HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

FOURTH SESSION—TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT

9-10 ELIZABETH II

VOLUME VI, 1960-61

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE SECOND DAY OF JUNE, 1961, TO THE TWENTY-FIRST DAY OF JUNE, 1961, INCLUSIVE

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

ROGER DUHAMEL, F.R.S.C.
QUEEN'S PRINTER AND CONTROLLER OF STATIONERY
OTTAWA, 1961

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 2, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO EXPORT OF CF-100 PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as the lone member who appears to wish to take advantage of this opportunity to ask questions, I wish to address a "simsicle" question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister inform the house whether any organization or person has applied for an export permit for the CF-100's sold to Westbourne Supply Company by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of the hon. member's intention to ask this question just as I was coming into the house. I am not aware of any application, but I am having my department check the matter and will advise the house as soon as I have obtained the information.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: In reply to the question put to me earlier by the hon. member for Kootenay West with regard to export permits for aircraft, may I say that no such applications have been received.

INQUIRY AS TO FLYING CONDITION OF SURPLUS CF-100 PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. In view of press reports to the effect that Mr. Louis Richard, president of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, is checking the claim of Mr. James McMaster that the 11 CF-100's recently sold to him by the corporation are in condition to be flown, would the minister inform the house later of the result of this investigation?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I believe this question should be addressed to the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley). However, since I note that he is not in his seat I will take this question as notice, and will also give the required information to the hon. gentleman at a later date.

REPORTED CLOSING OF U.S. RADAR STATIONS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): I should like to ask a question of the Associate Minister of National Defence. In view of the announcement of the closing of three United States Pinetree radar stations and six gap filler stations along Canada's northeast coast and in Newfoundland, has the minister any comment to make regarding the closing of these stations?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): I will answer this question early next week, Mr. Speaker, and will give precise information to the hon. member.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): If I may do so, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a supplementary question. Can the hon. gentleman say whether any increased activity is contemplated in the radar station at Sydney?

Mr. Sevigny: I believe that the best answer to the hon. gentleman is the same as that which I gave to the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. I will inform him next week concerning the details.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR CORRECTION IN QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the house would permit me to request a correction to question No. 241 which appears at page 18 of today's Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day. The word "yardcraft" which appears in parts 1 and 2 of the question should be replaced by the words "auxiliary vessels".

REQUEST TO REVERT TO MOTIONS AT NOON THIS DAY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a simultaneous announcement is to be made at noon today with respect to arrangements entered into at the meeting of the consortium regarding India. I shall therefore be asking, provided that the house will agree, for reversion to motions at 12 o'clock so the announcement can be made. This announcement cannot be made in advance of that hour.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the house would give its consent now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED PRESENCE OF RUSSIAN SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a press report in the Newfoundland Daily News dated May 31 to the effect that at present there are 150 Russian ships in the fishing zone off the Newfoundland coast? If so, are the fisheries patrol boats keeping the situation under surveillance?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I have seen the press report referred to, and it is substantially in accord with information obtained by my department. The ships referred to are well out at sea and none are in or near Canadian territorial waters. Our fisheries patrol boats are active in our territorial waters keeping a constant watch on the situation.

THE CENSUS

REQUEST FOR USE OF BILINGUAL FORMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (St. Henry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce with regard to the census.

In view of the many complaints made by French speaking and English speaking citizens, does the minister not feel it would be advisable to issue immediate instructions in order that every census taker be in possession of French and English forms when calling at our homes?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice and answer it tomorrow in French.

(Text):

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

OIL AND GAS—REPORTED RELAXATION IN CONDITIONS FOR EXPLORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister any comment to make on the suggestion contained in John Meyer's column in the Montreal Gazette of June 1 that some relaxation is indicated in the conditions for exploration and development of far northern oil and gas resources, for the purpose of encouraging more foreign capital?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that has been under discussion for some considerable time. When the decisions have been reached I shall be happy to make a statement in the house.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Dominion coal board—

229. Administration and investigations of the dominion coal board, $126,345.

The Chairman: This item will be found at page 44 of the blue book, the details at page 313.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, at the close of our sitting yesterday I had commenced to speak on the estimates in reference to coal. Toward the end of the sitting my good friend from Bonavista-Twillingate asked me what this government had done for the coal industry in western Canada. I reminded him that we had come to grips with the situation in that we had sold a considerable amount of coal from the mines in Alberta to Japan. In fact, my exact words were that we had sold some 500,000 tons of coal. I now have the exact figure for the year 1960-61. In that period we exported to Japan from the coal mines of Alberta 677,000 tons of coal.

I mentioned that when this government took office there was unemployment in the coal mines throughout the province of Alberta, and in particular in the constituency of Bow River, Drumheller and Canmore. I also mentioned that this government paid a subvention on the coal exported to Japan, amounting to $3,048,283 and it was because of this subvention that the Alberta mines were able to compete with the coal industry of Australia. It is because this government raised the subvention on coal that we found a new market in Japan and put back to work the miners who were unemployed when this government took office.

I got the impression from the remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that the situation in the coal industry is very black. I think the Liberal party left a black record as far as the coal industry in Alberta is concerned. In fact if you refer back to Hansard for 1956, as reported on page 5738 the then minister of mines and technical surveys from the province of Alberta, Mr. Prudham, had this to say:

> Alberta has been the most depressed section of the Canadian coal industry but this past year has seen at least a slowing up in that trend, although I am not trying to minimize the seriousness of the situation in Alberta. The bituminous mines in this area have been largely dependent on the railway market. The switch to diesel locomotives and to oil burning steam engines continued, causing some further loss of markets.

The reason I am referring to these words is that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate left the impression that all this had occurred since 1957. I have some statistics to show that the coal mining industry was in a mess when this government took office, and it was because of the steps this government took that in some measure not only the coal mines but also the men who work in them have been rehabilitated so they can live in dignity with their families.

In other words, Mr. Prudham stated in 1956 that there was nothing they could do for the coal mines as far as obtaining a market for Alberta coal was concerned. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, as usual, attacked the Prime Minister when he was absent from the house last evening. He said the Prime Minister made certain promises, and broke them. I should like to tell the hon. member now that I was on a platform in 1957 when the Prime Minister made certain promises. One of those promises was that his party would try to get a market for western coal. That is why I brought to the attention of the committee that in one year we sold 677,000 tons of coke and coal to Japan. That was a promise made; that was a promise kept. This was the kind of promises made by this government, and they have been kept.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate talks about the coal situation, and I think we should get down to some statistics. Let us look at the figures filed by the coal operators in Alberta before the royal commission in 1947. There were 11,042 men employed in the coal industry. Man shifts worked amounted to some 2,464,931 hours and earned some $25 million. By 1956 the number of men employed had dropped to 4,814. Their wages had dropped to $16 million. If I had time—and I do not want to take the time—I could show that from 1947 to 1957 while the Liberal government was in office there was a steady decline in the coal industry in Alberta.

Mr. Hellyer: And a steady rise in gas and oil.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, and I intend to deal with that in a few minutes. But the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate placed all the blame on the government, not on the competitive nature of the industry. I want to place the blame on the brigadier a far as that is concerned—

An hon. Member: Lance corporal.

Mr. Woolliams: I want to repeat that there were 640,000 tons of coal shipped in one year from Alberta to Japan, coal on which several million dollars of subvention were paid.

Let us look at the situation in 1949. Production in Alberta during that year amounted to 3,484,000 tons. By 1956 it was only 564,249 tons, and that was used by the railways. Man hours had dropped from 754,000 man days worked to 109,000. This was why places such as Canmore, Rosedale and East Coulee were reduced to the poverty I found there when I started to campaign for the first time on behalf of this government.

I should like to describe some of the conditions I found there. I went into homes in East Coulee where they did not have blankets on the beds. The men had exhausted their right to unemployment insurance benefits because, as hon. members know, miners work their shifts in the winter and are laid off in the summer months. Such was the poverty which existed in Canmore and these other places, and it was the step taken by the present government with regard to find a market for coking coal which gave these people employment and a chance to live in dignity with their families.

While I was listening to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate talking about the coal situation I found it interesting to recall what Mr. Drew told the Liberal government as far back as 1955. He warned them of what was happening. Here is what Mr. Drew said on July 25, 1955:

> Undoubtedly the situation is serious. It is likely to become much more serious unless positive and vigorous policies are adopted by the government. The subventions which have been paid by the government and the increased subventions now being asked for have not prevented a reduction in the use of coal as a result of increasing competition by other fuels.

If at that time, or earlier, the Liberal government had taken positive steps to find a market for our coal, or to encourage industry to move to that area, the coal mines of Alberta would not have been in the plight they were in 1957, and they would not be in the shape in which they find themselves today.

There is no doubt that in making criticisms one should bear in mind that constructive work can be done. I have called attention to what has happened in the past. Now I should like to speak for a few moments on what positive steps can be taken. I remember saying in this house, when speaking in reference to the energy bill, that there is a known quantity of natural gas in the province of Alberta, to the extent of 23 trillion cubic feet. That statement does not mean much until it is broken down. It is estimated there will be a proven reserve of some 30-odd trillion cubic feet. What will be the demand in Canada for natural gas in the forseeable future? I suggest that even with the expansion which has taken and will take place under the administration of this government, the maximum need per year will be in the neighbourhood of 10 billion cubic feet. Therefore we have enough natural gas proven reserve for probably the next 100 years.

As the Financial Post has pointed out, there are many other uses to which coal can be put. It could be made available to encourage the expansion of secondary industry. As the Financial Post reported the situation in an article dated September 27, 1958 coal, which is one of the oldest energy sources in the world, contains all the same ingredients and can be used to produce the same by-products as natural gas. Let us project our imagination and vision in an attempt to see that the coal from Alberta will be piped in the same pipe lines through which natural gas now flows to the industrial centres of Ontario, eastern Canada and the United States. It was through the dynamic steps of this government that development has taken place to the extent it has at this time. We approved the export of natural gas in quantities to the United States for the first time.

When we make reference to broken promises, let us look at the record to see if the statements are true. I remember the Prime Minister saying in the city of Calgary that if his government took office it would set up a national energy board, which was long overdue. The Prime Minister's word was good, and a national energy board was set up. It is that board which assesses the quantities of energy of various kinds that are needed. It is that type of dynamic step which will result in the rehabilitation of this country, and the cleaning up of the mess that the Liberals left. That word "mess" was used by the hon. member for Trinity during a recent speech he made not very far from Ottawa. He suggested that he would like to have someone debate the situation with him. He suggested by doing so it could be resolved that the Diefenbaker government had made a mess of running the country.

Mr. Hellyer: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: I suggest that type of debate should be "Resolved, that the Conservative government has cleaned up the mess in this country left by the Liberals".

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Hellyer: You have spent the $500 million surplus.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, and I have already placed on record what the hon. member for Trinity had to say about the former minister of mines of the province of Alberta. Who were his guiding lights in the province of Alberta? Those guiding lights were composed of Mr. Don Mackay, the former Liberal candidate for Calgary South, and Mr. Hawrelak, the Liberal candidate for Edmonton East. What happened to those advisers to Mr. Prudham in respect of the coal industry following the last election? They had both stated that if the Liberal party was returned to Ottawa in 1957 they would sit in golden chairs on the treasury benches.

It was not long before it was found that they had been sitting in golden chairs. There was an investigation carried out in the cities of Edmonton and Calgary. It is true that there has been some compensation paid. I do not know whether it was a subvention or not, but Mr. Hawrelak has returned to the treasury of the city of Edmonton as the result of a recent law suit, some $100,000 which he had accidentally borrowed. Ex-mayor Don Mackay of Calgary, who ran against the hon. member for Calgary South, was found to have borrowed some cement two or three years earlier which he had forgotten to return. Those two individuals were the coal industry advisers to Mr. Prudham. I suggest that represents the situation as far as the Liberal party's stand in respect of the coal industry.

I should not like to place all the responsibility for this situation on the shoulders of the Liberal government, though I place some of it there. I believe that government, if it had worked in conjunction with the Social Credit government of Alberta, could have done something. However, there is a situation that we must somehow correct. I do not know whether I am fortunate or not in having the Alberta minister of highways representing the Drumheller coal mining area. In 1960 he said that it was open to the federal government to get off their fannies and sell coal. He was reported as having made that statement in a March, 1960 edition of the Calgary Herald. I refer, of course, to Mr. Kovach, the member of the legislative assembly for Pincher Creek, and I know the hon. member for Macleod will be interested in that statement. Mr. Kovach said during the provincial election that he had heard a lot of talk about Japan emerging as a market for Canadian coal but not one ton from southern Alberta had been exported to that country. I put on the record this morning what has taken place and why the men in the Canmore and Crowsnest pass areas have had the kind of employment they have had since 1957.

There is another problem. The Social Credit members of the legislature come down to Drumheller and talk about the coal that is brought in from the United States. They refer to 20 million tons a year being imported. Twenty million tons were imported when the Liberals were in office, but this amount has been reduced because we believe in doing our own processing and developing our own industries. The amount imported from the United States has fallen to 10 million tons.

There is one thing I should like to make very clear. When we are dealing with the Drumheller coal mines we are dealing with subbituminous coal, which is a soft domestic coal. It is not to be confused with the bituminous and anthracite coal that is imported, or the high bituminous coal of the Crowsnest pass. This subbituminous coal is not suitable for coking coal. It is not used in an industrial way. Therefore the coal that does come in from the United States has nothing to do with the market, even if it were economical for this coal from Drumheller to be shipped east. This coal is a domestic fuel. However, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, by proper scientific processing it can be broken down into many by-products. In fact all the by-products of natural gas exist in this coal and some day, as I said, there is no doubt it will be used to produce natural gas which can be piped to the industrial centres in the east or used in industry in Calgary and elsewhere in Alberta.

With respect to the development of our resources, and coal certainly is a very important resource from the point of view of energy, I took quite a lot of abuse in the debate on the Aurora pipe line bill. In fact I think the hon. member for Assiniboia, and I am sorry he is not here, said that I was one of the buccaneers, or words to that effect. I should like to say that when you are developing a resource naturally you have to develop corporations if you are going to have industry. That is true of the coal industry also. But when the hon. member talks about buccaneers, may I say that I think there is a new group of buccaneers appearing on the political scene, the buccaneers who are emerging from the province of Saskatchewan.

So far as the encouragement of companies that can develop an industry is concerned, we have heard a lot recently about the Saskatchewan bill that cancelled certain contracts with respect to mineral and petroleum rights in that province. As far as I am concerned the federal government took the right step in that matter, but when you are dealing with these contracts it is interesting to note that these farmers in Saskatchewan, I am quite convinced, were induced to sign them by duress, but probably because of the processes of law the courts were unable to come to that conclusion.

Of course the courts of appeal are bound by a finding of fact, but it is interesting to note that the syndicate that accumulated these contracts was very friendly to some of these buccaneers. In fact some of these buccaneers were a part of it. As we are dealing with the development of the resources of this country I should like to place on the record a part of the cross-examination—

The Chairman: Order. I must say that the hon. member seems to me to be getting away from coal.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: I am willing to accept the views of the committee, but I would say that if the hon. member continues in this direction he will soon be discussing something else than coal. The item before the house deals only with coal.

Mr. Woolliams: I would ask you to bear with me. Possibly I came to the facts too quickly. You cannot develop petroleum or coal or minerals of any kind without some promotion, and I am talking about the promoters who endeavoured to develop the mineral resources of western Canada. I want to deal with this matter because I think it is very important, and I would point out that in the same Pincher Creek area where we have bituminous coal we also have gas wells of which one by-product is condensate. In fact every one of the by-products of natural gas is found in coal. In order to promote secondary industry you have to have these promoters and that is why I should like to place this on the record.

One of the promoters of this syndicate was a man by the name of Broughton. I would also point out that Mr. Shumiatcher was well connected with Mr. Fines, the former provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan. I am going to drop that point for the moment, but I should like to refer to certain questions that Mr. Broughton was asked in the action brought by certain farmers who alleged that there had been fraud with respect to these contracts. As found on page 160 of the appeal book filed before the Supreme Court of Canada there is the following passage:

> Q. Had you any connection with the government of Saskatchewan at that time?
> A. None other than I was living in the premier's constituency and at that time I was his organizer.

I would think that one of the buccaneers tried to bail himself out by means of a piece of provincial legislation with reference to the development of the resources of this country. I do not want to press this too far because

I feel the chairman thinks it is slightly out of order. However, I still say to you, Mr. Chairman, with the greatest respect, that you cannot get coal or gas out of the ground unless you have promotion and the proper kind of promotion established under free enterprise.

That is why I felt I should bring this to the attention of the house, because of the fact that these socialist planners talk about political cleanliness and one thing and another, and working for the average man. I said on one occasion that Mr. Fines had made $1 million since he became provincial treasurer. I may have been in error, Mr. Chairman, because I now believe he made $3 million. When we are talking about industry and the development of resources, I point out that there were some people in the Social Credit government of Alberta who did the same thing with the resources of that province. When we start looking at these great planners who want to take over we want to see who they are and what they might do with reference to some of our secondary industries.

To come back to the subject of coal, I trust that the government will continue to pay a subvention on the export of anthracite coal from Canada so we can continue to find a market for it in Japan and these miners can keep the employment they have had since 1957. I trust, too, that working together with the provincial government a vigorous plan will be set up by the federal government so that thermal plants can be developed throughout Alberta that will use coal with the result that the miners can live in their homes with their families in dignity.

I trust that some positive step will be taken in the future. It is long range planning that counts. If there had been some long range planning when the Liberals were in office many of the things we are concerned about, much of the unemployment about which they babble, would not be with us today. I trust that a system of pipe lines will be developed so that gas produced from this coal can be piped from the source of the coal, and so that the men in the coal mines will be certain they can continue to make a living.

I should like to close on this note. If I am convinced of anything in my constituency I am convinced that coal mining is unique. The farmers have their ups and downs, but when things pick up the value of their land goes up and the prices of what they produce go up. The coal miner dedicated his life to coal mining so that the development of the west can take place. All he is able to accumulate in life is his little home and the belongings he puts in that home. When the coal mines are closed he is forced to leave everything he has been able to accumulate.

That took place in Alberta under the Liberals. I have with me the facts and figures, I will take pleasure in placing them on the record. In 1940 we had 224 mines in Alberta. By 1956 that number had fallen to 91. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate last evening criticized the government for lack of action in the mining industry. During the war men were taken into the mines at Drumheller and Canmore. Even men who had retired from the job were asked to mine coal for Canada's war effort. When the war was over they were left in those localities with their families to find alternative employment without assistance from the Liberal government.

I am fair enough to say that some of the problems of the coal mines are related to two factors, the competition of petroleum and natural gas and the fact that our railways are dieselized. To illustrate the effects of railway dieselization on coal consumption let me indicate that railway coal consumption in 1949 was 3,484,000 tons. In 1949 there were 754,000 man day—

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before the hon. member for Port Arthur speaks I should like to take exception to a statement made by the hon. member for Bow River. I did not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman during the course of his remarks. The hon. member for Bow River suggested that he was replying to observations I had made about the decline in coal production in Alberta. I did not at any stage in my remarks yesterday mention the coal situation in Alberta. I was talking about the crisis in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, we have been treated this morning by the hon. member for Bow River to a review of political morality in relation to the coal board, which review has touched upon the reputations of people who are reputedly Liberals, Social Crediters and C.C.F.'ers. I feel that since this opportunity has been given the hon. gentleman I should be given an opportunity to review the political morality of some people who bear the Conservative label.

Since the hon. member seemed to link energy with petroleum and by some means or other relate this to Saskatchewan, I thought the best place I could start would be with the Northern Ontario Natural Gas Corporation and point out to hon. members of the committee in general and to the hon. member for Bow River in particular that there are certain gentlemen attached to his political party, which I think can be said to be a national party, who were very much involved in purchases, to such an extent that they were removed from positions they held in the cabinet in the government of the province of Ontario.

With respect to public morality we had several years ago in northern Ontario an absolute scandal—

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Bow River perhaps did for a moment stray from the subject of coal. At that time Your Honour brought him to order. He related his remarks to coal and quickly returned to that subject. The hon. member for Port Arthur is now not even going through the formality of making any effort to relate his comments to coal. He rose and stated that he intended to talk about public morality in connection with the province of Ontario. I suggest that Ontario is not a coal province in any full sense of the word, and that the hon. gentleman could not possibly relate his present remarks to the item under consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if I may say a word on the point of order, in view of the fact that Your Honour made a ruling which was completely disregarded by the hon. member for Bow River who went on, uninterrupted by anyone on this side of the chamber, with his attacks upon public men on matters not even remotely related to coal, the minority in this house should be accorded the same hearing that has been given the majority.

Mr. Grafftey: Why did the hon. member not raise a point of order at the time?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order—

Mr. Hellyer: The minister is loquacious this morning, perhaps because he got his canoe back. The hon. member had better be careful.

Mr. Walker: If little boy blue from Trinity would remain quietly in his seat on occasion, we would have more respect for him. Let me tell the hon. member for Trinity that he will have an opportunity to reply if he has the audacity to rise to his feet and speak.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who is chairman of this committee?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, the point of order that has been raised attempts to correct the situation. If the hon. member for Bow River was out of order, is that any reason why another hon. gentleman should be allowed to be out of order? If the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate wanted to make a criticism at the time, I am sure Your Honour would have stopped the hon. member for Bow River and invited him to return to the subject. How can the remarks of the hon. member for Port Arthur, if he is to continue in the fashion in which he started, be related to the subject before the committee at this time? With the greatest respect, Mr. Chairman, let me say we are trying to end this session, but we are not going to succeed in our objective if the hon. member for Port Arthur is going to attempt to rise in his place and engage in his favourite pastime of mudslinging or mudraking or whatever you wish to call it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Competition in muckraking.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is a circus performer at any time.

The Chairman: When I rose during the course of the remarks of the hon. member for Bow River I must say I had difficulty relating his remarks to the item before the committee, but I did not know anything of the background of the contracts of which he was speaking. I had some doubts about the relevancy of his remarks. Hon. members of the committee generally appeared to think I was in error. That is why I did not intervene, afterward. In order to be fair I think I should allow the hon. member for Port Arthur to deal briefly with the comments made by the hon. member for Bow River. I do not think it would be in order for the hon. gentleman to make a speech solely on the subject with which he opened his remarks. I shall allow the hon. gentleman some latitude, especially if he can relate his remarks to the subject dealt with by the hon. member for Bow River. On the other hand, the hon. gentleman must not go too far. I would not wish to have started a debate within this debate.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, do I understand your ruling to be that the hon. member for Port Arthur should confine his remarks to the subject of the bill before the committee?

Mr. Pickersgill: We are not debating a bill. The hon. member does not even know what business is before the committee.

Mr. Robichaud: We are on estimates.

Mr. Walker: I appreciate that we are in committee on estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: The chairman has made his ruling.

Mr. Walker: I am seeking clarification of the ruling that was made.

Mr. Tardif: Oh, oh.

Mr. Walker: We now hear from the hon. member in the back seat. What has the hon. member to say?

Mr. Tardif: Mr. Chairman, I have been invited to speak by the Minister of Public Works—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, I am seeking clarification of your ruling. Do I understand that the hon. member for Port Arthur will be allowed latitude in dealing with a subject which has nothing to do with coal and which is not relevant to the estimates now being considered in committee?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I believe it is a well known rule of this house that it is incompetent for any hon. member to put questions to the Chair. I suggest that Your Honour made a ruling that was understood by those who are intelligent enough to understand, and if the hon. member for Rosedale was not able to understand it perhaps he should read it in Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. Hellyer: If the minister can find time to take some reading lessons overnight.

The Chairman: Order. I do not think it is necessary for me to say that the rule applying in committee is that debate must be strictly relevant. On the other hand, I think it must be applied according to the prevailing circumstances in order to be fair.

I indicated in what way I hoped the hon. member for Port Arthur would continue, for a while, his remarks on the subject dealt with by the hon. member for Bow River, and I indicated my reservation that he would be permitted to continue subject to the intervention of the Chair if I think he is going too far afield. I trust that after the hon. member has replied to the hon. member for Bow River the committee will be satisfied that this matter has been disposed of and that the whole committee will come back to the discussion of the item dealing with coal.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, it never pays for any of us as individuals in politics to be too sensitive. I do not take objection to being accused of mudslinging by the Minister of Public Works. The purport of my remarks was that the hon. member for Bow River, in relation to the subject of coal, introduced some interpretations about the political morality—we will forget about individuals—of political parties. I felt it was incumbent upon me to rise and say that whether we are talking about Northern Ontario Natural Gas, highways or Eastview, we can produce lots of scandals and innuendos relating to the political party to which the hon. member belongs.

I do not intend to carry on in that vein, but merely wish to point out to the hon. gentleman that when one ox is being gored it is all right, but when another ox is being gored it is rotten. I think we should all consider that in the whole incident there should have been more fair play than was extended by the hon. member for Bow River.

My remarks on coal board affairs are going to be very brief. I wanted to say to the hon. member for Cape Breton South that I appreciated receiving word from him some months ago that he would like hon. members to use their influence with Ontario hydro in order to see that the thermo plants used Cape Breton coal. I recall that on a previous occasion he insinuated that the Ontario members had not done anything about this matter, or had not replied. I wanted to put on record the fact that I had spoken to several people in hydro, that I had sent a letter to one of the people at the top of hydro in relation to this matter, and that I am extremely pleased that Ontario hydro has given an order for Nova Scotia coal.

I regret that it may be too late or that it may not be big enough to be as significant as it should, however, it certainly seems to me that this is one way in which a provincial institution or corporation can be a big help in a national way. It is all very well for Mr. Macaulay and other people who are experts on energy in Ontario to keep pointing out that Nova Scotia coal does not quite match United States coal not only in price but in certain constituent values. However, it seems to me that in the national interest we should be prepared to work with a product that may be somewhat lower in quality or higher in cost if it really means the lifeblood of an area that buys a great deal from Ontario.

I do not know what role the federal government or the minister's department or the coal board can play in this matter. I imagine it is really one of negotiating and bargaining. However, as far as the hon. member for Cape Breton South is concerned, whatever one may feel about certain statements he has made I will congratulate him on his efforts in trying to get Ontario hydro aware of the fact that Nova Scotia has a coal problem which we can help to solve.

Mr. MacEwan: I shall be brief in this matter. I wish to make a few remarks on the estimates of the dominion coal board. Last night the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made certain remarks on which I should like to comment briefly. First of all,

I should like to commend the minister and the government on the continuation of subsidies to assist Cape Breton coal to get into the upper Canadian markets, especially the $1 per ton subsidy which is paid 80 cents by the federal government and 20 cents by the provincial government in order to assist the coal to non-subvention areas.

I noted also—and I was glad to see it—that the hon. member for Gloucester was sitting in the front benches last night, although on the opposite side of the house. Perhaps he was counting his chickens before they were hatched; I do not know. Perhaps he did so in New Brunswick a short time ago also in a recent event but I do not know anything about that.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South dealt last evening with his remarks, and I just wish to comment on a few of the things stated by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Referring back to 1946, and the fact that the hon. member for Cape Breton South placed on the record the closing of the various mines during the Liberal regime, as found at page 5744 of Hansard following an interjection by an hon. member "You could have done something at one time", he stated:

> Yes; and in 1946 and in 1956 a miner, if he lost a job in Cape Breton, could get a job in another mine, either in Cape Breton or somewhere else, and he did so because we had full employment in those days.

I do not know about that. I had not lived in Cape Breton at that time. However, I lived in Pictou county, where I was born and brought up. The closing of the mines during that period were as follows. Acadia No. 7, known as the Skunk mine, closed in 1947; Thorburn in 1947; Allan shaft in the same period; the Albion and McGregor in January of 1957; and especially the mine with which I am most familiar, the Drummond mine in Westville, where production was reduced in 1951. In his remarks further on he mentioned this amount of $1.5 million which was put up, as stated by him. As reported at page 5748 of Hansard he said:

> "We shall ask parliament to appropriate $1.5 million—

He was quoting the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

> "—but we have not the faintest idea what will be done with it—

I commend the government for providing this amount. I just refer to my own area. When these mines closed and Liberal governments were in power in Halifax and in Ottawa, not one 5-cent piece was given at that time by either government to assist the miners of Pictou county to get jobs, and I can tell this committee now that there was not full employment in Pictou county at that time. That is when the trouble actually began.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to interrupt my remarks in order to give the Prime Minister an opportunity to make his announcement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask that we now revert to the order for motions.

Progress reported.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDIA—STATEMENT OF CONSORTIUM ON AID COMMITMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I wish to thank hon. members of the house for agreeing to revert to motions at this time. My reason for wishing to do so is to table a statement which is being released in other countries concerned as well.

The house will recall that Canada has been represented at meetings this week of a consortium of countries and international agencies concerned with the financing of the foreign exchange requirements of India's third five year plan. This meeting concluded successfully yesterday and agreed on the text of a statement, copies of which I shall table for the information of hon. members.

I will not endeavour to repeat the details furnished in the statement. The meeting was attended by representatives of the governments of Canada, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, the United Kingdom and the United States and by representatives of the international bank for reconstruction and development and the international development agency. France joined the consortium as a member during the meeting.

At this meeting the members of the consortium undertook commitments of aid to India totalling over $2 billion for the first two years of the five year plan. These large commitments should enable India to launch this plan of economic development with confidence in the ultimate achievement of its objectives. The group recognized that, in order to carry out the plan, it will be necessary not only for India to devote very considerable resources to financing it but also it will have to be supplemented by a very large inflow of capital, both private and public.

The total commitments undertaken for the first two years amount to $2,225,000,000. Included in that is $56 million from Canada. This Canadian figure is at a rate of $28 million for each of the two years. This includes $18 million each year of aid made available under the Colombo plan and $10 million in each of the two years which the government has undertaken to allocate in the form of export credits, contingent upon the approval by parliament of the amendments to the Export Credits Insurance Act, in anticipation of which there is now a resolution on the order paper.

In addition to these commitments the United States has undertaken to assist India by making available surplus commodities. India is also receiving grants of wheat from Canada. I point out that these grants are over and above the commitment of $28 million a year for the first two years. Seven million dollars has been set aside this year in anticipation of a request being received from India for wheat. The house will recall that last year the same amount was furnished in wheat in response to a request from India.

I am sure that all hon. members of the house will welcome the successful outcome of this international meeting, which is of vital importance to peace. Parliament will be asked in due course to take the measures necessary for Canada to implement its share in these undertakings. The statement points out that the commitments made in the meetings in Washington in general are subject to legislative authorization.

If I may be allowed to do so, Mr. Speaker, I would table four copies of this statement.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house have listened with interest to the statement made by the Prime Minister. I think I can say at once that we welcome this statement and the successful outcome of the meeting of the consortium to work out arrangements to assist India in carrying out its third five year plan.

It is clear, as indeed it has been clear for years, that if India is to progress or even to maintain stability she will require help from her friends to reduce her dependence on foreign exchange. We think the arrangement to which the Prime Minister has referred is not only a good arrangement in itself from the point of view of helping India, but it has been brought about in a very satisfactory way in that several of those countries, not one or two, that are in a position to help India have got together and have acted on a co-operative basis. The Prime Minister can be assured of support from this side of the house for the kind of Canadian contribution he has mentioned.

I notice from the Prime Minister's statement and from the press release which he was good enough to send over a few moments ago that our commitment in the first two years is $56 million, but that part of that commitment, if I understood him aright, will be made out of the existing Colombo plan appropriations and part will be additional to the existing appropriations.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

No doubt when the time comes to introduce legislation to carry out this commitment we will be able to deal with this matter in greater detail. All I want to say now is that we think a move of this kind on an international co-operative basis is extremely important both politically and economically. There is no country that deserves help more than India, because India is trying to help herself and maintain a strong and progressive democracy in a part of the world where it is vitally important to us all that this should be done.

We are very glad of the action taken by the Canadian government to co-operate in this international undertaking, and it will certainly receive our support.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I must first of all thank the Prime Minister for sending over a copy of the press release. It is of considerable assistance in following the principle and the details of these proposals.

As far as this group are concerned, we are very glad indeed to support wholeheartedly the proposals announced by the Prime Minister for the total investing of some $2 billion of aid to India. We all know that India is very much entitled to it because of what she has tried to do for herself, and we are particularly happy about this proposal because of her relationship within the commonwealth.

This $2 billion of aid to India pleases us very much indeed because it is to be spent on construction for development and for the welfare of human beings. This is the direction in which we like to see our investments going. We are glad to know that Canada is investing in this project a total of $56 million for peaceful purposes in co-operation with other nations, which we hope will assist the Indian people to maintain progress and develop a land of plenty.

SUPPLY

The house resumed in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Dominion coal board—

229. Administration and investigations of the dominion coal board, $126,345.

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Chairman, in continuing my remarks on this matter I would refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate at the conclusion of the sitting last evening, when he referred to the proposal in 1957 by the government of the day for the building of thermal power plants and the production of power in the Atlantic area. The hon. member wondered why the premiers of the two provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick at that time did not buy this proposal.

Of course, first the all-powerful federal government of the day, as was stated by the hon. member, was to own the power plants. The provinces were to have no say in them; the federal government was to own them. As I recall the remarks made by various cabinet ministers in the area at the time, they gave no guarantee that coal would be used in these thermal power plants. There was some talk at the time about oil being cheaper, and so on, and that perhaps it would be better to leave coal in the ground.

The hon. member referred to the new act, and of course his reference was to the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act which was introduced by this government. The hon. member poohpoohed it and said there was not too much to it. He said finally:

It is true the Trenton plant has been completed but nothing more has been done.

The Trenton plant is a thermal power plant in my area, and I should like to refer for a moment to a few of the figures placed on record by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources a few weeks ago on his estimates regarding the amounts paid under this act in the province of Nova Scotia. They refer to the amount of coal used in the thermal power plant at Trenton in the year 1960. According to the minister's figures the following amounts were expended under this act in Nova Scotia to the end of March, 1961: coal subventions, $2.12 million; transmission facilities, that is building lines into New Brunswick and the eastern part of Nova Scotia, $4.22 million; the Trenton plant, $2.86 million, as shown by the estimates of the dominion coal board.

The following estimates are set out for this year for Nova Scotia: coal subventions, 1.7 million; transmission facilities, $6.3 million, and for the Trenton thermal plant a final amount of $363,000. With regard to the Trenton plant I refer to a press clipping from the New Glasgow Evening News of last week, May, 1961. The headline is:

More than million dollars' worth of coal used by power plant in 1960.

The article continues:

1960 was a coal year as far as generating electric power was concerned and the figures of the just released report of the Nova Scotia power commission indicate the Trenton plant consumed more than a million dollars worth of solid fuel.

Actually, 97,309 tons were burned—an increase of 24,000.

Bulk of the extra power produced went over the grid to New Brunswick where the dry spell that dried up Nova Scotia also hit big hydro streams including even the Saint John river.

Electricity continued to be shipped from Trenton to the New Brunswick pool at Moncton right up to the end of March; then the spring melting period started and coal consumption dropped off accordingly.

Further on it says this:

Making possible the shift of power to New Brunswick this past year was the new grid financed by the dominion government; and the fact the Nova Scotia government had proceeded with expansion at Trenton.

Coal consumed at the Trenton plant, the power commission's only thermal generating plant was sufficient to earn $163,685 for qualified industrial power users, also a recent development and financed by the dominion government.

The report indicates thermal energy sold to New Brunswick from Nova Scotia sources from August 17 to November 30 alone reached a total of 60,556,000 kilowatt hours.

I quote these figures to show how these measures are assisting all parts of the maritime provinces, and to illustrate the action which this government has taken. This is of particular importance to my own area where there are still mines in operation—Macbean, Drummond and Greenwood—and the measures I have described will continue to help them out, especially the enlargement of the thermal plant.

The question can be asked, what else has this government done for the coal industry? Well, Industrial Estates Limited, a crown company set up in Nova Scotia, has received some assistance from the federal government and has been able to get one industry into Pictou county, with hope of more. Again, a recent measure brought down by the Minister of Labour allowed the federal government to provide 75 per cent of the capital cost of new vocational schools. I am glad the municipalities in my county are getting together; it looks as though they will be able to agree on the construction of a vocational school, 75 per cent of the cost of which will be paid by the dominion government and 25 per cent by the provincial government. In addition, both governments will pay a large amount—I believe it is 60 per cent—toward the operating cost of such a school, which is greatly needed and which will help train many of the young men in this area.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate did not think very much of the provision for double depreciation set out by the Minister of Finance in the supplementary budget. Perhaps the arrangement does not amount to too much in itself. All I can say is that the former government took no steps to assist in this way by providing tax incentives, whereas the present government has made a move. We shall press for even more to be done to help new industry establish itself in the area.

One of the hon. members who sits on the front bench opposite was in my area lately, and I notice that he designated the Nova Scotia members as yes men. Well, we are yes men when it comes to measures for the setting up of vocational schools, acts such as the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act and provisions such as the Minister of Finance made earlier this year for double depreciation allowance. We plead guilty to that.

As far as the future is concerned, there are two matters I should like to bring to the attention of the minister and the government. First of all, with respect to the fund set up to provide assistance for the Cape Breton area I suggest that a further amount be allocated and used in the Pictou county area to help our own provincial crown company in its efforts to attract industry to the area. Second, I would ask the minister to give consideration to making available subventions for our independent mines. I do not intend to go into this subject very fully, because the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria has already discussed it at some length. During his remarks he outlined the necessity for granting subventions to independent mines, of which there are two in my area, besides a number in the Cape Breton area, which are in need of such subventions. I should like to ask, further, that the government decline to follow the suggestion or proposal in the Rand report that subventions should only be allowed to mines producing 50,000 tons of coal or more.

I notice that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was lately in the constituency of the hon. member for Cape Breton North. I am sure my hon. friend is now even more secure in his seat than he was before. We are not saying that everything which needs to be done in connection with the coal industry has been done. We do not say the problem is not a tough one. It is indeed a tough problem, and we have grown up with it. But I believe this government is making every effort to assist not only in the Cape Breton area but in other areas, and I strongly urge the government to continue these endeavours and, in particular, to take every step to assist the establishment of new industry in the Pictou area so that additional work opportunities may be available for miners and others who find themselves unemployed through no fault of their own.

Mr. Pickersgill: I had not concluded last evening the things I wanted to say about the situation in Cape Breton. The hon. member for Pictou who has just resumed his seat has made reference to certain things I said last night. I shall say a little more about that later. But I did undertake last night to produce concrete evidence in support of a statement I made, and I think I should begin what I have to say now by putting on the record an advertisement which appeared in the Halifax Mail-Star of Saturday, June 8, 1957. I shall read it exactly as it appeared. It is headed "The Coal Industry: Action Today or Regret Tomorrow!"

"If coal production is not increased, the services of some four thousand of the eleven thousand mine workers presently employed in the Nova Scotia coal industry will not be required."

That is a quotation from the Gordon report on Canada's economic prospects, section 16, page 103. Another quotation follows:

"... as far as I am concerned, and as far as my opinion may carry weight in the decisions that are taken, we are not going to encourage a substantial increase in the production of coal because I don't think that that would be fair to future generations."

(Prime Minister St. Laurent, Fredericton, May 23, 1957.)

I shall comment on that later. Then in the middle of the advertisement is the quotation, in large print:

"The Prime Minister, as a matter of policy, has set his face against the expansion of the coal industry in Nova Scotia ... And on no issue is there greater disagreement than our stand on coal policy and the position taken by the Liberal party".

(Premier R. L. Stanfield, Inverness, June 5)

The advertisement continues:

In these statements above, the people of Nova Scotia may read for themselves and judge for themselves who has the best interests of Nova Scotia at heart.

The question of the federal thermal power proposals is not an issue! Premier Stanfield has insisted only that Nova Scotia coal be used as the fuel and that the cost of power be made cheaper as a result of the thermal program.

But the statements of Prime Minister St. Laurent on the subject of coal production are an issue!

This is the part to which I want to draw particular attention:

Your Progressive Conservative candidates are in favour of a coal policy that will increase coal production!

The word "increase" is underlined. Then it says:

Do a good turn for Nova Scotia—turn out and vote Conservative on June 10!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: At the bottom of the advertisement there is a postscript which reads:

Don't be fooled by the power play of federal candidates for the Liberal party. Mr. Winters has described the program as "a $200,000,000 program". In Fredericton, Mr. St. Laurent said: "I can't tell you how much the plant will cost." Nova Scotia and New Brunswick want cheaper power but they want to hear the facts first not political speeches.

It ends:

Vote Conservative June 10th.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, certainly.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member has just quoted a statement made by the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, which I cannot repeat accurately now, but which in effect indicated that he did not advocate an increase in production of coal in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. MacInnis: I should now like the hon. member to qualify his statement, because of the fact that the St. Laurent government had loaned the provincial government $7,500,000 to help improve mechanization in order to bring about increased production.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman is seeking to engage in a debate regarding something which took place a very long time before the events which I am now seeking to discuss. Much as I should like to engage in that debate with the hon. gentleman, I think it is preferable that I continue with the subject I started to speak on regarding this Conservative advertisement. This advertisement offered the people of that area—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister had said that—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Mr. Pickersgill: —coal production was an issue.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member wishes to continue his remarks without involving himself in a debate with me, and I suggest he will not do so because the former prime minister had—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Chairman: Order. I must remind the hon. member that he is not permitted to interrupt a speaker except on a point of order, and that a point of order does not involve only a disagreement. If the hon. member wishes to debate the remarks made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, he will have to do so later on.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw your attention, the attention of hon. members of this committee, and the attention of the people of this country, to what has happened during this debate. We know that the hon. member for Cape Breton South is very worried about this problem. When he spoke in this committee he was politely listened to by the members on this side of the house. However, when anyone on this side has attempted to speak during this debate, that member was harassed by phony points of order from beginning to end. I suggest that this crisis in Cape Breton is too important to be treated in so frivolous a manner in this committee. If the hon. member for Cape Breton South does not like what I have to say he has the right to reply, and I assure him that I will then listen politely to what he has to say.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to—

An hon. Member: There he goes again; sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should again like to refer to the statement made in this advertisement, and the statements made by the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, on the subject of coal production which the advertisement described as an issue. The advertisement states that Progressive Conservative candidates are in favour of a coal policy which will increase coal production. That was stated as an issue in Nova Scotia by the Conservative candidates before the 1957 election. If that was not an inducement to the voters in Nova Scotia to vote for the Conservative candidates, so as to increase coal production, I do not understand the plain meaning of plain English words. They said that was an issue, but the fact is that coal production has decreased ever since that advertisement appeared.

The hon. member for Pictou said, I think with honesty, that the problems in respect of the coal industry started in 1955 and 1956. I think he is quite right in saying that, and I agree with him. The previous government was very concerned about these problems, and very concerned about the fact that because of dieselization, because of the rapid development of the Canadian oil and gas industries, because of other technological changes, and also because of the exhaustion of many of the mines—that is of course why most of the mines were closed—this problem was becoming increasingly difficult.

As hon. members on the opposite side know, or should know, the previous government did pay a subvention in respect of shipments of coal to the United Kingdom, in the hope of developing a continuing market there for Cape Breton coal. That government extended the whole program of subventions in any way that seemed fruitful. In Mr. Harris' budget of March, 1957 a proposal was made which, if it had been carried out, would have resulted in very much greater use of coal for thermal power development than is being used at the present time in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. It is very unfortunate that this program was not carried on by the present government.

That proposal, of course, was not the first proposal made to assist New Brunswick in the production of power. As early as 1956 Mr. Lesage, as the minister of northern affairs, had made an offer, which was warmly welcomed by the present Minister of Forestry, the then premier of New Brunswick, to assist in the development of hydroelectric power on the upper Saint John. It was later discovered that there was not sufficient storage space for the water without agreements being made with the province of Quebec and the government of the United States, and the Liberal government decided that if it could not develop the upper Saint John in a reasonable time—I have the documents right here which show that the then premier of New Brunswick, now the Minister of Forestry, agreed with this view—it must assist the province in some other way to develop the power it needed for industrial development.

Mr. Harris in his budget of March 14, 1957 made a proposal for thermal plants to be built by the federal government, to be owned by the federal government, operated by the Northern Canada Power Corporation, and made available for sale to either of the provinces at any time the provinces wanted to buy them, at their amortized value. That proposal was warmly accepted by the then premier of New Brunswick, the present Minister of Forestry, as well as by the premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. Stanfield. That was the first reaction from those individuals, but something happened subsequently to change that reaction.

The hon. member for Pictou said a few moments ago that this was another example of the arrogant centralizing attitude of the federal government, which wanted to own those plants. I have not tried to quote the hon. member's exact words, and I am sure he will correct me if I am being unfair to him, but that statement is not true. At that time we took the view that since the federal government could borrow at a much lower rate of interest than the provincial governments, and since these plants might not make any profit for perhaps five years, it would be an advantage to those provinces if the plants were owned by the federal government. However, in order to safeguard the position of the provinces, it was decided that the moment the plants became profitable, the provinces could take them over. I suggest that was a generous offer of assistance, unlike any offer ever made by any federal government up to that time, which was made to assist in the development of power in those provinces.

The question was raised at that time by Mr. Stanfield as to whether coal would be used in those plants. There was a good deal of debate about this subject, and since it seems to be the fashion for certain individuals constantly to misrepresent the facts, I shall now try to place them very simply on the record as they occurred.

Mr. Stanfield, as I have said, inquired of the federal government as to whether coal or oil would be used in these plants. Mr. Lesage stated that, at that time, coal was cheaper than oil and, therefore, the question did not arise. However, since that question was persistently being asked by members of the Conservative party—and I do not blame them for asking it—the government decided, in advance of any concrete situation arising, and it was formally announced by Mr. Winters, that if oil became cheaper than coal, the federal government would provide a subsidy to reduce the cost to the price of oil, so that coal could continue to be used, notwithstanding the fact that oil was cheaper, and that the subsidy, in such case, was to be paid out of the federal treasury.

That policy was abandoned by the present government when they came into office. That was the Liberal position, and if that policy had been followed by the present government, if the government of New Brunswick had been willing to allow coal to be used in the Saint John plant, coal would be used there now. If there had been a Liberal government in office in Ottawa coal would be in use in that Saint John plant right now. We know what is being used there. It is not coal; it is oil.

I say that the Minister of Forestry, who was then premier of New Brunswick, was so little concerned about the coal problem that he financed and built the Saint John plant as a provincial undertaking so that it could use oil and would not use coal; but in spite of that fact he is embraced by the present Prime Minister and brought into the government as the great champion of the Atlantic provinces. I say, sir, that is quite a record.

I do not know whether it was more in the interests of New Brunswick to use oil rather than coal in the Saint John plant. That is the business of the provincial government and I am expressing no view in that regard. That is their affair. I am not a member for New Brunswick and I express no view. But I do say that if there had been a federal plant as we originally proposed it would have been built with federal money, and it would have been using coal today rather than the oil that is being used. That was the Liberal policy. It would have meant a very much greater consumption of coal than there is at the present time. Those are facts that cannot be gainsaid.

This is past history, and it is not going to provide any jobs in Cape Breton or in Pictou county at the present time. I agree with the hon. member for Pictou that it is just as important to provide jobs for displaced miners in Pictou county as in Cape Breton. It is every bit as important. They are two areas which, with the town of Springhill, have suffered very seriously because of the decline in the coal industry, and I do not think there is any doubt that some of that decline could have been prevented.

That is why Mr. St. Laurent, with that honesty which was so characteristic of him, refused to say things that he did not believe would happen. He said at Fredericton that he would not say that the production of coal was going to be increased because he did not think it would be possible, and he was right because surely this government would have tried to carry out that promise if there had been any hope of doing so. What the Tory advertisement never gave him credit for saying, and what he did say which was very important, was:

> Now will maritime coal continue to be the cheapest fuel for the production of power for all time? I do not think it will. I think that coal is going to become more valuable for chemical, synthetical processes than it will be as a fuel.

I hope Mr. St. Laurent was right. If the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition in the house on July 1, 1958 had been followed and an intensive program of research into new uses for coal had been initiated at that time, we would have been three years further along the road; but like every other suggestion it was ignored by hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. St. Laurent said:

> I think that coal is going to become more valuable for chemical, synthetical processes than it will be as a fuel. In the meantime, of course, we want these coal mines kept in operation—

That is what he said.

> —because we do not want the coal mining towns to become ghost towns.

Mr. St. Laurent and the St. Laurent government, of course, had a record. We had faced a similar situation in the gold mines, and we had met that situation and prevented those towns from becoming ghost towns. That was the position of the Liberal party, and it took the same position with respect to the coal mines. Our position was not like that of hon. gentlemen opposite who, when a mine goes out or when there is no longer a market for the production of a mine, let these towns become ghost towns or say "Let the province solve the problem" or wring their hands and say they do not know what to do next. Mr. St. Laurent said, "We do not want the coal mining towns to become ghost towns". Then he went on to make this statement which, as events have shown, was thoroughly justified:

> But as far as I am concerned, and as far as my opinion may carry weight in the decisions that are taken, we are not going to encourage a substantial increase in the production of coal because I do not think that that would be fair to the future generations of Canadians.

I do not think it would have been fair, as it has turned out, to the present generation of Canadians to hold up false and visionary hopes which obviously could not be realized. I do say that I could not help but be impressed by a letter I read in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald yesterday. A suggestion was made which I put to hon. gentlemen opposite and particularly to the minister and to the coal board. The letter suggested that we should give consideration now to erecting another thermal plant in the coal fields. It is true that there is no great demand for electricity at the present time in the province of Nova Scotia. That is quite true, though there is some demand, because the Nova Scotia Light and Power Company at this very moment is considering a hydro development for stand-by power. That is rather extraordinary in the light of the coal situation in Nova Scotia. I believe consideration should be given to the possibility suggested in the letter I have mentioned.

I am not sure whether it is feasible, but these things have to be studied and explored, and they should be studied and explored before a crisis arises and not afterward. We do know that methods have been devised now for the transmission of electricity over quite long distances, and it seems to me that it would be very much better from every point of view, rather than paying a subvention to carry coal to Ontario to make power there, where there may not be a continuing market, to build a plant right in Cape Breton and develop power there and, if necessary, transmit it by high voltage lines through the system generally.

We know that the present premier of Quebec and the present premier of New Brunswick are now engaged in negotiating for interconnecting lines similar to those that exist between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and when that exchange is completed it will be possible to transmit power back and forth from Ontario hydro to Cape Breton island because it will all be interconnected by a single eastern Canadian grid. That is a great advance, and it is another development of the policy that Mr. Harris announced in his budget speech on March 14, 1957.

I say, let us consider it. I do not say let us do it, because these big projects require some study and consideration; but such study and consideration should be active and dynamic. Let us consider the possibility of building a big thermal plant on Cape Breton island with a view to shipping the power westward and shipping other power westward from New Brunswick, and so on. It does not all have to go the whole distance. We should consider this possibility with a view to providing another outlet for coal in the near future. You cannot build one of these plants overnight, but the building of such a plant would provide a lot of work and thereby provide alternative employment. It would provide cheap power right there in Cape Breton.

If that were coupled with the other suggestion which I put forward last night, and which I should like to repeat, that as a real inducement to secondary industry to come into Cape Breton the government should consider the possibility of providing at no cost, or at very low cost over a period of years, the necessary power to carry on in that area, then this would prevent the area from becoming a whole series of ghost towns. I say these are constructive suggestions that ought to be considered because I do not see how any Canadian, even if he lives in the Yukon, could contemplate the possibility—and it is a possibility today—of Cape Breton becoming a permanently distressed area with no outlet for the people there, no hope for them whatever.

It does seem to me, sir, that it is quite a shocking thing that 15 months after this government knew that at least two of these mines were going to close, no steps have been taken to provide alternative work for these people. We should have had a scheme ready to go into operation. Fifteen months is a long time. As a matter of fact the government has had three years, because ever since the slowdown of 1958 the government has known that there was going to be a decline. It is true that to slow down that decline is a wise thing. As I said last night, we on this side have always supported every effort of the government to spin that out. We supported those efforts because we hoped the government was going to do something constructive, not just sit on its hands.

I did not agree with everything contained in the Rand report. I did not think the Rand report was bold enough or imaginative enough. However, there were a lot of constructive suggestions in that report, and those suggestions should have been put into operation last November. Parliament met last November. We would have passed in one day a bill to carry out any of those constructive suggestions. Instead of following this course an interdepartmental committee was set up. We are told now that we will not see what this interdepartmental committee has recommended until after these estimates have been passed.

This is no way to treat parliament. This is no way to carry on the government of the country. I suppose this interdepartmental committee was composed of able civil servants. I cannot conceive of them taking all this time to prepare a report. I suspect that in this case, as in every other case, the delay is caused by the constitutional inability of the present advisers to Her Majesty to make up their minds about anything. They just cannot decide on any course of action in any field. They wait until there is a crisis, then they try to start another investigation or vote a little money, not even knowing how they are going to spend it.

I say, sir, that we need a little responsibility in government in connection with this matter. According to the press the minister is chairman of the cabinet committee studying this subject. Of course parliament is not allowed to know this. The minister surely knows what they are going to do with that $1.5 million. He should tell us now. In fact the government should be spending it now. The day before yesterday, when these men came out of the last shift at Caledonia, they should have been offered some jobs resulting from the expenditure of this million and a half dollars. Instead of that we find the government wringing its hands and saying, "We will be interested in receiving suggestions". This is not good enough.

Last night the hon. member for Cape Breton South blamed everybody he could think of; he blamed the U.M.W. and he blamed the company. He blamed everybody except the people who are really to blame, the ministers. We recall that when the hon. member's predecessor, Mr. Gillis, got up to speak about the situation in Cape Breton he always had constructive suggestions to put forward. I admit that they were not always practical, but unless you have suggestions you cannot find out whether or not they are practical. The hon. member for Cape Breton South is suggesting absolutely nothing to deal with this problem. He is just commending the government, stroking them nicely in the hope something may turn up.

Mr. MacInnis: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, certainly.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member admit that the suggestion he has put forward in relation to thermal plants in Nova Scotia and the transmission of power by wire is a really good suggestion?

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. member think for one minute that I would have put it forward if I did not think it was worth considering? Everybody who knows anything about what is going on in Canada today knows that the greatest possible consideration is being given to the development of hydro power on the Hamilton river and hydro power on the Peace river, which will be transmitted hundreds of miles, in some cases thousands of miles, to the ultimate users. I am not an engineer, so I am not going to say anything about the feasibility of these projects. However, I know this sort of thing is being done in some parts of the world. Surely it is just as possible to transmit power generated from coal as it is to transmit hydro power.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member permit another question?

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to carry on—

Mr. MacInnis: It is just one short question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member would save his question until I have finished, in order to contribute to orderly debate. I am trying to make some points, and I would prefer the opportunity of making them consecutively.

I say that now we have reached this situation, what is absolutely essential is some expedient, some stopgap, something that will give these men who are thrown out of work something to do right away so they can continue to earn a living. We must remember that most of these miners are not young men. Most of them are not trained for anything but mining. Even if there were plenty of jobs in Quebec or Ontario, these men could not go there.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the hon. member permit a question now?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, certainly.

Mr. MacInnis: He just said that he would not put forward a suggestion unless he considered it worth while. The hon. member has maintained that I have never put forward any proposal that would be beneficial to the coal mining areas. If the hon. member will look at page 16 of Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day for March 20, 1961 he will find a resolution standing in my name which reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of creating a national grid system for the transmission of power produced from coal in order to take full advantage of this natural resource and further assist the coal mining industry throughout the country.

Does the hon. member not agree that this is the proposal he is now putting forward as his own suggestion? He will note that I put forward this resolution on March 20.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would agree with that. I must say I think it is quite a good suggestion. I never pretended there was any originality in what I was suggesting.

Mr. MacInnis: There certainly was not.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not seeking to disagree with the hon. member. If he had urged that on the government last night instead of attacking the chiefs of the united mine workers who are doing their best—

Mr. MacInnis: Are you defending them now?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member asked me a question, but he does not seem to want to hear my answer. My answer is that instead of attacking other people who were sincerely trying to solve this problem—

Mr. MacInnis: About as sincere as you are.

Mr. Pickersgill: —if he had put this constructive suggestion to the government it would have been a more useful contribution to the debate.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is setting himself up as the champion of the coal miners of Cape Breton. He is the man, according to his own statement, who knows how to remedy the terrible situation we have at home in Cape Breton. Yet I notice that in taking up the maximum time of the committee that the rules would allow last night and again this morning, he still did not find time to deal with any of these remedies. Indeed, he is the man who last night complained that some hon. members on this side referred to the history of the coal industry in Nova Scotia, yet most of the time he himself has been talking about the history of coal and, I may say, I believe most of it was a distortion.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about this advertisement?

Mr. MacLellan: Let me see the advertisement.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a Tory advertisement.

Mr. MacInnis: The polite hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. MacLellan: The number one distortion of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is when he says now in this chamber that in the election of 1957 and 1958 the coal issue was whether or not the Conservative party guaranteed increased production of coal. By no means was that the case. The representation made by the Prime Minister, the premier of Nova Scotia and others in Nova Scotia was that they would do their best to face the problems of the coal industry and give them the full attention they deserved. The people of Nova Scotia elected 10 Conservative members in 1957 over one in 1953. Why was it that they turned down the representatives of the previous administration at that time? The reason was that clearly in the opinion of the people of Nova Scotia the Liberal party had turned their backs on the coal industry and had abandoned the miners to any fate that might befall them. However, they now pretend, or the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate does so, that if the Liberal government had been maintained in power they would have accomplished great things for the coal industry.

As a matter of fact what the people of Nova Scotia saw in 1957 was Liberal cabinet ministers running around Nova Scotia saying that the mines that could not be continued in operation on an economic basis would have to be closed. What the people of Nova Scotia saw was the then prime minister coming down to New Brunswick and making speeches to the effect that, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate admits, the coal industry was obsolete.

The prime minister of the day came down to New Brunswick without a single suggestion as to what could be done regarding our declining coal markets other than to say that it was hardly fair to future generations of Canadians to be digging coal out of the ground for use as a fuel. His excuse as to why the Liberal party had abandoned these mines and miners was that coal was much too valuable in 1957 to be placed on the fuel market in Canada but must be saved for the future. Now, of course, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate comes here and pretends that the then prime minister was simply against any expansion of the industry.

It was much more than that, Mr. Chairman. In my mind and in the minds of the great majority of Nova Scotians, as that election of 1957 proved, he had indeed turned his back on the Nova Scotia coal industry.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has made a great to do here this morning about the so-called power program offered by the St. Laurent government in 1957. He says "If we had continued in power and if the thermal program that we had set forth had been set up, and if it were in operation today, then there would be no problem with regard to the Nova Scotia coal industry".

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say that.

Mr. MacLellan: What happened? After neglecting this problem for years; after mine after mine had been closed and the people who worked in the coal mines and their families had been thrown out on the streets in Cape Breton island and elsewhere in Nova Scotia, on the eve of the election in 1957 the Liberals came back to the people of Nova Scotia hoping once more to catch them in one of their pre-election gags. The gag this time was a thermal power program. The figure of $200 million was mentioned. This money was going to be used to capitalize thermal power plants in Nova Scotia. It was going to give us cheap power. It was going to create a great market for coal.

But, Mr. Chairman, you will note that when the hon. member was speaking he referred to the comments of the premiers of the Atlantic provinces on the matter of the power proposition put forward by the Liberal government at the time. I quote from the advertisement which the hon. member has been kind enough to pass over to me. He quoted Premier Stanfield as saying this:

> ... And on no issue is there greater disagreement than our stand on coal policy and the position taken by the Liberal party.

And the advertisement continues:

> The question of the federal thermal power proposals are not an issue. Premier Stanfield has insisted only that Nova Scotia coal be used as the fuel and that the cost of power be made cheaper as the result of the thermal program.

What was the offer of the St. Laurent administration? They said they would provide thermal power plants but when they were asked if they would give us subventions on coal to be used within the maritime area in order to provide power at a reasonable cost from those plants, they said no. When the present Minister of National Revenue asked the then minister of northern affairs, Mr. Lesage, in this chamber if the government of that day would consider subventions on Nova Scotia coal to be used in those power plants, the answer of Mr. Lesage was no, because subventions would not be necessary. Why would subventions not be necessary? Even the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate should know that residual oil, bunker C oil, was always cheaper than coal.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was not cheaper at that time.

Mr. MacLellan: The hon. member says it was not cheaper at that time. That is just the point. Why was it not cheaper? It was not cheaper because the Suez canal was momentarily blocked, and oil at that time could not get through from the Middle East. Because of world market conditions there was a great shortage of oil, and residual oil costs like all other oil prices shot sky high. It was an emergency situation, a very unusual situation. But the Liberal administration at the time hid behind this unusual situation in order to pretend that subventions on Nova Scotia coal would never be necessary.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say that.

Mr. MacLellan: If the Liberal government had been re-elected in 1957 there would have been no thermal plants in the province of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, because neither provincial government could have accepted the proposition put forward at that time by the then minister of northern affairs and national resources. They said they would capitalize the plants. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said those plants would be available at any time for purchase by the provinces. Yes, they would capitalize the plants; but the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate now says that they would buy coal for those plants without subventions, that they would buy coal for those plants by making it a self-liquidating proposition. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate even went so far as to state that within five years it would have been an economic operation. The facts of the situation are these. In 1957, at the time this spurious proposal was brought forward to the people of the Atlantic provinces, we knew something of the cost of producing power with coal. We knew it could not be produced at a profit. Indeed, we knew it could be produced only at very high cost by using coal without subventions. Hence the Liberal offer at the time was a nullity.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member permit one question?

Mr. MacLellan: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the hon. member not recall full well that before that discussion was concluded, and before the election of 1957, an undertaking was given by the St. Laurent government that the price of coal would be reduced to the price of oil so that coal could continue to be used?

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, the Liberal party in the house prior to the election in 1957 steadfastly refused to pay subventions on coal.

Mr. Pickersgill: Answer my question.

Mr. MacLellan: On June 6, four days before the election, they did give out a release which suggested that they might be ready to pay subventions. But when the power proposal was put forward they had refused to pay subventions on coal. How could such a proposal be feasible or possible in the province of Nova Scotia or the province of New Brunswick?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at one o'clock I was commenting on the two recent speeches made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate with regard to the Nova Scotia coal problem and in particular with regard to the thermal power program of 1957-58. His first point was a suggestion that the Conservative party in the election of 1957 guaranteed an increase in the production of coal in Nova Scotia. Second, he seeks to argue that if the thermal power program put forward by the government of that day had been put into effect this would have been the salvation of the Nova Scotia coal industry.

Actually at that time former premier Flemming of New Brunswick and Premier Stanfield of Nova Scotia commented that they accepted the thermal power program suggested by the hon. St. Laurent administration in principle but they would make no definite statement on it until it had been checked carefully by their governments, and for a very good reason. The slogan of the Liberal party at that time was that this power program would provide "power at cost" in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. There could be nothing more empty or meaningless to the people of the Atlantic area than power at cost. We already had power at cost. The Nova Scotia power commission, for example, was operating at a substantial deficit, not at a profit, burning coal as the source of power.

What we needed, and what we had been approaching the government at Ottawa for many years before 1957, was a program which would give us cheaper power, and that certainly meant that if coal was to be used as the source of thermal power there would have to be heavy subventions on coal. The administration of the day had categorically refused to consider subventions on coal to be used in these thermal plants. I quote from page 3296 of Hansard of April 9, 1957, just shortly before the election in June of that year and after the proposed power program had been announced. The present Minister of National Revenue put this question to Mr. Lesage:

> Has the government given consideration to expanding the principle of subventions on the movement of coal within the maritime provinces to assist in the use of that coal in competition with oil, assuming that the temporary condition may not continue and the price of oil may drop?

Mr. Lesage replied:

If the hon. member will read my statement he will find that I said or implied we did not consider it was necessary to give a subvention on coal so it would be competitive with oil.

In other words, as I said this morning, the government of the day was relying upon the unusually high cost of oil at the time because of the temporary blockage of the Suez canal to pretend that no subventions were needed to move Nova Scotia coal to thermal plants in the maritime area. Furthermore, Premier Flemming and Premier Stanfield both preferred to have their provinces hold title to plants to be built within their provinces, particularly inasmuch as they wanted some say in the cost of construction. At the time the Liberal party made it sound as if there were grants being made available under this thermal power program. In fact, the proposal was merely in the form of a loan to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and the other Atlantic areas. These plants were to be built by the federal government and the cost of construction of the plant and the cost of the power, whether produced by oil or by coal, would be paid for in the price of electricity used. There was no gift to the people of Nova Scotia. When we looked carefully at this so-called thermal power program we saw that it was of no use to us whatsoever.

There has been some mention by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate about the fact that the thermal power plant at Saint John in the province of New Brunswick burns oil. He said that if their plan had been put through the government would have owned these thermal plants and they would have seen to it that coal was burned in them. In other words, he was saying that they would have been in a position to force the province of New Brunswick to burn coal or else presumably, to cut off the power generated by the plant.

It was of no use to the Atlantic premiers to have a program where they would not know what the cost of power would be. The cost of construction of these plants plus the price of coal at the tonnage cost at which it was being produced in 1957 would mean that the cost of power would have been prohibitively high. After 1958 and after the power program had been changed to allow the provinces to hold title to these thermal plants, as I believe any province should be entitled to do, after arrangements had been made for subventions to move coal to these plants by the Conservative administration, the Irving Oil Company of New Brunswick decided to build a refinery at Saint John alongside the proposed site of the thermal power plant. Regardless of subventions that were made available on coal, coal could not under-sell residual oil from this nearby refinery, and the province of New Brunswick felt it was in the best interests of that province to burn residual oil from the Irving refinery in order to provide cheaper power to the province of New Brunswick.

I do not see how any member, let alone the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, can rise in the house and say that if the Liberal government were still in power they would have been able to force the province of New Brunswick to burn coal in that plant. Furthermore, it should be obvious to every hon. member that a plant in the province of New Brunswick would burn New Brunswick coal, not Nova Scotia coal. The undertaking the Conservative party made to Nova Scotia in 1958 was that if any thermal power plants were built to use fuel other than coal they could not be financed by federal funds.

To turn to the second point made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, namely that in 1957 the Conservative party had guaranteed that the production of coal would be increased—

Mr. Pickersgill: I never said that.

Mr. MacLellan: The hon. member mentioned a promise that the production of coal would be expanded, even though he did try to weasel out of the expression—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is usually very fair, but would he use the words inserted in the advertisement? I did not put words into the mouth of the Conservative party. I used its own words.

Mr. MacLellan: The hon. member was taking a straightforward advertisement which told the people of Nova Scotia at that time that the members from Nova Scotia would do everything in their power, if possible, to increase the production of coal. But never at any time did we promise without reservation that we could expand coal production if there were no markets for that coal.

Mr. Deschatelets: You were elected on that promise. Do not forget that.

Mr. Pickersgill: I read the advertisement. It speaks for itself.

Mr. MacLellan: Had it not been for the action which this government took in 1957 and the increased subventions on coal, the situation would have been infinitely worse. If the policy of the Liberal party as made known by cabinet ministers speaking in the province had been followed through, we would not now be worrying about the closing of coal mines in Nova Scotia; they would have been closed before 1957 was out. Coal markets were declining and the government, when it came to power, took every step possible to try to save this industry. We must remember that subventions have been almost doubled since 1957. This is the measure of what was done by the government to try to make up for the rapidly declining coal market. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would like to blame the present government for the decline of that market. The increased flow of natural gas into the Montreal area and the disappearance of our natural market there certainly cannot be blamed on this government. An undertaking was made by Quebec Natural Gas Company to buy gas coming through the trans-Canada pipe line at 51 cents a cubic foot. Since the domestic market expected there did not expand as fast as was anticipated, gas was dumped on the market at 28 cents a cubic foot, making the sale of coal more difficult than ever. This was the equivalent of $5.68 a ton for coal. Every effort was made by the government, by special subventions, to meet this competition in the Montreal market but the gas producers were able to offer gas at a price per cubic foot with which coal was altogether unable to compete on a 12 year contract.

Then again, there have been inroads made on the market by residual oil. Every time a gallon of gasoline is produced, 1.75 gallons of residual oil remain for disposal, all of which is thrown on the market at prices which, very often, are set in relation to the price of coal. The sale of surplus hydro power in the Montreal east area has also made an inroad on the coal market there. No one could have foreseen this in 1957 or 1958; certainly, no one could have done anything about it. By 1959, 450,000 tons of Nova Scotia coal had been replaced in the Saguenay and Three Rivers area by surplus hydro power. In many cases the power was supplied under contractual terms requiring users to change to surplus hydro power at three hours notice if they were consumers of primary power. Neither this government nor any other government has magic means of meeting competition of that kind. I think great credit is due to the Minister of Mines and to the Minister of National Revenue and to Mr. Uren, the retiring chairman of the coal board, for the efforts made to retain what we do have now of our coal market.

I should also like to say that in the three years I have been here I have been pleased to be associated with the work done by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria. They have used great resourcefulness in tackling this problem of declining coal markets, and done everything which could have been done to bring to the attention of those concerned the problem of the mining communities and the coal industry itself in the face of these declining markets, responsibility for which cannot be attached either to the government or to any other person. Everything possible has been done in these circumstances to increase the subventions to Dosco and the independent operators in order to enable them to sell coal. Nothing was left undone in this respect. Long hours of work were devoted to efforts to sell more coal. Sales of coal in Ontario were, in fact, increased last year to almost three quarters of a million tons. These sales involved markets in that province which had not existed before.

Moreover, in addition to its efforts to stimulate markets for coal the government was responsible for measures intended to improve employment prospects in the area in general and to stimulate, by various actions, the economy of the region. The building up of forestry, the tourist industry and the fishing industry in conjunction with the provincial governments has gone a long way toward making the present position easier. If we had had to face the present coal crisis with the resources and degree of development available in 1957 the situation would be very much worse than it is today. Other industries have been growing at a rapid pace and people today have many more opportunities of employment in fields other than the coal industry. In passing, I might say that in my constituency at Point Tupper there are some 1,300 or 1,400 men working now on the construction of a new pulp mill where there was very little demand for labour only two years ago. In all the facets of our economy there has been a general improvement. We are glad that we are saving one of the three mines threatened with closure. Everyone in this area knows that everything that could be done was done. We have worked together with all the organizations and people of the communities concerned, including the clergy and many local organizations in order to take whatever practical steps were possible.

In addition to saving No. 16 mine for the present time, the mine which has the largest labour force of all, the government has been searching everywhere for new types of employment to provide work for miners who are laid off and who are to be laid off. Every avenue has been explored. I would say that the provision of $1,500,000 per annum for the setting up of new employment opportunities in the area represents one of the most generous provisions ever made by any government in a case of this sort. Certainly it is much more generous than anything done by the previous administration which sat by and watched mines close without making any attempt to provide alternative employment.

I should like to repeat that the people of the coal mining areas appreciate very much the many hours of work and the long nights spent by the hon. member for Cape Breton South in his attempt to save the mines in his constituency. The people of Cape Breton North and Victoria also understand how much work has been done on their behalf by the hon. member who represents that riding, and how earnestly the members from the area as a whole, together with other supporters of the government, have sought to meet this particular problem. They also know that if they must choose between the attitude this government has displayed, since it came into power, in trying to do everything it could, and the attitude of the former administration, to benefit they must choose the attitude of this administration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take very much longer, but I must take issue with one or two statements made by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond.

First of all, instead of reading the words of this advertisement as they are, he attempted to put a gloss on them, and to suggest that I said something other than the words that are used. I should like to read those words again. I shall not read the whole advertisement, only the relevant parts which have directly to do with coal. Premier Stanfield is quoted in this advertisement as follows:

> The Prime Minister, as a matter of policy, has set his face against the expansion of the coal industry in Nova Scotia—

Mr. MacLellan: Is that not true?

Mr. Pickersgill: The advertisement then goes on as follows:

> And on no issue is there greater disagreement than our stand on coal policy and the position taken by the Liberal party.

The hon. member has tried to weasel out of that statement by suggesting they did not promise to increase coal production. However, let me read the following statement appearing in the advertisement:

> But the statements of Prime Minister St. Laurent on the subject of coal production are an issue! Your Progressive Conservative candidates are in favour of a coal policy that will increase coal production!

There is certainly no mention of the words "if possible" in that advertisement, as has been insinuated by the hon. member. There was no question of it being "possible" before June 10, 1957. The hon. member has thought of that qualification this afternoon.

The fact of the matter is that they were either so ignorant they made those promises in good faith, or they were perpetrating a fraud. They can take it either way, and I do not much care which way they choose. The plain fact is that the people were led to believe that there would be an increase in coal production.

The hon. gentleman has said that this government has done its best, but I do not think it has done its best. The hon. gentleman also says that everyone knew that coal markets were shrinking. If everyone knew in 1955, 1956 and 1957 that coal markets were shrinking, why did the Prime Minister and the Tory candidates of those provinces promise an increase in production? If they were aware that the markets were shrinking, why did they promise to increase the production of maritime coal? Why did they not tell the people the true situation? I think the difficulty with which we are now faced in this regard has resulted from those promises made at that time.

The hon. gentleman has taken issue this afternoon with what I said in regard to the thermal plant in Saint John. I must say that I thought the hon. gentleman—I do not accuse him of doing it deliberately—did misrepresent what I had said. He also completely misrepresented the position taken by the St. Laurent government in June of 1957.

Mr. MacLellan: What date in June?

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest it does not make any difference what date it was in June, so long as it was before June 10, while they were in a position to carry out their undertaking. Mr. Lesage said, quite properly, when the policy was announced, that coal was cheaper than oil and there was no need to cross the bridge until it was reached. However, such a hullabaloo was made about the situation, along with many misrepresentations, that the government made a formal decision in respect of a hypothetical situation.

Mr. MacLellan: Yes, and everybody else knew—

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to continue and correct whatever he thinks I have said wrong when I am finished.

The Liberal government took the formal position that if oil became cheaper than coal, no matter what price it reached, the government would pay the necessary subsidy so that coal could continue to be used. That was the statement made by the St. Laurent government. I suggest if that policy had been adhered to by the present government, so that coal could have been used at the Saint John plant, there should have been a larger market for Canadian coal today than there is. The plain fact of the matter is that since the present government got into power, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Stanfield stated that the present Prime Minister had promised to see that coal was used, the government of the province of New Brunswick chose to build a plant designed to use oil, and which is still using oil. I suggest that had that Liberal policy been continued, and if the plant had continued to be owned by the federal government, the price of coal would have been subsidized and brought down to the cost of oil, so that the plant could have used that coal. I suggest the fact that the policy was not followed by the Tory government represents the difference between Tory policy and Liberal policy.

The Saint John plant was built by the present Minister of Forestry, who was then the premier of New Brunswick, to use oil, which indicates that he turned his back on the coal industry as well as the federal aid offered by his own friends in this house. I suggest that indicates the measure of his interest in regard to the situation facing the coal industry in the maritime provinces. I do not think even the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, who is very skilful at these things, can get around that situation.

I should suggest, however, that the important thing is not really what might have happened, or might not have happened in 1955, 1956, 1957, or even in 1958, but what is going to happen in 1961. I am not surprised that hon. gentlemen opposite continually drag out all these things that happened in the 1940's. I am surprised they do not go as far back as the 1930's, but, perhaps, when they considered doing so, they realize that during the 1930's, when the Bennett government was in power, coal production was even lower than it is now, and they prefer to forget about it.

The fact of the matter is that we are faced with a situation where a mine closed two days ago, and it is expected that another one will be closed on July 1. A lot of individuals are going to be out of work, with the result that two or three communities in Cape Breton island and, indeed, the whole economy of the province of Nova Scotia, is going to be affected if this situation is allowed to continue without something being done to provide alternative employment. I suggest that is the real problem.

The hon. gentleman has suggested everything which is possible to be done is being done to keep the mines open. Of course, that is not true, because the hon. gentleman knows very well when the delegation came up to Ottawa from Cape Breton early this month —I do not think the hon. member will contradict Mr. Shea—

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member for Cape Breton South will contradict him.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member should hear what he is contradicting before he does so.

Mr. MacInnis: I will contradict it in any event.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to refer to an article written by Mr. Harold Shea, an individual who most of us in this house believe to be a very accurate reporter. Mr. Harold Shea had the following to say, as reported in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of May 13, 1961.

Mr. MacInnis: That is last month.

Mr. MacLellan: That was last month, not this month.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the hon. member has me there, it was last month. In any event, Mr Shea had the following to say:

> Two federal cabinet ministers declared Friday that Ottawa would put up the money to keep three Cape Breton mines in business beyond announced closure dates if Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation would accept.

Those are Mr Shea's words, of course. The article then continues as follows:

> This statement, made to a Cape Breton delegation of municipal officials, clergymen and union officials, was regarded as a direct challenge to Dosco to make "a reasonable proposal".
> National revenue minister Nowlan, who chaired the meeting of cabinet ministers and delegation, assured "We will not stint on the money—we'll do everything that is humanly possible".

This article then refers to a statement made by the Minister of Labour, and reads as follows:

> Labour minister Starr said: "The big problem is to convince the company to keep the mines open. We'll pay the bill."

When I asked the minister whether that was what he said, and whether that was the policy of the government, he weaseled on that statement.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I must rise on a question of privilege. I cannot accept the description given by the hon. member in this respect. I gave him an answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, the hon. gentleman gave an answer all right and I will put his answer on the record because it really was a classic. It was the kind of answer that you get from straightforward people to straightforward questions.

Mr. Starr: If they come from straightforward people.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was a very different answer from the answer he gave to the delegation that he let go home believing that he meant what he said.

Here is the question and the answer. This is on pages 5096 and 5097 of Hansard for May 20, 1961:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour. Did he recently give an assurance to a delegation from Cape Breton that if Dosco would keep the coal mines open the government would pay the bill?

That is the question and those are the exact words of Mr. Shea's report. Here is the answer:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, up until now we have been paying subventions on the coal sold in that area by the mines, and my statement related to those subventions.

Apparently the reporter did not understand it that way; apparently the people who were there did not understand it that way. There is nothing at all about subventions in the words attributed to the minister. He said, "If they will keep the mines open, we will pay the bills". The bills are not subventions; the bills are the cost of keeping the mines open. Then I asked this question:

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister comment on a statement which appears in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald to the effect that labour minister Starr said: The big problem is to convince the company to keep the mines open. We will pay the bill.

We all remember what happened at that point. The Minister of Finance turned around and glared at the Minister of Labour, and here is what the Minister of Labour then said:

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, the keeping of the mines open is, of course, a decision of management. We would like to see the mines kept open if possible. We have paid subvention bills and are prepared to continue to pay them if they keep those mines open.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask a further supplementary question. Does the minister mean that the government is prepared to pay the cost of keeping the mines open?

At that point the Speaker intervened and there was no answer given to that question, which was the original question. This, of course, is typical of the way in which this government treat these problems. They give an assurance to the public and get the delegation away out of Ottawa and back to Cape Breton, and then they repudiate it in that indirect fashion here in the house. That is really what happened in this case. Those people went away thinking that if Dosco kept the mines open, the government would pay the bill.

I do not think there is any doubt that the Dominion Coal Company would have kept those mines open if the government had been prepared to pay the bill.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not saying that should have been done, but I am saying that is what they were told. We were told something else too, after the Minister of Finance had glared at the Minister of Labour.

The plain fact of the matter is that instead of making up their minds months ago that they would either let these mines close or that they would pay the cost of keeping them open, this government tried to keep fooling the people and fooling the people, and then finally they let two of the three mines close.

I say it is a good thing they did not let the other one close. But when you compare that with what was promised by the Prime Minister, not in the first election but later on between the elections—no; this was in fact before the first election; this was on Thursday, May 21, 1957. This is from the Cape Breton Post and these are the words of the present Prime Minister:

National leader of the Progressive Conservative party, John Diefenbaker, Wednesday night, told an overflow political rally at the Riverview high school here that a national fuel policy is high on the program of the national policy.

Then later on there is the following paragraph:

Implementation of a national fuel policy and its particular relation to Nova Scotia was discussed by Mr. Diefenbaker who stressed the important need of aid to the coal mines of the province.

That was in 1957, and we are still waiting for that policy. Indeed, the minister told us yesterday—I had better use his exact words—that you could not have such a policy. After four years of promises and evasion the minister says:

In presenting these estimates to this committee, I regret to report that the coal situation in Canada in the past year has grown more and more difficult as the competition from other fuels has intensified.

Well, that is true; everybody recognizes that is true:

It is becoming clear that the long established policy of providing assistance in the amount necessary to enable Canadian coal to meet the competition of imported coal in the markets of central Canada is no longer sufficient.

That is what we have been saying since 1958. That is one of the reasons why we had this thermal power policy:

The chief competition in these central markets and also in the home markets is no longer imported coal but other fuels.

It is open to question whether under the present rapidly changing competitive conditions a sound basis can be found for a long range basic policy.

In other words, they just throw up their hands and confess that they cannot have any policy. Maybe they cannot have any policy for coal, but surely they could have a policy to provide work for the coal miners who are thrown out of work. That is what they should be doing, and that is what they should have been doing for the last year. That is the real complaint I have been seeking to make all through.

I should like to quote the words of an editorial in yesterday's Halifax Chronicle-Herald, because I think this editorial states the situation clearly. It says in better fashion and more succinctly than I can, improvising here in the committee, exactly what the problem is. The editorial is called:

Cape Breton's Need.

It says:

The plan for meeting the latest Cape Breton coal crisis that has emerged from long and painful consultations between the federal government and Dosco is one of mixed blessings whose full effects will depend upon the type of follow-up action undertaken by Ottawa over the next few months.

That is what we want the minister to tell us. What is the follow-up going to be? We want to know the precise details of that. We do not want to be told, "After my estimates are over we will get up on the orders of the day and state something and you will not be able to debate it". We want to be told now.

Mr. Small: Something like you did; is that what you mean?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, we always did, because we were capable of making up our minds, announcing our policy and allowing it to be debated. That is why Canada was growing from 1945 to 1957 and that is why it has stopped growing today. I thank the hon. member for reminding me.

Mr. Small: You had no mind to make up. C. D. Howe made it up for you.

Mr. Pickersgill: This editorial continues:

The final closing of the 99-year-old Caledonia mine at Glace Bay and of the north side's Florence and the 12-month reprieve given to New Waterford's No. 16, the best producer in quantity and quality of the three, follows the general pattern of the past in the contraction of the industry—a pattern for which there is, unfortunately, little better alternative in the face of today's stiffening competition in the fuel markets.

The hopes that had been held for a continuation of all three pits were flimsily-based from the start. Caledonia and Florence are classed as uneconomical, and to keep them going, even with the extension of the federal-provincial offer of a dollar per ton production subsidy, would have brought the whole Dominion Coal Company enterprise closer to bankruptcy.

Even with No. 16 kept open for another year through this special type of aid, it will be necessary to resort to short-time work weeks in all but the better metallurgical collieries such as No. 26 and McBean. The company says it cannot find consumers for much more than four million tons a year without considerably expanded governmental assistance. The remaining mines, including No. 16, to be left in operation after Florence's abandonment this summer have a combined output capacity of almost 4,700,000 tons.

More than 1,200 miners are to be affected by this year's closings. Some will be transferred to other pits and some will be retired on pension. But the net addition to the ranks of the jobless still will be close to, if not more than, 800.

Eight hundred men, practically all of them with families, and most of them with large families:

And when the extra lease on life for No. 16, which contributes almost half of the general income for the town of New Waterford, runs out in August of 1962 another thousand men will be idled. The $1,500,000 which Ottawa is to provide for emergency employment on the island (in addition to the outlay in an extra year's production subsidies) will look after only a few hundred of these dislocated men and that apparently for a limited period in most cases.

Something more—

I draw your attention to these words.

—is obviously needed to avoid a further drastic economic setback for Cape Breton.

Mines minister Comtois has said this long term regional problem will get special federal attention.

We want to know what that attention is.

This consideration must go beyond merely more ad hoc palliatives and get into the realm of fiscal incentives to draw new industries into the region. Similarly, the possibility of Nova Scotia replacing the U.S. as supplier of the half million tons of bituminous consumed annually by Ottawa's own Polymer Corporation synthetic rubber plant at Sarnia should be further explored. Obtaining this market would be just about enough to rescue No. 16 from abandonment next year. Or at least to prevent the closing of further mines.

There is a real danger that, unless we get a good combination of ferreting out new coal markets within Canada and a bold, comprehensive government spearheaded program for revitalizing the entire industrial base of Cape Breton there will be a continuing, and likely accelerating, drift from bad to worse in its economy.

"We cannot cut this island off," royal commissioner Ivan Rand has said so rightly. "Canada, acting with Nova Scotia, must provide conditions to enable it to regain confidence and affirm its will to a new vitality".

And that goes for Springhill, Westville, Stellarton and the other mining communities of the mainland as well.

This, sir, is the problem with which we should be concerned, not what happened in 1957, 1947, 1937 or even 1867. The problem is here and now. The minister should get up now and tell us precisely what he is going to do to provide jobs for these men. He should tell us also whether or not he has spoken to his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, about the houses which many of these miners have bought, and for which they are not going to be able to pay. These houses are mortgaged to Central Mortage and Housing Corporation. This is another problem that has to be considered. However, the big problem is to get jobs for these men and stop the decay in Cape Breton.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, before the debate is concluded on this item of the dominion coal board, I should like to say a few words about the coal industry in the riding of Moose Mountain. I think, unknown to quite a few members, we have a very important coal industry in that part of Saskatchewan. It too has suffered from some of the problems of this industry which have been related at this time. It is a coincidence that just about 10 or 12 years ago an oil company surveying this area discovered large deposits of oil and, as a result of the development of that oil gas has been produced, too. It is interesting to note that out of about 4,300 producing wells in Saskatchewan, there are over 3,000 in that riding.

This development has provided our coal industry with very strong competition. I should like to give the committee, for a minute or two, a few facts concerning the lignite coal industry. I am not going to take up very much of the committee's time. Lignite coal is strip mined near Bienfait and Estevan, Saskatchewan. A fairly constant production of slightly over 2,200,000 tons has been maintained since 1950. The principal markets are for industrial users in the Winnipeg area. More than 70 per cent of the coal sold in the Winnipeg area is lignite. Other markets are in the Regina and Brandon areas, and certain pulp and paper plants at Kenora, Dryden and Fort Frances in Ontario.

Lignite coal possesses a substantial market advantage as a low cost fuel located near its principal markets; only 280 miles from Winnipeg and 155 miles from Brandon. There has also been a new market developed just recently as a result of the construction of a $40 million power plant near Estevan. This steam turbo generating plant uses large amounts of coal for the production of electricity.

In the post-war years the domestic house heating market has been pre-empted by fuel oil and latterly, to a large extent, by natural gas. The industry, by vigorous salesmanship which included assistance to industrial users in the installation of proper heating plants, was able to develop an industrial market more than replacing the lost domestic market. Concurrently, the companies have invested more than $5 million in new equipment since the war. As a result of mechanization and technological improvements, the industry has been able to absorb successive wage increases and has only raised the mine price of coal by 10 cents per ton since 1948. The present mine price averages $2 per ton.

The lignite industry by its vigorous salesmanship and technological initiative has been able to maintain its position, notwithstanding the competition of premium fuels in the post-war years. Its existence has been threatened by drastic increases in transportation expenses which it is powerless to control, and by this latter competition that I have just mentioned.

I have had representations from one of the directors of one of the leading coal companies in that area. We have, by the way, the following companies in that area, the Great West Coal Company; Western Dominion Coal Company; Manitoba and Saskatchewan Coal Company; Northwest Coal Company, and several other smaller ones. I have here a representation from which I am going to read a short extract, prepared by Mr. W. W. Lynd, Q.C., on behalf of Mr. J. M. Brodie, managing director of Great West Coal Company. He is referring to the Rand commission report, and he says:

> The report is most disappointing to the coal industry and if the recommendations that are made in the report are implemented by legislation, it will ring the death knell of the coal industry in Saskatchewan and Alberta at least, and I am not familiar enough with the coal industry of Nova Scotia to say what effect it will have there.
> Instead of making recommendations that will be of benefit to the coal industry, the recommendations will very substantially take away from the industry what little help it has been getting in the past. The commissioner proposes to do away with subventions, which are simply the payment by the government of part of the freight rates on coal shipped into certain areas in the country to enable it to compete mostly with importations from the United States. The commissioner proposes these subventions be abandoned and in place thereof that a subsidy of 30 cents a ton be given to the companies which would be of far less benefit than the subventions.
> Right at the moment Western Dominion coal mines sells about 400,000 tons to a paper industry in Ontario and the competition is very keen and it has only been by cutting the price to the minimum and by the help of subventions that this market has been held and if the subventions are taken away, it means a loss of 400,000 tons to this one mine.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys if he would give very serious consideration to these representations from the Great West Coal Company which affect this industry.

Mr. Kindt: During the past day and a half, Mr. Chairman, we have heard a lot of discussion on the subject of coal. About 95 per cent of this discussion has been related to Cape Breton and eastern Canada. I rise now to say a few words about western Canada and the particular problems associated with the coal industry in the Crowsnest pass area.

For the purpose of orienting hon. members, let me say that there is about 7 per cent of the world's supply of coal in western Canada. A large proportion of that coal is located in the Macleod constituency. We have the bituminous type, the lignite type, the metallurgical type, and so on. We are shipping about 650,000 tons to Japan yearly. According to reports from the Japanese who are, I might say, very critical and who have the world to pick from, our coal from the Crowsnest pass is tops for steel production. They say it is superior in terms of B.T.U.'s, ash content and many other qualities to any coal coming from other parts of the world. Hence when I rise this afternoon to speak about the coal industry of the west, I am not speaking because I have nothing to talk about; I am speaking because there is a problem there. It is one which is as acute as that in Nova Scotia. I am also speaking to you because the Crowsnest pass of western Canada may be called the Cape Breton of western Canada. I do not mean to say that we have not been doing anything about the matter. That is far from being the situation. This government has initiated a policy of shipping coal to Japan. As I said before, some 650,000 tons are under contract for shipment to Japan this year.

Let me turn to some of the statements made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate concerning his Liberal policies with respect to coal. What the hon. member said may apply to other areas; I have no information in that regard. However, I can speak from the bottom of my heart and with full knowledge about what has taken place in the Crowsnest pass. As the minister has already said, at one time 3,500,000 tons of coal were produced in the Crowsnest pass for the use of railroad locomotives. That production has now dwindled down, if I heard this figure correctly, to some 200 tons; in other words there is no further market. These railroads are all dieselized. It stands to reason that, with the shrinkage of the output down to next to nothing with the exception of a small quantity for domestic use there has been a dwindling of the markets for coal mined in the Crowsnest pass to practically nothing.

These miners who have spent their lives digging coal, have built their homes in the Crowsnest pass, have spent their lives in that area and have reared their families there are left high and dry, stranded and without anything to do. The former government allowed mines to close one after another in that area. The Hillcrest mine closed as did the mines in British Columbia, some of them at Fernie. Mine after mine closed down until only three remained open when this government came into office. If the policy of the Liberals was such as to keep mines operating and to give miners employment, why did they not do something about the situation? They did nothing. They left it to this government. May I say it was myself who recommended to the present government that the Japanese market should be opened for western Canadian coal. That recommendation was heeded and the Japanese market opened by subsidy for our coal. As I have already said, some 650,000 tons are being shipped annually to Japan. That amount of 650,000 tons is doing a tremendous job in helping the miners of the Crowsnest pass. However, there are always problems that one has to contend with.

One of the problems we have encountered within the past three or four months is the failure of the West Canadian Collieries at Blairmore to take any further Japanese coal orders. The coal mining operators in British Columbia have gone back in and have taken orders from Japan for some 300,000 tons of coal. At Michel everything is fine, times are good, the mines are operating and the people are happy. They are all employed in that particular area. Coming back down to Coleman, we find that they have taken coal orders for 170,000 tons from Japan. They too, are now in a very fortunate position and are operating in such a manner as to give maximum employment. However, at Blairmore and Bellevue it was found by the company operating there that it was unable to cover the costs and allow a sufficient profit. In addition, other factors came into the picture and made it such that no additional orders were taken this year from Japan.

By way of further explanation for those who are less familiar with the subject, allow me to say that operators in the coal mining business, like operators in any other field, have different costs of production. The company in British Columbia operates at a certain level, the one at Coleman operates at another level, and West Canadian Collieries at Blairmore operates at still another level. If employment was to be given in each of those areas, the dominion coal board had to give consideration to the costs of production in each of those three mines and the coal subsidy was set accordingly. If they had taken an average of the cost of each of those three mines, the high cost operator would have been eliminated, and there would have been no employment and no orders taken from Japan by one mine at the time when the subsidy was first initiated. But this was not done. The subsidy was set high enough to cover the cost of the highest cost operator.

However, that operator has found that it can no longer take coal orders from Japan and make a profit on the transactions. As a consequence some 350 miners have been unemployed since December in the Blairmore and Bellevue areas. Whenever there is that number of miners thrown out of work, a difficult situation arises. May I say that, as far as I am able to determine, those mines are closed and there is no prospect of their reopening in the foreseeable future. I have talked with one of the officials of that mine, and as a matter of fact he told me that if he was a worker for that company he would take any job that came along. Therefore, when I met all of the unemployed at Blairmore back during the first week of April I was careful to point this fact out to them. To help correct this situation I went to the president of some 10 companies that are now building that $20 million plant west of Coleman and also companies laying pipe lines for the export of gas, and I asked them to give priority to the miners who have been thrown out of work through the closing of the mines at Blairmore and Bellevue. I received very fine co-operation but I find also that most of those companies which are building the pipe line bring their employees in from the outside and that the local people are not getting the jobs. I should like to read part of a letter I have received from the town of Blairmore with regard to this matter.

> The council also wish to draw to your attention the fact that very few of the local unemployed persons are being hired by the pipe line construction company or the gas plant construction company and it was understood by the council that the hiring of local labour would be one of the first considerations of these companies, but this does not seem to be the case. Could this matter be brought to the attention of these companies and placement authorities through your office?

I have brought this matter to the attention of the Department of Labour. I have asked that job requirements in the Pincher Creek area be referred to the Blairmore office so that the unemployed in the Crowsnest pass will receive priority with respect to the jobs that become available.

South of Pincher Creek a $20 million Shell plant will be constructed this summer and a railway line 10.8 miles long is to be built leading to the plant. Then there is the $20 million British American Oil Company plant. I might add for the information of hon. members that from this very area south of Pincher Creek comes a large percentage of the gas that warms the homes of Ontario. The new petrochemical industries are constructing plants in that area for the purpose of separating the gas, separating sour gas, separating methane, which will be transported through pipes to eastern Canada and also exported to the United States. I hope that the Minister of Labour will give every possible consideration to the question of employment in the Crowsnest pass area.

I want to say a few more words about the coal industry. Yesterday the minister said that the shipment of coal to Japan was an experiment. To be sure, we all recognize that it is an experiment in that $4.50 per ton by way of subsidy is being paid to move the coal. As he told us, work is being undertaken to reduce the mining costs, transportation charges and the loading charges at the bulk loading facilities at Vancouver. All of these attempts to lower the subsidy are very commendable. If it were possible to decrease it to $2.50 a ton I would have every confidence that it would put the coal industry in the Crowsnest pass area on a sound and economic basis in relation to the Japanese market. That is what we want. That is the objective toward which we should be working. These are the points that the coal board and other people who are studying these matters should bring to the attention of all concerned and all should work towards making it economically possible to ship coal to supply the Japanese market.

I know that at the end of April there were some 750 to 800 people still unemployed in the Crowsnest pass area. That is why I am so concerned that, with respect to jobs available in my constituency, the first chance should be given to the people of the Crowsnest pass area. There were three mines operating in that area but the number has now dwindled to two. I hope above all that the minister in his wisdom and the coal board in its wisdom will look with favour upon the continuation of the present subsidy in order to maintain the movement of coal to the Japanese market.

I should like to say a word or two about the Rand report. We in western Canada want nothing whatever to do with that report. I make that flat statement. There is not a thing in it that is of any value to us. So far as we are concerned, you can take it and throw it in the nearest garbage can and you would be applauded by us for doing so. Whoever wrote the report knew nothing of the coal industry in the west and I say without fear of contradiction that he certainly knew nothing about the coal industry in my area.

So far as the dominion coal board is concerned, I understand that the board is going through a period of reorganization and that certain changes will be made because of the retirement of some of the officials. At this time I should like to join the minister in complimenting the late Mr. Uren, the former chairman of the board, and also Mr. O'Brian who has spent much of his life as a civil servant in the service of the board. These two fine gentlemen are to be highly complimented and they deserve the thanks and appreciation of all members of the house regardless of political affiliation. In the reorganization of the board and replacement of officials, I hope the time has come when western Canada will have at least 50 per cent of the representation. The chairman of the board should be from western Canada. He has always been from the east and the reason for that is that more vocal people, like the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, are always talking about the eastern situation. There are only myself, the hon. member for Bow River and one or two others that stand up and speak for the coal industry of western Canada. Yet we have far more coal in the west than there is in the east.

I am saying that the coal in the west is going to be developed some day and we want proper guidance in its development. We want proper consideration by the coal board given in respect of that guidance. When consideration is being given to the development of our natural resources—coal being one of the most important sources of energy—we want proper consideration given to western Canada. Let there be no mistake about it. As the member for MacLeod I shall not remain silent if that consideration is not given to western Canada.

Finally, I wish to compliment the minister and the government. In my view the government has done more for the coal industry in the three years it has been in office than the former government did during all the time it was in office. So far as the west is concerned, and my remarks in this regard apply only to the west, the Liberals did nothing in the Crowsnest pass area. As I have already indicated, they simply let one mine after another close and left the miners to sink or swim. As a result there is now a cankerous problem in that area so far as labour is concerned. I have made certain suggestions to the department and I know that every effort will be made to try to solve the problem. I want to thank the minister and the government for the efforts they are making, and if there is any way I can assist to improve the position of the coal industry of the west I shall always be ready to do so.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Kindt: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Herridge: If I heard the hon. member correctly, he referred to the late Mr. Uren. Are we to understand that Mr. Uren has passed away?

Mr. Kindt: I understand he has retired.

Mr. Herridge: You used the phrase "the late Mr. Uren".

Mr. Kindt: I am sorry. I intended to say the former chairman of the coal board.

Mr. MacInnis: There are two sides to every coin. Last evening I presented one side and I should like, this afternoon, to give the committee a picture of the other side. Before doing so I wish to refer to some of the observations made by members of the opposition. I do not for a moment think that anything I have to say this afternoon can be very beneficial to the miners of Cape Breton, and certainly not to the colliery where I used to work, which was closed on Wednesday. However, it surprised me that such a great interest has been aroused among opposition members, who in the past, when representations have been made here by delegations and committees coming from the areas concerned, have, whether Liberal or C.C.F., never shown any concern about these meetings and never attended any of these conferences. Indeed, I gave the hon. member for Gloucester, the last time I spoke in this chamber, what amounted to a formal invitation to attend one of these meetings, an invitation which he saw fit to by-pass. In spite of this lack of concern in the past, the members on the other side have suddenly developed a great interest in the plight of the coal miners.

Yesterday the hon. member for Timiskaming found it necessary to make representations on behalf of Elliot Lake. I am sure he must have ingratiated himself with the Leader of the Opposition by doing so although not intentionally, because that hon. gentleman, who represents the town in question, has failed to say one word on the subject during this discussion on the estimates of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. The hon. member for Timiskaming said he did not think political football should be played in the situation which now exists with respect to mines. I have long ago given up any idea that I could go on a public platform anywhere without becoming involved in politics on this question. The hon. member's reference to this subject yesterday confirmed me in his belief. Indeed, I am convinced that this is the case as far as the opposition is concerned. They are making a political football out of this issue. This was clearly illustrated by the question which his own leader addressed to the Minister of National Revenue on March 21 last with regard to a meeting being held with miners' representatives from Cape Breton. The true nature and purpose of the question was revealed when the minister had to inform the hon. gentleman that the meeting with which he was apparently so concerned had taken place the day before the question was asked. That shows where the hon. gentleman's interest lay; he did not even know that the meeting had already taken place.

It is usual when a member refers to another member who is absent from the chamber to say he is sorry that is the case. But I am going to reverse that procedure and say I am glad the hon. member for Essex East is not in his place today, because I think that with regard to this coal board item the committee has been getting on splendidly without him. Up until a short while ago the hon. member for Essex East was trying to set himself up as a champion of the coal miner. What put a stop to these activities I do not know, unless it was a front page press release which appeared in the Montreal Gazette a few weeks ago showing that the hon. member was much interested in the stock of the Quebec Natural Gas Company. I suppose he himself realized he could no longer serve two masters.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. MacInnis: Once again we had the opportunity to hear a dissertation from the hon. member who represents Bonavista-Twillingate. Apparently the hon. member for Gloucester has been relegated; he is no longer the official government spokesman on this subject of coal because the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has taken up three times as much time as he has been allowed. I should like to make a few observations with respect to what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said. First, I should like to call attention to something which was said by the hon. member last night as reported at page 5745 of Hansard. He said:

> I agree with the hon. member in protesting against the conduct of the government and its disrespect of parliament in that regard.

Here he was speaking of the so-called Vissac report. The Vissac report, as I indicated to the committee yesterday, was a report which, according to a letter I received from the then chairman of the coal board, was a report within the confines of the coal board itself. Never at any time was the government aware that this was the product of an arrangement made by the coal board in trying to set down its views on the Rand commission report. I might say that it is more or less a criticism of the Rand report. In the Vissac report there are many criticisms which I myself have made concerning this Rand report. The hon. member representing Bonavista-Twillingate has either misunderstood what I have said or else he is misquoting me when he suggests that the government is in any way associated with the so-called Vissac report. It was supposed to be a confidential document within the confines of the coal board. At no time was it supposed to be released outside, and I have a letter to that effect from the chairman of the board. If the report was circulated—and it certainly was circulated according to the information received from union executive officials as early as last November—then, as I indicated yesterday, the members of the executive were sitting on it, not I. If the report could be of benefit to meeting the situation in Nova Scotia, why did the executive not use it to that end?

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate indicated a certain date and then stated that coal production had been continuously on the decline since. I take no pride in bringing this to the attention of the committee, but I wish to point out the inconsistency of the hon. member by drawing attention to the fact that coal production in 1960 in Nova Scotia exceeded that of 1959. This in itself is enough to indicate that the hon. member was wrong in his observations with respect to this question. The hon. member was also wrong in applying that observation to New Brunswick where there has been a similar increase. The amount of the increase is not one which justifies continued operation of the coal mines; nevertheless it shows that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was wrong once again.

I do not intend to pursue the argument about what Liberal policy was prior to the election of 1957. I would only point out that if the policy was such as the hon. member indicated, he and his supporters should have got together before they went into Nova Scotia and then, possibly, the cabinet minister who was threatened with a ride on the rail out of a certain town in Nova Scotia might have brought himself into line with the suggestions made this afternoon from the other side of the house.

The hon. member took me to task for one of the observations I made yesterday. I asked him if he supported the attitude being taken by the united mine worker's executive officers. He disclaimed any credit and suggested that I myself had never put forward any kind of worth while suggestions. Then he went on to make the very suggestion which I had placed before the government several months ago. It appears under my name on the order paper as of March 20 of this year. Yet not content with claiming I have offered no solution the hon. member goes on to outline the very solution which I put forward with respect to the coal mining areas of Nova Scotia. The hon. member has claimed that I offered no solution, yet he uses the very solution to the problem affecting the coal mines of Nova Sotia, and has left the impression that this is an original idea. He has not said that he did say it originally, nor did he lay claim to it being original, but that was the impression he left with this committee.

Regarding the possibilities of a solution to the problem, and at the outset I inform hon. members that it is not my original idea, but was contained in a report regarding the activities of the coal industries of the United States, I suggest that the international leader of my own union has seen fit to promote the idea of coal by wire, in respect of electrical heating for homes, and has committed his support to the extent of $250,000 for the promotion of this scheme conceived of by the electrical contractors' association of the United States.

I suggest there is a great potential in this regard for the coal industry. In order to promote this scheme it will, of course, be necessary to reduce the cost of power greatly. I have been informed that there are at least 10,000 homes in the province of Quebec which are heated electrically. When we are considering the superiority of coal as a fuel, as compared with oil and natural gas, I suggest in respect to this scheme of coal by wire, coal is much superior to the other types of fuel.

I understand this scheme of providing domestic heat through the use of coal as a fuel has been considered seriously in the province of Ontario, and that there is a great potential in this field for the coal industry. The adoption of such a scheme, of course, will not alleviate the situation which exists in Nova Scotia today. However, it will do much to alleviate the problems of the coal industry in the future.

Mr. Chairman, I should like at this point to make representations regarding the policies of the coal company itself. I should also like to refer to statements made during the last coal conference here in Ottawa, as referred to by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I have reference, of course, to the statement made by the Minister of Labour, to that conference, that the government would pick up the tab. I suggest the hon. member has tried to leave the impression with this committee that the Minister of Labour has reneged in this regard. That is not the case at all. Up until this time the only formula the government has found, in an attempt to assist the coal industry, involves subventions. There is no other formula which could be adopted, and which would be workable in providing this assistance.

The government has offered this type of assistance to the coal industry, but the coal company, as a result of its own policies, has indicated it will have no part of this assistance. In this regard, I should like to refer to the meeting held in December of last year, at which time it was indicated, by representatives of the coal company, that the Caledonia colliery was to be closed on January 14. That meeting was attended, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said, by representatives from Cape Breton, including civic leaders, union leaders, the provincial premier, and representatives from the clergy and municipalities.

At that time the company took the stand that it was not interested in federal aid which the government offered to provide. It was very adamant in its rejection of government aid offered to avert the closing of the Caledonia colliery. I intend at this stage to refer to a statement, which is fully substantiated by remarks made by union leaders from Cape Breton, to the effect that if it had not been for the efforts of the Minister of Labour, the Caledonia colliery closure should not have been postponed from January 14 until Wednesday last. The Minister of Labour brought about the extension of the deadline set for the closing of that mine, and has been properly given credit by union leaders for his efforts in that regard.

I deplore the attitude on the part of the company in refusing to accept federal aid. I have made certain statements regarding union leadership; however, I do not think I can appropriately express here today my abhorrence of that company's policies.

First of all, we must consider the remarks made by Mr. Albert Fairley, the president of the company, during the December conference, to the effect that the Caledonia colliery was being closed because it was an uneconomical operation. I should like to state at this time that I protested those remarks, and Mr. Fairley then denied having made them. Whether or not I now receive any support from any quarter, I am willing to swear an affidavit in this committee, or outside, to the effect that Albert Fairley said he was closing the Caledonia colliery because it was uneconomical. His statement in that regard is absolutely incorrect. I might state that when I protested his remarks I did not receive any support whatever from the executive officers of the U.M.W. Mr. Fairley can be proved wrong in that statement by his own statements made at an earlier conference, when he said that the Caledonia colliery was one of the topmost collieries in an economical sense. Mr. Fairley denied having made the statement regarding economics at all. As a result of criticism appearing in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of the company's policy, the company, as late as December 30, 1960, or January 30, 1961, decided to answer the criticism, and once again put a statement on record to the effect that the colliery was being closed because it was uneconomical. I repeat, that is an absolutely false statement.

On another occasion the company made the suggestion that the quality of the coal from the Caledonia mine was not sufficiently high as to warrant its mining. This is a ridiculous statement because the coal now coming from that mine is similar in quality to the coal from the same mine which has been used for years. I should like to suggest that coal some 50 or 60 years old is being dragged from the bottom of the Atlantic and sold to thermal plants. I suggest the coal from the Caledonia colliery is much superior to that coal.

I should also like to refer to a stand taken by Mr. Gordon, the general manager, expressed by his statement in 1947, that the coal operation of that company must stand or fall on its own. My understanding of that view is that he felt the coal operation must be considered by itself, and not as a part of the whole company's operation. As a result of that viewpoint, officials of that company have come to Ottawa in recent years seeking federal aid in respect of the coal industry. In this regard, I wonder whether the company would be able to substantiate each individual operation by itself, and not as a part of the total operation? I suggest if the lucrative federal contracts, provided by this government were withdrawn, many other operations would become uneconomical. I do not intend to take anything away from industries, such as the Halifax Shipyards, in this regard, which enjoys contracts to the extent of some $30 million, but suggest that these industries are dependent upon federal government contracts to a very great extent. I also suggest in regard to these contracts, that the government should have an official acting as a co-ordinator, looking after the interests of the rank and file of these industries, who should see that the industry carries out its policy regarding these contracts in a manner that is in the best interests of the public generally.

I would go further and suggest to the minister that not only should this apply to a company like Avro, which came in here with very little finances of their own and have taken over one of the largest industrial empires in this country, but a co-ordinator such as this could very well serve this country if this policy were applied to every foreign company in Canada to ensure that Canadian interests would best be served. I do not see how they would in any way interfere with these companies, but they would at least protect Canadian interests in connection with foreign companies operating in Canada and their policies. I submit that the Canadian interest must be served in connection with companies like Avro and I suggest that all foreign companies should be considered in the same category.

My first experience with Dosco, or Avro, came shortly after Avro had taken over Dosco and they made their first approach to Ottawa for federal assistance. At that time they had a Mr. A. C. McDonald. My first recollection of Mr. A. C. McDonald is when he went into the town of Glace Bay and promised that there would be no cut-backs in the mine's operations. This same Mr. McDonald was hardly out of town when these cut-backs started to take place. This same Mr. A. C. McDonald came to Ottawa, as I say, in connection with the first submission this company made to this government. He was not here very long before it was pointed out clearly to him that some of the representations he was making at the time were absolutely out of line with the facts. Mr. McDonald was then required to go back to Montreal and redraft the submissions they were trying to put before this government.

That was the last time this government or anybody around Ottawa saw Mr. A. C. McDonald to my knowledge. Apparently the company, which up until that time considered him a brilliant man in the field of figures and facts concerning the operations of this company, decided that he had made two mistakes in coming to Ottawa. He made his first and his last mistake in coming to Ottawa and because of the representations, such as they were, we have seen no more of Mr. McDonald.

This company was coming to the government for assistance. As I say, the only formula that could possibly be worked out to further the interests of the Nova Scotia mines was that formula based on subvention payments. The Minister of Labour did not in any way contradict the facts, as they were brought out at the last coal conference, in his answer to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

This company has adopted the policy that coal must stand on its own, but I would remind every hon. member of this committee that if the same policy were applied throughout, this company could not stand on its own for ten minutes because they depend almost entirely on very lucrative federal contracts to carry on operations.

I do not ask the federal government to interfere with that policy. They cannot interfere with the policy of the company. The best the federal government can do is offer assistance, which they have done and which was flatly turned down. This statement can be very easily substantiated by reference to the remarks of the union leaders, who indicated to the rank and file that the government's offer to the company was absolutely refused; that the company flatly refused to go along with it.

They refused in the December coal conference to say anything in respect of continued operations of No. 4 colliery. Yet through the efforts of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, the Minister of National Revenue and certainly the Minister of Labour they were more or less forced into the position where operation of the No. 4 colliery was carried on until Wednesday last.

This government has consistently tried to do something for this company so that they may continue the operations of this mine, but the government cannot dictate policy to the company any more than a local government of any municipality in this country can go downtown and tell a merchant who wants to close his business, "You cannot close your business; you will have to keep operating". This government is not going to dictate company policy, but I want it clearly understood that every possible effort in regard to financing was made by the government. However, as early as last December the company refused to consider financial assistance to keep Caledonia operating, and once again that assistance has been flatly refused.

A remark was made by the hon. member, and considering his profession I find it difficult to understand why he would make such a remark. He said that the company was dictating to the government. I asked the hon. member to clarify and substantiate this remark but neither he nor any other hon. member can substantiate the allegation that this government has been dictated to by anybody.

At the same time, it would not be fair for this government to turn around and order this colliery to continue operations. They can do no more than offer financial assistance and, because of company policy, the company flatly refused to accept it.

Mention has been made of Polymer corporation. In the past I have made efforts to secure this market, and I will continue these efforts because now the fight to continue the operations of No. 16 starts today. Between now and the time that No. 16 is scheduled to close there must be action taken in respect to the approach to coal and the policy this company has adopted.

Their sales policy is such that I cannot say anything about it here today. There is no such thing as a sales policy in this company. They have allowed themselves to be pushed out of the local market. People in my home town and myself, living within 300 yards of the coal depot, have had a hard time getting the coal we require for our own homes; and this experience is prevalent throughout the province.

They must in some way bring about a correction of their own sales policy regarding coal. They must initiate action in this regard that will protect their own markets, and do something in respect to the domestic market which is fast falling away from them.

With regard to markets other than domestic I would once again make reference to this problem in relation to the situation we face concerning Quebec Natural Gas. Again I am very glad to see that the hon. member for Essex East has not been contributing to the cause of the coal miners in Cape Breton, because he has finally made up his mind that he cannot serve two masters. I am very happy about that and I am sure the coal miners in Cape Breton are also happy about it, because we cannot stomach this kind of representation.

What has happened with Quebec Natural Gas in respect to coal? They have come forward and offered on a number of occasions firm contracts for a period of five years to coal customers. They have offered contracts for seven years, nine years and they finally reached the stage where they were offering 12 year firm contracts to industrial users of natural gas. As the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond mentioned, they are offering natural gas at prices far below cost.

It is in this situation we feel there should be some sort of federal legislation to prevent this action, because while they are offering this natural gas at these prices it is undermining the industrial coal market. Natural gas is offered at below cost and with a 12 year firm contract. It is a most ridiculous situation because the same company is appearing before the Quebec utilities board and is asking for an increase in domestic rates. They were broke; they were in a very bad financial position, and being in such a position I think there should be some sort of legislation which would prevent them undermining other fuels on the industrial market when at the same time they are asking for higher rates from domestic consumers.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said this government has done nothing in this respect. This government very recently announced assistance in this regard, and once again this caught the opposition members napping. They did not even realize that this announcement regarding the coal situation was separate and apart from any other policy.

I refer to the announcement of assistance in the amount of $1,500,000 annually to provide alternative employment for the miners in the Cape Breton area. The opposition members thought this was another political move and they made representations to this effect; they thought this would only prolong the situation. They did not have the interest or knowledge to realize what the situation was. They just made this a political football. I do not object to that; I will kick a football around with the best of them.

In respect to this $1,500,000 I should like to offer a few suggestions. It is my hope that this $1,500,000 will be used in a way which will in no way affect the everyday or ordinary expenditures of the different departments to carry on what might be considered federal projects. It is my hope that this type of fund will be set aside to be used exclusively for the purpose of establishing other industries and providing more permanent work than would be provided by ordinary federal projects.

I do not wish to take away from the importance of the recommendations of the Rand commission. They recommended the spending of $1,500,000 on the fortress of Louisbourg over a period of 15 to 20 years. Nevertheless I feel quite strongly that any federal money spent on the fortress of Louisbourg should be spent on the merits of that fortress as a most important historical site in the country. I feel that the money necessary for the reconstruction of this fortress should be appropriated through regular channels and should not be related in any way to the special amount which has been set aside by the federal government.

I would go further, Mr. Chairman, and suggest that it might be a good idea to have this sum of $1.5 million set aside annually for such special projects. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has implied that the federal government has set aside money without knowing what to do with it. After all, it is partly the responsibility of the provincial and municipal authorities to bring forward projects which would qualify for funds from this amount. I would suggest that it might be cheaper in the long run were the government to set up a much larger fund for the purpose of enticing industries into this area. The fund would be called upon to help them get started. A fund of this kind, if it were provided annually, would be, from a political point of view, very difficult to discontinue. I would very respectfully suggest that the government should take a second look at the amount that has been set aside because as I see the situation in Cape Breton and Nova Scotia generally, it is going to require $1,500,000 to be spent on an annual basis over a number of years.

Perhaps a revolving fund could be set up from which new industries could borrow at a very low rate of interest, and then eventually repay the fund. A fund of from $25 million to $50 million could be set up for this purpose. Then, too, in addition to the vocational training and trade schools in Cape Breton, the government might take a look at the possibility of extending assistance to the academic field. In this way, many young people could be kept off the labour market and at the same time given training in some of the professions, as teachers, dentists and so forth, of whom there is a shortage. This course of action would serve the dual purpose of keeping these young people off the labour market and at the same time providing the country with teachers and other professional people.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Robichaud: Before the minister replies I wish he would consider certain statements which have been made by both the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond and the hon. member for Cape Breton South. When the minister made his announcement on Tuesday, May 30, with regard to the continuation of subventions for Cape Breton coal, he had this to say and I quote from page 5567 of Hansard:

> The government considered, however, that as miners are displaced from employment with the corporation this season, other special steps should be taken at this time to assist in the provision of alternative employment. Parliament will therefore be asked to provide an amount of $1.5 million which will be set aside for approved projects to provide alternative employment this year in the Cape Breton area.

Now, both members have stated, and have repeated, that this amount would be set aside annually. I wish the minister could tell the committee whether or not this statement is accurate.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall vote 229 carry?

Mr. Robichaud: No, Mr. Chairman, the minister should reply.

Mr. Comtois: I am sorry, but would the hon. member repeat his question because I was talking to the men in front of me.

Mr. Robichaud: The minister is aware, if he has listened to the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond and the hon. member for Cape Breton South, that both members have stated the amount of $1.5 million will be set aside annually to provide employment on approved projects in this area. The way in which the minister's announcement reads in Hansard, this amount was set aside for this year.

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Chairman, the fact is that it is $1.5 million for this year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Only.

Mr. Comtois: I did not say "only". I said for this year. Do not go adding other words.

Mr. Robichaud: At no time has the minister stated this amount would be set aside annually?

Mr. Comtois: No.

Mr. Robichaud: I think the minister should answer the definite questions I asked of him yesterday before we allow this item to pass.

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Chairman, there are a few questions that were raised by the hon. member for Gloucester. I have taken some notes on them.

The hon. member asked for information on the number of men employed and the number of days worked per year in the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick mines over the last 10 years. These figures are taken from the dominion bureau of statistics and are as follows: The number of employees in Nova Scotia in 1950 was 11,712, representing 274 days' work; in New Brunswick, 1,034 employees for 257 days' work; in 1959, Nova Scotia, 7,535 employees and 214 days' work; New Brunswick, 913 employees and 272 days' work. I have the figures for the intervening years between 1950 and 1959.

Mr. Robichaud: Does the minister have the figures for 1960?

Mr. Comtois: No, the dominion bureau of statistics has not reported as yet, so I do not have them. I would certainly have produced them if I could have obtained them.

Mr. Robichaud: Perhaps if the minister finds the report too long, he could give the number of employees only year after year, leaving the man hours aside.

Mr. Comtois: Just the number of employees?

Mr. Robichaud: The number of employees.

Mr. Comtois: This is the number, and I am speaking of Nova Scotia:

1957	9,181
1958	8,892
1959	7,535

In New Brunswick:

1951	866
1952	900
1953	919
1954	916
1955	901
1956	949
1957	909
1958	781

Is the hon. member satisfied with these figures?

Mr. Robichaud: Yes.

Mr. Comtois: The hon. member also asked the following question. What is the reason why there may be an increase in metallurgical coal? It appears reasonable to assume that the steel industry in Canada will continue to expand with increasing population and demand for goods. That is the normal forecast. Another question he asked was this. What proportion of this increase will be supplied by mines in the maritime provinces? It is not expected that there will be any substantial increase in the supply of maritime coal. The amount of coal produced in Nova Scotia for this purpose is very limited and New Brunswick coal is not suitable because of high sulphur content.

The hon. member for Gloucester also asked for information on the imports of heavy fuel oil in the eastern provinces. The dominion bureau of statistics reported as follows:

Imports of Heavy Fuel Oil into the Maritime Provinces

1958	732,400 barrels

The hon. member also asked about the changes in production in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick between 1950 and 1959. The production in these years has been as follows: Nova Scotia 1950, 6,478,000 tons; 1959, 4,391,000 tons. In New Brunswick, for 1950, 607,000 tons; in 1959, 1,003,000 tons. These figures represent a decrease of some 33 per cent in Nova Scotia and an increase of some 65 per cent in New Brunswick. I think those are the figures for which the hon. member asked. Is he satisfied?

Mr. Robichaud: I wish to thank the minister for these figures which I was anxious to have on the record. I will not elaborate on the figures which have been given by the minister. However, I will bring to the attention of the committee the fact that in Nova Scotia alone the number of employees in the coal mines decreased by 700 during the last seven years of the previous administration while it went down by 1,600 during the first two years of the present administration. I hope the hon. member for Cape Breton South will not say that I am again trying to misinform the committee as he did last night when I quoted the figures from the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. MacInnis: Perhaps the hon. member would like the figures of the united mine workers which show that between 1946 and 1956 there was a decline of 5,000 at that time and that the mine workers, district number 26, did not get work as implied by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Item agreed to.

230. Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council, $13,244,900.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister on May 30 said that this $1,500,000 which he has now told us is for one year only is for approved projects to provide alternative employment. Will the minister tell us who is going to approve those projects and who is going to recommend them?

Mr. Comtois: I presume and I am quite sure that the decision upon that subject will be taken as arranged between the federal government and the provincial government. They will have to meet together and work jointly on such projects.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this to be a joint decision? The minister said that parliament was going to be asked to provide this money. In his statement on May 30 he did not say anything about the government of Nova Scotia having anything to do with it. Surely, in this national emergency this government can do something on its own.

Mr. Comtois: Yes, that can be the case but we do not know right now. It depends on the arrangement that will be made eventually with the government in question. These matters will be settled and the house will be informed when we come to some agreement with the provincial government in Nova Scotia. As I said the other day, a statement will be made at that time so that the house will be fully informed of the agreement we have come to on those projects that will be approved jointly with the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, although Caledonia mine closed two days ago, the government still has no project at all on which to spend this $1,500,000?

Mr. Comtois: I would not say that, I cannot agree with that statement. There are some projects that are actually being studied and very serious projects which cannot be explained right now or upon which no statement can be made because they are not completed. Many efficient people are working on them, including technicians. As soon as we can inform the house, I will do so or some member of the government will make an announcement as I told the house the other day.

