you have a question of privilege?

Mr. Grégoire: Yes, Mr. Speaker. At the same meeting the Leader of the Opposition, while in my constituency, promised a new distinctive Canadian flag, and I should like that fact to be on the record.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the fact that that statement is put on the record by the hon. gentleman does not add any credibility to it. Before one o'clock I should like to quote to the members of this house the words uttered by the Minister without Portfolio as recorded in Hansard of October 9, 1962, at page 304 as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, it does not behoove a party leader, especially in his maiden speech before the nation, to speak nonsense, even though he is the leader of the Social Credit party. I hope that after hearing his deputy leader, he was reminded of the golden era of the Italian government under the Benito Mussolini administration.

Then he went on to say:

> They lied to the people during the last election campaign, they lied on television and they are keeping it up.

Those are the remarks uttered by that hon. member about members belonging to a party which today has been taken into the sheepfold, and I thought it only right that the house and the country should know of them.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Dupuis: I should like to ask him why he was so proud and happy to accept the votes of the Créditistes when he was sitting on this side of the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, that is what they have in mind. Now we are beginning to observe the alliance between them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on record the words of Mr. Chevrier, now a high commissioner, as recorded in Hansard of October 5, 1962 at page 247. He said:

> I come now, Mr. Speaker, to a series of fallacious, mendacious and untrue statements which I find in the book entitled "Réal Caouette vous parle".

Then Mr. Chevrier said:

> Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that one of Hitler's slogans, from 1929 to 1932, was—

The words then appear in German, and then this:

> "You have nothing to lose." They borrowed not only this individual's philosophy, but also his slogan.

Today those individuals who were being criticized then have become the handmaidens of Liberalism.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Grégoire: Where are the Conservatives? They are not here.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I hear gabbling again from the hon. member for Lapointe but I am not going to criticize because we will recall that the lessons of history show that great city, Rome, was saved by the gabbling of geese. It is just a case of recalling one of the lessons of history.

At the time of adjournment I was reading into the record a number of statements that had been made by members who today occupy the treasury seats regarding the hon. gentlemen who belonged to the Social Credit party of 1963 and today belong to the Creditiste party. However, the only reason I placed those statements on the record was that I was really forced into doing so. Now that there is reasonable quietness I find it no longer necessary to add any further gems of political wisdom uttered by ministers of the present government regarding those whom they now envelop in the arms of their affection.

There are one or two observations I should like to make regarding the question of closure. I am informed that last evening Mr. Poliquin, a leading member of the press gallery, advised in the course of an interview that the government was ready with closure and that a motion would be placed in Votes and Proceedings tonight. That being so, the fact that the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) today introduced a further amendment afforded no incentive to the government to act as it intended to do. Indeed, I am further informed that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) told his supporters last Wednesday that the flag would be all wrapped up by this coming Wednesday.

I will say nothing further in that connection except that any flag brought in by closure cannot but fly over a divided nation and a discredited government. I am amazed that there should have been any such suggestion on the part of the Prime Minister today, not that we have not had these threats before. I recall that on December 20, 1951, the prime minister of that day, Mr. St. Laurent, threatened closure in connection with anti-combines legislation. In that case it was not brought in, but the mind was there.

There are those who sit on the treasury benches today, including the Prime Minister, who sat there in 1956 when parliament was flouted by the application of closure on a matter that did not command the general support of the Canadian people. I remind hon. gentlemen opposite of what happened then and of their attitude of mind in 1956. Many who sit opposite today were members of parliament in that day and some of those in the cabinet today belonged to that group that brought closure into effect because, as the prime minister of that day, Mr. St. Laurent, said, there was a time limit. One can apply that statement of 1956 so well to what is happening today because this flag debate has been a succession of time limits. We were to have a flag on three different occasions, the first of which was by July 1st, second, by the time of the Queen's visit, and now for Christmas.

The Prime Minister says that an opposition has no right to prevent a decision. Taken literally that might be true, but in actual practice one of the major features of our parliamentary system is that oppositions have a responsibility to prevent wrong decisions. We say, as does a large proportion of the Canadian people also, that for a flag to be forced upon the Canadian people by a decision of this kind, having regard to the manner in which this matter has been brought forward, will not be conducive to Canadian unity.

There is one other point I wish to mention. I was waiting for the Prime Minister to come in because I did not want to make any statement in his absence that he might want to challenge. As he opened his speech this morning I was impressed with his manner of approach to the subject. I am not in agreement, but I have a great admiration for the exchange of opinions and the clash of ideas. When in the second portion of his speech he descended into a discussion that could not be described as other than petty, political partisanship, the effect of the earlier part of his speech was dissipated. I was impressed by two expressions he used. He spoke of our flag, the government's flag, our flag.

Mr. McIlraith: No, the Canadian flag.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is the expression he used, our flag. Then, he looked over at us and he said, their red ensign. Was it not his red ensign, Mr. Speaker? Is it not his red ensign? This represents an amazing revelation of his thinking.

He manufactured a false claim when he used the expression that we sneered at the maple leaf. There was nothing of that kind. Many of us on this side of the house are proud of the maple leaf, but the maple leaf as an emblem is a long way from the maple leaf as the design for a flag. An example occurs to me as I am speaking. What about Ireland? Ireland established itself as an independent country after generations of turmoil and difficulty. It decided on a flag. The emblem of Ireland is the shamrock. Did they place the shamrock on the flag? The shamrock was a symbol, but when they built their flag, they made it a flag of two colours representative of the unity of their country, orange and green. Certainly, no one casts aspersions on the maple leaf. We are all proud of it as a symbol of the nation. However, there is a great deal of difference between symbolic significance and that which goes to the heart and soul of a nation, the flag that must represent the people as a whole.

I will say no more on this occasion except that we have no apologies to offer for the stand we have taken. I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) will ascribe to us the same degree of sincerity which he has appropriated to himself. We believe that this flag that does not have anything to do with our heritage, with the greatness, the magnificent history of our country, will not induce unity. The imposition of this flag on the millions of people who have for generations accepted the red ensign as their flag, will cause a sense of frustration which we do not want to have within this nation.

The right hon. gentleman asked, when was Canada ever represented by the red ensign? One of the greatest cartoons that came out of the first war appeared in the April, 1915 issue of the magazine Punch, after the first gas attack at Saint Julien. It showed Canadians wounded and dead; it showed them raising the standard of Canada. Look up that issue of Punch for April, 1915, and you will find that the flag in the hands of the Canadian as he raised it, raised it with the strength that was available to him after being wounded and dismayed by the gas attack, was the red ensign.

In asking parliament to give the most serious consideration to this matter, I point out once more we are not asking something that is not peculiar to the Canadian way of life, because it has been our flag for generations. Indeed, if you read the advertising for the election of 1891, you will find that Macdonald used throughout the campaign huge placards and on every one of them was a red ensign, the only difference being that instead of the coat of arms there was the number of maple leaves representing the provinces of Canada. What we have tried to do, Mr. Speaker, is not anything to prevent parliament acting. What we have tried to do is to discharge our responsibilities in connection with the choosing of a flag which will touch this and future generations intimately and effectively, in a manner that will inform parliament, even though the majority thinks otherwise, that by taking this step it will be taking a wrong step.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I took part earlier in this debate and was able to state my views on the flag issue in ten minutes. I do not intend to repeat anything I said at that time. I just want to make a very brief appeal. I ran across a quotation the other day from a very wise author who wrote some 3,000 years ago some words which I believe are appropriate at the moment. The writer was Ecclesiastes, and he said this:

> To everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven; a time to keep silence, and a time to speak.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that after some 250 speeches on this issue, and I suggest particularly to my friends in the Conservative party, that the time for silence has arrived. I cannot escape the conclusion that the prolonging of this debate will make those responsible for it look foolish. This is a situation which I can contemplate with some equanimity when I see who is responsible for prolonging the debate. However I do not believe we in this house can contemplate with equanimity the fact that not only the party responsible for prolonging the debate will look foolish but parliament itself is being made to look foolish. Unfortunately, I fear it looks that way at the moment. Everything that could be said or should be said in this debate has been said. Perhaps some things have been said that should not have been said, and some things have been said more often than they required to be said, but I appeal to those members of the official opposition who are contemplating further discussion to realize the time has now come to keep silent. The time has surely come to let parliament take its responsibility.

I appeal to all hon. members to let us vote on this resolution now, so that we can get on with other important business before the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) will not object too strongly if I now recognize the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette).

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take too much time to discuss this matter which we have been discussing for too many months, and which seems to confuse the people of Canada. It was discussed thoroughly during the first weeks of the debate on this matter, and today the same members are allowed to repeat over and over again the same old worn-out arguments which we have heard ever since the resolution was introduced.

Yesterday, and particularly last night, we heard the hon. members for Cumberland (Mr. Coates), Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden), Vegreville (Mr. Fane) and Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) ask questions of the government concerning its attitude respecting the resolution on the order paper, what it would do should the amendment or the main motion be adopted, what it intends to do or will do. And all this while the government had informed the house that it intended to proceed with measures on the order paper and which should be taken up by the house before Christmas.

Mr. Speaker, it is astonishing to hear those people blame the government for giving effect to their own proposals. In fact, the establishment of a committee was proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). When the leaders of the five parties met the Leader of the Opposition insisted that a committee be established to study the flag issue and then submit to the house a majority report.

As was stated this morning, 11 members were in favour of this report and four against it, out of a total of 15 members.

The committee was set up following representations made by the Leader of the Opposition who also called for a free vote. The Prime Minister complied with this request: a free vote was allowed. All Liberals were permitted to vote as they saw fit. The Conservatives were also free to vote as they pleased, every one of us could vote according to his conscience and in the best interests of national unity.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, mention was also made of curtailing the flag debate. Since the Leader of the Opposition disagreed, I feel he is not justified in suggesting today that any member of the official opposition was prevented from expressing his views or that of his constituents. But, to my mind, the federal parliament has never been able to see to what extent some members are wearing blinkers which prevent them from seeing the facts as they are or to realize their narrow-mindedness.

Indeed, they only see one side of the question, and refuse to look at Canada as a whole. A matter as significant as the choice of a truly Canadian flag, of a distinctive Canadian flag, is brought down to the level of their constituency and their personal ambitions.

Mr. Speaker, some people have difficulty in realizing the facts. Some attach greater importance to the symbol of our origins than to the very existence of our nation, in short, to the future of Canada.

We rightly claim and will always claim that one must have the greatest respect for his forebears and ancestors, but there is not a single member here, including the Leader of the Opposition, who would dare put on the clothes and shoes that his forebears or ancestors were wearing 100 and 150 years ago. We must realize that we have something better to do at this time than to reduce the question of the national flag to the level of a mere political issue.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the Leader of the Opposition did not grow in the public eye when he stated here that the members of the Ralliement Créditistes have thrown themselves into the arms of the Liberals. The right hon. gentleman knows that he is wrong and that he is misleading the members of this house. And I immediately point out to the house that a proposal was made two days ago not by a member of the Ralliement Créditiste but by the deputy leader of the Conservative party, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer).

As reported in Hansard on page 10965, he made the following statement:

> Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. For weeks, and even months, the House of Commons has been witnessing an unparalleled debate which is completely paralysing the business or this house and transforming it into a debating society where it is impossible to reach any decision whatsoever. Freedom of speech must be respected, but we should not act in such a way that this house be deprived of its main duty, which consists in making decisions.

Mr. Speaker, this is what we want to do at this point. And I continue:

> That is why I deem that in this discussion on the flag, the whole gamut of opinions has been heard—

Including those of his party.

> —and should we extend it any further, we would but prejudice the rights of parliament and the higher interests of our country.
> Therefore, I believe that it is my duty to rise on a question of privilege and invite the Prime Minister—

Please note, Mr. Speaker, the words "and invite the Prime Minister."

> —or one of his ministers, to give notice that he will make use of standing order 33 to have this question settled without further delay by applying the rule of closure.

We are pressing for that application, because it is impossible to bring the leader of the official opposition to listen to reason.

Is the Leader of the Opposition ready to say that his colleague from Three Rivers has gone over to the Liberals? Is he ready to repeat that his colleagues from Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau), Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière (Mr. Paul) have gone over to the Liberals, or that they are people whom the Liberals treated kindly during the last election campaign, or that they are people who were praised by the Liberal candidates in their respective ridings or by the government in office?

Mr. Speaker, I ask the Leader of the Opposition, on behalf of the Canadian people, to be honest in his statements and to stop playing petty politics, as he did this morning and kept on doing this afternoon.

The Leader of the Opposition knows that we do not hold the Liberals in such high esteem. We have not gone over to the Liberals. We have no intention of going over to the Conservatives either. We want to remain ourselves, and we want the Canadian people to remain themselves too, all across the country. That is why we endorse, not every policy of the Liberal party, far from it, but the stand taken by the Prime Minister and the government who want to give Canada a distinctive national flag, a flag which will be the pride of the whole country everywhere, whether it bears three maple leaves or a single one.

When the right hon. Prime Minister introduced his motion in parliament, he recommended a flag design with three maple leaves on a white background and a blue border on each side.

Today the committee decides—and the Prime Minister himself said this morning that it was the committee—in order to accept a compromise, to change the three maple leaves for a single maple leaf with red bands instead of blue bands.

In my opinion, the new design is not as nice as the first one. However, the report of the committee is now before parliament, even though the design agreed to is not exactly according to our wishes.

I for one would have preferred the flag with the red and white diagonals, with a green maple leaf, promoted throughout the country about 20 years ago by la ligue du drapeau and the Native Sons of Canada. That is the flag we were endorsing.

However, we are not opposing the new design brought in. It is not that we have changed our minds, no, but we want the flag issue settled once and for all.

Within the party of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition there are members who do not necessarily share the opinion of the committee but who are ready to accept the report as submitted to parliament. There is no question, in this case, of playing politics nor of trying to toss the issue back and forth, by saying that one party is more important than the other.

The decision rests with parliament and, the right hon. Prime Minister said so at noon today, and not without reason: it is not the government which decides, but parliament.

The hon. member for Three Rivers said also that the chief duty of parliament was to decide. We are ready to decide and, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) said rightly a few minutes ago, it is time to stop talking, to cut off that "talkathon" on the flag issue.

When the right hon. Leader of the Opposition says that the flag issue is dividing Canada, I must say, and I know what I am talking about, that if there is a man who has spread doubts in the minds of citizens in various sectors of Canada, it is the Leader of the Opposition himself since he took up his stand on a distinctive national flag.

I happened to be in Toronto last week. I met there influential businessmen, professionals, students, people from all walks of life. Among these people, who are definitely grassroots, with whom we speak, many are disgusted with the way the flag debate is being handled at the present time in the House of Commons. And who is blamed? Not the government, not the Créditistes nor the New Democratic party, but the leader of the Conservatives in the House of Commons. Even his own followers have had enough of this obstructionist attitude, of this systematic obstruction we have seen for too many long weeks.

Mr. Speaker, our attitude—

[Text]

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is naming names and naming the party. Would he name the individuals in the Conservative party that are opposed to the question he has just raised. The hon. member made a blanket statement; I wish he would nail it down.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I did not get the hon. member's question, but if he is asking me whether some Conservative followers are disgusted with this Conservative action in the House of Commons I will say yes, sir, because I met some prominent Conservative followers in the city of Toronto last Thursday.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, our position on the flag question is very well known. I am rising this afternoon in order to establish clearly and have it on the record that we are not devoted to the Liberals, but that we are in favour of common sense. And when there is common sense among the Liberals, we are the very first ones to admit it, as we are the first ones to shout that they lack common sense too often, more often than they should. We know that also.

However, Mr. Speaker, on a matter as important as the flag issue now before us, we can only look at what Canada is and will be tomorrow. We are the ones who have to decide that as members of parliament; and only parliament has the responsibility to make a decision on the flag issue.

We will not let anybody sing to us the old refrain that we are rejecting the fleur-de-lis or the union jack. We will continue to have respect for the union jack and the fleur-de-lis, but we do not want those flags to represent us as Canadians. We want something typically Canadian, something which will be recognized as Canadian throughout the world, in all the countries where we will be received with our symbol, and not with the symbols of England or France.

[Text]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will make only a brief comment on the harangue to which we have just listened from the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette).

Mr. Grégoire: How many times have you spoken in the flag debate?

An hon. Member: We listened to you; you listen to us.

Mr. Churchill: I suggest that the Canadian people reject anything that the hon. member for Villeneuve, the leader of the Creditiste party, may say with regard to the flag because, as I pointed out the other day, he cares nothing for the flag design.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: He said, "I care not whether you take the maple leaf off and put on a sheaf of wheat, a beaver or anything else"; and what can anything else be—the swastika, the emblem of Mussolini, or something like that? "Anything else", he said.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) is not right when he says that I do not care what is on the flag.

The only thing I would object to on a flag would be the portrait of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

[Text]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, what I have said about the hon. member for Villeneuve regarding his opinions with reference to the flag are on Hansard. He cannot deny those things; they are there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: He does not care what the Canadian flag is. Anything that the government will propose, he will support; that is his attitude. We had the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) talking about the maple leaf today. The hon. member for Villeneuve cares nothing about the maple leaf. He says, "Take it off the flag; put on a beaver, a sheaf of wheat or anything else". Why would anybody pay any attention to his remarks concerning the flag?

With regard to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), I am always surprised in this house that people should exhibit the colossal conceit that was shown today. Members sometimes rise in this house and say, "Everything that can be said has been said on the subject under discussion"; they contribute their own remarks for five, ten or 30 minutes and then they say the debate should come to an end, and we are supposed to bow and say, "Lord and master, thou hast spoken. Your willing servants accept your dictum".

That was the attitude taken by the hon. member for Greenwood today. Having himself spoken he said that everything had been said on the subject. That sort of colossal deceit has always astonished me in this House of Commons and I did not expect to see it in the hon. member for Greenwood.

I now want to say a few words about the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). We had expected him to speak last night but for some reason or other he had to be smoked out. Last evening, when he asked us to forgo private members' hour at five o'clock, he said "Let's get on and come to a decision on this matter before six o'clock", and I said no. I would not give unanimous consent because I said we wanted to hear from the Prime Minister, who has not spoken on this subject for six months. That is, he has not spoken here in the House of Commons, although he has said things outside the house. It was June 15 when the Prime Minister made his great speech on the flag that he then had selected and which he was putting in front of us, and then he sat silent in the House of Commons for six months.

We wanted to know, Mr. Speaker, what his position was with regard to the report of the committee, which is why we pressed him to enter into this debate. We had hoped that members of his cabinet would enter into the debate and support the Prime Minister. There is some uncertainty in the country whether the members of the cabinet are supporting the Prime Minister. Now and again under duress they confide in him and confess; but no member of the cabinet has yet risen to support the Prime Minister in this debate at this time. Earlier on, only two members of the cabinet rose to support the Prime Minister and spent their time talking of other subjects. This is a disunited cabinet, as the people of Canada are well aware now.

I have seen, Mr. Speaker, the sword swallower act on the stage. Today we saw the man swallowing act—the Prime Minister swallowing himself by going back on his determination and his promise in June of this year to give to Canada a three maple leaf flag with blue borders representing sea to sea. He has now come around to the view that perhaps that was wrong, and he acknowledges error and sees that the red bordered flag with the white centre is the flag for Canada. Give him another six months and he will change his mind again. It is because of that uncertainty that we have suggested delay and postponement on a decision on a Canadian flag. We have watched the Prime Minister in action for a year and a half, and given time he will shift his position. So we are well within our rights in discussing this issue.

The Prime Minister skirted all around closure today, and there is the threat. I was in the house in December 1951 when Mr. St. Laurent spoke much more clearly with regard to the imposition of closure and held the threat over our heads. That was in December and again we are in December. So we had the threat in 1951. It was not carried out although we were supposed to run scared; but the Conservative party in 1951 was not frightened away at all. We said to Mr. St. Laurent: "Bring on closure if you are so brave", and he shied away from it. Then in 1956 closure was applied in this house. The Conservative party did not run away from that issue either; and to the credit of the then C.C.F. party, neither did they. Now we have the threat of closure again in December 1964.

So therefore, Mr. Speaker, we have the attitude of the Liberal party. If the Liberal party cannot get its way it threatens closure or imposes closure. What is to happen later on this afternoon? Are we going to have an announcement that closure will be applied next week? So that is the pattern followed by the Liberal party going back to 1951, 1956, 1964; and I hope the people of Canada realize that it is an autocratic, arrogant party, intent on enforcing its will on parliament and on the people of Canada.

With regard to the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas), the Prime Minister, improperly, said that this was a compromise suggestion. As I understood the hon. member for Middlesex West, he was arguing, in a very carefully given speech last night, which was concluded this morning, in favour of a meeting of minds. His argument today was this: Let us know the point of departure so that if there is to be a meeting of minds we will know what things cannot be considered and what things might be considered. So he suggested in his amendment that we have a stand-up-and-be-counted vote on the Canadian red ensign. Is this to be rejected by the Liberal party? Let the members of the Liberal party indicate in this House of Commons where they stand on the flag that has been Canada's national flag for 100 years. Let us have it down in black and white. Let them not shelter behind the committee, which is what they are doing. Why anyone should shelter behind the committee, with perhaps the determining vote in that committee being a vote cast by a member of the Créditiste party, which has no use for Canada's traditions, surprises me. Here is the opportunity for the Liberal party, man by man and woman by woman, to record their vote.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I think the hon. member has some of his wires crossed. We have use for the past in this country, but I have no use and no other party has, for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). That is where he is wrong.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: You mean South Centre.

Mr. Langlois: I am sorry; I mean the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill).

Mr. Churchill: Insult me if you wish, I say to the hon. member, but do not insult other members from the city of Winnipeg. I must stand up for my hon. friend for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). We differ on a lot of points, but he is a citizen of a great city and he must not be insulted in this house. I am glad that the hon. member who has just intervened does not agree with the leader of his party. The leader of his party wants to wipe out all history and tradition and this member does not, so we are glad to have that intervention.

The hon. member for Middlesex West was suggesting a step by step process, out in the open and not behind a committee, to see whether there can be a meeting of minds with regard to a flag for Canada. In the course of his remarks the Prime Minister had something to say with regard to his experience in war, and unfortunately used an expression which he used once before. He was speaking about the war of 1914-18, and the exact words he used were these, and I quote: "None of us saw a Canadian red ensign in those years". I interrupted and he repeated the statement. It is with regret that I refer to this, but the Prime Minister does not have to take my word for anything with regard to the first world war. I said earlier in the debate that the Canadian red ensign was seen by Canadian soldiers in the first world war. He does not have to take my word for that, because I gave evidence of others. I do not mind if he wishes to intimate that I was being untruthful earlier in making those statements. However, the Prime Minister is attacking the veracity of my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan). That member has placed on the record his experience in the first world war, and has brought forward pertinent evidence by quoting a statement made by General McNaughton regarding the use of the Canadian red ensign during that conflict. I am sorry the Prime Minister expressed himself in that way, and I regret having had to interrupt him, but I did find it irritating when he repeated the statements he had made earlier which we have denied and repudiated during the course of this debate.

Let me say this, so there will be no misunderstanding. The present and former prime ministers are two Canadian prime ministers who, during the first world war, volunteered their services to this country. I respect both of them in that regard. No one who volunteered for service during the war had any jurisdiction as to where he might be sent to serve, so that question does not enter into this discussion. I have as much respect for those who served during the war of 1914 to 1918 as for those who served during the second world war, as did both those prime ministers. They volunteered for service anywhere in the world, and at any risk. If I raise an objection to anything the Prime Minister has said today I do not do so because of lack of respect for the service he was prepared to render to his country during those years. I respect that attitude of the Prime Minister as much as I respect the same attitude taken by the former prime minister, the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). These men did not stay home with the paltry excuse that they had to complete their university education, or anything of that nature. They laid their lives on the line, and by the grace of God and with good luck they survived, as did thousands of others.

I have said that the Liberal party is attempting to take shelter behind the report of the committee. This House of Commons is not obliged to accept, without question, the report of any committee, particularly a committee which is composed of less than 10 per cent of the members of this house. Incidentally, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition had suggested, as long ago as June 22, that the best way to approach a controversial subject such as the flag is through a committee. Personally I preferred a joint committee of the Senate and the house, such as the committee which considered this issue in 1945 and 1946. A larger committee should have been established rather than one restricted to 15 members. In any event, we are not obliged to accept any committee report presented to this house. I think it is wrong that the government should seek to take shelter behind a report of a committee. It is wrong for any party in this house to seek that kind of shelter.

Had the hon. members of that committee been other than the members who actually were named, I think the report would be different. Why did the New Democratic party not name as a member of that committee the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge)? Why did the Social Credit party not name as a member of that committee the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe)? That party could also have named the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) as a member of that committee. Perhaps the N.D.P. could have named the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather) as a member of the committee. The Liberals could have been represented by a member with divergent points of view by naming the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan). Had those men been named as members of that committee I am sure the report presented to this house would not be the same as the one now before us for consideration. Those men have publicly stated their preference for the retention of Canada's history and traditions, as exemplified by the Canadian red ensign.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? When you were in power, why did you not appoint Mr. Van Horne as a member of your committees?

Mr. Churchill: I cannot see any more relevancy to that question than I can in the sale of bumper stickers by the hon. minister. Perhaps he can explain the relevance to me at a later date.

A different committee I am sure would have presented a different report. The special committee was selected with extreme care, and I am sure the substance of the report of that committee was a foregone conclusion, as was the abandonment or destruction of the Canadian red ensign. Let us not take shelter behind the workings of a committee. It is nonsense to suggest that the decision of a committee, even though it has worked long hours studying a subject, is superior to the decision of 250, odd, members of this house.

The Prime Minister during the course of his remarks referred to the single red maple leaf on the coat of arms of Canada. I noted particularly his remark in this regard, and I wondered whether the Prime Minister, who served as a soldier during the war, recognized the fact, as pointed out by the members of that committee which sat in 1921, and as indicated in their brochure, that the single red maple leaf in the Canadian coat of arms was representative of the sacrifice made by the young men of Canada during the first world war. I thought the Prime Minister in referring to the single red maple leaf on the coat of arms might have made some reference to that fact. As I said before, we must either change the coat of arms—and I do not think that should be done, taking the single red maple leaf from it—or refrain from using the single red maple leaf on the flag of Canada. I do not think we would be paying a tribute to our young men who sacrificed their lives during the war by changing a symbol which has, for almost 50 years, represented that sacrifice. What has happened to the thinking of the people of Canada since that time? Is our thinking different in 1964 from the thinking of that generation of 1921 which felt that the inclusion of the single red maple leaf in the coat of arms was an appropriate recognition of the sacrifice made by 60,000 young men of a country with a population of eight million? Have we no sense or appreciation for history and sacrifice?

[Mr. Churchill.]

The Prime Minister asked why we do not embroider the maple leaf on our own national banner. That is exactly what the joint committee of 1945-46 suggested. They suggested that the shield should be taken from the red ensign and a golden maple leaf placed thereon. They in effect embroidered the maple leaf on Canada's flag. We have respect for the maple leaf in that respect. That could be an appropriate part of a flag, and it could be embroidered on the present Canadian red ensign as recommended by the committee of 1945.

Mr. Speaker, I have never objected to the maple leaf as an emblem of Canada. Rather, my objection is that it should not be the main component of our flag. Once again I suggest to the Prime Minister that this issue which has caused so much controversy, is an issue about which hundreds of thousands, and perhaps millions, of people are concerned. In view of that fact I appeal again to the Prime Minister, as others have done, to postpone this issue. I do not subscribe to the point of view, which I have heard put forward in speeches by various people, that Canada has suddenly become a new country and everything must be done differently. This is a country with a long history. If it has suddenly become a new country in 1964, those people who are talking that way will hear in 30 years from another generation that in 1994 Canada has suddenly become a new country. They will be told that a new century is just around the corner and everything will have to be different because it is new and that the older generation must be swept away and uprooted and all the symbols of the past will have to be replaced. If the proposed new red and white flag with a single maple leaf in the centre is in existence at the turn of the next century it will, of course, represent the horrible past that must be forgotten as we move into the 21st century with a new Canada. All this is just too ridiculous.

This is not a new country. This is an old country. It has centuries of history behind it, centuries of sacrifice, and we should recognize these facts. As has been mentioned in many speeches, these sacrifices were endured in warfare on Canadian soil in other years, as abroad. We also must not forget the sacrifices of the pioneers of this country who respected our flag.

Everything does not have to be new just because a few people get an idea that a new horizon has opened up. The great change in Canada, of course, as everywhere else in the world, is in the material sphere because of the technological advances that are constantly being made. There is not much change in human nature. How can there be changes in the principles that have guided mankind? How can there be changes in our customs and traditions that are sound and have been considered to be sound over the years? Now and then you remove something which is no longer useful, but the main elements of our society carry on. Our society has been soundly based and should so continue. Some of these symbols mean a great deal to millions of people in this country.

This is a time for postponement of this issue. Set it to one side and if the people must decide it let them do so at some future date. But let it be removed from parliament at this time. Let the schools of our country interest themselves in Canadian history in a way they have never done before. As I pointed out earlier in the debate, to my knowledge the subject of the Canadian flag has never been a major topic of conversation in the classrooms of this country. Children have drawn the flag and so on, but the origin and meaning of that flag have never been discussed.

Educational circles in this country in every province can no longer ignore the Canadian flag. They have a storehouse of information on it supplied by members of this house through their arguments for and against and also by people outside the house. Let a period of time go by. Let the ministers of education and their advisers consider this matter. Let us have another look at our Canadian history books and see if something more impressive should not be included with regard to Canada's traditions. Let this be done and then, if you like, let another generation decide the question.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we have heard some 252 speeches on the subject of choosing a flag for Canada. Of the 252 speeches, 177 have been delivered by members of the official opposition.

Mr. Churchill: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: Most of those speeches have been 40 minutes in length with some a bit shorter and a few a bit longer.

