Mr. Speaker, shortly after the committee on the flag had done its work, I had the honour and privilege to lead the Canadian delegates to NATO on a visit of the Canadian military bases in Germany and then to the NATO parliamentary conference in Paris; later on, we were the guests of the Berlin government. Before leaving, I took great care to place in my pocket a model of the flag chosen by the committee. And wherever I went, I showed it to the officers, the soldiers and the Canadians in Paris. On every single occasion, without any exceptions, the servicemen, from high ranking officers to buck privates, as well as Canadians in Paris, expressed their delight with the design chosen by the committee and all were happy to have a Canadian flag.

[Text]

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member permit a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Dubé: Certainly, as soon as I have finished my speech.

Before I left, Mr. Speaker, I met a high ranking officer in the Canadian army who told me that if the Canadian troops in Cyprus had a Canadian flag, many of their difficulties would be eliminated. In fact, in several instances the Canadian troops in Cyprus had to paint the word "Canada" on the walls which surrounded their encampments in order to avoid the shots which were intended for others. This means that the members of this house who claim that our soldiers do not wish a new flag should obtain their information at the true source.

Mr. Speaker, I know that four members of the committee, who proved so by their vote in the house, preferred the red ensign. It is their right, it is their privilege, and I respect their intentions. But they must respect the decision of others.

I also know that about 60 and perhaps more members in the House of Commons have preference for the red ensign. It is their right and their privilege, but they must take into consideration the wishes of the other 200 members. By their persistence in delaying intentionally the adoption of a new Canadian flag, I feel they throw our democratic mechanism out of gear, they make a mockery of parliament and they will have to answer for their actions before the people one day.

Mr. Speaker, the flag debate has been going on for 34 days. A committee was set up at the specific request of the Leader of the Opposition. This committee sat during six weeks, for a total of 45 hours. The question has been exhausted.

It seems to me the time has now come for all of us, and especially for those who have been telling us for weeks that they want to safeguard national unity, to support in this house this truly Canadian flag design and to salute it with pride when it becomes our new Canadian flag.

[Text]

Mr. MacInnis: I just want to take time enough to ask the hon. member whether he would now answer a question. I understood him to say that while travelling overseas, showing the design which was the choice of the flag committee to high ranking officers and other employees of the Canadian government in Europe and soliciting opinions on it, he had received favourable replies from those high ranking officers. I wonder if I understood him right. Did the hon. member say he had received favourable replies from all those high ranking officers and others down to the simplest privates. Is that what the hon. member said?

Mr. Dubé: Does the hon. member ask me whether all those to whom I talked about the flag and all those to whom I showed the design approved it? That is the case. They were all in favour—unanimous. I have not met a single person who did not like the model and who was not happy with it.

[Mr. Dubé.]

Mr. MacInnis: Such being the case, does the hon. gentleman not think that his reference to Canadian privates serving overseas in the Canadian army as "simple" is a disgraceful one and reflects a ridiculous attitude on the part of the hon. member?

Mr. Dubé: The only ridiculous comment is the one we have just heard.

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): I realize that the guillotine of closure has been raised and is ready to drop but I rise nevertheless to speak in favour of the amendment which has been introduced whereby we would instruct the flag committee to report back in favour of the retention of the Canadian red ensign as Canada's national flag.

In rising at this time I also wish to protest against the imposition of closure by a vote of the house which does not represent the majority of the voters of the Dominion of Canada. I voted against the imposition of closure this afternoon because I do not feel that closure should be applied by a government aided by the supporters it can find elsewhere in the house when the members of parliament themselves do not command the majority of the voters behind them. We have been told there is a mandate out for a Canadian flag. There has never been a plebiscite placed before the people asking them to express their views on Canada's national flag. We are simply told we have a mandate to change the present flag.

No practical politician would desire to lay too much stress upon the mandate theory of a general election. There are men who have been elected to this house because they are residents of the ridings in which they ran. Others have been elected because they have advocated some diversion of waters in British Columbia to the prairies; others because they had promised additional authority for the Department of Fisheries. There are 265 members of this house and there are 300 or 400 reasons why they are here. There is no underlying mandate given to the 265 members to impose a flag on this nation.

When you analyse the vote and see how few have been elected on majority votes it will be realized definitely that there is no mandate. In April, 1963, the Liberal party got 41 per cent of the national vote. The Conservative party got 33 per cent, the Social Credit party 12 per cent and the New Democratic party 14 per cent of the total national vote. That does not look like any mandate to anybody on the question of a national flag. A mandate is defined as a clear instruction, authorization or direction. How anyone can call a 41 per cent vote a clear instruction and authorization or direction is beyond my comprehension, particularly when there are scores of seats where the question of a flag was never even raised. But in August of this year, as I said in the course of some previous remarks, we were advised that the flag question had all been settled. The country had decided, and the three maple leaf flag was "it". A member of the cabinet was speaking in British Columbia when he made that flatfooted statement in August. That was the three leaf flag. In November, the same cabinet minister, speaking in the maritimes, said that 90 per cent of the country was in favour of the one leaf design. That was only three months later. What loyalty is there to suggested national emblems when you see people switching from the red ensign to a three leaf flag in August and to a one leaf flag in November? There is no loyalty there.

When it comes to the subject of closure and a free vote, three times in this house within the past two weeks we have had the opportunity of adjourning the debate to enable us to get off the flag question and proceed to some necessary government business. On all three occasions I voted for the adjournment of the debate. You know how the others voted in this house, Mr. Speaker. That was a free vote of course. Always voting the same way, but a free vote. Now, when closure is introduced we have a free vote. And notice how the vote went. It was again a free vote, of course. There was no control in that regard. I want to emphasize the fact that it was a free vote.

The statement was made in this house on Friday that although this is a minority government it is not a minority parliament. That is a very fine, mouth-filling phrase. But what are the facts of the matter? We are not a minority parliament, it has been said. I propose to give some figures which have taken me some time to analyse. I have had mathematical specialists undertaking this analysis for me. I would point out that the 129 Liberal members of this house did not receive a majority of the votes of the electorate in the ridings which sent them here. These figures have been compiled so as to include all by-elections held from April, 1963 up to and including Waterloo South and Westmorland. To continue, 129 Liberal members have 2,060,000 votes behind them. The same members have 2,082,000 votes against them. The Social Credit party has nine members in this house who were elected on the basis of 120,000 favourable votes with 166,000 votes against them. The nine Social Credit members gathered 41.9 per cent of the votes cast in their constituencies. The 18 members of the New Democratic party are here with 251,001 votes behind them and 356,879 votes against them. The 18 members of the N.D.P. in this house collected 41.2 per cent of the votes of the constituencies who sent them here. The Ralliement Créditiste, with 13 members, have 147,936 votes behind them and 168,725 votes against them. They gathered 46.7 per cent of the votes in the 13 constituencies which sent them here. I would point out that the Liberals, the Social Credit party and the Créditistes from which the closure votes came are a minority in their own constituencies, let alone a minority in the house. I have mentioned this point before and I can only mention it once again. I do not see how anyone can conscientiously support the application of closure when this government does not have a majority behind it. I am in favour of closure and it should be on the statute books; but it should only be used by a government which has an absolute control of the house and an absolute control over the constituencies for which its members sit. That is only fair and proper. When you have a majority government representing the majority of the voters, then it should have a free hand to impose objectives which it has stated to be its political intentions. But when you have a government which is only here, you might say, on sufferance without a majority vote behind them, closure should not be applied because it means that a minority of the voters in the country are applying closure to a majority of the voters in the country, which is the denigration of democracy.

I have been reading the remarks which were made in this house on Thursday and Friday last. I was absent from the house on Thursday last because I was sitting in the police court in Cooksville with the 12 taxicab operators whom the Department of Transport is persecuting—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cowan: I mean prosecuting—in connection with having picked up taxicab fares at Malton airport despite a ten year contract which the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) gave when he was minister to Air Terminal Transport without tender. We sincerely hope to get this matter on a legal and proper basis where there will be tenders for that government contract requested, and we hope that this ten year deal can be broken. That deal is for a longer period of time than the normal span of two complete parliaments. However, we are making progress on that. We had a good time on Thursday in front of Magistrate Andrews.

Then last Friday I was out of the house and I was paired with the seconder of this motion on the flag. I could not have had a better pair, unless it had been the chairman of the committee himself, and I thank the seconder for the pair. While I was out of the house a certain statement was made. The criticism was offered that, "as a result of some kind of deal with one part of Canada, with Quebec, and that somehow this is Quebec's flag. Mr. Speaker, nothing, could be more malevolently designed to stir up division and controversy in this country. It is untrue and it is unworthy". I regret that that matter was ever brought forward and I am glad I am not the one who brought it forward.

In this regard may I refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Lamontagne), our Secretary of State, on June 13 in Toronto, which is reported in the Toronto Daily Star. The Secretary of State made this statement to the press:

> The M.P. for Outremont-St. Jean conceded the new flag would be more widely accepted in Quebec than in the rest of Canada.

I wonder why, Mr. Speaker, it would be more widely accepted in Quebec than in the rest of Canada if it is not particularly desired in the province of Quebec?

Then we are told by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), as reported on page 11038 of Hansard for Friday last:

> If, Mr. Speaker, the absence from our national flag of symbols which to a large part of our people seem to represent early differences...is the absence of those earlier symbols from a Canadian flag too much of a sacrifice for the rest of us to make in the interests of unity in this country.

Who is being asked, Mr. Speaker, to make these sacrifices, and what are they being given in return? Why must one element of the community everlastingly be asked to make sacrifice, sacrifice, sacrifice in the interests of unity?

Now, Mr. Speaker, analysing the vote which took place in this house on Thursday I find that there were 45 Liberal members from Quebec who voted against holding a plebiscite. It is quite interesting to note that those 45 Quebec Liberals who voted against holding a plebiscite captured 622,230 votes in the April 1963 election, with 654,666 votes being cast against them. Where is the mandate there? Twelve of the Créditistes voted against the referendum. Those 12 Créditistes from the province of Quebec captured 133,235 votes, with 158,565 against. Five of the Social Credit members from Quebec voted against the referendum. They held 76,227 votes, with 87,600 votes cast against them. There were 99,489 votes for those seven Social Credit members of parliament when they were elected, and 118,367 votes were cast against them. With regard to the 12 members of the New Democratic party who voted against the plebiscite, there were 154,334 votes behind them and 219,089 votes against them. I give you those figures, Mr. Speaker, to show that a majority of the voters is not behind these people who have voted against holding a plebiscite.

The next question which comes up—

Mr. Scott: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Cowan: —is this: Why was this question raised in the first place? There was no need to bring it up.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cowan: I have mentioned before, and I repeat, that on the front page of the Ottawa Citizen for March 13, 1963 there is a headline with reference to the then leader of the opposition who was running for parliament. Perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was right when he said that statements made when running for parliament do not have to be put into effect once you are elected. But on the front page of the Ottawa Citizen four weeks before the election we read the headline "Pearson doesn't reject red ensign as our flag". Then follows a report by Southam News Services datelined Sherbrooke:

> Liberal leader Pearson said today he had "never rejected the red ensign as Canada's flag and do not do so now".
> Commenting on reports out of Winnipeg last week that he wanted to see something other than the red ensign as Canada's national flag Mr. Pearson said that he merely wanted a distinctive Canadian flag...
> To reject the red ensign would mean the rejection of a British symbol, the union jack, which means much to so many people who have served and fought under it, and this he did not advocate.

That statement was made, as I say, within four weeks of the election. That statement has never been denied, and there are men sitting in the press gallery who were in Sherbrooke, Quebec when that statement was issued to them. We cannot call them as witnesses from the press gallery, but I have been talking to them and I can identify them quite readily.

Now, I take it that the word of that speaker was to be trusted. He said on August 5 last, on a C.B.C. television network program:

I say that as one who honours the red ensign—

Therefore he will vote for its retention and not for its disappearance. Then he went on to say:

I hope that parliament will be able to decide this matter with a minimum of bitterness and rancour. I believe that when parliament does decide, the people of Canada will accept the decision of parliament.

If this parliament has a majority of the people behind it when it votes, then it is expressing the will of the people. Why does the leader of the government say:

I believe that when parliament does decide, the people of Canada will accept the decision of parliament.

I want to see a government which represents the decision of the people and the desire of the people when it votes. I do not like to see a parliament deciding something and then "believing" that the people of Canada will accept later the decision of parliament.

If we have to get rid of our old flag because of its historic connections, because it is not distinctively Canadian and not typical of this country, then why do we not get rid of our system of weights and measures? I find pints and quarts and bushels and pecks disturbing. And when it comes to gills and rods and poles and perches and acres and cubic feet, it is really upsetting. This does not belong to Canada. This is an English system, so why not have a purely Canadian system? Why do we bother with the English language?

Why do we speak in the English language? Why do we not get a language of our own? Why do we stick to the use of the French language, it does not belong to us? The French language belongs to France and the English language belongs to England. Let us have a language of our own.

I say, let us stick with the red ensign if we are proud of our history. Surely there is not one member of this house who would not say that the majority of the people of Canada believe as we do. When we vote let us vote in a manner to indicate our support for the retention of the red ensign, within the next two hours.

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to follow the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) who has just made a very eloquent address, in spite of the fact he is a member of the Liberal party. If we read the weekly report to the weekly press by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Francis) we might be led to believe that the hon. member for York-Humber will be run out of the party if he continues to express himself with that intestinal fortitude, which is not possessed by other members of his party. I congratulate that hon. member and take my hat off to him.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the address of the leader of the N.D.P., the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas). The Indian bands in my constituency very often honour individuals by making them members of the band and giving them names which relate to their characteristics. I am sure if that hon. member were honoured by the tribes of my constituency they would name him "Chief Two-Voice Tommie", because he spoke for us and against us; he combed the Liberals against the grain; he took a crack against the Conservatives hoping to create a vacuum, with the idea that he and his party in the long run would become the benefactors. In the long run I think the people of this country will understand that he is still preaching socialism.

I did not intend to speak during this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mandziuk: But I intend to speak now, so you need not applaud too hastily. I hesitated to take part in this debate because I felt it was moving in the direction of an Anglo-Franco dialogue, becoming louder as the time passed. It was creating disunity, I admit, but it was started by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) who was bound and determined that this flag should be placed foremost on the list of things to be done by this parliament, above important pieces of legislation. It was my feeling that a member who was of neither French nor English origin should act like a good neighbour when a common law husband and wife are fighting, and stay out of it.

I felt like staying out of this debate, but I was prompted to take part by the impressive speech of that sweet young lady, the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mrs. Konantz). She made a tremendous impression upon me, as I am sure she did on this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mandziuk: You perhaps will not applaud after you have heard the rest of what I have to say.

That hon. member discussed the history of Canada, told us about Mennonites, Germans, Ukrainians and Icelanders, but she did not tell us under what flag these people came to this country. She very deftly skirted around that fact.

She informed us that she was a member of the committee that studied the flag issue. I know how the Liberal members of that committee voted. The Prime Minister did not make any announcement to the members of his party as to how they should vote, and I do not suggest that the Liberal members were told how to vote. However, they knew what the Prime Minister wanted.

The Prime Minister during his outright speech in this house said, among other things, that there must be just one national flag. We do have another resolution on the order paper and, although I am not allowed to discuss it or even mention it, I should like to know why this debate is a two flag debate.

The Prime Minister also said that he had agreed to a compromise. I agreed with the Prime Minister when he said that the three leaf design was more attractive than this one maple leaf caricature which we now have before us. I agreed with him when he said that the three maple leaf design was a more attractive and beautiful flag than the design chosen by this committee. I support the amendment which, if adopted, would send this issue again to the flag committee.

We should give some consideration to the red ensign under which those people referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg South came to this nation. Those people were guaranteed certain freedoms—freedom of speech, freedom of religion—as well as British justice and fair play.

An hon. Member: They were guaranteed there would be no closure.

Mr. Mandziuk: They were guaranteed there would be no closure, yet we certainly have closure in this house.

An hon. Member: Your time has expired.

Mr. Mandziuk: During the 30 days of this debate, which I admit is a rather long period of time, few if any of the members who continually interrupt us have had guts enough to stand up on their feet and ask questions. All we have heard them say is "order, order" and "question, question". When I have completed my speech I will be glad to answer any questions, but I have the floor at this time.

I am pleased to know that there is one member on that side of the house who has the courage to stand up, but as far as those members who shout "order" and "question" are concerned, I must state that I am ashamed of their attitude and ashamed of this government and those who support it. I think the people of this country should be made aware of the fact that the members on the government side of this house have been glued to their seats, nailed to their seats, pinned to their seats, and by whose orders? They have been pinned to their seats by the orders of a man who, by the actions of some of his ministers, has been forced to send out a code of ethics. That man does not happen to be in the house at this time, but I suggest that if the division bell rings he will be here posthaste to vote for this flag which he suggests is the only one for this nation. He is the man who has said that he has compromised in accepting the one leaf design recommended by the committee rather than the three leaves design. Of course a member of parliament cannot make or take bets on the actions of the House of Commons, but I would bet that if the Créditistes, Social Crediters and members of the N.D.P. had not committed themselves to supporting that man, the right hon. gentleman who leads the Liberal party would not have pushed this flag through. Am I right in that or not?

He knows he has a majority in the house but he does not know whether he has a majority in the country, and the hon. member for York-Humber has said so plainly. I had an over-all majority over my three opponents of over 50 per cent. Yet I do not say I have a mandate. I am expressing my own opinion. I know the feelings of a lot of people. The government has no mandate but a majority has been guaranteed to these people who want to bury the past.

There is another matter I should like to bring up, the question of the founding races. The subject of the founding races is beginning to wear pretty thin. I too have studied Canadian history and I am not a member of either of the founding races. I am one of those who Mr. René Lévesque says have to become either English or French or—well, I am not going to say the rest. But, Mr. Speaker, out of me and the likes of me and all those mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mrs. Konantz) you can make darn good Canadians but you cannot make English or French people out of them but only good Canadians. The founding races? It was a marriage of convenience. I would say it was a common law marriage of the conqueror and the conquered. You might as well admit it. You cannot rewrite history, and I have studied Canadian history as much as you people have.

What of the conquerors? Most of them were United Empire Loyalists who came here after the revolution when the United States broke off from England. They wanted to live under the British flag. What did those in Lower Canada want? They were afraid that if they ever joined the United States they would be absorbed as the French have been absorbed in Louisiana, where there is no trace of the French language or culture. I do not know about the religious part of it. So it was a marriage of convenience, a common law marriage and the two parties are fighting today. Who started the fight? Not the English speaking segment of Canada at all, Mr. Speaker. That is the way I see Canadian history.

The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) said this was the last chance. I believe this will be the last time I will ever speak in favour of the red ensign. It will be the last time I will have the opportunity of doing so, and that applies to all other members.

An hon. Member: Let us vote.

Mr. Mandziuk: Oh, yes, I know you have got a guarantee that others will vote with you.

Mr. Woolliams: You were a Conservative once.

Mr. Monteith: He does not know any better.

Mr. Woolliams: You have said you never voted Liberal until you ran as a Liberal, Harry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair would like to hear the interesting historical summary.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Speaker, I know there are people in this country and many of the members across the way and to the left of us who will cheer when they pull down the red ensign. It will become a foot wiper in the same way as some have already wiped their feet on it in certain parts of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mandziuk: Yes, that has been proven.

An hon. Member: That is a stupid thing to say.

Mr. Mandziuk: That has been reported and never denied. There will be many foot wipers and some will cheer when the red maple leaf goes up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mandziuk: I am going to tell you this, Mr. Speaker. I like to see a man get up and say something instead of yak-yaking and hiding behind somebody else. We have heard that for 30 days. The Liberals have been glued and nailed to their seats. I wonder why? I do not know. I think the man who established the code of ethics for the whole cabinet must have established one for the whole party. That is perfectly all right. That is his business. But, Mr. Speaker, there are going to be many people in this nation who will have heavy hearts. They are going to be sorry to see the ensign come down.

An hon. Member: You hope.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Speaker, if any of these members of the Liberal party want to get up and ask me questions that is fine or if they want to speak after me I will be glad to give them part of my time, but they have not got what it takes.

An hon. Member: The guts.

Mr. Mandziuk: There are many who are going to have heavy hearts. Many are going to be sorry. We are not Africans, Mr. Speaker, and I am not insulting the Africans. I feel that if this parliament in its wisdom or ignorance, shall I say, adopts this flag, and I include the Senate and His Excellency the Governor General, I too will have to salute this flag. But I have one thing about which I am proud, Mr. Speaker. Two years ago the province of Manitoba enacted a provincial statute making the red ensign the provincial flag. I asked the premier of the province what he would do if the federal government relented and accepted the red ensign. He said, "Then we will just repeal our enactment". I do not think Mr. Roblin is happy. He would have been glad to repeal that act. I know where his sympathies lie. I know where Mr. Thatcher's sympathies lie and Mr. Manning's.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Smallwood.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Smallwood too. Many people will look upon the hauling down of the red ensign with heavy hearts. I speak with emotion because emotion is natural for those of my race. I am not trying to get into the family quarrel between those in the common law marriage, but so far as the people to whom the hon. member for Winnipeg South referred are concerned I want to correct the impression she left. They came here to live under a flag that gave them guarantees, that gave the people of Quebec the guarantees that enable them to speak and act as they do today.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Thomas) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, as we enter the last and dying hour of this debate I consider it a privilege and an honour to participate once more in our discussions as the House of Commons reaches a very historic stage in the establishment of the flag which will be flown in Canada. A few days ago I had the pleasure, as I have this evening, of making a contribution to this debate regarding one of the amendments which was then before the house. At that time I laid before me on my desk four, five or six prominent daily newspapers from across the two main provinces of Canada, and I indicated the importance of their headlines for that day. None of the headlines made any reference to the flag debate which was taking place in the house at the time. There was a sinister warning made on that particular day to me and all Canadians by the reference to those things which are unsatisfactory in our Canadian political life. Those references had a bearing, in my opinion, on the words I used on August 12, the day I first participated in this debate. It is not my intention this evening to be as lengthy as I was on that occasion, but because of the close association of that warning with the words I used at that time, and the close association between the situation as it existed at that time and as it exists tonight, I should like to quote from that speech of August 12, at which time I quoted from a book known as "The Fight for Canada" by W. Wood, with reference to the time Canada was a colony of France. I said:

> We find that Vaudreuil was "—a liar, a backbiter, and a pettifogger, utterly unfit for his great position; and the best excuse that can be made for him is that he was almost as great a fool as a knave."
> Dealing with Bigot it says:
> "He deliberately set to work to create universal destitution in order that he might requisition help from France and make his commission on it."

Is there not a comparison to be found between the situation which existed at that time and the situation which exists today?

The government has chosen a very inopportune time to suggest that it has the right to present a national flag for Canada under existing circumstances. I think this is particularly true when one considers what might have been done during the long summer months, during the months of the fall, and during the months of the winter, to the greater advantage of the people of Canada than a debate such as we have had on a flag issue.

I think also of the situation which has faced the eastern farmers, and what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) has said about that situation. That situation has grown worse at least in the area which I have the honour to represent. The Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) stated that the farmers of eastern Canada were in a very sorry state so far as their economical situation is concerned. Many of my colleagues, as well as myself, have pleaded with the Minister of Agriculture to do something about this situation. What was his answer to this plea? It was simply that if we just keep quiet everything will look after itself. He stated that we were not rendering the farmers of eastern Canada any service by mentioning the situation. I guess this house did not do them any service by fighting this flag battle, because while we were debating the national flag issue the Minister of Agriculture forgot about the growing protest on behalf of the eastern Canadian farmer. Surely this house could have rendered some more beneficial service to the people of Canada than has been rendered them during the course of this debate.

I believe this night is an historic one. We are approaching Christmas, that season hallowed by the Christian world. I believe Canada is a Christian country, and that Christianity is part of our heritage. I believe that Christianity is representative of our way of life and, as I said on August 3, 1960, Christianity as brought down to us through English common law also forms a part of the laws of this country and the laws of the United States. I quoted an authority at that time, Mr. Speaker, and that authority is still the one to which I refer in support of my argument today.

The purpose of my brief speech this evening is this. An hon. member who spoke earlier in the course of this debate made a very earnest and passionate appeal, and speaking as to the other side of the question he said that the adoption of the flag now before us for consideration would not have application in Christian heritage. He said the flag would have no application to those things we cherish in our legal structure, or our institutions.

When I returned home last Sunday and, as is my custom, I attended church service with my wife and family, the man who preached the sermon impressed on me very emphatically that the times in which we live are changing. He said that Christianity was not keeping pace with the increase in the population of the world. He said that all churches which regard themselves as Christian churches were tending to adopt Christianity as an easy thing, and treating it just like a club, rather than a religion. He said there was a tendency by this mode of life to remove symbols, such as the cross, from Christianity. He went on to say, as I indicated this evening, that if we remove the cross as a symbol of something which we who call ourselves Christians believe in, we are actually denying our Christian heritage.

Mr. Speaker, I deplore the fact that all Canadians who find themselves in the situation with which we are faced tonight will grieve the denial of our Christian heritage under the flag which is proposed to be flown over Canada. I feel as sincerely about this as anyone who takes a different position.

As I present my point of view to the house tonight, I am not unmindful of the contributions which were made during the world wars, and while my contribution was insignificant, one of my colleagues lies beneath the ground somewhere in Holland. He died as a result of being shot down. That situation is not unlike the situations of several of our colleagues on the other side of this house, and I have particularly in mind a member of the family of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill).

With all sincerity I do not think we will ever live down the fact that we are removing something which men who have given their lives, honoured as part of Canada's Christian and democratic heritage.

[Mr. Winkler.]

Mr. Gérard Ouellet (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, on September 2 I took part in the proceedings of this parliament in order to express my views in the controversial Canadian flag debate.

Let me say first of all that, in my opinion, a distinctive flag is not an extinctive flag. I wonder why Canadians of my province who, in many respects, show so much faithfulness to their origins, have ceased to believe in the mission assigned to them by Providence.

Unfortunately, I fail to understand why, in considering this delicate matter of selecting a flag, they admit so readily that the fleur-de-lis should disappear from our flag, even from our mind, and forever. Perhaps they agree with the remarks made last Thursday night, December 10, by the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) who stated this, as reported on page 11023 of Hansard:

> I understand the feelings of our friends. They are quite willing to forgo any symbolism of our French heritage in Canada provided they can, at the same time, eliminate all the symbolism of the British heritage in connection with our country from our flag.

On second thought, those words seem to me strictly true. I knew before that the hon. member was living in an aura of wisdom. This reminds me of King Solomon's characteristic touch when he offered two women, who were quarrelling about the possession of a young child to cut the living child in two. The true mother then preferred yielding her child to seeing it die before her eyes. I leave it to each of you to draw his own conclusions from this excerpt of the book of wisdom.

Of course, I am in favour of a Canadian flag, but a single flag, representing, or comprising the symbols of the union jack and the fleur-de-lis, with a green maple leaf.

On this last point, I must say this. The hon. member for Vegreville, Alberta (Mr. Fane), this noble representative of a riding where 40 different nationalities are living together in harmony and who, moreover, has received a third mandate with an absolute majority, insisted upon the inclusion of a green maple leaf. I thank him for this.

Are you aware that a red leaf maple tree does not mean much to a maple sugar producer? I myself am a maple sugar producer, so I have a knowledge of the facts. The good varieties of sugar and syrup maple trees have green leaves during the spring as well as in summertime; in the fall, the leaves take a yellowish colour, the same as that of ripe wheat, then they fall and return to the soil. The red leaf maple tree may be lovely to look at, but that is all that can be said for it, as far as its practical value is concerned.

In proceeding with my investigation on this point, I noted on page 11038 of Hansard in the left hand column, words that in my opinion, come from a true diplomat—from the Prime Minister's lips—about the maple leaf for our flag, and I quote:

> —it has become so deeply a part of our symbolic history. This is especially true when the other symbol of our past, which has appeared on our flags in the past, the union jack, is to be recognized in another way.

There is the core of the problem. I want to dispense with any comment.

Quite often I find I am asking myself questions; it seems I am looking at myself and at everything around me, and I have the feeling that we are at the crossroads.

At this time those nations who yesterday celebrated their independence with glee are plunged into days of agony. They thought that they must at all costs rid themselves of imperialists, Belgian imperialists, Dutch imperialists, French imperialists and British imperialists. Was it a decision based on a common desire to thwart materialism, injustice and hatred in order to follow in the path of love? I do not think so, Mr. Speaker.

I think it was a day of victory for facility, for licence, for materialistic forces over moral forces. In that regard, everyone of us has a responsibility, because we are interdependent in this world.

But however, is it necessary to insult our Queen, Her Majesty Elizabeth II, to declare our eagerness to lead the good fight against the abuses of capitalism, against famine, leprosy, nakedness and against corruption in the public service, sure symptoms of our despicable selfishness? No, no, no.

Those who know me are not surprised to hear me give such a testimony in this house today.

In the tradition of my family, I learned that in two different periods, several Ouellets gave their lives serving the king of France, here in Canada in the province of Quebec, and then later under the régime recognized by the Paris treaty, and today I want to be worthy of my ancestors. I recognize that England did make some errors in her colonial policy. I think, however, she did her best for us, French Canadians. In any case, we had not been spoiled by France.

In fact, each of us believes he is invested with undeniable powers, or at least with a fair possession of a political and legislative power.

Mr. Speaker, if our loyalty towards the French Canadians rests on the contempt or persecution of anything that is not French, whether it is toward the members of this house or of the other place, or elsewhere, then we put justice and charity on the rack.

I have always believed that when love and hate meet and face each other, victory goes to love. Our Canadian political history teaches us lessons to remember and, as a member for the county of Rimouski, a county which is inscribed in the golden book of Canadian democracy, here is why.

Indeed, we all learned that one day Sir Georges Étienne Cartier was elected in Manitoba, in the constituency of Provencher, Sir Wilfrid Laurier in Saskatchewan, in the constituency of Prince Albert—they are glorious, the constituents of Prince Albert—and before that, Robert Baldwin was elected by acclamation in Rimouski. These facts are on the record and do honour to us.

At present I am saddened when I see that at the very moment when there is a rift in the structure of the communist bloc, free men are destroying themselves by despising the principles they had cherished until the advent of a contagious materialism.

Before I take my seat, I must say that I believe in the future of Canada—a future resting on a glorious past where men and women with different languages and customs erected a country which history has already recognized as unwilling to die.

I quote from the third paragraph of our national anthem, the following words:

> Amour sacré du Trône et de l'Autel,
> Remplis nos cœurs de ton souffle immortel!

All of you, Canadians, let this be your watchword; carry on the fight on behalf of this troubled, patient and harrowed humanity. Noblesse oblige. Let us never forget that we carry a heavy responsibility on our shoulders. Our flag deserves all this attention.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker—

It is true I am going again but not on so many occasions as the Conservatives have for the past four or five months.

Mr. Rhéaume: You have nothing to say.

Mr. Caouette: Nothing to lose, no.

Mr. Rhéaume: Nothing to say.

Mr. Caouette: Listening to you, no, nothing to lose.

[Translation]

A few moments ago, Mr. Speaker, we saw the hon. member for Grey-Bruce pose as a martyr.

Naturally, it was to be expected that those poor Conservative members would complain that they were not given the opportunity to express their views freely in this house since the resolution for a distinctive national flag was introduced. Well, the Conservatives—

[Text]

Mr. Winkler: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Caouette: Yes, I will.

Mr. Winkler: I should like to ask the hon. member if he would not feel more proud of his citizenship in Canada if he put forth as humble an effort for his country as I have?

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, on this specific point, I just love to see the Conservatives applaud and, in this regard, I should like to remind them of what Her Majesty the Queen said in Quebec city, during the recent visit, a month and a half ago, and that is that some people's patriotism must not prevent them from understanding the patriotism of others. I have no hesitation in telling the hon. member for Grey-Bruce that I am just as much a Canadian patriot as he is, has been and ever will be.

[Text]

Mr. Winkler: Not if the statements you have made are true.

[Mr. Rhéaume.]

Mr. Caouette: Stand up and ask your question.

Mr. Winkler: I say to you, not if the statements you have made are true.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Could we have order, please? The hon. member for Villeneuve has the floor.

Mr. Rhéaume: You sold lots of cars.

Mr. Caouette: It is all right, I do not need you to sell cars anywhere in Ontario. I am not one to follow politicians that are more interested in their party than their patriotism to Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we have heard the Conservatives speak, in turn, again and again, and surely more often than not.

Last Friday the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) stated in the house that the hon. member for Villeneuve was ready to accept anything as a distinctive national flag, that he was ready to accept symbols of Italy, under Mussolini, that he was even ready to accept wartime Germany's swastika.

Mr. Speaker, from the time the question of a Canadian flag was introduced, I have always maintained in the house that we would vote for a flag which contained nothing else but Canadian symbols. We have never said what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre repeated in the house: that I would be ready to accept anything on a distinctive Canadian flag. No, Mr. Speaker.

We took our stand at the very beginning of the flag debate. We have expressed our opinion, we have even suggested what would be our choice for a distinctive national flag: a flag with the red and white diagonals with a green maple leaf. That was our choice. However, at the same time, we suggested and offered to support whoever in the house would come up with a distinctive national flag, not a flag with the symbols of France or England, but a distinctive flag with Canadian symbols which would be our own and belong to us all, here, in Canada.

It is unfortunate to see how much division the flag debate has created, the gap it has put between the various nationalities in Canada.

We have heard about the French Canadian element, yes. We have heard about the English Canadian elements, very well. But when the Conservatives gave the impression or suggested throughout Canada that the distinctive national flag was only a step to please French Canadians, then the Conservatives did a bad service to the Canadian unity and a very bad service to the understanding between the various groups which make up the Canadian society. We must not forget that there are in Canada Ukrainians, Poles, Italians. There are people of all nationalities in our country.

The Italians, the Ukrainians, the Poles are not interested in the French fleur-de-lis flag or the English union jack flag. But they are interested in a distinctive Canadian national flag, because they are real Canadians, in the same way as those who think as Canadians instead of English, or French, etc.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard all kinds of remarks on the part of the Conservatives and of a Liberal member. At this stage I want to mention that the only group in this house which was unanimous and voted unanimously, on several occasions, in favour of a distinctive national flag was the Ralliement Créditiste group which represents, to put it that way, the truly Canadian element, and not only the French Canadian, as it was suggested.

The leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) has declared, in this house, that the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste is in the hands of the Liberals with regard to the flag. Two years ago the Liberals said exactly the same thing when the Conservatives banked on the support of the Créditistes to stay in power.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the flag is an issue which transcends political interests, political boundaries, which transcends even political parties as such. It is as Canadians that we support the proposal for a distinctive national flag.

The sixth report was presented to us by the chairman:

That the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday October 29, 1964, be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker, we think that the time has come to accept a national distinctive flag, even if the sixth report recommends a flag that is not exactly according to our taste and even if its design does not seeem attractive.

We were even told that if the flag has red bars on a white field with a red maple leaf, it was—and this, for the information of the public—in order not to yield to the proposal of a member of the New Democratic party who was suggesting a red maple leaf with blue bars on a white field, which flag would have been more acceptable than the one now before us.

However, we will not stand against the vote on the national distinctive flag recommended to us by the committee.

The Conservatives referred to the fact that in 1945, by order in council, Canada had adopted the red ensign to replace the union jack. It was suggested that the Mackenzie King government had adopted the red ensign as the Canadian flag.

Today the Leader of the Opposition is asking us to add to the red ensign, besides the union jack now in the left upper corner, a fleur-de-lis in the lower part of the flag as a symbol of the heritage we received from our ancestors.

A few days ago I told the Leader of the Opposition, as I tell all Conservatives: We have the greatest respect for our ancestors and our forebears, for our great-grandfathers and great-grandmothers; however, not one Conservative today would put on the clothes or the shoes of his forebears who lived in 1867 or 1830. Everybody knows that, Mr. Speaker.

We are no longer living in the days of the catacombs of Rome or the beginning of Christendom; we are now at the point where we have to decide by ourselves, in Canada, whether we want to be a sovereign nation, an independent nation, a nation still part of the commonwealth of British nations, but we of the Ralliement Créditiste are not ready to adopt symbols which make us slaves and representatives of a foreign nation.

And I said many times, we are the first to recognize that, under the British laws, we have been able to exteriorize and become what we are today. However, it is time that, even though remaining members of the commonwealth of British nations, we have our own symbols, our aspirations and our will as a people and as members of parliament.

This afternoon, I heard the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) tell us:

[Text]

French and English speaking people should work together and this arrangement has to work both ways.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam to that point. The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) did the same this afternoon. I suggest that if there is one part of the country where both elements have got along together and understood each other, where the English and French elements have respected each other, it is actually the province of Quebec.

This afternoon the hon. member for Lapointe said that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam had been premier of Saskatchewan for 17 years. This is a fact. I know what I am talking about, because I have relatives in south Saskatchewan, around Gravelbourg and Pontex, and I can say that in that province as in the others, separate schools—

[Text]

Mr. McIntosh: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Caouette: Definitely.

Mr. McIntosh: Would you volunteer to fight under this flag?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Caouette: Would you repeat your question?

Mr. McIntosh: Yes. Would you volunteer to fight under this flag?

Mr. Caouette: I will volunteer to fight for security and freedom in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I do not have to take a lesson in patriotism from any Conservative member in the House of Commons. I am even able to give them one in their own provinces.

When the other provinces of Canada treat their French minority the way we treat English speaking Canadians in the province of Quebec, the Conservatives can then afford to give me a lesson in patriotism.

I come from the Rouyn-Noranda area where there are English speaking people, Ukrainians, Italians, Poles, in short, people of all nationalities. We get along perfectly well.

In Montreal or Quebec city, we get along perfectly well also. Why in the other provinces, because we are French minorities do we have to pay double taxation for the administration of our schools in order to have our rights respected? That is what English Canadians do not understand.

Mr. Speaker, as long as I breathe I shall oppose any infringement upon the rights of the English speaking Canadians. But I shall fight so that no one will infringe upon my rights nor those of the French Canadians across Canada, not only in the province of Quebec.

It is on behalf of this Canada that we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, are prepared to support the adoption of a distinctive national flag, of a truly Canadian flag, neither French nor English Canadian, but a Canadian flag with Canadian symbols and something which represents Canada throughout the world, including the commonwealth of British nations. Let us be part of that society of nations.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Conservatives find it funny. We also found it funny to remain in the House of Commons for over four months to listen to stupid speeches, separatist speeches worse than those we heard in the province of Quebec.

The separatists are not in the province of Quebec. The separatists are the Conservatives sitting to your left.

Mr. Woolliams: You have your point mixed up.

Mr. Caouette: Certainly not. I am on the right track. I have my point right.

If the matter of the flag is not yet settled, the Conservatives are fully aware it is their fault. They have wasted the time of the house for weeks and months. I recently went to Toronto where I met some students.

An hon. Member: Why don't you go to Manitoba?

Mr. Caouette: For the hon. member's information, I might tell him that I intend to go to Manitoba.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has expired. I now have to choose among three hon. members. The last three speakers have been the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) Conservative party, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Ouellet) Conservative party, and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) Créditiste, so now I will choose a Liberal, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson).

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order.

An hon. Member: You are not in your place.

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, I move, seconded by my hon. friend from the Northwest Territories (Mr. Rhéaume) that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) be now heard.

Some hon. Members: Shame. Closure.

Division

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Skeena. Had we voted, we both would have abstained.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there have been 270 speeches—

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Monteith: There were 118.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I draw your attention to standing order 33, which is the closure rule. The concluding part of that standing order reads as follows:

—and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before one o'clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions—

An hon. Member: Well, sit down.

Mr. Churchill:

—as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration, shall be decided forthwith.

In view of that rule, Mr. Speaker, no one is entitled to speak after the hour of one o'clock, and it is now—

Some hon. Members: Closure.

Mr. Churchill: —20 minutes after one.

The hon. members who are shouting "closure" are members of the Liberal party which imposed this restriction on the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: It is perfectly obvious from reading Beauchesne, who repeats this rule, that no member shall rise to speak after one o'clock. Therefore, under the circumstances I suggest that the debate has come to a conclusion, and that you should now put the motion which remains before the house to be considered, namely for concurrence in the sixth report of the committee. That is the only matter of business now before us.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, I should like to draw your attention to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 167 (2) which states:

If a member has taken the floor at 12.55 o'clock, he is entitled to speak for twenty minutes, but no member "shall rise to speak" after one o'clock.

It is my belief that the Prime Minister had risen in his place to speak before 12.55 o'clock, and the rule does not state that the 20 minutes shall be concluded by 15 minutes after one o'clock. The rule simply states that a member is entitled to speak for 20 minutes. The Prime Minister has not yet spoken for 20 minutes, and regardless of what the clock says, I contend that because he was on his feet and recognized before 12.55 he has the right to speak for 20 minutes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, in reference to citation 167 (2) of Beauchesne's fourth edition, it states in part:

If a member has taken the floor at 12.55 o'clock—

If we accept the argument of the hon. member for Medicine Hat, we must then take into consideration the fact that two members had taken the floor at the same time, one being the Prime Minister and the other the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: They had both taken the floor to speak. May I suggest on that ground that the question now be put. When my friends talk about closure, they established the rule—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question before the Chair is both interesting and rather pressing.

An hon. Member: Take it under consideration.

Mr. Speaker: I do not propose to take it under consideration because I do not have too much difficulty in reaching a conclusion. I trust that the conclusion is right, impartial and correct. As the Chair sees the situation, the hon. member for Villeneuve, according to the note handed to me from the table, commenced at 12.31 a.m. and his time expired at 12.51 a.m., which is nine minutes to one. Right after that the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Port Arthur rose to speak at 12.51 a.m., which is nine minutes to one or if it was not nine minutes to one it was eight minutes to one.

Objection was raised by the hon. member for Bow River who proposed a motion that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition be now heard. We have had a vote on that motion. Therefore I now have before me an order of the house directing the Chair, according to my view, that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition be not now heard but that the right hon. Prime Minister be now heard. I must have regard to the effect and terms of citation 167, paragraph 2, of Beauchesne which is in these words:

If a member has taken the floor at 12.55 o'clock, he is entitled to speak for 20 minutes, but no member "shall rise to speak" after one o'clock.

The way I interpret this citation and the rules as I understand them is that the Prime Minister, who was on his feet eight or nine minutes before one o'clock and was recognized by the Chair, is entitled to speak at this time but not longer than 20 minutes.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, there was a famous incident on June 1, 1956, when an attempt was made to turn back the clock with disastrous results to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: I suggest that the clock is being turned back again and I appeal your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Under the rules of the house as given to the Chair this session there is no appeal from that decision. The right hon. the Prime Minister.

If I may have the indulgence of the house, I made a misstatement. There can be an appeal from my ruling but there can be no discussion of it.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Monteith: Bring in your furniture, too.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, and the Leader of the Opposition was closed off, in addition to the motion for closure.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if I may begin my 20 minutes, from which the hon. member for Bow River sought to deprive me, I should like to begin by calling attention to the fact that this debate which is now coming to an end has seen 270, plus, speeches in the house—

An hon. Member: How many on your side?

Mr. Pearson: —190, plus, of which have come from the official opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And we successfully changed the thinking of the government on the first flag.

Mr. Pearson: I have been criticized in the house for not having spoken enough in the flag debate.

Mr. Monteith: You finally were flushed out.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder if my hon. friend could contain himself for about 20 minutes. He should consult the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Rhéaume) who makes a tally of all interruptions that take place in debates in this chamber.

Mr. Monteith: And they have been numerous on your side.

Mr. Pearson: His record is going to be very high unless he is careful tonight. However, Mr. Speaker, when I rose to conclude the debate as Prime Minister the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams), who has had a good deal to say about closure, rose in his place, as was his right, to prevent me from closing the debate. I have 20 minutes, Mr. Speaker, and if the house wishes to give unanimous consent I would be very glad indeed to take only half of that time and give the last 10 minutes to the Leader of the Opposition if he would like to have them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, when the Greeks produce gifts we recognize what they mean. The Prime Minister is trying to explain away a situation in which he is throttling parliament and is tearing down the flag which has flown over this country for 100 years. He is trying to be facetious at a time like this.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to be courteous and co-operative and give half of my time to the Leader of the Opposition. I was offering to give him the last 10 minutes in this flag debate which began last June. Perhaps I should have learned from experience that offers of co-operation of that kind to that quarter usually do not get a very friendly reception.

This debate has gone on for a long time, Mr. Speaker, and in order to preserve to parliament the right of decision it was necessary for the government to invoke a rule which I hope will only be very rarely invoked in this parliament, the rule of closure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Otherwise we would have made a farce of parliamentary debate on this matter and the minority, the opposition, would have had the right to prevent a decision on a matter of the greatest possible national importance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We accepted our responsibility.

Mr. Bell: May I ask a question?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Bell: How could we prevent this decision, Mr. Prime Minister?

Mr. Pearson: By the action you are taking now, by intervening to prevent discussion. The motion of the government was sustained, Mr. Speaker, by representatives of every party in the house, including the deputy leader of the Conservative party.

Then, Mr. Speaker, when the right hon. gentleman talks about 1956 and closure, and when he realizes his deskmate, the deputy leader of his own party, voted for closure, how is he going to reconcile that? A decision was taken, and then we continued the debate. We have had a vote this evening on an amendment to the motion to concur in the report of the committee, which would have sent the report back to the committee with instructions to have the red ensign as the flag.

Mr. Monteith: All you want to do is to crucify it.

Mr. Pearson: I have too much respect for my hon. friend to pay very much attention to that interjection.

Mr. Monteith: I have a lot of respect for you, too, but not when you talk that way.

Mr. Pearson: On the vote this afternoon on the red ensign, a straightforward vote for the retention of the red ensign, the result, I believe, was 162 to 80, or two to one against that motion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are approaching the end of a long, hard and sincere fight by hon. members opposite for what they considered to be the right national flag for Canada. I have never denied them that right, nor have I ever denied them the sincerity with which they made the fight.

An hon. Member: You denied the people that fight.

Mr. Pearson: I denied the people no right. The people are represented in this parliament, and 162 of the representatives of the people in this parliament, representing every party, voted against my right hon. friend and his supporters. All right, Mr. Speaker, that fight in this parliament is over.

An hon. Member: That's what you think.

Mr. Pearson: This fight is over in this House of Commons. Now, Mr. Speaker, we approach the main motion and the main motion is a report of a committee, representing all parties in this house, a report containing a recommendation which was concurred in by the members of all parties in this house, recommending to this house a red maple leaf flag as the emblem of Canada. This is the flag for the future, but it does not dishonour the past. I hope that Canada can go forward as a united, strong and progressive country, with this flag as its emblem.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The right hon. gentleman has done everything to divide the country.

Mr. Pearson: Will the right hon. gentleman contain himself for two or three minutes longer, and then we will vote.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When the right hon. gentleman starts giving me advice, I say to him, you have done more to divide Canada than any other prime minister.

Mr. Pearson: I think we should be sympathetic to the right hon. gentleman because he is feeling the frustrations of failure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order, sit down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I challenge the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) because she was the one who said, with exquisite femininity, "Shut up and sit down". I say to the Prime Minister, is he experiencing the happiness of having throttled discussion in parliament? Is that what he is experiencing at this time when a flag is being born?

Mr. Pearson: Before I was interrupted by the right hon. gentleman, that master of parliamentary procedure, I was trying to say that this is a good flag, and it is Canada's flag, an emblem of which we and our children can be proud and under which Canada can go forward, the red maple leaf flag. Surely, Mr. Speaker, when the dust of controversy clears away, when the bitterness of debate is over, we can all in this house rally around the red maple leaf Canadian flag. I know the atmosphere does not appear very propitious across the chamber for appeals, but I make an appeal even at this late date in the debate. I appeal for us all to forget divisions and differences of this debate and to rally behind this red maple leaf Canadian flag.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the Prime Minister a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is telling us of the wonders of the red maple leaf flag. When did he change his mind, after saying the three maple leaf flag represented our heritage, and the one maple leaf had none?

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, that is a very easy question to answer. We submitted this matter, at the request of the right hon. gentleman, to a committee representing all parties in this house. This committee did not see fit, by a majority vote, to accept the design I preferred. I accept the design recommended by the committee, and I ask my right hon. friend to do the same thing. Surely there is nothing disgraceful, Mr. Speaker, and nothing could be further from disgrace, than to accept as the emblem of our country a flag which has one red maple leaf on a white background representing what we have stood for in this country in war and peace. Why cannot my right hon. friend forget the passions, the prejudices and the bitterness of the fights of the past few months and rally around this Canadian flag and make it the emblem of unity in this country? Why can he not do this? I ask him to do what we would have done, if the amendment had been carried.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A flag by closure; imposed by closure.

An hon. Member: The great divider of Canada.

Mr. Pearson: All right, Mr. Speaker, there is no use making an appeal, that is obvious. I regret very much that a man who has attained such prominence in the public life of Canada for so many years would take this attitude at the end of this debate on a matter of this national importance.

I will make one final suggestion, Mr. Speaker, and that is that if this motion carries—and it is going to carry, that is clear, from the vote this afternoon; there is every likelihood of this motion carrying—surely hon. gentlemen opposite do not wish to be put on record as voting against a design which is going to be our national flag.

Mr. Monteith: Oh, nuts.

Mr. Pearson: I ask them, Mr. Speaker, that when you put this motion no hon. member in this house vote against the design which is going to be our flag. Mr. Speaker, I do not ask them to vote for it. I ask that there be no recorded vote so that we will not be in a position in this house of having hon. members vote against what will be our national flag.

Mr. Monteith: Don't be crazy; I am going to be recorded.

Mr. Pearson: I make this appeal to them. They can turn it down with insult and contumely if they so desire. On this side of the house there are Canadians as loyal to the past as any hon. gentlemen opposite, and they will vote for this flag.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: There are Canadians on this side of the house quite as loyal to our past and quite as hopeful of our future.

Mr. Nugent: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I consider the remarks of the right hon. gentleman an insult to members on this side of the house.

Mr. Pearson: All right, Mr. Speaker. We on this side have made the appeal. They have turned it down with jeering and insult. We on this side, and a good many on the other side of the house will vote with pride and confidence in the motion you are now about to put before the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the resolution adopted at this sitting—

Mr. Churchill: I am rising on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Churchill: May I speak on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, or will I be denied my rights in this house?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows perfectly well he will never be denied by this occupant of the chair any rights to which he is entitled. He should know that.

Mr. Churchill: I was asking to speak on a question of privilege and I was not being given the opportunity. My question of privilege is this: The Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Pearson) has said that we have turned down his proposed flag with jeers and insults. That is not true and I ask him to withdraw that remark. This is an insult to all members of the house. I did not say one word—I uttered no jeer, no insult—and I ask the Prime Minister to withdraw that remark, which is an infringement of the privileges of all hon. members of the house.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I shall leave it to you to judge whether my remarks have been greeted by certain hon. members on the other side with jeers and insults.

Mr. Monteith: Not by certain members: By all members.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? Pursuant to the resolution adopted at this sitting, and in accordance with the provisions of standing order 33, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude this debate.

Accordingly, the question is as follows:

Mr. Batten, seconded by Mr. Scott, moved:

That the sixth report of the special committee on a Canadian flag, presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion? Those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Batten) which was agreed to on the following division:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, December 15, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GROOS—DECLARATION OF PAIR IN HOUSE VOTE

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria, B.C.): I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday when the final vote was taken I was paired, but I was unable to advise the house of my pair because of events which took place when you declared the motion carried. Had I been able to do so, I would have voted in favour of the motion.

CANADIAN COMMONWEALTH FLAG

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SEVENTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Batten, seconded by Mr. Cantin, moves that the seventh and final report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964 be now concurred in.

Mr. Thompson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Was there not an understanding last Thursday when the Prime Minister assured the house that between the two debates we would revert to the normal procedure and proceed with orders of the day? Is this not what the agreement was, and does it not still stand?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could deal with the point raised. On Thursday last, in answer to a question from the leader of the official opposition, the Prime Minister stated something about provision for a question period between the two debates. He pointed out that he had already made a proposal to that effect and hoped we could get unanimous agreement to provide for a question period between the two debates.

In accordance with that statement I called a meeting of the house leaders for Friday last. Unfortunately one of the house leaders was not able to come to that meeting, so there was no agreement on that day. This morning I sought to get agreement but have been unable to get agreement for a question period, and that is where the matter stands.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if, in the present circumstances, the government house leader or the Prime Minister would care to ask for the unanimous consent of the house so we could have a question period before proceeding to concur in the seventh and final special flag committee report.

I feel that in acting this way the government would show itself quite willing to cooperate. Besides, that would further the business of the house and make it easier for hon. members who have questions to ask today.

[Text]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I hope the house leader would now be prepared to ask for unanimous consent of the house for a question period, even though it may be limited to something like 60 minutes. Then we could carry on the regular, routine proceedings, and perhaps if the government wished to go forward with concurrence in this seventh report it would not be well for the house to pass that stage of our routine proceedings at which motions are called. Perhaps unanimous consent could be requested to take questions now, and if it were not forthcoming there would be nothing he could do about it. However, the government would not then be in a position where they could not revert to motions without unanimous consent.

Mr. McIlraith: The government is quite agreeable, and if there is unanimous consent in the house we should like also to have a formal decision to transfer the two notices of motion on the order paper to government orders so that when we do come to them later on they would be in a position where they could be dealt with. The same situation would apply to the first reading of Senate Bill No. S-22. The government is quite agreeable, and I would make the request now for unanimous consent to proceed to a question period of, say, one hour.

Some hon. Members: Closure.

Mr. McIlraith: And I would request that we take the two motions under government notices of motions and the first reading of the Senate bill.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Fisher: May I ask the minister, is he agreeable to doing this every day that we are faced with this situation, so we can be assured of a regular question period?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the government house leader has been rather anxious to get some kind of order to the business with a view to reaching what I am sure we all wish, some certainty as to the time of a recess. If we can get this one question period agreed to, I would like to call a meeting of the house leaders and see what arrangement can be made.

Mr. Howard: Don't you think it would be better to put the flag in cold storage?

Mr. Speaker: I would appreciate it if the house leader would recapitulate exactly what he wishes.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent for the first reading of the Senate public bill, the calling of the two government notices of motions and then a one hour question period, after which we would revert to the motion that is before the house now, the motion for concurrence in the seventh report of the flag committee. I would also ask that the introduction of bills be called.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the unanimous consent of the house that we proceed in this manner?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: It is not agreed.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the seventh and final report of the special committee on the Canadian flag, presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, recommended:

> —that the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to provide that the royal union flag, generally known as the union jack, may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canada's membership in the commonwealth of nations and of her allegiance to the crown.

I move, seconded by Mr. Béchard, the hon. member for Bonaventure, that this report be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton speaks I wish to clear up one slight error. When I put this motion I said it would be seconded by Mr. Cantin. The seconder, as proposed by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's is Mr. Béchard.

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the motion for concurrence in the seventh report of the special committee on the flag question is something which I feel deserves and should have more than just ordinary attention by all hon. members of the house.

The fact that we have two reports of the committee before us is something which I think requires explanation. I think we have to acknowledge that it is a bit unusual for a committee to present two reports, and it seems to me it is altogether fitting and proper that the house be made aware of the reasons that were advanced in the committee for doing so.

I would advise the house that my purpose in rising today is not merely to make some brief remarks; it is to move an amendment to the motion for concurrence.

It seems to me the first thing we might consider is the paragraph which makes reference to the recommendation for a national flag for Canada. This matter was dealt with yesterday in somewhat unusual circumstances, as I said. I should like to draw attention to the fact that in reaching a decision on the recommendation for a national flag for Canada, one of the first questions to be discussed in the committee was whether we should have one flag or two flags in this country.

The decision of the committee was that we should have only one flag. Those were the words: "only one flag". I suggest that if I were so inclined I might even question the validity of the committee's report itself in view of the fact that this contradiction exists. The committee agreed unanimously in considering this question of a national flag for Canada that there should be only one flag.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): I suggest to those gentlemen who are shouting "no" that they read the committee's report, the report with which we dealt yesterday. They will find that "only one" is the expression used.

An hon. Member: Not so.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): All right. If the hon. member wishes to speak he will have his chance to do so when I am through. In the meantime I have the floor.

I submit that the committee agreed unanimously that we should have only one flag, only one national flag in this country. Those were the words used. Now we find ourselves considering another flag. I submit this is a negation of the motion itself for only one national flag and, as I say, I think the validity of the whole report might be questioned if I were so inclined. However, I do not wish to press this point at the moment.

I should like to ask one question, though, and I should like to have this explained to my satisfaction because it was never explained to my satisfaction in the committee. It is, why do we in this country need two flags? We has not had two flags since the Canadian red ensign was the official flag of Canada, proclaimed by order in council in 1945. For many years prior to that date we got along and prospered very well under one flag. Why do we suddenly need two flags in this country?

I for one do not accept the proposition that we should have a first and a second flag. As far as I am concerned, whatever flags we have will be of equal merit and entitled to the same respect. I do not think we should have two flags, one superior to the other, any more than we should have two classes of citizens. We do not want first class and second class citizens in this country; we do not have them now. I do not differentiate, when flags are concerned, as to their status. If it is the considered opinion of this house that the report of the committee should be accepted, then I submit these flags must be of equal status. They must be of equal importance and equal significance even though the message which it is alleged they convey may be somewhat different. In this connection we might consider the message which this particular flag is intended to convey.

However, Mr. Speaker, before doing so I want to refer to the fact that, as I said previously, the flag which we have been using and which is still in use in this country has seemingly been able to transmit its message without help from any other flag. Therefore I think we might consider that the very fact we are being asked to have two flags in this country must suggest the general idea that something is now lacking in the design recommended by the committee in their report and apparently approved by this house yesterday. If I am correct in my opinion in this regard I would like someone to tell me what has brought about the necessity of having a second flag. It should not be the case, and I for one do not appreciate it and certainly do not desire it.

Let us consider the point raised in paragraph 3 of the committee's report. I have already mentioned that in paragraph 2 the flag recommended by the committee is intended to convey a message. This is the message. It is that it will be a flag to symbolize Canada's membership in the commonwealth of nations and her allegiance to the crown. That is the general message which the flag recommended in this report is intended to convey.

I suggest that membership in the commonwealth is not conveyed by any particular flag. The commonwealth has no flag as such. Commonwealth countries, however, generally speaking—this does not apply sweepingly across the board but it does apply in many instances—have inserted the union jack as part of their flags. However, generally speaking we find there is no such thing as a commonwealth flag. This flag is going to symbolize our membership in the commonwealth, according to this paragraph, and it will also symbolize our allegiance to the crown. I would like to think that the flag which flies over the tower of this building symbolizes our allegiance to the crown also.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that a flag and the things a flag symbolizes are more than just words which are put down on a piece of paper; it symbolizes what is in the hearts and minds of the people who are displaying and flying it. For that reason, if for none other, I believe it is proper for me to say that something must be lacking in the national flag which has already been approved and which is referred to in paragraph 2 of this report.

I said a moment ago that I was not able to understand the substitution. There are quite a few other things I am not able to understand, either. In order to make my point clear I must of necessity read paragraph No. 3 of the report:

It was moved—

That is in the committee:

—"That the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to provide that the Canadian red ensign may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canada's membership in the commonwealth of nations and of her allegiance to the crown".

The amendment which was moved was:

An amendment was moved to substitute the words "royal union flag, generally known as the union jack" for the words "Canadian red ensign".

In other words, the recommendation of the committee as it now stands presented to this house is:

I draw your attention particularly to the words "may continue to be flown", and submit that the union jack has not been flown in Canada generally since 1945. The inclusion of that sentence which says, in effect, that something may continue to be flown which has not been flown for more than 20 years, is nothing more than an expression of ridiculousness. How are we going to continue to fly something that has not been flown continuously?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Hon. members opposite who wish to add something to this debate will have an opportunity to do so, and I suggest it will be novel if they add anything intelligent to this debate.

We continue to take the position, as expressed last night, that it is difficult or impossible to continue to fly something as an indication of our membership in the commonwealth of nations and our allegiance to the crown that has not been flown during the past 20 years. Perhaps someone with more comprehension of this situation than I have could enlighten me. I cannot understand how that could take place.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest there is an answer to this problem, and that answer lies in the understanding that a mistake has been made in the committee report. Someone might well suggest that I should explain how a mistake could have occurred. The answer to that question is that we tried to do something about the error but we were not able to obtain enough votes in the committee to accomplish this correction. We did attempt to correct the mistake but were unable to do so, and I suggest that is what I am attempting to correct now by the amendment which I propose to move.

In reference to the next paragraph of the report, a question might be asked as to why there were abstentions. It might properly be asked why we did not vote for or against this matter when it was brought before the committee. My answer to that question is that the amendment which was proposed was an amendment substituting the union jack for the Canadian red ensign, so the question was "Do you prefer the union jack to the Canadian red ensign?" The question was not one really involving a preference but a matter of voting yes or no to the question as to whether there should be a substitution of the union jack for the red ensign. Speaking for myself, I was in favour of the retention of the Canadian red ensign, but did not feel free to vote against the union jack. My action in this regard may well be interpreted by some as sentimentalism. I acknowledge that to be the situation, but I suggest that is the reason for the abstention. I hope to correct the situation by moving my proposed amendment, and I hope this amendment will be acceptable to this house.

I yield to no one in this chamber in my feeling of respect and sentiment for the traditions of this country. However, I do not believe that the union jack is a flag of Canada; it is a flag of the United Kingdom. The red ensign, which incorporates a union jack, has been and I think still is the national flag of Canada and should always be considered as such.

Mr. Speaker, that is not the point at issue, but I doubt whether the majority of the people of this country could be convinced that the flag of the United Kingdom, the union jack, should be flown in Canada as a Canadian flag. Can anyone visualize someone landing on the shores of Nova Scotia, after a shipwreck, wanting to know where he was and seeing the union jack being flown? That individual would perhaps believe that he was still in England, not knowing that the union jack was a flag representing different countries.

An hon. Member: What about the Nova Scotia flag? Stanfield would not like that.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): I am one of the first to acknowledge that the flag of Nova Scotia is a very beautiful flag, and I personally thought it was entitled to a great deal more consideration as a national flag than it received.

I suggest with great respect, Mr. Speaker, to the members of this house, and particularly to my colleagues on the special committee, that the substitution of the union jack for the red ensign in this report of the committee is unacceptable. Since there is a flag mentioned in this report, I think it should now be changed from the union jack to the red ensign. In order to bring this proposition before this house—and I hope the house will receive this suggestion with a reasonable degree of consideration—I propose the following amendment: seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Pugh):

That the seventh report of the special committee be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to strike out in the recommendation the words "the royal union flag generally known as the union jack", and substitute therefor the words "the Canadian red ensign".

And that the committee for such purposes be revived.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to state my position on this seventh and final report of the committee in a very few words. We support the seventh report, as we supported the sixth report. I should like to express my appreciation for the work of the committee in producing the seventh report, as I did for their work in producing the earlier report.

This report, which I have before me, indicates that a motion was moved in the committee that the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to provide that the Canadian red ensign may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canada's membership in the commonwealth of nations and of her allegiance to the crown. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the amendment we now have before the house was before the committee during its sessions, but before that particular motion could be voted on in the committee an amendment was moved to substitute the words "royal union flag, generally known as the union jack" for the words "Canadian red ensign". That amendment was carried by a vote of seven for, two against and five abstentions. The motion as amended was then voted on and carried by a vote of eight for, one voting against and five abstentions.

I do not know whether I am doing my hon. friend who has just spoken any injustice, but I assume that he had the opportunity to vote against the royal union flag for the purposes of this motion and in favour of the Canadian red ensign, and he did not vote that way. He abstained. Now he moves in the house, Mr. Speaker, that the red ensign be substituted for the royal union flag, and no doubt he will take a position in the house on this matter that he did not take in the committee. He asks that the matter be referred back to the committee so he can now take a different position in the committee.

Mr. Rhéaume: I thought that the committee met in camera.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the position of our party in regard to this matter is well known and has been laid down in two election campaigns. In 1962 we stated as part of our policy that the union jack would be flown on appropriate occasions as a symbol of our membership in the commonwealth, and a similar pledge and similar commitment were made in the election of 1963.

My hon. friend who has just spoken began by talking about the illogicality of having two flags in this country; how absurd it was to have two flags even though one flag would be the national flag and the other would be a flag symbolizing our association in the commonwealth. He did not see any reason for that at all. But then he ended up by moving an amendment which would bring about that very thing. If it is illogical to have the royal union flag as a second flag symbolizing our association in the commonwealth, surely it is even more illogical to have the Canadian red ensign, which by order in council in 1945 was made the Canadian flag until parliament decided otherwise. Surely it is even more illogical to make a Canadian flag the second flag symbolizing our association in the commonwealth.

Then indeed, Mr. Speaker, we would have two national flags. Presumably this is what my hon. friend desires, two national flags, because that is what his amendment would do. It would accept the national flag of distinctive design which we decided on last night, and another national flag of Canadian design; and we would indeed then accomplish the result which he has considered as abhorrent to logicality, two flags of any kind in this country.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): May I ask the Prime Minister a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): I hesitate to interrupt, but is this not exactly what was contemplated by the two resolutions put on the order paper by the government last May in the Prime Minister's name? May I further say that every remark I made was based on the premise that the government had decided to have two flags.

Mr. Pearson: I congratulate my hon. friend on now having reached the view that we ought to have two flags because the government has decided that is the best thing.

An hon. Member: Don't twist words.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Prime Minister does not want to misquote me. I said "if the government had decided they should have two flags". I did not say that I favoured two flags.

Mr. Pearson: I do not want to do any injustice to my friend's reasoning, but if my hon. friend feels that way why did he not move an amendment rejecting the report of the committee? Surely that would have been the most logical course for him to follow, because he admits he does not believe in two flags. That was a problem that was submitted to the committee and they had to deal with it because it was in their terms of reference, but the logical way for him to get out of that dilemma is to object to this report and do away with the second report completely. He does not do that. He says "Let us have a second flag and make it a Canadian flag because it is the Canadian flag today." Yet it is to symbolize our allegiance to the Queen and our association in the commonwealth.

I do not consider that a very reasonable position to take. My hon. friend in supporting it said how absurd it would be to have the royal union flag as a second flag because we should not have two flags in this country, especially a second flag which had not been officially in use for 20 years, I think he said.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Since 1945.

Mr. Pearson: Since 1945. When the order in council was passed in 1945 authorizing the use officially of the Canadian red ensign until parliament should make a choice of a distinctive flag, the union jack was flown with the red ensign, in accordance with the wishes of the localities concerned, over many buildings for at least two years thereafter.

Surely my hon. friend must know what the situation has been. I ask him what flag has been flying in recent years over the parliament buildings in Fredericton. It is this flag, which is no longer in use and has not been in use for 20 years. I ask him what flag flies over the parliament buildings in Halifax. The union jack along with the flag of Nova Scotia. I ask him what flag flies over the parliament buildings in Prince Edward Island. Until a few weeks ago it was the union jack, but because it is fashionable now to have provincial flags Prince Edward Island adopted a flag of its own and I believe both flags fly there now. The union jack is also flying in Ontario. You will see it flying over school buildings in Ontario with provincial sanction.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): May I ask the Prime Minister another question? Does the Prime Minister not consider that the very fact that the Canadian red ensign was made official by order in council in 1945 places that flag in an altogether different position from a flag which any provincial government may wish to fly over its own public buildings? I claim it puts the stamp of officialdom on that flag which has been there ever since 1945.

Mr. Pearson: I think that is quite right. That order in council undoubtedly did put the stamp of officialdom on the Canadian red ensign until parliament made another choice. There is no doubt about that. But some of the provinces refused to accept that stamp of officialdom. They refused to accept the Canadian red ensign for a good many years and continued to fly the union jack. But the hon. gentleman says we must not now officially recognize the union jack for a special purpose because it has had no official sanction in this country since 1945.

The fact, Mr. Speaker—and I will try to indicate my reason for stating this—that it has had no official Canadian national sanction since 1945 and that it is the royal union flag is in my view the very reason it should be used as recognition of our association in the commonwealth of nations, and why the Canadian red ensign, which has had official Canadian sanction, should not be so used. I repeat that if it was used—

Mr. Grégoire: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? Can the Prime Minister tell us if the union jack is officially known as the commonwealth flag?

Mr. Pearson: Of course it is not, Mr. Speaker, and that is exactly what we are talking about. I hope to come to that in a few moments if I am given the opportunity. We have felt, Mr. Speaker, that it is quite in order and indeed desirable, as we adopt a distinctive national flag without any of the symbols of our past political associations, to have a flag alongside our national flag which will symbolize our association in the commonwealth of nations and the very special relationship to the Queen. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is quite in order and quite reasonable that we should indicate in our national emblems today that there can be, in this day and age, a loyalty on various levels of associations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the Prime Minister allow a question? At the time the Minister of Transport made his journey to the United Kingdom or since has Her Majesty the Queen been consulted as to whether the royal union flag would be acceptable as the embodiment of the commonwealth? And did the Prime Minister, on the occasion of the prime ministers' conference, secure from the prime ministers their consent or approval that Canada adopt a commonwealth flag, a flag that is not acceptable to many of the other commonwealths?

Mr. Pearson: I wish my hon. friend would allow me to deliver my speech in my own way, because I am coming to those various matters. He has brought up these two points, so perhaps I should deal with them now.

In so far as the first point is concerned, it was raised in the early days of the debate and I answered that at the time. There has been no change since that time. I said then, and I repeat now, that naturally when a resolution of this kind was before the Canadian parliament the Queen, through the high commissioner in London, was informally apprised of the fact that this resolution was before parliament. Her advice was not sought. It would have been quite unconstitutional to ask for her advice on a matter which had not yet been decided upon by the Canadian parliament. If I had done that I can imagine what my right hon. friend would be saying today. He would be accusing me of dragging the crown into politics. What we did, as a matter of courtesy, was to inform the Queen of the action or the proposal that was before the Canadian parliament, and indicated to the Queen that if that proposal were accepted she would be asked to take the necessary constitutional action, as Queen. This cannot be done, of course, until parliament has declared itself.

In so far as the second question is concerned, the question of a commonwealth flag, that was not mentioned at the prime ministers' conference at all. It did not come up in any way, shape or form, nor has it come up in any commonwealth meeting since of which I am aware. I have made informal inquiries of certain commonwealth leaders as to whether it may be practicable to consider the possibility of some emblem which would be common to all states of the commonwealth. However, it is quite impracticable at the present time and may be impracticable for a long time to come because of the very nature of the states within the commonwealth. There are monarchies in the commonwealth, are monarchies that recognize the Queen of England, the Queen of Canada or the Queen of Australia. There are republics in the commonwealth. But surely, in this day and age, it is not either wrong or unusual to have emblems flying in a country which denote different forms of association of the people of that country with different international or national organizations.

I believe, therefore, it is logical and desirable to retain in this country an emblem of our association with the other members of the commonwealth. Even though it is not a commonwealth flag, it is a flag which would denote Canada's association with the commonwealth. I will try to explain later why I think the royal union jack is the most logical and best emblem for that purpose.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the Prime Minister say whether the United Kingdom has consented to have Canada use her flag here in Canada?

Mr. Pearson: I will go ahead with my statement, and if the right hon. gentleman has any questions to ask at the end I will do my best to answer.

This is the emblem, Mr. Speaker, that is recommended by the report to denote our association with the other members of the commonwealth through the Queen. At the moment this is the only constitutional link, the only formal constitutional link, between the various members of the commonwealth, through the Queen. There is no other formal link. I remember very well when that link was first constitutionally recognized. In earlier days before the commonwealth achieved its present organization, it was not necessary because all members were linked by their allegiance to one queen. They were all monarchies inside this association.

In 1948, at a commonwealth conference which I had the honour of attending, the commonwealth was faced with the problem of trying to absorb within its association a republic, a state which owed no allegiance to the Queen and was republican in character. The commonwealth has proved itself, over the years, to be a very adaptable institution indeed. It was able to accommodate itself to this alteration in constitutional structure in one of its members by a formula which has been found to apply to all the new members of the commonwealth since, most of whom are republics. This was done by the official communiqué of the conference which included this sentence, and this is an important sentence because it does indicate why I believe the union jack is the right emblem for commonwealth association.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: My right hon. friend laughs, but perhaps instead of laughing he will listen.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was years ago.

Mr. Pearson: It was, indeed, years ago. It was 1948, and it has stood the test of every acquisition to the commonwealth since. This is why it was such an important formula on which to agree at that time, because it has not required any change since that time and there have been a great many changes take place in the commonwealth since that time. The date was April 20, 1949. The communiqué states that: "The government of India have, however, declared and affirmed India's desire to continue her full membership of the commonwealth and her acceptance—that is the republic of India—of the king as the symbol of the free association of the independent member nations—thus the head of the commonwealth."

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me if we are to have a symbolic mark of this kind, an emblem of our association with the other nations of the commonwealth, that emblem should be associated with the Queen—not the king now, the Queen—as head of the commonwealth. Therefore what could be more appropriate for this purpose than the royal union flag, which is the Queen's flag?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Completely specious.

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friend is an authority on specious arguments.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grégoire: Is the Prime Minister aware of the fact that the Queen has her own flag, and it is not the union jack?

Mr. Pearson: Indeed I am aware of it. Of course the Queen has her own flag which only the Queen, herself, flies and only the Queen can ever fly over any building in which she happens to be residing at the moment, and which nobody else has any right to fly in any circumstance. This could hardly be used as a flag to signify our association in the commonwealth. Perhaps my hon. friend would consider that a specious argument too.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, you have really got near the facts at this point for the first time.

Mr. Pearson: I believe the majority of Canadians wish to have a Canadian national flag which cannot be mistaken for the flag of any other country, and the majority of the members of this house certainly decided that last night. I also believe, Mr. Speaker, that the vast majority of Canadians wish to recognize our membership in the commonwealth and our allegiance to the Queen as head of that commonwealth, as we do to her as Queen of Canada.

Some will argue, and indeed I think my hon. friend took the position this afternoon even though his amendment does not seem to me to support that position, that we do not need any special flag to provide such recognition or that, if we do, the union jack is the wrong flag for the purpose. As I have already indicated, I would disagree with that position both in regard to the need and the nature of the flag denoting the relationship, and I would like to point out that other members of the commonwealth, that we call the older members of the commonwealth, have made provision for this recognition. The Australian flags act of 1953, section 8, provides:

> This act does not affect the right or privilege of a person to fly the union jack.

There is no requirement, but there is a recognition of the desirability of maintaining that emblematic association which we provide for in our recommendation. In the statutes of South Africa while South Africa was a member of the commonwealth—this does not apply now because she has withdrawn from the commonwealth—there was in volume 2, chapter 2, section 7(1) (a) the following:

> The flags of the union shall include the union jack to denote the association of the union with other members of the group of nations constituting the British commonwealth of nations.

It is interesting in this connection to recall some words used in this house by a man who passionately advocated a distinctive Canadian national flag, without the emblems of any other association on that flag. I am referring to Mr. Bona Arsenault, who is now a member of the government of Quebec. This is what he said in 1946 when he was passionately arguing in this house for a distinctive national flag. On March 21, 1946, as recorded at page 154 of Hansard for that date he stated:

> All nations of the world at all times have used different flags for different tactical purposes...
> Since Canada is a member of the British commonwealth, united to her sister nations under the constitutional authority of the same king, I cannot very well see why anyone in this country could reasonably object to the full-sized union jack being officially recognized by this parliament as the official symbol of our partnership in the commonwealth, the finest example in history of mutual friendship between nations and one of the strongest means of maintaining peace in the world in these trying days.