Mr. Pickersgill: In other words, after 15 months of knowledge that this mine was going to close, the government has allowed the mine to close without having a single project for alternative employment. That is what the minister is saying.

Mr. Comtois: I would not say that. I will not let the matter pass like that. Probably the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate refers to the Rand report—

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I am talking about your $1,500,000. What are you going to spend it on?

Mr. Comtois: You will be informed in due course, as soon as a statement can be made on the matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the whole point. These people were thrown out of work two days ago and the minister says "in due course" he is going to tell us what he is going to spend this money on. After 15 months they have not got one single project. The minister says he will not accept my statement. Let him name the project if they have got one. I am sure that if the government had a project they could name they would name it, but they have not.

Mr. Comtois: The $1.5 million will have to be voted in the supplementary estimates. At that time the hon. member will be allowed—

Mr. Denis: It is a blank cheque.

Mr. Comtois: No, it will be in the supplementary estimates. This vote is for the regular subsidies. The amount of $1.5 million is not mentioned in this vote. It will be included in the supplementary estimates. Perhaps the hon. member just wants to have the final word. I will let him have it if he wants it, but the truth is that the $1.5 million will be asked for in a vote and at that time he will be able to put every question he wants to put. The item in question concerns only the regular estimates of the dominion coal board.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am well aware of that—

Mr. Comtois: I knew you were.

Mr. Pickersgill: —but the minister made this announcement on May 30, the day before the mine closed, and offered some hope of alternative work to these miners who are being thrown out of work. He says to them that $1.5 million will be spent. He also tells us now that after 15 months the government has not got a single idea as to how this money should be used and that some day, if this session goes on until Christmas, he may bring in a supplementary estimate. In the meantime these men who have no jobs can just wait, hope and pray that the government will provide something.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, in order that we will have this matter straight, can the minister assure the house that the $1.5 million will be provided from the federal treasury and that the provinces, especially the province of Nova Scotia, will not have to share in such projects?

Mr. MacInnis: The province of Nova Scotia wants to share.

Mr. Denis: You are not the minister and you never will be.

Mr. Comtois: I will have to check the statement. I believe the full amount will be paid by the federal government but arrangements might be made with the provincial government as to administration and so on. I think that administration would represent the contribution of the provincial government in that regard. The statement is very clear. It would seem these two members are fighting to have the last word. Who is going to have the last word, Bonavista-Twillingate or Gloucester?

Mr. Robichaud: I want to make it clear to the minister that we want this matter set straight. In the first place, two members from Nova Scotia have stated that this amount is to be voted annually.

Mr. Comtois: There is no reference to it being voted annually here and I never mentioned that. In my statement on May 30, as found on page 5567 of Hansard, I said:

> Parliament will therefore be asked to provide an amount of $1.5 million which will be set aside for approved projects to provide alternative employment this year in the Cape Breton area.

Mr. Pickersgill: This year only.

Mr. Comtois: I did not say "only". I insist on that. This is the third time that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said that. As the last word, does he want me to say "only"?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I think you should take the help that the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond is offering you and say that you will do it annually.

Mr. Comtois: I hope it will be annually but right now it is $1.5 million for this year.

Item agreed to.

231. Subventions in respect of eastern coal under agreements entered into pursuant to the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act, $1,700,000.

Mr. Robichaud: Can the minister tell the house what amounts were paid last year to the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick under this item?

Mr. Comtois: Payments to the New Brunswick electric power commission to date under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act amount to $593,623.04 and in the case of the Nova Scotia power commission the amount is $1,102,792.47. That is the final amount.

Mr. Pickersgill: For last year.

Mr. Comtois: As of April 30, 1961.

Mr. Robichaud: Can the minister inform the committee whether any payments have been made to any other public utilities in addition to the New Brunswick power commission?

Mr. Comtois: No, it is all paid to them by mutual agreement.

Mr. Robichaud: To the power commissions of the respective provinces?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): That completes the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. We will now turn to the estimates of the Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Office of the chief electoral officer—

46. Salaries and expenses of office, $83,685.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the first matter I should like to touch on in relation to this vote is a very up-to-date news story in the Toronto Star today, Friday, June 2. It is headed, "No Issues, No Election this Year". It reads as follows:

> The national president of the Progressive Conservative party declared firmly last night there would be no general election this year. Senator Gunnar Thorvaldson, Prime Minister Diefenbaker's closest political associate, told the Star that only a major issue for which the Prime Minister felt he needed a mandate from the people might force an election. "I see no such issue on the horizon", he said.

Mr. Brunsden: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, is the hon. member in order in quoting from today's issue of the Star with respect to elections? I submit that we are discussing the estimates of the Secretary of State, and may I respectfully suggest that the hon. member is out of order.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): It is very difficult for the Chair to decide whether or not the hon. member for Port Arthur is in order until he has progressed to the point he is trying to make.

Mr. Fisher: We are now dealing with the office of the chief electoral officer and if this is not when we can talk about elections I do not know when we can.

Mr. Pickersgill: They are going to abolish elections.

Mr. Fisher: I imagine there is always that tendency. I continue with the report:

> The Senator's statement confirms Ottawa reports that the Prime Minister is satisfied the recent Conservative by-election victories indicate widespread approval of this policy and he sees no reason to go to the polls this year. The government has completed three years of a five-year term. The latest Gallup poll, on May 31, also indicates Conservative popularity is on the rise.

For the benefit of the hon. member for Medicine Hat, here is the relevant point. If we are not going to have an election this year, then we need to do something about redistribution and how we handle redistribution. This matter comes very much under the chief electoral officer. Even though the actual task of carrying out redistribution has been performed by a parliamentary committee, the point remains that he is the adviser. He is the gentleman who provides all the information, background and history to the parliamentary committee. I have a number of questions I want to raise concerning redistribution. I must say I was stunned that Senator Thorvaldson would come out with a statement like this.

An hon. Member: You were stunned by the election results.

Mr. Fisher: No, I was not stunned by them. If the hon. member wants to know, I think that if there was an election soon the government would be returned to power. That is why I cannot understand why Senator Thorvaldson, who does not have to contest a seat in an election, should be sounding off and saying there is not going to be one. He is certainly seeming to limit the authority of the Prime Minister. The situation is, however, that we are not likely to have an election if we believe Senator Thorvaldson. As anyone knows, redistribution is based upon—

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order. I think it is important to settle this point at once. We are on an estimate with reference to the chief electoral officer under the Department of the Secretary of State. However, the chief electoral officer has nothing whatever to do with redistribution. That is not within his field. If the hon. member wishes to discuss a question of this kind he had better do it when some other motion is before this house, not on an item of this branch of the Department of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Fisher: On the point of order, I know I am correct in saying that the chief electoral officer is the adviser to the government on all matters relating to redistribution. He is the man who has the information and the background concerning the whole set up in Canada. If the minister is denying that he is called in when redistribution takes place, if he is denying that he gives advice—

Mr. Churchill: I am denying it. He is not asked to do any of those things. He is asked to supply statistical information but not to give advice to the government. The hon. member is wrong.

Mr. Fisher: I was not suggesting he gives advice as to how the redistribution was to be done. I said he advises the parliamentary committee about the background, the position and the statistics. If I am not correct about that I am completely haywire, because I have followed the topic of redistribution for a long time. To say that the issue of redistribution is not related to the functions of the chief electoral officer is almost silly. Is this not the No. 1 item at elections—

Mr. Churchill: I think this has to be settled, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Port Arthur is going to insist on discussing this subject of redistribution, and he is making statements which are entirely incorrect. The chief electoral officer does not advise the government with regard to redistribution. He is only asked to supply statistical information. Nor does he advise the parliamentary committee with regard to redistribution. I am asking, Mr. Chairman, for your consideration of this point of order. We are dealing now with the estimate relating to the chief electoral officer, a branch within the Department of the Secretary of State, and those estimates have nothing whatever to do with the question of the redistribution of constituencies.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wish to say a word on this point of order because, unlike the hon. member who raised it, I have had some experience in this field. I was once secretary of state. I belonged to a government which did not seek by constantly raising points of order to restrict debates in a committee on estimates. This seems to be a systematic policy.

Mr. Pallett: Tell us about closure.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will tell the hon. gentleman about closure, whether closure of mines or closure of debate. I did not interrupt the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and I suggest that the hon. member for Peel possess his soul in patience.

The point of order raised by the leader of the house is that redistribution in no way affects the estimates of the chief electoral officer. Nothing could be more nonsensical. If there is a redistribution before the next election there is bound to be an entire recasting of this estimate because there would be different borders between the constituencies. Expenditures of all kinds would have to be incurred. This is so obvious that one wonders why it should not be clear to anyone except, perhaps, to someone deliberately seeking to restrict debate. I suggest there is no other opportunity under our rules except that provided by the estimate of the chief electoral officer to discuss this matter which is one which must arrive in the very near future. It is going to affect the estimates now before us, and hon. members should have the right to discuss this question. After all, what is the committee of supply for? It is for the exposure of grievances before money is voted. This government seems to think that no member of the opposition should be allowed to express his views on anything, but that the money should be voted blindly. I suggest that this further attempt to restrict our freedom in committee of supply is ill advised and contrary to the rules.

Mr. Dorion: I should like to recall to the hon. member, first of all, that question of redistribution is provided for by clause 51 of the constitutional act.

Mr. Fisher: And the Representation Act.

Mr. Dorion: Yes, but the basis is clause 51 of the act I have mentioned. If hon. members would look at that clause they would see that redistribution is based on the result of the census. The responsibility for the census is that of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Secretary of State has nothing to do with that. The Secretary of State is only the channel of communication between the House of Commons and the chief electoral officer. My responsibility is only to ask, for that officer, the moneys needed for the accomplishment of this work.

Moreover, if hon. members would look at these estimates they would see that there is nothing provided in them for the expenses of elections, properly speaking. Those expenses are paid from the consolidated fund. I believe, therefore, that it is improper to discuss this point, it being one upon which I personally, or as minister, have no competence to speak.

Mr. Fisher: Might I just add this, Mr. Chairman? This is the only estimate of which I am aware, among all the estimates which the government has put forward, which relates to the electoral officer. His job is to prepare for elections, to be in charge of the whole framework of machinery. I do not know any single thing which relates more to the machinery than does redistribution. I have on the order paper a bill relating to redistribution.

Mr. Churchill: That was your opportunity, then.

Mr. Fisher: No. It is a very simple bill seeking a change in the British North America Act. I was not going to deal at all with that point. Perhaps if I could set out for you, Mr. Chairman, what I had intended to deal with, it might be helpful. I had in mind the changes which were impending and I had thought to make some suggestions which in my opinion we should be considering at the present time in order to handle the redistribution. For example, it appears at the present time as if Nova Scotia is going to lose a seat, and Saskatchewan three seats. We have discrepancies between the rural areas and the industrial areas, between the country and the city, and so on. If this does not relate to elections, I do not know what does.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, the hon. member for Port Arthur has clearly set out what his intentions are. The hon. member for Port Arthur has very clearly stated that it is his intention to have a full debate in respect of redistribution. He has already suggested that it is his idea that certain provinces will lose seats while other provinces will gain seats. That is the type of subject he wishes to discuss, and I suggest such a debate could range for days. The hon. member will have the opportunity of debating this subject during the consideration of his own bill, which is presently on the order paper, as well as opportunity of discussing the subject during a supply motion, or when a committee of this parliament is set up to consider redistribution.

I was present in this house some years ago when a committee was set up to consider redistribution, at which time opportunity was provided for a complete and thorough debate of every facet of redistribution. To attempt to discuss this subject at a time when the committee is dealing with the expenses of the chief electoral officer and his officials, in a discussion regarding the duties of that branch, I suggest is completely out of order.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two regarding this point of order.

First, I should like to ask who is responsible in respect of delimitation of the different counties when a redistribution is made? If hon. members are faced with problems as a result of a redistribution, should they present those problems to the chief electoral officer, or to parliament itself?

Mr. Churchill: To parliament.

Mr. Caron: If a redistribution has taken place, how then can individual members effect any change? Where do individual members of parliament present these problems?

Mr. Thrasher: Those problems should be presented to the committee when it is set up.

Mr. Caron: The difficulty I am suggesting is, following a redistribution, individual members of parliament can do nothing to effect a change, but must wait until a new redistribution is made to find a solution to the difficulties. There was a redistribution made in 1952, but the problems and difficulties arising as a result of that redistribution cannot now be dealt with. As a result of that situation, I should like to be informed how to go about presenting these problems, and to whom they should be presented.

An hon. Member: They should be presented to the chief electoral officer.

Mr. Caron: There has to be a certain amount of latitude allowed in regard to a redistribution, but certain difficulties then arise. I should be the first to admit that our present chief electoral officer is the only expert in this field in Canada. If we are expected to go to him to find out something about redistribution, how can we make representations to him to change the delimitation in respect of the proposed redistribution? I realize we must apply to him, but how can the errors made during the last redistribution be corrected before a new redistribution?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Would the hon. member permit a question? Surely the hon. member does not expect any change in the delimitation of his district until after the census has been completed and the change in population is known?

Mr. Caron: The specific problem I am faced with results from the fact that the city of Hull, from a representation point of view, has a good deal of territory which lies in the Gatineau area, and I am wondering how this situation will be dealt with? How am I going to be able to prepare my suggestion regarding the correcting of the present delimitation before the new redistribution is made?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, perhaps in answer to the hon. member, I could be allowed to suggest that this will have to be done by an act of parliament and, therefore, it seems to me that the results of the census presently being carried out—which will take several months—must be acquired so that a committee can be set up to consider the whole question of redistribution. All matters connected with a redistribution will have to be considered by such a committee, which will in turn report to the House of Commons, following which a bill will be introduced to give effect to the law in this regard, as it is at present.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. I think I have heard enough now to allow me to decide this point of order.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, is the hon. member worried about losing his seat?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. Is the hon. member for Medicine Hat rising on a point of order?

Mr. Brunsden: No, Mr. Chairman, I was just asking if the hon. member was worried about his seat in this house.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, the answer is no, not even if that hon. member was a candidate there.

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, I should like to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Hull, by indicating to him that the boundaries of the electoral district were set up by the Representation Act of 1952, and can only be changed by parliament itself.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): The point of order is a little difficult because, in respect of item 1 of the estimates of any department, fairly broad scope is allowed in terms of the debate. However, I cannot help but consider the fact that the chief electoral officer is an officer of parliament who follows the instructions of his minister, and whose general administrative responsibility is the administration of the Canada Elections Act. His responsibilities, by and large, are confined to that narrow sphere. Historically, the consideration, in regard to redistribution following the taking of a census, is the responsibility of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, while the financing of elections is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance. For those reasons, I feel that a discussion in respect of redistribution cannot be relevant to the consideration of the estimates now before us and, accordingly, I rule the hon. member for Port Arthur out of order and disallow any further discussion in this regard.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to quibble with your ruling, but I should like to draw the attention of this committee to the fact that on previous occasions there has been considerable discussion and debate in respect of this subject, while the electoral officer's responsibilities and estimates were before the committee.

I should also like to make reference to one or two other points regarding the chief electoral officer. I should like to ask the minister whether he is provided, by the chief electoral officer, with estimates in this regard, based on increased population estimates, provided by the dominion bureau of statistics? Does the chief electoral officer supply the minister with such estimates which are, in essence, estimates in regard to redistribution in terms of population changes?

May I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can be allowed to answer at this time. The chief electoral officer does not make any official estimates in that regard.

Mr. Fisher: He does not make official estimates?

Mr. Dorion: That is right.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): It being five o'clock, in order to permit the house to deal with public and private bills, pursuant to standing order 15 (3), it is my duty to report progress and request leave to sit again later this day, or next sitting of the house, as the case may be.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the former having precedence.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO WATER POLLUTION

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-32, to amend the Criminal Code (Nuisance).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise with very high hopes of success in speaking to this bill this afternoon because I am following in the Prime Minister's footsteps. Quite recently we were all advised to "Follow John", and in this respect I am following John.

An hon. Member: You will not go far.

Mr. Herridge: In explaining the purpose of this bill I cannot do better than read the illuminating words used by the Prime Minister when he introduced and spoke to an identical bill in this house on February 28, 1955. I quote what the Prime Minister said on that day:

> Mr. Speaker, as provincial legislation has proven ineffective to control the wanton pollution by municipalities and industrial concerns of interprovincial rivers, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Criminal Code to provide punishment for the offence of water pollution.
> This amendment is demanded by tens of thousands of people, literally hundreds of thousands in this country, who are asking for some action on the part of the federal government to protect them from the cupidity of those who, because of their power, believe they can with impunity deny the use of these waters to present and future generations.

I wholeheartedly support the words used by the Prime Minister in introducing his bill on that occasion and I think they are still very appropriate. This has been a long time problem facing the Canadian people, and owing to the intensification of our processes of industrialization it is becoming more acute from day to day. This is not just my opinion but it is recognized across this country by people who give some consideration to these problems and reflect public opinion.

I might say that the bill I am introducing is not a cure-all; it is simply a first step in the legislative field in which the federal government has some authority, as mentioned by the Prime Minister when he was in opposition. I might say it is an example in a limited field; it is a remedy, as a matter of fact, in one sector of this problem.

What are people saying about this problem of pollution? I wish to quote from a few editorials and other documents to indicate the widespread interest and not just indicate my own opinion. I quote from an editorial in the Family Herald of May 28, 1959. This is what the editor has to say about this problem. He writes very well on the problems affecting the farmers of this country and he is writing from an agriculturalist's point of view:

> Water That Carries Death.
> Civilization, advancing into the wilderness of North America, has carried with it its own peculiar paradox. Wherever it has gone, it has dumped into the streams, rivers and lakes of the continent a continually increasing load of pollution. It is well past being high time that something was done about it.
> Canada is fast approaching a situation—if we have not, in fact, already arrived at it—where there is no open water near any major inland community which is safe for either drinking or swimming. Wild life, particularly fish, are suffering seriously, and in some cases disastrously.
> The situation is serious enough in practical terms, but what shames us is to think that white men took over this continent without any sort of invitation and, having done so, have failed to assume full responsibility for the guardianship of the land and all it contained. In some respects they have done well, but not in all, and the condition of our inland water bodies and waterways is one adequate and rather revolting proof of this fact. Of course, the country looked inexhaustibly big to our forefathers and we have not outgrown that impression. We have been a long time realizing that enough people and industry is all that is required to foul up even the gigantic network of streams and rivers and lakes that mark

Canada with scenic areas as beautiful as any in the world. The truths that we have failed to realize are now confronting us, and something must be done to observe them.

I have another quotation here from the Ottawa Citizen of December 30, 1959, dealing with a conference in Chicago with respect to the pollution of waters. This article is entitled:

Hundreds of chemicals pollute drinking water.

Dr. H. W. Poston of the United States public health service's water supply and control division said at that time:

"We do not have reliable methods for predicting their effect on man. We don't know how to remove viruses from treated water. We don't know the effect on the human system of the constant accumulation of small increments of present-day chemicals".

Poston called for immediate and expanded research to find ways of assuring safe, plentiful water, in a report to the American association for the advancement of science.

Then I have a very interesting editorial from the Gazette of February 13, 1960:

Man the Great Contaminator

Man has always been a great contaminator and despoiler of the places in which he works, lives and plays.

And, according to scientists gathered in Chicago recently for the annual meeting of the American association for the advancement of science, he has not mended his ways.

One of the most important events at the Chicago meeting was a symposium by a group of biologists, engineers, conservation experts and land and water development experts on the use and abuse of the great lakes of North America.

And speaker after speaker stressed the fact that in the past 50 years or so man has succeeded in contaminating and despoiling this vast body of water—over 95,000 square miles touching eight states and two Canadian provinces—to such an extent that vast areas of it are useless and even dangerous.

And the tragedy is, they said, that there seems to be no over-all planning, no co-ordinated effort on the part of the various states and provinces and the two federal governments concerned, to stop the relentless process of erosion and contamination which is ruining one of nature's greatest gifts to her ungrateful children.

I think the writer of that editorial explained the situation very clearly indeed. I have another quotation here from the proceedings of the national conference on water pollution in British Columbia; it is a quotation from the remarks of Mr. P. A. Larkin, chief fisheries biologist, B.C. game commission. This is what he had to say:

We feel that there should come a day, if we plan properly, when it is accepted that no pollution will exist without the permission of a responsible authority and that such permission has been given in the public interest in accordance with sound principles of resource use planning...

—I have taken these excerpts from what has been said on this subject by well informed persons. Then he goes on to say:

[Mr. Herridge.]

The existing legislation consists of a number of federal and provincial statutes which are designed to serve special interests of a particular resource. As such, while they are effective to a certain degree as preventive measures, collectively they are overburdened with overlapping provisions and they are completely inadequate as instruments of achieving our objective of planned water use. They should be replaced by broad legislation which would observe the necessary dual purpose of protecting special interests where it is desirable to do so, and at the same time, assuring the general purpose of proper water use.

Then he goes on to say:

The panel has noted the trend in most advanced countries and states toward the creation of a single agency to control and abate a particular type of pollution, for instance, water pollution, in a geographical area.

That is one thing that we must develop in Canada as the result of a public understanding of this question, of research and legislative action on the part of the federal and provincial governments.

I have one more quotation, Mr. Speaker, to indicate the current and almost daily interest in this problem. This is an article written by Mr. Walter Gray, that elegant, effulgent, erudite writer on the effluvium of polluted water, in the Globe and Mail for yesterday, June 1. This is a most interesting article entitled:

A perfect example of pollution.

This Globe and Mail reporter deals with the problem generally, but he mentions Ottawa in particular in the first paragraph:

It is to the nation's shame that swirling about the foot of parliament hill, the focal point of Canada's capital, is one of the country's most highly polluted rivers. The Ottawa river, rising fresh and clear in the forest lands of northern Ontario and Quebec, surges through this city choked full of wastes left by this day and age.

In my opinion, the present polluted state of the Ottawa river results from the ignoring of this problem on national and provincial levels of government. Before I proceed, I have in my hand, Mr. Speaker, the text of a speech entitled, "Water, a Resource for Tomorrow", by the Hon. Walter Dinsdale, Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, to the Ontario conference on co-ordinated water pollution control, Toronto, November 30, 1960. I might say this is an excellent speech, and I read it with interest. I am sure the minister has a keen interest in this question. Indicating to the assembled gathering the interest of the government in this matter the minister said, and I quote from the text of his speech:

Four years ago in the House of Commons Prime Minister Diefenbaker, then a member of the opposition, spoke on water pollution. He said in part:

"I believe that in the realm of God's richest bounty, clean river water should have a high place, and ought not to be allowed to be sacrificed to private greed or wanton and wilful pollution."

This attitude was not left behind when Mr. Diefenbaker and his colleagues moved to the Speaker's right.

This is the sentence that makes me most hopeful in the introduction of this bill in the identical terms of the one introduced by the Prime Minister when he was in opposition and spoke so eloquently on this problem.

Then, Mr. Speaker, one comes to the organizations across Canada. Many organizations have indicated great interest and petitions have been sent to members of parliament. I have one here signed by many people. It reads, in part:

The undersigned want immediate steps to be taken to stop pollution of the waters of the Grand river by the Naugatuck Chemical Company of Elmira, Ontario.

Any fish caught in the Grand from West Montrose to lake Erie is not edible because of the taste of the flesh caused by the effluent of the above named plant.

I can only submit that this shows the people are becoming very concerned about this serious problem. Then, too, municipalities have shown a growing interest but, unfortunately, their resources are limited. They are only able to deal with this on a piecemeal basis and it is for this reason that I believe leadership has to be given by the federal government. The interest of some people has been indicated by correspondence.

Scientists have taken an interest in this problem, too. I have here a study of the use, conservation and pollution of water resources by A. L. Van Luven. The author of this paper presented a brief to the Minister of Justice in July, 1959. He is the head of the waste treatment division of H. E. McKeen and Company Limited, Lachine. This is a very impressive document and shows this gentleman has given very close study to the problem and has not overlooked the difficulties. He deals with it from a number of points of view. He deals with some conservation concepts, our water resources, water supply problems, ground water problems, surface water problems, industrial water problems, water rights and water laws. Then, he goes on to deal with the pollution picture, industrial waste problems, standards for sewage effluent and government activities.

The author says, in part:

The government must consider, that left to their own devices most municipalities, large and small, fail to develop a sensible water or sewage policy until it is too late to avoid hurting themselves or their neighbours. Often the delays result from lack of financing. Sometimes communities could join forces on these projects if senior governments made this possible.

Sometimes, when several authorities have water and pollution control powers that overlap in a given watershed there will be differences in the ordinances or in the administration that tends to nullify the efforts of all. Considerations such as these plus a sound research and development program are quite properly the work of the dominion government, even if some constitutional problems must be solved first.

This is not only a problem in Canada, it is a problem facing the whole of the North American continent. I have here a copy of the proceedings of the national conference on water pollution, issued by the United States department of health, education and welfare. It is a very illuminating document and I want to quote two or three sentences from a speech made by Dr. Leroy E. Burney, surgeon general, public health service. I suggest that hon. members get this publication from the library because it is very interesting. This is what the doctor has to say in part:

In doing so, I should like to develop four principal points:

First, that water pollution control is an integral part of the broader problem of water resource development and use;

Second, that water pollution control is an inseparable part of the broader problem of environmental health protection;

Third, that an impressive amount of productive activity is already under way in controlling water pollution;

And fourth, that the problem demands a still stronger effort on the part of federal, state and local authorities, industries and all others concerned.

That is exactly the same situation as exists in Canada; it demands a much stronger effort on the part of the governments concerned. I am delighted to see the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Dinsdale) has arrived. No doubt he will be interested in what I have to say. I have been quoting him at some length and have referred to the very interesting speech about water resources he delivered in Toronto.

What has been done about it in Canada? There has been some noteworthy and interesting work done by the international joint commission which had a reference made to it with respect to the connecting channels of the St. Lawrence. In that connection the commission made recommendations and has received the co-operation of municipalities and industries surrounding the areas with which they are particularly concerned. As a result of this co-operation, there has been a slow but gradual improvement in the situation, with which the commission had been asked to deal. The federal government has passed legislation this session which will provide financial assistance to municipalities for the building of sewage disposal plants. This is a limited approach to the question, but it is very worthwhile, and necessary. Various provincial governments are now getting concerned and various provincial boards are evidence of concern and activity on the legislative level in Quebec, British Columbia and some other provinces. Conservation districts in some provinces have given this problem some study and have taken some local action, particularly in the province of Ontario. Great credit is coming to these local boards, organizations and people generally for doing something to try to help themselves under very difficult circumstances at this time.

As I said before, the municipalities are showing increasing concern and so are our scientists. However, as I said before, Mr. Speaker, all these activities are too unrelated for the problem to be satisfactorily solved. I see that my time is going rapidly, so I should like to quote again from the Prime Minister. I relish having the opportunity of quoting from the Prime Minister's former speeches and agreeing wholeheartedly with what he had to say when speaking on his measure, which is now my measure, or perhaps I should say our measure. I should like to quote from his remarks as found on page 2172 of Hansard for March 18, 1955:

> The federal government accepts the responsibility under the Fisheries Act of punishing the wrongdoing of those who dump sawdust into rivers and thereby detrimentally affect or even cause the asphyxiation of fish. The dominion government accepts the responsibility of punishing under law anyone who dumps waste into navigable streams. But in regard to the health and comfort of human beings who depend on these streams for their water supply the attitude is taken that there is no right or responsibility in the federal authority to act within the provisions of the criminal law.
> I find it difficult to understand why the dumping or throwing of sawdust, slabs, bark or rubbish into a navigable river is an offence when it is not an offence for municipalities or industrial concerns to use the waters of an interprovincial stream to free themselves of what they do not want, the effluent from their operations, by the simple expedient of throwing it into the river, and thus confer that pollution and its effects upon others. I do not wish to say more at this time but I point out that there is no action that can be taken other than an amendment to the Criminal Code.

That is just exactly what this bill proposes. Then the Prime Minister spoke later in the debate when the bill came up again for consideration during another private members' hour, and he had this to say as found at page 3184 of Hansard of April 26, 1955:

> The opinion of counsel—

He is dealing with the problem discussed in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

> —was that such was not the fact, and that the unlawful act as comprehended by the section in question must be an unlawful act within the meaning of the Criminal Code itself. Indeed, counsel gave legal precedents to support that viewpoint, and gave us their opinion that there was no right of criminal action to prosecute the wrongdoers—

That is under the law as it existed at that time.

> —who, for a period of three months, flouted the comfort of tens of thousands of people. I mention that not in order to bring forward this amendment as a means of protecting only the people of Saskatchewan along the North Saskatchewan river alone but the people of several provinces along the course traversed by that river.

Then later he goes on to say this:

> It is a crime to place in rivers anything that will interfere with the lives of fish. Under the Fisheries Act that is set out as a pseudo-crime; but, as yet, it is no crime to put interprovincial rivers and waterways in a condition whereby they cannot be used by humans. It is because of that, sir, that this amendment was drafted in a form that the law officers of the crown believed would cover the situation, a form which in my opinion places in the hands of those who are wronged the power to launch prosecutions against those interests, however powerful they may be. It provides suitable and heavy penalties against any industries or other bodies anywhere that would flagrantly destroy the water resources of the nation in interprovincial streams.

After considerable debate on the private member's bill of that day, which was the same as the one I have before the house on this occasion, the bill was voted down. At that time the opposition consisting of the Progressive Conservatives and the C.C.F. members supported the measure and the Liberal members of the government opposed it. We now have the Prime Minister's party in the seats of the mighty and we are looking for a majority when the vote comes on second reading of this bill.

I know that this problem of pollution is on the agenda of the resources for tomorrow conference which the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is doing his best to promote and to make a success of. I presume there will be some very interesting discussions on this problem from the constitutional, scientific, technical and, shall I say, people's point of view. At this conference I hope there will be agreement between representatives of the federal and provincial governments, industrial and all other bodies and organizations in Canada. I hope there will be such agreement that the government of Canada in co-operation with the provinces will soon be introducing legislation to meet this situation.

What is necessary in order to meet this problem of pollution effectively in time to save the situation is, first, co-operation between the federal and provincial governments in meeting what is the common enemy to us all, namely, pollution of our rivers; and second, legislation by federal and provincial governments to complement their agreement on a national policy to overcome pollution. After we have this co-operation and the required legislation, then without a doubt research on a very wide scale will be necessary in order to plan effectively to deal with the problem because there are local situations and local conditions to be considered, just as there are with regard to the conservation of national resources. It is not a problem that can be met on a set pattern. It is a problem which can be met only with an understanding of local, district and area conditions. Then after we have the co-operation, the legislation and the research, it is up to the governments of this country, federal, provincial and municipal, to take action to preserve our waters and to hand on to future generations a resource that we have no moral right to contaminate.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to what the last speaker had to say. I must confess that I agree with him in the attitude he has adopted. If this earth should survive for a thousand years and our civilization should persist for that length of time, it seems to me that the people who come to write history will wonder at the reckless disregard with which the people of this generation have ignored the factors so essential for the continuance of our civilization; the fashioning of the weapons of self-destruction and the apparent willingness to use them; the abuse of our national resources; and this particular act with which the hon. member has dealt in his bill, namely the poisoning and polluting of pure water which we inherited in this continent and which we are so blithely willing to poison and eliminate in that sense.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) referred to a discussion which took place in this house in 1955. I think I should point out that this discussion took place in three consecutive years. It took place during the session of 1953 and 1954 when the Criminal Code was in the process of a complete overhaul and revision. At the time the section which is now section 165, and which I propose to deal with later, was up for consideration the then hon. member for Prince Albert, the present Prime Minister, introduced, to the section and to the section preceding it, an amendment which would have had precisely the same effect as has the bill which the hon. member has now introduced. Again in 1955 and again in 1956 bills were presented and each time in the three years I believe the bills—or in one case the bill and in the other cases the amendments—came to a vote and were defeated. This was not a case of the bills being talked out. The government deliberately interposed. The then minister of justice spoke against the amendments and the bills were defeated. I propose to deal briefly with the reasons advanced by the then minister of justice, Mr. Garson, for his opposition which I presume will represent the opposition of the then government.

The present government has considered this problem. Last year there was a most interesting series of meetings of the committee on mines, forests and water which dealt with this question of water pollution very extensively, heard a great number of witnesses and in its recommendations dealt with the subject matter. On one or two occasions the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) has spoken on this matter as have other hon. members. The bill introduced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton), namely Bill No. C-77 which has now been passed, dealing with rehabilitation of agricultural lands, has to some extent, by section 4, subsection 2, dealt with the question of water conservation and pollution. I think to every extent this government has recognized the problem and is dealing with it. I am quite sure that the resources for tomorrow conference which was mentioned by the hon. member for Kootenay West and which will be held in Montreal this fall will also concern itself with this very serious difficulty. I think it is most essential that this should be done.

This problem must be viewed against the background of the expansion of population. Severe as were the consequences brought about by the situation a generation ago, what will be the situation 20 years from now or 40 years from now when, according to the statisticians, our population will be double what it is now and when, because of the consequent increase in industrialization, there will be an increase not only in the number of plants but also in the type of plants which will require the consumption of a great deal more water than at present? It is absolutely vital to our continued survival that we look at this problem and do something about it.

I have not only an academic interest in it. In the region from which I come there flows a great river, the Peace river which rises west of the Rocky mountains. It is the only river I know of that goes right through the Rocky mountains, flows several hundred miles to the east and then through Alberta into the Northwest Territories. It flows through two provinces and one territory.

At this time there is no suggestion of pollution of that river but there is in contemplation the construction of a gigantic power project, the Peace river dam. This matter is subject to the vicissitudes of political consideration, but as I speak here I am satisfied it is no longer a question of "if" but a question of "when" the dam will be constructed. When the dam has been completed an industrial complex will arise on a tremendous scale. At the present time that area is emerging from a purely agricultural state. We now have two refineries, a pulp mill and a sulphur plant, and this is just the beginning of what is bound to emerge when the dam is completed and cheaper power is available to the people of our region.

I believe the people of this country are determined that there will not inure that situation about which the hon. member for Kootenay West has spoken, about which the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has spoken in years past and which we see as one representing a tremendous problem in Canada and in many parts of the United States. It is a situation where prevention is far better than cure. Now is the time to see the problem and deal with it.

I agree with the last speaker that the bill he has presented to the house is by no means a cure-all. There must be a varied approach to the subject. There must be an approach by industry. There must be an approach on the part of the various provinces. There must be an approach by a combination of provinces and there must be an approach by the federal government. I think none of this will be effective unless and until public opinion is aroused, until the people became aware of the dangers and are prepared to support legislation and the measures which are essential for the problem to yield to solution. Although this bill probably will not pass at this session, its value in developing discussion here and elsewhere, I hope, will be very considerable.

The minister of justice in the last government said that legislation such as the bill before us was not effective and that this matter was already covered by existing legislation. With this statement I take issue. The very fact that the offence covered in the bill would be designated as a criminal offence in the Criminal Code would add a stigma which it would be hard to escape. When we have once taken what we admit to be a moral wrong and say that it is also a criminal wrong, I believe it will then be difficult for those who are now in breach of the moral law to continue in breach of the criminal law in the light of the consequences that will follow upon their failure to do what we think should be done. We will be giving statutory recognition to a moral wrong.

Time is going on and I do not want to prevent others from speaking, but I have several comments I should like to make with respect to the objections which were taken to a similar measure brought before the house in 1954, 1955 and 1956. At that time the then minister of justice said that we did not need such legislation, that we already had in the Criminal Code section 165 which deals with common nuisances. To refresh the memory of hon. members, I should like to read section 165, which is in these words:

> Every one who commits a common nuisance and thereby
> (a) endangers the lives, safety or health of the public, or
> (b) causes physical injury to any person, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

That is the punishment provision. The definition of "nuisance" follows:

> (2) For the purposes of this section, every one commits a common nuisance who does an unlawful act or fails to discharge a legal duty and thereby
> (a) endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public . . .

The then minister of justice, and I assume that he represented the views of his party, said that this section provided ample protection for those who suggested that they had suffered because of the discharge into the waters of rivers throughout the country of effluent or waste from industrial plants and municipalities. It may be that the Liberal party, now the official opposition, still holds that opinion. I hope not. I hope that by reason of the various vicissitudes they have suffered since then they have come now to take a different attitude toward this subject.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that that point of view as presented by Mr. Garson was not correct. The key words are the words "unlawful act". I will read the provision again.

> . . . every one commits a common nuisance who does an unlawful act . . .

Mr. Garson took the view then that because there was a provincial prohibition which to some extent prohibited the discharge into these rivers of certain waste from industrial plants that was thereby an unlawful act and was prohibited by section 165. I think I can meet that objection very simply because the words "unlawful act" as used in the Criminal Code have a special connotation. They are also used in connection with the definition of homicide. A person commits culpable homicide when he causes the death of a human being by means of an unlawful act, according to section 194 of the Criminal Code. In a number of cases it has been held by courts of appeal and judges of the supreme court that "unlawful act" as used there, and I assume any other place in the Criminal Code, means an unlawful act which is criminal in its nature, not one that is prohibited by provincial statute or regulation.

There are a number of cases on the point. I have appeared in one myself involving a person who was engaged in hunting out of season. He was hunting illegally according to the provincial statute and he shot a man by misadventure. It was established that the actual shooting itself was not negligence, and it was also held by the court and upheld on appeal that simply because the individual charged with this offence was doing something which was unlawful according to provincial law it was not thereby an unlawful act within the meaning of the Criminal Code.

That being the case, Mr. Speaker, the argument advanced by Mr. Garson at that time falls by the wayside. Consequently there is no protection at all in the Criminal Code as at present constituted which in any way permits people who come within the four corners of the bill proposed by the hon. member to seek and secure some remedy. Therefore it is my specific submission that this legislation not only is sensible but is also necessary because no protection exists today under the provisions of the Criminal Code.

There is one other point I might make concerning the value of this legislation. It has occurred to me, considering what might flow from the bill if passed, that there might be various benefits to people who suffer hardship, because of the fact that this is being established as a criminal offence. It occurs to me that they might have the right to seek an injunction in the civil court. I believe this point was raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West when he referred to an opinion given by a former president of the Canadian Bar Association who suggested that as the law stood it would not be possible for people, say, in Saskatchewan to go into Alberta to seek an injunction against the continuance of the state of affairs of which they complain. I throw this out as a suggestion, but this bill, should it become law, would establish a criminal offence and consequently any individual or company, or, possibly any municipality which sustained private damage might well be able to secure an injunction, bearing in mind that the act complained of would be against the law of the country inasmuch as it would be designated a crime under the Criminal Code.

Finally—and this was one of the points raised at the time of the interesting debates in 1955 and 1956—it might have the effect of permitting a person in one province who suffers damage there to press a prosecution in the province where he lives rather than in the province where the actual discharge takes place. This might require some amendment to the bill as introduced by the hon. member but since he has described the advantages of the legislation in such lyrical terms and told us so sternly of the dangers which would flow from failure to pass it I am sure he would have no objection to an amendment of that kind being considered. It may be that the particular situation in Saskatchewan which led to the Prime Minister and other members from Saskatchewan pressing for a measure of this type has in part been abated but this is a situation which could arise in any other part of Canada at any time. I support the proposed legislation. I hope it will have the effect, first of all, of arousing public interest, and that in due course it will become part of the law of this country.

Mr. H. F. Jones (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): The house must have been utterly dumbfounded this afternoon to hear the hon. member for Kootenay West claim that the passage of this bill would be the first step in combating the pollution of our rivers and streams in this country. I can only wonder where he has been this session to make such a claim and such a statement.

Mr. Herridge: I gave the government credit for what it had done later in my speech. This is the first amendment of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Jones: That certainly was not the message which got across to my ears. Anyway, such a claim, advanced in this way by the hon. member for Kootenay West, would seem to give the impression both to the house and to the country that the tremendous program undertaken by the present government under the inspiration of the Prime Minister to combat the problem of pollution, the $100 million program being carried out across the country, had never been initiated.

The Prime Minister brought this whole matter to the attention of the country as long ago as 1955 and even before that time by his speeches, by his method of presentation and by his introduction in the House of Commons of the measure on which the legislation now put forward by the hon. member for Kootenay West is patterned. More than any other person the Prime Minister focussed the attention of the country on this problem of water pollution. We have only to look at some of the results of the program undertaken by the government in this field to see what the record is. Every hon. member in the house will recall—at least, everyone save the hon. member for Kootney West—that certain amendments were introduced this year to the National Housing Act to provide for loans to municipalities in respect of sewage treatment, the provision of new schemes and assistance in the prevention of water and soil pollution. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was authorized to make loans under part 6B of the National Housing Act to municipalities or corporations to assist in the construction or extension of sewage treatment projects. At that time in the House of Commons the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) explained this proposal in detail. The minister said, for instance: collector system, a central treatment plant or both for the collection and treatment of sewage from one or more municipalities, and includes the expansion of an existing plant or existing trunk collector sewer. A municipal sewerage corporation is a public body incorporated on behalf of and controlled by one or more municipalities for the purpose of constructing and operating facilities for the collection and treatment of sewage from one or more municipalities.

Every attempt was made to make these amendments as broadly applicable as possible in order that the desired stimulation could be given to municipal corporations to take action to deal with water pollution. What has been the result of this program to date? Only a few months have passed, yet we find that as of May 26, 45 loans have been approved to municipalities for the construction of the sewers under the anti-pollution measure, totalling $27.4 million. In addition, there have been 25 formal applications, received by May 26, totalling a further $4.5 million. In addition, there have been 121 preliminary inquiries concerning projects amounting to an estimated expenditure of $68.6 million. In further addition to this are another 71 inquiries from municipalities concerning which details have not yet been given to the federal government, so it is impossible to estimate the cost of these projects being contemplated by those municipalities.

As to those projects for which we have the figures—the first three groups to which I have referred—they total over $100 million in loans approved, in formal applications made and in preliminary inquiries directed to the C.M.H.C. What has been the result of this tremendous program of anti-pollution? Some of the large projects which have already been approved in the few short months and in connection with which construction has already begun is a project in Vancouver to the value of $7.4 million, a project in Ottawa, to the value of $10.2 million; in Toronto, to the extent of $1.9 million; in Belleville, projects totalling $1.5 million; another project in Sudbury totalling $1.1 million; another project in Fort William, totalling $884,000; another project in Peterborough amounting to $593,000; and so on. I suggest those projects have been the result of this tremendously imaginative program undertaken by the government.

I suggest one has only to refer to the Ottawa Journal of today to see what has been done as a result of this program in this city, which has been cursed by a sewage problem for many years. I should like to read from an article appearing in the Ottawa Journal of today, which reads as follows:

Twenty five million gallons of raw sewage a day pour into the Ottawa river from Ottawa, its suburbs and federal government properties. This is soon to be remedied. The city hopes to have its $20,000,000 sewage tareatment and disposal system in operation by April 1, 1963. The project, which had been talked about since 1944—

Mr. Speaker, I suggest the fact that this project is to be in operation by April, although it has been considered since 1944, is an indication of the favourable results of the Prime Minister's efforts to bring this problem to the attention of the people of Canada.

The article then continues as follows:

—the federal government, which is lending the city two thirds of what the city will pay for the project, offered to forgive 25 per cent of the loan if the work were done by April 1, 1963. That means a saving of more than $2,500,000 for Ottawa.

How does it all work? Sewage from this area now enters the river from 23 outlets, on mainland and islands, between Nepean bay and the eastern city limits. When the new system is working the only outlet will be from the sewage treatment plant at Greens creek. Flow to outlets west of John street, which is just east of Rideau falls, will be intercepted by an interceptor sewer laid from Nepean bay to John street.

I point this out as an example of the practical results of this program which has been undertaken. The article then continues as follows:

The interceptor sewer will empty into an outfall sewer, which is a sewage expressway, from John street to Green's creek.

I should like to refer, as an example, to the effects of this program in my own municipality. The city of Saskatoon laid a program before the federal government involving a plan to put in an anti-pollution measure, calling for the construction of a trunk sanitary sewage disposal location, at a cost of some $420,000. A few weeks ago that city passed a bylaw requesting approval for the construction of a sewage trunk along Preston avenue in the city at a cost of $1.6 million. Perhaps I should state that I make mention of this Preston avenue sewage program as an example of what this government has done, by the adoption of another program in this regard.

The construction of that Preston avenue sewage system will not come within the terms required by the C.M.H.C. loans. However, the city of Saskatoon, as other cities across this country, will bring at least part of that program under the winter works program, which has been of tremendous assistance to municipalities across the country.

I did not want to allow to pass the opportunity of remarking in respect of statements made by the hon. member for Kootenay West. That is why I have intervened at this time.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, does the hon. member realize that when I said this was a first step, I meant a first step to amending the legislation providing a punishment for those individuals who pollute rivers? Later on, I gave this government full credit in respect of legislation in connection with loans to municipalities for the building of sewage disposal plants.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the hon. member in that way.

Mr. Stuart Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I regret there is so little time left for the debate in respect of this bill, because I feel it is important that I disagree with the purposes and intent of it. The purpose and intent of the bill have been eloquently described by the hon. member for Kootenay West. However, I do think it is possible to argue against the passage of this bill at this particular time because, as the hon. member has said, this is only one stage of a necessary comprehensive program embodying regulations and legislation attacking this whole problem in Canada.

When another bill, similar to this, was introduced at an earlier stage, there was not then any indication that the government of the day was interested in a comprehensive program covering every aspect of pollution control in respect of Canada's rivers and streams. There is evidence now that this is a major problem, which the government of the day is at present considering in full.

In October of this year the resources for tomorrow conference, to be held in Montreal, will deal with this problem, as well as with other related problems. As a result of those discussions, and hearings of the standing committee on mines, forests and waters of last year, as well as independent, non-governmental studies, which are taking place in every province of Canada at the present time, it should be possible to frame a completely comprehensive approach to the problem of pollution control in this country, at which time it may be found that the introduction of amendments to the Criminal Code will be required. It may, however, be found that because of the widespread interest, and steps that the government has taken to encourage wide study across this nation regarding the need for pollution control, the day is now past when a Criminal Code amendment forms a vital part of such a program.

For those reasons, I feel that there should be more and closer study proposed, with a greater opportunity for debate in this house, considering alternative measures which should be considered before amendments to the Criminal Code are proposed.

May I call it six o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, perhaps the house leader could give us, as he indicated he would last night, the government's plans for next week?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will carry on with the estimates of the Secretary of State, followed by the estimates of the Department of Fisheries, in turn followed by the estimates of the Department of Public Works. In regard to next week, it is expected that Monday, Tuesday and possibly Wednesday, will be devoted to legislation, preceded by an interim supply motion, as the first item of business on Monday.

May I just say at this stage that in years gone by, interim supply motions were passed rather quickly. A few years ago the opposition of the day used motions for interim supply for the purposes of rather lengthy debates, on at least one or two occasions. The opposition of this day has paid back that old score, so perhaps we can now treat this interim supply motion as such motions were treated some years ago.

If the interim supply motion is completed in good time, we will carry on with the following legislation: Bill No. C-92, which is a bill dealing with amendments to the Criminal Code (capital murder); Bill No. C-97, which deals with an amendment to the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code; and third, a resolution in the name of the Minister of Justice, dealing with amendments to the Judges Act and the Exchequer Court Act. The fourth legislative item will be Bill No. C-99, which we almost completed a day or two ago, dealing with amendments to the Food and Drugs Act, followed by the fifth item, being Bill No. C-100, to provide for the control of narcotic drugs.

Other items which are available, not necessarily in this order, are as follows: Bill No. C-98, concerning the Canada Shipping Act; a resolution concerning export credit; a resolution concerning the Financial Administration Act; a resolution concerning the Farm Credit Act. Then, depending on the progress we make on Monday, we can determine the items which will come up on Tuesday, and perhaps on Wednesday.

I can, however, be quite definite with regard to the estimates to be dealt with during the early part of next week. We will start off on either Wednesday or Thursday with the estimates of the Department of National Defence, followed by the estimates of the Department of Defence Production.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

COBALT, ANTIMONY AND TIN STOCKPILES

Question No. 204—Mr. Fisher:

1. Has the government stockpiles of cobalt, antimony, and tin?
2. Is there a world short supply of these metals?
3. For how long, and in what quantities, has the government had these stockpiles?
4. What have been the storage charges, by year, for each of these metals?
5. In what manner, if any, is it planned to dispose of these metals?
6. If any quantities have been disposed of in the open market, has there been a profit or loss per basic unit?

Answer by: Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production):

1. Yes.

2. No.

3. 6,085,255 lbs. of tin and 2,158,695 lbs. of antimony were acquired in 1949, and 343,522 lbs. of cobalt were obtained during the period from 1951 to 1954.

4. Cobalt is stored at the producer's plant on a no charge basis. Tin and antimony are stored in a crown owned warehouse. The storage cost for tin amounted to $3,483 per annum up to March 31, 1960, and $1,797.12 per annum from that date. The storage cost for antimony is $636.36 per annum.

5. It is planned to dispose of the tin and antimony through recognized Canadian metals brokers, at a rate designed to limit any serious dislocation of the Canadian market or injury to the economic interests of producing countries.

6. 110,000 lbs. of tin have been disposed of at a loss of approximately 1 cent per pound, based on the average invoice cost plus accumulated storage and handling charges.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

B—Dominion coal board—

229. Administration and investigations of the dominion coal board, $126,345.

230. Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council, $13,244,900.

231. Subventions in respect of eastern coal under agreements entered into pursuant to the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act, $1,700,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, June 3, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—DISCOVERY OF GAS WELL IN ARROWHEAD RIVER AREA

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I am happy to announce, Mr. Speaker, some significant developments with respect to the discovery by Imperial Oil Company Limited of a gas well in the Arrowhead river area of the Northwest Territories. This well has now been tested and has established an absolute open flow potential of 24 million cubic feet per day. There is every reason to believe that when it goes into actual production the sustained flow will be approximately one third of the absolute open flow, depending on the engineering.

It is anticipated that six more exploratory wells will be drilled during the present season in this general area. If similar success is achieved, as there is good reason to expect, it should not be long before there is an economic basis for pipe line facilities to carry the production of gas wells in this area to market.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that because of the geological evidence of substantial resource potential in the general area in which the well lies, there is provided in the estimates of my department for this year the sum of $100,000 for a location survey for a development road to open up the area and encourage its early development.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group may I say that we appreciate the minister making the announcement in this house and giving us officially exact, important and current information.

FARM CREDIT ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE CAPITAL OF FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Farm Credit Act to increase the capital of the farm credit corporation from $8 million to $12 million.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance, and ask whether he is in a position this morning to give the house some indication as to when he will bring down his budget.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should have thought that the hon. member for Laurier would have been duly impressed by a headlined statement that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of May 24, which purported to announce in categorical and authoritative terms the intention of the Minister of Finance in this respect. I will read from the text of the article:

Finance minister Donald Fleming will introduce the federal budget in the House of Commons on June 6, it was learned here today.

I am surprised that the hon. member for Laurier should betray a measure of scepticism about a report in the Ottawa Citizen that purports to be so firm, clear and altogether authentic.

Mr. Chevrier: I would appreciate an answer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): However, Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to relieve the interest and curiosity of the hon. member at an appropriate date.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that on Monday the minister will be asking for interim supply, a measure which always requires careful attention by this house, does the minister not consider that he should give some indication to the house as to when his budget will be brought down?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the two subjects are not directly related. There will have to be a vote of interim supply to provide for the normal necessity of the government to pay salaries, wages and other current obligations. The budget deals with broader questions, as I do not need to remind the house, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hellyer: Such as where the minister is going to get the money.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think the two subjects hinge on one another. I have indicated to the hon. member for Laurier that an announcement will be made on an appropriate date.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I may be permitted a further supplementary question. The house leader indicated last evening and I think on a previous occasion that he would like to see some co-operation in connection with interim supply. So far as we are concerned that co-operation will ensue, but it will ensue much faster if we have some indication of when the budget will be brought down. Certainly one is not unrelated to the other. That is why I put the question to the Minister of Finance. I had hoped the minister would have agreed that there was not only an indirect but a direct relationship between the two subjects and that he would have given the house some information.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member offers co-operation, as he has, I would like to meet him half way. Perhaps I may go this far at the moment; I do not propose to bring in the budget next week.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC—INQUIRY AS TO SAFETY OF CANADIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister notice of which I have given him. In view of the allegations that United States battleships are moving in preparation to evacuate United States citizens from the Dominican Republic because of possible danger to them, does the Prime Minister wish to comment as to the situation with respect to the safety and welfare of Canadians in that country?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Department of External Affairs has been in touch with our embassy in the Dominican Republic, and Canadians there are reported to be in no immediate danger. There are some 160 Canadians, of whom two thirds are Protestant and Catholic missionaries. The rest are businessmen and their families. If at any time it becomes apparent that they are in any danger, immediate action will be taken to ensure their safety.

TRANSPORT

P.E.I. CAUSEWAY—CHIGNECTO CANAL; REQUEST FOR FEASIBILITY STUDY REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister advise the house when he expects to receive reports on the feasibility studies in connection with the Prince Edward Island causeway and the Chignecto canal project?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I had been hoping to receive reports on both those projects before my estimates were considered. Replying to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate several months ago, I took it for granted that I would have the reports by this time. However, I have not received the reports yet. I have done my best to hurry them up, but I cannot say exactly when they will be received. As I say, I had hoped to have them before my estimates are considered, but now I do not know whether I shall or not.

AGRICULTURE

MARITIME PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO AID TO POTATO GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, and ask him whether the department is yet in a position to announce whether the assistance promised to the potato growers of Prince Edward Island by his minister in April has been determined and what form it is to take.

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture): This is a matter of government policy to be announced in due course.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SALK VACCINE—REPORTED COMPLAINTS ON SHIPMENTS TO AUSTRALIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): On Wednesday the hon. member for Essex East asked me whether the batch of Salk vaccine recently tested in Australia had been tested in the laboratory of hygiene in my department prior to shipment.

I understand that the Connaught medical research laboratories had previously shipped 100,000 doses of Salk vaccine in finished vials to Australia, and to the best of my knowledge these have already been used. Because of Canadian and other commitments, the Connaught laboratories could only send a further shipment to Australia in bulk, and I believe it is this second lot which was the subject of the newspaper article referred to. To expedite the Australian program, this more recent shipment was sent prior to testing so that all necessary tests could be completed at the same time in both countries.

My department's information is that the Australian tests for safety were unsatisfactory because of illness from another source in their test animal colony, so detailed information was requested from the Connaught laboratories on their own tests. I understand the Connaught tests here were satisfactory, and their results are being sent to Australia. The Connaught laboratories are submitting the details of their tests and samples for this batch to the laboratory of hygiene. Such details are sent to Ottawa only after all the manufacturers' tests have been satisfactorily completed and the vaccine placed in vials. All the laboratory of hygiene tests are carried out on the finished product only.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN MARCONI COMPANY—LETTER RESPECTING NON-FRATERNIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources if he has yet received a reply from Mr. Finlayson, president of the Canadian Marconi Company to the letter sent by the minister regarding the so-called non-fraternization clause in the contracts of employees of the company and, if so, whether he would be prepared to table it.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I have as yet received no reply.

PUBLICATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Prime Minister whether he has yet received the report of the O'Leary commission and, if so, whether he expects to meet the deadline set for its publication, which I believe is June 5.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not expect it will be possible to meet that deadline. I think there will be a delay of several days before the report can be tabled.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the report been received?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think that question was asked by the hon. gentleman's leader several days ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was not here.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATEMENT ON CLOSING OF U.S. RADAR STATIONS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in reply to questions asked by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador and Bonavista-Twillingate yesterday, I should like to comment as follows.

In view of the fact that the distant early warning system for the defence of North America against attack from the air will be improved by the extension of the D.E.W. line across the north Atlantic all the way to England via Greenland, it has been found that three radar stations located at Baffin island, Resolution island and Redcliffe, Newfoundland, as well as six gap fillers, do not fill the role for which they were designed, and do not justify the high cost of operation involved in maintaining the stations. Consequently these three radar sites, as well as the six gap filler sites, will be closed.

The improvement to the early warning capabilities of the D.E.W. line is such that the limited additional coverage provided by the three prime radars and the six gap fillers, all manned and operated by the United States, does not warrant the high cost of operation. The discontinuance of these radar installations will have no effect on the work load of any other radars which will remain in the system.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister could reply to the question I asked in regard to Sydney.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have not that answer as yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I could ask the minister if he would indicate whether there is any contemplated extension in the activities at the Point Edward naval base in Cape Breton?

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Office of the chief electoral officer—

46. Salaries and expenses of office, $83,685.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, before this item carries, while it is perhaps not always necessary to go extensively into the consideration of the elections act and its administration because that subject matter is reviewed by the standing committee on privileges and elections, I should like to place on the record, as has been done during past sessions in this committee, as well as in the standing committee on privileges and elections, a question regarding absentee voting.

I should like to draw a distinction here between absentee voting and advance polling, because in some quarters the difference is misunderstood. The procedure of absentee voting is designed to allow an elector to cast his vote on election day in a polling division other than the one in which he is registered. This procedure is provided for under the provincial elections act of British Columbia, and allows electors whose names appear on the voters' list to vote in any polling division in the province, including the polling division in which the electors are registered, regardless of whether the same or a different constituency is involved.

This is a right which I, and I am sure many others, would like to see included in the Canada Elections Act. I realize this is not just a simple matter of saying, "Let us include it in the federal absentee voting arrangements", because there are other complications which flow from the idea itself, one of which is the question of cost to the taxpayer of instituting such an arrangement. Perhaps this is not the session when we can deal with amendments to the Canada Elections Act, but at some time in the future—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. There is a noticeable and continuous current of conversation competing with the hon. member who has the floor, which I am sure is making it difficult for the Hansard reporter to hear and report the speech of the hon. gentleman. Therefore I would ask hon. members to quieten down, if they would, and oblige both me and the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Howard: That is very kind of you, Mr. Chairman. I express my thanks, and I am sure the Hansard reporter also expresses his thanks.

One of the principles we should keep in mind is that an individual should not be denied the right to vote in an election because of the fact that he happens to have a vocation, or because of some other circumstance, which causes him to be away from his home polling division on election day. This is what happens to many workers of the country who are employed in industries which are perhaps seasonal, such as the heavy industries of mining, logging, construction work, and so forth. This applies also to the activities of salesmen and lawyers who have occasion to be away from their homes from time to time attending courts and so forth. I mention this only as indicative of a group of people who for one reason or another beyond their control are ofttimes absent on election day from the polling division in which they are registered and are thereby denied the opportunity of casting a ballot.

There is some saving feature now, in that the Canada Elections Act was amended at the last session to expand the class of people who may vote at advance polls before election day. The group was expanded from three classes to include everyone who is an elector, but it confined the advance polling to two days. This does not meet entirely the difficulties encountered by many people in the country.

As I said, one of the reasons advanced in opposition to this particular proposal is the cost of instituting a foolproof system of registration of electors which will guarantee that some of the dishonesty and skulduggery which takes place in elections in some parts of Canada will be eliminated as far as possible, thereby assuring that such dishonesty will not become rampant throughout the country and people will not be elected by crookedness at the polls rather than by the honest votes of the electors themselves.

I think these safeguards, of course, must be placed in the act, just as there are many safeguards in the act now to ensure that elections are conducted with honesty and that this is the prevailing factor during the campaign and in the preparation of the electoral lists. I think if we approached the problem from this point of view of not denying the elector the right to vote when he is absent for reasons beyond his control, we would be adopting the correct attitude.

In years past there has been some demand that electors be permitted to vote at the advance poll in order to take care of this problem of absentee voting. I believe there is still some demand for this. I think at the next general election and subsequent elections, depending upon the time of year at which these elections are held, many people will find that the advance poll system will not afford them the opportunity of casting their ballots on election day as they thought might be the case. I am sure that in the years following elections, when people find they are denied the right to vote by reason of being away from their poll on election day, some pressure will be brought to institute a system of absentee voting. Perhaps the system could be similar to that which exists in British Columbia. I do not say this is a foolproof or guaranteed system, but it is a system of absentee voting, and I am talking in terms of something similar to that or similar to the systems they have in Saskatchewan and the United Kingdom.

I should like to see the day come very quickly when members of parliament will think in terms of the right of the individual to vote as the paramount principle that should be considered, and when members of parliament will be willing to find the necessary extra money to institute a system of absentee voting containing the necessary safeguards against abuses. This will ensure every voter in Canada the opportunity to cast a ballot. He will not be denied the right to vote, as many are now, by virtue of his occupation or other circumstances beyond his control.

Since the Secretary of State has been in office only a short period of time, perhaps I could say publicly now what I have said to him privately, that I extend to him my congratulations upon his elevation to the cabinet. I wish him success in this particular post as long as he stays there. I do not mean to imply that he is going to be fired or anything like that, but elections do come along from time to time and the mortality amongst elected representatives is somewhat high. Despite the fact that the minister has been in office only a short time, I should like to have from him some indication as to the government's attitude toward this suggestion and perhaps some estimate of the cost, in order that we might ascertain whether or not such a system may be brought into effect in the near future.

Mr. Fisher: Yesterday, Mr. Chairman, you ruled out of order any discussion on redistribution, and particularly any interpretation of the forthcoming redistribution that will follow the census. I am not going to try to abuse that ruling, but I should like to ask the minister if he will check with his chief electoral officer and tell us how long it took for the chief electoral office to carry out the changes in terms of constituency maps, instructions to returning officers and all that sort of thing, following upon the last redistribution. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that would be in order. I want to get some idea of the time involved.

Mr. Dorion: It took about 10 months to get the maps ready.

Mr. Fisher: Do I understand correctly that it took 10 months from the time the actual constituencies were struck by the parliamentary committee?

Mr. Dorion: It took 10 months to get the maps printed, but the chief electoral officer was ready to hold an election within two months after the bill was passed.

Mr. Fisher: I was trying to get the sequence. It took 10 to 11 months in 1952 to get the constituency lines drawn following the return of the census information, and then two more months in 1952 in order to have everything prepared for the election; is that correct?

Mr. Dorion: After the bill was passed, we were ready to have a general election within two months.

Mr. Fisher: I think if we have the pattern repeated all hon. members will understand the bounds within which we are operating at the present time.

I want to turn now, Mr. Chairman, to some questions relating to the by-elections that have been held, and ask whether the chief electoral officer has found that any of the changes which have been made in the act in the last few years or in any of the regulations have not worked as effectively as expected, or whether there were any untoward results flowing from the changes that had not been expected.

Mr. Dorion: The chief electoral officer has not received any official report as yet, but all indications he has received are to the effect that the changes were satisfactory.

Mr. Fisher: Is there any present member of this house who has not completed all the necessary steps that must be taken by a victorious candidate following a general election?

Mr. Dorion: Every member of this house has filed the regular return for the last election. In so far as the by-elections are concerned, we have not received those returns. The candidates have two months within which to file them.

Mr. Fisher: I know they have two months in which to file a return. What I am wondering is this. First of all, I am assuming that all the successful candidates in the last general election have filed returns. Can the chief electoral officer bring us up to date on those candidates who were not successful and who have not completed all the necessary forms?

Mr. Dorion: The responsibility of the chief electoral officer is to make his own report to the House of Commons. He made his report, and I am informed that at that time some of the defeated candidates had not made their reports. However, when the chief electoral officer himself has made his report to the House of Commons, he has discharged his duty. It is then for parliament itself to decide what shall be done.

Mr. Fisher: As I understand it, a candidate who does not complete the proper form within the stated period, or whose agent does not do so, is liable to some kind of prosecution or action. I wonder if the minister could indicate whether any prosecutions or actions were launched in consequence of failure in that regard.

Mr. Dorion: To the knowledge of the chief electoral officer, no action was taken. I speak on the information I have received, and I am sure this information is correct. Anyone may take proceeedings against candidates who did not make their own reports. However, the report of the electoral officer was made to the House of Commons and it is now a question for parliament to decide.

Mr. Fisher: The only point I wanted to underline was this—

Mr. Dorion: May I add that I believe the time has now expired.

Mr. Fisher: In other words, it is too late now. The only point I want to make in relation to this matter is this. It is something that I wish had received more emphasis in the committee last year which was examining the Canada Elections Act and making changes. I refer to the fact that so much of the statute and so many of the regulations are honoured in the breach rather than the observance. This is one example. Since one anticipates an election in the not too distant future, I might point out that there have been, as you might say, a considerable number of infractions in this particular regard. I wanted to turn to another section of the act—

Mr. Dorion: May I reply now on this point?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Dorion: The hon. member will understand that at the time the report was made to the House of Commons it would have been appropriate to suggest the action to be taken.

Mr. Fisher: My point there is this. I am quite aware of the fact that no one party has a monopoly on either virtue or rectitude in this particular matter. I think all parties are guilty. I was not trying to raise this matter from the point of view of knifing any particular one. I am sure that candidates in our party have been as remiss in this regard as those in any other party. However, I think it emphasizes the fact that many parts of the act are not paid much attention and consequently that more candidates should be aware of this provision.

I want to turn to section 66 of the act and underline the dissatisfaction that I feel on this particular point. Section 66 states as follows:

[Mr. Fisher.]

66. (1) Every person is guilty of the corrupt practice of treating and of an indictable offence against this act punishable as provided in this act, who, corruptly—

Again, for the second time, we find the use of the word "corrupt" or "corruptly".

—by himself or by any other person, either before, during or after an election, directly or indirectly gives or provides, or causes to be given or provided, or is accessory to the giving or poviding, or pays or engages to pay wholly or in part the expense of giving or providing any meat, drink, refreshment or provision, or any money or ticket or other means or device to enable the procuring of any meat, drink, refreshment or provision, to or for any person for the purpose of corruptly influencing that person or any other person to give or refrain from giving his vote at such election—

And so on. Further down in this clause, which does not go much further, the word "corrupt" or "corruptly" appears again. It seems to me that it is almost impossible to enforce this particular section. I should like to have some information as to what proceedings have been taken in the last two general elections as a consequence of this particular section.

Mr. Dorion: To our knowledge no proceedings at all have been taken. However, I should like to remind the hon. member that the responsibility of the chief electoral officer is limited to clause 70. It is not within his province to determine whether, in certain cases, action should be taken against any person who has violated section 66 or any other section. Generally speaking it is the privilege, if I can so state it, of any candidate to proceed against another candidate and take proceedings if there is a violation of the act. In other words, everyone has that right. The chief electoral officer, in virtue of this act, has nothing to do with that question. The situation is the same with regard to the Secretary of State, who is only the channel between the chief electoral officer and the House of Commons.

Mr. Fisher: I am sure the chief electoral officer is the person who keeps a record of prosecutions that take place as a result of the act. It seems to me that I have seen returns filed in the past. That is why I asked the question.

Mr. Dorion: With regard to actions taken, he keeps a record; yes.

Mr. Fisher: In relation to this particular section, the part that follows allows an official agent or any other person to provide sandwiches, cakes, cookies and drinks such as tea, coffee, milk or soft drinks at a meeting of electors. It does not expressly forbid alcoholic beverages, but I imagine that matter was in mind in that they were not inserted here.

However, the boundary line here is so narrow, it seems to me, depending upon the puritanism of the interpretation as to what is corrupting about a tea party.

I know that at least two of the parties have sent out instructions on how to organize. I know the Conservative party have done so, for I have seen their publications in the past. They advise building the whole campaign organization upon the tea party, the coffee party and so on, the idea being to have these meetings in as informal and as friendly surroundings as possible in order to get people in.

In this kind of situation, with which I do not see anything wrong at all, the whole idea of the first part of section 66, it seems to me, does not make a great deal of sense. How are we going to arrive at the conclusion, when you move over a boundary line, that you are corruptly influencing people to procure their vote? This section is totally nonsensical. If the words "bribe" or "bribery" were included it would make more sense than the adjective "corrupt". I cannot see any merit in the inclusion of that word in this context.

I turn now to a list found at the back of the by-election instructions provided to returning officers, issued in January. Schedule 3, page 276, lists electoral districts in which the nomination day is the twenty eighth day before polling day. All hon. members will realize that this has reference to large constituencies with scattered populations. Has the chief electoral officer given any consideration to recommending extension or narrowing of this time?

Mr. Dorion: No suggestion has been made concerning adding names to that list. The chief electoral officer believes that the list is complete and in order.

Mr. Fisher: I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members of the committee to this list. Extra time is given in these particular constituencies because of the difficulty in arranging for electoral matters due to the size and scattered nature of the districts. This is another point that reinforces some of the suggestions made in the past to the effect that in setting constituency boundaries, and in making up your mind about whether you are going to have any ratio between rural and urban voters, this is a factor that should be taken into account. Very few of these constituencies are what might be called rural agricultural constituencies. I think of Cochrane, Kenora-Rainy River, Port Arthur, Chapleau, Saguenay, Bonavista-Twillingate, Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador and Humber-St. George's. These are not rural agricultural constituencies.

I wish to underline the difficulty encountered not only by the candidates in these constituencies but by the chief electoral officer. After the election of a candidate in these constituencies he encounters especially difficult circumstances. This is another factor we need to examine closely. Under the Canada Elections Act, in this schedule, we have confirmation that there are added or exceptional difficulties in important constituencies in Canada. For this reason I should like hon. members in the next few months to again scan the constituency maps, and if they do not represent constituencies of this nature I urge them to develop some sympathy for hon. members who represent constituencies of the nature of Athabasca, Jasper-Edson, Peace River and others. I hope all hon. members will keep this factor in mind, whether at election time or at a time when we may have to make decisions relating to the holding of elections.

Has the Secretary of State sought to obtain from the chief electoral officer any information that would be useful and relevant to any consideration with respect to increasing the number of constituencies represented in this house? Has he done that in the last year or two?

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, I have not raised a point of order arising out of the remarks of the hon. member for Port Arthur because I believe it is valuable to have suggestions from hon. members of this committee, even if they are sometimes advanced in an irregular way. However, I cannot answer the question the hon. member has just asked. I believe the hon. gentleman will understand that it is a matter of government policy, and it would not be in order for me to answer that question. Redistribution is not a question to be decided by the chief electoral officer or by the Secretary of State who, after all, is the channel, as it were, between the chief electoral officer and the House of Commons.

With respect to the other questions raised by the hon. gentleman, let me recall to his mind the fact that last year certain suggestions advanced by him and by the hon. member for Skeena were fully discussed in a committee of this house but not accepted. For that reason those suggestions are not reflected in the existing law. The government is always interested in receiving suggestions from hon. members, some of which may be of assistance in introducing future amendments to the act. It is not my privilege to answer questions of the nature raised by the hon. member for Port Arthur. I can only make my suggestions to the cabinet when a question is raised about amending the act.

Before taking my seat, Mr. Chairman, let me thank the hon. member for Skeena for the kind words he said about me a few moments ago.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I feel I must rise at this time to correct any misunderstanding, misinterpretation or exaggeration that may arise out of the remarks made by the hon. member for Port Arthur. I do not want anyone to think that C.C.F. campaigns are based on thousands of cups of tea and coffee. They are based on a challenging philosophy, on broad humanitarian principles and on programs supported by dedicated people; and the C.C.F. is represented, in the riding in question, by a candidate who is a personality.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, as a footnote to the discussion that has taken place with respect to amendments to the Canada Elections Act, and specifically the one referred to by the hon. member for Kootenay West, may I comment that whether or not the amendments made last year to the Canada Elections Act had anything to do with it, the results of the recent by-elections were much better under the amended act than under the old act.

Mr. Howard: About half an hour ago I fell into the error, occasioned by practice, of seeking to make inquiries about matters of government policy, and advancing suggestions. As I say, I fell into this error in raising the question of absentee voting and inquiring as to government policy. I confess my error now. I think the government has its finger in too many pies, and that it has too much authority over the affairs of parliament. I should have known better than to fall into that trap of words, as it were, in trying to give to the government authority over decisions on balloting matters or changes in the elections act when this is a question primarily within the control of parliament itself and of the standing committee on privileges and elections, which traditionally has considered these amendments and proposed changes to the act in a non-partisan way as far as possible. I felt I had better clear the record with regard to that particular error of mine before the government decided that this was another matter in which it could become engaged and upon which it could make statements of policy from time to time.

However, that does not preclude the opportunity of using the House of Commons as a forum, as it were, where particular matters such as the absentee vote may be discussed. It is true that in the committee last year I was a minority of one, I think, when this question of the absentee vote was considered; but no matter by what majority a man has his views rejected he should, in my opinion, continue to press those views on every occasion because it is the little drop of water that wears away the mighty stone. Persistence brings results. I was a minority of one then, but perhaps I am in a better position here where I have colleagues close to me; by using this forum I am increasing my support.

To me, absentee voting is a vital matter, and I believe people should not be denied the right to cast their ballots on election day because of circumstances beyond their control such as the nature of their employment. Perhaps I can expand this theme now and indicate to the committee an area where additional difficulties will arise depending on the time of the year in which, specifically, the next federal election is held, though my observations will apply to other federal elections as well.

I mention the next federal election specifically because it will be the first general election at which our native Indian people will have the right to vote as a group. It is true that in the past, because of service in the armed forces, some Indian people have had the right to vote, and others have had the right to vote by virtue of the franchise. It is also the case that in at least two of the constituencies where by-elections have been held, native Indians have taken part in the voting. However, as I say, the next general election will be the one in which they will be casting their votes for the first time, at least for a number of years. I believe it was in 1918 or 1919 when they last had the right to vote in a general election.

On the west coast of British Columbia the absence of any provision for absentee voting could cause a great deal of misunderstanding and, possibly, anger directed against the government, the returning officers and everybody else concerned including the candidates. In British Columbia, as I have said, we have a provincial system of absentee voting. An elector, if he is on the voters' list, can cast his ballot in any polling division in the province. I should explain that a high proportion of the native population on the coast is engaged in the fishing industry, and during the salmon season the great majority of them are anywhere but at home in their own villages. They travel from their home villages following the fish. They move down from the interior to work in the canneries and fish out from the canneries.

When a provincial election is held—and native people have had the right to vote in provincial elections since 1949—these native Indians can vote by virtue of the absentee voting provision. If a federal election is called to coincide with the fishing season, most of these native Indian people who will be voting for the first time at a federal election and who have become accustomed, in five provincial elections, to a system of absentee balloting, will find themselves denied the opportunity to vote by virtue of their occupation. This would generate, I am sure, a great deal of antagonism on their part, an antagonism which in my view would be understandable. A good deal of explanation would be necessary to convince them that the law is different in its application to federal elections.

I cite this one group of people only as a case in point in order to show that there will be confusion and anger created. I think there will be an increasing demand on the part of the electorate after the next general election for a system of absentee balloting to be carried into effect. Even though, as I say, I was a minority of one once, perhaps by continual argument and complaint on this question sufficient public and parliamentary support will be generated to ensure that this system shall come into effect and that all the people shall have the right to cast their ballots on election day.

Mr. Fisher: The last point I wish to bring up for the consideration of the committee and the Secretary of State has really nothing to do with elections. I should like to ask hon. members to consider the whole matter of election expenses and the declaration of expenses. If they will check forms 62 and 63, the official agent's declaration as to expenses and the candidate's declaration as to expenses, and read through them in all seriousness they will find, I think, that if they are completely honest they will have a most difficult time signing these forms.

Perhaps I could give a few indications at this point to underline the difficulty of putting one's name to form 63, although most of us do so; all the successful candidates. This is what the candidate swears:

> I do hereby solemnly declare that I have examined the return of election expenses transmitted or about to be transmitted by my official agent to the returning officer at the said election, a copy of which return is now shown by me and signed by the officer before whom this declaration is made, and to the best of my knowledge and belief that return is correct.
> I further solemnly declare that except as appears from that return I have not, and to the best of my knowledge and belief no person, nor any club, society, company or association has, on my behalf, made any payment, or given, promised, or offered any reward, office, employment or valuable consideration, or incurred any liability on account of or in respect of the conduct or management of the said election.

The saving words which appear here are "to his knowledge or belief". I do not think anyone campaigning in a fairly large constituency would have much hope of knowing this as a certainty. I suggest those individuals would have as much hope of being sure in this particular regard as I would have of being elected in the province of Quebec, and the odds involved there are pretty poor.

> —I have paid to my said official agent the sum of—and no more for the purpose of the said election, and that except as specified in the return, no money, security, or equivalent for money has to my knowledge or belief been paid, advanced, given or deposited by anyone to or in the hands of my official agent or any other person for the purpose of defraying any expenses incurred on my behalf on account of or in respect of the conduct or management of the said election;

I suggest that is fantastic. In order to emphasize the point I make I should like to refer to a specific case involving one of my own supporters, who went out on his own and raised $1,000 for our campaign. The largest single donation he received was $10. He went from door to door and other places for these donations. Technically my official agent should have had a list of all those contributing individuals together with their addresses, and the money the individual brought in should have been listed under his name. However, would that have been a correct listing? Actually we did show on our return that we were advanced that amount by the C.C.F. riding association of Port Arthur. Had we followed the technical practice in regard to the collections of donations made by that individual, we should have had to hire a stenographer or stenographer accountant for several days.

The point I make regarding these expenses is that it is a very very mixed bag, and that I have grave doubts concerning accuracy of statements of expenses prepared by candidates following an election. I shall not recount some of the anecdotes which have been told by successful candidates and others regarding election expenses, but this does seem to me to be a situation which warrants serious consideration.

I should now like to refer to some suggestions made by Senator Douglas when he was in Canada not long ago, as appeared in the Globe and Mail of February 23, 1961. He is reported to have said that one of the greatest electioneering problems confronting politicians would be solved if campaign expenses were paid from the public treasury. He also believed that political parties should develop a wide basis of financial support rather than derive their funds from a small number of contributors. He said that some of the big contributors were idealists or sportsmen who enjoyed seeing politicians run, as other sportsmen liked to watch horse races. He suggested the majority were investors who expected to be paid by special favour. He believed that the public should pay for campaign expenses, because they would be much better off than paying in the form of special privileges given to those major contributors.

The point I make is that electioneering will become more and more expensive. I suggest it cannot help but do so. Some of my colleagues have checked the rate cards provided by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to the committee on broadcasting with respect to the cost of television appearances, and if the expenses in that regard are an indication of the expenses involved in television appearances wherever television reaches—and we have indication now that it does reach 94 per cent of Canadian homes—the total expenses are rather fantastic.

With regard to this particular subject I suggest we should consider two features. First, perhaps a ceiling could be applied to campaign expenses, such as has been done in Britain; and second, to adopt the suggestion of Senator Douglas, at least in regard to television appearances, to provide the expenses out of the public treasury. If such a system were adopted appearances could be based on a sharing arrangement, thereby removing this feature of campaigning from the public realm.

The difficulty involved in setting a ceiling, of course, would be that a great deal of hawkshaw work would be involved over a long period of time in order to make it apply across the country. Great Britain seems to have a tighter control on public morale than we have, and I understand, from information I have received from the head offices of the different parties, that they consider this has worked fairly well there, without too many abuses. I do not know whether this would be practical in Canada, but it might be a step we will have to take. We should then at least have some guide for the consciences of candidates.

The suggestion made by Senator Douglas regarding the running of election campaigns at the expense of the public treasury may seem fantastic when we consider that the total expenses of candidates' campaigns during the last election amounted to more than $2 million in relation to the individual constituency campaigns only. I am convinced that there are many hidden expenses which if added to this total, would at least double or triple it. When I say "hidden" I do not mean deliberately hidden, but certainly associated with the election campaign. If the cost of the national campaigns carried on by the different parties were included—for example, full page advertisements in magazines such as Weekend, with a circulation of one and a quarter million, and the Toronto Star Weekly, with a circulation of 800,000 to 900,000 and other national magazines—the total expense would be fantastic. The figures regarding the cost of such advertisements could be readily obtained from the editors and publishers of the magazines.

The difficulty of paying the cost of campaigns out of the public treasury is a practical one, in that a ceiling would have to be set. In view of the enormous expenses involved the amount of campaigning would have to be cut down, with the result that the voters would be very disappointed because of the lack of the kind of commercial spot announcement campaigns, hammering upon the issues, with which they have become familiar in recent times. If something of this nature is not done, however, the major parties in Canada will have tremendous advantages in terms of being able to find money to meet the election campaign expenses, while the minority parties will have a much more difficult task. That situation may not have applied during the last election campaign, and perhaps will not apply to the next, but I suggest it will apply more and more to future election campaigns as the expenses involved skyrocket.

I suggest this is a subject which should be of interest to all hon. members, and I hope many of them will give consideration to it; because I have a hunch that this will certainly be a major problem in future years to the democratic political policies of North America. Since in the United States certain limitations have been set in respect of expenses, with regulations requiring the provision of more information regarding amounts spent by national parties, it seems to me that this problem in our country, which in many ways is greater because of our lower economic base, as well as the fact that fewer politicians must cover a much greater area, must be seriously considered in the near future.

I realize that some consideration was given to the problem at the Liberal rally which took place in January. I was not present, but it is my interpretation of what took place there, having read the articles covering that rally which appeared in newspapers, that the discussion in respect to this problem was made from an objective point of view until someone dragged in a subject concerning Allister Grosart, the national organizer of the Conservative party, and the Liberals went chasing off down a trail regarding the activities of that particular gentleman.

It was interesting to me to find that the topic loomed so large with the Liberals at their convention, but I was disappointed to find no reference to it as a topic at the rally held by the Conservative party in March. I can only assume that when you are a winner these things are not important. I am sure that those people in the government party who are receiving money for the next election campaign will begin to see the relevancy of this whole question of expenses and the need for possible reform. It is for this reason that my remarks have been so extended. I hope that the organizations which have to do with election matters on behalf of hon. members will give some thought to this very complicated matter.

Mr. Howard: Before the item carries I should like to say a few words. I am indebted to the hon. member for Port Arthur for raising this particular matter. There is one subject connected with it that I should like to deal with in so far as it affects election expenses or, more particularly, election contributions. Whenever this particular section of the Canada Elections Act has been dealt with, parliament has either re-enacted the provision or has said it is desirable that candidates of political parties make known to the public contributions which they have received, and also their source.

I say that in essence parliament has made a decision in this regard by reason of its enactment or re-enactment of the provision. I do not know when the provision first became part of the Canada Elections Act. Form 61, which deals with the return of election expenses, contains form No. 63 which sets out what the official agent is supposed to do. The hon. member for Port Arthur referred to a book which contains instructions for returning officers with respect to by-elections. I assume they would apply also to general elections. On page 265 of this book, under item No. 1, we find the following:

1—Receipts.

(a) Money or its value received.

There are accurately set out hereunder the name and occupation of every person (including the candidate) and of every club, society, company or association, from whom any money, securities or the equivalent of money was received in respect of expenses incurred on account of or in connection with or incidental to the above election, showing in the case of each person the amount or value received as a contribution (including subscription or gift), loan, advance, deposit or otherwise.

In essence parliament has decided it is desirable that the official agent of the candidate shall make known to the public the amounts of money, the loans, the gifts, the bequests, the securities, or anything else of a similar nature, contributed toward the expenses of the candidate in a particular constituency. Although parliament has decided that it is desirable for the public to know where this money comes from, this requirement is not met because of the existence of provincial or national associations of political parties. If, for argument's sake, my official agent, or any candidate's official agent, receives the sum of $5,000 from the national or provincial party, the entry he makes on the return is: "Name, C.C.F., provincial, British Columbia, or Yukon section," or whatever it may be. "Address, British Columbia; occupation, political party," I suppose. The source of the $5,000, whether it is from a company, association, society or the like, is not revealed; it is hidden.

If parliament has decided that it is a desirable thing to make known to the public the contributions toward election expenses, in so far as the official agent is concerned, then to me it is an equally desirable thing, or even perhaps more desirable, that parliament should enlarge this and say it is also in the public interest to make known the contributions which are made at the national or provincial level as well. Otherwise, although parliament has decided it is desirable to do this sort of thing, a loophole would exist so that anyone who wanted to make a contribution with strings attached, as Senator Douglas and others have pointed out has happened, as a sort of prepayment for favours expected, could do so.

Anyone who wished to engage in this sort of contributing with strings attached, could easily evade the provisions of the Canada Elections Act as passed by parliament by making the contributions initially to some person other than the official agent. He could make it to a national association, or a provincial association, or even to a constituency association. On the return the agent could say that the money was received from some general source within the party. This gets around the provision of the Canada Elections Act which parliament decided was essential when it said that the public should have knowledge of most of the contributions made toward election expenses.

Civil service commission—

66. Salaries and contingencies of the commission including compensation in accordance with the suggestion award plan of the public service of Canada, $4,486,681.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on this item which relates to the civil service commission. I noted in the Gazette of this morning a further reference to Dr. Chaput and his case. The article reads:

Chaput says he'll reply in few days

Dr. Marcel Chaput, vice president of a Quebec secessionist movement, yesterday said he will reply within a few days to an invitation that he quit his defence research board job.

He said he will issue a statement replying to Dr. J. E. Keyston, vice president of the board. Dr. Keyston said Thursday Dr. Chaput's "political activities" are incompatible with his work as a federal government civil servant.

Dr. Chaput, 42-year old chemist for the defence research board, has been in federal service for 17 years.

There were rumours that a group of Progressive Conservative M.P.'s would ask Prime Minister Diefenbaker to see that Dr. Chaput is not forced out.

Dr. Chaput Wednesday night addressed a meeting of "le réassemblement pour l'indépendance nationale". He said that Quebec will secede from confederation before 1967 if the secession movement continues to expand at the present rate.

Jean-Noel Tremblay, Progressive Conservative member for Roberval who was one of three government members attending the meeting in Hull, said he had not heard of any project to approach Mr. Diefenbaker about Dr. Chaput's job.

I rise to say a few words on the question, because I am concerned on two grounds.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): May I raise a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. gentleman, I believe, is talking about an employee of the defence research board. The defence research board is in no way under the jurisdiction of the civil service commission, and the employees are not civil servants under the commission. Normally, in my submission, it would not be appropriate to discuss the matter under this item, but it would be appropriate under an item of the Department of National Defence estimates.

Mr. Herridge: I have been informed that this gentleman has been a civil servant for 17 years.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The employees of the defence research board do not come under the civil service commission.

Mr. Herridge: Perhaps the minister could inform the committee whether he is a civil servant.

Mr. Dorion: No, he is not.

Mr. Herridge: Then it is not in order for me to discuss the matter under this item?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): If I may intercede at this point, I would say the matter does not appear to come within the administrative responsibility of the department under discussion. Inasmuch as the estimates of the Department of National Defence still have to come before the committee, I think the hon. gentleman should defer his comments until that time.

Mr. Herridge: If I have definite assurance that this gentleman is not a civil servant, I shall defer my remarks.

Mr. Dorion: That is true.

Item agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): That concludes the estimates of the Department of Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

131. Departmental administration, $473,500.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, there are several matters of a general nature about which I wish to say something on this first item of the Department of Fisheries. The most urgent is a matter which I mentioned in connection with the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I am not sure whether or not the Minister of Fisheries was in the committee at that time.

I am referring to the surplus of salt fish which is overhanging the market, and the grave uncertainties in the markets for salt fish resulting from the Cuban revolution, as well as the economic difficulties facing the government of Cuba. Notwithstanding the enthusiasm for Cuba shown by the Minister of Trade and Commerce some time ago, he seems to have repented more recently of his earlier enthusiasm. Of course recent events in another market for our salt fish give us no cause to feel confident that there will be the kind of political stability in that area which would give us an assurance of the maintenance of the market.

The plain fact is, sir, that the market for salt fish in the Caribbean is, on political grounds, not as good as it was. As the minister knows very well, the market for salt fish in Europe is not being completely satisfied because fish of the right quality is not being produced in adequate quantities. The minister knows very well that for some time I have been an exponent, and I am an unrepentant exponent, of the view that serious steps should be taken to retain that market. In order to forestall the question, "Why didn't you do it", I shall say at once that I urged his predecessor to do so, but without success. I think a mistake was made by the previous government in not taking action when we were in office. I think that mistake is being perpetuated at the present time.

I do feel that during the period while we are developing the necessary technical know-how to produce light salt fish of Italian and Spanish quality in sufficient quantities to meet the market, an incentive bonus should be paid to the fishermen in order to keep the market alive. I feel this could be done in exactly the same way that the government, before the second world war, provided a bonus for quality bacon in order to maintain and expand the British market.

I regret that no steps of that kind have been taken. I feel that such action is all the more urgent because, as the minister is well aware, there has been an increasing tendency in the last two or three years to produce more and more heavy salted fish which cannot be sold in Europe but can only be sold in the Caribbean at a time when, for political more than economic reasons, the market in the Caribbean is not as good as it was.

I know the minister is thoroughly aware of this problem. I think the matter is sufficiently serious that, if we are going to have any assurance of a market at all at a decent price for this year's catch and the salt fish that will be made this year, then the surplus from last year should be taken off the market and used somewhere else outside our normal commercial markets. This has been done, of course, over and over again with farm products. This government has been fortunate in that it has not had to take such action so far as salt fish is concerned since it came into office. Action of this nature was taken on one or two occasions when the previous administration was in office.

The minister is very familiar with the speech given at Charlottetown on February 27, 1958 by the Prime Minister, of which I have reminded him every year since and which I think ought to be on the record again. This was one of those "Let no one suffer" speeches by the Prime Minister. The first paragraph of this report by Mr. Bruce Macdonald, who was then correspondent of the Toronto Star, reads as follows:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker intimated here last night that a Conservative government will place a floor price under fish and contended the agricultural support bill passed last session will provide "crash insurance" for all farm products.

I read the whole sentence, and for this reason. The agricultural prices support board, as the minister knows—it is now called the stabilization board, I think, but it is the same thing—has spent millions and millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money supporting farm prices, but nothing whatever has been done so far as salt fish is concerned. Happily, up until this year, nothing has been needed in any critical sense. This year action is needed. The fishermen are not going to be very well pleased unless they are treated with the same consideration—I do not mean sympathetic consideration, either; I mean action—that has been given in respect of farm products on many occasions.

This is a crisis or an emergency. There is only one way in which it can be met, and that is by taking the surplus off the market and disposing of it somewhere else. It is good food. There are many people all over the world who are starving. The cost of dealing with this situation would not be very great. The funds are available. The Fisheries Prices Support Act is there. The funds are there. All that is required is a decision and action by the government. I am sure that we can expect the minister, before the conclusion of his estimates and probably on the item relating to the fisheries prices support board, to give a considered statement on what the government intends to do to meet this urgent problem.

At the same time I wish to say something about another matter; about which the hon. member for St. John's East had something to say the other day. I was a little surprised when I asked the hon. gentleman if he had ever been to Valleyfield, after he had criticized the operation of the experimental station there, and he admitted that he had never been there. He also suggested that it was so remote that it was not reasonable to expect him to go there. I may say, of course, that the view taken by the hon. member for St. John's East is a view that is taken by a good many others in St. John's about the rest of Newfoundland, namely that the places are so remote that nobody could be expected to go there.

But I can tell you, Mr. Chairman, and the Minister of Fisheries that in those areas in which is caught a great part of the fish that is made into salt fish—that is, on the northeast coast—Valleyfield is not as remote from the fishery as is St. John's geographically. It may be true that it was more remote before the road was built, when one had to travel by boat or by aircraft, but today you can drive from Gander to Valleyfield in, I suppose, three hours. Valleyfield is centrally located so far as the fishery on the northeast coast of Newfoundland is concerned.

I have talked to a great many of those who are interested in the work being done at Valleyfield. My experience has been that those engaged in the salt fish industry, not merely in Newfoundland but in the other Atlantic provinces as well, have been keenly interested in what has been done at the Valleyfield experimental plant.The only regret many of us have is that more is not being done, and that there is not an even bigger program. The department has had an admirable staff there. They have had one man, a scientist, who I think was close to being a genius. We were sorry to see him leave Valleyfield in order to serve the department somewhere else, but already a great many useful things have been discovered there. If the minister will continue to give that experiment the support and encouragement he has given to it up until now—and I commend him for it—and if he will not be discouraged by observations made by people who have never taken the trouble to go to see the place, I am quite sure that it will pay great dividends over the years to our fishermen.

There is no doubt whatsoever that if we are to maintain a proper balance in the cod fishery and not depend entirely on a single market, namely the United States market, we shall be obliged to continue to produce salt fish as well as fresh fish and fresh frozen fish. If we allow the salt fishery to decline steadily it means that the fishermen will have only one market, as was pointed out earlier in the discussion of these estimates by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. We shall be dependent entirely upon what the United States market will take.

There is an opportunity for an admirable balance between the two markets. If we can maintain our market for salt fish and our markets for fresh fish, it is unlikely—it has rarely happened, except in great world depressions like that in the thirties—that the markets for both kinds of fish would go down at the same time. One year you get a good year in the fresh fish markets and more fish can be sold there. Another year you get a good year in the salt fish market and more fish can be sold there. That diversification of markets is of great advantage to the fishermen and to everybody engaged in the fisheries. It is a position that we ought jealously to guard and also to encourage in every possible way.

We know that in the British West Indies great changes are taking place. We know that in Puerto Rico great changes are taking place, and that there is an improvement in the economy of both those areas. We have reason to hope that improvement will continue. In both those areas we have seen the practical effect of the kind of aid to underdeveloped areas which this country has pioneered and which is bearing fruit there. But what that means is this. As the standards of living and the income of the people in those areas improve and, we hope, will continue to improve, they are going to want a better kind of food product. I think they are still going to want salt fish. I do not think there is any doubt about that. I am no expert on these nutritional problems, but I am told that in those hot countries salt is necessary in the diet, and that salt fish is going to continue to be required.

However, we should be preparing a better kind of product, a better packaged product, and should be experimenting with every kind of improvement so that as the standard of living rises in those areas, we can continue to satisfy the demand.

Of course the more we do in aiding the development of this area, the better; particularly in the West Indies Federation which is on the verge, one hopes, of becoming another member of the commonwealth and a united one. We know that there is a great problem there at the moment. We have high hopes of that. It seems to me that there is no area in the world outside the borders of Canada that is so closely connected by historical, traditional, geographical and economic ties with Canada as is that particular area. Not just for the good of the salt fishery but for the good of this whole hemisphere and for the economic advantage of Canada itself, we should seek to foster closer relations between Canada and that area; I refer particularly to closer financial and economic relations. We are natural complements of one another economically. It seems to me that we should particularly seek to conserve and to exploit, in the best sense of that word, the market there for our Canadian products, and particularly for the traditional product that we have exported to that area over the years, namely salt fish. In order to do that I suggest that marketing and production research and research of all types will be required.

I have said on many occasions in the last two years that there are many areas in which the market for salt fish could be extended right here on the mainland of Canada. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has not followed in my footsteps in many respects, but in one she has. The hon. lady has continued to permit the entry to Canada every year of many thousands of Italian immigrants, all of whom are fish eaters, and most of whom are salt fish eaters. I do not believe the Department of Fisheries or the fish industry have made an adequate effort to maintain a market for our salt fish products among these new inhabitants and future citizens of Canada. Some are no longer future citizens. Most of those I admitted are now qualified for citizenship by the efflux of time, and I assume that by next year all of them will be qualified to be citizens.

Here we have a large section of our population concentrated to a very great degree in three or four metropolitan areas, Toronto, Montreal and Hamilton being the most conspicuous, accustomed to shops run by their own people, with a press of their own. It is a market that should be easy to reach and develop if we have the initiative and energy to do it. I suggest that here again there can be that combination of public and private initiative which has been characteristic of the Canadian economy in every dynamic period we have had in our history, and which is needed in this field as it is in so many others.

I dwell a great deal on the salt fish industry simply because I represent a constituency, as do most of my colleagues here from the province of Newfoundland, in which perhaps more persons are concerned with the salt fishery than with any other occupation, even the woods industry, which is the other big source of employment in Newfoundland.

I wish to say something about unemployment insurance in relation to the fisheries. I shall not talk about those aspects of unemployment insurance for fishermen that are properly the concern of the Minister of Labour. I recognize, of course, that the Minister of Labour would have to sponsor any amendments to the unemployment insurance regulations or to the act itself. I do not think amendments to the act are needed to accomplish what I am going to suggest should be done, but I do think amendments to the regulations are needed, and I believe the Minister of Fisheries should be urging these changes upon the Minister of Labour because they are changes which affect the balance between the fish that goes into the salt fish markets and that which goes into the fresh fish markets.

As the minister very well knows, a fisherman who makes his own salt fish is allowed to average his catch over the whole season and get stamps in proportion, but those who sell fresh fish to the fish plants are not allowed to do that. There may be occasions when the earnings for a two week period are averaged, but not more than that, and generally speaking the earnings of each week have to be treated separately. This has the effect of interfering with the proper economic distribution of the fish as between fresh and frozen fish plants, and the making of salt fish or the selling of fish as salt bulk.

I know from my experience in my own riding that in one or two promising areas where there were fresh fish plants, those plants have been closed because the fishermen would not sell to them due to the fact that they could not get their unemployment insurance stamps, whereas they could obtain stamps by selling salt bulk to be sent to Nova Scotia to be processed there. I have no objection to the Nova Scotians buying salt bulk in Newfoundland. There is no doubt but that it has helped a great deal to keep up the price of fish and has contributed to the income of the fishermen. But I do say it is a shame to have fish plants closed in Newfoundland which are willing to pay the same price and perhaps an even better price than that paid for salt bulk, but which the rigid regulations of the unemployment insurance commission make the fisherman unwilling to sell to them.

I know there are those who go about in a sneering way—most of them seem to come from areas a long way from the Atlantic region—and say that all the fishermen have done since they obtained unemployment insurance has been to fish for stamps. I say that is a libel on a hard working section of our population. The fishermen, like working men in other sections of the population, want reasonable protection under unemployment insurance. I know this is not very well understood in many other parts of the country, but let me say that the fishermen want unemployment insurance and not some other form of social security, because, with unemployment insurance, they are able to continue working in periods when they cannot fish and thus, by getting additional stamps, build up their social security. There are those who say that instead of unemployment insurance there should be a special scheme for fishermen, but that would not suit the fishermen in that it would mean they could not go to the woods when the fishery is over to earn their living with the continuing advantage of unemployment insurance. What they want is to have the two kinds of employment under the same unemployment insurance scheme.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Macdonnell: I wonder if I may ask the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate a question. If I correctly understood him, he said this morning that a certain type of fish is not being so produced that the best quality is reaching the various markets. Would he please say something further on that subject before he resumes his seat?

Mr. Pickersgill: The situation is this: there are certain markets in which only what is called heavy salted fish is acceptable. There are other markets which insist on light salted fish. Of course, light salted fish is a product, almost exclusively, of Newfoundland. I say "almost exclusively" because I see the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Fisheries looking at me, and I believe the only other place where it is produced is in Gaspe. There is no market for heavy salted fish in Europe. The market is only for light salted fish of a high quality.

I was saying this morning that there was not enough of this high quality fish being produced to satisfy the demand. No one has yet found a way of processing light salted fish in mechanical dryers cheaply enough to enable it to be produced successfully for export. There was an experiment carried out at Bonavista which proved that Italian fish could be made successfully, in artificial dryers, but it cost more to make it than it would sell for. The problem is one on which the department is working at the present time particularly in Valleyfield and in co-operation with cetrain fish processors and those engaged in this work are hoping to find a process of making light salted fish at a cost sufficiently low to enable the product to be sold at a profit. Meanwhile, production of the light salted fish now going on to the market depends on the fishermen making their own fish on the flakes—the expression "making" means drying and curing. Increasingly, the fishermen are reluctant to do this work. If they can sell their fish for practically the same price as fresh fish or as salt bulk to be made into heavy salted fish, they prefer to do that, and catch more fish, than to make light salted fish themselves. What I suggested was that we should pay an incentive bonus in respect to this light salted fish made by the fishermen until such time as we have overcome the problem of making light salted fish in mechanical dryers economically, as I am sure, in time, we shall do. That is the nature of the problem.

Mr. Macdonnell: I thank the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pickersgill: At one o'clock I was speaking about unemployment insurance for fishermen and about one of the problems which had arisen because of the different methods of allowing stamps in the case of fresh fish and the case of salt fish. I was suggesting that because the regulations as they now stand have the effect of encouraging fishermen to sell fish as salt fish, particularly in some parts of the country, we should adapt the regulations to the economic problem instead of aggravating the economic problem by maintaining the existing regulations. I felt I must enter a caveat at that point, and that is what I was in the process of doing when we reached one o'clock. It is this: I hope the government will not consider for one minute the abandonment of unemployment insurance for fishermen.

There are many advocates of the abandonment of unemployment insurance for fishermen and the substitution of what is called a special scheme. The fishermen do not want this. They want to continue to be covered by unemployment insurance in order that they may cumulate the stamps they get through fishing with the stamps they get through other kinds of labour. Fishing nearly everywhere in Canada is a seasonal occupation and it is very difficult to get enough stamps during the season, in many places, to qualify for unemployment insurance. Contrary to what many people suggest, most fishermen do not want to qualify for benefit if they can get jobs. If the employment service is able to offer them work I believe, speaking for the people that I represent, that they would be very glad to take a job rather than the insurance payments. But they must not be allowed to fall between two stools. In the days when unemployment insurance was introduced in 1957 it was still relatively easy for fishermen to get jobs in other occupations. In the preceding five or six years there had been a tremendous exodus from the fishery. The introduction of unemployment insurance halted that exodus. It kept the fishermen in the fishery during the season; they realized that when the season was over they could get work in the lumber industry, or in carpentry and get stamps which would qualify them for a short period of benefit if they became unemployed. Unfortunately, it does not work that way now, because work has been so scarce.

I was pained to read in the Toronto Star on April 21 an account of the statement made by the minister before the Fisheries Council of Canada in Toronto. I am sure that if the minister is not satisfied with the way he has been reported he will say so. I should just like to quote from a story which appeared in the Toronto Star of April 11, 1961 which reads as follows:

> Hon. J. Angus MacLean, Minister of Fisheries, said the government is looking for a new approach for unemployment insurance for fishermen—

I do not mind that part of the statement at all, because I think there should be a new approach to this situation as long as it is within the ambit of unemployment insurance. Then the article reports the minister to have said, and this is in quotation marks, the following:

> "—to remove the incentive which appears to be so prevalent in some areas to fish for unemployment insurance stamps."

I do not think the minister meant that in the way it sounds. I feel that fishermen naturally want to be protected by unemployment insurance just as everyone else who is covered by it does. That is not dishonourable on their part. It is not dishonourable at all. Fishermen should certainly receive the benefits of this great social security measure. The implied suggestion that fishermen just fish to get enough stamps to live without work is, I think, quite wrong, and certainly quite contrary to any experience I have ever had. I receive letters every fall from individuals who have been fishing, who are looking for jobs in the woods, in Labrador, or anywhere else so that they may earn a living for their families. I think that is the general experience in this regard.

I suggest we change the regulations so as to rid them of some of these anomalies, but let us not contemplate for a moment the abandonment of unemployment insurance for fishermen, I hope the minister will reassure us, when he speaks, that he intended no such thing.

I should now like to say a word in commendation of the government regarding two things it has done. First, the portable bait freezers have been very successful, and I am very glad to know that one is going to be placed in my constituency this year, but I could inform the minister of six or seven other places in my constituency which have a need for these freezers which is almost as great, if not as great, as the need of the community that is receiving one. I understand these portable bait freezers cost in the neighbourhood of only $15,000 to $20,000 each.

Mr. Carter: No, $5,000 to $6,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: My friend the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo informs me they cost much less than I understood. He says they cost $5,000 to $6,000. It seems to me that, in view of the small expenditure of money required to make the fisheries so much more efficient, we ought to have a blitz and situate them, all in one year, in every settlement where they are required. I do not suggest they be placed at every place along the coast, because there are some communities where only two or three fishermen operate. However, these freezers are portable and, if a mistake is made in placing one, that mistake is not irrevocable; the unit can be moved to another community. Why does the government not spend $250,000, if it is even that much, and put these fishermen in a position to fish with much greater efficiency, and thereby increase their income?

I should also at this time like to say a word regarding community stages, which have already proven to be very successful. I admit they are not portable, and it is very important that they be placed in the proper areas.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Is there unanimous consent in this committee to allow the hon. gentleman to carry on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I appreciate that very much because I think in five or six minutes I shall be able to say everything I wanted to say of a general nature, and the body of my remarks will then appear on the record in one place instead of in bits and pieces.

Regarding community stages, I merely intended to say that where they had been well located—most of them have been so placed, and some have been exceptionally well located—they have increased the productivity and profitability of the fisheries of the community out of all recognition. I am sure that within a relatively few years the increased returns to the exchequer alone, to say nothing of the returns to the economy as a whole, will pay for them.

Again I say that I do not know why we do not do this job thoroughly rather than just building two or three, or six or seven stages per year. I feel that they should be placed immediately everywhere they are needed to stabilize the fisheries and thereby place the fishermen in a position to make a better living, under more satisfactory conditions and, incidentally, to make it possible to produce a better product. These community stages, with a reasonable water supply, with greater sanitation and so on, do result in the production of a better product than is produced by the use of the old stages of individual fishermen.

I must say that I was rather disappointed when I asked the minister a couple of weeks ago if the government was contemplating any legislation for the fisheries comparable to the legislation introduced by his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, and I refer to the rural rehabilitation legislation. The rural rehabilitation legislation is, of course, designed for the improvement of the rural economy in those areas which need rehabilitation. It is certainly true that, as far as the east coast fisheries are concerned, there is just as much need for community rehabilitation, for the improvement of fishermen's gear, boats and other implements of production, as there is in any rural area of this country. I urge the minister and the government to seek to do something comparable in respect to our fisheries. I admit that such a program would be carried out on a long term basis and would have very little immediate effect. That is of course true of the rural rehabilitation program. However, this is a patrimony that we ought to seek to preserve.

It is very extraordinary that we have, off the coast of Newfoundland and the east coast of Canada, the greatest fishery in the world; a fishery that has been exploited for 500 years by the Portuguese, the French and the English, and which is being exploited today, not merely by the historic fishing nations, but by the Russians and the Germans, all whom have to cross the Atlantic, making voyages from 3,000 to 4,000 miles, and who feel there is an economic advantage in doing so. Here we are right at the front doorstep of this great fishery and yet the fishery is perhaps the most depressed of our industries. Surely that is not a situation we can regard with satisfaction. Surely we should not throw up our hands and say that we have developed such a high cost economy and such a high standard of living in this country that we cannot take advantage of that great natural wealth at our doorstep. We cannot take advantage of it by using nineteenth century methods. It is impossible to do that. Technological advances have enabled other countries to maintain their fisheries.

This is the most ancient of all our industries, and one which is of great importance to a large segment of our population living in the five eastern provinces, as well as, of course, in the province of British Columbia, where the fisheries are rather different, and about which I would not attempt to speak because of my lack of direct knowldge. This is the industry from which many of the people living in the five eastern provinces derive their livelihood. Surely no industry is in more urgent need of the kind of consideration that is being given to those agricultural rural communities which need rehabilitation. I suggest this is one area where there is a demand for vision and for action.

Mr. Chairman, since I have been transgressing on the time of others, that will be my last word regarding this subject at this stage of the estimates.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on the general item, I should like to state that I have no intention of unnecessarily holding up the minister's estimates. However, I feel that in view of the importance of fishing to the constituency which I represent, and in view of some of the observations which have been made by hon. members in this committee, certain information should be placed on the record.

The fishing industry, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, is very old. Long before there was any western Canada we had a fishery on the east coast. As a matter of fact, history discloses that one of the first commercial companies was given the exclusive right to the sea and inland fisheries of Canada on certain terms.

I was quite interested in the observation of the hon. member relating to codfish in Newfoundland. This interest arises also out of the statement made by the premier of that province that the codfishery of Newfoundland was on the decline. We sometimes wonder whether the decline is due to the lack of markets, improper methods of curing or even the dearth of improvement in the method of catching fish. Be that as it may, I agree with the hon. member that codfishery is a very important part of the economy of eastern Canada.

When we consider the importance of the fisheries of Canada, I think we should give careful consideration to the problems facing the fishermen, particularly on the east coast. I am not going to say anything about the fisheries of the Pacific coast, of which I know very little, but sometimes hon. members, and possibly the country at large, get the impression that the only segment of our economy of any importance is the farming industry of western Canada.

Let me assure hon. members that we have our problems on the east coast. Perhaps because we are a little more independent and a little more self-reliant we do not ask the government for the same amount of assistance as do our brothers in the western provinces. Nevertheless, we have problems and it is about some of them that I should like to speak for a few minutes this afternoon.

Every year Canadian fishermen take some 2 billion pounds of fish and shellfish from the salt and fresh waters off the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. Those fisheries are valued at approximately $200 million. Therefore, it can be seen that they are of vital importance to the economy of Canada.

The primary fishing industry in Canada supports the families of over 80,000 fishermen and also a number of people connected with the industry in various activities, and this number is increasing every year. This fact should be taken into consideration when we are talking about the per capita income of the various kinds of fishermen. Although there has been an increase in the gross production of fish there has also been an increase in the number of fishermen employed in the industry.

The extent of our fishing activity can be appreciated when we realize that Canadians have access to three of the world's five oceans. Together with its coastal islands, Canada has a sea front of 60,000 miles, which is more than twice the length of the equator. Even more remarkable is the fact that 260,000 square miles of lakes and rivers, one half the fresh water supply of the whole world, are located within Canadian boundaries.

The history of the canning industry in Charlotte goes back a great many years. We find that many years ago sardine canning originated in Eastport in the state of Maine. In the constituency of Charlotte we have the largest sardine factory in the British commonwealth. At St. Andrews we have the largest live lobster pound in the world. On the Atlantic coast groundfish, especially cod and haddock and also lobsters, are the mainstay of the fisheries, while herring, mackerel and other fish add to the value of the industry. The annual Atlantic herring catch, including sardines, is around 225 million pounds, about one third of which is used in my constituency in the canning industry. In addition to this we have smokehouses, pickling plants and the lobster fishing industry. Each of the canning industries, which up to a few years ago operated only a matter of a few months each season, now operates about 10 months of the year, and during the peak of the season the sum of $100,000 to $125,000 is paid out each week for fish, wages and so on. This has been made possible by the improvements made in methods of fishing, type of gear, and in the packing systems and plants.

I do not intend to go into the history of the canning industry, but during the past few years the largest and practically the only packing plant in my constituency, namely that of Connors Brothers Limited, has been packing annually over a million cases of sardines which are sold in all parts of the world. When we consider the number of individuals employed directly or indirectly in this industry, the number of boats operating, the new ones built and old ones repaired and maintained, the number of fishermen and factory workers employed, it will be realized that the fishing industry is a pretty important one in the southern part of New Brunswick. I have some figures which indicate the value of this fishery, and this applies only to the constituency of Charlotte.

In 1959, 97,498,000 pounds of sardines were taken, valued at $1,528,000. In 1960 the quantity had risen to 103,964,000 pounds valued at $1,700,000. These sardines were caught in various types of gear. Of that amount 61.2 per cent were caught in what is known as weirs; 35.6 per cent in purse seines; 2.6 per cent in beach seines; and 0.6 per cent in other types of gear. Therefore, hon. members can see that there is a wide diversification in the type of gear used in this particular industry.

In addition to the herring industry, lobsters provide an excellent and large source of cash income. Most of the catch is marketed alive, fresh boiled or as fresh or frozen lobsters, and sent to all parts of Canada. Recently lobsters have been shipped to Holland by air where they are commanding an excellent price. Let me give an illustration of the value of this particular fishery. In 1959, 879,000 pounds of lobster were taken, valued at $440,000. In 1960, the catch had risen to 1,081,000 pounds, valued at $496,000.

A large scallop bed was recently discovered off the state of Maine. In 1959 nearly 5 million pounds of scallop meat were produced in the area and this development is providing a further source of income.

In connection with the fisheries, a fisheries research board is operated at St. Andrews. In 1958, this government opened a large addition to this board, which has provided excellent service to the fishermen of the area. I am sure this service is appreciated by all my constituents.

This fisheries research board was established at St. Andrews in 1899, and now employs a large number of technicians and scientists, all under the careful guidance and excellent leadership of Dr. Hart. This board not only provides great assistance to the fishermen in my area, but is a source of employment in an area which might otherwise experience difficulty in providing employment. In 1955-60, there was spent on new construction in this area, $417,617; on repairs and maintenance, excluding the fleet of boats, nearly $5,000; on salaries and wages, excluding the crews of the vessels, $527,208; on vessel operations, including the salaries of the crews, $178,928, or a total for that fiscal year of $1,172,190.

The 30th annual report of the Department of Fisheries, which is available to all members, sets out in some detail the value of the fisheries in the maritime provinces and Quebec, and the amount of money expended in the various stations of the maritime area for scientific investigation and protection of the various fisheries. I do not intend to give these figures in detail, but I should like to refer briefly to some of the figures put on the record by the hon. member for Gloucester.

The hon. member for Gloucester represents a riding which is primarily a fishing riding, like my own, although his interests are particularly related to groundfish and not sardines. If the hon. member will examine some of the figures and make some comparisons, I feel he will realize that his criticisms of the Department of Fisheries are unjust and unfair. He indicated, if I interpreted his remarks correctly, that we are not getting a proportionate increase in the value of the fisheries for the amount of money expended by this department.

In 1953-54, we spent on protection in New Brunswick, $485,000, and in 1959-60, $568,000, in round figures. Now, in the same year, 1953-54, we spent on assistance for the construction of vessels, only $57,268, while in 1959-60, we spent $110,335. This indicates that in this period we have doubled our assistance to the fishing fleet. The recent announcement by the Minister of Transport indicating that an increased subsidy would be granted on the construction of fishing vessels was received by my constituents with appreciation. There are several vessels now being completed, and several more are contemplated.

As an indication that the Department of Fisheries is keeping in touch with developments, I would point out that in 1952 the value of fishing gear in Canada was $106 million. In 1958, the latest figures available to me, the value of this same gear had reached over $114 million. The landed value of sardines in the maritimes in 1952 was $1,797,000, while in 1959, only seven years later, it amounted to $3,186,000. Although there was only a slight increase in the value of the cod catch, the lobster catch for the maritimes, excluding Newfoundland, in 1953 was $13 million and in 1959, it was $16 million. Although there has been an increase in the expenditures of the various departments over the intervening years, I think that these expenditures have been justified and have been worth while.

The department is now spending a considerable amount of money on research on the improvement of methods of catching fish, and rendering every possible assistance to the fishermen of Canada. I think at this time I should pay tribute to the minister and, through him, to his officials, for the work done by the department in the investigation of the Passamaquoddy power project. The Department of Fisheries carried out a long and careful survey of the project and formed a part of the two engineering teams that laid before the international joint commission the findings on which the commission based its report. Whether or not this power project is eventually undertaken is not now under discussion but the fact is that the Department of Fisheries, through the fisheries research board, carried out an excellent survey and gave real leadership to that commission.

I think I should make some comments on the unfair discrimination between fishermen in so far as unemployment insurance is concerned. At the present time a very unfair and unjust discrimination is exercised as between the fisherman who catches fresh fish and the fisherman who cures fish. The man who cures fish is able to spread his contributions over a greater period of time and therefore receives greater benefits from his unemployment insurance credits than does the fresh fish man. I would suggest to the minister that some changes might be made in the regulations in order to correct this anomaly. I should like to mention also that, especially in areas where there are a number of fishermen operating at different times of the year and with different types of cure, the regulations should be looked at from time to time in order to ensure that each particular segment of the industry receives a fair opportunity for catching fish. I realize that this is difficult because we have overlapping seasons. However, in so far as the government is able, it should endeavour to provide regulations that will ensure that no group is unjustly discriminated against. I think I should at this time also thank the minister and his officials for the co-operation and assistance given to the people of my area during the past few years.

Mr. Noble: Mr. Chairman, I am especially interested in the welfare of the great lakes fisheries; and I wish to say that the fishermen, sportsmen and many others interested in the great lakes fisheries are looking forward with satisfaction and anticipation to a visit to the Georgian bay and upper lake Huron area of the Minister of Fisheries. His proposed visit is an indication of his desire to secure first-hand information on the problems at present facing the fishermen of these waters.

Despite the fact that some success in lamprey destruction has been achieved, we still have a long way to go in the restoration of our fisheries to any degree of normalcy. Our biologists and researchers are highly respected authorities on the measures that should be taken in this program of rehabilitation of the great lakes fisheries industry. However, the men who man the fishing boats, many of whom have spent their working years on the lakes, have a wealth of knowledge and information that would also be useful in solving the big problem that confronts us. I therefore suggest that meeting with them will be time well spent and could bring to the fore some good practical ideas.

Several streams flowing into Georgian bay were treated with lampricide last year. It was evident that this treatment of these waters was attended by some success, as many young lamprey were destroyed and seen floating along with the current. We may have reached the point where we can control the lamprey, provided that we continue to treat their spawning beds periodically. It can hardly be expected that they can be completely eliminated from the great lakes. But then will this be the last barrier to lake trout production? Shall we find that the smelt has also taken his toll and that control of this predator will also be required before we can build up our lake trout and whitefish populations? With this thought in mind, I would continue to recommend the planting of sockeye and spring salmon fingerlings in the upper great lakes at the earliest convenient opportunity. These fish have proven their ability to survive in these waters and prospects are favourable to the development of a reproduction cycle.

The lake trout, whitefish and pickerel population of the great lakes was never lower than it is right now, nor was there ever a time when we had such an overwhelming population of predators and undesirable fish. There should be no hesitation on the part of the great lakes fisheries commission in using some of their funds for the removing of these undesirable fish from our lakes. The removing of large quantities of these undesirable fish is required if we are to create the proper environment for the propagation of more valuable and desirable fish. Hundreds of fishermen whose boats are now idle would welcome the opportunity to work on such a project.

I should also point out that the majority of the fishermen have reached a time in their lives when they are not acceptable to other industry, but have years of good service ahead of them in their chosen field. These men could be employed on this clean-up program until the desirable fish population was restored to a point that would warrant their return to usual routine of reaping a just reward for their labours.

Seventy two streams on both sides of the border have been treated with lampricide. All these streams flow into lake Superior and lake Michigan with the exception of six flowing into lake Huron and Georgian bay. To make a check on lamprey population during their spawning season of 1960, 4,810 of them were taken by the electrical barrier method on the Canadian side of lake Superior, and more than 39,000 adult lampreys were taken as they entered United States streams. The 1961 program calls for the operation of 39 electrical barriers to measure changes in lamprey population in lake Superior.

While on the matter of destroying lamprey, I should like to put on the record something about an operation that is worthy of mention. On April 20 two former natives of Latvia pitched their tent at a site on the Saugeen river for the purpose of trapping lampreys. They have trapped lamprey at this location for five years and last year they were successful in securing over 10,000, which were roasted and canned for a Toronto market. They anticipate that this year's catch will be a similar quantity. This operation indicates that lamprey are plentiful in lake Huron.

In the great lakes much of the fish population that we wish to reduce does have some commercial value. Mink ranches in the great lakes area are finding it difficult to secure enough codfish racks from the coastal regions to supply their needs; therefore many tons of certain types of lake fish would find a ready market close by.

Now that equipment is available to take alive fish such as suckers, catfish, sunfish, rock bass and perch, another method of marketing has recently developed. These fish can be sold alive to buyers who convey them in tank trucks to private lakes or ponds in the U.S.A. where people pay for the privilege of angling for them. Such establishments are making their appearance now in Canada and a noted development in this field can be expected.

Lake trout in years past were prominent in rewarding sport fishermen. Now that these beautiful game fish have fallen on evil days, our sportsmen in the days ahead will, of necessity, have to rely to some extent on man-made ponds and their production. This is an example of private enterprise stepping into the breach created by negligent handling of one of our great resources. Like any other form of wealth, this inheritance of ours has been misspent to quite some extent. It has been abused and can be ruined for want of care, or it can be wasted by miserly failure to use it fully.

From a conservation viewpoint, the great lakes fisheries are perhaps the most poorly managed of all our natural resources, first, because we do not know enough about the resource itself, and second, because the departments, in their undertaking of the phases of investigation necessary are often hampered by the problem of insufficient, and often inadequate, personnel.

The restoration of our great lakes fisheries will require several years of earnest effort and intelligent planning. Canada and the United States should pool the knowledge of all studies made on both sides of these lakes through all interested and contributing groups so that a directed program could be developed to eliminate the cost and waste of effort in conducting parallel or like projects. This procedure in time, should lead to the development of good management techniques based on this knowledge. In that way we could best utilize this valuable natural resource and hasten the day of restoration.

It is fallacy to think our fisheries, if restored, will be self-perpetuating. The fishing industry is now equipped with modern fishing gear that can locate fish and take them from the water with greater efficiency. This is as it should be. It is one more indication of progress. This is one of our renewable resources and there should be no hesitation in exploiting every possibility that would lend itself to the over-all program of putting this great natural asset back into production of lake trout and whitefish, or the equivalent thereof in quality and demand.

When the great lakes fisheries have been restored to their rightful place in our economy, the knowledge gained during the process should be sufficient, if used wisely, to assure the perpetuation of the industry at a level of high production. I will venture to say that natural production will fall far short in supplying stock of the desirable species. Therefore, artificial processes will be the means of assuring the proper balance. Modern hatcheries will be needed with rearing pond facilities where fry would be fed and protected until they are able to fend for themselves with a reasonable chance of survival.

Perhaps we will also find that some artificial protection will be needed at various points where fish are found to congregate and feed in their early life. Off the coast of Florida a reef was built up of old car bodies which serves this purpose. The interiors of the cars form caves which promote the growth of natural food for the fish as well as providing shelter for small fish so that they have a better chance to survive to adulthood. The use of this idea would be of twofold benefit, in that we could clean up many unsightly areas in the countryside while promoting our fisheries. Perhaps our researchers could discover some cheap material that could be placed in the water at these locations to promote algae and plankton production so that food would be plentiful.

Most of our fish hatcheries in the great lakes area are producing fish for the stocking of our streams and inland lakes. Therefore the basic requirement for the restoration and maintenance of our great lakes fisheries is hatcheries. So I would propose to the minister that at least two modern hatcheries should be provided on the Canadian side of the lakes.

Plans are now under way for the construction of a hatchery at Jordan, Michigan, which is estimated to cost $892,000. This would indicate renewed vigour in the United States effort.