This morning we listened to a most outstanding speech by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) of Canada, a speech which I am sure in years ahead, when many of us are gone from this place, will serve as an inspiration to young Canadians. In the course of that speech the Prime Minister made an earnest and sincere plea for parliament to be given the right of decision on a matter that has been before the house and a committee of the house for many weeks, during which time all the speeches I have referred to have been delivered and during which time every aspect of the matter, I must say, appears to have been dealt with. The sincere appeal made by the Prime Minister was rejected summarily and immediately and, might I add, almost with contempt by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. Woolliams: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: That still seems to be the position of hon. gentlemen opposite even though since that speech was delivered we have heard a brief but eloquently expressed appeal by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) for the right of decision by parliament to be preserved as well as an appeal by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) along the same lines. In other words, speakers from two of the other three political parties represented in the House of Commons have indicated their support for such an appeal.

In the circumstances, and to prevent a mockery being made of parliament, I have no alternative but to take the action I now propose to take. I beg to give notice that immediately before the order of the day is next called for resuming the debate on the motion for concurrence in the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag, presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, and on any amendments thereto, I will move that the said debate shall not be further adjourned.

Mr. Bell: The pipe line boys are at it again. Shades of C. D. Howe.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: The party is over now.

Mr. Coates: Why don't you start singing songs again, boys?

Mr. Churchill: Remember black Friday.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a great honour to make the 178th speech by members of the official opposition in defence of our position with regard to Canada's glorious flag. The election promises of the Liberal party have never been, and I trust never will be, taken as the law of Canada. We are here to make a decision. We are here to make a decision in the parliamentary way. I speak for my party 100 per cent when I say that it is our right and privilege to stand in this house and speak from our conscience and from our principles on each and every occasion that we believe it is our duty so to do.

I have been asked by members of all parties except my own not to drag in emotions, not to parade my war effort, and I shall not do so. I speak from principle, the principle of defending those things which we hold dear and if I did not speak about those things the very rocks of Canada would cry out. The term "stubborn" is a term of derision sometimes used in trying to deflate a political opponent. However, when stubbornness is exhibited by a man of stature, whether or not he occupies the front benches of this noble house or some obscure back bench as I do, if his statements are made with conviction and sincerity, then it is a step toward statesmanship. Mr. Churchill returned to the school of his youth after some 46 years and spoke to the classes of Harrow. He had only one, small message to give them, and that message was this: When your principles are at stake you are not to desert them, never, never and again never.

Now, 178 speeches is a long way from never. However, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) of this country came to this house, he came with great promise from a distinguished career in public affairs. I am sure it was the hope of the Liberal party if not the whole country, that when this man took the reins of office he would give the kind of leadership which the world and his country expected from one with such a notable career. From time to time I have stood in this house and said, I am a Canadian first and a Conservative second and, I hope, a mere politician third. This great party was largely responsible for confederation and from that day to this, December 11, 1964 we have appealed, with all the power and vehemence which we have been able to muster, to the people of Canada not to let the great experiment of confederation go down the drain.

We have been accused on numerous occasions by members of the other parties sitting in this house of being divisive in our actions. I do not see how the mere fact that I, for one, have stood and claimed I loved the flag under which I was born, the flag which I noticed outside school every morning when I was perhaps too young to understand its significance, is being divisive. This is the flag under which I served in the mounted police for 23 years, seven of which I spent in the armed forces. I do not parade this fact in any way to establish myself as a hero, as I have been accused of doing by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). I merely say that this is a distinctive flag so far as I am concerned. The words "distinctive flag" of course have been used by those who would get rid of the British flag or any semblance of the British flag. I am not merely saying this because the statement appears in Hansard for this week. I refer to the extremists on the left who pretend to be more Canadian by saying they will have nothing British.

I hope that this does not include British justice because if there is one thing for which the British flag stands or the union jack quartered in our flag, it is that every citizen of this country, be he large or small, rich or poor, black or white, has equality under the law. This is what the British flag means to me, and this is what the British flag in the quarter of the red ensign has always meant to me. In case anyone thinks I am nothing but a talker I say that for 52 years of my life I have tried to make that symbol live in action as well as in words. A flag is something which we have had for many years. A flag is something which I claim we have today, by tradition and by law.

I should like to speak for a moment or two about the future. What are we going to hand on to our children, not only in the matter of a flag but in this same dual culture of which we are all proud? Where are we going to stop? As I have said, it is passing strange to me that the man who had promised to be such a great leader should not have been the first to speak in this debate, rather than third or fourth from the last. For months and months, I have sat here hoping it would not be necessary for us to appear to be filibustering. I want leadership, and I have a right to demand it from my government. The speech delivered today by the Prime Minister was perhaps his greatest speech in the House of Commons. However, I am afraid that is setting a very low standard.

Miss LaMarsh: You would not know, anyway.

Mr. Bigg: Perhaps I would not know. I do not have a truth squad to help me. I merely have my own conscience, my own sincerity. I am speaking as a private member. By the way, in this party, and this is one of the reasons I belong to this party, one has a right to speak as a private member. No matter how much we may disagree with our chief, never by thought or word or deed has our chief ever made his imperative views known. He has always talked to us in public and behind closed doors as the first amongst equals. This is the only attitude I will ever tolerate. I would not cross the floor of the house, but I would ask for a seat alone in the corner if this were not so. I have principles and a man who puts principles above all has the right to stand as a free citizen of this country and express his opinions on every occasion. Let my chief dare to intimidate me in any way and there would be one less member of this great party.

I do not expect members opposite to understand me. Let hon. members opposite remember that when the Hansard which contains the greatest speech ever delivered in the House of Commons by their leader is read into the pages of history, mine will not be read; but my stand will be taken now in the light of the words of that great Conservative, Mr. Winston Churchill: I will never, never, never desert the principles which I hold.

I have stood for the red ensign. It is not a party flag. It has been Canada's flag for nearly 100 years and it would be strange if anyone born in this country, of French, English or native origin, was not proud of that great banner. The first citizens of this country who signed solemn treaties with the Queen look at the red ensign as the symbol of their freedom, and if it is taken away they will feel part of their treaties has been abrogated.

There are 6,000 native Indians in my district. We are proud of them. They are Canada's first citizens, and I will find it hard to go back and explain to them why we have thrown away that symbol of peace and security which they have learned to love. When the volunteer soldiers left Canada during three wars our native people, according to their population, made the greatest contribution of any race resident in Canada. If the so-called founding races of Canada feel they are the only ones to be considered in this matter, may I point out to them we have a solemn obligation to those simple people of the soil, to explain to them why it is necessary to tear down what they regard as a symbol of freedom and equality.

I have hoped and wished in vain to hear positive arguments why a new flag should be raised on our flagpoles in place of the red ensign. If there are positive arguments, where are they? At first when the Prime Minister presented us with his design I thought it had some merit. It contained three maple leaves, and I for one think of the maple leaf as a very dear and honoured symbol. But I want to know, why is there this negative approach?

Why is there this unanimity among certain groups in favour of tearing down the symbol we have? Why is there this strange silence on the opposite side of the house? When I believe in something I stand on my feet and say so. I make a positive contribution. If the ensign is retained I believe it will continue to be an inspiration for all classes and races of people so long as Canada remains a nation.

I make no apology for continuing the debate until I have made my point. If we do away with the red ensign we also do away with the white ensign which flies on every Canadian naval ship, and I presume we will also do away with the air force flag which flew over the airports in Britain when our great airmen, second to none in the world, helped the motherland win the battle of Britain. The men who served under these three flags, the red, white and blue ensigns, have a right to be heard.

Closure can be imposed, but far from being a great victory, far from being something to cheer about, I think it is a Pyrrhic victory. I suppose the opposition has won a small battle this afternoon in forcing us into arbitrary silence, but I wonder if they have not lost a greater battle of principle. Why is there such haste in getting rid of the flag which has served us well for 97 years? The excuse is an election promise, as if an election promise was sacred.

In the early years of the war, when the then Liberal government found itself faced with a very sticky election promise never to impose national service on the people of Canada, it held a plebiscite and approximately 87 per cent of the people voted in favour of releasing the Liberal government from its promise. In typical fashion it purported to take this as a vote of confidence, not a vote on the subject in question, which is an old trick. If the Liberal party wants to get out of this flag promise it could do the same thing, hold a plebiscite, but it has voted against doing that.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), speaking on behalf of the N.D. party just half an hour ago, begged us not to filibuster and waste the time of parliament. Yet his is the party that filibustered for two years in denying divorces to people who sought them. Apparently when one section of parliament talks it is a filibuster, and when another section talks it is a national service on a very high scale. Why should the rules not apply to everybody? Why should the rules of closure not apply to every government? Obviously the Liberals believe in closure because this is not the first time they imposed it, and the circumstances are somewhat similar to a previous occasion.

The Liberals would like to force us into an election. They would like us to make that move because they know perfectly well that this flag which represents British justice is being sadly soiled. They would like it to disappear in a red cloud with a white band around it, like a Hampshire pig.

This new design reminds me of the flag of Bolivia, but the Prime Minister did not bother to tell us why we should change our flag. He did not hurry to tell us why the single maple leaf design is superior to the three maple leaf design, and why the three maple leaf design is superior to the red ensign. When the 1945 order in council was passed the cabinet of that day were apparently unanimous in deciding we already had a distinctive flag. The question then was not to choose a distinctive flag but to postpone the need for changing the design of it.

When we marched into Holland and Belgium in the spring of 1945 and helped to restore freedom in those countries, thousands of red ensigns were brought out of the clothes closets where they had been hidden from the nazis, and every house in Holland and Belgium displayed our flag. It is passing strange that the people of Holland and Belgium should know the red ensign when they saw it while hon. gentlemen opposite say they never saw it or, if they did, they purport to despise it.

If one goes south of the line on July 1 almost as many red ensigns can be seen flying in United States cities on the borders of Canada as there are copies of old glory. The people there are proud of their long association with Canada and we are proud of our long association with them. If hon. members came to the Calgary stampede—and it would do a lot of them some good—they would see the red ensign and old glory flying side by side. Now with the change, thousands of United States tourists will not know they have crossed the border when they see the flag of Bolivia over our customs offices.

When our veterans go back to Holland they will look in vain for the flag which we associate with them.

Miss LaMarsh: They will look for the maple leaf on the graves.

Mr. Bigg: Yes, it is there, and every single soldier in each of those graves was a volunteer soldier who fought under the union jack and the red ensign. I would venture to say this to the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh), that we might well consider whether our dead sleep in peace when they think we are tearing down their flag, certainly without considering it and without being given the leadership from our government which we would expect. Even supposing we did—and I am not prepared to anticipate that day—willingly set aside our flag for any other emblem, no suggestion has been made that we will lay it away with the dignity which it so richly deserves. How are we going to pay the debt to those who are not here to defend that flag? How are we going to keep peace with those? "Lest we forget":

> To you from failing hands we throw
> The torch; be yours to hold it high.

I appeal to this government in this regard and say, "They were speaking to you, not only to me. They were speaking to all of us who live here in freedom". They paid the price with their blood. If the people of Canada are now so delicate and so refined that I must not speak of blood or talk about the blood they gave and the sacrifice they made for us, perhaps I have lived in Canada too long. Some of my ancestors came here to be under the British flag. They could have had the so-called prosperity and freedom that exists south of the line. But I remind hon. members again that Canada was the first country in the world to abolish slavery; Canada was the first country in the world to give complete religious freedom. I am sorry that when the problem of freedom comes up again we must rely on the same old few volunteers who are sneered at and jeered at in this House of Commons of ours by those people who say our ideals of freedom are an empty dream, something out of the past.

When our friends to my left want to give dignity to what they say, they quote from the book of holy scripture. There are a good many verses in the book of holy scripture to cover this. I can give no better example than from the Ten Commandments themselves, one of which is:

> Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God hath given thee.

Not Marx, Lenin, Stalin, Hitler; but "the land which the Lord thy God hath given thee." I am no Jeremiah and I hesitate to bring down the wrath of Almighty God on those people who so lightly turn aside these symbols of reverence which have meant so much for 2,000 years. I will not be your judge, but I appeal to you in this regard and say that when I stand here and tell you those symbols really mean something to me, I am speaking from the depth of my heart.

Mr. Woolliams: Others will judge them.

Mr. Bigg: I do not care whether I am hissed at, booed at or if catcalls are made from the other side of the chamber; I do not care whether there are mean threats made upon my life, as they have been made in this house. Well, Mr. Speaker, threats have been made against me before; threats have been made against me for many years and I have always tried to go ahead and do my duty. That is why I am doing it this afternoon.

If and when this House of Commons should ever come to a free vote, and if hon. gentlemen opposite ever stand in their place and take their oath and say, "Without fear, favour, affection or ill will toward any person, so help me God", on the vote, I will honour that vote. When the people in this house decide to have a change of flag I want it to be done in conscience, I want it to be done on principle; and whether the red ensign is ratified or not, or whether some new distinctive flag is decided upon—one bearing the Canadian maple leaf or three maple leaves—I pledge that I will serve that flag in the same way that I tried to serve the great, old red ensign which I love.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have said anything on the floor of the house in connection with the debate that has been going on, as has already been pointed out, for some time. In view of a recent announcement, if I am going to have an opportunity of saying a few words I should perhaps take it now. I think no one would quarrel with the right of the member who has just resumed his seat to speak with sincerity, and no one would quarrel with the fact that he was doing so. But I am glad that in his concluding remarks he did indicate that he was prepared to recognize that other members might hold somewhat different views with equal sincerity.

I would like, therefore, to address myself for just a few minutes to the amendment which is before the house, which was moved by the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas), in the light of some of the statements he made during his quite thoughtful and carefully prepared speech which was a prelude to his amendment. The hon. member for Middlesex West had a good deal to say about traditions and symbols. He paid particular tribute to the symbols of the past and his respect for them. With those parts of his remarks I have no quarrel, although I must say that I sincerely believe that the main concern of those of us in the present parliament should be more toward addressing ourselves to the symbols of the future rather than to those of the past.

I did feel that the member who placed the current amendment before us, along with some of the other spokesmen in his party, appeared to have a concept of the history of our country which in effect means that history has stopped and we are standing still where we are, or where we were 50 or 100 years ago. The hon. member for Middlesex West, however, did go beyond that which he properly should do, in my opinion, particularly when he was speaking in reference to Canadians of English ancestry. I have no objection to the hon. member for Midlesex West or any other member of the house who is of English ancestry speaking for himself; but as I listened to him it appeared to me that the member for Middlesex West was taking unto himself the right to speak for all Canadians of English ancestry.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words in a speech which I will label as one of "including me out", because I am a Canadian of English ancestry who does not agree with the views of the member for Middlesex West.

He represents, as I understand it, one of the constituencies of the province of Ontario. His remarks led me to think, as I have been inclined to think rather often during the course of this debate, that much of it has taken place within the context of the limits of old Upper and Lower Canada. I happen to be a member representing a constituency in the province of British Columbia. I suppose it could be argued that I have very little right to take part in this debate because, after all, we are only Johnny-come-latelies in the Canadian confederation; we have only been in it since 1871. Sometimes I feel that some members in the house scarcely yet recognize that we have entered confederation.

Mr. Woolliams: That is only across the way, though.

Mr. Barnett: I was born in Alberta and have lived all my life in British Columbia and Alberta, except for the months, and it begins to feel years, which I have spent in Ottawa. I am a first generation Canadian. My mother came from England when she was a small girl. My father came to Canada when he was a young lad. So I suppose it might be argued that really I have not very much right to participate in the question which is now before the house; I am only one of those "Johnny-come-lately" Canadians. I am a Canadian of English speaking ancestry who knows no other home than this Canada of ours, and perhaps for that reason I do feel I have some concern for what this country is and what it should become.

I must confess that I have something more than an academic interest in our past. History is one of my favourite subjects of study. I should like to say at once that I think most British Columbians are proud of the name of our province. We are the only province in Canada which uses the word "British" in part of its name. I have never heard anyone suggest in British Columbia that that is a name which should be changed.

Mr. Churchill: Wait till the Créditistes hear about it.

Mr. Barnett: We are quite happy that that happens to be the name of our province; and it was the name of the British colony which entered confederation in 1871.

However, Mr. Speaker, as I listened last night to the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) quoting Sir John A. Macdonald with regard to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway and how it was going to shorten the time to travel from London to Yokohama, and how the union jack was going to wave over these travellers all the way from London to Yokohama, I must say I should have reminded him that history is not a static thing. Indeed Canada, a nation in the full sense of the word, did not even exist when Sir John A. Macdonald was talking about this all red imperial route which was going to extend westward from London across the Pacific.

As far as I am concerned I think it is quite possible to make a logical argument that Canada came into being only in 1931, when the statute of Westminster made us an independent nation. I was a good deal younger in 1931 than I am now but I must say that along with a great many other young Canadians at that time I was feeling my way as a Canadian. I revelled in the fact that here were we in Canada, becoming a nation in the full sense of the word. As far as I am concerned I would have become much more excited about this issue then than I am able to become now in my advancing years. That would have been the time for us to have had a flag that was Canadian and only Canadian. That would have been the time for us to have had a flag which looked to the future, which looked to history in the making, rather than to history which has gone before. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, my feeling is that for far too long have we as a nation neglected to develop a flag symbol which was distinctively and purely Canadian, which would stand for and mark that new status we had achieved as an independent partner and a self-governing nation in a new commonwealth.

I first came to this house in 1953, and at that time still very current were the rumblings of discussions which had arisen from an earlier committee of this house which had considered a distinctive Canadian flag. My chief regret is that the government of that day was prepared to procrastinate indefinitely on this subject; that the parliament of that day was not prepared to come to grips with this question and, having gone that far, to go through to a proper decision. Therefore I must say that I agree with the remarks made a little earlier by my colleague from Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), to the effect that in his view—and this is also my view—the time has come when this parliament should, after the kind of discussion and detailed consideration which has taken place in committee, pick up where the parliaments of the 1940's left off and come to a considered decision on this question.

I know that if certain actions take place which have been proposed from the government side, speeches will be limited to 20 minutes. Even though that event has not yet taken place I do not intend to prolong my remarks certainly beyond that point. But the reason I did want to get up and make a few rather offhanded remarks was to say that I wanted to be included out from that all embracing and sweeping statement of the hon. member for Middlesex West, which in effect said that all Canadians of English ancestry were being represented by the sentiments he uttered yesterday. I wanted to make this brief statement including me out, while the subject matter of his particular amendment was before the house. Because if there is one element of this debate which has concerned me, as a Canadian, more than any other, it is the kind of suggestion which was implicit in the remarks made by the hon. member for Middlesex West, namely that somehow or other the proposal for a Canadian flag as brought in by the committee has something to do with dividing us as to whether we are Canadians of English speaking ancestry or Canadians of French speaking ancestry. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put on the record that I am one Canadian who does not feel that way in any way at all.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, this is the second occasion since this debate has arisen in the house that I have taken part in it. The first occasion was when I spoke, not on the flag or the flag design but only on the method by which the house should proceed in order to determine the selection of a flag for Canada. Perhaps I would not have arisen again had it not been for one or two events which occurred recently, and particularly today. I believe it is a shame that the only member of the treasury benches to have risen, apart from the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) today, to take part in this debate is a cabinet minister who had to move closure. The last occasion upon which this was resorted to was during the pipe line debate. Many of the same people involved in that debate are still in the cabinet. Subsequent events proved they were wrong then, and they are just as wrong this time. They have obviously not learned their lesson.

The procedure of closure has been repugnant to the sense of fair play of the Canadian people. My own personal view is that never in parliamentary debate should there be a muzzling of free debate. They will say they were forced into this by a fatuous opposition. Surely we had the right to debate this issue, especially when the government dumped their three maple leaf design and produced a new one, and in view of the fact that not one member of the government stated his position until today, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) spoke, only after being smoked out by the debate of last evening.

They will learn, Mr. Speaker, that no government can afford to take for granted that the opposition is entirely wrong in taking a stand on what it believes. In every single case, as Laurier said on one occasion, where closure has been imposed, the opposition has been justified. I am as sure as I am standing here today, Mr. Speaker, that that justification will be proved to those who now wish to gag parliament by imposition of the closure role.

Does the Prime Minister think that a flag imposed in this way will win popular approval? I do not think so. This procedure being followed by this government is unwelcome, distasteful and unjustified, and I predict that they will live to regret it.

A flag means a lot of things to many people. A flag represents one thing to one individual and another thing to another individual. A flag to me represents one thing, and that is Canada. When the Prime Minister spoke today he said he had fought during the first world war under the union jack, and never saw the red ensign during that time. For almost ten years I served under the red ensign. I remember going to school at a place where the red ensign was raised every morning in the schoolyard. That was common practice in the west, and I think more attention should be paid to the historical traditions that were instilled in the school children in that part of the country.

This flag, instead of representing Canada to Canadians, represents a Canada betrayed. It is betrayal of the past and of our heritage, and a betrayal of parliament because of the manner in which this government has proceeded. This government has treated this whole issue contemptuously. I remember very clearly what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) said, when he was speaking about closure, which was being discussed during the past government's term of office. I have with me today an excerpt from the Ottawa Journal of April, 1962 having to do with this subject. This article was written by I. Norman Smith, and I think it might be of some use if I were to read one or two excerpts from it. The article states in part:

> For some odd reason surprise is being expressed at the Liberals' eager agreement with Prime Minister Diefenbaker's move to abolish closure as a guillotine in the rules of parliament.
> Any of us having even a nodding acquaintance with wrong-doing will understand Mr. Pickersgill's speech as simply that of the reformed drinker who doesn't want the stuff left in his house even for emergency. He can't trust himself.
> Mr. Diefenbaker moved that a house committee "consider" dropping closure. No, no, cried Mr. Pickersgill, let's not talk about it, let's drop it now.
>
> "I believe," he said, "that no government in its senses would ever again use the existing closure rule in our book."
> But apparently he could not be sure that if the Liberals got into power again they might not again yield to temptation.

And they have done so.

> It is an awful thing to see a person have to acknowledge that in a given set of circumstances he might go out of his senses, specially when that knowledge is based on past experience.

No, no, a thousand times no, cry the Liberals; take the stuff away.

What an amazing flip-flop they have accomplished.

Mr. Robichaud: Would the hon. member permit a question. In view of his quotation from an editorial appearing in the Ottawa Journal, would he be interested also in putting on the record what was said in an editorial appearing in the Ottawa Journal on Wednesday, December 9, to the effect that the time has come for a decision on the flag, and also makes reference to closure?

Mr. Nielsen: It is extremely interesting that during all the days of this debate, since the report of the committee was placed before the house, this is the second interjection by a cabinet minister who has not had the courage to get on his feet and say something during the debate. This is an example of the usefulness of the contributions that they have made. I suggest to the Minister of Fisheries that he should stand in his place and state his position as to whether or not he accepts the single maple leaf design with the red borders as accepted by the committee. I suggest to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Tremblay) who has jurisdiction over all the functions of the citizenship courts in this country, that he too should rise in his place and state his position. I suggest that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau), and the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne) should stand in their places and state their positions. Those ministers have a very intimate reason for stating their positions on the flag issue. What have those ministers done in this regard? The Minister of Fisheries has stood up and asked an innocuous question instead of stating his position.

The course followed by the ministers during this debate has been a betrayal of even that symbol, now supported by the words of the Prime Minister, which they purport to adopt—the maple leaf. It has been dictated by a partisan advantage, particularly when one considers the very close rapport which exists among the Liberal members of that committee and the members of that committee who sit to my far left in the Créditiste ranks. In my opinion suspicions immediately occur when several Liberal members of a committee all suddenly express distaste for a design with three maple leaves which the Prime Minister suggested, when he presented it to the house on the first occasion, was the only design that had any national significance as the national flag for Canada. I suggest that action on the part of the Liberal party was dictated by a partisan advantage, and I think that fact is clear.

If the Prime Minister feels that we are too concerned with the past, as he seemed to indicate today, then why, as he has stated, is it his intention to drag the union jack into the picture? He made an impassioned and spirited speech about the maple leaf. No one can disagree that the maple leaf is an emblem of Canada. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) said today, about the emblem of Ireland, that they do not have a shamrock on their flag. One might say the same about the eagle of the United States. It is an emblem of the United States but it is not on their flag. One could say the same thing about the rose of England. That is an emblem of that great nation but we do not observe it on their flag. The Prime Minister fails to understand the nature of a flag, and fails to understand that a flag itself is history.

The government is afraid to face the country on this issue because of their disarray and discredit at this time. So what do they do? They resort to gagging parliament as they did once before and lived to regret it. He said today that we obstructed for 23 days. The fact remains that we were right. We obstructed for 23 days, said the Prime Minister, on the basis of the three maple leaf flag. We were right. They reversed themselves and they now have a single maple leaf. They junked the three maple leaves and are now clutching to their bosoms the one maple leaf flag.

I believe that the Prime Minister missed the point. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that one of the reasons we criticized the three maple leaf design was not that it indicated a lack of any reflection of our past alone, not that it eradicated any of our past heritage and history alone, but that the government itself has changed its flag and its tune since it introduced the first resolution. The Prime Minister cannot get around this fact with high sounding platitudes. They started out with three leaves and they have reversed themselves to one. Why? The Prime Minister's speech was full of sound and fury signifying, to my mind, nothing. It was full of pious platitudes. That is the best description I can give of it.

We are concerned not with words but with what is being done. What is being done is that the Canadian people are asked to accept a partisan flag—in fact, not asked to accept, because in view of the notice given by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith) a partisan flag that has already been changed at the behest of partisan requirements is being forced upon them. I say, sir, that the Prime Minister and his government are treating parliament with contempt by shifting and changing on the flag and that they are now adding insult to injury by gagging parliament.

They talk about respecting the past but they would junk the flag embodying our Canadian history. They talk about unity and they sow disunity. At a time like this, when frictions, gaps and fissures are appearing between the two great races of this country, they have petulantly insisted on bringing the flag debate before parliament again and again and again. They have tried, with collaboration, to foist the blame on the members of the opposition for their own ineptness and inadequacies and their lack of organization.

They talk about coming to a decision and voting on the flag, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) also did today, so we can get on with the business of the country. There has never been any reason why parliament could not have been dealing with the business of the country instead of frittering away endless hours on this debate merely because of the petulant insistence of the Prime Minister that the flag issue has to be decided instead of dealing with the national labour code, the pension plan, and all of those other more important matters that should have been dealt with by this parliament. There is where the real blame lies. There is where the responsibility for leadership lies. We have been getting nothing in the way of leadership from the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister talks about change. Change is one thing and honesty is another. He has made the issue the question of change, but that is not the issue at all. We in this party are not against change. If this party were against change I for one would not be a member of it. Why does the government keep the union jack which is embodied in the second resolution and which we discarded 20 years ago? It is not a question of change. It is the kind of change and the manner in which the government is bulldozing its way to change. Have the traditions representative of a large and substantial body of Canadians the right to recognition, after having been recognized for 200 years in this country, or have they not? Apparently not, because their views are now gagged. They are cut off, they are stifled, they are throttled and they are not being heard because of the high handed and arbitrary action of the government in moving closure.

I ask the Prime Minister what happened to the three maple leaves? If he was sincere in June, is he sincere now? What changed him? He has not said a word about that nor have we heard any of his cabinet colleagues or any of the backbenchers say anything about that aspect. What gives this government the right to play games with Canada's flag? Why did they change? What gives the government the right to decide that the time has come to deprive a great segment of the Canadian people of their history and traditions? This has nothing to do with the past. These are things equally valid in the present. If they do not matter, why the feverish anxiety about remembering them?

The Prime Minister says he accepts the report of the committee and that all members of his cabinet do likewise, but that does not tell us for a moment what happened to the three maple leaves. The government will accept anything as long as it gets rid of the red ensign. The Prime Minister calls it a compromise. I say, sir, that it was no compromise. It was a deliberate scrapping of their three leaf design for partisan advantage.

It certainly was time for the Prime Minister to speak. I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) in his seat now. I think he should rise and tell us what his personal views are on the committee report. Is he in favour of the red maple leaf on the white background with the two red bars? There are other cabinet ministers here. The Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) is in his seat. Why does he not rise and state his personal views on the flag? I see the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Benidickson) completely absorbed in reading his newspaper. Why does he not rise and state his personal views?

Mr. Benidickson: I will vote.

Mr. Nielsen: I will vote too, Mr. Speaker, and I will vote against the single maple leaf because it means nothing to me whatsoever.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Nielsen: There is something else I will vote against when the time comes to do so, and that is the imposition of closure in the House of Commons. I will vote against the gagging and throttling of parliamentary debate, because that is what is happening.

An hon. Member: Another black Friday.

Mr. Nielsen: It is Friday again, and another black Friday, Mr. Speaker. When the Prime Minister spoke this morning it was the first indication that any of us on this side of the house had so far as the Liberals are concerned that there was even a flag debate in progress, because we had not heard from a single minister sitting on the treasury benches. Where is the leadership to which this country is entitled?

Mr. Greene: We are working our way up.

Mr. Rhéaume: You had better have a paid furniture invoice.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, every time I attempt to make a serious speech other members inject humour into it and it usually involves the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Greene).

Where, sir, in this single red leaf design is the heraldry, the history that were so eloquently described by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) in connection with the three maple leaf design that was so eloquently described by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in June when he introduced the resolution? Where has that gone? In June, the Prime Minister waxed eloquent about this design for the three leaf flag; it was the only one with tradition and history. Now he approaches the whole matter on tip-toe; the whole thing has been dumped in his lap. He is now saying, I accept the single leaf and so do all my cabinet colleagues. The fact remains, sir, this flag design was chosen by ten members of this house, seven of whom were Liberals while the other three were from the splinter groups to my left.

This afternoon the Prime Minister said, certainly, I put forward the three maple leaf design. He referred to the historical significance of it. He said also that the single maple leaf had historical significance. It is strange that this historical significance should suddenly show itself when it did not have any such significance last June when the three leaf design was introduced by him. He says, however, that the three leaves have greater significance. I suppose they have three times greater significance. The members of that committee chose the single leaf design, seven of them were Liberals, and yet we are asked to believe that it is not a partisan flag, that it is not a partisan issue. I am informed also, sir, that the Liberal members of that committee voted unanimously against the three leaf design. This afternoon the Prime Minister skated around that fact.