Mr. Bona Arsenault, a very good Canadian nationalist in the right meaning of the word, went on to say:

> Too much is involved to try to put forward any sort of narrow nationalism in the face of the distressful conditions that we find in the world today. Not only should we help to maintain the British commonwealth of nations, we should have a commonwealth of all the nations of the world based on the same principles of mutual friendship and collaboration.

We also believe in that, Mr. Speaker, and on occasions in this country, indeed over this building, we fly the blue flag of the United Nations as well.

I believe that the most fitting emblem for this association is the royal union flag, the flag of the Queen, the flag of the monarchy since it was first established in the seventeenth century, the flag which is peculiarly identified with the monarchy and, as such, identified with the commonwealth because the Queen is the head of the commonwealth.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): May I ask another question? I would like to ask the Prime Minister if it is not true that the flag known as the union flag, to which he has just referred, is the flag of England, the flag of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the union jack, the royal union flag, is the royal emblem, and it has been adapted and adopted by the government of the United Kingdom as the flag of the United Kingdom; but is a royal flag any the worse because of the fact that it is the flag of the United Kingdom? It is the royal flag and as such stands for the Queen as head of the commonwealth.

My hon. friend takes exception to the use of the union jack, the royal flag, as standing for our association in the commonwealth whose head is the Queen, but in his amendment he puts forward as the emblem of our association in the commonwealth, under the Queen, the Canadian red ensign, which he admits for 20 years now by order in council has been adopted as a Canadian flag. How can we have a Canadian national flag, and a former Canadian national flag as the flag emblematic of our association with the commonwealth?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has made a series of statements that are historically unsound. I ask him—

Mr. Pearson: You will have a chance to speak afterward.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask him a simple question—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if the right hon. gentleman will just contain himself for about two minutes he will be able to get up on his feet and give me a lecture on history.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I simply ask—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the Prime Minister allow a question? His followers say no. I thought he would not be afraid of a question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It appears to be time to recall to the attention of hon. members citation 126 in Beauchesne's fourth edition, which once again comes to our assistance:

> If a member desires to ask a question during debate, he should first obtain the consent of the member who is speaking. If the latter ignores the request, the former cannot insist, even if he thinks he is being misrepresented. He cannot make a denial during the speech, but he must wait until the member has resumed his seat and then he may ask leave to make a statement, or he must wait until his turn comes, to address the house. Standing order 12 is compulsory. No one has a right to interrupt a member who is addressing the house, by putting a question to him or by making or demanding an explanation. A member may allow interruptions through a sense of courtesy, but it is entirely at his option to give way or not to an immediate explanation.

Further on, paragraph 2 states:

> The rule is well known, that interruptions should not be tolerated.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I immediately rise on a question of privilege. You found this rule in the last while. You did not apply it when I was speaking, and let that be perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker. On every occasion when I was speaking, when a statement was made that was challenged from the opposite side, hon. members rose on speeches, privileges and questions. Your Honour was not so careful then, and I say that advisedly and with great regret.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I believe you yourself must deal as you see fit with the interruptions of the right hon. gentleman. You have read out to him, quite rightly, the rules regarding interruptions. He spoke for an hour and a half the other day and I was never on my feet except once when he asked me a question, but he has been interrupting me repeatedly, and when you read out the rule against interruptions he attempted to browbeat the Chair. I think that is unbecoming.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a question of privilege, all I have to say to the right hon. gentleman is that that statement is as false as the allegation he has made that the union jack is the Queen's flag.

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, you will have to deal with the falsity or otherwise of the allegation. So far as the latter part of the statement which my right hon. friend made is concerned, I am very glad he made it in the way he did, as a straight statement of fact that I had made a false statement regarding the nature of the union jack, the royal union flag. I bring to my assistance in this regard the head of the College of Arms in London, who ought to know about these things. Conceivably he might even know more about this than the right hon. gentleman, although that is only conceivable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: This is what Sir Gerald Wollaston, Garter King of Arms and head of the College of Heralds has to say about this, and I am very glad I was able to put my finger on it at this moment—and without any help, either:

> The union flag is a royal flag...it is one of the royal badges, and has been since Stuart times. ... It is a royal flag.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Perhaps I could say this—

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether this is a question of privilege or a point of order?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, Your Honour, it is.

An hon. Member: What is it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, the Prime Minister said this was the Queen's flag and then he told us he was going to prove it. All he proved was that it was a royal flag, which everybody knew.

Mr. Pearson: I was always under the impression that the Queen was royalty. When the monarch is a Queen then the royal flag is, no doubt, the Queen's flag; and if the right hon. gentleman would prefer to have it the Queen's flag I am sure Garter King of Arms would not object.

If I may summarize, we feel it is desirable to recognize along with our national flag—and there can only be one national flag—a flag which symbolizes our association with the other nations of the commonwealth, and for this purpose the most appropriate symbol is the royal flag because the Queen is the head of the commonwealth; as Queen she is head of the commonwealth.

The hon. gentleman, who began by saying we should not have two flags at all, has moved an amendment which says we should replace the royal flag by the Canadian red ensign which is still, until it is changed by proclamation, the Canadian distinctive national flag by order in council. The hon. gentleman now wishes to put forward as a commonwealth flag a flag which he admits is still the Canadian national flag and which, after it has been replaced by another flag, will not be a commonwealth flag because it has been the Canadian flag and contains the Canadian coat of arms on it.

I ask the house to decide whether it is fitting that alongside this national flag we should have a flag representing our commonwealth association and, if that is the case, whether the royal flag of the commonwealth is not the best flag for this purpose.

Mr. Nowlan: I have just one question for the right hon. gentleman. He referred to the Queen's flag. I should like to ask him this. When Her Majesty visits Canada again, assuming she comes into this building, what flag would fly from the peace tower; the union jack or the royal standard?

Mr. Pearson: Over the tower, if the Queen herself were in the building, would be flying her royal standard.

Some hon. Members: The Queen's flag.

Mr. Pearson: On an occasion of that kind I would hope that over other government buildings where the Queen was not present both the red maple leaf flag and the commonwealth flag would be flying side by side.

Mr. Graffiey: Now you have three flags.

Mr. Barnett: Would the Prime Minister permit me to ask him a question before he ends his remarks? I ask him this not for the purpose of debating anything he may have said, for the moment at least, but for information. If I heard the right hon. gentleman correctly he indicated that the union jack is in fact the flag of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. I should like to know whether Her Majesty's government here in Canada has consulted with Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom with respect to this proposal that we should use a flag which is regarded as the flag of the United Kingdom for the purpose set out in the resolution.

Mr. Pearson: They have been made aware of the resolution before this house but it would be quite improper, of course, to consult them about this matter. The Canadian parliament will decide this question. The fact is that the flag which they have adopted as the flag of the United Kingdom is the royal flag, and they adopted it after consulting with the Queen. We have exactly the same right to consult the Queen, if parliament so desires, as to whether a royal banner can be adopted for commonwealth purposes. The British government does not come into this.

Mr. Nasserden: I have a question for the Prime Minister. He appears to be concerned about Canada's association with the commonwealth, and he believes some emblem should be adopted to show our commonwealth association. My question is this. Has there been any question from any quarter concern-in Canada's association with the commonwealth which raises this subject as a question which needs to be dealt with?

Mr. Pearson: I am not sure I understood the question. I gather it was whether any other nation in the commonwealth has raised this question.

Mr. Nasserden: No. If we are so concerned all of a sudden about asserting our association with the commonwealth, is it because someone has questioned our association with the commonwealth?

Mr. Churchill: Is it in doubt?

Mr. Pearson: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. I do not know what the hon. member is driving at.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I rise at this time to say we concur in the amendment, and that as far as I am aware it will receive the unanimous approval of the New Democratic party for whom I speak at this time.

I should like to begin by complimenting the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton for bringing this matter to the attention of this house and giving us an opportunity to register our views with regard to the proposal. We were unable to do this in the committee. It is unfortunate that the Prime Minister began by taking an inflexible position in connection with this proposal. I may say that the argument he advanced was considered by members of the committee, and we did not feel it could stand up to any logical examination.

It is important to register the position taken by the committee. What is being suggested in its report is not a commonwealth flag as such; we do not have the authority to create a commonwealth flag. But we do have the authority to designate an emblem to symbolize our association with the commonwealth until such time as the commonwealth itself may designate a flag.

It is regrettable that the Prime Minister should have seen fit to cast aspersions on the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton because of any position he may have taken in the committee or here in the house. There was agreement among all members of the committee that in order to achieve the greatest possible degree of success each member was free to voice his opinions, to change his views, to modify them, to try to come to an honest compromise with the other members concerned. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton does not deserve the insulting treatment he got this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Scott: I should like to say for the record that I have before me an amendment which I had intended to move. It is almost identical with the one now before the house. We have had an opportunity to examine some of the aspects of the union flag. It seems to me it is clearly a misuse of the union jack to attempt to designate it in the manner proposed by the government. It is beyond argument that the union jack is the flag of Great Britain, and we simply do not have the right to downgrade that flag, the flag of another country, by appropriating it for what we think is a peculiarly Canadian purpose.

It is perfectly reasonable for us to adopt the Canadian red ensign for these purposes because in many ways the Canadian red ensign is a sort of Canadianized union jack. We obtained it from the British merchant navy, we placed our coat of arms upon it, and it has developed a special place in the flag family of Canada. Therefore it is perfectly proper for us to adopt the Canadian red ensign for these purposes, whereas it is completely improper and I think is in fact an insult to the union jack to downgrade it by appropriating it for what is purely a Canadian purpose. I hope there will be enough members in this house to carry the amendment and defeat the proposition put forward in the flag committee's report.

One other observation that could be made is that the flag committee itself did not have a very long period of time in which to discuss the principle of a flag for our commonwealth association; most of our time was spent in trying to designate a distinctive Canadian flag. I wish members would stop talking of two flags. The committee was unanimously of the view that we were striving to create a distinctive Canadian national flag.

Mr. Pugh: Hear, hear.

Mr. Scott: But none of us at any time—at least this certainly applies to myself—ever felt this precluded us from dealing with the principle of a flag, not a national flag but a flag to symbolize our association in the commonwealth and our allegiance to the crown. This was clearly before the committee. We were asked to report upon the flag question, and that included both the resolutions that were before this chamber for consideration.

I think all of us in the committee were very, very impressed by the arguments put forward by those in the committee who would have wished to see the red ensign as Canada's distinctive national flag. We listened to those arguments with respect. We could not agree that they were sufficient to constitute the red ensign as a distinctive flag for Canada, but we did realize the deep loyalties and long traditions that have grown up around the red ensign. It is a Canadian flag and it is a flag which I think it is perfectly proper, perfectly appropriate and perfectly desirable to now give a special place by designating it as a flag to symbolize our association in the commonwealth.

All the arguments put forward by the Prime Minister this afternoon simply do not stand up, and he cannot get around the very real barrier posed by the fact that the union jack is not a Canadian flag and we have no right to appropriate it for our own purposes. That is one reason I regret that the government have started out with their usual inflexible position on this matter, and I hope that as the debate progresses they will become convinced, as many of us are convinced, that they are wrong and that it would be far more appropriate and proper to designate the Canadian red ensign for this special purpose. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, we will support the amendment when it comes to a vote.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Pugh: No, sir.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, might I say right off the bat that I agree with the last speaker's statements with reference to a second flag for Canada. However, I do not agree that in the committee we all felt there should be two flags; in fact my distinct impression is that early on in the flag committee talks I and the last speaker brought out the fact that we were going to choose a flag for Canada which was finally put through as a distinctive national flag. But there was no doubt in my mind, along with others, that we were working for only one flag for Canada despite the fact that two resolutions had been put before us. We discussed the two resolutions and we said "No, we do not want two flags". I am not alone, and was not alone in the committee, in that view.

However, I would just like to say one or two things following on what the Prime Minister has said. I believe he was a little off the beat. I must say that I hate following him in a speech because many of the points he puts forward I find rather difficult at times to follow from the point of view of sense. I have stated that the committee believed we should have one flag and one flag only, and I believe this change in government thinking is just one more attempt to wipe the Canadian red ensign right off the face of the map. Their last minute substitution of the royal union flag just does not bear any merit at all.

The Prime Minister had a great deal to say about the royal union flag and the reason for our using it, which he said is historical. The royal union flag and its predecessors in England and those countries comprising Great Britain were always the Queen's flags, the Prime Minister said, and the royal union flag was the flag for the whole of the country.

If my recollection is correct, out of the mouths of the witnesses the Liberals called in the flag committee there is no question at all but that the royal union flag and its predecessors were not the flags of the country. The royal union flag was a distinct naval flag for use at sea only; it was not supposed to be used even on land bases. However, after a great many naval victories it became a very popular flag and through usage, tradition and the fact that the British people liked to fly it over their own home base, it became popular. It became popular first of all not by edict, any parliamentary reference or anything like that, but because it was flown over the homes and was finally popularized to the extent that the government made it the flag of the country. This is my recollection.

I would like to draw an analogy between that and the Canadian red ensign. After drawing the analogy I would only point out that the Canadian red ensign, our present Canadian flag, is the flag we should have if we are to have two flags. That is why I seconded this amendment. The Canadian flag that we now have—the red ensign is still our flag—has flown in this country since its beginning in 1867. It was the first flag to fly on any flagstaff over our government buildings, and it stayed there until a Liberal government in 1904, for some reason or another, hauled it down.

But that did not kill the red ensign. It came back and—we all know its history from a legislative point of view—has been Canada's flag since that time, and is still until an act of this parliament changes it. During all that time usage and tradition were the only things that made it Canada's flag. Usage and tradition have made it Canada's flag in the same way that usage and tradition made the royal union flag the flag of Great Britain. Let us not have any mumbo-jumbo over the Queen's flag.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is more appropriate for this purpose. We have a Canadian flag now. I must say at the beginning that it is a flag which I did not want to see changed in any way, shape or form, and I fought for it in committee until such time as we had a vote on it and our red ensign was turned down. At that stage I sought other means, along with other Conservative members, to produce some form of the red ensign and, failing that, find a flag which would embody those traditional symbols of the founding races of Canada, namely the French and the English.

I should like now to touch upon the history of the use of the Canadian red ensign in Canada. Many people feel that this flag was created overnight. The usage of this flag has been responsible for its acceptance. It was not adopted as a result of some parliamentary whim of a Liberal government some time after 1904, when it was taken down. It was again adopted as the Canadian flag after serious consideration; and what it meant to the people of those days it means to the people of Canada today.

If we want a change then I will agree to such a change, but to make my position absolutely clear in this regard I must say that the committee from the beginning intended to select one flag for Canada and one flag only. The resolution passed by the committee included the word "only" in association with a national flag. Obviously we were thinking of two flags, one to be the national flag and a second to show our allegiance to the Queen and our membership in the commonwealth. Many arguments were presented to the committee in this regard, but as far as I am concerned the word "only" means, only one flag for Canada.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has suggested that we should show our allegiance to the Queen and our membership in the commonwealth by the adoption of a second flag. Surely we do not need a second flag to show our allegiance to the Queen. Other commonwealth countries have not adopted flags to show their allegiance to the Queen or their memberships in the commonwealth. Throughout our history we have demonstrated time and time again our allegiance to the Queen. If we adopt, as our final choice, the one red maple leaf flag as our national flag, that should be accepted as our flag for all purposes.

The only other argument in support of the adoption of a second flag is that it will show our relationship to the commonwealth. Canada has shown leadership in commonwealth studies, and has done a great deal to further commonwealth relations. We have never been backward in doing so. Therefore do we need a second flag to exemplify our commonwealth relationship Do we need a flag other than the red ensign to show our allegiance to the Queen?

The Prime Minister stated that the vast majority of Canadians desire a second flag, and indicated that the evidence supported his statement. I have never seen any evidence, certainly none was presented to the committee, that supported that argument. Has any member ever talked with an individual on the streets of the cities of Canada and heard that individual state that we need another flag to show our allegiance to the Queen and our relationship to the commonwealth?

For the reasons I have stated I was, from the beginning of the committee meetings, opposed to the adoption of a second flag. In this regard I should like to support the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) who said that the Prime Minister was despicable in his remarks about the speech made by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming).

Mr. Scott: I did not use the word "despicable", I said he was insulting.

Mr. Pugh: Using the words of the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was insulting not only to that member, and other Conservative members of the committee, but to his own Liberal members whose votes in the committee were to be kept secret.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question of a purely factual nature which I ask, because I feel what the Prime Minister said has been misunderstood? As I understand it, there was only one vote cast against the seventh report of the committee. Anyone who can do elementary arithmetic would come to the conclusion that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. minister asking a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am asking the hon. member whether he thinks that in view of the fact that only one vote was cast against the report, it is reasonable to infer that the vote was not cast by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton?

Mr. Pugh: I should like to thank the hon. minister for his lesson in arithmetic.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could clarify the situation.

Mr. Pugh: I am now making a speech. You can clarify whatever situations you wish to clarify when you are making your own speech.

May I point out that the hon. minister may be accomplished as far as elementary arithmetic is concerned, but perhaps not so accomplished as far as elementary common sense is concerned.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but for the sake of clarification I should like to state that there was only one vote against the report, and it was cast by myself.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The facts presented by the hon. member do not constitute a question of privilege. The hon. member is aware that he is entitled to take part in this debate, at which time he can clarify any statement he feels should be corrected.

Mr. Pugh: As I suggested, Mr. Speaker, the minister may be good at elementary arithmetic but he is not so good, as far as common sense is concerned. If he will add up the votes he will find that there were 14 votes. There were seven votes cast for the motion, two against, with five abstentions. The chairman did not vote. That makes a total of 15 votes, and that is what I meant by elementary arithmetic. Perhaps I should not insult the minister's intelligence by saying that he is not good so far as common sense is concerned, but excuse him on the basis that he has not read the report thoroughly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member permit another question? Is it not true that the final vote on the seventh report of the committee, as read by the Prime Minister, indicated that there was only one vote against, with a number of abstentions? The hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois) has indicated that he cast the vote against the report.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pugh: Whatever the circumstances, the votes taken in the committee were to remain secret, and it was certainly not proper for the Prime Minister to indicate what took place.

The Prime Minister rather scathingly attacked the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, who said that two flags were not necessary. I suggest he attacked him in this way because of his proposed amendment, which does in fact suggest a different flag. In actual fact the reasoning behind that amendment lies in the knowledge that the votes on the flag issue now being taken in the house are not consistent with the votes taken on the same issues at the meetings of the special committee. Adoption of the red ensign was defeated by the committee, and that is a matter of record. Following that defeat we did not turn our tails and scurry home but attempted to find a solution to our problem by the adoption of a modification of the red ensign. When that attempt was thwarted, we tried to select a flag which would incorporate emblems symbolic of the contributions of the two founding races of this country. I have used that same analogy today.

It is perfectly obvious that the government is being supported by members of other parties in this house in its desire to approve two flags. Now that they have taken a stand we are asking them to consider, instead of the royal union flag, Canada's flag of the past, her ensign. It is rather interesting to note what happened in the committee as set out in the report. In the third paragraph there is the following:

> It was moved "that the government be authorized to take such steps as may be necessary to provide that the Canadian red ensign may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canada's membership in the commonwealth of nations and of her allegiance to the crown". An amendment was moved to substitute the words "royal union flag, generally known as the union jack" for the words "Canadian red ensign".

Then the votes are set out. One can read this easily and quickly, but any member who was on that committee knows that there was a wealth of time and words behind the final adoption of the recommendation in the seventh report of the flag committee. Members of the house should consult their own members who were on that committee to find out just what their attitude was.

We had the distinct impression that word had come down from Joey Smallwood that if a recommendation for the royal union flag was not made he would be offended and would continue to fly it anyway. That is what we thought. We expressed that view and we were laughed at. I would say to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) that he should sit down and consult with the Liberals who were members of that committee because as I said a great deal of time was spent and many words were uttered in that regard.

Mr. Churchill: Were both motions moved by Liberals?

Mr. Pugh: There was a lot of emotion on the part of the Liberals, and I will leave it at that. I do not want to go on at length at this time. I think I have made clear the basis of the recommendation of the committee that there should be only one distinctive national flag. I believe I have made my feelings very clear on the matter, as did the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) who moved the amendment. As I have said, we could not understand why there was a change right at the end.

I respect the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) because he was a distinct asset to that committee, but I know he will recall the argument that preceded the recommendation for one national flag. I have put forward my argument why we should not have two flags and at the same time why we have now moved an amendment for a second flag. I say that if Canada has a flag today which is hers through tradition and general usage it is the Canadian red ensign. In seconding the amendment I wish to emphasize the fact that if we are to have a second flag for the two distinct purposes that have been set out, to express allegiance to the crown and our commonwealth affiliation, then there is one flag in Canada today that does so to a T, our present Canadian red ensign.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the amendment to the motion for concurrence in the seventh report of the special committee I should like to begin by suggesting that in spite of some of the arguments that have been made it is completely clear in my mind that there is a distinction between the flag adopted by the vote early this morning and what we are considering now. I think the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) outlined this very well when he said that the committee had decided, as contained in their report, that only one national flag would be adopted. Paragraph 5 of the sixth report of the special committee, subparagraph (b), sets out the position clearly in these words:

> Your committee considered the following motions: ... (b) The adoption of only one national flag —motion carried 14 to zero.

So there is no confusion whatever, Mr. Speaker. It is clear that the committee's decision was for only one national flag and that that flag should be the single red maple leaf on a white background with two red bars. I want to say, as is recorded in Hansard and in Votes and Proceedings, that I did not support the recommendation made by the committee to the house, but the consensus of the house has now been taken and so far as I am concerned I intend to accept and respect the decision made by the House of Commons respecting Canada's national flag.

There is one other thing I think we should be clear about and that is that this house and, indeed, parliament as a whole, does not have the right to create a commonwealth flag. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) pointed this out. I believe we have the right to designate a symbol of our allegiance to the commonwealth and to the crown. The Prime Minister argued that if we are going to do this it would be proper for us to select the royal union flag as that symbol. So far as I am concerned, that may be an argument but it is not conclusive from the point of view of ruling out all other symbols that could in fact serve for this purpose.

It is my personal opinion that the flag that is designated as being suitable for the purpose of displaying our allegiance to the commonwealth and to the crown could in fact be some other symbol than the royal union flag. I believe that the Canadian red ensign, which contains the royal union flag as part of its composition, with a distinctive Canadian content would in fact be a more appropriate symbol. As I have just stated, the Canadian red ensign has the royal union flag on it but there is also the Canadian coat of arms in the fly, and in my opinion this is a preferable symbol for the purposes suggested in the seventh report.

The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton moved the amendment now before us and it is coincidental that the hon. member for Danforth indicated he was prepared to move essentially the same amendment. For your information, Mr. Speaker, I have written out before me a similar amendment. It was, therefore, just simply a matter of time and who was recognized first.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to go on at length about this matter, except to say that the sixth and seventh reports of the committee are matters of free votes within our party. There may be other members of our party who wish to express their own individual views respecting this matter. So far as I am concerned, I am ready to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming). I hope that we can have unanimous consent in this house to accept the amendment. The reason I say that is contained in the last sentence of the amendment moved by the hon. member in which it is stated that the committee, for such purpose, be revived.

We know, Mr. Speaker, that under the rules of this house it is not proper for this house to amend a committee report. If we do not accept a committee report and we have some suggestions for changing it, then under the rules that amendment must contain instructions to the committee when the report is referred back. Of course, for such purposes, the committee must be revived. If there were unanimous consent in this house, however, I believe we could save a great deal of time by asking for that unanimous consent and amending the seventh report of the committee by substituting the Canadian red ensign for the royal union flag. Then, we could get on with dealing with this matter and perhaps complete it during this sitting. I appeal to the members of the house on all sides to accept this amendment unanimously so that it would not be necessary to revive the committee and we could get on with other government business.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, after sitting for six weeks on the special flag committee, which was also instructed to study a proposal similar to the amendment proposed today, I had then decided not to support the motion along those lines, for the adoption of a flag identifying us as a member of the commonwealth or as an associate member of the British commonwealth countries, if that flag were to be the union jack.

I rose earlier to say that I was the only one to vote against it at that time. I must point out again today that in this matter, I am speaking for myself. Everyone is free to speak as he sees fit. I am convinced that to refer the matter again to the committee would be to no avail and would delay everything.

The amendment which has just been introduced tends to substitute the red ensign for the union jack. I think that it is a trap. We have just voted last night in favour of a distinctive national flag. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, we have sweated hours and even days to arrive at last night's result. As a member of the committee, I can even say that the selection of such a flag brought tears in the eyes of many. Those members of the committee who are in the house this afternoon could confirm my statement. They worked industriously and with all their hearts.

I am wondering today why we must choose a flag to show our allegiance to and our association with the British commonwealth of nations. Did we not adopt last night a distinctive national flag which, in due course, will become official? That flag could very well represent us at all times and in all circumstances.

I fail to understand also why the Canadian government is obliged to choose a flag to show our allegiance to the commonwealth. If the commonwealth wants a flag to identify its member nations, it should choose one.

It is true that we are free to do so, but it is very difficult to find any sense in all that.

We now have a flag—a flag that we got with great difficulties. Everybody here and outside the house knows that. I think that the single maple leaf flag will be quite appropriate to represent our country within the commonwealth. Because of what this flag means, of the eagerness displayed to get it, of our pride in flying it, because also of the sincerity of the Canadian people as evidenced by that symbol we chose last night, I think that this emblem would be quite appropriate to represent our country within any organization. In closing, I say that it is not necessary to have a second flag, one is enough to represent Canada. Let us hoist that flag, telling ourselves that it serves all purposes and that we are entitled to fly it in any circumstances, as it was adopted by parliament. It is true that we are also a member of the British commonwealth of nations.

But it is not so much the interpretation that could be attributed to it when it will be hoisted across the nation. It will not be hoisted only to show that we are a member of the commonwealth, but as a national flag, and some will defend it as such. It will then be absolutely false.

One must not forget, Mr. Speaker, that this flag hides legitimate feelings which deserve to be defended with the greatest ardour, the greatest unity, as it is a national flag. On the other hand, today we are presented with a flag which has so many ties for some groups across the country that it is intended to impose it as a second flag, a second class flag, to impose it simply to show our allegiance to the commonwealth.

The best sign of allegiance—and we can never say it enough—is a national flag, the one we adopted yesterday; and when I heard, with my own ears, the anthem sung yesterday, I saw what emotions the adoption of this flag had given rise to.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot reveal how the vote was taken, but the matter was studied and discussed in the committee. I must abstain from revealing how the other members of the committee voted after these negotiations, but I adopted a position in committee, I maintain it today and I shall defend it tomorrow.

I did not approve the choice of this flag in the committee, and I will not support it today; my colleagues can follow the dictates of their conscience, but I for one oppose the second motion. This does not mean that I can be expected to support the other, for when the second comes, I will adopt exactly the same attitude. For, in my opinion, one national flag is sufficient to represent us anywhere, anytime.

[Text]

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be those of congratulation to the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) for presenting in a highly competent and capable manner an argument that should find great merit in the eyes of the government, since he was proposing that the government adopt as our commonwealth symbol a flag over which we have some right and jurisdiction.

If nothing else was learned from the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the interjections during it there is one definite lesson, that we in this country have no right to ask the people of the United Kingdom to provide us with their flag for use as a commonwealth symbol. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, we have every right and justification to propose the Canadian red ensign as that symbol.

In my speech yesterday I listed the reasons that I felt the flag design which was adopted by vote early this morning would not be satisfactory as a national flag. Already we see some of the justification for the argument I made then, an argument which was made by many other hon. members on a number of occasions. The flag design adopted last night is not capable of conveying an association with any other country which belongs to the commonwealth because it does not contain within it those symbols which are inherent in the red ensign, a flag capable of being both a national and international flag in indicating our association with our commonwealth friends and the contribution Canada has made over the years to the building of the commonwealth of nations.

Despite the conviction displayed by the Prime Minister in his speech in supporting the recommendation of the flag committee, the design recommended by the committee is not at all as satisfactory as the Canadian ensign would be in representing our commonwealth association. He presented in a most illogical argument a degree of gobbledygook unsurpassed during the last flag debate and, in my opinion, not surpassable in the present debate.

Last Friday the Prime Minister made a high sounding speech indicating his views on why we should adopt a new flag. I did not agree with the arguments he made then, nor do I now, but I admit he made a significant contribution to the debate. But his speeches earlier this morning and this afternoon have added nothing to any feeling of respect for him and the office he holds, principally because of the attitude he adopted and the method which he used in endeavouring to get his points across.

One of the most interesting portions of his speech this afternoon was that in which he admitted for the first time that the Canadian red ensign was our national flag. Until he said that I had always held the impression, according to statements made by the Prime Minister, that we did not have a national flag and that what he was endeavouring to do was produce one. Now, all of a sudden, after the vote has been taken and a new flag chosen, we discover through the mouth of the Prime Minister that the Canadian red ensign was, according to his mind, all the time a national flag.

The Prime Minister attacked the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton in a most despicable way. He laughed at the hon. member and told him how illogical he was. If the hon. member was illogical in any way it is because of the illogical procedure of the government in endeavouring to produce a second flag for the Canadian nation. What the hon. member was trying to do, as we in the official opposition have tried to do on so many occasions during the life of this parliament, was put forward arguments which he hoped would make sense not only to the Canadian people but to other members of the commonwealth. Since I have been in this house the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) has displayed a devotion and dedication to the betterment of the Canadian way of life which is a credit not only to his constituency and to his province but to this nation. He is not the type of man who should find the Prime Minister deriving great joy and benefit from deriding the remarks he has made in putting forward a cogent argument with regard to an illogical recommendation on the part of the government.

Why should the Canadian red ensign not be the flag which represents our association with the commonwealth? What better flag could be flown from the flagpoles of this nation to portray our association with that great body? I cannot think of anything of which Canadians would be more proud than the knowledge that this house had at last found a place in this country for a flag which has meant so much to so many for so many years. As I said yesterday, I appreciate that this new flag may in days to come acquire something of the meaning which attaches to the Canadian red ensign today. But it does not have that meaning now. If we are to do anything for this new flag in the hope that it will become an acceptable symbol of this nation, we should produce alongside it, since the government desires two flags, one which is steeped in the history and traditions of this land, one which means so much to those who have lost loved ones in two world wars, one which means so much to the builders of this nation. I point out again that this is a flag which incorporates in it the union jack; it has in it the stuff of which the commonwealth is made, especially the British tradition which is so important and which has played so large a part in the development of this nation of ours. Surely the fact that the New Democratic party and the Social Credit party find a degree of merit in this amendment which they could not find when it came to the selection of a unique national flag should be an indication to the government that it would be wiser and saner to accept this proposal by my hon. friend from Victoria-Carleton and have it adopted, without the degree of debate and rancour associated with the vote which was taken early this morning.

I am not interested in debating at great length the value of a second flag to this nation. I am not interested in debating whether we should have one, two, three or four flags flying from the flagpoles of this country. But I am interested in seeing some common sense used, if we are to accept the second flag, in the selection of that flag. We as Canadians can find many more reasons in favour of the adoption of the Canadian red ensign than can be found in favour of the adoption of the union jack. It is true there was a time when the union jack was used as widely in this nation as was the Canadian red ensign. There was probably a time when Canadians did not know whether the union jack or the Canadian red ensign should be the official flag of this nation. But that time has long passed.

If anything was achieved by the debate which has just ended it was that great bodies of Canadians in all parts of this nation were convinced that the Canadian red ensign has been the flag of this country ever since 1867. A great many of them for many years hence will continue to fly it and to respect it. They will still consider it to be the flag of Canada. What more logical step could this parliament take than to adopt it, thus recognizing the feelings which are held, and deeply held, by so many people in this country today? For many Canadians it will not be easy to move from the Canadian red ensign to a red maple leaf flag. If we were to adopt the Canadian red ensign as our commonwealth symbol it would at least give these people an opportunity during the period of transition to fly the flag they want to fly, knowing that it still had some meaning in this country.

Nothing which the Prime Minister said today convinces me there is any justification for accepting the union jack rather than the Canadian red ensign. I believe there are many other members in this chamber who remained unconvinced by what the right hon. gentleman had to say. I believe that in his own party there is less acceptance of the union jack than there is of the red ensign. After all is said and done, after votes have been recorded and after a new flag design has been adopted by this house, I remain convinced that there are many members of the Liberal party who feel great devotion for the Canadian red ensign. They do not want to see it hauled down from the flagpoles of this nation. They feel deeply about this. Now, at this moment, they have an opportunity to do something about it by urging the Prime Minister and his colleagues to accept the amendment which is before the house, thus ending this flag question so that we may go forward to deal constructively with the material and economic affairs of this nation which the people who sent us here wish us to deal with as prudently as possible.

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to enter into the debate on this amendment at this time, but rather to speak on the main motion. However, after listening to some of the speeches of this afternoon I feel I should enter into the debate. I am perhaps one of the last of the members of the flag committee to speak during this flag debate. First of all I would also like to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) for appointing me to the committee. It was not a task that I asked for but it was a task I was happy to carry out, not only for the Prime Minister but in my view for Canadians across this country.

I found on that committee, together with the other members of all parties, close friendships and close associations of mind although we differed in certain respects. I found that apart from our differences in certain respects we could always be friendly and sociable. I am happy therefore that this committee gave me an opportunity to know some members of this house somewhat better. I disagree with some of the remarks that have been made with regard to the Prime Minister's speech. I think the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates) used the words, in connection with that speech, "insulting" and "despicable". He also suggested that some things had been said with derision. I am sure the Prime Minister did not intend to be insulting or derisive. I knew the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton before being appointed to the flag committee, and during the meetings of the committee and before that time I always had a great deal of respect for him, although we were of different minds on this subject. I thought he would be the last to suggest that the remarks of the Prime Minister should be taken in this vein and used against him.

Certain remarks have been made in this house with respect to the decision of the committee regarding one national flag as contained in the sixth report of the committee. It is true that the report stated that a vote was taken on one national flag for Canada but, as the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) pointed out, during the committee meetings it was made very clear and all members of the committee knew very well—and I was also one who raised this question—that although there was to be a vote on one national flag for Canada it was to be without prejudice to the committee dealing with a flag symbolizing our connection with the commonwealth of nations and our loyalty to the Queen. I challenge any member of that committee to deny that as a fact.

My views on a national flag were well known in the committee and are known in my constituency. I wanted to speak in the debate on the sixth report of the committee, but circumstances prevented my so doing. However, I have no hesitation in making my views known with respect to the seventh report of the committee. I respect the views of the hon. member for Danforth and the hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois). The hon. member for Danforth at all times—he stated this in the house and I am sure he will not think I am taking too much of a liberty in stating it again—supported the Canadian red ensign as being the flag symbolic of our commonwealth association. That view was always held by the hon. member for Danforth. Although I assume that when the vote was taken he may have voted for the union jack, I believe he did so reluctantly because he was always for the Canadian red ensign being the flag designated for our commonwealth association.

The hon. member for Mégantic was also opposed to any kind of flag symbolizing our commonwealth association. I respect completely this hon. member's view. However, Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to draw attention to the remarks made in committee by the mover of this amendment, the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, and the seconder, the hon member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Pugh). I am sorry they are not present at the moment. I would point out that the remarks made in the committee, when the proposal was put forward that there be a flag symbolizing our commonwealth connections and our loyalty to the Queen, should be discussed by hon. members opposite, as a loyal opposition which sincerely believes that the Canadian red ensign should be the flag designated to symbolize our commonwealth association, with the mover and seconder of the amendment, because the views they propounded in the committee were exactly opposite to those they are now propounding.

I can understand the views of those who believe the Canadian red ensign should be the flag designated for this purpose. I also, being honest with myself, held that view and I held it, I might add, somewhat strongly. But then I kept looking into the matter further, when it was brought to my attention that perhaps it should not be designated as the flag for commonwealth purposes. In addition, Mr. Speaker, the views expressed by the Prime Minister today helped me to see why it should not be so designated. In fact a question was asked by, I believe, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), "Were they Liberals who moved both motions?" The answer was yes; the hon. member for Leeds admitted that he was the one who moved the amendment designating the union jack as the commonwealth flag, and another Liberal member moved the original motion that it should be the Canadian red ensign.

Mr. Churchill: That was the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman), was it?

Mr. Macaluso: I cannot recall who it was, but I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. I believe if that hon. member was here he would admit that. I see that the hon. member for Danforth agrees with my recollection. I listened to the arguments put forward this afternoon by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton for whom, as I have said, I have always had respect, even before I became a member of the flag committee, although we differed at times. The mover and the seconder of this amendment are the same members who argued in committee that the Canadian red ensign should not be relegated to a secondary position. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary argued strongly and sincerely that he would not see the Canadian red ensign in a secondary position at any time, even if the one national flag for Canada was adopted. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I found the statements made today by the seconder of this amendment incongruous and contradictory. I am not arguing with his reasons for changing his mind, but surely he should indicate those reasons to this house. He argued very strongly in favour of his position, as have many other members of the Conservative party.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macaluso: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: While he is dealing with people who have changed their minds, will he tell us why the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) changed his mind?

Mr. Macaluso: I do not know why that hon. member changed his mind. If that member was present perhaps he would give you an answer. Although I have had discussions with him, he has not expressed his reasons, and I do not think it is my function to explain such a change of opinion.

Mr. Churchill: Why did the Prime Minister change his mind?

Mr. Macaluso: I have no knowledge of that either. Perhaps the hon. member should have directed his question to the Prime Minister when he was here today.

The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates) stated that the Prime Minister had said today that the Canadian red ensign was the national flag of Canada, and of course we have heard a great deal on that subject. The Prime Minister has stated on many occasions, and I support him, that the Canadian red ensign was originally intended to be used as the national flag of Canada until parliament ruled otherwise. That argument has been repeated here on many occasions.

I am of neither French nor English stock, although I was born in this country. My grandparents were immigrants to Canada, and I am thankful that they came here rather than somewhere else. My wife is of English and Scottish descent, so I do not know what my children could be called. In any event we have too many hyphenated names around here as far as I am concerned. Perhaps my children should be referred to as English-Scottish-Italian-Canadians. However I have always considered them to be strictly, only and always Canadians, and I feel very strongly about this.

Many individuals have suggested that in my point of view I am overlooking British history. Many individuals living in my riding, who are of English speaking and U.E.L. stock, do not take exception to the flag adopted this morning. I can give the names of some of these people, who would not be opposed to my doing so, but I will not do so at this time.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macaluso: The hon. member laughs, but I suggest that he knows many individuals of the same type who live in his riding.

As I suggested, many people have spoken to me harshly because they feel I have forgotten British tradition, and British jurisprudence in law. I would be lacking in respect for, and ignoring those principles I learned at university if I were to forget either British tradition or the tradition and culture of my own family, and I say with a great deal of reluctance that those who would do so are neither true to themselves, their consciences or anyone else.

I am in favour of a flag which denotes our commonwealth relations and our loyalties, if you will, to the Queen. I am not in agreement with those hon. members, such as the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming), who suggests that because there is something missing in the one national flag which we have proposed we feel the need for a second flag. Anyone who feels that the symbols on a flag represent feelings that can be lost when those symbols are replaced does not hold true feelings for that which the flag represents. I suggest such individuals have never held dear to their hearts those things represented by a flag, if they can believe that such things can be lost by a change in the flag.

The members of the Conservative party who sat on the special flag committee saw fit to absent themselves during two votes. On the first occasion the vote concerned the adoption of the Canadian red ensign as representative of our commonwealth relationship. The second occasion was on an amendment that the flag to indicate that relationship should be the union jack. If their feelings were so strong in this regard why have they adopted a different attitude at this time? Why, having taken the attitude they took in the committee, do they now in this house propose an obviously illogical amendment?

The royal union flag, commonly known as the union jack, still flies in many areas of this country, particularly in Ontario. One has only to look at high schools, elementary schools and public buildings to observe the union jack. Why should the union jack not continue to be flown in this country? I am sure that it will not cease to be flown because of the adoption of this amendment. I am sure the Canadian red ensign will not cease to be flown as the result of the adoption of the flag which we voted on early this morning.

I do not suggest for a moment that we should attempt to stop the citizens of this country from flying either of those flags. However, there is nothing at all wrong with flying the union jack in this country as an indication of our allegiance to the crown and our membership in the commonwealth, particularly when it is flown by the government of Canada and those citizens of Canada who will continue to fly it, in any event, on appropriate occasions. I do not profess to know all of the occasions on which the union jack should be flown. I have always felt that the Canadian red ensign is a beautiful flag, and I still feel that way. I do disagree with those who suggest that the Canadian red ensign imparts a specific Canadian message, but that does not mean I disrespect the feelings of hon. members who think otherwise.

We learned from experts who appeared before the committee that the red ensign came to us from the British admiralty, and that as a result of usage it was adopted by order in council as the Canadian national flag in 1945, at which time it was stated that it should continue to be the Canadian national flag until a future parliament decided otherwise, and adopted a distinctive flag. I cannot accede to the argument that we can fly the Canadian national flag proposed now by the government while at the same time fly the Canadian red ensign with the Canadian coat of arms.

I went along with the suggestion to substitute the union jack for the Canadian red ensign because I felt very strongly and sincerely that the Canadian red ensign should not be placed in a secondary position, as a flag representative of our commonwealth relations. I think the amendment to the motion now before us deals with this suggestion in even stronger terms than I have used.

An hon. Member: It is easy.

Mr. Macaluso: It may be easy but—

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macaluso: I will be through in a moment and I will be glad to answer anything then. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Pugh) stated in his speech that he saw no evidence in the flag committee that there should be other than one national flag. I have already given my view on that and it is substantiated by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott). I put out the challenge that this is not so, that there was always the qualification that it would be with no prejudice to the committee discussing the matter at a later date.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) stated today, I felt during the debate on the amendment that to be consistent with their views and with the views of the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary they would have moved an amendment to delete altogether the recommendation made in the seventh report of the committee. I do not wish to put forward to members opposite that they should not have changed their minds. Of course they should. We all have the liberty and the freedom to do so, but I felt I should try to clarify some of the things that were said during the debate on this amendment.

If the amendment should carry, my own personal feeling is that I am quite prepared to continue respecting the Canadian red ensign not only as the flag designated to represent our commonwealth association and our loyalty to the crown but as a flag which I admit and have always stated has some history in the development of this country. It has some history. I disagree that it should be our national flag but I am not one who has ever said that it has no history whatsoever.

I will conclude my remarks now and wait to speak on the motion itself, if we get to it. Before sitting down I will accept the question that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) may have had.

Mr. Churchill: I will reserve my question and answer the hon. member in a speech I hope to make later today.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso) was labouring at some length the question of the logicality or otherwise of the position taken by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) when he introduced the amendment. He appeared to be rather puzzled by it. I should like to say at once that I find nothing illogical about the fact that this amendment was introduced by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton. I can understand the preoccupation of the hon. member for Hamilton West, having been a member of the committee, with the ins and outs of all the votes that took place, but it seems to me that those in the official opposition who have spoken so far on the proposition now before us have made it quite clear that in the first instance they would have preferred a single flag without any other arrangement, that that single flag should have continued to be the red ensign and that they reserved their position on the second proposition in the committee and abstained for that quite logical reason. However, when the decision made by the house last night is given full effect it will result in the removing of the red ensign from the Canadian scene in any official sense, and it is logical that the official opposition should now seek to propose the amendment that is before us.

I say at once, Mr. Speaker, that I do not share their line of reasoning in this respect. I made a public statement in my own constituency when the original resolutions in the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) appeared on the order paper. I said that while I did not necessarily agree with all the particulars contained in those resolutions I personally liked the idea of Canada having a national flag of a distinctive maple leaf design and I also liked the idea of having a flag which would be a symbol of our relationship with the commonwealth and our allegiance to the Queen. That has been my position ever since.

I have not participated in the debate since it began except briefly for a few minutes the other day, but I have a few things I should like to say with reference to the amendment now before us, which I may say I support quite strongly. I listened rather carefully to the statement made by the Prime Minister earlier this afternoon and I must say I was a little surprised that, after having been so reticent about participating in the earlier discussions, he should suddenly launch himself to the forefront at such an early stage of the debate on this motion.

When the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates) spoke earlier he urged that some of the members of the Liberal party, who he feels have an attachment to the red ensign, should do some urging of their leaders to reconsider their position and to consider supporting the amendment. In my view the hon. member for Cumberland is suggesting a rather circuitous route. So far as I am concerned I appeal directly to those members of the Liberal party, in the light of the declaration that there will be a free vote, to show their attachment to the retention of the red ensign for the particular purposes suggested in the report of the committee, namely as a symbol of our association with the commonwealth and of our allegiance to the crown.

My assessment of the Prime Minister's arguments was that they were embedded purely in the ancient principles of heraldry. He had some authorities and I am not going to quarrel with the correctness of the views of the authorities he cited. But I am going to suggest that with regard to the question of the kind of flag symbols we are going to have there are considerations which are of more vital and vibrant importance than strict adherence to all the principles of ancient heraldry. As a matter of fact, I think we have already ploughed a little new ground in this connection by the action the house has already taken in connection with the other motion. I am not suggesting that such considerations should be entirely ignored and in my view they are not entirely ignored in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton which my colleague, the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott), indicated he would have been prepared to move had it not already been proposed. I feel that the original suggestion brought forward by the flag committee ignores the very thing which was symbolized in the earlier report of the committee, namely that history is not a static or a dead thing. This report of the committee ignores the fact that the British empire and the British commonwealth is something which is living, evolving and moving on into the future which I, for one, hope will be as splendid as it has been in many respects in the past.

At the conclusion of his remarks I asked the Prime Minister whether or not the Canadian government had consulted with or made any attempt to ascertain the views of the government of the United Kingdom in respect of the proposal that we might adopt the royal union flag as the symbol of our allegiance to the commonwealth. I did so specifically because of my feeling that, while at one time we were in effect under the umbrella of the United Kingdom, we were an extension of it, since 1931 that has not been the case. We are, in fact, an independent nation even though we owe allegiance to the Queen who is one in person with the Queen of the United Kingdom. It would have been simply a matter of courtesy, in my view, apart from anything else, before such a proposal as this were placed before the Canadian parliament, at least to have had some sort of assurance that the government and people of the United Kingdom were willing and happy that we should do so. At least we should know if they are unhappy about it.

The Prime Minister's arguments concerning the origination and derivation of the royal union jack may be quite sound and logical from a historical point of view. I am not going to enter that argument or attempt to set myself up as any authority in this connection. I do suggest that, for all practical purposes, the union jack is the flag of the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland. We should recognize that fact. I do not know whether or not any other members have heard reports similar to those I have heard from people returning to Canada from the United Kingdom in recent weeks and months. I have had it reported to me that at least some people in the United Kingdom, when they read their newspapers, were rather disturbed by the fact that at this late date we Canadians apparently were trying to steal their flag. I have no way of knowing how widespread that sentiment may be in the United Kingdom. Apparently it has come as quite a surprise to at least some people in the United Kingdom to discover that Canada, who they thought had asserted her independence quite some time ago, still considered that, somehow or other, she was under their umbrella or tied to the apron strings of the mother country. I gather they were inclined to be just a bit resentful over the fact that we had taken action which led to the establishment—I think we all agree it was in large part under the leadership that came from Canada—of the commonwealth of nations, as free, independent nations associated with one another, and yet apparently still desired to keep the United Kingdom flag rather than be willing to fly our own.

In support of the amendment, I may say that I feel there would be no quarrel on the part of anyone in the United Kingdom if we were to select what has been our flag since 1945 officially, with its union jack in the corner and our coat of arms, as a symbol of our association with the commonwealth. We may continue to use it freely in that sense. We have other associations in addition to those we have within the commonwealth. For an example, we are a member of NATO. Let me take a hypothetical situation. Let us suppose we wanted a flag which would be, in some measure, a symbol of our association in NATO. Would we think of proposing a resolution in this house that would make the stars and stripes the symbol of our association in NATO without asking our cousins in the United States whether or not they were agreeable to this idea? Perhaps the parallel is not exact. I would agree that perhaps the royal union flag has heraldic implications that the stars and stripes has not. Nevertheless, if you consider the logic of things in this day and age, I suggest that really there is not much practical difference between suddenly deciding we are going to adopt officially in this parliament, for our own purposes, the flag of the United Kingdom, and suddenly deciding we were going to adopt for certain purposes and usages, the flag of the United States of America.

I really have not much more to say, Mr. Speaker, except that I do feel when we look back on all that has taken place in this house and throughout the country since the question of a Canadian flag came to the fore, the difficulties that have been encountered, and if we take into account all the factors that are involved in terms of healing some of the wounds that were referred to last night, then it would be the part of wisdom for this parliament to retain in a permanent and honoured place the red ensign that many Canadians have come to know and to love. Apart from any other considerations, apart from the fact that I find the symbolism of the Canadian red ensign very appropriate for our association in the commonwealth, I believe these considerations should not be lost from sight by members of this house in reaching a decision on the committee report which is now before us.

I appeal to hon. members opposite in particular to consider these things before they come to a decision. All of us in this house claim we have the right to vote freely and have been given the right to do so by our party leadership. We should consider all these elements before we decide to reject out of hand the amendment which is now before the house. My only real association with the red ensign in conjunction with the commonwealth was during the period I was in attendance at the commonwealth parliamentary conference in Kuala Lumpur some time ago. I must say that there are situations when we, as the senior member of the commonwealth, find that the position of our flag in the array of commonwealth flags is right next to that of the United Kingdom. This is a symbol which I feel most Canadians would accept equally well. It is in keeping with the traditions that have been built around this particular emblem which first had official recognition in this country. It is a symbol which I would hope would be more acceptable in the eyes of many people of French speaking ancestry than one which is purely and simply a symbol of the United Kingdom, a country which I honour and respect and to which I have a strong sense of emotional attachment that sometimes puzzles me because I have never been there. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I think here is an area in which we can move toward a unity of feeling and understanding, things which may be lost if we insist on implementing the report of the committee.

For these reasons I would appeal to other hon. members of the house to join with those of us who have already indicated our support for the amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago, I had no intention of speaking on a distinctive national flag for Canada. But I certainly intend to discuss the recommendation contained in the seventh report of the committee concerning the desire of the government to have a flag representing the agreement between Canada and the commonwealth.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso), who so ably dealt with the procedure adopted by the committee, showed how difficult it is for members who did not sit on the committee to understand the ramification of the votes. How much more difficult it must be for the Canadian people in general to follow the procedural implications of all the votes that were taken.

As I set out on my few brief remarks this afternoon may I say to you, sir, that everything I have to say in a historical context, and every other context, relates to the amendment before the house and the desire of the government to have a flag representing Canada's co-equal position in the commonwealth.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I always thought that it was not quite proper for a member to speak in too great details about the history of his own electoral riding in the House of Commons. But allow me to recall some historical facts concerning Brome-Missisquoi, the electoral riding I now represent in this house.

Some 75 years ago the population of Brome-Missisquoi was approximately 75 per cent English speaking and 25 per cent French speaking. Today, in 1964, the percentage is exactly the opposite: 75 per cent French speaking and 25 per cent English speaking.

Mr. Speaker, you can undoubtedly notice by my accent that English is my mother tongue, but today I have the honour of representing a dominantly French Canadian population in the House of Commons.

[Text]

Mr. Choquette: Today your riding is 75 per cent Liberal and 25 per cent Conservative.

[Translation]

Mr. Grafftey: It is not true, and I am glad the hon. member for Lotbinière made such a remark, because I am going to answer him in a few minutes. I am quite pleased—

[Text]

—I think hon. members will soon realize why I am happy that the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) made such an interjection because he thinks—

[Translation]

—because the government proposed a distinctive flag, that the Liberals will necessarily obtain votes in the next election in the province of Quebec. That is not necessarily so.

[Text]

Mr. Choquette: We will get the Liberal vote, that's for sure.

Mr. Grafftey: We in Brome-Missisquoi understand the true historical fact that two great races founded the glory and the strength of Canada. Today this approach also includes many citizens who, since the time of confederation, have come to Canada to join the two historic founding races in building a stronger and greater nation.

I know, as I begin my observations, that I am going to repeat myself but I am sure you, sir, will see that these keynote remarks, these introductory remarks I make, are definitely to be related to the amendment before the house and the government's desire to have a commonwealth flag. I cannot do it without referring to the historic background of my riding and to the present situation in it.

Although we are dealing with something that has national significance I think there are times when we can speak in some detail of our ridings, more especially when one speaks of Brome-Missisquoi where we truly understand, where the two great founding races live side by side in harmony and understanding, where we understand—and it is not an intellectual proposition—the positive attributes of unity in diversity are something deeply believed in and felt. That is why I found it very difficult to take the floor of the house and speak one way or the other during the debate on a distinctive national flag; but it will soon become apparent to the hon. member for Lotbinière why I am on my feet now.

[Translation]

I have a good answer to the question put to me by my hon. friend a few minutes ago.

[Text]

I feel, sir, that in relation to the problems of national unity and confederation, when we talk about the necessity for mutual understanding and bonne entente, and better understanding, we are not nearly positive enough in underlining the positive and glorious aspects of unity in diversity.

I think that in most organizations it is unfortunate that a 90 per cent area is the problem area and a 10 per cent area is the area of rich opportunity. This has been true in questions relating to national unity. Unfortunately we spend an inordinate amount of time on the 90 per cent problem area and typically ignore the 10 per cent area of pure opportunity. I hope before this debate is over, whether we are on amendments or subamendments, whether we are speaking of a commonwealth flag or a distinctive flag, I hope from now on in this house and outside it we will talk about the 10 per cent area of rich opportunity in relation to the problems of confederation and national unity.

Ten years ago I was speaking with one of my good friends in Montreal and I made remarks rather like those I am making in the house right now, and he said, "Oh, Heward, how boring. Can't we take it for granted we are united and strong and go ahead and deal with the bread and butter economic issues that are really facing this nation?" "Well," I said, "I suppose you are right, we can." But I think today as we deal with this subject, whether it is a distinctive flag or a commonwealth flag, that we cannot take such a thing for granted. Especially in the House of Commons we must show real leadership and discuss positively subjects which lie in the area of national unity, federal-provincial relationship and confederation. Now that we have a distinctive Canadian flag I hope we shall get on to discuss the real, bread and butter economic issues.

The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) suggested in the course of his intervention, and I am glad he made it, that because the government had proposed what the Prime Minister described as a non-political flag, and because of what has happened in the house in the last 24 hours, the Liberals would be elected automatically in the province of Quebec. I would simply point out that in 1962 there were some who felt that because of the introduction of simultaneous translation services in this chamber, bilingual cheques and that sort of thing, the position of the Conservative party in Quebec might be helped. Well, I think the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Choquette)—

[Translation]

—Mr. Caouette and the Créditistes have certainly given proof to the contrary in 1962.

[Text]

I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that I am straying from the subject of the amendment to some extent. But speaking directly to the amendment and to the question of a flag representing our association with the commonwealth, we must concede, now, that there is no fleur-de-lis in the distinctive flag or the proposed commonwealth flag. I say this without any rancour whatsoever. I am not saying it is what I want and I am not saying it is what the people in my province want. Certainly, whether the choice, now, is to be the union jack or the red ensign there will be no fleur-de-lis in the proposed commonwealth flag.

An hon. Member: It is in the red ensign.

Mr. Grafftey: It is in the red ensign but not, I think, in the sense we were considering during the original debate. I know that much of the Prime Minister's argument was technically correct—not all of it, by any means. But who in the world would suggest that it is possible to explain technicalities from the Atlantic to the Pacific on an issue so emotionally charged as this? I am convinced of one thing. I am convinced that while we on this side of the house had a free vote, no matter what was written or said across this land, the same could not be said for members on the other side of this chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. I am sure he will permit the Chair to bring to his attention the rule that he cannot reflect on a vote of the house.

Mr. Grafftey: I was not speaking on a past vote. I was speaking of a vote on the particular amendment which is before us.

I know there will be laughter from the other side at what I am about to say. But had the party to which I belong formed the government—I cannot say when we would have brought a flag, or flags, before the house for approval, or even if we would have proceeded by bringing a flag or flags before the house at all—I am convinced of one thing: We would have brought in one distinctive flag for one united Canada. There would have been no doubt about it. I realize I am speaking very frankly and forthrightly. My party, collectively and as individuals, has often made mistakes in the province of Quebec. But we have never made the mistake of dividing and ruling, as members opposite have done. That is why I left the Liberal party. I left the Liberal party because of resolutions such as we have before the house today.

The Prime Minister can try to tell us this is not a two flag resolution. He can go into technicalities. He can squirm. But he knows as well as I do that members in his Quebec caucus have stated this will be interpreted in Quebec as a two flag resolution. A party which is sympathetic to an associate state, a party which has never said the same thing inside the province of Quebec as it has said outside that province, now pleads with us to keep this question of a commonwealth flag above politics. I am not scared of the Prime Minister. He is an honourable man who wishes to do everything possible to unite this country. What I am scared of are his lieutenants such as the hon. member for Lotbinière, who think they can wave a flag and forget the economic issues and attempt to poison the minds of the people in the province of Quebec against the party to which I belong, telling them: Here is your flag; we are going to be elected automatically. No matter what the Prime Minister says, this is a two flag resolution.

Mr. Pigeon: We can go for two weeks on this subject.

Mr. Grafftey: Like his right hon. predecessor, a great Canadian, Louis St. Laurent, a man I respect as I respect the present Prime Minister, a man who did much to unite and help this country, the present Prime Minister does not know what the old guard of the Liberal party is like in the province of Quebec. We have noted the utter surprise of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan). He could not understand why his party is doing what it is doing. At the same time we notice this other attitude expressed by the members from the province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I will tell you why the government is following its present course. It is because the party opposite has never said the same thing in the province of Quebec as it has said outside that province. While the Prime Minister would like to keep this whole matter out of the political arena, through gross ineptitude people who wanted to vote for a distinctive Canadian flag were forced to do it by reason of closure and today we are forced to move into an area—

An hon. Member: Would you answer a question?

Mr. Grafftey: I will answer later. On this side of the house we have always said we want a united Canada under one distinctive flag. But no matter what members opposite say, this proposal now before us will be looked upon in the province of Quebec as a two flag issue. Their colleagues from Quebec will soon tell us how it will be regarded in many sections of this country. No amount of technical explanation, no amount of weaselling in and out will explain that away.

Make sure of one thing. Members opposite have come up to me and said, jeeringly: "Heward, you cannot vote against report No. 6; think what would happen in Missisquoi county, which is mainly French speaking." Again, members have approached me and said in the same tone: "Heward, you cannot vote against report No. 7. Look what will happen in Brome county". Yet the Prime Minister says this is not a two flag resolution. Who is fooling whom? Who has done more than members opposite to divide this country?

Mr. Choquette: Try to make sense. You have just said the opposite thing. Make up your mind.

Mr. Grafftey: I want to make one thing very clear. Yesterday I made my position unequivocally clear both in English speaking and in French speaking Canada. Members of my party did not in all cases agree with me, but we were allowed to vote in such a way as to express our views. Since I was a college student I have always stood for one united Canada under a distinctive flag without a fleur-de-lis or union jack in it. I was allowed to vote that way. Were you allowed a free vote over there? Are you going to be allowed a free vote on this seventh report of the committee?

Some hon. Members: Sure.

Mr. Grafftey: Not on your life. Through gross ineptitude you have plunged, like the Liberal party has always plunged, a delicate question of national unity, federal-provincial relations and confederation right into the heart of partisan politics. Mr. Speaker, I am proud of Canada's co-equal position with other members of the commonwealth in the commonwealth of nations. I am proud, as every member of this house is proud, to recognize the presence of the crown in Canada. Enough said. But when I voted yesterday for a distinctive Canadian flag, I voted in the name of all the citizens of Brome-Missisquoi, English speaking and French speaking; and we did not need this cynical approach that is being brought forward today, namely a two flag resolution.

Mr. Matheson: Let us hear about the amendment.

Mr. Grafftey: You will hear about the amendment. I say to hon. members opposite, Mr. Speaker, that no member is more responsible than the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) for the unhappy situation we are in right now.

Mr. Matheson: That is a generality.

Mr. Grafftey: It is a very important generality that the people of Canada are soon going to understand.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker. would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Grafftey: I will answer the hon. members' question when I have finished, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Matheson: A moment ago the hon. member said that the Prime Minister had been correct in some of the technical comments respecting a flag, although not in all. Perhaps, since he is generalizing, he will be able to bear down and tell us where in any of his comments the Prime Minister was in error.

Mr. Bigg: That is not a proper question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Bigg) not to interrupt the hon. member for Leeds who has posed a question with the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Grafftey: I will answer questions at the end of my remarks, sir, which will be very soon. I would say that no matter what many people want to do in this vote regarding the union jack, whether they do not vote at all or vote for the amendment in favour of the red ensign, let it be quite clear that as far as I am concerned, no matter what we are doing now—and I know we cannot talk about past votes in the house—when I voted yesterday I voted in the name of every Canadian in my constituency, English and French speaking, for one distinctive flag, for one united Canada. If we are in the delicate position we have now reached in this debate it is because of a government and party that is flirting with the idea of an associate state and has unwittingly—that is the best we can say, unwittingly—sown the two state theory. Therefore it is only logical that Canadians are now becoming confused when they bring a two flag resolution before the House of Commons and present it to the Canadian people.

I say quite forthrightly and frankly that in my heart of hearts, no matter how I am going to vote—there is a paradox here and perhaps hon. members will think I am contradicting myself, but I am not—on this report, I will do everything in my power to explain inside and outside the province of Quebec that what we were handling was a one flag resolution, whereas because of the actions and the stupidity of this government it seemed to many Canadians that we were dealing with a two flag resolution proposed by a government that has never said the same thing in different parts of Canada to all Canadians. No matter how stupid at times we might have seemed, especially to members opposite, we have always said the same thing in every corner of Canada; we have always stood for one united Canada, for one distinctive flag no matter what it looked like.

Mr. Choquette: You want to unite Canada, but your party is divided.

Mr. Grafftey: Take the whips off your party and you will see how your people vote on this issue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) not to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Grafftey: I know some hon. members will say—and this may include some of the remarks I have made—that a great many sad things have been said during the debate on the flag, whether it has been on this resolution or the other; but the facts of political life in Canada are these. I was asked this on the radio the other day, namely about our being a national party when we had such a small representation in the province of Quebec. West of the lakehead the government has less members than we have in the province of Quebec. It is very difficult, in the classical sense of the word, to call the two old, traditional parties national parties. Let us both realize that fact on the floor of the House of Commons, act responsibly and recognize that we have not a strong mandate, on either side of the house, from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. Pepin: Do you want to secede and join the United States?

Mr. Grafftey: I do not, and I do not think the hon. member does, either.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Grafftey: Yes.

Mr. Walker: I wonder whether the hon. member would take the assurance of the government whip, as another hon. member of the house, that the whips are not on in this vote and that it is a totally free vote.

An hon. Member: If so, it is the only one.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, let us make progress bit by bit. In this present debate it has been said time and time again that no matter how technically—

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, before six o'clock—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege or a point of order?

Mr. Choquette: I think we should hear from the hon. member whether or not he is in favour of the amendment. He has not said a word about it, so he is out of order.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, no matter how—

Mr. Choquette: Are you in favour—yes or no?

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will display good manners and keep his seat, I will get to the point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member will have an opportunity to do this at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned at six o'clock I was talking about my riding of Brome-Missisquoi, and I pointed out that most of the citizens of Brome were English speaking while most of my electors in Missisquoi were French speaking.

I also wish to point out that when I voted for a Canadian flag last night, I voted for a distinctive flag for a united Canada. And when I voted for a distinctive Canadian flag, I voted on behalf of my English speaking and French speaking fellow citizens in the riding of Brome-Missisquoi.

Concerning the seventh report of the flag committee, I must tell the members of the government that as the member for Brome-Missisquoi and speaking for all the voters of that riding, we do not need a flag for Brome and another for Missisquoi.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say that I intend to do everything possible during this debate, with a sense of responsibility, to make sure that every Canadian will recognize that, as far as those who support this party are concerned, this is a one flag resolution. Because of the actions of the present government there is a definite feeling among the people of this country that this is a two flag debate. That is the situation, whether we like it or not, in spite of the appeals for unity that have been made by members of this party to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson).

A number of Liberal members from the province of Quebec, as well as from other parts of Canada, have told me that the situation with which we are now faced is not indicative of a Quebec phenomenon but rather of a Canadian phenomenon. I believe that a great number of people in this nation feel that the government, as the result of this motion for concurrence, is proposing two flags for Canada. As far as my constituency is concerned, the government is proposing one flag for Brome yet another for Missisquoi.

Hon. members perhaps will remind me that yesterday I voted in favour of a distinctive Canadian flag and I did so because I believe in one flag for one united Canada. Hon. members opposite do not like to hear this side of the debate, because it is in this area that they are going to find themselves in difficulty. No matter how many errors the party which I support has made inside and outside of this House of Commons during the flag debate, and no matter how many technicalities the right hon. Prime Minister discusses, we believe in one flag for one united Canada.

Just before we adjourned at six o'clock I explained that, because this is an emotionally-charged issue, we in this party have exercised a free vote, and we will continue to exercise a free vote in respect of each phase of this flag issue.

In reference to the amendment now before the house, I plead with members opposite to make sure that their whip is off when they vote. It is not good enough for them to say that the whip is off, yet stand as a group and vote as a group, because the people of this country cannot be fooled about this issue. Action of that kind on the part of Liberal members of parliament does not represent a free vote.

We in the Conservative party believe that no matter what distinctive flag is selected, it should be the only distinctive flag for Canada.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grafftey: Hon. members opposite try to smear the Conservative members representing Quebec constituencies on every emotional issue which comes before this house, but because of television, radio and fast communication, the people of Quebec have become informed and can no longer be fooled by this type of action. This belief enunciated by Liberal members has been exposed, and what has taken place during this debate has been brought to the forefront and the attention of the people of Quebec.

All the members in this chamber have heard the catcalls from across this house during the debate on this motion, and the preceding motion for concurrence. We are all aware that the Liberal members think that we are afraid to vote against these motions for concurrence because we know what will happen. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) during this debate yelled across the floor, while I was participating in this debate, that I was afraid to vote against the motion for concurrence in the report of the committee. We know what she meant by that verbal ejaculation.

We know what the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) meant when he spoke on the flag issue, suggesting that French Canada would become completely Liberal. As an ex-Liberal from Quebec I can appreciate why the Liberal government is treating the flag issue in such a way. Because of my appreciation of that fact I left the Liberal party. The Liberal approach to the flag issue has been founded on the concept of one flag for French speaking Canada and one flag for English speaking Canada or, as related to my constituency, one flag for Brome and one flag for Missisquoi. This approach will no longer be effective because the Liberal party can no longer fool the people about this issue.

I am not speaking with the authority of my party but I know in my heart of hearts as I stand here that while we Conservatives may have a rough time in the province of Quebec we voted yesterday, no matter how we vote on this motion, in terms of thinking of one distinctive flag for one united Canada. We do this as Conservatives realizing that the melting pot theory is not applicable to the Canadian mosaic, and again members opposite, by paradox, may think I am plunging the whole issue into partisan politics. Sir, as a member from the province of Quebec I am not willing to stand here and listen to the pontifications of the leadership of the Liberal party in the House of Commons and then go back to the province of Quebec and face the villainous type of partisanship we are going to see on this kind of issue.

It is all very well for the Prime Minister to say in the House of Commons: "Let us keep this matter out of partisan politics". I suggest that he write a letter to some of his Quebec members telling them to do the same thing in the province of Quebec when this issue is over. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) has made the classic mistake of so many members of parliament on both sides of the house in relation to our province, a province that both of us have the honour to represent in the House of Commons. One would have thought he would have learned his lesson, but so many professional men in the province of Quebec feel that because they may be on the right side of emotional issues they can forget economic issues. The hon.

member for Lotbinière said: We have got our distinctive flag now, and as the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi has mentioned the fact that 75 per cent of the people of his riding are French speaking they must be 75 per cent Liberal today. That is false because today the people of my province recognize that the major issues are of an economic nature. I know it is bad for us to be on the wrong side of sentimental issues, but today 85 per cent of our farmers are living with net annual incomes of under $2,000 and 20 per cent of our urban families are subsisting in poverty and want.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I should remind the hon. member that what we are dealing with at the moment is an amendment to the effect that the seventh report of the special committee be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to strike out of the recommendation the words "royal union flag, generally known as the union jack" and substitute therefor the words "Canadian red ensign". It may be that the hon. member's remarks are related to this subject but that is not apparent to the Chair. I would ask him to make an effort to relate his remarks to that particular subject.

Mr. Grafftey: I was out of order, Mr. Speaker, and I bow to your judgment. I only say it is pretty hard for a young member of parliament who has seen so much poverty to hear a member opposite say that he thinks he is going to get an automatic vote because he has produced a symbol in the form of a flag.

To get back to the proposition that we have a two flag issue, Mr. Speaker, I say it is not a two flag issue. It is a one flag issue, but because the government has unwittingly plunged both resolutions into the partisan arena, because they have engendered by their actions a certain sympathy with the associate state idea, because they have never said the same thing in Quebec as they have outside of the province, unless we are very careful as to how we handle this resolution many Canadians in and outside of the province of Quebec will be thinking that we are dealing with a two flag resolution. Many of the members opposite have told their leader that in and out of their caucus, and it is going to be interesting to see how they vote.

Having said that, I plead that we make progress bit by bit and tonight adopt this amendment. Let us adopt the amendment for the red ensign because no matter how the Prime Minister enters into technicalities, we all know that the union jack is the official flag of the United Kingdom. I would think that hon. members opposite in a spirit of give and take would like to show us there is a free vote over there by voting for this amendment, which makes good sense to me and I am sure to all members of the House of Commons. There must be give and take in this sort of thing. Because of the actions of the Liberals in and out of the house there is great danger no matter what we do here. No matter what we do it is possible that this resolution will be described as a two flag resolution, a flag for Brome and a flag for Missisquoi. Let us avoid this and let us do things step by step that will better the situation. If you are sincere you will show us the whips are off and you will show us that you are ready to vote for this amendment providing for the adoption of the red ensign to indicate our relationship with the commonwealth.

Members opposite know there is going to be much unnecessary confusion related to the fact that the union jack, while greatly respected in many parts of this country, is largely recognized as the flag of Great Britain, our great ally. Let us not have this unnecessary confusion. If you are not plunging the whole matter into partisan politics, why do you sit there and sneer and yell? Where is the give and take? If this matter has not been plunged into partisan politics why is there this inflexible line of this or nothing else? When you see many responsible members in the other parties supporting this amendment, surely you can see its good sense. Surely if the leadership of that party is listening to its backbenchers from Quebec and outside of the province of Quebec they will adopt this amendment immediately. I plead with the party opposite to do so right away. Otherwise there is great risk that because of their actions this will be interpreted as a two flag resolution.

Let us recognize the fact, as I said before six o'clock, that neither of the two traditional parties, the Liberals or the Conservatives, can truly call themselves national parties any more. I recognize that with our corporal's guard from Quebec we are no longer a national party in the great sense of the word, but with your corporal's guard from west of the lakehead neither are you.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member although perhaps he just wanted to finish his sentence.

Mr. Grafftey: I would say that with their corporal's guard from west of the great lakes neither are the Liberals a national party. So let us treat this whole subject in a spirit of give and take. Let us end some of the sadder aspects of this debate, the things that have been said and done in and outside of the House of Commons. Let us show a spirit of give and take and be ready to vote for this amendment so that finally we can get down to dealing with economic issues such as the question of poverty which really mean something to most of the Canadian people.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the house my contribution to the debate will be a very short one. My participation this evening is motivated solely by the remarks of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey). I may say that my interruption was a very spontaneous one. I have listened with a great deal of interest both before the supper hour and since eight o'clock to the remarks of the hon. member who represents that very historic constituency. Earlier in his remarks I sensed a certain degree of sincerity with which that hon. member has always spoken when discussing national unity, the flag and his wonderful constituency of Brome-Missisquoi.

I have listened with perhaps more than usual attention to the remarks of the hon. member because in many ways the constituency of Brome-Missisquoi and the constituency of Verdun are very similar. I think the hon. member would be the first to agree that we both represent wonderful constituencies in a wonderful province. Like the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi I represent French speaking Canadians and English speaking Canadians in great numbers. Like the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, as he said earlier today, my decision on how to vote on the flag was a very agonizing one as I struggled to reconcile the different factors and to come up with a vote which I thought was in the best interests of my province and all Canada. Despite the sincerity which I sensed in the remarks of the hon. member, I resented deeply any implication on his part that my vote then, and my vote in the future on this seventh report, will be motivated by anything other than my own desire to do what is best for my constituency and for my country.

Mr. Winkler: Do you say that for the rest of your colleagues as well?

Mr. Mackasey: I can assure the hon. member—

An hon. Member: What about yours?

Mr. Winkler: Do not worry about mine; I will look after my own apples.

Mr. Mackasey: I can assure the hon. gentleman that I do not need the whip of this party or any other party to tell me how I am going to vote. I have one person to satisfy when it comes to voting, and that is myself. I believe, and I have always followed this belief, that if I do what I think is right, I am doing what is politically right. I repeat my resentment for every member of parliament, that the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) should suggest that any member on this side of the house, be he from British Columbia, Newfoundland or Quebec, English speaking or French speaking, is motivated by any other reason than a sincere desire to do his best for his constituency.

I have listened to practically all the speeches. There is no one on that side of the house who can accuse me of once heckling a speaker, of once interrupting a speaker, because I have followed this flag debate on the premise that the issue was such a great one nobody would want to participate in the debate unless he were motivated by sincerity and was a man dedicated to the House of Commons. I say therefore to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi that this speech could have been a great speech because it had all the ingredients that were necessary for a great speech if he could have learned to refrain from the partisan tone that he introduced.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please; I am wondering if at this point the hon. member is not straying from the question at issue. I believe what he should be considering is not what the hon. member has said or what motivated him in his speech. I suggest that what he should be doing is submitting his own views on the question at hand.

Mr. Mackasey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member, whom I respect, is obviously proud of the fact, and with just reason, that he voted according to his conscience yesterday. I do not know of any member on this side of the house or in his own party that would find fault with his decision. In the final analysis, he made it in good faith and good conscience. I would ask all members of this house, when the amendment comes before us, to grant that same privilege so that nobody can be accused of voting in other than a sincere manner, or that the whip has told us to do this or that. I have as much right to vote for a new flag or for the union jack as the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan). What makes the hon. member for York-Humber a hero because he votes against his party any more than the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi is a hero when he votes against his?

I respect the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi and I respect the hon. member for York-Humber, because I feel both of these people were motivated by the same reason. On at least four occasions the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi has emphasized the fact he voted for the new flag. Then, he goes on to say he cannot possibly vote for the union jack; that is his privilege.

Mr. Grafftey: I did not say that.