Before I conclude these remarks I want to reiterate that our great lakes fishermen are in trouble. Twenty five fishing boats left Kingsville a few weeks ago and returned with only enough perch to fill fifteen 60-pound boxes. In 1959, 11,000 pounds of lake trout were taken from lake Huron, and in 1960 only 200 pounds were taken during the year.

A few days ago a 100-pound box of lake trout and whitefish arrived at Meaford from northern Saskatchewan and the express was in excess of what these same fish sold for a few years ago, when Meaford was a noted lake trout centre.

Now, sir, after having been in close association with the great lakes fisheries for over 25 years, and during that period having used hundreds of tons of fish for food on our mink ranch, I believe I am in a position to make some pertinent observations in respect to this industry. In that time I have seen a thriving, renewable resource descend from prosperity to the depths of poverty. During this transition those charged with the welfare of the industry were indifferent to a variety of factors contributing to the decline of the industry. This deterioration has been more pronounced since the lamprey and smelts appeared on the scene; but these are not completely responsible, mismanagement must be included.

With this thought in mind, sir, I would suggest that it is hard for any business to prosper under dual control. Therefore I am of the opinion that this work of restoring and maintaining one of our great natural resources, which we share with another country, should be under the complete control of the federal government, and thereby we would eliminate any duplication of effort in management or administration of this, the largest body of fresh water in the world.

In conclusion, I would further suggest that the great lakes fisheries be given prominence at the resources for tomorrow conference in Montreal next October.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make just a few comments about two or three specific items before the minister replies and answers the various questions asked. I do so in order that all the minister's comments may be in one place rather than being scattered throughout Hansard.

The salmon fishery in British Columbia normally accounts, I think, for 65 per cent or 70 per cent of the landed value of fish in that province. Accordingly, from an economic and other points of view it is the most valuable fishery we have on the west coast. There has been a notable decline in the salmon catch over the last few years.

For instance—and these figures are in five-year periods—from 1951 to 1955 the salmon catch was 860,080,000 pounds; in the period 1956 to 1960 this dropped to 625,140,000 pounds. This represents about a 25 per cent decline in the quantity of salmon caught, or a decline of over 200 million pounds in that period.

I understand that the salmon catch of last year was the lowest it has been during this century; the total was a little over 75 million pounds landed. Apart from the loss to fishermen of income and the loss in food value to the population, I think one can speculate about some of the reasons for the decline in the salmon fishery.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Howard: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member mind repeating the first figure, which I think was 700 million or 800 million pounds, and then it came down to a figure of 75 million, if I remember well. Over what period of years was that drop?

Mr. Howard: Perhaps I could give the figures again. There are a number of different periods involved here. In the period 1951 to 1955 there were 860,080,000 pounds of salmon caught. In 1955 to 1960 inclusive, there were 625,140,000 pounds caught. This is a decline in one five-year period over the other of 234,940,000 pounds, or about 25 per cent. The 75 million pounds figure I used was the catch for 1960, just the one year. In fact, it was more than 75 million pounds; the actual figure I have here is 77,590,000 pounds. I used the figure of 75 million in round terms.

Mr. Macdonnell: If you multiplied it by five, it would again be a big drop.

Mr. Howard: Yes, but multiplying it by five would not give us an accurate picture for that five-year period, because this 1960 figure of 77 million pounds was the lowest catch since the turn of the century; so if we multiplied that low figure by five it would really put it a bit out of balance, I think.

I think there are a number of factors contributing to the decline in the catch of salmon and the decline of the fishery over this period of time which requires some examination.

We are a participant, as I mentioned earlier, with Japan and the United States in the international north Pacific salmon fisheries commission and agree with those other countries as to areas in the north Pacific for fishing so that immature fish will not be caught.

In recent years—and I should like the minister to bring us up to date on this matter so far as the knowledge of his department is concerned—we have known of Soviet ships being in that general area. As I understand it, a few years ago at least they were searching or fishing for bottom fish, or halibut, rather than salmon. This does not preclude the possibility of those ships fishing for salmon in those waters and it would account for some decline in the numbers of fish returning to the spawning grounds. There has been some disagreement as to whether the line of demarcation with the Japanese fishery is in the right place and the question has been raised whether or not the Japanese fleet has been catching Canadian salmon in that area. The Department of Fisheries and the commission has said this is not so and that no Canadian fish have been caught by Japanese vessels. In any event I think this is an area for examination, especially from the point of view of the Soviet fishing fleet, so that we may learn whether or not these factors are contributing to the decline in the numbers of Pacific coast salmon.

Another factor contributing to this decline is the use of insecticides when spraying operations are conducted in forest areas. It applies also to the east coast where different fisheries are affected. One such spraying operation was conducted recently on Vancouver island and another in the Queen Charlotte islands area. There have been further instances. Insecticides, though carefully chosen after consultations between the various departments interested, including the Department of Fisheries, do have a deleterious effect on the fry. They are a poison to them. This has undoubtedly contributed to the death of some of the young salmon in our streams. The logging industry on the west coast is an important part of our economy and its operations range from the southern extremity of the coast to the northern boundary of Alaska. The entire coastal area is the scene of logging operations by companies of various sizes. Their work leads, to some extent, to the denudation of our forests and consequent soil erosion. In addition, debris from the logging industry piles up in rivers and streams with a further detrimental effect on the salmon fishery. Water pollution obviously presents another threat to the salmon fishery. In Kitimat a while ago where there was a construction project in progress gravel was removed from the Kitimat river to mix with concrete, though I know there are laws which prohibit this sort of thing. Salmon spawning grounds have been destroyed in some instances through the removal of gravel in this way. Hydroelectric development has also had an adverse effect in some cases on the ability of salmon to reach their spawning grounds and on the spawning grounds themselves.

All these factors, in addition to others, have contributed to the decline in the salmon fishing industry and I am sure the difficulties will not be overcome merely by shortening the season or by imposing closures from time to time. It seems to me that the provision of a special fund to deal specifically with situations arising in the salmon fishery would prove of great advantage. Such a fund might be used in conjunction with the province of British Columbia to encourage reforestation and to ensure that salmon streams are not blocked, even temporarily, by logging debris. I think, also, that we might engage in the building of storage dams along the lines recommended in the report of the Fraser river board to ensure a regular flow of water through our salmon streams.

Stocks of salmon are also being depleted by predatory fish such as dogfish. An extensive program of destruction coupled with a research program into the economic use, for example, of dogfish, would also help to arrest the gradual decline of the salmon fishery over the years. It has been suggested that sport fishermen should not be allowed to fish inside the fishing boundary and that by fishing inside the boundary they are contributing to the decline of the salmon fishery. I raise these considerations in a general way at this time hoping that the minister will be able to make some conclusive announcement concerning the activities of his department in this regard because, as I have said, the salmon fishery in British Columbia is not a minor one; any decline in that industry has a serious widespread effect.

The last time I spoke on this subject I made reference to the report of Dr. Sinclair on the question of licence elimination. Since that time I have received from the united fishermen and allied workers' union a resolution which was passed at the union's recent convention held in March this year. This dealt with the Sinclair licence limitation report and passed a couple of resolutions one of which resulted in a telegram being dispatched to the Minister of Fisheries and to the Prime Minister. The resolution reads as follows:

> Therefore be it resolved this seventeenth annual convention strongly and urgently demand immediate action by the government of Canada, and in particular the Minister of Fisheries, to introduce legislation imposing a five year moratorium on the issuance of new licences and providing that any licence that has not been renewed in any year or any licence which is not utilized in commercial fishing in any year be cancelled.
> Be it further resolved the foregoing legislation provide that commercial fishing licences in 1961 and continuing until 1965 shall not be issued to any person who did not hold a commercial fishing licence in 1960. The only exceptions to this rule should be: (a) the holder of a licence in 1959 who was unable to fish in 1960 due to proven illness (b) sons of fishermen who came of age in 1961 and have applied for licences with serious intent (c) any other special circumstances with all such cases being reviewed by an impartial board consisting of representatives of the united fishermen and allied workers' union, native brotherhood of B.C. deep sea fishermen's union of Prince Rupert, Prince Rupert fishermen's co-operative association, and the Vancouver and Prince Rupert vessel owners' associations and the government.

I should like to ask the minister to tell the committee what answer has been given to the wire which was sent with respect to this resolution, in order that the public may understand what action the government has undertaken with respect to this particular report and the suggestions made by the fishermen's union.

That convention also passed a resolution regarding the Sinclair report in respect of licence limitations. I should just like to quote the resolution to which I have reference. It reads as follows:

> Therefore be it resolved this seventeenth annual convention demands of the government of Canada and the government of the province of B.C. an immediate start on a thorough study of costs, earnings, price fixing, capital accumulations, export for capital, reinvestment of capital, financing systems and earnings of individuals directing and employed by the fishing companies and a thorough study of the costs, earnings and capital accumulation of private vessel owners employing two or more men in the fishing industry. The reports, when completed, to be released in the same manner as this Sol Sinclair report, but without the unnecessary delay of fifteen months experienced in release of this report.

Those two resolutions were passed at that convention, albeit a short while after the Sinclair report was released. It may well be that the resolutions passed were not worded in such a way as to cover all the possibilities arising out of the Sinclair report, nevertheless, this represents action taken in resolution form. I hope the minister will enlighten us and bring us up to date in regard to these particular methods.

I should like to mention one other subject before I sit down. Mr. Val Gwyther, a few years ago, wrote an imaginative article which appeared in the B.C. Professional Engineer, and also in the U.B.C. Chronicle. There have been reprints of his article appearing elsewhere. The gist of the article was that it was possible to develop the Fraser river for hydroelectric purposes, while at the same time retaining it as a fish river. When this article appeared in 1958, practically everyone in the fishing industry, as well as the engineering field, apart from British Columbia electric employees, who have a definite interest in this matter, suggested that Mr. Gwyther was attempting to put across propaganda in favour of the power industries in British Columbia. This suggestion has been refuted by subsequent writers, engineers and fishery people, and Mr. Gwyther has not been deterred from engaging in the promotion of the so-called multiple use of the Fraser. Within the last week or two, as a matter of fact, he made a speech or wrote an article, in which he stated that, following studies made over a period of two years, proof had been obtained of the feasibility of using the Fraser for the purposes of developing hydroelectric energy, while maintaining it as a salmon spawning river.

I should like the minister to comment in regard to what has been done in this field, and tell us what the results are of the engineering studies, if any, which have been made.

My own personal opinion in this regard is that Mr. Gwyther, in stating again that the Fraser river can be used for this dual purpose, has indicated he did not know what he was talking about in 1958. However, this is of vital importance to the fisheries on the west coast, with particular reference to the salmon fisheries of the Fraser, which is the most important fish river in British Columbia. In order to ensure that commercial hydro-electric companies, such as the B.C. Electric Company, and other industries in this field, are not successful in their ventures to use the Fraser river for this dual purpose, they should not be allowed to issue propaganda under the guise of studies which indicate the river can be successfully used for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps I should leave the subject at that, with the hope that other hon. members interested in it will place their remarks on the record.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, up to this point in the discussion of these estimates we have heard a great many references to many phases of Canada's fisheries. I should like to begin by making a few references to research in the fishing industry.

The minister in making his statement of May 11 referred at some length to the research activities of his department, and stated that across the country important research projects were going forward as a basis for expansion and development of our fisheries. I think everyone knows that Canada is not a country which is noted for the amount of research being done, particularly in view of the fact that this is a country with many valuable natural resources. This is as true of the fishing industry, as it is true of every segment of our economy. Research projects in the fishing industry now in progress are indeed important and worth while. However, I believe that more intensive work is required if Canada is to remain in a competitive position in the northwest Atlantic region.

In the province of Newfoundland limited fisheries research has been going on for almost three quarters of a century. Over 70 years ago Adolph Neilson initiated a form of fisheries research which was continued up to and during the 1930's. Thereafter, Harold Thompson commenced a project financed jointly by the governments of the United Kingdom and Newfoundland. A good deal of worth-while information resulted from this research and, over the years, some of the information has been used to great advantage.

The present Newfoundland research committee, an organization which is over seven years old, paid special attention to the marine resources of Newfoundland at its meeting held during the early part of April of this year. In my opinion this committee is making a contribution to the fund of information concerning the fishing industry as a whole. However, what is needed is a pooling of the research facilities of both the federal and provincial governments in order to define a new approach to the problems of production, processing, marketing and conservation.

There was a time when the fishery of Newfoundland was the foremost industry of the province. Over the years other industries have come into being and have expanded to such an extent as to replace fisheries, in terms of employment, or revenue and maybe both. The activities of the newsprint industry, as well as of mining production, have placed the fishing industry in a relatively less important position. Let me hasten to add, however, that the industry, for a long time to come, will be an important source of employment for many of the Newfoundland people.

The marine resources of Newfoundland represent a great part of the economy of that province. The part it represents could be increased, but this will be accomplished only as a result of a co-ordinated policy of research and expansion, and such a policy will cost money. But improvement in any industry in any part of Canada adds to the national economic picture. Central Canada is not so far removed from the economic success or failure of the fishing industry in Newfoundland. When one considers the fact that the the province of Newfoundland buys from the Canadian mainland commodities having an annual value of $250 million it becomes obvious that a large proportion of our dollar added to the value of fishery products provides labour for workers in other parts of Canada. In view of this I submit that research in the fishing industry in Newfoundland should be intensified and conducted by the Newfoundland research committee, the fisheries research board and the national research council.

The demands for research services are unlikely to decrease in the years that lie immediately ahead. There are not only pressures as a result of the domestic picture, but also demands owing to Canada's responsibilities under international agreements. Indeed, there are even local problems to which attention should be given. For example, in my own area I should like to know how extensive is the source of halibut off the west coast of Newfoundland. If there are sufficient quantities, how best can this type of fish be harvested, processed and marketed? Another problem is the need to improve methods to transport live lobsters to market. In the area from Bonne bay to St. John's bay on the west coast of Newfoundland—and I used this area as an example—about three quarters of a million pounds of lobster were marketed last year. In 1960, only 72.5 per cent of the quantity shipped arrived at the point of delivery in first class condition. The remainder was made up of 6.3 per cent of culls; 14.2 per cent were weaks; and 17 per cent unsaleable.

One can well imagine the loss to the fishermen when over 25 per cent of their catch fetches a reduced price or no price at all.

I point this out as a problem of local concern but none the less important. What is the reason? Are the lobsters taken from the Newfoundland area less durable than the lobsters taken from any other areas? Are the methods of holding awaiting shipment such as to be detrimental to the lobsters? Are the actual transportation conditions too rigid for the lobster to survive the ocean trip? These are questions which need expert investigation to determine the best corrective methods in order to give the fishermen the greatest possible return for their labour.

I mention these as local problems, Mr. Chairman, because they are problems that require practical solutions based on information already acquired or to be acquired by scientific research.

I should now like to make a few comments of a more general nature. The hon. member for Charlotte referred to a statement made by the premier of Newfoundland, implying that the fisheries of the province of Newfoundland were declining. No such statement is true, of course. When he made his statement the premier was referring to two things, first to the number of fishermen employed in the industry in Newfoundland; and second, to the importance of the industry when compared with some other industries. Now obviously, or I think it is obvious, in any composite whole one component may increase in absolute value and yet decrease in relation to its percentage of the whole. To me it is just a simple application of Engel's law. I would say to my hon. friend that while it may be true that the number of fishermen engaged in the fishing industry in Newfoundland may be fewer than they were in years gone by, the actual value of the fisheries is not decreasing. I hold in my hand the Atlantic provinces statistical review of April, 1961. I note that the preliminary figures for the year 1960, as compared with the figures for 1953, of total landed values show an increase of 33 per cent. The landed value of all sea fish in Newfoundland in 1953 amounted to slightly over $12 million. The preliminary figures for 1960 show $16 million, or an increase of roughly 33 per cent. This in fact is slightly higher than the increase for the Atlantic provinces as a whole.

The total landed value for the four Atlantic provinces in 1953 was $43 million. The preliminary figures for 1960 are $56 million, or an increase of 30 per cent. Our problem in Newfoundland, Mr. Chairman, is that the fishing industry is not maintaining its place in an expanding economy. What we need are more research, more investment, better quality products and larger markets. One of the great difficulties of the fishing industry in Newfoundland is that in a large sector of its activities it is almost impossible for the fisherman to make a living wage when he is employed in that industry alone. There are many reasons for this, included among which are low prices for the product, too low a production particularly of those types of fish which fetch the highest prices, and the inability of fishermen to work for long periods of the year.

As far as low prices for the product are concerned, the solution does not rest entirely in our own hands. Markets will determine the prices to be paid on factors over which we have no control. Prices paid may be relatively high in relation to the general economy of the area in which the market exists, but relatively low in relation to the general economy of the area in which the commodity is produced. In any industry in Canada I think we shall find it increasingly difficulty to maintain Canadian wages on European prices, but we do have in our own hands the possibility of improving the situation to some degree. The fact of producing specific articles of the highest quality for specific markets may be one way of doing this. An example is light salted cod. It is possible to attain further improvement in the position by endeavouring to produce more of those fishery products which bring higher prices. It was for this reason that earlier in my remarks I referred to the possibility of producing and marketing a larger amount of halibut and attempting to increase the percentage of first class lobsters arriving at the marketing points.

The average price of all sea fish landings in the year 1960 was lower in Newfoundland than in any other of the Atlantic provinces. For example, in 1960 Prince Edward Island landed 3.4 per cent of the total landed weight of the four Atlantic provinces. Prince Edward Island had 8.2 per cent of the total landed revenue at an average value per pound of 10.9 cents. For the same year the percentage of the total landed weight of the four provinces for Nova Scotia was 34.4, and the percentage of the landed value was 46.5, at an average value per pound of 6.1 cents. New Brunswick, in the same year, produced 18.1 per cent of the total landed weight and had 16.4 per cent of the landed value at an average of 4.1 cents per pound. On the other hand, Newfoundland produced 44 per cent of the total landed weight and received only 28.9 per cent of the total landed value, at an average value of 3.0 cents per pound.

It is my contention that these figures support the view that we should strive to produce a higher quality commodity and, at the same time, attempt to increase the production of those types of fish which will command a higher return. I hasten to point out, Mr. Chairman, that I do not believe such goals as I have suggested are going to solve all the difficulties now facing the fishing industry, but they are facets of the problem which cannot be ignored.

If the fishermen are going to continue their operations for longer periods of the year, one of the things which must be done is to provide those facilities which fishermen could not normally be expected to provide for themselves. Here, I am talking about the physical requirements and services such as wharves, breakwaters, community stages and bait depots. I recognize immediately that wharves and breakwaters are the responsibility of the Minister of Public Works and not the responsibility of the Minister of Fisheries. Nevertheless, I think that you cannot dissociate the marine facilities provided by the Department of Public Works from the fishing industry. For many areas of my constituency the men have to use fairly large boats. They have to go a long distance from the shore, well beyond the three mile limit. These boats have to be hauled up in the evening and launched in the morning. Many days' fishing are lost because they are not able to get their boats afloat.

There can be no doubt that, so far as the fishing industry is concerned, protection is needed for the fisherman's gear. On the other hand, community stages and bait depots are part of the programs administered by the Department of Fisheries. I feel that the community stage program has a great deal of merit. The minister informs us that already we have 20 of these stages built in Newfoundland, and that these 20 have demonstrated the advantage which they are to the fishermen. I suggest this advantage should be extended to other areas which are equally deserving. The minister said on May 11 that the program of constructing community stages was virtually complete. I was sorry to hear that because I do not believe this very advantageous program should be confined to the areas which have been served to date. These community stages provide not only a convenience to the fishermen, but they provide more sanitary landings where the fish can be properly cured. They do have a very definite effect on the quality and also the stability of the quality.

However, the minister did intimate that the program might be continued at a slower pace. I would suggest to him that the program should be continued, and continued at an even faster rate, particularly in those areas where economic patterns are changing in such a manner that fishing offers the major opportunity for employment.

I might make similar remarks regarding the bait service. We do need more of these units, and they need to be supplied at a faster rate. In many parts of Newfoundland, fresh bait supplies are not so readily obtained as they were a few years ago. The units being provided by the department offer a source of bait which assists our fishermen in beginning their fishing earlier in the year and remaining at their fishing for longer periods. There are two areas in my constituency which would benefit greatly from the program for community stages and bait depots. They are the areas known as the St. Barbe coast and the Port au Port peninsula. The St. Barbe coast is the western part of the great northern peninsula. The people of this area have for centuries been fishermen and, for a great part of that time, they have had no occupation other than fishing. At the turn of the century there was a great lumber industry developed on the coast. This, in turn, gave way to pulpwood cutting. We have reached the period now where the lumber industry is no longer as important as it was. We have reached the time when pulpwood cutting is no longer carried out to the extent it was. Fishing, therefore, offers perhaps the only opportunity which these men have for making a living. The program for community stages and bait depots, if extended would serve this area well.

Another area which I should like to mention is the Port au Port peninsula. This is a peninsula which juts out into the gulf of St. Lawrence a distance of about 30 miles. Twenty five or thirty years ago, nearly all the people in this area were fishermen. Then, sometime between 1940 and 1942 the United States leased bases in the area. The men left the fishery for work at Harmon air force base. It is understandable that, no matter how long this base remains in Newfoundland, construction in the years that lie ahead is not going to proceed at the pace which it did during the last 20 years. Employment opportunities at Harmon air force base are not as plentiful as they were. The men now have to return to the fishery, and I believe the men will return to the fishery only when they are provided with those facilities which they could not be expected to provide for themselves.

I have here a chart of the Port au Port peninsula. I brought this today particularly because some of the replies I have received to my questions have indicated that there are not enough fishermen in this area. I have here a chart showing the number of fishermen as of February, 1960, in each settlement in the Port au Port peninsula. The total number of fishermen in the area was 403. I believe that this number could be doubled if the men who are no longer able to find employment at Stephenville on the United States base were able to see that the facilities for fishing were going to be provided for them. I would again suggest to the minister, therefore, that rather than have the community stage program proceed at a slower pace, perhaps he could speed it up so as to provide some of these facilities for the St. Barbe coast and for the Port au Port peninsula.

I should like at this point to make a few brief comments regarding the seal fishery in the northwest Atlantic area. In the past few years and in recent days in the House of Commons we have heard a great deal as to the past and present methods of harvesting these resources. We have been informed that nations other than Canada are sending men with modern equipment to augment the indiscriminate killing which in time must result in the complete destruction of this form of marine life. Much has been said about the need for conservation and control measures if the seal is not to follow some other forms of Canadian wildlife into the realm of total extinction.

These expressions of opinion are not new. Intermittently over a period of 40 years people in various walks of life from the individual conservationist to the marine biologist, from the seal hunter to the businessman in the trade, from organizations at the local level to the United Nations, have expressed views as to what should or should not be done to preserve this natural resource and at the same time maintain a maximum sustainable yield having regard for other forms of marine life.

Conservationists became interested in this problem as early as 1920. Further representations were made to the Newfoundland government in 1930. The Canadian government began a survey in 1950, which was completed in 1956. In 1958, at the United Nations conference on the law of the sea the following resolution was agreed on:

> The United Nations conference on the law of the sea requests states to prescribe by all means available to them those methods of capturing and killing marine life, especially of whales and seals, which will spare them suffering to the greatest extent possible.

Canada was represented at that conference and supported this resolution. From surveys which have been made and from the experience of many engaged in the industry I suggest that it is clear that some conservation methods are necessary and may in fact be well overdue. In this particular industry as well as in many other fields of endeavour there is a need for adequate scientific information upon which sound, practical and effective regulations can be based. There is also the problem of obtaining the co-operation of all those concerned within the confines of our own country. Maybe the situation is still further complicated by the fact that a large part of the sealing operation is carried on outside Canadian territorial waters. Maybe it is fair to say that because other nations such as Norway and Russia prosecute the seal fishery in areas adjacent to Canadian waters, Canada should take the initiative in arriving at some agreement with these nations which have a direct commercial interest in the industry.

In February, 1957, the north Pacific fur seal commission was established. Represented on this commission are Canada, Japan, the United States and the U.S.S.R. The purpose of this commission is to establish regulations based on knowledge resulting from scientific research which will best conserve the fur seal herds in and around the Bering sea; including the Pribilof islands, the Commander islands and Robben island. This commission met from January 22 to February 4, 1961, in Japan. At that meeting the Canadian representative, Dr. William M. Sprules, said this:

> The convention under which this commission is established contains references to several principles which we in Canada believe are essential to the rational utilization of any marine resource. These include recognition of the need for international co-operation to achieve maximum sustainable productivity of important marine resources; recognition of the need for detailed scientific knowledge; recognition of the complex biological inter-relationships existing between one resource and another; and recognition of the need to waive the right of free fishing in specific instances. The constantly growing world interest in utilization of the valuable living resources of the sea coupled with the rapid technological advances in harvesting efficiency make it apparent that the principles just referred to might be expected to form the foundation of future international agreements concerned with conservation of the living resources of the sea.

I believe these words were well spoken and I would commend them to all those who have an interest in our marine resources, not only in reaping an annual harvest but also in promoting those conservation measures which will ensure that continuing annual harvests will be possible.

Canada was a signatory to the international northwest Atlantic fisheries convention in 1949. This body does not have regulatory powers but it can make representations to the governments included in the agreement. I would suggest that at the next meeting of this commission Canada should initiate discussions leading to the proper surveys being made which in turn would result in the formulation and implementation of measures designed to conserve the harp seal of the north Atlantic. I should indicate here that I understand that a great deal of work in this regard is being done; but since the seal fishery is prescribed in areas adjacent to Canadian waters it might be well if Canada were to give that extra impetus which this conservation program requires. It may be that efforts in this direction are further complicated by the fact that, although Russian ships have been very active recently both in the seal fishery and in other branches of the fishing industry, Russia is not a member of the international northwest Atlantic fisheries convention. Nevertheless, it may be possible to obtain with respect to the north Atlantic the same co-operation that has been experienced in the north Pacific in the hope that this form of marine life may continue to provide a sustainable annual yield by regulated methods and at the same time be protected in such a manner as to afford a maximum opportunity for survival.

Mr. Carter: I should like to resume at this time the remarks which I was making on this item on the day when these estimates were last before the committee. I think that day was May 12. At that time I had pointed out to the committee that the fishing industry on the Atlantic coast of Canada was not prosperous. The industry as a whole might be holding its own, but it was certainly not as prosperous as the fishery on the west coast, and in many sections it was very much a depressed industry. Particularly in terms of returns to the fishermen there had not been very much improvement in the last 10 or 12 years.

To remedy that situation I urged upon the minister the need for an over-all program of fishery development for the Atlantic provinces. That program should embrace all phases of the industry in all provinces. It should co-ordinate all the different agencies connected with the fisheries in all the provinces and it should be flexible enough to make provision for individual differences in the industry as between one province and another.

The second course of action which I urged upon the minister at that time was to set up a fact finding body to get the necessary information upon which such a program of development could be based. That fact finding body could first of all, I think, investigate the clash of interests within the industry itself, that is, as between one phase of the industry and another, or between different phases of the industry in different provinces.

There is no doubt that a clash of interests does exist, and ways and means must be found to avoid future differences and reconcile existing ones. The second category of facts which I think should be investigated is the individual problems connected with the industry which are peculiar to certain provinces. My colleague, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, referred to one of them this morning in connection with the light salted fish industry, which we share with the people of Gaspe but which perhaps does not obtain in the other Atlantic provinces.

In connection with the salt fish industry there is the problem of culling. Some years ago government officials attached to the department were qualified to cull fish. That particular practice was not too satisfactory in many cases and after a while the department abandoned this idea of having official cullers. But there is still a need for something to be done along this line and I think the particular problems which arise in connection with the culling of fish and the standardizing of culls is one that should be investigated in all provinces.

In connection with the inshore fishery we have a very particular problem in Newfoundland which I think is not shared by any other province. Any program for development of the fisheries in Newfoundland must certainly make provision to do something about it. The problem to which I refer is the distribution of our population along a large coast line and broken down into a large number of small settlements.

A few days ago we passed a bill in this house to rehabilitate rural communities. At that time I asked the Minister of Agriculture whether there was any way in which the principles involved in that legislation could be used in connection with the rehabilitation of fishing communities. I am not going to repeat the minister's reply; it can be found at the bottom of page 5593 of Hansard; but the minister did indicate in his answer that this question was being given some consideration.

I hope the Minister of Fisheries will get together with his colleague the Minister of Agriculture and work out some arrangement whereby this principle of rural rehabilitation can be applied to the fishing communities in my province. Our own provincial government has for several years grappled with this problem. They have had a program of concentration of population whereby a number of settlements have been denuded and the inhabitants have been induced to move their houses and belongings to larger settlements.

However, it has been found from experience that this sort of program is far beyond the financial resources of our provincial government; yet it is an essential part of any program of fisheries development in Newfoundland and it is something that must be done. I believe the legislation which we passed in this house for the rehabilitation or rural communities can be very well applied to remedy this situation and I do hope the minister will give every possible consideration to this suggestion. I hope that action will be taken before too long to have this principle incorporated as part of an established program, a special program, if you like, for fisheries development in the Atlantic provinces.

In connection with the inshore fishery in my province there is another problem on which I think facts should be gathered. The other day the Minister of Transport announced in the house a program of assistance in the building of fishing vessels. That assistance was applicable only to boats over 45 feet in length. In many of our communities, particularly in the inshore fishery where the boats do not have to go more than 12 or 15 miles from land, or at the most 20 miles from land, you do not require a boat 45 feet in length. If we are to prosecute this fishery so that our production costs are kept as low as possible, we must apply that principle to every item. If a 35 foot boat will do the same job as a 45 foot boat, then the assistance given to people who want to use a 35 foot boat should be the same as that extended to those who wish to buy a 45 foot boat. I would point out that there are many harbours in my constituency where fishermen cannot conveniently use 45 foot boats because there is not room to moor enough of them. On the other hand, 35 foot boats can be accommodated. Again, a larger boat means heavier gear and heavier equipment all around with a corresponding increase in cost. If we are going to operate our fishery at minimum cost we must pay attention to items such as this.

Our experience in the province has already shown that an expensive boat does not always benefit the fisherman. Both federal and provincial governments have done a great deal to assist fishermen to get larger and larger boats, but what has happened is this: in order to obtain the kind of boat which will meet the conditions under which assistance is granted, fishermen must incur a debt running between $30,000 and $40,000, sometimes even more. It is true the owner has a first class boat, but it will not be large enough to go 200 miles offshore and fish on the Grand Banks, while it will very often be larger than is necessary to go 20 or 30 miles offshore. Insurance on the larger boats is very costly and so are running expenses. It is true the fishermen earn more money in some cases but the extra earnings are used to pay off the debt. By the time the debt is paid off, boat and engine are worn out and the fishermen are back where they started without having received any personal benefit to show for their effort.

It is my belief that the maximum cost of a boat for the inshore fishery should not be more than $10,000. That should include everything and it should be shared between two persons. We have to think in terms of minimum cost of production. I would ask the minister to get together with his colleague the Minister of Transport and devise some way of making this assistance available with respect to fishing vessels down to 35 feet, in length and possibly smaller.

One other matter which I should like to see investigated concerns the prices received by fishermen. For some reason or another our Newfoundland fishermen do not seem to be able to get the same prices for their fish as are paid to those who fish off the mainland. I can understand some of the reasons why this should be so. It is true that the mainland fishermen can sell a large proportion of their fish fresh and unfrozen. They have the advantage of transportation facilities and this enables them to avoid having to store the fish in expensive warehouses. But I am not satisfied that this is the full explanation.

There are practices—I do not have first-hand information about them; I am going by what I am told—which should definitely be investigated. I have here a letter from one of my constituents. I do not propose to read it, but I should like to draw attention to what the writer says. He and his friends were trapping codfish last summer in a trap —this, by the way, is the most economic way of catching inshore fish. He took the fish to the plant, and the plant would only pay two cents a pound for them. Other inshore fishermen catching the same quality of fish in much the same depth of water by hook and line were getting half a cent a pound more at the same plant. Once taken by the plant, all these fish were mixed together and processed, emerging as the same product. No difference was made between the fish which had been trapped and those which had been caught by hook and line. The people who had been catching fish in the traps complained to the plant management about the discrepancy in the prices paid.

What happened? Instead of the trap fishermen getting 2½ cents a pound, the price to the hook and line fishermen was cut down by half a cent. There is something wrong when things of this kind can happen and I should like to see some competent body look into the matter and decide what can be done about it.

I am told there are occasions when a plant operator uses what is called the weigh back method. A dragger may go out and fish for four or five days on the Grand Banks and come in with a load of fish. The fisherman does not know how much he is going to be paid until the catch has been discharged on the plant wharf. Then the weigh back method goes into effect and the plant operator reserves the right to discard any fish he does not want. Of course, any fishermen on these draggers get paid only for the fish which the plant will take for processing. The discarded fish go to the meal plant, and we must assume that the operator gets something for them. But the fisherman gets nothing for these discarded fish although he may have spent a day catching them. In addition, he and the crew are charged with the expenses of unloading these extra fish, so the return he gets from the plant is further lessened on that ground. I am told these practices are prevalent in parts of my riding and I think some fact finding body should look into the matter to see that our fishermen get a square deal. I say this because the fishermen have no means of looking after themselves. If there is only one fish plant in the place or if they are employed on draggers owned by the plants they have to sell the fish to those plants or else throw it overboard. I think it is our job here to protect the interests of those who sent us to parliament and, as I say, I think the government should set up a fact finding body to collect all information relating not only to this but to other problems in connection with the fishing industry in my province so that we can work out an integrated policy for the industry in the Atlantic provinces as a whole.

Perhaps the minister will contend that we are doing just that at the present time, and in theory he may well be right. However, the result is that we end up by treating each industry in each province as a separate industry. I do not feel we will put the fishing industry of the Atlantic provinces on a sound economic basis until we look at the industry as a whole, working out a plan of development for the whole industry which, at the same time, will be flexible enough to take care of the individual problems peculiar to an individual province.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take one or two minutes at this time to mention several items which I omitted when I spoke earlier during this debate.

I should like to call the minister's attention to the desirability of looking into the possibility of developing an inland fishery in Labrador for the Labrador Indians. As the minister is doubtless aware, there exist in Labrador a number of Indians, particularly in the Northwest river area and in the area of Davis inlet. I suggest it is desirable to find for these citizens fields of employment, other than hunting. A suggestion has been made that the lakes in the area could provide an inland fishery, in which the Indians could engage. Similarly, in the northern Labrador area, there exists a sea trout industry which could possibly be developed to provide increased income for the Eskimos on the coastline.

I should also like to refer to the development of a suitable type of house at a cost within reach of the fishermen. I refer of course to the desirability of embarking upon a program to create fishing communities along the coast of Labrador, and I ask the minister to give this suggestion sympathetic consideration.

Labrador requires to be exploited, in the best sense of that word, and requires a great deal of development. The waters of Labrador, lucrative as they are to many fishermen, must also become lucrative sources of employment for the people who live in Labrador on a year round basis. It is in connection with those individuals that I ask the minister to consider the possibility of embarking upon a program of developing a type of house suitable to that area at a cost sufficiently low to enable those residents to purchase them.

A further matter which has already been mentioned has reference to the desirability of increasing patrol fleets with the use of aircraft in order to retain those waters for the use of Canadian fishermen.

I should also like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo regarding the desirability of providing assistance to fishermen on the same basis as is contemplated with respect to farmers. This parliament has approved the provision of assistance to certain agricultural areas of this country and I am sure the minister will agree that one producer in Canada should be entitled to the same assistance that is given any other producer in Canada. I cannot believe that hon. members would in any way wish to see one set of standards for fishermen and another set for farmers.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate referred to one other subject which I believe is deserving of the earnest consideration of all hon. members of this committee. I refer of course to our trade with the West Indies. That trade is based on the supply of fish and has been in existence for many years. It is important today in the light of present circumstances.

The whole issue involved in this trade with the West Indies is more than one of the export of fish, but one involving a question as to whether we are our brothers' keepers. In the light of present day events in relation to the world we are living in today, hemispheric solidarity is more important than ever.

As a matter of fact, a time may arrive very soon when such solidarity is of critical importance. I should like to ask the minister to bear in mind the importance of developing, extending and expanding this ancient trade, with a view of drawing these areas, which are of such mutual assistance one to the other, and whose friendship is as desirable as their business is desirable, closer together.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Granger: Certainly.

Mr. McGrath: Surely the hon. member realizes that the responsibility for trade and for the marketing of our fishery products is within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, since it was taken from the jurisdiction of the Minister of Fisheries by the previous administration?

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, I am well aware that trade, as such, is the business of the Department of Trade and Commerce. However, I am equally aware that the business of selling fish is at least part of the business of the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, before the minister comments in regard to remarks which have been made today, I should like to be permitted to ask him to make a report regarding the losses suffered by fishermen in the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island resulting from ice conditions which existed during the month of May. I have reference to the loss of fishing gear, and the loss as a result of reduction in catches, which has been suffered.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, I should like at this time to express my appreciation to all hon. members who have taken part in the debate on the first item in my estimates because much of what has been said will certainly be of help to my department in assessing the weaknesses and strength of the program which it has tried to carry out continuously in the interest of the fishing industry of this country.

A great deal has been said, and I should like to comment in a brief manner in respect of some of the questions which have been raised. I hope hon. members will realize that this debate has continued for quite some time, over a period of three different days, so that my observations and comments therefore will perhaps not be complete, nor cover every matter entirely. However, should I fail to comment in respect of a problem raised by any hon. member, that does not mean that problem is being ignored. Hansard has been and will be very carefully perused so that all the questions raised by hon. members will be dealt with where action is required.

I intend to try to comment seriatim on the questions raised by the various members. On the opening day of these estimates the hon. member for Gloucester was the first speaker. He was concerned with the relative position of the Canadian fishing industry with the fisheries of the world. This is something of major and fundamental concern, of course, to the industry in Canada and to the department. But I should like to point out that most of the fish produced in the world is produced by nations for their own use and in most instances to fill a desperate need on their part for the supplementing of their national diet, which fish provides. On the other hand, Canada—and there are very few countries in this position; Iceland and Norway are probably examples—exports about two thirds of its production. When we have to compete in world markets to maintain our production this creates additional difficulties.

The hon. member for Gloucester also referred to the necessity of increasing the subsidy on wooden vessels from the figure of $165 a ton. This is a case of serendipity, because at the very time he was speaking the decision had already been made to increase the amount up to a maximum of $250 a ton and, as is well known, the announcement was made in the house by the Minister of Transport a short time afterwards.

The same hon. member asked for figures as to losses of lobster fishermen in various areas of the maritimes owing to ice conditions. The latest information I have is that in northeastern New Brunswick 27,150 traps were set and 3,300 were reported lost, or about one ninth. Certain areas from Escuminac to Baie Ste. Anne were very heavily hit and acknowledged that 3,000 of the 3,300 traps were lost. I think he also inquired about the Magdalen islands. At the time of this report some 115,000 traps had been set, and losses appeared to be very heavy. About 30 fishermen in this area had insured a total of 9,000 traps.

On the Gaspe coast some 3,600 traps had been set and losses were also quite high. I think I should also mention district 5 because hon. members from Halifax and other members in that general area of district 5 have been concerned about the losses to fishermen there. About 64,000 traps were set and of this number about 12,000 have been reported as lost. The most heavily hit areas were Jeddore, Jeddore harbour and Ecum Secum. The situation varies from place to place; it is very spotty. In some places no losses may have occurred, and at another place very close by a fisherman may have suffered very heavy losses. At the moment I do not have figures on the lobster catch for the various areas but this is being watched very carefully by the department with a view to nothing as accurately as possible what the situation is.

The hon. member for Skeena raised the question of the Soviet union fishing fleet in the Bering sea. The situation is being kept under close review in the event that it may be appropriate to discuss these problems with the government of that country.

In the case of red China, there has been no indication that a fishing fleet has been developed, or is being developed, for operation in the north Pacific ocean. The hon. member also raised the question of reef nets used in Juan de Fuca straits by native Indians. The views expressed by the hon. member have been noted and the matter will be taken up again by the Pacific salmon fisheries commission which is responsible for conservation matters in this area and also with the appropriate United States fisheries authorities.

The question of Indians fishing for salmon for food purposes for their own consumption, and the situation described by the hon. member about pink salmon in the Queen Charlotte islands, will be investigated. It is well known, of course, that free permits are issued to native Indians to take salmon for their own use as food. At the same time, certain basic conservation requirements must be followed.

The hon. member also asked what was the situation with regard to the Sinclair report. As I said on a previous occasion, we have written to the various segments of the fishing industry on the west coast asking for their views in writing by the end of May, if possible, on the matters covered by the Sinclair report and only a few of those have come in as yet.

I covered the matter of artificial spawning grounds, which was raised by the hon. member for Skeena, in my opening remarks. I think most of the information he had in mind will be found there. He also inquired about the use of aureomycin in the preservation of fish. The use of aureomycin was developed in the technical station of the fisheries research board of Vancouver. It is being used quite extensively on the Pacific coast by the Pacific coast fishing industry as a very useful preservative; also to a more limited extent on the Atlantic coast. With the use of the proper quantities there are no harmful effects when the fish are consumed because the antibiotic is boiled off during the cooking process.

The question of more general use of herring for human consumption is being worked on and was discussed on an international basis at a meeting in Rome last April, and also as a means of making a more general use of this great resource of the sea for direct human consumption.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni also raised some questions regarding an appraisal of the Campbell river area salmon stocks and suggested an examination of the possibility of artificial spawning grounds being constructed in that area.

The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador spoke of a scheme for small loans to fishermen. In most areas, this matter is being taken care of adequately by the various provincial fishermen's loan boards. In addition, of course, loans are available to fishermen, administered by the Department of Finance. There are the chartered banks and the fishermen's credit unions, which are also sources of credit.

I have noted the observations that were made with regard to assistance in the cost of construction of wooden boats under 45 feet in length. This matter will be reviewed, but I would point out that the construction of fishing vessels of this type is undertaken in co-operation with the provinces and the advice of the provinces will have to be considered in relation to the type of boat that should be covered. Of course, there are the obvious matters which must be taken into consideration from the point of view of the federal government.

The question of community stages was raised by a number of hon. members from Newfoundland. I want to say that I appreciate the kind words they have uttered about this program. One hon. member said he was sorry to hear me state that the program was about completed. I was referring, at that time, to the first 20 stages only. We hope to continue with other stages from time to time in co-operation with the provincial government of Newfoundland, so that this need can be met as time goes by.

The bait supply this year is adequate so far as the bait itself is concerned. There is, however, the continuing problem of satisfying the very wide demand for the bait holding units we brought into use. There is provision in these estimates for eight more of these units at a cost of $69,000, or thereabouts. I want to say that this program will be pursued as actively as possible.

The question of the production of light salted fish as opposed to heavy salted fish was raised by various members with various views on the matter. I want to say that the department has succeeded in developing a method whereby heavy salted fish can be desalted and then artificially dried to produce an excellent light salted product to meet the needs of the market in Europe. As the member for Bonavista-Twillingate is aware, I believe, the question is only one of price, relative market prices.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg posed some interesting questions with regard to the oyster industry. The department is proceeding as rapidly as possible much along the lines suggested by him. In so far as clams are concerned, these, too, are receiving attention and the views of the hon. member will be given consideration. He also expressed concern about the protection of the Atlantic salmon. This is a problem which is very acute. As hon. members know the habitat of the Atlantic salmon has been decreasing in area since very early times. This is obviously because of the impact of civilization itself, especially industrialization, and the detrimental effect on the environment in which the Atlantic salmon, and all other types of fish, live. Changes take place which may not be obvious to human beings, but are very critical so far as salmon are concerned. For example, there may be variations in the run-off, variations in water temperature, changes in the consistency of spawning beds as a result of siltation, as well as more obvious things like obstructions caused either artificially or naturally and the contamination of streams by such things as sewage, pulpwood logs and that sort of thing.

Several hon. members, including the member for Skeena, raised the question of the damage done to the salmon on the west coast by spraying. This problem is extremely difficult because hon. members will realize, I think, that if the forests are destroyed the habitat of the salmon will be destroyed as well. Nevertheless, we are able to report that the damage done to the salmon directly by d.d.t. spraying of the forests has been considerably reduced by using diluted sprays which remain effective for the purpose for which they are used, the destruction of the spruce budworm and other insects, without doing much direct damage to the salmon themselves.

In this connection there was some interesting press comment on this matter last winter when it was announced that half strength d.d.t., compared with that which had been used previously, had now proven successful and would not do so much damage to the salmon. The announcement produced a headline in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal for January 6 to the effect that we had succeeded in eliminating morality amongst the salmon. Far be it from me to eliminate morality amongst the salmon, if it is meant by that that we want to reduce in any way their capability of reproducing.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

I am happy to say that we have made progress, especially on the west coast, in designing and developing artificial spawning beds. The results look very good at the present time. It will take a period of time to prove their usefulness, but the results so far have been nothing short of spectacular. I am hopeful that this development will go a long way toward compensating for the loss of natural production of salmon to which the hon. member for Skeena referred just a little while ago. He also mentioned the Russians fishing for salmon. We have no information that would indicate that the Russians are fishing for salmon in the north-east Pacific area. They do catch large numbers of salmon, of course, but in their own waters, of stocks that originate in Asia. I might say that the Russians, of course, are actively fishing for groundfish in the Bering sea area. We have been able to find no indication that the Japanese are catching any salmon of British Columbia or Canadian origin. Therefore, as far as Canadian salmon are concerned, there is no indication that they go beyond the line of demarcation agreed upon, which is 175 degrees west longitude. I am speaking from memory but I think that is correct.

The question of the resolutions passed by the united fishermen and allied workers union has been noted. I might say that this whole question is under very careful study. The resolution read by the hon. member would indicate that, if the policy they suggest were brought into effect, legislation would be required. This is not the case. The changes they recommend could be introduced, from a legal point of view, by regulation under the Fisheries Act as it now stands.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg also raised the question of construction standards for subsidized fishing vessels. This matter of improving the standards of this type of vessel so that they will have a safer vessel for fishermen to operate in is something that we are working on at the present time in co-operation with the maritime commission.

The hon. member for Vancouver East took the view that a great deal more assistance was given to the Atlantic fisheries than was given to the Pacific fisheries. I do not think that this view can be well substantiated because a great deal of assistance is given to the fisheries on both coasts. The problems are entirely different on both coasts. On the west coast the primary problem is one of keeping up the supply of the resource. In most types of fish on the east coast this problem is not so acute, especially with regard to cod and groundfish, although there is a problem.

I agree that there is a problem with regard to stocks there but it is not so acute as is the problem of the stock of salmon on the west coast. The problems on the east coast tend to be more economic ones in the sense of trying to have a reasonable return to the fishermen engaged in the industry whereas on the west coast—I am speaking now very generally and there are all sorts of exceptions to what I say—the problem fundamentally is one of keeping the resource at a level which will provide sufficient fish for those engaged in the industry.

The hon. member for Vancouver East was concerned about the British Columbia herring fishery. I am happy to report that the fish meal situation, as far as markets are concerned, has strengthened considerably and has brightened to a decided extent. As I have already mentioned, an international meeting was held in Rome under the auspices of FAO to consider this matter. I think that meeting had beneficial effects almost right away. Every attempt is being made to improve and develop new herring products for human consumption and continuing efforts are being made to seek new market outlets.

With regard to the problem of more humane methods of killing whales and seals about which the hon. member for Vancouver East was concerned I might say this. It is not correct to make the flat statement that the use of electrical harpoons at the present stage of development would be more humane in whaling than is the use of the explosive harpoon. As a matter of fact, a great deal of work is being done on the use of the electrical harpoon by the electrical companies and by the industry but as yet it is doubtful that they would be any more humane than are the harpoons now in use.

With regard to Atlantic seals may I say that my department has already taken the initiative in this matter. Along with other countries we are keeping informed on technological advances with a view to introducing them to the sealing industry if they are practical and effective. On the conservation side, we have taken the initiative in bringing this question before the international commission for the north Atlantic fisheries which is meeting in Washington next week. I might say in passing that I believe it was the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador, although I might be mistaken about that matter—in any event it was one of the Newfoundland members—who went on the assumption that the U.S.S.R. which is one of the countries interested in the Atlantic seals is not a member of ICNAF. May I say that they have joined. They are now a member as they have been for about two years. Denmark, France, Norway and Canada all agreed on a closing date for the sealing this year. There is therefore some progress to report in this connection.

The hon. member for St. John's East also raised the question of community stages. I have dealt with that matter to some degree already. The marketing of salt fish, a matter which he also raised, is one which is of direct concern to the Department of Trade and Commerce. However, my department is concerned also in certain phases of marketing such as helping the industry to develop more acceptable types of fish and of containers so that salt fish, especially, will have a growing appeal for a widening market.

Several hon. members, including the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the hon. member for St. John's East and the hon. member for Trinity-Conception spoke of the neeed for and the problem of markets for salt cod. In this connection I should like to say that production of salted cod in 1960 in Newfoundland, at about 70.6 million pounds, dry basis, was 5 per cent above that in 1959, but was approximately average production for recent years. There were no stock holdings of 1959 fish at the beginning of the marketing year, last July 1. Despite the good catch, prices to fishermen from processors, were 15 per cent to 20 per cent above 1959 levels. Strong buying by processors and exporters was presumably based mainly on the short European catches in 1959.

Fishermen's income from cod fishing were at a post-union record of $1.1 million above 1959. In marketing the 1960 production Canadian exporters had been faced with greater competition from increased European production, together with a major reduction in exports to Cuba particularly since January of this year.

Stocks at the end of April were approximately 10 million pounds above the same date a year ago, but early in May substantial shipments of salt fish went to Portugal. However, this is a matter which is under very close and active scrutiny by the department with a view to finding some means of alleviating it if this proves, in the end, necessary.

Several hon. members raised the question of the use of the Valleyfield fish processing experimental plant. A good deal of progress has been made at Valleyfield in respect of salt cod. Projects include various drying methods, brining methods, a process for the production of light salted fish by the desalting of heavy salted fish and, most important, the development of new products and improved packaging.

In order to meet present day consumer demands a salt fish block has been developed.

This block is made basically from fillets of cod and thus is boneless and skinless. Substantial samples were sent in 1960 to outlets in Canada, the United States, Italy and all other potential markets. The reception was so good that there is an excellent possibility of this product being produced commercially this year.

The method of producing these fillet blocks and other new processing methods and techniques will be demonstrated at several courses for salt fish plant foremen and operators this summer at Valleyfield.

I may say that we are also most anxious to receive from the salt fish industry their suggestions and reviews of technological problems so that we can do our best to meet these problems and test the suggestions for their practicability.

I may say that as far as prospects for this year are concerned, due to the rather optimistic outlook as far as the fresh and frozen fish market is concerned these are brighter. With respect to freezing operations the department has been advised that several plants on the northeast coast of Newfoundland which were not expected to operate in 1961 will be put into operation in response to the much improved market outlook. This will relieve to some extent the pressure on the salt fish market. But it is only one factor and will only apply, of course, in some areas.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate also pointed out that we were dependent entirely, I believe he said, on the United States market for the export of fresh and frozen fish. I believe that is no longer entirely the case, since exports are now going to the United Kingdom market. This is an encouraging development.

I may say too that in certain cases the provisions of the agricultural rehabilitation and development act will have application to large numbers of people who are engaged in the fishing industry, at least partially. In cases where it does not apply, very careful study will be made of the situation so that proper compensation can be made in a way which we hope will be practical, along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

The hon. member for Charlotte and various other hon. members raised the question of the application of unemployment insurance to fishermen. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, it would seem more in sorrow than in anger, regretted a quotation that he was forced to read from a speech which I had made in Toronto about fishermen fishing for stamps rather than for fish.

What I said was that we wanted to remove any incentive which might lead fishermen to fish for stamps rather than for fish. I did not mean to suggest that any fishermen had yielded to this temptation, as yet at any rate.

Mr. Herridge: That is very diplomatic.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): The hon. member for Charlotte also gave an interesting review of the fishing industry in his riding, which is a very important and, generally speaking, prosperous one. But there is still much that can be done to develop the industry in all parts of the country, provided the development will result in activities that are economically sound.

The hon. member for Grey North raised the very important question of the great lakes fishery. Mr. Chairman, I should like to say something about the progress which is being made in the lamprey control program of the great lakes, but I will not make an extended statement at this time.

I think hon. members of the committee are aware that scientists have succeeded in producing a lampricide, a specific poison which will poison lamprey without affecting other forms of life. In 1959-60 more concentration was applied to the use of lampricides while still maintaining the barriers in lake Superior that were formerly used to prevent the migration of lamprey up the streams to spawn.

Finally in 1960-61 all streams tributary to lake Superior known to have lamprey populations had been treated. In addition, seven streams in lake Michigan and six in Georgian bay had been covered. In every case it is estimated that a kill of over 99 per cent of the lamprey population was obtained. As a result a reduction should be seen in 1961 from the operations of 1959, but the final demonstration will only show clearly in the spring of 1962.

It is thus crucial in demonstrating success or failure to maintain the barriers in lake Superior for checking through 1961-62. In the meantime the chemical program will be further expanded in lake Huron, Georgian bay and lake Michigan.

Concurrent with these lampricide experiments the commission has been considering and taking action on the rehabilitation of the trout population. This of course involves obtaining the co-operation of the various states and the province of Ontario since these organizations are responsible for such work. This co-operation has been gladly given, with the result that broad stocks have been substantially increased and the actual stocking was raised to over one million yearlings in 1960, with every indication of increase in the future. Close assessment of the results of this experiment is being carried out.

In brief, the lampricide program in the great lakes appears to be promising but it is too early yet to make definite forecasts as to how successful it is actually proving. There still remains the problem of the rehabilitation of those types of fish which will produce the highest income to the fishermen of the great lakes and thus add the greater strength to the industry.

I think that is all I wish to say at the present time, but if any questions arise as we go through the various items I shall do my best to answer them.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall the item carry?

Mr. Robichaud: I wish to thank the minister for his comprehensive reply to the various remarks which have been made by members of the committee on this the first item on the estimates of his department. I have a brief observation to make which could refer to item 131 or to the next item. I wish to make it now. A few moments ago I came across an editorial in the Ottawa Journal, June 3. It has for its title: "146.5 lbs. of Meat—Each". May I be allowed to quote a brief paragraph from this editorial. It reads as follows:

> Not everyone in Canada is unemployed and those who have work or income are doing very well indeed. So well that total per capita consumption of meat in 1960 was 3.6 pounds greater than in 1959 and more than 12 pounds above the 1951-55 average.

I wish to remind the minister of the remarks I made on May 11 when I said that fish consumption, which had reached 13.7 pounds per capita in 1950, had declined to 13.2 pounds in 1957, and called for drastic action on the part of the department to increase the consumption of fish in this country. When we realize that during the same period the consumption of meat has increased by 12 pounds per capita and the consumption of fish has decreased by half a pound—

An hon. Member: Utter nonsense.

Mr. Robichaud: I heard the hon. member say "utter nonsense".

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Exactly. Utter nonsense.

Mr. Robichaud: These are statistics made available by the dominion bureau of statistics, and if the hon. member wants to question them he should direct his observations to the minister responsible.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I think you should sit down.

Mr. Robichaud: I will sit down at the call of the Chair. I have as much right to make observations in the committee as has the hon. member for St. John's. This is typical of what we hear from members on the government side of the house, for no reason whatever.

When we have to face such a serious situation as this decline in fish consumption we may well ask ourselves what will happen to future generations of Canadians when such a brain food as fish is set aside.

(Translation):

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I am not taking part in this debate as an expert on commercial fishing and I imagine that members of the committee will perhaps be surprised to hear me say a few words on this subject. I should like to ask the minister to look especially into the problem I intend to submit to him and to give us some information about a situation prevailing at present in the Montreal area with regard to sport fishing. With the committee's permission, I should like to quote from an article published in the Gazette of June 2, 1961, which reads as follows:

(Text):

I shall read from this article in English as it is written in English. It is entitled: "Quebec reverses itself on minnow situation". It reads:

> We told you in yesterday's column to look elsewhere in the paper for the ruling on minnows by Hon. Gerard Levesque, minister of game and fisheries. Well, you didn't find much—simply an announcement that special permits are to be issued effective immediately for the sale of minnows.

Later on in a paragraph headed: "Prime interest to Montreal" the article says:

> These details will be particularly interesting to Montreal district fishermen in view of the fact that one suggestion had been that the sale of minnows should be permitted in a zone of the south shore but not on the island of Montreal which would be placed in the same category as the trout belt in the Laurentians. This would be a blow at the many thousands of anglers who depend upon minnows for fishing dore, pike and perch in local waters.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, that article was brought about by a rather radical decision taken by the present government of the province of Quebec concerning the sale and transportation of minnows.

That legislation was introduced at a most inappropriate time, that is last spring, and without any previous warning to dealers who sell not only minnows but fishing tackle.

Moreover, the provincial authorities received strong protests from certain sports associations concerning the adoption of that bill which is rather prejudicial to their interests.

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. Is the hon. member not touching on a purely provincial matter?

Mr. Valade: No. I am dealing with the part of the law which comes under the administrative responsibility of the federal government as I will show later on if you allow me to continue.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, as I was saying a moment ago, that decision has caused serious losses to all those business people who depend on the sale of fishing gear. Representations were made to the present provincial government, which washed its hands of the matter and said it was a federal responsibility. That is why I now ask the Minister of Fisheries to clearly state the stand of the federal Department of Fisheries with regard to that legislation enacted by the Quebec government.

(Text):

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Perhaps I can answer the observations which have been made by the two hon. members who have spoken.

In the case of fishing regulations which are enforced by the provinces, the regulations are made under the authority of the Fisheries Act and the order in council which brings them into effect is the responsibility of the federal government. However, I wish to make it clear that the appropriate ministers of the provinces make recommendations as to what these regulations should be and we rarely, if ever, modify them, or, if we do, we do so only after consultation with the minister of the province concerned.

In the case of regulations having to do with the use of minnows in Quebec, the recommendation was put forward by the provincial government. I communicated with the minister, who takes full responsibility for making this recommendation. He is happy with it. Therefore, it was made into law by the passing of an appropriate order in council. It is the direct responsiblity of the provincial minister concerned to make recommendations in this regard.

I was very pleased that the hon. member for Gloucester raised the suggestion that publicity should be given to the advantages of including fish in diets. In this regard I might suggest that my department is doing all it can to acquaint Canadians with the benefits arising from the consumption of fish, both from a health and economical point of view. There is a very excellent service in existence carried out by skilled young ladies who demonstrate the uses of fish to groups across the country, including the operators of restaurants, hotels and so on. This operation is being carried out in an attempt to familiarize Canadians with the benefits of the use of fish in diets and to increase the per capita consumption in Canada.

We have also introduced methods to improve the standard of processed fish in an attempt to establish a reputation of dependability in that regard.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I realize that every minister of the crown is anxious to have the estimates of his department passed as quickly as possible, and I suggest the Minister of Fisheries is no different in this regard.

At the beginning of the minister's remarks in reply to suggestions made by hon. members he referred to the fact that this debate had taken quite some time. As a matter of fact, he stated it had extended over a period of three days. That statement is true, in that the debate took place on three different days, but in terms of total time it has taken no longer than the number of hours this house sits on a Monday, Tuesday or Thursday approximately 8½ hours. I suggest that the fishing industry is of sufficient importance to the five Atlantic provinces, as well as to that important province of British Columbia, that we should not attempt to rush through the estimates of this department simply because we are approaching a particular time of day. Should we run through and complete the estimates during this last hour, that is perfectly all right, but they should not be hastened in any way which would limit our discussion.

Earlier today I mentioned articles which had been written by Mr. Val Gwyther. At that time I was unable to locate the reference to these articles, but I have since found this reference contained in the Vancouver Sun of June 1, 1961, at page 42. I should like at this time to make further reference to the statements made by that individual so as to relate them to the location in which they were made. The article in part reads as follows:

> Two university of B.C. engineers said today a hydroelectric dam can be built in the Fraser river canyon without harming salmon runs.
> They said a 100-foot high dam at Spuzzum, 30 miles north of Hope, would produce 700,000 horsepower and allow safe passage of 750,000 salmon a day.
> The engineers are J. F. Muir, head of the U.B.C. department of civil engineering, and Eugen Ruus, assistant professor of civil engineering.
> They were speaking at the 75th annual meeting of the engineering institute of Canada—

This article then makes reference to Mr. Val Gwyther who is reported there as saying that watersheds are now open to development of both fish and power. The article then goes on to state as follows:

> Gwyther said that with proper planning of fishways in conjunction with power dams, survival of fish can be increased over that in natural settings filled with predators.

I do not intend to quote further from this article because I think the essence of their approach to this subject is contained in the remarks I have quoted which were made at a meeting of the engineering institute of Canada. I should appreciate very much if the minister would indicate his opinion of the validity of these statements.

As I said earlier, Mr. Gwyther has been noted in past years for his one-sided approach to this question which would tend to serve the interests of those individuals concerned with the development of power exclusively. I think the approach presented in the report from which I quoted represents the same high pressure tactics resulting from these studies which have been financed, at least in part, by the B.C. hydro industry.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make it clear to the hon. gentleman that I did not object to the length of time being taken for the consideration of the estimates for my department, but merely pointed out that the discussion had taken place on three different days, two of which were about two weeks ago, and therefore I hoped to be excused if my remarks this afternoon were not comprehensive enough to cover every point that had been raised.

I should like to thank the hon. member for bringing this article to my attention but would suggest to him that individuals are free to express their own opinions. The best advice that I can obtain from experts, not only from my department, but elsewhere, is that there is as yet no feasible means whereby hydro development can take place on the Fraser river without serious damage to the salmon industry. I am sure that if there had been a tremendous breakthrough and discovery in this regard in recent times I should be aware of it.

Item agreed to.

134. Industrial development service, $806,750.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, in respect to vote No. 134 I should like to ask the minister to briefly comment in regard to new projects to be undertaken this year.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, there are a wide number of items which are under consideration for this year. A few examples of those projects are as follows: a study in regard to the use of a stern trawler, the development of a scallop stern trawler, the development of a combination dragger purse siener and a trap tender for the great lakes, the continued development of a multi-purpose 50-foot boat, and the development of a 48-foot long-liner in co-operation with the province of New Brunswick, the development of reinforced fibreglass hulls for fishing boats, the tank testing of various types of fishing vessels and fishing gear, the development of an unloading device for fishing vessels, some work in regard to hydro jet propulsion. We have also been assisting, to some extent, the development of a free-piston gasifier engine which we hope will be very useful in application to fishing vessels on the basis of a very flexible type of installation. Some hon. members may be aware of that project. Those are some examples.

Mr. Pickersgill: Practically all of the examples the minister has given had to do with the catching of fish. This item is called "Industrial Development Service". Can the minister say whether any of the money is being spent for what one would ordinarily think of as industrial development?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): We look on the catching of fish as an industrial activity, and it is part of our industrial development work, but not all by any means. For example, there is a great deal of work, to which I have already referred to some extent, being done at the Valleyfield experimental station on the processing of fish. Another example is the development of fish processing and holding equipment; the various developments in the drying of fish, the packaging of fish, and bulk containers for fish, which are not only the large containers used in shipment but also the retail containers. A while ago I mentioned salt fish blocks which are being developed. These blocks are for the retail trade. They are blocks about the size of a pound of butter and are quite attractive. We feel they will have a very great acceptability on the market. There is such a wide field of endeavour in this directorate that it is hard to give in a few words a complete review of what is being done but if the hon. member has anything specific in mind I shall certainly get the information for him.

Mr. Pickersgill: I just have this specifically in mind. The only substantial reduction anywhere in the estimates is in this item and while in general I am in favour of reducing expenditures rather than increasing them—I am an old fashioned Grit in this respect—I must say that in this particular field I do not think that reducing expenditure is the wise thing at all, because surely the most important thing is not to find new ways of catching fish but new ways of processing fish and getting it onto the markets in an acceptable form, and this is where Canada is not leading the world and where it seems to me we ought to be advancing even more rapidly than we are.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Let me put the hon. member's mind at rest right away. The general program is not reduced. This may be a bit misleading, but actually the over-all program of industrial development is being expanded as far as expenditure is concerned. The apparent reduction is due to the fact that there has been a quite sudden reduction in the amount of money being used in the building of community stages which is covered by this vote.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister knows that I would like to see that expenditure increased also.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes.

Mr. Carter: I have two supplementary questions on this item. The minister referred to the stern dragger as one of the experiments being carried out under this item. Is this the first year in which we have been carrying on such experiments? If not, what was the result of any previous work done in this respect?

My second question has to do with marketing. Can the minister tell the house whether any marketing research is being carried out by his department and whether it is done under this item? If not, under what item is it financed?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): With regard to the stern trawler, this is the development of a suitable design of boat that may be used specifically for Canadian Atlantic coast conditions. There has been no work done with stern trawlers in Canada up to this date.

Mr. Carter: No, but work has been carried out on the stern trawler or the stern dragger in England, I think, and in Norway.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Oh, yes.

Mr. Carter: The results of that experiment should be available to us. What additional information are we trying to acquire under this item or under the program the minister referred to? Just what is the purpose of continuing the experiment when the information is already available?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Well, the information is available in a general way, but it is a question of the design of a stern trawler calculated to meet specific Canadian Atlantic coast requirements. Our requirements for a stern trawler might not be the same as for a stern trawler which would be operating from Europe.

Mr. Carter: The minister did not answer my second question about marketing research. Is anything being done along this line?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): It actually is being done but it comes under item 133.

Mr. Robichaud: I have a question to ask the minister but I do not know whether it comes under this item. In recent years the department has carried out certain experiments to locate scallop beds especially in Northumberland strait and in the gulf of St. Lawrence. Is it the intention of the department to carry on with similar experiments this year?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes.

Mr. Robichaud: Has any arrangement been made by the department to select certain boats or certain vessels in certain areas?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): This is being done at the present time. As far as I know certain research is being done along this line at the St. Andrews station of the research board.

Mr. Robichaud: When such experiments are carried on the results should be made available to the fishermen. I know that fishermen in our own areas are still wondering whether beds were found in 1959. If beds were located, what amount of scallops was in those beds, and where were they? Steps should be taken to make the results of such experiments available to the fishermen so that they could use the beds to their benefit.

Mr. Howard: My question has to do really with the fishing bounty. I assume, from past practice, that we deal with statutory items where they follow immediately after a vote. In as much as it is six o'clock, I wonder whether I can defer my comment to another day?

Mr. Churchill: Would the committee be prepared to continue for a few minutes on these items? If we are striving for the deadline of the 30th day of June, would it not be wise to complete the estimates of this department? I do not want to hurry anyone if there are questions to ask, but the house sometimes shows that it is quite willing to take an extra few minutes and carry on. I am sure we are quite prepared to do that.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Morton): Have we unanimous consent to carry on?

Mr. Howard: There is another point. For instance, the fisheries research board becomes involved quite extensively in the next item and I have some remarks to make which would take more than a few minutes. I think we should call it six o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: I presume there is no change from the announcement made last night in connection with next week's business?

Mr. Churchill: No change is expected, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister whether, perhaps after consultation with the Minister of Finance, he is now able to tell the house when the budget will be brought down?

Mr. Churchill: That is not in my field.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

NATIONAL DEBT

Question No. 231—Mr. Regier:

1. As of the latest date of record, what was the total gross national debt of the people of Canada for each of the following categories: (a) each of the various levels of government (b) institutions of Canada (c) corporations of Canada (d) individuals?

2. What was the average interest rate on such indebtedness in the years 1945, 1956 and 1961?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

1. (a) Federal[1] [2] ..... As at March 31, 1960, $25,145 million

Provincial[1] [3] ..... As at March 31, 1960, $7,094 million

Municipal[1] [4] ..... As at fiscal year ends nearest December 31, 1958, $3,940 million.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—CIVILIAN CREWS OF AUXILIARY VESSELS

Question No. 241—Mr. McCleave:

1. What are the work hours per week and rates of pay of cooks and stewards serving aboard civilian manned auxiliary vessels of the Department of National Defence on the (a) east coast (b) west coast?

2. What are the work hours per week and rates of pay of crew, apart from cooks and stewards, serving aboard civilian manned auxiliary vessels of the Department of National Defence on the (a) east coast (b) west coast?

Answer by: Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence):

1. (a) East coast—Cook, $269 per month; cook steward, $269 per month; second cook, $238 per month; mess boy, $229 per month. Hours of work—48 hours per week, 6 days at 8 hours per day.

(b) West coast—Cook, $285, $290, $301 per month; cook steward, $290, $311 per month; steward, $280, $290 per month; second cook, $260, $280 per month; mess boy, $231, $253 per month. Hours of work—40 hours per week, 5 days at 8 hours per day.

2. (a) Hours of work: Approved work schedules—Effective 1 January, 1960, the approved work schedule for GSOs and seamen shall be 8 hours per day from Monday to Friday with Saturday and Sunday as rest days, with the following exceptions:

Naval Fire Tug—H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax and St. John's, Newfoundland: (i) the standard work week is 56 hours; (ii) the work week shall be averaged over a 3 week cycle using the 24 hours on 48 hours off duty system.

Stand-by duty boat—H.M.C. Dockyard, Halifax, N.S.: (i) the standard work week is 40 hours; (ii) the work week shall be averaged over a 4 week cycle; (iii) 8 days of rest shall be granted in the cycle.

Stand-by duty boat—H.M.C. Dockyard, Esquimalt, B.C.: (i) the standard work week is 40 hours; (ii) the normal daily working hours per day shall be 8; (iii) two days in seven shall be rest days.

Naval fire tug—H.M.C. Dockyard, Esquimalt, B.C.: (i) the standard work week is 48 hours; (ii) normal daily working hours shall be 8; (iii) one day in seven shall be a rest day.

(b) Rates of pay vary according to vessel classification.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 5, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Eighth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines—Mr. Howe.

STANDING ORDERS—CONCURRENCE IN TWELFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Miss Margaret Aitken (York-Humber) moved that the twelfth report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on Thursday, June 1, 1961, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE METHOD OF EXECUTION

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-102, to amend the Criminal Code (capital punishment, form of sentence).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, briefly it is an amendment to the Criminal Code to provide that the sentence of death where applicable shall be one of death in a lethal gas chamber and not by hanging by the neck.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

LABOUR DISPUTE, TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

Motion No. 136—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the Minister of Labour or the Department of Labour and any chairman of a board of conciliation appointed to deal with any labour dispute to which Trans-Canada Air Lines was a party since January 1, 1950.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this motion except for one reservation; that the correspondence and other documents asked for in this motion shall not be tabled until after the negotiations are completed and settled, if that is agreeable to the hon. member.

Mr. Howard: That is quite agreeable.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservation expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

PRESERVATION OF BATTLEFIELD PARK, STONEY CREEK, ONT.

Motion No. 138—Mr. Herridge:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the federal government, the Ontario provincial government, the municipal government of Stoney Creek, and any organization or person, since January 1, 1958, regarding the purchase of a parcel of land from Mr. Harry Smith for the preservation of Battlefield park at Stoney Creek, Ontario.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to accept this motion subject to the approval of the province of Ontario and the reservation concerning privileged documents.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservation expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE LOT, BEAUCEVILLE EST, QUE.

Motion No. 141—Mr. Racine:

For a copy of the lease signed by the government for an area to be used as a post office in the town of Beauceville Est, county of Beauce.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BILL NO. C-70—REPORTED DELAY DUE TO U.S. PRESSURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice and ask whether the minister has seen the article in the Financial Post of June 3 entitled "Here's Why New Bill May Perish" dealing with Bill No. C-70, the disclosure bill, now on the order paper, and wherein it is stated that United States pressure is the reason for stalling what is described in the article as the "tell facts" plan. Has the minister any comment to make on this article?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the article, but if the hon. member has correctly summarized it I can only say the article is without foundation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION AND INCREASED FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he is now in a position to answer my question of June 1 dealing with the winter works program and the request of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities, which question was taken as notice by the minister's parliamentary secretary.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we have not as yet received any resolution from the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities. I have read about what happened at their annual convention, as did the hon. member. We are very gratified indeed to have an acknowledgement on the part of that large and important organization that the municipal winter works incentive program has been such a huge success that they want it extended for a longer period. However, this is a matter of government policy, and when a decision is arrived at by the government an announcement will be made.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENTS TO BOARD OF DIRECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. H. Phillips (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. During the recent by-election campaign in Kings, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate advocated that the defeated candidate be appointed to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. Has the minister given any consideration to appointing Mr. Kickham, the defeated Liberal candidate, to the board of directors of the C.N.R.?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I question whether the hon. member is warranted in taking up the time of the house at this time in directing to the minister an inquiry of that nature concerning an individual.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport and ask whether the minister is giving consideration to appointing Mr. Donald Gordon to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways?

[Mr. Fulton.]

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the person to whom we are really thinking of offering the position of director of the C.N.R. is the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

REPORTED DIVISION OF POSITIONS OF BOARD CHAIRMAN AND EXECUTIVE HEAD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Can he say whether the president of the national Progressive Conservative Association was announcing government policy when he forecast a division between the positions of chairman of the board of the Canadian National Railways and the executive head of the railway?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is customary to ask whether a minister speaking outside the house is announcing government policy, but not any other person, particularly one not associated with the ministry.

Mr. Chevrier: May I draw to your attention, sir, the fact that this matter was discussed in the house on two occasions, first on the estimates of the Minister of Transport and again on a bill to increase the number of directors of the Canadian National Railways from 7 to 12. At the time the statement was not made; otherwise it could have been introduced and the ministry asked questions on it. Since then the statement has been made, and it seemed to me this was a proper question to ask on the orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to differ from the hon. member on this, but if such a question were accepted it would open the door to a great many questions which should not be asked, certainly in that form.

TELEVISION

SUDBURY, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO OPENING OF FRENCH STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport with regard to the French television station at Sudbury. Could the minister reply to the question I asked him about two weeks ago, when I inquired whether his department had given approval for an early start to be made on the installation of French television facilities in the Sudbury area?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my department is prepared to take appropriate steps to enable the applicants to start the work without the slightest delay.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Does the minister mean by that statement that his department's approval has been granted, in view of the fact that it is required before the work can start?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I would have to check, because as the hon. member knows, such an application must be approved by order in council. I am not sure whether the order in council has yet been promulgated, but as soon as it has been, my department will do its utmost to have the work started without delay.

AGRICULTURE

MARITIME PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO AID TO POTATO GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether the government has yet reached a decision in respect to a recommendation which he said he made to provide compensation for those who have suffered from fusarium rot among the potato growers in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can only refer the hon. gentleman to that answer given by my parliamentary secretary in my absence.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is the minister aware that some of those people are dependent on these payments which he promised in order to put in this year's crop?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, the minister has been aware of the development of fusarium rot since it was first discovered last October.

OATS—WHEAT BOARD PRICES FOR FUTURE DELIVERY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on May 30 the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska posed a question concerning the so-called refusal of the Canadian wheat board to sell July oats futures. I should like to give the answer to that question at this time.

The Canadian wheat board has not withdrawn offers to sell July oats futures. The board continues to offer, and sales are being made daily but in smaller volume due to limited availability. All stocks of oats in store at lakehead terminals have been contracted for, and the wheat board has ordered additional quantities forward from country elevators to meet commitments already entered into and to provide for additional sales contemplated under the July option. Stocks of oats in country elevators in western Canada are 9.4 million bushels.

In an effort to encourage increased producers' deliveries of this grain, a week ago the board authorized a supplementary quota on oats to 5 bushels per seeded acre with a minimum delivery privilege of 250 bushels per permit holder. Producers' deliveries to date this year have amounted to 27.7 million bushels compared with 15.3 million bushels to the same date a year ago.

The July oats futures opened on February 2, 1961 and the board has offered continuously in the market since that time and has sold a substantial volume for this delivery period. The initial sales were made at 77¼ cents per bushel, and there has been a small but steady increase in the futures market price since February 2, reflecting improved demand for available supplies.

GRAIN

WHEAT—DECREASE IN EXPORTS THROUGH PORT OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I should like to give an answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Levis concerning exportation of wheat from the port of Quebec.

The facilities at this port are used for both domestic and export movement of grain. During the last few years the volume of domestic business handled by this port has increased year by year, making up a large percentage of the port's business. In the fall the elevator contains large quantities of domestic grain and, consequently, smaller quantities of export grain. In the spring, when navigation opens, the facilities are busy replenishing stocks for domestic requirements.

Export clearances during the past few years have remained at about the same level of 9 per cent to 10 per cent in relation to total shipments from all St. Lawrence ports. This year this has been somewhat reduced owing largely to the domestic movement. However, as the year progresses and more grain is shipped from the lakehead to Quebec, I expect export clearances from this port to continue to increase and at the end of the crop season to reach close to the normal level of past experience.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FURTHER STATEMENT ON CLOSING OF U.S. RADAR STATIONS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the two questions asked me by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate I wish to give the following answer. In the answer I gave concerning the effect of the closing of three radar stations and six gap fillers on the east coast I mentioned that the discontinuance of those radar installations would have no effect on the work load of any other radars which will remain in the system. This answers the question which the hon. member asked with reference to the Sydney installation.

In connection with his question concerning what will happen to the Point Edward naval station, I wish to inform the hon. member as follows. The Royal Canadian Navy has no plans to make increased operational use of the Sydney naval base in peacetime. It is envisaged that the level of activity will remain more or less the same as it has in the past year or so, depending on the number of operational exercises that are planned to take place in that area from time to time.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask a question perhaps to clarify the question I asked the minister. The question was whether there was any increased activity in construction contemplated at the Sydney base.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I had better just say a word on that. A number of proposals have been put forward by the Sydney board of trade and other people in Sydney in connection with construction projects at the Point Edward naval base. These are now under consideration but a decision as to which ones, if any, to go ahead with immediately has not yet been reached.

TRANSPORT

SOULANGES CANAL—REPRESENTATIONS BY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he published an ad in La Presse of Montreal, whereby his department is putting up for sale a piece of land at Cascade Point, at the eastern end of the Soulanges canal, in opposition to public opinion in this riding?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the ad in question has been published in the papers. I shall check on this. I know, however, that such action was being contemplated.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister read an item published in La Presse of Montreal on June 1, 1961, to the effect that the department was mysteriously offering a property for sale at Cascade? Is the minister aware also that eight chambers of commerce have unanimously approved the setting up of a fish-breeding station and of a natural science museum, and does he not feel that he should follow up those representations, instead of those made by a certain individual known to the minister?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker I do not agree with the chambers of commerce in question. It would be a wonderful project to have a fish-breeding station and a natural science museum on the properties belonging to the Department of Transport. However, I believe the department has been generous and co-operative in offering 13 miles of this canal and reserving, for a relatively short period, certain parts of these properties for industrialists who might be interested in buying them and setting up plants in order to provide work in the area. If, after a certain time, no industry shows interest in such a project, we shall revise our policy concerning that particular section which has been reserved.

Mr. Chevrier: Another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister not agree with the chambers of commerce in this area that the ideal site for an industrial development would be at the west end of the canal, namely at Coteau, where railroad facilities are available?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with my hon. friend and with the chambers of commerce in that connection.

In my opinion, a fish-breeding centre or station could be built just as well in another section of the canal. Indeed, I would like to draw my hon. friend's attention to an article which appeared in the Gazette under the signature of a great fish-breeding expert who felt that the requests submitted by the hunting and fishing association and the Quebec department of fish and game were exaggerated under the circumstances.

I feel that our offer is both generous and logical and that people will agree with the citizens of that district that our attitude is reasonable.

Mr. Chevrier: Everybody would seem to feel different from the minister on that point.

FLOODS

NEW BRUNSWICK—REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. M. Creaghan (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, last week the hon. member for York-Sunbury directed a question to the Prime Minister concerning the current flood disaster in New Brunswick. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could make a further statement on this disaster in my province.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member said, a question was asked last Wednesday by the member for York-Sunbury regarding the disaster that has taken place in New Brunswick. I informed him that there had been no request for assistance by the government of New Brunswick up to that time. I have since received a communication from the premier of New Brunswick, the effect of which is that those in charge of the assistance fund being raised are asking for a contribution of $250,000 from the federal government.

As I stated on the earlier occasion, there have been certain customs followed throughout the years in determining whether or not there should be federal assistance for provincial disasters. Those rules are being considered in the light of the nature of the disaster in that province, but so far there has been no authentic or complete assessment of the potential damage. When all things that ordinarily enter into the consideration of such matters have been determined, the government will then be in a position to advise the house as to the attitude to be taken, that attitude, of course, to be determined on the basis of those regularly accepted principles that have heretofore been followed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $633,958,817, being the aggregate of

(a) one sixth of the total of the amounts of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1962, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, $614,823,482.50;

(b) one third of the total of the amounts of items 140, 226, 318 and 370 of the said estimates, $946,866.67;

(c) one quarter of the total of the amounts of items 90, 281, 282 and 400 of the said estimates, $7,184,844.50;

(d) one sixth of the total of the amounts of items 16, 65, 218 and 493 of the said estimates, $3,709,604;

(e) one twelfth of the total of the amounts of items 208, 209, 210, 212, 214, 222, 223, 227, 228, 337, 399 and 462 of the said estimates, $7,294,019.33, be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1962.

He said: Two months ago parliament voted interim supply for the first two months of the current fiscal year, namely April and May. A further sum is now required to meet current expenses. The present resolution asks for a sum estimated to meet the needs in this respect for the next two months. It would provide one sixth of the amount of all items in the estimates, and in the case of 24 items it would vote additional amounts. These 24 consist of items such as grants and provision for programs that do not move at an even pace throughout the year, so that additional sums are required to carry on programs that are often seasonal in their nature.

In no case will this resolution, if approved, carry with it a vote of the entire amount of any item in the estimates. I am pleased to give the usual undertaking that the approval of this resolution and the passing of the bill to be based upon it will not prejudice the rights and privileges of hon. members to criticize any item in the estimates when it comes up for consideration in committee of supply. The usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister has given a very short and brief explanation of the items of which it is proposed to obtain approval in this measure now under discussion. It concerns the amount of, roughly speaking, $634 million broken up as you, Mr. Chairman, indicated to us a moment ago.

Before I enter upon the remarks which I intend to make I should just like to pose this question to the minister. Why has it been found necessary to ask for a two month's vote for interim supply? I ask the question anticipating that the reply of the minister will be that it is the usual and normal course to follow. However, the question which I am prepared to ask is this. Is it the usual course to follow when the estimates are under discussion as they have been under discussion during the course of the last several weeks and, particularly, during the course of the period since morning sittings were initiated? As the minister knows, we have entered upon a discussion of the estimates of the various departments beginning on Wednesday, as a rule, and going right through, with but few exceptions, for the remaining days of the week. It therefore occurs to me that we should be given some explanation of this matter. Perhaps the minister, if he does not mind, will do so later.

Then there is another matter that comes to our minds at this time, namely that the minister has given little or no indication of his policy for the future, as I indicated on Saturday when I posed a question to the minister on the orders of the day inquiring when it was his intention to bring down the budget.

At that time I indicated to him that we were quite willing to co-operate in the passage of this measure for interim supply. However, I think it should be noted that co-operation is a two way street. Co-operation means co-operation not only from this side of the chamber but also from the government side as well. We are now into early June. The budget has not been presented, and this is a rather unusual situation. The new fiscal year started on April 1. Two months after entering upon the new fiscal year we do not know what the program of the government is; and by "program" I mean the outline of expenditures which the government has in mind. We know nothing of the money that will be required. We are in complete ignorance of the amount of the deficit which is envisaged by the government or the amount of money which will have to be borrowed by the government. We have no idea of the federal taxes which the Canadian people will be called upon to pay.

I think those various items which I have enumerated are matters about which the House of Commons and the Canadian people should know when we are discussing a measure of this importance. On Saturday the minister indicated that there was no direct relationship between the measure which would be discussed on Monday, namely this vote for interim supply, and the budget which he intends to bring down. I disagree with the minister. I think such is not the case. In my opinion there is not only an indirect but a direct relationship between the two matters. Normally the budget is brought down at the end of March or early in April. Last year it was brought down on March 31. I think it would be useful if the committee were to know the dates on which the budget has been introduced in this house in the last 17 or 18 years.

In 1946 the budget was presented on June 27. That was a late date, but having regard to the fact that the session was begun on March 14 it can easily be understood why the budget was not introduced much earlier. But that was an exceptional year. In 1947 it was introduced on April 29; in 1948, on May 18; in 1949, on March 22 and again on October 20; in 1950, on March 28; in 1951, on April 10; in 1952, on April 8; in 1953, on February 19; in 1954, on April 6; in 1955, on April 5; in 1956, on March 20; in 1957, on March 14; in 1958, on June 17; in 1959, on April 9; in 1960, on March 31 and December 20.

This gives some indication to the committee as to when the budget was introduced in the past. Here we are in early June and we have had no indication, contrary to what I believe are the rights of parliament, as to when the budget will be brought down.

The voting of supply is the traditional occasion for demanding the redress of grievances. It is the duty of the opposition to bring forward any grievances before voting supply. Here is a grievance now, a grievance of which we are complaining; that we on this side of the chamber, as well as the Canadian people, are entitled to know when the general presentation of the finances of the country is likely to be given to the house.

We are being asked to vote money before we know how these estimates are going to be spent. We are being asked to vote interim supply, but we do not know what the taxes are likely to be and what the whole expenditure program of the government is likely to be in connection with those very matters which we will be discussing.

It seems to me that the committee is entitled to a clear-cut statement by the Minister of Finance. We must know precisely when the budget will be brought down and whether there will be an appropriate and immediate opportunity for full debate. We do not want to be placed in the position we were put in last Christmas, when we had no opportunity to discuss the supplementary or baby budget, as it has been called. We were faced with an adjournment, and were not in a position to discuss it until several weeks later. I do not think we should be put in this position.

If the minister expects to obtain co-operation from this side of the chamber in connection with interim supply, he will get it; but as I indicated earlier, and I repeat it now, he will get it on certain conditions. He will get it on a condition which the opposition thinks it is entitled to obtain, and that is a clear statement by the minister of the matters about which I have asked, so that the opposition and all hon. members of the house will be able to discuss the matters which normally come up in the budget, at the appropriate time.

If that were forthcoming I am sure the Minister of Finance and, for that matter, the government would certainly have no fault to find with the co-operation from this side of the chamber. That being so, I hope the minister will find it possible to respond to these questions which I have put to him.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Laurier first asks why the house is asked to vote two months' interim supply. The answer, which he himself has indicated is in his mind, is that this is the normal period for which interim supply is asked. This is a well established practice. In some years when the house was clearly on the eve of prorogation or the end of the session was in sight or two or three weeks away at the most it has sometimes not been necessary in the last interim supply motion to ask for more than one month. However, no one in this house I think would be bold enough to say he is absolutely positive that this session will end by June 30. So, Mr. Chairman, it is in keeping with the practice of the house and it is necessary under all the circumstances that the vote should be sought in the amount indicated.

As to the second point, Mr. Chairman, all I can say to the hon. gentleman is that the date for presentation of the budget has not yet been set. I am not in a position at the moment to announce the date. As soon as I am in a position to make the announcement I propose to do so. That has been the practice I have always followed in the past while I have held this portfolio, and the committee may be assured that the date will be communicated to the house in ample time.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister what is the reason for this unusual delay in announcing the date of the budget?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can agree with the hon. member that the delay is unusual. It must be remembered, in the first place, that this session has been unusual in that there has already been a budget. That budget was introduced in December; it was debated through January; a considerable number of measures arose out of it; the last of those measures only cleared this house several weeks ago, and one of them has not cleared the other place yet. So account must be taken of that fact in considering the date of this budget and comparing it with the dates of the budgets in other sessions.

The hon. member for Laurier, in reviewing dates of budgets in earlier sessions, did take note of the fact that in 1946 the budget was presented later than the present date. I recall that in 1958 the budget was presented later than the present date. There were circumstances in both cases which accounted for the budget coming in in June, just as there are circumstances this year which account for the budget—

Mr. Pickersgill: Only one of them was in June.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —coming in in June.

Mr. Pickersgill: Only one of them was in June; the other was in May.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If I correctly noted the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier the 1946 budget was in June, and certainly the budget which I introduced in 1958 was brought in—I am speaking from memory—on June 9.

Mr. Pickersgill: June 17.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, June 17, 1958. So while the hon. member has said there were exceptional circumstances in those years, I must say to him that there are exceptional circumstances in the present session, namely the fact that there has already been one budget and it is not very long ago that the last of the measures arising out of that budget was cleared by this house.

I cannot go beyond that. The date has not yet been set. I assure the committee that when I am in a position to announce the date I shall be pleased to do so, and to give the house about the normal length of notice in that regard.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I ask one or two other questions. The minister seemed to take exception to the phrase I used, "unusual delay". I still think it is unusual delay; none the less, if the minister does not like that phrase surely he must admit that there has been a rather long delay. If one looks at the order paper he will see that this is the 124th day of the session. Will the minister not agree that it has been the practice in the past to announce the date of the budget much earlier in the session than the 124th day? That is why I now ask whether we have gone this long before, and why it is that the minister waits this length of time before announcing the budget. The other question which I would direct to the minister is this. Will the minister give the house an assurance or an indication that a budget will be brought down before the end of this month?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I hope to be in a position to bring down the budget before the end of this month.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is nothing in the suggestion we have heard that there will not be a budget in 1961?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, Mr. Chairman, I should not wish to be held responsible for everything the hon. member for Essex East concludes from suggestions he has heard.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, will the minister give us a categorical assurance that there will be a budget in 1961?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have just said in reply to a question asked by the Acting Leader of the Opposition that I am hoping to bring down the budget before the end of this month.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not the question I asked. I asked the minister a simple question and I repeat it now. Will the minister give us a categorical assurance that there will be a budget in the calendar year 1961?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That would be my hope and expectation, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister one more question. Does the minister expect that the budget will be brought down in sufficient time to permit the budget debate to take place in the month of June?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That would depend on the date of the budget and on the arrangements that are made by the leader of the house and the whips of the parties, or those who have charge of these matters for the parties, as to the dates chosen for the debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the fact that it is rumoured that the government intends that we shall adjourn at the end of June and come back either in August or in the fall, will the minister give us an assurance that if he does introduce his budget in the month of June—and from what he has now said it is not clear—there will be provided an opportunity of debating this most amazing budget in accordance with the practice laid down under our procedures allowing for six days of debate? While the minister is on his feet will he say whether his decision to postpone the introduction of the budget has something to do with the alarming state of the unemployment insurance fund and the suggestion that the deficit is likely to be not $700 million but closer to $1 billion?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member will not be surprised when I tell him that I must reject categorically the rumours and assertions that he heaped into the second part of his question.

In reply to the first part of the hon. member's question, let me say there has been no delay in the presentation of the budget, having regard to the fact that there was an earlier budget this year which ran its full course in this house and occupied, actually, rather longer than usual in being processed through all stages.

As to the dates of debate, that is again a matter for arrangement in accordance with the ordinary practice that prevails in the house. I should not think that the idea of a divided period would be acceptable to the house. I should think that when the house begins the budget debate it would probably wish to continue the debate until it has been concluded, but that must be a matter for discussion and arrangement among all parties in the usual course.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter on which I seek clarification, having to do with the statement the minister made earlier concerning the supplementary budget. I feel I should remind the minister that the supplementary budget of last December was supplementary to the budget of last year. It had nothing to do with this year's financial accounts. The other point which I think is of importance is one which I have raised indirectly earlier and which has now been raised more directly by the hon. member for Essex East. I refer to the opportunity to debate the budget when it is brought down.

We were placed in a most unusual position when the supplementary budget was brought down last December, in that we were not given an opportunity to discuss it until some weeks later. In other words, the budget was brought down in this house and the house adjourned—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is the hon. member not overlooking the opportunity provided for debate?

Mr. Chevrier: I have not overlooked the opportunity provided to the financial critic of the opposition to make his remarks, but after all there are others in this house who are entitled to speak, and indeed the house generally is entitled to the opportunity to discuss the budget continuously without interruption so there can be an appropriate and full discussion of the financial accounts of the country.

The minister gave no affirmative answer this morning when we inquired whether an opportunity for continuous uninterrupted debate would be provided. The minister said he hoped it would be possible for him to bring down the budget before the month of June is out. He went on to say he had every expectation that this would be the case. Let us suppose that the budget were introduced one day next week. This would mean that debate on the budget would not be entered upon until the following week. This would give an opportunity for six days of debate, as provided under our new rules, in the month of June. But suppose that were not the case and the introduction of the budget were delayed for another week. It would be impossible to discuss the budget continuously without interruption during the month of June.

While I realize we are not entitled to confidential information, on the other hand the opposition are entitled to know in connection with the matter now before us, interim supply, what is going to be the position of the government with respect to the discussion of the financial accounts of the country. The minister has gone some distance. He has said there will be no budget brought in this week. He went still further by saying that he hoped to introduce the budget this month. I believe we are entitled to know whether, in bringing down the budget this month, there will be an opportunity for continuous discussion of the budget before the month is out.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can usefully add anything to what I have said. The days set aside for debate on the budget will have to be arranged in the usual course. It is the house leader who makes those arrangements, not the minister introducing the budget. I think the views of hon. members opposite are known in this regard. I am sure that in whatever arrangements are made, effort will be exerted to make such arrangements as will accommodate the wishes of the house. I do not know what more I can say.

The request for interim supply that is made this morning makes provision for only the months of June and July, so that if the business of the house were not finished before July and if there were to be some adjournment proposed at that point, there would have to be a request made for a further vote of interim supply. The rights of the house are fully protected in that regard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is one aspect of this problem I think we should emphasize. We have been discussing, and I believe justifiably, the rights and convenience of hon. members of this house with regard to an opportunity to discuss the budget which the minister now assures us is going to be brought in some time in the course of the present calendar year. We hope this will be done before the end of June.

We must also consider, however, the question of public convenience. The minister says the delay in the introduction of the budget does not present an unusual picture in the sense that a delay of this kind has occurred before, although he has not satisfied me that there has been a parallel situation since confederation. The fact that there was a baby budget in December does not in any material way affect the fact that the budget normally presented before this time has been unduly delayed. The effect of this delay, as my hon. friend knows better than anyone else, is being felt throughout the country at a time when there should be definite knowledge on the part of business, industry, agriculture and the work community as to the intentions of the government, so all these groups can make the preparations they have to make in regard to their operations, including the kind of adjustments which inevitably flow from the presentation of a budget.

We are entitled to know from the minister at this stage, not what his budgetary proposals are, but the explanations for this delay. We are not receiving them from the Minister of Finance. We have been directing questions to the minister since Easter as to when the budget was going to be brought down, yet none of his replies at any time suggested that we should not expect the budget until some time well into the month of June at the earliest. Because of the fact that the minister at one time gave the impression that he was ready to present the budget—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I never gave that impression.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well then, because of the fact that, in my judgment, he left that impression, and his words are there to be seen—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He has certainly given the impression that he was ready. That has now been changed, and I cannot—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. gentleman to point out my words to which he has reference?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am afraid I cannot at this time, but in all fairness to the hon. gentleman I will ascertain those words which gave me this impression. Perhaps some of my colleagues will find them in the meantime.

Mr. Macdonnell: You will never find them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In any event that was my impression. That hon. gentleman who always comes to the assistance of the Minister of Finance has said that I will never find them. Perhaps he can offer some explanation in this regard.

All I am seeking to say now is that the Minister of Finance cannot take the position that he is going to hold the country in suspense beyond a reasonable period, and he should give us some definite reasons for this change. I have asked him two questions which he has treated lightly. I asked him first whether the delay in presenting the budget is because the deficit is going to be even more glaring than that suggested by the tax foundation and certainly much in excess of what the minister himself forecast last year. I then asked the minister if the delay was caused because of his wish to avoid the embarrassment which will come because of the state of the unemployment insurance fund. If those are the reasons they are legitimate, particularly the latter. The minister could tell us whether he intends to bring in legislation to replenish that fund, there now being no authority to make loans to the fund under the Unemployment Insurance Act because there are no securities which can be pledged in sufficient amounts. This again reflects the serious state—

An hon. Member: There are.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are not enough securities in the fund now to warrant the Minister of Finance making loans which would put the fund into a condition of security and give the necessary confidence to those who have contractual rights under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The minister may nod his head, but if that is the situation—that there has been a sudden burst in unemployment insurance revenues, I should like to remind him that seeding is now under way, businesses are even now getting ready for their autumn work, and there is a serious stagnation confronting the automobile industry.

I asked the Minister of Finance the other day whether, in view of the decline of over 10.45 per cent in production of commercial and other motor vehicles, he could say that he was prepared to give some relief. Mr. Speaker said at that time that under our rules I had no right to anticipate questions of that kind involved in the budget. Surely in the face of this kind of situation it is not unfair to ask the minister when he is going to bring down his budget so that industry, among others, will know what the situation is. Those are not unfair questions, I suggest.

The report of the royal commission under the direction of Professor Bladen was given the Prime Minister five or six weeks ago. The government has had an opportunity of examining that report. If it has not taken that opportunity then it is certainly remiss in the performance of its obligations. I recognize how busy the ministers are, particularly the Minister of Finance, but I have no doubt that he has had that report carefully examined, and if it has no relation whatsoever to the budget it ought to be tabled so we can ascertain the situation from the point of view of the commissioner in order that we may determine what course to take during the budget debate. If the minister informs us that he cannot reveal the contents of that report because it is to play a very important part in his budget and, as a result, he has not been able to do the necessary homework, even though his statement might not be approved it would be understood. However, those are considerations which the Minister of Finance ought to explain to this house. I do not know under what prerogative the Minister of Finance takes the position that he does not have to give a more definitive accounting to the house with regard to the presentation of the budget. No minister of finance is a law unto himself, no matter how much of a law unto himself he may be in the cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Finance laughs and I laugh back at him, because no matter how much of a law he may be in the cabinet, that is not his position in this parliament, nor is it his position in the country; and the Canadian people have a right to know why this postponing and procrastinating government has delayed so long in presenting its financial accounts to the nation. I suggest to the minister that this is a bit of finessing; that in the absence of a positive reason the minister is hoping to be able to divert public attention from the financial situation which has evolved under this government. If it is a fact that we are going to have a deficit of over $700 million, let alone a deficit of $1 billion, it is understandable that the minister is seeking to coincide our initial discussion on the budget with an adjournment so that the dreadful news may, on that account, be received with less objection on the part of the Canadian people.

If those are not the reasons for this delay the Minister of Finance should stop this humourous appreciation of a serious argument and tell us exactly why the budget is not being presented. The Minister of Finance may laugh, but I should like to tell him—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I cannot help it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that the people in the country who are out of work, and the businessmen of this country facing these conditions of stagnation as a result of the financial policies of this government are not going to laugh. They will be greatly amused today by the reactions which the Minister of Finance has displayed toward suggestions that have come from us in the Liberal party when we have asked reasonable questions of the minister.

Why does the minister not now tell us that the reason he has not brought down the budget is that he is not ready and that certain considerations have yet to be given? If that is the situation I suggest we are entitled to know what those considerations are, unless they go to the very root of the secrecy of the budget itself.

I suddenly recall, and would remind the minister, what happened in the British house with regard to the repeal of certain laws having to do with maize, when a situation arose not unlike the present situation. When the chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Ritchie, was asked to state when he intended to bring down his budget he refused and sat mute in his seat, like the Minister of Finance, and possibly arrogant, like the Minister of Finance. It was that arrogance which caused the government of which Mr. Ritchie was a member to lose its life and its head when the next election took place. That, of course, is what is going to happen to this government.

An hon. Member: What about the by-elections?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And one of the main contributors toward the fall of the head of the government will be the serene, unimpassioned, unexcited Minister of Finance who sits in his seat so quietly and serenely on Monday, June 5, 1961.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, as we move into committee of supply today we must realize, of course, that there are many problems facing this government, and I am sure they would be the last ones to deny it. In addition I believe also many problems are facing the people of this country which they are given to believe the government is not aware of. We have signs of squalor, and unemployment. There are problems connected with defence, transport, external affairs, and so forth. We must also realize that some of the estimates of departments we shall deal with today have already passed through this house. They have been subject to detailed discussion. We hope that the other departments will soon be before the house and again their estimates will be subjected to detailed discussion. In fact, notwithstanding the fencing and political footwork that we have witnessed here this morning, we may even hope that, since the by-elections have been held, we shall have a budget before us one of these days.

Therefore it is not my intention to cover the waterfront in this debate. I should like to discuss one problem only, namely the position in which the old age pensioners find themselves today. The problem of the old age pensioners is unique. If we look at the other problems we find that the sick can possibly look forward to getting well and the unemployed can look forward to the possibility of a job in the future if things take an upturn. If they do not, they can hope at least to hang on until the next election, when they will be able to take some positive action. International tensions can improve, and we all hope they will. But if all these problems were solved it would still leave the old age pensioners in the same position they are in at the present time.

What is ahead for our old age pensioners? Only one of two things can happen to them in which they find themselves at the present time. The first is to lower the cost of living. The second is to raise the old age pension. Either solution can help the old age pensioners today. Unfortunately this government has raised rather than lowered the cost of living since it took office. We see no signs of any change in this regard at the present time. This government has not raised the old age pension, although its promise to do so is now four years old.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We did raise it in 1957.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Yes, but that was four years ago. At the time it was raised there was a clear promise that it was only a temporary measure and the amount would be raised in the future.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): This idea was sold to the Canadian public and the old age pensioners of the country.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That just is not true.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): This government has raised the veterans disability pension during this session. That was a commendable move which received the full support of the house. In more recent days the government have also raised the war veterans allowance. I believe they raised it even higher than the amount asked for by the legion. This again is very commendable and received the full support of the house, but the position of the old age pensioners of the country today is a finger of accusation pointed straight at the government. We have to realize that improvements in the unemployment situation do nothing to assist the old age pensioners, because in the main they are unemployable people. Certainly in most instances the ones who are in need are unemployable. As the years go by they must expect to become less and less employable and more and more dependent on the whims of the government of the day.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I have no intention to discuss individual cases in detail. I have done this before and so have other hon. members. I am sure the situation is, or must be, fully realized by this government; but what I should like to ask today is, what is the government going to do for the old age pensioners, and when are they going to do it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I want to put on the record something to which I alluded when I spoke last. I said the minister did give me the impression during the course of this session that he had just about finished the necessary preliminaries which would enable him to bring in his budget. I now want to put on the record my support for that position. On March 29, as will be found at page 3461 of Hansard, the hon. member for Wellington South put this question to the Minister of Finance. I think it is significant that the question was put by a member on the government side. While I have the highest regard for the hon. member for Wellington South, I am sure he will not misunderstand me if I say he has not taken part too often in questions on the orders of the day, and one may reasonably conclude that this was a planted question, in other words a question which he asked at the insistence of the Minister of Finance. This is the question the hon. member asked:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister indicate to the house whether he has yet established a deadline date by which time he hopes to complete hearing delegations making representations in respect of the main budget?

The Minister of Finance replied as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I hope to complete the hearing of the delegations by the end of next week, April 8.

Now, everyone knows that once a minister of finance has completed hearing delegations he is then in a position to put the finishing touches on his budget—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and get the necessary consent of his cabinet colleagues. My hon. friend says "No". I am speaking from some experience over a long time in government, and I am sure this government's experience is no richer than that of other governments. In any event, on March 29 the Minister of Finance said he hoped that the hearing of delegations would be over by April 8. This is the reason I clearly had the impression that the minister would then be ready to present his budget shortly afterward. Something has intervened in the meantime and we are entitled to know, I repeat, why the Minister of Finance is now, on the 5th day of June, unable to give the hon. member for Laurier, who put this question on behalf of the opposition, the kind of reply which would normally be given by any other minister of finance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am indebted to the hon. member for Essex East for exposing to the committee the manner in which he misled himself into the state of mind which he indicated earlier in his remarks. What I said on March 29, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Wellington South, was that I hoped to complete the hearing of the delegations making representations in regard to the budget "by the end of the next week, April 8". The hon. member has been out of office for four years, Mr. Chairman, and he must have forgotten that normally after the completion of the hearing of delegations there is a great deal of work to be done on the budget. In my experience the hearing of the delegations for a budget brought in in April was completed about the end of January, and it is quite customary for about two to two and half months, in that range of time, to pass after the hearing of the delegations is completed before the budget is introduced in the house.

In the four years that he has been out of office the hon. member has forgotten that a tremendous amount of work has to be done after the completion of the hearing of the delegations. That is one of the earlier stages in the work of preparing the budget. So if he will add two and a half months to the date referred to for completion of the hearings he will find that we are running about on schedule. I might also remind him that the earlier period this year, when in a normal year the hearing of the delegations would have been done, was devoted as far as the Minister of Finance was concerned to sitting in the house following the debate on the budget and on the measures arising out of the budget.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance has given an explanation of his procedure in preparing the budget. I suppose that precisely how he conducts himself in preparing the budget is not the concern of the house, but I would not want the impression to go across the country that over the years successive finance ministers have stopped hearing delegations two and a half months before the presentation of the budget. They have heard delegations right up to the last week before the presentation of the budget.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister says that is not correct. I do not want to use language that you would rule out of order, Mr. Chairman, but may I say that many delegations have presented their representations on major financial matters as little as a week or ten days before the actual delivery of the budget. I have every reason to believe that the representations of those delegations were treated with respect and decisions were taken on them after they had been considered thoroughly by the finance minister of the day.

I can only draw the conclusion that the Minister of Finance has somehow revealed a situation that is a cause for concern in the country, in that the machinery for considering representations and taking decisions thereon on the part of the government is not adequate to the task. The reason for that will remain something peculiarly within the knowledge of the government and a few people working closely with it, but there is some alarming breakdown in the machinery, and what it is we have a right to know.

When the Minister of Finance brushes aside requests for information as to the date of the delivery of the budget and the other representations of my colleagues on this matter of such great concern to the Canadian public, he forgets that in part the great concern over the failure to deliver the budget stems from a certain action on his part for which he must remain answerable. I remind him that he is the Minister of Finance who in the previous parliament, between the 1957 and 1958 elections, refused to deliver a budget as such. He was the new Minister of Finance of a new government taking office after 22 years in opposition who refused to make known the state of the public accounts to the people of this country during the whole life of that parliament. He is the one who refused to state what changes in fiscal policy the new government proposed.

I said at the time in the house and I repeat now that that failure caused a great deal of doubt and hesitation in the business community of this country. It has done more than that. It has been a contributing factor in the slowing down of business activity in the last few years. However much the minister may defend his action on that occasion, I remind him now that it does leave him in the position of being suspect when we recall that the house has been meeting since last November and, having in mind the length of the session, it could reasonably have been expected that the budget would be delivered in April. With that background on his part, whether he was right or wrong in doing so, the delay and the unsatisfactory explanations for such delay have created a situation in the country that is most damaging to the economy.

I would hope that he would see fit to answer fully as best he can, so that the businessmen of the country who are concerned with the budget and the public generally will know when they may reasonably expect the budget to be delivered, the precise reasons for the delay, and will also be given the related information of a nature that can properly be given and does not entrench upon any of the matters with relation to the contents of the budget itself which must by their nature be kept secret. It is a matter of some importance to the public, and I would ask the minister to treat it in that way.

Mr. McMillan: I should like to ask the minister a question. He referred to the fact that we have already had a budget this year and he was referring, of course, to the baby budget. This morning is the first time I have ever heard him call it a budget. It was not a statement of the government accounts. The only figures he brought before the house had to do with a surplus or a deficit. In the previous budget he had forecast a surplus of $12 million and in December he came along and said there would be a deficit of $286 million. These are the only figures he brought forward. They had nothing to do with the government accounts. I should like to ask the minister whether he considers that is a proper accounting to parliament and the people with respect to the government accounts.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member says he did not hear me refer to the December budget as a budget. It will be realized, of course, that by reason of illness the hon. member was not here in the early part of the session, and that is the reason he did not hear it. It has always been referred to by me as the supplementary budget. The expression "baby budget" was a colloquialism applied to it. I have always referred to it, and have done so not infrequently in the house, as the supplementary budget.

Mr. McMillan: Would you say it was a proper accounting?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is so referred to in the budget speech itself.

Interim Supply

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I want to take a few minutes to express my personal concern that thus far we not only have no budget but we have no indication when it is going to be presented. My particular concern is as to any announcements that may be made by the Minister of Finance with relation to our Canadian financial structure from the point of view of trade. I know that we have already dealt with the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, but there have been developments since that time which I am certain must be of concern to the government and particularly to the Minister of Finance; therefore there may be something in the budget that will deal with this most important phase of our economy.

I also cannot help wondering whether the delay in bringing down the budget, which of course is a policy statement, may be having a detrimental effect on our export trade in that some of our industries and manufacturers may be refraining from pursuing an aggressive policy trying to sell Canadian goods abroad. Only last week I noted in a Vancouver newspaper the statement by an official of the timber industry that our export sales in the previous month were down 2 per cent. That is a very important matter to the province of British Columbia at this time of the year.

I also could not help but note and feel disturbed, as I hope the government is, about a statement which appeared in one of the eastern newspapers just a matter of two or three weeks ago. Mr. Victor G. Bailey, Jamaican publisher of the Caribbean Spotlight magazine, stated that Canada is rapidly losing its position as a traditional supplier in the West Indies market. He stated that the main reason is Canada's lack of a go-getting sales approach. On the occasion of this speech or interview he gave some most startling facts. Not only did he point out that we were rapidly losing out on our traditional West Indies market, but that we were losing out on the importation by the West Indies of those goods for which Canada is, I would say, an absolute natural. He says that West Germany, Japan and Italy are flooding the West Indies market with precisely the kind of products made by Canadian factories. For example, West Germany sold 11,526 radio sets in Jamaica and Japan sold 2,627, while Canada sold only 35. That is one illustration. But may I come to a product which is an absolute natural. Here is what we find in a statement made by Mr. Victor G. Bailey:

> Even in items which the West Indies thought synonymous with Canada, he said, newcomers to the market are pushing out Canadians.
> Holland, said Mr. Bailey, sold 343,125 pounds of paper bags in the West Indies while Canada sold 21,654 pounds; and West Germany supplied 216,870 hundredweight of counter flour, compared with only 10,983 hundredweight from Canada.

The situation is getting fairly serious when in an attractive West Indies market, in matters of wheat, counter flour, and products made from our timber resources such as paper bags, we are being completely wiped out by other countries, according to this information. It is something new.

In view of this report of what is happening and in view of the information I gave a few moments ago with regard to declining exports of our forest products from British Columbia at this time of the year, I say this is something that cannot be ignored by this House of Commons or by the Minister of Finance. I would expect the budget to contain something of a policy nature. I say it is bad for Canada and for parliamentary procedure that we should not have had a budget by this time. To my mind it is almost tantamount to a dereliction of duty, a lack of concern for the well-being and welfare of Canada.

As emphatically as possible I want to say that although we cannot do anything about the past, I sincerely hope that just as speedily as possible or almost immediately the budget may be brought down, and that it may have in it some policy analysis and statement and some forward looking views and recommendations to deal with the many problems which are of concern to our people, and the many factors which we see developing and which can be a hindrance to the economy of Canada.

A grave responsibility rests upon the Minister of Finance. Although we can hardly find words with which to condemn his lack of action or his lack of speed in the past, we sincerely hope he will now give us some indication that the government is concerned about what is taking place and that there will be almost immediately an explanation to this House of Commons and to the Canadian people of the fiscal and economic policies of this government. I would say this is a necessity for, let alone a demand by the people of Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: I have another question I should like to direct to the minister. Before doing so, however, I think I should commend the attitude taken by the hon. member for Vancouver East, which was entirely opposed to that of the hon. member for Timmins. The hon. member for Timmins seemed to think that we were simply shadow-boxing with the minister from this side of the house on a matter of perhaps little or no consequence. However, the hon. member for Vancouver East has in effect, I believe, rebuked the hon. member for Timmins, who did not seem to think that the rights of parliament were affected in any way in this matter. We on this side of the house say they are affected. We repeat what has already been said, namely, that there is a direct relationship, to say nothing of an indirect one, between what is being asked at the moment, namely supply to the extent of $634 million, and the bringing down of the budget itself.

However, what I rose to deal with was a matter which the minister has already put on record in connection with the question which was put to him by the hon. member for Wellington South on March 29. In explaining away that question the minister used these words: "A great deal of work must be done after the representations in respect of the main budget have been made". I presume no one will find fault with this statement by the minister. However, the true story is that a great deal of work is done prior to that time. A great deal of work is done by the experts in the Department of Finance in preparation for the budget. The minister said on March 29, as found at page 3461 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I hope to complete the hearing of the delegations by the end of next week, April 8.

When he said that surely he had not in mind that this important work would not be completed until after June 10th. On Saturday he indicated that the budget would not be brought down this week. The only conclusion to which I can come is that between the time this statement was made and the time the budget will be brought down something has happened to estop the minister; to make him change his opinion or to make him consider other amendments than those which he intended to bring down.

I am not complaining about the fact that it is necessary to do all these things. What I am complaining about, and what I think everyone in this house has a right to complain about, is the fact that it has taken more than two months for those representations of which the minister has spoken to be implemented in the form of an actual presentation. There is no doubt in my mind that this was a planted question. I do not mean to be disrecpectful to the hon. member or to anyone else. Here the answer was clear:

> Mr. Speaker, I hope to complete the hearing of the delegations by the end of next week, April 8.

Here we are at June 5, approximately two months later, and thus far we have had no indication of when the budget will be brought down. We have from the minister a statement of hope and expectation. There is hope and expectation on the part of the minister that the budget will be brought down before the end of the month. I do not think that is sufficient. I think the minister should make a definite statement, yes or no; and I think he can do that without divulging any information that should not be given to the house. I think he should tell us categorically whether or not we are going to get the budget before the month is out. In view of what was stated here in the month of March I think the committee is entitled to know what the position is with reference to the financial accounts of the country at this late date.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. McMillan: Is the minister not going to answer?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Answer what?

Mr. McMillan: Is the minister not going to answer the questions?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I answered the same questions earlier this morning, and there is nothing I can add. I said earlier that I cannot give the committee the date of the budget because the date of the budget has not yet been set. I did say that I would give the house the information as soon as I was able to do so. What more can I do than that?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister has given us the explanation now. He says "There is nothing I can add". That is no doubt the explanation of why we have not had the budget; he has got nothing to add. The treasury is empty; he does not know what his deficit is going to be.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, this is the second time this session the Minister of Finance has come before the committee for interim supply. I do not think it is out of order for him to ask for interim supply for two months, one sixth of the estimates. I think that is O.K. Ever since I have been in the house, when asking for interim supply the government has always asked for one sixth of the estimates.

In voting interim supply hon. members of this committee have an opportunity and a right to raise grievances. On this side of the chamber we believe that the matters we wish to put before the committee could more properly be raised in a budget debate. As has been suggested this morning, if the minister will give us some assurance that the budget will be brought down soon and that we will have the proper time to debate it after it is brought down, we will forgo any discussion at this time. In fact we will cut down our discussion on interim supply to the minimum and do all we can to process it through the different stages of the house.

The minister referred this morning to the baby budget. That certainly was not in any way, shape or form an accounting to this country. The only accounting the minister gave was that he would have a big deficit instead of a small surplus. There was no accounting for any one government account.

I do not think our request is unreasonable. It is almost two months since the completion of the last fiscal year, and we are voting money day after day in the estimates. We are voting millions of dollars, and we have not a clue whether or not we are going to have the money. We have no idea how much money will have to be borrowed. I think the minister could probably give us that information now, but he refuses to do so.

Never before in the history of parliament has the session lasted for so long without an accounting to parliament by the Minister of Finance. This session started in November and is now over seven months old. It is true that in two or three election years—and I have gone away back in looking at this matter—and in one war year the budget was presented as late as the latter part of June, but in those particular years the session started either in March or April.

When the minister presented his last June budget I have forgotten the date parliament was called back after the election in 1958, but it was very late, and he presented his budget rather early in the session. If the minister would give us the assurance now that he will bring down the budget some time this month and give us an opportunity to debate it, we on this side of the chamber will not pursue the matter further.

However, I feel that if the minister will not give this assurance I should raise those matters which I should like to put before the committee at this time. I will say this; if the minister is not able to give this assurance to the committee we can only conclude, and the country can only conclude, that he has not the intestinal fortitude to put the financial position of this country before the people.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right.

Mr. McMillan: As I have said before, a year ago the minister predicted a surplus of $12 million and at the end of the year, in December, he predicted a deficit of $286 million. I predicted then that he would never have a surplus. I predicted three years ago that the Minister of Finance would never have a surplus. I hope his figure of $286 million is right. I predicted it would be more and I hope, for the sake of the taxpayers of Canada, that my prediction is wrong.

An hon. Member: They all are.

[Mr. McMillan.]

Mr. McMillan: I have read different references in the press. I saw one in a Montreal newspaper the other day to the effect that our deficit for the last fiscal year would be between $700 million and $1 billion. I say that when the government refuses to give an accounting to parliament the Prime Minister and the government are holding parliament in contempt; they are taking away some of the rights of parliament from its members. How can we carry on and discharge our duties in a proper way unless we have the fundamental information with which to carry on parliament? After all, the author of the Canadian Bill of Rights, the Prime Minister, is taking rights away from the members of this house.

I read in the current press that the Minister of Finance created a pitiful and sad spectacle when trying to get the chartered banks to reduce the interest rate at the same time as the governor of the Bank of Canada was doing nothing in that regard. Surely this is a matter for discussion. It is time the minister laid his cards on the table. The minister has refused to bring the governor of the Bank of Canada before a committee of this house. We should have an opportunity to question the governor.

The report of the Bank of Canada says nothing about salaries, and I think we should have an opportunity to question the governor about salaries. I am not particularly interested in the salary that any one particular person receives, but I do think we should know what the total salaries are. We should also know something about the building of premises. I have heard—I do not know whether it is true—that the Bank of Canada builds and rents premises. From my reading of the Bank of Canada Act I think the bank has no right to build and rent premises.

I have said before that there is no room in Canada for two sovereignties. The government should take responsibility for fiscal policy, but so far they have taken no responsibility in this respect. The Minister of Finance has said that the governor of the Bank of Canada is responsible only to parliament. Then why does he not call the governor before a committee of this house so we may question him? The governor of the Bank of Canada has said on two occasions that he has a cure for Canada's ills. He has said he knows how to cure unemployment. Evidently the government is not following the recommendations of the governor, or hon. gentlemen opposite would have introduced a solution to the unemployment problem. The governor should appear before a committee of this house in order that we may question him on these points.

An announcement was made of a $1 item relating to shipping. This house voted $1 to assist shipping in Canada this year. I opposed that move at the time and said the government should give an estimate of the cost, which I predicted might run even to $100 million. We voted that $1 item not knowing what expenditure might be involved.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. member must be mistaken. No item has been voted yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was an intention announced. There was no item but there was an announced intention, as the minister well knows.

Mr. McMillan: I wish to refer to a recent advertisement which appeared in the Victoria daily Colonist sponsored by the Progressive Conservative association. Twelve points are listed under a photograph of the Prime Minister. The tenth point indicates that the government will spend $500 million for aid to the Canadian shipbuilding industry this year. We have heard nothing about an expenditure of $500 million; we have heard only about a $1 item.

I was laughed at in this chamber when I suggested that the expenditure might run as high as $100 million. An hon. member opposite interjected during the course of my remarks on that occasion and said I did not know what I was talking about. I mentioned that the government might pay as much as $100 million under a $1 vote, but the statement appeared under a photograph of the Prime Minister that $500 million would be spent in aid of the Canadian shipbuilding industry this year. The Minister of Finance or someone on the government side of the house should give us a clear indication of what the amount might be.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The government is following the same course it followed with respect to A.R.D.A., so called.

Mr. McMillan: What is to be done in connection with the unemployment insurance fund? Is the government going to place a sum of money in that fund after parliament adjourns? Will it be done under a $1 item? If the minister does bring in a budget will he include a $1 item for the unemployment insurance fund as he is doing for shipping, but in practice spend several hundred million dollars? How will he proceed to replenish the unemployment insurance fund? In connection with the railways I should like to know from the minister whether the money voted in connection with the equalization of rates will be brought into the budget.

The Canadian economy is sick. This is not the time to introduce a budget designed to help the party in power. We have had several budgets designed to boost the stock of the party in power. Surely the time has come when we should have a budget designed for the good of the Canadian people and not for the good of the party in power.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Even though the party in power needs help.

Mr. McMillan: The minister made reference to the baby budget. The only thing of much moment in that budget was the half hearted, wishy washy measure to assist depressed areas. Not long ago there was only one so-called depressed area, and today we elicited information to the effect that two or three other communities have qualified for assistance under this plan. I doubt whether one man has been put to work under this program since the measure was introduced. The government had every right to proceed under this program after it was announced in the baby budget last December.

If we had the right kind of leadership our economy could be reinvigorated and we could get going again. If proper action were taken the unemployment insurance fund would look after itself because there would be more employment. The United States economy is building up, but if one reads the Financial Post one learns that after a slight pick-up the Canadian economy is again faltering. We need assistance from this government to stimulate our economy and assist the business community.

Last year business failures in Canada were at the highest level since the Tory thirties. There is no doubt about that. Immigration has gone down to a trickle, and according to recent press reports more people are leaving Canada today than are entering the country. It is true that our population is increasing because of the increased birth rate, but at the present time more people are leaving Canada than are taking up residence here. Taxes are higher now than ever before at all levels of government. People are going hungry in our cities, including the minister's home city of Toronto. Unemployment is higher in Canada than in any other country in the western free world. A recent article in the New York Times indicated that our unemployment level is approximate two and one half percentage points higher than that of Italy, the next worst country in that respect in the western free world. Our federal bonds have sold at prices lower than the bonds of cities elsewhere including the cities of Hamburg, Buenos Aires and Oslo.