The fact remains, sir, that either the Prime Minister and those opposite were sincere in June when they said that only the three leaves had the qualifications that were desirable in a national flag or they are not sincere now. They cannot have it both ways. Either they believe what they are saying now or they did not believe what they were saying then. If they did believe what they were saying last June, the only conclusion is that they changed their views to get the support of the Créditistes, the Social Crediters, and the members of the N.D.P. He injected into the debate this afternoon, and this to my mind was one of the Prime Minister's well known straw men, the fact that the report of the flag committee was a surrender to Quebec. I was sorry to hear him say this, because it only further inflames, and he must take responsibility for having done so, the French-English differences which appear in this country today. Who said, before he did this afternoon, that it was a surrender to Quebec? Whom was he quoting? Was it, perhaps, the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan)? No one on this side, certainly in the speeches to which I have listened or have read, has described the committee report as a surrender to Quebec.

I feel, sir, that it is a disgrace that Liberal cabinet ministers have not spoken in this debate. We have had to wait two weeks to find out where they stand, and we have had to learn that from the Prime Minister. I feel that cabinet ministers, in that spirit of leadership which is supposed to exist in any government, have a responsibility to see that we are informed on how they stand, what their personal views are. Having said these things or having indicated to the house partially why I intend to vote against closure and intend to vote against the single maple leaf design, I shall take my seat.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, like my colleague who spoke before me, I wish to say that I intend to vote against closure and vote against the maple leaf flag. In fact, many of us on this side wonder why only one member from that side expressed his views. I refer not to the frontbenchers as my colleague did, but to the backbenchers. Why have more of you not had the intestinal fortitude to get up and tell the people what you really think. You are going to have to go back and tell your constituents.

The other day one of the speakers in this house said that the backbenchers on the opposite side of the house looked and acted as if they were imprisoned in strait-jackets. Actually, that is the way they have looked to us ever since this flag debate started. Today, as a result of the dictatorial action of the government, we have had strait-jackets imposed on us. I was very impressed this afternoon with the words uttered by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg), particularly when he reminded us of that poem "In Flanders Fields" by Colonel McCrae, part of which is, "to you from failing hands we throw the torch." I ask today, has that torch gone out? Have you thrown it?

I told you a few moments ago that you imposed a strait-jacket on us and we must accept it because that is the law of our country. I hope you are very proud of that. I said it appeared to us that you members on the back benches have refrained from speaking on this issue because you have been instructed to do so by your leaders. My colleague says you were threatened. I wonder what that threat was. The sole contribution that you people on the back benches have made in this debate—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; may I remind the hon. member that he should address the Chair?

Mr. McIntosh: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am addressing the Chair and I excluded you from these remarks. The sole contribution that will go down in history that the back benches of this government have made to this loss of the red ensign for Canada is recorded in Hansard. It is interjections, interruptions, laughs, facetious questions, irresponsible points of order and privilege and ridicule. In my opinion, this major issue, this very important election promise that you people say you made—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please; the hon. member was cautioned a moment ago by the Chair that he cannot address other members of the house directly. He can only refer to them in the third person.

Mr. McIntosh: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will ask you, and possibly I can get an answer. We wonder why they have remained silent. We ask why they have remained silent. I am sure their constituents will ask them why they have remained silent. I know the veterans in their constituencies will ask them why they remained silent. I am sure that in future years the children of this country will ask them why they remained silent. They say it was because of a promise that they gave to the country to give the country a distinctive flag. I wonder if they are not confusing extinction with distinction by their actions.

They may well believe it when they say that this promise made must be fulfilled. I said in the house the other day that you people went out west and made one promise that was very dear to the hearts of the western farmers. You promised $2 wheat. What is going to happen to that promise? You also promised the labour people of Canada a labour code. What is going to happen to that promise?

One member of your party promised a Canada pension plan. What has happened to that? What happened to the medicare plan? What happened for the relief of those people depending on railway lines during the question of rail line abandonment? Why do you remain silent? Mr. Speaker, I hope when they answer they will answer through you, in the same manner as you asked me to ask these questions.

Is it because they have a tiger by the tail and are afraid to let go? Is that why they remain silent? Is that why they enforce closure? Is it because they have been instructed to keep silent? The people of Canada have a right to know. Certainly their constituents have a right to know why they sat silent during these days of debate except for, as I said before, interjections and interruptions.

Is it because they have no respect for the Canadian red ensign? Is that the reason they have remained silent? Is it because their constituents do not want them to speak up? The Hansard record will show how many times these backbenchers got up and spoke on this very important issue which they said must have priority above all others. They have said nothing on it. Is it because there have been other types of pressure put on them? Have they been told to keep quiet for some other reason? The country is entitled to know the answer. Are they too apathetic or too complacent, not caring whether the red ensign comes down or not?

Mr. Byrne: No.

Mr. McIntosh: Is that the hon. member for Kootenay East? He has been on record more often in the House of Commons than most and has made the shortest speeches of anyone in the house. He makes them from a very good place, from his seat. Let him get up and tell us what he thinks about this flag. Why don't they speak?

Miss Jewett: I try to speak only once on any matter.

Mr. McIntosh: Yes, teacher.

Canadian Flag

Are they aware that the whole flag issue has become a red herring? The reason I say red herring is because I have in my hand The Western Producer of December 10, which arrived just this morning. It shows a picture of a flag suggested by a certain group in the west, and I may say this is a publication which to my knowledge has never been favourable to this side of the house but is always favourable to the party that forms the government. The caption under the picture reads:

Frank Cushon of Oxbow is shown holding his "red herring" flag which he introduced to the annual meeting of the Saskatchewan farmers' union in Saskatoon last week. The design was introduced as a joke but S.F.U. delegates took it seriously and decided to send a copy of the flag to Ottawa for consideration by the House of Commons.

Why did the Liberals introduce this red herring in the first place? Is it because they needed another 60 days of decision? We could have given them another 60 days. We could have given them a recess which cabinet ministers could have spent in their offices preparing bills properly.

Was it to divert public attention from more inefficient government or was it, as Time magazine said, for spite? I do not have Time magazine with me, but it referred to the action taken by the Prime Minister after the famous Legion meeting in Winnipeg. It said they never saw a man react so fast as after the reception he got at that meeting.

The government has conveyed to the public that the decision on the flag shall be left to the judgment of members of parliament. Dealing with the judgment of members of parliament I ask, do hon. members opposite, with but one exception, agree with what Edmund Burke has said about members of parliament and their duty? I quote the following extract:

Soul-searching and attention to business are what a great parliamentarian and political philosopher of the so-called golden age of oratory believed should be principal ingredients in the life of an M.P.

Edmund Burke said in the 1770's that an M.P. should "live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents."

"Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinion high respect; their business unremitted attention. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasures, his satisfaction, to their's; and above all, ever, and in all cases, to prefer their interests to his own."

Burke also held the view that an M.P. isn't elected simply to vote slavishly on every question as his electors demand. He is elected as a man of judgment on whom the electors should be able to depend. As Burke put it:

"Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices it for your opinion."

Mr. Davis: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McIntosh: Surely.

Mr. Davis: Would he take that quotation from Burke to refute a plebiscite or as an argument in favour of a plebiscite?

Mr. McIntosh: I do not know where the hon. member was all the time I was talking, but I was referring to the judgment of members of parliament. I ask you, in your judgment, did you serve your constituency well by sitting in the house and not talking on this issue at all?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills and private bills.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO WATER POLLUTION

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-68, to amend the Criminal Code (nuisance).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have introduced this bill on a number of occasions. In fact it is an identical copy of one that was introduced by the former prime minister, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) prior to his assuming the reins of office. I thought the bill had a great deal of merit at that time and since then I have introduced it from year to year in the hope that it will be a first step in doing something about the prevention of pollution of our waters.

The purpose of the bill is to make it an offence for the owners of industrial plants and oil refineries or other persons to discharge noxious matter into an interprovincial water thus endangering the lives, safety, health and comfort of the public.

In the first instance the bill was introduced to prevent, if possible, the pollution of certain waters that came from the province of Alberta and flowed into the Saskatchewan river.

For many years I have been very interested in the conservation of natural resources. I want to say that we can talk all we like about pension plans, national medicare plans and all the other social improvements that all members of this house desire; but unless we maintain and improve our national resources, our standard of living in the future—and the not very far distant future—will begin to decline. All civilizations have been based on a foundation of adequate natural resources. I have been interested in this subject all my life, Mr. Speaker, and I know something about it. I have tried to do what I can in my own small way to conserve the land that I hold at the present time as a trustee for the government, pending the revolution. I have tried to do the same with the rivers and waters that flow on my property, and the forests and the wildlife. I believe I have had considerable success, so far as a private owner can under this free enterprise system. However, on that account for years I moved a motion in the house in the following words:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of calling a dominion-provincial conference on conservation, with the view to the establishment of a nation-wide policy on soil, forest and water conservation and land use for Canada.

Strangely enough, Mr. Speaker, although over quite a number of years all members of the house supported this resolution in principle and gave it their blessing, shall I say, no action was taken as far as the resolution was concerned; it was talked out at the end of the usual private members' hour. On one occasion when I raised the matter the minister at that time replied. I am quoting from page 1565 of Hansard of February 27, 1956, where I said:

> When speaking on my resolution last year the minister gave three reasons for not agreeing to accept it. While he supported the principles of conservation in general, he gave these three reasons for not being able to accept the resolution. First, he said that the prime responsibility for conservation of resources rests with the provincial governments. Second, he said that the suggestion for federal action should come from the provincial governments. Third, he had grave doubts as to the success of a conference called to deal with all renewable natural resources.

I want to give full credit to the former minister of northern affairs and national resources for his calling the renewable resources conference in Montreal in the summer of 1961, when numerous very interesting papers were delivered to the conference. As the result of this conference there was the establishment of the Canadian council of resource ministers, and I am glad to see, from reading the reports that I get from this council, that they are beginning to tackle this question. They have laid out a program in which the question of pollution takes a prominent part, and they are also providing for the receipt of information from other nations regarding research with respect to natural resources and their development. They are also providing for an exchange of information between the federal government and the provincial governments. I give the former minister, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton), great credit for calling that conference. I think the circumstances were somewhat different then, inasmuch as the former government of Mr. Duplessis had been defeated and I believe it is quite correct to say that the atmosphere in Quebec was more conducive to calling a conference of this type than it had been in years past. I am glad to know that this council is laying down a program dealing with this problem.

I am also very glad that the present Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) has recognized the tremendous need for a national water management policy and has made a number of speeches on this question. I note that some time ago, through, shall I say, the vehicle of his very distinguished and good looking parliamentary secretary, he made a speech in Montreal on the question, in which he clearly indicated that he realizes what we have to do in this respect and what price the public is paying for confused policies, haphazard programs and ill planned projects. He went on to deal with the damage caused by floods; the situation with respect to shipping in some of our rivers; the depletion, often to perilously low levels, of those secure supplies of fresh drinking water without which great cities cannot exist; the virtual destruction of our once great commercial fisheries. Then he dealt with the pollution problem that is only beginning to be faced. Then he went on to deal with the slow decay of sports fishing in some areas that had previously enjoyed an international reputation; the acute shortage of water for irrigation and other purposes in farm areas; the need for water for recreational purposes, and the water required for industrial purposes. Then he dealt in a very interesting way with the fragmentation of government authority in the water resources field which, he said, "fosters a fierce rivalry and a devil-take-the-hindmost empire-building in competitive government agencies, encourages waste and duplication of effort and the taxpayers' money and which virtually guarantees an appallingly uneconomic use of water resources which, however vast, are not limitless". He then dealt with other aspects of the question and made certain proposals on how the government of the day should meet this situation. I was very pleased to see him face up to this question, because it is a very important one facing us at this time.

I want to quote briefly from an article that appeared in the October 9 issue of the Globe and Mail. It is headed, "But in the mass we're a pack of vandals". I agree with that sentiment and I could use that word "vandals" in a much wider way than possibly I should use it under the present circumstances. This article says:

> One of the more certain ways of making sure that one does not run out of essential goods is to make sure that one does not waste, despoil or pollute the bountiful supplies one already has. This is a fairly straightforward fact of life which is readily comprehended by most individual humans; but it is a fact that takes an awful lot of getting through the heads of the human mass.

It is a question that is going to take a great deal of education, not only in parliament and in organizations interested in this question but in our universities, high schools and the public schools. Every one of our children going to school, regardless of their age, should have their attention directed as soon as possible to the great importance of these issues. The article goes on to say:

> Canadians who appreciate a comfortable life do not stuff good food into the garbage can, smash up their furniture, yank up their rosebushes or pour the fresh cream in with the sour. They have too much respect for themselves and their possessions to indulge in such vandalism.
> Yet these same Canadians, in that larger home of theirs which is the country, happily litter their parks, destroy their forests, waste their topsoil and pollute their rivers and lakes. These things are quite as essential to their well-being as their more personal possessions, are, in fact, the basic wealth from which many of the personal possessions spring. But belonging to everybody they seem, in the contradictory human mind, to belong to nobody and therefore not to be worth preserving.

I think that article very clearly states the question. As I said before, unless we do something to conserve and develop these renewable natural resources of ours as a result of management policies, our standard of living which we enjoy today and the opportunities for its possible improvement through legislation both in this house and in the legislatures of the various provinces will decline in the years ahead. There is no question of that, Mr. Speaker, and that is why I am very concerned with this particular issue. In my opinion we in this house are responsible for doing what we can to improve this situation as the result of legislation or amendments to existing legislation, and by keeping the public informed of the seriousness of the situation.

Water is so important in life that its conservation and distribution must override the geographical boundaries of private property, counties and provinces, the political boundaries of federal and provincial jurisdictions, and the economic domains of agriculture, forestry and industry. If jurisdictional disputes prevent effective action, our heritage in natural resources will be lost by default, because above all boundaries is the supreme natural law the edicts of which are indisputable.

All that is to be done must start in the minds of citizens. "We may well ask", said John H. Storer, renowned lecturer on the natural world, in his book "The Web of Life", which I recommend to all hon. members to read, "whether man will develop understanding before he destroys himself by destroying his environment". To which may be added what was written by Myra Mannes, United States writer and commentator, in her book "More in Anger", which again I recommend members secure from the library and read, when she referred to "people who conserved their convenience at the expense of their heritage, and whose ephemeral prosperity was built on waste". The least we can do as responsible individuals is to become informed about the problems and make our voices heard in demanding conservation of our most priceless material resource, which I think at the present time without any doubt is water.

Before concluding my brief remarks I want to deal with a subject that does indicate the great value of water not only to Canadian subjects but to people in the United States and other countries. I want to refer to a statement made by the North American power and water alliance. The United States senate has appointed Senator Frank Moss of Utah as chairman of the new water development subcommittee. This subcommittee, known as NAWAPA—North American water and power alliance—has been appointed to make a study of how the waters of the Yukon, Northwest Territories and British Columbia—our waters, mind you—can be drawn down to the states of Utah, Nevada, New Mexico, Texas, California and Arizona to make their deserts bloom. It is the wish of the United States senate to store this water in what is known as the Rocky mountain trench, in British Columbia. The United States senate wishes to turn the Rocky mountain trench into a huge lake 500 miles long if these schemes come to fruition; and I mention this to indicate how concerned they are with the problem of water. The water from this 500 mile long lake would be taken by way of canals, reservoirs, tunnels and rivers to water the great American deserts of the previously mentioned six states. Perhaps even more important, these waters would be used for expansion of industries and populations in cities like Los Angeles, Phoenix, Tucson and many others.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is happening in this question? The United States is coming to Canada with the proverbial hat in hand claiming that they are all but out of water. Is their claim genuine, or are they conserving their own water for long range future expansion? The United States knows that at the present time Canada is still very much underpopulated, and perhaps does not realize how important water will be for Canada's future growth. Senator Moss has stated on several occasions:

> The era of space probes and miracle drugs has not changed man's dependence upon "the life blood of civilization". Cities and nations grow in direct ratio to their water supply. When that supply fails, they perish.

As they have in past history.

If Canada gives away all of her western water supply, can she continue to grow as a nation? Indeed, can she continue as a nation at all? Since 1940, or in the past 24 years, Canada's population has jumped from 10 million to 19 million. It is quite realistic to suppose that in the next 20 to 25 years the population could expand to 40 or 50 million. To support a population of this size we will have to turn away from a lot of uneconomical dry farms to irrigation of smaller, more productive farmsteads. If the United States plan is carried out, all the water of any importance left to Canada will be the Saskatchewan river system, as far as western Canada is concerned. But even now, before the Elbow dam on the Saskatchewan is finished, it is believed that the water supply will not be adequate to meet the present needs of Saskatchewan. That does not give us much hope for the future, unless we can tap some of the Arctic or British Columbia rivers. In all probability, we will be needing both these sources.

I could go on and deal further with this question, but in concluding this portion of my remarks I want to say that at the Canadian end of Senator Moss's project most of the rivers would have to be reversed. That is, the United States would have to make the rivers flow backwards and do a great deal of engineering miracles to accomplish that end. This plan has not been put into effect. Fortunately, I think the government of the day is aroused to the circumstances of the present situation and are determined, according to the statements made by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) and his parliamentary secretary (Mr. Turner), to develop a water management policy which will protect the needs of Canada both at the present time and for generations to come.

I have dealt with this vast project, the North American water and power alliance, only briefly, Mr. Speaker, so as to indicate how important is this question of water on the North American continent and what the United States is having to do to obtain additional supplies. My bill, shall I say, takes a somewhat shallower approach to the situation than the one I have been developing, but I have used this argument to indicate the urgency of the situation and the need for the development of policy. I was very surprised to realize when I was in the committee on mines, forests and waters the other day that there has been a committee of deputy ministers from various departments throughout the years which is supposed to meet periodically and come to decisions as the result of interdepartmental consultations on various water questions which are brought to their attention. And what do we discover? We discover that at the present time the committee has not even a secretariat, and we could not get very complete information as to when the committee had met and what its decisions had been over the last few years.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, and I see you looking anxiously at me, I urge the house to consider the purposes of my bill amending the Criminal Code as a first step toward the further prevention of pollution of our rivers which flow from one province to another, or which may in the future be transferred from one province to another by gravity or by pumping. This amendment to the Criminal Code represents only a minor step, but I suggest we take that first step on that long road we have to travel.

Mr. Joseph P. O'Keefe (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) on the presentation of this bill. I assure him that I agree wholeheartedly with the principles of it; however, I have some reservations as to its effect. First of all, I do not think a private member's bill is the proper way of doing this job and, second, that Bill C-68 is not wide enough or all embracive enough.

Mr. Herridge: We quite frankly admit that and suggest that this is only a minor step in the right direction.

Mr. O'Keefe: I agree with the hon. member but say, to use his own words, it is rather narrow.

It has been said that the gravest and the most difficult of any government problem is the matter of arranging the means of making industrial organization and humanism compatible. In this day and age I suggest that is what parliaments are for. This is not a new problem. It might be interesting to observe that its existence was recognized and dealt with, I might say vigorously, as far back in Newfoundland and Labrador at least as 1610. In that year John Guy, the English colonist who organized Cupids, a colony then known as Sea Forest Plantation, enacted eight laws the first of which, written in old English was: Ballast or anything hurtful to harbours not to be thrown out but carried ashore: penalty—£5 for every offence. When it is remembered that John Cabot, who discovered Newfoundland, was given just twice that amount, or £10 for his discovery of the whole of Newfoundland and Labrador, it must be agreed that John Guy enacted a law with a very severe penalty.

Of the major world problems, such as the prevention of nuclear war, the proper distribution of the world's food and the finding of fresh water, the third in the opinion of many experts is the most important. Back in the days when the Russians astounded the world with their space exploits, especially the feats of Mr. Gagarin, the late President Kennedy was asked by newspapermen how the United States could recoup its diminished prestige. They of course expected him to say "Send a United States spaceman to the moon". He surprised them by saying, "Find a cheap method for sweetening the sea".

With the exception, and it is a notable exception, of my own city of St. John's, whose Windsor lake is the source of the purest water in Canada and is fed by gravity to the extremes of the oldest city in North America, most city populations drink water which contains noxious substances such as detergents and insecticides, and these are slowly rising to dangerous levels. The discovery of an inexpensive way to separate salt from water would also mean that other chemicals could be eliminated.

I am one of the lucky ones who was born within sight and sound of the sea. Every Newfoundlander loves the sea. Every maritimer, every coastal inhabitant is, I suggest, always conscious of the sea. Anything, no matter how minor, which permits or is even suggestive of water pollution, is absolutely abhorrent to anyone who has walked with fishing gear, who has heard a boat chug out from the shore at dawn or has seen tall masts against a sunset. This is why, Mr. Speaker, I am very happy and very grateful for the opportunity given me today to speak for a few minutes on the frightening problem of water pollution.

I have seen seagulls, as I am sure you have, glorious in their freedom, gleaming crescents of ivory. I have heard the welcome sound of sea birds in the spring as they returned to my own village of Holyrood. I have also seen, as so many Newfoundlanders have, and as I am sure have others, the same birds, grotesque and slime-covered as they struggled hopelessly, wrapped in an oily shroud. I know there is an international convention for the prevention of pollution of the sea by oil, to which Canada is a signatory, but my understanding is that that convention forbids dumping of oil within 50 miles of the shore only. I respectfully suggest there should be no indiscriminate dumping of oil on the high seas anywhere. At the meeting of the last international conference, held in Copenhagen in 1959, the Canadian delegate described the Avalon peninsula, part of which I have the honour to represent in this house, and the southeast coast of Newfoundland as one of the world's hardest hit areas. Ships ending their trans-Atlantic run make a practice of discharging disgusting and dangerous oily ballast in the shipping lanes south and east of Newfoundland, and the prevailing winds and currents take it ashore, causing pollution of Newfoundland's coast and a wholesale destruction of wildlife in those waters. This makes no mention of the frightening danger of fire.

Surely my island has borne enough of the slings and arrows without suffering for the thoughtlessness and the carelessness of some captain. One wonders, does the thoughtless or careless captain, or worse, of any ship who indiscriminately dumps oil on the surface of the sea ever stop to realize the havoc those thousands of gallons of waste oil cause in the bays of our coastal waters. Does he not realize, apart from the elemental fact, that he is by his wanton act depriving fishermen of their livelihood? Does he not think of the beaches thus spoiled, the fishing gear fouled, or that bathing becomes difficult if not impossible and, as I mentioned earlier, the fearful risk of fire in the harbours?

Undoubtedly the ideal is the complete prohibition of the discharge of oil into the sea. I realize, however, the difficulty of enforcing such a prohibition. Yet one important step could be taken by the provision of facilities at all ports for disposing of oil. Such facilities are already provided by Britain and by Holland, and I am told now that a new process has been developed for absorbing oil on beaches or oil floating on seawater. It depends on the use of a granular mineral material which absorbs the oil and then soon sinks to the bottom of the sea. With men of good will working together, this particular type of water pollution could be overcome.

Of course, there are other problems that may be even more serious. Certainly there is nothing more disturbing than a threat of widespread contamination of ground water. Remember, it is not possible to add insecticides to water anywhere without threatening the purity of water everywhere. Nature does not operate in closed separate compartments and she did not do so in distributing the earth's water supply. Rain falling on the land settles down through pores and cracks in soil and rock, penetrating deeper and deeper until finally it reaches a zone where all the pores of the rock are filled with water —a dark subsurface sea rising under hills and sinking beneath valleys. This ground water is always on the move, sometimes at a pace so slow that I am told it travels only 50 feet a year, sometimes more rapidly, but always moving. It moves by unseen waterways until here and there it comes to the surface as a spring, or perhaps it is tapped to feed a well, but mostly it contributes to streams and so to rivers. Except for what enters streams directly as rain or surface run-off, all the running water of the earth's surface was at one time ground water, and so in a very real and frightening sense pollution of ground water anywhere is pollution of water everywhere.

If I may, I should now like to say a word or two about the problem and the myth of foaming detergents. More people, more factories, more chemicals poured on the land to run off with the water, more ships in our harbours and in our lakes dumping garbage, all this and more adds up to water pollution which has become a serious problem indeed for thinking people. I am told that experts addressing the annual meeting of the water pollution control federation in Toronto indicated that pollution is progressing faster than it is being controlled in many areas. The detergents we use in such quantities are not removed by sewage treatment plants and in some cities even the tap water now foams. The strange and almost unbelievable thing is that the foaming agent in detergents does not add anything to the cleansing powder. It only makes them look like old fashioned soap. The ironic truth is that we are willingly helping to destroy our lakes and our rivers with a completely useless sales gimmick.

Just before coming here I was manager of the St. John's tourist bureau. Next to questions on the historical significance of St. John's I was more often than not asked such questions as, how far is it to good fishing, to good safe bathing, to pleasant boating? How far is it to your best rivers and streams? Luckily my province of Newfoundland-Labrador, poor as indeed she is in material things, is rich in beauty, rich in her salmon and trout streams, her as yet unspoiled beaches and rivers, and rich in the mighty Hamilton falls where one day soon our premier will bring to reality the biggest and most dramatic hydro complex in the world.

Our rivers, Mr. Speaker, are natural resources that are either exhaustible or renewable, whichever our people wish. The cycle of neglect and exploitation that strangles the river starts with a full flowing river, a source of clear water with wholesome fish, a recreation asset of great value, and in some cases a vehicle for moving waste products. Yet how many of us have seen such rivers strangled by silt and pollution, their banks a garbage heap littered with trash dumps, their waters dangerous for swimming, unpleasant for boating, sterile of all save the coarsest life, and their waters drinkable only after expensive filtering and disinfection by chlorine. A full stoppage in our supply of chlorine, a most unlikely happening, would probably put a very considerable portion of the population in hospital in a few days.

So I appeal for a greater awareness of our neglect. Not long ago I had the pleasure of hearing the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) speak on this problem, and I assure you he and his officials are very much aware of it. There are those of us, ordinary people as well as politicians, who should and must keep prying, pushing and pestering the authorities to put teeth into an act which will prevent pollution. This awareness, this effort and a breakthrough in the process of using our vast store of salt water would revolutionize the world's economy. President Kennedy was right. It is a far more exciting prospect and surely a far more practicable one than landing on the moon.

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to give my general support to the bill. My remarks will be brief because I see the time is getting short and I know that other members of the house would like to speak on this subject. The reason I support the bill is that at heart I am a conservationist. I think that any of us who have travelled abroad from this fair Canada, particularly those who have travelled to the Far East and who have seen the situation that exists there today, where conservation has been one of the last things the people have had in mind, have very quickly become conservationists.

I am very pleased to see that the whole matter of conservation and the whole matter of pollution are very much in the minds of other organized bodies throughout the world than the one the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) just mentioned in his speech. I have just returned from the NATO parliamentarians meeting in Paris. Although I was a member of the military committee, I noticed that the scientific committee had this matter under consideration. They were dealing particularly with the pollution of water as a result of nuclear development, but they went very much beyond that in their deliberations.

If we want to bring the matter somewhat closer to home, I would point out that in today's Globe and Mail there is an article describing how a whale was killed off the Oregon coast, off the Pacific coast from which I come, and the whale apparently had become radioactive as a result of the waste products carried down the Columbia river from the Hanford atomic plant. The fault I find with the bill, as the hon. member himself admitted, is that it does not go far enough. I should like to see the problem of pollution dealt with in a more general and broader way than is done in the bill. I think it is one of the basic requirements for the enjoyment of life that we should have clean water and clean air and that we should preserve the beauty of our countryside, including the preservation of wildlife, flora and fauna.

So far in my life I have seen tremendous changes take place in my part of the country. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, a great period of industrial expansion is now under way in the west. I am not going to blame the industrial firms themselves. There is a statement to be found on page 823 of Hansard for February 13, 1962, which I think covers the situation very clearly. If certain things that are going on in my part of the country today are taking place, I believe it is because the companies involved are not being pressured to take action and very naturally they will do nothing until they are. I wish to read an extract from a paper prepared by Mr. J. R. Menzies, chief of the public health engineering division, Department of National Health and Welfare, Ottawa. He states in part:

> Broadly speaking, the effects of pollution become a matter of general interest only when they are notoriously bad.

I am taking part in this debate today because although I do not think things are notoriously bad in British Columbia, yet they could be better and, as the hon. member has suggested, I think we must be vigilant with regard to the industrial development that is going on in my part of the country. In this bill we are dealing with the pollution of clean water. Clean water comes from creeks, rivers and lakes, and it is not only clean drinking water about which I am concerned. In my area we have a large fishing industry. The same clean water for human consumption about which we are speaking also provides the basis for a very profitable commercial fishing industry and also provides a very valuable source of revenue, through moneys expended by tourists interested in sport fishing. If we are going to keep the water clean for human consumption I think that at the same time we must give equal this commercial fishing industry and sports attention to keeping the rivers, streams and lakes clear to provide a base from which fishing industry is derived.

I have noticed that within recent years in my own part of the country, because of the method of logging, the area in which many of the small streams and lakes are located has been laid waste. This has resulted in flash floods which wash down sand and gravel into the streams covering the spawning beds with mud. I have noticed that slash is left to accumulate in the creeks and the salmon cannot get up the rivers to spawn. If they are able to spawn their fry are not able to survive, because of these flash floods tearing down the spawning beds.

When we are looking at the matter of water pollution, upon which I am only touching in view of the time element in this debate, we should look also at the matter of air pollution. I think we have a big problem. The problem is, Mr. Speaker, that no one seems to be taking a stand against the pollution of the atmosphere.

Some 20 or 30 miles north of my riding, we have a very large pulp and paper sulphite mill. When the wind and weather conditions are right there is a most unpleasant smell in the atmosphere which emanates from these plants. It may be that this is the smell of money, Mr. Speaker, but it is also something which I find simply appalling. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) will agree, I am sure, that something could be done if we were to provide a body to look after the interests of the public in connection with this type of thing. In the case of the large smelter at Trail, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company were eventually persuaded to remove from the atmosphere the poisons that were being poured out of their smelter. They only took this action under pressure. I find that no pressure is being brought to bear upon the pulp and paper company. I am sure that if there were, if there were some central organization to apply this pressure, we would long since have had this ghastly smell removed from the atmosphere.

Why is it that nothing is being done? I notice the hon. gentleman has brought forward this bill many times in the past. I have been very interested in reading what has been said, and agree wholeheartedly with it. An almost identical bill was brought before the house, as the hon. member said, by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) in years past. Why has nothing been done about it? I think perhaps it is because this is a matter which obviously has federal and provincial implications. Even in so far as the federal government is concerned, who knows which department of government is responsible for looking into these matters? Is it a matter for the Department of National Health and Welfare? I suppose that it relates to both health and welfare. Is it a matter for Northern Affairs and National Resources? I think it comes under national resources. Is it a matter which should be the responsibility of the minister who has jurisdiction in the field of federal-provincial relations? I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is the responsibility of all three.