Mr. Mackasey: I believe the hon. member said for the two flag resolution; it is a question of semantics, I think. I say this in all sincerity that my vote for a new, distinctive flag and my vote for the union jack as a symbol of membership in the commonwealth are votes made out of sincere conviction. As a matter of fact, I believe that this action will finally restore this flag to a place of distinction in this country. What has been the role of the union jack since the red ensign has taken prominence? What, specifically, has it stood for other than some symbol of that particular country that was the mother country of so many of us? At least, by this action of parliament, if the motion passes, the union jack will once again have a proud place in our country, in our future events.

The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi made an issue of the fact that we will get confused with a new flag and a union jack. As a great Canadian, as the good Canadian I happen to know he is and also as a good Quebecker, I wonder what the hon. member might do this Saturday or next Saturday when he stands at the ceremony for opening a new road under the fleur-de-lis flag of Quebec? Does he turn his back on it or does he not recognize it for what it is, a symbol in the province of Quebec to be used on occasions where it cannot be confused with the red maple leaf or the union jack? The same thing happens to members of other provinces. The province of Quebec is not the only province with a provincial flag of its own. Other provinces have provincial flags. Certainly, they have a place in this country. There is no need for any confusion.

We will have occasions in Ontario, Newfoundland, Quebec and the other provinces, upon which the maple leaf, the union jack and the provincial flag are all displayed in a position of prominence. What amounts of intelligence is necessary to distinguish between them, to understand why they are there? So, Mr. Speaker, much as I appreciate the remarks made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi and his sincere sentiments toward the province I respect and love, I resent the fact he said that our party has spoken with two voices in that province. This, again, was an unfair remark when it comes to national unity. On four occasions in his remarks to the house the hon. member paraphrased the remarks of Brutus when he praised the Prime Minister, then accused him of having two voices, one for Quebec and one for the rest of the country.

I know the hon. member thinks very highly of the French. However, I ask him if he would get up in his riding this Saturday and read some of the things that have been said in the heat of battle in this house during the flag debate? Would he read the statements of one member that the symbol of French Canada is the red maple leaf, a statement which was based on a letter written in the 1800's? Of course he would not. He would be ashamed to do it and so would I. I am sure there are many good Canadians on your side of the house who stand and make an impassioned plea for a point in which they believe. I can forgive any speech in this House of Commons if it is made sincerely and it reflects a man's true feelings, and I include the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) as long as they are made with sincerity. This is his prerogative. If I vote sincerely for the resolution which will make the union jack a symbol of our membership in the commonwealth, I do not want the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi or any other to be imputing motives for my vote. I will have no problem in going back to my constituency, which resembles the constituency of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, and explaining to those people that there is but one flag, the new red maple leaf, and one symbol of our membership in the commonwealth of nations.

In conclusion I would like to say on behalf of the French speaking members, not only on this side but on that side, that many of us thought the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) was a classic in tolerance and I sense it made a lot of us a little bit ashamed, perhaps because it was in complete contrast to much of the bitterness and hate that has permeated this house for too long.

I know the French speaking Canadians of my own party are free to vote as they wish, and because of their cultural and other traditions, because of the fact they are the first to admit they do not have the strong ties with the British isles that we do, if they are willing to vote for the union jack let nobody here interpret it as an effort of the whip, as an effort of party discipline, but rather as a symbol of these French speaking Canadians willing to subjugate their natural desire for what they think is in the best interests of Canada.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question. I appreciate his comments and the sincerity with which he delivered his address, but I would like to ask him if he has read the speeches that were made in this house against the prime minister of Canada when the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) was prime minister, speeches by members who now sit on the treasury benches? Did he ever listen to the C.B.C. commentators in the province of Quebec in those days when they were engaged in a very definite program? I do not say this in any way validates anything that has happened here this session, but I think he should bear those things in mind.

Mr. Mackasey: This is a very objective question from the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) for whom most members have a great deal of affection. It is also an honest question, but I think it radiates what is wrong with this house, the constant references to the abuses in the past, the constant references to what happened in 1954, 1956 and 1958, and what one member said about another member's prime minister. This is precisely the type of sickness that has permeated this place.

This is the type of thing which makes it practically impossible to sit down and discuss anything objectively. I have no more sympathy with members on this side who would attack the character of anybody on that side than I have with members on the opposite side who have constantly to interpet as racism everything French speaking members do on this side.

Mr. Winkler: I appreciate that and I agree with the hon. member, but I ask him where then does he place the blame?

Mr. Mackasey: I am afraid the hon. member will have to repeat his question.

Mr. Winkler: I cannot repeat the words exactly. I appreciate the sincerity of the remarks made by the hon. member in answering me, but I ask him where then does he place the blame?

Mr. Mackasey: I think, Mr. Speaker, I must not have clarified myself adequately. I am not interested in placing the blame. I am interested in, from today on, getting rid of the insults, fancied insults and constant references to what members said about other members six, 18 and 20 years ago.

It amazes me how people can reach back into their memories and remember some insult thrown at the Leader of the Opposition or, as in this case, at the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) on something that happened 14 or 15 years ago.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. The comments of the hon. member are very interesting. The question was also very interesting but I am sure both hon. members would agree they are a bit beyond the scope of the amendment before the house.

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to support the red maple leaf flag, even though I would have preferred a green maple leaf. But, as regards the amendment now before the house and also the question of flying the union jack in certain circumstances to show our allegiance to the crown and our commonwealth association, well, I find it unacceptable.

I can say right now that I shall not support the union jack motion, because it is not the flag of the commonwealth but that of the United Kingdom and its colonies. To recognize in our statutes the union jack as one of our own flags, even if only in certain circumstances, constitutes an encroachment, it seems to me, upon our Canadian sovereignty, inasmuch as the union jack is the flag of the United Kingdom and its colonies. Canada has been an adult and sovereign country since the Statute of Westminster. I find it unacceptable that we should support the motion respecting the union jack.

As for the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming), I shall refrain from voting, and for the following reason: a vote against this amendment means a vote in favour of the union jack, whereas a vote in favour of the amendment does not mean a vote against the union jack, but in favour of maintaining the red ensign. Therefore, I would rather abstain from voting.

Mr. Speaker, as I have already mentioned, the government is claiming our association with the commonwealth in order to have us accept the union jack. Why does the government not propose also the tricolour, the French flag, since France played a leading part in Canada when our country was first discovered.

The reasons invoked by the government in support of the union jack could also apply in favour of the tricolour because, for an important part of our people, it carries the same meaning as the union jack does for another section of the Canadian people.

I do not believe that it is sensible for a sovereign country like Canada to ask the representatives of its people to vote in favour of the union jack and to even have in its statutes two flags, one bearing a maple leaf, and the other one which could be flown under certain circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, the newspapers of the province of Quebec, together with those of the rest of the country, have criticized this formula of two flags proposed by the government. Unfortunately the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Pepin) is absent tonight, although he was here this afternoon. Here is what I read in the newspaper La Tribune:

> M.P. Jean-Luc Pepin does not like the idea of having two flags.
> The federal M.P. for Drummond-Arthabaska, Mr Jean-Luc Pepin, stated yesterday about the legislation dealing with a distinctive Canadian flag that; as the matter now stands, he did not like much the section providing that the union jack can still be flown to represent Canada's allegiance to the British crown. "I do not like it", he said.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pigeon: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, in order to be fair to the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, would the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm read the other paragraphs of the article in question, because I think the heading possibly does not suggest exactly what the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska stated? In all fairness to the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, would the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm read into the record the other four paragraphs in that article?

[Mr. Pigeon.]

Mr. Pigeon: With pleasure, Mr. Speaker, if the house has no objection. They read as follows:

> The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated however that he was leaving it up to the Prime Minister of the country who would clarify the matter sometime this week.
> The opposition is taking advantage of this.
> The opposition is taking advantage of the existing confusion, in the opinion of Mr. Pepin, to strongly oppose the proposal.
> Now, according to Mr. Pepin, it is entirely false to suggest that two official national flags and anthems are being proposed.
> The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska said that he found it more acceptable to recognize two anthems. But there again, he said, only one will be national: "O Canada". He said that the "God Save the Queen" would be a royal anthem, and it would be nice if we were to sing it to Her Majesty when she pays us a visit.

Mr. Speaker, since I do not want to take up too much of the time of the house, I shall not go on reading this article. But all the same, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska said he did not like the two flag proposal.

I feel that if the house, in compliance with the Prime Minister's wish, adopts the union jack, even on certain conditions this will promote the separatist movement in the province of Quebec.

By adopting two flags, even though one of them is to be adopted on certain conditions, the government recognizes two Canadas and two nations.

Mr. Béchard: It is not two flags, but only one.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I have here an article by Mr. Yves Michaud, dated May 20, 1964.

Mr. Michaud, who is a highly respected Liberal, finds it abnormal that the government—

Mr. Choquette: He is not a Liberal in Ottawa, but in Quebec.

Mr. Pigeon: It is true, Mr. Speaker, that since the break between the federal and provincial organizations, that Mr. Michaud may be a Liberal in Quebec but not in Ottawa. Then if he is no longer a Liberal in Ottawa, I pay him my respects.

Mr. Chrétien: Certainly, he is not a Conservative.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, the following remarks appeared in La Presse of Saturday, May 30, 1964;

> The Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste of Montreal gave a cold shoulder to this proposal for two flags. Those two flags mean two nations, two different racial groups, and they will further the gap between the English and French speaking Canadians.

This Canadian flag is decidedly presented too late.

Mr. Speaker, I feel the government is making a monumental error in asking the house to vote in favour of the union jack which cannot be Canada's flag, even under certain conditions, which is not the commonwealth flag but solely the flag of the United Kingdom and its colonies.

Mr. Speaker, if Her Majesty the Queen comes to Canada in the future, we can then be polite and fly on parliament hill Her Majesty's flag.

On the other hand, if the President of the United States makes an official visit to Canada, there is no need to adopt a bill and to include certain conditions in our statutes, in order to fly the American flag. We do not need that. If the President of the United States comes to Canada we shall have the courtesy to fly the American flag. The same thing could apply to all sovereigns and prime ministers of other countries.

Once again, I think this is a mistake from the standpoint of national unity.

The government will widen the gap between French speaking and English speaking Canadians. It seems to me that, the unrest being what it is at present, the government should withdraw its measure for the adoption of the union jack, so that this flag will not be approved by the house.

I would very much like to have the opinion of the French speaking members from Quebec to know what they think. Let them tell us how they will vote when the question is put.

Personally, as I said, I will vote against adopting the union jack, not because I have no respect for this flag, but because, to my mind it is a foreign flag.

As far as the amendment moved by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton is concerned, while respecting the position of the hon. member, I shall abstain from voting for the reasons I mentioned earlier.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Pigeon: Certainly.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm aware that the government members from Quebec will have the courage to vote on the amendment as well as on the main motion, instead of abstaining?

Is the hon. member aware that we intend to do that?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to repeat his question, because I did not hear him.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I asked the hon. member whether he was aware that the government members from the province of Quebec intended to vote both on the amendment and on the main motion and that consequently, they were brave enough not to abstain from voting, as the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm intends to do? Is he aware of that?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the hon. member for Lotbinière that if he votes for the union jack, he does so for the sake of unity within his party, not because of any real feeling for the union jack.

Moreover, I want to tell him that we shall certainly not vote this week, since the debate will go on for some time, until probably after the Christmas holidays, if we have any.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a supplementary question?

Is he aware of the fact that we shall not be cowardly enough to abstain from voting?

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That remark by the hon. member for Lotbinière was entirely uncalled for.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I feel that the word the hon. member for Lotbinière just uttered is against the rules and, consequently I would ask the hon. member to withdraw that word.

Mr. Grégoire: Withdraw.

Mr. Béchard: That is quite right.

Mr. Paul: Mr. Speaker, following the question raised by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, I am of the opinion that the hon. member for Lotbinière used unparliamentary language. He has no right to impute motives to anybody in this house. In fact, we did not impute any to him when he refused to vote on the education bill. I believe that the hon. member for Lotbinière should have the decency and courage to withdraw his words and not impute motives to anybody in this house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I suggest to the hon. members who now take part in this exchange of views that perhaps the difficulty started, in my opinion, when the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, in a certain way, imputed motives to hon. members on the other side of the house, with respect to the way in which they might vote during this debate.

I take the liberty of suggesting to the hon. members that it would perhaps be proper to forget the remarks which have been made and, once more, I want to mention that in my opinion, the words of the hon. member for Lotbinière are uncalled for.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I just want to say that I have always been polite toward all hon. members, including the hon. member for Lotbinière. Moreover, if that is the kind of co-operation that they want to show during this debate, I want to tell the government that this debate could go on for at least a month.

Mr. Choquette: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. According to Beauchesne, threats are positively prohibited.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member rose on a question of privilege.

Mr. Choquette: I admit, in all fairness to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, that I used a somewhat virulent expression. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, what I meant was that when the time comes to vote on the amendment before us and on the resolution concerning the union jack as a symbol of our allegiance to the crown and our participation in the commonwealth, instead of abstaining, we shall have enough courage to express our views.

On the same question of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is no question of privilege in the statement made by the hon. member for Lotbinière.

In my opinion, if an hon. member is entitled to rise on a question of privilege, it is the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, and I know that my hon. friend will accept the explanations of his colleague for Lotbinière.

Mr. Pigeon: Just a word. His explanations are rather clumsy, but let it go.

[Text]

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am sure many of us must envy the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) who says he has no difficulty and will have the courage to vote on this question. I am sure we are all aware of that old expression, "Fools rush in where wise men fear to tread". Those of us who have some conception of the depth of feeling and compassion in the nation and how important these questions are to so many people who are, rather like myself, perhaps just a little puzzled as to why this nation needs two flags, are just a little hesitant about how we should vote on this question. The question in my mind is not clear. Because the hon. member may think that is because there is such a limitation on my thinking power I will reserve my right to the opinion that he who cannot even see the difficulties is not likely to give us much valuable advice on how to handle them.

I did think the remarks of the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) were worthy of some comment and note, and they do highlight what I think is the most important aspect of this matter that we can discuss; that is, the mental attitude of the members, our state of mind when we consider this question. Certainly much has been said by the hon. member for Verdun about the sincerity of members taking part in this debate and he made much of that point. We all know that there can be very sincere mistakes, but there can be a lack of understanding or a willingness to take a stand on so few facts that it is difficult to comprehend that it can reasonably be called honest. I think many of us have varying standards by which we feel that we must acquaint ourselves with the problems involved in a question before we can really call ourselves sincere when we venture an opinion.

In my view, while I do not want to make this just an exercise in semantics, sincerity means more than a mere belief, because of ignorance, in a certain thing and standing in this house and saying it. Certainly sincerity calls for the responsibility of knowledge, for acquainting oneself with the facts as well as trying to give honestly the opinion one has formed. I may be just a little bitter or perhaps a little suspicious, or perhaps I have learned a lot from watching the Liberal party over the years; but when the hon. member for Verdun says he does not think anyone in this house would want to get up and talk about the flag unless he was absolutely sincere I think he perhaps pinpointed for us the reason why so few Liberals took part in the flag debate. I suggest this does not exactly go along with his comment that while he may have been speaking for himself, it was not because the whip was on. I suggest that if he is asking us to consider as worth while his opinion that all members of the Liberal party are like himself in that regard, then he is indeed naïve. I have seen nothing to indicate, in the actions of the government supporters, that there was anything approaching what I would call sincerity with regard to this problem.

Certainly anyone in this house who listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) when he said what this flag was supposed to stand for, the unity it was supposed to bring to the nation, why the flag had to be distinctive, and then looked at the same time at the order paper and the resolution which is before us to bring in a second flag, can only come to the conclusion—this is what it indicates to my mind, at least—that this is an admission on the part of the Prime Minister that the flag adopted by this house last night is very hollow when it comes to symbolism.

I suggest to the Liberal members of this house that they will have the same task as the rest of us, if we are to have a new flag that must be honoured and accepted. I ask seriously the question: When there is before us this present resolution, which cannot signify anything but a complete failure of the flag that was adopted last night to be symbolic, how are we going to sell last night's flag? I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I am very perturbed at the question now facing us with regard to a second flag, particularly since we now have an amendment that the red ensign be substituted for the union jack if we are to have a second flag. I am aware of the depth of feeling and attachment to the red ensign of so many Canadians. I am sure every member in this house knows that there is a good percentage of the population of this country who as long as they live will neither forgive nor forget the tearing down of that banner to which they have become so attached. If I thought for a little while that perhaps the transition period while older people get older, young ones grow up and the attachment to the red ensign fades and those people gradually die out, so that a decade or two or a generation or two from now all that feeling may have faded away and the new flag will be accepted as symbolic of everything that the two flags are now supposed to stand for, I suppose I should feel a little better about it. But I cannot see how we hope to generate that feeling toward the new flag, if it is really to become the flag of this country, when we find it necessary to have a second flag flying when we want to really express something.

How can we build up this flag and say that the flag adopted in this house last night is a Canadian flag, if we are going to start at the outset by saying that it does not stand for anything and we must have another flag to fly when we want to express ourselves as Canadians? It becomes even more incomprehensible to me, Mr. Speaker, when I note that they want to have the union jack, not the red ensign, as Canada's second flag. These are the people who have put so much emphasis on the word distinctive and have said they want to fly a distinctive flag on special occasions. They have now put forward the union jack in place of the red ensign, which has signified Canada for 100 years, which is the only flag that is really distinctive of Canada today.

Meeting the arguments of my hon. friends opposite, who say they find on the red ensign the symbolism of the union jack repulsive and have rejected it because they have taken it as a symbol of colonialism and it has some unhappy memories connected with it, surely they are not going to suggest that the union jack does not have those same objections. As well as that, the union jack does have the disadvantage that it could not by any stretch of the imagination be called distinctive. I am really seriously interested in seeing some member on the government side get up and straighten out my thinking on this question or explain their own, because certainly on the record so far there is no logical explanation for this proposal.

This brings me back to where I started in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, namely to the question of sincerity. The hon. member for Verdun may be very sincere in his remarks on this question. Again I say that if he is sincere about himself, I can accept that; but when he asks us to accept his opinion of the rest of his party I find it just a bit difficult to swallow.

Most of us on this side of the house are convinced that there is only one reason why the union jack is being presented to this house by this report of the committee. That reason is that Joey has said: Give us the union jack or else. That statement does not seem to surprise or upset many of the members on the other side of this house. Perhaps that is because they sit in their places obeying the party whip slavishly on all scores.

On many occasions it has been embarrassing to me that the members in this house have shown such little unanimity. Perhaps I envy the members of the Liberal party because of the effect their party whip has on them. He seems to be able to drive them like a flock of sheep in any direction he wishes them to go. On the other hand, perhaps it is better to be a member of this party where the men are men and not trained seals.

In seriously considering the flag issue we must also think of the state of mind of the members of the Liberal party. I have attempted to understand their feelings. I have listened to the remarks made by hon. members opposite in an attempt to figure out what is taking place. Many times in this chamber the kind of remark made by the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) has been repeated. He has invited us to forget all about our feelings on the matter of this flag, has suggested that we begin again without recrimination and leave politics out of the question. Every time the Grit party is successful in achieving something by its dirty tricks, the members of that party immediately begin talking to us in that manner. Last night they voted in favour of the sixth resolution of the committee, and by their remarks and attitudes have indicated to us that the Liberal whip managed to get to them, lining up their vote. Yet today—and he did not even wait until today—their leader played the cheapest trick I have ever seen played in this house. Even last night he said, vote with us now. That is a most contemptible performance on the part of a prime minister, and I suggest to the members on that side of the house that if they wish to consider the flag issue on a level above politics, let them first stop those dirty, Grit, political tricks. Put an end to their purely political lines of approach, and do away with all their pious platitudes. Let them depart from the level of hyprocisy we have observed on that side of the house month after month.

The flag issue is a serious one, and I suggest that members on the other side of the house should have some regard for the welfare of this country. Once they have accomplished their purposes in adopting the flag proposed by the sixth resolution of the committee as the national flag of Canada, by dirty political methods, let them now for God's sake refrain from political trickery in respect of the union jack. Is it necessary that they continue to divide this country, and to continue with their Grit tactics which are based on the concept of divide and rule?

While I realize that the government must satisfy Joey's desire on the flag question, I would ask members on that side of the house how far they intend to go with their Grit political methods. How much consideration do those members have for that political party in preference to the general welfare of this nation? My suggestion at this time is that if any member on that side of the house wishes the flag, voted upon early this morning, to become revered as a national symbol, standing for the unity of this country, he must stop now in his attempt to adopt a second flag. Two flags can only mean two sections of this country, and that is one sure way of continuing the division of this nation. Surely a thinking person in this country, even a member of the Liberal party, will realize that the manner by which the flag issue has been introduced to parliament can do nothing but add to any division which exists in this nation.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if the members on that side of the house wish to have something of significance on a flag which is represented by the red ensign, as a result of more than 100 years of usage in this country they should give the people of this country a fighting chance to adopt such a flag. I implore them not to push the union jack on the people of Canada as an added reminder that even in the Liberal party the members do not believe that their flag is symbolic of this nation. They must be aware of the fact that the flag they have chosen is representative of pressure from Quebec and from Joey Smallwood, and that the maple leaf in the middle stands for what is left of the country. They must be aware that the flag indicates their belief that this nation is treated by the Liberals as a club. There is symbolism in that flag they have chosen, and it is this: The bars on each end separated by the big red maple leaf represent the two parts of the country divided by the Liberal party.

I am not sure whether I should vote for our amendment, but I know that I feel that, if we must have a second flag, it should be the red ensign rather than the union jack. I am unable to comprehend how any hon. member of this house can come to any other conclusion. As I have said, over the months I have come to understand some of the attitudes expressed in opposition to the red ensign, but it has been my feeling in that understanding that the opposition was directed more toward the union jack than the red ensign. If we are going to have a second flag, the flag suggested by the government is in fact that part of the red ensign which is most objectionable, and that part which many people have felt should be replaced. I think that objection was the basis of the move by the government to introducing the new one red maple leaf or Canadian distinctive flag to parliament. That being so I cannot understand government members who support the union jack rather than the red ensign. If those members who object to our commonwealth ties and our allegiance to the Queen are honest in their feelings that we should have a second flag for Canada, surely they must realize that it is the union jack which has been associated with colonialism. Of the two flags, the one which symbolizes colonialism, I suggest, is the union jack.

Mr. Speaker, I should be very pleased if some hon. members opposite, particularly those representing French Canadian constituencies, would enlighten me as to some of my difficulties. I should like some hon. members of the Créditiste party, who are so determined to rid the country of the union jack, to explain their approach to this flag question. If we must have a second flag, I have no hesitation in voting for the Canadian red ensign in preference to the union jack, and I shall certainly vote in favour of the amendment. However, I am afraid that the amendment might carry, in which event I would have voted for a second flag for Canada which I think is silly.

I should like to understand one thing about the way the flag committee worked. I realize how the Liberal members tried to mislead the committee by proposing a vote on the question as to whether the committee preferred the three maple leaf design to the one maple leaf design. Following that vote the Liberal members of that party were quick to suggest that the vote had been unanimous in favour of the one maple leaf design, but that is not a true picture. I suggest that a vote on the motion and amendment before us now is similar to that vote. Most of us have some difficulty in this regard. I think an honest member on the government side, who has seriously thought about the flag issue in relation to the events of the past several days, would vote for the red ensign in preference to the union jack as the second flag for Canada. I had sort of hoped that both resolutions would be withdrawn completely. I really think that if there is hope of the flag we adopted yesterday becoming what it must, for the good of this nation we must defeat this resolution completely, and I hope we do.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take any part in the debate and I am not really going to take any part at all. However, I saw a television news broadcast at a quarter to seven on CJOH and, having seen it, I took the trouble to telephone the station to tell them that they had made a terrible error. I told them I thought they had time to correct it but they did not bother correcting it. I think it should be corrected in fairness to my parliamentary secretary and to the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard). The story as I heard it, and I listened very carefully, was that my parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Cantin), had undertaken to second and indeed had seconded this motion and then had withdrawn and in his place had been substituted Mr. Albert Béchard from Newfoundland.

Sir, that was either a piece of the grossest kind of carelessness on the part of Mr. Stursberg or it was a piece of deliberate malice. I do not know which, but having heard a good many of Mr. Stursberg's sneering and careless comments over the years I say that hon. members can take their choice. In my opinion these news broadcasts are the worst in this country and the most biased on the air. When the hon. member for Bonaventure, the chairman of our Quebec caucus, was willing and anxious and eager and accepted yesterday the seconding of this motion it seems to me it is singularly and terribly unfair to have that misrepresented on television.

Mr. Aiken: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I was about to rise at this moment. I think the minister had a point of privilege to raise which I thought might have been raised by the hon. member for Bonaventure. However, I think that the minister has said sufficient to explain the point of privilege which might have been raised more particularly by the hon. member for Bonaventure.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I was not raising a question of privilege. I believe that I, like other hon. members, have the right to speak in the debate and I was speaking in the debate. I was referring to the fact that one element of that debate has been grossly misrepresented in a television news broadcast.

I say, sir, that we on this side of the house are proud of the unity of our party. We are proud of the fact that whether our members are English speaking or French speaking they have stood together and have voted together for national unity in marked contrast to the display we have seen on the other side of the house in the official opposition. I am proud of the hon. member for Bonaventure and I am also proud that when he was delayed for a few minutes in getting into the house my parliamentary secretary was willing as a French speaking Canadian to get up and second the motion to make the union jack the symbol of our allegiance to the crown and our membership in the commonwealth.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I think we have been led to believe that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) is not an admirer of Mr. Stursberg. I would say that in this as in other things I do not share his point of view. It is not for us here to discuss Mr. Stursberg, but he does happen to be a man who has a very high reputation not only in Canada but abroad as a highly qualified student, scholar and commentator.

It is interesting that in this country of ours, which people sometimes say is dull and lacklustre, we have spent so much time on a flag. I suppose no country in the world has ever discussed a flag for as long as we have been discussing the question and now to add to the infinite variety we are beginning a discussion on two flags. Who says that Canada is not an interesting and different country?

Yesterday it was a new flag; today it is an old one. I think that the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) has through his amendment sought to improve a situation which was made far from glorious by the action of the committee, as indeed by the action of the government earlier in its two flag resolution. There has been some reference made to the flag which was discussed previously, a matter on which I made one speech, and I expect this speech to be my last on this one. I am not now, Mr. Speaker, nor have I ever been one of those who are so adamant against the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag without the symbolic representation of any other country. Had we on this troubled occasion had a distinctive flag introduced in an appropriate way which would not have torn and disturbed our country and which was a flag of interest and of beauty, I would have had no hesitation in supporting it. Therefore when I endorse the amendment of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton I am not waging any rearguard action on behalf of the Canadian red ensign.

I think the hon. member has given a big assist toward resolving the situation in which we found ourselves by reason of the introduction of that first embarrassing, unhistoric and almost ludicrous exercises in dual flagdom. There are many reasons why it is difficult to support the committee's seventh report as it now stands. In one case there is some uncertainty as to the use of the royal union flag, the union jack. We are not clear when it would be used. On a visit of the sovereign the royal Canadian standard would be flown. On a visit of the prime minister of another commonwealth state it would be highly questionable whether the union jack would be flown because that individual would not be a head of state but a head of government. Indeed, if any flag were flown would it not be the flag of that particular commonwealth country?

As some of my colleagues have mentioned earlier today, it seems that this second flag diminishes the role and the symbolic value of the national flag. One might ask: Are there any occasions on which Canada is not a member of the commonwealth? Are there any occasions when Canadians do not bear allegiance to the crown? Therefore you have the problem of flying a flag on given occasions to demonstrate certain facets and facts of our national life which are in existence at all times. This is one of the problems that troubles me.

To go further with regard to the matter of the symbolic representation of flags, a flag should reflect, reveal and symbolize Canada in all its facets, international and otherwise, The flag of Canada should demonstrate that we are a member of the commonwealth, of NATO and of the United Nations. A meaningful flag should demonstrate all the aspects of Canada and all the things for which it stands in the great international world. It stands for great things in that world, and we can and should be proud of it.

We have before us the matter of a second flag, and we must take some action upon it. We must vote. However, the suggestion that such a flag be the union jack is a most regrettable and improper suggestion. It is a presumption upon the United Kingdom, a great and friendly country. It is a symbolic denial of Canadian history and the growth that has been made in this country from colony to nation. I do not ever suggest that one political party has a monopoly on virtue or has uniquely contributed to the development of this country. However, the thing that makes me proudest of the party to which I belong is that all down through the years it has been a great commonwealth party, and within that commonwealth has been the great champion of freedom and independence for this country. I ask why the flag of the United Kingdom should be chosen for commonwealth representation? Why should it not be the flag of Australia, or any other commonwealth state?

Through the efforts of the great Sir Robert Borden, and his efforts will be admitted by everyone, we put into action the dream of a commonwealth of autonomous communities, in no way subordinate one to another. The United Kingdom has been a great and friendly power, an ally, a country which has brought freedom to many parts of the world. It does not, however, hold any position of prominence in the commonwealth of nations. I think it is a disservice to history to suggest that this country, the United Kingdom, has a role in the commonwealth greater, juridically, constitutionally or otherwise, than other commonwealth states including our own. This is a backward step. I do not suppose it was a deliberate step toward colonialism. It reminds me so much of Mackenzie King's suggestion that the British government should intervene in 1926, just shortly before he went all over the country on the phony constitutional issue.

Where in the seventh report of this committee do we remember the work of Borden, do we remember the great commonwealth conferences in which Canada took the lead, do we remember Meighen, do we remember the Statute of Westminster, do we recall that throughout the years this country led the way within the commonwealth and, as the senior dominion, was the champion of freedom within the commonwealth in so many ways. This commonwealth is one of the greatest political institutions of modern time. If we are to have this second flag, Mr. Speaker, let it be one which has something unique in its representation of Canada's role in the commonwealth, a role of which we can be very proud. Someone said earlier today that we used only the union jack in this country until 1945. This was not the case. The ensign was used in this country long before 1945. My colleague from Calgary North (Mr. Harkness), during his participation in the earlier debate, showed a poster used by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1891. The slogan then was, "The old flag, the old policy and the old leader." The flag was not the union jack, it was the red ensign in 1891. The ensign signifies not subservience, not colonialism, but it signifies independence and it signifies monarchy. It signifies, too, that the monarchy is a Canadian institution. Monarchy is not confined to the United Kingdom. When the Queen is in this realm, she is the Queen of Canada.

We have developed a unique and wonderful country here in the new world, retaining the values of the old and I hope the virtues of the old, too. If we must have our second flag, let us try to retain something which symbolizes Canada in the commonwealth.

Perhaps a more practical point, Mr. Speaker, we can predict that regardless of what the other place does in respect of the red maple leaf flag, millions of Canadians will continue to fly the Canadian red ensign for many years. Why not let the practice of these Canadians be given some official status? Do not let us in these difficult times, times which have torn a nation and wrecked parliament, exacerbate the difficulties by asking Canadians to turn in their red ensigns and buy red maple leaf flags and buy the flag of the United Kingdom at the same time. The flag of the United Kingdom is not the flag of Canada. I think it is presumptuous of us to be passing legislation relative to the flag of another great country.

If we put ourselves in a situation where, on occasions, we officially raise to the top of the flagstaff all over Canada for Canadian purposes a union jack, we have just retraced history to those days when we were a colony of Great Britain. Great Britain was a great mother country but this land, Canada, was not without its difficulties in relation to London. The stories of some of our statesmen indicate, I think, that they had to press vigorously for the kind of independence to which we were entitled. It is a meaningless and regrettable thing, after all these years, after the ensign had been sanctioned by custom and then certified by law, after the passage of years and generations, that we should move back to the flag which flew over us in colonial days. If this is to be something meaningful, this second flag, our other face to the outside world or perhaps only to the commonwealth, I hope that the government, which has in so many things been able to change its decisions and alter its directions, will accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming). As a Canadian who loves the commonwealth and admires Britain, but who is a Canadian nationalist first before being a lover of Britain, I would not want to have to vote against this report incorporating, for Canadian purposes, the flag of another country. I do not think this is an exercise any of us would wish to engage in, and the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming), in the wisdom and good judgment which he always brings to public matters, has provided an opportunity for unanimity on this matter at least.

Heaven knows, we have had enough trouble over the first flag. Let us be sensible about the second. Let us underscore our history a bit. Let us not do that which those in future generations will consider a bit ridiculous and wonder how the champions of independence within the commonwealth should, in 1964 or 1965, suddenly decide to go back to a flag of their colonial past, to take from one of the members of the commonwealth its flag and make it, for peculiar and limited occasions, our flag.

This thing is going to be difficult to rationalize. I do not know who suggested it. I have not the slightest idea who has the power in the Liberal party. I do not particularly care, but I have an idea that it might be from a part of the country that has not had the long tradition of dominion development that Canada as a whole has had.

I do not want to speak with partisanship but I say this is a great mistake. It is a backward step. It is one which will embarrass many of us today and the whole country tomorrow. I would commend to the house and the government the sensible, soundly historically based amendment of my colleague from Victoria-Carleton.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, we are now considering the motion for concurrence in the seventh report of the special committee on the Canadian flag.

The sixth report of that committee dealt with a distinctive national flag which was adopted last night. Tonight, we are asked to adopt a second Canadian flag. We are told that it is not a second flag, but it is stated, as reported in Votes and Proceedings of October 29 last, that it will be flown as a symbol of Canada's membership in the commonwealth of nations.

As stated on page 834 of Votes and Proceedings, that flag may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canada's membership in the commonwealth of nations and its allegiance to the crown.

Mr. Speaker, I looked up the word "adhésion" in the dictionary. I have the Larousse dictionary which is well known for its definitions of terms, and here is how the word "adhésion" is defined:

"Contrat d'adhésion": A contract where all the terms are set out in advance by one of the contracting parties without the other parties having any say in the matter.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

Therefore, membership in the commonwealth, as stated in the report of the committee, would mean entering into a contract with another country where the contract would stipulate in advance all the terms on which we, who are becoming a member, would have nothing to say.

That is the wording used by the committee in its seventh report. And as I pointed out, that is recorded on page 834 of Votes and Proceedings of October 29 last.

Mr. Speaker, I protest against the concurrence in this report precisely because of the terms used concerning our membership. In fact, if we did approve, it would mean that we accept all the terms laid down in advance by one of the parties without the other having an opportunity to discuss them.

To this, Mr. Speaker, we do not agree, we do not accept to join the commonwealth without having an opportunity to discuss the terms of our membership. Which contracting party will lay down their terms in advance and which party will not have an opportunity to discuss them and will simply have to accept them?

Those terms are prescribed to us while we cannot discuss them. And note that this is specified in the definition found in the Larousse dictionary which is universally recognized as the French language dictionary.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot accept the wording of the seventh report and, once again, I ask which contracting party will lay down its terms in advance and which contracting party will have to accept them without discussion? There are two contracting parties: Canada is one and we would mark our membership in the commonwealth of British nations by adopting the union jack which is England's flag. At first sight, we must conclude that it is England that would lay down her terms in advance while we would not have an opportunity to discuss them.

This is textually recorded in the seventh report of the special flag committee and it is the definition of the word "adhésion" which can be found, as I just mentioned, in the Larousse dictionary, which is universally recognized for the definition of words.

Mr. Speaker, it may be that—

[Text]

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. member answer a question? I have listened to him with interest up to this point but does he suggest there should be any connection between Canada and the commonwealth and, if he does, what should be the symbol of that connection?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I think it is possible for free and independent nations such as Canada to join the commonwealth. I do not have the slightest intention to suggest anything else, but not an "adhésion." Participation, very well. When we participate, we are equal members, with equal voice and equal decision. But what is suggested at the present time? As can be seen on page 834 of Votes and Proceedings, and more particularly in the third from last paragraph of the report of the committee, it is suggested to fly—

[Text]

Mr. Woolliams: Will you answer the question? If you don't want to answer it then say so.

Mr. Grégoire: I have answered the question.

Mr. Woolliams: You don't understand my question.

Mr. Grégoire: Then ask it again.

Mr. Woolliams: My question is twofold. Should we be a part of the commonwealth—

Mr. Caouette: Yes.

Mr. Woolliams: —and if we should be a part of the commonwealth what flag or symbol should represent Canada as a member of the commonwealth?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Very well, Mr. Speaker. In answer to the first part of the question, I will say that we are a part of the commonwealth.

[Text]

A part of the commonwealth? We advocate that we be a partner in the commonwealth. Does that answer the first part of your question?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes.

Mr. Grégoire: As for the second part of the question, I would suggest—

[Translation]

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is neither the responsibility of Canada, nor of the Liberal government nor the Prime Minister, to decide what the commonwealth flag will be, but of all the prime ministers of the commonwealth to choose a flag which will really identify the commonwealth of free nations.

It is not a responsibility of Canada to decide what the commonwealth flag will be. That decision is neither the sole responsibility of Canada, nor of the Prime Minister, nor of the Liberal members or of the Canadian parliament, it is the responsibility of all the parliaments or all the prime ministers of the commonwealth countries, which will be able to agree to choose a flag which will really be significant of the commonwealth, like in the United Nations where many nations agreed to choose a flag of the nations which was accepted by all the nations of this world as the only symbol of the United Nations.

But what we do not accept at the outset in the committee report, is that we are asked to adhere to the commonwealth, to enter with it into "contact d'adhésion" in which we would have nothing to say and where another nation will lay down its conditions to us without allowing us to discuss them in advance.

Mr. Choquette: Would you object to reading the whole definition of the words "adhère" or "adhésion" as given by the dictionary?

Mr. Grégoire: Very well.

"Adhésion: nom féminin."

Here it says the word is feminine in French. Two synonyms are given.

"Union." "Jonction".

Mr. Choquette: As, "jonction".

Mr. Grégoire: Yes, "jonction", precisely. I do not believe that the commonwealth is a union. It is an association of free and equal partners. It is not a union.

Mr. Choquette: That is it.

Mr. Grégoire: No, it is not a union; it is an association of free and equal partners, and in that capacity we may belong to it.

It is not a "jonction", because we do not amalgamate but we develop individually in order to develop together. There is a difference between that and the word "union".

Mr. Choquette: It is a definition through association.

Mr. Grégoire: In the real meaning of the word:

"Contrat d'adhésion"—a contract where all the terms are set out in advance by one of the contracting parties without the other parties having any say in the matter.

Examples are given: gas, telephone, transportation, etc.

Canadian Flag

Mr. Choquette: Provided you pay your telephone bills.

Mr. Grégoire: Yes, provided you pay your bills with the telephone company—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I suggest to the hon. member to let the hon. member for Lapointe, who has the floor, proceed without interruption.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Once again, I ask the hon. member to let the hon. member for Lapointe proceed without interruption. At the same time, I would invite the hon. member who has the floor to come back to the matter under consideration.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, the point of order raised by the hon. member for Lotbinière is not well-founded.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point of order, which is well-founded, is this. In my opinion, the hon. member for Lapointe has no right to give an incorrect definition of the word "adhésion".

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, the point of order raised by the hon. member for Lotbinière is not well taken.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is obviously no point of order there.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Lotbinière wishes to speak, he should do so when his turn comes.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise once again on a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member for Lotbinière sit down. The hon. member raised a point of order, but there is no point of order. At this time, I recognize the hon. member for Lapointe.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Choquette: In that case, Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, are they preventing us from talking? What about freedom of speech?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lotbinière rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, in this house, and that justifies my question of privilege, there are people who cannot be as familiar with the French language as those who speak that language as their mother tongue—

Mr. Grégoire: This is not a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Choquette: I rose on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Grégoire: There is no question of privilege and I would ask the hon. member for Lotbinière—

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I suggest we allow the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) to speak to his question of privilege? The Chair is doubtful that there is any real question of privilege but the hon. member is entitled to make his point.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: My question of privilege is as follows: If the hon. member for Lapointe is allowed to define the word "adhésion" as he is doing—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, there is no question of privilege.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, may I state my question of privilege completely? I had barely started before I was interrupted.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I have the co-operation of all hon. members.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Lapointe will admit that the hon. member—

[Text]

Mr. Grégoire: Let him state his question of privilege.

Mr. Choquette: Just keep quiet and I will make it.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I was interrupted before I could state part of my question of privilege.

My question of privilege is this. It is obvious that some hon. members are not acquainted with French as well as we are—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lapointe does not give the right definition of the word "adhésion"—

Mr. Grégoire: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no question of privilege. The member for Lapointe has the floor.

Mr. Choquette: Would the hon. member for—

[Text]

Mr. Winkler: On a further question of privilege, we on this side of the house are interested in making a determination with regard to the amendment this evening. If these two hon. members continue to argue as petulantly as they are now doing we will get nowhere.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, we are also anxious to dispose of the matter as promptly as possible provided there will be no obstruction from the other side.

Mr. Choquette: It hurts the hon. member for Lapointe.

An hon. Member: It bothers him.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I had just reached the point of explaining the idea of "adhésion" to the commonwealth and why we object to the wording of the seventh report of the special committee on a Canadian flag.

"Adhésion" refers to a ruling nation and to another which is being dominated.

Mr. Choquette: That is not true.

Mr. Grégoire: We do not accept this, Mr. Speaker, a ruling nation and a nation which is dominated. We believe in an equal partnership of all free commonwealth countries.

Would this adhesion be symbolized by the loans granted without interest to the United Kingdom by the Bank of Canada? Would that be Canada's adhesion to the commonwealth? A nation imposing its terms upon another? And we, in Canada, are supposed to accept all this?

Well, Mr. Speaker, we are ready to be recognized as partners, as a participating nation, but not as one which has a "contrat d'adhésion" with the commonwealth of free nations.

Now, I shall ask this question. Which other commonwealth countries accepted the union jack to signify their partnership? I am not using the term "adhésion" but "partnership", because the word "adhésion" is a monumental error in the seventh report of the special committee on the flag which we should hasten to rectify by unanimous consent of the house.

But what other commonwealth countries have adopted the union jack as their flag, by a vote of their own parliaments, to symbolize their partnership in the British commonwealth of free nations? There are none, so why should Canada do so? Are we in such a hurry to give ourselves this flag in anticipation, now that we have decided to have one, whereas, since confederation, we Canadians have been refused a distinctive national flag?

Mr. Speaker, what are the other countries which, under the same circumstances, and through parliament, had members who are responsible to the people vote in favour of a flag as a symbol of their membership in the commonwealth? There are none.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the union jack is not the flag of the commonwealth and has never been. It has always been the flag of England, the flag of the British empire, but it is not the flag of the commonwealth. On the other hand, the Prime Minister admitted himself that it is not the Queen's flag, but the flag of royalty. Every attempt was made to make us Canadians distinguish between the Queen of England and the Queen of Canada, in order that we should accept the latter.

Today they want us to assimilate British royalty with Canadian royalty, in order to have us adopt the union jack. They have always tried to make two different things out of Queen Elizabeth II: on the one hand, she was the Queen of England, and on the other hand, the Queen of Canada. I even recall that, to make us understand, they tried to compare her to the Holy Trinity: only one God, but three persons, three distinct persons. We were told, I do not know for how long, that she was the Queen of England, but not the Queen of Canada; that it could be the same person, but not the Queen of Canada; that those were definitely two different things.

And now, today, they would have us accept once and for all what they have always maintained in Ottawa: this royalty united into one person, the Queen of England and the Queen of Canada, the same royalty. They then go on to say that, since the union jack represents the flag of royalty, we must have the union jack in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, when we took the oath of allegiance, it was to the Queen of Canada and not to the Queen of England that we pledged our loyalty, so that should a conflict arise between the various countries of the commonwealth, should we have to fight one against the others, should we have to choose, should there be a conflict of interests, our allegiance would force us to fight for the Queen of Canada and not for the Queen of Australia or New Zealand. Here, in Ottawa, in an effort to make us accept the crown, we were always told that the crown in Canada and the crown in England were two different things. Today, a package deal is offered us. Well, we no longer accept it.

Mr. Caouette: No package deal.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I maintain that the union jack is England's flag and not the commonwealth's.

Mr. Caouette: That is right.

Mr. Grégoire: If England is the commonwealth of free nations then we refuse, Mr. Speaker, to be part of it in the future. On the contrary, if it is a group, an assocication of free nations, very well then, but if England is the commonwealth, we are out. And what they are trying to force upon us today is not the commonwealth flag but the flag of England.

Mr. Speaker, when time came to choose a flag at the United Nations the United States flag was not chosen. The United States did not try to impose their flag on the United Nations under the pretence that they are located in the United States, on American soil. A part of United States territory was made into a free territory.

The United States did not, at the same time, impose their flag upon the United Nations; the latter chose a truly distinctive flag. Today we are asked to approve the British flag to symbolize Canada's "appurtenance" to the commonwealth.

Several Liberal members, and especially those from the province of Quebec, will admit that I am perfectly right.

This afternoon we heard the Prime Minister of Canada quoting Bona Arsenault to add weight to his thesis; I must say that, at that point, he could not rise to the occasion if he had to resort to Bona "la pitoune" Arsenault, of Quebec. His argument must have been very weak indeed if he had to quote him. If he can quote that passage, why then does he not accept his statement according to which the C.B.C., in Montreal, is infiltrated with communists? Oh. No. There are protests among the members of the Liberal party, because Bona Arsenault is a man who changes his mind as often as he changes his shirt, and he must change his shirt quite often because he changes his mind often too. Is the Prime Minister so short of quotations that he feels he has to quote Mr. Bona Arsenault? I would say, therefore, that his argument is very weak indeed and even sophisticated.

I never heard such a series of sophisms as I heard this afternoon to try and make us adopt this flag. We have been told: It is the flag of royalty; the Queen is the head of the commonwealth, therefore, we choose the union jack.

On the other hand, it is also true that the royalty is not recognized in all the commonwealth countries. Royalty is not recognized in Ghana or in India. Yet, the Queen is recognized as head of the commonwealth.

Then, Mr. Speaker, it is not the royal flag that is needed but the flag of the Queen of Canada and, in my opinion, the best flag for the Queen of Canada would be the national distinctive flag we have chosen yesterday, as it will be the one that will really symbolize royalty in Canada.

An hon. Member: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I have but ten minutes left.

Time has come for Canada to assert herself in the world. A year ago I found out at the United Nations that the Prime Minister was not treated like a chief of state but rather like a servant in the United Nations because, as we were told, only the chiefs of states are entitled to a special seat. But the Prime Minister was not entitled to the "blue seat treatment", since the chief of state of Canada is the Queen of England. Then, let us give the Prime Minister of Canada an opportunity to become the real head of state of Canada and to be considered as such at the United Nations.

Mr. Speaker, for all these reasons, because we believe we are perhaps the most Canadian of the Canadians, we object to the union jack becoming the symbol of the commonwealth, as well as to the red ensign. When the commonwealth chooses a flag accepted by all the countries in the commonwealth, then we shall accept it, not by a vote in this house, but by custom, and that will be all. Until then, we accept only one national distinctive flag, namely the one we chose yesterday, the maple leaf flag, and we shall accept no other, let alone the flags of other countries.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may I point out that, as I see the clock from here, it is ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

[Text]

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could have the concurrence of the house to deal with government notices of motions on today's order paper, so they can be transferred to the orders of the day.

Mr. Churchill: This is reverting to motions, Mr. Speaker. We had hoped that there would be a vote tonight so we could get on with the business of the house.

Mr. McIlraith: I am quite agreeable, Mr. Speaker, if the house is willing to sit on and there is any prospect of reaching a vote tonight.

Mr. Churchill: Two members of the government party were asking for the floor 15 or 20 minutes ago.

Mr. McIlraith: That was 15 or 20 minutes ago. Perhaps we could have the vote tonight, Mr. Speaker, if the house would agree to sit a little longer.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, we do not give our consent to proceed with a vote tonight, as we feel that if we have been unable to vote tonight, it is because of the systematic obstruction from the other side of the house. Because of this obstruction, we will not agree to vote later tonight.

[Text]

Mr. Churchill: We will agree to revert to motions for this purpose.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I did not hear what my hon. friend for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) said just now; but I was going to make the plea that we might agree to transferring notices of motions tonight. I wonder if we could also have an understanding that, whether or not we get to oral questions tomorrow, we take the two or three minutes that would be necessary for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Stewart) to deal with written questions on the order paper, because they are piling up.

Mr. McIlraith: I would be very glad to agree to that, Mr. Speaker. Could it be made an order of the house so there will be no difficulty, if we answer the written questions tomorrow, about departing from the motion before the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The house has heard the suggestion of the President of the Privy Council. Is it agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: May we transfer the notices of motion, the one standing in the name of the Minister of Justice and the other standing in the name of the Minister of Finance, to orders of the day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

TRANSFER TO PROVINCES OF FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR SHARED PROGRAMS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for Mr. Gordon) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure of an interim nature respecting certain conditional-grant and shared-cost programs that have become established federal-provincial programs to enable such of the provinces as may wish to do so to assume financial responsibility for such programs within the ambit of national objectives; and, in respect of those provinces that assume such responsibility for specific programs, to provide a tax abatement under the Income Tax Act, a tax equalization payment and, where necessary, an adjustment payment, or to provide a cash payment in lieu of a tax abatement for particular programs or as cash compensation in other cases, and to authorize such agreements as may be necessary to ensure that the continuation in the interim period of any such program by provinces with such federal assistance will accord with national objectives; and to provide for other related or incidental matters.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Did I understand the Chair to say the motion was moved by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon)?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion was moved by Mr. Sharp for Mr. Gordon.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES ACT

PROVISION FOR SALARIES OF ADDITIONAL JUDGES FOR MANITOBA AND QUEBEC

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to amend Bill C-112, an act to amend the Judges Act, now before the house, to authorize the provision of salaries for two additional judges of the court of Queen's bench for Manitoba and to increase from three to five the number of additional judges of the superior court of Quebec for whom salaries may be authorized to be provided.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the house seems to be in very good humour, perhaps hon. members would consider granting leave to introduce the bill standing in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau).

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT AND CRIMINAL CODE

EXTENSION OF MORATORIUM RESPECTING B.C. FISHING INDUSTRY

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-141, an act to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

[Translation]

Mr. Favreau: As this house well knows, the purpose of this bill is to extend the moratorium which prevents or suspends the application of the Combines Investigation Act as far as the relations between fishermen of British Columbia and those who process fish are concerned.

[Text]

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being after ten o'clock, this house stands adjourned until two thirty o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, December 16, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CAOUETTE—TRIBUTE BY HISTORICAL SOCIETY TO BALDWIN AND LAFONTAINE

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

May I be permitted to call attention to the ceremony that took place this afternoon on parliament hill when a good many people, under the patronage of the Société historique de Boucherville, paid tribute to two great Canadians, the Hon. Robert Baldwin and Sir Louis-Hyppolyte Lafontaine.

Sir Louis-Hyppolyte Lafontaine died 100 years ago, and it was 50 years ago this year that a joint monument was erected on parliament hill to those two great politicians.

Mr. Speaker, we could not let this occasion pass without recalling that Sir Louis-Hyppolyte Lafontaine and the Hon. Robert Baldwin were those who made the strongest stand to obtain for us what is called today a responsible government.

One could recall also that the first step taken by Lafontaine on entering parliament was to make a speech in French to ask for equal status for the French language in parliament. If, today, we can make speeches in our mother tongue in this house, we owe it to Lafontaine and Baldwin.

That is what I wanted to call attention to in rising on a question of privilege.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WORLD PATENT SYSTEM

Question No. 1,989—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to seeking a world patent system recognized by all states?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): The laws on patent are based on existing international conventions and the matter is receiving periodical consideration.

C.N.R. RENTAL FOR PALAIS STATION, QUEBEC CITY

Question No. 2,096—Mr. Marcoux:

1. Is the rental paid by Canadian National Railways to Canadian Pacific Railway for the use of the Palais station in Quebec city still based on the agreements signed in 1932 and 1933?

2. Does the present rental charge include the same services as were included in 1933?

3. What were the amounts paid by Canadian National Railways, in the Palais station premises in Quebec city, to Canadian Pacific Railway for the years 1933 and 1942 and for each year since 1957?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. Payments made to the Canadian Pacific Railway for use of Palais station and associated facilities are still based on the principles of the original agreement of 1915 and the supplemental agreements of 1930 and 1933.

2. Yes.

3. Canadian National shares in the operating cost on the basis of general and coach yard wheelage ratios, and also contributes 50 per cent of the interest on invested capital. Due to the fact that the joint expenses are grouped with those of other related facilities, it would be difficult to segregate, with any degree of accuracy, the user road's share of expenses applicable to Palais station premises.

[Text]

C.N.R. MAINTENANCE CHARGES, QUEBEC CITY

Question No. 2,098—Mr. Marcoux:

For each year between 1939 and 1955 (a) what was the total number of hours charged to the Canadian National Railways for maintenance and operation of the C.N. railway cars at the Palais station in Quebec city (b) what was the total cost of the hours charged for repairing such railway cars (c) what was the cost of parts billed to the C.N.R. by the C.P.R.?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

As the records of the company have been destroyed this information is no longer available.

FRENCH TEACHERS FOR CIVIL SERVANTS

Question No. 2,115—Mr. Coates:

1. How many individuals have been employed by the civil service commission as French teachers for civil servants?

2. What is the salary range for those employed in these positions and what is the total annual expenditure?

3. Has a special branch been set up to carry out this program and what is the estimated cost to the federal treasury for the establishment of this branch and its annual operation?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. The civil service commission has employed 21 persons, 11 in full time continuing positions and 10 on a casual basis, to teach French in the civil service commission language training centre.

2. The salary ranges for those employed in these positions are from $5,400 to $10,500 per annum. The estimated total expenditure on salaries for these employees in the period April 1, 1964 to March 31, 1965 is $61,155.

3. The civil service commission has established a language training centre, a division of the executive secretary's branch of the commission. The estimated total cost of the centre to the federal treasury, including faculty heads, administrative and clerical services, office rental, and also English teachers who teach English to French students, for the period April 1, 1964 to March 31, 1965, is $230,196.

C.N.R. TRAIN CREW OPERATIONS, MOUNTAIN REGION

Question No. 2,116—Mr. Lambert:

1. Has the management of the Canadian National Railways made any recent changes, or does it intend to make changes in the near future, in the operations of train crews in its mountain region and, if so, what are these changes and how do they affect the personnel of its train crews?

2. Is there presently any labour contract agreement between management and its operating personnel covering changes, conditions of employment between contracts and, if so, what are they and do any such provisions cover any runs between two subdivisions?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1 and 2. The management of the Canadian National Railways point out that an inquiry has been instituted by the Minister of Labour under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act into the industrial situation arising from the running of certain trains through the terminals at Nakina and Wainwright, and as the matter is under investigation the management are of the opinion that it would be inadvisable to give information outside of the inquiry.

[Mr. Cantin.]

PENITENTIARY EMPLOYEES PROVIDED WITH WEAPONS

Question No. 2,156—Mr. Howard:

Has any penitentiary employee been provided with a blackjack or other similar truncheon, club, or weapon and, if so, in which penitentiaries were such weapons so provided, in which areas in each such penitentiary, and has any such employee ever had occasion to use such a weapon and, if so, what are the details thereof?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): 1. Custodial officers of the Canadian penitentiary service were issued with regulation billies at the following penitentiaries: Dorchester penitentiary; St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary; Manitoba penitentiary; Saskatchewan penitentiary; British Columbia penitentiary.

2. Such weapons were provided for employment in areas as follows: (a) Dorchester penitentiary, to the officers assigned to the dissociation and segregation areas (b) St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, to the officers assigned to the dissociation and segregation areas (c) Manitoba penitentiary, to the officer assigned to the dissociation area (d) Saskatchewan penitentiary, to the officers patrolling ranges after the closing of the prison (e) British Columbia penitentiary, to all custodial officers employed at the penitentiary.

3. Custodial officers had the occasion to use such a weapon under the circumstances described hereunder:

(a) Dorchester penitentiary, there has only been one such incident during the course of the last year. Two inmates were exercising in the dissociation area, when they began to fight with one another. The officer supervising the exercise attempted to intervene and break up the fight whereupon one inmate turned on the officer and attempted to attack him. The officer drew his billy and struck the inmate one blow. The inmate desisted immediately. The injury was not serious, the inmate did not require hospitalization and received immediate first aid to a slight cut on the back of the head.

(b) St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, on one evening in 1963, in cell block No. 1, one inmate set fire in his mattress and cell equipment. The three officers on duty went to remove him from his cell as the inmate appeared to be unconscious. The officers carried the inmate to a table, and while two officers were looking for the stretcher in the same building, the inmate suddenly stood up and attacked the third officer, reaching for his neck or his face. One of the two first officers came back rapidly and used his billy on the inmate's head.

The blow was sufficient to stop the attack, however, the inmate was not unconscious. He was escorted to the hospital for check-up. He was not seriously hurt.

On another occasion in 1962, two inmates returning from the exercise period attacked the three guards escorting them and five other inmates to the isolation cells. One guard was hit on the head, suffering a serious cut which kept him away from work for a period of two months. Another guard suffered a broken right hand.

The guards were not able to reach their billy and one of them had to use a shovel to free the guard who had been hit on the head. These two inmates had attacked the officers by using one bench and one brush handle and were inciting the five other inmates to participate, in order to take hold of that building. These inmates were sent to the criminal court and were sentenced to one year consecutive.

4. In all other cases of attacks by inmates against custodial personnel, such attacks numbering to 23 since 1962, the guards have used their bare hands to overcome inmates using knives, crowbars, soft drink bottles or broken pieces of furniture. Nineteen officers have suffered injuries, varying from slight contusions to 100 per cent permanent disability confirmed by the provincial labour department work accidents compensation board.

VISITS TO PENITENTIARIES BY JUDGES OR MAGISTRATES

Question No. 2,158—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1963, have any judges or magistrates visited any penitentiaries and, if so, what are the names and addresses of the said judges or magistrates, the penitentiaries which they visited and the dates of the said visits?

2. Did any of the judges or magistrates, make any comments or recommendations following such visits and, if so, what comments or recommendations and what action has been taken thereon?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): 1 and 2. Since January 1, 1963, the following judges or magistrates have visited Canadian penitentiaries as listed hereunder and commented as indicated:

Kingston penitentiary:

February 15, 1963, Magistrate H. T. G. Andrews, address unknown.

June 6, 1964, a group of 42 magistrates of the province of Ontario who were attending a provincial convention in the city of Kingston, names and addresses unknown.

April 17, 1964, Hon. Mr. Justice Brooke and six other honourable justices from the supreme court of Ontario, names and addresses unknown.

October 20, 1964, Hon. Judge Lyon of York county, address unknown. Hon. Judge H. Waisberg of York county, address unknown.

The comments that were made by these judges and magistrates were complimentary and no particular recommendations were made by any of them.

Agassiz correctional camp:

June 22, 1963, Mrs. Edward Brockman, a member of the council of magistrates, England; Mrs. Brockman commented as follows:

I found it all most interesting, so much man's work to be done out there, that the effect cannot be anything but good—also the kindness of all who showed us around made me understand what a bond there is, all the world over, between the people who work among convicts.

Saskatchewan penitentiary:

January 21, 1963, Judge T. Hughes of Saskatoon. General comments of favourable nature. No specific recommendations.

January 22, 1963, Justice M. S. MacPherson of Regina. Made favourable comments and has since communicated with the institution on many occasions, with reference to training programs available.

LAU NGAR MYE—CHARGES UNDER IMMIGRATION ACT

Question No. 2,161—Mr. Lambert:

1. Was a charge of making false statements under the provisions of the Immigration Act or any related charge made recently against Lau Ngar Mye of the Toronto area?

2. If so, has a trial been held and with what result?

3. If such prosecution has taken place, what were the circumstances which removed Lau Ngar Mye from the protection of the amnesty granted in 1961 to Chinese nationals who had entered Canada illegally?

4. If Lau Ngar Mye has been convicted and suffers a penalty thereby, is there to be any further penalty or disability, such as deportation, which he may incur?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): 1. Yes.

2. Yes, he was convicted and sentenced to a fine of $1,000 or four months imprisonment. The fine was paid.

3. He did not qualify for the amnesty because it applied only to illegalities related to illegal entry and did not apply to subsequent illegalities not related thereto.

4. No.

TELEVISION STATION CJOH, OTTAWA—DRAMATIC PRODUCTIONS

Question No. 2,178—Mr. Orlikow:

Did the present owners of the private t.v. channel in Ottawa, or their associates, undertake with the B.B.G. to produce a number of hour long dramatic programs in Ottawa and, if so, how many have been produced?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Ted Cott of N.T.A. Telefilm (Canada) Ltd. appeared at the public hearing with the CJOH application. He stated "we are prepared to produce one or more of the 'Play of the Week' programs up here in association with Mr. Bushnell". The board has no information as to whether these programs were produced.

TELEVISION STATION CJOH, OTTAWA—
AWARD TO CANADIAN PLAYWRIGHT

Question No. 2,179—Mr. Orlikow:

Did the present owners of CJOH, or their associates, undertake to provide an award to a Canadian playwright for the best play and, if so (a) has such an award ever been made (b) what is the value of such award?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Ted Cott of N.T.A. Telefilm (Canada) Ltd. appeared at the public hearing with the CJOH application. He stated:

We are preparing to produce one or more of the "Play of the Week" programs up here in association with Mr. Bushnell and, in fact, when and if this licence is granted, we are prepared to announce the establishment of an award to a Canadian playwright for the best play which can be produced on this program.

In the logging process stations are not required to file with the board information of this kind. The board, therefore has no information as to whether the station has made such an award, or its value.

TELEVISION STATION CJOH, OTTAWA—
PRODUCTIONS FOR U.S. SHOWING

Question No. 2,180—Mr. Orlikow:

Did associates of the present owners of CJOH undertake with the B.B.G. to produce such programs as "Open end" in Ottawa for showing in New York and other American cities and, if so, have any such programs been produced in Ottawa and shown in the United States?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Ted Cott of N.T.A. Telefilm (Canada) Ltd. appeared at the public hearing with the CJOH application. He stated:

We look forward in our discussion with Mr. Bushnell and his associates to be able to do various of our "Open End" programs here so that they would be presented in New York city, and, since they are taped, they are also presented to other of the major cities in the United States.

In the logging process stations are not required to advise the board of productions they have undertaken or of material that has been shown in the United States. The board, therefore, has no information on this matter.

TELEVISION STATION CJOH, OTTAWA—
SERIES FOR CHILDREN

Question No. 2,181—Mr. Orlikow:

Did associates or the present owners of CJOH undertake with the B.B.G. to have a series for children made in co-operation with a company in France, partly in English and partly in French, using Canadian talent and, if so, has any such series been produced and shown on Canadian t.v.?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. N. A. Taylor, president of N. A. Taylor Associates, a group of companies concerned with the production and distribution of films, appeared at the public hearing with the CJOH application. He stated:

We have also invested in the co-production of a pilot film for a television series for children. We have done this in co-operation with a company in France. We hope to make part of the series in France and part of the series in Canada...

In the logging process stations are not required to advise the board of productions that they have undertaken. The board has no information as to whether such programs were produced and shown on Canadian television.

TELEVISION STATION CJOH, OTTAWA—
PRODUCTION OF FILMS BASED ON CANADIAN NOVELS

Question No. 2,182—Mr. Orlikow:

Did associates, or the present owners, of CJOH in Ottawa, undertake with the B.B.G. to produce motion pictures based on Canadian novels and to show them internationally and, if so, have any such films been produced?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. N. A. Taylor, president of N. A. Taylor Associates, a group of companies concerned with the production and distribution of films, appeared at the public hearing with the CJOH application. He indicated that one of his film companies had produced one such film and was considering the production of others. The board has no information as to whether these films were produced.

TELEVISION STATION CJOH, OTTAWA—
DEVELOPMENT OF CANADIAN TALENT

Question No. 2,184—Mr. Orlikow:

Did the owners of CJOH in Ottawa undertake with the B.B.G. to give priority to the encouragement and development of Canadian talent and, if so, how many Canadian artists have appeared on programs originating at CJOH and what are their names?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): In his application to the board Mr. Bushnell stated: "The discovery, encouragement and development of talent will be given a high priority". Stations are not required in the logging process to file information of this kind with the board. It would be the board's intention at the public hearing of the application for the renewal of the licence of the station which expires on March 31, 1966, to examine the licensee on the station's operation in the light of undertakings given with respect to the employment of the staff and artists.

TELEVISION STATION CJOH, OTTAWA—EXCHANGE PROGRAMS

Question No. 2,185—Mr. Orlikow:

Did the present owners of CJOH in Ottawa undertake with the B.B.G. to exchange shows, created in Ottawa, with the United States and England, and, if so, have any such shows been organized?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Yes. In the logging process stations are not required to file with the board information of this kind. The board, therefore, has no information as to whether any such shows have been organized.

TELEVISION STATION CJOH, OTTAWA—FRENCH PROGRAMMING

Question No. 2,188—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Did the successful applicants for channel 13 in Ottawa promise the B.B.G. that they would provide a minimum of ten hours of French language broadcasting, each week, produced in Ottawa, Montreal and Quebec?

2. How much French programming has CJOH televised since it began operations?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. Yes.

2. The board does not keep a continuous detailed record of the material broadcast by the station since it began operating and is not, therefore, able to provide the information requested.

TELEVISION STATION CJOH, OTTAWA—USE OF OTTAWA PERFORMERS

Question No. 2,189—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Did CJOH promise the B.B.G. that they would schedule variety and live dance programs produced in Ottawa and using Ottawa artists, musicians, etc.?

2. Have any such programs been produced, and, if so (a) how many, and (b) at what cost?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. Yes.

2. (a) The board does not keep a continuous detailed record of the material broadcast by the station since it began operating and is not, therefore, able to provide the information requested. (b) The board does not make public the financial information it receives from private station operations.

[Mr. Lamontagne.]

TELEVISION STATION CJOH, OTTAWA—PROPOSED USE OF TALENT AND STAFF

Question No. 2,190—Mr. Orlikow:

Did the successful applicant for a private t.v. channel in Ottawa ask the B.B.G. to compare the superior quality of their plans for the use of talent and staff as compared to those of the other applicants?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): The board's record indicates that the applicant made the following statement at the public hearing while presenting the application for CJOH-TV: "We feel that the board must consider the lower sights that the other four applicants have set and ensured by their talent and staff allowances."

VISIT BY MINISTER TO ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY

Question No. 2,211—Mr. Martineau:

1. Did the Minister of Justice visit St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary on October 26, 1964 and, if so (a) who accompanied him on this visit, and (b) what was the purpose of this visit (c) what was the outcome of this visit (d) will the minister prepare a report concerning the conditions observed at the institution in the course of this visit (e) will the minister table such a report before the House of Commons?

2. Did the minister verify, in particular, if any of the charges made by an ex-inmate of this institution, in the course of a C.B.C. program called "This Hour Has Seven Days" on Sunday, October 25, 1964, were founded and, if so, what measures does the minister intend to take to correct this situation?

3. Did he, in particular, verify details of the charges made in regard to one Gaston Nicholas, an inmate in this penitentiary and did he establish if this person has been denied the privilege of keeping his daughter's picture in his cell?

4. Did the minister and his party partake of a meal within the prison walls and, if so (a) was this fare the regular fare served to the inmates, and (b) was a special menu arranged for the prisoners on that day because of the minister's visit?

5. Has any disciplinary action been taken or is any such action being considered against the warden of this institution or any of its officials?

6. Are the guards on duty at this institution being examined as to their mental and physical aptitudes to fill these positions?

7. What qualifications are required to fill these positions?

8. Are any guards being removed as being unfit to fill their position?

9. What measures is the minister planning to remedy the conditions existing at this institution and what committees will be appointed to deal with same?

10. What powers will these committees have, and how will their membership be composed?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): 1. The Minister of Justice visited the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary on Monday, October 26, 1964. (a) The minister was accompanied by the Minister of Public Works and approximately 60 representatives of the press, radio and television. (b) The purpose of the visit was for the minister to see for himself the existing conditions at the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary. (c) This visit satisfied the minister that the present facilities at the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary should be abandoned as soon as possible and, in consequence, both he and the Minister of Public Works were impressed with the need to press the completion of construction of new facilities with all speed. (d) No. (e) No.

2. The minister investigated these accusations and found nothing that would substantiate them.

3. Yes. The penitentiary authorities denied permitting this inmate to keep one unusually large photograph of his daughter. However, a photograph of regulation size is now in this inmate's possession.

4. The minister and his party did not partake of a meal within the prison walls. During the visit of the kitchen and servery, the regular fare served to the inmates was inspected and tasted by the minister and any other person who wished to do so. No special menu was arranged for the prisoners.

5. No.

6. Yes.

7. The qualifications required to fill these positions are: (a) Age limit, 23 to 40 years. (b) Physical fitness; height, minimum 5′ 8″; weight, satisfactory for height, build and age; eyes, not less than 20/60 without glasses; must satisfy institutional doctor in all medical aspects as to physical fitness. (c) Education, minimum of grade 10 (grade 9, Quebec) or equivalent and achieve suitable standards in any psychological personality tests that may be given. (d) Ability, proven satisfactory police or military experience is a decided asset for any applicant. (e) Character and appearance, the applicant should be neat in appearance. During the selection board interview, the applicant is assessed as to: (i) suitability for carrying out duties according to regulations; (ii) ability to express himself orally; (iii) self control; (iv) self confidence; (v) potential leadership; (vi) ability to co-operate with others. (f) Training; to pass a three month induction training course and a further three month probationary period of employment.

8. No.

9. Measures have been taken by the Minister of Public Works to hasten the construction program of penitentiary institutions in the province of Quebec. It is also intended to establish two committees; one parliamentary committee to deal with the physical and material need of penal institutions, the other a committee of experts to deal with the overall field of correction in Canada.

10. The composition and powers of these committees are now being considered and the minister intends to advise the house as soon as a decision will have been taken on this subject.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Question No. 2,230—Mr. Woolliams:

1. How many people are employed in the C.B.C.?
2. What is the total capital investment of this crown corporation?
3. For the past complete fiscal year, what was the total revenue the C.B.C. earned or produced?
4. How much money was paid to the C.B.C. out of the public treasury in 1963?
5. What was the total cost of producing films by the C.B.C. in 1963, which said films or any part thereof were not, and will not be shown on the television network?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. 8,089 as at September 30, 1964.

2. The total cost to the corporation of capital assets in use at March 31, 1964, as shown by the latest published balance sheet of the corporation, was $68,442,958. The net book value of these assets after provision for depreciation, was $36,612,401.

3. Total gross revenue earned or produced by C.B.C. in the fiscal year 1963-64, $33,010,-055.

5. The combined film and video tape write-off for two television networks in the 1963-64 fiscal year totalled $104,751. This included the costs of programs cancelled because of emergency programming, such as the death of President Kennedy, and material unsuitable for use.

CONSIDERATION OF AIRPORT CONSTRUCTION, KIMBERLEY, B.C.

Question No. 2,232—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1964, has the government received any representations for building an airport at, or near, the St. Eugene Indian reserve near Kimberley, B.C., and, if so, from whom were the representations received, what was the nature of each and what action is contemplated with respect thereto?

2. In the course of considering any such representations, or in considering the question without any such representations, were any members of parliament consulted and, if so, which ones and what was the response in each case?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No, but the department has itself been in touch with various local municipalities regarding the airport problems of both the east and west Kootenays and its present investigations of alternate possibilities.

2. In reply to requests received from the member for Kootenay East regarding the future prospects for the Cranbrook airport, information on these current departmental investigations was supplied to him.

LAND PURCHASE, CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.

Question No. 2,259—Mr. MacLean (Queens):

Has the government, during the last year and a half, purchased land in the city of Charlottetown and, if so (a) what is the area of the land purchased (b) from whom was the land purchased (c) what was the total price paid (d) what is the intended use to be made of the land purchased?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Yes, (a) 0.34 acre; (b) A. Pickard & Co.; (c) $7,428.37, (d) marine agency depot.

TELEVISION STATION CJAY, WINNIPEG—VARIETY PROGRAMS

Question No. 2,272—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Did the successful applicants for the private t.v. channel in Winnipeg, Manitoba, undertake with the B.B.G. to provide an opportunity for professional and up-and-coming amateurs, to develop their talents on that channel?

2. Have any actors, musicians, singers and variety artists been hired for programs produced by the private t.v. channel in Winnipeg, Manitoba and, if so, since the station began to operate, how many and when?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. Yes.

2. Stations are not required in the logging process to file with the board information concerning the hiring of specific talent. It would be the board's intention at the public hearing of the application for the renewal of the licence of the station which expires on March 31, 1966, to examine the licensee on the station's operation in the light of undertakings given with respect to the employment of artists.

EFFECTS OF AIR POLLUTION ON AGRICULTURE

Question No. 2,294—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

[Mr. Howard.]

1. Is the government conducting or supporting research into the present or possible future effects of air pollution on agriculture and, if so, at which institutions and under whose direction is such research being carried out?

2. What have been the findings of each research project carried out within the last year?

3. For each of the last five years, what has been the cost to the government of such research?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. The Department of Agriculture is not conducting or supporting research into the present or possible future effects of air pollution on agriculture.

2. N/A.

3. N/A.

AIR POLLUTION CONTROL

Question No. 2,295—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

1. Is the Department of Transport conducting or supporting research into methods of air pollution control and, if so, at which institutions and under whose direction is such research being carried out?

2. What have been the findings of each research project carried out within the last year?

3. For each of the last five years, what has been the cost to the government of such research?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

JOLIETTE, QUE., FEDERAL BUILDING—AIR CONDITIONING

Question No. 2,297—Mr. Pigeon:

1. Does the government intend to instal an air conditioning system in the federal building in the town of Joliette (post office, unemployment insurance office, etc.) and, if so, when?

2. If no air conditioning is to be installed, for what reason?

[Translation]

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): 1. No.

2. The federal building at Joliette was built in 1888, with additions constructed in 1914 and 1952, and is typical of many buildings across the country where risk of deterioration from moisture saturation of the fabric of the building, and the materials of construction, will most likely prevent the installation of an air conditioning system. Investigation into different phases of this general problem is underway, both at the national research council and at the Department of Public Works.

COMPANIES ESTABLISHED IN DESIGNATED AREAS

Question No. 2,308—Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John):

1. What are the names of companies which have set up operations in designated areas?
2. In what location has each been established?
3. What is the amount registered on the certificate for each of these companies and what is the type of production of each?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): 1. It would not be in the public interest for the government to disclose the names of companies which have set up operations in designated areas and which have indicated, on a confidential basis, their intention of taking advantage of the tax incentives available to new enterprises in designated areas. When certificates under section 71A of the Income Tax Act have been issued, the government will give consideration to publishing the names of those firms which have received such certificates.

2 and 3. Companies which have set up operations in designated areas and which have indicated their intention of taking advantage of the tax incentives are arranged alphabetically according to standard industrial classification.

In Alberta-British Columbia in the designated area of Blairmore: electrical apparatus.

In New Brunswick in the designated areas of Campbellton, Minto, St. Stephen, Woodstock and Sussex: food, textiles, transportation equipment, wood products.