I have been right in a good many of my predictions. I venture to predict now that if we have another four years of federal fiscal policy such as we have had, we will jeopardize the pensions and other social welfare payments to which we are already committed. Our country needs leadership—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but before he launches into the next portion of his address I should like to call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, at one o'clock I said that this government needed leadership. I should like to emphasize that statement at this time by saying that this country needs leadership now. Before we adjourned at one o'clock I intended to deal more with the program of action as described in the Victoria Colonist, in an advertisement paid for by the Progressive Conservative party. There appears in this advertisement, among other things, the following statement:

> When this government entered office in 1957 immediate action was required and was taken—a serious recession was under way—these measures were taken—

Following that statement there appears a list of 12 measures, and I should like to refer to No. 10, which is as follows:

> 10. $500 million aid to Canadian shipbuilding industry.

In this house we voted a $1 item in the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. McMillan: There was a $1 item included there.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was just promised, not voted. It was just another promise.

Mr. McMillan: That is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister should look at page 4784 he will find there the Minister of Transport's promise.

An hon. Member: Who has the floor?

Mr. McMillan: I suggest we have been kept in the dark in regard to this $500 million program. I should like the minister to tell us what was intended by the inclusion of that $1 item in the estimates of the Department of Transport, as well as this program involving $500 million as indicated in the advertisement of the Progressive Conservative party. I suggest that information was made public in that way as election bait, and that the elected members of this house were given indication only of the $1 item. I wonder whether the minister can tell us why we are being asked to vote that $1 item in view of the announced plan regarding the $500 million in aid to the shipbuilding industry. At the same time I would ask the Prime Minister what has happened to the bill of rights in this regard.

It is no wonder that in this country we are in such a financial mess, and no wonder that the government has had to ask the taxpayers of Canada to foot the bill for $800 million in extra interest over a four year period. The trouble resulted from this government's policy, commenced at the time of the baby budget in December of 1957, followed by the losses suffered by the conversion loans, in turn followed by the high interest on borrowings which this country has had to make.

I should like at this time to briefly refer to the 1960 income tax rate. Many individuals have been fooled this year in regard to their 1960 income tax return because this government has raised the rate paid by individual taxpayers. In 1959 individual taxpayers paid the increase for that year from July 1 on, but in 1960 they had to pay the increased rate for the whole year. Many individuals have asked me why that is so. I suggest the reason is that the government has raised the income tax while at the same time it has lead people to believe that it has lowered it. I suggest this situation has become fully known to the individual taxpayers following their filing of returns for 1960.

The minister referred to the fact that he presented the baby budget to this house at a period when I was absent because of illness. I should like to inform him that at the particular time it was presented I was overseas in the company of other hon. members of this house attending a NATO parliamentary conference. I was at the officers' mess of one of the fighter wings in France when the news of the baby budget arrived from Paris. I felt it was bad news at the time, and was asked to comment in respect to it. I said at the time I felt it would not in any way help our economy and that it bore out my prediction that the $12 million surplus, which the minister had forecast, would in fact turn out to be a huge deficit.

I am sure all hon. members have read press reports regarding the financial difficulties suffered by Britain at different times, particularly following the wars. The government of that country, as well as the chancellor of the exchequer, has always been able to step into the breach by adopting measures to improve the situation. I wish that we had a government in Canada that would step into the breach in order to cure our ills at this time.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I intend to be very brief in my remarks this afternoon. At the outset I must say that our group has been restrained because of our impression that the members of this committee were going to all restrain themselves at this time in order to facilitate the business at hand. I suggest that we have kept our word in that regard.

Before proceeding with the matter in respect of which I rise at this time, I should like briefly to support the representations made by the hon. member for Timmins. I refer to his plea to the government for consideration of the plight of many of the persons in receipt of old age security and old age assistance payments. As we see it we have a responsibility to our senior citizens to make sure that they are able to enjoy their declining years with at least a measure of comfort and some security.

In order to save the time of the committee I will not go further in that direction. I rose particularly to proceed with a question that I raised on the estimates of the Secretary of State last Saturday. I was ruled out of order because the person I wished to deal with is a public servant and not a civil servant as I was informed. Therefore I trust that this afternoon I am completely in order.

First of all I wish to refer briefly to two or three news reports which have caused us, and I think a number of people in Canada, some concern. The first is a report in the Gazette of Saturday, June 3, which reads:

> Dr. Marcel Chaput, vice president of a Quebec secessionist movement, yesterday said he will reply within a few days to an invitation that he quit his defence research job.
> He said he will issue a statement replying to Dr. J. E. Keyston, vice president of the board. Dr. Keyston said Thursday Dr. Chaput's "political activities" are incompatible with his work as a federal government civil servant.

First of all, I must say we think it is highly improper for the vice-chairman of the defence research board to make a public statement to the press with respect to Dr. Chaput. I am quite sure he has started something that is bound to end up in Dr. Chaput getting justice from all quarters. I understand that Dr. Chaput addressed an independence meeting recently and said that "Quebec will secede from confederation before 1967 if the secessionist movement continues to expand at the present rate". Of course there is a big "if" there. A number of people have asked me the meaning of the word "secede". I understand it is to go apart, to leave, or to assume a different unit or grouping, and so on. Then in the Gazette of Monday, June 5, I read:

> Chaput still backs secessionist group refuses to quit Ottawa job.
> Speaking in French, he said:
>
> "In the dispute between myself and my employer, there is, as far as I'm concerned, only one possible reply: I have no intention of resigning from the defence research board or from the vice presidency of the R.I.N."
> This was his reply to an invitation from the board that he resign.
> Dr. J. E. Keyston, vice chairman of the board, said last week he considers it "morally and ethically inconsistent that anyone should publicly urge the disruption of the federal government while continuing to be employed by the government."

First of all, I think comment on the action of an employee of this status is the responsibility of the minister and not that of the vice-chairman of the board. I think the vice-chairman of the board should know better than to make such press statements. Because of this unfortunate publicity a certain amount of understandable resentment and concern has been aroused in certain quarters. In this morning's Gazette I read:

> Dr. Chaput supported in Ottawa.

This reaction is the result of precipitate and unfortunate publicity on the part of the vice-chairman of the defence research board. The article goes on:

> Five French language Canadians have formed a "civil rights committee", a group to back up financially any French language Canadians restrained in the exercise of their civil rights.
> The five men are Gaetan Legault, an Ottawa lawyer; Claude Trottier, a Quebec city industrialist; Pierre Laporte, a Montreal newspaperman; Paul-Emile Robert, a Montreal life insurance underwriter, and Jacques J. Paris, a Hull translator.
> Formation of the group was decided during the week end following the suggestion that Dr. Marcel Chaput resign his defence research board job because of "political activities".

Later on in the report we find:

> "We are not separatists," said the five men in a statement. "But we believe that any French Canadian patriot threatened, because of his opinion, in the exercise of his civil rights deserves the moral support and the financial backing of all his compatriots."

We agree with this statement. We are concerned about this unfortunate situation and publicity on two grounds. First, we are concerned with freedom of speech, the right of free association and the right to political opinions being enjoyed by public servants. We believe in the system they have in Great Britain where those civil servants who have access to certain confidential documents on a political level, deputies and senior civil servants, are not permitted to take part in political activities; but the great mass of civil servants, including technical and professional personnel, have the right to take part in political activities and many of them do so.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, we want to emphasize our interest in and recognition of the causes of this discontent which finds expression, I understand, in three or four so-called separatist movements in Quebec. While no established political party has adopted the idea of separation of Quebec from Canada, its revival no doubt has certain deep rooted causes which we should understand and recognize.

As I understand it, a number of our French Canadian patriots, Canadians of French descent, consider that their place in confederation has been that of a junior partner. Personally we think they are incorrect in that assumption, but they have that opinion and this lack of understanding is the cause of some discontent. We must appreciate the circumstances which promote these ideas and also, shall I say, to some extent these fears, and we must do all we can to strengthen unity and fraternity on the basis of understanding and a recognition of the principle of equality in all aspects of government and administration.

I am one who believes that we should not get upset about these activities. I must remind the committee that Scotland and Wales have had separatist movements for centuries. In Great Britain they actually provide the places for them to expound their views and talk to their audiences, and they get listened to attentively. They are respected as citizens of Great Britain; not that great numbers agree with them, but they have their rights and they are recognized. Actually, I think just prior to the last coronation some of them stole the coronation stone.

Well, no one in any separatist movement in Canada has suggested stealing anything of a similar kind in Canada, but here is another interesting thing. In Great Britain we find civil and public servants participating in these separatist movements which are the expression of long-standing minor grievances as a result of the union of England with Scotland or England with Wales, and it suggests there is no necessity for people to get concerned and become intolerant because some persons express these views. In Great Britain this is a long-standing tradition.

What about Dr. Chaput about whom there has been this unfortunate publicity? He has not violated his oath of allegiance or of secrecy; he has not violated his oath of office. As a matter of fact, shall I say, on strictly legal grounds the movement is to date non-partisan because there is no political party in Canada that represents it. Dr. Chaput has not transgressed any of his constitutional and legal rights as a Canadian citizen or as a public servant.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I did want to bring to the attention of the committee that this group regrets the public statements of the vice-chairman of the defence research board with respect to Dr. Chaput's political activities or whatever you may wish to call them, and the consequent unfortunate publicity. We uphold and defend his right to practice all his privileges as a Canadian citizen and as a public servant, and we urge that the Minister of National Defence announce his support for the practice of the principles of the bill of human freedoms and fundamental rights with respect to all the civil and public servants who come within the jurisdiction of his department.

I am being as brief as possible because we do not wish to lengthen the debate on interim supply. Finally I wish to say with emphasis: Let not the frosts of intolerance wither the blossom of democracy in this country by unfortunate statements or unfortunate publicity.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding what the hon. member who has just spoken has had to say I hope he will regard my intervention at this time as wholly within the procedures that we have laid down and within the rights of a member of parliament in accordance with what he thinks are the merits of the situation.

Mr. Herridge: Absolutely.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member has been speaking on behalf of the freedom of the individual, and that, of course, is a very important matter to engage anyone's consideration. Without in any way commenting on what the hon. member has said I want to say that we in the Liberal party have been discussing this morning a matter that involves not only the freedom of the subject but the freedom of parliament, the rights of parliament and the rights of the people to have from the Minister of Finance an accounting of the financial affairs of the nation.

We offer no apology whatsoever to anyone in the house for persisting in our denunciation of the refusal of the Minister of Finance to give us satisfactory responses. We join heartily once again in support of the position taken by the hon. member for Vancouver East, who in a succinct and able presentation this morning indicated that apparently he appreciates the seriousness of the reluctance of the Minister of Finance to give any indication of when we may expect the next budget, when we may expect him to give an accounting of the state of the finances of this country.

Though I was not able to put my hands on the specific remarks this morning, I said I had gathered an impression which led me to believe that the Minister of Finance had clearly indicated that he was ready many weeks ago to present his budget. When I pointed that out this morning the hon. member for Greenwood took issue with me and said he did not agree that I could have justifiably formed that impression. He was out of the house when I later produced a question that had been asked by the hon. member for Wellington South and replied to by the Minister of Finance having to do with eliciting from the minister the probable date of the presentation of the budget.

The Minister of Finance replied that he expected to finish hearing delegations by April 8, 1961. We pointed out that in the experience of other governments, certainly no less efficient than this government, once that chore had been completed it had not taken a very great length of time for the minister to come forward and present his budget to the nation. There can be no doubt that if the Minister of Finance had finished hearing delegations by April 8 he was not very far away from the date when he could reasonably be expected to present a budget in this house. I find that later in the session the Minister of Finance gave a further indication that he had reached the point where he was about to present his budget. I find on page 6140 of Hansard for May 1 a question—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): You were just 2,000 out.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member will recognize that some of us are capable of making mistakes. We do not have that infallible attitude of this arrogant government. We can make a mistake, particularly when it comes to a page of Hansard. The contribution of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance to this debate thus far has consisted of grunts.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is more than the hon. member's contribution so far.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He is very close to the Minister of Finance, and if his minister cannot give satisfactory answers I suggest that possibly he might like to take part in the debate and give some indication along the lines which we feel we are entitled to receive and which, as responsibly as we can, we are going to elicit from the government. As found on page 4140 of Hansard, no less estimable a member than the hon. member for Winnipeg South put this question to the Minister of Finance with regard to the probable date of presentation of the budget:

> Mr. Speaker, today being May 1, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he has as yet fixed the day for the presentation of his budget?

The Minister of Finance said:

> No. Mr. Speaker, and I do not think it will be possible to present the budget during the first half of this month.

That question, as was the former question, was put by a member sitting behind those on the ministerial benches. I am not suggesting in this case that it was a planted question because the hon. member for Winnipeg South is quite resourceful and is capable of thinking of questions without even the promptings of the Minister of Finance. The fact is that the former is a member supporting the government. The minister said that he would not be ready during the first half of the month, which leaves open only one conclusion, of course; that he would be ready during the last half of the month of May. This is the 5th of June, and still we have not had from the minister any definite statement when we may expect the budget.

We on this side contend, and we do so with force, that this is an affront to parliament, that this is an affront to the nation as a whole, that business conditions are such as to warrant some assurance from the Minister of Finance that the budget will not be delayed much longer. There is certainly no violation of our traditions in pressing the Minister of Finance to give us some indication when the budget may be presented. We have the right to ask whether there is going to be a budget at all. We have the right to ask within what dates it may be expected, just as did the hon. member for Winnipeg South. The Minister of Finance, in refusing to give us any answer, has left only one real conjecture, the possibility that there will be no budget at all.

If that is the situation, let the government courageously say that in its judgment there is no occasion for a presentation of the financial situation to the nation this year. Let the Minister of Finance say that he is content with the budget brought in on May 18, 1960. There would, of course, be controversy over that position, but at any rate the government would at least have taken some definite position. The Minister of Finance this morning spoke loosely of the relation of the so-called baby budget to the budget which he said may be brought in some time in the course of the next few months.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say that at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Finance says he did not say that at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The record will speak for itself.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My memory of the inaccurate words of the minister is as good as his. My memory is that the minister said this morning that the budget of last December could not be regarded as not related to the budget which may or may not be presented in 1961. Here is what the minister actually said about the relationship of this so-called baby budget. He did not relate it to a future budget at all. It had no relation, he said, to the future. As found at page 1006 of Hansard of December 20, 1960 the minister said this:

> As I said earlier in my speech, this is not a full scale budget. It is a series of specific proposals supplementary to the regular budget I brought down last March. It is an integral part of the broad economic policy set forth in the speech from the throne.

That is not what the hon. gentleman said when he interrupted the hon. member for Welland and said that the baby budget was related to a budget that may or may not be brought down some time in 1961. The minister cannot have it both ways. If the statement made by the minister on December 20 and to which I have just referred is the one that is to be accepted, then the minister is bound to bring down a budget this year because, on his own words, the baby budget of 1960 was related to the previous budget of March, 1960. Hence, unless we can get from the minister some definite assurance we run the chance now that we may not only not have a budget before the end of June, or before adjournment, or before the prorogation of parliament, but that in fact we may not have a budget at all during this year 1961. We are entitled to know what the position of the government is in that regard so the business community can be forewarned and so that parliament can take its decisions and formulate its judgment with regard to the policies of the government in that regard.

The situation must be faced. The minister has left us in an unsatisfactory state as a result of the indefinite replies he gave this morning to the hon. member for Laurier and to other hon. members with regard to the date of the budget. I cannot understand why the minister cannot say positively that there will be a budget before the end of June, or before the adjournment of parliament, or before the prorogation of parliament or before this session comes to an end. Why the minister does not rise in his place and give that definite assurance is something I do not understand. If he does not want to tell us that there will be a budget some time after June 10, why can he not at least rise in his place and say that there will be a budget along about the dates and times that I have specified? I therefore ask the minister the following questions, and I say that his refusal to answer these questions will be regarded by parliament, and properly so, as an affront to parliament.

Mr. Aiken: You are speaking only for yourself.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): His refusal to answer these questions will be regarded as an affront to the nation. His refusal to answer these questions will be a discouragement to the business community and to those in avocations concerned with the economic well-being of this nation. The questions are as follows. Will a budget be brought down before the end of June, 1961, or before the adjournment of parliament in 1961? The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance is taking these questions down and I will go slowly so that he may have a record.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is quite unnecessary for the hon. gentleman to go slowly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In that event I will repeat the question. Of course I could consider that remark as a definite indication of the arrogance of this government, but I will leave that remark stand. The minister did not make it and I do not suppose I have the right to attribute to the minister the indiscretions of his parliamentary secretary. Nevertheless I will leave that remark stand, but I will repeat my questions.

(1) Will a budget be brought down before the end of June, 1961, or before the adjournment of parliament in 1961?

(2) In that event, will there be an opportunity for a full debate in accordance with our rules before adjournment or prorogation in 1961?

(3) Will a budget be brought down in 1961 before adjournment or prorogation of parliament?

(4) In that event, will there be an opportunity for a full debate in accordance with our rules?

The failure of the minister to reply to these questions will raise in the public mind conjectures which are now being made and which have a very unsettling effect on the economic welfare of this nation. I hope the minister is now carefully considering the kind of reply to these questions which will give satisfaction to us in the Liberal opposition and more particularly to the people of Canada. The government cannot sit by and hope to extricate itself from the dilemma in which the minister's words have put it. These are questions of the greatest moment. We have the right to know whether or not the financial situation of this country is as it was portrayed by the tax foundation. We have the right to know whether the government is going take certain relief measures in order to assist certain sections of Canadian industry.

Does the Minister of Finance think I am unfair when I take this line, particularly in the face of the situation that confronts the automobile industry? Does the minister feel that one is unreasonable in asking for some indication, not of whether there is going to be tax relief but whether the government is going to announce its policy, from which it will be possible to determine whether or not there is going to be tax relief to assist that industry or to assist the Canadian economy generally?

I repeat that the Minister of Finance does not satisfy the traditions of this parliament by refusing to answer these questions. He may refuse to answer them. He may carry us right on until the time of adjournment tonight without giving any indication other than that with which he has now left the house. He may take that attitude because he has behind him a strong following that can resist, through voting power, any attempts of the opposition to elicit information in the public interest. But if that position is taken by him I can assure him that it will not add to the appraisal that is being made in this country in the most responsible quarters with regard to the inadequacies of the financial policies of the government of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not know how many hon. members have reflected on the fact that we are being asked at the present time to vote $640 million, which is more than the total pre-war budget of this country and more than the total amount that was spent in the year 1939 by the government of Canada for all purposes. We are being asked to vote this on the 124th day of the session. While I do not pretend to have perused all the records since confederation, I would be immensely surprised if it has ever happened before, since confederation, that a session of parliament reached the 124th day without any indication being given of when there would be a budget or whether there would be a budget. And that is what the minister has said to us today. He said he hoped to have a budget in the calendar year 1961. That was the best he could say in reply to a categorical question which I asked him twice.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true, and you know it.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is true, and the minister's words are on the record.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Tell the whole story.

Mr. Pickersgill: The whole story is that I asked the minister to say categorically whether there would be a budget, and the minister did not say there would be. If the minister wants to get up and say categorically there will be a budget in 1961, I will sit down and let him do so; but unless he does, there is no assurance that there will be, even on the 124th day of the session.

We are being asked to vote a second $600 million or more, the second instalment of this year's estimates—not last year's but this year's estimates—without knowing what the deficit was last year and without knowing what the minister's current estimate is of the deficit for this year, which he will no doubt have to correct in the house next December or January. One sometimes wonders when one reflects that in this house, in another parliament, the hon. gentleman's leader made a great deal of a so-called secret economic forecast, whether the minister is determined to wait until this fiscal year is over so he can announce his deficit by hindsight rather than by foresight. I say this because here we are well into the third month of the fiscal year and nobody except the tax foundation, a private organization, can give the country any idea of the state of the nation's finances. That is a most serious thing.

The minister finds the rights of parliament and the right of voting the taxpayers' money in $600 million gobs a laughing matter, but it is no laughing matter to the public, sir; it is no laughing matter at all to the public. Nobody knows today where this money is coming from. Here we are being asked to vote hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars; in fact the amount is over $1 billion already. The government has asked us to vote this amount this fiscal year without giving us any clue, as my hon. friend from Welland said earlier, as to where the money is coming from. We know there are certain taxes now being imposed, the highest that have ever been imposed in peacetime on the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nearly as high as the wartime peak and the highest ever in peacetime; yet the tax foundation months ago estimated that with the present levels of taxation and other present indications the minister would be $700 million short.

That was before a lot of shocking things were revealed in all their nakedness. That was before it was absolutely clear that the unemployment insurance fund would be bankrupt as it is at the present time. For months, since last November, we have been promised amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Many people are beginning to speculate whether there are going to be any such amendments at all; and you cannot blame them, because they get no information whatsoever from the government. They are beginning to speculate as to whether the government has any intention of amending that act, or whether the minister just intends to add to his deficit or make a huge dole to the unemployment insurance fund in a supplementary estimate, which would mean $100 million, $200 million—nobody knows—added to the deficit for this year.

That is only one aspect of the disorder, of the uncertainty, of the confusion that exists in the public mind, and it exists in the public mind, because of the failure of the government to do what the minister said earlier would have been done if this had been a normal year. I do not know what the minister considers abnormal about this year, except that he made a terrible boob in his budget last year and predicted a surplus, and then had to come in with a deathbed repentance in December and predict a deficit. If that is what he means by abnormal, that was last year. But what is abnormal about this year? The session started early; there has been lots of opportunity for the minister to bring down this budget long ago.

As my hon. friend from Essex East demonstrated so very clearly, the minister was obviously twice on the verge of doing so; because we know enough about the way hon. gentlemen opposite behave to know very well that those questions would never have been asked without some prior arrangement or consultation between the questioner and the minister. I quite agree that hon. gentlemen opposite can think up their own questions, but they are not going to embarrass the front benches—that is most of them are not—by asking questions until they know those questions will be acceptable. When the hon. member for Winnipeg South asked his question on May 1 there was no doubt from the tone of the question that he was a little shocked that it was already May 1 and there was no sign of a budget.

The minister shoved it off then for two weeks. Why did he say two weeks? Why did he say "not the first half of the month"? It is hard to understand unless he was seeking to create an impression in the public mind that in the third week of May there would be a budget. Therefore everybody had every right to expect that there would be a budget then. However, when the third week of May came there was no sign of a budget, and finally the minister blurted out the fact that he was not going to present a budget in May. Apparently he is now being more cautious; he does not know when, if ever, he is going to present a budget.

We do know that the railway labour dispute was settled. We know this because there was no denial and one is reasonably entitled to surmise that since there was no denial some undertaking was given that the railways would be provided with the money to pay those increased wages, or part of them. This is a reasonable assumption, particularly when you put two things together, the failure to settle the railway dispute last November or December, and the settlement coming in May after the government received the recommendations of the MacPherson report.

This is going to be another huge addition to the deficit. How is it going to be done? Are we going to have legislation brought down in the proper way, as the Prime Minister promised, or is this just another of those promises? Are we going to have another supplementary estimate, another dole and another addition to the minister's budgetary deficit? Is that why thing are being held up? Nobody knows what is going to happen about this.

Then we had this shipping business. The minister said that his colleague the Minister of Transport did not know what he was talking about.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is untrue. That is a contemptible, false statement, and you know it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, the minister has suggested that a statement I made was a contemptible, false statement. The minister knows perfectly well that when my hon. friend from Welland referred to this $1 item, he said there was no such thing. I am going to read from the Minister of Transport—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let us have the facts straight. What the hon. member for Welland said was that an item had been passed, and I said there was no item. There is not any item. No item has been placed before the house on this matter as yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: Unless the minister changes the record he will find that he went a good deal further than that. When I interposed and said that the Minister of Transport had said there would be an item, the minister disclaimed that. Here is what the Minister of Transport said as reported at page 4782 of Hansard for May 13 this year. That was the day after he came into the house and made his statement on motions. These words ought to go on Hansard again. The Minister of Transport was asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East:

> Can the minister give us an idea of the amount of the supplementary estimate?

That was for shipbuilding assistance. The Minister of Transport replied:

> My understanding is that it will be a one dollar item.

Then a little later, no page 4782, the Minister of Transport when replying to my hon. friend from Laurier had this to say. The hon. member for Laurier had asked:

> As to this important program, consisting of two divisions, to assist the ship operators and the shipbuilders and the fishing industry—will all of it be put into effect by the insertion of a $1 item in the estimates?

To this question the Minister of Transport replied:

> Yes. It will be inserted as a $1 item because there is no limitation to this subsidy.

Whether there is any money in the treasury or not, there is to be no limitation. The sky is the limit. He continued:

> We do not want to restrict shipbuilding in Canada. I think our regulations will be drafted in such a manner that we can look at after all reasonable requests from shipbuilders and ship owners. No ship operator, I am quite sure, will risk 60 per cent of the cost of a ship if there is no market for the services of that ship. However, on the other hand, if a definite amount was set up the result would be to limit this subsidy policy and we do not want to do that.

Apparently they did not want to do it, because when they got away from this house to a place where they could be even more irresponsible than they are here, if that is possible in view of the attitude taken by the minister today, the subject was revealed in an altogether different light. Here we have a program of action, an advertisement containing the pictures of the Prime Minister and the member elect for Esquimalt-Saanich which appeared in the Victoria Colonist, containing also a list of the billions which this government has spent including item No. 10, to which my hon. friend from Welland has already referred: "$500 million aid to Canadian shipbuilding industry".

Remember, the minister said that this amount could not be estimated in Ottawa. But in Victoria, in Esquimalt-Saanich, it became $500 million, nearly as much as the total budget of Canada in the last year before the second great war. There is another way of putting it. The party opposite won that seat by a majority of about 500 votes. That majority is apparently going to cost the taxpayer a million dollars a vote.

This is the kind of finance we get in our by-elections when we do not have a budget, and no doubt that is why we did not have a budget. I doubt if the Minister of Finance would have dared to include the $500 million, that sum of more than half a billion dollars, in his deficit. Does the minister say that this advertisement, to quote him, is a contemptible lie? Is that how he would describe it? He used the words a little while ago. Would he describe this advertisement as a contemptible lie, or does he stand behind this advertisement inserted by the Esquimalt-Saanich Progressive Conservative association? I ask the minister whether this is a truthful statement made on his behalf in order to elect another member to support him in this house, or whether it is, to quote the minister —it is not the kind of language I use—a contemptible lie, this offer of a million dollars a vote to win a by-election.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister should answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will not answer, because the minister is far too embarrassed to answer. The minister is noted for his exuberance. He was even more noted for his exuberance when he was sitting on this side of the house. But I imagine that even the minister would not have been as exuberant as this if he had gone out to the Pacific coast. He did not go, and I think I know why. He did not go out there because he did not want to pledge another $500 million to the premier of British Columbia to pull the government out of the mess the government got into because he refused to pay heed to the premier's warning on the 13th of whatever month it was—February, I am told. Whenever it was, it was far too soon.

We remember how forgetful the minister was on this subject when he read that letter in the house. When asked to table it he said he would have to get the premier's permission first, although he had already read it in the house. That is a fair sample of the way in which this whole question concerning the province of British Columbia has been treated. It seems to me that no federal government has ever been more humiliated by a provincial government than this one has been over the Columbia development by the government of British Columbia, and all because it was so eager to get something else to bolster its popularity, some other vision which, without the consent of British Columbia or a huge expenditure by the federal treasury, could not be translated into anything concrete.

It may be that this is one of the reasons the budget is delayed. It may be that, having signed this treaty, they are still trying to make up their minds whether to build the High Arrow themselves at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada. Maybe that is what is holding up the budget; nobody can tell. All that exists is a state of hopeless uncertainty.

I need not deal further with the motor car question, because my hon. friend from Essex East has already dealt with it. For five weeks the government have been in possession of the report of the royal commission. They have not published it. Apparently it is another secret document. In any case they have no idea what to do with it. Do they think this problem, which the royal commission was established to deal with is not an urgent one?

What is the reason for the hold-up? Perhaps the government was waiting around for the report on magazines by Grattan O'Leary. Well, they have even got that. Today was the day the secretary said it would be available to the press. Of course the secretary got ticked off by the Prime Minister, who did not appreciate premature intelligence being given, and as a result the press has not received the report and neither have we.

My hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition suggests that perhaps the government is waiting for the report of the Glassco commission. Maybe the Minister of National Health and Welfare is sitting up at nights rereading the Clark report. That may be the reason the budget is being held up. Actually this matter of the Glassco report is very serious, because we remember the half billion dollars of waste there was supposed to be in the expenditures of Mr. Harris. We all remember that at a time when the budget of this country was over a billion dollars less than it is now. Perhaps the minister hopes that the Glassco commission can give him that half a billion dollars to reduce his deficit.

It may be that the minister is waiting for that great salesman the Minister of Trade and Commerce—the minister of "boo-boos", as I am reminded by my friend from Ottawa West—to sell enough extra goods to balance the deficit. Maybe that is what they are waiting for. As far as I can see, the only thing the Minister of Trade and Commerce is selling these days is the idea that the senior minister from Toronto is the Minister of Trade and Commerce and not the Minister of Finance. He is, obviously, assiduously doing that while the unfortunate Minister of Finance has to sit around here preparing his budget and rewriting it in the light of the next new half a billion dollar expenditure that one of his colleagues forces upon him for the purpose of attracting votes in a by-election.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Do not forget the millions of dollars required by the Minister of Agriculture in connection with A.R.D.A.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought that was going to take two years. Well, I do not think anybody takes very seriously the visions of the Minister of Agriculture. We have heard of them before. The Minister of Agriculture was moved from the north further south because his vision in the north turned out to be as impermanent as an aurora borealis. I suggest we should not take any of those expenditures too seriously, except perhaps expenditures on publicity in the ministry of agriculture and the expense account of the minister himself, who today paid one of his rare visits to the house to tell us he still has not kept the promises he made to the potato growers of Prince Edward Island before the by-election. Notwithstanding the intervention of my friend from Essex East, I doubt if the minister is much worried about any expenditures under that bill for quite some time except the continued expenditures on those projects that were started, under the P.F.R.A., by a man who was practical and knew how to get things done.

It may be that the minister is hoping before he brings down his budget to squeeze down on the provinces a little more. It may be that he is putting another squeeze on them before the budget is presented. Seriously, sir,—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This is your first serious statement.

Mr. Ricard: He has been talking foolishness all along.

Mr. Pickersgill: Seriously, Mr. Chairman, the fact that there is no budget and that no one has the faintest idea how much the deficit is going to be, except that it certainly will be in the hundreds of millions of dollars, presents a very difficult situation. No one can inform us how much of this deficit is going to be covered by taxes. We have only the one forecast, what I suppose we might term an educated guess, made by the Minister of National Revenue at London some months ago when he said there would probably be higher taxes. That was the impression he attempted to give.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not what my colleague said at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will have the opportunity in replying, to set any facts straight which he thinks I have misrepresented.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You know that subject was raised in the house and that what you are saying is misleading.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will say what he wants—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why are you not fair and honest about this?

Mr. Pickersgill: There is one way to be fair and one way to be honest, and that is to be fair and honest in telling the people of this country what the taxes are going to be. Surely we should have known by the first of May what the taxes are going to be for this year and how much was to be borne by the taxpayers. Until they know that, the people of this country are not going to be able to carry on their business in an intelligent fashion.

Whether the Minister of National Revenue was just speculating, or whether he had some kind of inside knowledge—perhaps he was just trying to mislead the public—no one will know until we receive the budget, and that is the whole point involved.

These rumours, speculations, uncertainties, and worst of all, stagnations, are all results of the failure of this government, the incapacity of this government, and the unwillingness of this government to make up its mind about these problems. I admit they are tremendous problems, a good many of them the government's own fabrication. I am not surprised that the hon. gentlemen are completely overwhelmed by them.

I do not doubt at all the rumours which are rife throughout Ottawa, and elsewhere in this country, particularly in the financial press, that there are two schools in the cabinet; the school of what we might call the extra-mural minister of trade and commerce who, while the Minister of Finance is presumably wrestling with these problems here in Ottawa, is trying to steal that minister's support in order to become the heir apparent, who would like to have a sunshine budget, and the school of the Minister of Finance which is apparently the school of gloom and doom. I do not know whether that is right or not, but it is in accord with the character of both ministers. No one knows the answer to that question, nor on which side the Prime Minister is, if he is on either side.

The plain fact of the matter is that I do not believe, as I said at the outset—I will amend my remarks if anyone can demonstrate that I am wrong—ever before in the history of this country has a parliament reached the 124th day of a session, at any rate in peacetime, without having been informed as to when the budget would be presented. Certainly never before on the 124th day of a session has parliament been treated with the contempt with which it has been treated by the Minister of Finance today when he refuses to say categorically whether there will even be a budget presented in the calendar year 1961. To ask the members of this committee to vote over $600 million more than the whole budget of this country in the last year before the war absolutely blind and without knowing where the money is coming from—who is going to pay it, how it is going to be raised, and what effect the raising of this money would have on the economy of Canada is not only the height of irresponsibility but, coming from a government headed by the man who was going to restore the rights of parliament, is a mockery of parliament and a mockery of the rights of the people of this country.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say very much during the debate on this motion, but after listening to those members in the Liberal front benches, one after another, I thought at least one calm note should be introduced.

We are used to the sight of seeing them follow each other with more and more enthusiasm, one piling remarks upon those of another, until we get the impression that they are standing on top of a mountain instead of the molehill with which they started.

Mr. Pickersgill: It certainly is a mountain of debt.

Mr. Nugent: I decided to sit on this side of the house this afternoon to watch the hon. members of the Liberal front benches because I was impressed this morning with the idea that there was an unreal quality about the debate. However, the more I have watched, the more I have been convinced that I have been watching a play being played out which could perhaps be entitled "much ado about nothing". In fact, I felt if we allowed them to go on, the play might well be titled "the twelfth night", before it finished.

The play they have been carrying out was written by the chief propaganda agent of the Liberal party who has relied heavily on Shakespeare, I suspect. I do not think much of the material he has used but the cast has certainly been admirable. He has certainly chosen the right people to play the principal roles in this farce, full of wind and fury, signifying nothing; those individuals with the most experience in the parts. However, the entire Liberal front bench has taken part today, and I thought the hon. member for Essex East played the outstanding role. We have heard from him twice and should be convinced by now that he is really trying for an Oscar, though I am sure he has received criticism for trying to upstage his leader.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why not get to the issue?

Mr. Nugent: When he displays outraged regard for the rights of parliament and the people of Canada, I think he overplays his role and suggests another line from Shakespeare, if I may quote it slightly inaccurately, "Methinks the laddie doth protest too much."

I am reminded by the remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, as well as those of other hon. members of the Liberal benches, of Shakespeare's MacBeth. I am sure that is where much of the material has come for this play today. I am sure that the poor unfortunate king who placed his safety in the hands of MacBeth was in no different position from that of the hon. members of this house were they to listen to the Liberal admonition, that they are the protectors of the rights of members of parliament. I believe, should we leave the rights of parliament in the hands of that party, there would be that cry which was heard in MacBeth's castle in the morning, "Murder, murder most foul".

I was very struck by the solicitude of the hon. member for Laurier who gives such concerned advice to the hon. member for Vancouver East. We heard today from the hon. member for Timmins who was apparently not so alarmed about the possibilities of the government delaying the budget. The hon. member for Essex East then presented an impassioned oration following which the hon. member for Vancouver East joined with his remarks in saying that the opposition was not being done right by the government. Whereupon the hon. member for Laurier commended him and warned him to beware of his mate from Timmins. The hon. member for Timmins does not look well suited for the part of Desdemona, but the speeches made by the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Laurier would indicate that they are aptly fitted to form the rest of the triangle. I would suggest to the hon. member for Vancouver East that he again read his Othello and remember that the advice of Iago to Othello did not result in that union remaining together very long. I would suggest that here we have many pieces of advice, but when the Liberal front bench starts advising the C.C.F.'ers on how to conduct themselves in this debate I am sure hon. members will realize that my likening it to some of Iago's speeches is not out of keeping.

I would end with a very short comment. Despite all their filibustering I am sure the opposition realizes that the budget will not be too long delayed. I am sure that most of the noise they make about delays covers their apprehension that they will not find in it those things to scream about that they seem to think will be there. I am sure that the people of this country, along with hon. members when they hear the budget, will conclude by saying, "Despite the premonitions of the opposition, all is well that ends well".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the hon. member a question? In view of the assurance he has given that there will be a budget can he say, as a supporter of the government, that he shares the view that there should be a presentation of the budget either before adjournment or before prorogation of parliament and that there should also be afforded an opportunity for a full debate of that budget in accordance with the rules of this house?

Mr. Nugent: May I just advise my hon. friend that I have every confidence in the government and in the Minister of Finance. I have no doubt that the budget will be presented in due course and that we shall all be satisfied if we just have a little patience.

Mr. McCleave: Does the hon. member think that the role of the three witches could be played by the four horsemen of the Apocalypse?

Mr. Nugent: I am not sure which one of them would be content to be silent.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who has just resumed his seat has described the opposition participation in this debate as "much ado about nothing". It may well be that no one is co-operating with us. To the members on the government side these things may not be worth mentioning but we feel we have certain responsibilities to the electors of this country. If the presentation of a budget and an accounting of the affairs of the country are of no concern to the members on the government side, they are to us in the opposition.

It is my intention, Mr. Chairman, to deal briefly with a matter which is of grave concern to the population of my province of New Brunswick. If we had had a definite commitment on the part of the Minister of Finance to the effect that the budget debate would be forthcoming soon I would have waited for that time to make these remarks; but since we have no assurance—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is just humbug.

Mr. Robichaud: —that the budget will be forthcoming soon, may I be allowed to speak briefly on this matter of grave concern to the population of New Brunswick.

Earlier today, on the orders of the day, the hon. member for Westmorland directed a question to the Prime Minister having to do with the possible assistance which could be expected from the federal government by the residents of central New Brunswick who have been so seriously affected by flood damage.

In his reply the Prime Minister took a very sympathetic attitude toward those affected by the flood and said that the government would make a decision when the damage had been assessed. I realize that this could be considered as the proper attitude to take on the part of the Prime Minister, but may I be permitted to say a few words on this matter which, I repeat, if of great concern to the population of the province of New Brunswick and particularly to those residing along the Miramichi, the Nashwaak and Saint John rivers and its tributaries.

Every member of the committee is aware of the heavy damage caused in the central New Brunswick areas over the week end of May 28 when the rivers I have mentioned rose to unprecedented heights and went on their destructive rampage. There is no doubt that the residents of those areas have experienced one of the most floods with the heaviest losses in years if not in the history of the province of New Brunswick. Bridges have been carried away; public roads have been undermined; private homes as well as churches and parish halls have been damaged or destroyed. Telephone and electric services have been disrupted. Railway lines were swept away. At this early date the over-all estimate of the damage is placed in the vicinity of $7 million or $8 million by officials of the New Brunswick disaster fund.

So far a request has been received from the premier of New Brunswick asking the federal government to contribute the sum of $250,000, being 25 per cent of the minimum objective of a $1 million fund to aid the flood victims. The government of New Brunswick has already committed itself to a contribution of $50,000 to the disaster fund. It has been made clear that this fund has been instituted to assist individuals who have suffered extensive personal losses in this unfortunate disaster.

I know that every member of this committee will agree with the premier of New Brunswick that those who have suffered so much adversity with such fortitude and raw courage deserve the friendly and willing assistance for which New Brunswickers are noted in time of trouble. However, the New Brunswick disaster fund will not take care of the heavy losses encountered by the municipal corporations or by the province of New Brunswick itself. In fact, as I said earlier, the total estimated losses of the province and of the municipalities have now reached an astounding figure exceeding $7 million, and the total is likely to climb much higher as the whole story of the damage comes to light.

Everyone knows that the federal treasury contributed $12.5 million to Manitoba in compensation for the Red river disaster in 1950. This was 46 per cent of the total estimated damage of $27 million. By this yardstick New Brunswick should be entitled to receive $3,225,000 from the federal treasury.

Without insisting further, Mr. Chairman, I urge the federal government to show unlimited interest in assisting the people of New Brunswick in this disaster which is the worst financial blow that has befallen our province in the present century. I certainly know that this national disaster fund will be applied in a most generous way to alleviate the misery and hardship which have fallen on a large segment of our people of New Brunswick.

Before resuming my seat I should like to place on record a statement made in the house at the time of the Red river disaster by the then prime minister of this country, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. He did not make the statement after having been asked questions by members of the house but of his own volition he made a complete statement on motions respecting the Red river flood disaster in Manitoba and the Rimouski fire during the preceding week end. For the information of the house I should like to put on record the last paragraph of Mr. St. Laurent's telegram to the premier of Manitoba on May 8, 1950.

> No doubt you will want to know now in general terms upon what basis financial assistance to you will be considered. Until the extent of your misfortune is determined, no one can be specific, but I can say in general terms that in arriving at the amount of our assistance to you, we shall apply the same principles as those upon which our assistance to the British Columbia government in connection with the Fraser river valley floods was determined.

The then prime minister then went on to say in his statement that the same kind of immediate action was taken with regard to the Rimouski fire. Without going further, Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that in connection with the disaster which has affected a large segment of our population in central New Brunswick the government will take the same kind of immediate action that was taken with regard to the flood in Manitoba and the fire at Rimouski.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I spoke for only five minutes this morning and I had not intended to speak again. However, I feel I have to rise again for a few minutes in view of the statement made a moment ago by an hon. member on the government side who said that the fact that we in the opposition had made a request or a demand—I prefer the word "request"—for a statement of policy such as can only be had through the presentation of the budget was much ado about nothing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member was referring to the Liberals.

Mr. Winch: I do not know to whom he was referring but it was one of the most irresponsible statements I have ever heard in this house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member was referring to the official opposition.

Mr. Winch: As I say, I spoke for only five minutes this morning and I will take only two or three minutes now. I want to emphasize that there is a very serious situation in Canada. There are most serious problems and in spite of all the legislation and policies that have been announced and brought into the house by the government during this session, a great deal of which I and other members of this group have supported, we still face very serious problems which have not been met through the medium of the declarations in the speech from the throne or legislation already introduced or policies already announced.

I can assure the Minister of Finance that in my own province of British Columbia there are serious problems. In the month of June there are thousands upon thousands who are still drawing unemployment insurance payments because they cannot find employment and the weekly payment of $36 for a married person is not enough to maintain a half-decent standard of living. I can assure the minister that in my own city of Vancouver and in my own constituency of Vancouver East family after family has lost or is losing the amenities of life which are almost taken for granted in Canada but which they are losing because they cannot maintain their payments. Those who have tried to establish home ownership have lost or are losing their homes because they cannot keep up the payments and feed their families at the same time.

I say that right now in the month of June not only is that the position of those who are still drawing unemployment insurance benefits but there are thousands who are no longer eligible for such payments and whose positions are desperate. Something has to be done. The speech from the throne is out of the way. The government must be cognizant of the situation so the only place we can look for further consideration of these matters by the government is to a policy statement and that means the budget of the Minister of Finance. The budget not only deals with the situation I have mentioned and the trade situation to which I referred this morning but also with such matters as the Columbia river development which has been mentioned briefly. We should know whether there is going to be an answer to that problem this session. We should know whether or not negotiations will reach the position where the treaty can be ratified at this session of the house. If it is not ratified, this will mean a year's delay in engineering, a year's delay at least in the start of construction.

I am not a prophet of gloom or doom. I disagree with the politics of the government but I hope all of us have only one thing in mind, the happiness and security of the people of our country and the taking of immediate action of some kind to meet problems which have arisen in the past and are still with us. So far as policy is concerned, the only answer we can get is from the Minister of Finance through the medium of the budget. I want to emphasize that our representations at this time are not much ado about nothing. I will go so far as to say that the reason we plead for a policy statement through the medium of the budget is that only through such a statement can we find out whether something is going to be done and whether some new policy is going to be introduced.

Perhaps I am a little emotional, Mr. Chairman, but I have just returned from the province of British Columbia. I have met people there and have seen the suffering that still exists. I say that what we are discussing at this time is not much ado about nothing. It is something that concerns the happiness, security and standard of living of the people of our country whether they are unemployed or whether they are old age pensioners. We ask for only one thing, not a statement such as was made a few minutes ago but the acceptance of responsibility by the government in the way that we hope that all members accept and assume their responsibilities so that we can do our job as the elected representatives of those who sent us here.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the Minister of Finance not going to answer the questions which were put to him from this side of the house, particularly since the luncheon adjournment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have answered those questions twice already.

Mr. Pearson: Oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition says "Oh". He was not here to hear me this morning. The hon. member for Essex East simply repeated questions that were asked this morning by the hon. member for Laurier and others. I answered them once this morning and then I was asked the questions again and I repeated the answers. What more can one do? I have given all the information I can on the subject because the date is not set, and I told the house that the date would be imparted to hon. members as soon as I am in a position to do so. I also said that I hope and expect to bring in the budget this month. I cannot say any more than that.

We have seen this afternoon why it is that sometimes no firm statement can be made about a date because look at what has happened. It was understood on Saturday by all parties in the house that there would be co-operation and that the debate today would not be extended. What have we seen? It is now four o'clock. The house has been on this matter since shortly after eleven o'clock this morning. The understanding has simply been thrown to the winds. We have had speech after speech. The hon. member for Essex East I think has spoken three or four times in repetitious speeches.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Twice.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I had called a very important budget meeting for this afternoon. The fact that this debate, in violation of the understanding that had been reached, has extended until now means that the budget has to be one day later. I cannot be in two places at the same time. This is just a repetition of the sort of thing that has gone on previously. I could say some things that I think are abundantly called for in the course of this discussion today. I will, however, say only that, after all the time that has been spent in vain repetitions, I hope the house will pass this necessary vote of interim supply and give what assistance is required in this respect to get on with the preparation of the budget. The result has been that this important meeting today will either not be held or will be greatly reduced. I cannot be held responsible for delays of this kind when they happen in this way. As I say, Mr. Chairman, I could speak in the kind of attitude that has been exhibited here today by some hon. members opposite. However, I will say only that I hope good sense will prevail and that we can get on with the business of the house.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Pearson: We over here are not very much impressed by the minister's attitude of outraged virtue and injured innocence. I will therefore ask him questions which have already been asked him and to which he has not replied. If he would reply to these questions perhaps we could then get on with other business. Here are the questions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I say at once that the Leader of the Opposition, for what may be good and sufficient reason about which I do not know, was not here this morning. I answered the questions twice on this subject. I gave to the committee all the information that I could give. There is no use in the Leader of the Opposition coming along now and asking questions that I answered this morning.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps the minister will answer these questions or refuse to answer them. Will a budget be brought down before the end of June 1961, or before the adjournment of parliament in 1961 and will we have an opportunity to debate that budget? That is a simple question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is a simple answer to it. I will refer the Leader of the Opposition to the answer I gave to that question this morning.

Mr. Chevrier: On that point may I say this. The only reply made by the Minister of Finance to the questions from this side of the house were these. He said no budget would be brought down this week. Next he said that he had the hope and expectation that one would be brought down before the end of the month. Notwithstanding the fact that several other questions have come from this side of the chamber, he has not replied to them. I refer to one that was asked of him by myself, another by the hon. member for Essex East and a third by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. The question is this. Will we be given the opportunity, when the budget is brought down, to debate it continuously before the end of this month?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I refer the hon. member to the plain answer I gave to that question this morning.

Mr. Pearson: Let it be clear in the record that the minister has refused this afternoon to answer the simple question of whether there will be a budget during this session and whether we will have a full opportunity to debate it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let it be clearly understood that the minister has already answered these questions two or three times now and he stands by the answers that are a matter of record.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Interim Supply

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Chown in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1962, the sum of $633,958,817, be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-103, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1962.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Chown in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Chevrier: A moment ago the Minister of Finance was complaining that he was held here until four o'clock this afternoon because of repetitious speeches from this side of the chamber. I can assure the minister that he could have been out of here by 12 o'clock if he had wanted to be out of here then. He could have been out of here by 12 o'clock if he had answered some of the questions that were put to him during the course of this discussion, particularly that question having to do with an orderly and continuous debate on the budget, in respect to which we were at least entitled to have an assurance from the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I should be glad to deal with any proper questions in relation to this bill. The bill is in the usual form.

As to the remarks now just made by the hon. member for Laurier, let me tell him that he received answers to his questions this morning and those answers are a matter of record and they will be a complete and sufficient answer to his most unjustified remarks.

Mr. Chevrier: Since when does the minister determine that it will be a complete and satisfactory answer? That is an arrogant way of putting the matter, I may tell the minister. I say that we on this side of the chamber are entitled to receive from the minister better treatment than that. On Saturday, the minister asked what the position was going to be with regard to the opposition and I quite clearly indicated that we would give co-operation in so far as interim supply was concerned. However, I say this to the minister. We have not received from him the co-operation that we on this side of the chamber are entitled to receive. All we have are two statements, one, that the budget will not be brought down this week and the other that he hopes and expects that a budget will be brought down before the month is out. That is not satisfactory, coming from the minister. The least he could have said is that we would be given an opportunity of a continuous and full debate on the matters concerning the finance and the accounts of the country without an interruption such as that which we had at the time of the Christmas recess.

[The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown).]

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister whether he has personally examined the bill carefully and ascertained that it is in the precise language of the resolution.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the bill was drawn by the parliamentary counsel of the House of Commons, who drew it in the same form and gave me the assurance it is in the same form as usual. I have read the bill through. I believe it is in the same form as has become standard now in bills granting interim supply.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On clause 2—$633,958,817 granted for 1961-62.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, in connection with clause 2 I just want to ask the minister, with regard to one twelfth of the amount in schedule D, whether there was not an amount voted in respect of this item on the last interim supply bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): One sixth of all items in the estimates was voted two months ago, and additional fractions of certain items as well. As I explained in opening this morning, the present vote now before the committee contains provisions for one sixth of all items, and then additional fractions of some 24 items.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Shall clause 2 carry?

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 4 agreed to.

Schedules A, B, C and D agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEATH PENALTY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 30, 1961, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-92, to amend the Criminal Code (capital murder)—Mr. Fulton—Mr. Chown in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Order. House in committee of the whole on clause 3 of Bill No. C-92, to amend the Criminal Code (capital murder). Shall clause 3 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I do not think we have dealt with that clause.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Clauses 1 and 2 were carried, were they not?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, clause 1 was allowed to stand and clause 2 was carried; that is my recollection. Clause 1 was allowed to stand, with the possibility of amendment on the question of police officers and prison officers.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Could the minister assist me as to whether or not clause 1 has still to stand and we are therefore on clause 3?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that would be the best way of proceeding, I think, if that is agreeable to the committee.

On clause 3—Capital murder to be specifically charged.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, clause 3 reads as follows:

> No person shall be convicted of capital murder unless in the indictment charging the offence he is specifically charged with capital murder.

Would the minister tell us just who is going to determine whether to prosecute in cases falling under clause 3. Is it the Attorney General of Canada's office or the attorney general of the province concerned?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend will appreciate that the enforcement of the Criminal Code in matters of this kind is the responsibility of the attorney general of the province. The Attorney General of Canada does not authorize prosecutions for murder except that he may have some authority in the territories; but in the provinces it is the attorney general.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the minister say who is going to determine whether the accused should be charged with capital murder or non-capital murder.

Mr. Fulton: I assume, the persons who have the responsibility under the attorney general of the province for the enforcement of the Criminal Code in the various parts of the province.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is, of course, a very important question. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Justice is right in saying that obviously those who are charged with the administration of justice should have that responsibility. But in discharging that responsibility they are going to have to be able to satisfactorily define the words "planned and deliberate". As there is not going to be any real jurisprudence in this matter for some time, that is, settled jurisprudence, how can we leave it to law officers of the crown in this way?

I am sure all hon. members were impressed the other evening with what the hon. member for Essex West had to say when he expressed his concern about the apposite character of the words "planned and deliberate". Is the problem not going to arise in the minds of many law officers of the crown, in the right of the province?

The minister had no difficulty in answering the question of the hon. member for Essex West. I have looked back on what the hon. member for Essex West had to say and I bear in mind that he has had very considerable experience as a lawyer. If he was concerned, and if there was this difference of opinion which is going to prevail right at the outset, does the minister feel that this matter can be left in this state in the face of this misunderstanding?

I do not know what effect a renewal of the plea made by us for consideration in a committee of this house will have on the minister after the interval of four days of cessation of debate, but I can say to him that since we have debated this matter I have reviewed it with some persons in this country who have had very considerable experience in the prosecution of criminals. Their concern is as great as that of the hon. member for Essex West with regard to the meaning of the words relating to what is a capital murder and what is non-capital murder.

To leave this in the hands of law officers of the crown at this stage, when there is no jurisprudence and when there is no precise definition of the words is, I say, leaving a matter of this sort in the greatest state of uncertainty. This is altogether different than the kind of action that revolves around the cabinet in the exercise of the royal prerogative. There the obligation, while no less important than that contained in deciding the form of prosecution indictment, is entirely different. There is not the same precision required in the mind of a cabinet member as there is determining what is "planned and deliberate" in the mind of a person who is to authorize the laying of a charge from which will flow, if found guilty, a punishment involving death or life imprisonment.

I believe that one at least is justified in expressing one's concern again, particularly in view of the fact that we have had some opportunity since this matter was last discussed of reviewing the matter with other interested persons.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think the effective answer is that the law officers of the crown in the provinces now have the responsibility, and it is very heavy and serious responsibility, of deciding whether or not a charge of murder or manslaughter will be laid. The same duty, no different in principle will, admittedly, face those responsible, that is, the duty of deciding whether the evidence in the possession of the prosecution will support a charge of capital murder on the one hand or non-capital murder on the other. It may be it will not support a charge of murder at all, or that a charge of manslaughter will be laid. So there is no difference in principle and I doubt whether there is very much difference in degree, because at the present time a decision has to be reached whether to lay a charge of murder or manslaughter, one carrying the penalty of death and the other not. We are now simply subdividing murder into two categories one punishable by death and the other not, so the duty which falls on officers of the crown is in my view no different from that which they have now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I agree there is no difference in principle, inasmuch as the crown now has the responsibility of deciding whether to prefer a charge of manslaughter or a charge of murder, but in making that decision the crown now has the assistance of a considerable body of jurisprudence as to what constitutes manslaughter and what constitutes murder. That is clear. What the crown has now to do, which is new and which provokes this question, is to decide in the absence of practice or with the benefit of very meager practice, except, perhaps for the persuasive influence of precedents in the United States, what constitutes planned and deliberate murder. We have had already in our debates a clear expression of differences of opinion with regard to what "planned and deliberate" really means. I took the opinion of one hon. member of this house who, to my knowledge, has had considerable experience in the interpretation of statutes—the hon. member for Essex West—and in this connection I would remind the minister of a discussion which took place the other night on this particular matter, a discussion which revealed differences of interpretation. Such differences are going to prevail, I say, in the offices of attorneys general, in the offices of crown prosecutors, when they come to determine what constitutes "planned and deliberate" in the course of deciding, in certain cases of homicide, whether the charge should be in respect of capital or non-capital murder.

The minister may say: I have expressed my views and made myself very clear as to what I mean. It is true that the crown if it wishes to ascertain what is meant by capital murder and non-capital murder may look at the debates of this house for the purpose of elucidating the meaning. They may rely—I am not saying improperly—upon the words of the Minister of Justice. But I would remind the minister that the courts cannot look on our debates here and on the words of the minister in order to determine what "planned and deliberate" means. The courts are themselves going to define the words "planned and deliberate" just as over the years they have given clarification and meaning to the phrase mens rea. To place this initial responsibility in the hands of the law officers at this stage gives reason for concern about the interpretations which will be placed on them in one jurisdiction as opposed to another—I am not saying this will necessarily happen.

I had a very important criminal lawyer in the province of Ontario tell me the other day that in a discussion of these words with a number of lawyers including an official connected with the office of a law enforcement agency there were three different opinions expressed as to what was meant by the words "planned and deliberate". The minister is not resolving this problem simply by saying he is leaving it to the officials charged with the administration of justice. That has not settled the matter. It can only be settled humanly by making sure that we have resorted to phraseology which is capable of the strictest meaning in accordance with the capacity of the human mind to formulate words which represent as accurately as possible the purpose that one has in mind.

Mr. Fulton: May I just answer the observations of the hon. gentleman before the hon. member for Vancouver South speaks? I am not saying that this is the final answer to the problem but we have, of course, endeavoured, and, I believe, with success to use words which are in themselves a precise definition of the kind of murder which will be capital murder from now on. It is true that jurisprudence will be built up with regard to this new category of murder as, of course, jurisprudence is built up as a result of any substantial amendment to the criminal law. This does not mean that we should not go ahead and make this new subdivision of murders into categories, making clear at the same time what it is that constitutes the difference between the two categories as we have done here. I would point out, for instance, that in the United States when murder was first divided into degrees this was a new concept. In the commonwealth of Pennsylvania whose provision in this respect has been the basic one upon which all the others, generally speaking, have been founded, it was laid down that——all murder, which shall be perpetrated by means of poison, or by lying in wait, or by any other kinds of wilful, deliberate and premeditated killing, or which shall be committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate—

Then follow a number of offences.

—shall be deemed murder of the first degree.

In my submission, the words "wilful, deliberate and premeditated" were no easier to interpret than are the words "planned or deliberate". But the legislature in Pennsylvania did not shrink from saying them and making a departure from the previous law when they thought it was appropriate to do so, having taken the precaution of indicating, as definitely as their legislature then could, precisely what it had in mind and what must be proven in order to constitute the subdivision of murder.

I said a moment ago that the crown officers will have a duty no different from that which now falls upon them. The duty they have now is to decide whether to lay a charge of murder or one of manslaughter. In future they will have to decide whether the charge shall be capital murder, non-capital murder or manslaughter. Cases may arise in the future, just as they do now, where there will be difficulty in reaching a decision. In that case the authorities can lay a charge of capital murder on the basis of which the jury may convict of capital murder, or non-capital murder if they feel that the graver charge is not proven, just as now a charge of murder may be laid and the jury may convict of manslaughter if they feel the charge of murder has not been proven. I do not deny that there may be cases where this will be the only proper course for the crown to follow. In general, however, it is our view that the accused should be charged with the offence for which he is to be tried. That is why we have provided that if a man is to be convicted of capital murder he must be charged with capital murder.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Justice has, at least in part, covered what I have to say. I find myself in a position similar to that of the hon. member for Essex East, in that I am slightly worried about the actual wording of clause 3, which reads as follows:

No person shall be convicted of capital murder unless in the indictment charging the offence he is specifically charged with capital murder.

That gives me a little concern. I am not a member of the legal profession and naturally have taken the opportunity, since this bill was introduced, of consulting with members of the legal profession who are experienced in the law, and particularly in cases involving homicide. I find myself having to accept the advice they have given me, and should say at the outset that I think it is sensible.

Those individuals have pointed out to me that the person responsible for drafting an indictment, even as the law now exists, must have a decision whether the charge should involve a conviction and sentence for capital murder, or manslaughter, which carries a maximum penalty of life imprisonment. Those advisers also pointed out to me another matter which I think is of concern. I hope the hon. member for Essex East will follow this situation. It has been suggested that with the adoption of this new law there will be no backlog of jurisprudence and, therefore, it should not be adopted. I suggest if that were the case, we could never make any advance in legislation. This represents a new law and will have to be interpreted. I therefore suggest the argument falls completely to the ground.

One other point, which was brought to my attention by those members of the legal profession with whom I spoke, has been partially covered by the Minister of Justice this afternoon. When an officer of the crown decides to draft an indictment which involves capital punishment and the evidence shows that it was incorrectly drafted, I am advised that it is then within the power of the judge to give direction to the jury, making certain recommendations and, under the proposed act, the jury will have the authority to bring in the finding that murder, in a capital sense, is not involved but rather homicide in the other sense, or manslaughter. In fairness I think I should state that, having consulted several members of the legal profession, I have been advised by them unanimously that the situation I have just outlined is the fact, and I, therefore, have to accept the wording as contained in this bill.

On clause 4—Pleas permitted.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, in respect of clause 4 I should like to say that I have some concern. Not being a member of the legal fraternity—thank God, perhaps—I should like the minister to explain the portion of this clause which reads as follows:

An accused who is charged with an offence punishable by death and is called upon to plea may plead not guilty, or the special pleas authorized by this part and no others.

It was my understanding that when a charge was laid against an individual in court there were only two pleas which could be taken, guilty or not guilty. I should like to ask the minister to explain the use of the words "may plead not guilty or the special pleas".

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the pleas are autrefois acquit, autrefois convict, or pardon.

Mr. Winch: Could you put that in English?

Mr. Fulton: That is to say, that the accused has already been tried for the same offence and acquitted—that is autrefois acquit; that he has already been tried for the same offence and convicted, that is autrefois convict; or that he has been pardoned for the offence. Those are the three special pleas. If either one of them is established, the case is disposed of and there is no trial.

Mr. Winch: Thank you very much.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I do not understand the wording of (2a) which reads as follows:

An accused who is charged with an offence punishable by death and is called upon to plea may plead not guilty,—

The word "may" seems to be in contradiction of other sections of the act because it is a right that an accused can plead not guilty. Why is the word "may" or, in French, "peut" used there?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, the same thought occurred to me because that portion is tied in with clause 5 which also states that the accused may plead not guilty, although in that case it is when he is charged with an offence other than one which is punishable by death.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, an accused must plead something. The law provides that he may plead—the word "only" is not in the code but I use it here—he may plead only not guilty or the special pleas authorized by this act, and that is all he can do. Those are the only pleas he can give which will be accepted.

Mr. Winch: Why do you not use the word "shall" then?

Mr. Fulton: This clause has been written to conform with the present wording of the section which we are actually amending. The effect of it is that on a charge of capital murder an accused cannot plead guilty.

[Mr. Winch.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I do not raise this argument now, but it will be said by some that a jury will know that an accused could not plead guilty and will be influenced, therefore, to some extent in its decision. I do not raise that argument as my own, but possibly to elicit some comment from the minister which will assure other hon. members of this committee. The point is that because an accused cannot plead guilty a jury might be influenced.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am not able to follow that argument or appreciate it because the statute provides that certain pleas only can be entered, and I do not see how the jury could be prejudiced or influenced by that fact. An accused can only make those pleas which are authorized by the statute.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): An accused person may not plead at all. He may refuse to say "not guilty", and cannot plead guilty. In that event, of course, the court automatically enters a plea of not guilty.

Mr. Fulton: That is right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If a jury was not aware of the law with regard to a plea of guilty, it could draw conclusions detrimental to the accused. I raise this point on behalf of individuals concerned with this point.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I must admit that I become confused with the complexities of legal terminology but should suggest that we might get along a little better if laws were made much simpler so that they could be understood by laymen who actually are the individuals who form juries. It is difficult to understand that portion of this clause which reads:

An accused who is charged with an offence punishable by death and is called upon to plead may plead not guilty or the special pleas—

Under clause 5, if the offence is punishable by death, it has to be a plea of not guilty because the court cannot accept anything else. Let us go back to paragraph (2b) of clause 4, which I think is even more confusing in legal terminology than clause 5. It reads:

Where an accused who is charged with an offence punishable by death does not plead not guilty—

He cannot plead anything else but not guilty. I continue:

—or one of the special pleas authorized by this part—

The minister was kind enough to explain this to me a little while ago. I cannot understand why the wording in (2a) and (2b) refers to "not guilty" when in clause 5 it is made mandatory, if there is a charge punishable by death, that the plea must be "not guilty". Why this confusion in terminology; why is it necessary?

Mr. Fulton: I think the hon. member must bear in mind that in a statute of this kind it is hardly desirable that the statute itself should direct the accused in so many words as to what plea he shall enter. The statute should provide only what the pleas are that may be entered, and in this instance it does provide what they may be. This is quite different, and it is an important difference or distinction, from saying by statute that the accused shall enter a plea of so and so. That distinction to our minds is important. Therefore, we have said that in the case of an accused charged with capital murder he may enter one of three special pleas, or a plea of not guilty.

Mr. Winch: Or guilty.

Mr. Fulton: No, we say that a plea of guilty may not be accepted, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Winch: Clause 4.

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend will permit me to complete the sentence. He will find, if he reads clause 4, that a plea of guilty may not be accepted; that is, a plea of guilty to a charge of capital murder. If he does not plead not guilty, or one of the special pleas authorized by this part or does not answer directly, the court shall order the clerk of the court to enter a plea of not guilty. I do not think anything could be much clearer than that.

First of all he is given his option to enter any one of four pleas, not guilty, or one of the three special pleas. If he does not enter one of those pleas, or if he stays silent, then the court orders that the plea to be entered shall be not guilty. That is perfectly clear and to my mind a readily understandable method of providing in the proper legal phraseology that there cannot be a plea of guilty to a charge of capital murder accepted by the court.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Pleading over.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think there is no objection to this clause except I feel that some part of it is unnecessary because a judge would refuse to accept a plea of guilty on a capital charge, or most of the judges would in any event.

Mr. Fulton: There is some uncertainty here, Mr. Chairman. My officials tell me, and have told me for some time, that they have always been told themselves when making research into this matter that there was one occasion where a plea of guilty was accepted and the accused was executed. It is quite true, I am advised, that we have not been able to run it down and produce the case, but neither can we disprove it positively, and rather than take a chance it seemed to us that the proper thing to do was to exercise an abundance of caution and make it perfectly clear that a plea of guilty cannot be accepted.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Effect of previous charge of capital murder or non-capital murder.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is merely an extension of the old common law principle of autrefois acquit or, as the minister said a while ago, autrefois convict but as I read the clause now this amendment really carries the idea of autrefois acquit or autrefois convict a step further. It goes much further than the existing codification.

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend will look at section 519 as it stands at the present time, particularly subsection (2) thereof, he will see that the new subsection simply parallels the other one. That subsection refers to conviction or acquittal on an indictment for murder. We parallel that by providing in subclause (2a) the law that will apply with respect to conviction or acquittal on an indictment for capital murder.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—Where capital murder charged and part only proved.

Miss LaMarsh: I should like to make some remarks with respect to this clause and ask the minister some questions. The effect of this clause, of course, is to make non-capital murder an included offence in a capital murder charge. May I suggest to the minister that the necessary practical effect of this is going to be that every crown counsel throughout the country will not decide beforehand whether he is going to get a conviction for capital murder or otherwise. What he will do in every instance is to charge capital murder because this will probably prevent the escape of any accused person. It has been my experience both in my reading and in my practice that the crown counsel never charges manslaughter under present circumstances. He always charges murder and uses this as a basis of a possible reduced plea. Since the effect of all these sections together is that it is not possible to accept a plea of guilty in capital murder, the pressure will be on the defence counsel and on the accused, if, as will happen in every case, the crown counsel lays a charge of capital murder, to remove any possibility of a death sentence, and therefore there will be a guilty plea on a reduced charge of non-capital murder.

I would suggest to the minister that this might well be considered before the discussion on the bill is concluded, and that if non-capital murder were not an included offence, but if the option was taken away so that there could only be a conviction, if there had been separate counts charged in the indictment. In other words, that non-capital murder be not an included offence, but that there must be a specific charge in the indictment, one for capital murder and one for non-capital murder. This will prevent the possibility of dickers being made to get a guilty plea on the lesser charge.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take issue with the statement made by the hon. member for Niagara Falls. It has been my experience in at least three cases that I can lay my mind to that in the cases which were charged with murder, the original preliminary inquiries were held where all the facts were ventilated. When it appeared on the examination of those facts that the graver charge was not justified the attorney general's department reduced the charges so far as the indictment was concerned, and when the accused appeared before the jury he appeared on a charge of manslaughter and was tried on that charge.

It has been my experience that most agents of attorneys general, or crown counsel are responsible people who are determined to see that the charge which is laid is one which meets the facts. However, I should like to ask the minister this question. Am I correct in assuming that clause 7 as amending section 569 will leave five alternatives? If a charge is laid in respect of capital murder, will there be these five various alternatives open, capital murder, non-capital murder, manslaughter, not guilty by reason of insanity and not guilty? Would all of these five alternatives then be available if a charge is laid for capital murder pursuant to this amending clause?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I just follow up where the hon. gentleman left off. I recognize that in doing so we are not giving the minister the opportunity to deal with the point raised by the hon. member for Niagara Falls, with which I hope he will deal. As I understand clause 7, it would appear from the proposed amendment that on a charge of capital murder there are seven findings open to a jury: guilty of capital murder, guilty of attempted capital murder, guilty of non-capital murder, guilty of attempted non-capital murder, guilty of manslaughter, guilty of infanticide or not guilty. I have had some difficulty with this clause. Is this as far as that clause goes? If this is the correct interpretation, has the minister given consideration that the jury might make a finding of manslaughter if the facts warranted it?

Mr. Winch: Could I ask how a person can be guilty of attempted capital murder? I do not quite understand that. If you have committed murder, how can you be guilty of attempted capital murder?

Mr. Fulton: The conviction, as I see it, would be related to an attempt to commit capital murder. That is a perfectly well understood principle.

Mr. Winch: And if you are found guilty the penalty is death?

Mr. Fulton: You are only liable to the death penalty if you have killed someone and it is found to be capital murder, but the code does provide that a person may also be charged with an attempt to commit that offence and may be found guilty of an attempt to commit that offence. That is the situation in respect of a verdict of guilty of an attempt to commit the crime.

On the question of whether or not there should be two counts included in the same indictment, which was the point raised by the hon. member for Niagara Falls, it seems to me there would be certain objections. In the first place, the two charges are mutually exclusive. The person was either guilty of capital murder or of non-capital murder. He could not be guilty of both. Therefore it seems to me we would have to charge them in their alternatives and you would have one trial. We think that is undesirable, however, particularly in a case of this seriousness where it seems to me to be only appropriate that the crown should itself determine what is the charge for which the accused is going to be placed on trial. If he is going to be on trial for his life, the crown should so charge it. Alternatively, if he is only going to be placed on trial for an offence that involves life imprisonment he should know that and he should actually be placed on trial as the result of a charge accordingly. He should not have to meet them both either concurrently, which I think would be impossible, or alternatively. We think the crown should make up its mind and lay the charge accordingly.

Miss LaMarsh: May I say that I quite agree with the last words of the minister. If I were satisfied that in all provinces the practice was followed which one of my colleagues informs me is the practice in Alberta I would agree that this is the best sort of thing. The best way would be if crown counsel in the very first instance would make up their minds whether they are going to prosecute for capital murder or non-capital. Failing that, perhaps it would be possible to follow the practice that apparently is followed in Alberta whereby a preliminary hearing is held and, on the basis of the evidence adduced at that hearing, crown counsel would decide to reduce the charge if the evidence would only support non-capital murder. This would at least mean that the trial before the jury would be only on the basis of that which the crown was able to prove. While I do not have any statistics with me to this effect, I think it will be found that at least in the province of Ontario the practice is that murder is always charged and is only reduced either as a result of the grand jury procedure or as a result of a plea taken or of directions and the jury's decision.

The hon. member for Vancouver East mentioned another point about an attempt. I am not able to find in the code at the moment exactly what the penalty is for an attempt. Although my recollection is not very clear, I believe that the maximum penalty for an attempt in the case of an indictable offence is half the maximum penalty if the offence has been completed. Perhaps the minister will recall that point. You cannot half kill some one, of course.

Mr. Fulton: I must apologize to the hon. member. I was not able to follow what the hon. lady was saying.

Miss LaMarsh: Does the minister remember what the general penalty is for an attempt at an offence?

Mr. Baldwin: Section 210 covers that.

Miss LaMarsh: Section 210, to which I have been referred, reads as follows:

> Every one who attempts by any means to commit murder is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

I notice no amendment in the bill before us today to provide a difference between capital and non-capital murder in this regard.

Mr. Fulton: We do not think it is necessary. Obviously you would not impose the death penalty for an attempt to commit capital murder because there would be no life taken. Therefore the maximum penalty would be life imprisonment. This section provides that an accused convicted of an attempt to commit murder is liable to life imprisonment. The hon. member for Niagara Falls will remember that the definition of murder is not changed by this bill. What is new in the bill is that murder, if proven, is in turn divided into capital and non-capital. So all you would have to prove in the future, as has been the case in the past, is an attempt to commit murder and then, whatever kind of murder the accused may have intended, he is still liable to life imprisonment. We did not think any amendment was necessary under the situation as it exists.

Miss LaMarsh: I wished to draw the minister's attention to the matter because the apparent raison d'être behind the whole amendment now before the committee is that there seems to be a gradation of guilt between those crimes which are premeditated and those which are not. Thus there should also be a gradation between those attempts at intentional crimes and the other types.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think so because the gradation here is where a life has been taken. Where a life has been taken and it is found to be murder, murder is then divided into capital and non-capital and the death penalty or life imprisonment follows respectively. But that is dealing with the case where life has been taken, that is, murder has been accomplished. The offence to which the hon. member is now directing her mind is the offence of attempting to commit murder and there the law already provides a penalty of life imprisonment. It seems to me that is the maximum penalty that it would be desirable to provide at any time for a crime which does not succeed or result in the taking of life. For that reason we did not think there was any necessity to amend that section, bearing in mind that whether it is capital murder or non-capital murder it still must be murder. Therefore it is not necessary in the charge of attempt to commit murder to say whether the accused intended capital or non-capital murder. All he has to attempt is murder and then he is liable to a penalty up to life imprisonment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I assume that the six categories of guilt I have stated as being comprehended in this section are correct, but I suggest to the minister that it might well be stated in the section that the jury may make a finding of manslaughter if the facts so warrant. That is not authorized in clause 7. Assuming the incapacity to prove any one of these six categories of guilt, why should the jury not be specifically authorized to make a finding of manslaughter if the facts warrant it?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Essex East has begged the question on the point I first brought up. I think subsection 2 of section 569 meets the hon. member's point but I do not know whether it meets mine. That subsection reads as follows:

> Subject to subsection 3, where a count charges murder and the evidence proves manslaughter or infanticide but does not prove murder, the jury may find the accused not guilty of murder—

I am assuming then that we have written into the word "murder" as it appears in subsection 2 "capital" or "non-capital" murder and that it would then read in effect as follows:

2. Subject to subsection (3), where a count charges capital or non-capital murder and the evidence proves manslaughter or infanticide but does not prove murder, the jury may find the accused not guilty of murder but guilty of manslaughter—

What I am trying to get at to the minister is this. Am I correct in assuming that in the case of non-capital murder, there can still be a reduction to a conviction of manslaughter?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. In that case—of a charge of non-capital murder—there may be a reduction of the verdict to manslaughter. As I understand it, the hon. member for Essex East correctly listed the possible verdicts which a jury can bring in on a charge of capital murder.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am satisfied about that matter. It is covered in subsection 2.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8—Right of appeal of person sentenced to death.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): I recognize the hon. member for Roberval.

Mr. Roberge: I will sit down if I am so designated.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): I meant the hon. member for Megantic.

Mr. Roberge: I am a little bit puzzled about clause 8 and the exact meaning of it. I am now referring to subclause 2 which reads as follows:

A person who has been sentenced to death shall—

If I understand the matter correctly, the only persons who may be sentenced to death according to the Criminal Code or according to the bill before us are those guilty of culpable killing for instance, while committing piracy or capital murder. In cases of that kind sentence is imposed by law. The other instance would be in the case of treason. The clause reads as follows:

(2) A person who has been sentenced to death shall, notwithstanding he has not given notice pursuant to section 586, be deemed to have given such notice and to have appealed against his conviction and against his sentence unless that sentence is one fixed by law.

Will the minister tell us exactly what the meaning of that subclause is? Is or is not a man who is found guilty of capital murder able to appeal against the sentence or should he appeal only against the conviction? What about the other instance in which a man is found guilty of treason?

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. Fulton: The answer is that in the case of a conviction for capital murder he would not be able to appeal against his sentence. He would only be able to appeal against the verdict. That is, of course the case of most concern. The situation is similar wherever the sentence is one fixed by law, where it is a mandatory sentence. However, in the case of treason, as provided in section 47 of the code, my hon. friend will note that there the sentence is optional. The section provides:

47. (1) Every one who commits treason is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable—

I would direct my hon. friend's attention to subparagraph (b).

—(b) to be sentenced to death or to imprisonment for life if he is guilty of an offence under paragraph (d), (f) or (g) of subsection (1) of section 46;

Obviously as to a person who was convicted of treason and sentenced to death, it is only appropriate that such person would have the right to appeal against the sentence as well as the finding.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 9—Suspension of execution of sentence of death.

Mr. Deschatelets: Will the minister indicate how this is going to work under clause 9? Suppose we have the case of a man who has been sentenced to death but whose execution has been fixed for a certain date. Where is the line of demarcation? He has a right of appeal. Can the minister indicate how this is going to work? Can he give us an example?

Mr. Fulton: The explanatory note makes clear that the purpose is to ensure that wherever a sentence of death has been imposed, the execution of the sentence will be suspended until after the termination of the appeal which is now provided as of right and indeed automatically to the court of appeal of the province. I would think that such a provision as that which we have in clause 9 is necessary, because the date of execution still must be fixed, and even although the judge imposing the sentence may have allowed what he regards as, and what under ordinary circumstances would be, ample time for the conclusion of the appeal, there may arise circumstances that would have the result that the appeal is not disposed of by the date fixed for the execution. The clause now before us makes it perfectly clear that if that situation should transpire then the date of execution is automatically postponed and a new date set on application to a judge who might have presided at the trial at which the accused was sentenced.

Another clause also makes it clear, and I think provides for the first time in specific terms, that the application for extension or postponement of the date of execution does not have to be heard by the judge who actually presided at the trial. There was in Ontario one case which was a very difficult one indeed, where the judge who presided at the trial I think was away on holidays or ill and a very real question arose as to whether another judge of the trial division had the right to postpone the date of execution. We do not wish that sort of difficulty or uncertainty to arise again. Hence, in addition to providing an automatic right of extension, another clause makes it clear that any judge of the trial division who could have presided at the trial may extend the time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think that is a necessary and good provision. However, I am wondering whether the language is not a little bit dangerous. The clause states:

> —it may be fixed by the judge who imposed the sentence or any judge who might have held or sat in the same court.

That language could be open to any interpretation. A judge might find himself sitting in weekly court when obviously it is not intended that he should be the judge who should have the right of providing for a stay of execution or of fixing another date. Obviously, what is meant is a judge of the same jurisdiction or a judge of co-ordinate jurisdiction such as judges of the trial division of the supreme court, but not "any judge who might have held or sat in the same court". The judge may be a retired judge or it might be a judge in admiralty sitting in a court of general sessions or something of that sort. This is an ambiguous phrase. I think what we really mean is that the judge who shall have the power to fix another date must be a judge of the same order as the judge who imposed the sentence in the first instance. If that is the case, I think that is what we ought to say.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend will note that these words appear to have been taken from another provision in the code. We are looking it up now.

I think his fear that it might authorize, for instance, a retired judge to fix the date of execution is not well founded, because such a retired judge would not be a judge, and the words we have used are:

> —any judge who might have held or sat in the same court.

If my hon. friend will refer to section 643 (2) of the Criminal Code he will see the same words used:

> Where a judge who sentences a person to death considers—

Then there are certain things referred to, and the section goes on:

> —the judge or any judge who might have held or sat in the same court may, at any time, reprieve the person for any period that is necessary for the purpose.

So these words in the clause before us which deal with an order for the stay of execution are taken from the section dealing with reprieve in the Criminal Code. We felt it best to use the words that appear to have had an established usage.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Now that we have the opportunity of using more precise language, why do we not do so?

Mr. Fulton: We think this language is perfectly clear and precise.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 10—Transcript of evidence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, of course the whole purpose of this legislation, inter alia, is to avoid sentencing anyone to death for a crime he did not commit. That being the case—it is a minor point, but it is a point that is consistent—why not make sure that not only the court of appeal but the accused also shall be supplied with the necessary documentation? Why not make sure it is supplied to the accused as automatically as it is to the court?

Why do we give to the judge the power of dispensing with documentation? I do not understand why the judge is given authority to decide what documentation, the evidence, the judgment, the charge and all that sort of thing, should go to the court of appeal. I think that if there is an appeal all this material should go to the court of appeal, and at the same time, to make this clause consistent with the general purpose of the bill, the evidence ought to be supplied to the accused as well.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid my hon. friend stopped at subclause 1 of this clause, because if he had read subclause 2 he would have seen this expressly provided:

> A party to the appeal is entitled to receive
> (a) without charge, if the appeal is against a conviction in respect of which a sentence of death has been imposed or against such sentence, a copy of transcript of any material that is prepared under subsections (2) and (3).

That is, prepared for the purpose of the appeal.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If he is sentenced to death?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But not if he is charged with—

Mr. Fulton: The only case in which we have provided an appeal as of right or, if the accused does not take it himself or through his counsel, an automatic review, is where the sentence is death. This is the only case where this automatic appeal lies. We have expressly provided that in such case the accused is entitled, without charge, to a copy or transcript of any material used in the court below, for the purpose of the appeal.

Mr. Roberge: Perhaps the minister will tell me whether or not I am correct about this. I think I am. The accused will be furnished with all the material that has been transcribed, but he will not be furnished with the material which the judge orders not to be transcribed; is that right?

Mr. Fulton: The only purpose of the provision that a judge of the court of appeal may dispense with the reproduction of part of the record below is that there may well be parts that all parties agree are not essential to be reproduced for the purpose of consideration in the court of appeal.

If there were any point to it, or if the accused wanted it, then I am quite certain the judge would order it to be included in the material provided for the court of appeal and would order that material to be provided to the accused.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That may be, but the clause does not say that. All judges will not be as reasonable as the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fulton: I think my hon. friend would find that in capital cases the judges of the courts would not order the omission of something which it was urged was essential to the preparation of or assisted in the preparation of the case for the accused. We do not want to provide automatically that everything, including material that may not be of any relevance or pertinence, must be reproduced.

Mr. Roberge: The clause provides:

—the addresses of the prosecutor and the accused or counsel for the accused by way of summing up, if

(i) a ground for the appeal is based upon either of the addresses, shall be furnished to the court of appeal, except in so far as it is dispensed with by order of a judge of that court.

Why is there that restriction in the clause under consideration?

Mr. Fulton: The clause also says:

—or if the appeal is pursuant to section 583A.

Mr. Roberge: That is in that case; but if the accused gives notice of appeal he is not furnished with a copy of the address of the prosecutor or of his counsel if in the grounds of appeal there is no point arising out of those addresses.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Fulton: Why should he? If he really wants them, all he has to do is put them in as one of his grounds of appeal. He has only to put in his grounds of appeal an objection to the address of the prosecutor, and then he gets it. However, if there is no objection to the address of the prosecutor, why should it automatically be reproduced? We think it is a sensible provision to provide that it should not be reproduced unless it is relevant to the appeal; in other words, unless it forms one of the grounds of appeal.

Mr. Roberge: It might not be absolutely necessary, but it might be useful.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, as my hon. friend knows, many lawyers anyway, out of an abundance of caution, include grounds of appeal upon which, in the final analysis, they may not be going to rely in their argument. If he thinks it is necessary or desirable, all he has to do is put it in his grounds of appeal.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11 and 12 agreed to.

On clause 13—Recommendation by jury.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make some comments on clause 13. Perhaps it may seem rather strange that I, a person totally opposed to capital punishment, should be discussing the legalities which arise in this bill which will have the effect of putting a man to death, but I suppose that is one of the paradoxes of being a member of parliament.

I must admit that clause 13 made me do quite a bit of soul searching because there is a very important principle involved here. May I say in the first instance that on balance I think I agree with the principle and support of clause 13, but I would appreciate hearing from the minister and other hon. members their views about this.

Under this section we have this provision:

Where a jury finds an accused guilty of an offence punishable by death, the judge who presides at the trial shall, before discharging the jury, put to them the following question:

You have found the accused guilty and the law requires that I now pronounce sentence of death against him—

Then the judge adds:

Do you wish to make any recommendation as to whether or not he should be granted clemency.

As I see it, we are placing a dual responsibility on the jury. First of all the jury has to decide whether or not the person before the bar is guilty of homicide of a nature which carries the death penalty. That is a mighty grave responsibility to place upon a jury, and only the jury can decide that matter. They know they are actually, within the strict terms of the law, deciding whether a man or woman shall live or die. I, personally, should hate to be placed in that position, but society demands that this course be followed and I think it is correct that it should. Having found a person guilty, the question is put to them whether they make, or do not make, any recommendation for clemency. On first reading this clause it was my impression that if a recommendation for clemency was forthcoming from the jury the governor general in council would have recourse to the royal prerogative and commute the sentence to one of life imprisonment.

I regret I was not able to be here when the previous discussion took place on second reading, but I understand through reading the newspapers that this point of view was confirmed by a statement of the Prime Minister—that in future all recommendations of clemency made by juries would be accepted by the governor general in council and that the sentence of death would automatically be commuted. We are, therefore, in this situation: under the terms of this clause not only is the jury responsible for deciding whether a person is guilty or innocent but, in addition, it must decide, in effect, whether, having found a person guilty, the penalty is to be carried out. If they say nothing they are, in effect, saying "death", unless, of course, clemency is exercised by the governor general in council in exceptional circumstances. If the jury recommends clemency they are saying that the sentence shall be one of life imprisonment. Perhaps this is as it should be. On balance I have had to come to the decision that this is the correct principle to follow, but I want to add that a great deal of soul searching was necessary before I could bring myself to agree that this double responsibility should be placed on juries as distinct from the responsibility placed upon them in the past when they had only to decide whether a person was guilty or innocent, it being then the responsibility of the governor general in council, reviewing all the evidence and all the circumstances, to decide whether or not clemency should be invoked.

From the wording of the clause as it stands it appears that the government is accepting what I understand to be the principle in Californian law where the same procedure must be followed. I am afraid I am getting repetitious, but I have been distinctly worried about this clause and I should like to hear the minister explain the basic reasoning which led him to draft this clause in its present form. As I say, I think it should be supported. On the other hand I should like to hear a little more about the reasoning behing the placing of this double responsibility on juries.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am convinced that the meaning of this clause is not clear and that its interpretation would give the courts a great deal of difficulty. It has always been our law that a jury when acquitting or convicting a person charged with a crime must reach a unanimous decision. If they do not, a disagreement is recorded. In the past, juries have on occasion brought in recommendations of mercy on their own initiative. Our juries, I believe, attempt to agree to a much greater extent than do juries in the United States, and perhaps this is a good thing. In any event, most lawyers who have had a great deal of experience in the practice of criminal law—I cannot profess to be in that category—tell me that often recommendations for mercy in this country represent a compromise. It may be that a few jurymen hold out for a conviction while a few are in favour of acquittal; agreement is then reached that a finding of guilty shall be returned with a recommendation of mercy.

The clause as now drawn is a complete departure, as I understand it, from the present conception of the roles of the judge and the jury. It was for the jury alone to determine the guilt or innocence of the accused; they have had no part in the sentencing of the accused, and the judge, being presumed to be one of great experience, was the person to whom had been delegated the responsibility of determining the sentence. Now we are changing that. Under clause 13, a question is to be put to the jury regarding any recommendation for clemency. I ask the minister —and a reply to this question is, it seems to me, important—is a unanimous vote required, as in a determination of guilt or innocence? Suppose one juror is against clemency being granted while 11 are in favour? Would there be an announcement of a disagreement of this kind. The wording is not clear. I think consideration should be given to asking the jury to record a majority vote on this question. The jury should therefore be asked whether a majority of their number is in favour of making a recommendation for clemency. Otherwise, I am told, there will be a great deal of confusion on this point, certainly with good reason, because there is no authority here for a judge to take the initiative himself in determining whether a majority or unanimity is required.

It seems to me that the clause can be clarified by an amendment, if it is thought desirable to leave it in its present form. I shall be prepared to speak to it later but I put it forward now for the purpose of discussion, at least.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont that clause 13 be amended as follows:

That all the words after the figures 642 (a) be deleted and the following be substituted therefor: The judge who presides at the trial of an accused charged with an offence punishable by death shall at the time of charging the jury inform the jury that if they find the accused guilty, although they are not bound to make a recommendation for clemency, they are entitled to do so, and that any recommendation will be included in the report that he is required to make of the case to the Minister of Justice and will be given due consideration.

The amendment does not take into account he question which I myself raised concerning unanimity or a majority of opinion on the part of the jury in favour of clemency. Possibly I should have waited until I obtained the minister's reaction to my suggestion that the jury should be instructed to indicate whether they expressed a majority decision or a unanimous decision, and then the consequence could have been incorporated in the amendment. However, the amendment stands for what it seeks to do, and it may be of value in obtaining some reaction from the minister as to both the ideas I have expressed.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, one of the provisions of this proposed act which is alarming to me is contained in clause 13 of the bill before us. The minister is undoubtedly aware of the procedure which takes place in a court room, but I hope he will forgive me if I outline a part of it for the benefit of those members of this committee who are not familiar with that procedure.

For instance, hon, members may not be aware that a murder jury, whether the case involves capital murder or non-capital murder, is locked up, whether it be for hours or overnight, until it has reached a verdict and presented it to the court. When it has reached a verdict the jury is brought back into the open court room in the presence of the accused's counsel, members of the public and press, at which time, having presented its verdict, the provisions of this clause would be read. Whether the verdict presented represents a majority decision or a unanimous one, defence counsel has the opportunity of polling the members of the jury as to its verdict. The judge will then ask the members of the jury whether or not they wish to recommend clemency. I suggest that is a departure from the principles of justice because there should not be any suggestion made to a jury that they recommend against clemency.

I suggest most juries in Canada are sufficiently sophisticated to know that there exist instances when clemency can be recommended.

In many cases, although during the charge from the justice to the jury nothing was said regarding their right to make recommendations, the jury has come back into the court room, following deliberation and before announcing their verdict, asking if they had a right to do so. Juries are then informed that they of course can do so. They then are returned to the jury room where they decide this question.

Under the situation which will exist by the adoption of clause 13 of this bill before us, the question as to whether a jury recommends clemency or not, will be asked by the justice following delivery of their verdict. In other words the jurymen would be sitting in open court when the question was asked. I ask hon. members of this committee to consider what might then well happen. No deliberation in those circumstances could have been made in regard to such a recommendation nor would there be the opportunity afforded members of the jury to discuss this matter among themselves. The question having been asked of the jury, the foreman might well be startled, turn to the jurymen behind him, and then give an answer to the question which may or may not represent the opinion of the rest of the members of the jury. He may recommend clemency, or may recommend against it. In any event, whichever he does, it may not be the unanimous feeling of those gentlemen sitting behind him. That being the case, another member of that jury could stand up and inform the court that it was not representative of his opinion. It must be remembered that this would take place in open court without the jury having been afforded an opportunity to deliberate on this most crucial point.

I suggest the situation which I have alluded to is important particularly in view of the Prime Minister's statement a day or two ago that a recommendation for clemency would be tantamount to an escape from the gallows. I should hope that what the Prime Minister said could not be interpreted as being indicative that a recommendation against clemency would be tantamount to closing the door ensuring that the individual would hang.

Nevertheless, and because of the great importance being attached, not only by the Minister of Justice, but by the Prime Minister as expressed in his speech, to this particular feature of the new legislation, I suggest that a law, which could be taken as standing between an accused and the gallows, should not be interpreted by a judge so that such a question could be put to a jury in a casual way, in an open court room, the jury not having the opportunity to deliberate and discuss the matter.

Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of a subject as vital as this, disregarding the question as to whether or not the cabinet is shirking its responsibility by placing this decision upon the shoulders of individuals in local communities who make up juries, the phraseology used in this clause should be designed in such a way as to require the judge to inform the jury, without undue emphasis one way or the other, that it has the right to recommend or not recommend clemency, during that portion of the trial when the judge is charging the jury as to the law. If such were the case, when a jury had deliberated and decided whether the facts established a capital charge, it could then deliberate and discuss the question of recommending clemency, which would then be reported to the court, following the announcement of the jury's verdict.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, section 13 is an innovation in our legislation. In fact, it was partly on the basis of that section that I said during the debate on second reading of the bill, that because of section 13, the whole of the bill resulted, for all practical purposes, in the abolition of capital punishment.

A while ago, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) moved an amendment and I supported it with pleasure because I feel that it will greatly improve section 13 as it was submitted to us.

It is obvious that if the judge includes that question in his charge to the jury, the latter will be in a position to recommend or not to recommend mercy when they bring in their verdict. I feel that that is a great improvement and I sincerely hope that the minister and the government will take action in that respect.

(Text):

The Chairman: Do I understand the hon. member for Essex East to have moved the amendment?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

The Chairman: I had thought the hon. member had indicated his intention to move such an amendment later.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Chairman, I moved the amendment, or intended to.

The Chairman: In that event, I shall put the amendment to the committee.

The hon. member for Essex East, seconded by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont moves that clause 13 be amended as follows:

That all the words after the figures 642 (a) be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:

The judge who presides at the trial of an accused charged with an offence punishable by death shall at the time of charging the jury inform the jury that if they find the accused guilty, although they are not bound to make a recommendation for clemency, they are entitled to do so, and that any recommendation will be included in the report that he is required to make of the case to the Minister of Justice and will be given due consideration.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, when I said a few words on clause 1 of this bill, I stated that if I had not been unavoidably absent when the vote was taken on second reading, I would have supported the bill. I also indicated that I had certain reservations with regard to the provisions of the bill, and what I had in mind was section 13 which is now before us.

I followed with close attention what my colleague from Essex East (Mr. Martin) had to say in introducing his amendment, just as I followed the very clear statement made by our colleague from Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh). I do think that if the presiding judge must ask the jury this question after the verdict has been given, this places the jury in an extremely difficult position. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that the Minister of Justice and the government, in putting forward this section 13, are transferring to the jurors —in fact, to the general public—the responsibility of the royal prerogative.

I have here, Mr. Chairman, an article which appeared on May 30 last in the Toronto Star, which reads in part as follows:

(Text):

Prime Minister Diefenbaker made it clear yesterday he believes juries should decide whether a murderer will hang—and his cabinet will abide by their verdicts.

(Translation):

This certainly implies that if there should be a recommendation for mercy, the governor in council will accept it and that in all cases, even if the jury who made the recommendation was in the wrong, the governor in council will commute the death penalty into life imprisonment or another penalty.

That is a heavy responsibility to be thrown upon the shoulders of jurors who already have to decide whether there has been capital or non-capital murder.

It would be much better for the jury if the judge would explain the law when he makes his comments on evidence or law matters. Under this new section, if the jury find the accused guilty of capital murder. They will not know exactly what they should do. First, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh), it happens very often at present that the jury ask the judge when they come back into the court, whether they have the right to recommend clemency.

As the act stands now, there is no such provision but the judge will say nevertheless that they may so recommend.

Now, in all cases where this clause would apply, the jury would deliberate twice, and I believe such a procedure should be followed, as I just said.

(Text):

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this amendment because I feel it should not be supported and I will vote against it. The basic trouble with the proposed amendment is that it will confuse the jury. Under the jury system, the first duty of the jury, or of the judge when he is sitting alone, is to find whether or not the accused is guilty of the crime with which he is charged. The question of sentence or of punishment should not come into it whatsoever while the jury, or the judge when sitting alone, is deciding the innocence or guilt of the party charged. As the act stands now, this is exactly what happens. The jury first decide the guilt or innocence of the accused and report their finding to the judge. At that point they are not confused in any way with the question of punishment or with the result of their finding.

It is very easy for a judge—or it should be easy for him—to keep the two problems before him separate in his mind, but it is not easy for a jury. They have a great many problems to consider when they are trying to determine whether or not an accused is guilty. I think it is fairly simple after they have brought in their finding of guilty of capital murder. They have carried out this part of their duty and the only part that they have normally to decide by law. However, after having sat on a jury trial for perhaps several days, or a week, they have heard all the evidence that has been given and they have come to a conclusion as to guilt. They are also qualified at that particular moment to come to some decision on the question of clemency. But the time at which they must direct their minds to it is after they have made their decision on the guilt of the accused. Therefore, having delivered their finding, they are asked a second question.

The hon. member for Niagara Falls pointed up the difficulty that might arise but I cannot agree with her that it is likely to arise. There is no reason on earth why the jury, having been asked the second question, if they wish to make a recommendation of clemency, ought not then to retire again to the jurors' room and consider this second question. I can understand that they should not decide right away while they are sitting in their seats the way they do when they are selecting a foreman, which I think is what the hon. member had in mind. We often find that a jury will look around and see some person there whom they all know, and somebody says "We appoint a certain person foreman", which is really not a matter about which they even need to leave the courtroom. But when it comes to the matter of clemency, I could not possibly see how a jury would right offhand make a finding of clemency. They should then again retire.

However, if there is any feeling that the clause is not clear or that some confusion might arise, perhaps it could be clarified to the point where the jury should be asked to retire again to the jury room. Frankly, I do not see that it should be necessary. I think a judge would deal with them in the same way as he does when they come in and ask for further directions. He would merely be giving them further instructions as to their duty. They would again retire to the jury room and take as long as they felt necessary to come to a conclusion.

I think the bill as drafted is perfectly satisactory. The amendment would do no more than confuse the jurors as between the two duties that they are being asked to perform.

Mr. Winch: As I said a few moments ago, I found this section very complex. Now that the amendment is before us I find it very ticklish and difficult to come to a decision. Basically, I like the idea of the amendment in that the decision as to guilt and recommendation for clemency would be arrived at at one and the same time; but I can also see a certain complication which I am not certain that I like. For this reason I personally would like to get a greater exposition of the reasons why the amendment should be accepted. I make this request for two reasons. If the amendment carries we shall have the clause as amended. Although this may seem a little far fetched, I still think that by reason of the judge making this statement in his charge to the jury, there will be, whether we like it or not, a little pre-supposition of guilt. I say that because we find the word "if" is included. He is not yet found guilty or innocent but if he is found guilty, then two courses are open. As I said, it may be a little far-fetched but there is an implication there of the supposition of guilt. I wish there were a psychologist here. I say there is psychologically enough here to make an impression on a juror's mind. This is the first faint doubt which comes to my mind with respect to the amendment.

There is a second doubt which to me is a little more important. If the clause is amended as suggested we will have the jury sitting in camera and at one and the same time considering the guilt or innocence and punishment of the accused. I have done a great deal of reading on matters which pertain to homicide and juries. If my understanding of what I have read is correct, it is quite conceivable that a lot of bargaining will go on during the deliberations of the jury. They will sit there hour after hour trying to reach a decision and one juror will say, "Very well, I will vote for guilty if you will vote for clemency and mercy". I think it is almost certain that will happen so therefore the function of the jury in determining only the guilt or innocence of the accused is being undermined. There will be bargaining or compromise with respect to guilt or innocence, and I do not think that is what is intended by our law. In the light of what I said a few moments ago when we first discussed this question, these two perplexing questions come to my mind. I hope I have laid sufficient groundwork so that those who favour this procedure will rise and expound further on why it should be accepted and whether there are arguments against the two points I have raised and tried to make clear.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the reasons why we made the change in the law in the form of the amendment as we now have it, have been admirably summarized by the hon. member for Vancouver East, and it is for those reasons that I would be unable to agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Essex East in moving his amendment. I also bring to the argument that I want to advance the views expressed by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

First, we felt that it was appropriate that the jury should be asked whether they had a recommendation to make. That is the first thing, and I will come back to the reasons why we feel that is appropriate in a moment. I want to deal now with the stage at which the jury should be asked that question. After most careful reflection we feel very strongly that they should not be asked to consider that question while at the same time they are considering the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused. These are two entirely separate things and the first thing that juries should be asked to decide is, is this man guilty of the charge or is he not guilty?

I do not think I can do much better than the two hon. members to whom I have referred have done in attempting to indicate why we feel it is inappropriate that the two questions should be mixed, but perhaps this additional argument is relevant. Surely if the crown prosecutor referred in any way to the possibility of commutation or the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy it would be grounds for a new trial. It would be quite improper for him to try to suggest to the jury, come on, you might as well bring in a verdict of guilty because there is always a review by the cabinet and the possibility of commutation. This, of course, would be objected to and I am quite sure that even though it was ordered to be stricken from the record it would still be grounds for a new trial. It would be a most improper thought to intrude into the minds of the jury at a time when they were asked to consider whether or not the man was guilty as charged or innocent. I will not use the word "improper" in connection with the amendment and I am not suggesting for a moment that it is offered improperly in any sense but I think it would be unwise to adopt it because if carried into effect it would import an improper element to be considered by the jury, that is, improper for their consideration at the time when they are deliberating their verdict because it certainly could not fail to open to their minds the possibility that the matter is not so very serious after all if they find him guilty in that they can make a recommendation of clemency I think this is very dangerous and it would be a bad thing to import into the minds of the jury at that stage.

But I see nothing improper at all or unfair to juries, having brought in their verdict as a result of a process of deliberation in which their minds have been exclusively directed to the question of guilt or innocence, that it should subsequently be said to them, "You have brought in your verdict and have satisfied yourselves and reported accordingly that the accused is guilty; do you or do you not have a recommendation to make with regard to the exercise of clemency"?

It is true that this does then place another duty upon the jury, that of considering whether or not clemency should be shown but, as I have indicated before, this is not a duty which it is improper, unwise or unfair to ask the jury to discharge. As the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka said, they have perhaps sat for days and have heard all the evidence. They are the twelve peers who have been asked to decide whether their fellow human being is guilty or innocent of the offence charged. Surely, therefore, they are proper persons to be asked subsequently while the evidence is still fresh in their minds, including the evidence brought forward by the defence, "You have found the accused guilty of the crime of capital murder; notwithstanding that, do you nevertheless feel that there is something in what you have heard that in your judgment would warrant a recommendation that the royal prerogative of mercy be exercised and clemency shown"?

With respect to the question of whether or not they should deliberate that problem in open court, I agree with the hon. member for Niagara Falls that it would be very inappropriate for them either to attempt to reach a snap verdict or to find themselves in controversy in open court, but I agree fully with the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka that it would be quite natural for the judge to suggest to them or invite them to retire to deliberate their decision on this matter just as they deliberated on their verdict. I do not think that poses any problem.

Perhaps the remaining problem is the question of whether or not the jury should be asked to do this and there I direct hon. member's attention to the findings of the Gowers royal commission. I agree that its findings are not the final word with respect to what should be done in Canada especially but nevertheless a group of very experienced judges and jurists came to the conclusion that indeed it was not only not wrong to ask the jury whether or not they thought clemency should be exercised but they also felt it was not wrong to ask the jury to determine what the sentence should be. They suggested that if the jury brought in a verdict of guilty they should then be asked whether the sentence should be death or life imprisonment. We certainly do not go that far. We think that would be wrong in that the law itself should provide the penalty automatically, but we feel it is perfectly proper for the jury to be asked whether they have an opinion or recommendation as to clemency.

I have one further word before six o'clock. Some suggestion has been made that the Prime Minister said that a recommendation for mercy would automatically be followed by commutation. I cannot find that anywhere in his statement made in the house on May 29. I do not know whether it is based on these words which I find at the bottom of page 5527:

> Having heard the evidence and having come to the conclusion on the basis of the law as explained to them by the judge that a verdict of guilty is the only one they can bring in, a jury ought none the less to have the right to add a recommendation to mercy, and having done that, to hope that the royal prerogative will be reasonably carried out.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He speaks somewhere else of the jury in relation to its opportunities as a member of the community. I have not got the reference here.

Mr. Fulton: I will look through it again. I do recall the Prime Minister referring to the regard that ought to be had and the weight that would properly attach to a recommendation of a jury of the accused's peers but I find nothing in the Prime Minister's statement to say that the recommendation is other than a recommendation and to say that it is or should be automatic as far as the cabinet is concerned.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. McMillan: In connection with clause 13 there are one or two points that are not clear to me. A jury must be unanimous in its decision to find a person guilty of an offence punishable by death. In case a jury returns a verdict of capital murder, before passing sentence the judge will be obliged to ask whether the jury has a recommendation for clemency. My question to the minister is this. Must the jury be unanimous in the decision to ask for clemency? Suppose they are divided about half and half. What happens then? Would the jury be polled in open court in connection with the recommendation for clemency? Suppose all but one had made a recommendation for clemency. Could he prevent it and vice versa? This seems to be a very important matter and it is very indefinite in this clause.

Mr. Fulton: There is, as I understand it, no provision for polling a jury anywhere in our statute.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says there is no provision for polling?

Mr. Fulton: So we made no provision for polling a jury with respect to a recommendation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely that is not the question. The question raised by the hon. member for Welland was this, and it was the same question that I had raised myself previously. What was the recommendation to consist of? Was it to be a unanimous decision or a majority decision? The minister's reply to that question is that there is no provision for polling the jury on this point.

Mr. Fulton: No. My reply was to the hon. member for Welland as to whether there was a provision for polling the jury with respect to the recommendation. My answer was confined to that matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the minister mind repeating that answer?

Mr. Fulton: I said that my reply was to the hon. member for Welland as to whether there was any provision for polling the jury with respect to the recommendation. My reply was that there is no provision for that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister then replies and says there is no provision. I urge that there should be a provision and I inquire of the minister what was the intention of the minister since no reference was made to the possibility of a divided judgment. Suppose the jury had divided, as the hon. member for Welland has indicated, one for and eleven against. In that event will the section become operative? Will effect be given to the decision of the majority? In the case of the determination as to guilt the rule of unanimity applies and, in my opinion, wisely so. But in a matter of secondary importance—secondary in the sense that it is not as important as is the question of guilt—it is reasonable to argue that there will be some misunderstanding.

I can understand the minister being concerned about making a provision for it. The minister may possibly want to leave that matter to chance and to allow a practice to develop. However, I doubt whether that practice can eventuate because unless the jury know positively that a majority will be sufficient, they will not act; and unless the judge knows that a majority will be sufficient, he will not permit it to eventuate. Thus the purpose might be seriously defeated. In other words now is the time for us to meet this ambiguity and the ambiguity is there. Does the rule of unanimity apply? There is in this clause nothing that enables us to give a satisfactory answer to this question.

The point I sought to raise was that we should deal with the matter forthrightly and should indicate whether or not the majority or unanimity rule was required. Personally, in the case of clemency, I would think that where a majority of the jury recommended for clemency, it ought to operate. The minister may not have that view but he can state his position. However, we should not leave this section in the ambiguous state in which it is at the present time. In the first case confronting this amendment a judge may well conclude that he will accept a majority decision. Another judge in another jurisdiction may decide that he will not do so. There is no law which determines which judge would be right. Now, when we are passing an amendment to this particular section, is the time to remove any doubt and this is the place in which to do it. We in the legislature should not leave any doubt existent when we have an opportunity of removing it. I think the remarks made by the hon. member for Welland are appropriate and that they bear out and confirm what I myself sought to indicate earlier.

The Chairman: Order. May I indicate that, to my mind, this point, if it is to be pursued further, should not be dealt with at this time because the amendment does not deal with it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is correct.

The Chairman: If there are other views to be expressed on the amendment I think that it would be more appropriate that they be expressed before we pass on to this new problem.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Baldwin: It seems to me that this clause as originally drafted was quite plain and quite clear until the hon. member for Essex East offered his amendment. I think he has muddied the waters sufficiently to have created a great deal of difficulty. I suggest that the hon. member for Essex East in offering this amendment has completely misconceived the function of the jury. From time immemorial the function of the jury has been, in the words of the charge they receive, to try and make true deliverance between our sovereign lady, the queen and the prisoner at the bar. Their duty is to ascertain from the evidence presented whether the accused is innocent or guilty. The effect of the amendment offered by my hon. friend will be to send the jury on a detour where they may, and in many cases probably will, lose sight of what is their main function. The amendment introduced by the hon. member is in fact an invitation to juries to compromise on their verdicts. It is a suggestion to a jury and I am sure they will accept it as a direction by a judge such as is contained in the charge by a judge when directing the jury as to what the law is and what the functions of a judge and jury are.

This amendment would have the effect of the jury being told: "If you are in difficulties; if you find that one or two of the jurymen are not prepared to go along with a verdict of guilty or are not prepared to go along with a verdict of not guilty, you can bring in a verdict of guilty and couple that with a recommendation for mercy at the appropriate time".

I say that should not be done at that time The jury should come to its verdict as tc guilt or innocence on the evidence, and then it is functus officio; their duty is completed. They may then be asked, after they have brought in their verdict on the issue of guilt or innocence, whether or not they wish to make any recommendation so far as clemency is concerned.

May I point out, Mr. Chairman, that I think my hon. friend, in dealing with this matter, laid the foundation of his argument mainly on the ground that there might be a divided jury. However, there are many instances which occur to me where other reasons would justify a jury making a recommendation for clemency after their verdict had been rendered.

Consider a case of insanity for example. I mentioned this when I spoke on second reading. The evidence offered to prove insanity may not be sufficient to bring it squarely within the M'Naghten rules. However, there may be sufficient evidence to indicate such a degree of mental defectiveness as will not justify a verdict of not guilty because of insanity, but which may put a jury in the position that, having brought in the verdict of guilty as they are required to do by law, when the opportunity is later offered to them they will say, "We think that on the strength of the evidence submitted we are perfectly justified and it is perfectly proper for us to bring in this recommendation for clemency".

I can think of a case of provocation. Under certain circumstances provocation justifies a verdict of manslaughter. I can think of many cases where there might be provocation and the provocation may be grave. Then, having suffered the provocation, the accused might go and secure a weapon and come back and commit the crime of murder. Then there would be those elements of preparation and planning which are essential to prove a charge of capital murder as defined in this bill.

The jury might decide that while the preparation and planning, which were incidental to the offence, did not permit them to find the accused not guilty of capital murder, after having brought in the verdict of guilty and when asked this question by the judge they might say "We feel we should make a recommendation for clemency".

I can think of a case of two young boys, one of whom is a few weeks under the age at which sentence of death can be pronounced upon him and the other just a few weeks over that age. Surely a jury, in those circumstances, having fulfilled their duty and having brought in a verdict of guilty of capital murder might, when invited by the judge under the terms of this clause, feel there should be a recommendation for mercy because they feel it is wrong that one man should have his life spared and the other should suffer the penalty of death.

Those are some circumstances which could justify recommendation for clemency, but they should not be brought in at the same time as the main verdict; they should be considered as matters completely extraneous to the main issue, which is that of guilt or innocence. Once that has been decided, then and then only should the jury consider this question of clemency. For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I must say that I cannot in any way support the amendment introduced by the hon. member.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, this is the third time I have risen to speak to clause 13. I do not apologize for rising again.

I do not think we can differentiate between the principle of clause 13 and the amendment. I raised a number of points both on the section as originally drafted and on the amendment and I am not going to cover that ground again. However, during the dinner recess I had the opportunity of looking into this clause and the amendment in more detail and I should like to ask, before a vote is taken on the amendment or on the clause as originally drafted, if we could hear the Minister of Justice's views on what I think is a rather important point.

Under the clause as contained in this bill we have the situation where after a jury find a person guilty the judge puts a certain question to them and asks whether they have any recommendation to make with regard to clemency. Under the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Essex East we have the recommendation for a change which means the two questions shall be put at the same time in the charge of the judge to the jury.

This leads me to a major matter of principle and a question which I hope the Minister of Justice will see fit to answer. My point is this. I still feel that basically, in principle, both clause 13 as contained in the bill introduced by the Minister of Justice and the amendment moved by my hon. friend are the same. However, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice this question. This is based on the law of California and a number of other states in which the jury has a definite say as to the penalty. Under the law of California and many other states the decision of the jury has a definite bearing upon the penalty.

Three times this afternoon the Minister of Justice stated that the penalty should be set forth in the statute. I hope I am not misinterpreting the statement of the minister, and I agree with what he said. The Minister of Justice nods his head, so apparently he thinks I have put the correct interpretation on his words.

The principle of clause 13 and the amendment give the jury, either before or after reaching their verdict, depending upon whether you take the clause in the bill or in the amendment, certain authority. Since six o'clock I have had an opportunity of looking at the speech made by the Prime Minister. I must say that I feel if one reads the comment of the Prime Minister as found on page 5528 of Hansard there can only be one inference taken from that statement. The minister will find the statement at the bottom of that page. The inference is that a recommendation for mercy by a jury is one which must receive the most serious and moral consideration of the governor general in council. I can therefore understand from reading that one sentence why the press interpreted it as meaning that a recommendation for mercy from the jury would mean commutation of the death sentence to life imprisonment.

I should like to ask the minister if he can tell this committee what is the end result of clause 13, bearing in mind his contention that the penalty should be provided by law and the fact that this clause, even with the amendment, is based in principle on the statutory law of California. Why should the Minister of Justice reject the idea of prescribing in law that when there is no recommendation from the jury it means the death sentence unless the royal prerogative of clemency is exercised, and that recommendations of clemency would automatically mean the commutation of death sentences to life imprisonment?

The minister knows that this is the law in many states and, in principle, clause 13 even as amended means the same. I think this is an important matter and I hope the minister will see fit to explain why, since he has followed certain statutes in the south so closely, he has not carried this idea to its completion by making the penalty depend on the decision of the jury.

Mr. Fulton: In approaching this problem we reached the conclusion that the jury should have one primary task, that is, to determine whether or not an accused person is guilty as charged. The verdict may be varied, of course; a man may be found not guilty of murder, but guilty of manslaughter and so on. But we feel the jury should be in a position where they can approach this awesome task without their minds being burdened by consideration of whether or not they themselves are to be in the position of determining what penalty the accused should pay. We think the jury should not have to determine that question.

Mr. Winch: You are doing it under clause 13.

Mr. Fulton: No. If the hon. member will bear with me, I will endeavour to explain to him why not. We think the jury should pass on the question of fact, whether or not the accused is guilty of the charge for which he stands trial. That is all, up to this point, that they are required to determine and they are entitled to be placed in a position where they may make that determination without having at the same time to take into account the consequence of their verdict. Therefore we have endeavoured in the legislation to isolate this task as far as it can be isolated.

I am not suggesting for a moment that jurymen are not human beings and that they have no knowledge of the law but in so far as the law imposes on them the duty of ascertaining whether or not a person is guilty or innocent they are entitled so far as it can be provided to bring in that decision without being distracted by extraneous consideration.

Having done that, they are then asked, in accordance with clause 13 now under consideration, to say whether or not they think the accused, whom they have found guilty, should be shown clemency—whether they think any recommendations should be made in this respect. We have deliberately separated the two processes, the two tasks, if you like, which we are imposing on the jury.

For reasons I gave before six o'clock we think it would be improper to invite anyone to place before the jury at the time they retire to consider their verdict the question of whether or not their considerations in reaching a verdict should be clouded by the question of mercy. To do so would certainly be placing upon jurymen a perplexing task. Some members of the jury might be inclined to acquittal. Those who were inclined to a verdict of guilty could say to them, if the amendment of the hon. member for Essex East were adopted: never mind about holding out; let us get together and agree because even if we do convict the judge has told us we can bring in a recommendation for mercy; so let us convict and bring in a recommendation for mercy; if you will agree to convict we shall agree to support a recommendation. Thus the simple question of guilt or innocence would be clouded with these other considerations.

That is why we have thought it esential to keep these two questions apart and for the jury to consider them entirely separately. It is only after a jury has found an accused person guilty of capital murder that they are invited or instructed by the judge that they may, if they wish, bring in a recommendation. The jury will then retire and reach a decision on that point. This being the system we have devised and incorporated into this bill I must beg to differ with the hon. member for Vancouver East when he says it is based on Californian statutes. It is not. Under that system, if I read it correctly, the jury which tries the issue of facts is also charged with the ultimate decision as to what should be the penalty, that is, whether the penalty should be death or life imprisonment. If the hon. member has followed me thus far he will appreciate we have not adopted that practice.

Mr. Winch: That is my question. Why have you not adopted it?

Mr. Fulton: I am coming to that. We have imposed on the jury the responsibility of determining guilt or innocence and then we have made clear in our law that they have the right to bring in a recommendation. I am sure my hon. friends will appreciate that the recommendation is only a recommendation and is not binding. We have done this deliberately because we felt that the law itself should provide the penalty in respect of an issue as supremely important as life or death, and it is not right to impose upon the same 12 men, who have had the responsibility of determining the guilt or innocence of an accused, the responsibility of saying whether that accused shall pay the death penalty or shall be subject to a lesser penalty. We feel the law should provide that, and that legislators should say that. I do not know whether or not my hon. friends will agree with that.

Mr. Winch: Could I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Winch: I understand the law of California is such that a jury, having found a person guilty, is then charged by the judge as to the penalty and must decide upon the penalty. I understand a jury in California must do that according to the statute.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a supplementary question arising out of the question asked by the hon. member? Could the minister inform this committee whether there is any obligation upon the jury in respect to a recommendation for clemency? I understand that a jury is charged with finding a man guilty or innocent, and I should like to know whether there is anything further for which a jury is responsible, particularly with regard to the recommending of clemency.

Mr. Fulton: Does the hon. member refer to the law in California?

Mr. Brunsden: No, I refer to the law in Canada.

Mr. Fulton: I take it the hon. member means at the present time?

Mr. Brunsden: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: No. The simple issue before a jury involves the question of guilt or innocence. That is the only issue which we feel can appropriately be placed before the jury as a matter for their final and ultimate determination.

With respect to the law of California, if I read it correctly, it provides that the trier of fact shall fix the penalty. Therefore, the jury, being the body to try the fact, as to guilt or innocence, under the provisions of California law must fix the penalty in accordance with its verdict.

I am not sure that my hon. friends will agree with me, but I can only say again that we have considered this very carefully and have rejected that approach. We felt that it is not proper, fair, nor indeed appropriate to the jury system to have the same twelve men who are asked to decide this awful question —awful in the proper sense of the word—this awesome question as to whether a man is guilty or not of a charge of capital murder, then to go on and decide whether the man shall be hanged. I do not think that is a proper question to put to a jury. I think that is a responsibility of the legislators; that is, to say whether or not a person found guilty of capital murder shall hang, and that is what we are inviting this committee to provide.

The issue before the jury is then simple. It is simple but is awesome, and it is the only proper responsibility to impose upon the jury —deciding whether a man is guilty of capital murder or not. The jury having decided that question, it is our feeling that the law should provide the penalty. Then, as outlined in clause 13 of this bill, the jury is asked subsequently—not as part of a mixed bag to be considered at the same time—whether or not it wishes to make a recommendation for or against mercy, and it makes that recommendation without regard to the guilt or innocence of the accused because that issue has been settled.

My friend, the hon. member for Peace River, has posed the sort of consideration that we think proper to put to the jury. A jury may have found a man guilty of capital murder because it found that the technical defence of provocation, which would have absolved the accused from guilt, was not fully established. Perhaps a mounting series of provocations and irritations occurred and he finally succumbed to that provocation but instead of committing the murder immediately the individual went out and bought a gun and 24 hours later, or in some cases, with a few hours' intervention, committed the offence. In that event the law is such that the defence of provocation is not available to the accused, yet members of the jury might feel, as I have said to the committee earlier, there but for the grace of God go I; I should have done the same thing had I been subject to the same considerations, provocations and irritations; I should not have been strong enough to stand up against them. That jury cannot avoid finding the man guilty of a planned and deliberate murder but, when and if it is asked whether it recommends clemency, certainly the members of that jury will recommend mercy. I do not feel that these issues will arise often, but they will arise, and when they arise they will be most extraordinarily difficult issues to resolve.

I should now like to come to what my hon. friend said about the Prime Minister's speech. I have read his speech again very carefully and believe what he really said was that when the jury that has tried the issue has come to its decision, and when that jury of the accused's peers states that under the circumstances it recommends the exercise of clemency, the cabinet is bound to be profoundly influenced by that recommendation. However, it is still only a recommendation. It is on that basis we have placed it in the provisions which are now before the committee.

The issue now before us in a sense is an issue which is comparatively simple: on the one hand, should the question regarding the jury's recommendation be put before the jury for its consideration at the same time they are considering the question of guilt or innocence? That is the suggestion of my friend the hon. member for Essex East. On the other hand, should the question be put to the jury only after it has considered the question of guilt or innocence and after the jury has decided it was bound to bring in a verdict of guilty? That is our suggestion, as incorporated into this bill.

For the reasons I have given, while respecting fully the views and arguments that have been advanced, I cannot accept them. I think the adoption of that practice would place juries in an intolerable position, requiring them to consider two issues at once. Therefore, I am unable to accept the amendment.

I think perhaps I should suggest, without getting into that area which you, Mr. Chairman, have said should be discussed separately, with which statement I thoroughly agree, regarding the question of whether the recommendation should be unanimous, that my hon. friends ought to look at the question which is to be put to the jury:

> Do you wish to make any recommendation as to whether or not he should be granted clemency?

Having asked that question, the judge will then state the following:

> You are not required to make any recommendation but if you do make a recommendation either in favour of clemency or against it, your recommendation will be included in the report that I am required to make of this case to the Minister of Justice and will be given due consideration.

In effect the jury will have three alternatives. The jury will be able to say that it has a recommendation to make for clemency; that it has a recommendation to make against clemency; or that it does not wish to make or is unable to agree in respect of a recommendation. It seems to me, those being the three clear alternatives that we place before the jury by the form of the question, that all the issues and all the variations of the issue which are in the minds of the hon. members are properly reflected in that question which the jury will be asked.

In conclusion, I would say it seems to me that the proposal as we have placed it before the committee in the form of clause 13 of this bill is a desirable one because it removes from the realm of uncertainty and places in the realm of absolute certainty the question of whether or not the jury is entitled to make a recommendation, but it places that question before the jury at the proper time, namely after they have reached their verdict on the question of guilty or not guilty.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, as a layman I have listened very carefully to the arguments of the Minister of Justice. I realize that this is a technical, legal and intangible problem which is being discussed by persons on both sides of the house who are trying to face it quite honestly. I listened to the argument of the hon. member for Essex East. On this type of question I pay a great deal of attention to what he has to say because of his knowledge of the law and his humanitarian approach to those problems which face us from time to time.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Niagara Falls. I am influenced in this way. I think in problems such as these we would be very well advised to pay great attention to what the hon. lady has to say. Women approach these questions somewhat differently from what we do, not from quite such a legalistic point of view, although the hon. lady has a great deal of legal experience and knowledge and is quite able to hold her own with the legal luminaries in the house. But the point that bothered me when the Minister of Justice was speaking if I heard him correctly, was that he said that juries must not be clouded by considerations of mercy. That struck me rather hard because I am of the opinion that juries should always be terrified by considerations of mercy. I could not quite go along with him in that respect.