Now, in so far as conservation is concerned, since it is related to the question of pollution, I should like to cite a personal experience which I hope will be of interest to hon. members in this house and drive home to them the importance of this problem. I can recall some years ago going up a river in China, the Yangtze, and believe me this is a river that can only be used for irrigation purposes and for travel. It is not a thing of beauty. It is so polluted, Mr. Speaker, that if any westerner happens to fall over the side of the boat into the river he is immediately brought ashore and put into a hospital where he is filled with wonder drugs and kept under surveillance. This is the kind of thing that happens when you are not careful about matters of pollution.

In dealing with the matter of conservation, perhaps hon. members would be interested in knowing that this river is yellow and muddy because there has been no thought given to preserving the contours of the land, to keep the underbrush and trees growing to prevent flash floods, such as those I mentioned in my part of the country, and which there give rise to the spoiling of the salmon fishing beds. In fact, as you go up this mighty Yangtze river, when you get to within 50 or 60 miles of a town, the trees disappear. This results from the people leaving the towns to chop down the trees for firewood. When you get within 30 miles of the town all the shrubs disappear and there is nothing left but grass. This is a further evidence of the despoiling of the country for human needs. Then, the most appalling aspect of it occurs when you get within ten miles of a town and you find there is not a blade of living grass in sight. The needs of the population have required them to take the grass and the roots, dry them out and put them up in bundles for fuel. This is something which has happened in another land and it is the sight of this sort of thing which has made a conservationist out of me. It is the reason for my support of this bill.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I recommend that this subject should be brought up at the next federal-provincial conference so that the federal-provincial representatives can agree on joint responsibility for conservation and pollution. Terms of reference should be laid down for a joint board to handle all these aspects of pollution and conservation to which the hon. member has referred. The only fault I can find with this bill is that it does not go far enough.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my support for the bill which has been presented by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Her-ridge). This bill has been introduced before and has given rise to very interesting discussions on various aspects of the conservation policies of this country. I think the bill itself, by the very limitation of its form and the fact that it only calls for an amendment to the Criminal Code, indicates some of the complexities that arise because of the constitutional situation in this country in connection with the development of adequate conservation policies. However I feel that, since it has been introduced year after year, the hon. member for Kootenay West has been the cause of creating great interest in this subject in Canada. Certainly for this reason, if for no other, the hon. member is to be commended for introducing it.

Perhaps some hon. members are not aware of the genesis of this bill. It used to be introduced prior to 1957 by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). It may be recalled that it was due to a problem of pollution in the North Saskatchewan river, in which my former colleague, the then hon. member for The Battlefords, used to take an active part. Therefore I am a little puzzled not to see the hon. member for Prince Albert or the present hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Horner) in their places to support this bill.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) is to be commended for having taken up a good idea and having pursued it throughout the years, even without much apparent support from the hon. member for Prince Albert in the years since 1957. I hope the time may come again when that hon. member will lend his voice in support of the bill.

Mr. D. G. Hahn (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this bill should pass, for reasons that have previously been indicated. It is a narrow bill and deals only with a portion of the problem. On the other hand I think the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) has done the house a service by raising the problem.

One of the great things I am worried about is that the public generally does not seem to care about the problem of water pollution, and this can be overcome by discussing the matter in the House of Commons. I grew up adjacent to and have lived all my life on the shores of one of the great lakes. I spent my summers there and still do. I have become very concerned about and aware of the pollution that is taking place in the great lakes, and I would like to quote from an article which appeared in the Financial Post on April 18 last, dealing with the extent of pollution in the great lakes area:

> This is what's happening in the biggest expanse of fresh water in the world around which 25 per cent of all Canadians live and work:
> On lake Erie and lake Michigan, studies made by the great lakes institute indicate that, although 60 per cent of the sewage and industrial effluents are treated before being dumped into these lakes, it is essential to treat at least 80 per cent of polluted water to restore the impure-pure balance.
> There is a "dead" area of about 2,000 square miles at the bottom of lake Erie where fish and other organisms cannot live—there is no oxygen. The phenol count—refuse discharged by industries—is higher than the level recommended by the international joint commission, a body set up by Canada and the U.S.
> It is doubtful whether any beach in lake Erie is fit for swimming. The turbidity and amount of dissolved salts has increased during the past few years.

The general tenor of the article is that lake Erie and lake Michigan are already polluted almost beyond repair.

The other great lakes are suffering pollution to a lesser degree, but the pollution is reaching dangerous levels. I know from friends of mine who have summer cottages on the Muskoka lakes, north of Toronto, that those lakes are also becoming polluted and their waters unfit for consumption.

There is no need to spend a great deal of time indicating the problems which arise from this. Everyone is aware of the effect on the health of people. We are all aware of the impact on our recreational facilities. There is no doubt about the impact on our natural resources, the fish in the waters and the birds that nest by those waters. There is also the impact on industry.

In short, it is a situation that cannot be allowed to continue, yet it is one we have allowed to continue. It is a man-made problem and through our lack of care we are in the process of destroying in the great lakes area one of the major natural resources of the country.

Mr. Caouette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

We are now on an amendment moved this afternoon—

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: We are on private members' hour.

Mr. Caouette: You are right. O.K.

Mr. Hahn: At least I am glad I know where I am this afternoon.

All we have to do to cure the problem is stop pumping sewage into the water, stop adding industrial waste to the water, stop ships from dumping their garbage and sewage into the water, and stop pleasure craft from dumping sewage into the water. On the face of it, it seems a simple problem. The mechanical solutions are simple but the ways of achieving them are not. There are many jurisdictions involved. There is much study involved. Many costs are involved.

The cost of treating all sewage dumped by municipalities into the water, and which is not now treated, would be staggering and the municipalities involved probably do not have the ready funds available quickly to undertake this work.

We will arrive at a solution by discussing the matter and being concerned with the problem, and by referring it to the council of resource ministers, something which has already been mentioned. The ten provincial resource ministers and the federal minister are going to look at this problem from the national point of view and as a result of their work I hope we will reach financial solutions involved in the problem.

Further, I hope that when the international joint commission has dealt with the problem of great lakes water levels it will take this matter up. And before my time expires I make one further suggestion. I hope that when the committee of the House of Commons which is currently dealing with the problem of great lakes water levels has finished its study, it will inquire into this equally important problem of the pollution of these great natural resources.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pugh: Before we adjourn could we have an indication what the business of the house will be for Monday?

Mr. Benidickson: I think all hon. members know we will carry on with the business that was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—EDITORIAL IN TORONTO "GLOBE AND MAIL"

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of an editorial which appeared in this morning's Globe and Mail. I could take objection to other parts of this editorial, but I should like to refer to this part which deals with me personally, and which reads as follows:

> It is Canada's misfortune that the new flag was proposed at a time when the Leader of the Opposition was a man who did not scruple to pour derision on the device it was to bear, the maple leaf. The maple leaf has had a place of honour in Canada. It speaks for Canada around the world, and marks the sleeping places of all the dead of all our wars. Yet the Leader of the Opposition and the red ensign diehards of his party have mocked the maple leaf, and now they have forced its introduction by closure.
> This is the flag that is to fly above us, to express our pride of nationhood; and Mr. John G. Diefenbaker has not hesitated to besmirch it with words and now with this action.

Sir, that editorial in so far as it contains those allegations is a gross perversion of the truth. I have not risen on a question of privilege of this kind in all the many years I have been here because, after all, the press always gets the last say. However, that statement cannot remain unchallenged because my last reference to this was made on December 11 as reported in Hansard at page 11045, at which time I was referring to the Prime Minister and I said:

> He manufactured a false claim when he used the expression that we sneered at the maple leaf. There was nothing of that kind. Many of us on this side of the house are proud of the maple leaf, but the maple leaf as an emblem is a long way from the maple leaf as the design for a flag.
> An example occurs to me as I am speaking. What about Ireland? Ireland established itself as an independent country after generations of turmoil and difficulty. It decided on a flag. The emblem of Ireland is the shamrock. Did they place the shamrock on the flag? The shamrock was a symbol, but when they built their flag they made it a flag of two colours representative of the unity of their country, orange and green. Certainly no one casts aspersions on the maple leaf. We are all proud of it as a symbol of the nation. However, there is a great deal of difference between symbolic significance and that which goes to the heart and soul of a nation, the flag that must represent the people as a whole.

I simply say that the suggestion that at any time I cast aspersions on the maple leaf is a falsehood and an attempt apparently to misrepresent my position as being one which I have never held, do not hold now and never will hold.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SIXTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Friday, December 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Batten that the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Thomas.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, at the close of the debate on Friday I had made reference to a quotation from Edmund Burke who said, and I shall read the complete last line of the quotation:

> Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices it for your opinion.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has stated that in his judgment Canada needs a new flag to unite the country. Does the Prime Minister feel that he has achieved that purpose? Does he believe that by force he has given Canada the flag she needed? In my opinion force can never unite any country or any people. I regret that the flag we are going to have to honour in the future will have been imposed upon the people of Canada by force through the use of closure in this house. That is not a proud beginning for a flag which we should look up to with pride.

On Friday the Prime Minister said he had support for this flag from all parties in this house. He neglected to tell the people of Canada that there is opposition to this flag from all parties in this house. I think that fact should also be made known. Opposition has been indicated toward this design by members of every party of this house, so how can the Prime Minister say this flag will unite Canada? I do not think he has proved his point.

The Prime Minister dwelt upon that point at great length, and he seemed to be proud of the fact that he was in a position where he could use force at this time. I am sure the Prime Minister is not blind to the fact that the same disintegration of unity which has taken place in this house in relation to this question has taken place across Canada in each and every province. That same disunity does exist and will continue to exist.

On an earlier occasion I suggested that the flag issue had created more factions than have ever existed before. Before this debate on the flag issue there was not one faction which supported the three maple leaves design, one which supported the single maple leaf design, and another which supported a modified version of the red ensign. I suggest, therefore, that there are three more factions which have been created in this country by the flag question and debate.

How can the Prime Minister take any pleasure from his belief that the flag issue and the adoption of the single maple leaf design will unite Canada? I suggest that the attitudes expressed during the debate on this issue confirm the suggestion that this has created more disunity in Canada than any other piece of legislation placed before parliament in the history of this country. Only after the passage of time will we know the over-all effects of this flag issue. Our constituencies are represented by people of all nationalities, yet there are now more factions supporting various proposals than there have ever been.

I regret that I cannot look upon this flag with pride, even after hearing all the arguments that have been presented to this house by members not only on this side but on the other side of the house. We regret, in fact, that more members on that side of the house have not risen to state the views of their constituents. Surely, Mr. Speaker, all those members on that side who have remained silent during all the days of this debate are not representing the views of all their constituents by so doing. They have not even expressed regret that they cannot support the opinions of certain factions in their constituencies. They have not said one word in favour of the flag that has been flying over this country for a great many years. Many of us on this side of the house would like to hear them express their opinions. We wonder why they have sat silent as they have and not uttered one word.

Actually their attitude does not affect us on this side of the house. They will be responsible to their constituents and will have to answer to them for their silence on this matter. I should like to refer to a couple of newspaper editorials. I will not read all of them, but I think they express much better than I can what I am trying to get across to the house. I quote first from the Winnipeg Tribune of May 19 last:

> It is this newspaper's opinion that the timing of this flag proposal is bad.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Last week the Deputy Speaker decided that editorials from newspapers commenting on the flag debate should not be read at this time. Members are here to express their own opinions and viewpoints and not to give the viewpoints of editors of newspapers.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I am reading what I believe to be a true statement about this flag debate.

If the main purpose is to consolidate unity it is a peculiar approach for, as witnessed at the Legion meeting—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not wish to be ungracious to the hon. member, but if he is reading the editorial claiming that the words of the editorial are his he is doing something indirectly which he is not allowed to do directly. Perhaps he could express the same viewpoint if he wants to do so, but certainly he should not quote the words.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I am adopting these words as my own and I think I am entitled to read them. Other members of the house have read such articles into the record.

If the main purpose is to consolidate unity it is a peculiar approach for, as witnessed at the Legion meeting, the dominant reaction is disunity.

That I believe.

Unfortunately, too, the Prime Minister's approach leaves little ground for thoughtful consideration. He asks, in effect, for a surrender of what is known for something unknown. He entertains a mystique about the price of unity which he is unable to articulate. In addition to poor timing, the method of introducing the design was odd ...

He has placed himself and his government on the record to introduce a new flag. He has rejected the proposal for a national plebiscite and insists that the issue must be decided on a free vote in the Commons.

I should like to say something more about that free vote but I do not have the time.

But then he has also added that the result would be interpreted by his government as a vote of confidence. In other words, he is prepared to fight an election on the issue. He is willing to jeopardize national unity in the hope of political advantage but he is unwilling to seek an expression of opinion in a plebiscite in which the issue would be the flag, not seats in parliament.

Mr. Grafftey: Unity by closure.

Mr. McIntosh: The Prime Minister claims he has pressed the issue of a national flag—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have found the citation in Beauchesne, fourth edition. It is citation 157, paragraphs 5 and 6.

5. It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

[Mr. Speaker.]

6. On the 17th March, 1933, a member quoting a newspaper in debate was ruled out of order by the Deputy Speaker who said: "The rule is quite clear, that the quoting of a newspaper, an author or a book which reflects upon debate before the house, either directly or indirectly, is entirely out of order, because members are here to give their own opinion and not to quote the opinion of others. ...Members may quote an article or a book stating facts, but a commentary on any proceeding or any discussion in the house, with the object of swinging an opinion to one side or the other, is out of order." Can. Deb. 1932-33, vol. 3, pp. 3103-4.

In view of the authority cited I am sure the hon. member will do his best to give his own personal opinion.

Mr. Lambert: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think Your Honour will agree that it is common practice in the house to refer to newspaper editorials. This is one of the most difficult areas for the Chair to rule upon. I would say that the limitation is very narrow, in that reference cannot be made to editorials which comment on proceedings in the house, and that the citation is not so wide that reference to editorials or books or articles is precluded. They are commonly cited and have been for years by members both on the government side and on the opposition side. I would say that an editorial or article which commented upon the motivation of voting or on the procedure would infringe upon the rule, but certainly there is not and never has been a rule in the house which prevents an hon. member from citing an editorial in support of his argument. This is done regularly, and I think Your Honour has ample knowledge of that.

I submit that the limitation has to do with commenting on proceedings of the house. I suggest it would be improper for an hon. member to read an editorial stating that another hon. member was wrong in his presentation of the facts. I suggest to Your Honour that the restriction on reading editorials from newspapers is a limited and not a wide restriction. Therefore I think that, with appropriate care, the hon. member should be able to proceed under these circumstances just as all hon. members have been able to do in the past.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcoux: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order just raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), following your ruling, I should like to say that, in my opinion, the hon. member who was himself, at one time, Speaker of the House of Commons should not forget that members have always been given a great deal of latitude, even lengthy excerpts from editorials being allowed. However, the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) said he was going to read a whole editorial. That is where I feel he is out of order.

If we want to read an editorial, all we have to do is to get the newspaper, but if the hon. member merely wishes to quote from it, then I think you should accept this as you have always done. But I am under the impression that this hon. member, not satisfied with having succeeded in bringing down closure, would very much like to be named, so that he could say, in his riding, that he was obliged to leave the house—

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency cannot prejudge anyone's motives in this house.

Yet he is figuring that the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek is trying to get himself named. In that case, he is prejudging the hon. member's motives, and this is not allowed in the House of Commons.

[Text]

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Monteith: Oh, here's the authority.

Mr. Byrne: —I thought perhaps it would be wise to let hon. members opposite know there was not some glue on my seat. I recall that when the hon. member for Edmonton West occupied the Speaker's chair he did insist that articles from newspapers or letters read at length were not in order. Today the hon. member is contending that while newspaper articles reflecting on our proceedings would be inappropriate, articles reflecting on debates are acceptable. Now, proceedings are not debates; proceedings are the actual procedures that the house follows.

The hon. member is overlooking the very fact you observed, Mr. Speaker, that the ruling is quite clear in that it says newspaper articles or books which reflect upon a debate before the house, either directly or indirectly, are entirely out of order. When I drew this to your attention, sir, earlier in the debate you did allow a considerable latitude. If members are to be allowed to read newspaper articles when it is inappropriate to read speeches, they would simply substitute newspapers and editorials for their speeches. This seems to have been a preoccupation of most members opposite during this debate.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure after all this intelligent discussion the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek sees the point and will conform to the custom and practice we usually follow in this house by giving his own opinion, which I am sure is quite good.

Mr. McIntosh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Before I resume what I was saying I should like to say that if I had wanted to get myself named I would not have taken this long to do so. I want to say also to the hon. member of that party in the corner that at the outset of my observations on the editorial I said I was not going to read it all.

Mr. Woolliams: You mean that member of the fifth Social Credit party?

Mr. McIntosh: I do not know which one. However, I will dispense with that. I will say that in my opinion this issue is now creating disunity throughout the country, and there is more confusion about this issue than ever before.

The country has been told by the Prime Minister and the members of his party that if an election were held on this issue it would split the country and create disunity, and this was one of the reasons he adopted this method of implementing his desire. I say, too, that stubbornness is no substitute for statesmanship.

One writer has expressed the view that in the selection of a flag we should strive for some common understanding of what a flag is. We should understand what it means. One common understanding that has been evident from the speeches that have been made from both sides of the house is that we want to be Canadians. I believe the other day I made reference to a number of speeches from the various parties in this house who have said that we all want to be Canadians, whether we are designated now as French Canadians, English Canadians, Irish Canadians, Scotch Canadians or whatever. In fact this has been the common denominator throughout all these speeches. Can we not start from that point?

I should like at this time to ask the Prime Minister and the members of his party just what flag would be flying over Canada today, what conditions we would be living under today, if it had not been for Britain during the last two wars. This is something that I think a lot of us have forgotten. It is said that we who have supported the inclusion of the union jack as some part of our new Canadian flag should not refer to tradition. I cannot help but refer to tradition when I think of those things. If I came from French Canada or if I came from the province of Quebec I would say that those early explorers, those great pioneers who came from France and settled in Quebec, should in some way be remembered by the people of Canada today for what they have done in creating this country of which we are so proud. Would we have a country like we have today if it were not for those people?

During this debate, Mr. Speaker, we have expressed our views as individuals. We have expressed our views as members of this party. We think we have expressed the views of our constituents. In fact some of us go so far as to say that we feel we have expressed the views of the majority of the people of Canada. We have been criticized in the press. We have been accused of obstruction, and apparently some members opposite think that is what we have been doing. I can say that I believe every one of us has spoken with conviction. We believe that as members of parliament we are using our judgment when we debate this very important issue, and the Prime Minister has said it is a very important issue. We have been debating this issue sincerely. I hope I will not again hear the suggestion that we have been obstructing on this issue.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak for the time allotted in favour of the committee's report suggesting the maple leaf design as Canada's flag. I do this first of all because the flag that is being proposed is one which has been selected by a committee which represented all the parties in this house. This committee sat continuously for two months and made this recommendation under the able chairmanship of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten).

If we are dedicated to democratic principles, and I believe everyone in this house is so dedicated, then I believe it behooves us, after having expressed every shade of opinion that can be expressed on this subject, to let the democratic process take its course by bringing the matter to a vote and accepting the vote of this house. The maple leaf design that is being proposed is not a renunciation or a betrayal on our part of our Christian principles. Indeed, were we by a mere change of exterior symbols to cast off our traditions, our past, our Christian beliefs and everything that we hold near and dear, then certainly all those things would be very shallow indeed.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that after this debate has ended and this flag has been adopted we, as a Canadian and Christian nation, will continue to adhere to all those things that make our country great, that make the British heritage great, that make the French heritage great, and which indeed make our civilization worth living and fighting for. Whether we fly the union jack, the red ensign, the maple leaf flag or any other symbol we shall certainly continue to practise those liberties and respect those institutions which go far deeper than mere exterior symbols. Speaking as a Quebecker I think I should be the last person in the world to want to cast off the past and not honour it, nor to honour the British institutions that have given us our freedom, especially when the motto of my province is "Je me souviens" —I remember.

The maple leaf is a true Canadian symbol. Canadians recognize it as such everywhere, and others recognize us as Canadians by the maple leaf symbol. It is instantly recognizable and identifiable as a Canadian symbol no matter where a Canadian may go throughout the world. It is a symbol which was very much alive among servicemen during the second world war. Is it not a fact that the burial places of all those brave and true Canadians who gave up their lives are marked by a maple leaf? I recall travelling throughout western Europe at the end of the second world war and seeing that the routes which were travelled by Canadian forces all over Europe were studded with and indicated by the maple leaf, the symbol that led our forces to victory and which is also the symbol of the future.

I refuse to accept that the maple leaf can, in any sense of the word, be recognized as an exclusive or narrow Quebec symbol. It has never been accepted as such. It is an all Canadian symbol. Some have said that the maple leaf flag is a concession to Quebec. If by that is meant that it is a symbol which is acceptable to Quebec then I am entirely in agreement, because it is also a symbol acceptable to all Canadians no matter what their origins may be. But, Mr. Speaker, if by stating that the maple leaf is a concession to or an appeasement of Quebec one wants to stir up differences between the racial groups in this country, then I say that attempt is most damnable and contemptible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martineau: The new flag is the symbol of the future because it expresses unity, that unity to which so many of us have paid lip service during the course of this debate. I believe that in the maple leaf Canadians of whatever origin or background may find something in common. I believe this maple leaf flag will express for Canadians, in their own undemonstrative and taciturn way, the firm conviction that Canadians want to live together, work together and build a worthwhile nation.

If this distinctive flag can be accepted by the country without lasting bitterness and acrimony, then Canadians will have gone a long way to prove to the world that a nation such as ours, born in strife, diverse in its origins, speaking two languages and being the embodiment of two great cultures, can survive and prosper.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martineau: During the course of this debate many hard and bitter words have been spoken that it would have been better to have left unsaid. It is useless, futile and, I feel, mischievous to try at this stage to assess blame in this chamber or elsewhere. But the truth remains—and it is a bitter truth—that the embers of hatred and prejudice have been fanned, and if they should continue uncontrolled they could very well lead to disaster and the end of our nation. That is why this afternoon I approved and voted for the extreme measure that is closure; because I am firmly convinced that the continuance of this debate at this stage, after it has given rise throughout the land to so many utterances born of prejudice and hatred, could only achieve its normal course, the very destruction of this country.

It may be well to look at others and learn a lesson from history. Almost 100 years ago the United States of America, our great neighbours, today's leaders of freedom, were engaged in a murderous civil war. Fortunately, and I thank God, this has not happened in our country, and I trust and believe it will never happen. When President Lincoln, in his second inaugural address, spoke to congress in Washington, his country's murderous and bloody civil war had been raging for many years. As he addressed congress his mind must have lingered on the terrible price of that useless war that had pitted countryman against countryman, brother against brother, and which had already cost more lives than any war in modern history to that date and which, in his own words, would go on to the bitter end, even if necessary until—> —all the wealth piled by the bondsman's 250 years of unrequited toil shall be sunk and until every drop of blood drawn with the lash shall be paid by another drawn by the sword.

Lincoln urged his countrymen to strive on, to finish the work that they were engaged in, with malice toward none and charity to all, and to bind up the nation's wounds. Yes, Mr. Speaker, to bind up the nation's wounds; that is the task to which we should now be dedicated.

We have had our debate, and I believe that in order to bind up the nation's wounds—and they are deep and grievous—we must without recrimination, if defeated in our point of view in this debate, and without undue bombasity if our point of view prevails, accept the new flag when it is unfurled; because that flag will be the symbol of our country, and our country will be as great as the respect we show to the symbol that will be ours and ours alone.

If we are not mature enough to do that, if we are not big enough to forget the division that has torn us apart, then we are not even worthy to survive; but I think the immense majority of Canadians from coast to coast will accept the flag that is truly our own, and under that flag Canada will know better and greater days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): I am sure the English speaking people in this assembly, and those of English descent, are fully cognizant of the feelings expressed by the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau). Thank God I belong to a party in which there can be differences of opinion. Thank God we have a liberal-minded party where those who have a different view can express that view.

Today, in the few minutes at my disposal, I want to put on record what other people throughout this dominion are thinking. I have in my hand a letter I received this morning from a mother who lost her son in the last war. Her son was named Cecil. I want the house to know what she has to say about the red ensign which is being debated here today as it has been for the past few weeks. She writes:

> I feel Cecil fought for the protection of this flag and gave his young life for it.

I want to make this the theme of what I have to say here today. Young Cecil was about 22. He was the pilot of a Lancaster bomber and was shot down north of Berlin during the raids which were made on that city from bases in the British isles. His gunner was the son of a former member of this assembly. The entire crew lost their lives.

As it happens, this strikes home closely to me because Cecil Kindt, the pilot of that plane, was my nephew, and the person who wrote to me is my brother's wife, or widow; my brother is dead. So it was this boy, in the flower of his youth, who lost his life flying a Lancaster bomber during those days when we did not know whether Britain would survive and when, as Churchill said, we never owed so much to so few. Have we forgotten those days? I hope not. But here is a mother who says in her letter to me:

I agree with your opinion on the flag situation. I feel Cecil fought for the protection of this flag and gave his young life for it.

Those among us who talk lightly about a flag and about choosing a flag or destroying a flag have never felt the emotion which those of us who have been through it feel. So I say to all those who would lightly throw the red ensign away, you are spreading disunity among the people of this nation. There is no doubt about that in my mind. Do those who talk so loudly now remember the days of conscription when recruits were needed, and when we constructed air bases in western Canada to provide the armed forces with the men who were required? We built airfields and trained people to man the bombers. Those airfields were used to train people who came from all parts of the world. We put our best efforts into this work. What was the flag which flew over those airfields? It was the red ensign. These are the circumstances which are deeply ingrained in those of us who oppose this change in our national flag.

To get the right flag, the flag which Canada needs, and make it an acceptable substitute for everything else is not an easy task. It has to be a discovery, and such a discovery has not yet been made. What happened was this. A pistol was held by the government at the head of the flag committee. The committee was told to bring in a report by a certain date. Well, they threw out the flag with three leaves, which made it necessary for them to come up with something else, and this was the flag with one leaf.

That is how we got the flag which is now presented to us. It is a political flag. It is not a flag which will unify the people of Canada. If members opposite and those who think like them cannot see the possible evil effects of their action, and follow through with the result that disunity is created in this country, the blame will rest on their shoulders.

Let me say to those who write editorials condemning the Conservative party, and those in other parties who support the red ensign, that we are expressing a point of view which is held by a large section of the people of this nation, possibly 60 per cent or more. They have never been given an opportunity to express their views on this issue by way of a plebiscite. They never knew there would be a flag put forward consisting of one maple leaf on a white background until just a month ago.

[Mr. Kindt.]

I do not believe this is the way to choose a flag. We all know this design has come about because the committee was working under orders to produce. You cannot produce a flag which will be ingrained in the hearts of the people by following this approach. The government and its supporters are relying on having this flag approved so they can go out and sell it to the people. They will go out and support it—we will all support it, because it will be the Canadian flag. In other words it is a selling job they will be doing from now on, trusting that in a generation or two it will be as acceptable as the red ensign.

Well, I do not think this will happen. I think the disunity which will be created in this country as a result of the introduction of this particular flag will continue for years to come.

I do not believe closure should be used in order to obtain a flag. Nor do I believe that an emblem should be selected as the flag of this nation. Show me how many countries in the world, having distinctive emblems such as the shamrock, the rose, the thistle and so on, to name only a few emblems of the British isles, have chosen to place these emblems on their national flags. The people are proud of those emblems. They serve in just the same way as the maple leaf serves us. We are proud of our maple leaf. None of us has talked against it, but after all it is only an emblem. None of the countries in the British isles has its emblem on its flag. The Irish flag does not carry the shamrock, nor does the Scottish flag carry the thistle.

Therefore it is not necessary, neither is it desirable, to have a flag bearing an emblem. But when you are up against the gun and the head of a party tells a committee to bring in a report on the kind of flag we should have, it is simply imposing an impossible task upon that committee. Therefore, since the mistake in handling the matter in this way was made, the blame for the adoption of this flag and the mistake in connection with it lies squarely at the feet of this government.

Mrs. Margaret Konantz (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the flag committee I have felt it my duty to faithfully sit in this house during the last two weeks and listen to all the remarks which have been made by different members. However, the one thing which has upset me more than anything else has been the insinuations which have been made regarding the intelligence of the members of that committee. I have found no one has given us any credit for being bright enough, after being together for six weeks studying the flag issue, to emerge from the committee wiser than when we went in. Quite frankly, I think I can say for every other member as well as myself that we were keenly aware of our responsibilities. We were determined to be open minded. We were willing to listen to other people's opinions and to permit full participation in all our discussions. I think each one of us was ready to study the whole issue and certainly to be non-partisan.

As a westerner I think I was probably a little more conscious than were some other hon. members of the people who come from many lands to make up our country, besides those who are the descendants of our founding races. I have to admit that as a westerner I am fiercely proud of Canada. I have had the most marvellous opportunities for travel on behalf of the United Nations association through UNICEF, which travels have taken me through nine countries of Africa and South America; and every time I come home knowing that Canada is the finest land in this whole wide world.

I believe there has been in our past too little, not too much, national pride in our country. During the six weeks that I sat on that committee I was made very conscious of how little I knew of our early Canadian history, and I gleaned much in the way of knowledge from the different witnesses we heard. I wondered why this was, and one day I asked a witness when it was that we really began to teach Canadian history in our schools. To my amazement I found that this was only in approximately 1920.

It seems to me that we have all acquired an appreciation of the accomplishments of our nation's builders. I think of the missionary martyrs, I think of the voyageurs, and I think of the explorers and their extraordinary accomplishments. As I look at this whole issue now I really feel that our lack of knowledge of Canadian history, particularly our early Canadian history, is one of the causes of our growing pains today.