CONTRACT OF C.N.R. PRESIDENT

Question No. 2,311—Mr. Pigeon:

When was the contract of Mr. Donald Gordon, president of the Canadian National Railways, last renewed and, for how many years?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Pursuant to the provisions of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act 1936 (later amended by Canadian National Railways Act 1955), Mr. Donald Gordon was appointed president of the Canadian National Railway Company by its board of directors, such appointment being approved by the governor in council, effective January 1, 1950. The appointment is not for any specified term, but in accordance with the statutes the chief executive officer holds office "during the pleasure of the directors". Coincident with the appointment as president, and in accordance with the statutes, the governor in council appointed Mr. Gordon a director and chairman of the board. Mr. Gordon's current appointment as a director and chairman of the board of directors, pursuant to sections 6 and 8 of the Canadian National Railways Act, was approved by order in council P.C. 1963-1473, dated October 4, 1963.

CROSSING OF PETITCODIAC RIVER, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 2,314—Mr. Coates:

1. What formula was used to determine the $800,000 grant for construction of a crossing of the Petitcodiac river near Moncton under the M.M.R. Act?

2. What is the estimated cost of the crossing in question and what type of crossing is to be constructed?

3. Has an agreement been signed by the parties involved in the construction of the crossing and, if so, on what date was the agreement signed and who were the signators to the agreement?

4. What will be the site of the construction of the crossing and is the property on which the crossing is to be constructed presently under the ownership of either the federal government or the government of New Brunswick?

5. In what instances has the federal government awarded grants for river crossings within any province of Canada before a determination of cost, type of crossing or location for project been secured?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): 1. The federal contribution is based on the amount of arable marshland which will be permanently protected from tidal flooding, and the value of such protection in providing a secure basis for full development of the area. The project was analysed according to the same formula as that used for the construction of the Annapolis river dam in Nova Scotia.

2. $3,000,000 for a combination rock filled dam and causeway equipped with aboiteau.

3. No.

4. The northern end of the crossing will tie in with the Dickson boulevard in Moncton. The province is assuming full responsibility for acquiring all rights of way.

5. None.

FEDERAL BUILDING, AMHERST, N.S.

Question No. 2,318—Mr. Coates:

1. On what date will tenders be called for the construction of a new federal building at Amherst, N.S.?

2. What departments of government will have quarters in the new federal building?

3. What will be the estimated cost of this building?

Questions

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): 1. It is intended to call tenders for an addition to the existing building during the fiscal year 1966-1967, subject to the provision of funds by parliament.

2. We anticipate that the following departments will occupy this building: Post Office Department, Department of National Revenue, Department of Labour, unemployment insurance commission, Department of Citizenship and Immigration, Department of Forestry, Department of Finance (public works treasury).

3. The estimated cost will not be known until plans and specifications have been completed.

CONSTRUCTION OF STORAGE DAMS, ALBERTA

Question No. 2,319—Mr. Horner (Acadia):

1. Has the Alberta government made requisition either through P.F.R.A. or through ARDA, for assistance in construction of a water storage dam near the town of Hanna on Fox lake, so as to enhance the water conditions in the area?

2. Has the Alberta government made a request under P.F.R.A. or ARDA for a dam (known as Cameron dam) north of Youngstown, Alberta, on Sounding creek?

3. Has the Alberta government water resources board granted P.F.R.A. permission for construction on Blood Indian creek, south of Youngstown and, if so, when will construction on this project begin?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. The government of Alberta requested, under P.F.R.A., assistance in the construction of a water storage dam near the town of Hanna, Alberta.

2. The government of Alberta requested that a preliminary investigation be made of the feasibility of the Sounding creek project. The report was completed by P.F.R.A. in June 1962 and was forwarded to the government of Alberta.

3. The Alberta water resources board has granted permission for the construction of the Blood Indian creek community water storage project. Tenders are being called and construction is expected to commence early next year.

ISODELE BELFONT—DEPORTATION PROCEEDINGS

Question No. 2,320—Mr. Howard:

1. Have any deportation proceedings been instituted against one Isodele Belfont (nee Dreckman)?

2. Has any representation been made by the government of the United States regarding Isodele Belfont?

3. What are the reasons for the deportation proceedings?

4. Is the government aware that Isodele Belfont is a married woman and is her husband included in the said proceedings, or are there separate proceedings relating to him?

[Mr. Coates.]

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): 1. Yes.

2. No.

3. This woman has been ordered deported under section 19(1)(e)(ix) of the Immigration Act in that she returned to Canada contrary to the provisions of the Immigration Act after a deportation order had been made against her. Mrs. Belfont has entered an appeal against this order and her case is being considered by the immigration appeal board.

4. Yes, the government is aware that Isodele Belfont is a married woman. Her husband is a Canadian citizen and is not subject to the deportation provisions of the Immigration Act.

SALARY OF CHAPLAIN, FEDERAL PENITENTIARY

Question No. 2,321—Mr. Matheson:

1. What is the annual salary of a chaplain serving in a federal penitentiary?

2. Does a chaplain receive a residence in addition to salary?

3. What amenities, if any, are provided to a chaplain free of cost?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): 1. Chaplains serving in a federal penitentiary are paid $5,400 per annum if employed on a full time basis and $3,500 per annum if employed on a part time basis.

2. No.

3. None.

DEATH OF MAPLE TREES

Question No. 2,322—Mr. Matheson:

1. Has the government any statistics respecting the dying of maple trees during the past several years?

2. Has any study been undertaken to counteract maple decline and, if so, with what results?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): 1. A conspicuous dieback of maples has occurred in recent years throughout southern Ontario. Sample plots have been under surveillance for several years by the Department of Forestry and these show that the condition is restricted to exposed trees along highways, secondary roads, and streets in urban areas and does not extend into natural stands of maple. The severity of dieback varies from year to year and between areas but observations in 1964 show that a high proportion of the roadside trees are in various stages of decline at locations in the lake Erie, lake Huron, Lindsay, and Tweed forest districts.

2. Studies to date indicate that a number of factors are involved including: drought, chemicals used along highways to control dust, ice, and weeds; low winter temperatures when there is deficient snow cover; and the age of trees. Studies are in progress to determine the relative importance of these factors. Once this is established, appropriate means of prevention or treatment can be developed.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE CORPORATION

Question No. 2,325—Mr. Basford:

1. What are the names, addresses and principal occupations of the directors, executive officers and members of the advisory council of the Exports Credits Insurance Corporation?

2. With regard to cash financing agreements made under section 21A of the Export Credits Insurance Act, from January 1, 1964 to the present, either by Canada alone, or as part of a joint venture, or international consortia, what are the (a) countries and importers (b) products financed (c) name and address of exporter, and (d) amount authorized to be financed by Canada?

3. Where in Canada does the Export Credits Insurance Corporation maintain branch offices?

4. What factors militate against a branch office of E.C.I.C. being located in Vancouver, B.C.?

Mr. Jean-Luc Pepin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. Directors: J. H. Warren, Ottawa, Ontario, deputy minister of trade and commerce (chairman); R. B. Bryce, Ottawa, Ontario, deputy minister of finance; L. C. Audette, Ottawa, Ontario, chairman tariff board; A. F. W. Plumptre, Ottawa, Ontario, assistant deputy minister of finance; A. E. Ritchie, Ottawa, Ontario, under secretary of state for external affairs; D. Harvey, Orleans, Ontario, assistant deputy minister of trade and commerce; H. T. Aitken, Ottawa, Ontario, president and general manager of E.C.I.C.

Executive officers: H. T. Aitken, Ottawa, Ontario, president and general manager; A. W. Thomas, Ottawa, Ontario, vice president; T. Chase-Casgrain, Ottawa, Ontario, secretary.

Advisory council: Hon. J. V. Clyne, Vancouver, B.C., chairman of the board of the MacMillan, Bloedel and Powell River Limited; G. L. Harrold, Calgary, Alberta, president of Alberta wheat pool; A. T. Lambert, Toronto, Ontario, president of the Toronto-Dominion Bank; Paul H. Leman, Montreal, Quebec, executive vice president of the Aluminum Company of Canada; F. C. Mannix, Calgary, Alberta, president and chairman of the board of Mannix Co. Ltd.; A. F. Mayne, Montreal, Quebec, executive vice president of the Royal Bank of Canada; Ian F. McRae, Toronto, Ontario, chairman of the board of Canadian General Electric Company Limited; P. A. Ouimet, Montreal, Quebec, legal adviser to Iron Ore Co. of Canada; C. Ritchie, Montreal, Quebec, vice president and general manager of Montreal Engineering Company Limited; Fletcher S. Smith, Halifax, Nova Scotia, A. M. Smith & Company Limited; H. S. Sutherland, Montreal, Quebec, president of Shawinigan Chemicals Limited; R. B. Taylor, Hamilton, Ontario, vice president and treasurer of The Steel Company of Canada Limited; F. Homer Zwicker, Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, president and managing director of Zwicker & Company Limited.

2. Please see page 11202 for answer to question No. 2.

3. Montreal and Toronto.

4. The volume of contact work in Vancouver does not justify the salaries and expenses involved in maintaining a branch office in Vancouver. The corporation is represented by the west coast office of the Department of Trade and Commerce in Vancouver.

MEDICAL SERVICES, MILLBROOK INDIAN RESERVE, N.S.

Question No. 2,326—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1954, what is the name of each medical doctor who attended Indians on the Millbrook Indian reserve in Nova Scotia and the dates upon which each such doctor assumed his duties with respect to the said reserve?

2. Are Indians on the said reserve free to attend a doctor of their own choosing and, if so, will any medical bills so incurred be paid by any branch or agency of the government?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. The following are the physicians designated by the Department of National Health and Welfare for attendance to the medical needs of the Indians of the Millbrook reserve near Truro, Nova Scotia: Doctor J. B. Reid Sr., from world war II until his death in the fall of 1954; Doctor J. B. Reid Jr., 1954 to December 31, 1958; Doctor R. F. Ross, January 1, 1959 to September 30, 1963; Doctor J. B. Reid Jr., October 1, 1963 to the present.

2. Indians, like any other Canadian citizens, are free to make whatsoever arrangements they choose for their own medical care. However, when a Canadian Indian wishes to receive necessary medical care at public expense, he is expected to follow the arrangements which have been made by the Department of National Health and Welfare. It should be noted that in emergencies and other unusual situations a certain amount of leeway is permitted the Indian in obtaining urgently required medical attention.

REPAIRS TO C.C.G.S. "WOLFE"

Question No. 2,328—Mr. MacEwan:

1. Were tenders called for repairs on C.C.G.S. Wolfe?

2. What firms were asked to bid and what were the amounts of their bids?

3. To what firm was the contract awarded?

4. In what period of time will the work be completed?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes.

2. Saint John Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Co. Ltd., $13,146; Purdy Bros., Halifax, $14,904; Ferguson Industries Ltd., Pictou, N.S., $19,436; Steel & Engine Products, Liverpool, N.S., $20,558; Halifax Shipyards, $22,810.

3. Saint John Shipbuilding and Drydock Co. Ltd.

4. Eight days.

REFIT OF C.C.G.S. "SAUREL"

Question No. 2,330—Mr. MacEwan:

1. Were tenders called for the supplementary to annual refit of C.C.G.S. Saurel?

2. Where had the C.C.G.S. Saurel been operating during the last six months?

3. What firms were asked to tender and what was the amount of each tender?

4. To what firm was the contract awarded?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1, 3 and 4. The need for supplementary work on any particular refit becomes apparent only after the ship is in the hands of the commercial firm doing the work and the machinery is opened up or the hull exposed. In order to return the ship to operational service, it is, therefore, necessary to carry out immediately any additional work thus revealed and this must be arranged for by negotiation as an extra to the original contract. The original contract was let by tender to J. R. Weir Ltd., Montreal.

2. Upper St. Lawrence river.

REPAIRS TO C.C.G.S. "EIDER"

Question No. 2,331—Mr. MacEwan:

1. Were tenders called for supplementary refit and supplementary to dry-docking damage repairs to C.C.G.S. Eider?

2. What type of ship is the C.C.G.S. Eider and where has it been operating during the last six months?

3. What firms were asked to tender and what was the amount of each tender?

4. To what firm was the contract awarded?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1, 3 and 4. The need for supplementary work on any particular refit becomes apparent only after the ship is in the hands of the commercial firm doing the work and the machinery is opened up or the hull exposed. In order to return the ship to operational service, it is, therefore, necessary to carry out immediately any additional work thus revealed and this must be arranged for by negotiation as an extra to the original contract. The original contract was let by tender to Marine Industries Ltd., Sorel, P.Q.

2. (a) Northern supply vessel, (b) Hudson bay and Labrador coast.

REFIT OF H.M.C.S. "ALGONQUIN"

Question No. 2,332—Mr. MacEwan:

1. Were tenders called for the refit, repairs or conversion of H.M.C.S. Algonquin and, if not, to what firm was this work allocated?

2. If tenders were called, what were the names of the tenderers and the amount of each tender for refit or conversion of H.M.C.S. Algonquin?

3. To what firm was the contract awarded and is the contract amount a firm price?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): 1 and 2. Tenders were not called for the refit, repairs or conversion of H.M.C.S. Algonquin.

This work was allocated to Marine Industries Limited, Sorel, P.Q.

3. The contract was awarded in November 1964 to Marine Industries Limited. The contract provides a target incentive with ceiling price for labour and materials, and a firm price for overhead and fee.

EFFECT OF INSECTICIDE PHOSPHAMIDON ON WILDLIFE

Question No. 2,334—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Is the government aware of surveys made for the Canadian wildlife service on the effects of the use of the insecticide phosphamidon in New Brunswick?

2. Did the survey report that a large number of birds were killed in the area sprayed by phosphamidon?

3. Is the government considering the banning of the use of phosphamidon at least until further testing is done?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): 1. Yes, Dr. C. D. Fowle, head, department of biology, York University, Toronto, carried out surveys for the Canadian wildlife service on the use of phosphamidon in New Brunswick in 1964. Dr. Fowle has submitted a preliminary report, the contents of which were presented to the interdepartmental committee on forest spraying operations on October 27.

2. The data obtained by Dr. Fowle indicated a marked reduction in bird song and activity and in numbers of birds seen following the spraying of phosphamidon at the rate of one half pound per three quarters of a United States gallon per acre. Numbers of dead and sick birds were found by the investigators as well as by residents of the area; however, some of the sick birds recovered.

3. The government regarded the use of phosphamidon in 1964 as experimental. Results of the 1964 experiments suggest that phosphamidon applied at the lesser rate of one quarter pound per three quarters of a United States gallon per acre or phosphamidon plus a penetrant applied at one half pound per acre do not seriously affect bird or fish populations. The governmental agencies responsible for assessing the effects of forest spraying operations in New Brunswick are presently considering the 1965 program; however, no decision has yet been made.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS TO G. A. BOULET LTD.

Question No. 2,336—Mr. Douglas:

1. How many contracts has G. A. Boulet, Limitée St. Tite, Co. Laviolette, P.Q., received from the Department of National Defence in 1962, 1963 and 1964?

[Mr. Drury.]

2. Was G. A. Boulet, Limitée the low bidder on all such contracts and, if not, what was the bid submitted by G. A. Boulet, Limitée, and who submitted the lowest bid and for what amount?

3. What contracts is G. A. Boulet, Limitée working on at the present time?

4. Is a strike in progress at the G. A. Boulet, Limitée plant?

5. Does the government know if the reason for the strike is the refusal of G. A. Boulet, Limitée to bargain with their employees?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. 1962, 1; 1963, 4; 1964, nil.

2. Yes.

3. Contract GK.18-351044 for dress shoes, contract GK.20-351915 for dress shoes.

4. Not at the present time. It is understood there was a strike at this plant between August 20 and September 11, 1964.

5. This dispute is under provincial legislation. To the best of our knowledge some bargaining did take place prior to the strike but was terminated by the company.

TELEVISION STATION CFCF, MONTREAL—PROMISES ON OBTAINING LICENCE

Question No. 2,337—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Did the successful applicants for the private t.v. channel in Montreal (CFCF) promise the B.B.G. that if successful in getting the t.v. rights for Montreal they would devote certain percentages of their programming to educational programs, children's programs, public affairs programs, drama programs and, if so (a) what percentages of programming were allocated to each of the above types of program (b) since beginning operation, what proportion of CFCF's programming has actually been devoted to the above types of program?

2. Did the successful applicants for the private t.v. channel in Montreal (CFCF) promise the B.B.G. that if successful in getting the t.v. rights for Montreal they would devote a certain percentage of their prime viewing time to programs qualifying as having Canadian content and, if so (a) what percentage of Canadian content programs did they promise to provide (b) what percentage of Canadian content programming has station CFCF provided since they began operations?

3. Did the successful applicants for the private t.v. channel in Montreal (CFCF) promise the B.B.G. that if successful in getting the t.v. rights for Montreal they would devote a specific percentage of their programming to local live Canadian programming and, if so (a) how much time and what percentage of the total was promised to the B.B.G. (b) how much local live Canadian programming has station CFCF provided since it began operations?

4. Did the successful applicants for the private t.v. channel in Montreal (CFCF) promise the B.B.G. that if successful in getting the t.v. rights for Montreal they would devote their morning televising, if any, to some form of educational television in association with Sir George Williams University and, if so (a) is station CFCF televising in the mornings (b) how much educational television has station CFCF televised since it began operations?

Questions

Answer: 1. In their brief the applicants indicated that they planned to devote certain percentages of their programming to educational, children's, public affairs, and drama programs. (a) The following percentages were allocated: Educational, 7.8 per cent; children's, 14.8 per cent; public affairs, 5.8 per cent; drama, 38.7 per cent. (b) The board does not keep a continuous detailed record of the material broadcast by the station since it began operating and is not, therefore, able to provide the information requested.

2. The applicants proposed to devote a certain percentage of their prime viewing time to programs having Canadian content. (a) The applicants proposed 55.7 per cent. (b) The board does not keep a continuous detailed record of the material broadcast by the station since it began operating and is not, therefore, able to provide the information requested. The station has, however, continuously met the regulations of the board governing Canadian content in prime time.

3. (a) In their brief the applicants indicated that they planned to devote 53.6 per cent of their programming to local live Canadian programming. (b) The board does not keep a continuous detailed record of the material broadcast by the station since it began operating and is not, therefore, able to provide the information requested.

4. No. In their presentation at the public hearing the applicants made the following statement:

As to what use we might put such morning time on a permanent basis when we would expand back into the morning hours, I don't think there is any category—any single category—under which that program would fall. Morning time would lend itself to, and we have had discussions already, particularly with Sir George Williams University—it would lend itself very well to some form of educational television. As a matter of fact Sir George has been studying with some interest the experience of the group in California which is, in fact, doing television education on a very formal basis, and presenting courses for which credits are approved. We would see morning programming as being general programming, family programming, and with some educational material.

(a) Yes. (b) The board does not keep a continuous detailed record of the material broadcast by the station since it began operating and is not, therefore, able to provide the information requested.

WAGES OF CLEANERS, SAGE SITE, NORTH BAY

Question No. 2,338—Mr. Douglas:

1. What was the rate of pay for cleaner service men at the SAGE site in North Bay as of January, 1964?

2. Have any people employed as a cleaner service man received less than the amount advertised in civil service circulars?

3. Did civil service circulars advertising the position of cleaner service man indicate a wage increase every six months until a maximum was reached?

4. Have all cleaner service men received their wage increase at the end of each six month period?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): The following information in answer to parts 1 and 3 of question No. 2,338 has been supplied by the civil service commission and relates to competition 63-0-617, cleaning service men, government departmen in January 1964 were $2,900, $3,050, $3,200, $3,350, $3,500. These rates were in effect from October 1, 1963.

1. The salary rates for all cleaning service men in January 1964 were $2,900, $3,050, $3,200, $3,350, $3,500. These rates were in effect from October 1, 1963.

2. No.

3. A civil service circular advertising positions of cleaning service man in departments at North Bay, indicated the salary as $2,850 to $3,300 with semi-annual increases up to $3,150 and one annual increase to the maximum of $3,300. This circular was issued prior to October 1, 1963, and therefore did not quote the rates mentioned in answer 1, above.

4. No, one cleaning service man was denied an increase October 1, 1964 as he was not performing the duties of his position satisfactorily.

PAYMENTS UNDER CONTRACT, MOORE'S TAXI, WINNIPEG

Question No. 2,340—Mr. Cowan:

What are the dates of payments and the amounts received each time by the Department of Transport from Moore's Taxi Ltd. under the contract with the Department of Transport covering ground service transportation between Stevenson field and Winnipeg, from April 1961 to November 1, 1964?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport):

CONTRACT TO MOORE'S TAXI, WINNIPEG AIRPORT

Question No. 2,380—Mr. Orlikow:

1. When was the contract between the Department of Transport and Moore's Taxi Ltd., giving that company exclusive rights to pick up passengers at the Winnipeg international airport signed?
2. Were tenders called before the contract was awarded and, if so, how many companies tendered and, if not, for what reasons were tenders not called?
3. What are the terms of the contract?
4. Has the Department of Transport received any complaints that the provisions of the contract are not being lived up to?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. October 1962.

2. The company had been operating the concession under authority of the Winnipeg-St. James airport commission. Since the company already had a licence from the provincial motor carrier board and on the strength of a strong recommendation from the air lines the department negotiated the present contract with the company.

3. The contract is for a period of five years effective January 1, 1962. Under the contract the company paid the department a fixed fee of $500 per month for the period January 1 to March 31, 1962; thereafter the company paid the department 10 per cent of gross revenue. Recently the department renegotiated the payment clause whereby the company will pay the department the following fixed annual amounts: 1964, $10,000; 1965, $11,000; 1966, $12,000.

4. No.

STUDY OF CRAB FISHERY, NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 2,386—Mr. Barnett:

1. Has the Department of Fisheries investigated and come to any conclusion concerning the possibilities of establishing a commercial fishery for deep sea red crab along the continental shelf in the waters offshore from Nova Scotia southward?
2. If not, is such a study contemplated, either by the department itself or in conjunction with the U.S. bureau of commercial fisheries and, if such a study has revealed possibilities for a commercial fishery, what steps are being taken to assist the establishment of a deep trawling operation?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): 1. Deep sea red crab is unknown. The spider crab exists in gulf of St. Lawrence waters. The department is experimenting in use of various types of traps for taking of this species, particularly in the vicinity of Magdalen islands and Anticosti island, with the object of lengthening the season of operation and earnings of lobster fishermen. The common rock crab is indigenous to inshore waters from Labrador to South Carolina. No investigation as to its commercial potential is being carried on.

2. Answered by No. 1.

FEDERAL BUILDING, JOLIETTE, QUE.

EMPLOYMENT FOR PERSONNEL OF JOLIETTE REGIMENT

Question No. 2,389—Mr. Pigeon:

Does the government intend to provide employment for persons who worked as guards or in other capacities for the Joliette regiment prior to its disbandment?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): The disbandment of the Joliette regiment will affect 16 civilian watchmen and three caretakers part time. The watchmen are casual employees employed under section 88 of the civil service regulations and are not eligible for transfer into other positions in the civil service.

The caretakers part time will, in all likelihood, be kept on pending termination of leases. It is not possible to offer them alternative employment at this time because of the location of these armouries. Their names will be placed on civil service commission lay-off lists and they will be given consideration by the commission for re-instatement should suitable vacancies occur.

Arising out of the investigation into bankruptcy frauds now in progress in Montreal, has the government secured any information showing that the records and documents connected with bankruptcy proceedings by Max and Adolph Sefkind and/or their companies disclose contributions for campaign purposes to any cabinet ministers or other members of parliament, and, if so, to whom and in what amounts?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): The government does not have, on its own files, nor has it secured, arising out of investigation into bankruptcy frauds now in progress in Montreal, any information showing that the records and documents connected with bankruptcy proceedings by Max and Adolph Sefkind and/or their companies disclose contributions for campaign purposes to any cabinet ministers or other members of parliament.

ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW DRUG MANUFACTURING COMPANIES

Question No. 2,425—Mr. Mather:

Do regulations administered by the food and drug directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Industry or any other federal agency control the establishment of new drug manufacturing companies and the sale of their products and, if not, is consideration being given to the inauguration of a licensing system making the registration of such firms mandatory?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): In so far as the Department of Industry is concerned there are no regulations that control the establishment of new drug manufacturing companies or the sale of their products and the department is not aware of such regulations administered by other federal agencies. No consideration is being given by the Department of Industry at the present time to the inauguration of a licensing system.

There are no regulations administered by the food and drug directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare which control the establishment of new drug manufacturing companies. However, drug manufacturing facilities and control, as well as the drug products, are subject to the requirements of the Food and Drugs Act and regulations. Certain injectables, such as liver extract injectable and insulin, listed in schedule C to the Food and Drugs Act, and other products such as living vaccines for oral or parenteral use and antibiotics for parenteral use, listed in schedule D to the Food and Drugs Act, may only be manufactured by the manufacturer to whom a licence has been issued.

Consideration is being given to a system under which it would be mandatory for all pharmaceutical manufacturers to supply the food and drug directorate with a list of all the drug products which they manufacture.

Indian agency or any other officer of the Indian affairs branch hold any meetings with, attend any meetings of, or in any way discuss with any of the Indian bands or Indian people in the said agency the provisions of Bill C-130 introduced during the 1963 session of parliament, and if so, did the said superintendent or other officer record the opinions of the said band or bands or Indian people and were these opinions transmitted or forwarded directly or indirectly to the Indian affairs branch, or any other department or branch of government in Ottawa?

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): No.

Questions

STATUS OF F.L.Q. MEMBERS SENTENCED TO JAIL

Question No. 2,531—Mr. MacRae:

What is the present status of the five members of the front de libération Quebecois who were sentenced to prison after the so called letter box bombings in Westmount in 1963?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): One member of the front de libération Quebecois was paroled on November 18, 1964, under the provisions of the Parole Act and five others are inmates in federal penitentiaries in the province of Quebec.

PROSECUTION OF TAXI DRIVER, WINNIPEG

Question No. 2,535—Mr. Cowan:

What progress is being made by the government in its prosecution of Gabriel Robert Johnson, the taxicab driver who has been accused of picking up a fare at Stevenson field, Winnipeg, despite a monopoly contract given to Moore's taxi service in that city?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): On December 7 the Manitoba court of appeal upheld a ruling of the trial magistrate rejecting a preliminary objection by the defence, and the matter has been referred back to the magistrate's court for plea and hearing.

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING ONOFRIO MINAUDO

Question No. 2,536—Mr. Scott:

1. What correspondence was received from (a) His Honour Judge Bruce J. S. McDonald, chairman of the Ontario police commission, or (b) attorney general of Ontario by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in regard to one, Onofrio Minaudo?

2. What were the dates of such letters?

3. What reply, if any, was made to these letters, and when?

4. Did the letters disclose to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration the criminal record of the said Minaudo?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): 1. Two letters dated November 18, 1963, and December 12, 1963, from His Honour Judge Bruce J. S. McDonald addressed to Hon. Guy Favreau, minister of citizenship and immigration, and one letter from Mr. F. M. Cass, attorney general of Ontario, dated January 13, 1964, addressed to Hon. Guy Favreau, minister of citizenship and immigration.

2. See answer to number 1.

3. Reply by Hon. R. Tremblay, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, on March 12, 1964, to Mr. Percy Milligan, Q.C., who had succeeded His Honour Judge Bruce J. S. McDonald indicating that Minaudo had been deported to Italy on March 11, 1964. A similar letter was also sent to Mr. Cass by Mr. Tremblay on the same date.

4. The letters from His Honour Judge Bruce J. S. McDonald and Mr. Cass did not disclose the criminal record of Minaudo. (However, they did indicate that some police authorities considered Minaudo a friend and associate of persons believed to be engaged in crime in Michigan, U.S.A. The letter from Mr. Cass indicated that Judge McDonald was anxious to ascertain the status of Minaudo, whether a visitor or immigrant to this country.)

GUISEPPE CATALANOTTE—RESIDENCE IN CANADA

Question No. 2,537—Mr. Scott:

1. When did Guiseppe Catalanotte, one-time resident of 288 Hall avenue, Windsor, Ontario, enter Canada?

2. Did he have an immigrant or non-immigrant visa?

3. Was he granted a visa in December 1961 and, if so, for what period?

4. Was any order made for his deportation and, if so, what was the date of the said order?

5. What action was taken to execute the said order and was any warrant issued for his apprehension?

6. When was the last record of his having resided in Canada?

7. When was the Department of Citizenship and Immigration informed of his convictions in the United States of threats of extortion, gambling, and narcotics offences?

8. When was the government informed that the said Catalanotte had been ordered to be deported by the United States?

9. Was the government aware of his association in Cuba with one Onofrio Minaudo?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): 1. The immigration file discloses that Guiseppe Catalanotte entered Canada at Malton airport on May 15, 1958, at Dorval airport on May 27, 1958, and at Malton airport on October 21, 1961.

2. On each of these three occasions he was in possession of a non-immigrant visa.

3. No. The non-immigrant visa which he obtained to gain entry in 1961 was issued on October 18, 1961. A Canadian non-immigrant visa is made valid for presentation at a Canadian port of entry for a prescribed period. The visa itself is not valid for any period of temporary stay in Canada. The period of stay to be authorized can only be determined by the examining immigration officer at the Canadian port of entry.

4. Yes. September 24, 1964.

5. Deportation was effected to Italy under escort on November 5, 1964. Warrants for his apprehension and arrest had been issued on 14 July, 1958, 13 January, 1961, and 20 March, 1964.

6. November 5, 1964.

7. On June 26, 1958, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration was informed of this man's criminal record which included convictions in the United States for threats of extortion and illegal possession of narcotics.

8. June 26, 1958.

9. Yes.

DEPORTATION OF ONOFRIO MINAUDO

Question No. 2,538—Mr. Brewin:

1. Was one Onofrio Minaudo, deported from Canada on or about the 11th of March, 1964?

2. When was the order of deportation made?

3. What were the reasons for the order?

4. When did the same Onofrio Minaudo enter Canada and when he entered Canada did he have an immigrant or a non-immigrant visa?

5. Is the said Onofrio Minaudo the same person who lived at 301 Belleperche street in Riverside, Ontario, and was the said Minaudo deported from the United States?

6. Was the said Minaudo convicted in absentia in Italy on charges of murder, armed robbery and double murder and sentenced to 30 years to life imprisonment?

7. Was the said Minaudo convicted when working for one Santo Peronne on conspiracy to violate the state labour law and fined $1,000 with two years' probation?

8. Was the Department of Citizenship and Immigration made aware of his association with the Detroit Mafia?

9. Who, if anyone, made representations on behalf of the said Onofrio Minaudo in connection with his deportation or status in Canada?

10. When was the fact that the said Onofrio Minaudo was resident in Canada first called to the attention of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): 1. Yes, on March 11, 1964.

2. February 9, 1961.

3. Section 19(1)(e)(ix) of the Immigration Act in that he returned to or remained in Canada contrary to the provisions of the Immigration Act after a deportation order had been made against him.

4. The immigration file discloses that Minaudo entered Canada at Malton airport on May 22, 1955, June 24, 1956 and on June 25, 1960. On each occasion, he was in possession of a non-immigrant visa.

5. Yes.

6. Yes, however, no request for extradition was ever received and the sentences were later declared prescribed.

7. Yes.

8. The department was aware of allegations to this effect.

9. Mr. Ross Riddell, Q.C., of Windsor, Ontario, as solicitor for Minaudo from time to time between 1957-1961; the late D. F. Brown, M.P. for Essex West, in 1957; Mr. R. D. Thrasher, M.P. for Essex South, in 1958; Mr. Paul Martin, M.P. for Essex East, in 1960-61; subsequently, in September 1963, after being advised of information not previously known to him about Minaudo, he informed the minister that he wished to be dissociated from representations concerning the case; Mr. Bryce Monaghan, chief of police, Riverside, Ontario, in February 1961, also later withdrawn.

10. The fact that Minaudo was resident in Canada was first called to the attention of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in 1956.

OLD AGE PENSIONERS PREVIOUSLY RECEIVING OLD AGE ASSISTANCE

Question No. 2,540—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

Of those who became eligible for the old age pension in the year ended March 31, 1964, what percentage had previously been receiving old age assistance?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 25.03 per cent.

CENSUS ENUMERATION, 1964

Question No. 2,541—Mr. McBain:

1. Did the government in November, 1964, conduct a census enumeration through the dominion bureau of statistics or is it now conducting one in December and, if so, what is the nature of the enumeration?

2. Where are these census tests being conducted?

3. How many persons are employed in these tests?

4. Were these persons selected through the national employment service and, if not, how were they selected?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. The dominion bureau of statistics is now conducting a test in preparation of the 1966 census of population. The enumeration portion commenced on November 25 and involves testing some new operational procedures and the questionnaire.

2. A section of the central part of the city of Ottawa.

3. Thirty eight.

4. No. Two were selected by the dominion bureau of statistics to act as census commissioners and the balance were selected on the basis of a test prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics and administered by the census commissioners. This procedure is similar to that used in previous censuses and is in accordance with section 5 (1) of the Statistics Act.

RENTAL OF KALADAR BUILDING, OTTAWA

Question No. 2,542—Mr. Douglas:

1. Has the federal government rented the Kaladar building on Kaladar street, Ottawa, and if so, from whom did it rent the building?
2. For what purpose is this building being used?
3. What annual rental is being paid by the federal government for this building?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes, from Kaladar Realties Limited, Ottawa, effective April 1, 1961.

2. Accommodation for the Canadian government exhibition commission of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

3. $88,500 per annum for an area of 76,000 square feet.

N.C.C. PROPERTY PURCHASE, OTTAWA

Question No. 2,546—Mr. Douglas:

What was the price paid by the national capital commission for property on Boteler street, Ottawa that had belonged to Zelikovitz Bros.?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): The national capital commission paid Zelikovitz Bros. Limited $215,000. This amount represented compensation for acquisition by the national capital commission of the lease which the company had with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for property on Boteler street, Ottawa, plus business disturbance, the value of immovable equipment and for the value of the buildings on the property.

N.C.C. PROPERTY SALE, OTTAWA

Question No. 2,547—Mr. Douglas:

What was the selling price per acre for land on the Innes road, Ottawa, sold by the national capital commission to Zelikovitz Bros.?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): The national capital commission did not sell any land on the Innes road, Ottawa, to Zelikovitz Bros. Limited.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—STORM DAMAGE TO WHARVES

Question No. 2,551—Mr. Coates:

What action is the Minister of Public Works taking to determine the degree of damage to wharfage facilities in the Atlantic provinces as a result of recent storms, and what action is planned to effect immediate repairs to these facilities?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Officials of the department are now carrying out investigations to determine the damage, if any, caused to wharfage facilities in the Atlantic provinces by recent storms. Emergency repairs which may be required will be undertaken without delay.

HEATING SYSTEM, SPRINGHILL PENAL INSTITUTION

Question No. 2,554—Mr. Coates:

What type of heating system will be installed in the young offenders penal institution at Springhill and what type of fuel will be used to fire the heating system in question?

ESTABLISHMENT OF REHABILITATION WORKSHOP, SASKATOON

Question No. 2,559—Mrs. Jones:

Anticipating a national program of assistance based on the recommendations of the Hall commission to provide partial rehabilitation and occupational help to those with permanent mental and physical handicaps, would the government try to determine the most effective means of ultimately providing this assistance by immediately allocating a special grant to establish in Saskatoon a sheltered workshop as a pilot project?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Minister of National Health and Welfare would be glad sympathetically to consider the question of federal assistance for this project when the details are available. Certain aspects of developments of this nature may come within the terms of reference of the national health grants or other federal programs. It would be necessary to have a detailed project to determine the most appropriate manner of providing federal assistance, if the project qualifies for support.

BILINGUAL ANNOUNCEMENTS, RADIO STATION C.B.A., SACKVILLE, N.B.

Question No. 2,562—Mr. Coates:

What is the explanation for C.B.A. radio Sackville, N.B. announcing station identification and news broadcasts in both French and English?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that the announcements in both languages occur after midnight during the all night service when C.B.A. carries the program and news service common to all stations across Canada, connected to the emergency broadcasting network.

TRANSLATION OF OLD AGE PENSION APPLICATIONS, TORONTO

Question No. 2,563—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

When applications for the old age pension are submitted to the Toronto office of the Department of National Health and Welfare, accompanied by supporting documents in French, are these documents sent to Ottawa for translation and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The policy of the old age security division of the Department of National Health and Welfare is to have French language documents translated locally in regional offices. Only under unusual circumstances would such documents be sent to Ottawa for translation.

TELEPHONE LISTING OF RAYMOND DENIS

Question No. 2,566—Mr. Coates:

As the Minister of Justice stated that Raymond Denis left the employment of the ministry of citizenship and immigration "on or about October 1", what is the explanation for Raymond Denis being listed on the private telephone listing of staff of cabinet ministers as executive assistant to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration on October 7th, 1964?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The listing of the names and telephone numbers of the staffs of cabinet ministers is prepared periodically in the Prime Minister's office for the convenience of ministers and departments. A routine revision was prepared during the last week of September 1964. At that time Mr. Denis was still nominally on the strength of the minister's office although he had not served in it after he had been given leave on August 31.

REQUEST FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF HALL COMMISSION REPORT

Question No. 2,576—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

Has the government received representations from the Port Coquitlam New Democratic party club, supported by 546 signatures, requesting immediate implementation of the recommendations of the Hall commission report, and, if so, what has been the reply?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes. The reply of the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated that 14 committees in the department are engaged in a detailed study and analysis of the Hall commission report; referred to the constitutional responsibilities which the separate provinces have in the health field which necessitate very close collaboration between the federal government and the provincial governments in the formulation of a national health plan; and reiterated the government's announced aim to be in a position to present its proposals to the provinces early in the new year.

SUBSIDY PAID FOR VESSEL CONSTRUCTION

Question No. 2,577—Mr. Tucker:

What was the total amount paid by the Canadian maritime commission for the construction of vessels for the fiscal years ended (a) March 31, 1962 (b) March 31, 1963 (c) March 31, 1964, and (d) since April 1, 1964?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Canadian maritime commission advises as follows: (a) March 31, 1962, $2,025,261.36; (b) March 31, 1963, $22,500,000; (c) March 31 1964, $40,000,000; (d) since April 1, 1964, $19,130,384.37.

PURCHASES OF FURNITURE

Question No. 2,579—Mr. Winkler:

1. How many purchases of furniture have been made by the government since April 1963?
2. From what firms was this furniture purchased and what was the amount of each purchase?
3. Were tenders called for each order?
4. Who writes the tenders for these orders?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Question No. 2,579 covers perhaps a dozen government departments as well as crown agencies. As far as the public work department is concerned, it is impossible to answer this question now because of the tremendous amount of research involved, and I am told by my officials, that unless this question is clarified, it would take 300 man days of work, in Ottawa only, to answer the question as drafted.

This being said, the Department of Public Works reports that since April 1963, there was no purchase of any kind from the companies controlled or managed by the Sefkind brothers, and they never even bid on any tender calls for furniture.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO EASTER ISLAND INVESTIGATION

Question No. 2,303—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

What has been the government contribution, financial or otherwise, to the current Canadian investigation of Easter Island?

Return tabled.

SCHOOLS ATTENDED BY INDIAN CHILDREN

Question No. 2,307—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many Indian children in each Canadian province were attending the following types of elementary schools in each of the past ten years (a) Indian residential schools (b) segregated day schools for Indian students (c) public or separate schools in the regular school systems?
2. How many Indian children in each Canadian province were attending the following types of high schools in each of the past ten years (a) Indian residential schools (b) segregated day schools for Indian students (c) public or separate schools in the regular school systems?

Return tabled.

FEDERAL CONTRACTS TO HALIFAX SHIPYARDS

Question No. 2,317—Mr. Coates:

What is the total amount of contracts awarded to Halifax shipyards by the federal government for the fiscal years from 1957-58 to 1963-64 and the total amount of awards to date for the fiscal year 1964-65?

Return tabled.

FOOD SUPPLIERS FOR C.C.G.S. "ALEXANDER MACKENZIE"

Question No. 2,341—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1962 what are the names of each food supplier in Prince Rupert, B.C. who provided (a) meats, and (b) other foodstuffs, for the H.M.C.S. Alexander MacKenzie and for each month, how much money was paid to each such food supplier?
2. Are tenders called for the supplying of such provisions to the Alexander MacKenzie and, if so, when was the latest tender called and who were the bidders and the amounts of the bids and, if not, why were tenders not called?

Return tabled.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in connection with questions. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) can speak for himself, but his question No. 1,214 dealing with the C.B.C. has been on the order paper since June 3. Question No. 1,642 asked by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Enns) and also dealing with the C.B.C. has been on the order paper since July 31. Question No. 1,705, asked by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Madill) and again dealing with the C.B.C., has been on the order paper since August 12. The delay in replying to those questions is inexcusable and cannot be justified in any way.

I would also point out that starred question No. 1,889 asked by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates) and dealing with the flag question has been on the order paper since September 9. No matter how many questions are answered, the fact remains that the failure to provide answers to these questions cannot be justifiably explained away, and in particular those questions respecting the C.B.C.

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege may I say that there has been discussion with the three members who asked questions concerning the C.B.C., and I believe all three members understand the difficulties—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are the difficulties?

Mr. Stewart: —which are involved. In one or two instances there was difficulty in getting in touch with the hon. members.

CANADIAN COMMONWEALTH FLAG

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SEVENTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, December 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Batten that the seventh and final report of the special committee on a Canadian flag presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton).

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, as a member from the province of Quebec and the representative in this house of a riding whose population is more than 75 per cent French speaking, I feel I should express my views on the debate under way, and especially on the motion for concurrence in the seventh report of the flag committee asking us to recognize the union jack, the union flag, as the symbol of our membership in the commonwealth and our allegiance to the crown.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to restrict my remarks to the amendment now before us, and I hope that you will appreciate that most of the points I will make will apply to the original report as well as to the Conservative amendment.

All through the flag debate the Liberal members were blamed for their silence and it has been said that we were muzzled, that we were afraid to stand up, as the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Fane) said last Thursday, while it was very well known that there was, within our party, a very great unanimity on the matter, and not only a virtual majority, to use the words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

The same thing applies to the seventh report. We needed only a few speeches to express the general opinion, and as other speakers could refute the numerous false accusations from the opposition, we were quite satisfied to listen patiently to the Conservatives and their nonsense.

Just imagine, if every member had made an average of three speeches, we would still have to listen to them until Easter, and that without interruption.

The great majority of the population, and even the press, are unanimous in saying that the official opposition has abused freedom of speech and that it will certainly be judged on its attitude and be held responsible for having tarnished the image of parliament—

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

We are now on an amendment to the seventh report. The hon. member who has the floor has no right to speak of our activity during the debate on the sixth report.

Mr. Laniel: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will have patience for two or three seconds, I think he will be satisfied.

Mr. Speaker, some people claimed that the flag itself was but another concession to the province of Quebec; this is entirely false.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Laniel: I do not intend to dwell on that matter—

[Text]

You listen to what I want to say.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is patently out of order. We are discussing an amendment concerning the red ensign, which has been moved to the motion dealing with the seventh report, and whether or not we are going to adopt it. The hon. member is patently out of order and he should be brought to order.

Mr. Speaker: Well, I have listened very carefully and I must say that the hon. member was a little wide of the mark, but I understand he is now coming back on the rails.

[Translation]

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Speaker, I was saying that I did not intend to dwell on that matter.

Now that we are on the seventh report and the amendment moved in that regard, we are told that the Liberal members have to pay the price for the adoption of a distinctive national flag by adopting this seventh report. I hasten to deny that, and this applies to the seventh report as well as to the amendment.

Yesterday, we gave ourselves a distinctive national flag which will be the pride of all Canadians, a flag they will be able to salute and fly it with honour—

Mr. Grafftey: Why two flags?

Mr. Rock: You are for the red ensign.

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Speaker, let me say that the English speaking Liberal members are precisely those who put on the most pressure —I would even say all the pressure—on the Prime Minister in order that this distinctive national flag measure be brought forward this year.

We, the Quebec members, wanted, of course a distinctive flag, but we also hoped that our feelings in this regard would be shared by all members from the other provinces. And today we are most happy to say to the people across Canada that we are glad to have placed our confidence in them.

Mr. Grafftey: Explain it to the Quebec voters.

Mr. Laniel: I would ask the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi to explain to his own voters why he abstained when one of the last votes were taken on the flag.

Mr. Grafftey: But you are not answering my question.

Mr. Laniel: We are now considering the motion for the adoption of the final report of the flag committee constituted by unanimous decision of the house. Mr. Speaker, in spite of the Conservative amendment, I believe we should ask ourselves two questions:

1. Does our country need this second standard, emblem or symbol of our membership in the commonwealth of nations and our fidelity to the Queen of Canada?
2. Would the union jack or the red ensign or something else be a more proper symbol?

The first spontaneous reaction of many people is to ask why we should consider the adoption of a second flag now that we are on the verge of having a distinctive national flag, particularly in view of the following facts.

Canada is recognized as a self-governing and independent country and we are steadily on the way to achieving nationhood; our central government, in co-operation with the ten provincial governments, has agreed upon a formula to amend our Canadian constitution, a fact which should soon lead to its repatriation; and, with the growing pains we are going through at the present time, we witnessed the development of a Canadian spirit which a better dialogue, at the federal-provincial level, has definitely promoted.

In short, we become better Canadians, we are more concerned with the future of our country, with Canadian unity, without for all that forgetting our origins, even though they have much less importance in this country.

I would venture here to quote from two articles published in the Montreal Star on December 15. First, here is the conclusion of an editorial headed: "Enough is Enough". I quote:

[Text]

What this country has wanted is a flag. The particular design was not that important. What it has got after 97 years is a flag, and we should be proud of it. A new generation with new ideas has taken over. Mr. Pearson has shown himself a contemporary figure.

[Translation]

The second item is by Peter Newman, of the same newspaper. It is headed: "Transfer of Power", and I quote:

[Text]

The debate which marked a turning point in the evolution of our nationhood: The transfer of power from one generation of Canadians to the next.

[Translation]

And further on, Mr. Newman—

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member is reading from an editorial on the sixth report of the flag committee. I insist that the hon. member be called to order, for he should be dealing with the amendment to the seventh report of the flag committee now under consideration, and he is dealing with the sixth report of the committee.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest that hon. members leave it to the Chair to do the insisting.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I plead with the Chair and ask for a ruling immediately. The member is discussing in great detail the procedure with regard to the sixth report of the committee respecting a distinctive national flag. We are now discussing an amendment to the seventh report of the committee. We are now discussing whether we are going to have a second flag, and we are going to be very interested in learning whether the hon. member will support this amendment or whether he considers the union jack to be the flag of England. He must confine himself to this particular report. I was held very strictly to the seventh report yesterday.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have anything to contribute on this point?

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just been doing what you have forbidden during the last two or three days, the quoting of editorials.

Mr. Speaker: The point is well taken and I was about to mention it. The hon. member has anticipated the Chair.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Laniel: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, perhaps hon. members would think back to the two questions I asked. Did we need a second flag in this country to identify us as members of the commonwealth, and which one of the two flags should be chosen? We are becoming more Canadian at this time, and I am just presenting some facts found in editorials to prove that we are becoming more mature and more Canadian. I will be coming to the point in a moment. I do not see why they do not permit me to speak.

Mr. Speaker: I think the point is that a few days ago, if not last week, the Chair ruled that exact quotations from editorials giving opinions for or against various flags should not be used at this time, that members are here to give their own opinions and not to quote the opinions of others. If I remember correctly that was the exact ruling.

Mr. Laniel: If that is the only point I will put aside these statements and carry on with my own remarks.

[Translation]

All this goes to show, Mr. Speaker, that Canadianism has been substantially developed in recent years, even among English speaking Canadians. I might add, without wishing to offend anybody, that French speaking Canadians enjoy a certain advantage perhaps over the others when it comes to adapting oneself to those changes, to that evolution. Our ties with France were broken a long time ago. We have had to adapt ourselves to a world influenced to a great extent by British institutions. While we managed to keep our mother tongue, at the same time, we developed a personality of our own which is neither French nor British, one which I sometimes call the Canadian personality, having regard to the country itself, its history and its future.

As such, Mr. Speaker, as a French speaking Canadian and also as a Canadian in the proper meaning of the word, am I of the opinion, as an individual, that it is absolutely essential to recognize an official symbol of our membership in the commonwealth? I answer that it might not be absolutely necessary, but I am convinced that such a move is advisable.

I am aware that the house is far from being unanimous on this matter, but I think most Canadians will be pleased with this decision. This will provide us with something which will serve on certain occasions as a reminder of our associations with the member countries of a group of nations which has surely acquired an international renown; it will show our loyalty to the Queen and finally, will be a testimonial to our predecessors—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Laniel: I hear a member wailing over there—who succeeded in establishing and in maintaining in this country a democratic system which has protected everyone, the powerful and the weak, and has brought us peace and prosperity. One would have to be blind or dishonest to deny this.

As such, we should be proud to be members of the commonwealth. Is Her Majesty Elizabeth II the Queen of Canada or not, as well as the Queen of most of the commonwealth countries? Personally, I was proud that Her Majesty came to this country in October last, and I would add that I was thrilled to pay her my respects during her last visit in the capital. I am a Quebecker just the same, and nobody can refuse me the right to believe in our institutions and to respect them.

Mr. Speaker, would you kindly allow me to refer directly to the choice of the flag and to quote the words uttered by Hon. Jean Lesage on December 6 last? He said:

> The sad irony of it all is that actually, only those in favour of the 1867 status quo could have taken part in demonstrations against the Queen. Her very title shows that our country is master of its own destiny and that it has been decolonized. But, amidst the vociferations, it was not easy to understand the deep meaning and the lasting effect of a sentence spoken by the Queen in Quebec: "The role of the monarchy is to guarantee the execution of the will of the people".

Mr. Speaker, these last words correspond directly to my aspirations as a Canadian from the province of Quebec and I am not willing to sacrifice my country's future to agitators or to philosophies that could lead us I know not where.

The right hon. Prime Minister of Canada said:

> Patriotism by some does not exclude patriotism by others.

Therefore, I think it is possible for us to have different opinions or feelings on certain matters, but I think that we must be concerned with building, with preserving what we have, with seeking solutions that unite instead of dividing.

We have been accused of tearing down the red ensign; well, I say that we did not tear down anything; on the contrary, we have mainly made greater the national symbol that is our flag, we have replaced it by a standard that will strengthen and unite the country, and now that this has been done, I suggest that the distinctive national flag does not exclude other outward signs which may link us with our past and attest our institutions.

As I am convinced of this fact, I am sure that Quebeckers, when they salute our distinctive national flag, will not object to recognizing, beside it, under special circumstances, another symbol which, after all, has indirectly helped and contributed to lead us until now, in a Canada which is growing stronger from day to day.

However, I cannot accept the Conservative amendment, which makes me think that the official opposition is looking for some way to continue the fight on the flag which I believe to have lasted long enough, instead of joining those who stand for it, like the majority of Canadians will do.

We need unity. Therefore, let us act seriously, as true Canadians, and avoid any protraction of this fight which has lasted many months. This house has voted on a distinctive national flag, a standard which, in my opinion, meets the aspirations of the majority of Canadians and which we will soon see unfurled over all public buildings, over parliament buildings and also during any public demonstration throughout Canada. No one wishes to vilify or depreciate the red ensign, because it has served our country well. But it must give way before a purely Canadian flag, a symbol of national unity and a pledge of our future.

Some may be more inclined than others to use our second flag, besides our distinctive national flag, but, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that this will change with the years and that very shortly the maple leaf flag will be honoured, not only on public buildings, but in the hearts of all Canadians.

For this purpose, and also to avoid misuse of the flag which is proposed in the seventh report, I believe that the government, through an order in council, should define and set out the various circumstances under which the union jack could be flown besides our distinctive flag. This would not exclude its being used in other circumstances, but it would foresee doubtful situations and prevent criticism on the part of those who wish to deride the adoption of this second symbol which will identify us to the other nations of the commonwealth and recall our allegiance to our Queen. I hope that my suggestion will be taken into consideration and that the right hon. Prime Minister will implement it, once this seventh report is concurred in.

Coming back to the expression "price to pay", it is used mostly by those who do not want to make an effort to preserve national unity and I am strongly opposed to it. It is only meant to divide us and I say to those who use it that, if they insist on using it, I am ready to answer them in their own language and that I am ready to pay that price. The people in Quebec have paid a lot more before the present administration came into office, and it is in our own province that you will probably find the greatest understanding and the strongest wish to strengthen national unity.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) charged, in the course of the debate on the sixth report, that we had to rely on the Créditistes' support for most bills which we submitted to the house. I wish to point out to him that the group led by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) is not in the Liberal party's pay but that the sole purpose of its action is to serve its own election interests, without any consideration for anyone, not even national unity. The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), in the speech he made last night, was trying much more to ridicule than to find means to unify our country. He made fun of some words used in the report showing his obvious lack of understanding and that his only desire was to rouse the feelings of French Canadians.

As to the French speaking Conservatives, I fail to understand clearly why they would abstain on the amendment. They want to have their cake and eat it too by abstaining to vote on the Conservative amendment concerning the adoption of the red ensign instead of the union jack, while they intend to vote against the seventh report moved by the government.

In my opinion, they should be consistent and I do not believe that they can allow themselves not to vote against the Conservative amendment which, in fact, changes nothing at all to the matter of principle which they do not approve. Are they for or against it?

Mr. Grafftey: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Laniel: When my remarks are finished.

Mr. Grafftey: Thanks a lot.

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I want to say that I am very much concerned with the problem of Canadian unity, like most of us, and certainly as much as the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) (Mr. Groos) with whom I fraternize from time to time; it is even my first concern as a member from Quebec, and I ask all hon. members of this house, as well as all Canadians, to look for the solutions which will be pledges of our unity, not to go too fast and live with patience and understanding through the coming years, which will lead us to a better and stronger Canada, a Canada of ours with an increasing reputation throughout the world.

Mr. Grafftey: I would like to put a question to the hon. member who just delivered a great speech. Now that he indicated his desire to vote against the Conservative amendment, I would like to know whether he feels, with most of his fellow citizens in the province of Quebec, that the union jack is the flag of England, as is the case for most people outside Quebec?

Mr. Laniel: In answer to the hon. member, I do believe that this is a matter of judgment and common sense. We had a flag known as the red ensign and we have replaced it by a new one, one with a maple leaf which represents the future. Surely we are not going to continue the fight, as I said in my speech. We feel that the only distinctive national flag is the one with a maple leaf, but now we want a symbol of our membership in the commonwealth and our allegiance to the Queen. Certainly, such a symbol must be recognized and used by the majority of the other members of the commonwealth.

The red ensign has never been unfurled by Australia or New Zealand, while the union jack is generally used throughout the commonwealth. The Queen's flag should be recognized as the symbol of our membership in the commonwealth and our respect for Her Majesty.

[Text]

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, three or four minutes will suffice for what I have to say in this particular debate. I should like to correct an impression left by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel). He kept referring to the Conservative amendment. I should like to tell him that had the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton not introduced this amendment, the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) was prepared to do so and I was prepared to second a similar amendment.

I have been very disturbed by events in the house recently during the bitter debate which took place on the previous report of the committee. It seems to me this could well be avoided in discussing the particular report which we are at present considering.

It also seems to me there is a strong suspicion that when the vote is taken on the amendment the Liberal party is going to vote as a block. This is very surprising, because we all know many individual Liberal members who prefer the red ensign to the union jack. Some French speaking members of the Liberal party have said they would abstain on such a vote, yet I think I can predict that when the vote is taken they will vote as a party. Because of this it is very hard to convince me and others that it will be a free vote.

I should like to appeal to the Prime Minister to make certain there is a free vote; because I am convinced that if there is, then the vast majority of the members of this house will support the red ensign as the flag to represent our association with the commonwealth.

An hon. Member: Let us vote now and you will find out right away.

Mr. Prittie: I shall not keep you very long. After the rather bitter debate which took place on the sixth report of the flag committee I feel a free vote on the seventh report would do much to remove some of the bad feeling created during the past week. I agree we should have a flag to represent our association with the commonwealth, and I am convinced that in a free vote the red ensign will receive the support of the large majority of members in the house.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that to all intents and purposes we should be celebrating the birth of our new flag. Now that some of the dust has settled and the house has returned to a more friendly frame of mind, I wish to say that I think we have a flag, a distinctive Canadian flag; and as I promised in six earlier speeches, that new flag will have my unqualified support.

It has never been my practice to stand up one day and recommend something, and then overnight change my mind. I hope I will not be considered as being stubborn or narrow-minded. I believe in principle; I believe in being consistent, and I shall try to be consistent today. I am one of those who have always believed that one country needs only one flag. But of course I am here to represent the great district of Athabasca and to vote yea or nay on every subject that comes before the house.

I should like always to be able to decide between right and wrong. I would like to have clearcut principles, but on this subject I find the question proposed to me is something like this: which of your brothers would you like to murder, your brother Ted or your brother Walter? I do not believe in fratricide; therefore I cannot say which of my brothers I prefer to murder. As I am a lawyer some people may say this is legal jargon, and if they wish it explained I shall relate it to the question before the house; which of two designs, among second flags, do I want? The answer to that is very plain.

For this great country of ours, this young and virile nation, we need only one flag, but I am forced by principle to vote yea or nay between two designs which I do not want, now that the main question has been settled. How does a man vote on principle when he is presented with this problem? I shall vote when the time comes, but first I believe we are here to discuss the principles behind the whole issue.

As I have said, I accept the new national flag. I hope every citizen in Canada will rally to it whenever their services are needed. Here again I will be consistent. I have tried to serve the glorious old red ensign well, and I shall try to serve Canada under this new flag so long as I draw breath. But that is not the problem before us today. We are forced to vote on a two flag proposition, no matter what you call it. You may call it a one flag proposition if you like, but we are asked to sanctify or give legal acceptance to a second flag proposed by those very people who said the new national flag would be so representative of the whole nation, would be so distinctive that no person in the world could possibly make a mistake when seeing it flying at the mastheads of our ships, painted on the fuselages of our airplanes, or waved by children on parade.

I hope this is so. I hope that as the years go by the citizens of Canada, men and women, young and old, will serve this new flag with the same distinction with which they served the old one, until 100 years from now it will be truly loved and revered, not as a mere empty act of parliament but as one of the symbols of our nation.

I have never criticized the maple leaf as a symbol of Canadian unity, but I have asked that we recognize those other symbols of our past. There are some people who scream to get rid of anything British. I am not thinking of anyone in particular, but it has been said in this house that all vestiges of British colonialism must disappear. I happen to be of British blood. I have a great respect for British justice and their sense of fair play, and even for their colonialism which is classed as the finest the world has ever seen. No other empire in the history of the world gave so much of its strength and brains to develop other countries and set them free.

After Canadians showed in no uncertain fashion on the battlefields of Europe, particularly in world war I, that they had grown up, the old lion was mighty proud of her cub. Punch magazine of that day produced a wonderful cartoon showing the old lion lying inside her cave watching this great, mighty young lion striding forth to become independent and free. At no time in history has the mother of parliaments denied those necessary, and perhaps slow, steps required to bring a colony to nationhood. This is why I revere the British flag. I also revere it because it is something more than a mere symbol of empire. As has been said in this house on numerous occasions the flag of Britain, the noble union jack, is nothing more or less than the combination of three great Christian crosses.

I disagree with those who say we should do away with all that is old and revered just to have something new. There is no education without history, without rehearsing the folklore, the poetry and the great literature of our forefathers, both French and English. We said that we wished to retain in our Canadian flag those vestiges of our past. We did this in no small way. We did this in no petty, partisan way. We had a free vote, at least in the party to which I belong. I am not here to cast aspersions on any other party. We are a positive party. We are a building party. We do not recommend anything in this party of ours which in any way tears down the achievements or the beliefs of any other people. We oppose that which is negative but we do not turn down anything that is positive. We are the builders, and now that we have a new flag I appeal to each and every hon. member to put away any acrimonious feelings which may have been felt and to build for the future. Let us have a new dynamic program of building in Canada. Let us eliminate poverty in Canada. When I say we have a new flag, I wish something more to go with that flag. There should be real equality in this country—equality for every man, woman and child, economically as well as in matters concerning religion and race. This is a program we must carry out. I do not expect we shall have to resort to socialism or anything connected with it in order to put this program forward.

I come from a race of pioneers, from a race of adventurers—gamblers, if you will, if you call it gambling to get into a leaky ship, cross 3,000 miles of stormy sea and walk into the bush with nothing but a gun and an axe. I do not think that spirit is dead in Canada. That is why I am able to accept this maple leaf flag as a symbol of those who stepped out into the hardwood forests of Ontario as pioneers and settlers. When pioneering in the east was finished, my grandfather went further west. When my grandfather was at Lac la Biche the flag which flew over his fort looked a great deal like the Canadian red ensign though, in fact, it had the letters H.B.C. in the corner. He was law and order. He was priest, educator, businessman. He was everything in that part of the country. And he did not hold his position because the people were afraid of him. At the time of the rebellion they allowed him to walk out unscathed because he was a man of honour. These same native people loved our red ensign and I am sure that in time they will learn to love the maple leaf flag. If necessary, they will fight for it as they did for the red ensign in three great wars. I am going out to sell them the idea of Canadian unity. But even more important than this idea of Canadian unity I should like to bring them economic equality and economic freedom so that they will no longer be mere wards of the government; so that each and every one may grasp the one thing which, I hope, our race has given them—the idea that a man can stand on his own two feet and make his way in the world. Then, I hope, they will be willing to fight, if necessary, for all those things which a generous nation has put within their grasp.

We cannot call ourselves generous today. Yes, we can pat ourselves on the back and say we have seen the birth of a new flag. But that new flag is like a child, innocent of reputation. Let it not be a foundling child. If members opposite believe in it—and they have commended it, if only by their silence—let them work to establish it. I should not say they did not have the opportunity of a free vote. I would hate to think any Canadian would do anything at any time to prevent his voting freely on such a subject. It took us 2,000 years to get this free vote and I will be the last to suggest that any member of the party opposite would dare give up this heritage. If he did, the men who died at Vimy Ridge and in the battle of Britain must have died in vain. Even now they speak to us when they say:

> To you from failing hands we throw
> The torch; be yours to hold it high.
> If ye break faith with us who die
> We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
> In Flanders fields.

These are words which should not be forgotten. This is part of our British heritage.

I do not think it is necessary to fly any flag alongside this new democratic flag we have chosen to prove that we are, in fact, a nation, or to prove that each and every one of us is dedicated to that new nation. If the introduction of this new flag, the one and only symbol of our national pride, represents Canada's birthday, let us not sully it by pretending it needs to be bolstered up. Surely those who wanted a distinctive flag should be the first to say, now that we have a distinctive flag: The House of Commons voted on this flag, and now we have it. I who come of British stock will be the first to say we need not shore it up except with our devotion, our acts and our imagination. We shall go forward and build in the northern half of the North American continent the greatest nation which ever flew any flag.

Some say we need this second flag to show equality in the commonwealth. We do not need any flag to show equality in the commonwealth. The nations of the commonwealth look to Canada for leadership. All through the years they have looked to us for leadership and we have shown that leadership. This is why we are not afraid, now, to launch out on our own; this is why we have cut the umbilical cord. This is why we now have a Queen of our own, and she is a Queen of our own choosing. We are not trammelled here. Any person in this house can preach in favour of a republic if he wishes. But I will not; I will be consistent in that. Australia and New Zealand know that we are first among equals. That is a good phrase. That is what Canada is in a position of leadership within the commonwealth; she has never asked for a special place but she has earned a place in front because she is marching down that great road at the end of which all men will have equality, dignity and those economic advantages which we ourselves have found in this land of ours. Let us have no more talk about marking our association with the commonwealth by a flag.

We had a beautiful and distinctive one, in my opinion; and if you will bear with me, Mr. Speaker, because I do not see any other occasion on which I could say this, I have a suggestion to make with regard to it. I think that one of these days, perhaps Vimy day or on July 1, 1965 we should set aside the whole day to honouring this great red ensign of ours and to honouring the boys who served it so well. I would suggest that our great Governor General, General Vanier, should be given the privilege of laying our red ensign where it belongs—in the peace tower, where the names of those who gave their lives are graved in stone or written in letters of gold. As long as one stone stands on another and as long as we honour these men the flag will remain there as a lasting tribute to their love and devotion—the great old flag they served so well.

If we are to have a flag to show we are a member of the commonwealth, why not a special flag to show we are a member of NATO? I think the members of NATO know Canadians will be there, should the defence of western Europe make it necessary. Why should we not be asked to approve a special flag to show our membership in the United Nations? I may say that had I been in the committee which was concerned with choosing a flag I might well have suggested designs which would have shown our devotion to the United Nations—I do not know whether any were put forward or not. I think our contribution in money and in devotion to the idea of one united world might well require that we take the lead and incorporate in a new flag the United Nations banner and, in this way, let Canada be the first to recognize the brotherhood of man. But we have chosen otherwise in democratic conclave, in committee meetings. I have never been of the opinion that a committee was the best way of proceeding. I would much have preferred that we should have discussed this matter for as long a time as was necessary and then come to a conclusion in the house. I cannot understand how we could expect 15 men chosen by parties to sit behind closed doors and decide something which we could not decide here. Nevertheless, the committee did come up with this report. We have had a debate in the house, and we have a new flag. Surely, if we thought a committee could do it, we must say they have done it.

They have made that decision. We abdicated our decision to that committee and they came out with a report and gave us a flag. They must have given us a distinctive flag, a flag to serve under and love, and one which requires no bolstering up. I am quite sure this is what the committee intended to do, because the first time the question was raised they voted 14 to 0 for this very proposition. I am not going into the motives behind their change of heart but I suggest that on that occasion they showed their true principle, which is the principle that I suggest again should lie behind this whole question.

I must get back to the proposition before us, Mr. Speaker. The amendment is, of course, a method of trying to get a little more reason out of what I consider to be an entirely impossible proposal, namely that we should have two flags. However, if we must have two flags and are back again between the devil and the deep blue sea, I suggest that the red ensign of Canada is far and away ahead of any other flag, if we must have a second, distinctive flag for our country. I am going to have to vote, and I am quite sure the people of Athabasca want me to vote on this question; they want it settled as quickly as possible. However, we cannot settle things as important as this as quickly as some people may desire, because every member of this house certainly has as much right to speak on the subject as I have. I do not think I am trying to make cloth out of old rope; I am trying to be positive. I suggest that nothing can be gained by weakening the position of our new flag and it is my hope that when I try and celebrate, as I hope to do, the new flag for our great nation we shall not be torn between that flag and a second choice of any kind. I am sure many hon. members will vote in favour of the red ensign as a second flag—I know members on both sides of the house are going to do so—but this will only be Hobson's choice.

I have great respect for those sections of the country which have a particular love for the old union jack. Newfoundland has not been long in the dominion, just since 1949. I hope that the way we have treated Newfoundland is appreciated and understood. We have offered them full partnership in our family. I believe nobody will deny that we have tried to be generous to them. I think we can appeal to the people of Newfoundland and say that if they feel wounded because we have turned down the idea of a secondary flag, it is because we have tried to build this country of ours into a great, united nation. I know that when the people of Newfoundland get together with those people in Canada who are not of British stock they will love them as I do, and will not forget their British heritage but will put this question in its proper perspective and put Canada first. Let us put our sentimental attachments, our family devotion, on one side and put Canada first, not only today but for ever.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Saltsman).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to rise today to speak on behalf of the red ensign as a symbol of Canada's relationship with the commonwealth. I would like to take a moment to express my appreciation to the voters of Waterloo South for having accorded me the honour of electing me to the House of Commons as their representative. I would also like to take this opportunity of expressing my appreciation to all members of the house for their very kind and friendly reception. I hope it may continue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Saltsman: I am also extremely proud that I have been here on an historic occasion and one which will no doubt be long remembered by Canadians. I think the decision this house has made will be remembered long after the bitterness is forgotten. I am very proud to have participated in voting for the new Canadian flag. I think it is a good flag. Like most people, when I first saw it my feelings for the red ensign obscured the affection I might have had for the new flag; but every day as I look at it, it becomes more vital, it becomes stronger. I can see a united Canada in this flag and I am pleased and proud to have been able to vote for it.

Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, Waterloo South is an English speaking riding. It has very strong United Empire Loyalist roots; its people are proud and hard working; it is the home of the Highland Light Infantry of Canada, a great regiment with many battle honours; it has four branches of the Canadian Legion, all of them doing extremely well; and it is proud of the red ensign. I have followed this debate with great interest and great emotion, as hon. members will understand. I have spoken to many people in Waterloo South about the flag, and their feelings regarding it. I think the people in Waterloo South recognized very early that Canada needed a new flag, a flag that would not be hyphenated, a flag that would not say "French Canada", "English Canada" or any other Canada, but only one Canada. I believe this parliament has accomplished that; we now have that flag.

The people in Waterloo South could have waited for a flag. They could have waited, because they were most reluctant to transfer their loyalty from the ensign that they love to another flag which they will learn to love. But I think it should be recognized by many of the members of this house that we could have waited. There are other members of this house who could not wait. We recognized that fact and as good Canadians we said they had real, just grievances and we were prepared to meet those grievances. I refer to the grievances of French Canada. I believe we have shown our willingness to do this. We now ask those French Canadian members of this house to recognize, much as we understood their feelings and the justice of their cause, that we have very strong and real feelings for the ensign.

We have heard them say that if another flag is necessary and there was a flag representing the world, this is the flag we should accept and honour rather than one which only recognizes our commonwealth relationships. When that day comes and that flag is ready to be accepted, a flag that represents the brotherhood of man, the universality of all people, I will be one of the first to vote for it if I am fortunate enough to be here. But until we reach that point it must be recognized that we do have a flag that means a great deal to us, a flag we have given up voluntarily on behalf of Canadian unity. I think that flag should be retained in our affection and on our flagpoles as a symbol and sign of our relationship with the British commonwealth.

It is my opinion and my feeling, and I think the feeling of many members of this house who voted on this matter, that if the red ensign is retained as a symbol of our relationship with the commonwealth, that connection with the past will go a long way toward recognizing and accepting the new flag. I would ask whether those members in this house who were so willing to ask for a new flag—and I was one of them—would be equally as willing to recognize the affection in which we hold the red ensign? If they are, then when the vote comes they will have an opportunity to heal the wounds, and we may yet reach a unanimous decision on the retention of the red ensign.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have just listened with a great deal of pleasure to the maiden speech of the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Saltsman). I should like to congratulate him on entering into the debates in this chamber. From listening to him and from having talked to him on other occasions I am expecting him to add a great deal to the deliberations of this house; and I am sure he will add to the opinions of the New Democratic party something which is required—some new ideas and a fresh outlook on life. I congratulate him on his effort today knowing, as we all do, how difficult it is to make that first speech in the House of Commons. Subsequently he may become like some of the rest of us here as the years go by, but I hope he will pick out a proper model to follow. I am not sure whether or not he will find it in his own party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Well, I am not being discourteous to his own party, but he can make a choice from 264 other members.

I am rising to speak in this debate today, Mr. Speaker, but not because I desire to enter once more into the flag question for any purpose other than to express my regret and my sorrow that the issue has come to what I consider to be a very sorry pass. I should like to point out in the beginning, that yesterday we were prepared to bring to a vote the amendment which is now before the house to the seventh report of the committee. We had presented our case and put forward our amendment. Our members were ready for a vote last night, and I regret very much that that permission was not granted to us by other members in this house.

As far as our position today is concerned, hon. members in this house realize that quite a number of our members are absent attending the funeral service of Senator Horner in Saskatchewan, whom we will miss and to whom the Conservative party owes a great debt of gratitude over the years. In deference to those members who are absent we feel that the vote should not be held today because they want to record on Hansard their position regarding an issue which has concerned them very much. So let no one accuse me or anyone else of prolonging the debate today simply for the so-called purpose of filibustering; that is not in anybody's mind.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit a question. I very much appreciate his remarks concerning the late Hon. Senator Horner. The late Hon. Senator was one whom I met when he first came to Ottawa as a senator, and I have known him rather well over the intervening years. May I say I also join with other hon. members in expressing my sympathy to his family.

My question is this. I quite see the difficulty which is exercising the hon. gentleman, but it would seem that delay of the vote on the amendment is probably delaying the conclusion of the pre-Christmas part of our proceedings, because several members wish to speak after it is taken, and before holding a final vote on the main motion. I am wondering whether the hon. gentleman would consider permitting the vote on the amendment to go forward on the understanding that we could then have the speeches, which I am informed are coming on the main motion, delivered today. We would, of course, understand that there would be no vote on the main motion until tomorrow, when hon. members who are away will return. Would that meet the situation which is troubling the hon. gentleman?

Mr. Churchill: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, it would not. Our members who are away today want to vote on the amendment which we proposed yesterday; that is the point I am making. We were prepared to do this last night, but as I mentioned, last night there were two members of the Liberal party who were anxious to get the floor, which happened to be given to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). So I just wanted to make it clear, in view of all the accusations that we have had over weeks and months that we are trying to delay the business of the house, that that is not the case, and it is certainly not the case today. I want that thoroughly understood. However, this does not hinder me from discussing the present situation, the work of the committee, the report it made, and some other matters which I will deal with as I go along.

I notice that in its seventh report—and this has been dealt with by others—the committee started off with the proposition that the second flag to be proposed for Canada should be the Canadian red ensign. Last night the information was given to us that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) proposed that motion in the committee. Certainly as far as our members on that committee were concerned, if there had to be a second flag this is the one they favoured. Then along came the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) and reversed the position by putting before the committee an amendment which is almost word for word the resolution on the order paper which was put there six months ago. So the committee was put right back in the position which the government took six months ago. The hon. member for Leeds reversed the suggestion of his colleague for Vancouver Quadra.

Our committee representative, the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming), explained the position of our members on that committee and why they abstained from voting. First of all, they were of the opinion that only one flag was to be chosen. Second, when it became evident that the committee was not going along with that idea but was going to propose a second flag, they said this was just ridiculous and they were not participating in that vote in the committee. I thought that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) was unfair to the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton in ridiculing him the other night, or yesterday, when the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton was explaining his position as of the present moment, as contrasted with his position in the committee.

I ask, as members of the committee asked, what was the reason for suggesting that there should be two flags officially sanctioned by the parliament of Canada? When did we have to indicate by means of a special flag our allegiance to the crown? Have we not in all the years of Canada's history shown our allegiance to the crown by our activities both in war and in peace as citizens of this country? As members of parliament we swear allegiance to the sovereign. Must we now carry around a flag indicating that allegiance? It strikes me as being rather ridiculous.

What is the weakness in the proposed flag that does not show allegiance to the crown? There must be troubled consciences on the other side of the house in the Liberal party in that they must realize that the flag which they proposed and which at this present moment has not been accepted as the national flag of Canada shows only allegiance to the Liberal party. That is all it shows at the present time. It has not been accepted by parliament. It has not been authorized by the crown.

Miss LaMarsh: What about your co-leader?

Mr. Deschatelets: It is the committee's flag.

Mr. Churchill: The second thing is this, Mr. Speaker—I did not hear those interruptions.

Mr. Deschatelets: It is not the flag of the Liberal party, it is the committee's flag. It is the committee's recommendation.

Mr. Churchill: They are shielding behind the committee again. That is why an opportunity was given the other day by our amendment to the other report for members of the Liberal party to stand up and be counted with regard to whether or not they wanted to destroy the red ensign, and with one exception they said yes, we want to destroy the red ensign. They are going to have another chance this week to stand up and be counted with regard to whether or not they are going to complete the destruction of the red ensign. That is one of the purposes of the amendment now before the house.