In dealing with a problem in which there is such, shall I say, hairline differences between the proponents of one point of view and of the other I always come down on the side of mercy. I think it is quite true to say in this instance that the hon. member for Essex East, the hon. member for Niagara Falls and the member for Kootenay West are three minds that think alike. Therefore, I am of the opinion that if there is a sort of technical difference of opinion the committee would be wise to pass legislation about which the opinion of any juror would be clouded with considerations of mercy. I think that is a very sound principle, and if there should be a mistake made in which mercy is granted where possibly it would not be justified it would be well warranted rather than deny mercy where it would be justified. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say I am going to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Essex East, since it represents my attitude in this situation.

Mr. Deschatelets: A few minutes ago the minister gave his own interpretation of the remarks made by the Prime Minister on May 29. In order to put the record straight I think it advisable to read what in my view is the most important sentence in this speech in relation to the recommendation of clemency by the jury. I read from page 5528 of Hansard:

> That recommendation, excepting in extraordinary circumstances ought to be accepted.

The Minister of Justice did not read this sentence before the dinner recess. Surely this sentence indicates that the recommendation for clemency by the jury will bind the cabinet. I thought it necessary to put this sentence on the record before a vote is taken. After we have disposed of this amendment it is my intention to say a few more words on clause 13.

Mr. Baldwin: I wish to make one comment on the statement made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont. He was entirely incorrect in the interpretation he placed on the word "recommendation" as used by the Prime Minister in the speech he made in the house on May 29. The recommendation referred to in the sentence which the hon. member read has reference to the recommendation made by the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General and not to the recommendation brought in by the jury. This is made quite plain when one reads the particular extract.

Miss LaMarsh: I should like to make a few remarks with respect to the last comments by the Minister of Justice. In the first place, it was suggested by the minister that it might be possible in a trial for capital murder for the jury to escape any consideration of the penalty. I suggest to the minister that this is absolutely not possible.

Mr. Fulton: I think the hon. lady will realize I did say that the jurymen are human beings and therefore it will not be possible for them completely to divorce their minds from it. We felt that in so far as the law could do it, it should endeavour to make it possible.

Miss LaMarsh: I accept this explanation, and it is what the minister said previously. But it cannot be possible for them to escape the fact that they are asked to decide two things. The first is whether the man is guilty of capital murder. No Canadian will be able to escape the necessary knowledge that when a man is guilty of this crime it will mean that in all probability he will be hanged. Therefore this very consideration is one which necessarily bears in upon their minds and consciences, namely the fact that in all likelihood when they find that the answer to this question is yes the man will meet his Maker as a result of the due process of law.

Second, the minister has suggested that it is difficult for a jury to dissociate the two things in their minds, one, guilt or innocence, and, two, the penalty. I am sure the minister knows—and I can speak only for the province of Ontario—that in any civil action where there is a jury there are two issues to be tried. One is the equivalent of guilt or innocence, namely fault or not of the defendant; and, two, if there is fault, what is the measure of damages? Now, in my experience of the law in the province of Ontario all jurors have been sufficienly able to differentiate between these two individual problems as to decide them independently one of the other. I suggest to the minister that juries are no less capable of doing this where the two problems which they must resolve are, one, guilt or innocence on the count of capital murder; and, two, the punishment which is to be meted out; and that this may be decided in one deliberation but in two stages. Certainly I would suggest that if a jury is expected to be as sophisticated as the amendment now before this committee will require it to be—and I think the hon. member for Essex East has already pointed this out—there are six different judgments, six different verdicts, which may be given on a charge of capital murder. If they can navigate among the intricacies of these six possible results, then I say to the minister they can separate in their minds the two things.

If there is one thing that has impressed me in my short experience in the law, it is the tremendous consideration which ordinary Canadians from every walk of life give to a capital crime. Their attention never wanders either from the directions of the judge or the representations made by counsel or the evidence of the witnesses. They never miss a word. They direct themselves with the most astonishing clarity of mind to the decision they are asked to make. In my opinion they are a shining example of the best things in any community because they address themselves to the issue and solely to the issue.

If this is so, and it has been proven to be so, I suggest in all humility to the minister that the jurors are able to decide these two issues at the one time and that they should decide them at the one time rather than at separate times. They should not be called upon to make a second crucial decision when a period of time has intervened from the making of their first decision and knowing that when they brought in their first verdict finding the accused guilty of capital murder he died a little then and his family and, indeed, his counsel, also died a little. They should not be asked to retire again to make up their minds knowing that while they are out there will be great anguish on the part of the accused and everyone else in the courtroom and also knowing that if they come back and recommend against clemency, something that has never happened in our criminal law, they will be on the spot again and the accused, his family and friends and, indeed, members of the public, will die a little more. I would ask the minister and other hon. members to address themselves most seriously to this matter before voting on the amendment because it is of crucial importance. Those of us who practice in the defence of those who are accused but not proven to be guilty of a capital crime ask that fair treatment be accorded by having the jury charged as to this matter before they deliberate at all and not, as proposed in the legislation, after they have found the accused guilty of the offence.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, I find it necessary to rise tonight to speak in support of the Minister of Justice and against the amendment on two or three grounds. May I say that I speak as one who has served as a juror. I have sat on panels which have had to administer justice and I know the heart-throbs that men and women who go through this experience have.

With all due deference to the hon. member for Niagara Falls, I say that in my opinion jurors have one main task, to determine first of all the guilt or innocence of the accused. Once the jurors have done that they are free, as provided in clause 13, to offer some suggestions with respect to clemency. I am quite sure that jurors in a murder trial will have a much closer view of the actual case than anyone else, and I would be quite prepared to listen to any argument by a jury with respect to clemency after the verdict has been rendered. After all, those who are summoned to serve on these panels are first of all asked one question. Is the accused innocent or guilty? If he is guilty, and if clause 13 carries I will be very happy because those persons who have listened to all the evidence will have many more facts before them than anyone else, and I believe they would make a very commendable recommendation. My stand on capital punishment is very well known in this house. I somehow feel we are straying too far into the path of mercy. We are becoming too benevolent. Nevertheless, I support the application of clause 13 after the accused has been found guilty.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I believe it would be most unfair for the judge to instruct the jury to consider the matter of a recommendation of mercy because it would almost mean that the judge expected a verdict of guilty. If a verdict of not guilty is reached by the jury, they do not need to consider the matter of clemency at all. The hon. member for Vancouver East has expressed doubt whether it is a good thing to have the jury consider this matter. I think the judge might convey a mental presumption of guilt to the jury if he asked the jury to deal with the matter of mercy. It might not be necessary for the jury to consider this question at all because they might bring in a verdict of not guilty.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two with reference to what the hon. member for Kootenay West said. He referred to the words used by the Minister of Justice who had talked about the undesirability of the verdict of the jury being clouded with considerations of mercy. The hon. member for Kootenay West criticized that statement. He said that considerations of mercy should always be taken into account while the jury is functioning.

It seems to me that the advantage of the two stages suggested by the minister is that we can be sure that considerations of mercy will be dealt with but at the proper time. On the other hand, it seems to me that when the jury is determining the technical question of murder they should not have their minds distracted by the thought of the dreadful consequences which may flow from their verdict, and in my view that distraction is avoided by what I understand to be the minister's proposal.

Amendment (Mr. Martin, Essex East) negatived: Yeas, 17; nays, 58.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I raised another question with regard to this clause and the comments that I made were supported by the hon. member for Welland. It had to do with whether or not a majority would be sufficient or whether the rule of unanimity would apply. What would happen in the event of one juryman, let us say, being against a recommendation for clemency and the other eleven being in favour. The point was made that unless this ambiguity was resolved this question would arise, that is that there would be different attitudes taken by different judges, and the law would not become settled. There is ambiguity in the very language of the section and so it is our responsibility now to remove it.

If the minister takes the position that he believes the jury must, as in the case of a determination of guilt, be unanimous, then let him say so. If that is the position, let him put it in the statute. However, we take the position that the question is now doubtful, that it is not at all settled and that it is one that should be settled. I should be grateful for the minister's reply.

Mr. Fulton: I recognize the fact that this is a difficult question. However, I must start from the premise that we are asking here a question on a recommendation of the jury. The judge is going to ask the jury whether they have any recommendation to make. I therefore suggest that it would be a mistake to import into the law any provision which suggests that the jury can be less than unanimous. It must be borne in mind that the provision for unanimity is, generally speaking, one that works in favour of the accused. I therefore think it is proper that we should expect the same principle to be carried forward with respect to their recommendation which is now under consideration. The judge is not addressing this question to the jurors individually. He is addressing it to the jury collectively and he is asking them as a jury whether they wish to make any recommendation first, whether the accused should be granted clemency; and second, whether the accused should not be granted clemency. Then, as I said a moment ago, that actually and necessarily imports three alternatives. The jury may say, "Yes, we recommend that he should be granted clemency" or "We recommend that he should not be granted clemency" or "We are unable or do not wish to make any recommendation". I think that is all the jury should be invited to do.

I would point out that the judge, if he wishes to do so, may examine the jury as to the state of their minds. The judge is obligated by the provisions of the statute, section 643, to make a report of the case to the Minister of Justice for the information of the governor in council. I have thought of this matter a great deal both before I introduced the bill and since then, and also since this discussion started, but on reflection I would not be prepared to introduce into the law anything which would suggest to the jury that they may be less than unanimous. On the other hand, however, I would not be prepared to introduce into the law anything which would suggest that the judge may not report to the Minister of Justice unless the jury says "Our verdict is unanimous".

I have tried earnestly to devise an amendment that would meet these problems but I may say quite frankly that I have not been able to devise one which would not directly suggest to the jury that they may make a compromise decision, and I think this would be an unfortunate thing to suggest to the jury. I recognize the fact that juries may not be able to agree upon a recommendation. Indeed, juries on occasion have been unable to agree on a verdict. However, this is a very undesirable thing. It is a thing to be avoided and to be done only as a last resort. I therefore think it would be a mistake to write into the law anything that would suggest to the jury that they may be less than unanimous.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has stated his position quite clearly, I think, in so far as his objective is concerned of having the jury treated as a unit. However, that does not really resolve the question. Suppose that, after the judge reads out this particular provision, the jury repairs to the jury room, to bring in a verdict of guilty and then come back and the foreman of the jury says to the judge, "We understand the rule of unanimity as far as guilt is concerned and we the jury have found this individual guilty of murder. However we cannot agree on whether or not there should be a recommendation of clemency. Two of us take the position that there should not be such a recommendation and ten of us take the position that there should be one. May we now bring in such a recommendation?" What is the judge going to say?

Mr. Fulton: I think the judge would then be in the same position that he is in with respect to the verdict of the jury. As far as I can ascertain—and I have asked my officers to consider this matter—there is in the law no clear and specific provision which says in so many words that the jury's verdict must be unanimous. We are looking further.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Section 560.

Mr. Fulton: No. Section 560 states that where the judge is satisfied that no further purpose would be served by keeping a jury in an attempt to have it arrive at a unanimous verdict, he may discharge the jury. It is true that by implication the verdict must be unanimous but it is not specifically stated. However, the practice has grown up that where the jury shows quite clearly that it is not able to arrive at a unanimous verdict, the judge dismisses the jury and that trial is nugatory. The inability of the jury to agree on a recommendation would not make the trial nugatory. What would happen then, as I see it, is quite clear. The judge would simply report that after so much deliberation as was necessary it became quite apparent that the jury were unable to agree on a recommendation. He might indeed have elicited from the jury the extent of their disagreement; and I am satisfied that in the discharge of his statutory duty he would report to the Minister of Justice the extent of the disagreement. Then the facts of the situation would be clearly outlined to the governor in council for his guidance. After all, the purpose of this recommendation is for the guidance of the governor in council. If therefore the jury reach a unanimous decision that they should recommend mercy, that fact is reported by the judge. If they should reach a unanimous decision that they should not recommend mercy, it is also reported. If after such deliberation and return to the judge for further instructions as may be necessary, it becomes perfectly clear that they cannot reach a decision one way or another, that fact is also reported. I do not think that we can do more or that we should do more. To do more would involve the suggestion that a decision of the jury should be less than unanimous. If we cannot get a decision, then the effect of the section is that that fact will be reported to the Minister of Justice and it will then be obvious to the governor in council that some favoured mercy and some did not favour mercy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not wish to repeat the argument for something less than unanimity except to say this. I believe the minister has treated this point as one of primary substance when it is not one of primary concern. The primary question is the question of whether the accused is guilty or not guilty. Whether or not there should be a recommendation for clemency is not of the same order or category as the main decision; but the minister speaks of the jury, without speaking in terms of majority or minority, both in terms of unanimity with regard to guilt and unanimity with regard to recommendation.

I suggest to the minister the following. The purpose of this clause, I take it, is not to create a new procedure, a new tradition, or in fact really to create new law. The purpose of this clause is to bring home to juries an assumed power which they have had, I suppose, ever since our jury system in capital cases was established. I say this because now, although the law is not at all explicit, juries bring in recommendations for clemency, not in every instance but in so many cases where there is not even any suggestion by the court that they should do so.

That being the case I suggest to the minister that his reluctance to meet the point the hon. member for Welland and others have put will mean that juries will do the very thing I have suggested. Juries will not be able to agree in some instances, and the foreman of the jury will say, "Some of us believe there should be a recommendation for mercy; three of us think there should not, but the rest think there should".

The Minister of Justice, notwithstanding his objective of maintaining the jury as a unanimous body, will be faced I think by a practice which will not be denied under the law as it is to be amended or under the practice which is now followed.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, I indicated earlier that I was in many ways very much opposed to the amendment contained in clause 13, but at this time I should like to limit my remarks to the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Welland, which I believe has a great deal of merit, especially when one reads the clause as phrased.

This clause will create many doubts about things which possibly it was the intention of the officer who drafted the clause to clarify. I should like to comment on some of the remarks made by the Minister of Justice a moment ago intending to indicate to the committee that the intention behind this clause was to ascertain that the finding of guilt and the recommendation for mercy would not become two instruments of battle among jurymen.

Certainly if the Minister of Justice meant this seriously he should realize that the clause as phrased does exactly the opposite of what he had in mind. I say this because if it was the intention to enact a clause which would give absolute freedom to jurymen with regard to clemency and it was not to be coupled with the discussion as to guilt, the minister should have said so. But in this clause the minister makes it necessary for jurymen to discuss their recommendation with regard to clemency at the same time as they discuss their finding of guilty or not guilty.

All the jurymen must find in favour of clemency to make such a recommendation, or they must unanimously decide against making any such recommendation. Therefore this clause takes away the right of some jurymen to vote against clemency and means they will possibly be urged by the other jurymen to go into the question of the accused being not guilty because they cannot obtain a bargaining point and this matter has to be decided unanimously.

Therefore although I am not in favour of this clause dealing with a recommendation for clemency becoming part of our statutes, if it is included in the statute it should be left to the discretion of each and every member of the jury to indicate his wish. It could be indicated to the judge that four jurymen were in favour of recommending clemency and so many others were against it and so on. I feel there is much merit in that suggestion.

If the Minister of Justice will read the clause itself, the first paragraph seems to indicate that the question should be asked of each and every juryman and not of the jury as a whole. The first paragraph of the clause says:

> Where a jury finds an accused guilty of an offence punishable by death, the judge who presides at the trial shall, before discharging the jury, put to them the following question:

If that were meant to mean the jury as a body, the words would be "put to it". If you are going to put the question to "them" you must foresee that you will get an answer from each and every one, and not from the jury as a body.

Later on in the clause the question of whether or not there is a recommendation for clemency is dealt with. How can the jury vote on this matter? They either want clemency or they do not, and they have to vote "yes" or "no". In these circumstances how could they report to the judge that they absolutely do not wish to recommend clemency? It sems to me that this phraseology means it is the intention to obtain from each and every juryman his opinion or disposition with regard to this matter, "Are you in favour of clemency or not?". If this is the intention, why not make the words very clear? It is not a vote; it is not a determination; it is a recommendation in favour of or against clemency.

Surely if it is a matter of a vote of all the jurymen, the vote should be that they favour a recommendation for clemency or they do not. How can you recommend that no clemency be given? You can be against recommending clemency, but certainly you cannot in the same vote decide that no recommendation for clemency shall be made.

I see a slight distinction there. However, I am quite sure that if the minister reads that first paragraph again it will indicate to him that the intention of this clause is to have the question put to each and every juryman. Although I am against the question being included in our statute, I agree that if it is included there is a great deal of merit in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Welland. If it is a matter of recommendation the complete opinion of the men who sat on the jury should be given to the judge. If so many are in favour of recommending clemency and so many are against it, those figures should at least be given. It should be so written in the act, so that the judge will have a clear and definite picture of the jury's intention in deciding the course he is to follow.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I can, I regret, only say again that the jury is here being invited to make a recommendation; it is not being invited to reach a verdict. It is to my mind quite clear that if they are unable to agree, that fact will be reported to the judge and will be included by him in his report to the Minister of Justice.

The experience is that judges make very full reports on these cases and I have no doubt that the opinion or the state of mind of the jury will be ascertained by the judge and reported to the minister. Then it will be reported by the minister to the cabinet. But if what the jury is asked to do is make a recommendation, if they can make a recommendation they will make one as a jury. If they are unable to arrive at a recommendation they will report as much to the judge. Since they are only asked for a recommendation, it seems to me that it is a perfectly satisfactory state of affairs.

Mr. Deschatelets: I do not think this clause should be carried before I have a chance to outline the ridiculous position in which our judges would be placed in a number of instances should this provision be enacted. If a jury finds a man guilty of murder and decides to make a recommendation for clemency the judge is placed in the ridiculous position of having to go to his room, return with his black gloves and tricorne and everything else before sentencing the accused to death, knowing full well that in most cases the sentence will be commuted because of the jury's recommendation.

I am sure most judges would be reluctant to take part in what I would term to be a comedy. It is not good for justice that a man should be sentenced to death when we know full well—and the words of the Prime Minister leave no room for any other interpretation—that in most of these cases where clemency has been asked by the jury the sentence will not be carried out. I can imagine that in such cases the lawyer will say to his client, "Do not worry; we have a recommendation for clemency. This is only for fun; the sentence will never be carried out". This is something we should bear in mind before this clause is carried.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member's concern for the situation of the judges would carry a good deal more weight if I did not know for a fact that many judges place themselves in the position which the hon. member has described, because at the present time it is far from rare that a judge who, following a verdict of guilty from a jury has solemnly donned the black cap and sentenced the accused to death, yet recommends in his report to the Minister of Justice that mercy should be shown. So I do not think the hon. member need have any fear about judges being placed in a ridiculous position. The judges themselves are, frequently, not reluctant to express their views for such guidance to the governor in council as may be attached to them with respect to whether or not mercy may be shown, notwithstanding that the jury had brought in a verdict of guilty and that they themselves had pronounced the death sentence.

Mr. Deschatelets: I do not want to pursue this point at length, but I think the minister himself must be aware of the criticism made by many judges in this country when death sentences which they have imposed have been commuted. I think that when we are trying to introduce a new concept of law dealing with the death penalty we should endeavour at the same time to find a system which would avoid such circumstances as I have described.

Mr. Fulton: If there be anything wrong with this situation I can only say that in some cases it is created by the judges themselves inasmuch as they make recommendations of their own notwithstanding the verdict of the jury. What we are doing here is clearing up an uncertainty in the law, namely, whether or not the jury has the right to make recommendations. That is the main purpose of this clause. The legislation provides means of establishing in the minds of juries that they have this right if they wish to exercise it and that their recommendations will be reported to the Minister of Justice. This is no great departure, seen in its proper prospective. It merely makes clear that the jury has the right to make such a recommendation. At the moment there is some doubt about it.

Mr. Godin: As I indicated a moment ago when I made some observations about what had been said by the hon. member for Welland, I have something more to say about this particular clause, clause 13. I trust I shall have the support of many members of this committee in my efforts to ascertain that this clause is not passed and shall not be placed on our statute books.

The Minister of Justice indicated that judges will not be embarrassed if there is a recommendation to mercy—that they will don the black cap and pronounce sentence notwithstanding. But what cap will the cabinet wear when it considers one of these recommendations to mercy; what gown will it put on and under what terms will it make a choice between death and life imprisonment? I am sure members of this committee are entitled to ask the Minister of Justice these questions. We know that throughout history statutes have been made pertaining to royal prerogatives. They have always been used to limit them, not to enlarge them. This statute, however, will be a procedure to enlarge the royal prerogative of mercy. I realize it is fitting that such a recourse should be in existence. I consider it to be a great and extraordinary thing, and in my opinion it should remain thus. It should not be placed in the hands of politicians as the product of a statute. This clause means placing into the hands of politicians final responsibility in the matter of capital punishment in this country and to that I am absolutely opposed.

No one who knows something about the confusion which this clause can bring about has failed to support my views on this matter. We know that recommendations, if they have any value, will be made by juries in certain areas. The government is the government of all Canada. We know that possibly it will become known that in certain areas juries will commonly bring in recommendations for mercy—recommendations which are invariably followed by the politicians. How can citizens be assured that justice will be done if politicians have the final decision on a matter of this grave importance?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wonder if I may ask the hon. member a question? Does he not think that the setting up of different categories of murder will lead to fewer cases coming before the cabinet for consideration, and does this not mean that the use of the royal prerogative will be reduced rather than extended?

Mr. Godin: I am speaking on behalf of those individuals who should like to see justice done by our courts. That is why I voted in favour of the principle of this bill. That principle involves an attempt to indicate to our courts, judges and juries, what constitutes the offence of murder to be punished by death, and what constitutes the other types of murder, punishable by life imprisonment only. It is only in respect of the determination of the gravity of the crime which should be contained in this bill. It should be set forth clearly for the guidance of the judges and jury in determining what constitutes a crime which is punishable by death, and a non-capital crime, although murder, punishable by life imprisonment. That decision should rest with the judges and juries in this country and not be placed into the hands of the politicians and crown employees.

I am speaking in regard to clause 1 because I feel that clause 13 is coupled with the other clauses of the bill. I find it very odd that we should concern ourselves with the fine distinctions which we have attempted to make between capital and non-capital murder.

As the bill is now proposed, I suggest the police officers, the crown prosecutors, and other employees in the field of justice will make the decisions as to whether an offence is capital murder or non-capital murder. I say that is absolutely wrong. I suggest that our courts, judges and juries should decide what crime an accused individual is guilty of, and that the penalty should be provided by legislation.

I should like to suggest that in certain cases there will be doubt as to why an individual was charged with a non-capital murder which carries only a sentence of life imprisonment. There might very well be talk of the fact that a man has contributed $10,000 in order to protect his son, following which a charge of non-capital murder was laid.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I understood the issue of the principle of the bill was decided some days ago during second reading.

The Chairman: It seems clear to me that the hon. member is not discussing clause 13 at this moment.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, I am discussing clause 13 and all its implications, because I say we are making distinctions at the tail end of our legislation in regard to the decision to lay a charge of capital murder or non-capital murder, and leaving it to the cabinet, composed of politicians, to decide upon clemency.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, my hon. friend is not only out of order but is wrong. The present provisions of the Criminal Code provide that the cabinet shall review capital cases. This bill does not provide that at all, so my hon. friend could not be talking about this bill.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, by this proposed bill we are asking that recommendations be made to the cabinet in every case where an individual is sentenced to death, or could be sentenced to death. If the minister suggests that there is no reason whatever for this clause being included, because it is included in the Criminal Code, why does the Minister of Justice not agree to strike the clause out?

I do not suggest I have proof or evidence of something wrong in the administration of justice in this country but I have heard lawyers for the defence indicate surprise in finding that a charge of manslaughter had been laid against the accused rather than murder.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member is again out of order. I must point out that this clause deals only with the recommendations a jury may make after it has reached a verdict, and that the choice of the charge to be laid is a matter that has been disposed of.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, we all appreciate that a verdict rendered by a jury must be rendered in accordance with the charge laid. Perhaps I should agree that the realm of discussion in respect of clause 13 should be limited and that you, Mr. Chairman, are quite right in finding that the discussion regarding the choice of charge to be laid is out of order in the discussion on clause 13. I have been discussing that subject because it is very difficult to distinguish between the subjects included in different clauses.

Regarding clause 13, I am sure all hon. members will realize that there must be uniformity of justice throughout this country, as provided by the British North America Act, and that recommendations to be made by the provisions of this clause will be made to the cabinet. I would suggest that because juries in a particular area are found to be inclined to make recommendations for clemency, that murderers will take their victims on joy rides into those areas in order to be liable only to a sentence of life imprisonment.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, will the hon. member permit a question?

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Brunsden: Is the hon. member suggesting that there is a difference in the administration of justice in various parts of Canada?

Mr. Godin: I have suggested that there could not be such a difference if the law were defined clearly, but I suggest that a different interpretation is possible under the provisions of this bill because it tends to divide murder into two classes, one considered culpable, which is called capital murder, and the other less culpable, called non-capital murder. I suggest the law today, as proposed by this bill, particularly clause 13, should be clear in its definition of the two classes of murder.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I asked the hon. member a question and he has not answered it.

An hon. Member: He does not have to answer it.

Mr. Chevrier: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to lecture the hon. member but I have just stated that according to our law today the same distinction of the crime of murder applies throughout Canada, if that is what his question has reference to.

I object to this proposed clause 13 because of the flimsy recommendations which our judges will now ask our juries to make in regard to capital and non-capital murder, which involves an element of distinction which is not properly defined, and which could result in different applications of the law in different parts of the country. I trust the hon. member understood that.

I suggest the law is clear today and that we should retain that clarity in respect of the distinctions which are proposed by this bill. This is a distinction provided by this bill to permit our judges and juries to make findings appropriate to specific circumstances. I am not in favour of introducing a procedure which will bring about the uncertainty of the application of this measure. My great fear is not so much what recommendations we may have from different localities. That difficulty may be overcome. What I am concerned with is what is the cabinet to do with the recommendations? Is the Minister of Justice prepared to say that when there is a recommendation from a jury which comes from the area where the crime was committed that the cabinet is entitled to disregard it and not commute the sentence? What will the cabinet do in other instances? Why make the cabinet the court of appeal, as this clause does? Why not give the authority to the judge and jury, those people who have been called in to decide the case on behalf of the citizens or the locality? Why place the cabinet in the position of being the court of appeal? I am sure that this cabinet, or any other cabinet, will regret it for a long time if clause 13, which we are now discussing, passes and is placed in the Criminal Code.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the hon. member a question. Do we gather from what he has said that he is unalterably opposed to any final authority in so far as the prerogative of mercy is concerned?

Mr. Godin: I thought I made that clear. I am not opposed to the royal prerogative. At the present time I am not discussing the royal prerogative. If there is the head of a country, then it is fitting that we give to that authority the right to pardon. This is a part of our society, something which we consider in the development of our social structure and of our democratic way of life as being most fitting. But should we add to this prerogative? By many statutes we have limited the prerogatives of the crown in Canada. We have done this and it was fitting that we should do it. But why increase that prerogative and make it a matter of statute law as we are doing here by way of a recommendation for royal mercy? I say it is the wrong thing to do. It is a backward step for any government to take. I hope I have answered my hon. friend.

Royal mercy should remain an extraordinary thing that a citizen can resort to in special circumstances and possibly obtain it or try to obtain it. To implement it by way of a statute I say is wrong. I trust I have made it clear to my hon. friend that I am not opposed to the right itself which is a beautiful and a wonderful thing and ought to be used on extraordinary occasions. But I do not want to see it any every day matter, nor do I want to see it used as a court of appeal in murder cases.

Mr. Carter: There is just one point in connection with this clause that bothers me a little bit, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Nickel Belt has raised the question of what purpose is to be served by this final recommendation. He has implied that the only use it could be put to would be to guide the cabinet in exercising the royal prerogative.

The jury is charged with two separate duties. One is to find whether the person is guilty or not of the charge of capital murder. Well, in that case, on the basis of evidence, an objective decision can be arrived at; but when it comes to consideration of making a decision on the second question, namely whether or not a recommendation for clemency should be made, I doubt very much whether a jury is in the same position with regard to making an objective decision because we all know from what we have seen take place in this house on more than one occasion when this question has come up that our views on it are fairly representative of those of the people of Canada and we know that just as we are divided in this house into two groups, one in favour of abolition and the other in favour of retention of capital punishment, so a jury must also have these two positions represented in it. I say this because a jury will have members who have come to the conclusion that capital punishment should be abolished. I feel sure that this will colour their judgment and they will not be as objective in bringing in a decision on whether or not there should be clemency as there would be in making a decision as to the guilt or innocence of the accused.

If you are not going to have an objective decision—and I do not think you are—I think because of that fact there will be an effort made to try and get on the jury a number of people who are in favour of abolition so that it can be pretty certain that there will always be a recommendation for clemency. There may be ways of getting over this. I never served on a jury. I do not know whether or not jurors are frequently challenged, but certainly there is this problem of whether you are going to get an objective decision. If this clause is meant to serve a useful purpose, then we should try to improve it and do everything possible to make sure that an objective decision will be obtained.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think every committee or commission that has considered the question of the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy has come to the conclusion that it is not possible, if indeed it were desirable, that it should be exercised in accordance with a strict body of law and precedent.

May I just refer my hon. friend to one or two passages from the report of our own joint parliamentary committee, upon which, if I recall rightly, he himself served, when it was dealing with this subject. I will read from paragraph 12 on page 5 of the report:

> Since each case is judged on its own merits, the practice governing remission cannot be reduced to a statement of settled principles. The decision in many cases necessitates a review of varying circumstances and, not infrequently, the weighing of conflicting considerations. It would defeat the purpose of the exercise of the prerogative of mercy to attempt to codify the instances in which it might be invoked. The only safe and fair generalization than can be made is that commutation occurs in all cases where extenuating circumstances of a substantial nature exist or the degree of moral culpability is not sufficient to warrant the supreme penalty.

If these are the principles which are agreed on, and I wholeheartedly support that conclusion although I was not a member of the committee when it brought in its report, if it is agreed then that the considerations in the minds of the cabinet when it exercises the prerogative are many and varied and cannot be codified, then it does seem to me to be perfectly appropriate to say to the jury which has actually heard the evidence that you, too, will not be in a position to make any binding recommendation but of expressing an opinion whether or not there are present in this case the sort of facts which might warrant the suggestion that clemency be considered. This is why I feel, with deference to my hon. friend, it is perfectly appropriate to say to these 12 men who, it is true, may exercise a judgment in making their recommendation based partly on their emotion, nevertheless what do you think about it, bearing in mind that there is first only a recommendation which is not binding.

Mr. Carter: I thank the minister very much. He has clarified my problem quite a bit. If there were something in this clause which transferred what the minister quoted from the report which would sort of set down the principles on which that decision would be based, I think it would solve the problem. But there is nothing here. It simply says that they have to come to a decision whether or not they are going to recommend mercy, and on that basis alone I would think they would hardly be able to divorce their assessment of the evidence from their personal feelings as to capital punishment. That is the problem I was seeking to overcome.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, earlier the minister said that there would be no polling of the jury in open court in connection with a recommendation for mercy. Later he said the judge could ascertain what was in the minds of the jury by asking them. I think he said "them" and I understood him to be referring to the individual members of the jury. How can he do this without polling the jury?

Mr. Fulton: I was referring, of course, to what I had understood to be a suggestion made earlier that counsel would have the right to poll the jury. So far as I know the judge can ask the jury any question he wants in order to ascertain what may be their state of mind.

Mr. Godin: If I may return to what the minister said a moment ago, he said that the recommendation made as a result of the study in 1955 and 1956 was that the royal prerogative should remain free and there should be nothing to tie it down. I do not disagree with that in any way but in the light of that I fail to see how the minister could bring froward clause 13 if that was the guiding principle. Clause 13 introduces into the Criminal Code the very thing which will tie the hands of the cabinet in that they will be presented with a recommendation for mercy although it is not stated that they have to recommend mercy. But how could the procedure develop otherwise? In what other way could such a recommendation be treated? Is this not in a sense doing away with the liberty and freedom in respect of the use of the royal prerogative which the minister has just indicated it was the recommendation of the committee that the cabinet should exercise?

I think the Minister of Justice is going contrary to the recommendation which he said is to be found in the report. He is tying the hands of the cabinet so that the royal prerogative will not be exercised in the free way in which it was before. The cabinet will be tied down by a recommendation which by law must be presented to it. That is the objection I have, and surely the Minister of Justice must realize that he is blowing hot and cold when he says that the purpose of implementing this clause is to retain freedom with regard to the use of the royal prerogative. I say it is quite clear that the procedure which will develop will not tend to retain freedom in the use of the royal prerogative but will limit it and make it susceptible to the tendencies of local juries. It will tie down the use of the royal prerogative to the attitude toward capital punishment that the cabinet may have from time to time. That is why I say that the very principle of freedom in the use of the royal prerogative to which the minister has referred is gravely limited by this clause.

The Chairman: Shall clause 13 carry?

Mr. Deschatelets: On division.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 14 agreed to.

On clause 15—Approval by governor in council of release after commutation of sentence.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I must admit that this clause puzzles me a great deal. I should like to ask the minister to explain how and why he came to the decision to recommend this clause to the house. According to the explanation, its purpose is to enable the governor in council, in commuting a sentence of death, to direct that the prisoner shall not be released from the imprisonment to which the sentence is commuted without the prior approval of the governor in council.

The reason I say the clause puzzles me is that prior to this session when the Minister of Justice in his wisdom introduced major policy changes in the parole system of Canada and set up the national parole board this group in general and I in particular wholeheartedly supported the advance which the Minister of Justice recommended in our parole system. To the best of my knowledge the new parole board and system of parole have worked exceptionally well. As a matter of fact, I think the Minister of Justice can take a great deal of pride in the changes brought about in the last two years in the parole system.

However, under this clause the parole board and its authority are by-passed with respect to one type of criminal only. Although the board has done a terrific job in the last 18 months it is now by-passed because according to this clause the decision as to parole has to have the prior approval of the governor in council. I think the Minister of Justice knows that I have been interested in this question for many years. For the life of me I cannot conceive that the governor in council knows better than the parole board whether a man who was sentenced to death but has had his sentence commuted to life imprisonment is fit to be released into society or whether he should remain in jail for a number of years more or for the rest of his life. That is the function and purpose of the parole board. The whole function and purpose of the board involve undertaking a study of all prisoners. They study their history and the reports of the warden, the supervisor, the psychiatrist, the psychologist and so on. That is not a job that can be done by the governor in council.

With all the responsibilities that the governor in council has I would think the only understanding they could have with regard to a matter of this sort would be on the basis of information from the parole board. From where can such information come except from the parole board? Surely to heaven the members of the cabinet cannot make a detailed study of all the records, psychiatric and psychological reports and other reports. Of course not. That is why we have the parole board and that board has full power in every other offence involving penalties up to life imprisonment, offences such as rape, manslaughter and homicide without the death sentence. Such cases are the responsibility of the parole board but when it comes to just one type of case, that of the criminal sentenced to death who has had his sentence commuted to life imprisonment—

An hon. Member: He committed a murder.

Mr. Winch: All the others who commit non-capital murder and are sentenced to life imprisonment rather than capital punishment have also committed murder but they come under the parole board. As I read the clause, and I think I am right, when a sentence of death is commuted to life imprisonment that person cannot be granted parole without the consent of the governor in council.

I want it made very clear that I think extraordinary care must be taken that, whether it is 12 years or 50 years, if a man is not fit to be released in society, he should not be released, whether he is in jail for rape, homicide or any other reason such as punishment as a trafficker. What I cannot understand is why in this particular case the parole board, which is the only body that has knowledge of the matter, is by-passed in the final answer. In this situation the case must go before the governor in council.

I think the Minister of Justice understands why I am a little puzzled. I know he must have had some reason for putting in this provision. I think most of us in this chamber, being reasonable people, would be interested in knowing the reason. Men may be sentenced to life imprisonment for rape and other offences. Why is it that in this particular case the governor in council has the last say?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the minister wish to reply?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. This clause is put in here for two reasons, really. First it must be remembered that the only persons whose sentence of death will be commuted to life imprisonment from now on will be, generally speaking, persons who the jury has decided committed a planned and deliberate killing. My hon. friend must bear in mind that this will be the situation from now on whereas it has not been the situation up to the present time. Up to the present time, all murder carried the death penalty and therefore everyone who committed murder and was convicted of murder would have his case come before the cabinet. Therefore all murderers were susceptible of having their sentences commuted to life imprisonment. From now on, however, the death penalty will be imposed only on those who are guilty of capital murder; that is to say on those who, the jury has found, have committed a planned and deliberate killing. Hence commutation, if it should take place, from now on is going to take place with respect to a man who has committed a planned or deliberate murder or, alternatively, who has killed in the course of the commission of a crime which itself imports the element of planning and deliberation.

The first point is that the type of crime which will now be coming forward for commutation will be a much more restricted one than the type of crime which has been subject to commutation in the past. However, there still may be commutation. We have discussed this matter quite fully already and I shall therefore not go into too much detail. However, let me remind my hon. friend of this fact. There may be this commutation although the verdict is guilty of planned and deliberate killing. For instance, in a case in which, although the man was not proved to be insane within the technical meaning of the law, psychiatrists' reports are such as to raise in the minds of the cabinet a doubt or a feeling that he is not a normally sane person, then in accordance with the well understood practice that we do not hang persons who are not mentally responsible, that man may have his sentence commuted although he has committed a particular type of crime and although he may be a type of person about whom no one at this point in time can say that it would ever be safe to release him again into society.

That is a very grave responsibility. It must be remembered that it is the cabinet which orders the sentence to be commuted. Therefore it is the cabinet which takes the responsibility of saying that this man will not be hanged but will be subject to life imprisonment. In view of the factors that I have outlined we have felt that it is not inappropriate that, in this particular and restricted class of case as it will be in the future, we should say, "The cabinet which orders the commutation shall also bear the final responsibility of determining whether that commutation will now result in his release in society".

In this process we, of course, shall have the benefit of the advice of the parole board. It is not as though we were going to set this man off in a corner where the parole board never saw him. They will have access to his file. They will review his case, and they will make recommendations. The situation simply is this. In that small segment of cases where there may be a real question whether it is ever going to be safe to release this man, we felt it to be appropriate that the cabinet which took the responsibility—not the same individuals but the governor in council—for determining that he should have his sentence of death commuted, should also have to bear the responsibility of deciding whether or not he will be released.

Let me impress upon my hon. friend this final point. This will not be the situation with regard to every case of commutation. This situation—I refer to the situation that the governor in council must finally authorize release—will apply only if at the time of making the commutation the governor in council so orders. In other words the governor in council at the time of authorizing the commutation must say that "in this particular case we think the case is so dangerous or so delicate or so border line that we now provide that he shall not be released on parole unless and until the cabinet authorizes it". May I also remind my hon. friend of another parallel. If in the course of a murder trial the jury were to find that the accused is insane, then the law provides that, instead of being sentenced to death, he shall be ordered to be detained during the pleasure of the lieutenant-governor in council. In other words he is committed to an insane asylum until the lieutenant-governor in council decides that he is cured or is fit to be released. Then if the cabinet of Canada or the governor in council commutes a sentence because they feel this man is not mentally normal, under the law as it is at the present time there is no parallel authority to order that he be detained during the pleasure of the governor in council. Hence all we are doing is importing into the situation where we order a man detained because we have doubts as to his mental capacity, the same situation that prevails if the jury finds he is insane, in which case the sentence is that he be detained at the pleasure of the lieutenant-governor in council.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As we come to the end of the amendments I believe we are conscious of the fact that this particular subsection deals with the basic philosophy behind this measure in so far as government policy is concerned. The bill throughout, I think, represents an attempt at laudable compromise. I think the bill—and I have said this previously and I do not recall any comment being made about this by the minister—aims now to put into statute law a practice which quite legally and constitutionally has been exercised by the crown since this administration came into office in respect of the royal prerogative. One has the deep feeling that the considerations which have motivated the crown in Canada in the number of commutations that have taken place are to be found in the principles of this bill. There is nothing wrong and there is certainly no unconstitutional act involved in the crown seeking to put into the law of the land for administration and adjudication by the courts situations which have formed its basic policy in the consideration of how it would exercise the royal prerogative.

However, this clause raises a number of other considerations that were mentioned by the Prime Minister, and the contrast between what the Prime Minister said and what this clause provides cannot go unnoticed. It is time that in this particular the Prime Minister was speaking by way of obiter dictum and his remarks did not have the sanctity of any law, but they were the views of the head of the government and on that account must receive more than ordinary attention.

Before commenting on what the Prime Minister said I should remind hon. members of the committee that in this clause the instrument of commutation is provided not by members of the cabinet or by a committee of the cabinet but by the governor in council. It is the governor in council, and not members of the cabinet, who is charged with the responsibility of dealing at some subsequent time with the question of the extent of the accused's confinement.

The Prime Minister told us that these capital cases took a good deal of the cabinet's time. I am aware of that fact. I am aware, as one who sat in Her Majesty's privy council in Canada, that the cabinet of this country is obliged to give much time, and necessarily so as long as the authority is reposed with it, to the consideration of capital cases.

The Prime Minister went on to complain about, I should not say the length of time but undoubtedly, as head of the government with his preoccupations, he was placing on one side the many responsibilities and the many questions that have to be considered and on the other the time that is consumed by the cabinet as a whole in the consideration of capital cases. I suggest that as great a factor as that may be, the number of capital cases in this country are not so numerous as to cause any cabinet to feel that it could not properly discharge its role in the exercise of the royal prerogative.

The Prime Minister went on to remind us that in the United Kingdom the home secretary exercises the power of clemency or commutation without any reference whatsoever to his cabinet colleagues. Indeed I think the Prime Minister went on to say that he does not even discuss it with the lord chancellor. On that score there seems to be some doubt. In any event it is clear that in the United Kingdom the home secretary does not discuss the matter with his cabinet colleagues, except possibly the lord chancellor who is of course a member of the cabinet.

The Prime Minister went on to say that perhaps we might evolve a practice in Canada where the exercise of clemency could be left to the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General. I would simply point out that I think that would be a dangerous practice to evolve, in the light of the possible compromises because of this clause. In any event, that suggestion of the Prime Minister is not met in this clause because the role of recommending clemency and the ultimate role of determining the extent of confinement is to be exercised by the governor in council under this clause. I think that would have been the proper course for the Minister of Justice to have proposed.

It would seem to me to leave the decision in the first instance and in the ultimate instance to any body other than the governor in council, particularly at this time when this very important measure is about to be enacted, involving as it does a very important departure from our practice, would be a very dangerous procedure.

The hon. member for Vancouver East wondered why the question of confinement should go back to the cabinet in the first instance. I am satisfied with the validity of the reply made by the Minister of Justice. The minister says that the cabinet, having ordered the commutation, is to be the body that will order the accused to continue in confinement. As the minister pointed out, it will not necessarily be the same cabinet. That is not without some disability because, one cabinet having been seized with all the facts and having ordered commutation in the case of a person in respect of whom the sentence of death was commuted to life imprisonment, will not have the same freshness in the second consideration as the cabinet which had the responsibility for the original act.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is desirable and I strongly support the minister in saying that when we are making very important departures from the punishment of death in the case of wilful murder or, as it is called in the bill, capital murder planned or deliberate, we should make sure that in cases where the sentence of death has been commuted to life imprisonment the confinement is one that will protect the interests of society as well as providing for a proper measure of justice in so far as it is humanly possible to do that by human adjudication and by resorting to human standards.

I do not think there would be satisfaction in the country unless it were provided that the cabinet have the responsibility of reviewing recommendations made by the parole board as to the release of an accused person who had been sentenced to death for the crime of murder.

It may be that we will not always want these particular subclauses to stay on the statute books. It may be that the pressure of government business will make it difficult for a measure of this kind to prevail. Certainly when our country expands to a population twice its present size the problems of government will increase in consequence and so will the responsibilities of the cabinet. There may also be practical considerations and other reasons that will cause us to take a second look at this provision.

However, at this time I think the minister would not be meeting the wishes of most people in this country unless safeguards of this kind were provided. This means the cabinet is going to have put on it double the load about which the Prime Minister complained. If the cabinet now spends a considerable amount of time in considering what it should do in regard to capital cases, it is now going to have to spend perhaps almost double that time in considering them.

I say this because if one bears in mind the record of commutations of this government one realizes the cabinet is going to have to spend a very considerable time in deciding whether or not a parole board's advice should be acted on and whether or not an individual sentenced to death, having had his sentence commuted to life imprisonment, is to be released as having fulfilled the life sentence substituted as a result of the commutation.

One wonders whether there will be the same care exercised by the cabinet with regard to the matter of further confinement or release from prison in the case of one who has been found guilty of murder, who has been sentenced to death but whose sentence has been commuted. Is the government going to take the same care in that direction as is taken with regard to the original act of commutation? I suspect there will be the same care, but I put the question in order to indicate the further burden which will be imposed on the cabinet and, I think, properly so, by this clause. The minister did say a moment ago that this bill does not in any way reduce the royal prerogative. I do not agree. I think this bill does reduce the incidence of the application of the royal prerogative just as the practice of commutation under this administration has resulted in an abridgement of the exercise of the royal prerogative by this particular cabinet executive as compared with its predecessor.

It seems to me that this is a compromise measure. I have expressed the view that although I do not agree with the draftsmanship of the bill it does meet my own point of view in principle. It obviously satisfies the government and it is likely a continuation of the practice which the government has itself pursued in considering how the royal prerogative shall be exercised. But it is a departure. The hon. member for Essex West said he voted for this bill on the assumption that we were retaining capital punishment. I have not read all the speeches made by those who participated in the debate on that subject but I do know that the private view of some members of this house is that through this measure we are taking a very forward step toward removing capital punishment altogether. That being the case, if we are going to be true to the opinions of those who have taken one position or another with regard to this bill it seems to me that this should be a trial measure only. We should resort to no process of finality in this legislation. We should adopt the procedure adopted in the United Kingdom of a five-year trial period—I think it was five years. I should like to see the minister say, without in any way diluting or abridging the policy which the government has in mind, and without in any way retreating from the position it has taken, that in view of the importance of this matter to the administration of justice in this country the government proposes that this amendment should become law for a period of, let us say, five years or three years at the end of which time the amendment could be reviewed and the government of that day and the parliament of that day would come forward with new recommendations and urdertake a review of the position.

This suggestion does not in any way interfere with the principle of the bill and it would give many people in the country the feeling that in making this important departure we had acted in accordance with humanitarian instincts, in accordance with new concepts of the relation between offenders and the state and in accordance with new standards of morality while being, at the same time, moderate in our action and careful to keep within the rules of prudence. I think that is a consideration to which the minister might well give some attention and I hope he will say something about it.

Mr. Fulton: Before dealing with the last suggestion made by the hon. member for Essex East may I comment on what he said about the remarks made by the Prime Minister in this house on May 29? I think the hon. gentleman has to some extent misinterpreted what the Prime Minister said. The Prime Minister in indicating his views as to the procedures that might be followed in cabinet was doing nothing more or less, as I apprehend him, than taking this house into his confidence, as is so typical of him, as to the ways in which he feels our procedures, even our cabinet procedures, might be improved. The hon. member for Essex East appeared to take from the Prime Minister's remarks the impression that the right hon. gentleman thought a small committee of cabinet should have the final decision. That is not correct. What the Prime Minister said was that he felt that with respect to cabinet procedures we might approach more closely the procedures in the United Kingdom. As reported at page 5528 of Hansard the words used were:

> —whereby the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General would make a determination and recommendation and, on the basis of the opportunity now given to juries to recommend mercy, would be able to bring their recommendation to the cabinet as a whole.

It is clear from those words that the Prime Minister had no intention of suggesting that a small committee of cabinet should make the final decision in these matters and, as I have said, the Prime Minister was not in any way attempting to lay down a principle of law. All he did was to take the house into his confidence with respect to his thinking as to how procedures even in cabinet might be improved.

With regard to the proposal that there should be a five year test period—that we should announce as a government that we are not laying down any final rule but would be prepared to review the act at the end of five years—I appreciate the evident intention of the hon. member to prejudge events and I agree with him that undoubtedly this government will have the opportunity to review the measure in five years. We shall be here five years from now.

But it is not necessary for us to write into the statute an intention to review it in five years. After all, the law is a living thing. The law progresses, and if it is found that in spite of the collective judgment of the government, the House of Commons and the parliament of Canada this has not proved to be a wise and desirable amendment, then, of course, we would invite parliament to make further changes. However, I suggest with all respect to the hon. member that when you are dealing with the law affecting people's lives it is not a good thing to say: we intend to do this for five years to see if it works and if it does not we shall change it.

We believe this legislation is sound and progressive. We are convinced that it meets the wishes of the people of Canada and that it does more. Not only does it reflect public opinion but it reflects that standard of morality of conduct by which the public of Canada would wish, in the highest sense, to be governed. In that sense we submit this bill to the judgment of parliament, not in any inflexible sense, not in the sense of saying "We are doing this and we must be right", but in our firm belief that it is a proper course to take. If it should prove not to have been a wise move, we should be prepared to consider amending it, not in five years, but at any time it becomes apparent that changes should be considered. I do not believe that it would be appropriate to put a five year time limit on any legislation as important and, if I may say so, as well conceived as this which, as I anticipate, will receive that indication from the House of Commons.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 17—Transitional.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, clause 17 is the last clause in this bill and I should like the approval of this committee to say a very few words.

I feel my position as an abolitionist is very well known, and should like to say at this time I have not changed my view in any way whatever in respect of capital punishment. However, I do wish to say, in respect of the last clause of this bill, that I feel Canada is making a great stride forward in respect of penology, homicide and capital punishment. I find it rather paradoxical, being a strong abolitionist, that I should be discussing legalities and technicalities, but that is what happens when an abolitionist is a member of the House of Commons.

I should like to state that the feeling of this group, and my feeling particularly, is of appreciation and gratefulness for the great strides forward which are being taken, and on behalf of my colleagues I assure the committee that we will lend our unanimous support.

Clause agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall we now consider clause 1?

On clause 1—Classification of murder.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, at the request of the committee, clause 1 was allowed to stand while we considered the possibility of amendments to take care of three suggestions. The first was that it should be made abundantly clear that a person who kills a police officer, or a member of a police force in the course of discharging the duties of that office, should be presumed to be guilty of capital murder. Second, that a person who kills a prison officer in the course of the discharging of his duties shall also be presumed to be guilty of capital murder. Third, the suggestion was made that the words used in the French version of this bill do not accurately reflect the English words in clause 1 (2)(a). The words involved are "planned and deliberate".

With regard to the first two of those suggestions, as I have indicated, it is our view that by virtue of the present draft, a person who kills a policeman in the execution of his duties, or a prison officer in the execution of his duties, would be guilty of capital murder as presently defined. However, as I indicated earlier, if there is doubt in this regard, in our readiness to be flexible, we are prepared to admit that we should not always have the last word, and are prepared to accept an amendment in order to clear away that doubt. Accordingly, I have had an amendment drafted which I will ask one of my colleagues to move after I have presented and explained its effect.

The first amendment would be made by striking out line 11 on page 1 and substituting therefor the word "person". Second, by striking out line 25 on page 1 and substituting the following:

Subparagraph (iv), or (c) such person by his own act caused or assisted in causing the death of (i) a police officer, police constable, constable, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officer or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace acting in the course of his duties, or (ii) a warden, deputy warden, instructor, keeper, gaoler, guard or other officer or permanent employee of a prison, acting in the course of his duties, or counselled or procured another person to do any act causing or assisting in causing the death.

The effect of that amendment, Mr. Chairman, will be the adding of another subparagraph to section 202A, (2), which will include beyond any possibility of doubt the killing of a police officer or prison officer in the category of capital murder. I should ask my colleague the Solicitor General to move that amendment.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Chairman, I believe you have a copy of the proposed amendment before you. I beg to move that clause 1 of the bill be amended as has been suggested by the Minister of Justice.

The Chairman: The hon. member for St. John's West moves that Bill No. C-92, an act to amend the Criminal Code (capital murder) be amended as follows:

(a) by striking out line 11 on page 1 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

person,

(b) by striking out line 25 on page 1 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

subparagraph (iv), or

(c) such person by his own act caused or assisted in causing the death of

(i) a police officer, police constable, constable, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officer or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, acting in the course of his duties, or

(ii) a warden, deputy warden, instructor, keeper, goaler, guard or other officer or permanent employee of a prison, acting in the course of his duties, or counselled or procured another person to do any act causing or assisting in causing the death.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, these amendments will certainly meet with the approval of several hon. members.

With special reference to section 1 (b) (i), I should like to remind the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) that this amendment is due to the remarks made by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) who suggested that subparagraph (i) of that section should include the murder of a penitentiary officer or jail guard—

If I remember well, when the minister stated that he would ask his officials to submit to us an amendment covering that particular case, he added that he would give the merit to the hon. member for Niagara Falls. I am quite sure he will see no objection to doing that.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: No. I am delighted to have the opportunity to support my hon. friend from Maisonneuve-Rosemont in his tribute to his colleague, the hon. member for Niagara Falls, with respect to her interest in and sponsorship of this suggestion.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, with your indulgence, I have one other amendment to move with respect to the French version.

You will recall that some of our colleagues from the province of Quebec questioned the fact that the words "projeté et délibéré", which appear in line 7 at page 1 of the French version, accurately reproduce and translate the sense of the English words "planned and deliberate" where they appear in line 10 of the English version. I have consulted with the officials and with my colleagues who are both highly experienced criminal counsel and etymologists from the province of Quebec and I am advised that the sense of the English phrase "planned and deliberate" are not best rendered in French by the words "projeté et délibéré"; and that the full sense of the phrase "it is planned and deliberate on the part of such person" can best be rendered in French by the phrase "commis de propos délibéré par". I would accordingly ask my colleague the Solicitor General to move the appropriate amendment.

(Translation):

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I suggest that the French version of paragraph (a), subsection (2) of the new section 202A, which is section 1 of Bill C-92, be amended by substituting the words:

... commis de propos délibéré par ...

for the words

... délibéré de la part de ...

The Chairman: Mr. Browne (St. John's West) moves that the French version of paragraph (a) subsection (2) of the new section 202A, which is section 1 of Bill C-92, be amended by substituting the words

... commis de propos délibéré par ...

for the words

... délibéré de la part de ...

(Text):

Mr. Roberge: Since the Solicitor General was kind enough to move the amendment in French I will compliment him in English. We think it is a step forward and an improvement in the translation of the French version and we approve of it.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time, at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Roberge: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Next sitting.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT AND CRIMINAL CODE

EXTENSION OF MORATORIUM RESPECTING B.C. FISHING INDUSTRY

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-97, to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I explained at the time when leave to introduce the bill was given, the purpose of the bill is to provide for a further year a moratorium which was first provided in an amendment in 1959, which has the effect that certain activities of the fishing companies and fishing unions in British Columbia which might otherwise be found to be contraventions of the Combines Investigation Act shall be deemed for this period not to be contraventions. This is necessary because the restrictive trade practices commission now has before it a report of the director of investigation in which he alleges that these practices do raise questions under the Combines Investigation Act. However, the matter has not yet been settled, and if we were not to provide this moratorium the fishing industry in British Columbia would be thrown into considerable disorder.

The reason for the delay in settling the issue is that there have arisen certain side issues in the course of the hearings arranged by the restrictive trade practices commission which have been the subject of injunction applications which have unduly protracted those hearings. Therefore I am asking that this moratorium be extended for a further year, until December, 1962.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I am sure that no one wants to endlessly affect the fishing industry in British Columbia or in any other part of Canada. I believe the reason which the minister has given tonight is the reason he gave last year. If there is a good reason for excluding the fishermen—I put this as a matter of interrogation—why should it be merely a moratorium? Why should there not be some more extended period during which the fishermen are given this protection? Why should they be given this protection for only a limited period of time? It seems to me the minister owes the house a further explanation.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I think the government ought to end this kind of farce here and now. The Combines Investigation Act was designed originally to protect consumers and the ordinary working people of our nation. However, inadvertently, I believe, a misuse is being made of this act. This is a deliberate attempt to smash a legitimate union of the fishermen, and they have been kept out on the limb now for a long time.

I can remember our present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) expressing his opinion of the Combines Investigation Act when he was in the opposition ranks. He called for an act that had some teeth in it and for confinement behind bars of those who were found guilty of violating the intent of the act. I am sure that it never was the intent of the act to prevent the working people of Canada from combining with one another to get a fair deal. Yet, by one means or another, over a period of many years now, under both Liberal and Conservative governments, our fishermen have had a gun pointed at their heads. I believe it is high time that the government came clean and discontinued this particular investigation or demanded that the fishing companies produce their own records.

It is very easy. Mr. Speaker, to ask a fisherman to produce his records. These records are a matter of public knowledge. Yet, under the leadership of a former minister of the crown, the fishing companies are holding a gun at the head of the fishermen in British Columbia. This investigation is resented very deeply by all the working people of British Columbia, and we appeal to the government to end this nonsense once and for all. Either bring the fishing companies to task, make them open their books and expose their nefarious dealings to the public or allow the union of fishermen to negotiate as they have in the past in the interests of all our fishermen.

(Translation):

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, last year we were bitterly critical of various sections of the combines bill which was then before us. This year, we still have some fears about the way in which the act is administered. The rather simple amendment now before the house, providing for a one year extension of certain privileges granted to fishermen in British Columbia, prompts me to ask this question: Do the fishermen of the rest of Canada not have the same rights as the fishermen of British Columbia?

I know that in the fishing industry, it is often very hard to sell at prices that will enable the fishermen to earn a decent living. If the purpose of this bill is to help needy fishermen, I am quite prepared to support it. On the other hand, if this is true for one part of the country, it must also be true for the rest of the country. Those who fish on the Atlantic coast must be in a similar situation and should enjoy equal privileges.

I am therefore wondering, as was mentioned a moment ago by the hon. member for Coquitlam (Mr. Regier)—I forget the exact name of his constituency—Burnaby-Coquitlam, I think—

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Caron: —well, special case legislation is always rather tricky, and one must always be very careful before accepting or refusing such legislation.

However, I am not prepared to go as far as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. I will not say it is like a revolver placed at the back of the head of a certain class of citizens, but I will say that if this is needed —and this must be proven—in one section of the country, it should also be needed in the rest of the country, because the plight of fishermen is serious throughout Canada, and there should be protection both for the Atlantic fishermen and the Pacific fishermen.

I feel they have been exploited by purchasers for many years. If a way, a system can be found that will end such exploitation, I am quite in favour of it and will support the bill. However, I think the minister should show us the need. And if such a need applies only to British Columbia, the minister should tell us why, because I think the Atlantic fisherman has been exploited just as much as the Pacific fisherman.

(Text):

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those bills which are becoming perennial and each time it is presented the minister is asked to make it applicable across the country, as the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) has just suggested, or the minister is asked to make the moratorium effective for a sufficiently long period of time to encompass all of the activities that are going on in the fishing industry of British Columbia because that is what the bill deals with.

The reason that the bill is before us arises from the fact that an inquiry was initiated consequent upon the statement of six citizens five or six years ago, and it is one of the very few inquiries that have been initiated in this way. In general the inquiry dealt with a price conspiracy in the fishing industry of British Columbia primarily with regard to sales on the export market. Last year there was an amendment to the Combines Investigation Act which provided that it was all right to engage in what we would call illegal conspiracies so far as the export field is concerned, and no sooner was the bill passed than the fisheries association of British Columbia issued a statement that parliament had now agreed that it had been proper for the fishing companies to engage in price conspiracies in past years. This, of course, is quite untrue.

The point is that by a series of legal manoeuvres involving applications for injunctions and so on—I understand the matter is now before the courts so perhaps we should not debate it too much—the inquiry that was started some five or six years ago has not even reached the stage of the restrictive trade practices commission holding hearings and the commission has not even progressed halfway toward making a report on its findings.

Like the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier), I think the situation is becoming more farcical all the time. I for one believe that when the Combines Investigation Act was amended by parliament last session the minister should have introduced amendments to those sections of the act which state in essence that it shall not apply to workmen who combine for their own protection, or whatever the phraseology is, to ensure that this sort of legal persecution was discontinued. As I say, this is one of those types of bills that are becoming perennial. We find ourselves in the position of not being able to do anything at the moment other than support it and in effect allow these associations to engage again in illegal activities with the sanction of a statute until the matter is cleared up. But I think it is a disgrace that delaying tactics of this sort can go on year after year and that parliament should find itself in the position of having to provide moratorium after moratorium year after year to allow the situation to continue. I wonder whether I might call it 10.30, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Churchill: If you would care to finish tonight, we are quite prepared to listen if the hon. member would like to continue for a few minutes.

An hon. Member: Ten thirty.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the house leader put on Hansard again the business he indicated for the rest of week so that it will be available to hon. members tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: We will carry on with legislative items tomorrow and Wednesday. First we will take any third readings that are available. Then we will take Bill No. C-97, an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code. The third item will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Justice dealing with the Judges Act and the Exchequer Court Act. The fourth item will be Bill No. C-99, an act to amend the Food and Drugs Act. The fifth item will be Bill No. C-100, an act to provide for the control of narcotic drugs. The sixth item will be Bill No. C-98, an act to amend the Canada Shipping Act. The seventh item will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce dealing with the Export Credits Insurance Act. Item No. 8 will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Agriculture with respect to the Farm Credit Act. Item No. 9 will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance with regard to amending the Financial Administration Act. That is for Tuesday and Wednesday. On Thursday we intend to commence with the estimates of the Department of National Defence. Depending on the progress that we make, we will consider the business for Friday and Saturday. I think it would be unwise to attempt to announce anything in addition to this at the moment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Last week the minister indicated that defence production would follow defence. Is that still the intention?

Mr. Churchill: Yes. Defence production will follow national defence.

It being thirty three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.N.R. GRANTS IN LIEU OF TAXES, MARITIME PROVINCES

Question No. 225—Mr. Creaghan:

1. How many urban municipalities in the maritime provinces are in receipt of grants, in lieu of taxes, from the Canadian National Railways?
2. What was the total amount of these grants in 1953, 1957, and 1960?
3. What are the names, and amounts in each case, of the urban municipalities in the maritime provinces whose grant in 1960 was in excess of $25,000?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Thirty three.

2. 1953, $147,096.74; 1957, $213,527.70; 1960, $283,943.24.

3. Cities of Moncton, Saint John, N.B. and Halifax, N.S.: $65,000, $59,000 and $84,882.37, respectively.

TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT SHIPS' CREWS

Question No. 242—Mr. McCleave:

1. What are the work hours per week and rates of pay of cooks and stewards serving aboard ships of the Department of Transport on the (a) east coast (b) west coast?
2. What are the work hours per week and rates of pay of crew, apart from cooks and stewards, serving aboard ships of the Department of Transport on the (a) east coast (b) west coast?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

1 (a) The standard work week for cooks and stewards on the east coast is 48 hours. The rates of pay vary depending on the size of the vessel (number of complement) and the area of operation. The rates of pay for cooks range from $221 to $314 per month. The rates of pay for stewards range from $205 to $321 per month.

(b) The standard work week for cooks and stewards on the west coast is 40 hours. The rates of pay vary depending on the size of the vessel (number of complement). The rates of pay for cooks range from $280 to $333 per month. The rates of pay for stewards range rom $274 to $339 per month.

2 (a) and (b) The standard work week for ships' crews, other than cooks and stewards, is 40 hours on both coasts, except for waiters on the east coast and their work week is 48 hours. The following is a list of classifications of ships' crews, other than cooks and stewards. Where there is a range of rates shown, the rates vary depending on the size of the vessel (number of complement) and area of operation:

Classification	Monthly rates of pay
	East coast	West coast
Boatswain	$238 to $279	$292
Boatswain's mate	248 to 257	284
Quartermaster	230 to 269	289
Leading seaman	248
Seaman	*200 to 237	279
Ship's clerk	231
Storekeeper	254
Boatswain's mate and gasman	248
Diesel operator	314
Carpenter	269 to 279	294
Oiler	218 to 272	292
Fireman	227 to 265	289
Dayman	235 to 243	285 to 289
Electrician	289	304
Electrical assistant	303
Donkeyman	279	294
Winchman	232 to 264	292 to 294
Deckhand	225	279
Waiter	200 to 237	253

* Paid $5 per month extra when performing stevedoring duties.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 6, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

EDUCATION CONFERENCE—ANNOUNCEMENT OF MEETING IN INDIA

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I wish to inform the house that at the invitation of the government of India the second commonwealth education conference will be held in New Delhi from January 11 to January 25, 1962. An announcement to this effect is being made today in the various commonwealth capitals and by the commonwealth education liaison committee in London, which is responsible for the co-ordination of the commonwealth education program.

Canada will, of course, accept the invitation of the government of India to attend the conference, and in due course the government will announce the composition of a representative delegation competent to contribute in a constructive manner to the success of the conference.

It will be recalled that the first commonwealth education conference was convened at Oxford, England, in July, 1959 following an initiative taken by Canada at the conference of commonwealth finance ministers in Montreal in September, 1958. The Oxford conference recommended that a second meeting should be held after an appropriate interval to examine in retrospect the general progress of the program and, in the light of experience gained in the first few years of its operation, to consider in what manner the arrangements for co-operation among the countries of the commonwealth could be improved.

The commonwealth scholarship and fellowship plan, which came into effective operation with the beginning of the scholastic year in September, 1960, has already made substantial progress toward its goal of having 1,000 students studying in various commonwealth countries at any one time, at an intake rate of 500 students per year; and it is expected that by the end of 1961 almost all commonwealth countries will have made or offered awards under the plan.

For the first year of the plan's operation 338 scholarships and three fellowships were awarded by all participating countries; of these, 281 scholarships and the three fellowships were in fact accepted. I am happy to be able to report that, in that period, from the total of 281 scholarships we in Canada have had the pleasure of receiving as our guests 101 commonwealth scholars from 25 different countries or areas of the commonwealth. I might add that they are very widely distributed, as follows: Australia, 9; Basutoland, 1; Bermuda, 1; British Guiana, 2; British Honduras, 1; Ceylon, 5; Fiji, 1; Ghana, 5; India, 14; Kenya, 3; Malaya, 2; Malta, 2; Mauritius, 2; New Zealand, 4; Nigeria, 2; Pakistan, 8; Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, 4; Sierra Leone, 1; Somaliland, 1; South Africa, 4; Tanganyika, 1; Uganda, 4; United Kingdom, 13; Singapore, 2; and the West Indies, 9. This autumn we shall be receiving approximately 115 additional commonwealth scholars, so that by the second year of the scheme's operation Canada will have well over 200 of these welcome visitors from across the seas.

The scholars from abroad have done very well in their studies in Canada, which is a tribute to the care exercised by the special nominating committees in their own countries and in Canada by a scholarship selection committee set up for this purpose. The Canadian universities which received the commonwealth scholars deserve a great deal of credit for their successful efforts.

In addition to the Canadian scholarship and fellowship program, significant advances have been made in the area of training and supplying teachers. Although the United Kingdom has carried the largest share of the responsibility in this particular respect, Canada has assisted both by sending teacher trainers to help in the development of teacher training institutions in other commonwealth countries and by receiving trainees to undertake teacher training courses in Canada. Arrangements also exist whereby Canada and other commonwealth countries which have the necessary facilities available send selected teachers and advisers from their own education services to fill key posts in countries where they are most required. By the end of 1960 Canada had sent abroad a total of 20 educators to assist in teaching and teacher training, and plans for significant expansion in this particular field of activity are well under way.

Another important area of co-operation in commonwealth education is that of technical education, where existing plans are being developed and expanded in accordance with the recommendations of the Oxford conference.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members of this house have listened with great interest to the minister's statement and the decision to have a second conference in Delhi, in that great Asian nation of India, is warmly welcomed. The promotion of further educational opportunity among students of the commonwealth provides an additional strengthening of the commonwealth and will afford the opportunity for further understanding and collaboration in a very important area of human endeavour.

We have listened with great interest to this statement which denotes progress in a matter which has so much to do not only with improving the standard of living, but also with the promotion of peace, through the processes of education and enlightenment.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am always heartened to hear of Canada's participation in commonwealth activities of this type, and am very pleased to know that Canada is sending delegates to the educational conference and is supporting wholeheartedly this educational program aimed to develop peace, reform and prosperity in all parts of the commonwealth.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister inform the house what steps have been taken and what progress has been made to implement the minister's announcement that $300,000 would be made available to the French speaking nations of Africa for educational and training programs?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the department is busy working out the details of this program. I cannot give any further information at the present time.

TRADE

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SALE TO POLAND

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house that the Canadian wheat board has concluded an agreement with the Polish national trade organization, Rolimpex, for the sale and purchase of approximately 100,000 tons of wheat, equivalent to 3.7 million bushels, for shipment this crop year.

[Mr. Green.]

The wheat has been purchased on a credit basis, and the Canadian government has authorized export credits insurance in order to facilitate this sale. The terms of repayment include 10 per cent cash and the balance as follows: one third payable two years from the date of shipment; one third payable two and one half years from date of shipment; one third payable three years from date of shipment.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture in relation to the announced sale of grain to Poland. I wonder whether the minister could use his good offices in suggesting to the Canadian wheat board that the bulk of these shipments go out through the port of Churchill, thereby allowing western farmers the additional 8 cents to 9 cents a bushel through saving which results from shipment through this port.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from the west I should like nothing better than what the hon. member suggests in his question. However, if he reads my announcement carefully he will find that this particular deal is for delivery in this crop year. It is physically impossible to take grain out of Churchill before the last week or so of July.

[Later:]

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture regarding the sale of wheat to Poland. The minister's announcement of the new sale will be of great interest to prairie grain growers. Can the minister inform the house whether the wheat to Poland will be shipped from eastern or western ports?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, this particular contract for the sale of wheat to the Polish government calls for shipment through the St. Lawrence ports.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF REVISION OF OIL AND GAS REGULATIONS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce revisions of the Canada oil and gas regulations applying to the north and to other lands under federal jurisdiction. These revisions are the result of a great deal of study and two years of discussions with the oil industry. In several important respects they represent a new approach to the handling of oil and gas rights in Canada. They are designed to provide a greater incentive for increased exploration in the north, and to establish a system under which oil and gas can be produced in the north at competitive prices. At the same time they assure returns to the crown commensurate with the value of this great resource.

The regulations have been divided into two basic divisions. The sections dealing with drilling and production have been segregated and grouped together under the title "Canada oil and gas drilling and production regulations". The sections dealing with land disposition have been grouped together under the title "Canada oil and gas land regulations". A number of changes have been made in this part of the regulations to meet the special circumstances of the north in regard to climate, difficulty of access, distance from supply bases, and distance from markets.

Some specific changes are as follows. Up until a year ago the length of a permit term in the north was uniformly nine years. A year ago it was extended to 12 years in the Arctic islands. In the new regulations, in the area between 65 degrees and 70 degrees north, the exploration permit term has been increased from nine to 10 years. This is in recognition of the difficulty of access and problems of exploration in that area. For the same reason, the exploration expenditure requirement on the whole of the mainland has been decreased as a result of experience in operations in this area in the past few years.

Under the former regulations a permittee on going to lease could select 50 per cent of his permit area in blocks of specified size. This provision is maintained, but a new option allows the permittee to select blocks of larger size up to 40 per cent of his permit area. This change is designed to give greater flexibility.

The requirement that crown reserve be disposed of by cash bonus bid only has been removed. The disadvantages of the cash bonus bids are now being recognized throughout the industry. Western Canadian oil is high cost oil, and part of the reason for this is the cash bonus bid system. That system was designed to maximize revenues to the crown in the most active stage of oil development in the west, and at that time was successful in doing so. However, it encourages overdrilling and closer spacing than is necessary; it requires a complicated prorationing system to ensure its continuity, and it encourages inefficient operation because of the diversification of interest in a field. In brief, it is now apparent that the cash bonus bid system if used exclusively in northern Canada would discourage exploration and place a burden on production in the north.

I expect to announce in the near future alternative methods of disposition of crown reserve which will lower the cost of producing oil in northern Canada by decreasing land costs to operators. The cash bonus bid system could be retained for use in appropriate circumstances. Other alternatives could include giving an option to a permittee on going to lease to retain the crown reserve on payment of a higher royalty. This would produce some of the advantages I have referred to, particularly in higher revenues to the crown. Detailed proposals are now under study by the industry, and I will await comments from them before making definite recommendations to the government.

Unit operation is, I think, the real key to the successful and economic development of northern oil and gas. Oil and gas pools are continuous underground and are not broken into fragmented land parcels. Pools can be most efficiently drained by their operation as single units. The method used in disposing of crown reserves must take into account the necessity of ensuring that no more wells are drilled than are necessary. I am confident this will be the key to lower cost northern oil.

As a further incentive to exploration in this remote area, royalty has been reduced from 12½ per cent to 10 per cent. Although this may not appear a significant reduction, it may prove an important factor in many areas of the north where the wellhead cost must be kept to the lowest possible figure. Other minor revisions have been made in the technical and administrative sections of the regulations for clarification and efficiency in administration.

I believe this revised policy establishes a sound legal framework for development of northern oil. The other major requirement, of course, is success in discovery of large oil and gas fields. With encouraging geology in many areas, there is every promise that the necessary reserves will be found. Under these two conditions I look forward with confidence to the development of northern Canada as a major oil and gas producing region. There should be no concern in western Canada regarding possible competition from northern oil. Prairie crude serves the interior continental markets. Northern oil will find its outlet in world markets, and it is for that reason that the achievement of competitive cost is essential to success.

Revision of Oil and Gas Regulations

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the announcement I have made deals with a very technical subject. Because of this I have endeavoured to make my exposition of the new policies of the government in non-technical language. For the benefit of those persons and companies directly and personally interested in northern oil I have prepared a statement giving in more technical language and in greater detail particulars of the new policies. These are available to members of the press. Should it be the wish of hon. members, I will be glad to table this additional statement at this time. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it could also be printed in Votes and Proceedings of the house.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the house will have listened with interest to the statement of the minister on this rather complicated subject. The statement covers a wide range, and I think it is probably more appropriate that it be studied carefully to see exactly what its implications are. There is no doubt about the fact that the oil and gas regulations as originally drafted and now in existence have been in need of revision, and I take it from the statement that there has been a rather extensive revision.

From listening to the minister I do not believe he said anything about the parts of the regulations having to do with the ownership and control of companies taking part in exploration. The regulations on that point as they now exist were the subject of a great deal of discussion back and forth, with some criticism and some favourable comment. I noted that the minister did not deal with that point in his statement and has not relieved our curiosity about it. I shall wait until I examine the regulations to see whether in fact the government has retreated from its so-called Canada first policy, or how the rights of Canadians have been dealt with in these new regulations. I would ask the minister to table his supplementary statement and have it printed, and I should also like to ask him whether the regulations themselves are now available in printed form.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as a member with little technical knowledge and no information with respect to natural gas and oiliness, I want to thank the minister for his informative announcement on this very important question. I cannot resist congratulating the minister again for following this practice. I trust that some of his colleagues will follow his example in the near future, and we shall await with interest the minister's influence on some other members of the cabinet with respect to the practice in the following of which he has set such an excellent example.

Mr. Dinsdale: Perhaps I might be permitted to make a supplementary statement respecting one point raised by the member for Ottawa West. I am happy to assure him that the Canadian participation features of the Canada gas and oil regulations have proved to be in the best interests of Canada, and on the basis of experience they stand in their original form.

Mr. Speaker: What document is it that the minister suggests be printed in Votes and Proceedings, both statements or just the first one?

Mr. Dinsdale: It is a supplementary statement providing greater technical detail for those who have a special interest in the subject.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that it is not too extensive. Is it the pleasure of the house that the supplementary statement referred to by the minister be printed in Votes and Proceedings?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether he has had any indication that any company or companies are interested in proceeding in the immediate future with drilling in the Arctic islands.

I should like to ask the minister another question. I wrote down very quickly his statement to the effect that if a permittee fails to live up to his exploration or drilling obligations he will forfeit his permit. I should like to ask the minister whether any thought has been given to granting himself discretionary power in this matter in the event that there are extenuating circumstances, the difficulty of access to the north and so on, and whether perhaps some provision should be made for extending the permit under certain conditions.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the first question I would say there is indication that there will be active drilling in the Canadian archipelago during the current year. I shall take the second question under consideration.

TRADE

QUOTAS ON EXPORTS TO CANADA—REPORTED STATEMENT BY JAPANESE AMBASSADOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question based on a reported statement by the ambassador of Japan, to the effect that Japan is becoming resentful over the need to fix quotas on its exports to Canada and that it was forced to accept curbs on exports under the threat that otherwise Canada would resort to such measures as the arbitrary fixation of value for customs purposes. Has the minister any comment to make on this statement?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I saw the report in this morning's press of the statements attributed to the Japanese ambassador in a speech made, I believe, in Regina yesterday. Some of these statements are, to say the least, somewhat surprising. The export restraints which the Japanese government is applying on certain exports to Canada in the year 1961 were set forth in a letter written to me by the Japanese ambassador and tabled by me in the house some weeks ago.

These restraints were accepted by the Japanese government, and the kind of statement attributed to the Japanese ambassador in the morning's press it seems to me, is not in harmony or in tone with the letter written to me in setting forth those restraints which the Japanese government is voluntarily applying in 1961 on these designated commodities. These decisions of the Japanese government, as the letter itself indicated, were arrived at by decision of the Japanese government and I think that is perfectly clear.

The whole problem here, as all hon. members are aware, is the degree of concentration of Japanese exports in certain commodities. The Canadian government at all times has indicated its belief that trade between these two countries must be on a two way basis. We look forward to the expansion of trade between the two countries, but not on the basis of continued concentration of Japanese exports in certain selected commodities. That is the position we have taken consistently. We welcome the expansion of trade between the two countries, but not when it takes the form of this concentration to the point where the conditions of competition which Canadian producers are called upon to meet are, in the view of most Canadians, not fair.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a report in the London Times of June 1 to the effect that several textile trade associations in Hong Kong have refused to attend a meeting called by the government of Hong Kong for the negotiation of voluntary export quotas until similar proposals from Canada have been considered? Would the minister advise the house exactly what proposals Canada has made to Hong Kong on the establishment of voluntary export quotas?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not seen the article in the London Times to which the hon. member refers. I have acquainted the house very fully, in my several reports over the past month or so, with the kind of proposals that were submitted to the Hong Kong authorities by the Canadian team that went to Hong Kong to discuss the question of their exports.

FIRES

ALBERTA—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE OF ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. The hon. member for Peace River and myself are very concerned about the serious forest fire situation in northwest Alberta. I should like to ask the minister whether he has received any request from the province of Alberta for assistance from the armed forces to help in fighting the serious forest fires in the Edson and Grande Prairie areas of Alberta.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, no request has been received from the province of Alberta for assistance in fighting these forest fires. Should such assistance be required, the procedure for obtaining it is simple. The premier or provincial authority authorized by him requests assistance from the G.O.C. western command or the commander, Alberta area. These officers have authority to comply with the request as far as their resources enable them to meet it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT—INQUIRY AS TO REVISION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour a question. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister seems to be anxious to have an adjournment of this house at the end of June, can the Minister of Labour say whether in that event amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act will be introduced before the end of June, or will we have to wait until the end of August or some time in the fall?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: No what?

Mr. Chevrier: No adjournment?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the reply "no", does that mean there will not be any amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act introduced?

Mr. Starr: Not necessarily.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I take it the answer is they may not be brought in.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—ADVERTISEMENT IN PARIS NEWSPAPERS FOR CITY PLANNERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works in view of a report in Le Devoir of June 5 to the effect that C.M.H.C. placed an advertisement for city planners in the Paris newspaper Figaro on May 18. Since this advertisement was entirely in English, would the minister care to inform the house whether C.M.H.C. was hoping to obtain only English speaking city planners in Paris?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, what we did want to obtain was a city planner who would be bilingual.

N.H.A.—REFERENCE TO SPEECH BY MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works based on a report in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of June 3. The article reads:

> Public works minister David J. Walker "missed the main point" of "repeatedly stated" municipal requests when he spoke Thursday to the national convention of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities, Mayor A. T. Alsbury of Vancouver said yesterday.

In view of this statement by the mayor I wonder whether the minister would consider tabling a copy of the text of his speech on that occasion.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Nipissing. I was just hoping that somebody would ask me to table it, and I would be delighted to do so. I have it here already. I must say I have a great debt of gratitude to express to the 700 municipal mayors and reeves at that convention. I have never had a better reception. Of course I complimented them on the magnificent work they are doing, and suggested there was a great field still waiting for them to take advantage of, with all the tremendous opportunities under the National Housing Act. I thank the hon. member.

An hon. Member: Is the minister going to table his congratulations?

Mr. Walker: Yes, I can table them as well.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES—ALLEGED INFILTRATION OF DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister undertake an inquiry into the allegation of Mr. John B. Witchell at a meeting in Toronto last night to the effect that the Department of National Defence is infiltrated with subversives?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a statement which does not display any degree of responsibility on the part of this ex-employee of the defence research board who is no longer with the department, for good and sufficient reason.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister assure the house that he has satisfied himself fully that there is no authenticity whatsoever in the allegation.

Mr. Harkness: The security precautions in the Department of National Defence, as I think the hon. member well knows—

Mr. Ricard: No, he does not know.

Mr. Harkness: —are pretty good. I think any allegations along this line cannot be taken seriously.

PETAWAWA—INQUIRY AS TO RESULTS OF INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister table the report of the inquiry into the establishment and operation of the Camp Petawawa yacht club?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have had a report on this for some time, which I will be very glad to read to the house if it is the desire that this should be done.

Mr. Hellyer: Just table it.

Mr. Harkness: I am quite prepared to table it—

Mr. McIlraith: That was the request.

Mr. Harkness: —or read it, if that is what is desired.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the minister how many pages there are in the report.

Mr. Harkness: About a page and three quarters, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: That is too much.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreeable that it be read?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I hear some dissenting voices. Perhaps the more advantageous course would be to table the report.

THE CENSUS

STATEMENT ON USE OF BILINGUAL FORMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Last Friday the hon. member for St. Henry asked me if I would not find it appropriate to give instructions immediately so that all census enumerators have English and French forms when they call at our homes.

In reply, I should like to say that several forms used by the enumerators are bilingual. As for the other forms, the enumerator receives forms in the language he speaks. However, every briefcase contains forms in the other language and the enumerator must use them when necessary. If his supply becomes exhausted, he is supposed to ask his commissioner to give him some more. We have clearly indicated to the commissioners that enumerators are to have forms in both languages at all times.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question in respect of the announcement he made last December of the setting up of a royal commission to inquire into the problem of medical care insurance, particularly. In view of the replies the Prime Minister has given me several times, the last being as late as a week ago, can he say whether he is now in a position to announce the remaining members of that commission, particularly in view of the recent request by the medical association?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): This matter has received very full consideration. We wanted to choose as the chairman someone with experience. We did that in the person of Chief Justice Hall, now the chief justice of Saskatchewan. In view of the fact that his appointment to the court of appeal, then anticipated, would require his presence in Saskatchewan, we delayed proceeding with the appointment of the other members. Now that his work is reasonably up to date so that he will be free, having everything in proper order so far as outstanding judgments are concerned, the appointments should be made at once.

I am most anxious to have these appointments made because there is in the province of Saskatchewan, as the hon. gentleman knows, a commission under the chairmanship of the former president of the University of Saskatchewan, Dr. Thompson. My understanding, at least from what I read in the press, is that the premier of Saskatchewan, Mr. Douglas, is very desirous of having a report from his commission considerably in advance of the report we shall expect of our commission. His purpose would be as soon as possible following that report to introduce a measure applicable to Saskatchewan as a jumping-off place in the competition which is shortly to take place between the hon. member for Assiniboia and himself.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Of course I have no comment to make on the last part of the right hon. gentleman's answer, but does the Prime Minister not think in the light of this experience, having announced the appointment of the commission over six months ago, it would have been better to select as chairman of the commission, notwithstanding the good qualities of the gentleman he has suggested, someone whose time would have permitted immediate attention to the assignment at hand?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know of no one in Canada more qualified for this task than Chief Justice Hall. His experience in connection with the Catholic hospital association and hospitals generally is such that we wanted to have him as chairman. I know that after he takes over, a report will be made even earlier than the hon. gentleman now hopes.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CARON—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "LA PRESSE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In an article published yesterday in the Montreal newspaper La Presse, signed by Mr. Alfred Ayotte, about practical bilingualism, are mentioned in addition to the Secretary of State (Mr. Dorion), L. J. Pigeon, Liberal M.P. and Alexis Caron, Conservative M.P. I can easily understand that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm may be flattered, but as far as I am concerned, I strenuously object to the epithet conservative being associated with my name.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I protest strenuously, even more so than the hon. member for Hull.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: It may be a question of privilege in ordinary parlance. It certainly does not affect the privileges of the house.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS

DR. CHAPUT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY DEFENCE MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I wonder whether the Minister of National Defence would bring us up to date on the case of Dr. Chaput.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): The case of Dr. Chaput is under consideration at the present time.

CRIMINAL CODE

REVISION OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEATH PENALTY

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-92, to amend the Criminal Code (capital murder).

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of speaking at length at this stage, but after the bill has been considered by the committee of the whole, I should like to make a few brief remarks.

This bill does not amend the definition of murder as found in sections 201 and 202 of the Criminal Code, but it divides it into two classes, capital and non-capital, according as the crime is planned and deliberate or not.

On second reading, I suggested that this definition, along with other provisions of this bill, constitutes in practice, if not in principle, an almost complete suppression of capital punishment. Besides, the remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on May 29 last, leave no doubt on that score. In fact, I shall now quote a few lines from the speech of the Prime Minister, as reported on page 5527 of Hansard. This is what he said then:

(Text):

I feel that responsibility for carrying out the law and maintaining the safety of the public in each area depends on the jury. Having heard the evidence and having come to the conclusion on the basis of the law as explained to them by the judge that a verdict of guilty is the only one they can bring in, a jury ought none the less to have the right to add a recommendation to mercy, and having done that, to hope that the royal prerogative will be reasonably carried out.

The Prime Minister went on to say further, and I quote from page 5528 of Hansard of May 29:

Responsibility now rests squarely upon the jury to determine in its area and on the particular facts of each case what is just and fair, what constitutes the proper course to be followed in the opinion of those who have heard all the evidence and live in the community in which they are desirous of maintaining justice and equity as between the crown and the subject.

These remarks and, indeed, the whole speech made by the Prime Minister leave no room for any other interpretation. I wish also to quote from an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of May 30, 1961, the first paragraph of which states:

Prime Minister John Diefenbaker indicated clearly today that recommendations for mercy by juries on behalf of murderers sentenced to death will almost always be accepted by the government.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I also want to read into the record the first paragraph of an article which appeared in the L'Action Catholique of Tuesday, May 30, under the following title:

The cabinet and the recommendations by the jury.

And I quote:

Prime Minister Diefenbaker stated yesterday that the federal cabinet would have to accept recommendations for clemency by the juries in murder cases.

Moreover, said the head of the government, the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General should be the only two people deciding whether a sentence should be commuted, and not the cabinet as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, when the matter was discussed in the committee of the whole, all hon. members tried, I think, to make this bill as practical and efficient as possible, while taking into consideration the upsurge in the incidence of crime in this country, and throughout North America.

I should point out that, following our studies and discussions on clause 1 and the resulting suggestions, significant amendments were submitted, several of which were accepted by the government, at the request of members of the official opposition, among whom the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh).

While discussing clause 2 we moved various amendments which the government thought it could not accept. Yet the fact of those amendments having been submitted indicates that the bill should be reconsidered so as to meet public opinion with regard to the death penalty.

Moreover, during the discussion of clause 13, we tried to convey to the government that this clause, in particular, was entirely devoid of practical sense.

We moved an amendment which was rejected. And I very respectfully submit that this clause introduces an innovation in our statutes. Hon. members are very much concerned with regard to that clause being passed. I, for my part, cannot accept it, because I think it absolutely impracticable; it will indeed put the jurors in an extremely awkward position and the judges in an impossible one.

I repeat what I said yesterday: when it is proved that a capital crime was committed, when the jury assumes its responsibilities in recognizing the accused guilty of the crime and at the same time decides to make a recommendation for mercy, the judge is placed in the ridiculous position of having to sentence the accused to death, whereas we know very well that, in most cases, the cabinet has the moral obligation of carrying out the jury's recommendation for clemency.

I therefore think that this clause should be reconsidered because it is lacking in realism and we have not every day the opportunity of discussing such a significant bill. Moreover, the minister knows, and the government should realize, that we are introducing new legislation in regard to such an exceptional and important issue as the death penalty.

Let us therefore make sure that any amendments we pass with regard to our statutes are of a practical nature.

Mr. Speaker, the bill has certainly been improved following discussion in the committee of the whole, but it has not yet been tested by experts in criminal law and I would remind the Minister of Justice that when, in the United Kingdom, it was thought proper to amend the law with regard to the death penalty, it was done with the greatest of care. Amendments were introduced only after thorough and searching studies had been completed by experts.

As the minister is aware, the Gower commission was established in 1949, its final report was submitted in 1953 and it is only in 1957, after further studies, that the 1957 homicide act was passed by parliament in London.

In this country, the government has introduced this bill which, as I have already said, is not based on conclusions arrived at by a committee of experts. I do not question the knowledge of the Minister of Justice and his advisers in this matter, but, with all due respect, I must say that these advisers seem to be lacking that direct court experience which would enable them to express an opinion on the major clauses which represent a new law and to tell us whether these clauses would have any practical value before a court under existing procedures.

Mr. Speaker, for these reasons, I submit that the bill should be given further consideration and, supported by the hon. member for Megantic—

(Text):

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge):

That Bill No. C-92 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred to a special committee for the purpose of further study and examination and that such selected committee shall have the power to send for persons, papers, and things.

(Translation):

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support the amendment just put forward by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) on third reading of this bill.

I should like to make a few general remarks to explain why I support the amendment.

On second reading, according to Hansard, at least 30 hon. members spoke in the debate, including the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), thus enabling us all to benefit from their experience.

When the bill was considered by the committee of the whole, many hon. members commented on practically every single clause. Even the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) deemed it fitting, following the speech of the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Pearson) to refer to his own experience.

Personally, on section 1, I twice urged the minister and the government to allow the bill to be referred to a special committee, which could hear experts on criminal law, people who have practised in criminal courts.

I now paraphrase what I had to say at the time: We are here as a group of legislators, and I think we should use every means provided by parliamentary procedure to gain more information on this proposal.

Division

When the bill was considered in committee, a number of amendments were put forward, even by members on the government side. I refer particularly to the member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Johnson) who suggested an amendment to section 2.

The amendments to section 1, both in the English and French versions, were accepted by the government.

At least two amendments were put forward concerning clause 2 and another one concerning clause 13.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the proposed amendments indicate that there is still some doubt in the minds of hon. members and it would be advisable, I think, that this bill in its present form be referred to a special committee of this house.

One of the main objections of the minister against referring this bill to a committee of this house is that such procedure would delay the adoption of the bill. It is true that such procedure would cause some delay.

However, I do not believe that any prejudice would result for those who are to be judged under the present Criminal Code.

Indeed, the experience of these last three years indicates that the government or the governor general in council, exercising the royal prerogative has commuted, I think, some 40 death penalties to life imprisonment.

If while the bill is being studied by a special committee any case arose under the Criminal Code, nothing would prevent the governor general in council from exercising the royal prerogative once again.

For all those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I support the motion put forward by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont.

[Mr. Roberge.]

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. The question is on the main motion.

(Translation):

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, even though the bill was considerably improved due to the suggestions of the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) which were accepted by the minister, I feel that it could certainly stand further improvement so as to be acceptable to those who are against the abolition or reduction of punishment in capital cases. And I am entirely opposed to the abolition of capital punishment. As I said on second reading, where the issue was the principle of the bill, I feel that clause 13 which puts the jury in an extremely difficult situation is a clause which in my opinion tends to cover the minister who seems inclined to abolish capital punishment indirectly.

I suggest that it would be very difficult under such a procedure to find a jury who, faced by the accused, the defence counsel, a family in tears, would be ready to answer: "No", when the judge would put the question: "Are you prepared to recommend mercy?" Moreover, as the Prime Minister said, we know that it would be necessary and practically justifiable for the cabinet to take into account the recommendation for mercy when taking a decision.

Consequently, this is an indirect and practically inevitable way of abolishing capital punishment. Now, I feel we should maintain capital punishment. In my opinion, if the cabinet wanted to abolish it, they should have had the courage of saying plainly: "We want capital punishment to be abolished." Then, at least, we would have known what was the cabinet's position on that question. Under this bill which may otherwise contain very good sections, people who do not have the proper legal training to pass on this matter, will be forced to give the government an indirect means of abolishing capital punishment. If the minister had really wanted to be of service, if he had really wanted to improve his bill, he could have accepted the suggestion which was made to him, namely to compel the judge to say to the jury before they file out to deliberate: "You have the right to recommend or not to recommend mercy for the accused." But that would not have been said in front of the people who usually attend a murder trial, those people who are curious to see how the trial will turn out. The jury would thus have been able to deliberate freely in its private quarters without being influenced by the people around them; we would then have been able to say that the jury's recommendation was based on facts, on a thorough examination, that it has not been brought about by the embarrassment caused to them by the judge asking that question in the presence of the audience.

Because of that and because of the fact that, in my opinion, too much consideration is being shown to a handful of criminals at the expense of the vast number of honest people whom we must protect, I will vote against the bill.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am afraid I must inform the minister that he is considered as having spoken, having moved the third reading. Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is the following:

Mr. Fulton, seconded by Mr. Churchill, moves that Bill No. C-92, an act to amend the Criminal Code (capital murder), be now read a third time and do pass.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Adopted on division.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, will you please ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT AND CRIMINAL CODE

EXTENSION OF MORATORIUM RESPECTING B.C. FISHING INDUSTRY

The house resumed, from Monday, June 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fulton for the second reading of Bill No. C-97, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Chown in the chair.

On clause 1—Application of acts to fishing agreements.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister whether he can inform the committee as to the present state of legal proceedings in this regard, and in which courts they are being dealt with.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I regret that I do not have the precise information with me in sufficient detail to enable me to inform the committee as to the status of the injunction applications. I could get that information during the lunch hour and provide it for the hon. member if he wishes.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, perhaps that would be agreeable, and in the event that no other hon. member wishes to speak at this time we could call it one o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Chown): Is it the committee's wish to call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day, or at the next sitting, as the case may be?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

THE LATE WILLIAM ANDERSON

TRIBUTES ON DEATH OF MEMBER FOR WATERLOO SOUTH

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, once again while the house has been in session one of our members has passed away. This morning he was about ready to attend the session when he became suddenly ill. He was taken to hospital, where he passed away.

I refer, of course, to William Anderson, a deeply beloved member of this house. He served in the city council of Galt for a period of 12 years before becoming mayor, a position which he occupied for three years. I do not know anyone of whom it could be said in a truer sense than our late friend, that amid all the vicissitudes and thrusts of parliament he enjoyed to a great extent the affection of members in all parts of the house.

Many there are who know of the work he did in helping others. I think of his work in connection with the Red Cross, the contributions as blood donor that he made to that institution, unostentatiously and as silently as he did many other kind deeds. In other fields of endeavour, too, it can be said of him that he loved to serve others. He was on three committees of the house, research, estimates and miscellaneous private bills. He gave devotedly of his best to the service of his constituents, his province and his country. To his widow, his daughter Jean Elizabeth and his son Donald William I express a deep sense of personal sorrow at his passing.

After hon. gentlemen opposite have paid their tributes I intend to suggest, if the house is agreeable, that we adjourn this afternoon until 7.30 this evening. By our adjournment we will reveal in a tangible way something of the feelings that are ours and at the same time we do that which he would have expected us to do, namely carry on our responsibilities.

Again, sir, through you, I extend the sympathy not only of ladies and gentlemen on this side of the house but I know of all sections of this chamber.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, in the passing of Mr. William Anderson the House of Commons mourns yet another of its members who had contributed in more ways than one to the public life of his country. He was the mayor of his city, the representative of a constituency that was highly industrialized, which he represented in this house not only with competence but certainly with faithfulness and loyalty to his constituents.

It is not always easy, sir, to represent a constituency such as that which the hon. member served so faithfully and well from the time he was elected. We on this side of the house feel particularly for the Prime Minister and the members of his party on this occasion. We have been told that not only did this member work hard but that he had driven the whole of last evening and into the night on his way back to perform his duties in the house. There is no doubt that this, along with the other many duties that he performed in the house and elsewhere, took a toll on his physical capacities. There is also the fact that here goes another young man, because relatively speaking he was still a man of youthful age and one who would unquestionably have performed many more tasks for his country.

We join with you, sir, in expressing to your party our deep condolences. To his bereaved widow and his two children go our profound sympathy.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, members of this group join with the Prime Minister, the hon. member for Laurier and all members of the house in expressing our sincere sympathy for this sad and unexpected event. I must say on this sad and in this case quite unexpected occasion words are completely inadequate to express the deep feelings of us all. All in this group extend to his widow and children our most sincere sympathy and trust, Mr. Speaker, that they will find some comfort in the knowledge that he will be long remembered by many people as a colleague, as a friend, as a neighbour and as one given to good works for others and his community.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Perhaps in this sad moment I might be permitted to say a word. I suppose I knew the late William Anderson perhaps longer than any member of the house. We were natives of the city of Galt. He had been a student of my father at the Galt Collegiate Institute years ago, and there was a very warm bond of friendship between his family and mine and between him and me personally.

I think we are all numbed by the shock of this sad news that has come to us. The hand of death has been laid upon him with great suddenness and with no warning.

On an occasion of this kind, Mr. Speaker, I know it is superfluous to attempt to convey those deepest feelings that such an experience stirs; but I think it can be said of William Anderson that he had won the wholesome regard and complete respect of all members of the house, just as in his own community he enjoyed the widest measure of respect and regard. He had won these rewards by his own native qualities. He was a completely unselfish man. He was unassuming. He had a great desire to be of service to others. This characterized not only the service that he rendered in the municipal sphere and in parliament but all his contacts with other people. There are many people who will be able to testify to a host of personal kindnesses rendered to them and to others within their knowledge by the late William Anderson, a kindly man to the roots of his being. We mourn the passing of one of God's gentlemen.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to take a few minutes to say a few words about the late Bill Anderson, whom it was my pleasure to know most intimately for some years. Our ridings adjoin one another. During our last session we roomed together, and I got to know Bill possibly better than others may have. I always found him a most beloved and respected friend, and I am sure I speak for all those in the house when I say just that.

Bill was very well known in his area of Galt and Waterloo South. He rendered great service to that community. He was most interested in the work with retarded children, so much so that the first school in Canada for retarded children was built in Galt. That school bears the name, "The William Anderson School for Retarded Children", and it will be there for years to come as a tribute to the memory of this great and noble public servant.

I should like at this time to express my feelings of sorrow to his wife Jean, his daughter Betty and his son Don, and I can do no better than to use the words of the author who once said, "The light he leaves behind shines upon the path of men".

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on the record some remarks made by our beloved friend, William Anderson, in the restaurant only this morning. He left his home at eleven o'clock last night and arrived in Ottawa at five o'clock this morning, and in the restaurant he said he had driven all night in order that he might be here for the opening of today's session. He mentioned that he had only missed four of the 58 votes that have been taken in the house, and I am sure we shall all say that this is an amazing record of faithful service.

I knew Bill Anderson well because he occupied the room in this building next to mine and our relationships were always excellent. He often came into my room to tell a story, and his stories were always appropriate and fitted the point he was trying to make. The devotion to duty and hard work of Bill Anderson for the constituency he represented are undoubtedly responsible for his passing today. Bill Anderson died because he used a drug, and the drug he used was hard work. To his widow and his children whom he has left behind go my deepest and most sincere sympathy.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, every member of the house has reason to feel a deep personal loss in the passing of the hon. member for Waterloo South. As his seatmate during the twenty-third parliament and during the first three sessions of the current parliament, I feel I must add my words to those that have already been spoken. I know that every member of the house without exception will long remember Bill Anderson.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, shall we now rise until 7.30 this evening?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the house shall stand recessed in tribute to the late William Anderson until 7.30 this evening?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 2.50 p.m. the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 7.30 p.m.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT AND CRIMINAL CODE

EXTENSION OF MORATORIUM RESPECTING B.C. FISHING INDUSTRY

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-97, to amend an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act and Criminal Code.

On clause 1—Application of acts to fishing agreements.

Mr. Fulton: I think I should put on the record the answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Skeena. There were five actions for injunction dismissed in British Columbia, and it is expected that the companies will appeal. There is one interim injunction outstanding prohibiting a public hearing, and we hope to have this disposed of before the end of June. In Ontario, a permanent injunction was granted by Mr. Justice Parker on May 30, 1961, against the chairman and director prohibiting disclosure of transcripts and documents to the union.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time, now?

Mr. Fulton: By leave of the house?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Next sitting.

JUDGES ACT AND EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

AMENDMENTS PROVIDING FOR APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL JUDGES

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Judges Act and the Exchequer Court Act, to provide one additional puisne judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada and to provide salaries for such additional judge of the exchequer court, for two additional puisne judges of the Superior Court of Quebec, for one additional judge of the Court of Appeal for British Columbia, for two additional Ontario county court judges and for one additional Alberta district court judge.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Fulton: I think this resolution is self-explanatory. There is a need for the judges for whom we are asking the committee to provide the salaries in the provinces which are affected, namely, British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario and Quebec, as well as for the Exchequer Court of Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Meunier: Mr. Chairman, this resolution provides for the appointment of one judge to the Exchequer Court of Canada, of one judge to the court of appeal for British Columbia, of two county court judges for Ontario, of one district court judge for Alberta and of two puisne judges to the superior court of Quebec.

I should like to deal only with the appointment the minister intends to make to the superior court of Quebec. Last year, the minister introduced legislation in the house to amend the Judges Act. At that time, the province of Quebec requested six judges. However, the minister saw fit then to appoint only four, one for the district of Three Rivers, and three for the district of Montreal. In addition, when he was asked why he was not appointing six judges immediately, he stated then, as reported in Hansard for June, 21, 1960, that under an agreement with the Quebec administration of the day, he had been told, and I quote:

—they have agreed that the provision of three extra judges at this time, as soon as we can do it, will be a real contribution toward meeting that need. Therefore, there is no quarrel between us on this point.

Later on, while the bill was given first reading, the minister said that, although he was no expert, he felt he had grounds for appointing only three judges for the time being. He added that the matter had been discussed with the former government and that three judges were sufficient at the moment.

It is a fact, however, that the Montreal district has a tremendous backlog of cases, and that the appointment of additional judges would permit disposing of them. The minister added that a committee would be set up to revise the code of civil procedure and that any resulting amendments would facilitate the introduction of cases and consequently would speed up the hearing of trials. He admitted he was no expert in those fields, Nevertheless, he pointed out how complicated the code of procedure was, that no change had been made since 1867 and that certain motions took all the judges' time. I disagree with him on this point because I know that there is never more than one judge per week to preside over those incidental procedure hearings.

He mentioned among other reasons that there was no accommodation for the judges, no rooms for hearings and no offices where the judges could do their work.

What I am trying to tell the minister is that the situation in Montreal has not improved. If anything, the situation has worsened, since space is even scarcer. After all you cannot expect a judge to hold hearings in a hallway. A judge cannot hold court or render judgment in a corridor. There is no accommodation at present in the court house. Will some be provided? I don't know. What I do know is that in provincial courts the number of judges has been increased, but no accommodation has been provided for them. Consequently, there is little room to accommodate other judges.

Here is, then, the question I should like to ask the minister: since the provinces themselves look after the administration of justice, has the minister come to any agreement with Quebec government authorities to appoint those two judges, in order that accommodation and court rooms be provided for them?

That is the only remark I had to make to the minister about what he said last year to explain why he had not, at that time, appointed the two judges he was asked to appoint.

(Text):

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make just a few comments on this resolution with particular reference to the exchequer court. Just recently I had drawn very forcibly to my attention the situation with regard to the shortage of judges in the exchequer court. Obviously I am very much in favour of this resolution which would add a judge to that court and give them at least a chance to catch up on the large backlog of work which has accumulated.

The situation which was drawn to my attention related to a very unfortunate case in which the plaintiff was severely injured in an accident. I am not going to go into the facts except to say that the parties have been waiting for about 14 months now, in very difficult circumstances, for a decision from the exchequer court. This has caused a great deal of hardship, because regardless of which way the decision goes the parties could have prepared themselves or done something toward remedying the situation. This long wait is another example of the old maxim of "justice delayed is justice denied" and I certainly approve of the resolution.

While making inquiries about this matter I was also advised that the exchequer court now makes a practice of reserving judgment in all cases and then delivering a written judgment. I am not sure whether this is a practice or a policy, but it seems to have grown up and appears to be causing a great backlog in the amount of work that is accumulating in the exchequer court. I am hopeful that the appointment of an additional judge will strengthen the court and will mean they will be able to deal more more expeditiously with the work that comes before them.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, as a practising lawyer I would most certainly support a resolution to increase the number of judges of any court, but I should like to address myself for a moment to the appointment of judges in the district of Montreal in the province of Quebec.

As the minister no doubt knows, our roll in the district of Montreal is running very far behind schedule. I think after a case is finally inscribed for trial one can anticipate a wait of from 12 to 18 months, and one is fortunate if it is reached and comes to trial within an 18 months period. This is the situation despite the fact that the chief justice of the district of Montreal is doing a Herculean job in trying to expedite the work before the courts.

I wonder, also, whether the minister has given any consideration to the level of remuneration for the judges of these courts. We do not hear complaints from judges directly, but I think the men at the bar feel the judges of the superior court of Montreal, and indeed other courts, are not being sufficiently remunerated by the stipend they are receiving. Out of this stipend judges are called upon to pay the regular income tax and the other expenditures which are involved in maintaining their station in life and their method of living in order to maintain the dignity of their office.

I think this is a matter which should receive the minister's attention. I do not doubt that this question does receive the attention of the minister, but we would like to ask the minister to give further consideration to augmenting the stipends of the judges of the province of Quebec. We genuinely feel, when we consider what some practising lawyers earn—

The Chairman: Order. I must indicate to the hon. member that I had no objection when he mentioned in passing the problem of the salaries of judges. However, this resolution has nothing to do with that matter, and we might become involved in quite a long debate if the hon. member were to go into too many details on that subject.

Mr. Crestohl: Certainly, Mr. Chairman, I was only making reference to this question in passing because we are talking about appointing judges—that is what we are really discussing—and therefore we want competent men. I think the question of stipends certainly plays an indirect role in this question.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Papineau when he mentioned the problem of space for our courts. I think the minister is familiar with the fact that there is very active agitation for the erection of a new superior court building in the district of Montreal. Perhaps the chairman will say I am out of order on this point, but I do not think I am out of order because we do want places in which these judges can sit after their appointment in accordance with the recommendation of the minister in this resolution.

Unless we have the space and courts in the province of Quebec in which they can sit, hear their cases and administer justice, there is no point in appointing them. As the hon. member for Papineau said, they cannot sit in the corridors. However, we are so pitifully crowded in the superior court in the district of Montreal that if I were the minister I would hesitate to recommend the appointment of new judges until I had first solved the problem of where they were to sit. Unless some auxiliary premises are found, this problem will certainly not be solved.

I just wanted to draw these matters to the minister's attention. I know he is very alert to all these situations. Perhaps the minister could say a word about the question of stipends and the places in which the judges can sit and hear their cases.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I rise to express our support for this resolution. While I will not say the minister's judgment is perfect in some spheres of activity, I know he is a very competent member of the legal profession and I presume he has not introduced this resolution without knowing all the circumstances and the necessity for the appointment of these additional judges.

I presume it is safe to say that the necessity for the appointment of additional judges is a sign of our increased population and increased activity in our development, which naturally cause greater activity in the courts, human beings being what they are.

I note there is to be one additional judge appointed to the appeal court of British Columbia. I am going to stay strictly in order; I am not going to deal with judges' salaries because I do not have to plead in front of judges.

An hon. Member: Were you ever a defendant?

Mr. Herridge: No, I have never appeared before a judge either as plaintiff or defendant. The highest court with which I have ever had any experience was a local magistrate's court, a kangaroo court as a matter of fact.

I notice there is a provision for an additional appeal court judge in British Columbia. No doubt this is necessary, but I should like the minister because of the ignorance of persons like myself with respect to these matters, to tell the committee upon what information he bases his decision to provide for the appointment of another judge; what is the source of his information and how does he reach the conclusion that the services of this judge, and other judges are required?

I note the restlessness of a number of legal gentlemen who are waiting for an opportunity to extol the virtues of judges and the necessity for an increase in their numbers, so as an ordinary farmer I shall take my seat.

(Translation):

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add only a few words to say that the lawyers in Quebec city will be jealous of those in Montreal because the latter will benefit from the appointment of two additional judges to the superior court.

I should like, at the risk of being out of order for a minute, to support the suggestions of the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) lest the judges whose ability and talent are recognized be forced to resign and return to private law practice. Indeed, we should seriously think of increasing the judges' salaries. These last few years there has been a periodical increase in the number of judges of the superior court of Quebec. In my opinion the time has come to reconsider the whole system and to make a serious and thorough inquiry into the need for judges in the province of Quebec.

Recourse to a court of law is a right which belongs to the citizens and this right becomes almost illusive because the litigants suffer absolutely uncontrollable but always extremely long delays in the settlement of law procedures.

The hon. member for Cartier said a moment ago that in the district of Montreal it takes from 12 to 13 months for a case to come to court, and one is fortunate if it is reached within that time. In rural districts, the delays are usually from two to three years. I have in mind a case where proceedings were launched in 1955 and, despite all the diligence of the attorneys, the case was not heard before 1960, and the judge was so overloaded with work that the decision itself meant a delay of several more months. In short, people who take legal proceedings often find themselves deprived of their rights.

That is why I would ask the Minister of Justice that, when he considers the appointment of two judges to the superior court for the district of Montreal, he re-examine the whole judicial system by having the attorneys general analyse the needs of the province in that field and the prejudice suffered by the parties to a court action, when they have to wait years before their case is settled. Very often, major witnesses are dead or, more important still, have forgotten most important points; finally genuine rights are lost through such delays.

Consequently, this suggestion would be interesting, in my opinion, if the hon. Minister of Justice were willing to ask the attorneys general to reconsider the whole judicial system so that we may have, in each district, a sufficient number of judges and so that the citizens' right of appeal to the courts be not only an illusion but a right they can use with much more confidence than at present.

(Text):

Mr. Forgie: I support the resolution but I should like the minister to tell the committee what is to be expected of the two county court judges who are to be appointed to the province of Ontario. Are they to be travelling troubadours to relieve other judges who may be hard pressed?

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I may travel from west to east, as it were, in replying to the various comments which have been made. The hon. member for Kootenay West asked me on what basis I arrived at a decision to ask parliament to provide an extra salary for an additional judge of the court of appeal of British Columbia. As long ago as 1956, I think, the legislature of British Columbia passed legislation providing for the appointment of additional judges to the court of appeal of that province. When we took office in 1957 I discussed the question with the attorney general and with the chief justice of the court and was advised that there was no pressing need for an appointment to be made then. From time to time since then I have noted that the court of appeal has got behind in its work. Then it caught up again, and the pressure of the work grew once more. I have been keeping a close watch on the situation because in recent months the work of the court of appeal has increased considerably in British Columbia and it is a fact that they are behind in their lists.

In addition it must be borne in mind that last year by an amendment to the appropriate act we provided that the judges of the court of appeal of British Columbia will be judges of the court of appeal of the Yukon. Previously the court of appeal of British Columbia was the court of appeal of the Yukon. Litigants from the Yukon had to travel south to Vancouver or Victoria to have their appeals heard. Now we have constituted a court of appeal for the Yukon itself and a judge from the court of appeal from British Columbia goes to the Yukon territory and, together with other judges, forms the court of appeal in that territory. This means that from time to time a judge of the court of appeal of British Columbia will be out of the province. For this reason, plus the normal increase in litigation, plus the desire of the court to sit at all times in two banks it has seemed appropriate now to allow for a salary to provide for the appointment of an extra judge.

No one here has raised a question in connection with Alberta for which province we are asking a salary for an additional district court judge. However, I can assure hon. members of the committee that I have heard from the attorney general and from the chief judge of the northern judicial district and am satisfied there is good reason for asking provision for this additional appointment.

With respect to Ontario we are asking for provision of salaries for two additional county court judges. I have heard from the attorney general of Ontario by letter and I have also had discussions with him and I am satisfied that there is a present need for two additional judges of the county court. I am sure hon. members will appreciate that in the province of Ontario, widespread as it is, with many counties and districts served by county and district court judges, a situation frequently prevails when a judge in one district falls ill and is unable to discharge his duties. This means that judges from another district have to be sent in and that district, in turn, is left short of judges to serve it. An experiment has been tried recently under the authority of legislation in Ontario of appointing a judge at large, a judge to serve all the districts and counties of Ontario. Judge Wilmott is a judge who is doing that work now and I am informed that this is a signal service to the county and district courts of Ontario. This enables counties which would otherwise be very much behind with the work to receive services they would otherwise not receive.

The request I have received from the attorney general of Ontario is that, if this parliament should authorize salaries to pay two additional district court judges, they would be appointed to the district courts of Ontario.

With respect to the province of Quebec, the hon. member for Papineau reminded us of the discussion last week during which time the government of that province had provided for the positions of five extra judges of the superior court in the Montreal district. We appointed three at that time for reasons which I gave, and which my hon. friend summarized. I suggested that we would keep up with the situation in order to see whether the appointment of these three judges was sufficient to make reasonable progress in reducing the backlog of cases. I am informed by the chief justice that the backlog is as serious as ever. It seems, therefore, to be appropriate now to make provisions for the salaries allowing the appointment of two more judges.

I am fully aware of the accommodation problem in the Montreal courthouse, and can only remind my hon. friend that this is a problem for the provincial government. That government is responsible for providing courthouse facilities where the judges who hold court will sit. My understanding is that a statement has been made that a new courthouse will be provided in Montreal. It does seem to me, therefore, appropriate at this time to provide salaries for the paying of two extra judges. If in fact there is no physical accommodation for them provided, we do not need to appoint them. However, at the first moment accommodation is made available they could be appointed, but to do so we will have to provide for the payment of their salaries, and it seems appropriate to do so at this time. I do not suggest that one or the other could physically be accommodated at this time because judges are very often away from their home districts on other duties. However, I am fully aware of and in agreement with the suggestion made by my hon. friend that physical facilities which exist at this time are far from adequate. I repeat, I do feel that provision should be made now so that the appointments can be made at the first appropriate and convenient time.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fulton thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-104, to amend the Judges Act and the Exchequer Court Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Fulton moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, is the bill ready for distribution?

Mr. Fulton: The bill is printed, but whether or not it is in the hands of the Clerk for distribution, I am not aware. I have copies here which I can send to my hon. friends in the event that it is not available.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I think we should all have copies of the bill. It has not been distributed generally and although I have a copy, I think other members of this committee should also have copies.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am, of course, in the hands of the committee, and if there is any objection to proceeding in committee at this time I should not protest.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any objection to proceeding at this time, but I think it advisable if we do to have copies available to all members. In respect of a matter of this importance, all members should have the opportunity of studying the bill and I would suggest we proceed with it tomorrow.

Mr. Fulton: I think copies are available now for distribution.

The Chairman: I have copies available now if this committee wishes to proceed.

Mr. Chevrier: I suggest we should not proceed unless copies are available to all members. Otherwise, I suggest we proceed tomorrow.

Mr. Drysdale: It is not a very complicated bill. Do you not want to see more judges in Quebec?

An hon. Member: We should like to see more judges in British Columbia.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, if the bill is not available for distribution I suggest it would not be appropriate to proceed.

Progress reported.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTROL OF BARBITURATES

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-99, to amend the Food and Drugs Act—Mr. Monteith (Perth)—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Exports.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, I have read with much interest the articles appearing in the newspapers in respect of this proposed legislation and am very pleased to see that something is going to be done now in regard to this situation, the problem having been brought to the attention of this house over a period of three years.

I understand from newspaper articles which I have read that the mayor of Montreal has made certain recommendations to the Department of National Health and Welfare which appear to be incorporated in this legislation. The article to which I refer states that a government source has said that the mayor of Montreal and a delegation from that city expressed complete satisfaction with the—

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I indicated our consideration of clause 1 of the bill has been concluded except in respect of section 33, which deals with the procedure in respect of prosecution for possession, and section 34 (2). Therefore, it seems to me that the hon. member in dealing with general considerations is out of order, unless he can relate his remarks to those specific portions of the bill.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, may I humbly suggest that there is only one clause of importance in this bill. This bill has to do with sections 30, 31, 32, and so forth of the Food and Drugs Act, but there is only one item involved. Therefore, I cannot deal with the others.

The Chairman: I must indicate to the hon. member that the committee agreed we would proceed and consider the clauses one by one, and that the discussion would be relevant to each individual clause having to do with a particular section of the act. As indicated, we have passed sections 30, 31, 32, 35, and so forth. We now come to sections 33 and 34(2) which were allowed to stand at the last committee meeting. They are the only ones which are left for consideration by the committee. It seems to me that the discussion should be strictly relevant to these sections.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, if I cannot go on as I suggest may I respectfully ask that the report of the Montreal committee which contains the opinions of some of the outstanding social workers, police authorities, medical health officers, educators, doctors, lawyers, pharmacists, criminologists and vocational guidance people be read into the record. If this cannot be done, I should like to suggest that it be made an appendix to today's Hansard, because it is a report by leading authorities.

The Chairman: By leave of the committee the hon. member could do that, but I might indicate to him that when the bill is considered for third reading maybe the occasion would present itself when he could make his comments.

Mr. Deschatelets: May I say a word on the suggestion of the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean. The report he mentions is a very important one. It answers many questions that have been put by members on both sides of the house on the technical aspects of the problem. I would think that it would be a great help at this time if this report were made an appendix to Hansard, so that before the third reading of the bill hon. members could have a look at it. It would be of great interest to all hon. members and I ask the minister to agree to the suggestion.

Mr. Herridge: On this point, Mr. Chairman, I have only respect and admiration for the work done by the hon. member in promoting the necessity for this type of legislation, but this is rather a lengthy looking report. I think it would create a rather bad precedent to make it an appendix to Hansard. I think your suggestion was a good one, Mr. Chairman, that on third reading the hon. member would have the opportunity in the time allowed to put a substantive part of the report on the record and make his comments at the same time. This would be very useful because the hon. member has had a great deal of experience with this matter and understands the problem much more than some of us who come from the country.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, if I may say a word at this time, I am inclined to agree with the observations of the hon. member for Kootenay West. This is not a report of a committee of the house; it is a report of a body which met in Montreal to consider this problem. I realize its full import, and so on. It has been suggested that if the hon. member wishes to speak on third reading of the bill he might have something to say which he did not say in the previous discussion of the bill.

I should like to point out that we undertook to consider the bill clause by clause, if my recollection is correct, at the request of one of the members of the opposition. Consequently, I think we should stick to the order which was suggested and which was indicated would be the best way to proceed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When we were discussing this bill last week, and particularly section 33, the Minister of Justice was not in the house; he was away on business elsewhere. The Solicitor General was associated with the Minister of National Health and Welfare in piloting the bill through the house. At that time I raised a point in connection with section 33 and subsection 2 of section 34. I suggested that a careful examination of those two sections, and particularly the one with which we are now concerned, might indicate that there was a violation of the bill of rights. I pointed out that under section 2 (f) of the bill of rights provision was made for the retention of the presumption of innocence, a common law right that has been extant for many centuries. The Minister of Justice will recall that it was largely as a result of the initiative taken by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont that in the committee on the bill of rights it was agreed that there should be included in the bill a formal declaration preserving the presumption of innocence principle which has been part of our common law tradition.

I also pointed out last week in the absence of the Minister of Justice that if there was justification for the contention that section 33 did violate the bill of rights, the Minister of Justice owed the committee an explanation because under section 3 of the bill of rights the minister is under obligation to examine every proposed regulation submitted in draft form to the Clerk of the Privy Council in order to ascertain whether any of the paragraphs thereof are inconsistent with the purposes of the bill. If our contention with regard to section 34 is not a valid one, then the minister of course does not appear to have violated section 3 of the bill of rights, but we are strongly of the view that the section as drawn does violate paragraph (f) of section 2 of the bill of rights.

As the minister was not here, I repeat the argument. Section 33 does provide in (1) that:

If the accused does not plead guilty, the trial shall proceed as if the issue to be tried is whether the accused was in possession of a controlled drug.

That is the issue involved. The onus of establishing that he has not improperly within his possession a controlled drug is imposed on the accused. In other words, there is a presumption of guilt by virtue of being in possession of a controlled drug. The language of paragraphs (a) and (f) of subsection 2 at first glance may appear to create a different situation; but when one reads the whole section together I think one finds it is incontestable that the issue to be tried is whether or not the accused is in possession of a controlled drug and that pursuant to the subsection the court, if it finds that the accused was not in possession of a controlled drug, he shall be acquitted, but if the court finds that the accused is in possession of a controlled drug he must establish certain facts. I suggest that according to the bill of rights that onus should rest on the crown and not on the accused. As I mentioned last week, because this point was taken, no one should suggest that we want to weaken in any way the effectiveness of this legislation which we all approve, but we will not be doing our duty if in the realization of that commendable objective, in the light of this traffic so well pointed out by the hon. member for—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen laugh but it is the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean who is responsible for this bill. It is his work that brought this about in spite of the fact that it was not fully appreciated. We all remember the derision that attended his remarks when from time to time he brought this question to our attention. I think it is only proper that we would pay him this tribute and I would expect that the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Minister of Justice of the latter's parliamentary secretary, who confines most of his activities to observations from his seat when matters of importance are discussed, would be among those who would join in recognizing the contribution made by the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean.

The Solicitor General took note of this point and as a result it was agreed that this section and subsection 2 of section 34 should stand. I do not make any comment at this time on subsection 2 of section 34 because that would be out of order. We can deal with that section when we come to it. But I am sure the government has had an opportunity to give consideration to this matter and we will be interested in knowing what formula it has come forward with to bring this measure into consistency with the bill of rights. Having done that, perhaps the Minister of Justice will then explain to the committee his failure to act under section 3 of the bill of rights.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in support of the remarks that the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has just made to the effect that section 33 particularly, and the first part of section 34 are contrary to the provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights.