Now about the people who make up this country, this mosaic of Canada; I found this summer that I was really very vague about the early settlers of Newfoundland. I had the privilege of going down there and spending a day with one hon. member going through his constituency, and it suddenly dawned on me as I read the different names of the little fishing towns built by the early settlers in Newfoundland—and I think of Portugal Cove, Bonavista, Port au Port, Ireland's Eye—and as I stopped and talked to the people in the different villages, that although confederation meant so much to them they were still very proud of their heritage.

Then, of course, we all know that the French, the English, the Irish and the Scottish are the descendants of the early settlers of what was Upper and Lower Canada and the maritimes. But at the time of confederation easterners thought western Canada was suitable only for the Indians. I believe some people still feel that way, but as a westerner I can assure them that they have a lot to learn. The fur traders were very jealous of their rights, and I think they did their best for a while to keep people out of this area of Canada; because with the farmers moving in it meant that the fur traders would have to move out. But very soon the early travellers came back to eastern Canada with stories about the rich soil of western Canada, and pioneers, intrigued by these stories, soon flooded into this part of the country and we had a new province in 1870, Manitoba.

However, the vision of a dominion from sea to sea was really only sparked at the time two British colonies, Vancouver island and British Columbia, joined together. Some people thought it was foolish to talk of a territory so far away, but with the promise of a railroad to be built within ten years a new province was added in 1871, British Columbia. This railroad was built through wild, barren land, almost bottomless swamps, muskeg, and was blasted through great mountains. This was all made possible by the Irish, the Swedish, the Italian and the Chinese individuals who had strong backs and were willing to work. It was then that the settlers poured into this vast area, coming from eastern Canada, Great Britain, the United States, Russia, Poland, the Ukraine, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Holland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Iceland, China and Japan. And there was land for all of them. Six thousand Mennonites settled on the banks of the Red river, and we will always know that this is their community when we see names like Steinbach, Stoney Brook, Rosenfeld and Field of Roses.

Then the farming Icelanders built new homes around lake Gimli, which is a beautiful place. They proved that people knowing no English and unacquainted with Canadian laws and customs could prosper in a new land if they were willing to work. With their spirit of adventure and their strong sense of freedom and attachment to their cultural heritage, the Ukrainians too have added much to our national way of life, and their contributions to community affairs have placed us all in their debt.

Let us be honest with ourselves at this time, sir. Surely today we are trying to preserve a nation in which people of many diverse backgrounds may feel at home. Let us be united by a common pride and a common dedication to the progress of Canada.

When thinking of all these other groups we must not fail to remember the first settlers of our country. As one travels west through places such as Medicine Hat, Sturgeon Creek and Yellowknife he is always reminded of those settlers. I came across a beautiful little verse the other day by Richard Huntington, as follows:

> The memory of the red man,
> How can it pass away?
> While his names of music linger
> On each mount and stream and bay?

Let us not forget our Eskimos and the name that was given to them by the Indians. About a month ago there was an art exhibit in the air terminal at Winnipeg which gave everyone the opportunity of observing the skills of these people and the articles which they offer to us who live below the Arctic circle. While I was a member of the flag committee I thought of those people, and I remembered how last fall I had read of a resolution passed at the annual meeting of the chamber of commerce; and let me remind hon. members that the chamber of commerce has approximately 900 affiliates in this country. That resolution read in part as follows:

> Parliament has not formerly adopted a distinctive national flag and Canadian public opinion polls continually record significant majorities favouring a distinctive national flag with the nation's youth expressing an overwhelming preference for such a flag. A distinctive national flag would be a strong unifying influence consistent with the status of whole nationhood.

For emphasis I should like to bring attention to the word "unifying" in that resolution.

During our flag committee meetings, as you have all heard so often before, we learned about flags; and when I went home to my constituency about two weeks ago someone suggested that I should wear a steel helmet. I must now state that I had no difficulty in explaining what the new distinctive flag was all about. It really boiled down to the fact that I only had to use two sentences to tell them that it was something to which we could give a place of honour; that the upper staff quarter of any flag is the place of honour, and that by placing the union jack in that position, which it occupies on the red ensign, we would be putting it in the place of honour. I believe the argument against the use of the union jack does not suggest any disrespect for that flag, but is made because the union jack does not represent Canada but is the official flag of the United Kingdom. It has been said over and over again that by flying the red ensign the interpretation might be made that Canada is still subject to the United Kingdom, which is denied by Canadians. So I say simply that—

Mr. Pugh: May I ask the hon. member a question? I take it that when you are talking about the red ensign you are referring to the Canadian red ensign?

Mrs. Konantz: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am speaking of the Canadian red ensign. It is simply a matter of self respect on our part to adopt a flag which will proclaim to the world that Canada is Canada and is not subject to any other country.

When it came time for the members of the flag committee to declare themselves and vote, I voted against the plebiscite for the simple reason that I felt it would add more confusion to this whole question and would not prove to be of any use in this country. If I had more time I could give a perfect example of just how confused a group can become about what is our official Canadian flag. However, as my time is running out I am afraid I cannot go into that dissertation. I voted against the Canadian red ensign as a national flag because Canada is an independent state.

I learned from the experts who appeared before the committee that our national colours were red on white. At the time we voted for or against adoption of the three maple leaves design versus the one maple leaf design I was reminded of the Christmas day I spent in Hong Kong in 1958. We all know that Christmas is a sad day in Hong Kong because on that day in 1941 it surrendered to the Japanese. I decided on Christmas morning to visit the Sai Wang cemetery and place a wreath on our memorial. I arranged to get the wreath through our Canadian trade commissioner, and it really was a most effective one. It stood about four feet high, was circular of solid white chrysanthemums with a single red maple leaf made of carnations in the centre.

I went to the cemetery, which is on a beautiful hillside overlooking a magnificent bay, and on my arrival there I found a little Chinese gardener in his bare feet clipping the rose bushes and cleaning up the leaves which had fallen during the night. I walked down the great stairs and placed the wreath on the cenotaph, and then wandered among the headstones on the graves of our Winnipeg Grenadiers. I had not known very many mothers who had lost loved ones who are buried there, but one thing I will always remember is that on each headstone there was a single maple leaf, and I knew that when the time came for me to vote for the one leaf design versus the three leaves design I would vote for the single maple leaf.

Surely this flag, which the committee has recommended to this house, will send out the message we all want to give to the world; that this is Canada, this is a flag which symbolizes our freedom and unity, and a flag which we will fly proudly among the flags of the 114 members of the United Nations.

Mr. Speaker, I plead with all the members of this house to put an end to this debate. Let us behave like reasonable and mature adults and bring this question once and for all to a decision. I am sure that is what our constituents expect of us.

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. lady who represents Winnipeg South for entering this debate even at this late hour. I was pleased to hear her say that as a member of the flag committee her heart went out to the Canadian Eskimo people, and that for that reason she was able to make a choice as to a flag design. At this time I should like to invite that hon. lady, as I have done previously, to come with me to the great treeless plains of the Canadian Northwest Territories and explain to the Eskimo people what the maple leaf symbol is all about.

Because she is a convincing speaker I was also interested that she should make a plea to us to end the debate at this particular juncture, this after her own Prime Minister and his cohorts in the cabinet had decided to invoke closure to get a new flag by Christmas if they could not do so otherwise.

I had not intended to make any more comments on this matter, but the speech of the Prime Minister and more particularly of the government house leader on Friday prompted me to put a few more remarks on the record. I was particularly interested in the frequent references the Prime Minister made to the free and full debate that had gone on, and I want to put on record what he said. As found on page 11036 of Hansard he said:

> Of course free and full discussion is absolutely essential to the parliamentary process—

Again, as found on page 11037 he said:

> —so I hope this parliament will be given the right to exercise its fundamental duty; that is, to decide after a full and free debate.

Then that other expert on procedure, the government house leader, had this to say as found on page 11053, when he was giving notice of the closure motion with such obvious glee:

> In the circumstances, and to prevent a mockery being made of parliament, I have no alternative but to take the action I now propose to take.

Let us take a look at what the Liberals mean when they say "free and full debate". I took a cue from that little Ralliement Créditistes member, the hon. member for Lapointe, and I made an investigation of Hansard to see how the debate had been going. Let us find out what the Prime Minister means when he says "full and free debate". If you will look at the speeches made by members of the official opposition in the 10 days the committee report has been under discussion you will find that on a total of 661 occasions members opposite and their allies in the Ralliement Créditistes interrupted those of us who were trying to make sincere speeches in the house. These are 661 interruptions where the member doing the interrupting is identified by name. If one were to include all the interjections and smart remarks by way of harassment of speakers from this party by those members who are impatient with the democratic process, the closure kids, the number of such interruptions would be well over 1,000.

I am glad the government house leader is here, because his hands are not completely clean in this regard. The shameful thing is that 98 of these specious questions of order and privilege can be attributed to the Prime Minister and other ministers of the crown. I should like to put that on the record. The government house leader interrupted the debate 18 times in 10 days with specious points of order and questions of privilege or other questions. I can see why he might have done so with the Prime Minister sitting to his right. However, the Prime Minister was only in the house to hear three speeches. But his record is not so hot, either.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should like to take the opportunity at this moment to interrupt the hon. member to make a slight point of order. I direct his attention to the fact that his speech should be limited to the amendment before us at the present time. It seems to me that some of his remarks relate more particularly to the question of procedure in the house, which is really not germane to the subject we are considering now.

Mr. Churchill: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask you, quite respectfully, to see that the rules are applied on both sides of the house. We listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg South give us a story of Canadian history and a visit to Hong Kong without anyone interrupting or raising any point of order. I think there should be complete freedom of speech in the house today, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Certainly the Chair is prepared to recognize the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, but even though this is perhaps a special day and a special debate I do not feel that the rules of relevancy can be just thrown overboard. There is a specific matter before the house now for its consideration, the amendment to the motion moved by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's for the adoption of the committee report, and I would urge the hon. member to give that his primary consideration.

Mr. Rhéaume: Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling. Let us not forget that on Friday the Prime Minister was speaking to the amendment, and I am now discussing what the Prime Minister apparently means by full and free debate. I am trying to summarize the debate to date to see if it measures up to his standard. The closest the hon. lady got to the red ensign was a discussion of the Red river settlers, but none of us on this side objected to that. The government house leader interrupted 18 times and the Prime Minister interrupted nine times even though he was only in the house for three speeches. That professional interrupter, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis), interrupted 35 times on points of order and questions of privilege, and he only returned to the house from his world wide tour on December 3. Members can see the kind of record he has in this regard.

I will conclude my remarks along this line, Mr. Speaker, by stating that the ministers of the crown, those great advocates of full and free debate, interrupted speakers on this side of the house 98 times in the course of 10 days, and together with their allies interrupted a total of 661 times. Is this some sort of Grit definition of full and free debate?

The newspapermen of the country have a responsibility in terms of reporting this debate, but press reports have not indicated that speakers from the official opposition attempting to make their cases have been harassed and heckled. How many of these press reporters—they can live with this responsibility when the red ensign comes down—reported that 661 points of order, specious questions of privilege and other interruptions were made? The hon. member for Lapointe got up and talked about the number of speeches that had been made, and the members of the press gallery were very good about giving us the running score in that regard. We had a right to expect impartial coverage of the flag debate by the press.

Let us take a look at what a free vote means. Every member in this chamber from the province of Quebec, regardless of where he sits in the house, supports the new maple leaf flag in no uncertain terms. We know this is so. I admire and respect them for doing so, and I support their right to do so. I believe these members from Quebec have set an example that will shine forth whenever parliamentary freedom of speech is in question.

On the other hand, I have nothing but scorn and sympathy for those members who have sold out and who have refused to be as honest so far as the other side of the issue is concerned. If anyone is in doubt about how they have sold out I invite them to read the speech of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) who described precisely how it was being done among the Liberal party members. I have talked to Liberal backbenchers myself and I know the threats that were made against them. Let it be said about them in the years to come that when the moment came to stand up and be counted according to their consciences, they chose instead to swim downstream.

In his speech on Friday the Prime Minister said to members of the opposition "Come on, let us all rally around the flag once it is adopted and help me to hoist the new flag on the flagstaffs of this country". What he was really saying was "Come on, boys, help me tear down the one we have".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: That is right.

Mr. Rhéaume: I can guarantee he will get no help from me or from anyone who thinks as I do in the process of destroying what we have had when he has not made a case for the necessity of doing so. In terms of the new one, let this be on the record and let it be clear; should a new flag be adopted for this country I will do my best to promote it throughout the far northern reaches of our country.

The northerly part of this country has known no other flag but the red ensign, because it has been only during the last few years that we have ventured that far. This will not be an easy task for me. It will be made much more difficult because my heart will not be in it. The Indian and Eskimo people in the far reaches of this country have a way of spotting insincerity. They were happy with the flag they had. For generations they have received their treaty payments, have gone to school and received their help from the mother country under this emblem.

One thing about the Indian and Eskimo people is this, Mr. Speaker. Before they change something they have to have a good reason for it. They do not discard the old ways lightly because someone has a whim or is capricious and says it would be a good thing to do. They know intuitively that the pursuit of novelty, the pursuit of change for its own sake, can lead only to social anarchy.

No one in this chamber will work harder or longer to promote loyalty, duty and devotion to whatever flag is chosen by this chamber. Nor will I, in the meantime, do anything to discredit the symbol that may be on that flag that is chosen. However, do not expect me for one second to assist in the destruction of what we have. I want to state and to emphasize, with all the eloquence I can muster, that the Prime Minister of this country can never again in my eyes and in my opinion pass himself off as a person who is willing to subordinate his personal whim to the greater and more enduring needs of this country.

The Prime Minister and his house have said "We will use closure to get a flag". They say, as they have said before, "Who shall stop us if we want to do something?" Well, I say to the Prime Minister and to his friends on the front benches, there are quite a few other things I should like to see stopped in this country before debate in this House of Commons. I would, first and foremost, like to see a stop to the highly questionable conduct of his own ministers. I have read the code of ethics that was written for him—

Mr. Sharp: Order.

Mr. Rhéaume: I can understand why the Minister of Trade and Commerce is a little nervous, but he has not been named yet. I can say this to him and to the house: any minister with any self respect would have resigned when he got a letter saying in future honesty would be the best policy. What I want to see stopped and what Canadians want to see stopped is the feeling that if you are—

Mr. Sharp: Order.

Mr. Rhéaume: —a Liberal cabinet minister you can do anything you want in this country; no one shall stop you.

Mr. Moreau: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Rhéaume: I have not the time to permit questions. I have read the code of ethics that was issued in order to help ministers understand what is expected of them. This is something I had thought everyone knew well before he was ever elected as a member of parliament, but apparently this is not the case. It says that in order that honesty and impartiality may be beyond doubt, the members of ministers' staffs, equally with ministers, must not place themselves in a position where they are under obligation—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member will realize that the Chair has some difficulty in relating the subject matter under discussion to his remarks. There may be a relationship between the two matters but it is certainly not apparent to the Chair. Perhaps the hon. member would want to bring his remarks within the ambit of the matter we are supposed to be considering now.

Mr. Rhéaume: I certainly will. What I was attempting to do was to indicate that many of us, including the Prime Minister, want to see closure put on the kind of conduct that has evidently been occurring, not on debate in this house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. With respect may I suggest that this argument may be very valuable in another debate, but it seems to the Chair that the question before the house is not the subject matter of rule 33 of the standing orders on which there was a vote in this house this afternoon. Since that matter was disposed of, it cannot be raised in debate at this time. To that extent, therefore, the hon. member's remarks would not appear to be related to the subject matter before the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a point of order. Surely Your Honour is not ruling that after the, I was going to say, outrageous course followed by the government in introducing closure in order to bring in a flag, you are going to deny us the right to say anything in criticism of this government on the subject of bringing in closure. Surely you do not say that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The only thing the Chair is doing is referring to the rules that require hon. members on both sides of the house to be relevant in their remarks, and which indicate that once a matter has been disposed of by a vote there can be no reflection on that vote.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I must say I am usually very co-operative in this connection, and I intend to be in my position as an officer of this house, but if Your Honour is endeavouring to rule that our mouths are to be shut in criticism of this government for what it did to parliament and its institutions this afternoon, you are going to have quite a lot of difficulty.

Mr. Moreau: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I should like to bring to the attention of the right hon. gentleman opposite, and the hon. member for Yukon, that the motion for closure brought in by the government was voted upon by the house and sustained.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please; may I suggest to hon. members that the point is not before the house. The suggestion made by the Chair was that the remarks made by the hon. member for Northwest Territories did not appear to be relevant to the amendment. The hon. member appeared, I believe, to want to follow this suggestion made by the Chair.

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to speak to the point of order. The hon. member for York-Scarborough has referred to the hon. member for Yukon. I should like to call his attention to the fact that if he would spend more time on this side of the river rather than over in Hull, he would know that the hon. member for Yukon is not speaking.

Mr. Moreau: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I suggest to all hon. members—would the hon. member kindly resume his seat?

Mr. Moreau: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for York-Scarborough on a question of privilege.

Mr. Moreau: I should like first of all to apologize to the hon. member for Northwest Territories for referring to him as the hon. member for Yukon. I should like to point out that my conduct in going over the river to Hull, as the hon. member has just stated, requires no defence. My attendance in this house is as good as his.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps both the point of order and the question of privilege are not relevant to the matter under debate. I suggest we give the hon. member for Northwest Territories an opportunity to pursue his remarks.

Mr. Rhéaume: I accept the apology of the hon. member for York-Scarborough. However, there is no insult in being identified in this chamber, either purposely or mistakenly, with the hon. member for Yukon.

What I was attempting to say, Mr. Speaker, and apparently it was not obvious to the Chair, was not whether or not closure should have been invoked, because the house has already decided on that, but to ask why this government would be so anxious to institute closure. What is it with which they want to distract the attention of Canadians? I suggest that the new flag, the single maple leaf with which the ministry will hide its nakedness, is the reason for closure being introduced at this point.

In the short time left to me—and I do not know how much that is as there have been so many interruptions and points of order—I wish to put on the record a letter which I received today from a woman in Winnipeg. She may even live in Winnipeg South, but at any rate her name is Rose Cowan. In her letter she writes:

> On May 17th this year, we were guests at the memorial service for the war dead, in Winnipeg, when Mr. Pearson, instead of opening this convention...with a prayer and a few dignified words, unveiled his new maple leaf flag instead, causing much disturbance and upset feelings. My husband is a veteran of world war II and both of us have lost loved ones in that dreadful fray, so we felt really unhappy. I came away with tears in my eyes, and knew then that this flag issue should never never have been brought up. It is the kind of thing which splits a country from sea to sea, and does no good at all. It is an emotional thing—and emotional things inflame. Somebody has given Mr. Pearson very bad advice.

On the basis of a letter like that from a woman who is obviously sincere, I feel that if the Prime Minister and his cohorts use closure to stifle this kind of feeling, even if expressed by only one citizen, they are depriving that citizen of something valuable, and it would be better had they never brought this divisive issue before the country.

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, the fight on the flag has been a long one, and we can see the end in sight. The amendment before us deals with the red ensign and much of the debate, as well as public comment, has been to the effect, "Why do you keep fighting on? Can't you see you are going to lose the battle? Can't you see you are going to have a new flag? Why hold up the work of parliament?" I think it is time something was put on the record to indicate exactly why we fight.

I have never been one of those who think the most important question in a fight is, how much strength have you got on your side? I think the question is, how much right is on your side? I am sure members of parliament are called honourable members because we all like to think our duty is to fight for the right, and to fight against that which we think is wrong. On many occasions we have said, and we continue to believe, that what is being done in changing our national flag is wrong, and the way in which it is being done is wrong. Therefore it is our duty to fight. I am sure the question is not how long are the odds against us, but how good and sincere is our cause. I am not concerned with whether defeat in the end is certain. I am concerned that we do not give up a fight when we are on the side of the right.

I am aware there may be a certain amount of ill feeling among certain sections of the public, and I am aware that the press has been dealing with what it calls our stubborn resistance to inevitable defeat. I am quite prepared to bear any punishment that public opinion may bring on me because members of the public fail to understand that I am not willing to give up a fight just because I may be defeated in the end.

Perhaps this is due to my Irish heritage and background. I am sure that if hon. members would only contemplate Irish history for a little while; if they would realize the years of battle, the number of lives lost, the amount of persecution, the fearful odds, the innumerable defeats, they would begin to get some comprehension of why we on this side of the house think it is an honourable thing to fight, no matter how often other hon. members may believe we should realize it is a foolish battle.

I hope my constituents will be able to look beyond the writing in the newspapers, which seem concerned only with the fact that this is a long fight. I hope they will realize it is a fight that must be carried on. I am aware that public opinion seems to have forgotten it is the government which could have broken off the fight at any time. We are in the position, I think, of being deceived that there is no honourable retreat and that if we are defeated we go down fighting.

Perhaps I am a little preoccupied with the idea of fighting and keeping on fighting because the parliament of Canada has today lost a truly great fighter. The dean of the parliament of Canada, Senator Byron Horner, died in hospital in Saskatoon today, and I am sure anyone who knew and loved him as I did knows of his long and valued service to the parliament of Canada, and knows that one of his predominant traits was to fight. He was a great and gallant fighter, and I think it can truthfully be said that we have all lost a very inspiring example, now that he has gone after so many years of service.

I am sure I echo the sentiments of all hon. members of this house when I extend to our two colleagues, the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Horner) and the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner), our heartfelt sympathy on the loss of their father, and our sympathy to Mrs. Horner and the rest of the family. I am sure that his 32 years of dedicated service to parliament is one of the noblest and most gallant records of public service we have seen in our lifetime, or are likely to see for a long time.

I think it was when I first met him when I came to parliament that I realized how necessary it is for members of parliament to have courage. Perhaps sometimes some of us get a little too stubborn, but we are always too apt to be swayed by public opinion, by early, adverse reports in the newspapers, and by the contemplation of occasional fearful odds against us. I think I owe a deep debt of gratitude to Senator Horner because very early he convinced me that one of the greatest attributes a member of parliament could have is personal courage to stand up for what he believes.

I would like to refer to one or two comments made in the house today. I think it was the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue who mentioned the word "democracy," and the hon. member for Winnipeg South said let democracy have its way and bring the matter to a vote. There is something I believe people in this country are often prone to forget. I do not deny that rule by majority is what is commonly thought to be the essence of democracy, but those of us who treasure personal liberty, those of us who feel we have a right to be personally indiscreet sometimes in our talk, if we so wish, realize that rule by majority is one more way of rule by force.

That is how rule by democracy came about; the masses, because of their great weight of numbers, were able to bring sufficient force to bear. I think we should realize this and remember it from time to time. I like to mention once in a while that in my opinion the crowning glory of democracy is not just rule by the majority; it is respect for the rights of minorities and for personal liberty. In this case, in this flag debate fight, I have never been convinced that the majority wants the new flag; I have never been convinced that the majority wants any new flag at this time. I have not seen enough evidence to be sure there was any public outcry or demand for a change in our national flag. I am not sure I would have chosen to continue to battle against the proposal of the government had I been so convinced.

The red ensign is a symbol which means so much to so many people in this country that I firmly believe those who wish to retain it have a right to have their views expressed and fought for. I believe that any member who wishes to speak out in defence of this right has a duty to make sure that he fights for it to the best of his ability.

My own personal view on the flag was expressed in this house two or three years ago, when I said I was not very greatly concerned; I was satisfied with the Canadian red ensign and could see no great reason for changing it, but did not think I would fuss too much if it were changed. If my attitude in this regard has altered I can only say it is because of the manner in which this issue has been handled. I am confident that the most ardent red ensign supporters could have been won over to a great extent; that most of them, if they had been properly approached and if the matter had been handled in a diplomatic way, would have been willing to make a great many concessions.

It has always seemed to me that the argument as to whether or not this question was handled properly can be settled by merely taking a look at the way in which the matter was handled in 1945-46. At that time the issue was not introduced in a political way, and the report of the committee which was set up was almost unanimous; 23 out of 24, I think. Remember, this was at the close of a great war, at a time when we had every reason to believe that the patriotic feelings of Canadian citizens were still at a high pitch and when our people had every reason to feel proud of the contribution this nation had made in maintaining democracy and securing freedom for so many countries of the world. One would have to look hard to find any more honest expression of Canadian opinion at that time than the unbiased, soul-searching work of that committee.

This record alone is enough to explain why we on this side have fought so long and sometimes so bitterly over the different flags which the government has from time to time suggested we approve. Who can say that we are now just being stubborn? Who can say that we do not have good and sufficient reason for feeling bitter about the flag which the Prime Minister has so eloquently said should be the symbol of national unity? I wonder why we could not have allowed this question to stand for a while, even after the initial mistake had been made, until tempers had cooled, until the people had had a little time in which to get used to the idea. I for one have not been in any hurry to see forced upon this country a flag which, initially at least, can only stand as a symbol of political manoeuvring, or of political bungling on the part of the government; a proposition which obviously shows a determination to ram down the throats of the electors of this country a flag which no one even on the government benches brought forward as an idea more than a month or two ago.

I suggest that the method used in seeking the adoption of this flag cannot easily be separated from the design which has been chosen. It is not a question of what we are asking the people of this country to do. It is a question of human frailty, of human understanding and, perhaps, our understanding that Canadians are human. I am sure that most loyal Canadians when they look at the flag will not wish to remember the method by which it was brought in, the ill conceived strategy and the bludgeon used to make sure they got it. But I am sure most people will not be able to dissociate these things from the flag when they look at it. It is the eleventh hour, but I suggest to the government that the damage is not yet fatal. It is still not too late for them to put this motion aside and think it over for a while.

There is an editorial in the Winnipeg Tribune which I think should be read by other editors across Canada. No matter what else is done, all newspaper editors in this country should try to set the people straight on what the fight is about in this house. The question is not whether Canadians should get another flag. Nor is the question whether parliament should get on with other business, at least as far as the opposition is concerned. What is causing the unease and dissatisfaction in the public mind based on the oft repeated assertion that parliament is wasting its time because the opposition is filibustering? The point is that if you have a duty to fight what is wrong, you have a duty to keep on fighting.

If the government persists in a course of conduct which is wrong, it is difficult for me to understand why the newspapers have not told the simple truth over and over again. It is that the government has control over the order of business; the government can bring in any other business which it believes to have priority at any time it wishes to do so. If there has been a day wasted, or spent, in this house, as you choose to look at it, on the flag question it is because the government chose to spend or waste that day.

When I finally get a chance to get back to my constituency I intend to make it clear to my political supporters or foes that our so-called filibuster in this house did not take place just because our party leader wanted to retain the red ensign, or because people on this side of the house wanted to talk. I intend to take my full share of credit by saying I wanted that fight kept on because I refused to quit when I felt I was on the side of the right.

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, in rising this afternoon to participate in this debate and speak to the amendment, may I say how happy and proud I am to take part in the debate at this time. May I say too, Mr. Speaker, that I have enjoyed your guidance throughout the debate and I hope you may continue to occupy the chair for a few more hours.

With regard to the amendment to substitute the red ensign, as it is commonly called, for the single maple leaf flag, may I say that I realize the hon. member who moved the amendment, the hon. member for Middlesex West, did so sincerely and proudly as a last ditch stand, fighting for something he thought entirely right and for which many of us have fought in the days, weeks and months past. I think there may also have been in his mind, and in the minds of others in this chamber, the thought that there still might be a chance for a compromise to be made.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the reason I rise once again to speak in this debate. I know it is late, and in the face of closure our hours are numbered and our debate is limited. But I still think there is some hope for a compromise, and in this connection I should like to set out my reasons for thinking this is the case.

Much has been said throughout this debate, and many people have said there is nothing new to be said. I do not pretend that I have anything specifically new to offer, but in the course of my remarks I do wish to call attention to some aspects of the symbols we are discussing under this amendment. Speaking of symbols, this is a particular time of the year when we honour certain specific symbols; it is a time when we are particularly aware of certain symbols.

Today we are facing closure in this house, this having been brought on by the government. If I may wonder a little for a moment, the other day I heard the Prime Minister emphasize the fact that his entire cabinet approved of this step. I wondered at the time whether that was so, because only a few days earlier a representative segment of the press had this to say:

> Surely never again will the Prime Minister have quite the same confidence in them as he did before. The face of power, shown above, is now a partisan political face, far removed from any face that can speak for country above party.

I do not want to detail what has been said previously, but when speaking before about the red ensign I did say that when a government has the record this government has, surely the Canadian nation should not be made to accept a new flag by this means, albeit a distinctive flag which many of us have previously admitted we should like to see. To me, closure is not democratic.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, I should like to say something about emblems. Before this debate terminates, as I have said, it is still my hope that it is not too late to reach some compromise; but if not, when the time comes to haul down the flag of which so many of us have spoken and for which so many of us have fought, having received piles of correspondence from people in every area of the country, then will be the time to think of symbols.

As I said earlier, this is a certain time of the year when we are particularly prone to symbols. Some of us have wreaths on our doors. Nearly all of us embrace some symbol of this time of year, a tree or a cross. But do we forget that our so-called ties with Britain go deeper than any symbols related to a specific country? I need not remind the members of this house or the Canadian public that the crosses on their flag are Christian symbols. So I emphasize that we should try once more to reach a compromise. Compromises have been reached before in democratic parliaments. I ask, where are those parliaments today, Mr. Speaker?

Some people have said that democracy cannot work in this way. In my opinion this is the way in which democracy must work or it cannot survive. That is what I meant a moment ago when I tried to point out that some countries in this world have forgotten about the past and even the present, and have looked only to the future, and as a result today they do not exist as autonomous bodies. I am not drawing any inferences in this regard, but I would ask the question whether, by destroying this present symbol, which is what we will do if this amendment is not accepted, we are sure we will not destroy our national unity.

If the procedure now suggested is carried forward by this house, will we be doing something to enhance national unity and the national economy? Frankly I seriously doubt that we will be doing that.

The Prime Minister is a man well noted for compromise and for his ability to settle contentious issues. Has he suddenly changed his method of operation? I followed his actions very closely when he was acting in the role of a statesman and mediator, and often commended him for the headway he was able to make. Why does the Prime Minister now, in spite of his enviable record for compromise, resort to this kind of action?