An hon. Member: A political purpose.

Mr. Churchill: The other thing is that the second flag for Canada is to indicate our membership in the commonwealth of nations. When has there been any doubt about our membership in the commonwealth of nations? Why do we now, in December, 1964, have to indicate our membership in the commonwealth of nations? We are one of the founding nations of that commonwealth and in 50 years we have not had to produce a special flag to show that we are a member of the commonwealth. Everybody in the world knows that we are a member and a senior partner in the commonwealth. It is a guilty conscience that produces reasons like those put forward by the Liberal party for having a second flag.

We hear talk about Canada suddenly getting its independence now, as if it were just emerging from colonial days. Canada entered upon the world stage in the period 1914-1918. That is when Canada's name became famous around the world. Perhaps some of you were listening last Sunday to the C.B.C. radio program broadcast at one o'clock which commemorates the activities of Canadians in the first world war. Despite all the criticism we hear of the C.B.C. I should like to commend them because this is one of the best programs I have ever heard. On that program we hear from the lips of survivors of that conflict about their experiences in that war. Last Sunday we heard from survivors of the battle of Saint-Julien. That was the occasion of the first gas attack in the history of the world. We heard from survivors what happened in those momentous days when the allied armies in Europe were in as great peril as they were in the March retreat of 1918. The Canadians held their ground and stood firm and, as the commentator said, in newspapers throughout the world the name of Canada was blazoned in great letters. That is when Canada entered upon the international scene and became known as a country in her own right.

At the peace conference at Versailles Sir Robert Borden insisted that Canada should have a seat on that council. Canada entered upon the world stage at that time. That is when her independence was achieved and became known, and everything that has happened subsequently has just been a case of tidying up the documents to make it clear and evident that that independence is assured. So we have not just suddenly become a new and independent nation. This is ridiculous talk to which I have raised objection. I suggest that the flag proposed by the Liberal party—

Mr. Benidickson: The committee.

Mr. Churchill: —by the Liberal party shielding behind the committee has serious weaknesses. It does not show, according to the Liberal party, our allegiance to the crown. It does not show our membership in the commonwealth. I say it is not even distinctive because it closely resembles the flag of Peru with the colours red, white and red. The main difference is that the proposed Liberal flag has a larger expanse of white, but at a distance it will be hard to distinguish it from the flag of Peru. So it is not distinctive. The great search for a distinctive flag has failed. At a distance the maple leaf will not show up any more clearly than the coat of arms or diagram on the Peruvian flag.

It is much less distinctive than the present Canadian national flag, the Canadian red ensign. In the United Nations, in NATO, in the commonwealth, where flags are flown and where it counts to have a distinctive flag, the Canadian red ensign is unmistakably Canadian. It spells out the word "Canada" which we have heard about from the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) and from the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). The message of Canada is spelled out right now by the present Canadian red ensign. You can examine the flags of those nations in the commonwealth, in NATO and in the United Nations and you will see that is true and that it cannot be mistaken. It stands out very clearly.

I suggest that because of these weaknesses in the flag proposed and forced on this country by the Liberal party they have tried to come up with something else that will satisfy various elements in this country, and they are suggesting to us in the seventh report of the committee that we have a second flag. The committee is suggesting that that flag should be the union jack and we are suggesting that it should be the Canadian red ensign. We would have preferred to have a flag chosen for Canada that would have incorporated the very emblem which the Liberal party now says must be shown somehow or other in Canada, namely the union jack. We would have preferred that. We wanted a flag that represented something of our history and our traditions. We wanted the union jack on it. We also wanted the fleur-de-lis and the maple leaf on it, and we have said so time and time again. If such a flag had been proposed we would not now require a second flag to show our membership in the commonwealth or our allegiance to the crown, or another flag that would convey some other meaning. But our suggestions were not accepted.

As I mentioned in an earlier speech, and I am not going to repeat what I said, we were wrong. I admitted I was wrong, along with hundreds of thousands of people in Canada, in thinking that a compromise was possible incorporating the symbols of our past history. This was the initial mistake that we made months ago. This initial mistake was carried on right down through the work of the committee. I sympathize with our members who were on that committee because they conscientiously and seriously thought that a compromise could be effected incorporating the union jack and the fleur-de-lis, as well as the maple leaf, in our flag.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it is a rather sad period in our history when we have to consider two flags for this country because the flag proposed by the Liberal party fails in its purpose. We have to select another flag for the reasons they have advanced. We would have preferred, as I said, one flag; but faced in the house with this juggernaut of the Liberal party supported by their associates, chiefly the Créditistes, we find ourselves in a situation where another flag is going to be selected by the House of Commons. Under those circumstances, then, we have to make a choice. Our choice is the preservation of the Canadian red ensign. This is the reason our amendment has been placed before the House of Commons.

I noticed that when the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel) was talking, he quoted from some newspaper or other to the effect that the particular design of the flag is not of importance. This is Créditiste doctrine: Anything at all on the flag; it does not matter what is on the flag. I am surprised that the hon. member who spoke a little while ago should have quoted with approval that sentiment from some newspaper or other. Then he talked about the emergence of a new generation. I do not know which generation the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) represents. He represents an older generation than the one to which I belong. Is he a member of the new generation that is going to be in evidence in Canada now for the next 30 years? I think not. However, we hear from the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry that a new generation is now taking over. Well, who is leading this new generation—the Prime Minister of Canada? When I belonged, many years ago, to the new generation a person of his age appeared to me to be very senior indeed.

I suggest, sir, that we are going to be in difficulty in the future with regard to the two flags. Where are they to be flown? Are they to fly conjointly? What flag will be on the peace tower? Is it to be this new flag imposed by force on the Canadian people? Will we see the Canadian red ensign pulled down from the peace tower and this other flag run up which has not behind it the majority opinion in this country? The Prime Minister has said, and I could quote his exact words, that the majority of the people in this country favour a new flag. He said, as recorded on page 11148 of Hansard, that he believed the majority of Canadians wished to have a Canadian national flag which could not be mistaken for the flag of any other country. Then he picks one that looks like the flag of Peru. How does he know the majority of Canadians want this flag? Nobody knows that. We have not had an opportunity to find out, and that is the very thing to which I object. Do the majority of the people in this country want the Canadian red ensign pulled down from the peace tower, the greatest shrine that we have in this country? This is a shrine to which hundreds of thousands of visitors come every summer as we have seen, year after year. Every public building in this country will have the Canadian red ensign pulled down, I suppose. I do not know what will be done with regard to the schools, province by province. I do not know what will be done in the court rooms of this country. What will be done in the citizenship courts? The red ensign comes down, does it, and perhaps the new flag will be put up in its place?

What happens in so many of our churches in this country in which we have deposited Canadian flags of another era representing the sacrifices of the people in wartime? Are those flags to be taken down now and replaced by this new flag? Well, the ramifications of this are not known yet to the Canadian people. We have never been a flag conscious people. We have not been saluting our flag every day. Now we are becoming flag conscious and we are going to be confused with the multiplicity of flags in this country.

I have been distressed during the course of this debate by the evident intent of the Liberal party to destroy the red ensign. I have been distressed by the references we have heard from some corners of this house to the fact that we, in the Conservative party, are not real Canadians. The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire)—I regret that he is not here, although if he were I would be interrupted every other minute—stated the other day, as recorded on page 11186 of Hansard, that they are perhaps the most Canadian of Canadians. We have had suggestions from that corner of the house that just because members of the Conservative party have supported the Canadian red ensign they were not true Canadians. We, they say, are second class citizens and represent a declining minority in this house. This is the position in which we have been placed because we have fought the proposal of the Liberal party.

Now, I do not know how you determine between a real and an unreal Canadian. I do not know why the member for Lapointe and his friends consider they are more Canadian than we are. How do you become this? I thought we were attempting to recognize in this country that there was no distinction among Canadians by race, class or creed or anything else. I thought we were all Canadians, all honouring our country, all anxious to work for the benefit of our country and all of us honouring the crown. Why do we have to be divided into first class citizens and second class citizens? The hon. member for Lapointe and some others are going to find it very difficult indeed to relegate us to an inferior position. We will do our part, as we have done in the past, for Canada.

There has been a great deal of bitterness in the course of this debate. We are asked to forgive and forget. We saw the spectacle just the other day—though it seems longer it was only on Tuesday morning—of the Prime Minister asking not to have a vote, to all join together in favour of the flag which his party put out.

Mr. Macaluso: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member keeps saying the flag put out by the Liberal party, by the Prime Minister's party. The flag was put out by the committee and was voted upon by every party in the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please.

Mr. Macaluso: On a further point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member says "on a further point of order". Certainly the first was not one.

Mr. Macaluso: On a new point of order I would suggest that under the rules of the house the hon. gentleman is not speaking to the amendment that is now before the house.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member who has interrupted of course has a guilty conscience.

Mr. Macaluso: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I do not feel guilty about any vote I have cast in this house, and never will. I am very proud of the vote I cast in the house. The hon. gentleman cast aspersions against every other hon. member in the house and I suggest he keep his innuendos to himself, and to those within his own party whom he has also slandered.

Mr. Churchill: I have offended the sensitivities of the hon. member. It is my opinion he is suffering from a guilty conscience. I am entitled to say that. I should not have said he is, but it is my opinion; and he wants to shield, as I see it, behind the committee.

Mr. Macaluso: Small man.

Mr. Churchill: This was the purpose of the Liberal party the other day, to shield behind the committee, and we moved an amendment and said, "Stand up and be counted in regard to the Canadian red ensign. Put your names down on Hansard permanently with regard to the flag you are about to destroy." They were very embarrassed, and it showed. Then the Prime Minister was pleading with us to all join together, forget all these differences and join behind the flag which he, on second thought, discovered was the flag he desired. At the same time we had a noose around our necks, the noose of closure, and he was pulling on this and was throttling us. He thought we would then say, "It is all right, Mr. Prime Minister. We are sorry about all the things said in the debate and we bow to your will."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. Perhaps I should refer to the point of order raised a moment ago by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso) which to some extent was justified. It seems to the Chair that the hon. member at the moment is to some extent reflecting on a vote of the house, a vote which was taken on Monday or Tuesday, and in present circumstances the debate should be restricted to the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming).

Mr. Churchill: I did not think I was reflecting on the vote, Mr. Speaker. I thought I was stating the Prime Minister did not want to have a vote so that the names of the members of the Liberal party would not be recorded on Hansard for this generation, and subsequent generations, to see what they have done in our country.

I said that there was bitterness engendered during the course of this debate over all these months, bitterness in the hearts of many people, and sorrow in their hearts. Thousands of people in this country have been hurt by the action of the Prime Minister and it is too early to say, let us forgive and forget.

I have known nothing in the history of the world that corresponds to this action—the imposition of a flag on a country without the will of the people behind it. This has only been done by a foreign conqueror. Yet here, Canada, which resisted foreign conquerors in the past, has had imposed upon it, by the action of the Prime Minister and the Liberal party, a flag which has not been desired by the majority of the people of this country because they have had no opportunity to express their opinions on it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have to interrupt the hon. member again. I brought to his attention a moment ago that what he is discussing now is a subject matter on which there has been a vote of the house. What we have before us is an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, and it seems to me the hon. member is not dealing with that at the moment.

Mr. Churchill: There would be no need for this second report of the committee had it not been for the fact that a flag, foreign to our nature, is being imposed upon us, and I am relating it to that. I say this has been the failure of the Prime Minister. He talks about unity; he creates disunity.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: He is attempting to impose upon Canada a flag we do not desire. He wants us all to join behind it, and then he says, let us have a second flag to placate certain elements in this country, and he confuses the issue by so doing. I think it is a real failure in statesmanship. This is not the purpose that should be served by a Prime Minister who should act for all the people of Canada and not just for party political purposes.

So let me conclude, Mr. Speaker. When people say, "Let us all rally around now and forget the past," they are speaking prematurely. I know enough about human nature to know that this particular incident will not be forgotten for many years, no matter how charitable people want to be. I tell you, sir, a hurt has been done to hundreds of thousands of people in this country, and that is not easily banished.

In this house we have suffered a political defeat which some people are crowing about. Some elements of the press are displaying, by way of cartoons, a political defeat. It is an unfortunate way to deal with an issue which has created so much trouble within this country. But, sir, if you have suffered a political defeat and have any courage in your bones the next step is defiance. I am not going to say at this moment that I will accept this flag which the Liberal party has produced—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Churchill: —and forced upon us.

Mr. Benidickson: The committee produced it.

Mr. Churchill: I am not going to accept it at this stage, and there will be thousands of people who won't accept it; and we will defy the Liberal party in the future—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please.

Mr. Churchill: —and make them suffer for their sins.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, as a member of the flag committee I want to protest the despicable remark which the hon. member has just made, that this was a Liberal flag. This was the work of an all-party committee.

Mr. Churchill: Well, there is another member who wants to shield behind the committee, and that committee was a hand picked committee. Why was that member for that party put on the committee? Why not the member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge)—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Churchill: —and we would have a different result.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. The hon. member's remarks are not relevant to the question now before the house.

Mr. Deschatelets: Why not the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer)?

Mr. Churchill: I am prepared to discuss the question before the house, but these interruptions occur and surely I am entitled to reply to them.

Mr. Scott: It was a cheap, scurrilous remark.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. member withdraw those remarks—cheap, scurrilous remark? Will the Speaker intervene on my behalf on this occasion?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not know to what remarks the hon. member is referring.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps the Speaker did not hear. I don't know who the member was. Let him stand up and repeat that statement.

I heard it: Cheap and scurrilous remark. Has he the courage to stand up and say it?

Mr. Scott: I will be happy to repeat it. The hon. member who has just spoken said that I and probably some others have tried to shelter behind the committee. I say that the committee which chose this flag consisted of members of the house who worked long, honestly and sincerely, and any reflection on that committee such as the hon. member has just made is a cheap, scurrilous, political remark.

Mr. Churchill: I congratulate the hon. member on finally having the courage to stand up and say openly what he was mumbling so that Your Honour and other members could not hear.

Mr. Scott: If he did not hear, I will be happy to repeat it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has the floor.

An hon. Member: The truth hurts.

Mr. Churchill: You can see how sensitive some people are with regard to these issues.

Mr. Scott: We would rather be sensitive than stupid.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps Your Honour will hear those other interruptions. People are attempting to prevent me from speaking.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: But I know my rights in this house and I intend to continue. I was talking about the failure of leadership on the part of the Prime Minister in a matter which affects Canada so seriously. When I see that there is bitterness, that there is hurt, and that these things will not easily be forgotten, I ask this question: What is the next step which will be taken by the Prime Minister and by the Liberal party? They have ridden roughshod over the people in this country who respect Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must bring to the attention of the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Before addressing myself directly to the question before us I should like to refer to the remarks made by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Saltsman) who spoke effectively, briefly and from the heart in a way which moved us all. I am sure the good wishes of all members of the house go to this new representative of an historic riding.

My friend the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg) during his speech a little earlier in this debate talked about consistency. I would point out that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and a number of us who had the privilege of serving on the flag committee like to think that we have in fact been consistent. A number of years ago it was the policy of the Liberal party as, indeed, it was of other political parties, that a distinctive Canadian flag be adopted. During a general election in 1963—I am referring now to Liberal party policy—party literature was distributed in my own riding. Under the heading "Positive Canadianism" were these words:

> The new Liberal government will submit to parliament a design for a flag which cannot be mistaken for the emblem of any other country.

These words also appear:

> The union jack will be flown on appropriate occasions as a symbol of our membership in the commonwealth.

I would point out that in the sixth report of the flag committee we recommended the adoption of only one national flag. The vote was 14 to 0. I stress the word "national" because this word was used repeatedly in the course of our committee discussions. I think it is entirely consistent with the first purpose set out in the policy of the Liberal party—namely that we adopt a flag which cannot be mistaken for the emblem of any other country; in other words, a distinctive national flag.

Subsequently in the flag committee there was a motion to the effect that the government be authorized to take such steps as might be necessary to provide that the Canadian red ensign may continue to be flown as a symbol of Canada's membership in the commonwealth and of our allegiance to the crown. This was moved by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman). I did not share this view, and I may say that within our committee and within party groups throughout the process of the six weeks deliberation a number of different viewpoints were expressed from time to time. I myself moved an amendment substituting the words "royal union flag generally known as the union jack" for the words "Canadian red ensign". This amendment carried by a vote of 7 yeas to 2 nays with 5 abstentions—and the members of the official opposition have indicated they abstained on the vote. The motion as amended then carried by a vote of 8 yeas, 1 nay with the same 5 abstentions.

I think therefore that the position we have taken as a party and the one I have taken personally is a position which has been entirely consistent. Perhaps it would be helpful to explain why I moved an amendment against the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, to substitute the royal union flag for the suggested Canadian red ensign. I think it is clear that in the sixth committee report, the report which on Tuesday was adopted by this house in convincing fashion, what we did was establish a national flag clearly distinguishable from the flag of any other country. I do not pay particular attention to comments with respect to its similarities to other flags; I can assure hon. members that the committee spent six weeks considering this matter very carefully. Incidentally the design finally approved was suggested as early as March, 1964, by a former lieutenant colonel in the army, a man with seven years historical training at Oxford; he is a Canadian with an exceptional academic background.

Why would it be inappropriate at this time to approve an amendment respecting the Canadian red ensign as the flag to denote our relation with the commonwealth and with the Queen? I think it is perfectly clear we wanted one national flag, not two; and the Canadian red ensign is, after all, the "Canadian" red ensign. If we brought this flag back now all we would be doing, in effect, would be to create two national flags.

We have heard a great deal of argument, particularly from the official opposition, that two flags are a mistake. I think it would be wrong certainly to have two national flags. However, I am not against several flags for different purposes. I think that is entirely proper. The hon. member for Athabasca referred to the flag of the Hudson's Bay Company. Many old companies have their own flags. The provinces have flags, in several cases, and a number of municipal corporations have their own flags. We know there is a NATO flag which occasionally flies here in Ottawa and elsewhere over our various headquarters. And there is, of course, the United Nations flag which, I am glad to say, flies over some schools in Brockville. This is a sign of the times. Flags serve various purposes. But surely it is our purpose to have one national flag. Many years ago we obtained permission to use the red ensign by an admiralty warrant granted on the 2nd day of February 1892. I have studied the communication that was sent to Evan MacGregor by the under secretary of state, colonial office, dated February 2, 1892, where they answer the query as to whether it would be possible for a warrant to be granted empowering ships of Canadian registry to fly the red ensign of the royal navy defaced with the arms of the dominion. Although there were strong objections to any defacement of the traditional sea flag, as a result of strong representation from Canada permission was in fact granted. May I read to the house the significant words of the admiralty warrant of that date. It says:

> Whereas we deem it expedient that Canadian registered vessels shall be permitted to wear the red ensign of Her Majesty's fleet with the Canadian coat of arms on the fly thereof.
> We do therefore by virtue of the power and authority vested in us hereby warrant and authorize the red ensign of Her Majesty's fleet with the Canadian coat of arms in the fly, to be used on board vessels registered in the dominion.

Perhaps because I was raised as a boy in Quebec city and spent a good deal of time, as a young fellow, on the water I have always been led to think that the merchant service flag is a sea flag. If anybody has any doubt in this matter I suggest that they read the important text "Flags of the World" edited by H. Gresham Carr, in which he sets out the various countries of the commonwealth that use the red ensign for specifically that purpose. I am not going to take any more of the time of the house to dwell on that aspect of the matter. However, Mr. Speaker, may I raise the question as to the proprieties, in contrast to the Canadian red ensign, of using the union jack for the specific purposes which have been set out in this report. May I refer to correspondence respecting the flag to be flown on land by British subjects. A letter was written by John F. Stedman of Ebenezer, Saskatchewan, Canada, March 11, 1911, to the secretary of His Imperial Majesty, King George V, in effect asking what flag was appropriate for Canadians to fly. The answer was given by L. Harcourt in a letter addressed to His Excellency, Right Hon. Earl Grey, G.C.M.G., C.G.V.O., etc. May I read to the house the substance of the communication which came from Downing street under the date May 21, 1912. This communication is to the Governor General, His Royal Highness, the Duke of Connaught and of Strathearn, K.G., K.T., K.P. It says:

> I have the honour to transmit to Your Royal Highness a copy of a letter from Mr. G. S. Hodgins in regard to the flag which should be used by private persons who are British subjects.
> 2. I should be glad if you would be good enough to cause Mr. Hodgins to be informed that the union flag is the national flag of Canada as of all other parts of His Majesty's dominions, and may be flown on land by all British subjects: and that the red ensign, with the arms of the dominion of Canada in the fly, is intended to be used only by Canadian merchant vessels.
> I have the honour to be,
> Sir,
> Your Royal Highness's most obedient, > humble servant,
> L. Harcourt.

Perhaps my hon. friends on the opposite side will suggest that this is a little out of date, but I would point out to them that those members on the government side of the house who have been interested in this important matter for not only some weeks or months but indeed years have gone into this question rather thoroughly and have been advised by a great many authorities to which we referred that the union flag is an appropriate flag in these circumstances for any subject of Her Majesty anywhere in the commonwealth of nations. It is perfectly true, as certain hon. gentlemen have indicated, that in recent years it has become popularly thought of as the flag of the United Kingdom, but this is not legally its status.

May I give the house the view of a knowledgeable Canadian, Alan B. Beddoe, O.B.E., who served for some years as commander in the navy and has done a great deal of research on this subject. His views are expressed in this way:

> In the first place, the so-called "union jack" is actually a "royal badge", usually applied to a banner or flag, or as an "augmentation of honour" to certain coats of arms...It is today one of Her Majesty's personal badges. It is not, as is erroneously thought by many, the flag of all British people everywhere, in spite of its long and unauthorized use in this way. Since its advent on January 1, 1801, no permission has been given by the crown for the public at large to display it, except by King George V in 1933, when His late Majesty declared that the "union" might be flown publicly on the national day and on the King's birthday, the national day in this case being St. George's day and St. Andrew's day. The "union" is not the national flag of the United Kingdom, as many are prone to believe, for the simple fact is that the United Kingdom has no national flag. England has one, and Scotland, but not the U.K.

This is perhaps a purist view, but we are hearing here the opinion of a recognized authority on the matter. However, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to something that has come to us under the hand of Sir Anthony Wagner, Garter, Principal King of Arms, under date May 26, 1964. After all, he is Her Majesty's highest heraldic authority; it is his responsibility to offer advice on these matters. I think that what he says here tends to confirm in general what we have read in various flag texts as, for instance, the Observer's "Book of Flags", wherein it is stated that the union jack now is commonly used as the flag of the United Kingdom and a flag of the commonwealth of nations. Sir Anthony Wagner puts it this way:

> The difference between the arms of England and the St. George's cross, or between the present royal standard and union flag is not a difference of ownership, but a difference in the uses to which they are applied by the sovereign to whom they alike belong.
> One sometimes sees a distinction drawn in this context between the sovereign and the nation, on the lines that the royal standard is the sovereign's flag but the union the nation's. Such a distinction is alien to our constitution. For us the sovereign is the representative of the nation and the nation has and can have no flag but the sovereign's.

That is the view of Sir Anthony Wagner namely that the union flag is the flag of the sovereign. I listened carefully to my friend the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) last night and I thought he made a very logical and compelling address on this matter. I think one might reasonably contend that we do not need any symbol of commonwealth association to prove our loyalties to this commonwealth family of nations, and indeed the flag which we have selected as our national flag is a perfectly appropriate banner and will always be so regarded as an indication of the devotion of loyal Canadians, to the sovereign of Canada.

A few minutes ago we heard a respected privy councillor in this house who had served in world war I, and I believe in world war II as well, speaking feelingly with respect to symbols of the past. I am not in his age group; I am perhaps in between being old and being young. I am sure that for my children the Canadian flag alone would be quite adequate, but I believe there are many Canadians who will want this other symbol, the union jack preserved. Certainly in our churches, Legion halls and places like this there will be a great wish to preserve some precious symbol of this association which we value and treasure.

In conclusion, I would point out this interesting fact relating to flags authorized in war. On June 3, 1963, question No. 142 asked the government:

> What flags, or flags, were flown by the armed forces of Canada in world war I and world war II, and upon what authority?

The answer with respect to world war I is quite categorical: "The Canadian army flew the union jack." I am quite prepared to concede that there may have been occasions when other flags were flown, but this was the official answer. With regard to world war II the answer was:

> The union flag (jack) which was the flag officially prescribed in king's regulations and orders, 1939, for the Canadian army until superseded by the Canadian red ensign.

Hon. members will, of course, recall that on January 22, 1944 the Liberal government made provision for the Canadian red ensign to be flown by all units of the Canadian army serving with the forces of other nations.

So, Mr. Speaker, this is surely not the case of tearing down the Canadian red ensign. I am sure that we have enough wisdom and reverence for the past that at commemorative ceremonies and at places hallowed in the memories of those who fought in world wars I and II we will drape both flags at appropriate sites of remembrance. But as a continuing recollection of our British associations, of which we are so proud, I am sure that many of us will be very happy—certainly the people in Leeds constituency, which is a noted United Empire Loyalist community, will be—about flying with our new Canadian flag the old union flag of our sovereign. I think that in my constituency the union jack will always fly, and I am sure in other parts of Canada this will be so, as well.

I know we have heard expressions from certain members which indicate that this would not be acceptable to them. However, I would ask my good friends from the province of Quebec, who are not on this side but on the other side of the house, those not sympathetic to this view, to remember that being generous is the only way to build this nation. I think the French speaking people in Canada are as generous, as understanding and as sympathetic as any of us. Perhaps this is one of the characteristics of an ethnic minority. Perhaps they are more sensitive, more kindly, and more understanding of the feelings of others. So in order not to perpetuate two national flags I would ask hon. members to vote down this amendment and be prepared to show a generous support for an ancient banner, which has been described by Sir Anthony Wagner and the authorities to whom I have referred as being a royal badge.

Mr. Pugh: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Matheson: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Pugh: I just want him to clear up one point. The hon. member was talking about the older people and he referred to the Legion and to churches and said they might want to fly a flag. To which flag is the hon. member referring?

Mr. Matheson: On every official building under the control and auspices of the Canadian government—for example post offices, armouries and buildings like that—naturally our national flag would fly. But I agree that there are many occasions when the union flag could be flown; in some places it will continue to fly anyway. We are not going to find much change regarding the flying of the union jack, which I think is a good thing. In this connection, I cannot imagine the Carleton county home making any change.

May I point out in reply to the proposition of my hon. friend that there is a theory with respect to flags to the effect that a flag once in existence never really ceases to exist. My children go to a Gaelic college every summer and the flag flown there is always the St. Andrew's cross. I have friends who regularly attend the St. George's society, and the flag they fly is still the fine old flag of England. I am sure that in other places we will find the historic old flag of France. These flags are flown for a particular and peculiar purpose. The union flag has special recognition accorded to it in the permissive terms of the motion, but it does not conflict with or in any way diminish the importance of our national flag. This is exactly in accordance with the hopes and aspirations of King George V as he indicated in conversations prior to his death. I have as authority for that one Lewis Grant McNab, 4250 Sherbrooke street west, Montreal 6, Quebec, if the hon. member is interested.

Mr. Pugh: I just wanted a short answer to my question, Mr. Speaker. I did mention the Legion and churches. The hon. member also mentioned the older people, shall we call them the older generation, and contrasted them with the young people. Is he suggesting that the royal union flag should be flown over Legions?

Mr. Matheson: By the law of our Canadian realm a subject is free to fly any flag he wishes so long as it does not convey an erroneous message. I submit that, in those circumstances, that liberty is not being interfered with by the action we are taking. The clause creates a special permissive use and gives us a guide as to what is appropriate with regard to any occasion relating to our British connection or to Her Majesty.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak in this debate, and our group had agreed not to delay further the discussion on the amendment proposed by the Conservative party concerning the red ensign.

But after the Conservative leader told us that we must absolutely continue this debate until at least six o'clock, I would like to take a few minutes to state once more the views of our party concerning this amendment which was moved by the Conservatives.

First of all, I thought that after such a long fight to obtain a distinctive national flag the government would rest after such a painful labour without making a mess of everything and giving new headaches to the house with its second resolution, by endeavouring to have us accept through the back door a second flag for Canada.

Everyone knows our views on this matter. Every time we spoke on the flag issue, we plainly stated that we wanted only one distinctive national flag for Canada.

That is the fight we led throughout. We were accused of supporting the party in power in order to ensure the success of that idea. We did not accept anything, either from the party in power or from any other group. We merely defended the views of our constituents, the views of our province, and we finally accepted the opinion of the majority of the house, and we were very happy in doing so. I must congratulate the Conservative members who accepted the vote; I heard some this afternoon say that they accepted the decision of the majority, and I am happy to congratulate them for that.

I sincerely hope that this new flag will bring complete unity in Canada from one ocean to the other. I deplore that the Prime Minister and his government have brought forth this second resolution which was disapproved during our discussions on this second resolution dealing with a second flag, under the pretext that it would show our membership in the commonwealth nations.

In this respect I believe that the Conservative amendment does not make any more sense than the proposal of the Prime Minister concerning the adoption of the union jack, while the Conservatives propose the red ensign. Where is the difference between the two?

The union jack would bring back the memories of the colonialism we rejected in 1945 after the developments which then occurred. I congratulate those men who then set aside the union jack in order to adopt a new flag which was accepted at that time—namely, the red ensign. Today, there are those who would bring us back to the days of colonialism. We refuse to accept this.

The Conservative party offers us the red ensign which has been flying over Canada for the last 24 years. I am not ready to admit that the Conservatives are really wrong. As a matter of fact, I believe that the red ensign would more adequately represent our membership in the commonwealth than the union jack, since the red ensign, if it were approved, is, at least, a commercial flag, and would therefore stand for our commercial and military union with the other commonwealth countries. Neither would I say that the Conservatives are wrong in comparison with the Liberals, because I think that even if parliament were to accept the Conservative suggestion and retain the red ensign, that flag would be more acceptable than the union jack.

The red ensign, which was accepted in 1945, has just been put aside by parliament —which does not mean that we spurn it, nor indeed, the union jack—because this country is entering a new period of evolution in order to grow and attain a new status in the eyes of the world.

We were glad to accept this evolution, as were the parliamentarians of 1945 when they accepted the red ensign as a symbol of a new evolution in Canadian politics. We were very pleased with this evolution. We always worked in that direction, and we supported the government with all our might so that the single red maple leaf flag might become a reality throughout Canada.

Now, it has become a reality, and we are proud of that. I congratulate all members of the House of Commons who now support the decision of the committee, for I am not ready to say, as some claim, that this is a government flag. No, far from it. This is the flag of the committee specifically appointed to choose a design. We have agreed with the committee proposals to the effect that we accept this design.

Therefore, it is not the flag of one party in particular. It is the flag that stands for the national concept. We represent here the Canadian nation as a whole, the people of all provinces. We have had a majority vote and, as in all sound democracies, we must accept the wish of the majority, and this was accepted by most. I find there are but a few exceptions, people who have probably been in politics too long to keep pace with the evolution now taking place. That is somewhat the impression I get from those who are telling us today: we do not accept this flag.

I blame those old people who lack the required flexibility to get behind our new nation, which has taken a real step towards an evolution that will prove beneficial to the Canadian people.

As I said, if the house could accept a second flag to show our membership in the commonwealth of nations—I am saying if parliament could accept, could order—because I believe that parliament does not have the necessary powers to dictate anything to the commonwealth of nations, no more than this parliament has the power to impose a flag on NATO or the United Nations—it is up to the council of the commonwealth of nations to select an emblem for itself, and if and when they do make a selection we will accept it as we have accepted all the emblems of the organizations to which Canada belongs.

I have yet to see this parliament refuse to accept the emblem of the organizations which Canada has voluntarily and deliberately joined. When we reach the stage where such a decision should be taken, when all commonwealth countries will have decided upon a flag, no matter if it is the British flag, the red ensign or another one, it will be up to them and not to us to make such a decision, for we are not even entitled to decide upon such a matter. Why then is the Prime Minister and his cabinet so bent on doing something which we are not empowered to do? What strikes me and startles me is to see our governors so determined to take the place of others and decide for them while they are only associated with other countries composing the British commonwealth, countries who have to decide for themselves what emblem they should have.

I am not against an emblem representing all commonwealth countries or the commonwealth partnership. And I am also very proud to see the United Nations flag. We accepted it without the slightest action on the part of parliament, just as we do not need any legislation in order to accept the emblem for all commonwealth countries. I maintain that it does not rest with the Canadian parliament to choose this emblem.

I heard my friends opposite suggest that the union jack has always been considered generally as the flag of the commonwealth of nations. I would ask them to show me at least the resolution carried by all commonwealth countries which have agreed to recognize the union jack as the emblem of the commonwealth. If they are able to show it to me, I will be the first to follow them; but if they are unable to do that, we will maintain that the union jack represents England, which is our ally within the commonwealth. If, one day, it is decided to choose an emblem for the commonwealth, we will support it willingly, without need for regulations or laws. We will willingly support the decision of the commonwealth, as we accept the decisions of all the associations of which Canada is a member.

Mr. Speaker, in short, we do not support the Conservatives' amendment, not because it is weaker than the government's resolution, because in itself, the Conservatives' argument is stronger, but mostly for this reason: if the government lacks the power to propose the resolution, it also lacks the power to legislate on the amendment. The decision is not up to the government. We shall not support the amendment nor the resolution for the same reasons, because we feel that it is the responsibility of the leaders of the countries within the commonwealth of nations to select their own symbol. It is in that light that we consider the situation.

As for the second reason, to indicate our allegiance to the crown, we claim that if the Queen of England remains the queen of that country under the folds of the flag of England, why then would the Queen of Canada not remain the Queen of our country under the folds of the distinctive Canadian flag? Why again take a flag from our English friends to show the allegiance of Canada to their Queen? If the union jack can represent the allegiance of the English people to their sovereign, I maintain that our flag can indicate our allegiance to the Queen of Canada. Why was it chosen, if it is unable to represent us?

Mr. Speaker, this is all I wanted to say about the Conservative amendment and, for the above-mentioned reasons, we will not support the amendment nor the resolution which should never have been introduced, because it only spreads more confusion.

[Text]

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, it is now a quarter after five, and I realize that this house will rise at six o'clock. I desire to make some comments at this time, but I should like to point out sincerely that I have no intention or any desire to prevent a vote being taken on the amendment before the house. I realize that there are a large number of members in this house now in western Canada paying their last respects, not only to a late senator of this country, but paying tribute and honour to two sons and a nephew who are members of this house. I understand that a vote will not be taken under any circumstances today, and I admire the members of the house for their fine show of magnanimity and spirit in this connection. I, therefore, am prepared to make a few remarks on this amendment today knowing that when I speak I am not deliberately postponing a vote. I sincerely hope that the comments I have to make will be received in the spirit in which they are uttered.

I am a Presbyterian, Mr. Speaker, whose family has lived for almost 200 years in the valleys of the Ottawa and St. Lawrence rivers. We first came into this country in 1792 by coming down the Richelieu from Vermont, following the American revolution, and the family spread down the Richelieu to its mouth, and up and down the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa, ultimately as far as Shawville. I am proud to say that my mother, who is still living at 85 years of age, was a cousin of the late Senator Ralph Byron Horner. We all came out of the Ottawa valley together. The fact that the senator was named Ralph Byron Horner, that one of our members here is Ralph Horner and my name is Ralph Cowan is no coincidence. There has been marriage and intermarriage up and down the Ottawa, up and down the St. Lawrence and our people know one another. All of these people lived on both sides of these three grand rivers, the Richelieu, the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa.

Now, when I tell you I am a Presbyterian, I should like to point out that since I was first elected to the house the members have been kind enough to make me a member of the private bills committee on two different occasions. I have found it very interesting to deal with the business coming before that committee. Amongst the bills coming before it have been bills involving religious denominations. In every case, those who were intensely interested in the subject of a bill took an interest in seeing it passed through the committee and then through the house. Those whose religion was slightly different remained quiet and provided the necessary majority for their friends who wished to have some work done.

I make no apology, when discussing an amendment to the flag resolution, for referring to these religious incorporations which have come before the private bills committee, and for this very simple reason. I believe that most men and women hold their religious convictions and their patriotic feelings practically on the same plane. The congregations to which I have belonged in the past—and at the present time I am a member of Victoria Presbyterian church in west Toronto—honour the battle flags of many battalions by enshrining them in the sanctuaries of the churches. I refer to this fact to show you that there is an intermingling of the spirit of patriotism and religious fervor that you cannot separate, and God help the country where the two are ever rent asunder.

As a Presbyterian working on the private bills committee, I had the honour of helping to pass through the house a bill regarding the Canadian conference of the Brethren in Christ Church, which received royal assent on June 18, 1964. During the discussion in committee on that bill, those of other than the Roman Catholic faith took part quite actively, and it received the assent the sponsors so greatly desired. Then, we had another bill coming before the committee which received royal assent on September 16, 1964, one respecting the Congregation of the Marist Sisters, who were transferring their headquarters from the province of New Brunswick to the city of Hull in Quebec. When the private bills committee met on two separate occasions, I regret to advise the house that we did not have a quorum. I, a Presbyterian, went out in the highways and byways as we have been instructed to do in the Bible and brought in a quorum. The quorum came in and this bill was discussed in great detail by those greatly interested in the work of the Congregation of the Marist Sisters. It was beautiful to see the feeling that existed between the members of the committee, in that there was no criticism of that bill by other than Roman Catholics, and the Roman Catholic supporters then put their bill through and had majority support all the way.

Again, in the private bills committee, we had a bill come forward known as The Good News Broadcasting Association of Canada, Bill S-17. This was a bill that was of the greatest possible interest to Protestants on the committee, and I can only report honestly that there was quite a bit of discussion on that bill. This discussion took place entirely among Protestant members of the committee. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) and myself took an active stand in the matter, and the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) was opposed to our attitude, but the Good News Broadcasting Association bill did not receive assent. It did not get third reading in the house due to the discussion engaged in by Protestant members of the committee, and I stand here and publicly thank the Roman Catholic members of that committee, and those of other religious faiths, who provided the necessary quorum, and the necessary votes; and the action that a majority wanted to see taken, was taken.

You may remember that the matter came up right on the floor of the house—

Canadian Commonwealth Flag

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I realize the hon. member's remarks are introductory in nature, but the introduction is getting rather long and I would ask him to get to the meat of the subject.

Mr. Cowan: Sir, I thank you for the reference to the introduction that I wish to make. Might I have this extra paragraph? I have mentioned that I am a Presbyterian. Some people call us continuing Presbyterians but I do not use that title. Some Presbyterians prior to 1924 discontinued and joined the United Church, but the Presbyterians went right on as they had been going for generations.

In 1924 on the floor of the House of Commons a bill was presented for the incorporation of the United Church of Canada. I was 22 years of age at the time, and I wish to state with all the sincerity I possess that I never held the parliament of Canada in higher esteem than at that time. We were told that the Roman Catholic members of the Canadian House of Commons practically withdrew from the house when the bill to incorporate the United Church of Canada was brought forward. Feelings ran very, very high but they were not feelings between those of the Catholic faith and those of other denominations. The feelings were in the other denominations.

I checked this point at the supper hour last night with the former hon. member for Marquette, Manitoba, hon. Senator T. A. Crerar, now in his eighty eighth year, and asked him if I was not correct in my understanding that in 1924, when the United Church of Canada Act was passed through the house, the Roman Catholic members stood aside.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair is prepared to be lenient with the hon. member but I would ask him to be relevant to the question before the house.

Mr. Cowan: Thank you, sir. I will say that my preface has been completed. Senator Crerar confirmed the opinion that I had, and that many millions of people had at that time.

Now I come to the meat of the subject. I am one who cast a vote in the house, when there were very few members present during discussion of private bills, to change the name of T.C.A. to Air Canada. I am the one who cast the deciding vote in the railway committee to have two French Canadians on the board of directors of the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company.

[Mr. Cowan.]

Mr. Fisher: We helped you; we were there too.

Mr. Cowan: I said I am one. The vote was 8 to 7, but I had people come to me and say, "Cowan, we did not expect you to vote that way." I think that is enough for a preface.

The hon. member for Mégantic (Mr. Langlois), who was a member of the flag committee, spoke in the house last night and, as recorded at page 11156 of Hansard, he stated, in connection with the deliberations of the flag committee:

> —I can even say that the selection of such a flag brought tears to the eyes of many.

I believe the hon. member for Mégantic wholeheartedly when he makes that report. I know it to be a fact also that there were tears in the eyes of many not on the flag committee. It was nice to know members of the committee were that much affected by the emotions of patriotism.

The hon. member for Mégantic went on to say:

As a member of the house, as one who admires those members who use another tongue than mine, as one who has lived in peace and amity with them all my life, and will live on in that spirit for the remainder of the years which the Lord may give me, I, in all sincerity, in a question involving as much emotion as patriotism and in a question which, as the hon. member for Mégantic said, did bring tears to the eyes of the members of the flag committee—and I can assure you it brings tears to the eyes of many citizens of the Dominion of Canada—wish to make a request.

We had the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) rise in his place the other night, a member of the official opposition, and ask the cabinet to impose the rule of closure. We have had the Prime Minister of this country rise in his place and ask if members of the House of Commons would not consider, if they could not vote for the one leaf flag design, to refrain from voting so, as he put it, there would not be a mark showing they had voted against what he stated at that time would be the national flag of Canada within short order.

We had voted in the House of Commons for a distinctive new national flag. If it is passed by the Senate by this time it is the official national flag of Canada today, and it will be so honoured by the residents of the dominion. Now we have the opportunity of voting on a second flag. This was not my idea. The idea of two flags was introduced on May 28 and the resolution was divided into two on June 15. We are now considering the report of a flag committee that has recommended that there be two flags, and on the seventh report of that committee an amendment has been moved that the Canadian red ensign be chosen as a flag to show our allegiance to the British crown and our loyalty to the commonwealth.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) has been frank enough to state publicly on the floor of the house that he will not be voting on the amendment. I ask those French speaking Canadians who are members of the House of Commons if they will not seriously consider the action of those members of the House of Commons, in 1924, who absented themselves from the house? The total vote at that time was 148 out of a membership of 235, and those members allowed the question of a Protestant denomination being newly incorporated to be decided by that element in the house.

Now we are into a situation where speaker after speaker has referred to the union jack as a foreign flag. They refer to it as the flag of England. They refer to it as the flag of Great Britain, and others refer to it as the flag of the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland. We who love the two flags that have flown over this country in the past, and which are still unfurled to the breeze, ask those of our compatriots in the house who are so wholeheartedly in favour of the one maple leaf flag, which the House of Commons has declared to be the official national flag of Canada and which will be so honoured in the future by all citizens, to abstain from voting and allow us who love the two old flags and hold them so dear, to make the decision to show which shall be the flag demonstrating our allegiance to the crown and our membership in the British commonwealth of nations.

I have never asked any favour of any man. I find it hard to ask a favour tonight but I would remind you, of the words of Burke, who, when speaking on the subject known today as conciliation with America said:

> Magnanimity in politics is not seldom the truest wisdom.

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is not my desire to hold up in any way the proceedings in the debate on this amendment, but I did not speak in the debate on the first part of the flag question and I think I might be permitted to say a few words at this time.

I have been distressed at the perseverance of some members of the house in their abusive attitude towards the fairly chosen selection of the flag committee which was approved by the house the other night. I thought, therefore, I would speak for a minute or so today. I do so, though my remarks do not represent the ripened fruits of meditation; I have not had the opportunity to give much time to the consideration of exactly what I would say. Nevertheless there are certain views I would express.

For Canada I see shadows, clouds and darkness if the efforts of some to divide this country are not abandoned. I can understand that in the highly emotional atmosphere which existed during the first part of this flag debate feelings could easily carry one away. But now we have come to the second part of the resolution we should, I think, all attempt to take a broad view of the situation, and seek to reach a decision on a suitable second flag to mark our commonwealth connection with singular unanimity and enthusiasm. It seems to me unfortunate that the house should appear to be divided on the question of whether the union jack or the red ensign would best serve our country for this purpose. While I am of Irish descent myself I do not accept the proposition that any member of this house holds any higher regard for our historic relationship with the British isles and with Britain. In Nova Scotia, which is my province, we have always been closer to England than have some other parts of this country because of our geographical proximity, because most of the inhabitants of our province are of British descent and because of our close and historic trade ties. Joseph Howe, whom I will quote later in my remarks, said more than a hundred years ago that loyalty to our British connection is, in Nova Scotia, an enduring sentiment. And I think it remains an enduring sentiment today some 120 years after his remark was made.

I am quick to admit I would have had difficulty in voting for the selection of a totally distinctive and new Canadian flag if the union jack was not also to be recognized by this legislation. I was in this position: I felt we did need a distinctive flag, one which could not be mistaken in any part of the world for the flag of another country, but at the same time all my background and all my Nova Scotian sentiment favoured the reflection in some symbol of this country of a continuing connection with our mother country. I believe that the union jack which has been selected as the symbol of our commonwealth connection serves this purpose admirably. In these circumstances I felt I could vote for the selection of a distinctive flag. I believe most Nova Scotians would agree with me that we should have some symbol of our association with the commonwealth. I also believe that many Nova Scotians agree there is a need for a totally distinctive Canadian flag. In this regard I would quote the words of the hon. Robert L. Stanfield, premier of Nova Scotia, for whom I have great respect, although he is not of the same political faith as myself. Speaking on April 6, he said:

> Surely, however, it is not necessarily patriotic for me to insist that something I value highly must be adopted as a national symbol if it is objectionable as a national symbol to a large number of Canadians. Surely the Canadian thing for us to do is to find symbols which are mutually acceptable. Let us emphasize what we have in common. Surely we could have a national anthem and a flag which unites Canada.

Those were the words of the premier of Nova Scotia and while I do not dare speak for him I should be surprised if he, like many Nova Scotians, did not feel there is a place for a commonwealth flag, a flag which does show our tradition and our history.

In the course of a few minutes I will deal with the question whether that role is best fulfilled by the union jack or by the red ensign. Let me say that the selection of a distinctive flag is another step, although an important one, in the development of our nation, even as the change from the almost universal use of the union jack to a partial use of the red ensign was an earlier step. I had the opportunity of spending four weeks in the British House of Commons last spring in connection with the commonwealth parliamentary association and I came back from that visit with, if anything, even stronger feelings about our association with Britain than I previously felt. I treasure our relationship with the mother country and I do not accept the view that the use of a distinctive Canadian flag will in any way lessen those feelings or dishonour our relationship.

Let us now consider why we should choose the union jack rather than the red ensign. In the first place, the red ensign has been the Canadian flag since 1945 when it was adopted by order in council. The union jack has been the flag recognized as the symbol of the empire, and subsequently of the commonwealth, across the world from a much earlier date than that. The selection of the union jack would, I suggest, perpetuate our association with the British isles. The red ensign is a variation of that flag. I have no strong feelings on the question of whether the red ensign or the union jack should be the commonwealth flag. But on balance, after weighing the arguments in each direction, I have no difficulty in making my choice in favour of the union jack. If we wish to retain a symbol of all our past, of all the years of our past, what better symbol could there be than the flag which flew here on this hill in 1867, long before the red ensign had come ashore? At that time the union jack was the flag which reigned in Canada, as it was for a large part of our history. So if we are to choose a symbol of our past, why choose something which is a symbol of only part of our past? Why not designate the flag which flew at the time of confederation—a flag which to this day is used in my province, I would say, more widely than is the red ensign. I think the same is true of the other maritime provinces.

The red ensign, though of more recent vintage, deserves honour and respect. But even the words of the order in council at the time it was adopted show that it was to be of a transitory nature. On the other hand the union jack has always been flown in this country. It was under this flag that British justice and British culture spread across the world creating the political climate under which free nations such as Canada have been able to grow and prosper. I think it more fitting that the union jack should be selected as the flag symbolizing our ties with the commonwealth. The hopes and aspirations of the people who founded this federation were fulfilled under the union jack.

These are the few words I wanted to say on this subject today, Mr. Speaker. In common with all members of this house, I am sure, I am extremely grateful to the many Canadians who took the time and trouble to write to us during the months the flag question was topical in this nation, to express their views and help us in reaching our decisions. I received many letters on this subject. There were many letters that favoured the selection of a totally new flag, many that favoured the retention of the red ensign, many that favoured other designs. With regard to those who wrote to me in favour of the red ensign or the retention of a flag that contained the union jack, I hope they will in time see, as I honestly feel, that we are right and that their purpose and desire to not tear away the ties of history is best expressed by the adoption of the union jack as the commonwealth flag; but that as a great and growing nation of citizens of many races we need and badly need, a flag which will be recognized in all parts of the world as nothing but Canadian.

Speaking of the people who did write to me on this subject and specifically those who favoured the red ensign. I know that many of them, as is the case with many of my good friends on the Conservative side of the house, had strong, honest, sincere and deep feelings on the matter. On the day we had the flag vote, I received from a friend of mine, with whom I grew up from early boyhood, a telegram which read:

> It is not right that the red ensign which is treasured and loved by so many Canadians throughout the country should be taken from us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Regan: Yet, while I honour his views I feel that had he been here and had the opportunity to participate in this parliament and spend two or more years in Ottawa, his views of the nation as it exists, how it is evolving and where it is going might have been different. I hope he will find as time passes that what he is concerned about, namely not abandoning our past, is dealt with adequately by our legislation with reference to the union jack.

My final words will be in support of a suggestion that has been made by two or three members who spoke about the red ensign in the general debate on the first part of the resolution. I agree that the ensign did serve as this country's flag for a period of time, and when the legislation on the flag passes the Senate and comes into force and the ensign is lowered from the tower of this building, let it be done in dignity and let it then be conveyed with pomp and ceremony to an appropriate site of permanent honour.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I see that the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) wants to take the floor, and during the few moments I have I would like to set forth a few ideas.

As most hon. members know, I was chosen to represent my party on the flag committee. I took part in the discussions of the committee and I had to take a stand on several occasions. It is precisely about that stand that I wish to speak briefly for a few minutes.

By concurring in the sixth report, we voted for a distinctive national flag, and as far as I am concerned, I am convinced that it is our distinctive national flag which will remain.

I must pay a tribute for that to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), and those who followed him in this venture, for it was really a venture. I also want to pay a tribute to him for having had the courage, at this stage of Canadian history, to initiate those talks and, even at the risk of being the only French Canadian to support the second proposal, namely to adopt this emblem of our membership in the commonwealth, I will do it, if it were only to prove to the other members of the committee that I keep my word, that I abide by the opinions I set forth, and somehow to show them my unique faith in the circumstances. On the other hand, I would not like my words to be construed as meaning that this profession of faith or of opinion merely expresses my gratitude to the government or is inspired by the fact that at any time during the debate, I might have come to an arrangement with the government.

Far from it, but in the light of everything that has been said during those long debates and, as the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) explained so well a while ago, perhaps the government did not need a symbol to represent our allegiance to the commonwealth. I hope that Canada will take the initiative—I know that the right hon. Prime Minister is able to do so—to suggest at the next conference of the commonwealth which should take place very soon, the adoption of a symbol which could help the countries of the commonwealth to join in a trade bloc, because after all the commonwealth is, for all practical purposes, an economic union comparable to the union of South American states and that of European countries which is known as the common market.

It might be useful and wise for all these countries to unite and adopt a symbol to identify them and draw them closer in the policies they wish to adopt and implement.

Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, we are asked today to adopt a symbol of our membership in the commonwealth, which symbol I expect will only be temporary, because in years to come we will probably see this very commonwealth adopt a symbol of its own and, ipso facto, the symbol we are asked to adopt today will automatically be replaced.

Mr. Speaker, I also feel that all Quebeckers, even if they think that this question of an emblem to represent our membership in the commonwealth perhaps is not so important and, after all, does not mean very much, will appreciate that for the rest of English speaking Canadians, it will possibly be easier for them to accept, in coming years, this new distinctive Canadian flag we adopted last Monday night. In fact, if in order to be able to accept it gradually and more easily, they have to keep some symbol, I feel that to a certain extent—and that is my personal opinion—it would ill beseem us to deny them the right to a symbol which might, for a little longer, remind them of their past and their attachment to the British empire.

As for us, in Quebec, I think that it leaves us somewhat cold, because many generations ago, we cut our links with our mother country, which was France at the very beginning. Besides, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that, on the matter of feelings toward our mother countries, the Quebec group is probably two generations ahead. In fact, I am sure that two generations ago, if we had wanted to choose a national and distinctive flag, it is very likely that the citizens of our province would have asked for a symbol of France on their flag.

But with the years, with the rising generations, such feelings have come to pass, and I am sure that with our present youth, and in the years to come, the new flag we have adopted will be accepted and will become something genuinely Canadian, while the symbol we want to accept at the present time, to indicate our membership, will gradually fall into oblivion and will be replaced by another symbol which will be selected by the commonwealth countries themselves.

Mr. Speaker, apart from England of course, Canada is the oldest commonwealth country, and I hope that Canada will be on the ground floor of such an initiative, without, however, exerting any undue pressure on any member of the commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment before the house suggests replacement of the union jack mentioned in the seventh report of the committee by the red ensign.

I for one would not have taken a strong stand in favour of one or the other, but when the decision was taken in the committee and I noticed that the division was so deep that there was danger of having to submit a minority report, I preferred to suport the resolution in favour of the union jack, so that a majority report could be submitted to the house. I do not regret my action at all.

Mr. Speaker, with regard to the amendment under consideration my stand is as follows, and by this I am not binding any member of our party, since it was agreed at the beginning of the debate that everyone would be free to vote as he wishes. Personally, when the question was put to a vote in the committee, I voted in favour of the report as submitted to the house. I will take the same stand I then took and I will vote against the amendment moved by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming), because I definitely intend to support the resolution submitted by the committee.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I heard an hon. member say "Question".

According to the information we were given a while ago, no vote will be taken today, due to the absence of several Conservative members who wish to be present in this house when the vote is taken on their amendment.

I did not intend to speak on the seventh report of the flag committee dealing with a second flag, but after listening to the hon. members for Halifax (Mr. Regan) and York-Humber (Mr. Cowan), one suggesting that it is high time that we adopt a commonwealth flag, and the other asking that the French Canadians refrain from voting so as not to antagonize their English speaking fellow citizens, I thought I should make a few remarks.

I would only ask those people to give us the name of any member country in the British commonwealth of nations which, having a distinctive flag, has a second flag to show its allegiance to the crown or to the British commonwealth.

The British commonwealth of nations has no official flag. The union jack is the flag of England and not that of the British commonwealth of nations. Therefore, we cannot consider that flag today as the flag of the British commonwealth of nations. We would have no objection, however, if it were adopted as the flag of the British commonwealth of nations, provided it were so adopted by all member countries of that British community. We would have no objection to that.

But we do object to Canada having two flags. The mistake of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) was to place before us a resolution for the adoption of two flags, one to be flown every day of the week, the other on Sundays. That is what the people do not understand.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Halifax was explaining to us the meaning of the union jack. We know and respect what it means. But we also respect what the red ensign stands for. We respect all it stands for.

But I believe that with our distinctive national flag we can, as Canadians—not as French Canadians or English Canadians, but as Canadians—show our membership in the British commonwealth of nations by using our own symbols.

Nobody in the world, no commonwealth country has adopted a second flag. In the last few years, we have seen small countries get their independence; their first action was to choose a distinctive national flag, but not a second or a third flag—they chose only one flag. And yet these countries have been members of the British commonwealth of nations from the very beginning.

We have no objection to the nations of this commonwealth meeting and adopting the union jack, if they wish, as the flag of the British commonwealth of nations. Then, I would be the first to vote in favour thereof, here in parliament.

Mr. Speaker, may I point out that it is six o'clock.

[Text]

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether hon. members would be agreeable to letting the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) complete his speech tonight, and not see the clock until his speech is concluded.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, if we were discussing something really earth shaking like the Canada labour code it might be a worthwhile venture. Otherwise I do not think so.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, December 17, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PERMISSION TO PHOTOGRAPH HOUSE WHILE IN SESSION

Mr. Speaker: I hope hon. members will not object if the national film board completes its project of taking one or two pictures during the next 15 minutes. Hon. members will recall that they gave consent for this educational project on November 27. These pictures are to be used in school classrooms and I am told there will not be much if any interruption.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HARKNESS—REPLIES BY PRIME MINISTER TO QUESTIONS IN HOUSE

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege which also affects the entire house. It concerns the memorandum sent by the Prime Minister to the Dorion commission in connection with the answers to questions which I directed to him on November 24. These appear on pages 10428 and 10429 of Hansard for that day, and I read the relevant questions and the Prime Minister's answers:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in order to clear up what appears to me to be an ambiguity, as I am sure it appears to other hon. members consequent upon some of the answers given to questions today. Was the Prime Minister informed by the Minister of Justice of any of the circumstances of this case, which is now going to be investigated, prior to those circumstances being brought out in this house yesterday?

Mr. Pearson: I think the Minister of Justice has dealt with this matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the reason I asked the question is that it appeared from questions and answers that the Prime Minister had not been informed about his parliamentary secretary. It was not clear whether he had been informed about any of the other circumstances, and my question is this. Was he informed by the Minister of Justice in regard to any of the other circumstances of this case prior to those circumstances being brought to the attention of this house yesterday?

Mr. Pearson: I was informed by the Minister of Justice of some of the circumstances shortly before his estimates came before the house. He told me this matter would be before the house during the consideration of his estimates. He told me the facts of the matter. My parliamentary secretary, who has just resigned, has already indicated in his statement that he had not informed me of this matter until this morning.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's answer touched upon the ambiguity I mentioned, which was the reason for my question. When the Prime Minister said he was informed before the minister's estimates were put before the house, does he mean he was informed yesterday or a week ago? When was he informed?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think I was informed on the day before his estimates were brought before the house.

—which would be Sunday, November 22. These questions and answers made it clear and definite that the Prime Minister had no knowledge of any of the circumstances—and I emphasize the word "any"—of this case until November 22.

In this morning's Gazette it is announced that yesterday the Prime Minister sent a memorandum which was read into the record of the Dorion commission. As it appears in the Gazette it reads as follows:

Mr. Pearson's memo filed with the inquiry said: During the evening of November 23 and the morning of November 24, I learned for the first time of the details of the allegations and of the contents of the R.C.M.P. report into the Rivard case.

As I told the house on November 24, I had not known until that day of the alleged involvement of my parliamentary secretary in this matter.

The member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) then asked me whether I was informed and, if so, when, of any of the other circumstances of this case prior to these matters being brought to the attention of the house November 23.

My answer on this point should be clarified. I made it clear that I first learned of the contents of the R.C.M.P. report shortly before the justice estimates were introduced November 23.

However, the Minister of Justice had informed me earlier, on September 2, that there were allegations of bribery involving the executive assistant (Denis) to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration; that these allegations were denied by the official in question; that they were being investigated by the R.C.M.P. upon the instructions of the Minister of Justice and with the knowledge, of course, of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration; and that the person in question had been sent on leave while the investigation was taking place.

Clearly those were the full and appropriate measures at that stage and they had been taken promptly. I was, therefore, content to wait for the R.C.M.P. report of which, as I have already stated to the house, I was informed on November 23.

This statement is not, in my mind, a clarification but rather an admission that the information given to the house on November 24 was incorrect. I point out, Mr. Speaker, that had the correct information been given —that the Prime Minister was aware of the charges against Mr. Denis on September 2— I, and no doubt many other members, would have had further questions to ask him, and the whole course of the debate would have taken a quite different direction.

Not only has the house been misinformed and affronted in this way, but it has been further affronted by the Prime Minister not having made his new statement here, as he could have done at any time on a question of privilege rather than sending it in the form of a memorandum to the Dorion commission.

A further question of the Prime Minister's position vis-á-vis the House of Commons arises from the point of how long ago he realized he had made a misstatement to us, and thus how long he continued to leave us in ignorance as to the true facts.

This is a case, Mr. Speaker, which I think you should take under advisement.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman has raised a question of privilege which very definitely and directly concerns me; and I know, Mr. Speaker, that you will give me an opportunity to deal with it. I appreciate, if I may say so, the terms in which the hon. member raised the question.

Mr. Speaker, I want first of all to deny that I deceived the house in the answer I gave on November 24, either inadvertently or deliberately. When I answered the question on that day as put by the hon. gentleman concerning the circumstances surrounding this matter I was thinking of the circumstances surrounding the production of this report and the contents of this report in respect of members of parliament and others who were mentioned in the report.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peters: The same as the uranium deal.

Mr. Pearson: Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but I am giving the facts of this matter without any reservation or qualification.

An hon. Member: Cover up.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps members opposite would allow me to make my statement on this very serious matter without snide and smearing observations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howard: You are pretty thin-skinned over there.

An hon. Member: Oh, be quiet.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I left that afternoon for the west, and when I returned I was informed by the Minister of Justice that I had omitted to add some information which, while not in my mind dealing directly with the question of the report, with when it was received and with the contents of the report, concerned the background of the whole matter. I drafted a memorandum at that time which I had intended to read to the House of Commons when we got on to routine proceedings.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, that happens to be the truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: As hon. gentlemen know, the commission had been set up by the time I got back; the commission had been established and was about to commence its hearings. When the commission commenced its hearings last week and before the house reached motions, when these statements could be made, I realized that perhaps this matter would come up in evidence before the commission and that therefore I should tell the commissioner, as I did when I first met him on December 2 when he was appointed, that there was certain background information about my connection with this matter which should be in his hands. I sent him this memorandum without any request of any kind that it should be made public, but I felt he should have the information: As I said in my letter, I was going to make that information available to the house at the first opportunity.

I was entirely accurate when dealing with the circumstances of the matter in saying that I first heard of the R.C.M.P. report and of any of its contents on November 23. It is true, as I have already said, that the Minister of Justice mentioned to me on September 2, when we were on a plane returning from the Charlottetown conference, that there had been charges of bribery levelled against an official in a minister's office, that those charges had been denied and that the R.C.M.P. were investigating the charges. This seemed to me the proper course of action to take. I must confess that the matter was then put in the back of my mind pending a report from the minister as to the result of that investigation. It is quite true that when I got on my feet on November 24 I had completely forgotten the earlier conversation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Hon. gentlemen may laugh at that, Mr. Speaker, but it was a conversation on board a plane about a matter which was being investigated by a minister and the R.C.M.P., and I was informed that when the investigation had been completed I would be given the results. It is quite true that I did put the matter in the back of my mind from that time, and until November 23 I heard nothing further about it.

On November 24 I gave the house all the information I had—that I thought I had—at that time regarding the circumstances surrounding the production of this report and its contents. I am very sorry indeed, and I apologize to my hon. friend; because if I had had that matter in my mind at the time I would of course have added that information, even though it was relevant only to the original charge to the inquiry that was being made and not to the report of the police which I had not received at that time, or to the content of that report. I apologize for that omission; but believe me, Mr. Speaker, the information I gave was accurate, and I did not deceive the house in that information.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, if I might just say another word or two, the Prime Minister says he had forgotten he had been told this; but he has not told us and he has not explained to the house, and I think he has far from satisfied members, why when he remembered it—and he has not told us when he did remember it—he did not then make a clean breast of the whole matter in the House of Commons. Instead of that he said he told the commissioner about these particular facts on December 2 because by that time he knew this was going to come out in evidence.

I think, Mr. Speaker, we are still left in the position where the house has been kept in the dark. It was misinformed to begin with, and then it was kept in the dark ever since until it became apparent that it could not be kept in the dark any longer. I think this is a matter which Your Honour should take under advisement, and consider whether it should go to the committee on privileges and elections.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I entirely agree with the suggestion that Your Honour should take this matter under advisement and take any action which you see fit regarding it.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: May I ask, is this on the same subject?

Mr. Douglas: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I had intended to raise this matter on a question of privilege, but in view of the fact that the hon. member for Calgary North was the member whose questions were answered and he was directly affected by the replies, I was quite willing to give way to him. I am now rising on a question of privilege regarding the unsatisfactory nature of the answers we have received.

I think my point of privilege can be dealt with in two parts. The first is that the answers of the Prime Minister are completely unsatisfactory. The questions which were asked on November 24 by the hon. member for Calgary North had nothing to do with whether or not the Prime Minister was aware of the charges contained in the R.C.M.P. report or any of the allegations contained therein. Nor had it anything to do with information regarding the involvement of his parliamentary secretary. Those two questions had been answered the same day but prior to these answers. The three questions which were put in succession by the hon. member for Calgary North, as reported at page 10429 of Hansard, had to do with whether the Prime Minister had been informed "about any of the other circumstances". The answer of the Prime Minister was clear and succinct. First of all he said he had been informed only shortly before the justice estimates came before the house. His second reply was:

> —I think I was informed on the day before his estimates were brought before the house.

In view of the statement of the Prime Minister to the effect that when he gave that reply he had forgotten that on September 2 these matters had been revealed to him, it would seem to me that if on November 22, the day before the estimates were brought to the house, the Minister of Justice had informed the Prime Minister that he had the R.C.M.P. report in his possession and that it contained serious allegations regarding certain persons, surely that would have refreshed his memory about the conversation which had taken place on September 2. Therefore I find it extremely difficult to understand how the Prime Minister on November 24 could make the categorical assertion that he knew nothing about any of the other circumstances regarding the Rivard case until the day before the estimates were introduced in the house.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that this is completely at variance with the statement filed by the Prime Minister with Chief Justice Dorion. This statement is attached to a letter which, if I may quote in part, says:

> I had hoped that before now I would have been able to make a short statement on this aspect of the matter to the House of Commons, but the procedural situation made that impossible.
> I hope that very shortly the procedural difficulties will be removed, but meanwhile I am attaching to this letter a copy of what I had hoped to say before now, as I think you may wish to have it before the inquiry opens tomorrow.
> Yours sincerely,
> L. B. Pearson.

The memorandum which is attached is dated December 14 and is entitled "Statement by the Prime Minister". It is in the following terms:

> This is my first opportunity to report to the house on the judicial inquiry which, as I mentioned three weeks ago on November 24, would investigate allegations that had been made concerning possible bribery and improper pressures in relation to the extradition case involving one Lucien Rivard.

The relevant paragraphs, Mr. Speaker, are these:

> The member for Calgary North then asked me whether I was informed and, if so, when, of any of the other circumstances of this case prior to these matters being brought to the attention of the house on November 23.
> My answer on this point should be clarified. I made it clear that I first learned of the contents of the R.C.M.P. report shortly before the justice estimates were introduced on November 23. However, the Minister of Justice had informed me earlier, on September 2, that there were allegations of bribery involving the executive assistant to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration; that these allegations were denied by the official in question; that they were being investigated by the R.C.M.P. upon the instructions of the Minister of Justice, and with the knowledge, of course, of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration; and that the person in question had been sent on leave while the investigation was taking place.

My first point, Mr. Speaker, is that if the statement which the Prime Minister filed with Chief Justice Dorion is correct, then the statements made by him on November 24 as reported at page 10429 of Hansard are incorrect, and the house was consequently misled by the Prime Minister regarding the statements he made at that time.

My second point of privilege is that the Prime Minister has had over three weeks in which to refresh his memory and make a correction in the House of Commons. It is not correct, as he says in his letter to the chief justice, that the procedural situation made that impossible or that there were procedural difficulties which he hoped would be removed. Mr. Speaker, there were no procedural difficulties, because any member at any time can rise in his place on a question of privilege. As a matter of fact, during the past two weeks several members at various times have risen on questions of privilege. There was nothing to prevent the Prime Minister from correcting this matter and correcting his statements of November 24. If he found that his memory had been defective with respect to the replies he made to the hon. member for Calgary North he could at any time after his return from his trip west have risen in his place and told the house that he had been in error, and set the matter right.

We take a very serious view of the fact that the Prime Minister made no such statement in the house, and for a period of over three weeks made no attempt whatsoever to correct what was obviously a misstatement of fact. Instead, the Prime Minister sent a statement to the chief justice, which he said he hoped to make in the house when the procedural difficulties were removed. It is only today, when a question of privilege has been raised, that the Prime Minister has seen fit to make an explanation to the effect that his memory had failed him when he was replying to the questions asked by the hon. member for Calgary North.

Therefore I think the members of this party cannot accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary North that this be referred to Your Honour. With all due deference, sir, I feel that this matter must be referred to the house and to the proper committee appointed by the house for that purpose. This is a matter which the house must determine. If the house feels, as I do, that it was misled by the Prime Minister in answers which he gave on November 24 to the hon. member for Calgary North, the house must determine that and the house must say so. If on the other hand the house is satisfied with the explanation which the Prime Minister has given or by any further elaboration which he may care to make to the committee on privileges and elections, then at that time the house can make a determination as to whether or not the house was misled by the Prime Minister, and decide if that was due to either an unwitting or an intentional action on the part of the Prime Minister.

I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher):

That the statements made in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister on November 24, 1964, concerning his knowledge of the matters referred to in order in council P.C. 1964-1819, as amended by order in council P.C. 1964-1820, be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections for consideration in the light of statements made by the Prime Minister in his letter of December 14, 1964, to the commissioner appointed under the terms of the said order in council and in the statement enclosed with the said letter.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Before accepting the motion, Mr. Speaker, you must first of all determine whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. If you do accept the argument that there is a prima facie case of privilege, then of course the substantive motion which has been made is in order. In so far as we in this party are concerned, we believe that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary North is a good one, that is that you take this matter under advisement.

If, in your determination, you are able to satisfy yourself that there is a prima facie case of privilege, then of course you can allow the motion that has been moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. It appears to us at this stage that there is a prima facie case of privilege. We believe the house will determine this matter eventually, but that it ought to go to a committee so we can have the facts all assembled.

We know this whole matter is now under investigation by a judicial inquiry set up by the government, known as the Dorion commission. I believe the determination of whether or not the house has been misled can be brought out by cross checking the evidence that will come out in this judicial inquiry against the dates and the statements that have been made in this house. Then the committee will be able to decide whether there has been a misstatement of the facts in this house or whether there has been an honest lack of memory.

So far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, we would support the suggestion that this matter be referred to a standing committee of the house, and I believe the Prime Minister has already accepted this procedure.

Mr. Pearson: There is a motion before the house now, and perhaps I can say a word about it. As I understand the rules, if any member of this house makes a charge that a member of this house has deliberately deceived the house, that is a matter which must be investigated and the hon. member making the charge takes the responsibility for asking for the investigation before a committee. If a charge is made it must be investigated, and the hon. member making the charge takes the responsibility for that. Under the circumstances now, I do not know whether the hon. member is making such a charge. It must be a charge that I deliberately deceived this house. If that is the charge it certainly should be investigated.

The hon. member has said two other things. He said that two or three weeks ago I should have made the kind of statement I have now made as a question of privilege. The hon. member obviously does not give much credence to my statement that I believed the right way to do this was not as a question of privilege, which if I had raised it would have been tantamount to admitting that I had deceived the house, but by making a statement on motions which could be replied to by hon. members of the house. This is what I intended to do at the first opportunity, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman has said.

Another point the hon. gentleman made was that I discussed the matter with the Minister of Justice on the morning of November 24 and he must have informed me of the earlier talks. He does not accept my word when I say I was not informed by him of any of the antecedents of this matter. He does not have to accept my word, but I repeat that is the truth, absolutely.

Mr. Douglas: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I cannot allow the Prime Minister to put words into my mouth. What I said was that when the Minister of Justice, according to the Prime Minister's own statement, informed him on November 22, the day before the estimates were brought into the house, that he had in his possession a report from the R.C.M.P. alleging certain wrongdoing on the part of certain persons, surely that must have refreshed the Prime Minister's memory that he had discussed this matter with the Minister of Justice on September 2. It is therefore difficult to understand why on November 24 he could not remember this previous conversation.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member may find it difficult to understand, but I am telling him the facts. When the Minister of Justice spoke to me, it was to the effect that a report had been received, and what it contained. I had no thought of the earlier discussion at all. He can accept that statement or not, but I am making it as a statement which is true. I would remind the hon. member that, as I said in my first statement, this was a conversation on an airplane coming back from a constitutional conference, the kind of statement which could easily be put in the back of a prime minister's mind when he had other things in his mind during that week, and especially when it was a matter that was now in the hands of the minister and the R.C.M.P. I was informed I would be given the results of the investigation when the minister felt they were complete. This is the story, and it is the absolute and complete truth.

I might have made an error in not getting up on a question of privilege, but I thought it would be better to make a statement under motions. I apologize if that error was made. If the hon. member wishes to charge me with deceiving the house deliberately, he should do so and certainly the matter should go to a committee.

Mr. Speaker: I have to decide whether there is a question of privilege. Dealing first with the argument of the hon. member for Calgary North, I should like to cite Beauchesne, citation 104, subsection (2), which reads:

> It has often been laid down that the Speaker's function in ruling on a claim of breach of privilege does not extend to deciding the question of substance whether a breach of privilege has in fact been committed—a question which can only be decided by the house itself.

It seems to me, therefore, that it is not part of my function, as was suggested, to take all this into consideration, and I do not propose to do so. Furthermore, the hon. member did not finish up with a motion either to refer this to a committee or asking for some penalty, and without some specific motion it seems to me it was a general statement and not necessarily a question of privilege. Then we had a long explanation from the right hon. Prime Minister, and up to that stage it seems to me it was more in the nature of a grievance than a question of privilege. Then the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam rose and moved the motion which I have before me.

In that connection I should like to call to the attention of the house a ruling by Mr. Speaker Michener which is very much in point. The ruling appears in the Journals of the House of Commons of June 17, 1959 and I referred to it in the house on October 30, 1964. I do not propose to read the whole ruling but just to cite one key sentence. These are the words of Speaker Michener:

> In my view, simple justice requires that no honourable member should have to submit to investigation of his conduct by the house or a committee until he has been charged with an offence.

On reading and studying the motion moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam it seems to me there is no specific charge set out in it. The words are too vague. If the hon. member wishes to make a specific charge there is a proper way to do it, to stand and bring a specific charge.

Here we are dealing with a misstatement, not a question of privilege. There must be a real accusation made against, in this case, the right hon. Prime Minister, and there must be something in the charge which shows the misstatement, if it was a misstatement, was made with intent, with purpose. There is no specific charge, and in view of the ruling of Speaker Michener and of what I have said, in my opinion there is not a prima facie case and therefore no question of privilege.

Mr. Douglas: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the ruling you have given misses the entire point of the motion which I placed before Your Honour and the house, namely that two statements are now before the house, one a series of answers made by the Prime Minister to questions on November 24, and the other the memorandum sent by the Prime Minister to Chief Justice Dorion, and that they are completely at variance.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may not like the ruling, but the ruling has been made in the best possible faith. I repeat once more there is nothing to prevent the hon. member bringing a charge, properly drafted, but in my opinion this is not properly drafted. There is no specific charge, and until there is I cannot accept it.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, believing that the house and the house only has the right to make a decision on this matter, I would therefore regretfully appeal your ruling.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it is proper to say anything at this time. I do not want to, but I feel a very serious situation has arisen and I am sure the Prime Minister would be most anxious to have this sent to a committee.

There are the two divergent statements. I recognize that one can forget—fail to remember—as a prime minister carrying all the information that a prime minister does, but surely he would want the committee to look into this question that he should have forgotten a matter so important as this. I make that appeal to him, that he accept the suggestion and not rely on the question of charge or counter-charge.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the matter is in your hands. You have made a ruling, and I believe it has been appealed.