I should like to point out to the minister that under section 33 of this bill, possession is not in itself illegal. Therefore, if a person is brought before the court and charged with having transported or peddled a controlled drug and the crown has, at a given time, proved possession under section 33, the accused may not be condemned for an offence yet, but he is placed under the obligation of proving first that he has obtained the drug from an authorized person and, second, that the drug in his possession is not for trafficking.

Well, if I were counsel for an accused charged under section 33, I would advise him right away to ignore the crown's evidence, to make no move and to let the crown prove possession, because, in that case, there is no offence at all. I fail to see how a judge can convict, under section 33, an accused who is only guilty of having been found in possession of goof balls, because this is not an offence under the law.

The provisions of section 33 were taken almost textually from the Food and Drugs Act, but at that time possession constituted an offence under that act. I suggest that if possession is not considered an offence under section 33, we draw conclusions that are inconsistent, especially if we take into consideration the provisions of the bill of rights that we passed last year.

I think the minister and the government ought to give special attention to that most important point raised by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin).

What will happen if the government fails to submit this bill, either immediately or after its passing, to the Supreme Court of Canada, in order to obtain a definite opinion? It is to be expected that the first accused to be charged in court under this amendment in clause 33, might well refuse to acknowledge the court's jurisdiction, on the ground that the act is inconsistent with the provisions of the bill of rights, which means that in less than one or two years the act would have become almost inoperative.

Since the point raised is a very serious one, I cannot see why, at some time or other, even after the passing of the bill, it would not be possible for the government to submit, as a reference, to the supreme court this simple question: "Are clauses 33 and 34 in Bill No. C-99 inconsistent with the provisions of the bill of rights and, if so, in what respect?"

Should we adopt such legislation which introduces something new in our law—as the minister stated, this country is perhaps the first to have legislation concerning this kind of barbiturates—I think it would be a good thing in view of the point raised by the hon. member for Essex East to seek the advice of the supreme court so as to be sure that this act is in accordance with the bill of rights passed last year.

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he think that the procedure concerning evidence described in clause 33 represents something new in criminal law?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the point.

Mr. Deschatelets: That is not the point.

Mr. Martineau: Well, it is the question I am putting to the hon. member.

Mr. Deschatelets: I shall reply to the hon. member who, I think, was crown attorney.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The purpose is to correct something new.

Mr. Deschatelets: This provision in sections 33 and 34 existed in another act, but under the other drug and narcotics act, possession was an offence whereas under this act, it is quite obvious and the minister has admitted it—that possession is not an offence. So, if a man is found in possession of goof balls, he is brought before the court and charged with peddling goof balls, and there is no offence, no prima facie case against him, because the only thing against him is the fact of possession, and possession is not an offence.

Therefore, I say this is completely new legislation, in which use is made of the provisions of section 33, under which possession is not an offence, to bring the accused before the court and to force him to appear in the witness box to defend himself when no case can be made against him. In that sense it is new legislation and extremely dangerous legislation.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

(Text):

Mr. Crestohl: We live in a country which follows the principle that the accused does not necessarily have to step into the box to offer a defence until a case has been made against him. I now invite the minister's attention to subsection 3 of section 33, which reads:

> If the accused establishes the facts set forth in paragraph (a) or (b) of subsection (2) he shall be acquitted of the offence as charged; and if the accused fails to so establish he shall be convicted of the offence as charged and sentenced accordingly.

If the accused finds that the evidence presented by the crown is sufficiently strong and the judge orders that a defence be presented, then the accused can step into the box and offer the explanation outlined in paragraphs (a) or (b). It is our submission, and I point this out to the minister, that it is certainly a violation of the principles of justice in this country that no accused should be compelled to enter his defence until the crown has made a case against him. Subsection 3 of section 33 definitely indicates that the accused shall step into the box and offer an explanation when no case has been made out against him. I say that is a violation of criminal law procedure in this country.

I invite the minister to carefully read subsection 3. I think the point I make has some valid ground, and I support the submission made by the hon. member for Essex East. This is the only point I want to make. Let us not change the criminal procedure in this country by enacting a provision in this bill that the accused shall be compelled to offer an explanation before the crown has made out a case. The accused is not now obliged to do so until a case has been made out against him.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, a great deal of importance and, in my view, a disproportionate amount of importance has been attached to the statement made by my hon. friends that this section contravenes the bill of rights, and that what we are doing here is to provide, in effect, that the accused will be presumed guilty even in advance of the proof of the case by the crown. In other words, my hon. friends are suggesting that the mere fact that a charge is laid puts the accused on his defence and that he then has to establish his innocence. Nothing, of course, could be further from the truth.

The crown, under section 33 of the new act, if this bill passes, will have to prove the facts upon which it relies to establish the guilt of the accused. It is not until the crown has proven its case that the accused is under any obligation to enter a defence. It is a well understood principle of criminal justice that criminal statutes themselves may provide that certain inferences will be drawn from certain facts; that is all that is being done here. In every one of these cases, just as here, the crown has to establish the facts from which the statute then says that the inferences may be drawn. This is particularly true in the case of dangerous substances such as explosives, for instance, and narcotics, and now we are adding goof balls or barbiturates and amphetamines. As I say, in the case of these dangerous substances, it is common to provide that possession, in the absence of a reasonable explanation, will raise these inferences or presumptions on the basis of which the guilt of the accused can then be assumed if the accused is not able to make a reasonable explanation of the origin and purpose of his possession of these dangerous substances. This is a well understood principle of criminal law.

There is another well understood principle of criminal law, and it is this. When you are dealing with the necessity of proving your case, there is a point at which it is proper that the onus of rebuttal should pass to the accused. This again is particularly the situation with regard to those cases hinging on possession. It is, therefore, understood and accepted, and not a contravention of the bill of rights, that when the crown proves possession then the onus shifts to the accused to establish that his possession is innocent, to establish how he came into possession and the purpose for which he has possession. How could the crown possibly establish all these facts which are peculiarly and exclusively in the knowledge of the accused? He alone knows how he came into possession. He alone knows the purpose for which he possesses. It is, therefore, a well understood principle of criminal law that once the crown has proven, with respect to this category of subjects, that the accused is in possession, then the onus passes to the accused to establish that his possession is innocent and that the purpose for which he possesses is lawful.

Now, the hon. member for Essex East, particularly, has made a gross confusion of these two questions, on the one hand of the presumption of innocence and on the other hand of the transference of the onus of proof. It is because he has made this gross, self-deceiving confusion that he has so long detained this committee in his self-defeating attempts to establish that there is here a breach of the bill of rights. The bill of rights says that no statute of the parliament of Canada shall be so interpreted as to deprive a person charged with a criminal offense of the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.

If my hon. friend looks at the bill now before the committee, he will find there is nothing in it which presumes the accused to be guilty until the crown has proven its case in accordance with the principles I have outlined. The crown has to establish the fact of possession.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, not at all.

Mr. Crestohl: Possession for trafficking, not simple possession.

Mr. Fulton: Does my hon. friend deny that under section 33 the crown will have to establish the fact of possession? Has my hon. friend not read the section?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely the minister is not going to confuse this issue by resorting to these debatable tactics.

Mr. Fulton: I have asked a question: does my hon. friend deny that the crown will have to establish the fact of possession under section 33?

Mr. Crestohl: That is possession for trafficking.

Mr. Fulton: I will ask my hon. friend from Essex East this question, if his colleagues will keep silent for a moment: do any hon. members opposite deny that the crown has to establish the fact of possession under section 33?

Mr. Crestohl: Possession for trafficking.

Mr. Fulton: The question is simple: does my hon. friend deny that the crown will have to establish the fact of possession?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When the minister is through I will be able to answer his question.

Mr. Fulton: I have not yet received an answer to my question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You make your argument and I will give my reply.

Mr. Fulton: I gathered from what was said on the other side of the chamber that hon. members did deny that the crown had to prove the fact of possession. Do I now understand that hon. members opposite do not deny that the crown has to establish the fact of possession because they have not answered my question.

Mr. Deschatelets: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: That is agreed. My hon. friend from Maisonneuve-Rosemont accepts that the crown does have to prove possession. The law then makes a presumption that the possession is for the purpose of trafficking unless the accused can establish that the possession is lawful or is not for the purpose of trafficking.

Mr. Deschatelets: Will the minister permit me—

Mr. Fulton: But there is nothing new in this. I would direct my hon. friend's attention to a case recently decided in the supreme court of Ontario where this very issue was before the court. I refer to the issue of whether such a presumption in a statute is a contravention of the bill of rights.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister give us the name of the case.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Regina versus Guertin.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Give us the facts of the case.

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend will possess his soul in patience, I will do so. I know he does not like to be caught out.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Come now; this is not a debating society; you are the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend always takes refuge in these interjections when the case is going against him. He has spent a considerable part of two days trying to establish that the government has been derelict in its duty.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Fulton: He has spent two days trying to mislead the public of Canada into thinking that the government attaches no importance to the bill of rights—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Fulton: —whereas he has so misinformed himself and misled himself that he has just been wasting the time of the house and the country.

Mr. Drysdale: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: We had the provisions of the bill of rights in our minds at every moment when we drafted this bill. I have said—and I have to explain this in words of one syllable in order that I may be certain my hon. friends fully understand—that it is a well understood principle of criminal justice, and not inconsistent with the bill of rights, that with respect particularly to these dangerous and offensive substances, once the crown has proven the fact of possession the presumption is made by law that the possession was for a guilty purpose. The law having made that presumption, the onus is shifted to the accused to prove that the possession was innocent.

That is all this section does. The section says that when the crown has proven possession, the possession shall be presumed to have been for the purpose of trafficking and the onus is then shifted to the accused to establish that the possession was lawful or that it was not for the purpose of trafficking.

When I was interrupted by the hon. member for Essex East I was at the point of referring the committee to the case in the supreme court of Ontario recently where this very issue was before the court, on the basis of whether or not a similar provision of the Criminal Code was inconsistent with the bill of rights.

The section in question was section 80 of the Criminal Code, which provides:

> Every one who, without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him,
> (a) makes or has in his possession or under his care or control an explosive substance that he does not make or does not have in his possession or under his care or control for a lawful purpose . . . is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.

In the case of Regina versus Guertin, reported in "1961 Ontario Weekly Notes", page 134—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is the citation again, please?

Mr. Fulton: "1961 Ontario Weekly Notes", page 134. In that case this very issue was before the court. Here is a section of the Criminal Code which says that all the crown has to prove is the fact of possession and then the law presumes the possession was for an unlawful purpose unless the accused can establish that the possession was for a lawful purpose; and the onus of proof, by the provision of the statute, shifts to the accused the moment the crown establishes the fact of possession. Why? Because it is a dangerous substance. That is the reason for these provisions in the code, for similar provisions in the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, and for the proposed inclusion of this provision in the Food and Drugs Act.

The chief justice of the Ontario court of appeal—Mr. Chairman, I am sorry; I misinformed the committee. I said it was a case in the supreme court of Ontario. The citation to which I have referred is a report of a decision of the court of appeal of Ontario.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Are you sure you got the facts right?

Mr. Fulton: The case was originally tried by a magistrate and was appealed directly to the court of appeal.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Was the appeal allowed or dismissed?

Mr. Fulton: The appeal was allowed. The magistrate had held that the shifting of the onus of proof provided by section 80 of the Criminal Code was abrogated by section 2 of the bill of rights, and the court of appeal of Ontario held that this was not the case.

The chief justice of the Ontario court of appeal, commenting on the argument by counsel for the accused that section 80, by putting the proof of lawful excuse upon the accused abrogates or infringes the right of the accused to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law, had the following to say:

> I do not agree with this contention. Under section 80 the accused is not deprived of the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law. The law, it is true, stipulates that upon proof that accused has the explosive substance in his possession, he shall be liable to conviction unless his possession can be justified by lawful excuse. Nevertheless, it is only after conclusion of the evidence, if any, for the defence as well as the evidence for the crown that the trial tribunal is in a position to find his guilt or innocence. The presumption of innocence remains until the whole evidence is before the court. If the accused elects to adduce no evidence or if the evidence he adduces fails to support the defence of lawful excuse, then in either case he may be convicted according to law.
> For these reasons, I am of the opinion that section 80 does not abrogate or infringe upon the right to be presumed innocent recognized and declared by section 2 (f) of the bill of rights.

In my submission, Mr. Chairman, this case is completely conclusive of the issue which has been raised by my hon. friends opposite, because of the words of Chief Justice Porter, applying them now to the section before this committee:

> If the accused elects to adduce no evidence or the evidence he adduces fails to support the defence of lawful excuse,—

Transposing the words "fails to support the defence of lawful possession" or "innocent possession", in either case he may be convicted according to law. But in no case may he be convicted until the crown has satisfied the onus of proof which rests upon it, that of proving the fact of possession. Just as in the case of explosives covered in section 80, the crown has to prove the fact of possession and then the onus passes to the accused to establish that the possession was lawful.

A great deal of consideration has been given to this whole question by the courts in the United States under the due process clause. I could cite arguments under the due process clause and the reasoning there, but I think that although the committee will agree that in this respect the United States cases are of interst and of value as illustrative of the process of reasoning in this regard, hon. members would feel that a decision of the court of appeal of Ontario on this very point is conclusive on this question which was raised by the hon. member for Essex East and supported erroneously by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure the Minister of Justice will agree, now he has taken his seat, that an argument of this sort is not going to be resolved by the minister losing his patience—

Mr. Fulton: I have not lost my patience.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —or by making accusations against those who believe that there is a violation of the bill of rights as a result of this particular subsection. The Minister of Justice may be correct in his contention, but he must also assume that hon. members who raise issues of this sort may equally be proven to be correct.

It is significant that when this point was first raised, the Solicitor General who has had considerable experience in the practice of the law in Newfoundland and who, unlike the Minister of Justice has had considerable contact with the criminal courts where he served, I believe, as a magistrate, did not resort to the petulant tactics of the Minister of Justice.

An hon. Member: Oh come off it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Someone says "oh, come on". Well, that is no way in which to attempt—

Mr. Fulton: You don't like to be discomforted.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister, by adopting that attitude, does not add to his stature or to the elucidation of the issue now before us, nor will all the catcalls of the eminent lawyers who sit behind him assist in resolving the problem which faces the Minister of Justice with regard to his duties under the bill of rights.

I was saying that the Solicitor General, when this question was raised, after considerable argument by hon. members on this side of the house, did have a consultation with the Minister of National Health and Welfare who was piloting this bill with the result that they decided to allow this and the other subsection to stand. They thought, at any rate, that some consideration should be given to the point which was raised. The Solicitor General did not say he agreed with the objection which had been taken but he did take the proper course of saying he would have the matter reviewed. The minister comes forward tonight with all the infallibility of one who does not believe in the possibility that there can be any difference about the interpretation of a statute and tells us: I believe that notwithstanding what you have stated the interpretation of the statute is not as the hon. member for Essex East, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont and the hon. member for Cartier have said—I tell you without any hesitation that this is the situation. And all this is before he had started to set out the judgment of Chief Justice Porter, in the province of Ontario sitting in the weekly court with regard to an appeal that had come from a magistrate who had held in the first instance—

Mr. Fulton: What does the hon, member mean by the words "sitting in weekly court"?

Mr. Pallett: Does the hon. gentleman not know it was a court of appeal decision of Chief Justice Porter, Mr. Justice Aylesworth and Mr. Justice Mackay.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Now we have another Solon sitting over there. The minister told us that in the weekly notes—

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member said "sitting in weekly court".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Justice ought to be able to contain himself and listen to reasoned argument. It might not be one which makes an appeal to him but he should at least attempt to give the impression that he has the judicial manner, and he should allow an argument against his position to be stated without these constant interruptions. It is not characteristic of him. I can only assume that he is tired today after a long—

Mr. Fulton: Not tired, just bored.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Bored?

Mr. Fulton: Bored. By you.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Justice is bored. The Minister of Justice, who introduced the bill of rights does not like, now, to have the bill of rights used as an argument—

Mr. Fulton: I am waiting to hear the argument.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Justice, who continues to interrupt, who continues to display impatience on hearing a judicial argument, does not wish to be told that the bill of rights he piloted through this house—

Mr. Fulton: I love to see the hon. gentleman irritated.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —protects, also, the common law right of presumption of innocence as it is carried forward in all legislation passed by this house, and there is a further obligation on the Minister of Justice to indicate whether in his judgment any bill put forward for our consideration represents a contravention of the term of the bill of rights. These are the facts.

When the Minister of Justice says because there are now in the Criminal Code certain sections which say that the mere possession of explosives and, under the provisions of the narcotics act, the mere possession of narcotics, creates an obligation on the part of an accused to explain possession, that is no answer to the particular question raised by the section now before us. We have to analyse this particular section not as it appears to us in the light of sections in the Criminal Code dealing with something else, but in the light of how this particular section itself bears an interpretation with regard to subsection (f) of section 2 of the bill of rights.

The hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue who, likewise, has had some considerable experience in these matters asked a proper question, it seems to me when he drew attention to the fact that under the Criminal Code the mere possession of certain substances, explosives and the like, creates an obligation on the part of the accused to explain the circumstances of possession. We readily acknowledge that this is the case. But these sections in the Criminal Code, like their companion provisions in the narcotics act, came into being as a result of acts by this parliament before the bill of rights was passed. The Criminal Code is replete with all kinds of exceptions to the general rule of presumption of innocence. There are many other punitive statutes which have been passed by this house and passed by provincial parliaments where there is a failure to carry out the common law practice of presumption of innocence. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Does he not regard the bill of rights as being declaratory of what already exists in the common law on presumption of innocence, or does he contend that it added anything further to our rights in that respect.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the learned gentleman from Stormont, because his question substantiates what we have always said about the bill of rights—that it did no more than declare the existing law; that it added nothing to substantive law, but was simply declaratory of what was already the law of the land.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): What happens to your previous argument, then?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I finish what I am saying? I am glad the hon. member has asked that question, because he is confirming the position taken by the Canadian Bar Association and others that the bill of rights added nothing to the existing law. This being the case, the hon. member says, I am placed in an inconsistent position having used the argument I did a moment ago. I am sure if the hon. member for Stormont will allow me to complete my argument he will then be able to give us a clear and undeniable defence of the position that he is now taking. However, until such time, I know he will listen to me with the respect I am now receiving from the Minister of Justice, for which I am extremely grateful.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Will the hon. member explain his obviously inconsistent attitude? How does he explain it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps if the hon. gentleman will listen to me now with care, which is characteristic of his general attitude in listening to learned counsel, he will then receive an answer.

The minister has overlooked the fact that subsection (1) of section 32—this is the governing factor—provides that if an accused pleads not guilty the trial will then proceed as if the issue to be tried was whether the accused was in possession of controlled drugs. That is the governing factor and principle regarding the argument we make in respect of this matter. As soon as an accused has pleaded not guilty, and the issue is joined, then the obligation falls upon the accused to—

An hon. Member: It is not an obligation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The onus is on the accused to prove that he is not in possession contrary to the particular section of this act. If that provision does not place the onus upon the accused, and if it does not presume an accused to be guilty in the absence of proof to the contrary, then I do not properly understand Her Majesty's English.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, may I attempt to assist the hon. member by returning to the question asked of me earlier? The hon. member asked me whether, under the wording of section 33 (2), the crown has to prove that an accused is in possession of the drug.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, there is no doubt about that. The section is clear in that respect.

Mr. Fulton: The crown must prove its case in that regard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the point. The minister forgets that once a plea of not guilty has been entered the issue is to be tried as though it involved the question of possession.

Mr. Fulton: That is right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The issue can only be determined as a result of an accused clearly establishing his legal possession.

Mr. Fulton: No, the crown must—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the accused cannot do so then the issue is proceeded with as though—

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps my hon. friend would admit that the crown must first prove possession.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If an accused cannot explain the circumstances of possession then, according to subsection (3), he must be convicted of the offence. If the accused establishes the facts as set forth in paragraphs (a) or (b) of subsection (2) he shall be acquitted of the offence as charged. However, as I have said, if the accused fails to establish that, he shall be convicted of the offence as charged and sentenced accordingly. If that does not place the onus upon the accused, then the Minister of Justice will have to give me some satisfactory explanation.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is trying to establish that—

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, I should like to—

Mr. Fulton: Does my hon. friend suggest—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I should like to answer these hon. gentlemen one at a time, and perhaps I should recognize the minister first.

Mr. Fulton: Does my hon. friend suggest the onus shifts before the crown has proved the fact of possession?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The issue arises at the moment there is a plea of not guilty and then becomes a question of possession.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is then up to the accused to explain his possession, not the crown.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend misunderstands the situation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister continues to say that I misunderstand. I suggest that I do not misunderstand it but that it is clear. If an accused does not plead guilty the trial proceeds as if the issue to be tried is whether the accused was in possession of a controlled drug. That is quite clear. If the court finds the accused was not in possession of a controlled drug, he shall be acquitted. If the court finds that he was in possession of a controlled drug, the accused shall then be given the opportunity of establishing certain things.

Mr. Fulton: How is the court going to find that unless the crown leads evidence as to possession?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps the accused goes into the box.

Mr. Fulton: The accused does not go into the box until the crown has proved possession.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend has not read his bill very carefully.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I suggest that my hon. friend has not given this section the interpretation it should be given.

Mr. Drysdale: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister speaks of the Guertin case; is that case conclusive? Can the Minister of Justice say whether there has been an appeal entered in that case?

Mr. Fulton: This case was decided, and so far as I am aware there has been no appeal.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): So far as the minister is aware there has been no appeal, but he does not know. I suggest the magistrate held that there was a violation of the bill of rights involved.

Mr. Fulton: That is right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On appeal, the court of appeal held otherwise.

Mr. Fulton: That is right.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We do not now know whether or not a further appeal has been taken. I should be very surprised if a further appeal has not been taken in this matter.

It may be that the arguments which were put forward were not valid arguments, and that may be the position the minister is taking. Undoubtedly he will be able to support that position by the support given by those who sit behind him, but there is some doubt.

Obviously there was some doubt regarding the similar circumstances in respect to the Guertin case, at least in principle. I have not examined the facts of that case and must rely upon my hon. friend's interpretation, but there was some doubt in the mind of the magistrate with regard to the situation. That case has not been concluded if it is to reach the Supreme Court of Canada.

In view of the fact that my hon. friend should like this to be the most effective act possible to meet the situation, and in view of the doubt which does exist, as well as because of the interpretation which some hon. members sincerely place on this section, will the minister deny that a doubt may well be entertained by others who will be called upon as judges to interpret this section in the future? Will my hon. friend deny that defence counsel will use this section as a means of avoiding the mischief and the judgment which the minister says must inevitably follow from a proper interpretation of this section?

What will be the result? I suggest the result will be that this legislation will be ineffective for a considerably long time. This bill has been brought in after careful consideration by the government in order to meet a situation which has been brought to the attention of this committee by the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has stated it was brought in for the purpose of meeting a particular situation which has brought about so much degradation among young people, particularly in our large centres where criminal activity is extensive.

The minister will know, by looking at the punitive section, that the sanctions are very great and that the punishment imposed is intended to be corrective. If the minister intends to make this law effective surely he must recognize the arguments which will be made by defence counsel on the first occasion that this act is tested. What will be the result? I suggest that when a charge has been laid it will ultimately be tried, after the docket has been so adjusted as to permit the case to be heard; then there will follow an interval, unless judgment is given forthwith. However, if judgment is reserved there will be another interval followed by an appeal to the court of appeal. If individuals who are trafficking in these controlled drugs are anxious to pursue their nefarious practices they will delay the process of justice by seeing that there is an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. This whole procedure will take well over a year from the time the charge is first laid under this act. That being the situation, is it unreasonable for the minister to resort to unmistakably clear language containing no ambiguity whatsoever? On the other hand, if the minister persists in the interpretation which he does persist in, why should he not give consideration to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, that this section be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada by way of reference?

In the submission of a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada the crown will not be confronted with any delay in the hearing of a request in the right of Her Majesty's government on federal account. I suggest this procedure to avoid the kind of delay that will come from defence counsel and others in the interpretation of this section.

If the minister does not accept the arguments we present, surely he ought to, in the interest of the dispatch of justice in this matter, accept the proposal made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont as the effective way of dealing with a matter that is doubtful. The minister cannot take the position that this is not doubtful, because that was the position taken the other night, by the Solicitor General whose legal experience is no less than that of the Minister of Justice. For these reasons I hope the minister will regard our interventions tonight as designed to remove any doubt about the effectiveness of this section, to remove any doubt about a violation of the bill of rights, to remove any doubt about whether or not the minister has complied with the requirements of section 3 of the bill of rights.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Martineau: May I ask the hon. member a question?

The Chairman: Maybe the hon. member would choose which member should ask him the question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think at this time I ought to recognize priority again. I recognize the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Martineau: The purpose of this question is simply to remove any doubt in my mind as to what the hon. member might have been saying. Did I understand him to say that if this clause becomes law and a conviction is obtained in a court of first instance and then appealed, this would mean that the law could no longer be enforced and that the goof ball traffickers could continue to traffic unmolested?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. I am sure my hon. friend knows that that is not what I intended.

Mr. Martineau: The hon. member was not clear, and that is why I am trying to get an explanation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Obviously, if a case under this section is appealed, that does create an uncertainty. The crown will not be able to rest until the final court, not the court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, but the final court, has declared that the law is such and such. Until that is done there will be a field day for defence counsel. This traffic will be as active as before. That is the experience that attended the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act when it was first introduced and when this kind of argument was made, in the sense that it was a violation of the common law right. At that time there was no bill of rights and consequently it could not be contrasted.

Mr. Martineau: Is it not also true that uncertainty exists when any legislation is enacted until it has been decided in the courts?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, we always listen to the hon. member for Essex East. We always treat his arguments with the seriousness which they deserve, even when he deals with the problem ad hominem, which unfortunately the hon. member has shown all too ready a disposition to do.

I do not mind what the hon. member says about me or what his opinion may be about my legal qualifications; I merely suggest that it does not really strengthen his argument to be resorting to that kind of tactic. However, sir, what we do object to—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not want the minister to think that I attacked his legal qualifications because I did not.

Mr. Fulton: I would not be disturbed if the hon. member did.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think the minister can truthfully say that. I referred to his eminence and I repeat I simply pointed out that one equally eminent, namely the Solicitor General, had some doubts in the matter. If the Minister of Justice takes that as a reflection on his legal competence, then he is very touchy.

Mr. Fulton: I am not concerned about the hon. member's opinion of me; I am merely pointing out that whenever he is in a tight corner he always turns to the argument ad hominem in one form or another, and we attach to his arguments the seriousness which they deserve. Nor, indeed, do we object to the hon. member rising on the basis of a difference of opinion, but what we do point out is that the hon. member indulges himself in those tactics of which he erroneously accuses others. He made the positive and vehement assertion last Tuesday that this was a violation, and a deliberate violation, of the bill of rights.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Fulton: He did not express it as a matter of tentative opinion on which he invites us now to express ourselves. My hon.

friend was absolutely certain that the government had deliberated disregarded the bill of rights when it brought in this bill, and that the Minister of Justice had disregarded his obligations under the bill of rights, and all those high flown, loudly phrased objections that he took to the bill, on the basis which he suggested, have been a waste of time of this committee. If he had asserted them as tentative opinions or points of view requiring consideration there would, of course, have been no exception taken; but when he asserts in a positive statement that we have violated the bill of rights, which he himself tried so hard to frustrate and to prevent being passed—the bill that he now asserts we have violated—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You know, of course, that that is not so. You know the bill of rights was improved as a result of the efforts of the members of the Liberal party.

Mr. Fulton: I know for a fact that they attempted to frustrate it because I was exposed to the attempt for weeks and months; I was exposed to the efforts of hon. members to delay, to defeat, to frustrate the desire of the Prime Minister to put a bill of rights on the statute books. Now the hon. member is loud in his accusation that the legislation we are introducing is in violation of the bill of rights.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the minister give me the page number of the case?

Mr. Fulton: Apparently my hon. friend is now really interested in it. He referred a moment ago—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Don't get too histrionic.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member said that I had trotted out a decision of the court of appeal of Ontario sitting in weekly court.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Don't get mad.

Mr. Fulton: That is what he said when he was trying to disregard it. Now apparently he realizes the seriousness of the situation in which he has placed himself in his complete disregard of the court of appeal of Ontario.

The case is found in Ontario Weekly Notes at page 134. The court of appeal consisted of Porter, C.J.O., Aylesworth and MacKay, justices of the court of appeal. The date is March 9, 1961, and the case is Regina versus Guertin. It is the issue of the Ontario Reports and the Ontario Weekly Notes, Toronto, April 7, 1961. It is cited 1961 (O.W.N.). The reference is to be found at page 134. I hope the hon. member has now found it because if he has he will agree entirely with the point of view I have been asserting, not exclusively on my own, but as the point of view which we have come to as a result of research and study of this subject which is fully supported by the judgment of the court of appeal of Ontario not sitting, sir, in weekly court.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the minister let me have his copy?

Mr. Fulton: Oh, yes. I am informed that the hon. member may well have some difficulty in finding it. There is double pagination. One has to do with the Ontario Reports and the other with Ontario Weekly Notes. Both are included in the same number. The Ontario Weekly Notes case will be found at page 134. I shall be glad to send this copy across to the hon. member.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has the library copy and I would appreciate having it.

Mr. Fulton: Now, sir, having disposed of the tactics of the hon. gentleman, let me deal with the only argument he really brought to buttress his position tonight and that was that by this section the accused, by virtue of the charge, is placed immediately in the position where he has to go into the box and prove his possession was innocent. Sir, this argument coming from a lawyer surprises me.

Mr. Deschatelets: I support the claim.

Mr. Fulton: I find it most difficult to know how to deal with it because it seems to me it can only be based on a deliberate refusal to appreciate the meaning of words. Let us go through the section clause by clause. Section 33(1) says:

> In any prosecution for a violation of subsection 2 of section 32, if the accused does not plead guilty, the trial shall proceed as if the issue to be tried is whether the accused was in possession of a controlled drug.

Very well. The issue to be tried is the issue of possession. The section does nothing to remove from the crown the onus of proof that is on the crown in every criminal case to prove the facts which it alleges or which are in issue as establishing the guilt of the accused.

Mr. Deschatelets: Will you permit a remark at this point?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Deschatelets: The charge is possession for the purpose of trafficking. The minister will admit that. It is not just possession. The charge against the accused is possession for the purpose of trafficking. I admit that the only issue at the trial as far as the burden of the crown is concerned is possession, but the minister must keep in mind that the charge is possession for the purpose of trafficking.

Mr. Fulton: I admit that and I will deal with it, but at the moment I was dealing with the contention of the hon. member for Essex East that the moment a charge is laid the accused, if he does not plead guilty, has to go into the witness box and refute the charge of possession.

Mr. Deschatelets: Otherwise he is found guilty.

Mr. Fulton: He does not. The onus does not lie on the accused until the crown has proven the fact on which it relies to support the charge and the fact is the fact of possession.

Mr. Crestohl: Possession for trafficking, not simple possession.

Mr. Fulton: The charge is a charge of possession for trafficking, yes, but the fact which has to be proven, the onus of proof which lies upon the crown, is the fact of possession. It is true that the law then says that if the crown proves possession certain inferences will be drawn and then the onus is shifted to the accused of rebutting those inferences. This is a perfectly normal and proper principle of criminal justice and has been for generations. It is one of those principles which is in line with the bill of rights and was in mind when the bill of rights was drafted.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There was no bill of rights then. That is the point.

Mr. Fulton: The bill of rights simply says that an accused will not be deprived of his right to be presumed innocent until he is proven guilty. The bill of rights does not say that statutes may not suggest that reasonable inferences may be drawn from certain facts so long as the onus of proving those facts is not removed from the crown. This statute says that from the fact of possession an inference may be drawn that the possession was for the purpose of trafficking and that that inference will stand unless the accused then proves that the possession was not for the purpose of trafficking. This is a perfectly proper principle of criminal justice not in the least inconsistent with the bill of rights which merely says that an accused shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty.

Once again, may I suggest in all seriousness to my hon. friends that their difficulty is that they are confusing two principles, one, onus of proof, and the other, presumption of innocence. In every criminal case the onus of proving the facts upon which the crown relies in support of its allegations lies on the crown. Once the crown has done that, the onus always shifts to the accused to answer the case which had been brought against him. All that you have here is a variation provided by statute as to the time at which that onus of proof shall shift, but it does not relieve the crown of the onus of proving the facts on which the crown relies to prove the allegation it has made against the accused. Yet the hon. member for Essex East solemnly said a moment or two ago that all the crown would have to do would be to lay a charge and then the accused would have to go in the witness box to prove his innocence. This is completely incorrect.

I have read subsection 1 and the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont has agreed, even if the member for Essex East has not, that the crown will have to prove the fact of possession because subsection 2 says:

> If, pursuant to subsection 1, the court finds that the accused was not in possession of a controlled drug, he shall be acquitted, but, if the court finds that the accused was in possession of a controlled drug, he shall be given an opportunity of establishing—

One or the other of two things. How could the court find that he was in possession of a controlled drug unless the crown proved that he was in possession of a controlled drug?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Under this bill the proof must rest on the accused.

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Read the subsection.

Mr. Fulton: I can only say that there is a complete and deliberate refusal to understand the ordinary meaning of words.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "deliberate". Look at the words in subsection 2:

> If, pursuant to subsection 1, the court finds that the accused was not in possession of a controlled drug, he shall be acquitted—

Does that support what my hon. friend has said?

Mr. Fulton: Most certainly it does because how on earth does the hon. member suppose the court will find these things unless someone proves them? The subsection does not interfere with the ordinary principles of criminal justice which say that the crown shall prove its allegations. The crown is alleging possession; therefore the crown must prove possession. If the crown does not prove possession, the court cannot find possession because up to this point there is nothing for the accused to answer. It is only if the court finds possession that the accused has to answer anything, and until there is something for the accused to answer he does not have to go in the box. Therefore the only way the court can find possession is if the crown proves it.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but if my hon. friend will not accept that simple point then there is probably not much use in our continuing this discussion. I can only assure him with the sincerity at my command that every lawyer he might care to consult on this matter who would consider it carefully would agree that what I have stated is correct, that the crown must prove possession before there is anything for the accused to answer. It is only then that the onus shifts to the accused and then, in accordance with proper principles of criminal justice, it is up to the accused to satisfy the court whether or not his possession was lawful or was for an innocent purpose.

It is, as I have said, an accepted practice or principle not in violation of the bill of rights that those facts which are peculiarly and exclusively within the knowledge of the accused and upon which he relies to establish his defence must be proven by the accused because, of course, it would be impossible for the crown to prove how the accused came into possession or what his state of mind was or for what purpose he acquired the drugs. That onus is on the accused to satisfy the court that his possession was lawful or was for an innocent purpose.

I suppose—in fact, I know—that we could go on and on discussing this subject but I imagine my hon. friend has now had a chance to study the case of Regina v. Guertin and the authoritative statement of the chief justice of Ontario that a section of the Criminal Code, parallel in its import and almost identical in its provisions with the section now under discussion, was not in contravention of the bill of rights. I assure the hon. member for Essex East, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont and this committee that when we drafted the bill we did so with the greatest care because we recognized that these situations where we are trying to deal with the possession of harmful and deleterious substances do pose special problems and that one must be very careful not to go so far in one's desire to establish effective measures of control as to transgress the bill of rights. It was with that caution in our minds that we drafted this provision and it is for the reasons I have attempted to indicate to the committee that we ourselves are satisfied there is no contravention.

One final word, Mr. Chairman, and it is this. I have maintained throughout, contrary to the urgings of some of my hon. friends opposite, that the courts will, of course, have the final determination of these matters. The courts may not agree with me. It may be that a court or, indeed the highest court, would say that they find this not to be consistent with the bill of rights. If that should be the case, then of course I would accept the verdict of the court because I respect the court. The courts are the final arbiters, the final protectors of the rights and liberties of the subject. When we introduced the bill of rights, we were at pains to explain that the courts were the final protectors because they are the final interpreters of the law. If the court does not agree with me, then I shall admit that in giving a legal opinion or a legal interpretation of this section, I was wrong. Up to this moment, and at this moment, on the basis of that clear decision of Chief Justice Porter and the other two judges of the Ontario court of appeal, reinforcing the research, the study and the consideration that we have given to it, I have no hesitation in saying that there is no contravention of the bill of rights in section 33 of the proposed Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. Drysdale: I endeavoured to intervene some time ago to assist the hon. member for Essex East. I suppose when he saw me in possession of law books, he did not want my assistance at that particular time. I should like to refer the committee to "Phipson on Evidence" the ninth edition. I think the difficulty from which the hon. member for Essex East is suffering is the difficulty of understanding the shifting of the burden of proof. We all realize that the primary onus which is on the crown is maintained throughout, and that is of proving the guilt of the accused. However, there is a shifting of the onus at various times. To support this particular proposition, I would refer the hon. member to page 38 of Phipson under the heading, "Distinction when burden of proof on prosecution or prisoner". If the hon. member will refer to that page he will see that a distinction is made between the burden of proof which remains on the prosecution throughout and secondary burdens of proof where the onus shifts to the accused and he merely shows a prima facie case shifting the burden back to the crown.

Phipson at page 38 states:

> When the burden of the issue is on the prosecution, the case must, as we have seen, be proved beyond a reasonable doubt; though a prima facie case made by the prosecution and not rebutted by the accused may often amount to this, and suffice for conviction... When, however, the burden of an issue is upon the accused, he is not, in general, called on to prove it beyond a reasonable doubt or in default to incur a verdict of guilty; it is sufficient if he succeed in proving a prima facie case, for then the burden is shifted to the prosecution, which has still to discharge its original onus that never shifts, i.e., that of establishing on the whole case, guilt beyond a reasonable doubt... Thus, on a charge of possessing house-breaking implements without lawful excuse, proof of such excuse being upon the accused, the latter proved that he was a bricklayer, which made his possession prima facie lawful. At the trial, however, the judge directed that the burden was still on the accused to negative a felonious intent. On appeal it was held that this direction was wrong, and that when a prima facie excuse had been shown, it was for the prosecution to rebut, and not for the accused to establish, an innocent intent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not propose to repeat my arguments, except to say that the Minister of Justice has sent me over a copy of the judgment which I have read. I would simply point out that this case undoubtedly goes a long way in support of the contention the minister has advanced. We are not advised yet as to whether or not an appeal is being lodged from the judgment of Porter, C.J.A. In any event, while this case does go a long way it is distinguishable from the section under discussion because of the wording, as I have said a number of times, of subsection 1.

I am sure that counsel arguing for the accused, confronted with this case, would point out that the language of section 33, in seeing that there is an issue tried on the question of possession, differentiates that case from this one. I cannot, however, say any more to persuade the minister. This is my honest view. A number of us here have been looking at this case, and that is our considered opinion of the difference between the Guertin case and a hypothetical case that might arise under section 33.

Finally, the minister has said that he has given his best judgment and care to the draftsmanship of this section. No one has suggested otherwise, but that does not preclude an hon. member of this house from saying that the section, as drafted, could be regarded by some hon. members as being contrary to the bill of rights. The minister has said he is going to leave to the courts the decision as to whether or not an argument of this kind is valid. Undoubtedly, the courts are going to be making decisions that will bring about many refinements in existing statutes and existing cases. The point is that we are the parliament of Canada. We are now in the process of legislating and it is our duty, in so far as we humanly can, to provide formulae to meet objections we have in mind and take steps to make corrections at this stage when enactments are in the process of being created.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): I listened very carefully to the legal dissertation of the hon. member for Essex East. I hesitate to rise in the presence of such eminent counsel. Although I listened very carefully, he did not explain his inconsistency, or at least I have not been able to hear any such explanation. The hon. member contended that the existence of the provisions in the Criminal Code and narcotics act which shifted the onus of proof to the accused, were irrelevant to this legislation because the Criminal Code and narcotics act antedated the bill of rights. Then, he went on and said that the bill of rights had no effect in changing the common law in this respect. There is an inconsistency in these two contentions which the hon. member promised to explain. I am still waiting for an explanation. If none is forthcoming or he is not capable of making an explanation, I am quite prepared to let the subject drop.

Mr. Baldwin: May I make one brief comment to try to satisfy the hon. member for Essex East as to the state of the law. May I assure the committee through you, sir, that we have in this case to which the Minister of Justice has referred, an authoritative decision on a set of facts which are on all fours with the type of situation which would arise under section 33. Until the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled otherwise, the finding of the supreme court of Ontario in the case of Regina v. Guertin will be binding in the province of Ontario in any prosecution which may be launched in connection with sections 33 and 34 of this act. It would have an equally binding effect, may I assure the committee, in the other provinces and would almost certainly be accepted by those courts as representing the state of the law.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the minister's remarks with great interest. I should like to examine with him a difficult case that may arise under section 33. Let us suppose a man is charged with possession of goof balls for the purpose of trafficking. Now, under section 33 (1) the crown establishes possession of these goof balls. Suppose that the accused rests on this evidence. He does not testify. The minister will admit that at this moment there is absolutely nothing illegal before the court because possession, of itself, is not illegal. Section 33 (3) provides that the accused shall be convicted if he fails to establish those matters which are contained in paragraphs (a) and (b).

I should like to come to the point where we can see whether we are wrong or whether the minister is wrong. A man is charged with possession for the purpose of trafficking. The crown establishes by evidence the fact of possession. The accused, of course, is free to enter the witness box or rest on the evidence of the crown. There is nothing in our law which forces the accused to go into the witness box.

If the accused rests on the evidence of the crown, am I right in assuming that under section 33 (3) he shall be convicted of trafficking although the only fact before the court is the possession, which in itself is not an offence? I should like the minister to comment on this question.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I would say that on the bald facts as suggested by the hon. member, that there was a charge of possession for trafficking and the crown proved possession to the satisfaction of the court—that is, they proved possession beyond a reasonable doubt—and the accused rested there and gave no answer either himself or through other witnesses, he would be convicted.

However, I think the point my hon. friend overlooks is that although the accused is convicted of possession for trafficking, he is convicted because the statute says that when the crown proves possession it is a legal, logical and proper inference to make that he was in possession for the purpose of trafficking, unless he establishes that he was not in possession for the purpose of trafficking. In other words, the statute makes that inference.

I think it might perhaps be appropriate to refer my hon. friend to one or two United States authorities where this point has been discussed. The Corpus Juris deals with this point as follows:

> A statute providing that proof of one fact shall constitute prima facie evidence of the existence of another fact essential to the guilt of the accused is not void for want of due process of law, where there is some natural and rational relation or connection between the fact proved and the ultimate fact presumed and the accused is afforded a fair and reasonable opportunity to repel the presumption and submit all the facts being on the issue to the jury . . .

Here you have exactly that situation. You have the fact—possession. You have the statute drawing from the fact of possession the inference that the possession was for the purpose of trafficking; and you have here some natural and rational relation or connection between the fact proved, that is the possession, and the ultimate fact presumed, that is the purpose of trafficking.

You go on and you have also the situation where the accused is afforded, and he is expressly afforded it by this statute, a fair and reasonable opportunity to repel the presumption and to submit all the facts bearing on the issue to the jury. That is the authority of Corpus Juris, and there have been a number of such cases in the United States.

There is a decision of the United States supreme court in the case of Mobile Jackson and Kansas City Railroad Company v. J. A. Turnipseed. The judgment in that case contains the following passage:

> The statute does not, therefore, deny the equal protection of the law, or otherwise fail in due process of law, because it creates a presumption of liability, since its operation is only to supply an inference of liability in the absence of other evidence contradicting such inference.

The judgment continues:

> That a legislative presumption of one fact from evidence of another may not constitute a denial of due process of law or a denial of the equal protection of the law, it is only essential that there shall be some rational connection between the fact proved and the ultimate fact presumed, and that the inference of one fact from proof of another shall not be so unreasonable as to be a purely arbitrary mandate.

A criminal case in point where another United States supreme court decision was made is the case of Yee Hem v. United States of America, where the judge referred expressly to the presumption of innocence and the rule against self-incrimination. He said as follows:

> The legislative provisions here assailed satisfy these requirements in respect of due process. They have been upheld against similar attacks, without exception so far as we are advised, by the lower federal courts.

Then the judge said:

> Every accused person, of course, enters upon his trial clothed with the presumption of innocence, But that presumption may be overcome, not only by direct proof, but, in many cases, when the facts standing alone are not enough, by the additional weight of a countervailing legislative presumption. If the effect of the legislative act is to give to the facts from which the presumption is drawn an artificial value to some extent, it is no more than happens in respect of a great variety of presumptions not resting upon statute.

He went on:

> The point that the practical effect of the statute creating the presumption is to compel the accused person to be a witness against himself may be put aside with slight discussion. The statute compels nothing. It does no more than to make possession of the prohibited article prima facie evidence of guilt. It leaves the accused entirely free to testify or not, as he chooses. If the accused happens to be the only repository of the facts necessary to negative the presumption arising from his possession, that is a misfortune which the statute under review does not create, but which is inherent in the case. The same situation might present itself if there were no statutory presumption, and a prima facie case of concealment with knowledge of unlawful importation were made by the evidence. The necessity of an explanation by the accused would be quite as compelling in that case as in this; but the constraint upon him to give testimony would arise there, as it arises here, simply from the force of circumstances, and not from any form of compulsion forbidden by the constitution.

I put these additional authorities from the United States on the record, Mr. Chairman, not for a moment suggesting that United States authorities are binding in Canada. I have frequently made it clear in the past that they are not. I simply put them on record because they are illustrative of the process of thought of eminent jurists who have held that provisions similar to the one now before us do not constitute an abuse of due process, nor do they run contrary to the principle of the presumption of innocence until proven guilty.

I suggest that these United States authorities are of illustrative value only, but when they are added to an authority of binding value such as a decision of the Ontario appeal court, I hope that temporarily, at any rate, the concern and the doubts of my hon. friends will be set at rest.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, the minister is no doubt correct when he speaks about possession. Under certain conditions possession creates a presumption under the provisions of the Criminal Code. I refer to recent possession, possession of burglary tools, the possession of narcotics or the possession of explosives, where there is nothing else said as to the type of possession. Simple possession might create a presumption in those circumstances.

However, in this bill there is a qualification of the type of possession which creates the offence. Before we began discussing section 33 I bring to the minister's attention the fact that section 32 does qualify the type of possession which creates an offence under this bill.

Section 32 (2) says:

> No person shall have in his possession any controlled drug for the purpose of trafficking.

So we have in this section a qualification of the type of possession which creates an offence. If we then turn to section 33 which deals with the possession, surely the minister does not think he can, under that section, sheer away from the quality of the type of possession set up in the preceding section. You cannot eliminate the type of possession you define elsewhere. You cannot read section 33 as defining possession without considering the definition created in section 32. You have established that it must be for trafficking, and when a complaint is lodged it cannot be lodged in respect of anything else. If you can prove the man was in possession for the purpose of trafficking he must explain the kind of trafficking. The moment you say nothing and remain mute with regard to the quality of possession and do not show that the accused was found in possession for trafficking, I imagine a competent defence lawyer would simply say: you have not proven the principal ingredient of the offence, namely that the accused was in possession for the purpose of trafficking.

I submit it would not stand up if the minister were to contend that an accused person was found in mere possession. You cannot say, under section 33, that mere possession means anything unless you attach to it the quality of the type of possession created in the same statute in the preceding section. Once you have established the quality of the type of possession and proved that the accused has placed upon him the obligation to get into the box and defend himself or explain the circumstances of possession. But until such time as that is proven, no valid case exists. Until the crown has proved possession for the purpose of trafficking, I submit there is no burden of proof shifted to the accused. To say that mere possession of a controlled drug applies in the same way as it does with respect to a section in the Criminal Code is, in my view, altogether wrong. It is my considered opinion that section 33 when it speaks of possession means possession for the purpose of trafficking and not just simple possession.

Mr. Drysdale: Would the hon. member permit a question? He says that under section 31 (b) possession is defined as possession within the terms of the Criminal Code. In the Criminal Code it says:

> For the purposes of this act,
> (a) a person has anything in possession when he has it in his personal possession or knowingly
> (i) has it in the actual possession or custody of another person, or > (ii) has it in any place, whether or not that place belongs to or is occupied by him, for the use or benefit of himself or of another person; and
> (b) where one of two or more persons, with the knowledge and consent of the rest, has anything in his custody or possession, it shall be deemed to be in the custody and possession of each and all of them.

Does the hon. member not feel that this particular definition shifts the statutory onus on to the accused to prove a prima facie case that he was not in possession for the purpose of trafficking?

Mr. Crestohl: I shall be glad to answer that question. Of course, the definition of possession here is perfect but that applies only to the case of a definition which is not otherwise qualified by a statute. In this bill we have the word "possession" qualified and given a meaning according to all the circumstances. It does not fall within the general definition of "possession" which we have here in section 32. I shall read it once more for the benefit of the hon. member:

> (1) No person shall traffic in a controlled drug or any substance represented or held out by him to be a controlled drug.
> (2) No person shall have in his possession any controlled drug for the purpose of trafficking.

We have given meaning, here, to the type of possession intended.

(Translation):

Mr. Martineau: I should like to say just a few words to refute the argument which the hon. member for Cartier has submitted and which the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont mentioned previously.

The hon. member claims that there is nothing in common between section 33 of the bill which we are considering now and the provisions of the Criminal Code under which the onus of proof rests with the accused after the crown has proved an essential fact like possession. He said that under this section, the crown merely has to prove possession, without regard to the type of possession, and that the accused has placed upon him then the obligation to explain the circumstances of possession.

There are several sections of the Criminal Code where that principle applies but I will read only the following, which is section 80:

> Every one who without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him,
> (a) makes or has in his possession . . . is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.

Now, possession in this case is qualified in that it must be without lawful excuse.

On the other hand, section 32 provides that the controlled drug in the possession of the accused must be for the purpose of trafficking; that is how possession is qualified.

In that case qualified possession must be without lawful excuse and for the purposes of trafficking.

Section 80 states that it is the accused who must prove lawful excuse. Here is what it says:

> Every one who without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him—

Therefore, if the accused takes the attitude that he has nothing to answer and if the crown proves possession, the court is fully justified to infer that such possession is "without lawful excuse" and, therefore, the accused may be found guilty.

Under this bill, if the accused does not submit any plea after the crown has proved possession, the crown can infer that the accused is guilty.

Therefore, there is a striking analogy between the two provisions, and in either case, the principle remains that the onus always rests with the crown to prove the accused guilty beyond any doubt; but at a certain stage of the procedure, the onus may be transferred from the crown to the accused, and even when the accused has given some proof of legal possession or has proved that he had no intention of trafficking, there again the crown may, by way of rebuttal, prove that the facts the accused attempted to establish are unfounded.

It is precisely on that point that the Ontario court of appeal gave a decision recently in the case mentioned by the Minister of Justice: Regina v. Guertin.

Another point I should like to make in reply to the suggestion of the hon. member for Cartier, is that the accused does not necessarily have to appear in the witness box. He is free to do so if he wishes to prove his innocence or to establish that the possession of drug was not illegal. But he has many other ways of proving this and, therefore, there is no violation of the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Martineau: Yes.

Mr. Deschatelets: Suppose a person is charged with trafficking in controlled drugs—in this case goof balls—and the crown establishes possession under section 33, but the accused decides not to move and just to adopt a waiting attitude. Would the hon. member, who has been a crown attorney, kindly tell me whether in such a case he thinks the accused should be found guilty under section 33 (3)?

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, I would not want to deal with this at great length. The accused is then in the same position as one charged under section 80 when the crown has proved possession of explosives.

Mr. Deschatelets: Let me add only a word. Would the hon. member for Pontiac, who has acted as a crown attorney, be satisfied if one of his clients, having been brought to court under a charge of goof ball trafficking, decided not to put up any defence, and if the judge, after the crown had proved possession, found him guilty under section 33(3) of trafficking in goof balls when in fact only possession of goof balls would have been established and when possession is not an offence under the act?

Would the hon. member tell me how he can reconcile this nonsense which is something totally new in our legislation?

The minister referred a moment ago to court decisions. Never has a law with such a nonsensical provision been passed. I have never seen any, nor have I ever heard of such a thing.

Mr. Martineau: It is because you do not understand.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could be allowed to reply to the hon. gentleman. He has made a fundamental error in his judgment regarding what an accused would be convicted of. He said a moment ago that if the crown proved possession, and the accused person gave no evidence, nor took the box himself to give evidence on his own behalf, the judge would have to convict the accused of trafficking.

Mr. Deschatelets: Yes, of trafficking.

Mr. Fulton: That is where my hon. friend is in error.

Mr. Deschatelets: That is the charge.

Mr. Fulton: If my hon. friend will read the bill he will find that the charge is possession for the purpose of trafficking. Therefore, an accused will not be convicted of trafficking, but will be convicted of having possession for the purpose of trafficking, which is very different indeed from being convicted of having trafficked or of trafficking.

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the hon. minister answer a question at this point? How will an accused be found guilty of an offence which has not been proven?

Mr. Fulton: The offence must be proven by evidence presented in conjunction with the inference of fact which the statute creates. The statute creates an inference of fact. That is, once it has been proven that an accused was in possession of goof balls, the statute creates the inference that the possession was for the purpose of trafficking, and the onus shifts to the accused to establish that the possession was lawful or was not for that purpose.

Mr. Crestol: Would the minister say that an accused would be found guilty because the accused remained silent?

Mr. Deschatelets: That is the whole point.

Mr. Fulton: The accused is always found guilty if he remains silent after the crown has proven a prima facie case.

Mr. Crestohl: Does the minister contend that when the crown has proven simple possession, without establishing that the possession was for the purpose of trafficking, that would be a prima facie case?

Mr. Fulton: Oh, most certainly, in the light of the inference which the statute creates, as other statutes in many cases create inferences. For example, section 80 of the Criminal Code creates the inference that possession is for an unlawful purpose. In that case the crown does not have to prove the unlawful purpose, but merely the possession. Once that has been established the section provides that the onus is upon the accused to prove lawful possession. The supreme court of Ontario has held that there is no contravention of the bill of rights in this regard. This statute creates the inference that an accused, who has been found to be in possession, is in possession for the purpose of trafficking, and the onus then falls upon him to prove otherwise.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the minister has sought vainly to impress us with the validity of his position. We in turn have sought vainly to give him the facts as to the interpretation of this bill, as we see them in the light of this section. I suggest to the minister that we have now reached the point where we cannot convince one another. The fact is that throughout this discussion there has existed an honest difference of opinion. However, that difference of opinion, I suggest, is strongly indicative of that which will happen in the case of any statute which we believe to have been formulated ambiguously without the kind of precision which should obtain, having in mind the objective.

The minister has rejected our interpretation, and has refused to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, that this matter be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for an opinion which could be readily obtained before the end of June, thereby clearly establishing the situation, giving to this act the effect of the purpose intended. We cannot do any more than we have done. We believe that our position is sound. We believe the Guertin case, while similar in one particular, is distinguishable in another.

For these reasons we believe that section 2 of the bill of rights will be violated by this proposed act, in that the presumption of innocence principle has not been recognized. We believe that the Minister of Justice in consequence has failed to act in accordance with section 3 of the bill of rights, which causes him to advise this house in respect of any draft or bill which is in violation of the bill of rights, or which could be regarded as a violation or contravention of that statute. We have had a long argument this afternoon, during which we have presented our opinions. We regret that we are unable to convince the Minister of Justice. Nevertheless, we are certain that this legislation will be contested in the courts by defence counsel in the way that we have indicated.

Mr. Fulton: I am quite prepared to admit that the legislation will be tested in the courts. I am also prepared to admit that there is a difference of opinion here. There was a difference of opinion between counsel in the Guertin case. That difference of opinion was so strong that counsel felt it was worth while to appeal the decision. My point is, that counsel on one side was satisfied there was no violation of the bill of rights, and that point of view was upheld in the courts. The situation is similar here. We are satisfied that the hon. gentlemen have argued their case with just as much vehemence as persuasive force, but they have not convinced me that they are right. If the courts agree with my hon. friend, then I shall be the first to admit that he was right.

Mr. Roberge: Will the minister permit a question at this time? He spoke about the Guertin case. Is this the case where explosives were involved?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Roberge: Under section 80 of the code?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Drysdale: Mr. Chairman, the thing that has concerned me particularly is the reasoning of the hon. member for Essex East. On the one hand, he says that the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean has done a tremendous service to the nation in publicizing the goof ball problem. The hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean has in effect indicated the tremendous danger of those goof balls and the fact that they can be put into soft drinks and alcohol. In fact, they are almost like handling dynamite. When by this legislation the crown has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that somebody has in his possession what is clearly in effect dynamite ready to blow up, then it seems reasonable that the person who has it in his possession is the person who would himself know why he has it in his possession and should be called on to give a reasonable explanation why he has it in his possession. Under the legislation he does not have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt why he has this dynamite. As I see it, he merely has to give a reasonable explanation. He can give any explanation, such as that he obtained it from a druggist, or by prescription, or any other explanation which is inconsistent with trafficking.

But the hon. member for Essex East says, on the one hand, I am trying to back up my hon. friend from Outremont-St. Jean but on the other hand I do not understand what is going on. He wants to set loose this dynamite—

Mr. Deschatelets: We want a good bill.

Mr. Drysdale: —which is doing damage to a great number of juveniles whom the federal government has sought to protect by bringing in this legislation. The persons that we are trying to protect are those who, if they have goof balls in their possession, are quite competent to give a very reasonable and innocent explanation of their possession. I think the legislation is quite clear. The legislation when enacted will enact what we have had in legislation in many years past and what they have in legislation in the United Kingdom as well.

I am shocked and amazed at my hon. friend from Essex East taking this very negative view of this excellent legislation which his hon. friend from Outremont-St. Jean has backed up. I just cannot understand it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I had not intended to say any more on this bill, but the remarks of my hon. friend cause me to say this. We believe this bill is needed. The other night when this matter was discussed we indicated our support of the principle of the bill and we also indicated we believed that it was as a result of the efforts of the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean that the government had been persuaded at long last to bring forward this legislation. Are we to take the position, which the hon. gentleman seeks to place us in, that because we support this bill and because at the same time we find that in our judgment one of its provisions violates the bill of rights we are not to point it out? That is the argument of my hon. friend. That is what my hon. friend is now indicating. By his remarks he wants to leave the impression that although we have praised the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean, although we have praised this bill, we are now in effect taking a position which suggests that this bill should not be passed in this form and consequently the corrective measures envisaged should not be pursued.

We want this bill to operate; we want it to operate in a most effective way. It is not characteristic of the hon. gentleman, for whom I have the highest esteem, to say that because we point out what we believe to be a violation of one section of the bill of rights, on that account we are to be justifiably accused of not being in favour of so positive a measure as this. That was not worthy of the hon. gentleman. There is no consistency whatsoever.

I should have thought that the hon. member who was so enthused over the Prime Minister's championing of the bill of rights would be the first to join with us in pointing out to the Minister of Justice that he as one of the precursors of this bill of rights has now been proven to be one of its most serious violators. That is what I thought the hon. gentleman would do. Instead of that he seeks to suggest that we are not in favour of this constructive measure.

Mr. Drysdale: I can come to no other conclusion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Everyone in this chamber is in favour of this bill and we can thank the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean for it.

Mr. Roberge: A little while ago I asked the minister a question with relation to the Guertin case, which he cited. I wish to refer to the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue who also spoke on section 80 of the Criminal Code. I see a difference between the clause we are considering and section 80 of the Criminal Code. Let me read section 80:

> Every one who without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him,
> (b) has in his possession a bomb, grenade or other explosive weapon, > is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable—

And so forth.

If I were wording the section I would say:

> Every one who has in his possession a bomb, grenade, or other explosive weapon is guilty of an indictable offence except that he may have a lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him.

The first principle of section 80 of the Criminal Code is that possession of an explosive is an unlawful act. Then, when the crown has proven that, the accused may bring forward an excuse. The Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, chapter 201 of the statutes of 1952, section 4, provides that the mere possession is an offence. In the bill that we shall be discussing later, namely Bill No. C-100, mere possession is an offence. In this instance mere possession is not an offence and, therefore, it is my view that the crown should be obliged to discharge the complete onus of proving that possession is for the purpose of trafficking, and not just mere possession.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I have a concrete example to give. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) told us the other day that he could not in the circumstances, and we understand him, make an offence of a simple possession because each of us has at home some of those barbiturates when they are needed.

Well, according to clause 33 of the bill before us, related to clause 36, any law officer may come to my house, take away the barbiturates which I may have in my medicine cabinet and bring me to court for possession and for traffic of barbiturates. Then, I have to prove that lawfully bought those barbiturates at a drug store and that I am entitled to have them.

I therefore submit that clause 33 goes really too far and I again urge the minister to consider our views.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to prolong this discussion. I would simply refer my hon. friend from Megantic to the fact that if he will read section 80 of the Criminal Code, which was the section in question in the Guertin case, he will surely agree with me that it is not the simple fact of possession which is the offence; it is possession without lawful excuse, and the onus of proving lawful excuse is, by the section, placed explicitly on the accused.

Here the charge is possession for the purpose of trafficking. The crown has to prove possession, then the onus is on the accused to prove the possession was lawful or was not for the purpose of trafficking. The situation seems to me very closely paralleled. May I just remind my hon. friend that all the accused has to prove to rebut the presumption which proof of possession has raised is either that he acquired the material from a druggist through a prescription, that he got it through a prescription, or that he does not have it for the purpose of trafficking. As I say, he can rebut the presumption by proving either that his possession was innocent or that it was not for an unlawful purpose. I cannot go further than that. The two cases do seem to me to be very much on all fours.

Mr. Roberge: Would the minister permit a further question? Does he not agree that under section 80 possession is presumed first to be unlawful and then it is up to the accused to prove that it was lawful for him to have the dynamite or explosive? In this case it may be lawful to have goof balls in one's possession.

Mr. Fulton: I am afraid I cannot agree with that. Possession under section 80 is not presumed to be unlawful because the section says "Every one who without lawful excuse". Therefore it is recognized that possession may be lawful. It is recognized by section 80 that possession may be lawful but the onus is on the accused to prove a lawful excuse. So here by section 33 it is recognized that possession may be for an innocent purpose but it is up to the accused to prove either that possession was innocent or that it was for an innocent purpose. I could not envisage anything very much more closely parallel than these two sections.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I should like to carry that point further. I have listened very carefully tonight to lawyers on both sides of the house and I must frankly admit that for most of the time they were away over my head. However, as a layman I should like to pursue this matter for a moment. The minister said that it is not presumed that people are in illegal possession of these substances but in the same breath he said that all the crown has to do is to prove that they have possession and once the crown has proved that the onus is on the accused to prove that he does not have possession illegally. That is the crux of the whole thing. If the crown proves you have possession then, as I have listened to the discussion and understood it, you have possession illegally unless you can prove otherwise. I think that is the whole point.

Mr. Fulton: You have it for an unlawful purpose unless you prove otherwise. That is quite true. Just as in section 80, unless you prove you have it for a lawful purpose you are presumed to have it for an unlawful purpose.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I am not familiar with the sections of the bill of rights, but is this not contrary to British justice under which you are innocent until you are proven guilty? In this instance you are guilty unless you can prove yourself innocent.

Mr. Fulton: I have endeavoured all evening to explain and to establish, and I think with success—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not at all.

Mr. Fulton: —that it is not contrary to the principles of criminal justice which for years have drawn a distinction between presumption of innocence and onus of proof. The crown always has the onus of proof and it is not until the crown has proven a prima facie case that the onus of replying passes to the accused. Proof of the case may be by inference from facts which the crown establishes and these inferences may be drawn either by the court itself from the circumstances or because a statute establishes that certain inferences can be drawn from these facts. That is what is done here.

If my hon. friend will look at the section, he will see that the crown has to prove possession. The onus then shifts to the accused and the accused can establish innocent possession. If he makes out a prima facie case in that regard, the onus shifts back to the crown to rebut it. There is no shifting at any time of the principle that the accused is innocent until proven guilty. It is a matter of the burden of proof.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): If he does not prove innocent possession, he is automatically guilty.

Mr. Fulton: Once the crown has proven the facts upon which it relies, yes.

The Chairman: Shall clause 33 carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Clause 1, section 33, agreed to.

Clause 1, section 34, agreed to.

Clause 1 as amended agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the report be received? Now?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): May I ask a question? If I move third reading at this time, will I have the opportunity of replying later if there is a debate?

Mr. Speaker: We have not come to third reading yet. The question may not be relevant, but if we do come to third reading I shall answer the question. When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have more arguments.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

DRUGS

PROVISION FOR CONTROL OF DISTRIBUTION AND SALE OF NARCOTICS

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-100, an act to provide for the control of narcotic drugs.—The Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I call it 10.30?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader if we will be dealing with legislation tomorrow and in what order?

Mr. Churchill: We will deal with legislation tomorrow and third readings will come first on the program. Then we will take second reading of the bill to amend the Judges Act and the Exchequer Court Act. The third item will be Bill No. C-100, to provide for the control of narcotic drugs. The fourth item will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce dealing with the Export Credits Insurance Act. Item No. 5 will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Agriculture dealing with the Farm Credit Act. Item No. 6 will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance with respect to amending the Financial Administration Act. Item No. 7 will be Bill No. C-98, an act to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

ALBERT VILANDRÉ

Question No. 233—Mr. Dupuis:

1. Did Albert Vilandré, who occupies building 124 at the Royal Canadian Air Force base at St. Jean, Quebec, in the period from January 1, 1958, to January 1, 1961, ever sell the following items: watches, jewellery of all kinds, electrical appliances, bicycles, radios, record players, washing machines, frigidaires, etc.; (a) on the property of the R.C.A.F. (b) in the city of St. Jean, through R.C.A.F. officers or employees?

2. Does the same Albert Vilandré hold a retail trade licence? If so, for what classes of goods?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence):

1. (a) Mr. Albert Vilandré has been authorized to operate, from building 124 on R.C.A.F. station St. Jean, a concession established to provide a soft drink dispensing service, an automatic photo machine, ice cream bar vending machines, coin operated weight scales, cigarette vending machines, candy vending machines and a popcorn making machine. It is understood that Mr. Vilandré, who is a manufacturers' distributor in the area and has a warehouse in the city of St. Jean, has made arrangements from time to time for individual station personnel to purchase from him the various types of items referred to by the hon. member, although such items are not stocked in building 124.

(b) No R.C.A.F. officer or station employee has ever been authorized to act as agent for Mr. Vilandré for the sale in the city of St. Jean of the articles mentioned, nor does the R.C.A.F. have any knowledge of this having happened.

2. Mr. Vilandré has posted bond with the municipal authorities covering all classes of merchandise mentioned in this question. In addition, he is in possession of the requisite provincial licence.

VETERANS AFFAIRS PERSONNEL, PETERBOROUGH

Question No. 247—Mr. Pitman:

1. How many people have been working full-time in the Department of Veterans Affairs subdistrict office in Peterborough since January 1, 1961, apart from the administration of the Veterans Land Act?

2. What are the addresses, salaries, and official positions of these people?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs):

1. None.

2. N/A.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 7, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Sixth report of standing committee on veterans affairs—Mr. Montgomery.

TRADE

GRAIN—REPORTED DIFFICULTY IN OBTAINING UNLOADING PUMPS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that several departments of government are concerned with respect to certain events which have received a large degree of prominence in today's press, I have a statement to make. The house is aware, of course, of reports that have been given prominence and in some cases accompanied by what might be called scare headlines concerning difficulties being experienced in procuring special high capacity suction pumps for unloading certain ships carrying grain from eastern Canadian ports to communist China.

I would point out immediately that the absence of available suction pumps applies only to tankers and not to freight or cargo ships.

The case in question is quite different from some cases which have caused trouble in the past because some earlier cases implied an assertion, as interpreted by Canada, of the exercise of extraterritorial jurisdiction and were regarded as interference with Canadian sovereignty. In the current case the product in question is a United States product and the supplying firm is a United States firm located in the United States, and it has no Canadian subsidiary.

As we expect others to respect our sovereignty, so we must recognize the right of the United States, in its wisdom, to legislate and regulate with respect to its products and the course to be followed by its nationals. However, we are concerned over any action that would affect Canada's important grain trade, and immediately the matter came to our attention yesterday afternoon we proceeded to do everything possible to facilitate the continued and continuing movement of grain to China.

Discussions have already taken place at the official level; Ambassador Heeney has seen those officers of the United States government concerned with this particular matter, and a review is being undertaken as a result. In the meantime the government has taken steps to investigate any existing sources of supply, either in Canada or in other countries, or to develop an alternative source quickly within Canada for this unusual equipment.

The high-powered pumps that are used in order to unload tankers are not standard equipment. The need to have such pumps on board ship arises principally when the port of delivery has not been in the habit of receiving large shipments, especially in large tankers, and therefore does not have suitable equipment installed on the docks.

Inquiries have been made in the United Kingdom and in Europe through the trade commissioner service as to alternatives, and a representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce is this morning conferring at a plant in the province of Ontario which is at the moment the most likely prospective producer. We believe that Canadian corporations can produce the necessary suction pumps, and the company in question to which I have made reference assures us that it can produce suction pumps with a capacity of 300 tons per day compared with a capacity of 600 tons a day for the equipment in question produced in the United States. Meetings are taking place this morning with the Canadian shipping federation to work out arrangements for determining the volume and timing of requirements and for co-ordinating the necessary procurement or production. I should add that the owners and operators of the ships involved recognize the responsibilities they have under their charter arrangements with the Chinese importer. The government will facilitate and co-ordinate their efforts in every appropriate manner.

The government is determined that these grain shipments, which are of such importance to Canada, shall proceed without interruption and without delay. So far shipments from the east and west coasts of Canada have been well up to schedule, and we intend to maintain the movement in question. In so far as the Canadian company is concerned, we are assured that the necessary pumps can be delivered within three weeks, and we have advised the shipping companies accordingly as to the availability of these pumps. I would emphasize that there is no basis whatsoever for the suggestion that this event will in any way endanger the continued carrying out of the agreement made between the Chinese government and the wheat board. That should be emphasized. This has been blown up into a very much more serious incident than the facts would warrant.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has stated, very considerable publicity has been given to the question he has raised in his statement. That publicity in fact, Mr. Speaker, extended to an announcement that the Prime Minister himself would be speaking about the matter. In view of what the Prime Minister has said and the information he has given us, it is unfortunate indeed that this publicity should have extended to such headlines as "Canadian Protest is Planned". Indeed, Mr. Speaker, one report said that Canada planned to make "the strongest possible representations to the United States".

I gather from what the Prime Minister has said that there is no question of a protest or representations because, if I understood him aright, in this particular incident the United States treasury was enforcing its own law against a United States company. It is unfortunate that this kind of difficulty could not have been resolved without this kind of publicity.

Perhaps one way in which this matter could be settled is the way the Prime Minister has mentioned, that of having these suctions pumps made in Canada in time. If that is not possible, I think another way in which the matter could be solved to the satisfaction of all concerned would be by having the Canadian Commercial Corporation become the purchaser of the pumps in question. In that case it would be a transaction between governments, and the United States law would not be involved in any way. The pumps could then be made available to the ships in question for the unloading of Canadian grain.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, we have enough difficulties and enough real problems between our two countries at the present time to do our best to avoid the manufacture of issues of this kind.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in view of the need to speed up grain deliveries from western Canada to the export markets of the world I do not feel that this issue has been blown up beyond proper proportions. I think it is a reflection on the relations between Canada and the United States—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: —that we should be subjected to this kind of treatment which will interfere and which does interfere with the speedy export of Canadian grain following the conclusion of an agreement with China.

I do not think there is any doubt that the United States had the right in law to take this action. I am not saying that the United States does not have the sovereign right to take this action. Nevertheless, taking this action toward a friendly country and an ally, as we are, I think is a mistake, and I hope that the representations that have been made will result in this equipment being provided immediately.

This is not the first instance of interference in the sale and delivery of grain to the China market. We have had instances reported in the newspapers where milling companies in Canada which are subsidiaries of United States corporations refused to accept flour contracts and sell flour in the China market.

We naturally express the hope that if it is necessary for Canada to produce this equipment, it can be done within a very, very short time. Even a delay of three weeks in the production of this equipment may delay the delivery of the additional quantity of grain for this year, being 28 million bushels of wheat and 17 million bushels of barley. Mr. Speaker, the quota situation on the prairies is much worse today than it was a year ago—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should not take advantage of his right of comment to enter into debate about the wheat situation on the prairies.

Mr. Argue: This emphasizes, Mr. Speaker, the urgency—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I warned the hon. member, and I expect him to observe the warning.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I naturally do not want to enter into any controversy, but I am glad to see the interest that the hon. gentleman now shows in the sale to China which previously he said did not exist.

However, I would say that if we are able to secure production in Canada within three weeks, that will not in any way hold up the course of delivery of the shipments. What we will do in that case is this, and it will cover the situation completely. The production will take place; it will cost a little more, but we will be able to deliver this necessary equipment by air or whatever means is necessary to whatever port in China delivery is to be made. It will be some three or four weeks before this particular equipment will be necessary.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Not only has the Prime Minister made a second statement on motions, but he has said that in remarks I made on a previous occasion I said that this sale did not exist.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: That statement is not correct. It is not in accordance with the facts. What I had said, and I think it is in order that I should be given this opportunity to reply to this statement—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the house will recognize the fact that the hon. member has a right to make a personal explanation. I will hear him.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, at no time did I say that this sale did not exist. What I said at the time—and I said it again this morning—was that there was a firm agreement for a sale of 28 million bushels of wheat this year and 17 million bushels of barley. That is what we are interested in. I have said, and this statement has since been confirmed by the chairman of the Canadian wheat board, that the balance is not a firm contract.

STARRED QUESTIONS

BILL OF RIGHTS—DISTRIBUTION TO PUBLIC

Question No. 359—Mr. Tardif:

1. Have copies of the bill of rights been printed for distribution to the public?
2. If so, is anything except the bill itself included in the printing?
3. How many copies have been prepared?
4. On what basis are they being distributed?
5. Has the bill of rights been inscribed on calfskin?
6. If so, was anything else inscribed with the text of the bill itself?
7. What was the cost of preparing this document, and what is its purpose?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, may this question stand in the absence of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Question stands.

POSTAL EMPLOYEES, OTTAWA—VOTES ON SHIFT WORK

Question No. 366—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1958, have any votes been conducted amongst the Post Office Department employees in the Besserer street post office concerning the question of shift work for the said employees; and, if so, with respect to each such vote (a) upon what dates was each conducted (b) amongst which employees was each conducted (c) what were the results in each case (d) were any of the ballots marked with a number or other distinguishing mark, and what are the details surrounding this matter?
2. Have any steps been taken to put into effect a program of shift work consistent with the results of the said vote, and, if so, what are the details of such steps?
3. If such steps as mentioned in part 2 have not been taken, what is the reason?
4. Under what shift arrangements do postal employees work in the main post offices in each of the following cities: Montreal, Winnipeg, Toronto, Vancouver, Hamilton?
5. Is any overtime payment made to employees of the post office department who work overtime, and, if so, what are the details about such payments?
6. How long a period of time elapses between the pay period within which a post office employee works overtime, and the pay period within which the said employee receives payment for the said overtime work?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question occupies three and a half pages of single-spaced typing, which I think the house would not want me to read. Could the question be made an order for return?

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

DR. OSTIN CANTIN, HEALTH AND WELFARE—TRIPS ABROAD

Question No. 369—Mr. Valade:

1. How many trips abroad have been made by Dr. Ostin Cantin (who is the administrative officer of the Department of National Health and Welfare in the harbour of Montreal) since April 1, 1958?
2. Which countries has he visited, in what capacity did he do so, for how long was he away, what were the purposes of his trips, and what was the cost thereof?
3. How many other persons connected with the said department in the harbour of Montreal have been sent to Europe in the carrying out of their duties?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

Dr. Ostin Cantin, medical officer in charge, quarantine, immigration medical and sick mariners services, Montreal, has made two trips abroad.

2. The countries visited by Dr. Cantin were East Pakistan and Hong Kong. The purpose of these trips was to act as medical escort to sick deportees. Both trips were made at no cost to the Department of National Health and Welfare. Dr. Cantin's absence on the first trip was from November 17 to December 21, 1959 and on the second trip from January 25 to February 28, 1961. In each case he was on official duty for approximately one week. The time Dr. Cantin was absent beyond that required for escort duty was taken as earned leave and entirely at his own expense.

3. None.

OLD AGE SECURITY CHEQUE ENVELOPES

Question No. 372—Mr. Herridge:

1. Do the monthly cheques mailed to those in receipt of old age security have typed on the envelopes the words "old age pensions"?

2. If so: (a) have representations been made to the department concerning the removal of these words on the grounds that they offend those in receipt of old age security? (b) for what reason are these words put on these envelopes? (c) has consideration been given to removing these words?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

1. The envelopes containing the monthly old age security pension cheques have the following printing on them: "Government of Canada; District Treasury Office; Department of National Health and Welfare; Family Allowances; Federal Old Age Pensions."

2. (a) No representations have been made to the department for the removal of the words "federal old age pensions".

(b) The Old Age Security Act provides that the cheque is the instrument issued in payment of a pension, and the words "federal old age pensions" have been on the envelopes since the inception of the act in January, 1952.

(c) In the absence of representation no consideration has been given to the removal of these words. That is not to say that consideration could not be given if there were occasion for it.

MRS. WILHELMINA ROBINSON, HAMILTON—ESTATE TAXES

Question No. 375—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Was the case of Mrs. Wilhelmina Robinson, 1070 King street, Hamilton, Ontario, brought to the personal attention of the minister or the acting minister?

2. Under what specific section of the Estate Tax Act (1958) was Mrs. Robinson ordered to pay estate taxes on a gift made to the estate by her late husband's former employer?

3. Has the government taken, or is it now taking, any steps to amend the provision under which Mrs. Robinson had to pay estate taxes on money which was not actually part of the estate at the time of her husband's death?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Acting Minister of National Revenue): The answer to this question is as follows:

1. No.

2. Section 3, subsection 1(L)(i) of the Estate Tax Act.

3. This involves government policy, and any announcement will be made in the usual manner.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION, NEW DRUGS—STATEMENT OF EVIDENCE

Question No. 376—Mr. Howard:

How many copies of the statement of evidence by the director of investigation and research of the combines investigation branch, regarding the selling and pricing policies of certain pharmaceutical houses in respect of new types of drugs, were sent to interested groups and people by the restrictive trade practices commission, and how many replies have been received?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is that copies of the statement were sent to 225 organizations and individuals. Acknowledgments have been received from 30 of these organizations and individuals and 17 of them have indicated a desire to make or are considering the making of representations to the restrictive trade practices commission.

[Later:]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to revert to question No. 376 for the purpose of supplementing the answer I gave. I think I said that 17 organizations and individuals had indicated their desire to make recommendations to the commission. I should have said that acknowledgments have been received from 30 organizations and individuals of whom 17 are considered making representations.

C.N.R. OFFICERS DIRECTORS IN OTHER COMPANIES

Question No. 379—Mr. Fisher:

1. Have any of the senior executive officers of the Canadian National Railways, including the vice-presidents, any directorships in other companies or corporations?

2. If so, which executives, and which companies, since what dates?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1 and 2. The policy of the company with respect to the subject matter referred to in the question is as follows.

Under the Canadian National Railways Act the chairman of the board of directors of the railway is precluded from becoming a director of an outside company, but there is no similar legal restriction applicable to other railway officers.

In these circumstances the general view of the board of directors of the railway is that such other officers should not be prevented from accepting outside directorships provided that acceptance will not involve any conflict of interest or interfere with the carrying out of their duties with the Canadian National. The board considers it to be advisable, however, that before an officer accepts an outside directorship the matter should be referred to the president for decision on the facts of the particular case.

The records of the company as to this date indicate that officers holding directorships in commercial corporations are as follows:

D. C. Gonder, vice-president, Atlantic region, director of Canadian Premier Life Insurance Co., Winnipeg, Man.

H. W. Craig, traffic manager, foreign freight, director of James Wilson & Co. Ltd., 731 Common St., Montreal, Que. (steamship supplies).

SALE PRICE OF CF-100 PLANES

Question No. 380—Mr. Badanai:

1. What was the price paid for each of the eleven CF-100s sold by crown assets disposal corporation to J. L. McMaster of Westbourne, Manitoba?
2. Were there other bids and what were they?
3. Who made the decision that these aircraft were obsolete and of no further use in our defence?
4. Who authorized the disposal of the eleven CF-100s?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production):

1. 220,000 pounds of contaminated scrap consisting of eleven airframes and engines were sold to Westbourne Supply, Westbourne, Manitoba, for a lot price of $3,413.13.

2. Yes. They were:

	Lot bids
American Metal Steel Co. Ltd., Winnipeg, Manitoba	$2,152.95
Syrota Bros. Metal and Cartage Ltd., Winnipeg	1,500.00
Sabre Industries Ltd., Winnipeg	103.00

3. Minister of National Defence (recommendation of chiefs of staff).

4. The scrap was declared surplus to the requirements of the Department of National Defence and disposed of under the Surplus Crown Assets Act according to usual disposal policies of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

TRAVELLING EXPENSES, POSTMASTER GENERAL

Question No. 381—Mr. Denis:

1. What has been the cost to the federal government of the travelling expenses of the postmaster general during the month of May 1961?
2. What means of transport were supplied to him, free of charge, by the government?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): The answer is as follows:

1. $317.33.

2. Department of Transport aircraft: 17 May, Ottawa to Montreal and return; 21 May, Ottawa to Calgary; 26 May, Ottawa to Peterborough; 27 May, Peterborough to Toronto.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to raise a question of privilege. The question just asked and answered deals with the travelling expenses of a particular cabinet minister for a particular month, and the answer is given as a certain sum of money.

On November 25, 1960 I filed a question asking for travelling expenses incurred by other members of the government between September 1, 1960 and October 31, 1960. Though the dates are different, both these questions deal with travelling expenses. This question of mine, No. 28, was made an order for return which was filed on May 25. I have a copy of sessional paper 216(a) which reads as follows with respect to my question of November 25:

> There is no official record from which the information called for by this order of the house can be drawn. Under a well established practice expenses incurred by cabinet ministers when travelling on official business are paid out of departmental administration or other appropriate votes without any accounting being required therefor, irrespective of whether or not an advance is made.

My question of privilege affecting every member of this house is that incorrect information was given to me in answer to my question No. 28. That is substantiated by the answer which has now been given by the Postmaster General in reply to a specific question addressed to him on the subject of his own travelling expenses.

While it is normal to found a motion on a question of privilege, and I think in this case the motion should be one of censure on the government for refusing to file information as ordered by the house, I should like first of all to have some guidance from you, Mr. Speaker as to whether or not this question of privilege is well founded.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The best advice which could be given to the hon. member would be to read the return itself and not to confuse the facts. The Postmaster General has given an answer to starred question No. 381 concerning travelling expenses of one minister in a particular month. That information is within the knowledge of the department, and the minister, who is head of that department, has given the answer.

The hon. member for Skeena is now referring to a question asked last autumn concerning the travelling expenses of a number of ministers, indeed, I gather, of all members of the government. That necessarily must be an order for return because at that stage it is information which has to be gathered from various departments. After three years in the house the hon. member must know that where information has to be drawn from more than one department the question must, according to the invariable practice of this house, be made an order for return. This was done.

At a particular stage, when the public accounts are prepared, information of the kind sought by the hon. member can be obtained from one source, but for current months it must be drawn from the various departments concerned and accordingly an order for return has to be made.

The hon. member is complaining of something which he has not taken the trouble to read and understand. The answer he was given is a correct one and in accordance with the practice of this house. I am sure that is the understanding of all other hon. members.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Perhaps I might say a word on the point raised by the Minister of Finance. If I correctly understood the hon. member for Skeena the return stated that this information was not available in the government records. That is the basis of his point of privilege, not the fact that his question was made an order for return and that the answer was delayed. As the Minister of Finance correctly stated, that is the only course which could have been taken to deal with a question of that kind. But surely it is misleading the house to say that this information is not available and cannot be obtained, and the Postmaster General himself has contradicted this statement by the answer he has just given. It seems to me that the Postmaster General out of his own mouth has convicted the government of contempt of parliament in making such a return.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Evidently the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is determined to add to the confusion which was exhibited by the hon. member for Skeena. As a former minister, he must know the law in regard to the matter of accounting with respect to travelling expenses of ministers. He must know that. Why does he seek this morning to create confusion? The fact is that the statement contained in the return made to the hon. member for Skeena is a correct statement of the law. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate must know that from his own experience.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think, since the minister has chosen to read me a lecture about what I must know as a former member of the government, I should have the right to reply to his observations.

Mr. Speaker: I would not wish to have the discussion prolonged at this point. The difficulty arises out of answers given at considerable intervals of time. There does not appear to be urgency attached to it, and I should like to look at the returns and answers and consider the hon. member's point further before indicating whether he would have the right to proceed with a motion. If the house will permit me to reserve a decision on the matter, perhaps for several days, I think that will be the appropriate course.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Pickersgill: Then I should like to raise a question of privilege affecting my own rights as a member of the house. The Minister of Finance has chosen to make certain allegations as to what is within my own knowledge, and it is within my knowledge and recollection as a former member of the government and of treasury board that on many occasions the previous government furnished information precisely of the character asked for by the hon. member without any kind of excuse such as was offered in this case.

ROBERT E. AMARON, CENSUS STAFF, MONTREAL

Question No. 382—Mr. Denis:

1. Has the government requested the services of one Robert E. Amaron to work on the census of Canada in Montreal?
2. If so: (a) what are his duties and salary? (b) was the said Mr. Amaron president of the young Progressive Conservatives of Canada? (c) what other federal position, if any, does he hold?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Because any information required in order to reply to part 2(c) must be secured from other government agencies and departments, the reply to this question should be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

PAUL EMILE LESAGE, CENSUS STAFF, QUEBEC

Question No. 383—Mr. Deschatelets:

1. Has the federal government employed one Paul Emile Lesage of Mont Laurier, Quebec, to work on the census of Canada?
2. If so: (a) what are his duties and salary? (b) is the said Paul Emile Lesage the defeated Conservative candidate in the past by-election in the county of Labelle? (c) what other federal government position, if any, does he hold?

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, for the reason I gave in reply to question No. 382, this question should be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

C.N.R. HOTELS GENERAL MANAGER—JASPER PARK LODGE ACCOMMODATION

Question No. 384—Mr. Peters:

1. Has the general manager of the Canadian National Hotels, or any special representative of this man, spent the hotel season for 1959 and 1960 at Jasper park lodge?
2. If so, what are the duties of such a person?
3. What arrangements are made for the cost of his or her board and room?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of the Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1, 2 and 3. The general manager of hotels spent part of the 1959 and 1960 season there as part of his normal supervision of the hotel system and in the regular performance of his duties.

MACDONALD HOTEL, EDMONTON—SPECIAL STAFF PRIVILEGES

Question No. 386—Mr. Fisher:

1. In 1959 or 1960, did the Canadian National Railways investigation department send anyone from Montreal to examine complaints about special or unique privileges given to any personnel on the staff of the Macdonald hotel, Edmonton?
2. If so, what results, if any, came from the investigation?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the management of the Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1 and 2. The work of the company's investigation department is regarded as a matter of internal management, and that disclosure of its activities would be prejudicial to the interests of the company.

POST OFFICE CONTRACT, BEAUCEVILLE EST, QUE.

Question No. 387 —Mr. Racine:

1. Has the contract for the construction of a public building to be used as a post office at Beauceville Est, county of Beauce, been awarded?
2. If so, to whom was such contract awarded?

Mr. Y. R. Tassé (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

1. No.

2. Not applicable.

INDIAN BAND, CHRISTIAN ISLAND—REQUEST FOR BARGE AND TELEPHONE SERVICE

Question No. 388—Mr. Richard (Ottawa East):

1. Has a request been received from the Indian band of Christian island reserve for a barge or scow to carry truck loads of lumber from the island to the mainland?
2. If so, what disposition has been made of this request?
3. Has telephone service been established between Christian island and the mainland?
4. If so, who has access to the telephone, and at what hours?
5. Is any provision made for a pay telephone which would be available at nights and on holidays?
6. If not, for what reason?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

1. Yes.

2. No action has been taken on this request as the barge presently in use is considered to be sufficiently large to handle the present production of lumber. Should conditions change, consideration will be given to the band's request.

3. There is a radiotelephone service between Christian island and the mainland. That is Midland, Ontario, which is rented from Georgian Bay Airways. Arrangements are being made to rent an improved service from the Bell Telephone Company.

4. The telephone is located in the Indian agency office and is for the use of the staff, although it can be used by the general public in cases of emergency. The agency office is open from Monday to Friday inclusive between 8.30 a.m. and 5.15 p.m.

5. No.

6. The department has approached the Bell Telephone company in regard to the installation of a pay radiotelephone on Christian island for public use. However, the installation would be costly and would involve certain technical difficulties. The matter now rests with the Indian band council to decide whether they are willing to pay the costs and assume responsibility for the protection of the equipment.

PUBLIC ROAD, POORMAN INDIAN RESERVE, SASK.

Question No. 389—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Is there a public road across Poorman Indian reserve, No. 88, in Saskatchewan?
2. If so, when was this road built, and by whom?
3. Was the land on which the road was built surrendered for that purpose?
4. If not, who has jurisdiction over the road, and how is the jurisdiction exercised?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

1. No. All reserve roads are private and still form part of the over-all reserve acreage.

2, 3 and 4. Not applicable.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration a question supplementary to starred question No. 389 which she answered earlier today, about a road across the Poorman Indian reserve. Can the hon. lady say whether there is a road there which is used by the public, and whether it would be competent for the band to close the road against public use should it so desire? It may be that the hon. lady would wish to take this question as notice.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I think I had better take it as notice because of the implications involved.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND

Question No. 390—Mr. McMillan:

1. At the latest available date, in respect to the unemployment insurance fund, what was the face value and market value of (a) securities held in the fund (b) securities pledged for loans to the fund?
2. What is the total amount of these loans?

Starred Questions

3. What amount of these loans is still on hand?
4. What federal contributions have been made to the unemployment insurance fund during this fiscal year?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, all answers are as of May 31, 1961.

1.(a) Par value $63,713,500. Market value $54,776,325. (b) Par value $181,089,000. Market value $147,018,817.50.

2. $140,500,000.

3. I am not clear what the hon. member means when he refers to loans "still on hand". I can only interpret that as meaning in effect what question No. 2 asks and, if so, the answer is the same. If that is not what the hon. member meant, perhaps he would clarify the question and I can answer it further.

4. $8,059,584.96.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Speaker, by that part of the question I referred to the balance still on hand.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member will submit his question the information will be given.

GOLD PLATED SYRINGE USED BY AGRICULTURE MINISTER

Question No. 394—Mr. Leduc:

1. What was the cost of gold plating the syringe used by the Minister of Agriculture in injecting a black and white milk cow?
2. Did the Department of Agriculture issue a press release on this event?
3. If so, how many issues of this release were circulated, and at what cost?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

1. $5.

2. Yes.

3. Copies were sent to all news outlets throughout Canada, including dairy newspapers, farm press, radio and television stations. This was done as part of the normal operations of the information division and it is impossible to segregate the cost of this particular operation. In all there have been eight press releases over the past two or three months regarding the completion of a $50 million program to make every area of Canada free of bovine tuberculosis, with its resulting benefit to the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL—ADDITIONAL GOVERNMENT PERSONNEL

Question No. 395—Mr. Deschatelets:

1. Have any persons been brought into the government service for the purposes of preparing for Canada's centennial?

[Mr. McMillan.]

2. If so, who are these persons, and what are their specific duties?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to both parts of this question is no, not yet.

CUSTOMS AND IMMIGRATION BUILDINGS, HIGH FALLS

Question No. 396—Mr. Badanai:

1. Will new customs and immigration buildings be constructed at the new proposed border crossing which is being moved from Pigeon river, Ontario, to a new site at High falls, or will the old buildings be moved to the new site?
2. What is the estimated cost to the federal government of construction of new buildings, or moving of the old buildings to the new site?
3. Will the present boundary crossing be closed for traffic after the relocation?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

1. A new customs immigration highway office building and a new customs examining warehouse will be constructed at the site of the new bridge over the Pigeon river at High falls.

2. According to the Department of Public Works, which is arranging the contract, the estimated cost is $190,000.

3. If necessary, with service according to requirements.

COUNTY OF WEST ABITIBI—PAYMENTS TO EMILIEN BEGIN AND JOSEPH MORIN

Question No. 397—Mr. Leduc:

During the cleaning operations on the Dagenais river and the Côté creek, in the township of Palmarolle, county of West Abitibi, in 1958 and 1959, what has been the amount of wages paid by the Department of Public Works to (a) Emilien Bégin of Palmarolle (b) Jos. Morin of Palmarolle?

Mr. Y. R. Tassé (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows:

(a) To Mr. Emilien Bégin, $824.44.

(b) Mr. Joseph Morin was not on the payroll.

REDISTRIBUTION PROCEDURE

Question No. 398—Mr. Martin (Timmins):

1. In the years 1958, 1959, and 1960, did the government give consideration to changing redistribution procedure, including the creation of a redistribution commission or commissions?
2. In the year 1961, has the government given consideration to changing redistribution procedure, including the creation of a redistribution commission or commissions?
3. Has the government given or is it giving consideration to changing redistribution procedure, including the creation of a redistribution commission or commissions, before the dissolution of this parliament?
4. If not, has consideration been given to permitting the 1952 redistribution to continue in effect, until a royal commission or a special committee reports on alternative procedure and formulae for redistribution?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in regard to parts 1 and 2 of this question, it would be improper for me to answer as to whether the government as such has given consideration to any such matter unless and until a proper announcement of policy is made. However, I should like to say that thought has been given to the procedure to be followed in connection with redistribution. I should not wish that answer to create any impression that we have reached a conclusion now on the matter or are tending toward any particular change.

In regard to parts 3 and 4, I should not of course be prepared to give any commitment regarding a future policy which would imply a decision as to whether or not redistribution would be completed before the dissolution of this parliament. However, it is obvious that it will be some considerable time before the results of the current census are available for use in redistribution by whatever procedure may be followed.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

POSTAL EMPLOYEES, OTTAWA—VOTES ON SHIFT WORK

Question No. 366—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1958, have any votes been conducted amongst the Post Office Department employees in the Besserer street post office concerning the question of shift work for the said employees; and, if so, with respect to each such vote (a) upon what dates was each conducted (b) amongst which employees was each conducted (c) what were the results in each case (d) were any of the ballots marked with a number or other distinguishing mark, and what are the details surrounding this matter?

2. Have any steps been taken to put into effect a program of shift work consistent with the results of the said vote, and, if so, what are the details of such steps?

3. If such steps as mentioned in part 2 have not been taken, what is the reason?

4. Under what shift arrangements do postal employees work in the main post offices in each of the following cities: Montreal, Winnipeg, Toronto, Vancouver, Hamilton?

5. Is any overtime payment made to employees of the Post office Department who work overtime, and, if so, what are the details about such payments?

6. How long a period of time elapses between the pay period within which a post office employee works overtime, and the pay period within which the said employee receives payment for the said overtime work?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Return tabled.

ROBERT E. AMARON, CENSUS STAFF, MONTREAL

Question No. 382—Mr. Denis:

1. Has the government requested the services of one Robert E. Amaron to work on the census of Canada in Montreal?

2. If so: (a) what are his duties and salary? (b) was the said Mr. Amaron president of the young Progressive Conservatives of Canada? (c) what other federal position, if any, does he hold?

PAUL EMILE LESAGE, CENSUS STAFF, QUEBEC

Question No. 383—Mr. Deschatelets:

1. Has the federal government employed one Paul Emile Lesage of Mont Laurier, Quebec, to work on the census of Canada?

2. If so: (a) what are his duties and salary? (b) is the said Paul Emile Lesage the defeated Conservative candidate in the past by-election in the county of Labelle? (c) what other federal government position, if any does he hold?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

VETERANS AFFAIRS—WELFARE OFFICE, PETERBOROUGH

Motion No. 137—Mr. Pitman:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the federal government or any agency or branch thereof and any other person, corporation, organization, or government since January 1, 1959, dealing with the question of the assigning of a D.V.A. welfare office to any place in the municipality of Peterborough.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is acceptable, subject to any reservations on the part of any other governments.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservation requested by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE CIRCULAR 502, 1960

Motion No. 139—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of circular 502 for the year 1960, used by the Post Office Department.

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, this particular document is a directive which circulates only within the department among employees, and as such is not officially available for general distribution. I should be delighted, however, to make it available to the hon. member in his capacity as a member of this house.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I should be in any different class than any other hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to proceed with the motion in view of what the minister has said?

Mr. Howard: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member indicates his desire to proceed with the motion.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, but having offered to make this document available to the hon. member in his capacity as a member of this house, under the rules of the house and by precedent it simply is not a document which should be allowed to be tabled.

SALE CONTRACT FOR CF-100 PLANES

Motion No. 140—Mr. McIlraith:

For a copy of the contract between Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and The Westbourne Supply Company, Westbourne, Manitoba, concerning the sale of eleven CF-100 fighter planes.

Motion agreed to.

MONETARY AWARDS, MILITARY PERSONNEL AND NON-COMBAT UNITS, NEWFOUNDLAND

Motion No. 142—Mr. Carter:

For a copy of the list of monetary awards, not included in the regular pensions list, with dates and particulars, made by the commission of government of Newfoundland and continued by the government of Canada to members of the armed services, and non-combat units such as the merchant navy and forestry units prior to union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PAKISTAN—STATEMENT OF CONSORTIUM ON AID COMMITMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called may we revert to motions? I have an announcement that is supposed to be made not only in this house but generally throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister permission to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On June 2 I reported on the outcome of meetings held in Washington last week under the auspices of the world bank for the financing of India's foreign exchange requirements during the third five year plan. I now wish to make a similar statement on Pakistan. The consortium meeting was concluded today in Washington. I do not intend to cover all the details set out in the press communique which is being released in the various capitals today. Instead, I shall report on the part Canada has played in the consortium. At the conclusion of my remarks I shall ask for leave to table copies of the communique.

The world bank had calculated that Pakistan's foreign assistance requirements for the next two fiscal years totalled $800 million. The consortium was unable to reach this target figure, but nevertheless agreed on forward commitments for 1961-62 on the basis of which the United States, the world bank and the international development association found it possible to participate, while holding the view that the original two year objective was the appropriate approach. It is their intention accordingly to revert to this plan the next consortium meeting on Pakistan due to take place in the fall.

On the basis of commitments for 1961-62, additional commitments of $320 million were made by members of the consortium, subject of course, as appropriate, to legislative action or other necessary authorization. Canada's share of this was set at $18 million a year, which is made up of $11.5 million in Colombo plan aid and the remainder in export credits in an amount of $12 million over the next two years. These sums are, of course, contingent upon approval by parliament of the Colombo plan grants for the coming year and of the amendments to the Export Credits Insurance Act.

In addition to this form of aid, I would remind the house that Pakistan in the past has been receiving grants of wheat from Canada. Pakistan has requested further shipments of wheat under the Colombo plan in the coming year at the same level as last year and, in anticipation of this, $3.65 million is being set aside for this purpose during 1961-62. The anticipated total figure for Colombo plan aid to Pakistan is thus roughly $15 million for the present fiscal year.

I might mention that the communique will show a figure of $19.8 million as aid previously committed by Canada for Pakistan. I understand that this relates entirely to Canadian Colombo plan programs started in previous fiscal years, and does not require new appropriations. This is the same procedure which has been followed with respect to those amounts shown for other countries under the already committed heading, totalling $229.3 million.

Hon. members will welcome the outcome of the international meeting just concluded in Washington, since this will help Pakistan to meet the balance of payments gap expected for 1961-62 and thus enable the Pakistanis to make essential purchases abroad in order to maintain the momentum initiated during the first year of the second five year plan.

I ask leave, sir, to table two copies of the communique. I have not a French translation of it, since it came to me only a few minutes ago.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Our attitude toward the announcement the Prime Minister has made with regard to aid to Pakistan is exactly the same as it was toward the announcement he made the other day with regard to aid to India. We support anything the government may be able to do in this regard to help Pakistan, a fellow member of the commonwealth and a staunch supporter of the free world.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): This is the type of international co-operation and action we wholeheartedly endorse. It is the type of action that has been suggested by this group over quite a number of years. We are very pleased, therefore, to hear the proposal contained in the Prime Minister's announcement. We are also glad to see that provision is made for a periodic review of the progress and development of this plan. We think this is an excellent provision to meet changing needs and circumstances and provide opportunity for adjustment as a result of experience.

We are very pleased indeed, and personally I am particularly pleased, to see Canada taking part in another proposal to assist another country within the commonwealth.

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO VIOLATIONS OF CEASE FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can comment on reports that the cease fire in Laos has been violated by both sides, and that the international commission is not in a position to even effectively report on these violations.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as yet I have had no official confirmation of press reports that a pocket of troops loyal to the Vientiane government at Ban Padong in central Laos has been under heavy attack by Pathet Lao forces during the past 24 hours and has now been overrun. However, we have received information from Geneva that the United States delegation there issued a statement today, that the United States has asked for a suspension of the conference pending further instructions from Washington in view of grave violations of the cease fire at Ban Padong.

Since May 16 the international supervisory commission has been seized with the question of breaches of the cease fire at a number of places in Laos including Ban Padong. For more than two weeks the commission has been endeavouring to visit Ban Padong or to send representatives to investigate the reported violation of the cease fire. They have been unable to do so for various reasons.

I can inform the house that a considerable portion of the commission's most recent report to the co-chairmen, that is to the United Kingdom and the Soviet union, dated June 5, deals with visits to sensitive areas. The government in Vientiane has stated that it would accept visits by the commission and was prepared to give all possible assistance within the limits of its material resources. The other two principal parties, on the other hand, have said that visits and investigations can be made only with the agreement of all three Laotian parties.

Another reason given for refusing to take any action is that the Geneva conference has not as yet adopted any principle concerning the activities of the commission. In their report the commissioners indicate that any agreed decision taken by the conference would have a helpful effect. These developments serve to underline the vital importance of a cease fire in Laos which is effectively supervised and controlled.

As I stated in the house on May 30, the Canadian government has been doing its utmost to ensure that a genuine cease fire operates throughout the whole of Laos. To do this the commission must have, first, the co-operation of the parties in Laos and, second, the co-operation of the co-chairmen and other members of the Geneva conference in sustaining and supporting it. Finally, of course, the commission must have the material means to carry out its job.

It may be too early as yet to be sure whether the discussions between President Kennedy and Premier Khrushchev over the last week end will help to solve this present difficulty over Laos. I am hopeful that such will be the result of the talks.

[Mr. Green.]

INDUSTRY

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS—REPRESENTATIONS BY AUTOMOBILE WORKERS UNION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether he has given any further consideration to the request of the united automobile workers for an interview to discuss the agricultural implement industry with the cabinet?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has not kept up with the times—and that is understandable—as to what has happened here during the last few days. The meeting is being held today.

Mr. Argue: No announcement was made in the house.

AUTOMOBILES—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct to the Prime Minister a question arising out of the great interest of the workers involved and others in Canada in the lagging automobile industry. I wonder whether the Prime Minister is in a position to inform the house when he will make public the Bladen royal commission report.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

CUBA—REPORTED SEIZURE OF EXPORTS BY CANADIAN CUSTOMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister give the house information on a so-called unofficial agreement between Canada and the United States by which the Canadian customs last week seized 165 tons of spare parts and base materials, some of which were produced in Canada, from aboard a Cuban vessel destined for Havana, as reported in this morning's Gazette? Can the minister tell the house exactly what items were seized and under what authority these items were seized?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, I had not seen the report. I will look into the matter, and I shall be glad to report to the house as soon as I have done so.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SURPLUS CF-100 PLANES—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON FLYING CONDITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. In view of the statement of Mr. James McMaster of Westbourne Supply Company that the Minister of Defence is "all wet" when he states that it would take several hundred thousand dollars each to put in flying condition the CF-100 jets that he bought from Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, and that he has all the parts, would the minister care to comment on this rather unusual and contradictory statement; and can he also inform the house as to the result of the investigation into this matter by the president of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, as was promised the house on June 2?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid Mr. McMaster will have quite a job on his hands in proving that the Minister of National Defence is "all wet".

Mr. Pickersgill: It is self evident.

Mr. O'Hurley: In reply to the hon. member's question, may I say that Mr. McMaster has written a personal letter to the president of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation saying he will dispose of the scrap as it was bought, as contaminated scrap. I have here a report from the officials of the national defence technical services unit which states as follows:

> On receipt of information that the press were reporting that these aircraft were in a flyable condition the R.C.A.F. technical services unit at Lincoln park, Alberta, were asked to confirm the class and quantity of parts removed from the aircraft prior to their declaration under the category of "contaminated scrap". As you are aware, it is our policy to salvage from aircraft of this class all armaments and classified equipment plus all parts and installed equipments which can be used to support other R.C.A.F. activities. This recovery program has the result of rendering the aircraft completely non-flyable.
> The technical services unit confirmed by telephone that the parts specified for removal had in fact been removed. The work was carried out by a Canadian Pacific Air Lines work party and completed work orders are held at the T.S.U. The R.C.A.F. technical NCO at the MacDonald site and the foreman of the C.P.A. work party confirmed to the commanding officer of the T.S.U. that to their personal knowledge the specified parts had been removed.

We still maintain our position that this is just scrap, and that Mr. McMaster has confirmed by letter that he will dispose of this as scrap. I think there is a certain scrap dealer in the country who is amusing himself at the expense of the press.

[Later:]

INQUIRY AS TO CONTINUED USE OF CF-100 PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. My question arises out of an answer that was given earlier this morning to part 3 of starred question No. 380 on today's order paper. The reply to this part of the question confirmed that the CF-100's were obsolete and of no further use for our defence. My question is this. If this is so why are we still retaining five squadrons of them in service?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, these particular 11 aircraft had been used very extensively, and their flying time was exhausted. As a result they were declared surplus and all usable parts were removed. As to the aircraft which are in use in the CF-100 squadrons which are still flying—I think the number is seven or eight—may I say that these aircraft still have a considerable number of flying hours in them and are performing a useful function.

TRANSPORT

CARILLON DAM, QUEBEC—WIDTH OF LOCK GATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Latour (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport of which I have given him notice. In view of the work being carried out by the Quebec hydro at the Carillon dam, could the minister make sure that there will be no less than 285 feet, instead of 215, between the two gates of the only lock at that dam?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Navigable Waters Protection Act stipulates that any public works which are to be carried out in a navigable river and which could interfere in any way with navigation must first be approved by the Department of Transport. I am sure that in this case the Quebec hydro will send the plans in question to my department. Consequently, I wish to assure my hon. friend that the engineers of my department will see to it that no work interferes with navigation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

(Text):

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

TAX SHARING ARRANGEMENTS—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Finance whether the discussions with the provincial government with respect to the federal-provincial tax sharing arrangements have now been concluded. If so, how soon does the minister expect to be in a position to introduce the legislation?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing further to be reported since I last gave the house a report in reply to a similar question.

FLOODS

CRESTON, B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE BY ARMY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. L. McFarlane (Kootenay East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I understand that the flood situation at Creston and in the Wynndel area of East Kootenay in British Columbia continues to be critical. I wonder whether the minister has a report on the situation and what assistance is being given by his department.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not received a further report today, but the report I received yesterday was to the effect that the water level of the Kootenay river at Creston is nearing the critical level of 25 feet, and is expected to spill over dikes south of Creston in the next 12 hours. Water pressure caused a break in the dikes at Creston. Troops and civilians are sealing the break.

The major concern to provincial authorities is that continual seepage will result in a major break. There are at present 165 troops there. Previously we had some engineers there to give technical advice and assistance, and also a water purification unit. The majority of the troops are now being employed in raising the dike level at Creston and in the area to the south of the town.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS

TRANSCONA, MAN.—CELEBRATION OF GOLDEN JUBILEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Laurier Regnier (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister aware that on Saturday, June 10 Transcona, a well known railway and industrial centre in the constituency of St. Boniface, will not only celebrate its golden jubilee but also its birth as the newest city in Manitoba, which I believe constitutes a unique historical event in Canada?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think I should say something in answer to the hon. member for St. Boniface. While ordinarily such questions do not arise, I can understand the pride of the hon. gentleman in the fact that this very admirable community is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary contemporaneously with its becoming a city, and I am sure the congratulations of all Canadians will be accorded.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): In associating myself with the congratulations offered by the Prime Minister I wonder whether the Prime Minister can hold out some hope that the workers in the railway shops in this area will have a reasonably good chance of employment, or whether they are to be laid off as threatened.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is misdirected.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO ALTERATION IN COMPOSITION OF MANAGEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport, in view of the current interest created by stories in the press, if he could indicate whether he has had any discussions with the president of the Canadian National Railways about an alteration in the balance of C.N.R. management, in which at the present time not one of the 17 vice-presidents is a French Canadian.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): This is a matter strictly for the management of the Canadian National. The government appoints the directors and the chairman of the C.N.R., but the vice presidents are all chosen by the management.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT AND CRIMINAL CODE

EXTENSION OF MORATORIUM RESPECTING B.C. FISHING INDUSTRY

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-97, to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTROL OF BARBITURATES

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-99, to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): May we have the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Pickersgill: An hon. member is attempting to speak.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few comments to make with regard to the motion for third reading of Bill No. C-99.

When this bill came up in committee of the whole, we did our utmost to improve it. We said we supported the principle of the bill, and now our only hope is that the minister will keep informed of the results of the bill, and that if it can be improved, he will put forward appropriate amendments.

Mr. Speaker, before resuming my seat, I should like to commend the person who first called the attention of the house and of Canada to the existence and seriousness of the goof ball problem. I refer to the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque). In fact, it will be recalled that at the opening of the 1958 session, in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member devoted his whole speech to this problem. He dealt with it conscientiously and boldly despite the jeers of some hon. members who failed to realize the seriousness of the problem.

At every opportunity, the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean renewed his representations, and with every speech, he managed to convince more and more of his colleagues.

Today, when this bill is about to be read a third time, circumstances prevent the hon. member from being in attendance, due to extremely important reasons. I know the minister will join us in commending the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean. Such commendation goes beyond the person of the hon. member and is directed at every private member of the house, of any party, who has strong views and puts them forward stubbornly until they are finally shared by all his colleagues.

That being said, I am pleased to state that I will, of course, support the bill. In fact, the principle of the bill has received the unanimous support of all hon. members.

(Text):

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): It is understandable that the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) should wish to pay tribute to his fellow member from Outremont-St. Jean, and of course nobody on this side of the house or in the government has ever sought or desired to take away credit due to any hon. members wherever they sit in the house. Therefore I hope the remarks I have to make will not be taken as detracting from or indicating a lack of appreciation of the interest shown in this subject either by that hon. member or by others who have spoken on the subject or who are supporting the bill.

However, I feel that a factual résumé of the steps taken to deal with this problem and bring in the legislation might put the question in its proper perspective. Several years ago reports were received indicating that barbiturates and amphetamines were easily procurable without prescription at a number of retail pharmacy outlets. As a result of studies made at that time it was not considered, however, that there then existed any illicit form of underworld traffic in these substances.

Investigations were subsequently made in an attempt to ascertain the extent to which these drugs could be purchased without prescription in retail stores. As a result of a survey made some four years ago of 2,400 drug stores, approximately half the total number in Canada, evidence was secured which warranted prosecutions being instituted against some 150 pharmacists. I am informed that a number of prosecutions were instituted accordingly.

I think this should be borne in mind more carefully than it has been, because—only as a result of overzealousness on their part, I am sure—some hon. members have sought to create the impression that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, together with the government as a whole, were not interested in this problem, or that he proceeded to deal with it only in response to pressure from one particular source. Notwithstanding the prosecutions which took place it was the opinion of the inspectors, based on their examination at that time, that there was no evidence of widespread illicit traffic in these drugs but, rather, that there were infractions of the regulations calling for their sale only on prescription.

Within the past year and a half other reports have reached us indicating that apart from infractions by retail pharmacists, there also existed a form of illicit underworld traffic in these drugs. This information was immediately passed on to the R.C.M.P. who made a thorough investigation, and the results of this investigation clearly establish that such a traffic presently exists, and that it has grown rapidly. Accordingly, well over a year ago detailed consideration began to be given to the preparation of measures designed to be effective in eliminating the underworld traffic and to control the sale of the types of drugs commonly used in goof balls.

Suggestions have been made that there has been delay in producing this legislation. May I remind hon. members of this house that this type of legislation is extraordinarily difficult to prepare. That difficulty arises primarily from the fact that we are dealing with a commodity or commodities which, when properly used, are useful and valuable adjuncts to physicians in the control of pain and in the practice of their profession. It is, therefore, with great caution that the problem of instituting a program of control over such materials is attacked, particularly when we are dealing with possession, which normally should be available to people on a physician's prescription.

When we come to establishing a system under which we acquire control of these drugs, because in the hands of certain people they may be abused, I think all hon. members will appreciate the care with which such legislation must be drawn and the difficulty of evolving a scheme of control which protects the public interest against abuse and trafficking in these materials on the one hand, but which does not violate the right of individuals to be in proper and lawful possession on the other. Furthermore, and particularly important, this control must be designed in such a way as to not expose those individuals in lawful or innocent possession to the dangers of interference, prying and, indeed, pressure and perhaps persecution by the authorities responsible or having the power to enforce such control measures.

It is for those reasons that it is not until this session that a bill has actually been introduced. It has been studied and restudied by an interdepartmental committee which has been working in respect of it ever since evidence became definite that there was illicit trafficking in these drugs for the purposes of manufacturing and distributing goof balls.

The work of my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, with the assistance of all those individuals responsible for the enforcement of this program, in devising this legislation has been recognized and appreciated by all those who are concerned. He and I have had great interest and concern in this regard, and have worked in co-operation, but it is primarily to him and his department that credit is due.

Hon. members of this house will, I am sure, be interested and appreciate knowing that the minister had a recent meeting with the mayor and members of a committee from the city of Montreal who have also been working with regard to this subject for some time, and have been greatly concerned with regard to the trafficking in these drugs. The mayor expressed his wholehearted and unreserved appreciation for the interest shown by the minister and for the legislation which has been introduced and is before this house now for final disposition. I feel that when we find the mayor of Montreal, who is concerned about this matter on behalf of his citizens—as is well known—expressing, in the glowing terms that he used, his appreciation for the bill the minister has introduced and for the interest shown by the ministers and the government in this matter, that should set at rest some of the questions which appear to bother my friend the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to take part in this debate at all, but because I am assured by my hon. friends who have shown particular interest in this legislation that if this were put to a vote it would be their intention to vote for the bill. In view of the repeated appeals from the government to the effect that it would like to expedite the work of this session, and in view of that assurance, I hope the minister will not persist in taking up the time of the house in an attempt to get a unanimous vote. Of course he is perfectly within his rights in doing that, but we are anxious to get on with other legislation. I repeat that assurance on the part of my hon. friends in order to save the time of the house.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my intervention at this stage will be brief, but I should like to point out to the house that in 1958 and 1959 this problem in respect of goof balls was of considerable interest to the people of my own riding of Halifax, and representations were made, through the hon. members for Halifax, to the Minister of National Health and Welfare at that time. Perhaps we can not claim paternity for this legislation, as do the hon. members for Outremont and Essex East, but at least we are well within the family circle of those who helped bring this serious matter to the understanding attention of the minister concerned.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate whether what he said a moment ago also applies to the hon. member for Essex East?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I have not consulted the hon. member for Essex East but have consulted those of my friends who are present, and believe I speak on behalf of all my friends. I should not like to think there was any difference in respect to the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

JUDGES ACT AND EXCHEQUER COURT ACT

AMENDMENTS PROVIDING FOR APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL JUDGES

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 6, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-104, to amend the Judges Act and the Exchequer Court Act—Mr. Fulton—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—1955, c. 48, s. 1.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, there is only one point in respect to which I should like the minister to comment. During the minister's remarks last evening he mentioned having discussed the situation in respect of judges with the Attorneys General of the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. As far as the province of Quebec is concerned, the minister reported having received representations from the chief justice of that province. Could the minister now say whether he has discussed the situation regarding judges with the Attorney General of the province of Quebec, and does the minister not think that representations by the chief justice of a province should be made directly to the attorney general of that province rather than to the Minister of Justice?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the situation here is that over a year ago the legislature of the province of Quebec provided for 5 additional judges in the Montreal district. That legislation is on the statute books and has not been rescinded by the legislature of the province of Quebec at the instigation of the present government of that province or otherwise. I take it, therefore, as I think I am entitled to, that this legislation represents the view of the government of the province. The effect of that legislation is that there are still two judicial positions in the Montreal district for which this parliament has not provided salaries. I have had no indication from the Attorney General of Quebec that he does not agree with the view of the legislature of that province which previously expressed the opinion that there should be five more judges in the Montreal district.

I do quite naturally and properly have communications from time to time with the chief justice, formerly the associate chief justice, of the province of Quebec, just as I have with the chief justices of other provinces, with respect to the positions of judges for whom there are vacancies on the bench. For instance, when a vacancy occurs by death I frequently hear from the chief justice concerned if he feels that I should be informed that there is a heavy work load and thinks he should indicate to me that it would be appreciated if the appointment were made as quickly as possible or in other matters affecting the appointment of judges for whom positions already exist. In the course of the exchanges I have had with the chief justice of the superior court the impression I received has definitely been that there is a continuing requirement for the appointment of the judges to fill the vacancies which the legislature has provided.

DRUGS

PROVISION FOR CONTROL OF DISTRIBUTION AND SALE OF NARCOTICS

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-100, to provide for the control of narcotic drugs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I was wondering whether we might call it one o'clock, but I also wondered whether it would be agreeable to the other parties if in moving second reading of this bill I were to speak to part I having to do with the general purposes of the bill, and then be followed by the Minister of Justice, who will speak in some detail on part II of the bill. I wonder whether this procedure might be followed after 2.30.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition was consulted privately about this matter. So far as we are concerned we think this would be a sensible arrangement, so the debate could take place after both ministers have exposed the government's position on the bill. I think I can speak for all my hon. friends when I say we are quite agreeable to the suggestion.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, in moving second reading of the narcotic control act I thought hon. members might be interested in having a short review of the development not only of this particular measure but also of Canada's participation in the field of international narcotic control. The medical use of opium, which until relatively recent times has constituted the most widely known narcotic, can be traced back for many thousands of years. Records dating 7000 B.C. make reference to the use of opium for the relief of pain. Opium is the coagulated juice of the opium poppy which botanically is described as papaver somniferum. It is distinguishable from the ordinary garden or Flanders variety of poppy which is grown for decorative purposes.

In a number of far eastern countries the opium poppy has traditionally represented an important agricultural crop. Of recent years, however, countries that at one time produced opium have discontinued its cultivation. Indeed, at the moment there are only some 12 to 15 countries that permit the growing of this plant. The major producing countries at the present time are India and Turkey. Several other countries produce small quantities but these are generally for their own consumption. Unfortunately there exists a substantial amount of illicit cultivation and it is from the illicit sources that the underworld criminal traffic in narcotic drugs is supplied.

It is the aim of the international agencies, with international co-operation, to attempt to limit to legitimate medical needs the world's supply of opium. Until the beginning of the nineteenth century opium was the best known and most effective pain killer. At that time morphine, which is a derivative of opium, was produced in Germany. Later on another derivative, namely, codeine, was produced, and in 1898 a further derivative, which became known as heroin, was developed from this natural source.

Ironically, heroin, which is now regarded as the most powerful and the most dangerous of all narcotics, was developed as a miracle pain killer with all of the virtues of an opiate but without any of its recognizable dangers. Within a very few years, however, the real potential of heroin was recognized and today its use has virtually disappeared from modern medical practice everywhere in the world. Unfortunately it remains as the major narcotic of addiction in North America, and so long as there exists the illicit cultivation of opium there will exist a source from which illicit heroin can be manufactured to support the underworld criminal traffic.

Recognition of this fact is of great importance because of recent years medical reliance on opium has diminished and there have been developed a number of synthetic substances which can meet the therapeutic uses of opium but with less danger to the individuals than its derivatives. The authorities predict that the time may well come in the not too distant future when opium as a source of narcotic medication will substantially disappear and will be replaced wholly by synthetic substances chemically produced.

While opium was for many thousand years recognized and used in medical practice, it was also known and used to produce a state of euphoria or a sense of happiness and well-being. The dangers from addiction to opium while known were not legally suppressed until shortly after the turn of the present century when a number of the countries of the world commenced to take steps to control the use of this substance. International recognition of its dangers was first given at the Shanghai conference in 1909 and the principles agreed to at that time were embodied three years later in the narcotic convention signed at The Hague. This document, which is known as The Hague convention, marks the cornerstone in the foundation of international narcotic control. Since then there have been a number of narcotic treaties or conventions developed to deal not only with opium but with other drugs which also have narcotic properties and in particular the synthetic drugs.

Hon. members will, I am sure, be gratified to learn that Canada is one of the very few countries of the world that is a signatory to all existing narcotic conventions. Since the dangers of narcotics became internationally recognized, Canada has taken a leading part in the development of international control and Canadian legislation together with its enforcement have for a long time been regarded as amongst the most far-sighted and far-seeing of its kind by countries recognizing the narcotic problem.

It is with very special pride I now refer to Canadian participation in the recently concluded conference of plenipotentiaries at the United Nations in New York called to adopt a single convention to replace the nine existing multiple and multilateral treaties. This conference was indeed one of historic importance because it followed some 10 years of deliberation and discussion by narcotic experts in proposing a document which took into account all aspects of narcotic control as presently developed and which, at the same time, made provision for the future. I am happy to be able to say that Canada, which not only played an active and important role in the conference, is now taking the necessary steps to be in a position, subject to the approval of parliament, to ratify that convention. The convention requires ratification by 40 parties to come into force. When this takes place the convention will replace existing narcotic treaties and will mark the commencement of a new era in the field of international narcotic control.