I have not been successful in finding one member in my constituency who is not willing to accept a truly distinctive national flag. I have not received one letter from an individual in Canada who is not willing to accept such a flag. Nor do I believe there is one member in this chamber who would seriously oppose the adoption of a distinctive Canadian national flag. Therefore, the only real question to be answered is, what shall be the distinctive Canadian national flag?

Many Indian people live in my constituency, and there are a great many others living in various other sections of this country. No one can refer to these people as other than truly Canadian. What do they think about the flag proposed at this eleventh hour? One need only talk to one or two in any section of the country to discover what they think about this flag. Without relating my remarks specifically to the union jack as being the commonwealth flag, or the flag of Britain, I must state that past Canadian emblems and symbols have a different meaning for Indian people—who possess a greater degree of sensibility than apparently some of us here in this house possess—than they have for the rest of us. The Indian people remember the solemn promises made at the time of the signing of treaties, and associate these symbols with an allegiance to the Queen, the great white mother. They hold the same feelings today, and one can well imagine what they will think about a government which, by force or by any other means, tears down these symbols and casts them aside. The government should give serious consideration to the thoughts of these Indian people about the flag they intend to tear down.

Some time ago I attempted to point out that the relationship between a national flag and the feelings of the Indian people is not something which can be associated with the commonwealth or with Britain itself, but is directly related to symbolic feelings and treaties. The crosses on the flag are not merely crosses or symbols of a country, but Christian crosses which many of us do not want to see removed and replaced by a mere symbol, and I refer to the maple leaf. One can well understand what the Indian people will think about this government and this parliament in its action to remove this flag as a symbol of allegiance and promise.

I hope someone will correct me if I am wrong and the record shows otherwise, but I believe on the very first day of this debate a proposition was put forward by the Leader of the Opposition, and repeated again several days ago as a last ditch stand, in favour of compromise. Before moving to bring down the symbols which mean so much to the people of this country, I urge the Prime Minister and the government to give serious thought to the results of that action.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, on this historic occasion when we are debating an amendment to a motion concerning our flag it must be obvious to us all that we are under the pressure of closure. This puts a bad taste in our mouths which will remain for a considerable period of time. The Prime Minister, while speaking to this amendment now under discussion, said it was parliament's right to make a decision on this issue. I think his words were that this is an issue which the government and parliament must decide. I should like to place clearly and unmistakably on the record our reaction to the government's procedure on this issue.

Politics involves the art of getting along, and the art of governing lies in the ability to bring together divergent groups. In this regard the Prime Minister and the government have failed the country. This issue has not been brought along in that way so that the people of Canada are united. We have all been aware of the various groups with various opinions which exist in this country, and we as a party have tried to give the right to every individual to have a voice on this issue. Having failed in that regard, by failing in our attempts to persuade the government to settle the issue by plebiscite, we commenced to move a series of amendments to the main motion in order that there may be some indication of the divergence of opinion on this issue.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that in the very early stages of this debate, in my own case on August 20 at a time when I knew there had been discussions at the leadership level as to the advisability of referring this matter to a committee of the house, four basic conditions to the sensible completion of the work of the committee were put foward. Those four issues were ignored and, as I suggested earlier during another stage of this debate, the members of that committee voted as party members. They did not make an effort to bring the main parties together, and that was a necessary ingredient to the compromise.

Now we have the amendment respecting the red ensign. The vote on the amendment will indicate to the house and to the country that there are a number of members of the house who are willing to vote for what has been our distinctive national flag for a good many years.

On that point I should like to say that a flag is meaningless until people have done something for that flag. I for one should like to give testimony to the fact that during the war I belonged to a group that did its best to make it stand out in the minds of people who were our allies and those who were our enemies that the red ensign was our distinctive flag. When I heard the Prime Minister say the other day that Canadian troops had not fought under that flag, or that he had never seen it, I wished he could have been where I was during the war.

In the latter part of the war I happened to serve with one of two Canadian squadrons in a group composed mainly of R.A.F. and American squadrons. I served under an American general, and when you are in a mixture of squadrons doing the same type of work one squadron matches itself against the others. Some of us had served with R.A.F. squadrons, but because of the great difficulty that there was among the Canadians, Australians, New Zealanders and people from the United Kingdom it was decided to pull out of the R.A.F. squadrons all crews containing a majority of Canadians. Thus two Canadian squadrons were formed in the summer of 1944 to serve in the close support work being done by the allies for the 14th army in Burma.

I think I am right in saying that it is tough to take orders from a sergeant at any time, but when you have to take orders from a sergeant who is of another nationality, whether he be British or American, I think members here can understand how resentful we felt and how glad we were to serve in a Canadian squadron. The essence of my little anecdote is that serving as we were in the same area, crowded on a small island with all squadrons working from the same base, naturally there was rivalry among us. If you look at the official squadron records for that theatre you will find that the average tonnage per month carried by squadrons doing this particular type of work was about 3,200 tons a month delivered on objective. During the same period of time the Canadian squadrons averaged over 5,000 tons a month. No American or British squadron came anywhere near what the Canadians were doing.

Why did the Canadians do so much under such great difficulties to demonstrate that they were the best in that particular group? We did so because we knew the Americans thought they were the best in the world and told everybody about it, and the R.A.F. thought they were the best in the world and kept quiet. The only way we could show we were the best was by doing the job. So we set a record of tonnage carried to objectives that no other squadron could match.

On each of our planes was the red ensign. There was also the official roundel with the maple leaf on it, but the red ensign was carried on our planes. When we returned from operational sorties we drew up our planes in the assembly area right opposite an operations tent flying the red ensign as well as the air force insignia outside the tent. As we completed these missions each of us knew we were demonstrating to our allies that the Canadians were an effective part of the war effort, and we were trying to earn the right for Canadians to be recognized by their flag, the red ensign.

I have no apologies now for speaking in support of this amendment, because those of us who were emotionally involved in trying to demonstrate that this was our flag felt, when the then prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King pointed to the red ensign at the end of the war and said to General Crerar "You have made that Canada's flag", that we had been a part of making it Canada's flag.

I could go on and talk of other things of a more personal nature. In our particular group we had no defence except high flying fighters, and our orders were to use camouflage on our aircraft. In spite of those orders the Canadian squadrons painted on the sides of their aircraft the maple leaf as well as the red ensign. We did so because, with a million and a half troops on the allied side engaged in a mighty struggle with the Japanese empire, when we flew low over the troops in that area they all knew, our allies as well as the enemy, that these were Canadians who were getting through to their objective.

I well recall an occasion when the troops were advancing south down the Salween river to Rangoon. The hard pressed tank troops were without supplies and short of all amenities. A Canadian plane flew in at low level with such mundane things as big bags filled with cigarettes, dumped them on the road behind the forward element and gave the troops the chance to smoke an American or Canadian cigarette for the first time in many months. I recall too a little box story on the front page of "SEAC", the southeast Asia command newspaper, saying "Thanks, Canada". The officer commanding the tank corps said "If you had flown 10 feet lower we would have thanked you personally".

We took our flag everywhere to let those people know that it was our flag. Some of us, possibly a minority, think we earned the right for Canadians to fly that distinctive national flag with pride. It seems rather odd to me that the minute the last amendment was moved the government decided on that day to apply closure. Did they not want a debate on the red ensign so that people across the country could be made aware of the testimony in favour of that flag? The government has given us little chance to put forward alternatives.

I should like to refer to an editorial that appeared in the Globe and Mail on September 11, 1964, dealing with the question of closure. At that time the house had decided to refer the flag question to a committee, and in approving this move the editorial stated in part:

> What is more important, any flag adopted under such circumstances—
> By closure.
> —would have been an object of contempt and scorn.

Today the same Globe and Mail says closure is all right. What is the significance of this? It simply means that this newspaper, with no sense of responsibility to minorities in Canada, said in September that to bring in a flag by closure would lead to contempt and scorn, and today says that closure is all right.

My mind goes back once again to an event that happened before you and I were in the house, Mr. Speaker. I refer to the use of closure in 1956, when closure was applied before debate occurred. What are people going to think? In their minds they are going to associate this new flag not only with closure as it will be applied tonight but with closure as it was applied in 1956. So I checked the debates of that time. One thing that came to light at that time was that United States companies were being asked by the government to come into Canada and finance a pipe line that should have been a Canadian undertaking of great pride. The house was told that it had to get the legislation through or construction could not start right away, and that Canadians could not possibly support such a huge undertaking. So these American entrepreneurs came into Canada and set up companies so they could buy Trans-Canada Pipe Line Company shares. If my memory serves me correctly they did not even obtain them at the opening market value of the stock, $10, but got them for $8 a share.

I hold in my hand today an offer to purchase shares of common stock of Canadian Delhi Oil Ltd., which is a subsidiary company of the Murchisons from Texas, one of this group of entrepreneurs who came in and convinced the government of that day that they and they alone could handle such a great undertaking, even though when some shares were put on the market in Canada the issues were oversubscribed seven to ten times. Here, under date of November 25, 1964 is an offer to purchase which will remain open until the close of business on January 8, 1965. At this very moment this company is prepared to strip these Trans-Canada shares from its set-up and sell the balance of the company back to another

United States company. They will now be selling for more than $40 those shares which they bought for $8 because this government applied closure. This will mean that for those shares for which they paid $3.5 million they will now receive $35 million.

At the moment I cannot help but get the taste in my mouth of this graft ridden government, not being aware that it is graft ridden, coming in and applying closure on a subject like this; particularly on a day when, as everyone knows, we are honouring the eighth anniversary of the selection of the leader of the Conservative party who fought closure in 1956.

It is not only my mind that comes to this conclusion. On the editorial page of this morning's Globe and Mail there is an article by Mr. Scott Young, who tells a very interesting story. This story concerns cabinet ministers who had not previously considered hara-kiri, and asks them to consider it now. What does he say about this search for a flag? He says it has caused us to lose face in Japan, and I quote:

> Partly this is because we have such plausible cabinet ministers (some days). Recent ministerial meetings between Japanese and Canadians left the Japanese with the firm conviction that what Paul-san Martin and Walter-san Gordon want, they get. So when their leader, Lester-san Bowles-san (Mike-san) Pearson said in Winnipeg last spring that he had an idea for a flag, factory whistles blew shrilly and Japan rushed to get in on the ground, or even basement, floor. They didn't make only those little auto-aerial flags, but mighty silk and nylon flags built to last as long as winds blew over the barren lands.
> I learned this the other evening when Mr. Gordon and I happened to be sitting across a dinner table from one another at Massey College. He thus was absent from a night sitting in the Commons during which the flag debate was in progress. I asked if he were not afraid of missing something that he had not heard before. When he recovered from this preposterous suggestion, he said affably that he personally was having more trouble with the Japanese over our flag than he was with the Commons. The sad story came out.

Here is a report in a newspaper in our country ridiculing this flag as an effort to increase trade with Japan. Some of the members of the house, including members of cabinet, rushed out ond bought these flags. I heard that they were on sale in cities like Vancouver and Toronto for $1 each. They took thousands of suckers and high pressured them into buying this three maple leaf flag. Now they say, by closure, they are not going to get the three maple leaf flag; they are not even going to get a vote. We are going to be forced to take the single maple leaf flag.

This whole question of a flag—I have to watch my time for obvious reasons—brings me to some statements I have kept in my files for a long time. This one is from the Victoria Daily Colonist of August 8, 1964, almost five months ago:

> The assumption is that the Commons will then recess—

This is after we had passed interim supply for three months instead of two at our suggestion.

> —and prepare for a new session. That is, once Mr. Pearson has rammed his new flag into the statute books. He acts like a schoolmaster who won't let his form go home until it bows to his wishes.
> In the present impasse that hamstrings parliament and sees it sitting through the hot months of an eastern summer the Prime Minister displays the petulence so often associated with persons of weak character. He seems to imagine that a show of authority is an indication of strength, even when a diplomatic way out of dilemma is offered him.

We offered the Prime Minister an honourable, diplomatic way to bring this matter to a successful conclusion. We would have liked to get a vote of the house on this red ensign, and we will. We would have liked other votes which would have indicated to the house that there were other suggestions by way of compromise that we think might have united the whole house, if not the whole country. However, on this very important matter we are forced to our knees by a closure vote that applies tonight. I should like to suggest to members opposite that by so doing not only have they tied themselves up with the closure imposed in 1956 but have tied themselves up with the type of action in parliament that shall ever disgrace the name of modern Liberalism.

Closure is a device that has been used in Canada several times already, but as Laurier protested and as the Leader of the Opposition protested, it was something that no government should ever use in the future. As one hon. member said when he was in opposition, it would not be used by a government that did not lose its senses. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this government has lost its senses when it imposes such a doubtful type of regulation as closure on us on such an important matter.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): I do not believe there is a better example of the condemnation of the government's attitude toward the issue that is before the house than the fact that in order for the government to secure the approval it knew parliament would give for one reason or another, whether the country as a whole was in accord with the majority view within the house, we are now debating for the last time in this parliament what our national flag should be.

It is indeed significant that at the moment we have a choice between two alternatives, a maple leaf flag that could well take on significance in the future if our nation continues to prosper and expand, and a flag that is more representative of our past than any other symbol in our nation, the Canadian red ensign. It is indeed unfortunate that we must face the fact that we are going to have to agree with the majority vote in the House of Commons as to what our nation's flag will be, without knowing with certainty the opinion of the majority of our people. Surely, sir, this is the crux of the whole matter, the fact that this government was willing to put this question forward last April or May without determining with any degree of certainty what were the views of the Canadian people with regard to our national flag.

If, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle pointed out, the government had moved in the same direction as the government of the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King did in 1945, it would have endeavoured to produce a flag by determining in a non-partisan way what the people of Canada felt the flag design should be. Had it done that we would not have seen the House of Commons become a debating society on symbols at a time when it should have been taking action that would be of material benefit to our citizens in the many areas where the government promised action would be taken.

Instead of that we saw an ill conceived, poorly handled flag design placed before the house, a design that later went into the trash can where it belonged because of the method used by the government in endeavouring to inflict it upon the Canadian people without giving them any choice in the matter. Today we are almost back where we started. We have a flag which the government embraces wholeheartedly, although there is one unique member in the Liberal party, and we still have a flag which has flown over this nation for 97 years. After almost six months of debate we are told we must now make the same decision the government asked us to make originally, without any real change in the attitude of hon. members because they are no better prepared today to speak with certainty on the views of the Canadian people than they were six months ago.

[Mr. Coates.]

When 1 a.m. on Tuesday morning comes, when the guillotine falls, when the words stop and the votes are taken, will any of us be any more certain than we were last April of what the Canadian people want in the way of a flag design? Since last April many polls have been taken. Most of them told us what the people did not want, but few of them told us what the people did want.

You may talk to an individual who will say "I think we should have a distinctive Canadian flag." But when you show him the three maple leaf design, or the present design which was agreed upon by a majority of members in the flag committee, he will say "Oh, no. I don't like those flags. I don't think that is the type of flag we should have for Canada." He does not know what he wants, but I say without fear of contradiction that there is a large majority in this nation who do not want the flag design that is now being proposed by the government. There is also a substantial group, indeed I would say the largest group, who know what they want, and what they want is the Canadian red ensign. They want no other flag, although I have always found those people quite willing either to abide by the wishes of a majority as shown in a plebiscite or to accept an alternative flag embodying the symbols of our past, the symbols of the founding races and of the contributions they made to the building of this nation.

More than anything else the problem we face in parliament today, and the problem we have faced during the six months this question has been before the Canadian people, is a problem of mishandling and mismanagement in the way this matter was placed before the country, the absolute and unbelievable carelessness of the government in endeavouring to give the people the impression that it is decisive at least on the flag issue, if on nothing else.

Members of the government have finally made a decision to bring in closure, and what a grand decision that is. I can think of nothing worse; I can think of nothing more undemocratic than to tell the Canadian people they are going to have a flag, born of division, flying from the flagpoles of this nation; for certainly when the vote is taken tonight there will be division and that division will be as indicative of the nation as it is of the House of Commons.

What will they have after the vote is taken? If the other house is kind and considerate—something the upper house in South Africa was not—they will have a flag that is as colourless, as nondescript as any flag produced by any of the emerging nations in the world in which we live. They say the maple leaf is an emblem of the nation, and with that I have no argument. As I said earlier, it may come to mean something in the future; but for a nation 97 years of age it is a sad looking flag, produced by a sad looking government for a sad looking people, for that is certainly what they will be tomorrow morning.

The flag design, Mr. Speaker, is typical of the picture this government has produced ever since it took office. One can well understand why members opposite finally embraced it and agreed, with one exception, that it should be the flag which will fly over our nation. I think we should have been better off as a parliament and as a nation if the government had moved to set aside the whole question. Surely no one will get excited about the design now in question, and I consider there will always be a segment in this nation which will feel that the flag design chosen by the government should be replaced whenever the government is replaced. I cannot feel that any future government will find many arguments to use in opposition to the view held by many people in this country that some action should be taken to determine what the Canadian people as a whole believe should be involved in any flag which is to represent a nation which in 1967 will be celebrating its one hundredth birthday.

I regret more than anything else that a decision was made last April to move in this direction. It was known by the government that they would receive a measure of support from the province of Quebec for a flag design of this type, support which would not be available in any other part of Canada. One would have thought that in the light of other developments which are occurring and which have been occurring in the past few years hon. gentlemen opposite would have been forewarned about the type of animosity which would be created and developed by moving in this direction. It would have been more sensible to have decided that in the interests of national unity it would be better not to plant seeds of doubt in the minds of people in other parts of Canada. They should not have risked doing something which Canadians in other provinces might describe as nothing more than a concession.

I do not think the people of Quebec have much interest in whether we should have a maple leaf flag or whether the red ensign should continue to fly from the flagpoles of this nation, so long as there is a government in Ottawa which is making an effort to solve some of the serious economic problems which face that province. It would have been much more sensible to have sought solutions to these economic problems before trying to find new symbols for this nation.

Mr. Laniel: We are doing both.

Mr. Coates: You are not doing both, and the hon. member knows it. It is all very well for him to say the government is doing both, but let him tell me about one piece of legislation which has been presented to this house and which has reached any degree of finality in the last six months to deal with the problems of agriculture in his own province of Quebec. His problems are the same as those of the maritime provinces and of the area which I represent. They are problems of economics, not of symbols. We should seek solutions to these questions before getting into a fight over what the symbols of this nation should be or should not be. These are things we could all face together; we could deal with them in a united way. This is what we should have been considering and attacking since April instead of discussing maple leaves or other symbols.

When one o'clock tomorrow morning comes we shall still be faced with the same economic problems that face us today. There will be no divergence of opinion as far as they are concerned. Instead, I must resume my seat, I suppose, and see the red ensign come down—a flag which represents much of our past history—to be replaced by a maple leaf flag which may represent a great deal for the future but which represents absolutely nothing to me or to anybody else living in this nation today.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will not rule me out of order if in my introductory remarks tonight I mention something which I know you will endorse. Eight years ago tonight the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) was made leader of this party. Prior to that time, as a young and struggling lawyer in Saskatchewan—I was living in Saskatchewan then—I got to know the Leader of the Opposition very well. I am certain that his greatest contemporaries and also, if I might put these words in fine print, his political enemies will agree with me that since his election to the House of Commons in 1940 he has dedicated himself to public life, and that at no time, no matter what the issue, has he ever lacked courage.

It is strange that on this occasion he had to rise on a point of personal privilege in connection with some remarks which were made in a certain newspaper. I suppose when analysing the life of a leader of a party who takes upon himself responsibility regarding issues which may arise you can never assess his worth until history assesses it. One has only to read the life stories of past presidents of the United States, past prime ministers of Canada and past prime ministers of Great Britain to appreciate that history always places things in their proper perspective. I think that when history does record the facts with reference to our leader, who brought this party from 39 or 40 seats up to 116 and then to 208, and who now leads an opposition with 94 or 95 seats, it will prove not only that he served his party well but that he also served his country well. I have no hesitation in saying that on this particular issue tonight he makes no apology, and should make no apology, for the fight he has put up.

The newspapers have reported that at times there have been divisions among us. As one hon. member said, I think the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt), thank goodness—actually I think his language was a little stronger than mine—the members of this party speak their mind, vote as they see the issue and stand and fall as they see the issue. We have never disciplined our thinking, because where everyone thinks alike there is no thinking.

Mr. Grégoire: Who said that?

Mr. Woolliams: I hear our little member who was recently hung up on a hook in a Conservative member's office. I hope he will give me a better hearing tonight than he gave the Leader of the Opposition, who after all is an officer of this house. I understand the hon. member was hung up for about 20 minutes.

Mr. Grégoire: When?

Mr. Woolliams: This is a most serious occasion, because at some time between now and 1 a.m., or after 1 a.m., a very important decision is going to be made.

I for one, as a Conservative, make no apology for the stand this party has taken or for the stand I personally have taken on this issue. I am from the city of Calgary, which is known for its friendliness, and I hope that, whatever remarks have been made in the early days of the debate or over the last ten days, we will rise to the occasion as Canadians and be friends. In this debate each one of us was seriously expressing his opinion as he saw the issue. Sometimes one gets a little too serious on occasions like this; but men in difficult circumstances, far more difficult than the situation we are in on the flag issue, have risen and set aside propaganda—and we have had a lot of that—and set aside their emotions and have been friends.

I have only to read some words of Havelock Ellis to make this point. He described the situation in the first war, in 1916 or 1917, I am not sure of the exact year, when—

Mr. Grégoire: You were not here then.

Mr. Woolliams: I was born in 1916. I hear our little choir practitioner interrupting again, and he will filibuster anything because he has no respect for this place or for the dignity of parliament. Before I quote Havelock Ellis I should like to say this. When one hon. member said he would like to retain his British traditions—I am one of them and I make no apology for that—the hon. member then scoffed and sneered. I would ask him to bear with us for once.

Mr. Starr: We have been bearing with him long enough.

Mr. Woolliams: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, in no man's land in those days there were the allies on the one side and the Germans on the other, and they were so close that at this time of year they heard each other singing carols and they joined together in the singing of those carols. This is what Havelock Ellis said in this regard:

> So we see, too, how simply the end of fighting might be reached. We have but to bring men together as human beings, either in imagination or in reality, and they are prepared to violate all the abstract principles of patriotism and war, to break any rule of discipline, rather than kill one another. We see it is not much to ask. It has been achieved on a single Christmas eve in men whose hatred of each other had been artificially excited to the highest pitch. Is it too much to expect that one day this process will be extended on the world's fighting line until so many men have had to be moved that there will be none left to replace them?

And so, Mr. Speaker, in that tone set by Havelock Ellis and under these difficult circumstances, I ask the government to bear with us tonight in the remarks we may make and the words we utter, even though they may hurt and even though they may penetrate the consciences of hon. members opposite. I would draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that in the only speech I made on this subject there were 22 interruptions in 35 minutes, and some of those interruptions lasted for two or three minutes. So as I say, I would ask them to bear with us and listen to the remarks which will be made before morning or whenever the vote is taken. As the saying is, "Lend me your ears".

After all, we are a real democracy. We heard a member of our party express today a view absolutely contrary to some of the views I will be expressing tonight. He has an absolute right to do that as a member of this party, and so have I the right to express my views. But I would say to him and to all those who share his views that when our views differ let them be as tolerant of, and as patient with, our views as we were with his. We listened to him seriously and we have listened to the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite seriously.

After all, as Myrtle Cook Jackson said recently:

> Democracy, guard well your sacred strength;
> Through blood and tears this priceless gift was born—
> This miracle, which brave men used at length
> To shape a crown for freedom none may scorn.

When we can bear with each other's ideas then we are being tolerant and giving each other a fair hearing.

I speak tonight and say this to parliament, at a time when the government has implemented once again a rule, which is still a rule of this house—closure—that I oppose this measure at this time, and I cannot endorse the attitude of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) who was the only minister of the crown who really spoke on this issue, the only minister of the crown who got off his love seat and stated his position, only to say that we are going to do so and so during this debate, and that if we do not do that there will be a general election or an implementation of closure. I may say that as far as I am concerned, as a Conservative, I fear neither.

I do not believe however that I could honestly have stood in my place today, as a minister of the crown and a long time member of this house, had I made the statement made by one minister on March 26, 1962, and voted for closure without having first made some reasonable explanation of my actions. That minister made a statement in 1962 at a time when we were considering the abolition of the closure rule. This is what that minister said then:

> I believe that no government in its senses—

I like that expression, "in its senses".

> —would ever again use the existing closure rule in our book.

The man who made that statement voted today for closure without giving any explanation or reason for changing his point of view. I suggest his reason is that he wanted to follow the discipline of the Liberal party, or did so perhaps for political expediency. The minister who made that statement is the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), speaking at that time as Mr. Pickersgill, as reported at page 2165 of Hansard of March 26, 1962. These are his words:

> I do not wish to be a purist.

No one expected him to be a purist.

> If I had been drafting such a motion I am not sure that the precise word I would have used would have been "desirability". However, that is an unimportant matter. I agree with the Prime Minister.

The prime minister at that time happened to be Mr. Diefenbaker:

> He may be surprised to find my saying this without any qualification—

I emphasize that statement, without any qualification or reservation; yet today without any explanation he stood in his place and voted against that espoused principle.

> —and I have no more desire or intention than he seemed to have to relive the past or to try to rewrite it or do anything of that sort—that, having regard to what has happened, I believe that no government in its senses would ever again use the existing closure rule in our book. I therefore do not see any sense in leaving it there.

And to use the minister's words, no government in its true senses should implement the rule of closure. Let those words be the minister's own sword, and let that sword be used at the minister's own hara-kiri, because this government has no sense of responsibility.

There are other matters I could mention, but because of the rules of debate I am not allowed to do so. However under other circumstances and under a different leader, ministers of the government party might well have resigned their positions. I am sure they might have had a sense of responsibility and known that it was proper for them to quit. I am sure they might have known what was the decent thing to do in view of their responsibilities. However, they still sit in their places.

We had an experience in Alberta of this kind of Liberalism, involving two individuals. I make no apologies for giving their names. I suggest these examples are equivalent to the situation which has developed because of the statement made by that minister in 1962 and his action in voting for closure today. Because he still sits in his seat I must come to the conclusion that he has not measured up to his responsibility or his integrity.

The two Liberals in Alberta placed themselves in a similar position. One was a mayor of the city of Calgary, Don MacKay. As a result of his actions a judicial inquiry was held, and at the conclusion of that inquiry he moved to Phoenix, Arizona. The other one was a Mr. Hawrelak, who was re-elected as mayor but was involved in a scandal.

It seems strange to me that when dealing with responsibilities of debate and responsibilities for closure we should have a situation today where ministers of the crown, having been involved in this kind of scandal, are still sitting in their places and taking the position they take as far as this issue is concerned, voting for closure without having given any explanation.

The only minister of the crown who has made a statement is the Prime Minister, and he has accused us of making a great number of speeches, filibustering and prolonging the debate. On the other hand, during the same week he wrote a letter setting out certain basic principles of conduct which his ministers should follow, warning them like school boys to be honest. Our democracy has really reached a sorry position when the leader of the government and the Prime Minister of this country must warn his ministers to be honest.

While dealing with closure I should like to say this. There is a great deal of difference between implementing closure during the debate on a legislative matter and implementing closure on an issue such as the flag question, because legislation can be passed and repealed, but when dealing with traditions and past history we are dealing with the past, present and future which, taken together, provide us with our emblematic symbols, and we cannot repeal any action we take in this way. We cannot unfurl a new flag every day, or every parliament.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

The most cutting words of the Prime Minister in this regard were the words he used when he referred to people pointing out the fact that there might be some prejudice as far as the province of Quebec was concerned. I ask the Prime Minister, as I stand in my place tonight, outside of that province of Quebec —and the people there have an absolute right to believe whatever they wish to believe— what province of the remaining nine has a majority of people who would say that we want as a national flag any flag that does not have on it the union jack? Therein lines the question regarding whether this is a majority opinion.

Parliament has not always been right in its decisions. On one occasion an imperial parliament legislated the union of Ireland, but that union never took place because the majority did not favour such a union. I suggest that the government has a responsibility to explain its position to the people of Canada. They must prove to the majority of the population of this nation that they believe honestly that they have a mandate to change the flag of this nation. It is for that reason that we have carried on this fight in parliament on this issue.

Mr. Speaker, we have at all times been prepared to give a little. We have at all times been prepared to compromise and listen to what those with other beliefs have to say, but I ask this question of those people who have accused us of presenting the kind of arguments that are contemptible, and accused us of filibustering: When is it wrong to differ in opinion? I repeat that when all think alike there is no thinking at all and the moment we get to that stage there is no parliament, no democracy.

An hon. Member: There was a filibuster.

Mr. Woolliams: Somebody says "filibuster". As it came from the Liberal ranks I only have to remind him to read and live the pages of history in 1962 and 1963 when many times the word "closure" was mentioned because of the long debates and the filibustering that took place on that occasion. It was right for the Liberals then to oppose closure because they claimed they stood on principle, but now they wish to use closure to shove this flag down our throats. I say that the manner in which closure has been brought in shows contempt and arrogance. It is nothing short of dictatorship to bring in closure in this fashion.

Mr. Grégoire: Dispense.

Mr. Woolliams: My little friend says "dispense". I say to him that if parliament dispenses with him it is one "dispense" with which we will certainly all agree. I made reference to the letter the Prime Minister had written. I would ask this question, because we have not had questions for a number of days. Many of us can hear the wheels grinding now somewhere in Canada or maybe in another nation—Mr. Scott of the Globe and Mail had something to say about this—producing the hemp or silk for the new flag. The Liberals are so arrogant and so indifferent that they are going to ram the new flag down the throats of the Canadian people and somewhere, either in Canada or elsewhere, these flags are being manufactured to fly over the buildings of this country, if they can get it through the institutions of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, closure has been brought in and may I say at the outset that in a debate such as this closure should never have been applied. There is no place in the House of Commons for closure on a subject such as the flag, a subject that touches the hearts of each and every member of the House of Commons as well as the hearts of each and every citizen throughout Canada. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) said during the debate that he wanted the flag question decided after full and free debate. That statement and the statement made by the ex-leader of the house over there just do not jibe. In other words, if you are going to have full and free debate you do not cut it off and there is no reason why the flag debate should have been cut off.