Mr. Speaker: That is exactly what I was going to say to the house, that a decision of the Chair has been given. The decision has been appealed.

The house has heard the decision of the Chair, from which the hon. member has appealed to the house. All those in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

And the members having been called in:

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question is an appeal to the house from a ruling of the Chair which is as follows:

"The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) as a question of privilege proposed to move that the statements made in the House of Commons by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on November 24, 1964, concerning his knowledge of the matters referred to in order in council P.C. 1964"—

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I dispense?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Speaker:

The Chair decided that in the absence of a specific charge in the wording of the proposed motion he could not find the basis of a prima facie case of privilege.

Whereupon the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam appealed to the house from the decision of the Chair.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

PENSIONS

SECOND REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON CANADA PLAN

Mr. A. J. P. Cameron (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the second report of the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Canada pension plan, in English and in French. By unanimous consent I intend to move concurrence in this report later this day.

[Later:]

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON CANADA PLAN

Mr. A. J. P. Cameron (High Park) moved that the second report of the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Canada pension plan presented this day be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent for the Chair to put this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN COMMONWEALTH FLAG

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SEVENTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, December 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Batten that the seventh and final report of the special committee on a Canadian flag, presented to the house on Thursday, October 29, 1964, be now concurred in, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton).

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned yesterday at six o'clock I was saying that we, in this corner of the house, have or would have no objection to the seventh report of the flag committee being considered again so as to suggest to the government to propose the union jack as the commonwealth flag to all member countries of the British commonwealth of nations.

Several members mentioned yesterday that the Canadian parliament could adopt this flag, since Canada is a member of the British empire or of the British commonwealth of nations.

Now, that flag is not recognized at all as the flag of the empire or of the British commonwealth of nations, but rather as the flag of a country, namely England.

I wish to repeat that we hold nothing against the traditions represented by the union jack or the red ensign. We have nothing against what either of these two flags represent, far from it. On the other hand, the people of Canada wonder why our country should have two flags. Ours will be the only country in the world, in similar circumstances, to have two flags; a Canadian national flag and another to prove its membership in the commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Speaker, surely we need no flag other than our own Canadian flag to indicate our co-operation with the other members of the British empire. We would have no objection either should any province decide to adopt the red ensign as its provincial flag, if it wishes to do so. We would have no objection to that, but Quebec does have a provincial flag, and it is not trying and never tried to impose it on the federal parliament or any of the other Canadian provinces. We would not attempt either to impose to anybody our provincial flag which symbolizes our origins and our traditions which are essentially Canadian, because everybody knows that Canada was first discovered in 1534 by Jacques Cartier. Therefore, at that time our allegiance was to France. But today we would not impose or try to impose French symbols on the Canadian people as a whole.

We have seen other provinces besides Quebec adopt a provincial flag. For instance, British Columbia and Nova Scotia adopted a provincial flag, and Saskatchewan adopted one yesterday. If Alberta decided to adopt a flag similar to the red ensign or the union jack, we would have the greatest respect for such a decision.

Unfortunately, such is not the case: Attempts are made to force a second Canadian flag on us. And we are sorry to say that this project of the Prime Minister or of the government to adopt a second flag for Canada is bringing about unfortunate reactions in certain parts of Canada.

Reading in the press yesterday and this morning that hon. members from Ontario and other provinces were threatened because they voted for a distinctive national flag, we wonder what has become of our truly Canadian civilization, what has become of that civilization we wish to set as an example for several nations in the world, when things get to the point where hon. members are threatened because they vote for a true Canadian symbol.

Mr. Speaker, we deeply regret the doings of these people who make threats against hon. members, be it against members of the Liberal, Conservative, New Democratic, Social Credit or Ralliement Créditiste parties. I think the Canadian people have reached such a degree of maturity that our country, Canada, can be held up as an example to other countries, and even to certain countries which are members of the British commonwealth of nations at this time.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment moved by the Conservatives and included in the second part of the resolution, to the effect of changing the union jack for the red ensign, faces us with a choice, to use the words of some hon. members.

Now, we of the Ralliement Créditiste have said loud and clear, not only in the province of Quebec but also in Ontario, and I even said so in western Canada, that we would support the adoption of a distinctive national flag, but not two Canadian flags. That statement met with the approval of English speaking and French speaking people as well, and today the Conservative amendment does not imply a choice to the effect of changing the union jack for the red ensign.

Let me tell you how we will vote on this amendment and on the main motion. We have the greatest respect for what the union jack and the red ensign represent, but we still stick to the ideas set forth several months ago to the effect that Canada must have one flag and not two flags, and that it can belong to the British commonwealth of nations with its distinctive Canadian flag and nothing else.

Mr. Speaker, the proposal for the adoption of the red ensign forces us to make a choice, and the stand we have taken is evident. We are in favour of one flag and against any plan for the adoption of a second flag. The Conservatives would like to give us the red ensign as a second flag and the Liberals want to give us the union jack as a flag indicating our allegiance to the crown and our membership in the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Speaker, we agree neither to the amendment of the Conservatives, nor to the main motion, and we will be against any plan and any amendment or subamendment which would force upon us a second flag, whatever it may be.

We want to remain authentic Canadians from coast to coast and I think that England and all other countries of the British commonwealth of nations will respect us even more if we appear before them with a Canadian symbol representing Canada in this British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Speaker, those are the few remarks I wanted to make on the amendment now before us as well as on the main motion that we will probably discuss this afternoon.

Our stand is clear and I will sum it up this way.

The distinctive national flag is adopted. We have voted for that flag not because we had something against one or the other, but because we have voted as real Canadians, not as French Canadians.

We shall vote against the Conservative amendment and against the main motion.

[Text]

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to speak in support of the amendment now before the house. I recall very well that during the 33 days of discussion on the important matter of the flag more than one member of this house asked all members to exercise self discipline, not to be repetitive and not to repeat arguments that had already been made. I must have taken that request to heart, Mr. Speaker, because this is the first time I have risen to speak to the flag motions.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Winch: One hon. member says "Shame". Sir, my position was known to all the members of this House of Commons; my position, I believe, was known to the people of Canada because of the symbolic gesture which I made to indicate that no flag should be raised on parliament hill that was not the flag of Canada since it had not been approved by the House of Commons. My position being known to all the members and all the people of Canada, and some 270 speeches having been made, what more was required to be said on either side of the question? When I had the opportunity of expressing my hope, I voted for the red ensign as the distinctive flag of Canada. When that motion was defeated, we then had to face the vote on the recommendation of the special committee of the House of Commons, a special committee representative of all parties, and having lost what I really wanted, then as a democratic member of a democratic House of Commons I accepted the majority democratic position of all parties in this House of Commons and voted for the new flag. I make no apologies for that.

Now, sir, we have a further question in front of us, and that is what you may call a second flag, a flag introduced on the basis of the fact that, in addition to a national flag, we should have one that will demonstrate the relationship of Canada within the commonwealth, as a part of the commonwealth and of our allegiance to the peoples and countries that were the founders of our country.

I disagree completely with the recommendation of the committee. I cannot understand how the committee reached their conclusion. It is to be a flag that demonstrates our relationship with the commonwealth. How you demonstrate your relationship with the commonwealth by a flag which is wholly and solely outside of Canada, I cannot understand.

The amendment is reasonable; the amendment is understandable. The amendment is the only position that the members of the House of Commons can take in support of the committee if they want a second flag which demonstrates Canada's position within the commonwealth. This flag is, should be, and must be the red ensign. This morning I made once again a special study of the facts to insure that my information was correct, and I think it is.

Let us take the union jack, strictly as the union jack, and we find that is not a flag which demonstrates the relationship between Canada and the commonwealth. It is the flag of the United Kingdom. However, I should like to put this to the members: Take the red ensign, and what is it? It is a combination of the union jack and the Canadian shield. Why is it, sir, that no matter what constituency or province one comes from, there are so many in this house who ignore the Canadian shield. We have the union jack on the red ensign. We have the union jack which we, in Canada, share with other commonwealth countries in what is sometimes termed the staff side of the flag or the jack side of the flag or, if you want to be particular, the canton No. 1. So, on the staff side, the jack side, the canton No. 1, is the union jack, which represents not only the United Kingdom but the commonwealth because it is common to all the commonwealth countries. On the red ensign also, Mr. Speaker, you have the Canadian shield.

Now, sir, a few weeks ago this was explained in heraldic terminology. I am afraid too many have forgotten the heraldic terminology of the Canadian shield. On the red ensign, the Canadian shield is symbolic of Canada. This shield has maple leaves on it, which everyone agrees are symbolic of Canada. It also has emblems that go back to ancient times, ancient times of the peoples and countries who have founded and built this country. You have the couchant lion or, if the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Matheson) were here, he would refer to it as the heraldic leopard. We know that it came over from France and was the emblem on the flag of William of Normandy. Ever since, from 1066, it has been incorporated in the heraldry of Great Britain and of the British kings. On the shield of Canada you have the red lion rampant on a golden field, which was the emblem of the Scottish kings and came to Scotland from ancient Ireland. Then, you have the harp, an emblem on our Canadian shield which is equally ancient and was taken into Ireland many centuries ago. You have the fleur-de-lis on the Canadian shield, which is well known as the lily of France and held a proud place in the arms of British kings proclaiming the French ancestry of the sovereigns from, to put it politely, the distaff side of the house. About the time the fleur-de-lis was removed from the royal arms of the United Kingdom it began to appear in the heraldry of Canada and it has been there ever since.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these emblems on the Canadian shield represent the early pioneers who were instrumental in laying the foundation of our country, Canada. We must remember that the emblems on the Canadian shield, with all their heraldic meaning and early history, were incorporated officially in 1921 because the Canadian government requested King George V to prepare a new coat of arms for Canada. It was in response to the request of Canada in 1921 that the royal college of heralds laid down what we now know as the coat of arms or the shield of Canada.

In view of all the foregoing, in view of the fact that the House of Commons has established what is termed a national, distinctive flag, I say it seems only suitable that the second flag which demonstrates our understanding of the past, recognizes the ethnic groups that founded Canada, demonstrates our history of the past, our allegiance to the past, our recognition of the pioneers who came from many countries and made Canada great, our recognition of our membership in the commonwealth, should be one on which you have the union jack on the staff and the coat of arms on the fly. On that one flag we have Canada with its history and origins, and with its membership in the commonwealth of nations.

Sir, how can anyone argue against the red ensign in such a matter? How can anyone say, with our understanding of the commonwealth, that the second flag shall be the flag of a country outside Canada? The real living proof of our membership in the commonwealth and the real living proof of our knowledge of history and ancestry demand that we have both together on the flag of the commonwealth, the shield of Canada and the flag of the mother country, with tribute to the pioneers who founded our country. It is as simple as that. I have nothing to say against the union jack, but having made a decision the other night on a distinctive national flag I say our second flag should be the red ensign, which is the proof of our history and our pride within the commonwealth.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Girouard (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I only wish to make a few short remarks.

We will soon be asked to substitute the red ensign for the union jack as a second flag for Canada. I believe, like most of my constituents and a great majority of the Canadian people, that one flag is sufficient to represent Canada.

Whatever the outcome of this vote, whether the red ensign or the union jack is chosen as the second flag, I intend to vote against both, when the vote is taken on the main motion.

Since my constituents and myself are not interested in the vote which will be taken, I will abstain from voting when we will be called upon to choose between the red ensign and the union jack, and, as I said, I shall vote against both when the main motion comes up.

An hon. Member: Question.

[Mr. Girouard.]

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Beer: Mr. Speaker, I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

[Translation]

Mr. Robert Beaulé (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to prolong unduly this debate on the seventh report of the flag committee.

Inasmuch as we voted only a few days ago to select a flag, I fail to see the importance of giving Canada a second flag as a symbol of our allegiance to the crown and our membership in the commonwealth.

Canada was without a flag for 97 years. But today we are offered two flags. Now, there are some who claim that we are not going to have two. Why then should there be two resolutions asking us to adopt two flags.

Mr. Speaker, if in 1931, when Canada gained its independence under the Statute of Westminster, our country had been given a distinctive flag, we would not be faced today with this thorny problem. Why did the politicians of those days not give Canada a flag? It is up to you to answer.

Mr. Speaker, last November I was privileged to participate in the 10th conference of the commonwealth parliamentary association in Jamaica. What I appreciated about that country is the fact that, in 1962, when it obtained its independence, it immediately flew its distinctive flag, and sang its distinctive national anthem. During that commonwealth conference I did not hear "God save the Queen" sung once, and the union jack was not in a more prominent place than other national flags.

Mr. Speaker, why should we have two flags while all other countries, such as the United States, France and the U.S.S.R. only have one flag? Why should we act differently?

Why do we have to ask permission or to pass an act in order to fly a foreign flag? If I want to hoist the stars and stripes on the fourth of July, the United States' national day, I have no permission to ask of anyone, any more than if I want to fly the UN flag on United Nations' day.

Canada did not pass an act to recognize the United Nations flag and permit Canadians to fly it. The UN flag was adopted by representatives of the United Nations member countries.

In the seventh report now before us, we are asked to adopt the union jack as the symbol of our allegiance to the crown and of our membership in the British commonwealth of nations.

Why the union jack? It is the flag of Great Britain and we would be lacking in courtesy and tact if we took it over without the permission of Great Britain. It does not belong to Canada to decide what flag to fly to indicate its association with the British commonwealth of nations. In fact, our membership in the commonwealth would not be shown by the adoption of the union jack, because that flag is not the commonwealth's but Great Britain's, and even if it were the commonwealth's flag, we do not need a law to fly it. We just fly it.

To indicate our membership in the commonwealth, a commonwealth flag would be needed, and in that regard the member countries of the commonwealth should decide what flag they will adopt as a symbol of that commonwealth. And thus, all the member countries will be proud of it, because a symbol will have been chosen not by one country but by all member countries.

Mr. Speaker, why has the government brought forward two resolutions? We Canadians wanted a resolution for the selection of a single distinctive flag; that is all. Why try to make us believe that only one flag is involved? Why this seventh report, then? Why do we have to vote on this second flag?

We have often heard during the flag debate that many Canadians fought under the union jack or the red ensign. It is quite proper to recall such memories. There is a tendency here, in this house, to speak about veterans in and out of season, and even to use them for political purposes; but when the time comes to help them, there is not quite that display of courage to face up to their problems, yet many of them are in urgent need of assistance, particularly war amputees and widows whose husbands were killed on the battlefield. It might be better not to mention them at every occasion but pay them more attention and provide them with what they need to face their obligations in life, in short, to provide them with the strict minimum.

Mr. Speaker, we are in favour of a distinctive flag and we have proved it recently by voting solidly for the maple leaf. But we do object to adopting a symbol, in this case the union jack, to show our membership in the commonwealth and our allegiance to the British crown. We cannot concur in this report because it is not up to Canada to decide what should be the symbol of the commonwealth. Why should we, Canadians, legislate in an area involving 18 other countries? This would be a lack of tact and courtesy on our part.

How can a compromise or a solution be reached in this house when five members of the committee abstained from voting, and, consequently, only ten out of a total of 15 members voted. Under these circumstances, and since the decision to fly a flag as a symbol of membership in the commonwealth of nations lies with all member countries, I move:

—That the seventh report of the special committee on a Canadian flag be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to suggest to the Prime Minister that he should propose the recognition of a flag of the commonwealth of free nations at the next meeting of the prime ministers of the countries comprising the membership of such a commonwealth.

If democratic principles are to be respected, once the different views have been expressed on the matter, let the motion be voted upon, and the result of this vote be respected.

Mr. Speaker, once the debate has come to an end I am sure the Canadian people will remain true to all that has made our nation great. Whether we fly the maple leaf, the union jack or any other flag as a symbol of our allegiance to the crown, we shall nevertheless continue to respect all that has been dear to Canada. And I would not like to see us spurn a past which has given us our freedom. If we are mature people, let us stop our divisions, let us not tear one another to pieces any more; let us endeavour to make Canada a great country to live in.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps this amendment appears to be somewhat in the nature of an expanded negative. Having expressed this doubt, I must say it is not an open and shut case and I feel it my duty to submit it to the house for decision.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Quebec East, seconded by the hon. member for Charlevoix, moves:

That the seventh report of the special committee on a Canadian flag be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee with instructions to suggest to the Prime Minister that he should propose the recognition of a flag of the commonwealth of free nations at the next meeting of the prime ministers of the countries comprising the membership of such a commonwealth.

And that the committee for such purposes be revived.

Mr. L. P. Antoine Bélanger (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of the amendment and against the recommendation of the seventh report of the special flag committee, and, for several reasons, all of which I shall not put forward because I intend to be brief, very brief.

At the outset I wish to congratulate the government for having had the courage to bring the flag matter before this house and to hold out against the pressures exerted on them to have the matter postponed.

I suppose that the fact they knew they had the support of our group, the Ralliement Créditiste, helped in giving them that courage which resulted in giving our country, Canada, a distinctive national flag.

Unfortunately, things were too good to last, because today we of the Ralliement Créditiste must withdraw our support, and for the same reasons we had to give them support when they proposed a distinctive national flag.

Today we are asked to give official recognition to the emblem of another country. I think it is a mistake which destroys the good impression made by the government because of the adoption of a new flag.

I think I would be justified to turn against the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel) the charges he made against us, as can be seen on page 11237 of Hansard, concerning the position that our members adopted in the house on the flag issue. He said that our conduct was dictated by political interest.

As far as I am concerned, I can see no reasons other than electoral which have prompted the government to introduce this motion for a second flag. It seems that after having succeeded with its project of a distinctive flag, it feels it may have caused dissatisfaction among a certain group, and this second flag is to satisfy them. That is why I am forced to oppose this second flag as earnestly as I had supported the first one.

In fact, I think the best way to explain our opposition to a second flag would be to ask why a country needs a flag. A flag is an emblem representing the nation; it helps us to love our country and to make it known.

The flag must be a national focus and the emblem around which all citizens are proud to gather. Therefore, we should not have two official flags; the flag should not, moreover, bring back to an important group of citizens memories which they prefer to consign to oblivion.

We applauded when the government introduced the motion for a distinctive flag which, even though it is not very representative, has at least the essential quality of not including in its design reminders of bondage, of colonialism, or of a conquering nation. I fail to see why the government should ask us now to approve a second flag which, in our opinion, expresses precisely all these things.

During the previous debates the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and several of his members blamed us for trying to break with the past and refusing to recognize the great bounties England brought to Canada.

Besides having a bad influence on the relations among Canadians, this action is futile, not to say childish, because we never passed any resolution to recognize the flag of the United Nations, and yet it is flown when required by circumstances, and the same applies also to all foreign flags.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member, because it is now five o'clock.

[Text]

It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to a consideration of private members' business.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I have spoken with the leaders of the other groups in the house, and I believe it is agreeable to all hon. members that we waive the private members' hour today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Bélanger: The new distinctive flag means harmony and peace among the ethnic groups of this country, but this second flag will mean discord and disunity. Once more, let us not forget that if Great Britain gave this country many good things, it also gave us, French Canadians, things which we would rather forget, and we would prefer looking toward the future of Canada.

If we recognize officially a second flag under certain circumstances—which are not mentioned—we will afford certain groups, which I will not name, a valid reason for flying the second flag more often than the first one.

We are told that this second flag will denote our membership in the commonwealth of nations. Then, why use the British flag for that purpose? That flag is not recognized by all the countries of the commonwealth. Therefore, why and under what authority should we impose it upon the commonwealth nations who do not want it? Why should we carry our dispute concerning a flag to the meetings of the commonwealth of nations?

It is also claimed that this second flag will show our loyalty to Her Majesty the Queen. We have never had any such flag since the conquest, but none the less French Canadians have proved themselves quite respectful and loyal subjects from the conquest to this day.

We shall recognize and respect our Queen, as long as the province of Quebec does not choose freely and without compulsion to become an independent state like Ghana, for instance. But let us not give weight to the present separatists tendency by forcing upon its supporters obligations which they are now carrying out freely.

To impose such coercion would give them arguments that they could make the most of for their own purposes. I am against separatism in Quebec and I shall be against it as long as I can keep the hope that Quebec will be able to assert its rights in this house.

During the flag debate we had clear evidence that the interests of Quebec will never be well safeguarded by the two old parties, because we saw the Conservative party go to pieces and its Quebec members break with the group and vote against it. On the other hand, on the occasion of the adoption of a second flag, we see Quebec members of the Liberal party voting against their own opinions in order to return the courtesy that they received from their colleagues of the other provinces. That is why this flag debate has convinced me of one thing, and it is that if we want to keep Quebec in confederation it is an urgent necessity for all Quebec members who are conscious of their responsibilities and who really want to protect Quebec's rights and stand for them within confederation, to unite and form a Quebec party in Ottawa. That would be the only way to show that Quebec is not like the other provinces and deserves a treatment different from the treatment it got in the past.

You will find further evidence of what I am saying in the perfect unity which prevailed and still prevails in our party on racial matters like the one now before us. It was very easy for our group to remain united because we are all of the same origin. I think that Quebec and also confederation would be better off if we had in this house a Quebec party strong and united.

In concluding my remarks I ask all Quebec members in this house, whatever their political party, to unite with us so as to prevent the passing of this resolution for the creation of a second official flag. As regards the other members, I say this: You have everything to gain if you do not permit this factor of dissension, the adoption of a second flag, to come between you and the Quebec representatives.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, if at this time I take this opportunity to address the House of Commons, it is mainly because I am convinced that we are now discussing an extremely important subject, a most important principle for our country.

I sincerely hope that we will really have a free vote soon.

I will state immediately that I give my unqualified support to the amendment moved by the Créditistes. Indirectly, perhaps it will not be in agreement with the first remarks I wish to make, but I will state that, at this time, I am very proud of the fact that we now have a distinctive national flag.

If we must have a flag for the commonwealth, I wonder why we should not also have a distinctive flag as a symbol of our agreement with the commonwealth.

[Text]

Very briefly, sir, in rising to support this amendment responsibly put forward by the Créditiste party at this late hour, I am only doing so because I sincerely feel in my heart of hearts we are dealing with a most important principle. I am proud to say that at this moment Canada, certainly by a vote of this house, has a distinctive national flag. If we have a distinctive national flag, then I ask myself, why should we not have a distinctive commonwealth flag? I know that, directly or indirectly, we cannot talk about votes that have been taken. However, when I voted a few minutes ago for the red ensign as our commonwealth flag, I did all in my power to make sure that if we had a commonwealth flag it would be distinctive. I did all in my power to assure that we would minimize the chance of this whole consideration being taken by the country as a two flag resolution. It is for this reason I rise at this moment.

Most of the technicalities advanced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in his argument are correct, as I said during the debate on the amendment. While I do not agree with all the technicalities presented by the Prime Minister in relation to the flag of England or the royal standard, he knows as well as I do that, while the royal union flag is greatly respected in many corners of this country, it is greatly respected as the national flag of one of our great allies, Great Britain. I say that if hon. members opposite were really forthright, were going to vote in a free vote, they would advise the Prime Minister that there is going to be confusion on this issue in the province of Quebec. I do not like continually to make references to the province of Quebec, but surely the members of the Quebec caucus of the government party have explained to the leadership of their party that in many parts of Quebec this is going to confuse the issue. If this is truly not a political proposition, can members opposite not accept this fact? Do hon. members opposite not realize that by rushing a vote on the union jack at this late hour, they are going to maximize the possibility, certainly in my constituency, of this whole issue being considered as a two flag resolution?

I ask hon. members opposite, do they not agree with the responsible utterances of members of the Créditiste party and with our attitude at the moment, to the effect that no matter what technical explanation you make you cannot explain the technicalities from the Atlantic to the Pacific on an emotionally charged issue such as the flag? Hon. members know in their heart of hearts that in many parts of the country, not only in Quebec, the union jack is considered to be the flag of England? Why rush into this matter?

An hon. Member: The flag of the United Kingdom.

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. Grafftey: The flag of the United Kingdom; excuse me, I have made a technical error myself. Hon. members sit opposite and shout, "Carried". Surely they can see the sincerity with which I am speaking. Surely many members, not only those from Quebec but from other provinces, must agree with me at this moment. This is going to create much unnecessary confusion. Do you think for one minute, gentlemen, that I am rising to my feet at this late hour, after the flag debate has dragged on for such a long time, just to say something in which I do not believe? I believe this sincerely.

I know I have often been partisan. There have been speeches in this House of Commons on occasion when we have regretted a few of the things we have said. I have often said the Liberal party has said one thing in Quebec and another thing outside of Quebec, and that by proposing this type of resolution, by forcing us at the end of a long, long session to rush into this kind of vote, they are only asking the people to emphasize the fact that they have said one thing in Quebec and another thing in the rest of Canada. Surely the members of the Quebec caucus must know that if they believe in all sincerity that national unity is a really important thing, they are going to support the Creditiste amendment to minimize the chance of confusion. Hon. members opposite from Quebec look across at me and smile. I know that in their heart of hearts they realize their electors have told them that so far as they are concerned the union jack is the distinctive flag of the United Kingdom. But the same cannot be said of the red ensign or any other kind of flag. However, the vote on the red ensign has been taken and it was defeated.

Speaking as a public man I know that in my own constituency sometimes we have done a bad job explaining to the electors the real significance of our commonwealth ties. This is true in the province of Quebec. Sometimes we have done a bad job explaining the significance of the presence of the crown in Canada, but why confuse things and make it harder to explain this important issue by rushing into this kind of vote?

Maybe I sound partisan now but I must say this. During a past debate hon. members opposite said to me, "You don't dare vote against a distinctive flag." For a totally different reason, during this debate hon. members opposite have said to me "You don't dare vote against the union jack as our commonwealth symbol." That is political stuff. That is partisan. I am not going into the details of why they said that, but anyone with any imagination knows why they said it.

This is a last appeal I make to hon. members opposite. One of them laughs. Does he not admit that voting for the union jack is going to create confusion in his own area?

Mr. Ryan: Definitely not.

Mr. Grafftey: I am sure many of his electors will tell him about it at the next election.

Mr. Ryan: I know what my electors have told me.

Mr. Grafftey: If it is not a political consideration then I ask why the whip of the government party told us this was a free vote, yet when we in a spirit of good will try to do—hon. members opposite laugh. How cynical that you laugh. When we get on our feet you sneer and laugh. When we tell you what is in our heart of hearts, what is the best thing in the interests of this country, your whip cracks down and you just cower like a bunch of sheep.

Mr. Deschatelets: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I remind the hon. member that he should address the Chair.

Mr. Grafftey: I am sure that the hon. member who has just made that remark does not wish that I address him, because he does not like the sound of these remarks.

The other day when I voted with the government for a distinctive flag I voted in the name of the French speaking and English speaking electors of Brome-Missisquoi for one distinctive flag, for one united Canada. I did not speak on that issue because my people knew where I stood, and I did not think it necessary to take up the time of the house. But I shall take up the time of the house now and do all in my human power to minimize the chance that what we are doing now will make the whole issue a two flag proposition. If hon. members are sincere about the fact that they do not say one thing in Quebec and another outside it, they should stand up to their whip and support this amendment, because it makes good sense.

Mr. Rinfret: On a question of privilege, I wish the whip of your party would talk to you so that you would quit making an hysterical speech in the house.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, that was a false point of privilege. I would have thought the assistant whip of the government party would know more about the rules, but obviously he does not have that position on the basis of his knowing too much about them.

Mr. Rinfret: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I must advise the hon. member that his first alleged question of privilege was not even close to being one. I hope his second will be a little more legitimate.

Mr. Rinfret: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been speaking about the whips of this party, and I happen to be one. He has no right insinuating what are the attitudes of the whips and members of this party about the question of the flag. He should get down to brass tacks and quit using hysterical words. This is an historical moment, not an hysterical one.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, there is only one reason I am on my feet now and it is because I am convinced beyond doubt that if we are rushed into a vote at this late hour on this important question confusion will be created, certainly in my riding. Can we not have a commonwealth flag that in a real sense shows the French fact on it? I do not believe we are a melting-pot society in Canada and I cannot understand why we cannot have the French fact represented on our commonwealth flag.

No other country in the commonwealth of nations has adopted a commonwealth flag in this manner. Cannot hon. members opposite show their good faith and accept at least one amendment during these two debates? Months ago we were told this was going to be a non-political question, that we were going to have a non-political flag or flags. Cannot hon. members opposite, in the face of a patently sensible amendment, show their good faith and non-political consideration by accepting it? I am sure all members from the province of Quebec must consider that this is going to create confusion at a time when needless confusion should not be created.

[Translation]

When the Prime Minister explained his point of view I agreed with him, but when he explained in detail the question of a flag to symbolize our allegiance to the commonwealth, everybody knows, as well as every Liberal member, that the union jack is also the flag of the United Kingdom.

[Text]

Since the French fact has not been signified on our national flag, can we not consider that it should be on our commonwealth flag? Why are hon. members opposite in such a hurry? Can we not consider the possibility of postponing this issue and letting the government decide, with its other commonwealth partners, what would be a suitable commonwealth flag? Is not this a patently sensible amendment? Surely hon. members opposite realize it is.

I make a last appeal. Let me repeat for the third, the fourth, the fifth time that for the good of the country, from Atlantic to Pacific, we should minimize the possibility of this being taken as a two flag resolution. If you plunge hastily into this matter this evening many Canadians in many parts of Canada will unfortunately think that what the Liberal party is playing with is a two flag resolution. Has the hon. member opposite something to say? For heaven's sake let him make a speech on it.

Mr. Ryan: I would like to know what you want.

Mr. Grafftey: I think the hon. member must realize that that interjection was not worthy of him. I want a united Canada and I am sure he does too. If he has a modicum of common sense he could easily follow the principles I am speaking about.

At a time when the Liberal party is flirting with the associate state idea, at a time when we have Liberalism reigning in Quebec and Ottawa, at a time when people in many parts of Canada think they are fostering a two-Canadian theory, for heaven's sake be sensible and accept this amendment, thus minimizing the possibility of having two flags.

When my party voted on the sixth report of the flag committee I was allowed a free vote. I did not agree with the bulk of my party on that report, but to a man the Conservative party stood for one flag for one united Canada. I am sure hon. members opposite feel that way too. If they do they will support this amendment and minimize the chance of making it look like a two flag resolution.

After these brief remarks of mine I hope it is obvious why I have considered it important to rise at this time and make this plea that the government should support the amendment put forward by the Créditiste party. I am about to take my seat, and members opposite know that on the first report I was with them all the way. Do they think I am on my feet just to be sneered at and yelled at by them? Members from Quebec yelled at me and said I did not dare vote against the first report. Now they think that because of the population make-up of the county of Brome I am bound to vote in favour of this report. Mr. Speaker, I believe that in my district I have in pilot form the problem which faces the whole country. Why do not members opposite reflect for a few minutes instead of yelling and sneering at members who try to put propositions forward in the best interests of this country?

I have done everything in my power not to let the flag issue become a political football. If I was not acting that way, why did I support hon. members opposite on the first committee report?

An hon. Member: You had no alternative.

Mr. Grafftey: Who said "You had no alternative"? What did he mean by that? What a cynical remark. Did you hear that—"You had no alternative." What a cynical, political remark. It is unworthy of the hon. member who made it. I will not name his constituency, although I know it. I do not think the constituency would want to be associated with such a remark. This represents the type of cynicism we have always faced in Quebec. A two flag resolution—one for Brome and one for Missisquoi? Never. That is why I left the Liberal party and that is why I am on my feet today pleading with the government to unite this country by supporting the Créditiste amendment.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Grafftey: Yes.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Are you in favour of, or against, a commonwealth flag?

Mr. Grafftey: If the hon. member had been in the house during the last division he would have seen me voting for the red ensign as a commonwealth flag. I did that because I thought it was distinctive and because I thought its adoption would minimize the chance of this whole flag issue looking like a two flag proposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grafftey: May I be given a chance to answer? Now I am on my feet pleading with the house not to adopt the flag of England as a commonwealth flag, because this will confuse the issue and make it a two flag proposition. Is that clear? Does the hon. member understand? Thank you.

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the amendment now before the house proposes to refer back to the committee, for further study, the matter of a symbol for our membership in the commonwealth. Still, this amendment recognizes the principle of a symbol or a second flag.

As for the Conservatives, they have proposed the red ensign. It is their right, and I respect their opinions.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I wish to define briefly the attitude I shall take when we vote in a few minutes, I hope.

I believe in the evolution, along parallel lines, of our country toward its present independence and of the symbolism of our sovereignty. On several occasions I expressed opinions which, to some people, seemed extremist, to others, hasty, and to others still, objective.

These opinions, Mr. Speaker, I have voiced most sincerely and probably with the enthusiasm of the younger generation to which I belong. I shall express them by the negative vote I shall cast, not only on the amendment moved by the Créditistes, but also on the main resolution for the adoption of a symbol of our membership in the commonwealth and our allegiance to the crown.

Mr. Gérard Chapdelaine (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), I admit that the amendment moved by the Ralliement Créditiste makes a lot of sense. I would find it hard to vote against it, but I would do so for the following reasons.

When the house spent several days debating the first resolution proposing the adoption of a distinctive national flag for Canada as well as the union jack as a symbol of our allegiance to the crown, there came a time when the Liberal government agreed, at the request of the opposition, to refer the matter to a committee which studied it attentively for six weeks. The report submitted to the house would have us vote for the adoption of a distinctive national flag with one maple leaf, which has been done already, and also for the adoption of the union jack as a symbol of our allegiance to the crown.

Mr. Speaker, I am ready to agree to the suggestion of the committee which studied that matter thoroughly, looking at it from all angles. But other reasons lead me to favour the adoption of that report. Apart from the fact that it is the committee's report, there are reasons of the heart and mind which I want to explain.

This afternoon, during the vote on the Conservative amendment to substitute the red ensign for the union jack as a symbol of our allegiance to the crown, I saw, on the other side of the house, quite a few English speaking Liberal members who had to tear their hearts out in order to vote against that amendment, because the red ensign means more to them than the union jack.

What made those English speaking people from all parts of the country take such a stand? There could be many reasons, but I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that it was surely not because they wanted to be successful at the next election. I have personal friends in the Liberal party and they have assured me that because of the position they took in this case, they run the risk of being defeated at the next federal election.

There must certainly be a more logical reason to their attitude than party unity. In my opinion, this is a positive action so that in a more or less distant future we may actually fly a single maple leaf flag throughout the country as the one and only Canadian flag. Since most Canadians are less fond of the union jack than the red ensign, it would be a less dangerous rival for the single maple leaf flag and, in a few years, the single maple leaf flag will be increasingly displayed instead of the union jack.

In my opinion, this is the reason why the Prime Minister proposed that second flag rather than the red ensign as a symbol of our allegiance to the commonwealth. I believe also that the fact we have the union jack in the flag resolution will make easier and less confused the intermediate stage toward the national and full recognition of our single maple leaf flag.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I do not see any objection to voting for the union jack as a symbol of our allegiance to the commonwealth, because first in my opinion it does not mean much and, second, it will provide an intermediate stage, as I said, that will permit our distinctive national flag to be accepted more rapidly and with less confusion.

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I feel I must say a few words about the amendment we have moved. I am in favour of this amendment, first of all, because it is logical; second, because it is patriotic; third, because it is sensible and uniting and, fourth, because it is Canadian and protects our sovereignty.

As I have already said in this house, Canada is a sovereign country, and I keep this in mind. Since we are a sovereign country, we do not need any other flag. It is useless to accept another symbol. It would be detrimental to Canadians and carry separatism to extremes to accept another symbol.

We barely managed to adopt a flag. We now have one and it is under it that we must live and die.

Mr. Speaker, we now have a flag. It was forced upon us, we know, but it is still the Canadian flag, the flag around which we must rally and unite. We must salute it proudly.

That noble flag, Mr. Speaker, might see some rough days, but we must love it, fly it, defend it and even die for it, if need be, if we are true Canadians.

To show its sovereignty, our flag had to be distinctive. Now that we have it, let us rejoice. That hard-won flag is the symbol of our aspirations, our ambitions, our legitimate pride, our unity, our loyalty, our Canadian nationality. It fulfils at last the legitimate wishes of Canadian men and women in this land.

This noble and beautiful flag will grow with the Canadian people, as long as we all remain Canadians, just plain Canadians.

This flag will be respected as long as the Canadians it represents will be able to live decently on Canadian soil, enjoying freedom, security and a decent standard of living, as long as every Canadian will be respected and recognized right across Canada, from one ocean to the other, from the north pole to the parallel separating us from the United States.

That is the meaning of our flag, the Canadian flag. A Canadian flag does not mean two flags. It does not mean the union jack or the red ensign.

With the greatest difficulties we have finally succeeded in giving our country a distinctive national flag. Let us not offend our Canadian people by imposing upon them an official flag of foreign origin, even though we recognize its greatness and its merits in its own country.

Mr. Speaker, when we study the background and origin of flags, we find that the union jack remains the emblem of Great Britain, under a royal proclamation of January 1, 1801 and that the red ensign, authorized in England by Queen Ann in 1707 and by Queen Victoria in 1864 is, in accordance with section 72 of the merchant and shipping act, 1894, the national flag of all the ships and crafts owned by British citizens.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

If the Canadian people truly wish to express their newly acquired truly Canadian citizenship, which has been theirs since January 1, 1947, and if they want to show a truly distinctive patriotism, those two foreign flags cannot fulfil their national and legitimate hopes.

I see absolutely no point in having two flags in the statutes of Canada. We have approved one flag, we have expressed ourselves clearly on the final choice: a flag free from all signs of race, colour or religion, free from prejudice, a truly Canadian flag. We should leave it at that.

If the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) lacked sincerity or diplomacy in requesting two flags for our country, let him suffer the consequences and turn back, because the people of Canada, like the people of all other countries, are quite content with their Canadian flag, a single national and distinctive flag, among all the other countries of the world.

Instead of wrangling over two flags—and I am speaking to all members of the house —we should unite in order to obtain a national anthem and a national day; we should not be fighting for political purposes.

We do not resent any nation flying its flag for the purposes of its national life, but we believe that our national flag is sufficient to express our own Canadian and national life. If some Canadians do not like our flag, let them go and live under another flag; in my opinion, true Canadians will be proud to live under an exclusively Canadian flag, a distinctive flag belonging to the Canadian nation.

We approved the closure motion concerning this flag issue on condition that there would be no further debate on the flag, but that it would be saluted, loved and respected, and that it would not be disowned immediately by imposing, within our own walls, an arrogant and outmoded competitor on this American soil.

Does the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) imagine that closure is like an election promise? If he was unable to have closure observed, he should not have imposed it. Now that closure has been imposed, we must abide by it. Let us respect our flag and continue to administer our country, Canada, for the good of all its citizens, for the good of all its 19,400,000 Canadians who have vested in us the administration of their right to life, freedom and personal security.

There is a limit to filibustering in the case of a flag, but not for two. There are other problems to be solved in Canada, apart from the problem of a second flag. There was certainly a lack of sincerity and diplomacy on the part of the Prime Minister, perhaps not by himself, but by his wrong attitude in the present circumstances experienced by Canada.

People who lack bread have enough of one flag.

A second flag would be an uncalled for luxury. Let us think about giving the people the daily necessities of life, before we think of the luxury of a second flag.

Let us put an end to the discussions on the flag. Let us manage the country, which has enough of one Canadian flag, for all of the 19,400,000 citizens who want to live united in the eyes of God and under the only emblem of one Canadian flag.

We are of those who want to go ahead. There is a limit to filibustering, to the conspiracy of silence, to blindness in the face of real and serious problems, merely to defend political myths, Grit or Tory. The people want a flag, but not to the prejudice of their bread, their lives and their security. Not a single hour can be found to study the problems of unemployment, poverty and indigence among hard working and peaceful people, the personal, family and social problems which are facing us now and require an immediate solution.

There is much uncertainty among Canadians. The number of poverty-stricken and discontented people is increasing. With your nonsense, you are preparing the plague which will punish your political follies.

Because of the inertia of the two old parties, the public debt is increasing, interest is increasing, taxes are rising, the taxpayers' pockets are empty and people have to deny themselves everything.

Because of the two old parties' inertia, we see our businesses and industries going bankrupt, and the farmers are in a new depression. Sabotage is a criminal destruction, and the saboteur is a destructive criminal.

The saboteur is a parasite who leads a life of luxury, makes his profit on sweat labour and does not mind the plight of those who, because of him, have to tramp the streets in search of work.

After a life of labour, endurance and continuous fortitude, the human nest has become the prey of parasites. The land, worked at great pains, is mortgaged to the hilt, and nobody finds the time to discuss and find a solution to the serious economic problems which, in this century of progress and science, condemn and abuse our fellow men.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, we have considered the amendment brought forward by the Créditistes and, frankly, I find its logic quite wrong.

Even, if, on the whole, I support the feelings of my colleague for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) concerning this matter and the futility of two flags, on the other hand, I am unable to support this amendment.

[Text]

Now, Mr. Speaker, this amendment seeks to recommit the seventh report to the committee so as to recommend to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) that he defer any action on a second flag until one is chosen by the commonwealth prime ministers at their next meeting. This suggestion might have some merit for acceptance if the proposed second flag were to be singly or uniquely a symbol of our membership in the commonwealth. I intend to speak on the main motion so I will therefore limit my remarks at this point, but I say that this is a sop to those people who feel that there is a division in or a cutting off of our ties with Great Britain and the crown as a result of the flag that has been chosen.

If we examine the composition of the commonwealth we find it is composed of a number of self-governing dominions and a number who pay no allegiance to the crown and Queen. In this country she forms one of the elements of our parliament. However, there are many members of the commonwealth which are republics wherein the Queen figures not one iota. Within the concept of the commonwealth these countries are prepared to accept the Queen as the symbolic figure of head of the commonwealth. Theirs is merely a political adherence to the commonwealth, whereas ours goes much further than that. I say that this would be a complete denial of the government's proposal for a second flag as outlined in this resolution, namely that there must be some symbol of loyalty and affection to Her Majesty by the adoption of this second flag. Right away we can see that if this matter were referred for decision to a commonwealth prime ministers' meeting those countries which have no connection with the crown would immediately say they refuse to have any element in that flag which would tie them to the crown or to the Queen of Great Britain and the Queen of Canada. The flag which they would propose would have removed or eliminated from it any symbol of loyalty and affection to the Queen. Therefore we would have a national flag, and/or a second commonwealth flag.

For this reason I feel that the amendment to this motion is illogical, even though I dislike intensely the report itself, as I shall outline at the next stage of this debate. I do not think that the acceptance of this amendment would mean anything other than limiting any second flag to being the symbol which represents the commonwealth, because it could not in any way represent any symbol of loyalty and affection to Her Majesty. If that is what this group wish to be the aim of a second flag then that is fine, but they have not said so. One day they pay lip service to Her Majesty as Queen of this country, and the next day they say we should remove any suggestion or symbol from any flag of Canada of loyalty and affection for Her Majesty.

The proposal for a second flag must assume as a basic premise that the first one is a limp one, because it apparently does not contain any symbol of loyalty or affection for Her Majesty. In the form of government we have, Her Majesty is as integral a part of parliament as is this chamber. That fact is accepted by the vast majority of the people of this country.

For those reasons I believe we have clearly indicated that on these flag questions, including the motion and amendment now before us, all hon. members on this side have a freedom of choice. Certainly I am not in favour of this amendment and when the time comes to vote I shall vote against it.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. I already expressed my opinion on the flag yesterday. As I said then in this house, we have had enough difficulty giving our country a truly national flag and we should not, with an illogical resolution, make a mess of everything that was done thanks to the last vote taken after closure.

If we were able to accuse the Conservative party of deliberately wasting the time of the house on the matter of a distinctive national flag, we can now accuse the Liberals of deliberately wasting more time by trying to have a second national flag approved by the house. We will be the only country in the world to have, by virtue of a government act, two flags which will compete with one another according to the whims of the people in each province. The second flag, we are told, will serve to show our allegiance to the crown, but if the English provinces decide—and they would have the right to do so—to show their allegiance to the crown 365 days a year, who can stop them? Could that be the way out used by the Prime Minister to have the single leaf flag accepted by certain English reactionary elements? Everything is possible with this government which lacks determination.

As I said in my last speech, the government cannot give as a reason our membership in the commonwealth of nations. In this connection, I support wholeheartedly this motion introduced by our group to the effect that it is up to the commonwealth association, that is all the prime ministers as a group, to decide on the flag of that organization known as the commonwealth of nations and to discuss at such a meeting the matter of a distinctive emblem for that community.

This government suggests that the union jack has always been considered as the emblem of the commonwealth. Perhaps it was at the time of the British commonwealth, in the sense that the British commonwealth or England directed everything and it had borrowed this expression to have the years of its colonialism forgotten.

Today it is a dictatorial act, while England is our equal partner, and this is the reason why we say the "commonwealth of nations", because even the countries which have completely rejected royalty are members of this association.

Do you really believe that this suggestion of the Canadian government concerning the union jack would be agreed to by these countries which have repudiated royalty? They would agree even less to a country enacting the recognition of the union jack as the emblem of the commonwealth of nations, as this would be an unprecedented attack against all these free countries from a member country.

At most, we could agree to refer the matter to a committee of the house, and suggest—I do not say order, but suggest—to the Prime Minister at the next meeting of all the representatives of the other member countries of the association, to propose this matter of an emblem representing the commonwealth of nations. We do not say that it is necessary to wait for this meeting, to wait for a decision of the people responsible for the commonwealth to adopt it; no we simply say "suggest to the Prime Minister, at the meeting, the selection of an emblem to represent the commonwealth of nations among the member countries".

This is the only course that can be legally taken by parliament in this field.

The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) said a moment ago that we are, in fact, accepting a second flag. Well, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say at this point that there is the word "necessarily", if the association decides on a flag that will represent the commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member—

[Text]

It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, to resume my remarks which were interrupted at six o'clock I was saying that the hon. member for Lotbinière claimed in his speech that we were accepting a second flag in principle. Quite the contrary. We would accept the emblem to be chosen by the whole commonwealth of nations, if ever the prime ministers concerned were so to decide, just as we accept the use of NATO emblems and those of other organizations. Still, we do so in principle only, and not under a federal act, for the day we decide to withdraw from NATO, from the commonwealth or any other international group, we no longer have any use for those emblems.

This does not mean that we recognize two Canadian flags, one for week days and the other for Sundays. We want one flag and one flag only.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said that our amendment is illogical. I wonder in what books he learned his definition of logic.

If it is illogical to let the real authorities of the commonwealth select the emblem which should represent that association, I do not understand anything about logic.

Everybody will agree that what we are asking for in our amendment is merely common sense. Therefore, I urge all members of each party to support the amendment proposed by this group.

Thus, we would not encroach on anybody's authority. We would not bring about any conflict, any misunderstanding and above all, any unfortunate complication. We would not dictate anything to anybody and we would leave full and complete freedom of action to all member countries. We are only expressing one of our dearest wishes, that is to obtain eventually an emblem for the commonwealth, just like there is one for the United Nations and NATO, an emblem which we could fly during meetings of the commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Speaker, I made those remarks so that the purpose of our amendment may be understood, and I hope that every member will make it his duty to support it.

Mr. Rémi Paul (Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière): Mr. Speaker, as I did not have the opportunity to take part in the debate following the presentation of the sixth report, I now want to congratulate all those members who, for six weeks, studied the matter of choosing a distinctive national flag, which was adopted last Monday evening.

The committee also submitted a report which has been discussed in this house since last Tuesday.

Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note that there is increasing unity on the distinctive national flag chosen by the majority in the house last Monday, and we must now, in accordance with the recommendation of the seventh report of the committee, choose a second flag.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming), who declared after studying the seventh report of the committee, that nine members had voted for its adoption while five members had voted against.

And, by chance, it so happens that the five members who seemed to take a logical course in the work to be done by this committee were Conservative members who, oppose, just like their party, the adoption of a second flag.

It is alleged as a pretext in the committee report that we have to adopt a second flag as a sign of our membership in the commonwealth of united nations and of our allegiance to the British crown. It is permissible to wonder whether, since Canada adhered to the commonwealth, that is since 1945, it has expressed its allegiance to the British crown, because we did not have the union jack to proclaim, as suggested in the report, our membership in the commonwealth of nations and our allegiance to the British crown.

We wonder where "Joe" is in this seventh report. And speaking of "Joe", we might ask whether it is not the premier of Newfoundland who influenced the federal members of his province, because this premier said that he would never tolerate any flag other than the union jack or the red ensign to be flown on government buildings in his province.

Why two flags, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Grafftey: Why two?

Mr. Paul: Why two? And I was very interested in the remarks, or the explanation, which the right hon. Prime Minister tried to give when supporting the report of the committee chairman. He has not brought forward any arguments, he has only provided pretexts.

Is there a country in the world with two flags?

We have had to wait 97 years to have a distinctive national flag and now, within three or four days, we are going to have two flags to offer to the Canadian people and to the rest of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest also to some hon. members of my own province who have risen in support of the second proposed flag, the union jack; no doubt, I shall have the pleasure of seeing them in my riding, during the next election, with the two flags.

Mr. Grafftey: Never, only one.

Mr. Paul: Mr. Speaker, the seventh report of the committee is going to be put to a vote. Let us hope it will be tonight. Now, I want to take this opportunity to tell my colleagues, the members of the province of Quebec: "Be completely at ease to rise and vote against the adoption of the second flag." The right hon. Prime Minister has told us that it was going to be a free vote. We, in the Conservative party, are absolutely free to vote as we please on matters dealt with in this report and I hope the Liberal members are also free to do so.

I have no doubt—

Mr. Deschatelets: You were not free, a while ago, in caucus.

Mr. Paul: I hear the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets), my good friend the Minister of Public Works. How enthusiastically the voters will salute you when you offer them these two flags. You could say: My dear constituents, we are the only government in the world to give two flags to its citizens.

I hope to have the opportunity to see the flag for special occasions flying in front of the house of the Minister of Public Works and the second flag behind his residence or vice-versa. What a sight, Mr. Speaker, two flags being bestowed on Canada.

I see the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette), my good friend. I would like him to name a republic in the world which has two flags.

Mr. Choquette: Nigeria.

Mr. Paul: Perhaps the republic of Lotbinière will have two flags.

Mr. Choquette: Name me a party with two leaders who disagree.

Mr. Paul: Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that I should be unable to reply to the one who has just spoken as he does not speak from his seat, which he does quite often.

Mr. Grégoire: He does not know the standing orders.

Mr. Pigeon: And the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan)?

Mr. Paul: Why, Mr. Speaker, does the government bring forward this second flag which we do not need?

I was listening with great admiration and emotion to the right hon. Prime Minister when, on the nights of Monday and Tuesday, he made a plea for unity around a distinctive national flag to be chosen by the House of Commons. Why give the opportunity to the people of Canada to divide around two flags? Only one flag can represent the most legitimate aspirations of all the citizens of Canada to make our country progress; only one flag is sufficient to proclaim to the whole world that, finally, under the banner of this new flag, there are no longer different races or languages, but, on the contrary, that the rights of the minorities are respected, because all the people are willing to co-operate, to walk hand in hand toward progress and prosperity for Canada?

But no, it is an occasion for division, as has always practised the Liberal party which preaches different policies in the English speaking provinces and in the province of Quebec.

We are sincere, we want the tremendous sacrifice we made last Monday to sanction our choice not to be in vain. We do not want this flag to be an occasion for dispute, but it will be, Mr. Speaker, if the government persists in its plan and tries, as it has always done in other fields, to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds.

Mr. Speaker, we will not vote for a second flag. Personally, I will also vote against the subamendment moved by the Créditistes and I will tell you why: I have listened to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) who denied the principle of the resolution submitted to the house concerning a second flag.

They said that this measure was ridiculous and useless, and now, after having denied the very basis thereof, they are tacking on an amendment.

Mr. Speaker, how could something which is radically unsound be improved by tacking something on, namely the proposed amendment—

Mr. Grégoire: Sometimes, there may be something wrong in the head, while the feet are still good. That is your case.

Mr. Paul: As far as the hon. member for Lapointe is concerned, neither the head nor the feet are good.

What do we read in this amendment? Nothing, except that they dare not rise and say: We are against a second flag. They try to please their Social Credit friends in other provinces by introducing an amendment so that the Prime Minister, at the next meeting of commonwealth members, may suggest that the British commonwealth of nations endorse a flag to which all the nations could agree. In my opinion, it is a devious means to encourage the adoption of the union jack, of a second flag, which is quite wrong and does not deserve any more consideration and support than the main motion itself.

Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate—

Mr. Grégoire: Why can't you talk sense.

Mr. Paul: I always talk most intelligently and, above all, sensibly.

I always hear that voice preaching in the desert.

They realize the mistake they have just made in trying to introduce an amendment whereby a second Canadian flag could be indirectly adopted. If it was not the union jack, then another would replace it as a second flag. And what would it be called? What would it represent? The Créditiste members could not care less, but they accept and recognize the principle that we must have, according to them and according to the Liberal party, a second flag in Canada.

I say the proposed amendment is quite unacceptable. I would be very much surprised if the majority of my colleagues were to support it, since it is illogical, ridiculous and stupid. It is just as stupid as the main motion itself.

I have no doubt that hon. members opposite, especially those from Quebec, will recall that freedom of expression promised by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) last June and that, when the time comes for them to vote on the main motion, they will have the courage and especially feel free—as we did in our party when it was time to vote on the sixth report—to vote according to their convictions. Such a freedom will not be denied them, I am sure, because the Prime Minister would not find it easy to go back on the solemn word he gave in this house.

Then, at last, it will be possible to have just one flag around which could rally—and I do not mean Ralliement Créditiste—all the men of good will who live in this great country of ours, so we could improve our standing among the free nations of the world.

One may wonder if this second flag will not raise a question of international law.

I would appreciate if the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) who last summer during a mission connected with his department, visited Europe and particularly Great Britain, would tell us if Her Majesty the Queen was consulted concerning the adoption, by Canada, of a flag which is hers as well as that of Great Britain, namely, the union jack?

What would happen if the Governor General were to refuse to assent to the order in council which will give Canada a second flag? Can the Governor General, on his own and according to international law, give Canada a flag which already belongs to the authority he represents and to Great Britain? What will happen then?

The government would have to submit to Her Majesty the Queen the matter now under consideration and if it were approved and accepted by Her Majesty the Queen, the Governor General could sign the royal proclamation.

But let us suppose that he refused to sign it? Suppose that the Governor General would resign. Anything is possible, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

Mr. Caouette: Ask John.

Mr. Paul: Pardon?

Mr. Caouette: Ask John.

[Translation]

Mr. Grafftey: He is referring to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. Paul: Ask John. I would say: "Ask Réal."

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, in order to become final this royal proclamation must bear the signature of the Governor General. Has the latter the right to give our country a flag which is already that of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II?

A problem of constitutional and international law arises. Can the Governor General, without consulting Her Majesty the Queen, allow Canada to have a second flag, the union jack, which has already been chosen by our ruler, Her Majesty the Queen?

Unless the Minister of Transport had the opportunity to discuss the matter when he was in London last summer, the problem has remained unanswered. If at that time, the Minister of Transport consulted Her Majesty the Queen, it might be interesting to know what answer he obtained. If he did not consult Her Majesty the Queen, let us by all means do so, for I fear the Governor General might be faced with a dilemma which, from the point of view of international law, would prevent the implementation of the order in council adopted by the government, provided of course a second flag is adopted by the house, not to unify Canada but to divide it.

We have had the opportunity of selecting a first flag. I have no doubt that the hon. members on the other side, specially those from the province of Quebec, will set aside all partisan considerations and vote—

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): You have no right to mention my name in this house.

Mr. Paul: Does the hon. member for Longueuil have a question to ask me?

Mr. Côté: You said "l'esprit de parti de côté." I made the remark because you mentioned my name, and it is forbidden to mention a member by name in the house.

Mr. Paul: I have no doubt that the hon. members will be allowed to have a free vote against the subamendment which is even more illogical than the main motion, and Canada will have only one flag after 97 years of existence.

For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the main motion and against the subamendment.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Lucien Plourde (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière (Mr. Paul), one is reminded of a proverb which could very well be applied to him, namely: There are none so deaf as those who do not want to hear. I think that is literally true in the case of the hon. member. If he had listened to the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), he would have known exactly where we stood and would not have talked through his hat. It seems that he wants to get the population as confused as the members of his own party. That is why I will not waste my time disproving what he tried to say, because he simply got everything mixed up. I will therefore proceed with my speech.

I will try to be brief because I feel the marathon has gone on long enough in this house.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the seventh report of the special flag committee and I strongly support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Beaulé).

I believe that for the good of Canada the said flag committee should be reconvened, with instructions to suggest to the Prime Minister that he propose the adoption of a British commonwealth flag at the next meeting of the prime ministers of the member countries of the commonwealth. This does not mean that we accept a second flag, but on the contrary that we do not want a second flag adopted by the Canadian parliament. This is up to the commonwealth and let the commonwealth find some emblem. It is not our problem, and that is what it means.

I think it is not our responsibility, as members of parliament, to accept or impose a symbol of Canada's membership in the commonwealth and of our allegiance to the crown.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that it was our responsibility to give the country a truly distinctive flag. And that is what we were happy to do. But when it comes to accepting a second flag for this country, we beg to disagree. If there is only one Canada, there should be only one flag. At first, the government showed great courage when introducing in the house a motion to endow this country with a flag of its own. But what a mistake was made when, a little later, Mr. Speaker, Canada was to receive a second flag.

We have waited 97 years, sir, to have a flag, and I think we might be ready to wait another 97 years before discussing this second flag the government wants to impose on us. Those two flags have brought about all the confusion we are now witnessing in this country.

The government, in its desire to please both ethnic groups in our country, did just the opposite, that is it managed to set both factions one against the other with speeches such as those we have heard from the Conservatives.

If two flags and two national anthems are imposed, do we want parliament to accept, without knowing it, that from then on, our country will consist of two associate states? If such is the case, we should know about it so that, in the next parliament, we could see here representatives of each of those different states, and we should consider at once an amendment to our Canadian constitution and an acknowledgement of the respective rights of each of those two states.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members will accept our amendment and that we will not hear anything more about this second flag if, really, it is not in the government's mind to recognize, by that very fact, two associate states in Canada.

Now, if parliament votes against this amendment, it will mean that it advocates, in this country, two associate states, and the responsible people will actually be those who are now in office.

Woolliams—194.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Beer: I was paired; had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I abstained from voting, and I cannot see why anybody—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Clancy:—in this house has to support something that they voted against nine times.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, other than for the few remarks I made this afternoon on the amendment which has just been voted upon, I have not spoken in the debate on this motion for concurrence in the committee's report. I have just a few remarks I should like to make in this debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lambert: I wish hon. members opposite had the courtesy to listen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. In fairness to the hon. member who has the floor may we have a little quiet in the chamber.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I must comment on the noise that comes across from some members sitting on the opposite side as though they had gas on the stomach and were relieving themselves. I feel that this house is entitled to hear the opinions of all members. We are quite prepared to listen to hon. members, even hon. members opposite when the occasion arises and they do not behave like trained seals. In particular we would like to hear from some of the members from the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

And I should like to know what will be the attitude of the members of the province of Quebec who voted against the red ensign, because it was a foreign symbol and who now intend to support the government's proposal so that Canada may be given a second flag that is even more foreign than the first, if it was. Then, we should like to know which arguments they will use to adopt the union jack as a second flag for Canada, and it is indeed a second flag.

Mr. Caouette: That is correct.

Mr. Lambert: Of course, the union jack is a nice flag, but it is the flag of Great Britain. It is not the Canadian flag. I am proud of my affection for Great Britain, because after all I married a girl from over there and I studied in England, but I can tell you that, in my view, the union jack is not a flag for Canada.

[Text]

Any way you want to cut it, Mr. Speaker, this is the same loaf of bread we had last June when the government introduced its resolution which the Chair divided into two parts, one dealing with the national flag and the other with the second flag. Shortly after that resolution was introduced I was in Europe and may I say that Canadians abroad, and our friends abroad were absolutely astounded at what they considered was the completely illogical position taken by the government.

We can, of course, advance all sorts of reasons why this was done. A charge has been made in the press and elsewhere that this was a sop or pacifier to certain sectors of the country.

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Lambert: Well, first of all, I know one provincial premier at the eastern extremity of the country who said, "I don't care what flag they adopt in Ottawa so long as it is the union jack or the red ensign, because the union jack is what is going to fly in this province." I am sure there were many government backbenchers who were also astounded when they saw the form of the resolutions calling for two flags. Everybody had talked about a distinctive national flag, not two flags; yet this is what was produced.

In view of the appeal the red ensign had throughout the country, and in view of its general popular support, if we were to have a second flag showing our devotion and loyalty to Her Majesty, one would have thought we would adopt the red ensign. But no, the government refuses and we are to take the flag of another country, the royal union flag. It is certainly a royal flag in the United Kingdom, but I ask what is the government afraid of? Is it afraid that if the red ensign were put alongside the one maple leaf flag it would still be the popular flag?

Further, if the red ensign was so unpopular in the province of Quebec—and we had scores and scores of members saying it should not fly in this country—how much more chance is there of the union jack flying in that area? I would say considerably less, and with justification because it is not the flag of Canada. I find it a little difficult to see why, by vote of this house we should take the flag of another country and make it our own. What right have we to do this?

Mr. Woolliams: It takes some doing.

Mr. Grafftey: It certainly does.

Mr. Pickersgill: Which way will you vote?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May we have order in the house, and may I bring to the attention of the hon. member who has the floor that this time the noise is coming from his side of the house.

Mr. Lambert: It is a good exchange. I am competing against a lot, Mr. Speaker, but, as I was saying, what right have we to take over the flag of another country?

I think hon. members opposite should read the comments that appeared in part of the British press, in regard to this whole flag question. They were not very complimentary to Canada.

In résumé, Mr. Speaker, I say that if the government had real faith in its original flag proposal there would not have been any need for this second resolution which, after all, was brought in only after the flag committee had reversed itself. At the very beginning in the committee there was a unanimous resolution that the committee would discuss one flag and one flag only, but the time came when it swung around on this because someone had to deal with the second portion of the original resolution which had been divided by the Chair.

This is not our flag to take, although it is a very respectable, and I would say beautiful flag. But it will have no greater attraction, in fact even less attraction than the red ensign in many parts of the country. How can one distinguish between public occasions so as to decide an occasion on which not to show loyalty and devotion to Her Majesty? On all public occasions, then, we will have the two flags flying. I was talking to a man who controls a large building on which there are two flagpoles. He said to me: Which flag am I to put at the front and which am I to put at the back; which is to have precedence, and when?

If the government had shown faith in its flag proposal it would have asked the house to adopt one flag; it would have left the other off. The second portion of the flag proposal is an admission of weakness in the premise for the first. I am sure that Her Majesty and all others concerned would have more respect for us had we said: All right, we will have one flag; we may have disagreed as to the nature of that one flag, but the disagreement has been resolved or is in the process of being resolved, and we will stick by it. I have just as close a connection with the United Kingdom and just as much devotion for Her Majesty as anyone in this house, but I think I show greater respect when I say we should not take over for our own use a flag which is the flag of Great Britain. I would hope that the flag of Canada would itself show devotion and loyalty to Her Majesty. We do not have to go about wearing that like a badge on our sleeves. This is something which flows from our actions, from our support and recognition of the crown as part of the parliament of Canada. In my opinion it was unnecessary to bring this second flag forward.

Those are the observations I wish to make on this motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, to begin with I should like to state that I am not one of those who speak for hours on many occasions, and who, then, turns around and accuses others of making lengthy remarks. In fact I controlled myself for a while, but I found out that it was not to much avail.

We had before us the sixth report of the committee which was passed a few days ago.

We are considering now the seventh report about which, in my opinion, the members expressed their views in a rather substantial manner, especially since they had made them well known during the consideration of the sixth report. I believe that the best way to make one's opinion known, with regard to a committee report, is through a vote.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) stated a while ago that he was anxious to know what the Quebec members would do. He should let us vote, and then he will find out.

Several amendments were moved, and at this stage I must point out to the house that when the Conservatives were accused of obstruction, at least in the meantime we could work in our offices, the ministers could attend to their work and the committees could sit. But when an amendment was moved, the committees could not sit and the ministers could not perform their work, because everyone had to be called back to the house in order to vote on a question the result of which was known beforehand.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that if it can be said that some overstepped the mark in their speeches, others did the same through the amendments.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not express any other opinion this evening for, as early as on the 18th of August, I recommended that closure be imposed by the government, as I felt that it had given all members opportunity to express their views. If only the members had had new opinions, new interpretations or new solutions to proffer: but back came the same old speeches.

I had even declared that if, as a private member, it had been in my power to apply closure, I should have been pleased to do so. But I realized that it was impossible for me to do it, as only a minister could move closure.

Before moving a motion myself and notwithstanding the respect I have for the committee, I wish to express my personal views and those of my constituents.

There are in my riding about 85,000 voters, and none of them asked me to vote for a second flag. In fact, in the few letters which were sent to me, I was told to vote for a distinctive flag but, for goodness' sake, for one only. That means that I will vote against the adoption of a new flag to mark our allegiance to the crown. I wonder also why others voted against one flag and wanted to propose another one? I am against any flag to show our membership in the commonwealth. We should use our national flag in the meetings of the commonwealth nations as elsewhere.

Moreover, I wonder whether those who said they would vote against the union jack, because it is the flag of another country, will not be the first to stand up and sing "God Save the Queen" which is also the national anthem of another country.

Personally, I already stated that I was against; I am against another flag. I am against the adoption as ours of another country's flag.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the debate should certainly be allowed to continue in the house, since hon. members are free to speak, but there should be no other amendment.

Therefore, in order to have no more amendments to discuss, and basing my suggestion on standing order 51 which says:

> The previous question...shall be in the following words, "That the question be now put"—

And, further on, citation 216, paragraph 2 of Beauchesne, fourth edition:

> The previous question prevents an amendment to the main question and thus forces a direct vote on the main question.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portneuf:

> That the vote be now taken on this question.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt this motion?

Is the hon. member for Skeena addressing the house on the motion?

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I hope to, if I get the floor. I really do not think the motion which is before you should be put at this time. All it does is attempt to choke off the birth of debate on this particular question which is before us. It is a lefthanded way of introducing closure, especially in view of the fact that a great number of members in all parties have, as I understand, reached a general understanding about the time at which the debate should end in any event. There is a certain hazard involved in rising to speak about this question and about the question of the flag itself; that is, that one may become guilty by association of something of which he is not guilty. For instance, my own view with respect to the whole number of motions which have been before us in respect of the two flags for Canada could, on the one hand, make me an associate of les Québecois members in the house and I would thus be sort of tainted with that; or, on the other hand—and this applies to other members also—I might become guilty by association with the Liberal party. God forbid. I do not know which would be the worst of the two, really. Even taking another course could make one guilty by association with the Conservative party.

Mr. Grafftey: No, no, no, no.

Mr. Howard: Those are aspects of this question that one has to consider. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) says, "No, no, no, no", and I agree with him. I know he objects to my association with him as much as the reverse applies.

Mr. Grafftey: Politically.

Mr. Howard: Yes; not with him personally, but with the party. So, Mr. Speaker, the views I want to express and make clear are my own and I am sure each hon. member has approached this question in the same way. I start off in that way because I intend to take a particular course with respect to the report of the committee.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't you think we should vote on it tonight?

Mr. Howard: That was an inane question from the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams), who asked, "Don't you think we should vote on it tonight?" He, of all people, is attempting to rush to a conclusion a debate of this sort. It may be that he has worn out his filibustering techniques; I do not know. However, I think we should look at the report of the committee from the point of view of its original birthplace, which was in the devious mind of the member who was then the member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) when he sat on this side of the house in opposition and when the Liberal party were groping desperately for all sorts of appealing ideas to place before anybody who would listen to them, in the hope of gaining some political support in the country and getting back into the seats of government, which they obviously accomplished. At that time the then member for Bonavista-Twillingate came up with the nightmarish idea that we should not have a distinctive national flag but that we should have two flags. This two flag policy was quickly dubbed the two-faced policy, which I think was the more appropriate designation for it then and is now, because the basis of it was not particularly to develop some sort of symbolic banner for Canada as much as it was to appeal to different sections of the nation, to different ethnic groups within the nation. I think we have to look at it in that light. This was the birthplace of the so-called distinctive national flag, namely the appeal that flag would have within the borders of only one of the provinces, the province of Quebec.

On the other hand, the other half of this two-faced flag policy, namely the part relating to the union jack, was designed, again, to cater to and appeal to one particular province initially, and latterly to other people who are pro-British in extraction. The province I am talking about is the province of Newfoundland. The only ethnic group of people who were not considered by the government—perhaps I should put it more strongly and say the only ethnic group of people in Canada that was completely disregarded by the government in their preparation of these flag designs was the group to which we should be paying the greatest amount of attention in regard to anything symbolic, namely the people who were here a long, long time before the Europeans came over.

Mr. Matheson: It's a red flag for the red man.

Mr. Howard: I refer to our native Indian people. Some smart character on the other side said something about a red flag for the red man. That indicates to me the degree of ignorance he has or his degree of disdain for the native Indian people, to classify them in the vernacular of Hollywood movie-makers.

Mr. Grafftey: A typical Liberal approach.

Mr. Howard: In any event, Mr. Speaker, with all that as a background I cannot for the life of me see the logic of this parliament embarking upon a course of adopting a flag that belongs to another country. Stretching this idea a little further, one might ask the government to bring in a motion indicating that we should fly the stars and stripes, old glory, because of our association with NORAD. What is the difference in that? Would they think of such a course? Would they think of proposing that idea because we happen to be associates on the North American continent? It is just the same. They sell wheat, following the example set by the Tories, to the People's Republic of China. Why not fly their flag, commemorating the fact that China has bailed us out of our difficult position in regard to our balance of international payments? That is equally logical. We belong to the United Nations, and I think that if we are going to fly any other flag commemorating our association with other countries of the world it should be the United Nations flag above all else. Why don't we approach it on that basis? In any event, Mr. Speaker, with that as an introduction I would say that I have no intention of voting to endorse the union jack being flown in this nation for any purpose, because it is a flag that belongs to another country and we have no business whatever appropriating it.

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Girouard (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, a few words only in order to explain my stand in connection with the votes that will take place in a moment.

We are requested to vote on the final report of the flag committee, a report suggesting the adoption of the union jack as a symbol of our membership in the commonwealth.

When I refer to the motion that had been made in the house to set up that committee, I note that in the French as well as the English text, it is written:

> That is it established to study the question of the flag.

I really wonder why this committee had to submit a seventh report suggesting that a second flag be voted on here in this house. It had been requested to study the flag question, flag, not the question of flags.

I, therefore, strongly question the fact that the committee is suggesting a vote this evening.

I would more readily believe that the government is using a roundabout way to make believe there was unanimity among the parties in order to have us adopt a second flag in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I certainly will not go over all the reasons which have been given here, why we should vote for a second flag in this country. I would simply appeal to my Liberal colleagues of the province of Quebec before it is too late.

Not very long ago, and on several occasions, my Liberal colleagues from the province of Quebec applauded loudly the courage and daring of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer). They even allowed themselves, on several occasions, to applaud your humble servant who rose to vote against his own party.

I would remind them, Mr. Speaker, that you have to be courageous and bold to do it, and that is hard. I should like to remind them particularly that you have to be most conscientious to vote against your own party, knowing that, for once, the interest of the voters lies on the other side.

Tonight I should like them to recall the courage, the boldness and the fortitude shown by the hon. member for Three Rivers who, on three or four occasions, voted against his own party in order to properly represent the voters of his riding and his province.

I do not see the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette), but I do see the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis). Those gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, speak loudly on the hustings and I would like to ask them tonight to speak just as loudly in order to voice the views of their voters who insist—and I challenge them to say the contrary—that they vote against the union jack as a second Canadian flag.

Mr. Speaker, this appeal is a simple one. The right hon. Prime Minister made it himself when he stated:

> The members of my party are free to vote according to their conscience.

I challenge my Liberal colleagues from the province of Quebec to vote according to their conscience tonight. If they vote for the union jack, I challenge them to explain their attitude to the people of Quebec immediately. I challenge them to vote against the union jack.

Mr. Speaker, as I said, it was easy to applaud the hon. member for Three Rivers, as well as those other members who followed him. It was said that they had voted against their own party. They were not voting against their party, Mr. Speaker, they were voting according to the wishes of their electors, they were voting according to their conscience, because the leader of their party had left them free to do so.

I am making the same appeal to them and I challenge them.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker—

[Text]

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: How interesting it is to hear a Conservative member talk about filibuster, although for six months those same Conservatives have been filibustering against the adoption of a distinctive national flag.

Mr. Speaker, the first and main reason why the government and the opposition are asking for the recognition of the union jack is because during the 1914-18 and the 1939-45 wars, many Canadians served for and on behalf of the union jack or the red ensign.

Mr. Speaker, under such circumstances it would have been preferable for the government not to give a flag to veterans, but rather to introduce legislation giving them pensions and the right to lead a decent life in their country, Canada, for which they fought.

Mr. Speaker, there are also the widows of veterans. Hundreds of them write to us in this House of Commons asking that their pensions be increased and imploring the passing of legislation which would enable them to lead a decent life in their country, Canada.

Mr. Speaker, instead of offering them decent pensions, instead of coming to grips with this problem, the lot of our veterans, those people who served Canada under various flags, the union jack or the red ensign, instead of passing legislation enabling them to live, we are arguing in this House of Commons whether we should give them a flag called the red ensign or the union jack.

The colour of the flag matters little to a veteran, to a 65 or a 70 year old man, to a 50 or 55 year old man, to a veteran of world war I or II if they are starving in Canada.

We have seen ministers under the Mackenzie King government deliver speeches in Europe to our young people and tell them: "Young Canadians, fight with bravery and courage and when you return to your country you will never experience a depression or unemployment and you will never be considered outcasts."

Mr. Speaker, I feel that veterans or their widows are now treated like outcasts or second class citizens in the country for which they fought on two occasions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but I have to interrupt the hon. member, because it seems to me that his remarks are not relevant to the subject matter, which is concurrence in the seventh and last report of the special committee of the Canadian flag.

In my opinion, the study of the economic situation in some sectors of our population is not directly connected with this question and I ask the hon. member to make sure his remarks are relevant.

Mr. Caouette: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for calling me to order.

However, I would like to submit most humbly that since the discussion on the seventh report on a second flag for Canada, Liberals and Conservatives in turn have told us this was a national emblem which would respect and represent those who served Canada on the occasion of both world wars.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I believe sincerely that my remarks are quite within the ambit of the question of a second flag which the government wants us to adopt.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not say more on this point, because all the hon. members who served during any of the world wars are well aware of the problem we raise at this time about the veterans of any of those two wars, their widows and their families.

Mr. Speaker, during the flag debate we heard the Liberals say that we needed a distinctive national flag and later the Conservatives repeated that we needed only one distinctive national flag. The representatives of both old line parties contradicted themselves within a few weeks. We heard the Liberals, not only from Quebec but from elsewhere, tell us that one distinctive national flag was enough. I hope that there will be a vote shortly, because this will indicate clearly, not only to the people in the province of Quebec but also to those in the rest of the country, how much sincerity or honesty the Liberals and the Conservatives have toward the Canadian voters.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard Conservative members, including the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) and the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière (Mr. Paul) oppose the adoption of a second flag for Canada. I congratulate them. They represent a sector of the Canadian people that must be taken into consideration and is entitled to its opinion.

The hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Marcoux) a while ago moved that the house revert to the previous question, under standing order 51, to cut down the discussion on the adoption of a second flag. He went about it the wrong way, because we shall have to vote on the previous question motion and then on the main motion, that is, on resolution 44(B), in order to decide whether or not the union jack should be adopted as Canada's second flag to show our allegiance to the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Speaker, that is not the way to cut the debate short. It is rather a good way to extend it. Surely the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency was wrong when he moved his motion on the previous question according to standing order 51. We shall vote against the previous question motion and then against the main motion intended to give Canada a second flag, whereas we had enough of one, that is the distinctive national flag we adopted just two days ago.

[Text]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak for very long during this debate, but I do wish to ask for some consideration about something in which I think that hon. members of this house should exercise justice.

In the next few minutes we are going to be asked to vote for the establishment of a second flag for Canada. I am much like many of those French Canadian members who are so very proud of their heritage and because they have been here for such a long time. I think I have been generous in allowing them to express their opinions. I have been very interested in listening to their opinions and their statements regarding their positions about the establishment of a new flag for Canada. This flag will give them the right to be proud of the development of Canada. It is a flag which they feel has no ties with any other country or with the past.

It is true that they look at our past in a little different way than I do, but it is safe for me to say that I too as an English speaking Canadian am interested in the establishment of only one flag for Canada. I honestly believe that that is the feeling of every member of this house.

The plea made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in this house not long ago was made with some passion. I cannot agree with the position taken by the Prime Minister in introducing his plea, but I think he was sincere in that regard and I have no reason to doubt that sincerity.

Perhaps the French speaking members of this house will be fair with me as an English speaking Canadian. I have had difficulties in my riding over this flag issue as a result of the fact that a number of people who have come from the British Isles live in that riding. I am sure those difficulties have been experienced by other members who represent predominantly English speaking provinces or ridings. If we are to have two flags, one with some heritage attached to it and a new one without any historical significance, there will continue to be a conflict in many areas, particularly having adopted the red ensign a number of years ago. I think we should make sure that all Canadians have a flag that can be considered by everyone as the flag of Canada.

Surely there is no one French Canadian member in this house who would voluntarily fly the union jack, and if I am wrong in that feeling those members should have stood in their places and given some indication of that feeling. At least 25 or 30 per cent of the people living in my riding are French speaking and I have not yet heard any of them express a desire to fly the union jack. I plead with the French Canadian members of this house at this time to refrain from confusing me as an English speaking Canadian about this problem which I have faced for many years. If we adopt a second flag for Canada the English speaking Canadians will in effect have two flags, while the French speaking Canadians will only have one, and we will not have solved the problem which I hope will be solved by the adoption of the one flag which I believe will provide all Canadians with a flag of which they can be proud.

I know there is a hardship in this regard as far as some members are concerned who have made commitments to their political parties, and who are being forced to vote against the wishes of their own constituents. It is important to me as an English speaking Canadian to have one flag which will symbolize our unity. I believe that French Canadians have now been given a flag which they can support, and I hope they will give that same right of support to English speaking Canadians by refraining from adopting a second flag which can only create conflict.

My plea is made with as much sincerity as the Prime Minister's plea of several days ago. Surely we are all in support of the position taken by the Prime Minister when he made a plea in this house that we all support one flag, and that we all get behind it with as much loyalty as possible. I make a similar plea to the members of this house, particularly the French speaking members, to give me as an English speaking Canadian an opportunity to believe in the unity of Canada under one flag, so that we all, English and French speaking can say: This is my flag because I am a Canadian.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether it would be agreeable to not see the clock for a short period of time so that we can have the vote tonight?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, before we agree, perhaps the house leader might set a time limit on this in order that we will not be here until four o'clock in the morning. These open-ended agreements invariably run into difficulty. No one is able to predict the extent of the participation by hon. members of the house in a debate.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps we could have an indication as to how many more members wish to speak so that we can set some time limit.

Mr. McIlraith: I believe there are one or two members who wish to speak, but it is my information that the speeches will be very short. If they will give some indication as to how much time they require I am agreeable to setting a definite limit.

Mr. Fisher: How about 10.15?

Mr. McIlraith: Would eleven o'clock be agreeable?

Mr. Howard: I think 10.15 would be much more agreeable.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps there would not be enough time if we agreed on rising at 10.15. Perhaps 10.30 would be agreeable.

An hon. Member: Sold.

Mr. Winkler: Perhaps we should allow the Minister of Agriculture to run this raffle.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There seems to be agreement on 10.30.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the next speakers are being asked to be rather brief, whereas for the past two or three months, or more exactly for the past seven months, we have been asked to adopt flags. In the last minutes of this debate, we are being rushed so that a second distinctive flag might be adopted.

As previous speakers have pointed out, we already have a national flag, and the problem facing us at present is to select a second flag.

I did not have the opportunity, or at least I did not avail myself of the opportunity to speak about the first flag, because I fully endorsed the resolution. When it was time to vote, I showed that I was in favour of a distinctive national flag, like all other members of my group.

But after listening to all the marathon speeches made in this house about those two proposed flags, I feel entitled to make a few remarks tonight.

The other night the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made a pathetic appeal about our national flag, saying that we should be proud of it, rally around it, that we should be happy to adopt a national flag liable to favour unity.

Mr. Speaker, I maintain that if our national flag was a source of unity, as I believed at first, the resolution on the second Canadian flag, which will be put to a vote in a few moments, will be as great a source of division as the single leaf flag can be.

At this stage I ought to thank the Speaker who, when the resolution was introduced, was kind and gracious enough to separate it into two parts so that we may vote according to our conscience and more freely.

I wish to congratulate the English speaking Canadians who took part in this discussion this afternoon, and among others, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) who, with several of his colleagues, approved the single leaf flag and now favour but one distinctive national flag with a view to promoting Canadian unity.

Mr. Speaker, like many other members, I am now asking the Liberal members of the province of Quebec to rally around the single maple leaf flag, because they are the ones who will now give us a second flag, which, in future, will divide this country, because the second flag which we will adopt tonight will give rise to more separatism in the province of Quebec and in other provinces. In fact, this flag will cause disunity.

As the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) so aptly said: Which of the two flags will have precedence? The single leaf flag in the province of Quebec, and the union jack in Newfoundland? Why? Because the hon. premier of Newfoundland stated that whatever distinctive flag was chosen, only one flag would be recognized, or flown, in Newfoundland: The union jack.

Mr. Speaker, I think that we are living at this time a very significant moment in the last minutes of this long debate, perhaps the longest since confederation, on a most important matter.

Our distinctive national flag is an instrument of unity, of mutual understanding. As to the second flag on which you will vote tonight—and the Liberals will be held responsible for it—it may well favour and spread separatism in the province of Quebec and in the rest of this country.

As for me, like my colleagues, I shall vote against a second flag.

And once again I must congratulate the English speaking members who have rallied around the maple leaf flag and who do not want to recognize a second flag.

To them, I say that I look upon them as patriots. But to the Liberal members who were asking us to rally around the maple leaf flag and who may, in a few moments, vote for a second flag indicating our allegiance to the crown, I say this: You will be voting for a second flag which is not ours, a flag which belongs to England. I also tell them that I am anxious to know their names, because in the province of Quebec they are not looked upon as patriots but as flag-wavers who, unfortunately, say a lot and do not have any principles when it is time to vote.

Mr. Speaker, we respect the union jack and what it stands for. We have already said so in this house; but the union jack is not our flag. Why a second resolution, if they were so keen on a distinctive flag? It is a two-faced "gimmick", and I think the Liberal government, under the circumstances, tried to please everyone.

The government should have remembered the words of the famous French fabulist who said it was impossible to please everyone and one's father. In these circumstances an attempt was made to satisfy not only everyone and one's father, but also one's mother-in-law.

That is why I say the Liberals, under the circumstances, not only did not please everyone, but they displeased everyone, for they failed to assume their responsibilities with regard to the problem at hand, namely that of adopting only one distinctive flag.

Under such circumstances, perhaps we will not be in a better situation in six months than we were before losing so much time in adopting a flag, because what we are doing tonight will probably be a cause for disunion, disagreement and even quarrels throughout Canada, because it is not known which of the two flags will be the official emblem.

Which of the two flags will we fly on certain occasions? We are told that that will be left to everybody's discretion.

I suggest that when you leave such an important matter to the discretion of everyone and anyone, that is likely to create dissension in Canada, and the Liberal party will bear the entire responsibility for it, for I am not ready to accept the union jack as the flag to fly in Canada's ten provinces.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? Mr. Marcoux moved that the question be now put.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcoux: Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the house, and seeing I have been assured no amendment will be introduced later, I am willing to withdraw my motion.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to withdraw his motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, as we had no intention of moving an amendment, we accept the withdrawal just made by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, does the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre not intend to ask what tomorrow's business will be? If not, I shall ask it on his behalf.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member does not need to ask it on my behalf. The leader of the house arranged with me a month ago that he would announce the business of the house without anyone asking him from this side of the house.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is quite correct. I am afraid that in my feeling of relief that a rather long debate had come to an end on a good note I overlooked doing what I ought to have done.

Mr. Bell: You are still a good house leader.

Mr. McIlraith: Tomorrow we propose to submit to the house for its consideration the opting out resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance; the labour standards bill; the C.N.R. financing bill; the combines legislation amendment; the Judges Act amendment; the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act amendment; and the resolution and legislation on the Coal Production Assistance Act amendment—

Mr. Bell: I take back what I said.

Mr. McIlraith: —the insurance legislation amendments, the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act amendment; and the resolutions ratifying trade agreements between Canada and Hungary, Canada and the U.S.S.R., and Canada and Bulgaria.

I may add that the items I have mentioned will not necessarily be dealt with in the order I have given.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the last words of the government house leader to the effect that these various items would not necessarily be dealt with in the order given, may I ask whether the second item he mentioned, namely the Canada labour code measure, will be on the list tomorrow, in view of the government's promise to deal with this matter before Christmas?

Mr. McIlraith: The only item to which I can really give priority is the opting out resolution.

An hon. Member: Welching again.

Mr. Thompson: May I ask whether it is the intention of the leader of the house that we should adjourn the session tomorrow night at six o'clock?

Mr. McIlraith: That is our hope.

It being forty five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, December 18, 1964

The house met at 11 a.m.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

RECOMMENDATIONS OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON RATES OF PAYMENT TO PROFESSIONAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to present the recommendations of the joint committee on the library of parliament concerning rates of payment to professional employees of the library.

[Later:]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I move that the report of the joint committee on the library of parliament tabled this day be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Fifth report of special committee on food and drugs—Mr. Harley.

Second report of standing committee on mines, forests and waters—Mr. Godin.

PROCEDURE AND ORGANIZATION

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIFTEENTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, acting for the special committee on procedure and organization I move—

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether at this point I could raise a point of order to put something before the house. The hon. member is about to move concurrence in a very important report of the special committee on procedure and organization which was presented to the house on December 14.

Hon. members will have noticed that this is the most important report that has come from the committee; and I say that with all deference to the other reports that have come from the committee. It raises very important matters which are basic to the whole procedure under which we operate in the house. It is the kind of report that is deserving of full debate and discussion in the chamber.

I think all hon. members will agree that there is need for examination of the rules with a view to their improvement, and that this report does deal with some of the basic, needed improvements. I for one, and the government, have not had an opportunity of studying this report thoroughly and in a proper way. We would like to have more opportunity to study it, and indeed have made some preliminary arrangements for doing that during the recess.

In the light of what I have said, Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether the hon. member would consider not moving concurrence today. I am led to believe, from conversation with some members of the committee, that the hon. member may feel he is obligated to move concurrence because of some proceeding in the committee, namely that he may have given a commitment that he would move concurrence in this report before the house recessed. But I would appeal to committee members, if any such commitment was given, to release the hon. member from that commitment. I wonder whether it would meet the wishes of the house if we were to let this very important matter stand over, in the hope and expectation that when we reconvene for the latter part of the session we could give it priority for the thorough discussion which it deserves.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Privy Council has put forward clearly and concisely very cogent arguments in support of the suggestion of the government that this report, revolutionary as it is in certain portions, deserves the fullest consideration. The President of the Privy Council has said that sufficient opportunity has not been available to the government to give that type of consideration to all the implications that are inherent in the report. I think this suggestion is one that deserves the support of the house.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order that has been raised by the President of the Privy Council, I would like to say that I appreciate the remarks he has made, but I also believe that if the members of this house are going to consider this report during the recess and come back to the session some time after the new year, there are at least some words of explanation due to hon. members respecting the considerations of the committee when compiling this report. I would be agreeable to having the report stand until a later date, but I do think it would be useful to hon. members, particularly to members of the government, if some explanation could be given at this time; then the report could stand and we would not proceed to the point where we had concurrence.

Mr. McIlraith: Do I understand the hon. member's remarks to mean that he would make his speech moving the motion for concurrence in the committee report and then have the debate adjourned at that point in the proceedings? I believe that would be agreeable if that is what he intends to ask for.

Mr. Speaker: I think it is only right that the Chair should declare its personal interest in this matter. It has been moved by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson), seconded by the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Walker):

> That the fifteenth report of the special committee on procedure and organization presented to the house on December 14, 1964 be now concurred in.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I had a very detailed explanation prepared for the house this morning, but I will be as brief as possible in keeping with the desire to give members of this house at least some explanation of the background to the preparation of this fifteenth report.

I want to say at the outset that concurrence by this house would not necessarily give effect to the recommended changes in standing orders and all the other necessary changes in procedure in this house to the point where all the suggestions which have been made would be effected. It would simply give the blessing of this house to the new committee structure which is proposed by the fifteenth report. I think it is obvious from reading the report, from the language which is used and from the nature of the recommendations which are made that it would require changes in standing orders as well as other changes which could not in fact be made without legislation being passed.

In commencing my remarks may I point out to hon. members that they can find the complete report printed in Votes and Proceedings No. 210 for Monday, December 14 last. I also want to express appreciation to the members of the subcommittee who worked for many weeks preparing this report, including the hon. members for York Centre (Mr. Walker), Northumberland (Miss Jewett), Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), Royal (Mr. Fairweather), Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). I should also like to express appreciation to Mr. Laundy, Mr. Carty and Mr. Kirby, who prepared a number of special studies for the consideration of the committee.

This subcommittee was established on August 26 of this year and its term of reference was simply "Committees". It was authorized to consider all questions and problems relating to the committee structure of this House of Commons. In the opinion of the full committee this subject was of such importance and magnitude as to justify the appointment of a fourth subcommittee with this single area of investigation as its terms of reference.

For your information, Mr. Speaker, the subcommittee held a large number of meetings. They wrote and redrafted the report several times. In addition, it was brought before the whole committee on procedure and organization three times and was appropriately amended after the discussion on each occasion.

When members study this report and give consideration to the effect it would have on the proceedings of this house, I should like them to bear in mind that our major attention was directed toward that duty of the house of dealing with the estimates and expenditures of the federal government. We did a great deal of work in considering what could and should be done by the standing committees of this house in respect of bills and other legislation, but we decided that we could not complete a study and make the necessary recommendations concerning the procedure for consideration of bills in the committees. So when considering this report I hope hon. members will bear in mind that the emphasis was placed on the consideration of estimates.

In Votes and Proceedings No. 164 of Wednesday, October 7 there appears a list of 14 special studies that were authorized for and on behalf of the subcommittees. Rather than read the list into the record again perhaps permission could be granted to have this list printed in Hansard along with this explanation. All these studies will be available to members so they may consider some of the background the subcommittee used in arriving at the recommendations it has made.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give consent to the suggestion of the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The list referred to above is as follows:]

(k) Statistical data prepared by the committees and private legislation branch of the House of Commons.

(l) List of suggestions for parliamentary reform made by party leaders and other members of the House of Commons.

(m) Some features of interest in the procedures and organization in the parliaments of Australia and New Zealand (Mr. Robert Thompson).

(n) Summary of Mr. Lambert's impressions of his visit to certain legislatures in western Europe.

Mr. Olson: Essentially the report provides that all the main estimates, when they are tabled in this house by the minister of finance, shall automatically be referred to the appropriate standing committee. In this regard we have set up nine new committees, if you want to call them that, or renamed the committees, with at least one designated to consider each part of the estimates tabled in this house.

Some consideration was given to the physical limitations of the number of committees which would be meeting concurrently or simultaneously. There was also some consideration given by the fourth subcommittee to the suggestion that we adjourn every Wednesday while parliament is in session, setting it aside for the exclusive consideration of estimates by the committees. Consideration was given to a number of other ways by which we could give more and greater attention to the consideration of estimates.

One of the points which required a great deal of consideration by the members related to the designation of committees. We considered names for these new committees very carefully, and I am sure there will be some objection to the names suggested. We even considered simply numbering a large number of standing committees rather than giving them names, because of the connotations which might be placed on particular names. For instance, in the matter of the Department of Labour and the designation of a special committee, there was no disagreement that this was a tremendously important department, of sufficient importance that it warrants a standing committee by itself. That also applies to the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Olson: In relation to the Department of Veterans Affairs, when considering matters which come within that designation we had to bear in mind that many things would have to be sent to the committee when considering the estimates. We felt that at this time the Department of Veterans Affairs is concerned largely with veterans hospitals, pensions and things of that sort. Certainly the same committee which considered the Department of National Health and Welfare estimates would also be concerned with pensions and hospitalization. Therefore we put the Department of Veterans Affairs in with the Department of National Defence. It was moved out once, moved back in and moved out again.

We have included the Department of National Defence and the Department of External Affairs in one of the nine committees. There can be no argument that each of these departments is large enough to warrant a committee, but in the consolidation of the standing committees it was necessary to reduce their number and try to find some common ground or at least some common area of interest in assigning the various departments to the committees. By the way, Mr. Speaker, appendix "B" to the fifteenth report does in fact give the detailed assignment to committees of all the departments and agencies of the government. We do not regard this assignment as perfect, but after a great deal of consideration we thought this was probably the best we could do at the time in grouping those areas where there is some common interest.

In going through the report, Mr. Speaker, you will see that there is an introduction in the first six paragraphs. We say in part by way of introduction that we recognize that the committees branch of the House of Commons must become the subject matter of a thorough investigation to make sure first of all that they are able to cope with the provision of rooms, staff, and all the other facilities these committees will need. I might say at this point that some members of the subcommittee felt that consideration of the estimates should have been consolidated even more so far as the number of committees is concerned. We are down to nine committees, but some of us felt that the number should be reduced to six because of the physical limitations involved in having six committees meeting simultaneously.

There is the matter of reporters in both English and French, the question of simultaneous translation and all the other facilities these committees will require. Having in mind the overriding consideration that we wanted to have the estimates referred to committees, we had to try to reach some kind of compromise so that in fact the committees could meet and be properly staffed. There is also the problem of having the committee proceedings printed and available to members. Therefore it seems to me we have to recognize that there are physical limitations.

We think that at the present time it would be difficult for more than three or four committees to meet simultaneously, but during those periods when the house would stand adjourned there would be additional staff who would be released from their reporting and translating duties in the House of Commons who would be available to the committees branch. Therefore it would perhaps be possible for four or five committees to meet at the same time and still do all those things that are necessary.

With regard to joint committees, members are well aware that at the present time there are several joint committees with the other place which primarily consider shared services such as the restaurant, library and so on. We believe that one joint committee could deal with all of these shared services. We also recommend, of course, another joint committee on statute law review and consolidation, which is a new departure. I am not going to take the time today to explain that particular committee. I want to go through the report very quickly.

We recommend that the size of committees be reduced substantially. In fact your committee recommends that no standing committee shall consist of less than 15 or more than 30 members. Members will be aware, of course, that at the present time some of the standing committees have as many as 60 members. We recommend that the quorum of all these committees shall be a majority of the membership. In other words, for a committee of 30 members the quorum would be 16, and for a committee with 15 members it would be eight.

We also recommend that at the outset, when the committees are struck and the membership is named, there should be alternate members named so that we would not have to come back to the house repeatedly for the substitution of names. Therefore if any member who is assigned to a committee is unable to attend it would be his responsibility to get in touch with his alternate to see that he should attend.

We also recommend that a chairmen's panel be set up consisting of the Deputy Speaker of the house as chairman and the chairmen of all the other standing committees as members. The purpose of this is so there can be some co-ordination of the activities of all the standing committees. At present there is at times some difficulty within the committees branch in finding accommodation and staff, and we think this could be overcome to a large extent if there were a chairmen's panel which would make the decisions as to when committees would meet or, if that could not be done, at least co-ordinate their thinking so there would not be this difficulty in finding accommodation.

Paragraph 23 of the report sets out that we should adjourn the house for a period of two weeks after three weeks of sitting, and that would come into effect after the main estimates have been tabled in the house. There are nine standing committees on estimates and legislation. We considered this number very carefully, and we believed it would be physically impossible for nine committees to meet concurrently without a lot of confusion developing. Therefore we recommend that half, or about half—that is four of these estimates standing committees—meet during one week of the two week adjournment and that the other four or five, whatever the case may be, meet during the second week of the two week adjournment. We recommend that this be continued throughout the session; that the house shall sit for three weeks and then stand adjourned for two weeks while the legislation and estimates committees would have the exclusive attention of hon. members.

We further recommend that the members be required to attend these meetings of the committees to which they have been appointed, and that standing order No. 5 be amended by the addition of the words "and its committees" after the word "house" where this occurs. At present members are required to attend the sessions of the house, but when a session stands adjourned their attendance is not obligatory. We think this obligation should be invoked also with regard to attendance at committees.

In paragraph 28 we recommend that the main estimates of expenditure should automatically be referred to the appropriate standing committees when they are tabled in the house.

Paragraph 29 recommends that there be no more than 20 days set aside for debating the main estimates in committee of the whole. We think the details of all the expenditures would be delved into deeply in the committees, and that a maximum of 20 days is sufficient for debating them in the house. This would, of course, prevent interminable repetition of the debate which took place in any committee.

Paragraph 30 contains a very important point that requires some explanation, because it deals with the six supply motions that are required under the present standing orders. At present these six supply motions are required in order to refer estimates to the committee of the whole, but if all the estimates when they are tabled automatically stand referred to the appropriate committees, it would appear there would no longer be any need for these six supply motions.

At the same time we recognize that there ought to be a number of debates during the course of a session on which the opposition would have the right to select the subject matter and move motions of no confidence if they wished to do so. Though we have not provided for what should be done to retain this right of the opposition we do not believe these opportunities should be abolished, even though they would not be required to enter estimates. We recognize that additional study needs to be done to provide for retaining this procedure and at the same time tidying it up so that it will not necessarily be called a supply motion.

There are a number of other suggestions, such as that these supply motions would still be required in order to vote the funds when the report of an estimates committee came back to the house and, as I pointed out, there was no intention on the part of the subcommittee to do away with such opportunities because it is necessary that the opposition select the subject matter of a limited debate. One other consideration which is not contained in the report is that possibly the first two days, the Monday and Tuesday after the house reconvenes following an adjournment period, would be an opportune time for the presenting of motions of no confidence.

Paragraph 31 simply exempts the Speaker's estimates, the Governor General's estimates and the privy council estimates from going to the standing committees, because we think these are of unique importance to members in the chamber and therefore should be considered in committee of the whole.

At present I am not going to go into a lot more detail, but I think members of the house should know these things and the considerations which gave rise to the recommendations.

Taking all the recommendations that are in the fifteenth report and putting them together with the recommendations made in the eleventh report, which dealt with the matter of committees being set up at the beginning of each parliament rather than at the beginning of each session, in our opinion they will make a tremendous improvement in the efficiency and effectiveness of parliament.

I should now like to read excerpts from two or three press reports which appeared since the committee's report was tabled last Monday, in order to indicate that there appears to be almost unanimous support in editorial comment across the country for the recommendations of the committee. For example, the Montreal Star on December 16 said:

> Where there has been failure it has often lain in outmoded procedure and rules rather than individuals. These rules have been under scrutiny for many months. An all-party committee of the house has worked with astonishing unanimity to change and streamline procedures.

The Ottawa Citizen on December 16 said:

> The best thing about the report is that it proposes a thorough and rational study of government estimates, thus suggesting a more effective check on spending while restoring to the private member his ancient control over the public money. A job that needs to be done would be given to a group of people—the backbenchers of all parties....

The Toronto Telegram of December 16 said:

> This week the Commons committee on procedure and organization made some recommendations which give hope for a revival of respect among the people's elected representatives. This is indispensable, for without it the nation's respect for parliament cannot easily be nursed back to health.

It goes on to say:

> The recommendations offer a sensible way to entrust important segments of a mounting work load to keen scrutiny in committee without weakening the basic authority of the Commons as a whole.

There is much more I could read into the record, but I promised to be brief. I make an appeal to members of the house to study this report in detail over the recess period, and to give consideration to giving it their support, at least on a trial basis, so that we can restore, if one wants to put it that way, some order to the tremendous load of business being transacted by the house at present.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Baldwin, seconded by Mr. Knowles, moves that the said debate be now adjourned. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—REPORT ON MINISTERIAL MEETING

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to make a brief statement to the house on the NATO ministerial meeting which the Minister of National Defence and I have just attended in Paris. I should like to table copies in English and in French of the communiqué which was issued at the close of the meeting. As is usual, perhaps this could be made an appendix to today's record.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This was a useful and encouraging meeting. In fact I think it was the most useful of the four which I have attended, for we discussed matters which are at the heart of the alliance in a spirit of candor and tolerance. As so often happens, the meeting was preceded by reports of crisis, but an alliance which can discuss its difficulties in the spirit I have described is strong and healthy.

That differences exist is of course well known, and this is particularly the case with regard to the nuclear arrangements of the alliance. I went to the meeting with the strong belief that the various proposals that had been made for nuclear arrangements should continue to be discussed in the NATO forum and that no decisions on these important questions should be taken without full consultation in NATO. During the meeting I expressed this belief, which was shared by others, and paragraph 8 of the communiqué reflects this view.

I should like to make quite clear that in urging NATO discussion of these issues, we are not aligning ourselves for or against any other member of the alliance. What we are doing is seeking a way to reinforce the unity of the alliance. It is for this reason that the Canadian government has consistently maintained that any new arrangements must be related to the essential purposes of NATO.

We also discussed Cyprus in a restricted meeting of ministers. We were given a report from the secretary general which covered the conscientious efforts which he and his predecessor, Mr. Stikker, had made under the watching brief entrusted to them to try to bring Greece and Turkey together. Without the intervention of the NATO secretary general the dangers arising from the tension between Greece and Turkey and the threat to the stability of the southeastern flank of NATO might well have increased.

After hearing statements from the foreign ministers of Greece and Turkey, I appealed to the sense of responsibility of the two governments and urged them to do all they could to exert a moderating influence on the two communities in Cyprus. I reiterated the need for renewed efforts to reach agreement on a negotiated settlement. I also urged that restraint on the part of the governments of Greece and Turkey could be an even more influential factor than the activities of the NATO secretary general. It was of course understood that the watching brief of the NATO secretary general which the council reviewed should continue to be in support of the mediatory and peace keeping role of the United Nations. That role is of primary interest to Canada as a contributor to the United Nations peace keeping force in Cyprus.

I may say that the government expects to receive a request from the secretary general of the United Nations today to agree to a renewal of Canadian participation in the United Nations force for a further period of three months, and that the Canadian permanent representative to the United Nations will be authorized to convey the government's agreement to this request.

It has been the Canadian view for some time past that if NATO is to continue as a dynamic alliance, its members must consider carefully the kind of alliance most suited to their national needs and to conditions in the future. The importance of examining the alliance's future was recognized at The Hague meeting, where ministers had their first exchange of views on this subject. At this recent meeting I advanced the view that there should be a study of the state of the alliance and the commonly accepted purposes and principles of NATO, to be undertaken in the first instance by the permanent council. I am pleased to be able to report that this view finds clear expression in paragraph 4 of the communiqué.

We believe the unity of the alliance is best served by using to the fullest possible extent the machinery of consultation which NATO provides. It was with this aim in view that, as I have just mentioned, we advocated a full and continuous examination of the state of the alliance and of its purposes and objectives.

I cannot recall a more searching discussion at any of these meetings. We did not evade the problems of the alliance, even the United States and British proposals for multilateral defence arrangements. We heard and welcomed in unmistakable terms assurances of mutual confidence and co-operation based on a unanimous recognition of the fact that at least as long as the threat of agression in a divided Europe continues, the need for the alliance remains as compelling as ever.

While NATO has survived successive crises, I hasten to add that I found no state of crisis in the alliance but a healthy recognition of the perplexing problems of the international scene and a desire to come to grips with them.

I had talks with the French foreign minister which were part of a series in the ministerial consultations between Canada and France begun last January at the time the Prime Minister and I visited General de Gaulle and members of the French government. I had an extensive conversation in this connection on December 13 with Mr. Couve de Murville at the Quai d'Orsay. The French foreign minister and I exchanged views on a number of NATO issues and reviewed several subjects of current interest to both our countries, including defence.

Finally, I took the opportunity on December 14 to attend the opening of the new consulate general of Canada at Bordeaux. This marks a further significant stage in the rapidly broadening relations between France and Canada.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): First I want to say to the minister that he has given to the house a general review, but he has not touched on certain matters which I would have thought he would deal with.

When he speaks of the necessity of preserving the NATO alliance, that sentiment would, of course, receive the entire support of the members of this house. The hon. gentleman stated that the NATO alliance showed no sign of weakening. That is not the information which is daily being received through the press, over the radio and through other media of information. Indeed, for the past several months these sources have indicated a loosening of those ties in NATO.

One of the main purposes of the meeting, I would think, would have been to bring about a more general agreement in respect to those things which are essential to the preservation and strengthening of NATO. It has always been the case that an alliance defensive in its nature weakens when the threat of danger lessens. Certainly in the last year, in any event, the communist threat as posed by the U.S.S.R. has, in the public mind, diminished and in consequence those things that hold the nations together in NATO tend to weaken.

The minister had advised the house that Canada will be receiving an invitation today from the secretary general to provide for a further three months of peace keeping in Cyprus, and he has informed the house that the stand of the government will be the acceptance of the request. I would have liked to hear the minister place before the house and the country the representations he made regarding the most unfair responsibility which rests on Canada of providing the entire cost of Canada's contribution to that peace force. Why should Canada be placed in the position of having to bear the entire cost of doing an international work? We have spoken of this on more than one occasion. Apparently, however, the minister did not deal therewith or place before the NATO countries the need of a reasonable degree of equality of sacrifice among the nations in the preservation of the UN force and the maintenance of that peace force.

On the question of the nuclear deterrent we received little or no information from the minister. I can understand his difficulty, because this government in its policy in this regard has followed a course of uncertainty and vacillation. We have seen evidence of that over and over again in the last 19 months, namely that the views expressed by the members of the present government, when they were in opposition, regarding a nuclear deterrent and the like have been forgotten or in any event denuded in the experience of carrying them into effect.

Then there was reported in the press a statement made by the minister regarding Canada's attitude to France. That was a most unusual statement and one that deserves to be debated in this house. I do not have it before me, but in summary it was that Canada had given its assurance to General de Gaulle that in any course of action that might be taken in NATO, Canada would do nothing that would run contrary to the course being developed by or the attitude of mind of the Republic of France.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I just point out to my hon. friend that a correction was made in regard to that report. I saw the report, and the next day I made a correction of it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, these corrections do not seem to catch up with the ebullient declarations of the hon. gentleman. He held a press conference; he expressed himself; he had with him a host of pressmen; and each and every one, press, radio and t.v., reported the statement allegedly made by the minister. It is one that needs to be clarified, for what it amounted to—and it was so interpreted—was that he, on behalf of Canada, had made a declaration that regardless of the attitude of the United States in its contribution to the preservation of the peace of the world through NATO, if France was in disagreement Canada would follow the lead of France.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is something that is not realistic and cannot, as I see it, be accepted by the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says he corrected it. Well, Mr. Speaker, the place to correct it and say what he in fact did say is in the House of Commons, so that the misunderstanding that was created, if such indeed took place, would be removed and obliterated. But, as it is, all the pressmen, radio and t.v. reporters took the same view and made the same interpretation of the words used by the minister when in Paris. There was no exception. We in this house have the right to know what is the attitude of the government of Canada in relation to the views being expressed by General de Gaulle, and above all France, which so often do not coincide with the views of the other members of this great alliance.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in commenting on the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I would like to confine myself to three brief points. The first is that, as is usual, the communiqué from the NATO council is vague and reassuring in its terms; it papers over the very real problems and difficulties that exist. I regret that we are not able to hear from the minister a clearer statement of where Canada stands on the problem of the control of nuclear weapons and the further dissemination of nuclear weapons.

The second point I would like to make is this. We regret that there appears to be nothing in the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to indicate that Canada has now initiated the renegotiation of her role in the area of tactical nuclear weapons, which was promised by the government before the election; I believe by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We regret there is no indication that this point was raised by Canada, and that this renegotiation of Canada's role—long overdue, in our opinion—has now begun.

Third, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that we do welcome the indication in the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that Canada will accept the invitation of the secretary general of the United Nations to continue her peace keeping role in Cyprus. We believe that Canada should do this, notwithstanding the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition that it is perhaps an unfair financial burden to put upon Canada. We think that financial burden is small compared with the tremendous constructive value of Canada's contribution to the peace keeping force in Cyprus, and we hope that notwithstanding any difficulties and feelings—and they are natural—such as the Leader of the Opposition has expressed, Canada will continue to accept this very important responsibility.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in attempting to be as brief as possible I would say that we welcome the summary report given to us by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the recent NATO conference in Paris. I believe we all agree that the record of NATO has been tremendous; it has accomplished far more than was originally expected. I believe that, in spite of the difficulties which are being faced today, there is a very urgent need and a very definite role for NATO in world affairs.

It is obvious that the most important work at this conference was done not so much in the formal meetings that were held but in the discussions and direct contacts among various representatives of the different nations. From what we have read and from what has been said this morning, I would think Canada's delegation played a very important role in this regard.

Obviously there is some satisfaction to be taken from what was accomplished in spite of the fact that there is a great deal of insecurity and certainly indefiniteness about just what is going to be the future role of NATO. I think no single matter is more important than the question of whether there is going to be a nuclear deterrent in the hands of NATO. I am sure the decision of the British parliament yesterday, namely to support the government's recognition of an Atlantic nuclear force in place of what has been suggested by the United States, is of extreme importance, and I would have appreciated it if the minister had said more about that matter. Obviously there is a great deal yet to be done in relation to what action is going to be taken through NATO as it relates to the nuclear deterrent in Europe.

We welcome the statement which has been made about Cyprus. I think it is important that Canada continue her peace keeping role there, and I would hope that in this apparent lull in active hostilities some definite plan is being worked out for that island in the unfortunate situation in which it finds itself at the present time. Certainly a peace force such as there is now, is essential, but this arrangement cannot go on indefinitely, and I trust that everything is being done which can be done toward bringing the situation to some sort of satisfactory settlement.

There is one point on which I should have liked to hear more from the minister, and it is this. I realize it does not relate directly to NATO and its sphere of influence, but it has a definite relationship to world peace. This concerns Portugal and its role in Africa. The charge is constantly made that NATO equipment is being used directly or indirectly to support a very dictatorial colonial regime in two major parts of Africa, Angola and Mozambique, and that unless this situation is settled we will never have peace in Africa. Certainly NATO does have some direct responsibility here, particularly if it is true that the assistance which is being given to a NATO member country is being used for other purposes than originally intended.

This brings up the point, Mr. Speaker, that the role of NATO is definitely changing in the changing world in which we find ourselves today. Certainly the metamorphosis and development required to meet changing conditions will result in some very definite changes in NATO. I hope when we reconvene we may have an opportunity for a full scale debate on these matters which centre around NATO, because certainly it is not only vital to the world situation but it is most important as far as Canada's role in that situation is concerned.

We note with interest the fact that another consulate general has been opened in Bordeaux, which brings up the point made by the Leader of the Opposition that Canada's developing role with France is likewise something which should be debated in this house because it concerns a very important policy regarding Canada's foreign relations.

While we realize there are many problems still facing NATO, NATO is nevertheless bigger and more important than these problems, and I think it has a very important future which will remain as important as it has in the past.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a few words to congratulate the minister for the report of his meetings at NATO and the discussions in which he took part, because they certainly helped the cause of peace.

I think that NATO is the right organization for trying to gather all the nations which want to unite, first of all for peace and, more particularly, for standing up to communism.

During my last journey, I had the opportunity of seeing for myself the work accomplished by those 15 countries, an experience which made me very happy indeed, because I could see that those nations who want peace, and more particularly to work for peace are able to do a great deal, even if their population is not very large, as in the case of Canada.

Yes, Canada can accomplish a great deal by joining with those war giants. What strikes us in all those discussions is to always see the mighty prevail against us. It is all very well to say that in order to protect ourselves we must get arms, but what scares me most is that all those NATO discussions aim to provide everybody with weapons, while giving bullets to only one. This is dangerous, but I know that in his speeches, the minister has surely helped to relieve this tension and this threat by emphasizing that all countries, including France, should contribute to this peace-minded organization. I wish to congratulate especially the minister for his good work.

There is only one point about which I wondered, and it is the matter of Cyprus. We are asked to leave our occupation forces in Cyprus for another three months. I understand that Canada should be asked to make further sacrifices but it seems that it is the only country that is paying all the expenses of its troops in Cyprus. Therefore, I wonder why the Canadian government does not take the necessary steps to see that our army is on an equal footing with the other troops regarding its expenses.

People overseas think that Canada is a rich country but if they came to live here they would change their minds.

I always wondered why we accepted to spend millions of dollars to pay all expenses of our armed forces in Cyprus when the other UN forces which are in that country to protect it—the same as the Canadian troops—do not have to pay their expenses.

Now, I would like to ask the minister to tell us the exact costs of our Canadian troops in Cyprus.

We should help, of course, to the keeping of peace, but we should also bear in mind that there are 15 countries in NATO and that the burden should be born equally by those 15 countries.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister to communicate with the countries concerned and discuss this matter with them in order to put an end to all these expenses being paid by Canada while these other countries are only contributing a very small share.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the communiqué referred to by the Secretary of State for External Affairs be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For communiqué referred to above, see appendix.]

PENSIONS

PROPOSED PROCEDURE FOLLOWING PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION RESPECTING PRIVATE PLANS

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a short statement on the procedure which the government proposes to follow as a result of the present and proposed provincial legislation relating to the portability and solvency of private pension plans.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

Legislation relating to the portability and solvency of private pension plans, applicable to employment under provincial jurisdiction, has already come into force in the province of Ontario and is currently being considered by other provinces. An interprovincial conference on uniform pension legislation, to which federal government observers were invited, was held in Toronto on October 16 of this year. It was then agreed that every effort should be made to prepare a model act for consideration by the end of this month, with the hope that it could be approved by provincial authorities in time for presentation to the various provincial legislatures at their 1965 sessions.

The government has decided that as soon as there is a wide measure of agreement as to the approach to be taken by the provinces to this problem as it applies to employment under provincial jurisdiction, the government will, as a measure of co-operation with the provinces, introduce similar legislation applicable to employment in works, undertakings and businesses under the jurisdiction of parliament. Before any such legislation is introduced, however, the government will be having further discussions with the provincial authorities. In addition, the pension plans of federal government employees and employees of federal crown corporations will be amended to include similar provisions for portability.

I should like to make it clear that since both the provincial legislation and the proposed federal legislation on this subject will relate to private pension plans, there will be no conflict between it and the Canada pension plan.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONDUCT OF CERTAIN MINISTERS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I should like leave to move the adjournment of this house in accordance with standing order No. 26 in order to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely the grave doubts and uncertainties which have arisen in connection with the standard of conduct and public morality of those in authority in public affairs, in particular the public admissions made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne) and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Tremblay) concerning the relationships between those ministers and the Sefkind brothers of Montreal and companies associated with them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacEwan: Perhaps if hon. members, particularly the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud), will wait for a moment, I will indicate the actions of those ministers which I believe to be inconsistent with the proper conduct of ministers of the crown.

Before I move the motion, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I will be allowed to mention briefly the importance and urgency of this matter. As you will recall, on December 1 the hon. member for Cape Breton South placed the following question on the order paper:

> Arising out of the investigation into bankruptcy frauds now in progress in Montreal, has the government secured any information showing that the records and documents connected with bankruptcy proceedings by Max and Adolph Sefkind and/or their companies disclose contributions for campaign purposes to any cabinet ministers or other members of parliament, and, if so, to whom and in what amounts?

Without going into the details, Mr. Speaker, on December 8 the Secretary of State was reported in the press as having revealed that he had dealings in the amount of some $6,800 in relation to the purchase of furniture from the now bankrupt United Upholsterers Limited. He said he had received this furniture in 1961 and in 1963, not having made a down payment or arrangements for payment, and began to make payments after receiving a demand from the trustees in bankruptcy in January, 1964.

On December 9 the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration was reported in the press as having volunteered similar information to news representatives. In this case the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration stated that deliveries of some $3,341 worth of furniture had been made to him between November 15, 1963, and January 10, 1964. He stated that he had received it under similar conditions, and that he made a final payment upon the demand of the same Bank of Montreal.

On December 9 the Prime Minister was reported in the press as having made the following statement:

> I make no statement until I have all the facts, in contrast to allegations and innuendos. When I have all the facts, I'll make any statement that is appropriate.

We do not know what further facts the Prime Minister might be waiting for, but information about this matter which is so important to parliament should be brought before parliament at this time.

As to the importance of this matter, without reading any of the many reports which have been made throughout the country, as is known to Your Honour for some time there has been a great deal of speculation and an extraordinary amount of questioning in the press and over other media, t.v. and radio, having a bearing upon the propriety of the actions of the two ministers.

As to the urgency of the matter, if Your Honour will allow me, and in view of the fact that it is the last day before we adjourn for—

Mr. Pearson: That is what you think.

Mr. MacEwan: That is what the house leader stated last night. Perhaps the Prime Minister will check with his house leader.

Mr. Pearson: He said he hoped, but that hope is now gone.

Mr. MacEwan: All right; we hope that to be the case, and this is a good time of the year to have hope. This is the time when this matter should be brought forward. I have set forth the matters of importance, as set out in the motion which I should like to move. No statements have been made in this House of Commons by the ministers concerned, which could have been made on questions of privilege. They have made voluntary statements to the press, and I suggest that is to their credit; but I believe in regard to matters of such importance, dealing with cabinet ministers in this country, the House of Commons and parliament are entitled to an explanation. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

> That the house do now adjourn in accordance with standing order No. 26 to discuss a matter of urgent public importance.

I have already set out that matter, Mr. Speaker, and I will not repeat it now.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, are you going to allow discussion on this matter? On the question of urgency and the public importance of this question, Mr. Speaker, I would say first that nothing is more important than that the actions and activities of ministers of the crown shall, like Caesar's wife, be free from any suggestion of impropriety. The only explanation that has been made has consisted of statements by the two ministers, made outside the House of Commons, which, for want of a better expression, I would say had all the appearances of political upholstery of a situation that demands an explanation.

An hon. Member: Furnish us with the facts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No opportunity has been given up to the present time to ask any questions on this matter. As the hon. member for Pictou has stated, the first question asked, the one as a result of which the ministers suddenly developed memories of what had taken place, was a written question by the hon. member for Cape Breton South which was answered on December 16. That question was as follows:

> Arising out of the investigation into bankruptcy frauds now in progress in Montreal, has the government secured any information showing that the records and documents connected with bankruptcy proceedings by Max and Adolph Sefkind and/or their companies disclose contributions for campaign purposes to any cabinet ministers or other members of parliament and, if so, to whom and in what amount?

This was the answer given by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice:

> The government does not have, on its own files—

I emphasize the word "own".

> —nor has it secured, arising out of investigation into bankruptcy frauds now in progress in Montreal, any information showing that the records and documents connected with bankruptcy proceedings by Max and Adolph Sefkind and/or their companies disclose contributions for campaign purposes to any cabinet ministers or other members of parliament.

How important this is, sir, is shown by the fact that the Prime Minister issued what might be called the Prime Minister's "political primer" indicating the proprieties that must be maintained. Indeed, as an aside may I say that document was a colossal indictment of his colleagues, and it would be interesting to know the reaction of the ministers and the replies they gave thereto. We have had no explanation by either of these ministers as to what took place other than a general statement which, to say the least, has not brought about the dissipation of the veil of speculation surrounding these unusual, "un-Household Finance" transactions which might be described as "Beneficial Finance" transactions.

There are questions to be asked; there are questions to be answered. One would think the ministers would immediately agree that this opportunity should be given. Certainly we should find out, and the country has a right to know, whether the R.C.M.P. has made any investigations following the revelations that are taking place in connection with the bankruptcy commission instituted by the government of the province of Quebec. Has the R.C.M.P. produced any report in connection with this matter? If so, what action does the Department of Justice intend to take in connection with it? The records are available but we are unable to get them from the trustee in bankruptcy, the accounting firm of McDonald Currie, because the trustee has no power to make information public on these questions.

What about the accounts receivable that appear on the records of the Sefkind firms? Could we be told what records the Bank of Montreal has in connection with this matter? Certainly the answer that was given on December 16 is simply a brush-off answer, and brush-off answers will not meet the serious question of ministerial ethics. So there is urgency, as has been made very clear by the hon. member for Pictou.

The President of the Privy Council said last evening that he hoped the session would end today. A few minutes ago the Prime Minister emphasized the word "hope". Whether it ends today or Monday or Tuesday or whenever it ends, there will be no other opportunity for parliament to consider this matter, a matter of urgency and even more urgent having regard to the serious view that the Prime Minister took in writing a letter to his cabinet associates. Indeed, that letter is one that ought to be attached as an appendix to Hansard so that all who run may read. It sets out the Prime Minister's view very clearly in these words:

> It has been said that the elementary qualification demanded of a minister is honesty and incorruptibility. But it is not enough for us to have those qualities. Our attitudes and conduct must be such as to reflect them.

Sir, I am in no way casting aspersions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not said a word that casts an aspersion. The ministers sit in this house with their lips sealed. They had an opportunity today to rise in their places and make the explanation which I would have expected them to make under all the circumstances. They sat silent when they had an opportunity. Yesterday the Prime Minister stated he did not raise a question of privilege because he did not have the opportunity procedurally to explain the situation. That was not according to the facts.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, a decision was taken on this matter yesterday, and perhaps the right hon. gentleman will observe ministerial ethics in dealing with it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said that the Prime Minister yesterday made a statement that he knew was not in accordance with the facts—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I ask you to rule on the point I have raised.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —when he said—wait until I finish the sentence—that he had no procedural opportunity to make an explanation until yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Kindt: This howling down of people has got to stop.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is difficult enough for the Chair without extraneous assistance. I am interested in these remarks, but I am sure the right hon. Leader of the Opposition will confine himself to the matter under discussion today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I was pointing out that what the Prime Minister learned yesterday was that procedurally he could have done that and made his explanation at any time; and certainly having learned that yesterday I am surprised the two ministers would not rise and give the house the facts.

They did not do it. Mr. Speaker, they cannot sit this out. They have got to explain what took place and, not having done so, I say to you that no matter is more important than that this be thoroughly discussed; because editorial comment across Canada has been unanimous, I believe—I know of no exception—that an explanation must be made, that this must be cleared up because the circumstances reveal a surprising lack of appreciation for those things that must be maintained not only by ministers but by members.

I say, sir, that under all the circumstances there is urgency. It is a most important matter. The integrity of parliament is the most important matter with which we can deal. These ministers had the opportunity today to explain, but they kept their mouths sealed. We want to know the facts now and there is only one way in which we can find them out; this is through the motion in question.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman dealt not, of course, with the urgency of the matter but with the substance of it, and I assume I will be given the same opportunity.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Absolutely.

Mr. Pearson: He also dealt with it within the context of what he called ministerial ethics. It might help the Leader of the Opposition in coming to a reasonable conclusion on questions of ministerial ethics if he could recall some of the difficulties when he was prime minister which concerned the ministerial discharge of affairs and the action, or lack of action, which he took at that time in the discharge of his responsibilities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I read this—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No innuendos. Go ahead and reveal what you had in mind.

Mr. Pearson: I am reading from Hansard of 1959:

> We shall not permit, we shall not allow, in our country that something to occur which brought about devastating effects on a responsible government in another country whereby individuals were tried by television, whereby evidence was introduced by innuendo and hearsay.
> I say this, that it ill becomes anyone in the house to bring forward a shadow of a motion that in no way offers any proof and behind which the mover does not stand. I will do my utmost to protect the rights of parliament. It is one of the glories of the Canadian parliament that there are few cases in our history where there has been wrongdoing, but where there is wrongdoing it is the responsibility of the Prime Minister and all members of the house to do their part to see that it is punished.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I say stand up and make a charge of wrongdoing and stand behind it. I continue the quotation:

> Here we have but a piece of paper containing a motion ingeniously contrived in order to sow suspicion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who was the mover of the motion?

Mr. Pearson:

> The hon. gentleman moving the motion will not take his stand behind the truth of the allegations ... I say this. I hope I shall never allow any hon. member to be struck in his honour and integrity by a motion such as this, a motion of suspicion fortified only by questions, with the mover holding the high and responsible position of Leader of the Opposition refusing to accept his personal responsibility to make a charge on the basis of his opinion and belief with respect to the alleged findings of wrongdoing...

These observations, Mr. Speaker, were made by the right hon. gentleman—

Mr. Diefenbaker: And I stand behind them today.

Mr. Pearson: —on June 17, 1959. Let him get up now and make a charge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: He won't do that, Mr. Speaker, any more than the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) will do it when he goes on television and talks about lack of integrity in high places.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I heard that broadcast, Mr. Speaker, and I asked the hon. gentleman's office for the text and could not get it. But I got the transcript of it, and I have written to him and asked him to produce the evidence on which he charges members of the government with lack of integrity, and of course I have not heard from him.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the Prime Minister's comment, I answered his letter three days ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: He may have answered but it is still in the office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dinsdale: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister forgot for three months.

Mr. Pearson: Let me quote the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton), speaking in this house, as recorded at page 6368 of Hansard of this year when he said—

Mr. Dinsdale: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is a question of privilege.

Mr. Dinsdale: The Prime Minister has suggested that letter is still in my office. I will be very happy to supply him with a copy of that letter, which left my office three days ago.

Mr. Pearson: I have not received it. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle had this to say when a certain question was raised in the house concerning the propriety of the conduct of a member of the house, and I do not think the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has seconded this motion today:

> He picks out a little section out of context—a little something which he hopes will be of some advantage to his mind, that lives in a sewer.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle was referring to an hon. member on this side of the house. Then he went on:

> I would simply point out to hon. members on the government side that if they ever try to stir up any thoughts which are not based on the facts, they destroy themselves.

These are very good words to apply to hon. members who make this kind of motion in this context, and I would say to my right hon. friend, who is a great authority on quotations, perhaps he will recall a quotation from Confucius—

Mr. Coates: Stop the smokescreen and give us the facts.

Mr. Pearson: —perhaps he will recall the quotation from Confucius, "He who digs dirt loses ground."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am also reminded that the same Confucius said "He who hides wrongdoing is a wrongdoer himself."

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the right hon. gentleman is he charging wrongdoing?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to Your Honour that the Prime Minister by his very argument has confirmed that we do need a debate on this particular matter. As a matter of fact we have been having it, and I think there is no clearer justification of the urgency than that instead of speaking to the urgency of the matter he immediately engaged in a debate.

We are bothered from the point of view that we consider other matters to be very urgent, but we also feel that there is some merit in the point of view that the house has not been taken into account so far as these explanations are concerned. I think all of us have been reading the public print on the matter and I think we recognize, or at least assume, that the Prime Minister has been carrying on some investigations into this matter.

Therefore we assume that the government and the Prime Minister would welcome the opportunity for a brief debate so the ministers and the Prime Minister could indicate very clearly the details of the matter to us in our forum, rather than in a press conference where you get a different coverage and quite often an incomplete coverage. I hoped that the Prime Minister in speaking to the urgency of this question would have indicated that the government was willing to accept the motion so as to clear up these details. I certainly feel that the question of a charge is a subterfuge on the part of this government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fisher: Well, look at what happened yesterday. I do not believe in rehashing things, but if hon. members want this on the record I still believe that no matter what the decision of the house was, the Prime Minister misled the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, since that news appeared in the newspapers at a time when the house was concerned with a flag debate which forbade the members to raise that question and since the opposition was unable at any time to put questions to the ministers in that respect, it seems to me that, even if today is supposed to be our last sitting day before the adjournment, it would be appropriate to allow a debate on this issue, so that the members and the ministers involved may make the necessary clarifications, since innuendos appeared in the newspapers.

This matter being of some significance, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it would be in order for the Chair to let us discuss it, at this time, with the hope that it will not take us the rest of the day and that we shall proceed with the orders of the day.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, when I hear in 1964 the present Prime Minister quote what the prime minister of 1959 said, I am convinced that the two old parties are alike: When they are in office, they say one thing, and when they are in the opposition, they say the opposite. When they change sides, they say the same things as their predecessors. This confirms my opinion: both are alike. They wish to hide the truth when they are in power and when some things pop up, and they would like to raise scandals when they are in the opposition.

Since the substance of the matter was dealt with, Mr. Speaker, I must state that I have no doubt about the honesty of the minister concerned, but it seems that one point should be clarified.

I refer to the fact that in all these things which have cropped up of late, whether it be the matter presently under judicial inquiry, or furniture, or Hal Banks, there always seems to be a tie with the electoral coffers of the Liberal party. That, Mr. Speaker, far more than the honesty of the ministers, is what brings questions to my mind.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question we are discussing is whether the house should adjourn under standing order 26 to discuss a matter of urgent national importance; not political speeches or things affecting political parties. Two people have been mentioned. That is the subject before the house.

Mr. Howard: We have got two rules again.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on taking the floor a while ago the Prime Minister said that he agreed that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition should have some latitude to speak on the substance of the matter. I should like to have the same latitude, but when I attempt to speak, I am called to order. Why?

I am not accusing anyone, but I wish to point out that every time there is a scandal, the matter of the electoral coffers of the Liberal party crops up. We would like a discussion of this matter and an inquiry into it.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is a proper way to make a charge, as the hon. member knows. The question before us is the urgency and the importance of the matter under discussion. We are not concerned with various allegations which have appeared in the papers. We are concerned with the particular question the Chair has to consider at this moment and I would ask the hon. member to restrict himself to the matter under discussion. I am not here to make rules; I am here to apply the rules given to me.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I again refer to the importance of the matter. I think discussion is important for the ministers involved because, if they are not guilty, it would give them the opportunity to clear themselves publicly and before the members of the House of Commons. That is why I think it is important.

As far as the urgency of debate is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask you when we would have an opportunity to discuss this matter if we cannot do it today, since the session might very well end today.

Mr. Speaker, I think the matter should be open to debate. We will support the motion, because we think we should have more information concerning the public affairs of this government, especially regarding electoral funds, because it affects everybody.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another point I should like to discuss. Must a specific charge be made by a member of the House of Commons before something can be discussed or referred to the committee on privileges and elections? I do not think so, Mr. Speaker, because since 1962, that is since the day I entered parliament, on various occasions matters were referred to the committee on privileges and elections, and that was never done following specific charges concerning the responsibility of an hon. member.

After all, we are not asking that a charge be laid but that explanations be given on certain points. A charge may be laid later if necessary—and I repeat "if necessary"—and if the investigation should reveal certain irregularities.

But for the time being our purpose is to get some explanations and not to lay charges, because I do not question the integrity of the ministers involved.

[Text]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, because of the things which have already been said on the substance of this so-called issue I hope you will allow me as a matter of privilege to make a very brief statement.

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest we try to reach a decision on the question before me. Then if the minister has any question of privilege to raise, he can raise it.

Mr. Lamontagne: A lot of things have been allowed to be said on the substance of this matter, and since I am directly involved I think I should be allowed to make a very brief statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair does not wish to prevent, and will not prevent, the minister making a statement at the right time; he can always rise on a question of privilege and make his statement. But I have a specific matter to deal with, and I should like to deal with it first. Then if the minister wishes to make a statement I cannot see any particular harm in his doing so.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): The difficulty as I see it is that the Leader of the Opposition rose and made extensive remarks after the hon. member for Pictou had proposed his motion. In the course of those remarks he dealt in a somewhat extensive way with the whole subject matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. McIlraith: Well, that is a matter of record. What was said is recorded in Hansard, so let us not get into a controversy here about it. However, having been permitted to make those extensive remarks—

Mr. Grégoire: I was not permitted.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member for Lapointe was not permitted to make the same kind of extensive remarks. Surely the minister directly involved should, in the circumstances, be permitted to make the same extended remarks as the right hon. gentleman, and he should be allowed to make them as a right, not as a privilege or by a concession of the house. He should be allowed as a right to make remarks exactly in the same context and at the same point in our proceedings. We cannot have a situation where one set of interpretation is permitted for one hon. member and another for another. Surely, since he is directly involved, the minister is entitled to be heard on this point with exactly the same interpretation placed on the latitude for his remarks as was placed on those of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order that has been raised by the Secretary of State, I agree that the minister should be heard; he should be allowed to make a full statement. But I point out to Your Honour that the substance of the matter has already been dealt with both by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, and the only way the minister can make a statement is for Your Honour to allow the motion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at all.

Mr. Douglas: It seems to me that having allowed two speakers, if Your Honour allows the minister to make a statement on the substance of the matter Your Honour will have in effect allowed the motion. In my view, to have the minister make a statement and then for Your Honour to rule that the motion is not relevant and deny anyone else the opportunity of making a statement would be most improper. It seems to me that having allowed the debate to go this far, Your Honour has really no alternative but to allow the motion and let the debate proceed.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in relation to the point of order raised by my colleague and spoken to by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, I wonder whether I could suggest that a factual statement by the two ministers concerned is absolutely essential at this point in order that Your Honour may have the opportunity to determine whether there is any urgency of debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I also suggest, sir—and I hope I will be listened to as the right hon. gentleman was listened to, and not howled down—that hon. members opposite, having made a motion about these two ministers, having made a number of statements about them which they culled from the newspapers and so on, ordinary, elementary justice demands that the two ministers be allowed to make a factual statement of their own position; and that you, sir, cannot properly decide whether this is an urgent matter until we have heard those two hon. gentlemen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, this is the most amazing suggestion I have ever heard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: The Minister of Transport is suggesting that under the guise of debating urgency two ministers be allowed to make statements which they cannot properly make unless the motion is allowed. I agree that in justice both these ministers should be allowed to make statements. I would go further. In view of the fact that they have both made statements outside this house, they should be required to make statements in the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: The only way they can properly make those statements is not under the guise of arguing urgency, but for Your Honour to allow the motion, allow them to make their statements and allow the contribution any other hon. member wants to make in the course of the debate.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I think the argument that has just been made by the Minister of Transport makes it abundantly clear that there is urgency of debate. I think the request made by one of the persons named in the motion, namely the Secretary of State, that he should be given an opportunity to make an explanation is in itself an indication that there is urgency of debate.

The Prime Minister argued that there is a need for someone to make a charge. I agreed with him yesterday that when a motion is moved on a question of privilege the member concerned is then—if there is a question of privilege or a prima facie case established—obliged to follow up with a substantive motion containing a charge. The motion yesterday of course did not have a charge in it, but it is a completely different matter to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26, which is the proposition that is before us this afternoon.

Therefore I think the fact that the Secretary of State and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration apparently feel they ought to make statements and ought to make explanations in this house because of certain latitude of discussion that has already taken place is sufficient argument to allow the debate to take place.

Mr. Speaker: I think I can say without hesitation that the matter is not without a certain amount of difficulty; but as Speaker I am bound by form, precedent and also, I hope, a sense of fairness and justice. Before giving this ruling I would say that I do think it is in the interests of the house that a short explanation be given by the two ministers concerned, particularly in view of the wide latitude given this morning to the right hon. Prime Minister, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and even, if I may say so, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and others. Therefore I think it is in the interests of fair play and justice that not necessarily a statement but certainly an explanation be given by the two ministers concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, in view of the hope that I expressed last night, I wonder if we could agree to sit through the lunch hour—

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. McIlraith: —for the purpose of carrying out that hope.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, it would be much better if we sat at the dinner table instead of sitting through this muck-raking.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, we would prefer that you call it one o'clock, because this will enable us to consider the ruling you have just made, for, in my opinion, your decision is one which we will appeal.

[Text]

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, before Your Honour leaves the chair may I ask a question.

Am I to understand from Your Honour's ruling that the two ministers in question may make statements on the matter of urgency, and will Your Honour also allow other members of the house to make statements following the ministers' statements?

Mr. Churchill: That will have to be allowed, if it is under privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I do think the hon. member is asking for quite a bit. It is the wish of the Chair to have an explanation this morning from the two ministers concerned and not to continue with a long debate unless it be necessary. My particular problem is to reach a decision on whether the house should be adjourned under standing order 26. In view of the latitude given this morning and in fairness to the two persons charged—informally, if you wish—they should at least have the opportunity of making short statements. I think those statements should be made before rendering a decision as to whether standing order 26 is to be applied. If the house would give consent for those statements to be made now it would be of material assistance to the Chair; but I am in the hands of the house, of course. Does the house give consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give consent?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the minister himself called it one o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: This morning when the house recessed for lunch we had certain matters under discussion, and I think it might be useful if I gave my view at this moment not on the principal question whether or not the house should adjourn but on the question whether or not hon. members are entitled to make remarks for the benefit of the Chair. I do not necessarily mean statements; I mean remarks to assist the Chair in arriving at a conclusion.

This morning reference was made to standing order 26 to which a revision has been made this session as a result of a suggestion by the committee on procedure and organization, and I think it might be useful to refer to it at this moment. Standing order 26 (3) reads:

> He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to Mr. Speaker. If Mr. Speaker questions the urgency of debate with respect to the proposed matter, he may invite members to speak on the question of such urgency.

It then goes on to refer to other matters, but the point is that the Speaker "may" invite members—which is only right, of course—to assist him in trying to arrive at a proper conclusion.

In virtue of that, this morning several members gave the Chair the benefit of their views, which were in fact quite extensive. The matter under discussion should have related to urgency and in some cases it went far beyond that and related to the substance; but no matter, several hon. members did have the opportunity of assisting the Chair. So it seems to me that the Chair should extend the same privilege to other members, within reason. The privilege should not be abused, but the Chair is entitled, within reason, to call upon other members of the house for their views—again I stress the point; not statements, but views—as to the urgency of the matter.

Therefore I propose to extend the same privilege to the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne), not for the purpose of having him make a formal statement, but for the purpose of allowing him to present his views for the assistance of the Chair. I think it is only a matter of common right and justice that he should, within reason, have the same latitude which was extended to other hon. members this morning.

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I am in a little difficulty here on several counts. First of all, the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne) did rise and say he wanted to speak on a question of privilege. He also said he had a prepared statement, which you, Mr. Speaker, could not have known about. It seems to me that if the hon. gentleman wants to rise on a question of privilege and so state, then you, Mr. Speaker, must hear that question of privilege before you decide it, and by that time it will be on the record. This has been going on in the house for years.

I find difficulty in allowing this type of statement to be made when we are under the impression, and I think rightly so, that the minister had a prepared statement when he came into the house. Under the circumstances, I believe that if he wants to make a statement on a question of privilege, then let him make it on a question of privilege. Then, after hearing it, if Your Honour says there is no question of privilege involved, that is up to you. But I think that is the way we should proceed; and I too am only trying to help the Chair.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I had no prepared statement this morning. I have one now and I think I should be allowed to make that statement because of what has been said this morning.

Mr. Speaker: We are playing with words. I am sure the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne) wishes to present his views to the Chair, and the use of the word "statement" is a difficulty between French and English, if I understand him properly.

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, a few years ago when my Ottawa home burnt down, several pieces of furniture were destroyed. The cost of damage was high, since my insurance had expired without my knowledge, due to the death of my insurance agent. At that time, I had to refurnish my home in part on a temporary basis.

In the spring of 1962, before my daughter's wedding, I decided that I could no longer delay buying new furniture. I then bought furniture on credit from the Futurama store, a well known Montreal firm. There was never any question of a gift. I received statements of account and, besides, my account was normally transferred by the company, like all other outstanding accounts, to the Bank of Montreal in early January 1964.

I must also point out that at the time, I was a private citizen and not yet a member of parliament, and that my salary was $12,000, rather than $27,000, as suggested by a journalist.

After my election, I certainly would have been able to settle this account, but early in May 1963, a member of my family had to retire from active life for reasons of ill health and asked me to lend him $3,000 to help build a small home. I felt unable to refuse him this service, but this meant that I would have to postpone starting to pay my debt.

In December 1963, I made a second purchase of furniture for the apartment I have in my riding, and I intended to pay for it without delay at the time. However, I did not have this opportunity, as I received the first statement about January 21, when all the company's accounts had already been taken over by the Bank of Montreal. The bank got in touch with me at the time. I proposed an arrangement which was immediately accepted, and I now have repaid about half my liability.

I wish to add that I did not take part directly or indirectly in any fraudulent activities. Moreover, the Sefkind brothers and their companies did not get any favour from the government through my intervention. More particularly, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Deschatelets) informs me that an investigation has revealed that his department did not get any offer for sale, by tender or otherwise, and that it did not buy anything from the Sefkind brothers or their companies since April 1963.

I do not intend at this stage to comment on the false rumours and slanderous comments that can be heard in the halls of parliament or read in the newspapers about that incident. Before resuming my seat, I would like to give some advice to all hon. members of the house.

Should you want to buy furniture, pay cash. Should you buy on terms and should your supplier go bankrupt later on, you and your family would go through very unpleasant moments, especially if you feel you have made some sacrifices to remain in public life.

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity afforded me to lay before the house the facts about the furniture I bought from the Futurama Company Inc., Montreal, in order that you may rule on the merits of the motion for adjournment.

In order to complete the furnishing of my new house, in the summer of 1963, I went to Montreal with my wife to the show room of the Futurama Company, a firm which is known for the high quality of its furniture, which had been in business for more than 20 years and where many prominent people from Quebec city and Montreal went regularly to make their purchases.

The first delivery of furniture was made on November 15, 1963, the second, on November 28, 1963, the third, on December 19, 1963 and the fourth on January 10, 1964.

After the above deliveries, there were still a few more pieces of furniture to come.

It was on February 19 that the manager of the Bank of Montreal advised me of the bankruptcy of the Futurama Company and of my account, as of that date, with that company.

Six days later, on February 25, 1964, I sent to the manager of the Bank of Montreal a cheque in the amount of $3,341.69, and on March 2, 1964, I sent him a second cheque in the amount of $240.41, after adjustments, since some furniture items had not been received by then.

Thus, I was waiting for my last furniture delivery before making the final payment to Futurama, which did not take place before the bankruptcy.

I am still dealing with Fraser Brothers, the company which bought out Futurama and which gave me the assurance that they could complete the order and exchange some lamps, delivered to me by mistake, which did not match the selected design.

That business transaction with the Futurama company was conducted in the most normal way, and at no time did I have the impression of benefiting unduly from that company.

Any insinuation to that effect is malicious, and those who are guilty of such insinuations are assuming a heavy responsibility indeed before this house and the country as a whole.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: I must now decide whether or not the motion now before the house to adjourn the house under standing order No. 26 should be received.

This morning we had a wide discussion as to the urgency of this matter, and it seems to me that we got into the substance of the matter to a much greater degree than necessary. I must take some responsibility in that regard.

However, we are here dealing primarily, it seems to me, with the conduct of ministers. According to paragraph 3 of the motion submitted to me in these words:

> These public admissions indicate action totally inconsistent with proper conduct of ministers of the crown.

In this connection I must—I tried to do this this morning without success—refer to Bourinot's fourth edition, page 300 where the following is stated:

> Certain matters cannot be debated save upon a substantive motion which can be dealt with by amendment or by distinct vote of the house, such as, the conduct of the Governor General, the Speaker or Deputy Speaker, members of either house of parliament—

This has frequently been interpreted in this country to include ministers of the crown.

Later on in the same paragraph it is stated:

> For the same reason, no charges of a personal character can be raised save upon a distinct and substantive motion to that effect.

[Mr. Tremblay.]

This seems to be borne out by Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 127 (2) which reads:

> Unless discussion is based upon a substantive motion drawn in proper terms, reflections must not be cast in debate upon the conduct of the sovereign, the heir to the throne or members of the Royal Family, the Governor General of a dominion, the Speaker, the chairman of ways and means, members of either house of parliament—

Again in my opinion this includes the personal conduct of ministers of the crown, and I do not see any other way of interpreting that particular subsection.

Citation 100(2) of Beauchesne's fourth edition states:

> Matters arising out of the debates of the same session, or the term of a bill before the House of Lords, matters of privilege or order, or matters debatable only upon a substantive motion, cannot be submitted to the house under this standing order.

There is then a reference to standing order No. 26.

In the circumstances I regret that I cannot receive the motion which is presented for debate at this time.

COMPANIES ACT

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-22 (from the Senate), to amend the Companies Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SEFKIND BANKRUPTCY—REQUEST FOR DOCUMENTS IN TRANSACTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question, in connection with the matter to which you have just referred, to the Minister of Justice, asking him whether or not there has been an investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police into the bankruptcy of the Sefkind Brothers or the companies which they operated. Has he as Minister of Justice anyone present at the investigation by the government of the province of Quebec into fraudulent bankruptcies? Will he, in order to clear up the matter respecting the question put on the order paper by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, communicate with the trustee, Peter Christie of the firm of McDonald Currie, and empower that official to make available the documents in his possession with regard to the transactions on the part of these people or those connected with them?

[Translation]

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first part of the question of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, I must say that as soon as I noted on the order paper the question on the possible advance of contributions and electoral funds, I asked the R.C.M.P. to conduct an investigation. At the same time, I advised the ministers concerned that I was asking for such an investigation to be undertaken, and they approved of my decision.

It is the result of this investigation, as far as the R.C.M.P. could make it, that is reflected in the answer given to question 2,423 on the order paper.

As far as the second part of the question put a moment ago by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is concerned, he will understand that under the rules of the house I must take it as notice, but I can assure him that I will immediately take steps to obtain the required information.

[Text]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could I ask the Minister of Justice if he has received from the R.C.M.P. a full report on the Sefkind bankruptcy proceedings and if this report is now in his possession?

[Translation]

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I made it quite clear a while ago that at the risk of asking the R.C.M.P. to somewhat override the limits of their jurisdiction, I requested that an investigation be made so that I could answer the question put on the order paper.

As regards the matter of bankruptcies and any investigation in bankruptcy frauds, it is clear that from the strict point of view of federal jurisdiction, any information that could be obtained is restricted to what the superintendent of bankruptcy has in his possession because of his official function. Bankruptcy frauds as such being criminal offences come under the attorney general of the province and the investigation made in the case of the companies in which people were or are involved, as I understand, was made and is being carried out probably in the name and at the instance of the attorney general of the province.

Under such circumstances, I am not so sure that it comes under my jurisdiction to order an investigation. However, what I have tried to do up to now and what I will try to do, is obtain the most complete body of information from those authorities that have jurisdiction, taking into consideration the respective powers of the Minister of Justice and of the attorney general of the province of Quebec.

[Text]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Minister of Justice inform the house whether any report at all has been made to the superintendent of bankruptcy in his department in connection with this matter?

[Translation]

Mr. Favreau: I shall take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

THE MINISTRY—CODE OF ETHICS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to give us an explanation of the situation that led him to issue the so-called code of ethics. I should also like to ask him if he would be kind enough to table it in the house so it can become part of the permanent records of the house?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to table it. The letter speaks for itself.

Mr. Fisher: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Prime Minister, in any follow-up to the letter which he sent to his ministers, carried on any investigation or set up any investigation on his own into the situation that was involved in the whole question of ethics?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I would have thought the hon. gentleman had been in the house long enough to know that ministerial discussions and ministerial exchanges are not made public in the House of Commons.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why was the document produced then?

DORION COMMISSION—LETTER OF CLARIFICATION BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell the house whether, immediately prior to the writing of the letter of clarification of the Dorion inquiry, he or any of his staff received any threat of any kind from any member of the press gallery that the matter would be made public unless that letter was written immediately? Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious question I am asking.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is a very serious question and a very impertinent question. I do not act on instructions from the press gallery in these matters.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to take lessons on impertinence from the Prime Minister.

Mr. McIlraith: You are an expert on that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask him this question. Having made this codex ministrensis—I suppose that is the proper Latin expression—available to the press, thus making it a public document, did the Prime Minister receive any letters from any of his ministers? It is no longer a question of ministerial confidentiality, the Prime Minister having made this extraordinary document available to the people of Canada.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I did not make the document available to the press, and the right hon. gentleman, who was once the head of a government, should know and I am sure does know that exchanges between ministers are not made public in the house unless they are tabled.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why then did the Prime Minister make this document available which cast aspersions on every member of his cabinet by the very fact that he sent it?

Mr. Pearson: This document cast no aspersions upon any member of the cabinet. It lays down a code of conduct and ethics which has been followed by members of the cabinet, a code of conduct and ethics that might well have been laid down by my right hon. friend when he was prime minister. One of the reasons for this exchange with my cabinet ministers was to warn them about the kind of innuendo and insinuation they might leave themselves open to if they were not extremely careful in these things.

An hon. Member: In other words, cover it up.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister whether he has worked out any method by which the code of ethics can be made retroactive?

[Mr. Rhéaume.]

Mr. Pearson: Yes; Mr. Speaker, I think it should be made retroactive to 1867, and also to provincial governments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister does not believe in innuendoes and smears I wonder would he like to be more specific because I for one—

Some hon. Members: Lay a charge.

Mr. Douglas: —would be very glad to see the Prime Minister make a definite statement and lay a charge.

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman made a definite statement. He asked me if this document could be made retroactive. I said yes, and to 1867, and to provincial governments. Surely that is a very reasonable reply.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the Prime Minister, since it was sent to his cabinet, how does he feel this would be applicable to provincial governments? Surely it was sent to his cabinet because it was felt his cabinet needed it.

Mr. Pearson: I presume provincial ministers have the same sense of responsibility as federal ministers, even in the province of Saskatchewan.

POSSIBLE ACTION RESPECTING ONTARIO SUPREME COURT JUDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Some time ago the Minister of Justice promised to make a statement to the house on the position of Mr. Justice Landreville. He said, later, that he would postpone making that statement for reasons he did not explain. Is the minister now in a position to make the statement he undertook to give us?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): I am not now in a position to make a statement on the matter.

THEFTS FROM DORVAL AIRPORT—POLICE INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice, and I have broken it down into several parts. Can the minister report to the house on the theft of $100,000 in bullion and other specie from Dorval airport on Monday last, the second such theft at Montreal airport, as I understand it, in approximately six months?

Is an investigation being carried out by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; and what precautionary measures are being taken to prevent recurrence which would be damaging to Canada's reputation and security?

What investigation is being made of the statement by local police that this was an "inside job"?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that this is a question for the order paper.

Mr. John N. Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question having to do with Dorval airport.

Mr. McIntosh: Well, I have not had an answer yet. I wonder whether the minister would give an answer?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): You should give notice.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, this is quite an urgent matter.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest this question be put on the order paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With great deference, Mr. Speaker, this is the last day and the matter is of great importance. We are trying to expedite the business of the house, but this is a matter on which information should certainly be available.