In referring to the active part taken at the conference by the Canadian delegation, it is fitting to mention that the head of our delegation was Mr. Robert Curran, the legal adviser to the Department of National Health and Welfare, who has also been very active in the development of the measure now before the house. As a mark of recognition of Canada's role at the conference, he was elected chairman of the main drafting committee responsible for the production of the text of the convention itself.

As I have mentioned, Canada's domestic legislation and its enforcement have long been regarded as amongst the most effective and realistic of any country in the world. In submitting the measure which is now before hon. members, I am glad to be able to say that it marks still further recognition of the steps which Canada regards as appropriate to take in dealing with the problem of the narcotic traffic and narcotic addiction. Canada, from the outset of its approach to the control of narcotics, has recognized that legislation to be effective must take into account two factors: The first, and the one which is frequently overlooked in referring to narcotics, is the necessity that the legislation must be such as will ensure that narcotics continue to be available for legitimate medical and scientific use. The other, and this has largely overshadowed the importance of the legitimate use of narcotics, relates to effective and vigorous enforcement to eliminate the narcotic traffic and its companion evil, narcotic addiction.

Narcotic legislation in Canada has traditionally been the responsibility of the health ministry, with its criminal enforcement the responsibility of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In this connection, it is not only timely but appropriate to pay public tribute to the continued efforts of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the war which it has waged on the narcotic traffic. The members of that force who are engaged in narcotic control work have demonstrated their dedication to the elimination of the evil and unwholesome traffic in narcotics. Inasmuch as persons so engaged must work under a cloak of anonymity, it is very fitting that I should, in introducing a measure that has been developed with their support and cooperation, pay public tribute to them.

I should now like to say a word with respect to the development of the measure which is before us. In 1955, an investigation was made by a special committee of the Senate into the narcotic traffic in Canada. In June of that year, the committee handed down its report which contained a number of recommendations relating to special measures for the suppression of the illicit traffic in narcotics. In 1957 a measure described as Bill D was introduced in the Senate which wholly revised the existing narcotic legislation and implemented substantially the recommendations contained in the Senate report. This bill was passed in the Senate and was given first reading in this house before parliament dissolved in the spring of 1957.

The reintroduction of that measure has been delayed pending further study and investigation of the narcotic problem in Canada and particularly of measures which might effectively be proposed for the treatment of narcotic addicts who are undergoing imprisonment for narcotic offences. The measure which is now introduced reflects very substantially the subject matter and content of the former measure but with a number of important changes which, in the light of experience, are considered desirable. In addition, the measure contains in part II special provisions relating to the control of narcotic addicts for the purpose of treatment.

In my explanation of this bill, I will not attempt however, to deal with those portions which are contained in part II because they involve matters which will be wholly within the area of responsibility of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) as relating to the penitentiary system and the national parole service. While these matters will be dealt with in detail by the Minister of Justice, I might say at this time that the provisions in question set out special procedures for the control of narcotic addicts who are convicted of offences under the act and will, therefore, be subject to the jurisdiction of the penitentiary authorities and of the national parole service.

While the control of the misuse or abuse of narcotics is an essential purpose of the legislation, a more important purpose lies in the control provisions which are designed to ensure the availability of narcotics for legitimate medical and scientific use in the alleviation of pain and suffering and the treatment of disease. So well controlled has been the legal use of narcotics in Canada that this most important feature has tended to be overlooked, and the emphasis given to the dramatic aspects of the continual war against the underworld traffic.

I have previously touched upon Canada's role in international narcotic control. I can assure hon. members that this measure implements in every particular all of the obligations and undertakings which are involved in our international relations and, in particular, in the convention which has recently been concluded in this important area.

As I have mentioned, the subject matter of Bill D which was prepared a few years ago has not been overlooked and it has provided a basis for the present bill. In addition, however, we have endeavoured to reflect in it the experience gained since that time, as well as providing a new procedure which it is hoped will cope more effectively with the problem of narcotic addiction than has been attempted in the past.

In preparing this bill, we have examined the laws of other countries to ensure that Canada's narcotic legislation will continue to rank amongst the best in the world and that it will not suffer by comparison with any other narcotic legislation nor lack anything which will lead to a more effective accomplishment of this purpose.

This bill, which completely revises the present law, does not change its basic policy or purpose. Structurally it represents a different approach to the control of the problem. Apart from removing a number of anomalies in the present legislation, and deleting provisions which are now archaic, it separates the criminal enforcement aspects from the legal distributing aspects. The latter will now be covered entirely by the regulations. This is regarded as an important change because it gives to the distribution and availability of narcotic drugs a desirable flexibility and will permit of effective changes being made as time and experience may indicate. This, of course, is apart altogether from the provisions of part II which deal entirely with the control and custody of narcotic addicts for the purpose of treatment. The bill reflects and recognizes the realities of the narcotic situation, not only as it exists today but as it may be expected to develop in the foreseeable future.

Hon. members will note a change in the title of the legislation. I have mentioned the diminishing importance of opium and it was not thought desirable that the use of this particular substance should be perpetuated in the title. The word "narcotic" which is incapable of precise definition does however have a widely recognized generic meaning and it was therefore thought desirable to re-emphasize this in the title of the bill itself.

As I have mentioned, part I, which is the part for which the Minister of National Health and Welfare is responsible, has two aspects, the first being the enforcement and the second the legal distribution of narcotics in accordance with the regulations.

Possession except as authorized by the act or the regulations continues to be an offence. Here an important change is made from the present act which provides for a mandatory minimum penalty of six months for the offence of possession.

The bill provides for a maximum penalty of seven years' imprisonment, which is the same as the present act but, except as is provided in part II in the case of proven narcotic addicts, does not impose any mandatory minimum. In the case of narcotic addicts, the procedure of part II provides for a sentence of custody for the purpose of treatment for an indeterminate period. This involves matters which will more appropriately be spoken to by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton).

With regard to trafficking, no change is made in the substantive offences which are established. These are of two kinds, the first related to traffic which is defined in the act, and the second to possession for the purpose of trafficking. An important change is, however, made in the penalty provisions.

The report of the Senate committee recommended that trafficking, regardless of its purpose, should be made a costly and hazardous undertaking in terms of a penalty. While the Senate committee did recommend that there be mandatory minimums for second or subsequent offences for trafficking, it was the view of the enforcement authorities that a more effective deterrent would lie in the increase of the maximum penalty and that the courts should be empowered to impose within the framework of a lengthy maximum what might be an appropriate penalty for trafficking.

The sentence which may be imposed has been raised to life imprisonment. In this way parliament will have indicated clearly the seriousness with which it regards trafficking offences and the courts can, therefore, take cognizance of this in fixing appropriate penalties.

This, of course, is again subject to the provisions of part II which make provision for a sentence of preventive detention for subsequent convictions for trafficking and for custody for treatment for an indeterminate period the case of addict traffickers. This, however, is a matter which the Minister of Justice will more properly deal with in explaining the purposes of part II.

I should like to say a special word with respect to section 5 which establishes a new type of offence. Our experience has shown that with the control measures over the legal importation and distribution of narcotics, there is no diversion from legal sources into illicit traffic. Narcotics used in the illicit traffic are smuggled for that purpose into Canada. If it were not for the illicit importation of narcotics, there would be no trafficking problem and, correspondingly, no problem of narcotic addiction. The Senate committee, recognizing this, recommended the establishment of a special offence of illicit importation with an effective mandatory minimum penalty.

There can be no possible excuse or justification for the illicit smuggling of narcotics into this country and the legislation properly recognizes this evil in establishing a special offence against illicit importation with a maximum penalty of life imprisonment but with a mandatory minimum of seven years.

Unfortunately, in dealing with the illicit importation of narcotics, it is seldom that the enforcement authorities come in contact with the hierarchy of international traffickers. The negotiations are arranged by those persons but the actual carriage of narcotics from abroad into North America is almost invariably entrusted to subordinates or paid hirelings. These people may be addicted but as a rule are not. Usually they are engaged in smuggling purely for financial profit and it is therefore felt that the most effective way of deterring persons from this type of transaction is to make the offence of smuggling a costly one.

The bill contains an additional offence of illicit exportation and it may seem to hon. members that there is a contradiction if narcotics are not produced in Canada. The international trafficker is not as a rule concerned with geography but only with a market. North America is a victim area and, depending upon the individuals engaged, the arrangements to be made and other factors, narcotics may be smuggled into the United States for subsequent transshipment to Canada, or into Canada for subsequent transshipment to the United States. In keeping with the purpose of the recently concluded convention which makes special reference to international trafficking, it was thought appropriate to penalize exportation from Canada in the same way as illicit importation. This provision is therefore wholly in keeping with the fulfilment of our international obligation.

There is one further provision relating to the criminal side of the measure to which I might make brief reference. This relates to cultivation of the opium poppy or of marijuana.

I briefly touched upon the opium poppy in my opening remarks. While the opium poppy is not legally cultivated in Canada, it is considered appropriate to prohibit its cultivation except under licence which, for practical purposes, is never issued. It would, however, permit of a licence being issued for experimental scientific purposes. Similarly in the case of marijuana.

The use of marijuana as a drug of addiction in Canada is fortunately not widespread. It, however, may well provide a stepping stone to addiction to heroin and here again cultivation of marijuana is prohibited except under licence.

The circumstances under which a licence might be issued could well involve experimentation to develop a form of plant for hemp purposes but without a narcotic content. Considerable work in this regard is, I understand, going forward in the United States and the time may well come when it will be possible to produce a source of hemp that is not associated with the dangers currently posed by the cultivation of marijuana.

Before coming to that part of the bill which deals with the legal distribution under the regulations, I should like to say a brief word on the seizure and forfeiture provisions. Here an important change is made from the present act.

The present act provides for the automatic forfeiture of any conveyance containing a narcotic or used in any manner in connection with the commission of an offence. This provision was designed to further impede the mobility of the trafficker by making vehicles subject to forfeiture.

Recognizing that under modern practices innocent persons may frequently have an interest in vehicles which would otherwise be prejudiced, the bill sets out a procedure whereby an innocent person may obtain protection to cover his interest in a vehicle used in trafficking and which is forfeited by the court.

It will be noted, however, that in the case of narcotics or moneys used for their purchase, these are subject to automatic forfeiture because they form part of the commission of the actual offence.

This brings me to the concluding part of the bill which is within my responsibility and which deals with the legal availability and use of narcotics. As I have mentioned, this will be done through the regulations which can be adapted to current needs and purposes.

While strict control over the legal distribution and use of narcotics is necessary, it would not be in the public interest if in an attempt to accomplish this there were imposed undue restrictions or limitations on the distribution and use of narcotics for medical purposes.

The manufacture, distribution and use of narcotics for these purposes requires supervision and control but with a workable flexibility in its administration. This flexibility could not effectively be obtained if all controls were entrenched in the legislation itself. Even under the present act, a great deal is delegated to regulations and experience has shown that this feature can usefully be extended to provide for all aspects of importation, distribution and use for legitimate purposes.

The availability of narcotics is, of course, primarily of interest to the healing professions and notably in the practice of medicine. It follows, therefore, that any proposals which impose controls should carry the support and understanding of the medical profession.

Regulations have been prepared and, in principle, these have been discussed with the representatives of organized medicine in Canada, as well as with the provincial licensing authorities who are concerned with the control of the practice of medicine. I can assure hon. members, therefore, that the regulations which have been drafted and which will in due course be submitted for enactment, carry with them the support and approval of organized medicine in this country.

Other provisions will be made regarding the licensing of importers, manufacturers and distributors and the control of narcotics by retail distributors and in hospitals, but these regulations do not of themselves incorporate any new or substantial change in the present control system.

May I, therefore, conclude my explanation by commending to hon. members this bill, which I believe marks a further and important advance by Canada in its control of the illicit use of narcotics, but which at the same time makes adequate provision for the legitimate employment by the healing professions of those substances for the relief of pain and suffering.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): It is, I believe, the desire of the house that I should follow the submission made by my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) in order that the complete outline of the government's thinking in connection with this legislation might be before the house for the purpose of the subsequent debate.

My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has outlined the scheme of this legislation, and indicated the role of his department in devising a plan to give effective control of the distribution of narcotics through those channels and for those purposes which are regarded as legitimate. The legislation itself makes all other uses or possession of narcotics illegitimate. The responsibility of the Minister of Justice arises in connection with the enforcement of the control measures, the detection and apprehension of those who are breaking the law, and the custody and treatment of those who are convicted of such offences. I should like to outline to the house the new approach to these problems that underlies those portions of the bill with which I am concerned, which are found in part II.

It is always difficult, and usually dangerous, to summarize the basis or effect of legislation dealing with a problem as complex as this one, but if I were to attempt it, I should do it as follows. First, we have had to recognize that notwithstanding all the vigorous, faithful and efficient enforcement of the present act, the program embraced in that legislation has not been effective to solve the problems of narcotic addiction and narcotic trafficking. A new approach is therefore necessary.

Next, our studies have shown that the narcotic drugs in use for illegal purposes are not grown or manufactured in Canada but are imported and distributed initially through highly organized criminal circles. This leads to the conclusion that the objective of legislation should be threefold: first, to reduce so far as possible the supply of drugs brought in and distributed for illegal purposes; second, but simultaneously to reduce the demand for illegal drugs by providing effective treatment for existing addicts, and third, to prevent the creation of additional demand by preventing, so far as possible, the creation of new addicts

The drug traffic, after all, like any commercial activity obeys the laws of supply and demand. To remove the supply therefore will not remove the demand and to remove the demand will not necessarily reduce the opportunity of supply. It is necessary therefore for us to attempt to reduce both the supply and demand at the same time.

The third feature of the legislation is based on the recognition that the jurisdiction of parliament in this area is limited to the field of criminal law, that is, the creation of offences by the enactment of legislation and the provision of suitable punishment, to be imposed by the courts, for persons who commit those offences. The conclusion to be reached from this is that, in so far as this parliament is concerned, we can deal only with a part—although an important part, still only a part—of the problem of addiction.

This follows because there are in fact two types of addict, the criminal addict and the non-criminal addict. The first are those who are addicts and who are criminals as well, in most cases to support their addiction; the second are those who, although not convicted of any criminal offence, are known or suspected to be drug addicts. The first group —the addict who is convicted of a criminal offence—is within the jurisdiction of the federal law and therefore within the scope of any treatment or other program we may provide; but the other group who are perhaps sick rather than criminal, but most of whom must be treated for their addiction if they are to be saved from becoming criminal, are entirely within the jurisdiction of provincial laws.

The new approach therefore contemplates that there will be complementary provincial legislation to provide for the custody and treatment of the non-criminal addict. Without such co-operative and complementary action there will always be a significant and frustrating gap in our efforts to deal with the drug problem in Canada. We have already made an initial approach to the provinces in this connection, and this bill contains a provision reflecting our desire to co-operate by providing custody and treatment programs in our institutions for addicts who may be committed under either federal or provincial laws.

After this brief outline of the scheme of the legislation, let me turn to a more detailed examination of its various features. I have said that one of the objectives of the new legislation is to reduce the demand for illegal drugs by providing effective treatment for existing addicts. It will be appropriate, therefore, first to outline the scope of narcotic addiction in Canada and the new steps we propose for its effective control.

The world health organization defines a narcotic drug addict as a person who, through the use of narcotic drugs, develops an overpowering desire or need to continue to take the drug and to obtain it by any means, legal or illegal; he demonstrates a tendency to increase the quantity of the dose that he requires in order to satisfy his desire or need and he also has a psychological and sometimes a physical dependence on the effect of the drug.

The nature of the narcotic drug addiction problem in Canada is this: the legal use of narcotic drugs is limited by federal laws and regulations, as my colleague explained to certain approved medical and scientific purposes. Any other use is, by law, illegal. A person who has become addicted to narcotic drugs ordinarily is unable to support his habit by the legal purchase of drugs and therefore, in order to achieve his purpose, must resort to illegal purchases. The cost of drugs purchased illegally is high, and the addict ordinarily is incapable of earning by any legal means the money that he requires for illegal purchases. As a result the addict, who must generally purchase drugs one or more times daily, engages in criminal activity such as theft, shoplifting or peddling of drugs to other addicts and, in the case of females, in prostitution.

The best information available indicates that at the moment there are in Canada some 3,100 criminal addicts. It is, at the moment, a national problem that finds its greatest concentration in British Columbia and more particularly in the city of Vancouver. On a national basis one out of every 5,700 Canadians is a criminal addict. In Canada's cities, although the situation gives cause for concern in Montreal and Toronto, the problem is concentrated in the city of Vancouver. Montreal has one criminal addict for every 5,000 persons. Winnipeg, for example, has one for every 3,750 persons, and Toronto has one for every 2,000 persons. The greater Vancouver area has a criminal addict for every 390 residents. It is, therefore, in the city of Vancouver that there is the greatest immediate need for a solution, or at least an attempted solution, of the narcotic addiction problem.

However, I must emphasize that no solution or proposed solution can hope to be effective unless it operates on a national scale because if we brought in a solution that was operative only locally the result would inevitably be to drive the addicts and traffickers into those parts of Canada where the scheme was not operating or was not effective.

Another feature of the problem which gives an idea of the necessity for a new approach is the heartbreaking fact that under the present system the criminal addict is going through our penal institutions in a never ending cycle; crime, arrest and conviction; incarceration for a stated term; release, return to evil haunts and associations and again into the cycle of crime, arrest and conviction. It is a degrading cycle which leads steadily downward, and it is a social blot which should permit of no rest until it is eradicated. It spells perdition to its victims, and it is frustrating to the authorities to have to enforce the present program in the sure knowledge that of the number of known criminal addicts approximately one third are in our jails or penitentiaries at any one time, inevitably to return to the cycle on their release unless some effective change is made in our method of handling the whole problem.

The consideration of this situation has led us to the conclusion that what is needed is a concentrated effort to reform and rehabilitate rather than simply to incarcerate. We have decided accordingly to deal with the problem in so far as treatment of the criminal addict is concerned, by a three pronged attack: to cure his addiction in so far as medical and psychiatric knowledge make this possible; to treat his fundamental delinquency with a view to a reform of his criminal habits; and to provide the maximum degree of post release care and supervision with the object of assisting him to avoid a return to the cycle of addiction, crime and conviction.

Before outlining our program in detail, let me refer to one or two other approaches which have been suggested, but which we have rejected. One proposal that has been made with the objective of reducing or eliminating the illegal demand for drugs is this: To segregate every addict for life upon conviction for the offence of being in possession of illegal drugs. I think that this is unsound in principle because it is inconsistent with the basic philosophy of correction, which is, the reform of the offender. It is a completely negative approach which should certainly not be resorted to, at least until positive approaches have been tried and have been found to be inadequate. There would be substantial administrative difficulties as well as objections in principle. With no real hope of freedom the addict would make no effort to improve himself and, therefore, there would be little likelihood that the addict could ever establish that he had developed either the ability or the desire to abstain from the illegal use of drugs when at large. The result would be that by far the vast majority of addicts would live out their lives in captivity.

Again, such a procedure, that is the segregation for life of criminal addicts, would be extremely expensive as well as socially wasteful. The number of criminal addicts involved would, in a short time, be at least 3,000. The cost of maintaining each of them in a maximum security institution would certainly be not less than $6 a day, that is to say $18,000 a day for all of them or a total of $6,570,000 a year. This is, in addition to being socially wasteful and wrong in principle, clearly prohibitive because of cost, except as a last resort.

Another proposal that has been made is to provide drugs at cost to existing addicts according to their needs. This proposal has been uniformly and unequivocably rejected in a number of reports: The Canadian Senate report, a special report by a committee of the United States senate, a report by the United Nations narcotic commission and the report of the joint committee of the American bar association and the American medical association.

[Mr. Fulton.]

What then should be the federal program in relation to the criminal addict? The fundamental issue to be determined is whether, generally speaking, the criminal addict can, or cannot, abstain from the commission of criminal acts and, simultaneously, abstain from the use of narcotic drugs. The Canadian experience, thus far, on the basis of programs at present in existence, has tended to show that, generally speaking, he abstains from neither one nor the other. However, the clinical studies carried on by the Stevenson committee satisfied that committee that at least some addicts can discontinue the use of narcotic drugs and abstain from them under certain circumstances. They found that where there was any motivation for such discontinuance and abstention it was, generally speaking, an increasing dissatisfaction with the type of life the average addict was living and a desire for a more normal socially integrated life. Addicts who gave up the use of narcotics, they found, fell into two main groups; (a) those who became alcoholics, in which case they merely exchanged one chemical substance for another and may very well have been no better off than they were previously; and (b) those who gave up delinquency and addiction concurrently to become well conducted socially integrated citizens.

They found that the factors that tended to aid discontinuance in and abstention from the use of narcotic drugs and crimes were as follows: First, a strong desire for social reintegration and a fair degree of courage and persistence in pursuing this objective; second, avoidance of or minimal contacts with alcoholic or related substances; third, avoidance of contacts with delinquents, addicts and drug traffickers; fourth, acceptance and assistance by friends and relatives; fifth, congenial domestic relationships; sixth, satisfying work relationships; seventh, a constructive religious environment; and eighth, cultivation of socially approved recreation and hobbies.

Now, it is significant, Mr. Speaker, that these are the same factors that are ordinarily found to exist in the case of the reform and rehabilitation of the non-addict offender. The point would seem to be, therefore, that the criminal addict must be treated not only for his addiction but also for his fundamental delinquency. This makes the problem of reform of the narcotic addict not necessarily different from that of the reform of other criminals, but rather appreciably more difficult.

The basic approach of this bill to the problem of reducing and, if possible, eliminating the illegal demand for drugs by existing addicts is to provide for appropriate institutional treatment to remedy the fundamental delinquency of the addict and to provide suitable supervision and guidance to assist the addict to abstain from using drugs during substantial periods of his life in the community.

We have decided, therefore, that instead of providing for simple imprisonment, our law should provide for committal to custody for treatment of persons who are addicts. The federal law should apply in relation to those persons who, being convicted of simple, illegal possession of narcotic drugs, are found to be drug addicts and are committed to custody for treatment accordingly in criminal proceedings. The provincial law should apply in relation to those persons who, not being under charge for any criminal offense under federal laws, are found, in proceedings under appropriate provincial legislation, to be drug addicts and are committed to custody for treatment accordingly under that legislation.

Committal to custody for treatment, whether made under federal or provincial law, should involve the following:

First, confinement in a secure place until such time as it is determined, by competent authority, that it is in the interest of the inmate and not contrary to the over-all interests of society for the inmate to be released; second, treatment, while in custody, by way of (a) the development of working skills or, in any event, good working habits, and (b) psychiatric, psychological and social counselling; third, development, while in custody, of an appropriate post-release program of employment, supervision and counselling; fourth, release at the appropriate time, under supervision for an indefinite period and, finally, return to custody for further treatment if, during the post-release period, it appears to be necessary for treatment purposes.

The effect of committal of an addict to "custody for treatment" by virtue of this legislation will be as follows: In the first place, the addict will be liable to detention and treatment for an indefinite period. Second, he will be eligible for release only at the instance and under the certificate of the national parole board and subject to conditions to be fixed by the board in each case. Third, the addict, after release, will be subject to supervision and guidance to be arranged by the national agency. Fourth, the period of supervision after release will be for first offenders a period up to 10 years, and for second offenders indefinite, and during that period the addict will be subject to frequent, periodic physical examination by means of the most up-to-date methods to determine whether he is again using narcotic drugs. Fifth, where, pursuant to such examination, he is found to be using narcotic drugs he will be dealt with by the parole board either by revocation of his certificate, in which case the addict will be returned to further custody and treatment for the remainder of the 10 years, or an indefinite period as the case may be, subject to be released by the agency by means of the same procedure that applied in the first instance, or, alternatively, by continuing the certificate under the same or altered conditions.

I am satisfied that the key to the success of this plan for treatment of the criminal addict will lie in the nature and extent of the after care that is provided for addicts who are released from custody by the national parole board. The program of after care should be consistent with and a natural extension of the program of treatment that the addict receives in the institution. If it is not, and if for that reason or for any other avoidable reason, the addict again resorts to drugs and to criminal activities, the money spent on specialized treatment for him in the institution will, for all practical purposes, have been wasted. It is important, therefore, that at least as much if not more emphasis should be placed upon the program of after care in relation to the addict as is placed on the program for treatment for him in the institution. Experience alone will determine how large a case load can be handled effectively by a parole supervisor.

The problem of finding suitable employment for released addicts will also have to be solved. Without employment the addict is not likely to abstain from the illegal use of drugs. If he commences again to use drugs illegally it is unlikely that he will abstain from the commission of criminal offences. In this connection, therefore, as in so many others where we are dealing with the reform and rehabilitation of offenders, the intelligent and sympathetic support of society itself is required. I hope that the parole board officials, the private after care agencies and all others who may be concerned with making this program effective, will be able to count on the support and active assistance of every level of society in placing the paroled addict in gainful and useful employment.

I turn next, Mr. Speaker, to that part of the bill designed to accomplish the objective of limiting and indeed going as far as possible to dry up completely the supplies of narcotics available for illegal purposes. Here we are dealing generally with the problem of trafficking.

The traffic in narcotic drugs is essentially a world-wide problem. It would not exist if the growth, manufacture and distribution of narcotic drugs could be strictly limited to the amounts known to be needed for legitimate medicinal and research purposes. The United Nations are making efforts in this direction. However, in each year the amount required for legitimate medicinal and research purposes in all countries totals only about one quarter of the world production. It follows, therefore, that extremely large quantities of narcotic drugs are available in the world for illegal purposes and it is no surprise that a proportion of these quantities of drugs find their way to Canada to be distributed by illegal trafficking methods. What is required, therefore, to reduce the quantities of drugs available in Canada for illegal purposes is continuing strict enforcement of the various federal statutes that are involved, principally this legislation and the Customs Act. There must be continuing control by the Department of National Health and Welfare over the legitimate distribution of drugs in Canada. But there must also be constant vigilance and co-operation by federal, provincial and municipal police forces against the illegal possession and distribution of illegal narcotic drugs.

In connection with the problem of trafficking, we should not overlook the fact pointed out by my colleague that there would be no traffic within Canada were the supplies of narcotics not illegally smuggled into Canada. Therefore, we have created a new offense, with very heavy penalties even for the first offenders, of illegal importation. With respect to their custody and, where appropriate, their treatment, however, we have applied the same principles, and what I have to say about the trafficker applies generally to both the trafficker and the illegal importer.

In developing legislative policy in relation to the trafficker, the motivation of the trafficker should be immaterial. The law and the enforcement of it should be based on the view that the trafficker who peddles drugs primarily to pay the cost of his own addiction is no less a menace to society, while at large, than the trafficker who peddles for some other purpose. The law relating to the suppression of trafficking, then, should be sufficient in terms of punishment reasonably to deter the would-be trafficker from engaging in that form of activity and, if it does not do so, it should be adequate to protect society against him when he persists.

However, the law should also take into account that reform of the trafficker is possible, whether probable or not, and so he should have available to him the same opportunities of returning to society as a law-abiding citizen that are available to other classes of offenders who undergo imprisonment. The trafficker, therefore, whether himself addicted or not, should be eligible for consideration for parole at appropriate times and under appropriate conditions to be determined by the parole board.

It would seem, then, that appropriate federal legislation against illegal drug trafficking should be designed: (a) to deter the would-be trafficker; (b) to teach a salutary lesson to the peddler who may deal in many small transactions and also to the major distributor who may deal in only a few large ones; (c) to attempt to assist the convicted trafficker to live in society upon his release without engaging in this form of criminal activity; and (d) to remove from society, for substantial periods, those persons who have demonstrated by their previous conduct that they are not likely to refrain from this type of conduct in the future.

The present law, as contained in the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, provides that every person who traffics in any drug or who has in his possession any drug for the purpose of trafficking is liable, upon conviction, to be sentenced to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 14 years and, in addition, at the discretion of the judge, to be whipped. No sentence of more than 14 years may be imposed upon a second or subsequent conviction. Probation may be granted to first offenders.

By contrast, this bill reflects the view that, in order to emphasize the serious nature of the offence, to provide the greatest possible degree of deterrence and to ensure that an appropriate remedy is available to the court where it is faced with the worst possible case of trafficking, the maximum punishment for that offence should be life imprisonment, and that it should be open to the court to impose it in a proper case, even where the accused is a first offender. There exists ample precedent for this in the Criminal Code at the present time. For example, the following offences, even in the case of a first offender, have a maximum punishment of life imprisonment: robbery, stopping the mail with intent to rob or search it; breaking and entering a dwelling house with intent to commit an indictable offence therein; mischief causing actual danger to life; rape; kidnapping; committing abortion; manslaughter; causing death by criminal negligence; attempted murder and accessory after the fact to murder. It would be difficult, indeed, to contend that the social harm caused by the deliberate drug trafficker is less than that caused by persons who commit any of the offences that I have enumerated.

Probation will continue to be available in proper cases for first offenders. The probation period could, of course, be made for any fixed term of years or for life. If, during the term of the probation, the convicted trafficker violates any condition of probation, whether by engaging in trafficking or otherwise, the court would be authorized to impose any sentence that it might have imposed in the first instance, up to life imprisonment. During the term of probation, of course, the probationer is under the direct supervision and guidance of a probation officer.

What this bill proposes in the matter of sentences in relation to drug traffickers is not in my opinion in any way excessive having regard to the desired objective, namely, the removal of the danger to society that is presented by the person who is prepared to undertake the illegal distribution of narcotic drugs. The provisions of this bill will give almost complete discretion to the courts to adopt the course that is indicated as most appropriate in the individual case: to give to the first offender a chance to profit by his mistake and to continue to live in freedom; to remove from society for treatment and training, during an appropriate period, the trafficker who has not profited by his previous experience or, indeed, in an appropriate case to sentence him to life for a first offence; and to remove from society indefinitely those persons who refuse repeatedly to learn from experience.

I should say also that the approach in the bill provides with respect to the trafficker that if he is found to be an addict he may then and should, of course, be committed to custody for treatment, a sentence which would be imposed instead of a sentence for his offence of trafficking. The approach here is that all those who are addicts should primarily be treated for their addiction. Whether they be merely addicts without being traffickers or whether they be traffickers as well, if they are addicts then the first thing is to attempt to cure or to treat their addiction.

I will deal now with the third of the objectives I mentioned earlier, that of preventing the creation of new addicts. The prevention of the creation of new drug addicts would appear to be for the most part a provincial responsibility. The enactment by parliament of appropriate laws against the illegal supply of drugs and the strict and continuing enforcement of those laws will, by drying up that supply, assist in reducing the amount of drugs available for addicts or for traffickers to purvey to non-addicts with whom they associate. The way in which the federal government can best aid in preventing new addiction is by segregating in its penal system existing criminal addicts from non-addicts, thereby avoiding the type of association that in the past has tended to promote new addiction by young delinquents. This we propose to do in British Columbia by means of a new institution that will be started in that province this year.

With regard to the over-all problem, however, of what it is that creates drug addiction, the Stevenson report of 1956 found, from its examination of the delinquency records of addicted and non-addicted prisoners who were studied, the following:

1. In the addicted subjects the common finding of maladjustment in the home and school as children was carried over into neighbourhood maladjustments in juvenile delinquency.

2. Membership in juvenile delinquent gangs was common.

3. Contacts in childhood with the police because of unsatisfactory behaviour were frequent.

4. Between one third and one half of those who later became addicts spent some time as juveniles in correctional institutions.

5. The great majority of addicts had convictions in juvenile or adult courts before they began the use of narcotics.

6. Once addiction became established, the addicts, male and female, tended to engage in anti-social activities on a full time basis, in addition to violations of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act.

7. Addicts are a segment of the delinquent population.

8. Non-addicted delinquents have court records very similar to those of addicted delinquents, minus only violations of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act.

9. Addicts usually prefer not to be involved in crimes associated with violence, their common crimes being theft, shoplifting and related activities for the men, and prostitution for the women.

It would seem, therefore, that the best means of preventing the creation of new addicts is by preventing juvenile delinquency, a matter that, in terms of the social, physical and moral development of young persons, seems to fall exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures.

However, while this is so, in so far as concerns the control of juvenile delinquency and the prevention of those habits of criminality which lead so often to addiction, there is a portion of the federal program which will make a real contribution to the prevention of the creation of new addicts. This is our proposal to establish separate treatment centres to which all narcotic addicts, confined under federal legislation, will be committed. The first of these institutions will be, as indicated, in the lower mainland of British Columbia and upon its establishment there we will be able to segregate criminal addicts in British Columbia from the inmates of our institutions who are not addicts.

The problem of the presence in the same institution of addicts and non-addicts has been a constant difficulty in the way of preventing the spread of addiction. Strenuous measures are taken to prevent the introduction of narcotics into the institutions, but the nature and organization of illegal drug trafficking are such that it is not possible to guarantee absolute success. This results, unfortunately, not only in supplies coming in to addicts but in some cases in the creation of addiction. The establishment of new, separate institutions for addicts alone will give us a much better opportunity for control and even if we are not successful in preventing absolutely the introduction of narcotics into such institutions the segregation of addicts which will be accomplished will eliminate the spread of addiction through the mixing of addicts and non-addicts.

Furthermore, when, as I hope they will, the provinces agree to pass complementary legislation under which non-criminal addicts requiring treatment may be committed to our new treatment centres, this will represent a further step forward in the segregation of addicts and non-addicts. It will also represent a forward step in that we should by this co-operative measure be able to secure the commitment to custody for treatment in these specialized institutions of persons who, if they were not thus treated, would almost inevitably become criminals as well as addicts, thus representing an addition to the number of criminal addicts and a potent further danger from the point of view of the spread of addiction.

In conclusion then, the establishment of these new specialized institutions for the treatment of addicts will represent a federal contribution, and ultimately a federal-provincial co-operative program, for the prevention of the creation of new addicts.

I should like to refer to just one other matter although it has already been touched upon by my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I refer to the care which has been taken in the bill now before the house to revise those portions of the old Opium and Narcotic Drug Act dealing with the confiscation and forfeiture of vehicles and other material used in connection with the commission of an offence under that act. Here again is another case where the government has been careful to revise such provisions and bring them into conformity with the bill of rights. The drafting of such legislation, motivated on the one hand by the proper desire to be severe with those who commit offences under this act or those who permit their property to be used and are careless whether or not their property or property in which they have an interest, is used to facilitate the commission of an offence, presents a difficult problem from the point of view of being certain you do not go so far as to deprive an innocent party of his property without an opportunity to have a hearing before the courts.

After a very great deal of careful study, consideration and consultation we believe that the method outlined by my colleague represents a sufficiently stern and severe provision with respect to the man who carelessly or wilfully allows his property—I refer particularly to motor vehicles—to be used to facilitate the commission of an offence, while at the same time providing a method by which the innocent person is given an opportunity to establish his innocence of complicity in the offence. He is given an opportunity to establish the fact he has taken reasonable care to prevent his property from being used for that purpose and also to establish his interest in the property. The man is given the right to go before the courts and in appropriate cases where these things are established, the courts will order the restoration of the property of such innocent owners.

We take great pride and satisfaction, firstly in bringing these parts of the former legislation into line with the bill of rights, and also in the position generally taken that the spirit of the bill of rights must be observed and carried forward into all legislation introduced by this government. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the house will agree with my colleague and me that we have produced here legislation which is sound in its approach and effective in its method, as well as forward looking in its results, to bring at last an effective program for dealing with this problem of drug addiction.

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few remarks in respect of the bill which is before the house and the statements made by the two ministers during the past hour or so with regard to this legislation. I think it probably goes without saying but must of necessity be repeated, that all Canadians decry the fact there is anywhere in our society a problem with drug addiction. Most Canadians will be astonished to find such widespread effects as has been indicated by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) in the few statistics which he gave us. I think even those members who represent constituencies in British Columbia will be astonished to learn that one out of every 390 people in the greater Vancouver area suffer from this disability. Certainly, there is a necessity, according to everything which modern science has learned, for having a Janus-like approach to this problem. The stern face should brook no opposition to the stamping out of this social evil, and this stern face should be shown to those who, for venal purposes for the purpose of making money only, prey upon the disability of other persons. No one in Canada would suggest that legislation could be too onerous, too difficult, for those who traffic for the purpose of money only.

Members of the opposition, of the government and of the public generally should, in approaching a problem which creates an emotional response as well as a rational response, be careful to see that legislation does not go too far. This legislation should provide that necessary framework for fitting into our whole concept of law, that is that a man shall not be found guilty unless so proven. It is necessary also that we scrutinize any such legislation extremely carefully to make sure that great power is not improperly used against someone alleged to have committed such a crime.

I believe it goes without saying, Mr. Speaker, that all Canadians will wish that the second face which is turned toward those who suffer from addiction be firstly firm, and second, kindly. This is an illness just as much as alcohol addiction or other more physical ailments. It is an illness which requires assistance, perhaps even more than alcoholism because it has been shown that assistance is difficult to give since there seems to be so little co-operation from those who are caught in the net of addiction. I think many hon. members will have read a great deal in the public press in the last few years, particularly the United States and Canadian press, in the form of first person stories about addiction either by the individuals concerned, their children or their friends. One such person in particular is the well known United States writer, Alexander King, who deals with his frequent comings and goings from institutions, from which one can only deduce it is highly unlikely anyone really has a desire to escape addiction until the last few years of his life. I feel that the most usual reaction after all this reading is, what a terrible waste of humanity. There is not just the suffering of the addict, of course, but the shame which the family of the addict feels. There is the added fact that there is no income coming into the family, and the physical illness which results from continued addiction.

We, on this side, therefore, can do nothing but approve of the principle of Bill No. C-100. I, personally, would like to commend both ministers for the approach to the problem which their statements reveal. It is both a modern one and one which shows the sternness of the law will be applied to make sure that, in so far as this parliament is capable of doing so, addiction shall be stamped out. At the same time, a helping hand will be offered to those who will accept help. This, of course, does not mean that those of us in this group are abdicating our responsibilities as members of the opposition. We intend to scrutinize carefully the various clauses as they come before the committee of the whole.

I might refer specifically to some of the things which were said by each of the ministers in their statements. First, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) said that there must be availability of drugs such as those listed in the schedule for legitimate purposes. Obviously, it is necessary because modern science could not get on without them. The problem is to get rid of addiction, and this is a problem not only for the 3,100 people who are already addicted and to whom the Minister of Justice referred but for the children and young women who may later become addicts. It was for this reason the Minister of Justice suggested there should be a three pronged approach: first, reducing the possibility of the importation of drugs into Canada; second, cutting down the demand for drugs by the addicts who are presently known and, third, doing what is possible to prevent new addicts.

The Minister of Justice pointed out quite properly that there are two types of addicts, the criminal and non-criminal. I can only assume that the criminal is the one with whom we are dealing and that, unhappily, there are not so many non-criminal addicts because even if they begin this way they shortly become criminals. If I may for once be excused for referring in this chamber to my sex, I should like to say that this is one of the problems which is of great concern to those interested in the enforcement of the law in so far as women are concerned. It is a fact, happy or otherwise, that the greatest proportion of women criminals in Canada are those who have, by reason of addiction, been drawn into prostitution. It is possible for a man to obtain some sort of casual employment in order to obtain money to feed his habit or to engage in something like robbing a house or a passerby. However, this is not the type of crime in which women can engage. A woman has only one way, a most degrading way, in which she can raise some money to feed this habit. Perhaps stamping out addiction amongst women, leaving everything else aside, will go a long way toward stamping out the growing evils associated with the prostitution of young women in the major cities of Canada.

The proposals in the bill for dealing with those known addicts, whether they be traffickers or simply those in possession of drugs, are I think good in principle. The concept which the Minister of Justice set out with regard to the way in which addiction must be treated is, however, something that perhaps can better be stated than realized. The five or six points he made included a desire for reintegration into society, personal courage, avoidance of alcoholics, avoidance of addicts and other criminals, acceptance by his friends, good relations at home with his wife and family and at work, acceptance back into his former religion and recreation and hobbies. Not all of these, of course, are things that can be legislated toward. A program of education will be required not only for the addict but for the public that may come in immediate contact with him and indeed for the public at large.

This is something that cannot be legislated under this bill or any other bill. It will have to be done through a special concerted attack not only by the federal and provincial governments but by welfare agencies and through assistance in provision of employment. A sympathetic and intelligent attitude on the part of the public to those who have received treatment and who have been considered sufficiently good risks to be released will be one of the largest areas to which assistance can be given by this government and by other levels of government. I think this is already one of the places where more work is necessary in Canada for every criminal who is released and more so for a criminal who has been an addict. Most employers appear to have a special approach to individuals who have been either alcoholics or narcotic addicts and they are more afraid of taking them on than of taking on those who may have been parolees on a charge of theft, robbery or something of that nature. Therefore such a piece of legislation as this one is only the first step toward a long and expensive but necessary program.

When anyone in Canada reads the figures quoted by the minister this afternoon, I think it will be agreed that this legislation is already overdue, that it cannot go far enough and that from this time forward it will be necessary to treat as a matter of national urgency a program which will return to their proper place in the community not only these 3,100 who already suffer from addiction but will prevent anyone else from swelling that number.

The problem of juvenile delinquency, of course, is one which has occupied the attention of the people of Canada for some time, perhaps since the war or a little bit earlier than that. It has done so since these teenagers began to be treated as a group of society apart, since social workers began to discover that these were not just younger adults but were a class of the population with special problems. The Minister of Justice indicated that a number of elements are found both in ordinary juvenile delinquents and in juvenile delinquents who are delinquent as a result of their use of narcotics or who are addicts as the result of their juvenile delinquency. Certainly a program in which all levels of government cooperate in order to assist in the removal of this cancer of present day society is also long overdue and one which can only be greeted with applause.

The provision of the first institution where young persons and addicts are to be separated from other criminals is, I think, an important experiment and one that will be watched by all persons in Canada with hope that it will be a successful one and can be spread further.

In conclusion, I should like to say that we on this side approve in principle the statements of both ministers on the legislation before the house. We wish, of course, to deal with the individual clauses as they come before the committee of the whole. We will continue in the discharge of our responsibility to assure, in so far as we are capable of doing so, that the public as represented by a charged but not convicted criminal shall continue to be protected; but, once they are convicted either of trafficking or addiction, the principle of sending them up for preventive detention and for treatment is an excellent one and one in which we thoroughly concur.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I consider that the bill now up for consideration on motion for second reading in this House of Commons is without doubt one of the most important pieces of legislation to be introduced this session. That feeling will, of course, be understood by hon. members recognizing that I am one of the House of Commons representatives from the city of Vancouver. The Minister of Justice has given us an indication of the seriousness of the narcotic problem in Canada, in particular in the lower mainland of British Columbia surrounding the city of Vancouver. He pointed out that, of the 3,100 known addicts in Canada, over half are in the city of Vancouver. I have known of this problem for a great many years. That is the reason why my late father and I, as members of the British Columbia legislature some 25 years ago, started a serious study of the problem and never lost any opportunity in the British Columbia house to speak on it every session. As hon. members know, I believe I have spoken on it every year in which I have had the privilege of being a member of the House of Commons.

Before going into what I have to say on the specific bill itself I should like to comment on some of the statements made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his opening remarks. I can agree with the minister that Canada can take pride in the fact that it has been a signatory to all the international treaties and conventions. It can also take pride in the fact that in Canada the legislation has been of a nature to try to control the illicit trafficking in narcotic drugs. However, I cannot agree that we have been a spearhead or in advance in our legislation or in our approach in tackling the problem as far as addiction itself is concerned. Actually, I think Canada has been one of the most backward nations of the world in this respect. You will therefore, Mr. Speaker, understand why I greatly appreciate the fact that at long last a modern and realistic approach is being taken with regard to all aspects of the narcotic problem.

I wish to agree completely, however with the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare with regard to the narcotic conference that was held at the United Nations this year. Whether we are dealing with members of the government party, the official opposition or this group, I am one who firmly believes that when commendation is due, commendation should be given. I think that the long narcotic conference held under the auspices of the world health organization at the United Nations this year was truly a magnificent effort. The fact that, after conferring annually for ten years, 99 member nations of the United Nations and nine countries invited as observers were able to come to a unanimous agreement on consolidating nine previous treaties and conventions into one, with just one exception,—and I think that is part I of the 1936 treaty—was a truly great achievement as also was the achievement of unanimous consent to consolidation into a single department of the other eight or nine various organizations in the international field that deal with narcotics. As I say, that was real progress and Canada can take a great deal of satisfaction from what occurred. I had the privilege of being at the United Nations during the latter days of the meeting of that conference. I have taken the opportunity of reading every word of the hundreds and hundreds of pages of the transcript of the evidence and I have no hesitation in saying that this house and the Canadian people owe a vote of thanks to Mr. Curran, our Canadian representative, for the work he did at that conference and particularly as chairman of the drafting committee. He must get a great deal of credit for the work he did on behalf of Canada.

As I said, I had the privilege of being there during the latter part of this conference and I thus had the opportunity to meet members of the delegations from other countries. I was impressed by the unanimity which they expressed in asking that Canada should take early action in ratifying the new treaty. Although there was unanimity about the acceptance of that treaty at the conference, that treaty, must, of course, be ratified by each of the countries and I found a measure of apprehension in the minds of representatives of some countries that there might be a long delay in obtaining official ratification. There was a unanimity of opinion, which gave me a certain feeling of pride, that if Canada would take a lead in ratifying the document it would have an important impact on many other countries. I was therefore very pleased to hear the minister inform us, if I understood him correctly, that at an early date this house will be asked to ratify the new treaty.

May I also say with regard to that conference that on reading the transcript of evidence I was puzzled that Canada should be experiencing this most serious problem. Other countries such as the United Kingdom, Scandinavia, Israel and many others, countries with populations larger than ours and with international seaports like our own, do not experience this problem. I do not know the reason for this, but it was interesting to note, with regard to the section which dealt with rehabilitation and the treatment of addicts, that 65 countries said they had no need of provisions for treatment and rehabilitation centres because the problem, with them, was not sufficiently serious. As I say, I found this puzzling.

There is another matter which puzzles me. In the United Nations, there are 99 nations represented all of whom were invited to this conference. The world health organization also invited representatives of nine other countries who are not members of the United Nations, and those countries attended. Thus the representatives of 108 countries were present. I am not certain whether I heard the hon. gentleman correctly, but I think the minister said the major source of these drugs was India and Turkey. In the evidence I read it was emphasized time and time again that communist China was the major source, both of the drugs and of the illicit trafficking. So I was surprised to find, since the world organization had invited nine delegations representing countries not members of the United Nations that this country which is said to be the main source of the trouble was not represented at the conference. I was not able to get an answer as to why the country which presented the major problem as being the source of these narcotics was not represented at the narcotics conference. That is all I want to say on the subject of the conference but I wish to repeat that it was a magnificent one and that Canada can be proud of the contribution made by Mr. Curran as well as of the results and the achievements generally.

Now I turn again to the bill itself. As the Minister of Justice has pointed out, according to the latest figures there are 3,100 known addicts in Canada of whom more than half are in Vancouver. I have been intrigued as to why this should be the situation. I can only conclude that it must be because Vancouver is an international port and because it is in closest proximity to what the narcotics conference said is the main source of production and of illicit trading in narcotics, namely, communist China. Irrespective of the reasons why such a situation should exist, it presents a severe and serious problem. Together with all other members of this group, I am grateful that in the bill now before us it is recognized for the first time that provision should be made for the treatment of addicts as sick people and not as criminals. I am certain that the establishment of the rehabilitation centres will go a long way toward alleviating the situation.

I was most interested in the statement made by the minister when he suggested that the question be approached in terms of supply and demand. I completely agree with what he said in this regard. I feel that sufficient attention is not being paid to that and one other aspect of the problem, namely the profit angle. After all my studies of this question and the keen interest I have shown in it I feel we should make real progress if something were done to remove the profit motive. Undoubtedly the illicit trade continues mainly because of the exorbitant profits to be made from the illegal sale of drugs. I suggest one of the main reasons why there are so many addicts is because those illicit traffickers in this field vigorously seek to introduce unaddicted people to the horrible habit of use of these narcotics.

Studies have been made by the Canadian Senate committee, and the report of that committee has indicated its rejection, for some reason, of what is known as the English principle. I must say that the English principle has been very successful. As has been pointed out year after year by the United Nations, in the United Kingdom, which has a population of some 47 million, the known number of addicts for quite a considerable period of time has been less than 400. I suggest one of the reasons for this situation in the United Kingdom is that it is not considered a crime there to be addicted to the use of drugs. However, under their system known addicts must be treated. An individual there having received treatment without being completely cured, and upon a report of the medical doctors to that effect, is provided a minimal daily shot on prescription which he purchases at cost.

I suggest that this phase of the problem in respect of addicts should be considered thoroughly by the Minister of Justice, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare. That system has proven successful in the United Kingdom as well as in Scandinavian countries and in Israel. I suggest it has decreased the number of addicts because it has removed the lucrative aspect of narcotic trafficking. When the profit is removed the illicit trade ceases.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to relate my remarks to the situation in Canada. I am very sorry to note that this particular phase of the situation has not been covered by this proposed measure, as I feel it should have been covered. Because of my interest in this problem over a period of 25 years I know of many different addicts. I can at this time recall one young man who was a good member of society until he began to use narcotics and eventually became completely addicted to their use. That young man eventually reached the point where he needed so many shots he had to turn to a path of crime in order to obtain them. That young man got married and unfortunately successfully addicted his wife to the use of drugs as well. At this time she is incurably insane—nothing can be done for her. After a long period of time and a great deal of effort, during which period the young man was in and out of prison as a result of his criminal activities, we were successful in getting him to submit to medical treatment. Following a period of treatment the doctors arrived at the decision that they could not do anything more for him and that he required a minimal daily shot of narcotics. During a period of some years now that man has been receiving his minimal shot per day from the doctors and has never broken the laws of Canada again by a return to crime. I suggest that is a good illustration of what can be accomplished in regard to this problem.

I think it should be spelled out in this proposed legislation that, in respect to that type of case, following a medical man's certification of an addict as being cured as far as possible, but still needing a minimal shot, that addict can obtain that amount on subscription at cost. I am sure the Minister of Justice has knowledge of the fact that in regard to addicts of this type doctors will not recommend or provide this treatment because of the necessity of having the Royal Canadian Mounted Police keep close check on the quantities of narcotics ordered by different doctors. I have spoken with many doctors who invariably have indicated to me that they will not bother with this type of treatment in view of the necessity of such an investigation being made as to the amount of narcotics ordered by him. While I understand it is permissible, under the Canada Medical Act, for doctors to provide this type of treatment, I think advantageous influence might flow from the spelling out of the legality of this type of treatment under this act. I make that suggestion for the consideration of the two ministers who are sponsoring this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to refer to what in my opinion is something of an important nature not covered by this bill. I completely agree with the principle that there is a requirement for co-operation between the federal and provincial governments in order to arrest known addicts so as to provide them with treatment. I am, however, concerned, in this regard because, as I read the provisions contained in this bill, there is still a criminal aspect involved. The Minister of Justice having lived in British Columbia, will know that years ago there was an extremely difficult situation there in respect of the number of persons afflicted with infectious tuberculosis. The hospitals of British Columbia were not only filled some years ago but the province had to build more. The number of people with infectious tuberculosis was increasing because of the fact that irresponsible individuals would not voluntarily submit to treatment. I take a lot of pride in the fact that, while in opposition, I suggested year after year there should be a change made whereby those known infected individuals could be compelled to take treatment. That change was made and has proven to be very satisfactory. Today in British Columbia the province not only has ceased building tuberculosis hospitals but has closed the existing hospitals with the exception of one, which I understand is only about one third filled. I suggest an identical principle could be adopted in regard to the treatment of known narcotic addicts, with a great deal of effect. However, as I read the provisions of this bill, one vital factor has been ignored or forgotten, and I refer to voluntary committals. I am convinced from my knowledge of this problem, and the individuals who are addicts, many of them actually desire to have the monkey off their backs, which is the term that is used, and would voluntarily submit to treatment. As I have said, there is no provision contained in this proposed legislation in respect to voluntary committals. The only course open to an individual is voluntarily to say that he is an addict. He would then come under this clause which I still say in its actual terminology has a criminal approach.

May I give one example why I think this is of the utmost importance. A few months ago in the city of Victoria a father found out that his 17-year-old daughter was a drug addict. He did what I think was the right thing. He picked up the telephone and called the police. He hold them that he had just discovered that his 17-year-old daughter was a drug addict and he said, "What would you advise me to do?" Do you know what happened, sir? He was not given any advice as to the best procedure to follow for the girl's sake and to cure her of the addiction. Because the father had telephoned the police raided the home. The girl was arrested and sentenced to prison. I think that was a damnable procedure to follow, a vicious mistake. What they should have done was to direct that the girl be sent to a doctor or be referred to the narcotic foundation of British Columbia, which is doing a magnificent job. Instead of that she was picked up. She was sentenced to jail and she is now considered a criminal.

I would ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Justice to consider whether between now and the discussion of the bill in committee it would be possible to include some wording under which there would be an indication to the provinces that under provincial legislation a voluntary commitment could take place without the stigma or the taint of crime being attached to it. I sincerely hope that this will be considered by the government.

This legislation is of such importance that one could speak a long time on it. However, I am not going to go into a number of other aspects which I feel are important because I believe it can be done when the house is in committee. Without going into any detail at all, I should like to mention in passing some points which have to do with the details of the bill which should be considered further by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Justice. I hope we shall have a discussion on them in committee. I mention them very briefly so that they can be noted by the minister.

May I say I am sorry I was not here yesterday when the goof ball bill was discussed; I had to be away. This bill contains a principle similar to that contained in the other bill. Yesterday I had the privilege of meeting one of the great constitutional lawyers of Canada and also certain professors. That meeting took place in connection with other matters. They expressed anxiety about one principle in this bill which is contained in a clause which can mean only that an indicted person must prove his innocence. It has always been my belief that the responsibility for proving guilt was 100 per cent on the crown. The thought of having to prove one's innocence is something which is antagonistic to what we commonly, favourably and lovingly call British justice. I do think that this matter should be reconsidered.

There is also the clause that deals with trafficking. I am discussing it only in principle. A person can have no sympathy for one who breaks the law, no sympathy at all for one who commits homicide and, of course, no sympathy for one who traffics in narcotics. I think about the lowest depths that any man or woman can sink to is to be a trafficker in narcotics. A murderer kills and that is it. But one who traffics in drugs, who brings a person to addiction, to that insatiable craziness, makes an absolute hourly and daily hell for life for the addict. I, therefore, have no sympathy for him, and I agree that for the trafficker there should be a penalty of up to life. But there is one phase of the question of trafficking that I do not quite understand. On the first conviction for trafficking the penalty can be up to life, but there is no minimum punishment for the first offence. This may not sound the way I talk at times, but when it comes to this curse of trafficking in narcotics I can realize what it means to those who become addicted. Although I agree completely with the sentence of up to life and an indeterminate sentence, I say there should be a minimum period for the first offence of trafficking. It is a pretty important matter and one which should be made clear by law, so that those who are guilty of the first offence of trafficking will know that there is a minimum and they will be out after at least that length of time.

As I mentioned a while ago, there is nothing in the bill having to do with the legal minimal supply of drugs. I hope this will be considered by the Minister of Justice.

There is also a clause which deals with restoration of articles seized. Under certain terms and conditions a person can make application for the restoration of what has been seized if he had the narcotics legally. There is nothing in the bill which says that if the person is innocent and restoration is made there shall be payment for the damage caused. I wish to tell you, Mr. Speaker, I have been in homes that have been raided because of the suspicion of narcotics being present. I have seen smashed walls, smashed plumbing, smashed electrical fixtures, and so on, running into damage amounting to hundreds of dollars. The suspicion was not well founded, but there is nothing in the law which says that the innocent home owner shall get anything back for the damage done by the crown, although the occupant has not broken any law of Canada. I think, sir, in all sense of justice and decency something should be done either by regulation or by the legislation itself to deal with this phase of the matter also.

I notice, sir, that my time has almost expired, but I should like to mention two more points. We are most happy that provision is going to be made for post discharge care and supervision. Supervision on discharge after having received treatment is of the utmost importance. That is the time when these people are coming back into society and they need a great deal of help. I hope the wording of the bill means that great emphasis is going to be placed on this matter.

May I also refer, and I address myself now particularly to the Minister of Justice, to the need for very careful instructions, which should be most carefully obeyed, to the police forces of our country. I have known many addicts, both men and women, in the course of my research into this matter. I am afraid that many have returned to addiction or have become anti-social through being hounded because they were known addicts and had been to jail or penitentiary.

I mentioned a while ago the case of a young man who for years now has not come into conflict with the law. Yet I was informed only recently that periodically he is picked up by the police because of his past record. Nothing is ever found. The police know that he is getting the minimum dose and yet he is picked up periodically. Psychologically speaking, this is dynamite so far as that individual is concerned whom we tried for years to rehabilitate and finally did.

I know of another case in the city of Vancouver involving a man who has been sent to jail three times as a drug addict. I know for an absolute fact from my own personal knowledge that this man has been hounded. He gets a job and two days later someone says to his employer, "Do you know whom you have got on the job", and the man is fired. In addition, his brother, who has never been in trouble with the police, is also hounded, simply because he is the brother of a narcotic addict who has been in jail three times. This is not fiction. I speak from my own intimate personal knowledge.

So far as post discharge rehabilitation and supervision are concerned, I plead with the Minister of Justice to recognize the psychological effect of trying to help these people rather than hound them. I feel certain that point is in the mind of the minister but I believe he should know there are many who do not follow his precepts and principles. I am quite certain that some people have become addicts again because of a psychological break down brought about by the situation I have just outlined.

I think I have said enough on second reading. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I believe that the bill is a great advance over anything we have had before. It represents a constructive approach to a most serious problem. The government is to be commended for tackling the problem at long last and bringing in this bill. In principle it has our wholehearted support. However, as the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) said, there are some details of the bill which we would like to have an opportunity of discussing with both ministers from the point of view of possibly making some changes and strengthening the legislation so that it can be a real forward step toward the solution of a most difficult problem.

Mr. Cardin: Would the hon. member permit a question before he resumes his seat? In his very interesting remarks on this most grave problem, he stated that the problem of addiction was particularly felt in the city of Vancouver, no doubt because of the relative position of Vancouver and China. From his studies and research with respect to the problem, can the hon. member state whether it exists in the same degree of acuteness in all the coastal cities on the west coast of the United States? In San Francisco, for instance, is the degree of addiction comparable with that in Vancouver?

Mr. Winch: I do not have the actual figures but from what I know I would say that on a comparative basis the problem is similar in San Francisco and San Pedro, the port of Los Angeles. It is also prevalent, though not quite to the same extent, in the city of San Diego. I do not think that Vancouver stands alone on the Pacific coast.

Hon. G. E. Halpenny (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to give my wholehearted support to my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith). I could not agree with him more when he described this measure as marking a further important advance in Canada's efforts with respect to narcotic control. While I am sure all hon. members recognize the importance of the bill, I have a particular interest in it because I have been connected with a pharmaceutical manufacturing business for years which has been engaged in manufacturing and distributing narcotics in Canada and the United States. While this has brought me in close contact with the problem of narcotics and specifically with the matter of making those substances available for legitimate medical uses, from my own experience I can vouch for the excellence of Canada's arrangements in this regard which I agree are possibly the best in the world.

What has impressed me most is the fact that the supervision of the legitimate use of narcotics has not only been effective but has been carried on in such a way as to reduce to a minimum the inconvenience to medical practitioners and to the pharmaceutical industry. Anyone familiar with the intricacies of the problem will appreciate the fact that the situation could be otherwise. Bureaucratic controls could be extremely cumbersome and burdensome to those who handle narcotics for legitimate purposes. The fact that this has not been the case is, I believe, a great tribute both to those who have been responsible for the developing of our legislation and those who have been charged with the difficult task of putting it into effect.

In my own case I know that relations with the supervisory authorities in the Department of National Health and Welfare have been on the whole very satisfactory, but perhaps the most striking evidence of the success of Canada's narcotic control program is provided by the fact that addiction and the illicit traffic in narcotics are supported almost completely from materials smuggled into the country. I am told by the departmental authorities that little, if any, narcotics entering into illicit channels come from legal sources of supply, that is, either from the medical profession or the retailer or wholesaler or manufacturer of drugs. This to my mind represents a tremendous achievement. While a major problem still exists through illicit importation, the situation would be much more serious if our supervisory system did not work so efficiently in keeping the legal production of narcotics in proper channels.

In this connection, it might be of interest to the house to have a bird's eye view of how this supervisory system actually operates. I have in mind, of course, the effect it has on pharmaceutical manufacturers. If such a manufacturer wishes to produce an item which has primarily a narcotic content, he must meet certain standards, not only with respect to competent and qualified staff but also the safeguarding of supplies. These standards are set by the Department of National Health and Welfare. Once they are met, a manufacturing licence is granted by the department. Armed with such a licence, the manufacturer in question may then go ahead with the production and distribution of his product, so long as it is limited to certain customers who, because of professional status, are entitled to obtain narcotics. The main group here consists of physicians, dentists, retail pharmacists, wholesale pharmacists and veterinary surgeons. Distribution to these people is carefully controlled. Supplies of narcotics can be sold by the manufacturer only on the strength of a signed narcotic order. This is comparable to the prescription which the physician gives the patient to obtain any other drug in the pharmacy. In addition, all transactions, including both quantities purchased and sold, must be accurately recorded by the licensed manufacturer. Monthly reports of this record must be submitted to the federal authorities.

In addition to these controls, federal inspectors make annual examination of the manufacturers' stocks and of their records. Inventories are taken of all supplies and a firm must be in a position to account for all its materials purchased and sold. This amounts, in effect, to a complete audit.

So much for the supervisory system. As hon. members can see, it attaches very closely, in operation, to the manufacturers, and if not handled efficiently, as it has been, considerable difficulty could result. The fact these difficulties have not arisen is indicated, I believe, by the fact that in drawing up the revised version of the federal legislation it has not been felt necessary to make any real changes to the provisions governing the legal distribution and supervision of narcotics. The bill now before the house, in effect, simply continues the basic approach adopted in the past so far as these two items are concerned.

The bill does, however, incorporate a shift in emphasis which it is considered should make our control system even better. Over the years experience has suggested that flexibility is of great importance, and that this can be best achieved through the regulations rather than by legislation. Regulations have the great advantage that they can be revised quickly to meet changing conditions in medical and pharmaceutical practice. One hardly needs to mention the fact that changes are becoming more and more prevalent in medical science and technology. The new bill, therefore, gives greater recognition to this state of affairs and places the supervision of the legal use of narcotics almost solely on the basis of regulations. I know that this change will be welcomed by the entire pharmaceutical industry. I am sure it will be welcomed also by dentists, doctors and druggists, as well as others directly involved in the legal use of narcotics.

In so far as the illicit traffic in narcotics is concerned, there can be no doubt as to the general agreement that no measure should be neglected in attempting its suppression. In my opinion, the stern provisions embodied in the new act for dealing with traffickers go about as far as we can go in deterring their evil enterprise. Anyone convicted of trafficking will be liable to life imprisonment and, for successive offences of this type, a person will be subject to preventive detention indefinitely. These are strong measures but I am sure that no one who is familiar with the narcotics traffic will consider them unduly severe. For those convicted for possession of narcotics, the mandatory minimum sentence of six months has been eliminated. Those convicted of this offence are usually addicts, and as such will be subject to the provisions of part II of the new act dealing with treatment.

Finally, a new offence is created, namely the smuggling of narcotics. This, I believe, is not only appropriate but is also in line with Canada's international obligations as intimated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his opening statement.

In so far as the treatment and supervision of addicts is concerned, this, of course, is a wholly new departure. It is embodied in part II of the new act and will come under the jurisdiction of my colleague the Minister of Justice. Although a new departure, it is actually somewhat of an experimental undertaking and is one which our government is convinced should be definitely explored. How it will work out in practice remains to be seen. Special treatment facilities will be provided. These should represent a substantial advantage over the past. I am sure no one, including the Minister of Justice, holds the view that treatment facilities alone can overcome narcotic addiction. The attitude of the addict himself is a prime factor in any program. Also of prime importance are the opportunities afforded him for rehabilitation into community life. Unless these latter two elements are favourably developed, treatment cannot be of any value. If they are developed in conjunction with treatment, then there may be hope of achieving a positive effect.

Realistically, it must be admitted that most of our addicts were problems for society long before addiction itself developed. This fact implies that their rehabilitation, both personal and socially, will likely be extremely difficult. Nevertheless, the government is convinced of the necessity for taking this positive approach. We feel a start must be made in the hope that from greater knowledge and experience, some real progress may be possible. We believe that the segregation of addicts, as envisaged under the new act, will in itself have a beneficial effect in preventing the spread of addiction at least among prison inmates. This is particularly important because it is well known that addiction spreads by association with this group. I believe that the new provisions for the treatment and supervision of addicts represent a significant step forward, as do the other aspects of the bill now before the house. I have no doubt that this measure will commend itself most definitely to Canadians and will receive the wholehearted support of all hon. members.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say only a few words on the motion for second reading of this very important bill now before us. All those who spoke before me emphasized the seriousness, the importance and the need of this bill. They also suggested that all members would unanimously agree at least on the principle of the bill under discussion.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that by passing this legislation, we shall repeal the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. This means that Bill C-100 includes certain provisions of the former act, as well as new ones. In this regard, I should like to point out to the house that this is the first time, to my knowledge, that a bill is submitted without any explanatory notes. I hope that the minister will give us some reason when he replies to our various remarks.

In fact, I noticed that when a new bill is introduced to amend an existing statute, we are always given explanatory notes, which greatly help us appreciate the extent of the proposed changes and the legislator's intentions. In my opinion, it is most unfortunate that this long bill, which has a great number of sections, should not also contain such notes. I would have appreciated it very much if it had been provided with explanatory notes; that would have been most helpful to us in understanding the importance of the changes which are proposed through these new provisions.

The second part of the bill introduces a new concept: preventive detention and custody for treatment. It is to be expected that such an innovation will call for an expansion program with respect to the construction of institutions and will entail, I think, federal-provincial agreements on the question. It was quite urgent that inmates who are drug addicts be separated from other criminals. So, the sooner we build those institutions for the custody and treatment of addicts, the better it will be for all concerned.

Mr. Speaker, without entering into all the details of this bill, since we will have an opportunity to deal with them in the committee of the whole, I glanced briefly at clause 8. Here, the minister recognizes the fact of possession as an offence under the law, so that if a person charged with drug traffic is brought before the court and the crown establishes the fact of possession, it will have established an offence on the part of the accused. Everyone knows that by making possession an offence the enforcement of an act such as this is made much easier.

I think the minister will appreciate the basic distinction between section 8 of Bill C-100 and a certain section of a bill which we discussed last night. But I do not wish to labour the point because I would be out of order and because the minister, having heard about it during hours last night, would not like to see me take that course again.

Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) was telling us, in his statement, that this new act, including these new provisions, was being substituted for an act which had not proved as effective as expected. I do not think such an assertion is justified on the part of the minister.

Crime as much as society changes with the years and laws that have been of great value for us in the past have to be amended in the light of changing conditions. I feel that we have here an instance of that. This new act, embodying new concepts, is being introduced to meet new requirements. I readily agree with the principle of the bill; I am glad this legislation has been introduced and I am sure it will be very effective.

I understand that severe penalties are provided for the supplying of imported narcotic drugs. Provision is made for the treatment of addicts. On this matter of drug addict treatment, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) asked the minister earlier to consider the possibility for those whose addiction reduces them to slavery to be treated without being taken before the courts. On that point, I should like to quote a few lines from an editorial which appeared in La Presse for Wednesday, May 31:

> —at the same time, the victims of that traffic who become addicted to drugs should properly be considered as ill. They are less guilty than the traffickers and are more in need of treatment than of punishment. However, it is not enough to pass good legislation. The laws must be enforced with severity in the case of criminals and with humanity in the case of sick people.

Mr. Speaker, this problem created by the use of drugs is obviously very serious. It is said to be more serious in the Vancouver area, but I am not too sure of that, nor am I sure of the accuracy of the statistics quoted by the minister a moment ago. When it comes to narcotics, there are no statistics that can give a complete idea of the extent of the damage caused in this country. I am quite sure that every large city, Toronto just as much as Montreal—which is a seaport—are exposed to the evils of this scourge.

This bill also provides for the rehabilitation and re-education of those afflicted with what I would call this disease.

Even if we pass this bill, which we will try to improve when the details are considered in committee, it will not be enough. An educational campaign will have to be launched to warn the public, and particularly the young people, against the danger of this social evil of drug addiction.

Mr. Speaker, we have discussed cases where responsibility varies as between importers, traffickers or users of narcotics.

As far as I am concerned, we can never deal too harshly with those who knowingly and deliberately engage in the importation of such drugs, which are a plague to society and to many of our homes. Nor can we ever be too hard on traffickers, people who, while trafficking in narcotics, are usually smart enough not to use them themselves, but prey on the misery and enslavement of others.

Personally, I think we should provide the severest punishment for those two classes of criminals.

Our primary responsibility here is to pass legislation to protect society, decent people and particularly our young people.

I feel sure every hon. member will want to take this opportunity to make the law as strict as possible, so that those responsible for this scourge that victimizes so many Canadians will be subject to the most severe punishment.

(Text):

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): I wish to take the opportunity at this time to deal with this very important bill, a measure which is of particular significance to those hon. members who come from the lower mainland of British Columbia.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

It has been indicated that there are between 3,000 and 5,000 drug addicts in Canada at the present time and that some 1,500 or 2,000 of them are in the greater Vancouver area. These addicts require some $30 a day to spend on their drug habit which is the equivalent of $10,000 a year, or the entire salary of a member of parliament devoted entirely to the purchase of drugs. If a further calculation is made on the basis of 2,000 drug addicts we arrive at a figure of approximately $20 million a year being spent on drugs, and if we further consider that the majority of these people have to steal in order to provide for their habit and that stolen goods only realize one third of their true value, we reach a figure of some $60 million a year. Perhaps this figure is high, because of the fact that many of the addicts are in prison or capable of "tapering off" at intervals, but the calculation is enough to show that the problem is an extremely serious one viewed from the financial aspect alone.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) and myself took the opportunity during the last recess to visit the New Westminster penitentiary and I was impressed by the work that warden Hall was doing despite the handicap imposed by the intermixing with the rest of the prison population of the 25 per cent who are drug addicts. I think one positive step which the present bill takes is the provision made for the segregation of drug addicts. We also took the opportunity to visit the Oakalla prison farm and again we saw an excellent job being done by warden Hugh Christie in the face of tremendous handicaps. A separate establishment is provided there for women drug addicts and the officials are engaged in an excellent rehabilitation campaign. I emphasize these positive aspects of the work which is presently being done despite the handicaps imposed by shortage of accommodation and so on. One point which has not been emphasized is the higher than average level of intelligence possessed by most drug addicts. In order to provide for the satisfaction of their habit they are obliged to be "on the go" literally night and day. Even when an addict is put into a penitentiary or a prison farm this activity continues, and despite all the precautions taken large quantities of drugs are smuggled in. There have been instances where drugs have been concealed in the shoes of children visiting their parents. In other cases, books have been brought in, certain pages of which had been soaked with a particular drug. The prisoner would secure the book and retire to his cell, extract the drug and usually manage to get the necessary material for a fix. I mention this to show that the addict presents a most difficult problem; the fact that the present bill provides for his segregation goes a long way.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) has deplored the fact that no voluntary treatment centres for drug addicts are to be provided, yet he did mention the narcotic addict foundation of British Columbia which was started in 1955. At the present time it is under the direction of Dr. Robert Halliday who is doing outstanding work in the treatment of addicts who attend voluntarily. He is assisted by a capable board of directors, the chairman being Mr. John Carson. This foundation treats both in patients and out patients, besides providing for rehabilitation, education and research. I do not think we can consider the provisions of this particular bill in isolation. It provides for the penal aspects of this problem and for the treatment of addicts caught in the crime net; I think it should go forward side by side with the development of an organization such as the narcotic addict foundation of British Columbia which has done the pioneer work and now needs substantial funds in order to expand its operations.

I think that one important aspect of this work which has been neglected is the tremendous amount of research work which is needed. I was concerned when the minister told us that this new institution contemplated would be placed somewhere on the lower mainland. This provides a considerable amount of latitude. I think it is important that this treatment centre should be located right in the community where most drug addicts are to be found and that it should also be located close to the universities where skilled and qualified people are available to undertake the necessary research tasks. If the buildings are put up in some outlying region I suggest that qualified personnel will not be available to deal with this problem.

Here is an interesting thing about the Vancouver area. It is true we have the highest rate of addiction in Canada. We also have the highest rates of suicide, divorce, illegitimacy, delinquency, alcoholism and admission to mental hospitals. I doubt if the tourist association will be too happy about this recommendation, but I think it indicates there is a high degree of correlation between drug addiction and other social diseases. The only social studies we have had so far in Canada have been one made in 1955 by the special Senate committee dealing with drug addiction and a report by Mr. Stevenson, I believe, in 1956. I suggest that the sociological aspect of research in regard to literature available has been negligible.

I should also like to suggest that the location of the centres should be at those points where the drug addiction problem is greatest. The primary one would of course be located in the city of Vancouver with a second and third located at Toronto and Montreal. I suggest they be established close to universities and regular community facilities. That particular plan has been followed by the narcotic foundation which has found it to be successful in respect to both in and out patients.

There is one other aspect of the present legislation with which I am particularly concerned dealing with the matter of trafficking. I do not feel that the provision for life imprisonment is sufficient and that there should be included in the provisions of this act the death sentence as an alternative. I make that suggestion because I feel that those individuals dealing in narcotic trafficking are perhaps committing a worse type of murder—destruction of the social entity of victims they introduce to use of narcotics—than the types of murder for which we have provided sentences by recent amendments to the Criminal Code. I think this type of crime is described quite accurately in an article which appeared in Life magazine for February 1, 1960. The article relates to world crime syndicates and reads as follows:

> But whatever their corporate structure and whatever their number of employees, international criminals in all fields share certain common attitudes. They are interested in big, quick profits. They are contemptuous of the laws they so adroitly evade. They are indifferent to the suffering and hardship that they spread throughout the world.
> At the top of the roster stands the most extensive, most effective criminal agency in the western world, the widely known and widely misunderstood Mafia. Many people are convinced that the Mafia is a colossus of crime with branch offices in every major city and an I.B.M.-like efficiency. Some people are convinced that the Mafia, if it ever existed at all, does not exist now. Both groups are mistaken.
>
> The Mafia does exist. But instead of being a world-wide syndicate, it operates almost entirely in its birthplace, Sicily, and in its adopted home, the United States. It does have a few branch offices on the Italian mainland and in certain centres of the narcotics trade but scarcely a single representative anywhere else. It does have a kind of organization but not a very tightknit one. The Mafia is principally a way of life shared by groups of lawbreakers who understand and trust one another and who work together for mutual safety.
> This work is crime—usually dirty crime. As reported in last week's article, the Mafia is the principal conductor of the world's cruelest business, the narcotics traffic.

I feel it is also of interest to note that in January of last year, or some time prior to that, many of the type of people that belong to the Mafia held what has been called the Appalachian conference. The major topic for discussion at that particular conference had to do with that crime syndicate getting out of the narcotic traffic business. I suggest the reason that syndicate decided to cease its narcotic operation is because enforcement is becoming effective and the imposition of sentence is being extended.

I suggest that by this legislation we are aiming at the type of individual who is a kingpin in the drug traffic business, and the trafficker who is not a user of drugs himself, and I feel that the death sentence should be provided as an alternative to life imprisonment. I suggest that, because I am unable to see the necessity or justification for the state maintaining that type of individual at a cost of $2,000 per year which, applied to a life sentence of 10 or 20 years, would amount to $20,000 or $40,000 respectively.

In the field of medicine today cancerous areas of the body are removed for the protection of the remaining living tissue. I suggest in respect of the narcotics trafficking field, that traffickers who do not use narcotics can be likened to cancerous tissue and should be permanently removed.

Mr. Speaker, in the Globe and Mail of November 19, 1960 there appeared an article under the heading "Dope Pushers Face Death". The following statement appears under the dateline Bangkok, November 16:

> Heroin and morphine manufacturers and peddlers face the death sentence or life imprisonment under a bill approved by the Thai cabinet today.

I suggest that indicates that other countries are dealing with this particular problem in an effective way.

During the introduction of this bill the minister indicated concern not only in its narrow aspect in Canada but also in the need for strengthening international enforcement. I was interested to hear the hon. member for Vancouver East refer to the rather low per capita addiction in the United Kingdom. It has been suggested by some sources that those figures which he quoted are not too accurate because of the lack of supervision and availability of narcotics, and that the actual per capita number of addicts to opium in the United Kingdom is much higher than in Canada.

I should also like to draw to the attention of the hon. members of this house the fact that one of the largest processing countries of narcotic drugs is France, in the areas of Paris and Marseilles. Morphine is processed by laboratories there into refined heroin, yet there is practically no addiction problem in France. I suggest that the wholesale centre of the world for narcotics is located in Milan, Italy. It is estimated there are some 2,000 individuals employed in the wholesale narcotic business in that locality yet Italy does not have a drug addiction problem.

The point I have tried to make is that since we have concluded that life imprisonment is a deterrent, the penalty should be increased further because, as the hon. member for Vancouver East pointed out, the worst type of murder should carry the death penalty, to be meted out at the discretion of the court or the judge.

In respect of the locations of the treatment centres I suggest steps should be taken to ensure that they are located in the centre of communities rather than in the outlying areas. I suggest also that provision should be made for more extensive research on the part of voluntary organizations through which voluntary treatment can be obtained. An example of the type of organization to which I refer can be found in the narcotic addict foundation. That type of organization should be encouraged to develop, and I hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will devote a portion of his budget to providing greater subsidies to those organizations which are now doing such excellent work on budgets of some $200,000 to $300,000.

I should also like to see consideration given to Canada's active participation in Interpol in an attempt to prevent narcotics coming into this country. I suggest we are concerned with the world-wide aspect of this problem and should, therefore, provide every co-operation, both financial and moral, in order to curtail this very vicious racket.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the minister wish to speak now?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a few words.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up much time now, in view of the fact that we will be discussing the bill in some detail when we reach consideration in committee. However, I should like to make a few remarks as a result of speeches made by various hon. members during second reading stage. I was pleased, of course, to hear the enthusiastic—I think I can call it that—response of all hon. members who have spoken despite the fact that there were some things in connection with the suggestions with which we may not agree. I know that some of the suggestions were made with the best of intentions and in order to strengthen the bill further as hon. members see it.

The hon. member for Niagara Falls (Miss LaMarsh) spoke of the fact that the intent of the bill appeared to be to deal firmly but kindly with addicts and that this was inherent in the bill. We believe this to be so.

I should like to say I am well aware of the keen interest which the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) has had in this subject for many years. I realize his strong feelings. I should like to say how much I appreciate his words with respect to Canada's part in the conference at New York recently and his gratifying words concerning Mr. Robert Curran of my department. He said that I indicated that the treaty would be presented to parliament for ratification. What I actually said was, "I am happy to be able to say that Canada not only played an active and important role in the conference but is now taking the necessary steps to be in a position subject to the approval of parliament, to ratify the convention." I am given to understand that external affairs is now actually processing the convention but I am also of the impression—I may not be correct in this—that, following the examination by external affairs, an order in council may be sufficient rather than an actual presentation of the convention to the House of Commons.

I may have given the wrong impression in my opening remarks Mr. Speaker, in that it is my understanding that the major suppliers of legal opium for medical use are India and Turkey. I can give more details on that matter when we get into committee.

I am pleased that the matter of doctors and the use of legal narcotics by the medical profession has arisen. I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that sections 6 and 16 of the present act set out the circumstances under which a physician may administer or prescribe drugs and the circumstances wherein it is improper for him to do so.

It has been the subject of some criticism that the legislation should attempt in any way to define what is or is not proper professional treatment and practice. It has, of course, been the view of the department that the legislation does not attempt this. Nevertheless there has been a strong feeling by many members of the profession that this is the interpretation to be given to those sections and that no professional man should be called upon to decide whether he is or is not breaking the law in a matter involving his professional conscience and the treatment of a patient under his care. The bill, therefore, makes no reference to what constitutes legal employment of drugs by a professional person. The regulations, however, will cover this by providing that a medical practitioner may prescribe, administer or furnish a narcotic to a person if such person is a patient under his professional treatment and the narcotic is required for the condition for which the patient is receiving treatment. We feel this represents an important change in language, if not in principle, to that contained in sections 6 and 16 of the present act. This is thought to be a desirable change in that it leaves to professional interpretation what is or is not a proper use of a narcotic. Actually, we hope to encourage doctors to take more responsibility for and interest in the health and well-being of the addict. We can, of course, go into that in more detail in committee, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for London (Mr. Halpenny) gave a detailed description of the legal use of narcotics. The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) mentioned the fact that there were no explanatory notes to this bill. It is my understanding that no explanatory notes are necessary when it is a new bill. For instance, Bill No. C-71 respecting the civil service of Canada deals with legislation that we have had for a great many years. But it is new legislation. There are no explanatory notes to Bill No. C-71. I am told this is the reason why explanatory notes have been omitted here in the case of the narcotic bill.

When we are examining the bill in committee I shall be very glad to give the origin of each clause in relation to the present act, if the clause is not new.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Drysdale) mentioned another matter which the hon. member for Vancouver East had brought into the discussion. I think I should like to make a short statement on what has been called the British narcotics system. There is a great deal of popular misconception regarding the so-called British narcotics system, and I am glad this question has been raised because it gives me an opportunity to place on record the actual situation.

Whenever proposals are advanced respecting the problem of narcotic addiction the question that is almost invariably asked is why do we not try the British system. In the first place, I should like to assure hon. members that there is no such thing as the British system. The legislation in the United Kingdom does not differ in purpose or subject matter from the legislation in Canada. If anything, our legislation permits of more effective control, and in so far as trafficking is concerned, of more severe penalties.

It is not correct to say that in the United Kingdom addicts can get all the narcotics that they require from their family doctor. Doctors, in accordance with their professional judgment, are permitted to furnish narcotics to persons requiring such medication. This does not differ from the situation covered by the legislation which is before the house. Doctors in the United Kingdom are not permited to furnish narcotics indiscriminately or indefinitely to addicts; neither would doctors be permitted to do so under this legislation. There is, accordingly, no difference in so far as the legal use of narcotics is concerned under the United Kingdom legislation and this legislation.

We feel that our methods of reporting and recording narcotic transactions covering legal distribution, coupled with the knowledge and experience of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, give us a very accurate picture of the narcotic situation in Canada and particularly as it relates to what are called criminal addicts. I would not like to draw any comparison between our methods of recording and reporting and those in force in the United Kingdom, but I am satisfied that our methods will favourably stand up to any comparison that can be made.

This becomes of some importance in trying to explain why we have some 3,000 criminal addicts in Canada whereas the United Kingdom authorities report a number fewer than 200. Regardless of whether the United Kingdom methods if applied to Canada would reflect with the same accuracy our numbers of addicts, we are satisfied that because there does not exist a criminal underworld narcotic traffic in the United Kingdom, the number of addicts is very substantially less than ours on a per capita basis.

Through the R.C.M.P. we have made intensive inquiries in the United Kingdom and have also studied reports of other investigations into this very aspect of the problem. The general view that is expressed is that while there exists a criminal underworld element in the United Kingdom the narcotic addict is considered to be at the lowest level and it follows that the narcotic trafficker is regarded as beyond the pale of even criminal society. Why this is so may perhaps lie in the mores and culture of the United Kingdom which is a far more homogeneous society than that of North America. Apart from this, there is simply no explanation that wholly explains the difference in the two situations. I can assure hon. members that our inability to explain the difference in a more satisfactory manner is not for want of studying the situation in both countries, and even the United Kingdom authorities are not able to give any better explanation than the one I have given.

As a matter of interest, the explanation I have given, in addition to being based on our own knowledge, is also based upon the report of a special study that was made by senior health officers of the New York state department of health who went to the United Kingdom for the express purpose of finding out something about the so-called British system and as a result they have reported that there is no such thing.

[Mr. Monteith (Perth).]

In conclusion, I should like to set at rest once and for all the misconception that the success of the British system, if there was such a thing, lies in the furnishing of legal narcotics to narcotic addicts. This is no more tolerated as a general practice in the United Kingdom than would be the case in Canada.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond mentioned the narcotic addiction foundation of British Columbia. I have their most recent report here. I have been studying it and I should like to mention that it is a very comprehensive study. I do not think there is anything more that I can say at this time. As I mentioned earlier, my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), and I will do our best to give as complete explanations as possible when we get into committee on the bill, and I should again like to express my appreciation of the constructive approach which has been taken on both sides of the house.

Mr. Winch: May I ask one question? Is the minister able to make any comment at all on what I consider to be the most important matter of voluntary commitment for treatment?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am afraid not at the moment but I will be glad to go into the matter when we get into committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Miss LaMarsh: I wonder whether I might make one suggestion to the minister. I think the minister is probably hopeful that the bill will pass without undue delay, and as there are no explanatory notes opposite the clauses since the legislation is new may I suggest to the minister that as each clause is called he explain to the committee whether the provision is the same as already appears in the old act, whether it is a new departure or whether there is some slight amendment in order that we may not waste time.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I would be very glad to do so.

Mr. Winch: I think clause 1 is the only place where I can ask the minister the question I asked a moment ago with respect to voluntary commitment. It is not in the bill so clause 1 is the only place where I can raise the matter. I am not going to repeat what I said a few moments ago on second reading but I think this matter is of the utmost importance. Is consideration being given to that principle and, if not, why has it been omitted?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am told that the matter of voluntary commitment for treatment of a non-criminal addict would come under provincial jurisdiction. Certainly we would be very pleased to assist any provincial department or organization which was looking for assistance in this regard. I am told that the matter is a provincial responsibility at this stage.

Mr. Winch: I believe it does come within provincial responsibility but I would point out that in the bill provision is made for co-operation with respect to other matters that come within provincial jurisdiction. Why should this matter not be mentioned in the bill also in the same way as other matters which are already included? In support of the principle and in the hope that it will receive further consideration, I want to mention one point which I did not mention on second reading. Unless there is an indication in this legislation of provision for co-operation with the provinces with regard to voluntary commitment, I am afraid that if a province did anything about it you would not have any authority because under certain circumstances these people would have to be taken care of in a federal rehabilitation centre. That is the reason why I think this matter should be included in the bill.

I wish to raise one other argument in support of the principle. If a person wants to take treatment and voluntarily offers to do so, he cannot receive treatment under the legislation as it stands now. Immediately he admits he is a drug addict and wants to take treatment voluntarily but cannot do so, he then becomes known to the law officers of the crown as a drug addict and he is picked up under the criminal law. I think that is not psychologically good for such a person and will deter people from voluntarily offering to take treatment. No matter how you look at the matter, Mr. Chairman, I think every argument is in favour of something being included in the bill with respect to voluntary commitment so that these people will not be picked up on a criminal charge. I think this is a most serious matter and I sincerely hope that the two ministers will give very serious consideration to including some provision at this time.

Miss LaMarsh: May I inquire from the ministers whether there is contemplated any possibility of treating people within penitentiaries as they are now constituted? The Minister of Justice said that an institution was to be established in southern British Columbia. He did not indicate whether it would be an institution of a type similar to a regular penitentiary or whether it would be more in the nature of a hospital to treat narcotic addiction.

The question just asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East points up the necessity of having something more than just a prison where these people can be treated. If there is any possibility at all now or in the future of addicts entering voluntarily for treatment, I would assume it would be against the interests of society and against the interests of the addict to put the addict in a prison rather than a hospital if he has not been convicted of any offence. Therefore, until narcotic hospitals of some sort can be provided there would be no facilities for voluntary entrants.

Mr. Fulton: That is correct. What is contemplated here is the establishment of institutions to which people are committed for custody and for treatment. Under the new bill they will be committed as the result of a charge of possession or trafficking or importing. If they are then found to be addicts, they will be committed as a result of the criminal procedure.

The program envisaged in this bill contemplates also that the provinces may pass complementary legislation providing for committal to that institution of persons who need treatment. What my hon. friend from Vancouver East is referring to is something different, something which would go beyond that and would make provision for a person whose addiction is perhaps not so serious that he requires committal to custody for treatment. There would be, rather, an institution to which he may go voluntarily on terms arranged between himself and the institution. My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and his department, do have in mind the possibility of assistance to the provinces in setting up such institutions, call them what you will, hospitals, drug hospitals or treatment centres, to which persons might go voluntarily. There would be absent from these institutions the element of custody, as it is envisaged in this bill, custody for treatment.

The reason why I think such institutions would have to be quite separate, and why I think the person desiring voluntary treatment should not go to the institution contemplated by this bill, is that the institution to which persons are committed to custody for treatment obviously has to be operated under a regimen. This bill and the new Penitentiary Act together make provision for such institutions to be operated, in fact, under the authority of the Penitentiary Act. Release will only be permitted when the parole board says it is in the interest of society to release the inmates. You will see that there is definitely an element of custody, although the purpose of the custody is treatment. It would not be, in our view, convenient nor would it be acceptable to persons wishing to go to an institution where they are voluntary patients, to have them in the same place where, in fact, you must have a regimen and where the period during which persons stay there is not subject to their own desires but is set by authority. I do not think you can have the two types of institution run together, nor do I think you can have the two types of inmates there, one group who are there voluntarily and can leave anytime they want and the other group who are there in custody and can only leave when the parole board certifies it is in the public interest for them to do so.

A different kind of institution would be necessary to meet the case put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Niagara Falls. As I have said, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and his department have instituted some discussions with the provinces to explore the possibility of federal-provincial cooperation in the setting up of such institutions.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry, but I just cannot see that argument. If a person is an addict then, of necessity, that person has a quantity of narcotic in his or her possession almost daily; that is axiomatic. I do not know the exact figure now, but two or three years ago the majority of the women in the women's section of the Kingston penitentiary were from British Columbia. They were not there as a result of a charge of being in possession but because they were addicts. I imagine the same situation prevails now. They require treatment.

What is the difference in approach under this new plan? These women are there not because they participated in a bank robbery, or for breaking and entering or for prostitution, they are there because they are addicts. What is the difference, then, between the person who has been placed in custody under this new law and someone who voluntarily goes to an institution for treatment? They both require exactly the same thing. Is it not, in some sense, a duplication to have two such institutions? We are going to need very experienced personnel in connection with this particular program. I appreciate that there may be a different approach to the person who volunteers for treatment, but why have two such institutions when the purpose is the same?

Mr. Fulton: Because of the essential difference to which my hon. friend has just referred; that one group would be in the institution for treatment because they went there voluntarily, and the other group would be in the institution because they were committed either as a result of a criminal trial or under the appropriate provincial legislation. I am sure if my hon. friend stops to reflect, he will appreciate that it would be, first, unacceptable to persons who wanted to go to an institution voluntarily for treatment to go to one run by the penitentiaries branch and where necessarily, if unfortunately, the atmosphere is that of a place where persons are committed under the Criminal Code. People simply would not go to that institution voluntarily and, with respect, I do not think it is sensible to suggest they would. This type of institution we conclude, therefore, should be designed to house those persons who are committed under our federal law or under the appropriate provincial legislation when it is passed. Persons who, recognizing they are drug addicts and wanting to take treatment, but also to retain their freedom, we hope will before too long find other institutions to which they can go voluntarily.

The best distinction would be that a hospital is a place to which a person ordinarily goes voluntarily because he knows that he is sick or his doctor tells him he should go to hospital. He can leave, within certain unimportant limitations, whenever he desires. However, a mental hospital, for instance, in most cases is a place to which a person is committed under the appropriate provincial legislation because the legislators have said: in our view a person who is suffering from mental disease may be such that it is in society's interest that he be committed to a mental institution until such time as he may be cured. In the kind of mental institution of which I am thinking, the people are not there voluntarily and they are not free to leave whenever they wish. It seems to me that is about the best illustration I can find of the difference between the institution contemplated under this bill, where the inmate is not there voluntarily, he is not free to decide for himself whether he will leave, and the other type of institution about which my hon. friend is talking which would be necessary to serve a person who, recognizing his own illness and not having been convicted of any offence or not having been committed under provincial legislation, simply wants to go to an institution for treatment. I do not think you can mix the two kinds of institution, physically or even under one administration.

Mr. Drysdale: I wonder if the minister could clarify the situation with regard to the narcotics addiction foundation in British Columbia, because that is an institution which is, at present, doing an excellent job. I am backing up the hon. member for Vancouver East. Where the section deals with the possession aspect, what provision is there in the code or how would such an organization be exempt from these provisions and be in a position to have a gradual withdrawal from an addict who comes voluntarily to this organization?

Mr. Fulton: That matter could be taken care of by the regulations under the new bill.

Mr. Drysdale: Is it the intention that there be a specific regulation dealing with an organization such as the narcotic addict foundation? As the matter stands now in the legislation, those organizations will be wiped out.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): As I mentioned earlier when I closed the debate on second reading, as to the matter of doctors and the medical profession, we wanted the handling of this situation at this stage under regulations to provide greater flexibility than was the case under sections 6 and 16, I think it is, of the present act. Certainly we are doing this to encourage doctors to take a keener and greater interest in the health and well-being of such patients.

Mr. Drysdale: With great respect may I say that I do not think the question has been answered. The minister has referred to the Criminal Code which sets forth very clearly a definition of what possession consists of. As I read section 3 of this act, the narcotic addict foundation of British Columbia would have drugs in their possession. I do not wish to prolong the discussion. What I am trying to do is to make sure that this organization which is doing a worth-while job is clearly exempted.

Mr. Fulton: Clause 3 of the bill states as follows:

> Except as authorized by this act or the regulations, no person shall have a narcotic in his possession.

So when my colleague is able in conjunction with the provinces to arrive at a point where they can set up such voluntary treatment centres, then the regulations may be altered in order to provide that it is lawful for that treatment centre to be in possession of narcotics for the purpose of administration.

Mr. Drysdale: That is the point I want to clarify.

Mr. Broome: I just want to support the remarks of my colleague the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond and also those of the hon. member for Vancouver East. After all, this is very much a Vancouver problem. Hon. members on all sides of the house agree that this bill is a major step forward and that the ministers are to be commended. However, there seems to be a gap in one spot namely, in the line of voluntary commitment and also along the lines of drugs being supplied through an out-patient clinic or through a federally administered operation at cost where these drugs are required by the addict and where medical opinion says that the man cannot be reduced below this minimum level as far as drugs are concerned.

The question of the profit factor or of taking the profit factor out is extremely important and this in effect would tend to do that. What we want to do is to get at the people who are traffickers and who are creating new addicts daily. These are the people who have expanded this pool of drug addicts to its present size. The bill takes care of those people we are going to put in the penitentiary. But what about the people who should be treated as sick persons, as is the intent of this legislation, in an out-patient type of clinic where they go voluntarily and where there is no control? Where this post sentence rehabilitation takes place we are going to have social workers or case workers looking after these penitentiary inmates when they get out in order to try to rehabilitate them. Here you have a person who has not gone to penitentiary, a person who has an even better chance of rehabilitation than has the person who has had to be sent to a penitentiary. It seems to me that this is within the area of concern of the department of national welfare. The minister more or less points this out in his remarks. He says this will be in agreement, in consultation and in co-operation with the provinces. But at the same time the federal government is taking the lead in this matter and I should like to see the federal government perhaps carrying it a little bit further. It may work a little bit faster and better than it would with the particular government we have today in British Columbia. I do not want to make this a political matter. This bill has been non-political all the way through. We all agree that it is good. We all agree that it is a marvellous step forward. However, there seems to be a bit of a gap in that field of taking care of what you might call the person who is just starting to become a drug addict, the person who comes along and voluntarily says, "I am going to reform" but who needs help, if you like—

Mr. Winch: Just on the same basis—

Mr. Fulton: I think this question should be answered before six o'clock. Irrespective of whatever may be said here, and however desirous we may be of solving the problem of the addict who requires help from the medical or health point of view exclusively, the fact of the matter is that this is a part of health and the primary responsibility is that of the provinces. No matter how ardent we are in our desire to provide these good things, it would be first an intrusion into the field of provincial responsibility and authority and second, in my opinion, an improper acceptance of a burden which is not entirely ours. That would mean, of course, that we would pay all the costs.

We have gone a long way here in providing a system and legislative authority for the reception and treatment in our institutions of persons who are committed under provincial legislation. My hon. friend would go further than that and he is talking about what is purely the provision of health facilities in out-patient clinics. Nothing could be more clearly a matter of provincial responsibility. My colleague has already initiated discussions with the provinces to see whether they are prepared to take any initial steps at all. We are prepared to co-operate. However, the kind of institution being talked about is quite different from the kind which it is our responsibility and our authority to operate.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I believe that by arrangement there are some changes in the estimates to be called. If the house leader would indicate them so that they would be on Hansard it would be helpful.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder whether I first might ask the house to consider this possibility. Yesterday, owing to the recess of the house in the afternoon as a result of the death of one of our members, we missed the private members' hour from five o'clock to six o'clock and we have not much time left now in this session. Would the house consent to substitute tomorrow the hour from five o'clock to six o'clock for the hour that was lost on private members' bills on Tuesday? There are a half a dozen bills in hand and this would give us an opportunity to deal with them. May I have an expression of opinion on that matter first?

Mr. Pickersgill: Although I have had no previous warning about this matter, Mr. Speaker, if it were understood that the time were taken for private bills only, I think we would see no objection because the time was lost to petitioners who have a reasonable right to expect these bills to be dealt with. However, if the private bills could be disposed of, say in 15 minutes or 20 minutes, I would hope that then we could go on with government business which, after all, is the most urgent business before the house.

Mr. Herridge: This comes rather as a surprise to us. I have not had an opportunity to discuss this with my colleagues, but I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has expressed a reasonable view and we agree with that.

Mr. Churchill: I had intended suggesting Saturday, from five to six, but perhaps Thursday would be a more suitable time.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may interrupt the leader of the house, I think Saturday would be a very much more suitable time. I wish I had thought of it myself. It does seem rather unreasonable to take this time for private bills. Certainly, those people who are interested in them can be here on Saturday; there are always enough people, and anyone interested in promoting these bills could be here on Saturdays. The minister having made that suggestion, I may say we should be happy to give consent to having them on Saturday rather than on Thursday.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps we might leave that open for further consideration.

With regard to the business for tomorrow, a change has been required in the estimates I announced. This is due to the fact that some hon. members are away and it has followed a good deal of negotiation. I regret the fact that I have not had an opportunity to discuss some of these changes with the hon. member for Kootenay West. Anyway, what is proposed for tomorrow is that we start with the estimates of the Department of Transport upon which we spent about three days earlier on, followed, if they are finished, by the estimates of the Department of Labour. Then, as a special arrangement, on Friday we would start off with the estimates of the Department of Justice. There are not many items left there. Then, in the time that might be available on Friday after the estimates of the Department of Justice have been completed we shall consider the estimates of the Department of Transport and the Department of Labour. Then, on Saturday, by arrangement, we would complete the estimates of the Department of Fisheries and deal with the Department of Forestry. If we make good progress, the estimates of the Department of Defence Production are available.

If we could complete this week the estimates of the Department of Transport, the Department of Justice, the Department of Fisheries, and, perhaps, the Department of Forestry, I think it would be a reasonable piece of work and we would then be fairly sure of completing the other estimates later on this month. I think the house now realizes that we should press on with some of these matters and those estimates on which a number of days have already been spent will not, I imagine, detain the committee very much longer. That is the order of business, Mr. Speaker.

It being five minutes after six o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

GRAIN STORAGE CHARGES

Question No. 216—Mr. Hanbidge:

1. What is the rate per bushel per day (or per month) for storage charges for grain (a) in a local elevator (b) in a terminal elevator?
2. What is the amount of money paid in each year by the government of Canada on account of grain storage charges for each of the crop years 1954-55 to 1959-60 inclusive?
3. What is the total amount of money paid by the government of Canada or the Canadian wheat board to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the total amount paid to Canadian National Railways for demurrage on freight cars carrying or storing grain from western Canada in each of the crop years 1954-55 to 1959-60 inclusive?
4. What is the total amount of money paid by the government of Canada or the Canadian wheat board for storage charges on grain grown in western Canada in each of the crop years 1954-55 to 1959-60 inclusive (a) for the storage on farms to the farmers of (i) Alberta (ii) Manitoba (iii) Saskatchewan; (b) to each of the grain terminal elevator companies in (i) British Columbia (ii) on Hudson Bay (iii) Fort William and Port Arthur (iv) any other grain terminal elevator company in Canada; (c) to the following companies for storage of grain in local elevators (i) the Alberta pool elevators (the Alberta Co-Operative Wheat Producers Limited) (ii) the Manitoba pool elevators (the Manitoba Co-Operative Wheat Producers Limited) (iii) the Saskatchewan pool elevators (the Saskatchewan Co-Operative Wheat Producers Limited); (d) to each of the line grain or elevator companies operating in western Canada for the storage of grain in local grain elevators?

4. (a) Nil.

(b) The board records do not contain details relevant to storage paid to individual terminal elevator companies principally because most of the storage at the lakehead is paid to the lake shippers' clearance association and not to individual companies. Storage paid at the lakehead comprises the largest item in this question and hence without its inclusion any detailed analysis of storage paid at other terminal points by company would appear to have little value. However, on the statement of country elevator storage paid to individual companies, 4 (c), included is the total of the terminal and mill storage paid by the board for the crop years indicated.

ADDENDUM

4. (c) With respect to the attached statements the following factors should be considered:

1. The Canadian wheat board cannot allocate its terminal storage charges by company by reason of the operation of the lake shippers' clearance association. The board deposits its warehouse receipts with this association and when a shipment is made ex the lakehead the lake shippers apply the oldest deposit of board documents for the grade involved irrespective of the company and they invoice the Canadian wheat board for the total storage involved in the shipment. The lake shippers' clearance association then makes settlement for the storage to the terminal elevator, or elevators, from which the grain was shipped.

2. The storage charges in respect to oats and barley do not include any charges that originate at points east of the lakehead. Ex the lakehead the board sells oats and barley basis in store and hence all storage charges at points east of the lakehead are for buyers' account.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 8, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a communication has been received as follows:

Government House

Ottawa, June 8, 1961

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 8th June, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler
Secretary to the Governor General

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1961-62

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1962, was presented by Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Deputy Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF DISTINGUISHED VISITORS FROM SIERRA LEONE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend the greetings of this house and the members thereof to two distinguished visitors from the newest member of the commonwealth, Sierra Leone. In the Speaker's gallery is Hon. M. S. Mustapha, deputy prime minister and minister of finance, and with him is Hon. Albert M. Margai, minister of national resources. I am sure the house will wish to join in asking them to convey the sincere good wishes and admiration of the Canadian parliament to the parliament of Sierra Leone and to the people of that great country.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house would like to join with the Prime Minister in welcoming the representatives of this new nation, Sierra Leone, to Canada. We trust that their sojourn here will be a most happy one.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate the members of this group with the words of the Prime Minister and those of the hon. member for Laurier. We too welcome these distinguished guests to the parliament of Canada. Their presence here today is another indication of the vitality of the commonwealth of nations, an assembly of free nations through which self governing countries are emerging from time to time. We hope that in the days ahead our association with Sierra Leone will continue to be close and friendly and of mutual benefit.

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know that the house will learn with deep regret of the serious illness of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Rea), who for a considerable period of time has occupied the position of deputy chairman of committees of the whole house. In view of his inability to discharge the responsibilities of his position his wife, speaking for him, has asked that some hon. member be appointed in his place. I am sure that hon. members generally join with me in a tribute to his ability and the fairness with which he discharged his duties, coupled with the hope that in the not too distant future he may return to the house again.

In order to carry on the business of the house a successor must be appointed, and I suggest the name of Gordon Chown, the member for Winnipeg South. From time to time he has occupied the chair as chairman of the committee of the whole, and the reaction of hon. members generally is indicative of the fact that in the discharge of that position he has acted with ability and fairness. Since coming to the house in 1957 he has made a careful study of the rules and has also become imbued with the traditions of parliament. I believe that if the house agrees to his appointment he will fill the position with dignity and restraint.

I therefore move, seconded by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill):

That Gordon Campbell Chown, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Winnipeg South, be appointed deputy chairman of committees of the whole house in the place of Charles Edward Rea, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Spadina, who is unable to carry on his duties because of illness.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, before the motion is approved I should like to join with the Prime Minister in expressing the grief that we on this side of the house feel because of the fact that the hon. member for Spadina is unable to carry on his duties as deputy chairman of committees of the whole house. I should like to say on our behalf that we have admired the manner in which he has implemented and put into effect the rules of the house. We have found him to be extremely fair, and we will regret his absence from the post which he held. We trust that his illness will be temporary, and that he will be able to resume his duties in the not too distant future.

I should also like to join with the Prime Minister in supporting to the fullest extent the motion he has just made for the appointment of the hon. member for Winnipeg South. We have seen the hon. member for Winnipeg South in action on more than one occasion, and I am sure I express the views of members on this side of the house when I say that he is moved by one object and one object alone, to see that the rules of the house are applied with fairness and with equity. There is no doubt in our minds that he attempts at all times to be objective in his interpretation of the rules of the house, and that is why we are happy to support this motion.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it was with regret that we learned that the Prime Minister had found it necessary to move the motion now before the house. Ted Rea is very much in our minds at this time. I am sure I speak for the members of this group when I say that he has been a real friend to us. Perhaps because we sit in this part of the house it has been easier for us to become acquainted with him. We have enjoyed our association with him very much over the years. We sincerely hope that he will have a speedy recovery and return to this house at an early date. I have never known a deputy chairman of committees to conduct the business of the house in any more impartial and fairer way than did the hon. member for Spadina. We wish him a very speedy recovery.

Then also, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group may I say that we are pleased to associate ourselves with the remarks of the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Laurier, and to support the motion that the hon. member for Winnipeg South shall assume these duties. We are certain that in the best traditions of this office he will continue to administer the rules in a fair and impartial manner.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

GRAIN—UNITED STATES DECISION TO PERMIT EXPORT OF UNLOADING PUMPS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I told the house of the action which the government was taking to ensure that grain shipments to mainland China would not be interrupted or delayed by the problem which had arisen over United States unloading equipment. At that time I indicated that in addition to the urgent steps which were being taken to investigate or develop alternative sources of supply, the Canadian ambassador in Washington was discussing the matter at senior levels of the United States administration. I explained that while the decision was within the jurisdiction of the United States government, the government of Canada was urging a review of the earlier ruling which had abruptly cut off delivery of these necessary pieces of equipment.

As a result of the prompt and careful attention which this problem received in Washington yesterday, the United States treasury department is now prepared, as an exceptional measure, to license United States corporations, if they apply, to export grain unloading equipment already on order for installation on ships delivering grain from Canadian ports under charter to communist China.

Although this relaxation is limited to equipment which has already been ordered, I understand that the orders so far placed are likely to take care of the immediate requirements and enable full scale loading to proceed without difficulty over at least the next few weeks while deliveries of pumps from other sources are being arranged by those operators whose ships will arrive later and whose requirements may not be already covered by orders.

The United States authorities took this decision at the request of the Canadian government. I am sure that hon. members generally would want to say how much we appreciate the good sense which the United States administration has shown in reconsidering this matter of concern to Canada. The adjustments which they have made have not been easy for them in the light of the long established policies in their country and the strong feelings regarding any United States participation in trade with communist China. This is a further evidence of the relations between our countries whereby each country, without in any way derogating from its own sovereignty or independence, endeavours by diplomatic means to accommodate the other. Such co-operation is an example to all the world.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join, and join wholeheartedly, with the Prime Minister in what he has just said about this example of the kind of co-operation which is the result of a long history of good neighbourliness between Canada and the United States, a good neighbourliness that is fostered by attempts always to understand, always to deal with the facts and always to avoid exacerbating differences which from time to time obviously will arise.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased with the announcement the Prime Minister has been able to make this morning. We think the initial action that was taken was in error and was a mistake. We are pleased that this has now been corrected and that the pumps in question will be made available for the speedy shipment of this grain to China.

I want to congratulate the Prime Minister for having taken prompt and resolute action on this particular occasion.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and ask him whether he has seen the statement appearing in the Globe and Mail of this morning quoting one of the trade commissioners of his department, namely Mr. C. M. Forsyth-Smith, in Hong Kong who states:

> China does not need U.S.-made suction equipment to unload Canadian grain, the chief Canadian trade commissioner in Hong Kong, C. M. Forsyth-Smith, said today on his return from an extensive tour through many Chinese provinces.

Has the minister any comment to make on that statement?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I saw the statement in this morning's press. I think the hon. member will have noted that Mr. Forsyth-Smith referred to tankers only needing this particular type of equipment, and I believe that was made clear in the house yesterday by the right hon. Prime Minister. I have sent a message to Mr. Forsyth-Smith asking for further clarification of his statement. When I receive a reply I will be glad to inform the house further.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question having to do with the answer given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The article goes on to say, quoting Mr. Forsyth-Smith:

> He added that the Chinese have some modern suction-type unloaders which are used only when they unload grain from tankers.

Would the minister care to comment on that statement?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, that could easily be so. I do not know whether or not the Chinese have this kind of suction unloading equipment. I mentioned a moment ago that the suction unloading equipment is only required when tankers are carrying the grain. As I have said, I am communicating with Mr. Forsyth-Smith, and when I receive an answer I will inform the house further.

PENITENTIARIES

REPEAL AND SUBSTITUTION OF ACT

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-105, respecting penitentiaries.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED OFFER OF U.S. FIRM TO SELL MUSTANG PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Defence Production. Would the minister care to make any comment on the report in this morning's Globe and Mail that a United States firm has in its possession 15 Mustang fighter aircraft which it purchased for $500 and which it hopes to sell for between $6,000 and $50,000?

Were tenders called in this case, and were the planes in flying condition when they were sold?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I saw the article, but have not received a report from the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. If my memory serves me correctly they were reported to be in flyable condition when they were sold. They were put up for tender, transferred to the United States to be repaired and ameliorated, and sold to private individuals. When I receive a report in this regard I will make a statement to the house.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is the minister able to say at this time whether the sale price was $500 each?

Mr. O'Hurley: As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I shall have to get a report in this regard.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Would the minister be kind enough to say whether these 11 CF-100's sold as scrap were still equipped with motors?

Mr. O'Hurley: Yes, Mr. Speaker, the engines were in those planes; but I should like the hon. member to know that for years we have been selling the engines of the CF-100 as scrap, and we saw no reason whatever why the engines should have been taken out of these planes before they were sold. As I have said, we have been selling these engines as scrap for years when new engines were put into the planes.

FLOODS

CRESTON, B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE BY ARMY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. L. McFarlane (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I understand the flooding situation in the Creston-Wynndel area in the east Kootenay district of British Columbia is considered to be more serious this morning. I should like the minister to advise us whether any further action is being taken by his department in regard to this emergency?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I did receive a report this morning as to the situation yesterday, but I have not a report as yet as to what the situation is at this time. The flooding conditions have increased considerably. The water has reached a point an inch above the critical level of 25 feet, and has been spilling over the dikes in some places. The army has sent a further two officers and 82 or 84 other ranks from the Queen's Own Rifles battalion at Calgary to assist in fighting the flood in the Creston area.

TRADE

CUBA—STATEMENT ON SEIZURE OF EXPORTS BY CANADIAN CUSTOMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres asked me a question concerning action taken by customs officials with respect to a quantity of goods destined for Cuba.

In reply I wish to state that under the Export and Import Permits Act, an export permit is required in connection with the re-export of goods originating outside Canada. I should like to refer to my statement in this house on December 16, 1960, which may be found on page 867 of Hansard for that date. I concluded that statement by saying:

> As the Prime Minister has also stated, there is no intention of permitting what, in effect, would amount to bootlegging of goods of United States origin to Cuba. To implement this policy, no permits will be issued for the re-export of United States origin goods to Cuba.

In the present case it appeared to the customs officials that the shipment in question included goods originating outside Canada. It also appeared to these officials that no export permit had been issued in connection with the goods. Furthermore, the export entry form indicated that the goods were not of foreign origin. As a result of the possibility that there was a violation of the Export and Import Permits Act or the Customs Act, or both, the goods were held for further investigation.

The shipment in question involves 165 cases of a variety of industrial equipment. At this time detailed information regarding the individual products cannot be disclosed.

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is it not a fact that among the items that were seized by the Canadian customs some were made and produced in Canada?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, this whole matter is under investigation by the customs department at the present time.

Mr. Cardin: Does the minister intend to make a report in this regard when that investigation is completed?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to, as I see no objection involved.

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET—PROTECTION OF CANADA'S POSITION IN U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of continuing reports in the press that Britain is likely to join the common market, has the minister anything he might wish to report to the house about negotiations between Canada and the United Kingdom directed toward protecting our United Kingdom markets in this eventuality?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the house is well aware, from statements made by ministers in the past, of the keen interest taken in this question by the Canadian government. It has been discussed at various commonwealth meetings and naturally will be followed with very close interest by the government.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Can the minister tell the house whether the government has given any active consideration to the possibility of Canada joining the common market?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The government is naturally viewing all aspects of the situation and following such clarifications as may arise from time to time in the positions of other countries.

RED CHINA—REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture based on a newspaper report which appeared in the Edmonton Journal of June 3, 1961. That report appears under the heading "Says Wheat Deal Gives Time to Push Wheat Acreage Cut". The portion of this article about which I should like to ask reports that the minister said:

> The red Chinese have a good business reputation and have honoured all transactions since they took over in that country—

Does that statement accurately reflect what the minister said and, if not, would the minister advise the house exactly what he did say?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in regard to the first part of the statement made by the hon. member, I should like to state that government policy is to help western farmers find new opportunities for their land in the form of the growing of grass, rapeseed and any other activities which will give them a higher return.

In regard to the portion of his question about the Chinese, I think that reputation has been established by dealings the British have had with them, and also is reflected by the reports which we have received from officials in Hong Kong.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED SECOND HIGHWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (St. Henry): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister seen the press report appearing in today's Gazette to the effect that discussions took place recently among the premiers of Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia in connection with plans for a second trans-Canada highway, and has the minister any comment to make regarding that matter?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no, and the answer to the second part of the question is no.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED INJURY TO PRESIDENT KENNEDY WHILE IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I regret not having sent him notice, but the dispatch to which I intend to refer has just come into my hands. Has the Prime Minister heard of an announcement made in Washington this morning to the effect that President Kennedy injured his back while planting a tree with the Prime Minister in Ottawa last month?

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO VIOLATIONS OF CEASE-FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister any further comment to make on the situation in Laos, with reference to the protests which have been made by the United States and the United Kingdom regarding irregularities concerning the cease fire in that country?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I presume the hon. member is referring to a dispatch in one of the morning papers which referred to a so-called boycott by the United States and the United Kingdom. That word is quite inaccurate, as a matter of fact. The situation is that the meeting planned for yesterday did not take place, and no decision was taken as to when the next meeting would be held. This state of temporary recess could continue for a day or two, or even longer, until the difficulties which arose out of the incident at Ban Padong, which I described to the house yesterday, have been overcome. There is, however, as yet no reason to believe that the conference will not resume in due course.

As far as the United States is concerned, I understand it was made clear yesterday by the state department spokesman that the United States had no intention of disrupting the conference. Certainly the United Kingdom has no such intention.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT—INQUIRY AS TO REVISION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour, in view of the alarming state of the unemployment insurance fund as revealed by an answer to a question given yesterday, whether the minister hopes or expects to introduce amendments to the act during the month of June.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the position of the unemployment insurance fund is well known to the government and the situation is being considered at this time. However, I am unable to say as yet what the decision of the government will be.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

DEVELOPMENT OF TRACKED VEHICLE FOR U.S. ARMY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production arising out of a statement made by the minister on June 6, to the effect that the Canadian government will undertake the development of a snow vehicle for the United States army. Can the minister inform this house whether the government has any particular manufacturer in mind, and if it would consider the Canadian Car plant at Fort William as the manufacturer of this vehicle?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I had several plants in mind, but the United States government had one particular plant in mind only. I think perhaps I should give the following statement to the house.

After exhaustive examination of the proposals from Canadian industry, the United States army selected the Canadair vehicle as the one which came closest to meeting its requirements. Contract negotiations are now under way with the department and the United States army, and it is expected that we shall put forward a recommendation concerning this contract within the next three weeks. It is expected that if this contract goes well there could be large production quantities ordered.

The CL 91 is a small amphibious articulated tracked vehicle with high off-road mobility, and is capable of carrying a one ton payload or a light infantry section. The front unit or utility carrier portion of the CL 91 can be easily and quickly detached from the trailer unit and used as a conventional utility tracked carrier with 1,000 pound payload capacity. The United States army regards this vehicle as one of the future family of high mobility vehicles to replace the Weasel, the "mechanical mule" and the one quarter ton truck for combat operations in areas of difficult terrain.

The recommendation of the United States army is to negotiate the development project with Canadair.

INQUIRY AS TO PRIORITY FOR CANADIAN MADE PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Will the minister tell the house whether any definite instructions have been given his department to give priority when purchasing to goods made in Canada versus goods made outside Canada if prices are competitive, or if the difference is very slight?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Absolutely, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Garland: May I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister believe that a price difference of less than two thirds of one per cent is a justifiable reason to refuse a Canadian-made product and award a contract as recently as yesterday to a firm selling goods made in England?

Mr. O'Hurley: Probably I should ask the hon. member a question. Would he like to have a preference as between Canada and the United Kingdom?

GRAIN

WHEAT—FINAL PAYMENT ON 1959-60 POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister inform the house whether the 1959-60 wheat pool accounts have been closed out and, if so, when an announcement will be available as to the final payments and when the cheques are likely to go forward?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I had a conference with the chairman of the Canadian wheat board yesterday, at which time he informed me that he expects the accounts will be closed out some time about the third week of June. There will be a supplementary report prepared for me at that time.

AGRICULTURE

MARITIME PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO AID TO POTATO GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I, too, should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question. Does the minister think it possible that this very complex and difficult question of compensation for the potato growers of Prince Edward Island can be settled by the government during the month of June?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It is my sincere hope that that will be so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jack Wratten (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, with respect to compensation to potato growers of Prince Edward Island, there are growers in Ontario who bought certified seed in that province and when it arrived they found it had rotted. Are they going to be compensated as well?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This is a matter between the distributors of potatoes in Prince Edward Island and the buyers in Ontario.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—INQUIRY AS TO PROJECT TO ASSIST MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether I may put a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Can the minister inform us whether the government has yet decided on any project on which any of the $1,500,000 to be spent in Cape Breton to relieve the miners is to be spent?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): A project is actually under study, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REDISTRIBUTION—SUGGESTED FLOOR UNDER REPRESENTATION OF SASKATCHEWAN AND NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the very interesting answer given yesterday regarding redistribution. Is the government giving consideration to the establishment at any time of a floor under the present representation of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the days go by this question of redistribution will, of course, loom larger and larger and assume greater and greater importance.

Mr. Argue: You have had experience.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Naturally, as a member from Saskatchewan, I notice that it would lose some four members; one or two other provinces would lose one. This is a question that must receive very full consideration. When it does, as with all matters connected with redistribution, the house will be advised.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: If I could have the momentary indulgence of the committee I should like to thank the right hon. Prime Minister, the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Assiniboia for the generous welcome they accorded to me on taking this high office of responsibility in the committee.

I should say I recognize the supreme importance of impartiality and my duty to protect the rights and privileges of all members on all sides of the house at all times. In particular, I know I must serve as an instrument to protect the rights of the opposition, those who sit to the left of Mr. Speaker, in applying fairly and impartially the rules of the house in committee.

I join with those who have made reference to my distinguished predecessor. I wish him a speedy and complete recovery. I hope that in the course of my duties in this committee I will live up to the high standard he has set for me.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

402. Departmental administration, $3,395,700.

The Deputy Chairman: This item will be found on page 75 of the blue book and the details on page 520.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, it is a unique privilege for me to make the first remarks while you preside over our destinies as deputy chairman of the committee of the whole house. We who heard your words a few moments ago know that you will indeed bring to this exacting position all the qualities of heart and mind that will enable you to successfully follow the distinguished pattern set by your predecessor, the hon. member for Spadina.

Sir, one of the disadvantages in speaking in a debate which in effect has been trifurcated and been before the house on at least three different occasions—this is perhaps the fourth or even fifth—is that sometimes the trails grow cold and one does not have the opportunity for some weeks really to reply to some contentious remarks.

I refer to a remark made by the hon. member for Port Arthur concerning winter navigation on the St. Lawrence river. I should like to deal with what he said later. First, sir, I should like to turn to a rather prosaic and humble matter, yet one that is of some importance to me. It concerns the working hours of cooks on Department of Transport vessels on the east coast. As found on page 5918 of Hansard there is a rather lengthy reply, filed by the minister, to questions of mine concerning the working conditions and wages of cooks, stewards and other crew on departmental ships on both the east and west coasts. I may say that I have also had replies on the same subject from the Department of Mines and Technical Survey and the Department of Fisheries, and respecting civilian manned auxiliary vessels of the Department of National Defence.

In each and every instance cooks and stewards on the east coast work 48 hours per week, while the working week for everybody else, other crew on the east coast and cooks, stewards and other crew on the west coast, is only 40 hours. This was not always so. I understand that until a few years ago cooks and stewards had the same hours of work as other crew, but that the Department of Labour, in making a prevailing rate survey, found that on smaller non-governmental vessels cooks did work these longer hours and so the government cooks were bounced back to the 48-hour week.

I suggest to the Minister of Transport and to the other ministers concerned that this is most unjust. In the first place, I do not think you can have a happy ship when the arrangements respecting working hours are divided in this way so that one group has to work longer than other members of the ship's crew. I suggest further that the prevailing rate formula needs thorough investigation and re-examination in this instance, for it seems to me that there are probably more cooks and stewards employed on the vessels of the four departments I have mentioned than are employed on non-governmental ships operating on the east coast. Perhaps I am wrong in that view, but if I am right then in effect the working conditions for these cooks and stewards are being fashioned in much the same way as if the working conditions of a man in a very large restaurant were determined by what was applicable in the case of the short order cook in the hot dog stand right next door.