Let me make a couple of points. First of all, with regard to the cutting off of the debate I say without fear of contradiction that we have had 10 days of debate, with today being the 11th, on one flag and one flag only. No one can deny that. The house has had a preoccupation with the flag since last spring which lasted all through the summer. This preoccupation has plagued the people of Canada and has driven them to the point where they feel that no work is being done in the House of Commons. In many respects I am inclined to agree with them but I do not agree as to the cause. Many in the house as well as outside have said that the cause is obstruction. I say to them once again that nothing is further from the truth because the cause is not obstruction. The cause is the failure of the government to bring forward the business of the house in an orderly manner.

I have used the word "preoccupation" and I will emphasize that point as I continue my speech because it is the Liberal preoccupation with the flag which has strangled all reasonable and orderly conduct of the business of the house. Without going into too much detail I ask them this straight question. What business of the house has been obstructed? The answer, of course, is none. They refer to the pension plan and say that we have to clean that up and get rid of it. They name another dozen very small items and a few major ones like the labour legislation and they say that this is the business of the house which is being held up. Nothing is further from the truth, Mr. Speaker. The business or the house has been held up purely and simply because the Liberal government in office today has not seen fit to bring forward their legislation.

Why have they not seen fit to bring forward their legislation? They have tried time and again to bring bits and pieces of legislation before the house. I would mention the pension plan again. Last November, over a year ago, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) stood up on her two feet and said: "This is it; we are bringing it in now". What happened? They had to revamp it, just like they have had to revamp a lot of their other legislation. Then they made another false start. But when they start something do they keep at it? From the point of view of the orderly conduct of the business of the house they could keep at it if they wished to do so if they did not have this preoccupation with the flag. But do they carry on? No, they do not. I will tell you why they do not carry on. It is not because of their preoccupation with the flag but because of the fact that their legislation has been downright lousy from the beginning and subject to withdrawal all along the line. Nobody in the house can deny that from their very first budget this has been true.

So far as preoccupation with the flag is concerned, there is talk about spending a lot of time on it and not getting on with the business of the house, but the simple fact of the matter is that we members, who normally should be back in our constituencies finding out the views of our constituents, were kept here for part of June, all of July and August and part of September for the flag debate and a few other little things. This is the longest session of parliament on record now, Mr. Speaker. We started in February and we went through March, April, May, June, July, August, September, October, November and into December. We have been here 10 months. Do not let anybody say that the flag has kept us here that long.

What legislation has the government brought forward? I will hand it to them for a few bits and pieces but, believe me, when I am handing it to them I will at the same time ask any Liberal member or anybody else in Canada to compare, month by month, year by year and session by session, the legislation they have brought in with that introduced by the last Conservative government which had the best record in this regard in history. At this stage of the game the Minister of Transport is reading his newspaper—I am sorry, it is the house leader. The Minister of Transport is not here. Last Friday the house leader rose in righteous indignation and said that circumstances were such that closure was warranted and necessary. Well, I am not so sure. He said it was necessary because we were making a mockery of parliament. I would not comment on his interruptions, because they were not worth much. In fact, I recall when I was making a speech he got up and interrupted, then he apologized and said he did not know what was going on. It was a lousy interruption I might tell you, Mr. Speaker.

He is the house leader and I say say to him this: You, sir, know what the orderly business of this house is and should be; you have not one, single solitary answer because it is within your jurisdiction to demand of the government that they will bring before this house business which is essential to the consideration of legislation that is necssary for the well being of Canada. I say to the house leader that it was his duty. I know he is a man of integrity. I cannot understand why he sits there and has to take a waffling position, why he just shrugs his shoulders and indicates that the whole ruddy troop of ministers have not got legislation ready to put before the house. Therefore, ladies and gentlemen—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pugh: There are still some in the house, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, let us not hear any more of these rather stupid Liberal charges that have no meaning to the effect we are holding up the business of the house. It is not true.

Mr. Grégoire: Then sit down.

[Mr. Pugh.]

Mr. Pugh: I should like to refer to the preoccupation with the flag. I am glad to see that little man back in his seat; I missed him. He is the best interrupter in the house.

Mr. Grégoire: I did not say a word.

Mr. Pugh: He says that he did not say a word; that is what I like about him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I mentioned the preoccupation with the flag. I know I am on solid ground here because this government has been preoccupied with the flag, preoccupied with a false mandate and they have been preoccupied all down the line, when they should have been considering legislation which is so necessary and important to our dominion. They are the ones who are responsible and they should have seen that legislation was brought forward. There has been this preoccupation, and now closure. May I just button up that one thing? There is no question about it. We are on our eleventh day of consideration of this flag. The time we have spent heretofore on the flag, and this no one can deny at all, we have spent on a flag that was produced by the Liberal government or the leader of that government. Now, it has been tossed in the ash can.

I am not making any disclosures when I say that all the Liberal members of the flag committee voted against this three maple leaf design and indicated their preference between the two flags. I know what I am talking about because I was a member of that flag committee. The Liberals were preoccupied with that flag which divided the feelings of the people of Canada, the feelings of members of parliament, and all that time which was used up was used up on a flag which the Liberals have now tossed aside. All during the summer, they said, you will take this or leave it; if you do not take it, we will have an election; if it is turned down, we will have an election. Where is that flag today? It is not here with us. I want to say again that all these charges of holding up the business of the house, of obstructing, of filibustering, all those charges which were made up until ten days ago, were made on a flag which even the Liberals were glad to get rid of.

Were we filibustering when we talked against that flag in this House of Commons? I think the facts have proven that the answer to the question is, no. What we said at that time was right. For the benefit of other parties who might be interested, I should say that every party voted against that flag. Where, then, is this holding up of the business of the house? All we were debating was a flag, the creature of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and his cabinet; it had no status whatever and has been proven to have been just another bit of dishcloth. I believe it was on Friday that the Prime Minister told us they were not going to bring forward this flag. I say to you, was there a filibuster? The answer is no. How can we have closure at this time on the motion to adopt a flag design about which we have been talking for only ten days?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pugh: Hon. members across the way laugh. Well, I should like to mention something else since they are so happy. I am just wondering whether or not instead of closure there should not be disclosure in this debate. When I listened to that happy woman speaking today who comes from Winnipeg South (Mrs. Konantz), I heard her say that everything in the flag committee was wonderful. I have forgotten her exact words, but she indicated everything was rosy and she said that there was no partisanship. I have never heard so much baloney in my life, and any member of that committee will know what I am talking about. She made a nice speech. She talked about history. She said that in her view we should have one history in Canada. I will agree with that. My questioning during the meetings of the flag committee was directed toward that. She said that the people of Canada were ignorant about history, and so were many members of parliament.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will go a long way toward agreeing with that and I believe that every member of the flag committee, including the Créditistes, said the same thing. We should have had a study of this. Today we are talking about national unity. I say this, that no flag is going to produce national unity. I say that a study of history from each other's point of view—I am talking about French Canada and the rest of Canada—might well produce unity because from education and study comes understanding. This is what we lack in Canada today. How I should like to see some of these Liberal members get up and make a speech telling us precisely what is going on.

An hon. Member: They are not allowed to do that.

Mr. Pugh: They are not allowed to that. I must say I was extremely happy to hear the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) get up and talk, and talk with a purpose. I recommend that speech to every Liberal member in the house. I urge them to search their consciences because I am amazed when I see hon. members opposite who have not spoken, hon. members from ridings with which I am familiar.

I have a paper here in my hand which was written by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Francis). It is called, "Report from parliament hill," and some of the things which have crept into it are funny. In it he says that he has not spoken in the flag debate in the house and does not intend to do so. Why did he not speak? People on this side have stood up on principle and talked about our flag, our present Canadian flag. We have fought not only for that flag but also for a modification of it.

I am not giving away any secrets when I say that I myself moved a motion in the flag committee that, in addition to its present symbols it should contain the maple leaf. The Conservative members were quite prepared to go along with that. We are not strictly Canadian red ensign, but to return to the paper written by the hon. member for Carleton, he says that one member of the Liberal party has gone so far that it is hard to see how he can stay within the party. My goodness, is that your view over there? How many other Liberal members say, "He spoke against the party, therefore drum him out"?

I am amazed that hon. members opposite approve closure being introduced just because they have been too darned well afraid to get up on their feet and say what their constituents want them to say. They sit there with grins on their faces and say nothing. This is what the hon. member for Carleton says at the end of his report:

> Frankly, I believe the country is sick and tired of the whole affair. Parliament should settle the issue and its members can then answer for what they have done to the people at the next election—

Are they going to adopt a flag and then answer for it at the next election? Why do they not give the people an opportunity to decide first whether they want our present flag changed and, second, what new design they would like to have?

I have a great many more things to say but I think I have used almost my whole time.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity tonight to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas)—

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the dignity of this place certain hon. members may not want debate but sometime between now and 1 a.m. they are going to have a vote, and surely members from this party should receive a hearing. Surely what is taking place in the house is improper and I ask you, as Speaker, to bring the house to order.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: About the point of order, I would say that no Conservative member can complain that he has not been heard, because the hon. member who now has the floor will set the unbelievable record of speaking six times on the same matter. On the contrary, everyone should congratulate that hon. member (Mr. Danforth) on that feat, namely that of speaking six times on the same matter.

[Text]

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, just as I opened my address there was placed on my desk a little hat with a red maple leaf on it. Knowing the size of some of the heads in the house it is not hard to guess where it came from.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: This is a deeply emotional issue and I do not intend to let a desire for newspaper headlines stop me from saying what I wish to say tonight. As I stated at the outset, I am supporting the amendment moved by the hon. member for Middlesex West because I want recorded on Hansard the names of those hon. members who are so eager to haul down the red ensign.

This debate has been ridiculed over and over again by all means of communication in this country, but history will tell the value of it, and I suspect it will go down in history as one of the great debates. I am proud to be recorded as having spoken four times, as honestly and sincerely as I can, representing my riding on a matter of principle, rather than going down on the record as being responsible for catcalls, jeers, interruptions and objections such as we have been subjected to over a thousand times in the last ten days.

The history of this flag will go down in headlines, and I would like to repeat some of them, "The flag by July," "The Canadian flag by the Queen's visit," "The flag by Christmas," and now, "The flag by closure." I am sure hon. members opposite can be proud of their record.

An hon. Member: Yes, we are.

Mr. Woolliams: Oh, go back and be an undertaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order please.

Mr. Monteith: Well, stop them.

Mr. Speaker: There is very little time left in this debate and I mean to ensure that each one has the proper opportunity of expressing his or her true sentiments.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, I am being accused of repetition. I ask you, is it wrong, where our country is concerned, to keep asking for reason? Is it wrong to keep asking for fairness? Is it wrong to keep asking for justice? Is it wrong to keep asking for an end to the project that is spreading disunity from coast to coast? No, Mr. Speaker, it is not wrong. This is not repetition. This should be the aim and object of all members of the house, not just those in the Conservative party.

Mr. Caouette: It is wrong to have no reason.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, I hear the interjection, it is wrong to have no reason, and I sympathize with the hon. member.

Mr. Caouette: To have to sit with you.

Mr. Danforth: The other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) rose in his place and put forward the aims, objectives and views of the government with respect to this very important matter. We had been asking him for days to do so, and we are still asking hon. members on the front benches opposite to do that very thing. The Prime Minister said he was speaking for all members of his cabinet in putting forward his views. Here was a golden opportunity for the leader of this great country to propose a plan, to put forward a compromise, to take action in a manner which would bring credit to a great statesman. Instead of seizing this golden opportunity, however, he delved into party politics to such an extent that he tried to place the blame for this political holocaust on the Conservative party.

Why could he not have left this entire measure out of partisan politics? Why did he embark on a course which plunged this country into political division? Why did he have to use our flag as barter on a partisan party platform? This is why we are in trouble today. It is sheer hypocrisy in my mind to say this flag will bring national unity. How can it do so when there is division in this house as well as across Canada? We have been criticized for the fight we have put up in this chamber for the Canadian red ensign. If we do have a new flag let us hope that the government will be prepared to put up as much of a fight for that flag if the need should ever arise. The Prime Minister asked the opposition to join with the Liberals in putting up this glorious new flag which will mean the unity of Canada. I want to join wholeheartedly with my hon. friend from the Northwest Territories (Mr. Rhéaume) who said this afternoon that he would take no part in hauling down the red ensign. I will have no part in taking down Canada's flag. We are told we cannot have a plebiscite —that the people cannot make their wishes known. We must accept this position. This has been decided by the House of Commons. And now we have closure, so that the opposition cannot make its wishes known. Is it not a sad day indeed in Canada's history when we must have disunity in the country as a price for one man's desire for a new flag before Christmas? What a mockery of Canadian justice.

I have been criticized because I have dared to stand up and speak for the fourth time on this question. Would that I had the opportunity to speak four more times until this parliament returns to reason and sanity and allows the Canadian people to decide what flag they wish to have in the future. I am proud to be a member of a party which feels the Canadian people have the right to make Canadian decisions where the emotions of every single Canadian are involved. This is what we are fighting for, not a piece of cloth. The people of Canada will be asked to salute the flag on that flagpole and surely they should have the right to choose the flag they should salute. This is not a state; it is a democracy. We have tried, and we are continuing to try, to resolve this question in the best possible way. We have offered to compromise. From time to time we pointed out avenues along which the government could approach this question in a logical way. Instead members opposite approached this question from a partisan point of view. It was they who interjected this question into the business of the country, not us. It was they who gave it priority in the list of business to be completed by this house, not us. It was they who imposed closure, not us. Now they expect us meekly to submit to their will. We cannot do this. Representing the people I do, I cannot accept these measures without fighting to the extent of my ability.

This is not a matter to be treated with the levity which we have witnessed. This involves the Canadian flag, and in my estimation the decision of this parliament will be final. Surely no other government in the future would dare to interject a flag question again into the work of a Canadian parliament. This is why the issue before us is so serious. This is why we must be so right in our decisions and deliberations. This is why we must be sure that what we are doing is right. I feel the government is making one of the biggest blunders any government could make because I believe that instead of unity it is actively promoting disunity in this country, as never before.

Mr. Speaker, the people will know who is responsible. It is not us: It is the government which brought this measure into being.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): In the closing hours of this debate I intend to speak only briefly because I believe there has been too much talk already. The attitude of the public as I sense it in my travels across the country and through my correspondence is simply that most people are fed up with this subject.

Whether we agree or do not agree with the method being used to close off this debate; whether we agree or do not agree with the report of the flag committee on which we shall be voting tonight, the simple fact remains that nothing positive will be gained from a continuation of this debate. There is no place in the life of our country at this time for any further rocking of the boat. After some 260 speeches in the House of Commons, most of them from members of the Conservative opposition, any further debate on this flag issue would be redundant, superfluous and unnecessary. I do not believe that after all these hours of debate one opinion has been changed in this House of Commons. I do not think it is necessary to hash and rehash the arguments which have been raised by those who hold opposing opinions.

However, I am likewise convinced that the government has handled this flag situation very poorly right from the beginning. I think it is recognized by most Canadians that that is the case.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Olson: You have made your speech.

Mr. Woolliams: I was wondering how the hon. member would have handled it.

Mr. Thompson: The hon. member can ask his questions when I am through. However, democratic government will never function, in fact it will not survive, if a filibustering minority is permitted to paralyse the majority. Nor, on the other hand, will it ever function effectively or survive if the government continues to stumble into and out of one crisis after another. At the present time this parliament is plagued by both situations. It is now imperative that a decision be made through a vote which will express the will of the majority of the members of this House of Commons. In my opinion, there is no other alternative at the present time.

I say that, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the fact that I feel that a flag by closure is far from the ideal. Ever since a distinctive flag was called for in the election platform of the Social Credit party it has been suggested that the problem could best be worked out through a national referendum, and we have advocated this. However, I am convinced that in the way this flag situation rests at the present time any referendum would simply serve further to divide the country. We must face up to the reality of the situation.

This is the ninth time that closure has been invoked by the Canadian House of Commons in its 97½ years of history. Six times it was invoked by a Conservative government and three times by a Liberal government. It is a legitimate and an effective tool of a democratic legislature and the parliament at Westminster uses it often.

Mr. Herridge: Not in this way.

Mr. Thompson: I suggest that other parliaments use it, and for the same reason it is being used now. The situation we have in the house tonight is something which can have nothing but an adverse effect on the nation as a whole, and even though we do not like it and it is unfortunate that this is the means by which a decision will be made on the flag, I can see no other alternative.

Four months late the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) suggested an all party flag committee. The resulting committee, made up of 15 members, subsequently held some 45 sittings. At the time when the names of the members of this flag committee were announced—

Mr. Rhéaume: You were in Africa.

Mr. Thompson: I suggest that hon. members in the Conservative opposition give me the same opportunity to speak that I have given them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thompson: At the time that these 15 names were announced it was my thought that 15 capable, honest and trustworthy men had been chosen. It was a remarkable group of individuals who represented the rest of us on the flag committee. I want to thank them for the way they went to work and for the tremendous number of hours they put in. I am convinced they did their work conscientiously, carefully and thoroughly. Their final recommendation was decided by a majority vote of ten to four, not counting the chairman. We are now considering their report, and the purpose of the motion now before the house is to enable us either to accept or reject this report. It is that vote in which we are expected to take part tonight following the vote on the amendment, which to me is contrary to the decision made by the flag committee.

As one of those who agreed to the setting up of this flag committee I am convinced that it is my own personal obligation to support the report of the committee and I intend to do so. I say this even though I personally do not prefer the design which they selected.

Mr. Woolliams: What would you like?

Mr. Thompson: It is not a question of what I personally like. We entrusted this responsibility to these 15 men, and in view of the fact that they did submit a strong and substantial majority report I think it is our responsibility to support them. I believe this is the general opinion of the majority of the Canadian people.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that this is the opinion of Canadians living abroad, which after all is where a flag perhaps serves its greatest use, because it does represent Canadians who are abroad. I was in France and Germany in June and I spoke to many members of our armed forces. I intentionally asked them their opinion about a flag, and not one dissenting voice did I hear to the proposition that it was time that Canada, in her unique role in foreign affairs, had its own distinctive symbol. I found this opinion expressed in my recent trip to Africa, where I met hundreds of Canadians who were doing a worth-while job in the countries they were serving. They were doing a magnificent job representing our country, and once again I heard not one dissenting voice to the proposition that it is time Canada had her own distinctive flag. In fact, I believe that the reports of the goings on in this house which have been carried by the world's press have lowered the image of Canada in the minds of a lot of people who look to Canada, a small nation, as a leader of other small nations. They are wondering just what is taking place in this house.

There is one further aspect I should like to mention in connection with this entire issue. It seems to me that the elected representatives of the Canadian people should have more concern for our country than for their own partisan or personal convictions regarding the winning or losing of a single point in debate in this house. It is our responsibility and our privilege to demonstrate to the people of the world—yes, people of diverse backgrounds who do not know unity, or have the heritage we have in Canada—that together we can solve our problems in such a way as to meet the needs of every individual in this country, and thus prove to the world that the democratic form of government is best.

A question we might ask ourselves, Mr. Speaker, is: Have we grasped the significance of our own destiny as a nation? If we have, then we should not continue focusing our attention on such an internal matter as the flag, but should be looking to much wider horizons—to the world outside.

In presenting the concept and image of unity, how much more important is it that we show that we can settle our difference in an amicable and democratic fashion? It could mean a great deal to the world if we as Canadians could set the example of solving the problems of our own country. I think this is most important at this time, and it should be remembered that it is not a flag which makes a country, it is a country and its people which make a flag.

I am convinced that the deficit picture, with which we are faced now, following these 33 days of debate, has brought us to the point where it is now our responsibility, particularly as members of parliament, to get on with the job before us which we are expected to perform. That is why my own decision is a very simple one about this debate. I believe there is only one alternative open to us, if we look at the situation objectively.

Many have spoken about the past, and let me say that I respect the past. In fact, one of the lessons I learned early in my lifetime at home is that we should respect the past and those who have been part of it, as well as the institutions for which they have fought, not only to help survive, but to perpetuate for us. In closing I should like to say that while that respect for the past must remain, our responsibility is to the future because we, our children and their children are going to live in the future.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, since this debate will close tonight I think it is appropriate for me to recapitulate the position the New Democratic party has taken on this question.

On June 16 when this debate was opened on the flag question I said that our party had three main objections to the proposal which was then placed before the house by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). Those objections are still valid. Our first objection was toward the design which the Prime Minister proposed at that time. We said that we were prepared to vote for it because we wanted to see a distinctive national flag adopted, but that we would prefer another design.

I must say that we are pleased that the Prime Minister was prepared to send this question of a design to a parliamentary committee, and I should like to commend that committee for its work. The Prime Minister deserves commendation because of the fact that he was prepared to forgo the design he submitted to the house, and because he is now prepared to accept the design recommended by the committee. It takes a big man to adopt that position.

At least the majority of the members of this group are prepared to support the recommendation of the committee, but I am frank to say that the design the committee selected would not have been our choice. We would have preferred the design of our original suggestion, the red maple leaf on a white background with blue vertical bars denoting, as does the Canadian motto, from sea to sea. The committee voted on that design and turned it down. We live in a democracy, and no group living in a democracy can obtain all the things it wants. The committee has brought down a design, which I think is a good design and the design which ought to commend itself to the great majority of the Canadian people.

The position we have taken in this group on the flag question is that there should be a free vote. We take that view because the flag issue involves personal judgment and is a matter of one's own feeling. It has nothing to do with political ideologies or philosophies, and is not a partisan matter. One or two of our members will vote for the amendment. The majority will vote against the amendment; not because we are against the red ensign, but because we believe that the majority of the people of Canada want a flag which symbolizes Canada's independence and Canada's role in world affairs.

I can understand those who have deep attachments for symbols of the past, since I have them myself, but I think we must recognize that Canada has moved from being a colony to a dominion, and from being a dominion to being a self-governing autonomous member of the commonwealth. As we have progressed toward being an autonomous nation, our symbols must also have changed to represent that change. We must have faith in the future of Canada, and I believe that our children's children and their children will see the day when Canada will have a bigger population and larger gross national product than the motherland which gave us birth. I think this will be one of the two great countries of the North American continent within the next century.

If we are to keep our rendezvous with destiny we must have a flag which denotes our faith in that destiny and our sense of national identity. I believe we can do this best by adopting a flag which does not constantly remind us of the things which have divided us too often in the past.

The second thing we objected to about the government's program was the method by which this whole question was brought before us. I am not going to labour that point, but I do want to say that I think the government could have saved itself and this country a great deal of heartache by sending this question to the committee in the first place without any time limit, and could have given Canadians a chance to attempt at least to work out some consensus, obtaining the support of the majority of Canadian people with a minimum of dissension and bitterness.

The report of the parliamentary committee of 1945 put forward a recommendation which, if I remember correctly, was voted for by 23 to 1. That is close to being a unanimous vote. If I remember correctly, that committee sat for 18 months. I do not think 18 months is too great a price to pay for general support for something such as a flag. The great tragedy of that period is that the flag recommended was not adopted by parliament. Had it been adopted by parliament we would have been saved a great deal of trouble during this session.

As I have said, I commended the Prime Minister on June 16, because of the fact that he picked up this thorny nettle which all his predecessors carefully avoided. I think he is to be commended that he has undertaken this matter, but I suggest that the method which was adopted has brought a great deal more dissension and some degree of bitterness which I believe could have been avoided.

The other thing which we criticized at the beginning of the debate was the government's timing. I suggested on June 16 that by introducing this question at the time it was brought into the house the government was going to paralyse parliament and obstruct its own program. After all, there had been nothing in the speech from the throne about a flag. Early in June the Prime Minister was asked if he would outline the business for the remainder of the session and if I remember correctly he read out 38 legislative items, all of them important. Then, about the middle of June came the flag debate, with the result that we spent all of the summer months without discussing legislation. It obstructed the whole legislative program completely with the result that when this session of parliament is prorogued probably more legislation will die on the order paper than has been passed during the session. I think that is unfortunate.

When the government finally agreed to send this matter to a committee I thought the government had an excellent opportunity to redeem its mistake. It would have been a good thing to let the committee's report lie there, go on with the legislative program and let the flag wait until the end of the session or even wait until next session. But the Prime Minister, in one of his more pixilated moments on the C.B.C., promised that he was going to have a flag by Christmas. Why? It was not a matter of life or death. No one was going to suffer if the decision on the flag were delayed until January or until next spring or until next summer. What was the urgency in this matter? Many more urgent matters affecting the lives, the welfare and the well-being of the Canadian people are on the order paper that are not being dealt with because the flag has preoccupied our time. What was the hurry? What was the urgency?

Only three weeks ago I asked the Prime Minister on the orders of the day if he would agree to leave the flag debate until we had at least dealt with the national labour code, which after all affects the welfare of 650,000 workers in Canada who come under federal jurisdiction. The Prime Minister said no, that we had to deal with the flag. What we have had is one blunder after another and now the supreme folly of all, in my opinion, the forcing of a decision by means of closure.

I am not opposed to closure when it becomes necessary on legislation whose passage means improving the lot of the Canadian people. If the Canada pension plan or the national labour code or a medicare plan or some other plan upon which the Canadian people were waiting were involved, if there had been adequate time for debate and expression of opinion by all groups in the house, and if some obstreperous minority was holding it up, I would support closure. But I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that closure on a flag, closure on something about which there was no urgency, closure on something which is an emotionally charged issue that touches people's lives and beliefs and faith, is a totally different thing. After all, a nation only selects a flag once in its history. Surely it ought to be allowed to take time to make that selection after due reflection.

In respect of the navy bill in 1913 and the pipe line legislation of 1956, both of which have left scars on the political life of Canada, there was at least the excuse that there was a deadline to be met, but on the flag question there was no deadline at all to be met except the deadline established by the Prime Minister's own promise that we would have a flag by Christmas. The only real issue at stake was that parliament had to conform to the Prime Minister's timetable in order to maintain the Prime Minister's reputation and enhance his vanity.

I do not mean by what I am saying that I condone the filibuster which has been carried on by the Progressive Conservative party over a long period of time. I respect their point of view although I do not agree with it. I think they had adequate time to express their opinions repeatedly, and they did so. But I think there comes a time when there ought to be a decision and I think they would have been wise to have allowed parliament to make a decision long before this. But the sad thing, Mr. Speaker, is that we have had in this parliament the spectacle of the present Prime Minister saying "we are going to have a flag by Christmas" and the former prime minister of Canada saying "you are not going to have a flag by Christmas".

An hon. Member: What do you say?

Mr. Douglas: My friend says "what do you say". I think Canadians deserve something better than this from their two major political leaders. That is what I think. I think the spectacle we have witnessed in recent weeks has reduced parliament to a farce. It has been a childish exhibition that has done this country no good.

The thing that concerns me most, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure it must concern the Prime Minister, is that the two things he was hoping to accomplish by introducing this flag have been destroyed by the method which has been used to bring the matter to a decision. The first thing the Prime Minister was hoping to accomplish was to establish national unity. I do not think that the action taken today will do anything to enhance national unity.

Last week the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) were suggesting closure. I make an appeal to my French Canadian friends. I say to them very frankly that we English speaking people in Canada have too often and too long been callously insensitive to the susceptibilities of the French Canadian people. We acknowledge that and we ought to apologize for it. We ought to try to rectify it. But, Mr. Speaker, it must also work both ways. I ask the French Canadian members who are crying for closure to stop and ask themselves this question. If the committee had recommended the union jack or the red ensign and the members from Quebec had been speaking out vigorously against it, as I am sure some of them would have, would they have asked for closure or supported closure? I do not think so.

I am not one of those who thinks this flag is a concession to Quebec. As a matter of fact, I am convinced that the great bulk of the English speaking people in Canada will support this single maple leaf design. However, I would remind the French Canadian members that there is an English speaking minority, with whose views I do not concur, but I respect those views and I am prepared to fight for their right to have those views; and it seems to me that imposing closure is not likely to improve the feeling between the two founding races and is not going to promote national unity.

Mr. Balcer: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. Does he consider that the French Canadian members are restricting the freedom of speech of the English speaking members when, after 200 speeches, they ask for an opportunity for the house to take a decision?

Mr. Douglas: Well, my hon. friend ought to have more influence in stopping some of those speeches than I am likely to have. However,

I agree with him that when a debate has gone on a long time everybody gets sick and tired of it. I am suggesting when you are trying to select a flag, which you select only once in the lifetime of a nation, you will be far better to put the matter aside and let the idea become familiar, to see if you cannot find some basis upon which you can get a greater consensus than that which obtains at the present time.

I have only two minutes left, Mr. Speaker, and I want to make my last point. The other purpose the Prime Minister was hoping to accomplish by introducing this flag was to get general acceptance across Canada. I think that the government had a golden opportunity to have introduced a flag that would have given voice to Canadians' sense of pride in their country. Instead of that, we are in danger of having a flag which is going to be launched in bitterness. I hope not.

An hon. Member: Why mention it?

Mr. Douglas: The hon. member says, "Why mention it?". I fear for the reaction to a flag that is hoisted by closure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; I must bring to the attention of the hon. member that according to the information received from the table his time has expired, unless he has unanimous consent of the house to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas: If I may have two minutes; I was interrupted a great deal.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the house would allow the hon. member two additional minutes to compensate for the interruptions.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas: I wanted to say that in my opinion only a government which had lost its sense of values, which had become obsessed with a political death wish, would have compounded its long list of blunders by the supreme folly of invoking closure on a measure so emotionally charged as the flag. I hope I am wrong. I hope that any bitterness or any rancour that has been aroused will be forgotten. I pledge myself and the party with which I am associated that we will not only vote for this flag but we will do everything in our power to get the Canadian people to support it—to support it as their flag. We will do all we can to get people persuaded to put any bitterness or enmity behind them and to push on to the future, to build the kind of country over which that flag will fly as a symbol of Canada's greatness, its peace and its prosperity.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks made by the leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Douglas) and to those of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) concerning the adoption of a distinctive national flag.

The hon. member who just resumed his seat said a while ago that the understanding between English speaking and French speaking Canadians must be effected in relation to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret that I must interrupt the hon. member, but according to the information which has just been handed to the Chair, the hon. member for Villeneuve already took part in the debate on the amendment when he spoke Friday afternoon, December 11 last. According to standing orders, he cannot speak twice on this amendment.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, may I ask you if we are on the amendment or on the main motion?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are on the amendment. The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) now has the floor.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had the opportunity to speak on the amendment under consideration but I feel that our party's point of view must be put forward on this last night of the flag debate.