Mr. McIntosh: I did not quite get the statement of the minister. He asked, why did I not—what?

Mr. Favreau: Give notice.

Mr. McIntosh: I should like an answer, if I may have it.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that no minister, as I am sure the hon. gentleman would agree, can carry in his head figures and facts which concern the aspects of a very vast department. I am sure that had I received notice of this question either yesterday or this morning I would have inquired about it and would probably have been in a position to answer today. All I can do now is take this question as notice. However, I can say this. If in the meantime, at a time when the hon. gentleman is available, I obtain the information, I will be pleased to give it to him personally. I will, of course, report to the house at the first opportune time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY AS TO NUMBER OF DEATHS BY SUICIDE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. With respect to the inordinately high rate of suicides in the R.C.M.P. he replied some days ago that he would undertake to look into the matter to see if he could ascertain the explanation. Is he now in a position to give that information to the house?

[Translation]

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have obtained some information on this matter. However, I think the best way to answer the question would be to prepare a short statement that I could read to the house at the first opportunity.

What I can say is that impressions created in the press were obviously caused by misinterpretations. But, in order to give the house accurate information, I feel I should give more than just a verbal report. That is why I should like to table figures and show, with each group of figures, the causes or reasons which led to the suicides, to the extent that they could be determined by the investigations in each case.

DISMISSALS FOR MISAPPROPRIATION OF FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice and ask is he now in a position to inform the house whether reports are correct that the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. recommended the dismissal and firing of two high ranking officers for misappropriation of funds, and that that decision of the commissioner was changed by himself or by the cabinet, for retirement purposes and pension, in order that they be gagged?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the decision of the R.C.M.P. commissioner was changed neither by myself nor by cabinet. At one stage of the proceedings cabinet had to take a responsibility upon my recommendation, and the cabinet took its responsibility in a sense which in my opinion was totally consistent with a sense of fair play and justice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Winch: As a supplementary question, I ask the Minister of Justice whether or not the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. recommended the dismissal of the two men concerned?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, if this is an allowable question would you ask that it be put on the order paper?

Mr. Winch: What have you got to hide, Mr. Minister?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would think the minister would want to answer that question. Of course he had a discretion to exercise. I am frank to admit that, but whatever discretion is to be exercised by the cabinet is certainly something the house should know about. That does not imply any criticism to ask that question, but what was the order of the cabinet in that regard?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I think it is a matter of principle that the question should be ordered to be put on the order paper. It will be fully answered. There is, of course, nothing to hide, but it seems to be the type of practice and procedure followed by these hon. gentlemen across the way always to insinuate that, because we do not want to break the rules, we have something to hide.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise immediately on a question of privilege. I make it perfectly clear there was a discretion to be exercised by the minister and the cabinet. This is a matter of an appeal to them but strangely enough this government, with all the codes of decency and responsibility—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —strangely will not carry them out.

[Later:]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice concerning the R.C.M.P. officers. Since the decision of cabinet would have to be reflected, I assume on the basis of an order in council, would he be willing to table that order in council in order to clarify the matter?

Mr. Favreau: It is not always with pleasure I answer the questions of the hon. member for Yukon but this time I will say yes with pleasure.

[Mr. Favreau.]

PRIVILEGE

RECEIPT OF LETTER FROM MEMBER FOR BRANDON-SOURIS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise on a question of privilege. This morning I indicated—and I rise now because the hon. gentleman is in his seat—that I had written a letter to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) on December 14 and at the time of speaking I had not received a reply. I have checked into this and I find that when the house opened this morning no reply of any kind had been delivered to my box. Since that time, Mr. Speaker, two replies have been delivered. One was delivered to my office by hand and the other to my mailroom in the east block, stamped on December 18, 1964, 1.40 p.m.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege and in view of the Prime Minister's distaste for innuendo I would like to reiterate once again that that letter left my office on December 15, on Tuesday last. If there is such confusion in the Prime Minister's office that he did not discover it, then it is not my fault.

[Later:]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, during the last two or three minutes suggestions have been thrown across the floor of this chamber that there has been delay on the part of post office officials. Delays in postal services are to be expected at this time of year, but I think the house should know, especially the hon. gentlemen casting aspersions, that the post office in this building is the responsibility of the Speaker of the house, not the Postmaster General.

Mr. Speaker: In further explanation I would like to say the Speaker is overworked.

[Later:]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): The Prime Minister referred to a statement concerning a letter he has received from the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. Since there is a considerable aura of mystery surrounding this letter I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman would mind tabling it or giving the house a summary of its contents.

Mr. Pearson: I would be very glad to table the letter and my reply.

CANADIAN COASTGUARD

ALLEGED INABILITY TO RENDER ASSISTANCE TO SHIPS IN DISTRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the inability of the Canadian coastguard to provide assistance to Nova Scotia fishermen during a recent storm, which resulted in the loss of two lives, will the minister give consideration to constructing adequate ships for the coastguard service, with authority granted to the captains to rescue crews and tow disabled ships to port when they are in trouble?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if I might be permitted to make a slightly more than usually extended reply to the hon. gentleman's question I may say that last autumn—I have the date somewhere here—the hon. member will recall a question arose about towing by the coastguard. I undertook at that time to have the matter looked into and to see whether more satisfactory and more clearly defined arrangements could be made in this regard.

This matter has been receiving consideration and certain clarifications in the instructions—which I do not think the hon. gentleman would expect me to attempt to outline here—have been made.

With respect to the recent tragic events off the coasts of Nova Scotia there is, I am frank to admit, evidence that there was a certain lack of adequate co-ordination between the various—

An hon. Member: There sure was.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am admitting it without any hesitation, and with deep regret because lives were lost. There was a lack of adequate co-ordination between the various agencies which collectively have the responsibility for search and rescue. I am not pretending there wasn't. I have investigated this thing very carefully, or at least had it investigated. I have seen the reports, so far, of the investigations and it is my opinion that even if this lack of co-ordination had not existed, in the circumstances with which the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg is more familiar with than I, it would, unhappily, have made no real difference because there was no vessel capable of dealing with the terrible situations in those terrible storms. But if it did not serve to do any other good it did reveal there were some defects in communication and organization. I intend to do everything I can, and I am sure all the ministers who have this responsibility intend to do everything they can, to see that any defects in co-ordination are remedied without delay. I say this without even having had a chance to consult with my colleague the Minister of National Defence who has just returned to Ottawa and who has, as head of the R.C.A.F., the primary responsibility, but I know I have his concurrence.

I would not pretend for a moment that even the best practices in the world would enable us to deal with the kind of storm, the like of which has not taken place for years and which afflicted the east coast a short while ago.

Mr. Crouse: I wish to thank the minister for his answer and ask him whether in reconsidering the duties of the Canadian coastguard service he would consider giving authority to the captains of these ships to act upon their own discretion in cases of distress.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is a great deal more latitude given to captains now than they thought they had when this incident took place some months ago. This is a difficult problem because one has to be sure that we are not supplanting people who make their living by towing and that there is a genuine case of distress, not a case of someone who wants to get something free.

CANADIAN FLAG

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF PROCLAMATION—CEREMONIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to inform the house at what date the government intends to proclaim the new single maple leaf flag, the distinctive national flag, and what kind of ceremony the government intends to prepare to observe this historical event?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): This matter is under consideration. There are a good many formalities to be completed, as I have informed the house previously, including the proclamation by Her Majesty. It is hoped that these formalities will be concluded in a matter of weeks. Then there is the question of proclaiming the flag in Canada as the Canadian national flag with the kind of ceremony which will be worthy of such an important national occasion. It will be a matter of some weeks.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Girouard (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put to the right hon. Prime Minister a question supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer).

Should there be a ceremony to mark the inauguration of the new flag while the house is not sitting, and inasmuch as the distinctive national flag is the result of the joint effort of the various members and political parties of the house, does the Prime Minister intend to invite the members of the various political parties in the house to attend and participate in the inaugural ceremony of the new Canadian flag?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Yes, indeed. I would hope this would be a parliamentary occasion.

GRAIN

WHEAT—STATEMENT BY NORTHERN AFFAIRS MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The matter I now raise has been before me for some time but this is the first occasion I can find to put it forward.

An hon. Member: Procedural difficulties.

Mr. Hamilton: I ask this question because I think it should be cleared up. Some of us have a feeling that this may be the last day for this parliament to sit.

Some hon. Members: Parliament?

Mr. Hamilton: My question has to do with the policy of the government concerning a matter which is of great significance in western Canada. It is addressed to the Prime Minister. Does the statement made by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in Saskatoon to the annual convention of the Saskatchewan Liberal party to the effect that a two-price system for wheat under which domestic purchasers would pay a higher price than the subsidized export price would be too much of a burden on domestic consumers, represent the policy of the government?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I have not seen the statement to which the hon. member has referred. I would wish to examine it carefully before replying because it deals with a very important matter. I will give an answer as soon as I have had a chance to consider the matter.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COURT OF CLAIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): In the kindly spirit of Christmas I should like to address a question to the kindly Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and ask him whether he can tell us anything at all about the progress of the Indian claims commission.

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the amended bill has been accepted by myself and by the officers of my department, and the next step will be the discussion of this new bill amended by the cabinet committee on legislation.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCE RECOMMENDED BY ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the Hall commission report strongly recommended a federal-provincial conference within six months, what steps have been taken toward the calling of such a conference bearing in mind that tomorrow six months will have elapsed since the report was published.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I think the hon. member was in the house on many occasions when this question was discussed. There is to be a meeting some time in the new year. Recently the premiers have indicated that they would prefer it not to be held too soon.

HARBOURS

VANCOUVER—RELOCATION OF INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. This is a question of urgency; it is not a matter for the order paper. It arises out of the meeting the minister had recently with the harbour board commissioners, with the delegation from the international woodworkers of America and representatives of industries which will be displaced by the plan to build a grain elevator on the north shore of Vancouver harbour. We are all grateful that there has been a two month extension of the time available to these industries.

Is the minister now able to say what consideration is being given to making available a financial subsidy or loan so as to enable the four industries concerned to relocate on sites where they may continue to operate and maintain their employment capacity?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Since the hon. member's question was somewhat lengthy, perhaps I might be permitted to say that I appreciate immensely the co-operation of the president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool who at some considerable inconvenience to the organization, which is anxious to get on with the building of its elevator, consented to make certain arrangements which give us two more months in which to consider the future of these industries. I should like to express my appreciation publicly.

I should also like to say that the delegation which I received was most understanding. I think I grasped pretty well what their problems are. The harbour board is giving them careful consideration. If the bell had not rung at 2.30 I would have had a report from the chairman of the harbour board who was trying to reach me by telephone. Not having received that report I am afraid I cannot yet give even a tentative answer to the question put to me by the hon. member. But the matter is under active consideration.

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question in order that the situation should be clear. Am I to understand that what is under consideration now is the making of a subsidy or a loan in connection with readjustment? Is that it?

Mr. Pickersgill: It was suggested to me that if certain financial help could be given to these industries they might be relocated without any undue displacement of employment. I, of course, could give no undertaking that such assistance could be given but I did say I would examine the proposition very carefully and if I felt something could be suggested to my colleagues I would propose it to them.

TRADE

AUTOMOBILES AND PARTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DUTY FREE PROVISIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has he anything to report as to whether or not Canada and the United States are nearing agreement to establish duty free trade in automobiles and parts?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this very important matter is under active consideration and there is nothing I can announce yet.

WORLD FAIR

TRANSFER OF ADVERTISING ACCOUNTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question. In view of the letter on ethics and the abolition of patronage thereby, would the Prime Minister explain the reason why the Montreal world fair account has been transferred from six agencies, two of them French Canadian, to Cockfield, Brown & Co. Ltd., the chief advertising agency of the national Liberal federation?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, without accepting in any way the implications of the question, I would point out to the right hon. gentleman that the world fair corporation is not under the control of the government. However, I would be glad to look into the point he has raised. I would also remind the right hon. gentleman that the word "patronage" did not appear in the letter to which he referred.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the Prime Minister say that it was not to be interpreted, as the press interpreted it, as the abolition of patronage?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED INTIMIDATION OF CANADIAN CITIZENS BY LEBANESE AMBASSADOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask whether his attention has been drawn to the article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of December 5, in which two Ottawa citizens, James Beauchamp and Fred L.

Farha, Canadian citizens of Lebanese extraction, contended that they were called in on the instructions of the Lebanese ambassador, M. Edmond Khayat, and intimidated with reference to their political activities with the threat of some misfortune or ill treatment being meted out to their families which are still in Lebanon? I want to ask the minister whether he has taken any action with respect to this matter, if the ambassador in question has been called in, and if any action has been taken by the government to ask the government of Lebanon to recall him if the facts in this article are correct.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the various press reports on this subject were called to my attention and I have received a telegram containing certain allegations in very general terms. This telegram is now being examined by the department in the light of normal diplomatic practice, and I have given instructions that it be discussed with the Lebanese embassy here in Ottawa. This is the usual practice. I arrived back just last night and have not had a report of these discussions. Perhaps before the day is out I may be in a position to say something further in this connection. Just before I left I gave instructions that this matter was to be discussed forthwith with the Lebanese ambassador, because on the surface the circumstances were certainly of an order that called for explanation.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs who the telegram was from and whether any of the officials of his department have interviewed either of the gentlemen in question in order to verify the newspaper reports of the accusations which they made regarding the Lebanese ambassador?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I cannot say who the telegram was from, Mr. Speaker. I saw it, but I forget who it was from. With regard to the last part of the hon. member's question, I will make inquiries about that matter.

FISHERIES

NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF STRAIGHT BASE LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries and ask whether he and his colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs have been able to make any further progress since we last had an opportunity of raising the question of the establishment of straight base lines, which would alter our territorial seas and our fishing zones, in accordance with the principle outlined in the bill with which the house dealt some time ago.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, as I replied to a similar question of the hon. member some weeks ago, negotiations are under way with the countries involved and progress is being made.

Mr. Barnett: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister suggested several times that the negotiations were under way. I wonder whether he would mind checking to see whether the engines of the ship of state have come to a halt and the ship has lost way.

Mr. Robichaud: I do not believe this is a proper question to answer, Mr. Speaker.

ASSISTANCE REGULATIONS—INCREASE IN PERCENTAGE RATE OF SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has any consideration been given to increasing the percentage rate of subsidy under the fishing vessels assistance regulations covering fishing vessels 35 feet and over, in order to bring the subsidy more in line with the tonnage rates formerly paid?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I do not think we can accept the statement made by the hon. member that the percentage rates now being offered are not in line with the tonnage rate, however, I can inform the hon. member that the whole matter is under consideration.

AIRPORTS

DORVAL—DANGER FROM TOWER AT WORLD FAIR SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John N. Turner (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport which relates to one of the main landing routes into the Dorval airport. In view of the proposed tower over the world fair site, which is supposed to rise

1,400 feet into the air, has the minister inquired of his officials as to whether this tower will meet air safety regulations?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, at this stage that is a hypothetical question.

SYDNEY, N.S.—CALL FOR TENDERS FOR TERMINAL BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, asking him whether he is in a position to advise us as to how soon tenders may be called for the new airport terminal building at Sydney?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am not sure of the exact status of this situation, but I do know, as does the hon. gentleman, that it is under active consideration.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether the services of the R.C.M.P. have been requested by the government of Saskatchewan to investigate an alleged bribe, involving the small amount of $300,000, that was supposed to have been made to a former attorney general of Saskatchewan?

TRANSPORT

BORDEN-CAPE TORMENTINE FERRY—INQUIRY AS TO LETTING OF CONTRACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a brief question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position to say whether a contract has yet been let for the construction of a new car ferry for operation between Borden and Cape Tormentine?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not able to give an answer at this time, but if the hopes of the house leader are realized, I hope that I will be able to do so soon.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—NEGOTIATIONS WITH PREMIER OF ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister what steps, if any, he has taken to negotiate or talk with the premier of Ontario regarding the Canada pension plan and Ontario's position relating to it, particularly in view of the fact that recent indications seem to be that Ontario is not going to take part?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have had no recent discussions with the prime minister of Ontario, but so far as we are concerned federally, we are going ahead with the plan.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, can we take it from the Prime Minister's answer that the arrangements in so far as the Canada pension plan are concerned, which were negotiated with Quebec, will apply, so far as the federal government is concerned, to Ontario, if that province is willing to accept them?

Mr. Pearson: That is a very hypothetical question, Mr. Speaker. We are going ahead with our consideration of a bill which will apply to Ontario.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Arising out of the answer just given by the Prime Minister, has there been any indication from the government of Ontario that it intends to set up its own pension scheme, or has the government of Canada received any communication from provincial authorities in this connection?

Mr. Pearson: No communication regarding that course of action has been received by the federal government from the government of Ontario.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

MINTING OF GOLD COIN TO COMMEMORATE OCCASION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether the cabinet has given any consideration, or has reached a decision as to the minting of a gold coin for our centennial celebrations?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): A number of suggestions have been made along those lines, Mr. Speaker, but no decision has been made.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DESIGNATED AREAS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the subject matter of the question I am about to ask was not dealt with during my absence. As the Minister of Labour is not in the house, I want to direct this question to the Minister of Industry.

Is the minister in a position to let us know when we shall be told which are the designated areas in the country?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I shall discuss the matter with the Minister of Labour.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRIORITY OF ITEMS TO BE DISCUSSED BEFORE RECESS—CHRISTMAS RECESS—PRIVATE MEMBERS' HOUR—SESSIONAL EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the house leader. In view of the fact that last night he indicated 12 items of government business for today, without indicating the order in which those items would be called, I wonder whether before we get to orders of the day he could tell us the order of priority among those 12 items.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I may have been a little optimistic last night. I did indicate at that time that we would call the opting out resolution first, and I think hon. members will understand why, bearing in mind new standing order 61. But if the house would agree that the provisions of standing order 61 would remain applicable if we called the legislation concerning the Judges Act amendment first, I have reason to believe it would only take a few moments, and the other place is waiting for the bill. Then we would call the Combines Investigation Act amendment, which I believe is equally short. We would call those two items and then the opting out resolution. I would also like to ask the house now, Mr. Speaker, whether it could be agreed that we would waive the private members' hour at five o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: Before we do that, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may ask the house leader a supplementary question. So far he has told us about only three of the 12 items that he announced last night. What is the government's position with respect to the labour code, bearing in mind the commitment the government made that this legislation would be put through before Christmas?

Mr. McIlraith: With regard to the labour standards bill, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how it will be possible to call it, in the circumstances that exist today. I regret that very much, not only because of my own statements that we expected to have it through before Christmas but also because of the nature of the legislation, which the government regards as of the utmost importance. But we are unfortunately in the position where it would appear that certain amendments we have in mind to propose could not be expected to be passed in a reasonably short time. In any event, Mr. Speaker, there is still outstanding for discussion one point in regard to this legislation that is of concern to the government.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, if the house were prepared to sit on Monday, would the government be ready to proceed with the labour standards bill on that day?

Mr. McIlraith: I would think not, Mr. Speaker. I might add that I regret this very much because I for one feel that I did lead hon. gentlemen to believe that we would bring it forward before the Christmas recess.

Mr. Knowles: It was a very firm commitment.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, I realize that, and I regret it very much. The answer to the question, in any event, is that I do not see how we could be ready with this legislation on Monday.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister give us some reason? Surely the house is entitled to be given some reason, in view of the very serious and solemn commitments that have been made, as to why the government is not ready today and cannot be ready by Monday to proceed with this piece of legislation that was before the committee of the whole four weeks ago.

An hon. Member: The flag was too important.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not know how fully I should develop the reasons, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member will appreciate that a great many representations have been made as to the effect of the operations of the bill on certain labour groups in the country. Those representations had to be taken into account and considered very carefully, and they were. As a result there are some amendments that we propose to make to the bill. In any event, there is one question still outstanding and the government has it under quite active consideration. That is the way the matter stands at the moment.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I correct the statement that I made. I said it was a month ago, but I find on checking that it was two months ago that this matter was before the committee of the whole. It seems to me this matter was before the committee of the whole for a long time.

Mr. McIlraith: That is quite right, Mr. Speaker. It was many weeks ago in any event, although I do not have the precise date when the matter was before the house. A great many representations were made. This bill is one which in the view of the government is very important, and it is a matter of getting or trying to get, a perfect bill through to enactment, rather than a less perfect bill. These representations did reveal some need for perfecting the bill.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister or the leader of the house, whoever is the more appropriate to answer. Is the government in a position to state whether this session is going to be adjourned or prorogued; and in either event what is the period of time the government has in mind before the house is brought into session again?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to answer that question. The government proposes to submit a motion to the house, when the house is ready to receive it, providing for an adjournment of the house until February 16, subject to the provision which has been made in the last several adjournments that the Speaker can call the house back earlier if the necessity should arise. There is also a provision in the proposed motion that in the event that His Honour the Speaker is unable, owing to illness or other cause, to recall the house the Deputy Speaker could act in his stead if need be.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The previous speaker basically asked the question I wanted to ask, but I should like to ask the house leader if it is not possible, out of respect and consideration for those members who have to travel a great distance, to state the intentions of the government as to when it proposes to adjourn so that we can make our reservations.

Mr. McIlraith: Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak for the opposition groups but I would hope it would be possible to adjourn in another two and a half hours.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, since everyone seems to be getting into a better mood may I ask a supplementary question which is prompted by the many approaches which have been made by the longshoremen regarding the labour standards bill, and which may give the impression that I am in favour of a delay in the legislation, or at least approval of what has been put forward. Will the minister assure the longshoremen, who are worried about the effect of this bill on their working situation in Halifax and Saint John during the winter months, that every opportunity will be given to them in the meantime to put their case forward; and if satisfaction is not achieved in this regard, will the government bring in amendments which will deal with their particular situation?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the answer to that is yes; I hope these representations will be made very quickly.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question to the house leader. Does the government have in mind the recall of the house earlier than February 16 if the Canada pension plan committee has completed its final report before that date?

Mr. McIlraith: Well, Mr. Speaker, one can never tell and it is impossible to give a precise answer to that question. I hope it will not be necessary to recall the house before February 16 because it seems to me there is a great deal of work to be done by the pension committee, but it may be necessary. I just cannot foresee the future.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, one further supplementary question. I wonder whether the house leader could use his influence on the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare so that the members of the pension committee will have a little longer holiday than from now until January 12. I think this is asking too much.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, could I ask a further supplementary question of the house leader?

Mr. Speaker: Anything to do with holidays, I understand, is quite pressing.

Mr. Winch: In view of the fact that the permanent members of the House of Commons who have been sitting for 11 months receive an annual salary, could the minister state whether on the recess sessional employees will be kept on the staff and on pay?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That matter has been considered very carefully, and in view of the large number of members of the regular and permanent staff who are still to take holidays, and because of the fact that there will be committees sitting and extra help required for the purpose, it is going to be necessary for all sessional staff to be kept on throughout the whole adjournment period.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. My understanding is that this series of questions started out as a question to the house leader concerning the labour standards code bill, and my supplementary question relates to that aspect. I should like to ask the house leader whether, since he has indicated that except for one small point certain changes to the bill as originally drafted are in the mind of the government, he would not agree that it would be desirable that we at least resume the delayed consideration of the committee of the whole so that members of the house may become acquainted with the changes to which the government has already agreed, in light of the many representations and questions which many hon. members are receiving on this matter. If I may say so, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that even if we did not conclude our considerations we would be able to understand the whole matter in a much better light and deal with these questions during the recess if we were to agree to give some further consideration to the bill prior to any recess. This supplementary question relates to the one asked earlier by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam with respect to our spending some time on Monday discussing the labour standards code bill.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I am very doubtful whether it would be possible to accede to the hon. member's request, although I will consider it and see what progress we make. But I really do not see how it is possible to meet this request, much as I should like to.

[Mr. Monteith.]

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Girouard (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, may I direct to the Prime Minister a question which I think is of national interest?

Would the Prime Minister tell the house whether he intends to reconvene the house in February for a regular session, or rather, according to some rumours, to table a budget and announce a general election for next summer?

[Text]

[Later:]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister about a subject we were discussing a moment ago, and I am sure the Prime Minister will realize that it is appropriate for me to direct the question to him. Without prejudice to the possibility that we might yet deal with the labour code before the adjournment of this session, may we have an undertaking from the government that this legislation is to be enacted at this session, as far as the government is concerned?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that certainly is our intention. I share the house leader's disappointment that we have not been able to deal with it during this part of the session before Christmas.

As the house leader has stated, representations in relation to this legislation are still being received. Delegations also are still being received. Other business has taken longer than we had expected and we have not been able to reach that business before Christmas. Certainly it is our intention to enact this legislation during this session.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask another question. Are we in this present position because of the time which has been taken up in this house on other matters, or because the government is not ready to proceed with the bill?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, a lot of time has been taken up in the consideration of other very important national matters. We have received many more representations in relation to this labour code than we had expected. They are still being received from employees' unions and employers. This has required further consideration of some of the provisions of the legislation, but that consideration is just about completed.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, the one assurance we want from the Prime Minister is that the government is not getting cold feet about this legislation.

Mr. Pearson: No, we are feeling pretty warm about this legislation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: So are we.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, do we have the agreement of the house on the two matters I raised, one regarding the five o'clock private members' hour and the other in respect of proceedings with the legislation on the Judges Act and the Combines Investigation Act, without prejudicing any rights under standing order 61?

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that we adjourn today until February 16. It is my belief that to do so would mean that we will again not get a summer vacation next year unless we have an election. I am not running this government, but I am one of those who is insistent that we should strive toward arranging the business of this house so that we can have a holiday in July and August. It has been my opinion since I came to this house that we were supposed to have a vacation in July and August, and if we now propose to do something which will not work toward that end I cannot give unanimous consent. Surely we are all adult enough that we can arrange our business in such a way that we have a summer holiday. When the government asks for co-operation it must be prepared to give some assurance that it will co-operate in working toward this goal, which I am sure is desirable to every member of this house. This long holiday we are going to get in the wintertime means we cannot possibly have a summer vacation next year when it would be much more advantageous to our families than a winter vacation. So far as I am concerned, the government is either going to have to give some assurance in this regard or I will not be willing to consent to giving up private members' hour.

Mr. McIlraith: I hasten to assure the hon. member in this regard because one of the main reasons for choosing this date was in order to permit the government to have its legislation and the estimates ready for submission to the house when the house opens. If the hon. member was listening to my remarks this morning when we were discussing the matter of concurrence in a report concerning the standing orders and rules of the house he will have noted the reference to one item at least which I hope will make it possible for us, come next session, to have the kind of adjournment in the summer season that all of us wish, those on the government side equally with the hon. member.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if that is also his opinion? He has some say in this matter. I certainly would not be opposed to something unusual happening, but is it his opinion also that the fact that we have had a winter vacation will not be used to say that we have to spend the next 10 months in Ottawa on government business?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I hasten to assure my hon. friend that I share his opinion and that expressed by the house leader entirely with regard to this matter and I hope that next summer we will indeed have the kind of vacation which he has mentioned.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the adjournment of private members' business at five o'clock, I understand that the bill most likely to be called and with which I am ready to proceed is that under order No. 3 under public bills, an act to amend the Immigration Act, racial discrimination. I think it is a very important matter of legislation, but if the government will give consideration to making this amendment at some stage or other I will be very happy not to press it at five o'clock.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we will give it consideration.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to say a word since the Solicitor General is not here, I spoke to the hon. member for Port Arthur about his bill which would have come up in the ordinary course and the Solicitor General told me that he would give an assurance to the house that the priorities of the bills as they now stood would, at the request of the government, remain as they are. I do not think the hon. gentleman would expect the government to make a decision like that without being able to consider the matter but I am sure it is a matter that would be considered.

Mr. Brewin: I did not expect the government to give their approval now. What I did say was that if we are going to have an adjournment and if the bill in principle commends itself so much to reasonable people I hope they will bring it in as their own legislation after the adjournment.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, at this stage I am anxious to consider practically anything.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to the suspension of private members' hour from five to six?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister to consider private Bill No. C-48 while he is at it?

Mr. Pearson: Indeed I will, Mr. Speaker.

JUDGES ACT

PROVISION FOR SALARIES OF ADDITIONAL JUDGES FOR MANITOBA AND QUEBEC

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend Bill C-112, an act to amend the Judges Act, now before the house, to authorize the provision of salaries for two additional judges of the Court of Queen's bench for Manitoba and to increase from three to five the number of additional judges of the superior court of Quebec for whom salaries may be authorized to be provided.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, it is rather difficult to follow what the exact amendments are. What will be the increase in Manitoba? In the copy I have before me there is no reference to Manitoba.

Mr. Favreau: No. The resolution now before the house purports to amend a bill, which on July 13 of this year received first reading, so as to provide for the addition of two judges in Manitoba.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Favreau, seconded by Mr. Pickersgill, moves that the said resolution be referred to committee of the whole on Bill C-112, an act to amend the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES ACT

PROVISION FOR SALARIES FOR ADDITIONAL JUDGES

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-112, to amend the Judges Act.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Chairman, I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Transport, to move the following amendment to Bill No. C-112:

That Bill C-112, an act to amend the Judges Act, be amended as follows:

(a) by striking out clause 1 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

1. Paragraph (e) of section 9 of the Judges Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
"(e) Seventy puisne judges of the Superior Court, each...21,000.00."

2. Paragraph (d) of section 12 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
"(d) Seven puisne judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, each...21,000.00"; and

(b) by renumbering clauses 2 and 3 thereof as clauses 3 and 4 respectively.

Mr. Pickersgill: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, as a point of general interest, and I am asking for information only, this bill has to do with the salaries of judges.

Mr. Churchill: No, just the number.

Mr. Favreau: The numbers. It does not change the salaries.

Mr. Churchill: It is just increasing the number of judges.

Mr. McIntosh: In the copy I have here it mentions set salaries of $16,000, $21,000 and so on. I want this information for information's sake only. The salaries judges get are either from their duties when acting as judges or as commissioners of inquiries. How are they paid when acting as commissioners of inquiries, and what are they paid?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Chairman, the salaries provided for in this bill are the ordinary prevailing salaries of judges, depending on their respective jurisdictions. There are provisions in the Judges Act which allow for authority to be given in certain circumstances to judges acting as commissioners. The practice is usually to pay a nominal per diem allowance, or other sort of allowance, by the authority retaining them as commissioners. The salaries provided in this bill are strictly their salaries as judges, and I understand that in certain provinces, not all, judges in certain jurisdictions receive an indemnity from the province to perform certain services under specified provincial acts.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I just want to be clear that the amendment included the additional two judges for Manitoba?

Mr. Favreau: Yes, it includes the additional two judges for the court of Queen's bench in Manitoba, as well as the two judges for Quebec.

Mr. Knowles: To be clear, Mr. Chairman, should you not call clause 4 as well?

Mr. Favreau: Clause 4 is contained in the amendment.

Mr. Churchill: That is the trouble which arose. Did you call clause 4, Mr. Chairman, or just clauses 1, 2, 3 and the title?

The Chairman: I have just noticed the last paragraph of the amendment so I will now call clause 4.

Clause 4 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Mr. Prittie: Just before the title carries I would like to express the thought which has been felt by many people from time to time, that some time we should investigate the means of appointing judges and perhaps look at the United Kingdom practice which is almost completely non-political.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No it is not.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-141, to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there would be agreement if the minister would give a short word of explanation in connection with this bill.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, as the house knows, because of a situation which arose in B.C., in the case of a request under section 7 of the Combines Investigation Act, for an investigation into the operations and arrangements between fishermen and the purchasers and processors of fish in B.C., an amendment was made to the Combines Investigation Act providing for a moratorium during which the act would be deemed not to apply to those arrangements.

The moratorium was renewed and continued for further periods in 1960, 1961 and 1962. The last exemption by parliament in 1962 was for two years, to expire on December 31, 1964. Because of legal proceedings that have been taken against the restrictive trade practices commission and its members, which proceedings ended some time in 1962, the commission has not been in a position to send full notice to all the parties likely to be aggrieved by the proceedings and who ought to be heard, and it is not expected to be in a position to make a report for some time yet.

Furthermore, in the summer of 1963 there was a serious fishermen's strike, primarily over the minimum prices to be received by fishermen from the sale of fish. Arising out of this strike an intergovernmental committee, comprising federal and British Columbia civil servants, was appointed by the federal Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud) and the British Columbia minister of labour to examine in detail the problems concerned with wage and price disputes in the British Columbia fishing industry and to submit to both governments recommendations of action necessary to minimize interruption of fishing operations in the future.

While I understand the committee is expected to submit its report shortly, it will be necessary to allow sufficient time for consideration to be given to the committee's recommendations and for a decision to be made concerning their implementation by either or both of the governments concerned.

It is considered, therefore, that the moratorium provision should be extended for a further 18 months, that is to June 30, 1966, by which time it is expected there will have been a full opportunity to assess any recommendations and to have taken what action, if any, is required.

With respect to the inquiry I might add that it is the view of the restrictive trade practices commission that before proceeding further with the matter it should know the committee's recommendations and any action to be taken arising out of these recommendations. Those are the reasons for the request to the house to extend for a further period of 18 months the moratorium under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for his explanation. This is a matter which is of grave concern to the fishermen and the fishing industry of B.C., and had the minister not explained it I was going to point out this is something which was in a state of moratorium. Though I am quite willing to support early passage of the bill I think we should have some assurance that the present state of affairs, which I for one think is highly unsatisfactory, will not continue forever. I am reasonably satisfied with the statement made by the Minister of Justice and would be prepared to support the passage of the bill. However, I know that the Minister of Fisheries is interested in this matter and he may have some additional information he can give us. He may be able to tell us how soon he expects to have the information provided in the joint federal-provincial report which the Minister of Justice mentioned. If the Minister of Fisheries is in a position to make a statement to the house along these lines I for one would be interested to hear it.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): I wish to state that the commission referred to by the Minister of Justice has completed its studies and submitted a preliminary report. This was about three weeks ago. We expect that the final report and recommendation will be ready early in the new year. This report will naturally have some bearing on a final decision with regard to this matter.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Application of acts to fishing agreements.

Mr. Patterson: I do not intend to delay the committee but I would point out that the unions concerned with the various fishing agreements on the west coast are desirous of bringing legislation into line with the calendar year. It has been pointed out that this provision runs for 18 months and will expire in the middle of the calendar year. Does the minister feel convinced that before the date set out in this measure is reached he will be in a position to clarify the situation and put the legislation on a permanent basis?

Mr. Favreau: I am confident this will be the case. Instead of providing for the moratorium to expire at the end of the calendar year we have provided for a period of 18 months to end on June 30, 1966, and the reason for this was twofold. First, it will undoubtedly cover the period of the arrangements relating to the two fishing seasons and, in the second place, it will in 1966 provide sufficient time to enact whatever complementary or remedial legislation will be necessary. In other words, the arrangements being made at the beginning of the fishing season it would have been not abnormal but unnecessary to let the moratorium go until the end of the year because in the meantime it would not have been possible to provide for remedial legislation. But in practice this covers the arrangements between the fishermen and the fish purchasers and processors both for 1965 and 1966.

[Mr. Favreau.]

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Favreau moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

TRANSFER TO PROVINCES OF FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR SHARED PROGRAMS

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure of an interim nature respecting certain conditional grant and shared cost programs that have become established federal-provincial programs to enable such of the provinces as may wish to do so to assume financial responsibility for such programs within the ambit of national objectives; and, in respect of those provinces that assume such responsibility for specific programs, to provide a tax abatement under the Income Tax Act, a tax equalization payment and, where necessary, an adjustment payment, or to provide a cash payment in lieu of a tax abatement for particular programs or as cash compensation in other cases; and to authorize such agreements as may be necessary to ensure that the continuation in the interim period of any such program by provinces with such federal assistance will accord with national objectives; and to provide for other related or incidental matters.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Mr. Gordon: This resolution and the bill which will follow it concerns the important matter of federal-provincial shared cost programs. It is designed as a prelude to a thoroughgoing review of the role of shared cost programs in Canadian confederation—a review which has been agreed to by all of the provinces. This review, to be undertaken by the tax structure committee, must be both objective and dispassionate if it is to produce a long run approach to shared cost programs which will be acceptable both to this house and to all of the provinces.

Let me say a word about these shared cost programs and how they developed before elaborating upon the intent of this resolution.

The primary purpose of certain of the federal-provincial shared cost programs was to stimulate the development of national programs and to ensure to all Canadians an entitlement to certain basic services, regardless of residence. The major services involved are well known to all hon. members—the hospital insurance scheme, the old age assistance payments and other related welfare services, unemployment assistance payments to others who are unable to work and to those who are temporarily out of work or whose unemployment insurance benefits have expired; vocational training, and the basic health facilities that are being financed partly by national health grants.

The major purpose of other joint programs was to facilitate the achievement of national and regional economic goals, primarily high and stable rates of economic growth. Examples of these programs include ARDA, the trans-Canada highway, the winter works and the roads to resources programs.

Still other programs, the smaller ones, were designed to meet temporary or short run problems, such, for example, as the camp grounds and picnic areas program, or the spruce budworm control program.

Everyone recognizes that in meeting these primary goals, the shared cost programs resulted in a very substantial transfer of funds from the federal to the provincial governments. These transfers enabled the provinces to undertake programs which were in considerable public demand without the withdrawal of funds from other important areas of government such as education which would otherwise have been necessary.

I should note, Mr. Chairman, that not all of these programs were inspired by federal governments—many of them were urged by the provinces themselves. It remains true, however, that the federal government has an interest in the shared cost programs; it is to be found in the broad national purpose which could be served by the establishment of certain Canada-wide programs, and in the transfer of funds to the provinces and municipalities.

It must be acknowledged immediately that the largest of these programs could be implemented only through legislative and administrative action on the part of the provinces—action which falls clearly within provincial jurisdiction. Some joint programs, it is true, were concerned with matters of concurrent jurisdiction—notably agriculture—and some of them were concerned with economic growth and development, an area in which federal initiative is generally acknowledged. But many of the programs, indeed, as I say, the largest of them, required the kind of legislative and administrative action which is within provincial domain.

Since the war we have seen a very substantial growth in these conditional grants. In 1945 about $50 million per year was being transferred to the provinces by means of these shared cost programs; by 1964 this figure had reached $903 million. In a period of 20 years the total is approaching 20 times the 1945 figure. When such transfers of funds reach these proportions it is time to re-examine the role and the purpose of shared cost programs. This is all the more so when one considers that unconditional payments to the provinces, namely equalization and fiscal adjustment payments, now constitute only about one third of the conditional payments. Yet it is through these very equalization payments that we can now overcome the unequal fiscal capacity of the provinces which contributed to the rapid extension of conditions grants.

The second reason for re-examining the role of shared cost programs in Canada flows from the first. Having overcome the most serious deficiencies in the fiscal capacity of the provinces, and given the vast improvement which has occurred in the staffing and the technology within provincial governments, the case for continued federal participation in joint programs is not nearly as strong as it once seemed to be. I think all the provinces recognize these changes; but Quebec in particular perceives that the equalization of provincial fiscal capacity now makes feasible a point of view which has tended to be argued in the past in theoretical terms: the discharge of provincial responsibilities without the degree of federal intervention that has come to prevail—and come to prevail, I should add, in the post-war years. Quebec notes that shared cost programs as they have been used, however, have involved the continuing and the growing intervention of the federal government into matters which lie within provincial jurisdiction. This view is held honestly and firmly, and I think everyone must agree that when such a large proportion of Canadians come to share this view —and of course they are not confined to the province of Quebec—it is time to re-examine the intergovernmental arrangements which are in question.

There is a third reason for re-examining the role of shared cost programs in Canadian confederation. It is this: The primary purpose of many existing conditional grants may already have been accomplished. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that when hospital insurance has been established across Canada, that when old age assistance payments are being made across this nation, that when unemployment assistance is available to all Canadians, the prime purpose of these conditional grants may well have been achieved. These programs have been established and are not likely to be revoked. We want to assure, of course, that the benefits remain portable or, to put it another way, that barriers are not erected so that the citizen loses his rights to these services when he moves across provincial borders. But I think all the provinces accept this principle and would be quite prepared to maintain such important elements of nation-wide programs without the application of federal sanctions. This, then, is the third reason we feel it is time to re-examine the role of shared cost programs—their very maturity.

The fourth reason for re-examining federal-provincial shared cost programs is related both to their maturity and to the magnitude they have reached in terms of dollars. It has long been argued that he who spends should be the one required to tax. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said in 1905 that "it is a sound principle of finance and a still sounder principle of government that those who have the duty of expending the revenue of a country should also be saddled with the responsibility of levying and providing it".

Mr. Olson: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gordon: My hon. friend will find that quotation in the House of Commons Debates for February 21, 1905, if he is interested. In 1940 the Rowell-Sirois commission repeated this view. Obviously one cannot press this principle to its ultimate conclusion without eliminating equalization payments, but I think it is fair to argue that once shared cost programs have accomplished their initial purpose they should be reviewed with this principle in mind.

For these reasons the government of Canada has agreed that there should be a review of the role of shared cost programs in Canadian confederation. All provincial governments have agreed with this view. In consequence the tax structure committee has been assigned the task, as has already been reported, of studying the future role of shared cost programs in Canada. Its recommendations will be submitted to the federal-provincial conference; but this review will take at least a year and a half.

In the interval it seemed that some positive indication of the possibilities open to Canadian governments was called for. Consequently, the Prime Minister offered to the provinces on August 15 an alternative approach to shared cost programs, this alternative to prevail during the interim period while the tax structure committee conducts its studies. For the major programs involved—hospitalization, welfare programs, vocational training and health grants—this alternative will enable the province to tax their own citizens to pay for these major continuing shared cost programs with the federal government providing related equalization payments. The province in turn would agree to maintain the programs in their present form during the interim period. The provisions of the bill will apply for an interim period only.

I have deliberately refrained from enunciating at this time any government position on the role of shared cost programs in the long run. I think the reason for this will be obvious. The federal government has undertaken to discuss this question with the provinces, who are as much concerned with it as are we in this parliament, and we want to approach these discussions with an open mind and without having made our position clear or definite in advance. My hope is that hon. members will have an opportunity to consider this important issue carefully when the bill receives first reading and becomes available for study. We can then debate it fully when it reaches the stage of second reading.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most important matters that will come before parliament, and the fact that it is being brought in in the last minutes of the last hour does not render it any less significant. Indeed, I am surprised that this question, important as it is to Canadian confederation, was not brought before the house earlier so that it could be given the careful consideration which the nature and importance of the matter deserves.

While the Minister of Finance has emphasized the fact that this is in the nature of an interim measure, the government of Canada has not enunciated or declared its policy, nor does it intend to at the moment. None the less the experience of the past has been that the things which have been interim and introduced as such have ultimately in many cases become the permanent course of action. Indeed, the pathways of experiment often become the highways of experience. For that reason this matter and its importance should have been discussed at very considerable length. Several of my colleagues would have dealt with the matter, to the end that the substantial changes inherent in the ideas which have been expressed by the government concerning some of the provinces receive the examination by parliament which would assure that what is being done here, when it is done, is to the advantage of Canada, and that it is strengthening rather than weakening confederation.

I want to have the assurance of the minister that in the event that this resolution is passed—and in order to preserve our rights we intend to pass it on division—no action will be taken by the federal government during the months intervening between the present and the resumption of debate and final decision on the matter by any of the provinces of Canada. In other words, what is done by the passage of this interim resolution is not to be considered as a determination made by the house.

We think that this matter is one on which there is widespread division of opinion. In outlining the circumstances of this matter the minister rather glossed over the situation. I think he did so intentionally so as to indicate that there are four or five arguments in favour of action being taken and that the position of the government, while not determined upon finally, might receive the support of this house; and then later on the membership of this house would be faced by an accomplished fact.

How far are we going to go in this direction? Are we, in accepting the generality of the idea of opting out, actually opting ourselves out of nationhood? This is a viewpoint which is being expressed in increasing measure. When this matter is placed alongside certain other plans of the government, when one sees the changes that are taking place or are anticipated or expected, and in view of the leadership which this government has given in certain directions, there are many Canadians who are wondering whether or not this is one measure, when taken in conjunction with others, has not got as its purpose ominous portents for national unity.

I have before me an editorial which appeared in the Vancouver Province for October 2 last in which this view is set forth. The view of this newspaper is that the clock is being turned back. The editorial goes on to say:

> The provinces want to opt out of shared revenues and shared responsibilities. If they are not careful they may arrive at a time when there is nothing left from which to opt out.

It concludes with these words:

> If there is strength in unity it is, perhaps, ironical that just as Canada is about to commemorate its centennial the government should be passing legislation which may prove to be a major step toward the eventual disintegration of confederation.

That is a viewpoint which is being expressed across this nation.

We want to look carefully into this matter, Mr. Chairman. We want to make our position clear so that no one will misunderstand it, and that the fact we are considering today the passage of this resolution shall in no way be interpreted as approval of the course which this government has in mind. The aim and purpose of the fathers of confederation was to bring about a united nation. The fathers of confederation did not believe in a Canada of two nations. They did not accept the principle of a state within a state. They did not accept the principle that the provinces, or any of them, might become associate states. The principles of Macdonald and Cartier and of all succeeding prime ministers up to the present Prime Minister followed the course throughout the years which was in keeping with the abiding principle upon which confederation was built. The expression "The building of one Canada" is not a new one, nor is it a new thought. It was the aim and purpose of the fathers of confederation that we should indeed be one nation, with our constitutional rights assured, predicted and preserved. We in the Conservative party went further than did the Liberal government of 1945 to 1949 when we insisted that our constitutional rights must remain inviolate, and that they could not be changed excepting by unanimous agreement not only of the federal parliament but also of each and every province in Canada.

We want carefully to examine legislation which would allow a wholesale opting out; not an opting out on matters, constitutionally and necessarily so, within the jurisdiction of the provinces, such as education, but the whole field mentioned by the minister, such as ARDA, roads to resources, the trans-Canada highway and the like. We want to be assured that in any scheme to permit of a wholesale opting out we are not taking a step which will ultimately lead to the fragmentation of this nation and the deconfederation of our country.

Having said that, without going into great detail at this time, I conclude by saying that this is not as casual a matter as the minister has suggested in the statement he read to the house. This is one of the most serious matters which should and must receive consideration of parliament and of the provinces. Steps such as this, in order to achieve immediate purposes, are dangerous unless there is a most careful scrutiny and examination made to assure that in the years ahead the acceptance of the general principle of opting out by provinces will not lead to the creation in this country of a series of associated states, as it were; a culmination which I am sure none of us desires, because it would only lead to the weakening of national unity and a denial of the abiding purposes upon which confederation was envisaged, and finally consummated.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, while it is not possible to be sure what is intended by the legislation which is to come before us, I must say that I was somewhat disturbed by the minister's statement this afternoon, because it appears to bear out the anxiety I expressed some weeks, or possibly months ago, when I raised a question in the house about a speech made in Montreal by one of the minister's colleagues, the Secretary of State, which appeared to me to be an invitation to all the demands for fiscal decentralization.

At that time, the Secretary of State assured me that that was not his intention, and he very kindly provided me with the text of his speech in both French and English; and while there was nothing in that speech that one could definitely point to as an acceptance of even greater decentralization, the whole tone of it appeared to me to be in that direction.

This afternoon the minister has suggested the areas in which more decentralization should take place. In fact, he appeared to be of the opinion that when we have old age pensions, unemployment insurance and hospitalization across the country, we have pretty well completed the purposes of federal participation. It seems to me, sir, that there are some fundamental economic principles and fundamental national principles involved.

I was not impressed with the minister's quotation, that he who spends should be made to tax, which appears to me to be a clear statement of the government's desire to escape any odium by raising funds in an area in which it is not going to itself directly disperse them. That does not seem to me to be a very responsible attitude for a government of Canada.

I am concerned principally, however, Mr. Chairman, with the danger that I see resulting from a too far reaching program of decentralization, such as was outlined by the minister this afternoon—a danger to our federal control of the economy and monetary system. I have in mind the very close relationship which has grown up, and is now acknowledged by most people, between the federal government in this case, through national government bond issues, and national government fiscal powers and control over the monetary system. They are linked inseparably together, and in my view the government will have to be very careful as to how far it goes in the process of divesting itself of the fiscal power which will be required in order that it may fulfil its functions of controlling and managing the monetary system of our country.

The minister also made mention of conditional grants. I think this is an area where there should be some reform take place. These grants should perhaps be made on a much wider basis than they are at the present time, and I have in mind, for instance, grants that are made for hospital construction. It may very well be that in one province or other there happens to be at a particular time no current need for further hospital beds, but very urgent needs for other health services, perhaps in the way of cancer research or cancer treatment, or various medical projects of that sort.

As things stand at the present, of course the provincial governments cannot divert conditional grants made in regard to hospital construction to another purpose. I think it would be the better part of wisdom to make these conditional grants on a much wider basis, and base this decentralization of administration on that principle. I think it might well be quite dangerous to permit more and more of the taxing powers in this country to devolve on the provincial government.

The minister made mention of the Rowell-Sirois commission. I have a very clear memory of that because I was sitting on the opposite side of the question in the provincial legislature. I remember the discussions that took place at that time about the transfer of fiscal powers from the provinces to the federal government. A great many fears were expressed as to the ultimate result of that transfer. I doubt whether anybody looking back over the history of the past 20 years could have any doubt that that was a move in the right direction, and if we consider what its specific and urgent purpose was, I think we will see how extremely important this division of fiscal powers is. It was, of course, brought on under the approaching pressures of war, which required a tremendous federal-national program of development. In order that we could have a national program of development for military purposes it was necessary to transfer many of the fiscal powers to the federal government.

I submit, sir, that we have today no less an urgent need for an overriding national economic development than we had in the 1940's when we were faced with that military situation, and for the government to divest itself of the powers which will be required in order to direct and stimulate that economic development at this time, seems to me to be extremely shortsighted. I hope that the tax structure committee in its examination of the tax structure of this country will bear these matters in mind and will not be too concerned about assuaging the local ambitions of provincial governments. I have on more than one occasion suggested that this problem of the provinces versus the federal government has been, as it is today, oversimplified.

We are being asked to believe that there is only one province in Canada which is engaged in these pressures for disintegration, if you like. Whereas it is perfectly obvious that this is an apparent characteristic of powerful provincial governments. Alongside that, if you are looking for separatists it is no good just looking over the Ottawa river. We should also look over the Rocky mountains. Indeed you may look also closer at hand. We have a very clear warning coming from Toronto these days that the Ontario government is getting all set to torpedo the national pension plan.

An hon. Member: The Christmas spirit.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): No Christmas spirit there. It is not Christmas day yet. These are dangerous trends in the country and they should be resisted in spite of a possible loss of favour among certain provincial potentates. I believe that today more than ever before there is a necessity for a national plan and a national purpose in the development of our country which can only be carried out if the federal government reserves to itself and retains adequate fiscal powers that will enable it to do so. I am extremely uneasy about the suggestions that have been made this afternoon by the minister. I can only hope my uneasiness may be allayed when I see the legislation, but I have very grave doubts in that regard.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, we listened with interest to the Minister of Finance when he spoke on the resolution respecting this measure of an interim nature dealing with certain conditional grants and shared cost programs. I am going to be as brief as possible and yet convey some of our thinking to the Minister of Finance in this regard.

He said first of all, I believe, that all of the provinces have agreed to review these shared cost programs, that this was being done through the tax study committee and that they were basically in agreement with the opting out provisions contained in the resolution. I think he could probably have been considerably more accurate if he had stated that in so far as the provinces are concerned there is unanimity respecting the matter of basic services, that all of the provinces have agreed that this is a proper area for the federal government to be in and that even though these services may fall within the jurisdiction of the provinces there should be minimum basic services in a number of the fields that the Minister of Finance suggested.

But when it comes to the matter of some of the formulas that have been concocted recently to distribute the tax revenue to pay for these shared cost programs there is vigorous disagreement. We in this party believe that there is a great need today for this kind of review. We also believe that along with such a review certain constitutional amendments should be made which would redefine and redelineate areas of responsibility. We in this party are becoming very concerned about the growth of a fourth level of government and the importance being placed on it. I refer to dominion-provincial conferences.

We believe we have almost reached the stage where a great deal of the authority in administering our national affairs has been taken away from the House of Commons. Whenever the government of the day raises in this chamber any matter that could have some overtones with regard to provincial jurisdiction the first question that is raised is: Have you cleared it with the provinces? I think this is an unhealthy situation that is developing.

The Minister of Finance said that since the war there has been a substantial growth in shared cost programs. The reason this has happened is that the federal government has not been willing to vacate or even partially yield some of the tax fields they took over from the provinces during the war years. In addition, the major growth of government expenditure has been in those areas assigned exclusively to the provinces under the constitution. I do not quarrel with that. I think the people have a right to have growth and expansion in those services they desire. In other words, they have a right to the results they want from the administration of their affairs and if it happens that the desire has been for expansion of services that were within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments, then I accept that. But what I do not accept is the fact that the federal government has not been willing to turn over these tax fields to the provinces so they could accept and discharge their responsibilities.

Another great problem that has led up to the situation in which we find ourselves today is the fact that all federal political parties have made campaign promises on matters exclusively within provincial jurisdiction. When the party elected to office attempts to keep these promises it finds itself in the situation where it has to negotiate with the provincial governments to find out whether it can undertake these things.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, there is one other thing about which we in this party are very disturbed, and we can see the kind of legislation that will follow this resolution, further aggravating the situation. I refer to the business of concocting formulas to meet a predetermined figure in dealing with the sharing of revenue. I am happy that the Minister of Finance referred to that famous quotation from Hansard of 1905 where it was said that the responsibility for collecting revenue must rest with the spending authority. This cannot be done completely and I realize that perhaps it would not be desirable to have different levels of personal income tax throughout the country, but I do think there should be some kind of fixed formula for the disbursement of revenue to the provinces.

We know, for example, that in the equalization payments certain factors are found in the formula that result in an unequal distribution of money. The province of Alberta has justifiably complained about the inclusion of half of the revenue from natural resources. I do not want to go into that subject deeply again because I am sure the Minister of Finance is quite familiar with the injustice of the inclusion of that factor in the tax equalization formula.

We also believe that the central government must maintain exclusive authority in certain areas and we certainly hope that the resolution and the bill to follow will not lead to a situation that will weaken the central government at a time when it needs to be strengthened. I am not one of those who believe in complete centralization and complete authority resting in the federal government in all fields but I think there are certain areas where the federal government needs to maintain its exclusive authority to the extent that it is not negotiable with the provinces at all. Otherwise we are always going to find ourselves in the situation of having to negotiate so-called political bargains with regard to the distribution of the tax dollars collected by the federal government.

We are not going to oppose the resolution, Mr. Chairman, or carry on the debate at any length today but we have certain reservations about this matter. In particular, we believe that the jurisdictions of the two levels of government should be redefined and that we should make sure that the federal government does not begin to move into provincial jurisdiction again as much as they have in the past, which in fact has led up to the situation that we face today.

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Chairman, there is one matter which I think I should clear up. The Leader of the Opposition in the course of his —I hope he won't think I am being offensive—refreshingly brief remarks said he would like an assurance from the minister that if the resolution is passed no action will be taken in the intervening months until the bill can be dealt with. Naturally, as I am sure he knows, I cannot give him that assurance. If the resolution is passed the provinces will be entitled to operate, as I think they are anyway, on the basis of the letters from the Prime Minister, so far as deductions are concerned.

These changes will go into effect on January 1. Naturally, if the bill should not be passed by parliament adjustments will have to be made.

Mr. Cowan: I was quite prepared to discuss this resolution in detail but we are having the same treatment as last year when they brought in the C.B.C. estimates in the last hour of the last day of the year. In this resolution the expression is used, "that it is expedient to introduce a measure of an interim nature respecting certain conditional grant and shared cost programs." Would the minister be kind enough to state that when the bill comes down we will have time to discuss it in detail?

Order No. 2 on the order paper deals with the O'Leary report. This was introduced in the house on March 11 and a number of us have been waiting with interest for it to come up for discussion. Could the minister tell the committee—you ask me why I don't ask him privately, but I would like to have it on public record—at what time the bill might be brought up for discussion? Will it be nine months from now, as is the case with the O'Leary report introduced on March 11, or will it be introduced shortly after we reassemble on February 16?

Mr. Gordon: If the members of the committee would bear with me and permit me to answer the question I would be glad to do so. It would be my hope it would be one of the first items to be dealt with after we reassemble.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Churchill: On division.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the resolution?

Mr. Churchill: On division.

Resolution reported and concurred in, on division.

Mr. Gordon thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-142, respecting the operation of certain established federal-provincial programs.

Motion agreed to, on division, and bill read the first time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): When shall the said bill be read a second time? By leave now?

Mr. Churchill: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Next sitting of the house.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): May I have the indulgence of the house to read the following communication which has been addressed to the Speaker of the House of Commons:

Ottawa, December 18, 1964

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Robert Taschereau, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 18th December, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. G. Cherrier
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

FINANCE

AMENDMENT OF ACTS ADMINISTERED IN INSURANCE DEPARTMENT

On the order:

House in committee of the whole on Bill C-123, an act to amend certain acts administered in the Department of Insurance—The Minister of Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Mr. Gordon, seconded by Mr. McIlraith, moves that I do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of the whole on the said bill.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, what stage are we at now? I am afraid we have not followed you.

Mr. Knowles: It is order No. 76.

Mr. Churchill: Let us have a clear understanding. We have a few minutes left but this is a very long bill with 43 clauses and amendments thereto, and there was no agreement that we would deal with it this afternoon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Absolutely not.

Mr. Gordon: It was dealt with by the committee.

Mr. Knowles: Let us take the labour code instead.

Mr. Gordon: Perhaps I might explain that this bill was referred to the banking and commerce committee after second reading. I indicated that I hoped the committee would favourably consider four amendments of substance. The committee has now held its sessions. It has recommended the amendments that I suggested earlier, and one other one of a minor character, and it is reporting back to the house.

Mr. Churchill: I think it would be unwise for us to rush through a bill as important as this and as lengthy, despite the considerations of the committee. There are certain amendments which have to be looked at and the house would make itself look ridiculous if it pushed through a bill of this character in two or three minutes. We are not opposed to considering one or two other items if they are short and non-controversial.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could clarify the matter. We are quite agreeable to this not being proceeded with but I want to clear up one small matter. It is on the list I provided the house leader of the official opposition, but in any event we are quite content not to proceed with it now. It would be agreeable to us to call order No. 7 which I think is a bill of a nature that is not controversial, dealing with the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Does the house agree that it be deemed order No. 76 has not been read?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MERCHANT SEAMEN COMPENSATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING COMPENSATION ON INJURY OR DEATH

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-131, to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act.

Mr. Churchill: Where is the minister in charge?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are speaking from a good position over there.

Mr. Knowles: Shouldn't the hon. member be in his right seat?

Mr. Churchill: Where is the Minister of Labour?

Mr. Byrne: Since the sittings of the house were out of order for such long periods today at the earlier stages I thought it would be more convenient to conduct the proceedings from one of the seats on the front bench.

[Mr. Gordon.]

In the absence of the minister, who is receiving a delegation today, I have been asked to proceed with this measure. While it does not seem to be one of exceeding importance it does have the effect of paying compensation primarily to the widows and dependants of merchant seamen who lost their lives in the performance of their duties. Because these accidents took place some years ago the rate of compensation is of course not in line with present practices and payments.

On the resolution stage the minister made a somewhat lengthy statement and of course I have a rather lengthy prepared statement here this afternoon. But understanding that the house wishes to proceed as rapidly as possible with these various measures I thought a short summary might be aceptable. The bill applies to no more than 2,300 seamen who are not otherwise covered by provincial statutes. The adjustments to be made will be made through the consolidated revenue fund as is the common practice under provincial statutes but with the adjustments in the future being paid by the employer. The measure provides for the raising of the age limit with respect to payments to dependants between 18 and 21 years of age having regard to the practice in other spheres of jurisdiction and to the policy of the government to keep chidren and youths in school as long as they are able to absorb the training open to them. For these reasons the payments will be extended to 21 years if the dependant remains in a recognized institution of learning.

During the resolution stage the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron) inquired why the rates of which benefits are paid are not more in line with those in existence on the west coast. It should be pointed out that this legislation does not affect seamen on the west coast. In any event I believe the amendments do bring the basis upon which compensation is paid up to $5,000 from $4,500, which is in line with the provisions of provincial statutes. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) was concerned that there seemed to be relatively few who were receiving permanent partial disability payments. This is because of the sad fact that most of the permanent disability payments are on behalf of dependants of seamen who lost their lives during the performance of their duties. There are I believe some five seamen receiving permanent partial disability or total disability payments.

The waiting period has been reduced from four days to three days and burial allowance has been raised from $200 to $300.

In the absence of any assurance as to when this legislation would come before the house we did not make arrangements for any officials to be here. However, I would be prepared to answer to the best of my ability any questions which members may wish to raise.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): As far as we are concerned, we have studied this bill and approved of it and are prepared to pass it; we will not ply the parliamentary secretary with questions which he may not be able to answer.

The amendment proposed here appear to be sensible amendments and if they meet the requirements of the merchant seamen then, of course, they should go through the house. To the extent that provision is being made for widows and dependant children, we are entirely in agreement with the idea. As far as our party is concerned we are prepared to accept this bill and proceed with it right away.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith (for Mr. MacEachen) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

TRADE

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND HUNGARY

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the trade agreement between Canada and the Hungarian People's Republic, signed at Ottawa, June 11, 1964, and laid before the House of Commons on June 11, 1964; and that this house do approve the same.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader one question. I have no objection to this resolution, but are there any bills which are short and with which it is necessary that we deal before this house adjourns? Are there any such bills that required to be dealt with now?

Mr. McIlraith: I believe not, Mr. Speaker. There are a couple of other bills that I mentioned in the list given the other day, but there has been some question about taking them now. For that reason I was asked to have called the items concerned with the approval of trade agreements.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, if I may interpose here, it is my understanding that Bill No. C-137 is essential. This is the C.N.R. financing and guarantee act.

Mr. McIlraith: There was an agreement about that.

Mr. Pennell: I may have been out of the house at the time.

Motion agreed to.

APPROVAL OF RENEWAL OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND RUSSIA

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the protocol renewing the trade agreement between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, signed on February 29, 1956, and renewed on April 18, 1960, signed at Ottawa September 16, 1963, laid before the House of Commons on October 9, 1963; and that this house do approve the same.

Motion agreed to.

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND BULGARIA

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the trade agreement between Canada and the People's Republic of Bulgaria, signed at Ottawa, October 8, 1963, and laid before the House of Commons on October 21, 1963; and that this house do approve the same.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, may we now suspend the sitting until the bells ring?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could have the consent of the house to revert to motions in order to table documents that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) undertook to table earlier today. One was a letter from the Prime Minister to his cabinet colleagues. This was referred to in the early part of today's proceedings and the Prime Minister undertook to table it. If I receive consent to revert to motions for that purpose, I will table this document.

The other material that I will table is correspondence that passed between the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). There was a letter from the Prime Minister dated December 14, a reply dated December 15, with certain enclosures, and attached to that is the envelope in which the reply came.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could take advantage of the good nature of the house, in this interval while we are awaiting a call from the other place for royal assent, to extend on my own behalf and on behalf of the government the good wishes of the season to the staff of the House of Commons. Unlike many of my predecessors who have done this in the past, I do not propose to single them out by groups or categories, because I have found that on every occasion on which that has been done in the past one particular group or category has been overlooked. This has never failed in all the years these good wishes have been expressed. Therefore I would content myself with expressing good wishes for a very happy Christmas and good health and prosperity in the new year to all the members of the staff who make the work of this place possible. I am sure I express the wishes of all hon. members in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: I should also like, on my own behalf and on behalf of the government, to extend the good wishes of the season to all hon. members, and the hope that they will have a good Christmas with their families. I say that with some feeling for all hon. members in this house, because it has been an extraordinary session in that hon. members have been kept away from friends in their constituencies for a very long time, and have been kept away, in all too many cases, from their own families for too long a time this year. Mr. Speaker, while I have looked forward very much to this Christmas recess, I am sure that hon. members who have been separated from their families have looked forward to it even more. Therefore I would like to extend to them and their families the very good wishes of the season and for a very quick reunion with their families in order that they may celebrate the Christmas season together.

I should also like, if I may, to express a little of my own feeling, namely the hope that the adjournment will provide an opportunity for hon. members to have some rest and an opportunity to get that necessary degree of objectivity into our thoughts again before the session reconvenes so that we will come back here refreshed, rested and with the kind of approach to our problems that I am sure we should all have.

Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure how one does this, but I should like to express best wishes to His Honour the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker and the chairman of committees. Without more ado, I wish one and all a very merry Christmas and a happy new year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join the government house leader in expressing our good wishes to Mr. Speaker, his associates and all the people who serve the House of Commons so well. I would like to be as objective as the house leader; in fact, I thought we were always showing objectivity around here. If this were not 5.30 on Friday afternoon, December 18, on the 214th day of the session, I might attempt an eloquent speech in praise of the government house leader. But I have energy enough left only to wish him a merry Christmas; and as far as the new year is concerned, I wish him continued happiness in his private life and the strength to endure his public responsibilities.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, it is fitting and proper to join with the house leader in his remarks regarding the staff. It seems to me that the staff has carried a burden because of our presence here for such a continuous length of time. Each of us sees only certain facets of the operation. Along the corridor from me is the Hansard index branch, where I have frequently seen people working overtime in the evenings. I realize the strain that particular branch of the staff of the House of Commons has been under and I imagine it applies throughout. I think we should not only give them our best wishes but also extend them something of an apology for the session we have had, which has put this particular load upon them. Most of them, of course, have borne it very well.

I am afraid I am not so much in the Christmas spirit that I am going to accept the remarks of the house leader to the effect that we will return after our break with some kind of renewed objectivity. It seems to me as this part of the session was coming to an end that we were finally becoming objective; that we were finally getting the measure of this government and just how good or bad it is. But I am leading into political activities and I suggest to the house leader and the members across the way that if they want to close this part of the session with a smile they should take a look at tonight's Toronto Star and the wonderful cartoon by Duncan Macpherson. If they do that they will leave here with probably a feeling of amusement which is shared by the members on the opposite side of the house.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like on behalf of the Social Credit party to join the expressions of good will to all members of the staff, to all members of parliament representing their constituencies and also to all those people they represent. At this time I remember the words of one delegate to the commonwealth parliamentary association from Western Samoa, when he rose to take part in discussions recently held in Jamaica. He said that they had a custom in his country which he felt he ought to follow, and that was first of all to give thanks to our Heavenly Father for his goodness. I bring that in just to remind us all that in the midst of all the festivities and the joy and hilarity of this season it would do us well to remember the real purpose and significance of this season, which is remembering the goodness of God. So as I say, we join in expressing good wishes to all who have served us and who do serve us so well in this house, as well as to each and every member of parliament and to the people of Canada.

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, being at this moment the only French Canadian on the opposition side of the house I wonder if, on behalf of the hon. members from Quebec, I may extend their very best wishes to every member of this house. I should also like to extend my very best regards to the Chair and to those who have occupied it since the beginning of this session. I think they have done a tremendous job because the work load put upon them was heavy. Even though during the course of debates we may have been divided on many occasions, and in certain cases accusations have been made against some people in Quebec, I can say for sure that all of us together at this time of year would like to forget about our divisions so that we can extend to each other our best wishes for a happy Christmas and a happy new year.

[Translation]

I should like to add that the French Canadian members have certainly appreciated, up to a point, the way in which debates have taken place in this house during the year. We appreciate the gains and progresses made, not only for the French Canadian group, but also the English Canadian group, in short for all Canadians across the land.

I can, on closing, but express the hope and the wish that the year 1965, which will see us all, I hope, together again in early February, will bring more progress and less discussion of the type that creates division.

My very best wishes to one and all on behalf of all my French speaking colleagues in the opposition.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CHRISTMAS ADJOURNMENT

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, may I have unanimous consent to put the formal motion for adjournment at this point? I move, seconded by the Solicitor General (Mr. MacNaught):

> That, when this house adjourns this day, it stands adjourned until the 16th day of February, 1965, at 2.30 o'clock p.m., provided always that if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with Her Majesty's government, that the public interest requires that the house should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the house shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time.
> In the event of Mr. Speaker being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker shall act in his stead for the purpose of this order.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are, of course, prepared to support this motion, and I do not wish to detract from the things which have been said in the spirit of the season we are about to enter. Nevertheless before this motion does carry I feel I must register our protest at this part of the session being adjourned without our having completed a very important piece of legislation. The government, of course, knows what I have in mind, because we had something to say about it earlier this afternoon. I refer, indeed, to the Canada labour code.

I should like to remind the government that when this session met first, ten months ago today, the proposed labour code was an important item in the speech from the throne. Two days later the Prime Minister spoke in this house and indicated, on February 20, the priorities in the view of the government for this session.

It is interesting to recall the first three items on that priority list. Number one was the Canada pension plan, No. 2 was the student loan legislation, and No. 3 was the Canada labour code. Here we are, ten months later adjourning, and only one of those three first items has been enacted by parliament.

As the session went on we were given commitments that the labour code would be brought in by certain dates. Then we were given a firm commitment that it would be enacted before we broke off for the Christmas recess.

We are aware of the explanations given today by the house leader and by the Prime Minister, but we can hardly be blamed if we are a bit suspicious as to whether or not this legislation will get through during this session. It has been promised for years. It was the subject of a firm commitment this session, and for that part of this session before Christmas. We have now had to accept another commitment, namely that this government hopes that it will be passed before the session really ends, whether that is in February or March.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, we are ready to accept this motion. As a matter of fact we are glad the government is not asking that parliament be prorogued at this time but is merely seeking to adjourn it so that items such as the Canada pension plan and the Canada labour code can be concluded before this session ends, and we call upon the government to make absolutely sure that these commitments are not broken. With that understanding we are prepared to support the motion.

I am sorry I had to break into the kind of thing that was being said a few moments ago, because, like all of us in this house, I too share in the hope that everyone will enjoy a happy Christmas season and that we will have a productive and useful 1965.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, there appears to be a few minutes left while we wait for the signal from the other place, and I should like to draw to the attention of the members of this house once again the 15th report which was tabled in this house on Monday of this week. I ask hon. members to study it very carefully particularly those members of the government who will have to bring forward legislation to give effect to some of the recommendations which have been made.

If we can adopt most or all of the recommendations contained in this report we will not again have a situation developing such as we have just been through. There is provision in the report for detailed and exhaustive study of the estimates. If the estimates can be considered and passed early in a session, that will preclude the need for interim supply motions and things of that nature.

This would also accomplish one other important thing which has been pointed up during the long months of this session. The adoption of this report would provide one week out of five during which the members of this house could attend to their business in their constituencies. This would not only add to the efficiency and effectiveness of parliament, but add greatly to the effectiveness of democracy.

Certainly after having spent month after month in Ottawa, in some cases hundreds or even thousands of miles away from the people we represent, it is not possible to reflect accurately the opinions of those people in this house. There ought to be some practical time when a member can be available to his constituents to meet with them so as to be able to represent their feelings in this house.

In conclusion I make a last minute appeal to hon. members to give very serious consideration to these recommendations so that they can be dealt with at the end of this session, in order that they may become effective for the next session. If this report dies when this session is prorogued we will not then have the necessary amendments to the standing orders and other procedure so that the next session can be conducted in an orderly and businesslike fashion.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Deputy Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to amend the Judges Act.
An act to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

Motion (Mr. McIlraith) agreed to, and the house adjourned.

APPENDIX

COMMUNIQUÉ FOLLOWING NATO MINISTERIAL COUNCIL MEETING

FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ

The North Atlantic council met in ministerial session in Paris on 15th, 16th and 17th December, 1964.

2. Ministers surveyed the whole field of east-west relations. The basic causes of tension still persist, and will persist as long as it remains the aim of the communist countries to extend their system to the whole world. Ministers noted that recent developments in China and the Soviet union have increased the uncertainties with which the world is faced. They reiterated their conviction that it remained essential for the alliance to maintain and strengthen its unity.

3. Ministers also reviewed the situation in various areas in Asia, Africa and Latin America. They reaffirmed their interest in the stability of these areas and in the economic and social welfare of the peoples concerned.

4. In their discussions on the state and future progress of the alliance, ministers emphasized the importance of strengthening and deepening their political consultation. Recognizing the challenges that may face the organization in the years ahead, they directed the council in permanent session to study the state of the alliance and the purposes and objectives commonly accepted by all members, and to keep ministers informed.

5. Ministers reaffirmed their determination to continue their efforts to find a peaceful solution to the questions at issue between east and west. In particular, they continue to attach great importance to making progress toward meeting the legitimate aspirations of the German people to reunification on the basis of their right to self determination. In regard to Berlin, ministers confirmed the terms of their declaration of 16th December, 1958.

6. Ministers expressed their conviction that the unity and military preparedness of the alliance had safeguarded peace and preserved the freedom of the west in the past. So long as general and complete disarmament under effective international control has not been achieved, any weakening of the allied defensive posture would expose the alliance to increased pressures. Ministers therefore stressed the importance of maintaining the cohesion of member states in the strategic as well as the political field. Only a military structure demonstrably capable of swift and vigorous reaction to any aggression can meet the threat. To maintain such a structure, involving as it does a continuous adaptation to changing requirements, necessitates a persistent effort to improve the readiness, state of training, and equipment of the forces of the alliance. It further requires a sound economic basis for the defence effort and the most rational use of available resources.

7. Ministers also confirmed their determination to continue their efforts to arrive at agreements in the field of disarmament. In this connection, they stressed the importance of avoiding the dissemination of nuclear weapons.

8. Ministers examined the problems confronting the alliance in the field of conventional and nuclear weapons. A thorough exchange of views on these problems took place and will be continued.

9. Ministers took note of developments in the studies of the interrelated questions of strategy, force requirements and resources, initiated in pursuance of the decisions taken at their meeting in Ottawa in May 1963. They reaffirmed the significance they attached to these studies and instructed the council in permanent session to continue them with the assistance of the NATO military authorities.

10. Ministers also considered the special military and economic problems of Greece and Turkey. They reaffirmed the need for accelerating the economic development of these two allied countries, and for an effort to strengthen the defence of the southeastern region of NATO. They instructed the council in permanent session to continue to examine these questions urgently.

11. In the spirit of previous resolutions on defence aid to Greece in 1963 and 1964, ministers established a procedure aimed at contributing to the solution of the special defence problems of Greece and Turkey in 1965.

12. With regard to Greek-Turkish relations, ministers heard a report by the secretary general on the "watching brief" conferred on his predecessor at The Hague in May 1964. In an effort to improve these relations and in the interests of the solidarity of the alliance, they agreed that this "watching brief" should continue. They reaffirmed their determination to lose no opportunity of contributing to a reduction in tension and a peaceful, agreed and equitable solution of the problem of Cyprus, confirming also their support for the efforts of the United Nations and the mediator.

13. Ministers considered a report on civil emergency planning. They reaffirmed the importance of such planning within the context of over-all defence, noting the progress which had been achieved and the work which remained to be done.

14. The next meeting of the North Atlantic council at ministerial level will be held on the invitation of the United Kingdom government in London in May, 1965.