I would say that one sentence in particular caught my attention, if not several, in the speech the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) has just made. He asked us to be patient; he said that a flag is chosen only once in a lifetime, that a decision must be postponed if there is not unanimous agreement in this house. And yet, a few minutes before, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam had congratulated the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) for taking today a step which none of his predecessors had dared take about a distinctive national flag.

Talk of a distinctive national flag is nothing new. Henri Bourassa brought the matter up in this house in 1910 and 1911, but, at that time, they did exactly what the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam proposed a while ago. The issue was put aside for lack of unanimity.

How many times, under the R. B. Bennett administration, from 1930 to 1935, did hon. Senator Pouliot say he himself had introduced, before the war, a motion for the adoption of a distinctive national flag? That was 30 years ago, and his resolution was shelved until there could be some degree of unanimity.

How many other members of this house, in 1944, 1945, every year for the last 20 or 30 years, have put forward a motion in this house for the adoption of a distinctive flag? But such a motion was never agreed to in the past on the grounds that there was not enough unanimity.

Today if the Prime Minister were to withdraw his motion or shelve it, I ask every member of this house, and particularly the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), when we would ever have this distinctive national flag?

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam said that this is something which is given but once in the life of a nation, but how old must our nation be before we can fly this flag? Must we wait until we become more deeply mired in old traditions before we adopt this flag? We have been oblivious about this flag long enough. I do not approve the Prime Minister on many other points, but I do not hesitate to say that I support him unreservedly on this point, since he was courageous enough to introduce his measure, resist all pressures and maintain his intention to give the people of Canada a distinctive national flag.

Our attitude in this respect is very clear. These eternal discussions have lasted long enough, even too long, putting off until tomorrow a distinctive national flag and a national anthem for Canada, because we are convinced that such feelings reflect a true Canadianism, and we want this to become a fact.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and others before him have made a pathetic appeal in favour of good relations between English and French speaking Canadians. But how can English Canadians and French Canadians endeavour to understand each other? This understanding must work both ways.

Mr. Grafftey: That's right, it must work both ways.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, here is a question I want to ask all members of this house: Which of the two groups has done more toward good understanding? The English Canadian group or the French Canadian group? During the 17 years the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was premier of his province, during the 17 years he held that post, how were French Canadians treated in his province, with regard to the school question, as compared to English Canadians in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I be allowed to suggest to the hon. member for Lapointe that the comments he is now making are beyond the limits of our discussion?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if my comments are not within the ambit of this debate, then why was the matter brought up a while ago? Since I am only speaking about objections raised earlier, I think my remarks are in order. If a previous speaker was allowed to express his views on the subject, I feel I am also entitled to voice my opinion.

Mr. Speaker, understanding between English Canadians and French Canadians must work both ways, because this is essential in order to come to an agreement. It must be like the wheels of an engine on railroad tracks; they must turn in the same direction, not one in one direction and the other in the opposite direction.

What has happened since confederation? Can the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam tell me that French Canadians have not made every effort in the province of Quebec to co-operate with and understand the English element? I claim that they have done as much and even much more than the English Canadian governments in the other provinces, including the Saskatchewan government during the 17 years when the member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was premier. Had he asked the French Canadians in his province if they were treated as well as the English Canadians in our province, I do not think he would have made that pathetic appeal a while ago, because I think we have done more than our share and I think we have worked for Canadian unity. If the question comes up today, it is not because we have not done our share, but perhaps because efforts have not been made for Canadian unity in all parts of the country.

Maybe there have been some extremists on one side, but there have been some on the other also. We are asked this question: Had the committee proposed the red ensign or the union jack, would you have supported it or would you not have fought to the death? In answer to that objection, I would say this: We have had it for 97 years, we have accepted it for 97 years. Today, English speaking Canadians are not being asked to become French Canadians but to become just plain Canadians. We are prepared to fight so that each and every one of us may become Canadians. We have been lukewarm Canadians long enough, Canadians too closely connected with other countries, while we believe that Canada must be really independent, as mentioned by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

I admit that objections have been raised regarding the selection of a flag design. But when have you seen a country select a flag by means of a national referendum or a vote of members of parliament? Canada would be the first country to do this. The value of a flag does not depend on its colour, on what is on it or on its design, but on what it symbolizes. A flag represents a country where you feel at home, for that is the definition of the motherland. The motherland is where you love to live, where you feel at home. That is what a flag should represent. It is not a picture, a photograph or a drawing, it is something representing the motherland, and I have just defined what is the motherland.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that in the selection of a flag we should not pay too much attention to unimportant details, but rather try to design something which we will fly as a symbol of the motherland where everybody will be glad to live, that is in an independent Canada constituted by Canadians of different races, but races getting along with one another. And it is true that races can get along together.

Since the beginning of the debate on the flag, I had the opportunity of talking with Conservative members who rose in the house to express opinions which were flabbergasting to a genuine Canadian citizen, but when I had a friendly chat with them, understanding was possible. How is it that understanding is possible between two individuals of different races but that this understanding becomes practically impossible when one takes the floor to speak on behalf of a political party in the house? That is the whole question. To answer that question is answering the important question of Canadian unity.

When she was last in Canada, Her Majesty the Queen said that one's own patriotism should not keep one from understanding the patriotism of others.

Mr. Speaker, I quite understand that many Canadians will see with regret, even with sorrow, the red ensign lowered to be replaced by a new flag. However, Mr. Speaker, if they truly love their country, they will understand that they are saluting more than a flag, that they are indeed saluting the country in which they live. I admit and understand the grief, the sorrow they will feel; still, emotions and feelings must not always dictate our conduct. They should rather try to look to the future of Canada, without forgetting the past, our forefathers' heritage.

We should think in terms of a great country, a country that wants to develop itself, in short a country, as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam said—and I agree with him on this point—which may become greater than those which contributed to its foundation and development. But, if we are to vote once in our lifetime on a flag, let us do it, at least, while we are still alive.

Mr. Speaker, we do not consider this matter as a quarrel between French Canadians and English Canadians, but we believe that the debate on the flag will have been a tremendous test concerning the future of mutual understanding and unity in Canada. It will have been a test of understanding between our Canadian citizens, in short, between the two main races which make up this country.

And if one wonders about the success of this test about the mutual understanding which may exist in Canada, there is certainly no cause for rejoicing, because we find that, before thinking as statesmen, too many members tried to play politics with this matter. Therefore, I think that the test of the flag debate is a lamentable failure and only served to point out that there was still too great a divergence of opinions in this country.

But we shall have a flag. It will be perhaps unfortunately voted in by applying closure. But if the closure rule had not been imposed, when would we have had this flag? Perhaps never, and it would have been shelved once and for all.

But, the flag once adopted by parliament, we hope that everybody will say: This is now Canada's flag, let us now work for Canada's growth and development, so that we, and the future generations can be proud of it.

This will promote throughout the country a better Canadian spirit and, therefore, a better understanding between Canada's two great races.

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Today we have seen most unusual and, I believe, unfortunate developments in connection with the question of our national flag.

The amendment we are presently considering, as proposed by my hon. friend from Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) reads as follows:

That the sixth report of the special committee be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to strike out in paragraph 7 all the words after "Canada" and substitute "be the Canadian red ensign."

Acceptance of this amendment would mean that paragraph 7 of the committee report would read:

Your committee therefore recommends that the flag to be designated as the national flag of Canada be the Canadian red ensign.

I do not think it will be any news to hon. members of this house when I say I have no hesitation whatsoever in favouring paragraph 7 as amended.

I wish now to refer to the speech which was made by my hon. friend from Middlesex West on Friday, because I feel he outlined in that speech the objective of every member of this house. I have no hesitation in saying he represented my views to the fullest possible extent. I quote from his remarks as reported on page 11023.

The party to which I have the honour to belong, in common with all other parties in the house, is doing, I believe, whatever it can to promote national unity in this country. Opinions may differ as to how national unity can best be promoted. There are honest differences of opinion regarding the procedure which should be adopted with this end in view. Our party has taken the stand that for the government to impose a flag by a vote of this house is not the best way to promote national unity. We have the right to present our view and to urge our view upon all hon. members of the house. We wish national unity—

In my opinion the proposition that we shall have national unity in the present circumstances, especially in the circumstances of closure, is a misleading one and the action now being taken by the government will not bring about the result which is generally desired. I wish to quote from today's copy of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald in support of this view. The writer is a distinguished member of the press gallery, Mr. Eric Dennis, and he has this to say in connection with the whole matter of national unity and what is likely to happen if the committee's report is accepted. He says:

What will be the reaction when the maple leaf flag is hoisted over the peace tower, over every federal building, every military installation, every military cemetery in which Canada's war dead lie buried, at the United Nations, every Canadian embassy abroad and at NATO, as will be required once the new banner is officially proclaimed?

Will there be the embracing of it from sea to sea which Prime Minister Pearson so eloquently pleaded for in his final speech on the issue Friday?

Will there be, as Holmes said "one flag, one land, one heart, one hand?"

The writer has certainly asked a most pertinent series of questions. In the same article he proceeds to answer them. He says:

British Columbia Premier W. A. C. Bennett already has promised that four flags will fly by official sanction over the legislative buildings at Victoria—his province's own banner, the maple leaf design, the red ensign and the union jack.

Quebec is certain to keep the fleur-de-lis flying for years to come despite the insistence of its federal representatives that it did not want even this emblem incorporated in the new Canadian flag.

It will take a good time before the red ensign comes down in the maritimes and many other parts of Canada.

And Newfoundland's Premier J. R. Smallwood has made it plain the full union jack will not be pulled down over his island.

If this is an indication of what is expected should this motion pass, and we assume it will, it seems to me the government has taken a tremendous responsibility on its shoulders.

Some members may be wondering why I should reiterate my support for the red ensign, a stand I have taken many times in this chamber. This evening my hon. friend and next door neighbour here, the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) quoted from Abraham Lincoln, the great emancipator. I intend to quote the same great statesman. Abraham Lincoln at one stage in his career uttered these words—they are very short but they are very potent and most pertinent to this subject. He said: "To sin by silence when they should protest makes cowards out of men". I do not propose there should be any doubt in the minds of anyone in this chamber or in Canada about where I stand on this particular question.

The recent development to which I referred a few minutes ago was this decision to use closure which would put an end to the debate on the amendment favouring the red ensign. Hon. members may properly ask: do you favour closure? I find myself saying that I do not favour closure when it has the effect of discarding a flag which has been used as the national flag of Canada to a greater or lesser degree for almost 100 years. This is one time when I do not think closure is justified. I agree with my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) that there are times, when important legislation is being held up with an ulterior purpose in mind, when closure may be justified. I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) who said that this was a time when closure was not justified, especially in view of the amendment now proposed. I do not question the advantage of closure when used in the national interest, but in this case I think—and I say this advisedly—that the contemplated action does not qualify under the general heading of what is good for Canada.

I said in a previous speech that the changing of the flag of a country was in the same category as changing its constitution, and I repeat those words. This action should never be taken on a mere majority vote. I also said in a previous speech that changing a flag which has been in use for something like 100 years is a responsibility which should not be taken as a result of a majority vote taken of 265 members of parliament. I know there is a great deal of difference of opinion on this matter, but I think the reasons for not changing a flag without a great deal of consideration and deliberation cannot be challenged.

I am one of those who listened to the speech of the Prime Minister on Friday last most attentively, but I found myself taking exception to many of his conclusions. He quoted words attributed to Mr. Speaker Lemieux and he acknowledged they were a moving illustration of what is best in our history. But he also stated that they were an indication of how history changes and that we should not ignore the lessons of history when we support Canadian symbols for Canadian nationality. My contention in this connection is that we do not eliminate historical symbols in the process of incorporating what the Prime Minister referred to as Canadian symbols. Surely there is no need to eliminate all that is good and which we treasure in the past in order to incorporate something into our flag.

In this connection I want to quote an editorial which appeared in the Montreal Gazette for this morning which talks about the division of the country. In speaking of this division the editorial says:

> It recalls the saying of Mr. Louis St. Laurent, when he was prime minister, that he would not introduce a new flag until he was satisfied that it would do more to unite than to divide the country. To be ready to divide the house but not the country suggests an embarrassment over the issue. Yet it remains true that in avoiding a flag election the government is acting wisely. Whether the government was as wise in getting itself into its present position is another matter.

That, Mr. Speaker, is where I say the government has made a tremendous mistake. As I have said many times, and as other hon. members have said, it is the government's handling of this whole question to which we object.

[Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton).]

I should like to draw the attention of the house to the order in council which was passed in 1945, and I do so only to refer to the second paragraph thereof, which in my opinion is a vital paragraph. After the usual preamble the second paragraph states:

> That the Canadian red ensign was employed by Canadian forces during the present war;—

That was one of the reasons for carrying into operation this order in council by which the use of the Canadian red ensign was made legal within and without Canada. That reason has stood for the last 20 years and still stands today.

What has happened, Mr. Speaker, to bring about this change? In view of the special mention which the Canadian red ensign received in that order in council, this house should hesitate for a long time before interfering with the aims and objectives of the order in council itself. According to the Prime Minister, as reported at page 11032 of Hansard he said:

> It was not until 1945...that the union jack was replaced by the red ensign as an official flag for Canada. At that time we all remember that a great many sincere people in Canada opposed that change. Many who are now worried about the change from the red ensign were worried about a change from the union jack, but I think we all agree now that this was a desirable and an inevitable stage in our national progression.

I am sure everyone will agree with that; there is no question about it. But, Mr. Speaker, how can we ever justify the discarding and destroying of the symbols in our flag under which the same progression to which the Prime Minister refers has been made? Why do you throw something away under which you have made great progress, and substitute something else for it? Why should it be eliminated?

Then the Prime Minister went on to say that the order in council was made pending only a decision of the committee which had been set up at that time. I do not know how long the committee took to report; one of the hon. members who spoke this afternoon stated it took a year and a half. However, it did report following a majority vote of 23 to 1. It recommended that a golden maple leaf replace the Canadian coat of arms.

I would draw to the attention of the house the fact that the prime minister of that day, Right Hon. Mackenzie King, did not implement the report of that committee. The house never had before it a motion for concurrence in that committee's report. I am one of those who think the prime minister of that day had good reason for not doing this, and I give him full marks in that regard.

Then in 1948, after allowing the red ensign to remain the national flag of Canada and to fly at home and abroad, Mr. Mackenzie King was replaced by Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent as prime minister of Canada. Mr. St. Laurent continued in office until 1957, a period of nine years, and Mr. St. Laurent did not change the Canadian flag. And I have no doubt that Mr. St. Laurent also had good reason for leaving it alone.

We now find this government coming into office, and one of the first things it does is to bring before the house this motion, and it does so in such a partisan way that it seems as though it is going to have a very adverse effect upon the unity of our nation. The government presented a motion for a design to this parliament last spring consisting of three maple leaves conjoined on one stem. It was presented to the house by the Prime Minister in an eloquent speech. Many speeches were made from this side in opposition to it. There were a few speeches in support of it. Many points were made in connection with it. Then agreement was reached to refer it to a committee. A majority report of the committee did not favour the three maple leaf design as approved by the Prime Minister, his government and their supporters, but recommended another design. Now the government, the Prime Minister and his supporters seem to be quite willing to concur in the report of that committee, even though that committee did not concur with the original submission made by the government to this parliament. They changed their ideas completely and seem today apparently to have lost interest. They discarded the three maple leaf design as quickly or quicker than they discarded the Canadian red ensign. They have now become enthusiastic about the one maple leaf flag. There has been a complete right-about-face which leads us properly to interpret their main intention as being to eliminate the union jack from its place on our flag. We have been using that union jack in an official capacity for almost 20 years, and for almost 100 years to a greater or lesser degree.

In the course of the Prime Minister's remarks, as they are recorded at page 11036, he said:

> Unfortunately there has been a great deal of depreciation and sneering about the maple leaf as an emblem on a flag. I do not understand why hon. members opposite take that attitude toward this symbolism of Canadianism. I suggest it is unfortunate that the impression has been created in certain areas and quarters that the maple leaf is not worthy of being a national symbol of Canada on a flag, and I hope that when the dust of the debate has cleared away, if this recommendation carries, we will all be proud of the fact that the central feature of our flag is a red maple leaf.

In connection with the modified red ensign I should like to refer to the fact that when the committee was voting on different designs one vote related to a design which had a maple leaf in the centre. That flag had the very thing incorporated in it about which the Prime Minister said in his speech there was some prejudice. The committee did vote on a motion to support a flag with a maple leaf in the centre, with symbols of French and English heritage on either side, but that design did not carry in the committee. I mention that fact simply because it refutes the argument made by the Prime Minister that there is some prejudice against the red maple leaf as such.

Mr. Speaker, I see you nodding your head, and you have been very kind to me, so I will bring my remarks to a conclusion. I should like to refer to many other things, but I appreciate the attention which I have received from all hon. members of this house and will now take my seat.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): I should like to refer to one or two things which have been mentioned earlier by preceding speakers. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Pugh) referred to the fact that there had been 22 days of debate on the previous resolution and 11 days debate, including today, on the present motion to concur in the sixth report of the committee. I should like to stress very strongly that the 22 days of debate took place on a resolution to adopt the three maple leaf design. The present debate is related to the one maple leaf flag. I do not understand why we should be criticized for debating this issue to the extent we have debated it, and I admit it has been rather a long debate, in view of the fact that we believe this is the most serious subject that has come before this parliament for consideration.

Certain editorials across this country have criticized us for delaying the adoption of a flag. They have pointed out that we have debated 22 days on the first flag and 11 days on this motion for concurrence. The two debates dealt with two flags, both sponsored by the government. We ask the question: Which flag does the government want? It is obvious that the government has no answer to that question.

I believe the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) said this evening that it was very important to have something overseas which could be recognized as Canada's own distinctive national flag. I am sure the Canadian red ensign is known abroad as Canada's national flag. In relation to that which people in embassies and other places overseas think about a national flag, what do the 19 million Canadian people who live in Canada, and who might never have the opportunity of travelling abroad, think about the national flag? It is those people and their opinions about which I am concerned. I feel very strongly that we are dealing tonight with an issue which affects the hearts and souls of every Canadian. There are different points of view on this subject and I appreciate the points of view of those who do not agree with me. However, I cannot understand why we who stand for what has been Canada's national flag should be entirely deprived of any semblance of that flag on any proposed flag.

Tonight is the third time I have taken part in the debate on the flag issue. Perhaps I should receive one of the hats given out by that pinhead down in the corner; however, he is not in his seat at the moment. He took part in the debate a short time ago and I presume that he feels, having said what he did say, everything of importance has been said. As a consequence of that feeling he has left the chamber.

I make no apology for taking part again in this debate on the amendment to the motion to concur in the sixth report of the committee. I spoke first on August 24, at which time I outlined clearly my position on the flag issue. I would like to repeat some of the statements I made on that occasion, but unfortunately time will not permit me to do so. I do not back down from any statement I made on that occasion, and I state again that my position today regarding the whole national flag issue and the Canadian red ensign is as I stated it to be on that occasion.

Having sat as a member of the committee, which worked arduously for six weeks studying the whole situation, I had the honour to speak again on November 30 and move an amendment which called for a plebiscite. I do not intend to go into the pros and cons of holding a plebiscite, as they have been clearly set out on many occasions. All I can say in that regard is that the amendment was defeated, and we accept that fact. At the moment, Mr. Speaker, we are discussing an amendment moved by the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) to the same motion to concur and the vote on that amendment will in effect decide whether or not we are going to continue to have the red ensign.

[Mr. Monteith.]

Those who vote against this amendment are going to vote to tear down the red ensign; let there be no mistake about that.

My main reason for speaking now at all is that we are now going to lose the red ensign which this country has known in so many emotional circumstances. I have to agree that from the sense of the house tonight this is what will happen, no matter what may be said. We know their minds are made up. They are sitting stony faced across the way. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith), the Solicitor General (Mr. MacNaught), the purveyor of bumper stickers—there are not too many of them on the ministerial benches at this moment—they are all going to vote us down. I know that. However, I think we should be entitled to our last plea and our last fight. I do not think we should be chastised for putting up that fight.

I am going to be very frank and say that I do not think enough has been said in the press media about where the real fault lies for the present situation. Let us say that those who wish a new flag have every right so to wish. I am not quarrelling with those who wish a new flag. I am not quarrelling in the least with those who promote it. But surely others have the right to disagree. Surely those who have grown up with and have known no other flag have a right to disagree with respect to a new flag. Surely we have the right simply to maintain what we have now. What is wrong with that?

I claim that generally speaking the press has not been fair in fixing blame on a particular party for having caused disunity in Canada. Let us face it. We certainly have greater division and disunity today than we had last May when the flag question was introduced. There is no question about that. The government, Mr. Speaker, is completely responsible for this situation. All that the President of the Privy Council does is to get up and move closure. Let him get up and make a speech as to what he thinks of the whole situation.

They are responsible for the whole situation, Mr. Speaker. Surely when they first raised this question, particularly in the manner they did, they must have realized what would happen. They could have introduced this question in a more reasonable manner. We know that. They must have realized what would happen, but they just did not care. It is the same old arrogance dating back to 1956. I should like to refer to an editorial in today's Montreal Gazette to which the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) referred a little while ago. I should like to read one sentence:

> It recalls the saying of Mr. Louis St. Laurent, when he was prime minister, that he would not introduce a new flag until he was satisfied that it would do more to unite than to divide the country.

This is the point. You know very well, Mr. Speaker, that this whole flag question has done more to divide than to unite. Mr. St. Laurent knew that and so did his predecessor in office. They were very well aware of the situation. I should like to make one other reference. I trust I am not taking too much of the time of the house. I should like to refer to an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen of last Saturday.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Monteith: I do not know who yelled "order" over there, but get up on your feet and make a speech like a man.

Mr. Greene: If it was anything like yours I would sit down.

Mr. Monteith: You are much better sitting down.

Mr. Greene: So are you, but you do not know it.

Mr. Monteith: I should like to refer to this editorial because it accuses me as one of the Conservatives on the flag committee of having abandoned the red ensign. It reads in part as follows:

> The committee rejected the red ensign. Even the Conservative members of the committee abandoned the ensign and suggested a modified maple leaf flag—

This is an absolutely false statement. Today the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) had reason to rise on a question of privilege about an editorial in the Toronto Globe and Mail. I suppose I might well have got up on a question of privilege and raised this matter at that time. This statement is absolutely false. We never at any time abandoned the Canadian red ensign. When the matter was put to a vote we were defeated and after we were defeated we then tried to come up with a compromise which certainly was not acceptable either to the group across the way or to those down in the corner to my left.

I have read that there were only three choices open to the government, depending upon the viewpoint, I suppose. Some say two and some say three. The first was to abandon the plan, the second to impose closure and the third to have a plebiscite at the next election. We have discussed the matter of a plebiscite and as I said earlier I am not going to pursue that subject any further. The house has made its decision on it and I am willing to accept that decision, much as I dislike doing so. As a matter of fact, I believe the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) made some reference tonight to the fact that the matter might have been best decided by a referendum. If he said that, then I accuse him of at least some ambiguity in his thinking because he did not vote for a plebiscite when he had the chance to do so.

I come back to the point that some say there were two choices open to the government and some say there were three. However, the government has made its choice and has imposed closure. I claim it has done so only to save the government's face because this vote will cause much more disunity in Canada than anything that has happened before in my memory. I am quite convinced that if the government could see its way to abandon the matter even at this late date it would do a great deal of good. I know they are not going to do so, but I just cannot say strongly enough how much good I think such an action would do for Canada.

The argument over the flag has been going on over the last several months, though I agree in a somewhat spotty manner; but at the same time I strongly believe that the only solution is for the government to withdraw its proposal so that more disunity will not be created, because that is where we are heading when the vote takes place tonight. We started out with three leaves and we spent 22 days on that flag. Now we have the one leaf design and we are on the eleventh day. This is not compromise. Let us be reasonable. Positions have hardened. Sure, the Prime Minister has said this is supposed to be an open vote. What kind of an open vote is this? Do not let us be ridiculous. He declared it was not an open vote many long months ago. The other day during the debate he suggested perhaps it could be an open vote.

Positions in this House of Commons have hardened, Mr. Speaker. There is no possibility of an open vote today. There is no doubt about it that parliament and the country must now accept an imposed verdict, an imposed flag. This is all there is to it. It is as simple as that. There are not too many members here even on the backbenches of the Liberal party, and very few on the treasury benches, who had the actual experience as I did of going through closure back in 1956.

I know the government wishes to forget that. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) has indicated he would have liked to forget it. At one time he would have been willing to dispose of it. We have a new crop here today with the same mentality. They simply feel they have a divine right to rule. They will never learn.

I claim, Mr. Speaker, that this is our last stand for the Canadian red ensign, this flag which has been our country's flag for so many years, which has meant so much to practically everybody in Canada. I do not care from where they come, this flag has still meant a great deal to practically everybody. I come back now to an earlier statement I made. This government has done more by this particular manoeuvre, by bringing this whole question up as it has at the time it did, and in the way it did, to create disunity in Canada than anything else that could happen in this country. I only make a plea for those who do have some feeling for our past. I heard these views expressed by members from the other side in the committee. Could we not get together, could we not have something of the past as well as the present? I heard this view expressed. It has all gone by the board. We have nothing left that we can remember of our traditions, our heritage, part of our lives.

If this government had only waited. Sure, they ask, why do you want to wait? The Prime Minister said, what do you want to do, wait one year, two years or three years? I say, wait ten years until all the old codgers like myself are dead and gone, and then this question could be readily settled. Today it is causing a great deal of trouble. I see, Mr. Speaker, you have just received a slip suggesting that my time is up so I will resume my seat.

Mr. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, as the two previous hon. members who spoke, it was my privilege also to serve on the flag committee. I should like to take part in the final stage of this debate. First of all, I wish to state that working on the flag committee was an experience which I will not soon forget. You cannot associate yourself with 14 other members of the house for a period of six weeks, meeting two or three times a day, without gaining some knowledge, making new friendships and leaving something of yourself behind. These 14 members, Mr. Speaker, represented widely different areas of the country. They expressed their feelings and the aspirations of a cross section of Canada. We learned to respect, if not to share entirely, our individual views. We spoke freely. I feel that I came out from the committee richer for the experience and in knowledge. I believe we all came out better Canadians.

It had been hoped and even expected, Mr. Speaker, that we should come from the flag committee with a unanimous report. It is unfortunate that we did not come out with a unanimous report. Under the circumstances, I feel that it could not be so. To insist on a unanimous decision or a virtually unanimous decision, or to insist on an 80 per cent or 90 per cent majority, in my opinion, would not be democracy; it would be a virtual minority dictatorship. I say that if only the members of this house who were elected with 80 per cent or 90 per cent majority had been allowed to speak in this debate the filibuster would have been very short indeed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we were very surprised, and indeed saddened, to hear some hon. members opposite say that the members of the Liberal party on that committee were under instructions to carry out the orders and signals received from the outside. This is not the case. Speaking for myself, I entered the committee with an open mind. I left at the door both the government's model and the red ensign. I started from scratch. My worry was not to find ways and means of preserving the red ensign. My ambition was not to impose the government design. My sole desire was to learn, to secure knowledge in heraldry, in history, and to try to end up with a design which would be technically correct, beautiful to see and truly Canadian. This is what we did.

Mr. Speaker, the task assigned to us seemed very difficult at first. But after listening to the opinions of experts in heraldry, history and economics, we soon began to grasp the essential characteristics a truly Canadian flag should have. Three basic principles were established:

1. We found that, according to the royal proclamation of King George V, in 1921, the two national colours were white and red, and in support of this first principle, let me quote from the royal proclamation itself, as it appears in this booklet published by the Department of the Secretary of State and entitled "The Arms of Canada".

A Proclamation Declaring His Majesty's Pleasure Concerning the Ensigns Armorial of the Dominion of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, allow me to refer to the proceedings of the flag committee of 1945 and to quote a short excerpt from the testimony of a witness, Colonel Duguid D.S.O. an army historian of the Department of National Defence. Colonel Duguid read the royal proclamation of George V of which I have just read an excerpt and he then explained those excerpts as follows:

[Text]

And upon a Royal helmet mantled argent doubled gules the crest, that is to say, on a wreath of the colours argent and gules a lion passant guardant or imperially crowned proper and holding in the dexter paw a maple leaf gules.

That is the full verbatim text. It may sound like nonsense but it enables anyone who understands to draw and colour a picture, complete in every detail. It resembles a doctor's prescription. It is either understood or it is complete nonsense. Cleared of confusing terms and items, and written in plain language, with argent translated as white and gules translated as red, the vital part of the proclamation would read: "The King, at the request of Canada, assigns to Canada the national colours white and red."

[Translation]

Moreover, on February 5, 1963, that is the very day the previous Conservative government was defeated, the following answer was given to question No. 1,449 which asked:

Does Canada have national colours and, if so, what are they?

Answer: Yes, Canada has national colours, which are white and red.

Therefore, as a first principle, the two national colours are white and red.

We also reached our decision on the basis of this second principle: the only really Canadian symbol is the maple leaf. Besides, the great majority of designs submitted to us included either one or three maple leaves; and those designs came from every part of the country, mostly outside the province of Quebec.

The third principle by which we were finally guided to decide on the flag design is that heraldry does not allow the juxtaposition of colours or metals, that is one colour cannot be put on another and one metal cannot be put on another. Moreover, the only metals recognized in heraldry are gold and silver, that is yellow and white.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it was a matter of applying those principles to the problem submitted to us. The conclusions can be found in the committee report, and I quote the main conclusions which were finally reached by way of elimination.

(a) The three maple leaf design was retained by a vote of 8 to 6.

(b) The single maple leaf design was retained by a vote of 13 to 1.

(c) The design containing the union jack and/or the fleur-de-lis was rejected by a vote of 9 to 5.

Then, the committee had to choose between the three maple leaf design and the single maple leaf design, and another vote was taken. As we know, the single maple leaf design was retained by a vote of 14 to 0. However, it should be added that, on a last vote to determine whether or not the committee accepted finally and definitely the last design, the result of the vote was 10 to 4.