As I say, this seems to me a very unjust situation, and I ask not only the Minister of Transport but also his colleagues the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Fisheries to correct it.

May I turn next to the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier, who on May 20 was good enough to devote some of his comments to the Canadian institute of communications. We in the institute would like to say to him how very much we appreciate this first mention in the House of Commons of this brand new baby on the Canadian communication scene. The hon. member for Laurier suggested that the Department of Transport make a contribution to our institute under the item in the estimates dealing with membership in international organizations. We welcome his suggestion and his interest, but I have talked this matter over with some of my fellow directors, and while no final decision has been reached as yet we would ask that the request or the suggestion be held in abeyance until we have had an opportunity to discuss it further.

I would, however, ask the Minister of Transport on behalf of the other directors of the Canadian institute of communications if he would encourage senior officials of his department to become members of our institute. Our reluctance to come forward at this time is simply that we wish to retain as much independence for our institute as we possibly can. I do not wish to appear to be speaking in a fashion derogatory of parliament or of the government, but at the same time some of us have doubts about the wisdom of encouraging a large government contribution. However, we shall be presenting our views to the minister and, since the hon. member for Laurier was good enough to raise the matter, we shall keep him in touch with the picture as well.

A third matter is this. For some years it has been very difficult in the Atlantic coast area of the maritimes to obtain accurate weather forecasts. Perhaps the most famous instance in recent years arose, I think it was, on New Year's eve when the forecast had predicted a few snow flurries and all of a sudden we were whacked in the Halifax area with over 20 inches of snow. One can conjure up in one's mind the riotous picture of what a sudden 20 inch snowfall can do to driving conditions on a New Year's eve, when even under the best possible weather conditions driving is apt to be tricky.

There is a reason why the weather forecasters in Halifax have experienced these difficulties. It is not because of any lack of ability or training on the part of the staff. I can assure the minister of that; they are fine people. The difficulty is that much of our maritime weather comes from off the Atlantic ocean. It is true that many weather masses move across the continent to the maritimes, and these can be accurately charted all the way. The difficulty we have experienced arises out of unexpected weather developments coming from the gulf stream or over parts of the Atlantic ocean.

I am happy to see from the estimates that between $140,000 and $150,000 has been provided by the department to set up what is known as a weather radar station. Perhaps I may explain what that is in simple and non-technical terms. An ordinary radar station screens out the weather factors in front of it and picks out objects. The weather radar station for which, I understand, tenders will shortly be called, eliminates solid objects in front of the screen and picks out the weather factors. One could almost visualize it in terms of the positive and negative of a photograph, although that is not an exact parallel. In any event, the system should do much to improve our weather forecasting and, maybe, even our chance of getting home safely on New Year's eve.

The final point I should like to make has reference to some remarks by the hon. member for Port Arthur when he took part in this debate on May 13. Perhaps I can quote the paragraph with which I intend to take issue. As reported at the bottom of the second column of page 4773 of Hansard, the hon. member said:

> We know that there are now icebreakers and mechanical devices which can keep the port of Montreal open for almost the whole of the year. We also know that this is a delicate political problem because it is going to have its repercussions and its effects upon Halifax and Saint John. Yet I had a figure given to me by a man who is very prominent in shipping. He pointed out to me that the average saving per ton on freight coming through Halifax and Saint John in the winter as against that coming through Montreal is $12 a ton in favour of Montreal. One only has to look at the amount of freight coming through the two maritime ports in order to realize that we are in effect subsidizing the Atlantic ports by not pushing very strongly a policy to open up Montreal to winter shipping.

The hon. member for Port Arthur has made a fundamental error in stating the problem so simply. If there were to be shipping to Montreal throughout the winter an extra cost would be involved, a cost which I do not think the hon. member has taken into his calculations. This would be the cost of providing extra special icebreaking services up the St. Lawrence river to Montreal; and no one who has seen that river frozen over in winter fails to realize that it would be a herculean task to clear that ice aside. The cost of such an operation would, I suggest, be fabulous and out of this world.

On the other hand, the ports of Halifax and Saint John are free of ice the year round. If the hon. member for Port Arthur had said that it would be legitimate to heap on the cost of this special icebreaking service, or if he had taken that into account when discussing this matter with his friend who gave him that advice, I think he would have found that the competitive advantages would more than favour Halifax and Saint John.

I am personally not one who stands against progress of the kind that is argued here, but if we are going to need extra services provided by icebreakers—and these would be more costly icebreakers than the ones we have in operation now—it would be only fair to add the cost of the service to the shipping charges. Then we would see who is competitive and who is non-competitive, or who is being subsidized and who is not being subsidized.

May I present, very briefly, the point of view on this tricky question which was expressed by the port of Halifax commission. There are six points made concerning this matter and I shall list them quickly. They are taken from a brief presented to the minister on winter navigation in the St. Lawrence river.

> In our opinion, therefore, icebreaker activity in the St. Lawrence river and gulf should be limited to:
> (a) Anti-flooding operations;
> (b) Assisting Canadian coastal shipping and ferries;
>
> (c) Assisting any kind of vessel in the gulf;
>
> (d) Assisting, but not beyond Quebec city on the upriver voyage, nor before Quebec city on the downriver voyage, vessels engaged in international trade which are shown in Lloyds register of shipping as "ice reinforced";
>
> (e) Ice reinforced vessels should pay for icebreaker service at a price which would be reasonable for such service on a commercial basis;
> (f) However, if the above are not to produce situations contrary to government policy as outlined above, and most harmful to Canadian Atlantic ports, the river must be closed between certain specific dates during the winter season to all vessels engaged in international trade other than those mentioned at (d) above.

Perhaps with regard to that last recommendation I do not go as far as some of my maritime colleagues. I think the present policy of the government is satisfactory, namely that the icebreaking service should be provided to vessels which are reinforced against ice. In other words, it helps vessels which have a proper reason for being in the river when ice conditions are difficult or when, for unexpected reasons, the ice may get out of hand. On the other hand it does not give carte blanche to any tramp steamer or freighter not adequately equipped to deal with ice to be in areas where severe ice conditions are expected. I think that is a reasonable policy, but in order to ensure that the maritime view is fully presented I thought I might quote from the brief which, I understand, has already been sent to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Fisher: I shall refer later to the icebreaking situation in the St. Lawrence river, but I wish first of all to draw attention to a question which I know is puzzling members of this house, and that is the complete inability of the Minister of Transport to give us any indication when a properly constituted committee of this house is going to meet and have before it the officials of the Canadian National Railways.

We know that the president of the C.N.R. and his officials cannot be completely at the disposal of the whims of any House of Commons committee. We know that the minister is our means of liaison with the railway company, and that it is through the minister the arrangements will be made. The committee has not yet met. No chairman has been selected. We are not under way. But the very failure to go ahead and bring Mr. Gordon before the committee or to see that he comes before the committee is leading to speculation of a kind which I think is regrettable.

I know it is being argued that one of the reasons Mr. Gordon is not before the committee is that he has said he will not come until his position as chairman of the board has been cleared up. I dismiss this story, but it is the kind of thing we shall be hearing until we know more definitely when the affairs of the C.N.R. are to be examined. I think it is time the minister let us know definitely and concretely when Mr. Gordon is to appear, because the committee cannot decide until it hears through its pipe line to the president, and the minister is that pipe line. I think it is time he let us know when this meeting is going to take place.

We hear all kinds of speculation about when this session is going to adjourn or when it is going to end. We are chivvied in certain places and told we must rush to get out committee reports because this session is going to adjourn at the end of June, and perhaps it is going to end on that date.

All I know is that it is now the 8th day of June. There is not very much time left and we have this important committee coming up. It was agreed that this year the affairs of the C.N.R. and the T.C.A. would be separated, that there would be time for reflection and consideration. The minister is aware that there is unusual interest in the C.N.R. this year and that the study of its affairs is going to take more time, one would judge, than in previous years. I think it is most unfortunate and unfair that we have not been given a date for the meeting of that committee.

One of the arguments which is always put before us when Mr. Gordon comes here is that we cannot tie up the C.N.R. for too long, and it is therefore necessary to meet at 10 in the morning and sit right through until late at night, sometimes 10 o'clock. This procedure certainly has some advantages in enabling us to hasten through the report of the C.N.R., but it has marked disadvantages for the members of the committee who are trying to marshall the kind of thorough analysis they wish to make.

I wish to draw to the attention of the minister in this regard the fact that the committee on broadcasting has had before it another government corporation, the C.B.C., for weeks on end. For at least two days and sometimes three days a week we have had the president and the senior officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation before us and somehow, although, I am sure at a great disadvantage, the C.B.C. has managed to keep functioning.

I just want the minister to note the difference between treatment we give to the executives of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the treatment we give to the head of the Canadian National Railways. The committee on broadcasting has Mr. Ouimet before it in the morning or perhaps in morning and afternoon sittings. Then there is a break for several days. Mr. Gordon has never had that kind of treatment, nor have other presidents of the Canadian National Railways. Yet I suggest there is not that much difference in the role of the corporation in terms of public interest and in terms of the interest of members of parliament.

I would hope that this year we could make some arrangement whereby the committee before which the C.N.R. appears is more slowly paced so that, when it meets, we can do a decent and thorough job. I would not go so far as to suggest that we should use the C.B.C. treatment as a model, but I do suggest that something more on that line would be better than this tremendous emphasis we have in the sessional committee on railways and shipping to drive through and get it all over with.

I think the minister is aware of the fact that a committee can sometimes operate much better if it has a bit of opportunity to consider the evidence rather than have it come before it in something of a staccato fashion. If you take an analogy in sports, it seems to me that it is much easier to watch a football game or a baseball game than it is to watch a hockey game, because you have more pauses and more chance to reflect on what is going on. It is one straight hockey game when Donald Gordon appears before us, with no periods called and really no offsides. I hope the minister will give consideration to that matter and let us know where we stand on the Donald Gordon situation. When is he coming?

The next point I wanted to bring to the attention of the minister is something I touched on last year, namely the rather unusual growth in the Department of Transport. At that time I pointed out to hon. members who represent free enterprise in this chamber that one of the consequences of some of the peculiar actions in the non-free enterprise sphere of this government is that more and more responsibilities are being put upon the Department of Transport and that it is growing in size. Even someone like myself who is not a forthright free enterpriser cannot help but be concerned about the growth in size of the Department of Transport.

I would ask the minister this question. Can he give us a projection in respect of air services, which seems to represent the fastest growing part of his deparment? Can he give us a projection for the next five years with regard to the numbers of people who are going to be employed? We have had prefigured for us on a number of occasions an astounding line of expenditures for air services in all aspects. It seems to me that we should get some idea of how big the growth is going to be in terms of personnel. It seems to me that this would be fair information.

The other thing that I wanted to ask in relation to personnel is this. Will the minister explain why, in reducing the amount of information provided in the annual report, it has been decided to dispense with the information on employees and the relative places of their employment? This seems to me to be among the useful information that was in the report. If any hon. members feel that I am carping at what may have been done to save money, I should like them to compare the report we get in relation to penitentiaries and the one we get in relation to the Department of Transport. In the one report we are just blown over with figures and details, even about the meals in one small reform institution. Here we have the fastest growing department in the government and its report gets smaller, less detailed and less informative every year.

Before I sit down I should like to touch on the point raised by the hon. member for Halifax, who indicated that I had made one fundamental error in my remarks on the ice-breaking possibilities in the St. Lawrence in connection with the advantages that Montreal had in terms of $12 a ton over freight costs vis-à-vis Halifax and Saint John. I did not raise that matter in order to suggest that Saint John or Halifax should be forgotten. I quite agree that the cost of the ice-breaking service should be taken into consideration. However, if we wish to move toward a stage where our transportation services in this country are based upon a service principle and the lowest possible cost to the shipper—and this seems to me to be the ideal, whether it is a public service providing them or whether it is a private service providing them—we need to know more about the relative costs of shipping and of using various ports and various alternatives.

Despite what the hon. member for Halifax read from the brief of the Halifax people expressing their views, I think the hon. member is also aware of the fact that along the Gulf of St. Lawrence and in Montreal there are groups that have contradictory views. I am not suggesting that one group should be heard and another should not be heard. I am suggesting that the job of the Department of Transport is to determine what will give us the most efficient, and the cheapest and the best service, and that somehow we should have a resolution of this problem. Since it will continue to be a political problem in resolving the naturally selfish interests of Montreal and its shippers against the naturally selfish interests in those terms of the cities of Halifax and Saint John, it is not going to be an easy one to solve. However, it seems to me that some attempt should be gotten under way to tackle problems such as this.

The hon. member for Peterborough is going to make some suggestions in this regard as to how we should work toward solving some of these fundamental problems in transportation where we have a choice and where, whatever choice is made, someone is going to get hurt. However, the point is that if we do not make the choice or turn toward the principle of efficient and fair service, we are going to continue to carry the extra burden in transportation costs about which we all complain and which was the subject of so much repetition before the royal commission on transportation.

As I close my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I am very pleased that you have attained your post. When I heard that you were going to have a permanent senior position I of course immediately thought back to last Thursday, I think it was, when you were acting chairman and I was ruled out of order. At the time I had a fairly good case. However, I recognize the fact that there was nothing personal or partisan about your decision. I just hope that you will have as good a time in the post as your predecessor had. I also hope—and I am not saying this as any reflection on you—that you will gain the affection that your predecessor had with almost everyone I have encountered in the House of Commons. I would say without reservation that I personally have never encountered in this House of Commons a more popular member or better liked person than your predecessor in the post. In this sense it seems to me both our sympathy and our co-operation must go out to you, because you have a real job before you in filling that role.

Mr. Chevrier: I am prompted to rise at this time, Mr. Chairman, because of some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Port Arthur. But prior to dealing with them may I say that I think the minister should clarify the position created by a statement made in the other place by the president of the national Progressive Conservative association, when he suggested that the management and the administration of the Canadian National Railways should be split into two divisions, or in other words that there should be an administrative head and a chairman of the board.

I think the committee is entitled to know here and now, before this item goes through, what is the position of the government in respect to this matter. After all, this is of considerable importance to the house and to the country. Here is what the Ottawa Journal, whose sympathies toward the government are well known, had to say in an editorial which appeared on June 5 entitled:

Mr. Gordon and the C.N.R.

I should just like to quote a portion of it:

> The Senate has heard a suggestion from one of its members that Mr. Donald Gordon be relieved of his duties as chairman of the board of the C.N.R. so that he, Mr. Gordon, might concentrate on the running of the railroad, either as president or general manager.
>
> This suggestion lacks not only wisdom but decision.
>
> It presumably wants to remove Mr. Gordon from the control of the C.N.R. but doesn't say so in so many words. It fiddles about with the titles but is not forthright. Thus it lacks decision.
> It assumes that this is a time when our national railway can be put under a kind of two-headed leadership, one of whom would perhaps be receptive to suggestions from Ottawa and the other (Mr. Gordon) would be receptive to nothing but his own judgment of the merits of any given case. Thus it lacks wisdom.

Because of the last paragraph of this editorial I am going to put the whole of it on the record. It goes on to say:

> The Journal is not so naive as to imagine that the life of a government is easy when it is trying to deal with a man like Donald Gordon, whether in wartime price controls or peacetime running of a railroad. Mr. Gordon is a large and independent man, messenger for no one. Such a man may not always be right, may not suffer politicians gladly. But such a man is more likely to be a successful head of a national railroad in these strenuous and revolutionary times than some chairman of the board with smooth manners and soft convictions.

That is an editorial which the minister might well ponder before he and his colleagues in the government make a decision on this matter. However, in view of what has been said by the hon. member for Port Arthur I say to the minister that it would be absolutely wrong and a serious mistake to call the president of the Canadian National Railways here as a witness before the committee on railways, air lines and shipping owned and operated by the government until his position is clarified by the government.

Not only do I think it is unfair, but I think it is immoral on the part of the government to continue the present situation as it has been since September of last year. Here is the president of a great national railway who, together with three of his co-directors, does not know what his position is. Not only is it ungrateful; it is disgraceful on the part of the government to hold up a matter of this importance in the manner in which it has been held up.

The legislation dealing with the directors of the Canadian National Railways passed through this house and I understand it has now passed the other place, or is about to be reported upon if it has not already gone through the other place. If that is the case there should be no further hesitation on the part of the government in making known its position.

I do not think it would be fair to those who are responsible for the administration of this great railway, particularly the president, to call Mr. Gordon before the committee unless and until his position is made clear and he knows whether or not he is going to be carrying on as president of the railway.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, may I join other hon. members who have congratulated you on what is really the confirmation of your appointment. We have already seen the manner in which you conduct the committees of this house. We know you will live up to the standard set by your predecessor who, as the hon. member for Port Arthur stated, is a very respected and greatly loved member of this house. I would only say, sir, that in the course of the business we have already conducted in the present session you have certainly given every indication that the committees of the house will be conducted in accordance with the highest traditions of parliament.

May I say to the Minister of Transport, in the same respect, how much we appreciate the co-operation which he has shown, in particular to private members, in dealing with matters related to his department.

I want to make one or two what may appear to be slightly disjointed comments because of the relatively large area of administration which comes under the supervision or within the purview of the minister. I do not intend to enlarge on these matters because they are problems which are well known to the minister. However, I suggest that in his reply the minister might make some reference to the points I raise, because I know it is not necessary to take up the time of the committee in providing the background, much of which has already been introduced into this debate.

We have had several royal commissions examining the problems of various aspects of transportation. The one currently sitting, dealing with railway transportation, has already recognized the various factors involved, such as competition with other forms of transportation in Canada. I think it is safe to say that the competition of air transportation with the railways will increase to such a point that the day may well come when, because of the progress in air transportation, we will find we have literally relegated the railways to being low grade haulers. I say this because quite obviously the competition which has been experienced in other areas of the world both in air freight and air passenger services has had a similar effect on railway companies in the countries concerned. I think this is generally recognized.

I have listened with some interest to the many criticisms of the president of the C.N.R. I think it is perhaps fair to say that some of these criticisms are based on fact, but I hope no hon. member of this committee will assume that because there is a substantial deficit in the C.N.R. the responsibility should, in effect, be borne solely by the president of the railway. I need not defend this gentleman, because he is well able to defend himself. However, I would point out that there seems to be an inclination on the part of some hon. members to hold the president of the railway entirely responsible for the difficulty in which this railway finds itself.

This brings me to the point that I want to make very clear. I think the minister has perhaps one of the greatest responsibilities of any member of the cabinet. We are already well aware of the advances made in aviation in Canada, and the history and tradition we have in this respect are second to none in the world. However, it is not enough just to sit back and assume that we have done enough in the field of aviation because we have been successful in developing efficient air line services and, to some degree, freight services; because we were successful in developing a commonwealth flying program during the emergency years, the first 2½ years of the war, or because we have successfully pioneered much of the north country through aviation.

I feel that some people in Canada—and I am not speaking specifically of those in government—have been inclined to sit back and say that we can let matters take their course; that we can share in the progress of aviation in the future without putting in all our imagination and all our effort to see that we continue to advance in this field.

Therefore I say to the minister that I think his responsibility within the department is greater in this field than that of any other person in Canada, and he has a duty to see that Canada is kept ahead in every aspect of aviation. His responsibility is not limited to the providing of assistance through a crown company, or private industry. I suggest that his responsibility includes the carrying out of regular surveys in regard to the possibility of increasing our air freight and passenger transportation through the negotiation of bilateral agreements with other countries so as to provide a greater opportunity for our air carriers to compete in the international field.

I think there is an additional responsibility on the part of the minister in respect to the equipment which Canadian carriers are using today both in air freight and air passenger services. There exist in Canada two very competent manufacturers of aircraft equipment. I think hon. members of this house will remember at least some of the history in this regard, which shows that at one time it was possible to provide one of our air lines with Canadian made aircraft. I suggest to the minister that, in co-operation with the two principal carriers, he should consider the possibility of determining whether these carriers could be provided with Canadian aircraft built in Canada, to be utilized in their passenger and air freight services. I suggest that one of the two aircraft manufacturers has already developed suitable aircraft for exactly this purpose, and I believe the other company is equally capable of doing so. If this were accomplished we should not have to depend on any other source for these aircraft.

In terms of aviation, I suggest we cannot neglect the civilian side of air development, nor can we overlook the contribution which it makes. I refer specifically to the royal Canadian flying clubs. I think it is an historical fact that these clubs contributed, perhaps more than any other element of aviation, to the success of the commonwealth training program to which I have already referred. It is equally true that some two years ago the Department of National Defence withdrew its financial support of those flying clubs. I presume this withdrawal can be justified by the fact that the air force is, to a large degree, training its own pilots. However, I suggest it is equally important that we consider the difficulties with which the flying clubs are currently attempting to cope in order to continue their operations.

These problems fall roughly into two categories. The first category involves excessive ground rate rentals which are being charged by the Department of Transport. The second category arises from the fact that many of the clubs have had to face increased costs for their facilities. These were previously provided at a rather nominal rental rate. Following the war, however, crown assets corporation was asked to dispose of them, with priority, of course, given to the flying clubs, but at considerable cost.

These non-profit organizations have little hope of survival in many instances because of the two factors I have referred to. I think we can also add to those two factors the knowledge that high municipal assessments and tax rates have, in part, created the financial burden of these clubs. Many of them are now in very serious financial difficulties. Quite obviously the department cannot be expected to assume the entire responsibility for the success of civil aviation in this field. Nevertheless, I suggest that the minister and his colleagues should review the situation very carefully regarding the future of civil aviation in Canada, in terms of what might still be expected in the way of providing pilots, because we dare not underestimate the part that civil aviation will continue to play in the whole aviation picture. I think it is fair to say that in certain areas this element of aviation will provide service to commercial air lines, and to some degree to the air force in Canada. I think it is important that it be remembered that a great many young men are being trained by those flying clubs and, therefore, the government has a major responsibility.

So, I should like to ask the minister to comment in regard to my observations, and to perhaps review very carefully the financial contributions which the government makes in an attempt to maintain the position of the royal Canadian flying clubs.

In this respect I have a second suggestion to make to the minister. There exists in the United States a body known as the civil air patrol, which is to a very large extent a military organization. It also involves civil pilots, and as a result is a rather unique organization. Today in Canada we are concerned with civil defence to perhaps a greater degree than at any other time in our history. I suggest that the minister, in co-operation with his colleague the Minister of National Defence, should make a close examination of the part that civil aviation can again play in the development of a more effective civil air patrol in Canada. Such a body does exist now. I suggest we could utilize a vast armada of aircraft, in the event of an emergency, to supplement the civil defence activity within this country. I suggest this is a broad field in which, largely through organizational responsibility, the minister, together with his colleague the Minister of National Defence, could again make a very important contribution.

Another aspect of the subject of civil aviation involves the location of the fields which are in current use. I think it is a fact that many of us are concerned because the municipal fields, and those fields operated by the department, are becoming somewhat overcrowded. I feel the experience the United States has had in the past few years clearly indicates the necessity of a major change by wherever possible removing civil aviation operation from those areas of commercial operation. This necessity is borne out by the fact that where there is an active air field used by civil, domestic and international air lines, the risk of accident is extreme. Almost every year a number of R.C.A.F. air fields are declared surplus because of the decrease in activity at those particular fields. I suggest to the minister, therefore, that he might give us his own view, and the views of his department, regarding the development of auxiliary fields for the use of private aviation in Canada. I suggest that would first of all provide a greater safety factor to air passengers, and, second, would provide much more orderly development of civil aviation in Canada.

My final comment deals with the important question of international and domestic competition between the Canadian air carriers. I think this subject has been adequately covered by a number of hon. members who have spoken before me, but I should like to say to the minister that he will soon have to face that problem or one of our air carriers, because of the restrictions imposed on it, will perhaps fall into the same position as our railway company.

The minister's predecessor indicated his belief that competition could gradually be injected into international and domestic air services. I suggest to the minister that the restrictions imposed on the Canadian Pacific Air Lines have made it almost impossible for that carrier to continue operations. I suggest the time is now opportune for introducing a greater element of competition. This can be supported by statistics compiled by the government-owned air carrier, Trans-Canada Air Lines, which indicate that while it has shown a deficit largely attributable to the replacement of its air fleet, it was able to fly more air miles at a greater rate of occupancy than at any other time. I suggest that the future of aviation must be protected, and that this can be done by the introduction of a greater element of competition at this stage by removing or relaxing those impositions placed upon the second major carrier in this country.

It is perhaps in the field of international aviation that we could hope for greater opportunity for the second major carrier because, of course, much of the traffic that they would be competing for would be drawn from United States carriers rather than in Canadian. Nevertheless, I believe that in Canada we can also provide C.P.A. with a number of runs and a greater opportunity to compete for both freight and domestic traffic at the same time.

I would like to say a little more on this subject, Mr. Chairman, but I realize it is currently under study. I hope that in the near future we shall learn the intentions of the government in this respect. As I said at the beginning, I hope he will also indicate that the department is doing everything within its power to encourage all aspects of aviation within Canada.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, may I express to you, sir, the congratulations of this group. We realize that in the future there may be conflicts. However, I am sure you will realize that those conflicts will not reflect upon our admiration and respect for you personally. We hope we shall not make your task any more difficult than that of your predecessor.

May I also express the thanks of this group to the minister for the extent to which he has attempted to bring to the floor of the house answers to the many questions we have asked over the last few months. We have appreciated the amount of detail and the accuracy of those answers and the spirit of co-operation we receive whenever we call on his good offices.

We recognize that this is one of the most important portfolios of the government. Across this nation there is a tremendous amount of questioning going on in the people's minds with respect to this whole area of transportation. We are searching for a pattern; we are searching for some direction as to where we should be going. We see the situation of two railroads competing with each other, one owned by the people of Canada and the other owned by private enterprise. Both are being subsidized, yet each is competing with the other. We want to know what will be the position of the small air line companies which have been formed in relation to T.C.A. as a government entity. We want to know where the trucking industry will fit in, especially when we have one of the railroad companies going into this form of transportation which is not receiving the subsidies that the railway transportation services are getting.

We want to know where the crown companies fit into this pattern. Unfortunately no one seems to be able to find out what this pattern is. We appeal to the minister to take this into consideration. Perhaps what we actually need is a full scale review of our transportation policy. Perhaps the minister could take a page out of the book of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Perhaps we should have a huge meeting like the resources for tomorrow conference and bring in not only the transportation people, the railway people and the air companies, but industry, representatives of agriculture and indeed some so-called "eggheads" from our universities. Let us have some economists, and perhaps even more important of all, let us have some sociologists, because more and more people in this nation are becoming more and more concerned about the fact that our population is beginning to concentrate in a few major centres, and what might be called the geographic and climatic focus is becoming even more pronounced as a result of this concentration of people within a small area.

I think we should bring in some university economists to decide just how much it is costing to put a great many people in a small area in terms of the goods and services which must be provided. What are we losing as a result of building traffic arteries in the cities so that people can drive their automobiles and spend hours of valuable time in them? Could we put that money into low cost housing? In other words, we need to make more serious value judgments in this whole area of transportation. I think the people of Canada would want leadership from the Minister of Transport in this very area.

I realize that we have a royal commission on transportation which is carrying on its work right now. We have already received the first volume of its report, but surely the minister will recognize that it is really a royal commission on railways; it is not really focused on transportation. Indeed, it is completely railway oriented. What they are suggesting is a transportation system, as it would appear to be necessary, so the railways could operate in what could reasonably be called a rational and intelligent way. But I think we should get a full scale review of transportation.

I understand there has not been such a conference since 1917. Well, let us have one now. Let us take maybe two, three years to allow industry and agriculture to prepare briefs, as the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources has done. Bring these people together. Give the conference lots of publicity and give the Canadian people some feeling that a pattern has been developed in transportation for this nation.

Over the last number of months we have seen in the newspapers signs of consternation —some among government supporters—over the situation which has developed within our railway system and within T.C.A. versus the smaller or, at least, the private air carriers. This is one of the problems we must solve. Also I feel that one of the difficulties about this royal commission on transportation is its suggested continuation of the very phases that I am rather concerned about. The MacPherson report suggests that we need to cut down on the number of branch lines and our unprofitable passenger service; that we create a huge trunk line going across Canada, and possibly trucking will come into that trunk line. But still there is no clear indication of just how this is to be organized. I am wondering whether we are creating even more concentrations of people in metropolitan areas, and the smaller municipalities of Canada are going to be left more and more behind. I think this is not what the people of Canada want; I think this is not what sociologists, penologists and various experts in the field are seeking to bring about. What they are seeking to produce is the kind of society that will produce the greatest fulfilment for the people of this nation. We have to be very careful in our emphasis, and that is why I think there should be a full review of the whole transportation scheme to find a pattern. A conference would be a helpful thing at this particular time.

Since the estimates were last discussed on the floor of this house we have been quite happy to hear that the minister has announced that regional air carriers are going to be allowed to compete with T.C.A., especially in eastern Canada. Nordair and Quebecair will be able to set up transportation lines to smaller cities such as Oshawa and Kingston. The people of my riding are hopeful that Peterborough will be able to move into this area as well, because we are beginning to realize more and more that today industries need air service. Their executives must be able to move quickly from one part of this nation or this continent to another. It is a serious disadvantage for a smaller community not to have an airport which will handle at least smaller aircraft which those lesser companies —lesser in sense of size in comparison with T.C.A. and C.P.A.—will be using.

For that reason I hope the minister will make every attempt to encourage and give every bit of advice and help possible to those smaller cities that will be trying to improve their air services and their airports, runways and conveniences over the next number of months. I think this is a step in the right direction, because it will help to stop the concentration which we find is taking place in Canada and which I do not think is helpful, even from the point of view of the Minister of National Defence in terms of the necessary needs of the foreseeable future.

Another matter about which I was a little concerned was the attitude taken by at least one member in the house with regard to some of the crown corporations which have been operating in Canada, especially in the north country. I refer particularly to Eldorado Aviation and the Northern Transportation Company. I am afraid these companies received a rather bad going over on one occasion during the debate in the house. I think it is foolish to look at either of these companies in the sense of their involving simply a transportation problem. Both these companies are inexplicably related to the uranium industry. The problem there, of course, is to service the uranium mines and to transport uranium at the cheapest cost to those who are buying it. This is what these companies are attempting to do.

I have been rather surprised at the line of argument that has been taken. These companies have been criticized because they do not seem to be making enough money, and T.C.A. has also been criticized because it is not making enough money, while on the other hand Polymer has been criticized because it has been making too much money. One really wonders what is meant by free enterprise, and the current definition would seem to be that it is enterprise for free by the people of Canada to be handed over free of charge to other entrepreneurs. I do not think this is a definition of free enterprise which a great many people would accept, certainly not in this department, and I am sure the minister will be very careful before any changes are made in relation to these crown companies which have provided such an admirable service to the uranium industry of the north country and have opened up a great many areas.

The final matter about which I should like to speak for a moment concerns my own constituency, and I am sure the minister will recognize what I have in mind. It is the problem of the Trent canal. We are very concerned about the suggestion that there may be some changes in the Trent canal system, because it is of such tremendous importance to the area I happen to represent. I should like to refer to a brief prepared by Mr. James P. McGrath, who worked on the Trent canal system for 34 years as canal superintendent for Peterborough county. I am not going to repeat the excellent summation of the importance of the Trent canal which was made by the hon. member for Simcoe East on the second or third day of the debate on item 1 of these estimates, but I should like to indicate just how important this canal system is.

It is important first as a reservoir to hold back water and thus prevent flood conditions developing throughout the entire valley. The maintenance of navigation levels in the canal itself is an extremely important matter. We have had a serious unemployment situation in this area, and we are hoping that over the next number of years we are going to be able to further develop the tourist industry, which has been unprecedented over the last quarter of a century. We are hoping that we will be able to carry out the views expressed by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and make the tourist industry not just the second major industry in our area but perhaps even the first. Navigation levels in the canal are absolutely imperative if we are going to attract the increasing number of people from the northern United States and southern Ontario who have become interested in boating.

In addition, of course, we have in operation on the Trent canal 27 power stations, some of which are privately owned. The Canadian General Electric Company, the Quaker Oats Company and other companies have such stations, and the availability of cheap power in the area is imperative if we are to maintain a growth economy and try to provide greater prosperity for these communities. I realize that there are some who feel that the changing of levels is a very serious problem in relation to the upper reservoir lakes; nevertheless I think the minister will appreciate that any serious change in the status quo will have a most deleterious effect upon a large number of people living in the lower areas.

I do not think any community wants to be one up on any other community. I do not think the system of providing air services by giving one route to one company and taking one away from somebody else and replacing that route with another is in our best interests. I think this juggling of air services that has been going on, especially on the west coast, shows a lack of foresight in a field which is probably the most important in a country as large as Canada, with its population as spread out as it is. That is why I come back to the point that there should be some kind of conference held or some kind of method devised to take a look from every direction at the whole field of transportation in 1961, 1962 or 1963, so we will know where we are going for the next 40 years. There should be such an examination at this time when there is such questioning, when there seems to be a crisis coming in the whole transportation situation and when we are at the crossroads in so many areas, in relation to the C.N.R. and the C.P.R., in relation to private and public enterprise in air travel, with respect to where the trucking industry fits into the picture, and so on.

That is why when I refer to the Trent canal system I am not asking for any special privileges in this area. What we are asking for is an attempt to fit canal services into some pattern in relation to the other areas of transportation. I should like to read one statement by Mr. McGrath who, as I said, has had wide experience. He said:

> Any deliberate man-made changes, such as the lowering of levels, might affect the navigable waters act and also the whole buoying system, rendering the navigation aids useless. The system could not be handled by groups as they could not possibly know the over-all picture.

He goes on to say what the results might be.

Since confederation the problem of transportation has always been foremost in the minds of Canadian statesmen, and I hope the minister will take into consideration some of the things I have suggested. They may involve wrenches and serious surgery in some areas of transportation, but I think we must come to grips with the matter and not be dissuaded by such slogans as free enterprise or private enterprise versus socialism, which are completely irrelevant to the situation in Canada today. What I think we need is a national policy. As it is one o'clock I will conclude my remarks.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Rynard: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I should like to congratulate you on your appointment. I hope that in the days that lie ahead you will have the wisdom of a Solomon, and you have already shown that you possess such qualities.

I should like to draw to the attention of the minister the inadequacy of the methods employed in the Trent valley system, referring particularly to the opening and closing of the locks. Men are forced to open these locks by going round and round on a turnstile. This is very heavy work. I have known some of these men to take sick and be laid up for long periods as a result of the stress and strain involved in opening these locks. This waterway is being used more and more each year as the popularity of boating increases. I do not think it is fair to these employees to subject them to the drudgery of opening these locks in the same manner as they were opened over 40 years ago. As a matter of fact, this system of opening the locks reminds me somewhat of the treadmills that were used in the early days of the first century.

I have a letter here from one of my constituents which I should like to read. He says this:

> Sure, it is wonderful to go down to the United States where they have electrically operated locks and where the men have every facility to work with, and where they have a place where you can go round behind the lock at night if you are caught; but when a fellow has to walk around on the end of the treadmill like our lock keepers have to do, I don't know how you can expect them to be in uniform with a tie on. Over there, there is electricity at every lock; and from an economy standpoint, and for service to the public, every lock should be electrified, but I am afraid I will never see the day when they are.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this system has been neglected far too long, both from the standpoint of the people who are operating the locks and from the standpoint of the people who are operating the boats.

I wanted to make some reference as well to the low level bridges which are found on the Trent system. Surely it is about time, in this day and age, that we eliminated these places where boats have to stop in order that bridges may be turned. There is no place for such things in Canadian tourism today. Both the boats and the highway traffic are held up while these bridges are being turned.

One particular case is the low level bridge at the first narrows at Atherley. This is the place to which Champlain travelled over 300 years ago. Not only are the boats held up while the bridge is being turned, but motor traffic is held up as well. I have seen traffic held up there for a long period of time. This is a particularly important bridge. It is difficult to manipulate and the work is very hard on the employees. One would think we were still in the horse and buggy days when one sees such a system in operation. This condition is extremely annoying, in view of the fact the bridge forms part of the trans-Canada highway.

Let us get rid of these obstacles so we can invite boatmen from the United States, who are used to the electrification of locks in their canal systems, to come up here. The prospects are that many more boatmen from the United States will be using this water highway than have ever used it before. Let us do a good job so they will be proud to travel on our waterways and we will be proud to have them use these waterways.

(Translation):

Mr. Habel: Mr. Chairman, I shall deal only briefly with the first item of the estimates of the Department of Transport, but there is a matter that I feel strongly about and that I shall submit to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer). It has to do with the T.C.A. services in my riding.

The minister will agree that his department is already in possession of almost all the information required to look fully into the request submitted by the Kapuskasing chamber of commerce, which represents the town as well as the district of Kapuskasing with regard to the service provided by T.C.A.

From 1937 or 1938 to 1957, that district was served by T.C.A., first as part of a service between Toronto and Winnipeg, since Kapuskasing was located along the route between Toronto and Winnipeg. Later on, in 1945, that city was served by a direct flight from Toronto to Kapuskasing.

When the directors of Trans-Canada Air Lines decided to use Viscount aircraft, in October 1957, the service between Toronto and Kapuskasing was dropped.

I know that surveys were made by the Toronto office and that the department was led to believe that the cost of extending the runways to accommodate Viscounts would run extremely high.

However, engineers who are currently employed by the Spruce Falls Company, which operates a paper mill in Kapuskasing, and who must certainly know their business have made a thorough study of the situation. They claim that the estimate made by the Toronto office is much higher than the actual cost.

Mr. Chairman, it is an acknowledged fact that the construction of the Kapuskasing airport was a costly project since all buildings and facilities required for the operation of an airport, like a weather station, etc., were provided. Now, however, these buildings are almost left uncared for, except perhaps for what is needed by those who use what is commonly known as the private air service.

The airport is being used widely enough. As a matter of fact, I understand five or ten planes may be seen every day either landing or taking off. But that is not the important point. The important point is the service to which the population of the district has been used.

When the Kapuskasing airport was used by Trans-Canada Air Lines, it welcomed many distinguished visitors, for instance, Her Majesty the Queen and the Duke of Edinburgh during their visit in Canada in 1951; Her Majesty was then, of course, Princess Elizabeth.

In 1941, I think there was the visit of the late Duke of Kent, a few weeks only before his accidental death.

We had also the visit of Field Marshal Montgomery and of several other personalities. These historical events are proof enough that the Kapuskasing airport was a suitable airport and that it should have been maintained in good operating condition so that the service could be continued.

Our district is about 560 miles from Toronto and 600 miles from Montreal, maybe a little more. Moreover, our railway service is quite inadequate, and the need for a T.C.A. air service has become urgent.

If I chose not to mention this matter during the previous sessions, it is because I had promised the chamber of commerce officials that politics would not interfere with the efforts being made to induce the Department of Transport to restore the service we had enjoyed for some ten years. I did not mention the subject in the house, but I did keep in touch with the minister, and especially with his predecessor. I would not want to blame the present minister for what happened, but I would ask him to kindly reconsider the situation and to carefully look his files over concerning Kapuskasing airport. Then he will certainly realize how reasonable is the request we make in the name of people living in that outlying region where fast transportation is needed in case of emergency.

At the present time, for instance, to go to Toronto you have to ride on a bus from Kapuskasing to Cochrane in order to get a train connection, around 2.30 p.m. That train reaches Toronto around 8.30 the next morning. You have to admit that it is quite a long run, particularly when you consider that there is no sleeping car between Kapuskasing and North Bay. A serious study of that problem is a must and the request of the chamber of commerce should be considered so that the problem can be solved in keeping with the needs of the region.

The Spruce Falls Power and Paper Company of Kapuskasing provides the Canadian National with a yearly income of over $10 million, just for the shipping of paper and other materials that the mills require. So, it seems to me, considering all that, the department could have new surveys carried out and the situation studied, in order that an area which now numbers more than 35,000 is provided with a service like the one we are asking for, and which would fill a long felt need.

Furthermore, the minister will no doubt be interested to know that in the same district the Ontario hydro is carrying out at least two large developments and that, in addition, three other projects are on the way. Which means that for five to ten years an average of two or three thousand additional men will find work in the Kapuskasing and Cochrane districts, and they, of course, would find it most useful to have an adequate service for a population which should not be neglected any longer.

I hope the minister—I must say, by the way, that he found means to give his home town an airport, and I do not blame him for that—

Mr. Balcer: It was not me but my predecessor.

Mr. Habel: The minister says it was not him—

Mr. Balcer: It was my predecessor.

Mr. Habel: I am quite willing to grant him that, and even though he was not responsible for that to any great extent, I am sure that he will take credit all the same. I do not want to reproach him, to blame him for that but, as we know, Three Rivers is 80 miles away from both Montreal and Quebec city, so that if an airport is justified there, the minister will admit that it would be even more justified in an area like ours where the people have the same right to live as those of any other part of the country.

Therefore, our area should have a better service, if not through the railway, then at least through T.C.A. in order that we may feel a little more like the rest of the Canadian people, not as a forgotten area, but rather as an area where one and all benefit from equal opportunities.

(Text):

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, I should first like to associate myself with the remarks made by previous speakers in this debate about your appointment as chairman of committees. I am sure you will carry on and do the job equally as well as and perhaps better than you have while filling in without the official appointment. I am sorry, sir, that your appointment has been made necessary because of the absence through illness of Ted Rea, and I associate myself with those hon. members who wish him an early and speedy recovery.

This is the first opportunity I have had to congratulate the minister since his appointment. I was privileged to take part in the ceremonies at the opening of the new airport terminal in Regina on September 12, which I think was the day following his official appointment as Minister of Transport. We were privileged at that time to have the former minister participate in those ceremonies.

The people of Regina are very proud of the fine terminal which now stands at that airport. It is certainly one that is well constructed, well laid out and well planned, and it will serve its purposes in a very efficient manner. Since the opening of that terminal, after many, many years of effort, Saskatchewan now boasts a direct north-south air service link. That link was opened on May 4 from Regina to Minot, North Central Air Lines having the franchise. It has been operating for something over a month now and its passenger, freight and express services are developing. They are operating at present in temporary accommodation in this new terminal for customs and immigration purposes. I venture to say that within a period of six months we will need to add to that terminal to take care of this traffic. We will need to provide suitable and proper facilities for this purpose. I hope the minister will keep this development in mind when the time comes, as it seems clear it will, when the service is established and the needs are there. I hope the minister will at that time give a sympathetic hearing to me when I present him with the problem and ask for action.

I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary South in regard to civil aviation. I am somewhat concerned about the position of flying clubs in Canada. I think there is justification for the policy that was adopted in regard to this matter, just purely from the point of view of training pilots. However, it seems to me from my experience and association with the flying club at home and what it is doing that there are considerations other than the mere training of pilots.

We see lads of the district join the flying club at an early age. They graduate as pilots. It is true that they do not go on to fly and use that training commercially, but it has stimulated in them an interest in other aspects of air service and they go on to college and take technical and meteorological training, and so on. From the initial impetus given by the operation of the flying club in the community I am sure many of the personnel we will need for our expanding development in air services could be found.

It is certainly a future that looks bright. With the ever increasing need for trained personnel it seems to me that these flying clubs should be kept on a sound operating basis, and reconsideration should be given to this program so that not only will the clubs initially train these young people to fly, but they will stimulate in them an interest in education in the other avenues of air service and so provide us with very necessary personnel for the future.

I should like to make a few remarks at this time on another matter, because I do not know where else to make them. It is a problem I want to bring before the government and the committee. I refer to developing an interest in soaring in Canada. There are now a number of very active soaring clubs in Canada. They have a national organization. I would hazard the guess that they are composed mainly of former R.C.A.F. officers and personnel, men who have served their country well.

While some people may look upon this as a sport purely and simply, and perhaps a rich man's sport, I think it goes far beyond that. We all know that the treaty of Versailles was circumvented by the Germans through the use of gliders to train the youth of Germany, so that when they broke the treaty finally and openly and started to train an air force these boys had the advantage of the background and experience they had gained in soaring.

I would also refer to the many scientific and aviation journals that have been concerned with trying to find a reason why so many air accidents take place in the mountains. These accidents usually end up in an inquiry and a report that it was due to the pilot's error, but in many cases the pilots concerned were men with years and years of experience. From these inquiries has been brought forth information about the hazards of mountain waves. It seems that mountains set up these waves and air currents, and even today we do not have enough information about them. Through the use of motorless planes, or soaring, much information could be gained and it would provide a source of research into this problem. The soaring clubs as I know them are carried on at the expense of the members themselves. They do not have any subsidies, grants or aid.

Canada has been represented in the soaring events at the Olympics for many years. These events occur every two years. It was rather ironic and something about which I think we should be concerned that in 1960, for the first time, Canada's flag did not fly at the soaring Olympics at Cologne, Germany.

This was simply due to a lack of funds, the price of gliders and the time off from work which was necessary to participate in these events. The price of gliders has risen over the years. In spite of all the effort put forward, the Canadian soaring association found itself in a position where it could not transport even the pilots to Cologne for this contest. It was a matter perhaps of some $800.

My research and information indicate that in other countries of the world—and there were many countries represented at this competition—grants are made and help is provided. I have talked with these soaring enthusiasts and with the president of the soaring association of Canada. They do not seek grants to maintain their clubs as such. They are quite able and quite competent enough to make whatever sacrifice is necessary for the operation of their clubs. However, when it comes to Olympic competition they feel that Canada should be represented, and they would seek a policy by this government of transportation for the pilots at least.

I noticed a picture in a magazine this week showing that the United States soaring team was composed of 16 persons, and included maintenance people as well as pilots and meteorological experts. In previous years when Canada has participated we have had to go to these events and borrow gliders from other people because our clubs have not been able to transport their own gliders. They have also had to ask the help of other maintenance crews in cases of necessity, and they have had to use other meteorological services.

I ask the minister to give some consideration to this request. I think it would involve a very minimum expenditure to guarantee Canada's participation in these events. I believe it is warranted as a continuing activity in Canada, and one which should be developed and could be used for the improvement of our knowledge about mountain waves and things such as that.

Mr. Chairman, I seriously ask the minister to consider this suggestion. If it is something which is not under the administration of his department I hope he will suggest where I should refer the suggestion, because I do feel that these people have made an excellent showing in the past in spite of the handicaps they have faced. I suggest they would be excellent representatives of Canada in these international competitions.

I am very pleased to take the opportunity of referring to this subject during the consideration of the first item of the estimates of this department because quite recently Mr. Julian Audette, one of my own constituents, attended the Canadian soaring championship trials at Pincher Creek in Alberta, and there won two soaring championships, having attained an absolute altitude of 24,500 feet and 17,500 feet altitude gain. In view of that fact this seemed to be an opportune time for me to make this request of the minister and the government.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, my intervention during the consideration of the first item of the estimates of the Department of Transport will be brief. I should like to ask the minister for certain information which I hope he will supply during his reply.

On May 10, in reply to a question addressed to the minister by the hon. member for Cochrane, the minister stated that the municipality of Gloucester and the town of Bathurst had submitted a joint resolution regarding the establishment of an airport in the county of Gloucester. I understand that earlier this session a delegation from the municipality of Gloucester and the town of Bathurst met with the minister and his officials to discuss the possibility of establishing an airport in the county. I would appreciate it if the minister could inform this committee of the exact policy of his department in this regard, as well as the terms and conditions under which a cost sharing form of assistance could be made available by the federal government. I should hope that at the same time the minister could also inform this committee whether similar representations have been received from the municipality of Restigouche and the town of Dalhousie and, if so, what reply he has made.

I understand the minister has made a statement to the effect that the municipality of Restigouche had purchased certain land with the intention of establishing an airport. I would appreciate the minister advising this committee whether that deal has been closed and whether the federal government has agreed to contribute to the cost of establishing an airport either in the municipality of Restigouche or the municipality of Gloucester and, if so, under what terms and conditions.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw to the attention of the minister that problem which I drew to his attention earlier, but which I believe has been aggravated in the past month or so, having to do with the operations of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the trucking industry. I pointed out earlier that the Canadian Pacific Railway is now the largest trucking operator in Canada and that it has purchased a number of private truck lines over the past few years, although until recently it has operated those truck lines on an independent basis. That company recently has developed a new policy of integrating the truck lines into the railway's operations.

This has caused a number of labour problems in the province of British Columbia.

This new policy has meant that people who formerly had been represented by the teamsters union were forced to be represented by one of the railway brotherhoods though the particular operation in question represented but a small portion of the railway operation.

This situation has been recently brought to my attention again, and I am referring to this subject because of a letter I received from Mr. Weldon Jubenville, president of the international woodworkers of America, local 180. He informs me that members of that union have also been caused considerable difficulty because of the integration of these trucking operations into the railway services. I believe this is something which concerns both the Department of Labour and the Department of Transport, and I should hope that the two ministers in question will discuss this matter, because there are a number of employees in British Columbia at the present time who have had to face this difficulty, and because this situation will become more acute across this country as the railway integrates this type of service into its operation across Canada.

That integration will in effect mean that employees of these trucking firms, who have been able to choose their own bargaining agent over the years, will now be deprived of that right. It seems to me that each group of individuals in Canada should be able to choose the union it wants to represent it, and to choose the union to which it wants to belong.

I suggest there is another serious problem arising which is affecting those firms in British Columbia which are competing with other British Columbia firms whose operations are entirely within that province. Now that the firms have been integrated into the C.P.R. they come under federal labour legislation, as a result of which those individuals who are working for the British Columbia firms are placed in an unfair competitive position because of the fact that railway wages are based on the national average rather than the provincial average. Many employees have had to take substantial wage cuts, amounting to 65 cents an hour in the case of individuals belonging to the teamsters union, at the time they left the teamsters union to join the Canadian brotherhood of railway and steamship clerks.

Mr. Jubenville in his letter drew my attention to a letter his union had written to the Minister of Labour, which made reference to the fact that rates of pay to truck drivers following their integration with C.P.R. operations have dropped to $1.54 an hour as compared to $2.35 an hour which was being paid when those individuals belonged to the international woodworkers of America. That situation seems very unfair, and warrants the immediate consideration of the government.

I have always opposed the entry of railway companies into the trucking industry. However, that view has not been shared by everyone in this committee. In view of this new problem which has arisen as a result of the railway companies becoming substantially involved in the trucking industry, this situation should be considered by the government with a view to deciding whether they should be allowed to integrate these services into the railway operations. I can see many problems arising from this change, such as the possibility of another monopoly in transportation developing. I understand the railway companies now control some 15 per cent to 20 per cent of the trucking industry in Canada.

I pointed out earlier that I thought it unwise to have all our transportation services tied to one union because, if a strike were called, the government would then have to take some compulsory action. I believe that collective bargaining should be allowed to run the full course, providing there are two transportation services; but when all the transportation services come under the control of railway management, and under the control of one union, I do not see how that course can be followed at all. The employees would lose their right to free collective bargaining, because the government could not possibly allow transportation in this country to come to a standstill. The policy of the government throughout has been in opposition to compulsory arbitration of any sort. The Conservative party as well as organized labour have been opposed to this for many years.

For the foregoing reasons I suggest the government should examine the trucking industry of this country as a whole. I suggest that, in the interest of the employees the trucking industry should remain outside the operations of the railways because, when the transportation services are controlled by one management and by one union, those employees likely will lose their right to strike.

I hope the minister will take this situation under consideration in consultation with the Minister of Labour in an attempt to decide what action can be taken by the government in regard to this matter.

(Translation):

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, at the very beginning of my remarks I should like to draw again the minister's attention, although it is a bit late, to the recent appointment of a vice president to the Canadian National.

Following the death of the previous vice president, I had taken steps and had even broached the subject with the Minister of Transport—in fact, I even got in touch with the president of the company—in order that, out of 17 vice presidents of the Canadian National, one at least should be a French Canadian, especially in the case of the St. Lawrence area; there was no better opportunity for the government to make representations to the president himself. This government seems on good terms with the president, so the minister could very well have expressed the wish that a French Canadian be appointed vice president. I do not question the competence of the one who has been appointed, but I am convinced that there were some others who, having served very near the vice president, had all the necessary qualifications for the position.

I do not know whether the new vice president is bilingual; I would not be at all surprised if he was unilingual.

I understand that with the adoption of this new bill increasing from seven to 12 the number of directors, the government may appoint two or three French-speaking directors, and then they will use these appointments to talk about national unity across the country.

It is not enough to make political appointments in order to preach unity; but it is very important to consider the qualifications of the appointees and this is why I suggest that the person selected as the replacement for the vice president should have been an employee with over 35 or 40 years of service in all departments of the C.N.R. I said it before and I say it now, I am convinced that that was the kind of appointment that should have been made and that the minister should have exerted the necessary pressure, or simply express the wish to the C.N.R. authorities, to the president if necessary, that a French Canadian be appointed.

I do not want to dwell too long on the issue, Mr. Chairman, because I have a few other matters that I want to raise.

First of all, I should like to draw the minister's attention to the fact that some time ago, I referred in this house to the Champlain bridge approaches, and that on May 20 last, I asked that the agreement signed the day before between the national harbours board and the city of Montreal be tabled. The only return that was tabled is a letter of September 1959 regarding three items, and two other letters under date of February 6 and 8, 1961, containing proposals to the city of Montreal, but no evaluation or information.

The reason why I asked for the tabling of this agreement between the city of Montreal and the national harbours board, is because it concerns the very important matter of the Champlain bridge exits on the north shore. It has been reported in the press that the national harbours board intended to spend $5 million for those approaches. In the explanatory letter of February 6—the agreement was signed only on May 19—mention was made that a few streets should be one-way streets, but nothing was said about the exact location of those exits and entrances on the north side of the Champlain bridge.

I often raise that point. I have been bringing this question to the minister's attention for three or four years now; the matter is most urgent and causes great concern to all the residents of that neighbourhood.

I notice that my remarks cause the minister to smile but I can assure him that if he is still sitting at the same place, one year from now—

Mr. Ricard: That is a sure thing.

Mr. Loiselle: —and if the situation has not improved on the approaches to the Champlain bridge, I will again call the minister's attention to this matter and I will even invite him to visit the place, since it is situated in my constituency.

I repeat it, the situation will become unbearable.

Actually, a tunnel was built to replace the Atwater street bridge but it is much too narrow to handle all the traffic, especially at peak hours. It is now proposed to channel through that tunnel the six lanes of traffic on the Champlain bridge. That will lead to a disaster. The tunnel will certainly not handle the extra traffic.

I know that any suggestion coming from the opposition is always looked upon with a certain suspicion. We are always asked to make suggestions but very few of those we make are carried out.

Well, I ask that something be done in that regard and I hope appropriate action will be taken because the constituencies of St. Ann, St. Henry and Verdun, the latter being represented by a member on the government side, will be flooded with traffic and the situation will be disastrous.

I have suggested that elevated roadways be built. Whether elevated or level roadways are built, it does not matter at all, as long as the problem of the Champlain bridge traffic is settled. I would be satisfied if the traffic on the bridge were routed through Atwater street, past St. James street.

At the present time, all traffic seems to go through the Atwater tunnel, as I mentioned earlier. I wonder whether something will come out of it through repetition. I hope so, because I am not asking this for myself. As for me, if the road I intend to use is blocked, I will take another one. But I am making these representations on behalf of those who must use this bridge that will serve housing developments now being built on the south shore of the St. Lawrence.

What will happen in these circumstances? The traffic on the Montreal side will be paralysed.

I hope that we shall at least get some explanation regarding the reported amount of $5 million being appropriated by the national harbours board for the improvement of the Champlain bridge approaches on the north side.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to refer to another problem and to draw the minister's attention to an event which is occurring almost every year, and more particularly, it seems to me, these last few years, in the vicinity of Lachine canal.

Again last week, the canal took the life of a 10 year old child. As a matter of fact the drowning of one or two children in the canal happens every year. I warn the minister that I am starting a campaign to have an inquiry made into the matter so that means of protection may be provided at the most dangerous points. Whether it be a railing, a parapet or a fence, the important thing is to do something to keep off children. The body of the 10 year old child who drowned last week was recovered 8 days later.

I heard about that unfortunate accident only during the week end, and on Monday I approached the St. Lawrence seaway authority in order that something might be done to find the body.

While I was led to expect that the child might have escaped drowning, the lifeless body was discovered floating on the Lachine canal Monday evening. For eight days the parents had been in agony. The father was even reported as saying: I wish I could be sure that our child is dead because I could then bury him and I would know where he is.

Just imagine, Mr. Chairman, the concern of parents looking for a 10 year old child for eight days. And yet, such occurrences happen every year. Only last week the body of an older man was fished out of the Lachine canal.

It is essential that the matter be considered and that access to the most dangerous spots be made impossible. I am thinking in particular of Bassin street, close to Des Seigneurs street, where the canal is only two feet away from the road, since there is no sidewalk. Such places should be provided with fences or barricades, so that no other child will drown in Lachine canal.

Mr. Chairman, the matter I should like to raise now has been the subject of a few news stories, although I have not been informed officially. If my memory serves me right, it would seem that the authorities of the city of Montreal got in touch with the Department of Transport in order to acquire from the Canadian National a property which is commonly called Turcot yard.

I would ask the minister—I do not know whether he is discussing the Soulanges canal, and if so, I would not like to disturb him —to kindly give me an answer and tell me whether the authorities of the city of Montreal got in touch with his department with a view to acquiring Turcot yard, which is owned by the Canadian National.

The present municipal administration apparently intends to clear the slums and build low cost or low rental housing. The Turcot yard would be an ideal location for a large residential area.

Mr. Chairman, for the information of the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Bourbonnais), who is apparently trying to say something that I cannot hear, work will be started within a year or a year and a half, in my constituency, on a low cost housing project, and I am very pleased. Moreover, I hope the situation will improve throughout Montreal following the speech made last week in Halifax by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) at the convention of mayors and municipal administrators, in which he urged them to make greater use of the facilities offered by the National Housing Act. particularly with regard to low cost housing. Unless the present municipal administration changes its mind, it will probably follow his advice, and I hope that when the minister's department receives an application from the Montreal authorities—perhaps it has already received one—with respect to the acquisition of the Turcot yard, the minister will consider it and the situation will be improved.

Mr. Chairman, I have only one more short remark to make before resuming my seat.

At the present time, there are three bridges over the St. Lawrence, or rather the third one is just being completed. It has been suggested in the past, and therefore I wish to associate myself with the representations made by the hon. members for Maisonneuve-Rosemont and Hochelaga (Messrs. Deschatelets and Eudes), that a bridge be built in eastern Montreal.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if, instead of building a bridge, the department might make a survey to determine whether it would be preferable to build a tunnel under the river. Perhaps a bridge would be more economical, but it would raise far more problems than a tunnel.

We are often asked by ministers to make suggestions. I leave this one with the minister, and I can only hope that among the many suggestions made to him, he will recognize that some are of great value and will give them due consideration.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a few words with regard to the president of the Canadian National Railways Mr. Donald Gordon, who is still head of that company. I ask the government not to renew Mr. Donald Gordon's term of office, because all C.N.R. employees hate him and hope that his mandate will not be renewed. There is at this time an iron curtain between Mr. Gordon and employees of the C.N.R.

Many residents of the county I have the honour of representing in this house are C.N.R. employees. Those people have asked me to speak out for them. In addition, I have received letters from various parts of the country, asking me to urge that Mr. Gordon's term of office, be not renewed. Mr. Gordon is an autocrat. To my mind, he is enemy No. 1 of national unity. We know the pressures that have been exerted on Mr. Gordon, on various occasions, for the sole purpose of requesting fair treatment for French speaking Canadians. As a matter of fact, Mr. Gordon has just done something which not only is counter to national unity but is an insult to the French speaking population when this week he appointed as vice president a certain gentleman who is not French speaking while out of seventeen C.N.R. vice presidents not one is French Canadian.

This is a crown company, and I know that the minister is responsible only for the estimates of that railway company, and that the government may not directly interfere with that company's business. Therefore, I very much wish that the man who replaces Mr. Gordon will show more understanding than has the present incumbent and that he will try to give fair treatment to all Canadians, whatever their racial origin.

May I also say—and this is about the C.N.R.—there have been may items in the press on the subject of bilingualism at the various railway stations serving a large sector of the French-speaking population. Mr. Gordon has never paid any attention to the representations made in the interest of national unity and in the interest of C.N.R. employees. I sincerely hope that Mr. Gordon's term will not be renewed and that he too will be discarded as were the steam engines he replaced with diesels.

I have something to say also about T.C.A. There have been press items too about this crown corporation for whose expenditures the minister is accountable, and more specifically about air hostesses. Out of 690 air hostesses in the employ of T.C.A., 90 are bilingual and 75 can speak three languages; the others speak but one language, at best speak a few words of French. Of the latter, 25 per cent are in the Montreal-based group and 33 per cent are stationed in Toronto. Among those who speak three languages, most of them being of European origin, there are a few French-Canadian girls. Since we are known abroad as a bilingual nation, it would only be consistent, I think, if T.C.A. officials did all they could to increase their staff of bilingual hostesses, so that passengers from abroad, as well as Canadians, may be understood. Besides tourists from abroad would have a good opinion about our country which is a bi-cultural and bi-ethnical country.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish the Minister of Transport would tell us why there has been delay in awarding a beer and wine licence to the owner of the restaurant at the Montreal international airport. That delay has been detrimental to the good name of Canada since all international airports have bars and restaurants which are allowed to sell alcoholic beverages.

May I point out also that the operators of that restaurant obtained the concession following a call for tenders, even though theirs was the highest tender.

I was also given to understand that they had been subjected to pressures and blackmail, and even that they had been compelled, by the son of the chairman of the liquor commission, to buy some $400,000 worth of furniture that he himself offers for sale, something which, in my opinion, is absolutely undemocratic. It is a case of nepotism.

Therefore I would appreciate a few words from the minister about this matter, and I wish he would tell us too whether he is aware of the fact that the award of the beer and wine license to the operators of the restaurant at the international airport of Montreal was delayed for several months. I was astounded to learn about this situation. This sort of thing gives a bad name to the province of Quebec and to Canada as a whole.

I therefore ask the minister to tell us about that case and inform us whether the facts were as reported.

(Text):

Mr. Small: It was not my intention to speak on this question this afternoon, but I should like to make some reference to the remarks that have been made. I have already congratulated you, Mr. Chairman, upon your appointment to this office so it is not necessary to reiterate.

On frequent occasions I have made some comments—some people have called them lamentations, wailings or harangues—by way of criticism of the administration of the Canadian National Railways. I do not intend to go over the ground I have already covered, but some observations have been made, probably justifiably, by the hon. member for Laurier, in respect of the president of the Canadian National Railways. The hon. member said the president's term of office is up and he has been kept waiting for some time, particularly in view of the passage of the bill to increase the number of directors, for his re-appointment as director and president.

The hon. member for Laurier then went on to mention the service of the president. Having worked with him and been associated with him for some years, I can also understand why the present Minister of Transport as well as the previous minister of transport spoke very highly of him and his administrative ability. I have never questioned his administrative ability at any time. I know that when you are working with a person you become very good friends and you probably overlook some things that would not be countenanced under ordinary business conditions.

On a number of occasions in the past I have referred to certain conditions at terminal stations which I did not believe were right. I started off with an air of levity and humour, trying to make my criticisms amusing. I am not one of those given to making complaints. I can generally see the humour in these grotesque situations. I can get a lot of humour and fun out of them. However, I found these criticisms were treated as humour and no attention was paid to them. When the C.N.R. president appeared before the committee, I would not say he was insolent but I would say he was arrogant and adopted a haughty manner, and he said, in effect, "If you did not like my efficiency and services, then you could dispense with them." Then, when somebody suggested taking him at his word, it was alleged we were persecuting him or unduly criticizing him. It is our prerogative to criticize or commend.

The main job of a person who is in the transport business is to give the kind of service the public expects. Although some improvements were made but they were not sufficient in extent to warrant people using the services the railways supply. It was intimated that the president of the Canadian National has been offered a position with the Chase National Bank in New York at $125,000. If he were wise, he would take it. He would get an increase in salary and the railway situation would soon be cleared up; the morale of the employees would be restored and the travelling public would be happy.

I have had a considerable amount of correspondence from railway employees. They call me on the telephone as well. I feel that their complaints have merit and we cannot afford to ignore them. I do not believe the president of the railroad has the goodwill of the people of Canada. I do not know whether or not this is the result of continual criticism, but nevertheless reference has been made to the fact that morale within the service is very low and is not likely to be improved so long as the president remains. The hon. member for Laurier says the government should do something. I can assure him that if I had anything to do with the matter something would have been done long ago. Why the government have not taken action, I do not know because they must be aware of the criticism that most of the members of this house have received.

One of the complaints to which I referred three or four years ago related to the commuter service. The commuter service is deplorable. There is profit in commuter service but the railways have allowed it to deteriorate. They have not catered to it or tried to retain it. The railways tell you now that if you want this service you will have to pay a fabulous sum of money to have it restored. If you offer constructive suggestions, the officials tell you the commuter service is not very profitable; it cannot be maintained because it is only wanted in the morning and the evening. Well, this situation applies to every transit company. The Toronto transportation commission has to meet this condition. Every city that provides a transportation service is faced with the same problem, a high volume of traffic in the morning and at night. Departmental stores have to contend with a similar problem. People who are in the broad service field are faced with this problem and make an effort to meet the requirements of their patrons.

I believe it would be more advantageous to go after this traffic than to lay off men according to seniority as the railways have been doing. The men who are being laid off now could be employed on a part time basis, morning and evening—the hotels, restaurants and theatres do so—and they would probably get four hours or six hours of work. They would be glad to get it and, at the same time, the public would be provided with satisfactory service.

I have mentioned the trucking business before. The railways have had opportunities in the past to go into the trucking business, and it would not have been difficult for them to do so at that time. Now, the railways are going after those who have a vested interest in a trucking business. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway said a while ago that there was going to be jurisdictional trouble with the unions. These are things that make many of us wonder whether they are giving the best service. The remarks made by the hon. member for Laurier quoting newspaper comment about the delay in the decision to retain the services of the president have also caused many of us to wonder whether this would perhaps not be an opportune time to dispense with them. If he is in any suspense or in doubt what to do, probably this would be the time for us to terminate his service. If the remarks had not been made about it I would probably have let the matter go. Personally I think the government would be well advised to dispense with his services. It is not going to cause any hardship to him because the salary he has drawn over the last ten or eleven years would set any man up in comfort for the rest of his life. The pension he will get will not be niggardly either. There therefore need be no qualms about doing anything that is unkind or is going to financially harm him because he will retire from his position with more income than many people living in Canada today will get when they retire. The only damage that will be done will perhaps be to his ego.

Mr. Thompson: Like others who have preceded me, Mr. Chairman, I should like to congratulate you on having assumed the office of deputy chairman of committees, although I also regret the circumstances which necessitated your appointment, namely the serious illness of the hon. member for Spadina. I hope that your period in office will be a very satisfying one to you.

I should now like to say a few words about the Trent canal and the Murray canal, both of which run through my riding and their significance to the people in my constituency, particularly those who live adjacent to those canals. I should like to speak first about the flow of water through the Trent canal. This year representations were made by the Haliburton chamber of commerce to maintain bodies of water in reservoirs at the high point of land in the Trent canal for the purposes of cottagers. As I understand it, the priorities which are given to the flow of water in the Trent canal are as follows. First priority is given to navigation or to boats. Second priority is given to power; I refer to hydroelectric power. Third priority is given to fishing or other activities of that nature. I would assume that fourth priority would therefore be given to cottagers. In view of the fact that the Trent canal is there to be used mainly as a means of transportation for boats, I feel that transportation and boating should be given a high priority and certainly hydroelectric power should be given very high priority. It means a great deal to people in communities like Campbellford, for instance, who rely for their hydroelectric power supply entirely on the water flow in the Trent canal. I understand the department has decided that the normal flow of water will not be disturbed this year for the benefit of those who own cottages. In making this decision I think the department arrived at the right one.

I should make a few remarks in connection with the operation of the canal. Referring to the item which is covered in the estimates, I note that it calls for "administration, operation and maintenance". I do not believe it is quite clear what the policy is with regard to some of these non-commercial canals. The Trent canal was originally built as a commercial canal. It never performed that function and it has been reduced now to a canal which is used largely for pleasure craft. The only indication I could get as to the policy of the department toward this non-commercial type of canal is in the heading used in the estimates, namely "administration, operation and maintenance". In other words, the canals are going to be kept up but that is all. I should like to see the word "improvement" added to this heading. I should like to see not only maintenance but also the idea of improvement brought into the policy in respect of these canals.

In that connection I have a few small suggestions to make. They are things which I do not think are expensive but which I think could be a great improvement. As far as the tourist industry is concerned canals today constitute quite a tourist attraction. If they are going to be maintained, and if they are of some benefit as a tourist attraction, surely it would be worth while to spend a few extra dollars in order to make them really attractive to people who want to use them.

When I came down to the department a couple of years ago with a delegation from Campbellford with some suggestions as to improvements on the canal, we were told that the best justification for the expenditure of money on the Trent canal was the number of United States boats which used the canal; in other words, the more money that can be brought in from the United States or the more dollars that can be brought in, the better, and that is the best form of justification for the canal.

I think it is general knowledge that last year there was an unprecedented number of lockages through both canals. Both are being used more and more every year. In order to determine just what use is made of the canal by Canadian boats and by United States boats I took it upon myself last August to circularize the various yacht clubs and power squadrons around lake Ontario and also the Buffalo yacht club in lake Erie, in order to see how much they knew about the canal and how much use was being made of it. I sent out a small questionnaire. It was not a very detailed one. The questions were as to what literature the various yacht clubs had on the canal, how many of their members had used it and what percentage of the members had used it; and I requested any suggestions as to the improvements that might be made for the use of pleasure craft. I sent out 22 of these questionnaires to various yacht clubs and power squadrons around lake Ontario. I am pleased to say that I had a great deal of co-operation. I had responses from most of them. In many cases they have gone to a great deal of trouble to get the information for which I had asked.

I should like to refer to two or three of the replies I received. I think that is the best way of getting these suggestions across. I have here a letter which was received from the secretary of the Buffalo yacht club which, of course, is not in lake Ontario. In any event the secretary of the Buffalo yacht club stated in part as follows:

I have talked to 64 members, who have sailed on the Trent waterways. Obtaining ice and finding navigational markers were the only areas of improvement mentioned.

Sixty four members constitute about 24 per cent of the memberships of the Buffalo yacht club. I might say that in every case the club indicated that it did not have any literature on the Trent canal system. Why no literature was available I do not know. It seems to me that the department must have some literature available. It might be a good suggestion that some of this literature should be sent out rather than just wait until it is requested by the various yacht clubs. It might be a good idea to send it out and let them have it so that they will know something about the canal and possibly make use of the canal. The secretary of the Buffalo yacht club in his letter stated:

We would be pleased to receive and post any literature on the Trent canal system.

I have another reply from the secretary of Canadian power squadrons, Toronto. He points out:

I have just completed 11 return trips through the Trent waterway system and I am entirely enthusiastic about the service and facilities of the system in so far as it concerns my own particular type of boat, which is a cabin cruiser approximately 40 feet long and of heavy construction. Dozens of our members use the canal and continue to use it year after year, and generally reports from the skippers of boats are most favourable, particularly those who have been through the system a few times.

He goes on to say:

One suggestion that could be implemented during the lay-up season, and that is to increase the number of chains in most locks because of the large number of small boats now using the locks that find it very difficult to hang on when the chains are so far apart.

I consider that the Trent canal system is one of Canada's greatest boating attractions. All 240.5 miles of waterway is most beautiful and anything that can be done to help the boats that use its facilities would be most appreciated.

I have another fairly complete reply from the commodore of the Brockville yacht club. Again, this yacht club has no literature on the Trent canal; there is nothing available. Unless they ask for it, they do not get it. The commodore makes the following suggestions:

If facilities were available to provide water, power and ice at the docking locations adjacent to the locks, it would be a great assistance to boat owners. I would also recommend that additional dockage facilities be provided away from the locks on the various connecting lakes and rivers of the type that are maintained in the federal parks among the Thousand islands. This would permit boats to tie up and stay for 48 hours at a stretch.

I would also suggest that better facilities might be provided for tying up when it is necessary to wait for swing bridges.

Then he says in brackets:

This may not be a problem in the summer when the water level is not so high, but early in the year, when the current is swift, I found it a problem once or twice waiting for the bridge to open.

He goes on to say:

The most important recommendation I have to make is that the navigational buoys be numbered consecutively, as they are on most shipping channels. I discussed this briefly with the superintendent at Lakefield on my way down and he pointed out that one of their problems was the very large number of buoys that are used in this system. It may not be necessary to number all the buoys, but where there are several connecting channels, i.e., as through Stoney lake, it would be a considerable advantage to have the buoys marking the main route through the Trent numbered consecutively so that one is not led astray by channels marking routes to various summer resorts, etc.

There is also a fairly complete reply from the commodore of the bay of Quinte yacht club of Belleville. His suggestions are as follows:

Picnic and camping sites similar to those on the government islands in the St. Lawrence adjacent to Gananoque, chiefly for outboard boats.

Hydro plug-in on the docking areas above the locks. Most boats now require hydro to keep their television, refrigerators and electrical appliances in operation.

Those are just some of the replies which I received to this very brief questionnaire. It seems to me that if these canals are going to be kept in operation, and if it is considered that they are a tourist attraction of any kind at all—and I believe they are a tourist attraction—it would be worth while spending a few more dollars to make them more attractive to those people who want to use them.

As far as some of these services, such as hydro, water, and so on are concerned, I do not think we want to step on the toes of any of those people who might be operating marinas or duplicate services. I do not think we should interfere with them, but there are many places on the canal where there is no marina where these services are not available. I think the department could well make these services available in those places.

As I say, if it is worth while spending some money to keep these canals in operation, it would be worth while spending a few more dollars to provide facilities for the people who use them in the hope that more and more people will use the canals and it will help to develop a tourist industry in the area.

(Translation):

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take this opportunity to inform the minister of the situation which obtains in the area comprising the Beauce, Dorchester, Megantic, Compton and Frontenac counties.

As the minister is probably aware, this area is served by the Quebec Central Railway. I would not want my words to be construed as a charge against the minister, since my sole purpose is to bring the situation to the minister's attention and at the same time to the attention of the board of transport commissioners since they have jurisdiction over the railways.

There is no need for elaborate proof of the great importance of the area served by the Quebec Central Railway. It is therefore all the more surprising to see the board of transport commissioners tolerate the very poor service given there. The passenger service is a pity. There are not enough trains. There is also something detrimental to industry. It is common knowledge today that Quebec Central Railway is the property of the C.P.R. All freight carried over this line, for later transfer to the C.P.R. line, is subject to extra rates because of the transshipment from the Quebec Central to the C.P.R., so that shipping costs from this area are practically prohibitive, economically speaking, for customers of our industrial plants. Moreover, when placing their orders with manufacturers in our area, those customers now require that loadings be made at Quebec, Sherbrooke, or Lake Megantic, that is at points along the C.P.R.

Besides, as years go by, we have the impression that the Quebec Central is bent on closing all its stations along the line. Last year, for example, the station agent at St. Ephrem was replaced by a watchman, and the same thing will probably happen this year at the town of St. Victor.

The company complains and is always putting forward, before the transport board, the plea that it does not make the necessary turnover to maintain the service it was giving a few years ago. I rather think it is up to the company to give an adequate service if it wants to attract customers.

I intended to inform the minister of this particular situation. I am sure that the fact of having brought this point to the attention of the committee will help, or, at least, will result in the transport board being somewhat more careful when it has to reach decisions concerning the Quebec Central railway company.

I have every reason to believe that the minister, if he takes steps to improve the situation, will provide great economic assistance to a whole area stretching from Sherbrooke to Quebec, and from Quebec to lake Frontière, in Dorchester county.

(Text):

Mr. Webb: Mr. Chairman, may I also take this opportunity to congratulate the deputy chairman who was appointed today and offer the hope of a speedy recovery to the hon. member for Spadina whose illness necessitated the appointment being made.

I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Danforth. I, too, think that the criticism of Mr. Gordon is justifiable because of his overloading and arrogant attitude even at the House of Commons committee meetings. After speaking to many railway workers it became evident to me that he is almost inhuman and has the attitude of a dictator, thereby eliminating any aspect of human relationship with employees. May I suggest that Mr. Gordon be replaced by a president with foresight and the cause of humanity at heart.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Finance, for example.

The Chairman: Shall vote 402 carry?

Mr. Chevrier: No, Mr. Chairman. The minister has undertaken, before proceeding with this vote, to deal with the many problems that have been raised and I am sure he wishes now to deal with them.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the hon. member for Laurier for his invitation.

I thought I should have the opportunity and pleasure of congratulating the new deputy chairman of the committee, but in view of his absence, I should like to offer him my co-operation through you, Mr. Chairman, and also congratulate him on his appointment. I should like at the same time to express my deep and sincere regret in regard to the illness of the hon. member for Spadina, and say that we are looking forward to seeing him back in this house as soon as possible.

Mr. Chairman, since the earlier discussion of item 1 of my estimates some weeks ago, a number of the questions raised in discussion have been answered either in part or completely by myself during orders of the day or during the debate in respect of various legislation which has been brought forward. I do not intend, therefore, to deal with those items which were raised during the earlier debate and which have been subsequently answered in this fashion, but will concern myself with the points which have not been dealt with. One of these has to do with the matter of aviation policy, raised by the hon. member for Laurier.

The general basis of policy regarding authorization of routes was outlined in the house by my predecessor. Any changes decided upon would be the subject of governmental announcement at the appropriate time. Perhaps I can best summarize the situation by quoting from a speech which I made to the air industries and transport association in Quebec on November 2, 1960, at which time I said:

> Previously there had been an apparent objection in principle to the idea of competition itself. This position was modified and the government accepted the idea that there was no inherent objection to competition and, indeed, concrete advantages to be gained from competition, providing there was sufficient traffic to sustain it without harm to air services available to the travelling public. Therefore, with regard to scheduled and regular route services, the policy may be described as one in which the air transport board has the discretion to authorize competition where economic conditions warrant, but only where economic conditions warrant.

As I said earlier, this is the policy outlined by my predecessor, and the policy I expressed in the city of Quebec in November. That is the basis upon which the air transport board has been dealing with the various applications from various carriers in Canada.

An inquiry was made regarding current Canadian Pacific Air Lines applications and, if the hon. member will refer to page 4594 of Hansard of May 10, 1961, he will see that I dealt with this subject in the answers I gave at that time.

Reference was also made to the investigation of regional services and carriers being undertaken by the air transport board. I am fully aware of the problems facing regional air carriers, and the air transport board has been proceeding with its general review of this situation. My predecessor indicated earlier that the air transport board would make a complete report of the situation in respect of regional air carriers throughout Canada, beginning at the eastern seaboard.

[Mr. Balcer.]

The air transport board has been proceeding with this general review; the review is not taking the form of a single over-all report but involves a series of continuing investigations on a regional basis, the results of which, from time to time, may be implemented by air transport board decisions. It has completed its eastern hearings and I believe most of its central hearings, and will be proceeding with the western hearings very soon, I think some time this month. I am hopeful that during the coming months the situation in this regard will improve.

I was very pleased to see that the announcement I made a few days ago in regard to regional carriers was extremely well received by the press and by the industry itself. This board has considered the applications received from various carriers, and has made a review of the situation from the eastern seaboard to the city of Windsor, Ontario, to date.

In regard to the licensing of non-scheduled charter services, it has been suggested that the policy which has provided for a more liberal granting of licenses for the operations of groups C and B chartered air services—that is those providing service by light to light medium size aircraft—was working to the detriment of the industry. I think those were the words used by the member for Laurier. In fact, however—I think this gives a good picture of the situation, or at least presents a very strong argument in favour of that policy which we have been following—the revenues of non-scheduled carriers in this class in 1960 were about $40 million compared with $29 million in 1959, and were up in all main categories.

Indications which were given by my predecessor to this house last year in regard to group C operators—that is the charter operators using very light aircraft—were that liberal granting of licences was resulting in the provision of a greater over-all service in Canada. What is not generally recognized is that the policy does provide for recognition of the fact that there may be occasions in remote northerly areas where exceptions to that policy may be justified. In such cases the air transport board has the discretion to make exceptions to the policy if necessary.

With regard to group B, charter operators—that is the operators of medium aircraft of, for example, the Beaver and Otter types—we have received representations to the effect that this policy needs some adjustment. Here again, initial results have indicated that the policy has produced more service. Over-all charter revenues in 1960 have increased. However, it may be necessary to recognize some variations in conditions as between northern unsettled areas and settled areas of the country. My departmental officials have informed representatives of the air industries and transport association that if they wish to make a careful and detailed study of this subject with a view to submitting representations and recommendations, I would be very glad to consider these to see whether an adjustment in this policy is needed. What is important to emphasize, however, is that any policy should recognize the desirability of avoiding extensive or excessive governmental regulations in this field.

We must not put the industry in a straitjacket but at the same time we must offer to the Canadian public as much service as possible while making sure that this expansion in the number of carriers is not too sudden or rapid so as to wreck the whole industry. These are my answers to the various questions that have been asked on the aviation policy.

I should now like to go into the field of shipping policy. I was asked about the procedure we intend to follow in restricting our coasting trade in the great lakes area to ships of Canadian registry.

The commonwealth merchant shipping agreement provides for modification by agreement among the member states. It also provides for withdrawal on 12 months' notice. The length of time before change can be made depends upon the length of time required to reach agreement with member states on modification; or alternatively, if this is not possible, on the expiry of a 12 months' notice period. Since consultation through diplomatic channels always takes a little time, I cannot state with any certainty that this matter will have been cleared up to the point where the amendment to the Canada Shipping Act on this point could be introduced before the end of the present session, any more than I can state how long the present session is going to last. The amendment will be introduced at the first opportunity, as soon as our procedure has been determined after consultation with other member states. This we hope will be completed within three months. As I explained earlier, we are following article 25. I explained earlier in the house the difference betwen article 24 and article 25.

Mr. Chevrier: Articles 24 and 25 of the agreement?

Mr. Balcer: Yes. I was also asked questions regarding the position of Canadian operators who may have transferred great lakes vessels to other commonwealth registry. Once the modification has been made, such vessels will not be able to operate in the coasting trade in the great lakes unless they are again placed on Canadian registry. The operator will have to make application for return to Canadian registry in accordance with the terms of the Canada Shipping Act. Any such application, when received, will be dealt with upon its merits at the time.

I was also asked about the matter of Canadian content.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit me to ask one question on this subject which is of a good deal of concern to the people in the eastern provinces? Can the minister assure the committee that the reservation of the coastal trade to Canadian ships will not apply to ships plying from a point east of the great lakes-St. Lawrence region into the great lakes-St. Lawrence region; for example, a British ship from St. John's, Newfoundland to Montreal would have exactly the same rights as Canadian shipping under the new coastal policy?

Mr. Balcer: I thought I indicated that earlier. I am glad to have the opportunity to repeat that a commonwealth ship operating from St. John's, Newfoundland to Montreal will be able to carry on in that trade. The new policy applies only to coastal trade between two Canadian ports inside the inland waters of Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: It does not affect international trade?

Mr. Balcer: No, the coastal trade.

I was also asked about the matter of Canadian content. While this will be determined when the governor in council has approved the regulations, it is intended that the subsidy will apply to the total cost of the vessel but that some limitation will be placed upon the percentage of non-Canadian content to ensure that the great proportion of the vessel is of Canadian content. The exact percentage is still under technical study.

A question was asked regarding the relationship of the subsidy scheme to the Canadian Vessels Construction Assistance Act. The provisions of this act relating to accelerated depreciation will continue to apply where operators wish to take advantage of them. Whether an operator will be allowed to take full benefit from the construction subsidy and also, simultaneously, all benefits available under the Canadian Vessels Construction Assistance Act is a matter that is at present receiving study by financial experts, and, will also be dealt with when the regulations are issued.

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt the minister and ask a question. The minister says that this matter is under study, but the Canadian Vessels Construction Assistance Act exists and therefore over and above the 40 per cent subsidy which the minister announced some weeks ago the builder of the vessel will also be entitled to the 33⅓ per cent depreciation over a period of three years.

Mr. Balcer: This is quite right, unless some restriction is included in the regulations and this is what we are discussing with the Department of Finance at the present time. We have no intention of amending the Canadian Vessels Construction Assistance Act.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I can ask this question.

Mr. Balcer: As far as the dual application of the subsidies and the Canadian Vessels Construction Assistance Act is concerned, this will be covered by the regulations, and they will say, in such and such a case the subsidy will apply and in another case it will not.

Attention was also given to the procedure which we propose to follow in regard to the authorization of funds for the subsidies. The suggestion was advanced that I was acting improperly in relation to parliament in proposing to include only a $1 item in the supplementary estimates at this time, and that I was attempting to conceal the details of our policy. Nothing is farther from the truth, Mr. Chairman.

The purpose of including a $1 item in the estimates at this time was to allow parliament full opportunity to discuss the subject and to ask questions. After the policy has been in operation for a few months, it will be easier to assess the amount required in the first period of operation. It is more in accord with approval by parliament in the matter of subsidies if requests for funds in estimates are submitted to this house as actual contract details are worked out with applicants rather than sought in advance. This is the policy that, generally speaking, has been followed for many years with regard to coastal shipping subsidies, including the period of office of my hon. friends in opposition.

However, in view of the points that have been raised in the committee, I have discussed the matter further with my colleague the Minister of Finance and it has been decided to include in supplementary estimates for the present year a substantially larger amount to cover this program rather than wait for inclusion of an item in the final supplementaries next winter. I expect that the amount will be in the neighbourhood of $10 million to start with.

Mr. Chevrier: The supplementaries are already tabled.

Mr. Balcer: I know. It will be $10 million. The problem is that it is virtually impossible at this stage to estimate how rapidly the program will begin to take effect; that is, how rapidly the machinery can be established and arrangements made for applications to be received and processed; and how rapidly the shipping and the shipbuilding industry will themselves come forward with new projects. This is why the initial estimate to cover the first few months of the scheme is extremely difficult. At the present time a great deal of discussion is going on between the shipbuilders and the shipping companies. They are studying various plans, and so on. I can sympathize with both the shipbuilders and the shipping companies because they are quite anxious to see our regulations in order to start on their new projects.

Mr. Chevrier: So are we.

Mr. Balcer: Every day we get inquiries—

Mr. Chevrier: So do we.

Mr. Balcer: I can assure my hon. friends and the shipping and shipbuilding interests that we are rushing this matter as quickly as possible. The regulations are rather complicated. We are meeting with all kinds of technical difficulties but we are rushing the matter as quickly as possible and should be in a position to have these regulations ready in—

Mr. Pickersgill: By the end of June?

Mr. Balcer: I will have the draft regulations in my hands within the next two weeks and it is then just a matter of having the regulations approved by the governor in council. We are rushing the matter as fast as we can.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has $10 million in the supplementary estimates. Could he say how soon he expects to provide the other $490 million that was promised by the member-elect for Esquimalt-Saanich before the by-election?

Mr. Balcer: I have not met the member yet but I am very glad to learn that he has such tremendous confidence in our shipbuilding program. I would certainly be the happiest man in the world if we could build $500 million worth of ships in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: But you do not seriously expect it.

Mr. Balcer: The figure seems rather large but I can tell the hon. member that if in the next ten years we simply replace all the ships we have and also provide for a modest increase the amount spent will probably run to $500 million. To come back to the figure of $10 million in the estimates, we had in mind possible figures, of course, with regard to ship construction under the new policy. Various formulae exist for relating expenditures on ship construction to employment and no formula is completely accurate since this varies greatly according to size and type. The hon. member for Port Arthur advanced his own estimate which was, in fact, not too bad an effort. However, because of the normal time lag in getting a program of this sort under way, I would expect that the fullest effects of this policy would actually be achieved in 1962 and thereafter.

Reference was made to our relationship with the province of Quebec in the disposal of the Soulanges canal. There has been some misunderstanding on the part of the province. I indicated my willingness to dispose of the whole canal to the province if no industrial concerns are interested in the potential industrial area in the vicinity of Cascades, but I felt that I should have a period of approximately one month to explore this possibility. We did not take action until we had heard from the province and there was a delay of some weeks before I received a reply from the appropriate provincial minister. However, this reply having been received, I am now exploring this possibility and have again informed the province that unless an opportunity for sale develops the whole canal property would be offered to the province; and, in any event, the balance of the property, composing by far the greatest portion of the canal area, more than ample for the purpose they have in mind, will be available to the province. I must say that we have already received some correspondence from a couple of industrial firms which have shown interest in the Cascades area, and we are investigating their offers at the present time.

Reference was also made to the development of a deeper waterway along the Chambly-Richelieu route. To clarify any misunderstanding, let me say that this project has not been rejected out of hand by the government. A communication was recently received through diplomatic channels from the United States authorities raising the question of whether a further reference on this matter should be made to the international joint commission, and this communication is now under interdepartmental consideration.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo raised a number of questions relating to marine activities in Newfoundland, and I will be very glad to study his requests. With regard to his query whether there is anything current in the matter of the project for establishing a free port area at Mortier bay, I can only state that I am not aware of any current review of this subject going on within my own department. He also asked about pilotage statutes in Newfoundland. The position is that the St. John's pilotage act remains in force until repealed and part VI of the Canada Shipping Act proclaimed in its place. This has been considered but the timing has not been decided upon.

The hon. member for St. John's East asked about the ferry to eastern Newfoundland. Interdepartmental study of the special economic and technical report is almost completed. Report and recommendation to the minister are expected early this summer. The same member also asked about sailors' pay. The rates are set by the Department of Labour and treasury board. We favour a national, not a regional, approach, and recently this has been applied to the benefit of maritime sailors. Newfoundland rates are to be the subject of further study.

The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador asked about Gander airport. Landings were down last year very substantially but of recent weeks there has been an encouraging upward trend. He also asked about sealing vessels. We help them to get to open water but to take them into the ice is basically a dangerous and inefficient use of icebreakers. There is a great risk of the icebreakers getting stuck or frozen in themselves, and the task is far more slow and difficult than normal icebreaker convoy and harbour work.

The hon. member for Kootenay West asked about Wabush lake. Wabush lake is a 20-mile lake on the border of Labrador. The residue is overburden, that is, rock and soil primarily, and causes no harm to fish. The lake is several hundred miles from civilization in the northern Quebec-Labrador hinterland and does not represent a vacation or recreation area for any substantial population development at least for the present.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely the minister does not say that the Wabush lake area, where a vast industrial development is now taking place, is miles from civilization. Surely the minister will admit that there is a great civilization developing there.

Mr. Balcer: I quite appreciate what my hon. friend says, but the point raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West was that we should reserve this lake for tourists, pleasure craft, swimming and so on. It is an extremely interesting industrial area and I look forward to visiting it, but I would not say that it is a great vacation spot or summer resort area.

The hon. member for Chambly-Rouville asked about rail service to Montreal international airport. There has been no direct reply from the railroads to the suggestion of a rail service to the Montreal international airport. It is a difficult and costly technical undertaking, we understand, since this really is an urban rapid transit system rather than a normal railway type operation. In cases where this exists such as in Brussels, there is a special right of way and track solely for this purpose. The matter is still in the hands of the railways.

The hon. member for Laurier asked about the Warsaw convention on limitation of liability on international air services. The theory behind this convention is that below the limitation of liability figure it is made easier in the event of an accident to obtain damages from the air line but above that amount it is made more difficult. Below the limit the air line does not have certain defences available to it in law which otherwise it could apply against claims but, in return, damages higher than the limit need only be paid if gross negligence can be proven. The limit was established in the Warsaw convention over 30 years ago and, of course, which the changing value of currency, is worth far less than it was at that time. At the international conference at The Hague some years ago, the amount was substantially increased but The Hague protocol has not yet come into force.

My hon. friend recognizes that the previous administration did not take action to ratify The Hague protocol but now suggests the present government should do this. I am glad to be able to inform him that I have had actively under consideration for some time legislation to remedy this sin of omission on the part of our predecessors and I hope that at an early future session it will be possible to bring this forward for the consideration of the house.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, in commenting on aviation, made mention of space travel and satellites. The department is participating actively in programs relating to the civil use of space satellites. The first civil benefits of a substantial nature from space satellites will be in the fields of meteorology and communications. We are sending senior departmental technical engineers experienced in the field of communications to work with a special U.K. team in this field on a project in co-operation with the United States national aeronautics and space administration for trial development of space communications. In addition, we are actively in touch with the active program for the use of satellites in improved meteorological services and weather forecasting that is being developed in the United States. We have, at present, under active study both within the department and in consultation with the national research council and other interested Canadian agencies, the question of what further direct developments should be undertaken in Canada to ensure adequate participation in this field.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate raised the question of fishing vessels. The matter of coverage of fishing vessels in the regulations in our shipping policy is under study by the Department of Fisheries. I think we can rely on the Minister of Fisheries to see that the coverage provided will be in the best interests of the fishing industry.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to get one point clear from the minister, if I can. Does the minister mean by what he has just said that vessels under 45 feet in length will not be covered under his program, and that if anything is done it will be done by the Minister of Fisheries? Does he mean that these vessels will be covered, but under a different scheme?

Mr. Balcer: I think my hon. friend misunderstood me. What we mean is that this section of the new regulations dealing with fishing vessels is under preparation by the Department of Fisheries. It will be included in the over-all regulations.

Mr. Pickersgill: That does not answer my one question. Is there any hope that vessels of less than 45 feet will be included in the program? That is the point I really want answered.

Mr. Balcer: I do not want to amend what I said earlier, Mr. Chairman. I think I covered that point in my introductory remarks, and my hon. friend will have to be patient and wait for the regulations.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not seeking to acquire one, I can assure the minister, but there are a good many fishermen who are.

Mr. Balcer: These regulations will come out pretty soon.

The hon. member for Port Arthur asked about the future growth of the air services branch of the department which, as he knows, includes civil aviation, telecommunications and meteorology. Projections of growth in numbers of personnel are subject to a wide margin of error because different assumptions have to be made, and in this particular case much will depend on the future rate of growth of aviation and communications in Canada. I would not be surprised, however, to see a growth of 35 per cent at the very least in numbers of personnel employed in the air services branch over the next five years.

The hon. member referred also to the reduced size of the department's annual report, and suggested that this was inconsistent with the growth of the department itself. In fact, the department puts out two annual reports. One, the shorter version, is entitled "Annual Report" which is intended for wide distribution and the other, a less expensive but much more lengthy volume, is entitled "Annual Record of Operations". This latter volume contains much more detailed information.

Both volumes have been tabled in this house. If there is a type of information which is missing, either from the shorter or lengthier volume, we would welcome suggestions in this regard.

Finally, the hon. member for Peterborough commented on the matter of water levels in the Trent canal. This is a very complicated subject in view of the different interests that have to be accommodated. I can assure him that no major changes in the present system of control would be undertaken without careful study and consultation; and that, at the present time, for this year we are not contemplating any major changes in the system of control previously followed, although representations suggesting changes are receiving study.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, I have not answered all the various questions that have been asked during the four or five days of discussion on the first item. As we go through the estimates and my officials are in front of me, I shall be very pleased to answer the various questions for hon. members. Before taking my seat, I want to thank all hon. members who have taken part in this discussion for their suggestions. I can assure them that all of these suggestions will be considered very seriously and I am hopeful that a number of them will be presented to the treasury board.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to delay this item, but I do not believe the minister dealt with one question which I put to him this afternoon. I refer to the president of the Canadian National Railways. I asked the minister whether or not it was the intention of the government, as announced by an hon. gentleman of the other place, to divide the activities relating to the direction of Canadian National Railways into two branches, namely policy and executive.

Mr. Balcer: I am not criticizing any hon. member of the other place, because I believe the gentleman referred to is one of the finest members of the other place. However, my hon. friend knows quite well that the policy of the government is never made public by a member of the other place. I respect his opinion. However, so far as the chairmanship of this corporation is concerned, whenever any change or new policy is announced, it is always announced by a member of the cabinet.

Mr. Chevrier: I did not interrupt the minister while he was dealing with shipping policy. I have some questions on it which I will leave to a subsequent item when we get to it. However, there is one thing that I think he should answer before we get on from item No. 1 and it is this. His announcement in the house with reference to the subsidy is quite clear. Having regard to that announcement, I think it is definite that if a shipbuilder wants to build a ship that would cost, say, $6 million he would be entitled to a federal subsidy of 40 per cent which would reduce the cost to $3,600,000. As the law now stands he is entitled, over and above that subsidy to the special or accelerated depreciation of 33⅓ per cent under the Canadian Vessels Construction Assistance Act over a period of three years which would reduce the cost by another $1,800,000. It therefore follows that a ship that normally costs $6 million could be depreciated and would cost the ship owner $1,800,000 at the end of the three year period. That is what I understand to be the case from the minister's announcement.

Mr. Balcer: I think my hon. friend's example was quite correct. However, there are problems in tax law such as freedom from capture of depreciation. I think $1,600,000 was the amount mentioned.

Mr. Chevrier: The amount was $1,800,000.

Mr. Balcer: This matter of freedom from capture of this depreciation is one which the tax officials have to clear up. That is what they are studying at the present time in relation to the subsidy.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister mean that regulations which he will bring down will alter the recapture position as contained under the Canadian Vessels Construction Assistance Act?

Mr. Balcer: We are not going to alter the C.V.C.A.A. What we must decide is that the subsidy will apply in such and such circumstance or the subsidy will not apply in such and such circumstances. There is no need for an amendment to the C.V.C.A.A. at the present time. Following discussions my officials are having at the present time with the tax officials, this is the place where these provisions will be looked after, namely in the regulations, in the description of the subsidy and the various applications of the subsidy.

Mr. Pickersgill: Like my friend the hon. member for Laurier I do not intend to take up any time. However, I have a couple of questions which I do not think I can ask under any item except the first one. The first one is this. The minister told us that a study was going on with regard to a ferry to the east coast of Newfoundland. That study is apparently one of these perpetual things. It is not perpetual motion; it is apparently perpetual lack of motion. The leader of the Conservative party in the province of Newfoundland in the 1959 elections, which are now nearly two years away, said that proposal was before treasury board at that particular time. I do not think any proposal in my recollection has ever been before treasury board for quite so long a time as that if the hon. gentleman, as all Conservatives do, was telling the truth to the electors at that time. It seems to me that it is about time the minister told us whether the government is or is not going to build a ferry to ply to the east coast of Newfoundland. There are problems as to what kind of ferry it will be and how long it will take to build, I admit. But is the government going to build the ferry or is it not going to build it? Surely the minister, after all this time, can answer that simple question.

Mr. Balcer: I think the proposal was before treasury board but in a different form and at that time it was turned down. However, a new and complete survey of the problem has been carried on. A full inquiry has been made and a report is practically ready now. I can assure my hon. friend that it will be before treasury board early in the summer and also that this ferry will be really established.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister think it will be ready in time for dissolution of this parliament or the next dissolution of the legislature of Newfoundland? That is the only time this question ever seems to be active.

Mr. Balcer: We never set our time limit on points like that. We never think of these things.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is like the $500 million for aid to shipbuilding in Esquimalt.

Mr. Balcer: It was an advertisement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, it was an advertisement from the Progressive Conservative association of which the hon. gentleman at one time was the honoured national head. However, as a matter of fact, as I was listening to my friend the hon. member for Laurier asking the question about the Soulanges canal and the minister replying to it and as I listened to the interesting speeches that were made this afternoon about another canal about which a friend of mine says that every time he crosses it he always takes off his hat to the taxpayers of Canada—and I refer to the Trent canal—I wondered whether the minister had ever given any consideration to giving the Trent canal to Mr. Frost in lieu of the $100 million that he is not getting from the Prime Minister.

The Trent canal, like the Soulanges canal, is no longer a commercial canal. In fact, it apparently never was a commercial canal. It seems to me that this canal would make a wonderful birthday present for Mr. Frost. It goes right through his constituency. If it is a tourist attraction, it could be made into a provincial park and the federal treasury would be spared the expense of its upkeep. Mr. Frost could probably charge admission and get his $100 million in that way.

Mr. Chevrier: I have just one other question in connection with the shipping policy and the amendment to the British commonwealth merchant shipping agreement. From the statement made earlier by the minister it was not too clear that this would take some time. However, from what he said today it is now quite clear to me that it may be many months before it is implemented. The minister has probably seen the doubts thrown on the whole matter by a professor of Queen's University, I believe in Montreal. I refer to Professor H. J. Lawford. However, I do not intend to deal with that matter now. What I intend to deal with now is this. In the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of two or three days ago—I have just read it now and I have not it with me—there is to be found the statement that because of the amendment which will be made to the shipping policy and the extension of the restrictions on coastal trade, a British ship will now be able to move iron ore to an international port such as Cleveland, dump its load, go on to Duluth, take on grain and bring it down to a Canadian port either within the coastal limit referred to by the minister or outside it. I would like to know whether or not that is the case, because that is the affirmation in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix. Is that correct?

Mr. Balcer: Of course, this is an international voyage, and international voyages are not coastal voyages. The commonwealth merchant shipping agreement has nothing to do with international voyages.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the minister for that answer. That was the understanding I had. However, the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix goes on to say that this is going to create a great hardship to Canadian ports such as Fort William and Port Arthur in that the tendency will be to go to Duluth, get the grain and bring it to a Canadian port, since they cannot go to Canadian ports such as Fort William, Port Arthur, the lakehead ports, either within the restricted coastal area or below it.

If that affirmation is correct, it is going to restrict Canadian trade rather than help it; and I take it from the minister's answer that my statement is correct.

Mr. Balcer: Actually the tendency will be, I am quite sure, for Canadian grain to be carried in Canadian vessels. As I said earlier, my hon. friend is talking about an international voyage. I do not think it will have the effect he mentions, because we have been asked time and time again by Canadian shipping companies to take this action, and from the reaction we received from them I am quite sure they look forward to a substantial increase in the carriage of grain from the lakehead down to the lower St. Lawrence ports such as Montreal, Three Rivers, Quebec, Baie Comeau and Seven Islands.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to pursue that point a little further. The minister says he has had a lot of requests from shipping interests. I should like the minister to produce the requests he has had from the farm organizations, because it is perfectly evident from what my hon. friend from Laurier said—and I must say I had not thought of it before he raised the point—that if the object of this restriction which the minister is proposing is to reserve the trade to Canadian vessels, it must be because the British vessels operate more cheaply.

What we may have in the future is a lower rate on grain from Duluth to Baie Comeau than we have from Fort William to Baie Comeau. That is going to be highly detrimental to the farmers of Canada and the ports at the lakehead, as the hon. member said.

I think the minister should reassure the committee immediately about what precaution the government intends to take to see that this does not happen.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is placing this whole matter in very narrow perspective. He is dealing with all kinds of hypothetical effects of these regulations.

Let us not forget that these flags of convenience, for instance, have developed to the point where they have practically lost all national meaning. A great many Canadians are faced with unfair competition from people who have ceased to be truly British commonwealth citizens and corporations which have ceased to be truly British commonwealth corporations.

I just want to cite an example of how this matter has deteriorated. You may have a United States interest, for instance, which has a ship built in Holland, manned by a Greek crew, with Italian officers, and they register the ship in Bermuda and come and sail on the great lakes as a commonwealth ship.

I think there is unfair competition because of these flags of convenience. This situation was really becoming a danger to shipping and shipbuilding interests and I think it is absolutely proper that Canadian inland waters should be reserved for Canadian ships.

Practically all the trading nations in the world do this. When one studies the various restrictions to protect national waters in all countries of the world one sees that the Canadian regulations are very far from being protectionist in the way my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was considering this from the point of view primarily of the wheat farmers. If we are going to have to pay a higher freight on wheat from Fort William to Baie Comeau or Montreal than the rate that is established by international competition from Duluth to Montreal or Baie Comeau, the minister is certainly going to hear about it everywhere from Winnipeg to the Rockies and into the Peace river bloc; he should make no mistake about it. If the minister is looking at this in terms of votes, there are far more voters in all that area than there are in the interests that he is talking about.

I am not saying anything one way or the other about the question of whether or not these waters should be reserved exclusively for Canadian ships. I do know that if we are going to sacrifice our market for wheat in the United Kingdom, or any large part of it, it is going to be too big a price to pay for this policy. However, it is a big question that will have to be debated when the matter comes before us in the proper way and I am not seeking to do it now.

It is not an academic question; it is the most practical question possible. If you ask any western farmer, the one reason for his enthusiasm for what my hon. friend for Laurier did in getting the St. Lawrence seaway built was that it would give us cheaper transportation for our wheat to the markets of the world and put us in a more competitive position. It was not that the cost of transportation would go up so that all that advantage would be lost. If the advantage is going to be lost and a competitive advantage is going to be given to the United States wheat growers, it will certainly be a sad day for us in this country. That is what this editorial in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix seems to suggest, as the hon. member for Laurier so accurately pointed out.

Of course we would rather see Canadian carriers carry the wheat if they will carry it at the same price, and the minister ought to tell us what precautions the government is going to take to see that they keep their prices down to the same level as British carriers or foreign carriers from Duluth to Baie Comeau for carrying wheat. Otherwise we are going to have a storm on the prairies the like of which we have not seen for some time.

Mr. Balcer: Ever since this policy was announced we have received absolutely no indication from any shipping company that there was any intention of increasing these rates. What our shipping people were trying to get was the volume of shipping that was going to other shipping lines.

We have good ships here and we intend to build more. I think shipping companies, especially with the advantage they have at the present time with the subsidies and the closing of the inland waters, will be in a very good position to give excellent rates to shippers from the west.

Let us not forget that the shipping subsidy and the shipbuilding subsidy of 40 per cent is quite a great help to Canadian shipping on the great lakes and in the inland waters. There is absolutely no reason why Canadian shipping companies, with this kind of advantage, should increase rates for the transport of grain.

Mr. Chevrier: May I just briefly pursue one other matter connected with an answer the minister made earlier respecting Canadian ships operating under United Kingdom flag? The minister will remember that at one time there were close to 100 such ships operating under U.K. flag. However, I believe now there are only some 25. The minister indicated that in order to benefit or take advantage of the new shipping policy of the government those ships would have to re-transfer to the Canadian flag. I should like to ask what advantage there will be to those ships if they are transferred to the Canadian flag? My purpose in raising this question is that while there will be a subsidy of 40 per cent given to a Canadian shipbuilder this will not in any way assist the operation of the vessels. In other words, I am trying to say that the 40 per cent subsidy is only one step toward the equalization of costs among Canadian, U.K. and continental or European operators. Unless some enticement or assistance is given to that type of ship, what incentive now exists in the retransfer of those ships to the Canadian flag? What this all boils down to is, what assistance is being given under this policy to deep-sea operators?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, they may not want to come back under the Canadian flag, but if they intend to engage in coastal trade or trade on inland waters they must be under Canadian registry. As an example, I should perhaps refer to the Cloverdale of the Canadian Steamship Lines which was transferred to Bermudian registry. If the Cloverdale is to carry on with its work on the great lakes it will have to come back under Canadian registry.

As far as other ships at the present time under foreign registry and engaged in world trade are concerned, this new policy may not be advantageous to them. Those ships have already been built, so there is no question of construction subsidy involved. I do not think it would be of advantage perhaps to those ships to come back to Canadian registry. However, there is a definite advantage for lakers and ships of that kind, engaged in coastal and inland waters trade, to come back to Canadian registry if they intend to carry on with that type of trade.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, are there any lakers which have transferred to outside registry? I was under the impression that all lakers, with the exception of the Cloverdale and perhaps one other, operated under Canadian registry. I should like to tell the minister that the Cloverdale, I am informed, transferred to the Bermudian flag for one purpose only, and that was in connection with income tax. I am sure the minister is aware of that fact. Does the minister know of any lake ships that have transferred out of Canadian registry into other registry other than the Cloverdale?

Mr. Balcer: I am informed that there are quite a number of old United States lakers that have been placed under Nassau registry so they can carry on coastal and inland waters trade in Canada, and those ships will not be allowed to carry on with this type of trade if they do not register in Canada. If they do not carry a Canadian registry they will have to get out of coastal and inland waters trade.

Mr. Chevrier: There would be no advantage whatever to any laker that is presently under U.S. registry to change because the cost of operation is even higher there than in Canada.

Mr. Balcer: The ships to which I have referred are old United States vessels purchased by individuals and placed under Bermudian registration, and are plying the great lakes at the present time with a commonwealth flag, engaging in trade from one Canadian port to another. These ships will not be allowed to continue to do that unless they come back to Canadian registry.

Mr. Chevrier: I understand that, and thank the minister for his answer, but it did not deal with the first part of my question. The minister has shifted the subject by his answer. The purpose of my first question was in regard to what incentive there was to Canadian ships operating under the United Kingdom flag, to come back to the Canadian flag as a result of the new shipping policy?

Mr. Balcer: There is none except to those ships which intend to engage in coastal and inland water trade in Canada.

Mr. McPhillips: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in regard to the payment of salvage subsidies. There is an item in the estimates regarding salvage subsidy which has been paid and is to be paid to the marine foundation of Montreal in respect to a stand-by salvage craft on the Atlantic coast. At one time there was a stand-by salvage craft on the Pacific coast. It was in existence there for some 50 to 60 years. However, the previous Liberal government, with its contemptuous disregard for the Pacific coast of this nation, terminated its operation and now there does not exist such a stand-by craft.

Canada is a maritime nation. I am sure ship operators approaching the Atlantic coast of our nation take a great deal of comfort in the fact that there is a stand-by salvage craft there. Many tons of ocean shipping approach the Pacific coast of Canada and enter the ports of Vancouver and Victoria, which receive approximately 10 million tons of ocean shipping per year, to say nothing of the great ports of New Westminster, Prince Rupert, Nanaimo, Port Alberni, Tahsish and Chemainus. I suggest the minister should rectify this rotten act performed by that Liberal government. The Liberal government, during its entire term in office, treated the Pacific coast of this nation with contemptuous disregard. The only thing one can find that was built by the Liberal government on the Pacific coast is Lapointe pier, which Uncle Ernest built as a monument to himself. I should like to ask the minister to put this matter right, and to provide proper subsidies in regard to a salvage stand-by craft for operation on the Pacific coast of this nation.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I referred to a matter of pensions to 75 employees of the Canadian National Railways whose services are being terminated in the Niagara area because the C.N.R. is selling its franchise and equipment there. Could the minister deal with that subject now, or should I refer to it during the consideration of a particular item?

Mr. Balcer: I do not have the answer to that question at the present time, but I will supply it before we conclude our consideration of these estimates.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I also asked several questions of the minister. While I have been away attending the meeting of the broadcasting committee, I have been informed that the minister did not reply. I wonder if he could do so now?

Mr. Balcer: I do have an answer in regard to the last question asked by the hon. member for Gloucester, which dealt with airport grants to the municipalities of Gloucester and Restigouche. The municipality must provide the land and agree to operate the field. The field must be technically satisfactory, and the departmental officials must make a traffic study in order to satisfy themselves that the traffic potential for local use exists. Once the officials have been satisfied in regard to these principles, the department makes a recommendation to the treasury board in respect of a federal grant to a maximum of $100,000 on a dollar-for-dollar cost-sharing basis. These projects in respect of both municipalities are now under study.

Mr. Robichaud: I understood the minister had made a statement in Dalhousie, New Brunswick, on May 12, in which he said the land had already been purchased and the airport would be built. This does not seem to be in accord with what he is saying now. He says it is under consideration. According to the reports in the press, he made the statement then that the land had been purchased and that the airport would be built.

Mr. Balcer: It is easy to see that my hon. friend was not there when I made the statement. Of course, I did not expect him to be there at that time. What I said precisely was that the department had various systems of aid for municipally owned airports and that I met with the people in Dalhousie and explained to them that this type of airport required to be approved by the department. I also explained that if the municipality would buy the land we would meet every dollar that would be expended by the municipality on a dollar for dollar grants basis. Preliminary reports indicate that it is a very good location. Of course, they have not bought the land yet. Also, there has not been a complete survey from the Department of Transport relating to traffic possibilities and technical aspects of the location. I assure the people that if the municipality is ready to do its share for an airport we will do our part, and the department will share in the building of that airport dollar for dollar.

Mr. Robichaud: I accept the minister's statement now. According to his statement, I must agree with the minister that he had been misquoted.

Mr. Carter: Will the minister clarify the asssistance program for fishing vessels? Will this assistance be made available for new ships built to increase the fishing fleet, or only for new ships built to replace old fishing vessels?

Mr. Balcer: I understand the interest of my hon. friend in these matters but, as I explained earlier, the regulations are being drafted at the present time. The section that deals with fishing vessels is being prepared by the Department of Fisheries. It will be part of the regulations which will be tabled as soon as they are passed by the governor in council. As I said earlier, I expect to be in a position to have these regulations ready for approval by the governor in council in a period of approximately two weeks.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I follow up the question of my hon. friend from Burin-Burgeo. The minister will recall that his statement was quite categorical on this point. His statement said that the assistance applied to vessels to replace existing fishing vessels. It did not say anything about a fisherman who had no vessel at all and wanted to build one. Is the minister now telling us that under this policy those vessels will also be considered?

Mr. Balcer: Well, I do not want to add anything to the statement I made at that time. I do not remember exactly the wording of the statement, but I do not want to give misinformation to my hon. friend. I refer him to the statement I made on May 12. If any changes are made in the policy expressed in that statement they will be minor changes. I would ask my hon. friend to be patient for a couple of weeks and he will have the answer to his question.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, we have been patient about this policy of the minister since last November. It now appears that the policy is not very much further advanced than it was last November. The minister rushed in here on May 12 and made a statement which was certainly blown up by his friends on Vancouver island into a $500 million program, about which the minister cannot tell us today whether a fisherman who does not own a vessel but would like to have one, can get any aid at all. The minister's statement was clear enough on that. In his statement on May 12 the minister said it was only to replace existing vessels. If anybody wanted to build a new vessel and did not have one already what would he do? The minister says that there are going to be minor changes. Surely it is a major change if you are going to have the same assistance given to people who had not previously owned vessels. I do not know why the government would want to create a privileged class of those who already have draggers or trawlers as against other Canadians who surely have an equal right to consideration in this matter. Surely on a point as fundamental as this the government has made up its mind as one would expect of, to quote the Minister of Finance, any "normal" government.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, my only answer to the question of the hon. gentleman is to refer him to what I said on May 12. My statement stands as it was made at that time.

Mr. Pickersgill: One further question. Are South African ships still regarded as commonwealth ships?

Mr. Balcer: This is a matter on which external affairs has not yet informed us.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say how the department is treating South African ships in lake Ontario and lake Erie at the present time, if indeed there are any South African ships to be treated there? I do not know, South Africa may not be any more a maritime nation than Canada is. If there are any South African ships, how have they been treated since May 31?

Mr. Balcer: We will deal with the problem when it arises. As of today, I am informed by the officials of the department that no South African ships are in the great lakes.

Mr. Pickersgill: None?

Mr. Balcer: Not so far as we know.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the position under the commonwealth merchant shipping agreement? Does there not have to be some negotiation between the two governments because as it is now, I take it, a South African ship is no longer a British ship? There are unquestionably South African ships which move in and out of the seaway. They have moved in the past and they will in the future. What is the position of the Department of Transport with relation to those ships now?

Mr. Balcer: The fact that the Union of South Africa has become a republic has certainly created certain problems, and this is a matter that is being investigated at the present time by the expert on external affairs.

Mr. Chevrier: What about your experts?

Mr. Balcer: Well, my experts do not deal with these matters of international complications, and the various problems created by one country of the commonwealth becoming a republic is I think a little outside the scope of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Morris: Mr. Chairman, before the encompassing first item which covers a multitude of transport matters passes the committee, I should like to make a few observations about transport policy, particularly as that policy has affected in the past and in its ramifications in the future will affect Atlantic coast ports. I do this because earlier in the debate and, indeed, earlier today reference was made in discussion of the first item to the position of the Atlantic ports of Halifax and Saint John. To introduce what it is I wish to say I should like to quote from the earlier debate on item one on the 13th of May as found on page 4773 of Hansard. The hon. member for Port Arthur is reported as having said:

> We know that there are now icebreakers and mechanical devices which can keep the port of Montreal open for almost the whole of the year. We also know that this is a delicate political problem because it is going to have its repercussions and its effects upon Halifax and Saint John. Yet I had a figure given to me by a man who is very prominent in shipping.

I would interject here that the hon. member did not give us any further information about this individual prominent in shipping, nor do we have his name. The hon. member went on to say:

> He pointed out to me that the average saving per ton on freight coming through Halifax and Saint John in the winter as against that coming through Montreal is $12 a ton in favour of Montreal. One only has to look at the amount of freight coming through the two maritime ports in order to realize that we are in effect subsidizing the Atlantic ports by not pushing very strongly a policy to open up Montreal to winter shipping.

If I heard the hon. member right, earlier today on the discussion of this first item he advocated, in conjunction with the hon. member for Peterborough, a long look at a new transportation policy for Canada which would be based on cost. I am one of those who are perplexed by the advocates of socialism in the house who are everlastingly asking the government to become involved in a wider range of governmental activity and who suddenly become pure when it comes to a matter which affects promises given to regions of this country. My constituents would feel that I was remiss if I did not mention in the house on this first item a matter which is of great importance at each year's sitting of the House of Commons to the ports of Halifax and Saint John.

I have brought into the chamber this afternoon a copy of the British Colonist, a newspaper published in Halifax, Nova Scotia, on Thursday morning September 15, 1864. Hon. members will perhaps permit me one minute's recollection to establish why it seems to me to be important to quote this newspaper on this first item today. Why September 15, 1864? Well, this newspaper the British Colonist reports on its first two pages—members will be interested to know that this was a phonographic report—an account of a dinner given in honour of the delegates from Canada, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island by the delegates of the province of Nova Scotia, a dinner held in the Halifax hotel in connection with the conference on colonial union.

Hon. members will recall that it was the last evening in the month of August, 1864, that the Canadian government steamship, Queen Victoria, which some Prince Edward Islanders jocularly called the confederate cruiser, sailed into Charlottetown harbour. There was a group at the harbour that evening but history records that the islanders had not come to the harbour to see John A. Macdonald and the other delegates but to see the first circus in Prince Edward Island in 21 years. Indeed, there was a little trouble with lodgings in Charlottetown. John A. Macdonald never slept in Charlottetown. He slept on board ship in the harbour.

On Thursday, September 8, the delegates held a ball in Charlottetown and the following morning, when the meteorological and other fog had cleared away, they set sail from Charlottetown and went to Pictou, Nova Scotia.

Mr. MacEwan: Hear, hear.

Mr. Morris: The hon. member for Pictou applauds, as he fittingly should, for that charming community 100 miles from Halifax. There at Pictou some of the colonial delegates left the ship and went overland to Halifax. The others, John A. Macdonald included, remained on board the ship. The Minister of Transport might be interested to know that transportation in Nova Scotia in those days was in that high degree of refinement as a result of which the party that went overland arrived in Halifax after the ship which had circumnavigated half of the province.

On Saturday, September 10, 1864, the colonial delegates met in the Halifax hotel. At ten o'clock in the morning the maritime delegates met and then, as now sometimes, could not agree among themselves. Within an hour the doors were opened and all the delegates from all the colonies resumed their plenary session. At 1.30 p.m. on Saturday, September 10, in Halifax the decision was taken to go to Quebec 30 days hence on the 10th of October. The following Monday, September 12, a great dinner celebrating the decision to proceed to the Quebec conference was held in the Halifax hotel. It is this newspaper which is the only extant report of what was said on that memorable night in Canadian history on which a great ball was held in the Halifax hotel celebrating the decision taken in that same hotel on the preceding Saturday that led to the Quebec conference and so to confederation.

These speeches are inherent in the heart of every resident of the maritime provinces. What was said that night is a part of the upbringing of every resident of our provinces. What was said? I quote from the newspaper itself which I have brought to the house. This great dinner was chaired by Sir Charles Tupper, one of three illustrious Nova Scotians who have filled the chair of prime minister of Canada since confederation. Tupper introduced the speakers and Sir Georges Etienne Cartier, as he was to become, and then attorney general for Canada East, said among other things:

> I have heard since I have been in Halifax the objection thrown out that there is much danger that you would be absorbed.

That is to say, by union or confederation.

> It will be very easy for me to dispel such fears. I answer them by a question. Have you any objection to be absorbed by commerce? Halifax, through the intercolonial railroad, will be the recipient of trade which now benefits Portland, Boston and New York. If you are unwilling to do all in your power to bring to a satisfactory consummation this great question, you will force us to send all this trade which you ought to have through American channels.

I interject here that last year more than $400 million of Canadian imports and exports left Canada for foreign destinations or entered Canada from foreign lands via United States ports.

> It is as evident as the sun shines at noon that when the intercolonial railway is built—and it must necessarily be built if confederation takes place—the consequence will be that between Halifax and Liverpool there will be steamers almost daily leaving and arriving at the former—in fact it will be a ferry between Halifax and Liverpool.

The phonographic report says that this was followed by cheers. We have not seen the ferry between Halifax and Liverpool as yet, but we would like to see it. Later in the same evening, the Hon. George Brown spoke in the Halifax hotel. The British Colonist reports him as having said, among other things:

> But far in advance of all other advantages—

That is to say, of colonial union.

> —would be this, that union of all the provinces would break down all trade barriers between us, and throw open at once to all a combined market of four millions of people. You in the east would send us your fish and your coal and your West India produce, while we would send you in return the flour and the grain and the meats you now buy in Boston and New York.

Then, Sir John A. Macdonald spoke, the father of confederation and Canada's first prime minister. This is what he said on that memorable evening:

> I will not continue to detain you at this late period of the evening, but will merely say that we are desirous of a union with the maritime provinces on a fair and equitable basis; that we desire no advantage of any kind; that we believe the object in view will be as much in favour as against these maritime colonies—

Mr. Deschatelets: Would the hon. member say from what document he is reading?

Mr. Morris: I am quoting, as I earlier said, but evidently the hon. gentleman did not hear, from the British Colonist, a tri-weekly newspaper, published at Halifax, Nova Scotia, on Thursday, September 15, 1864. This edition records speeches made in celebration of the decision to advance to confederation. I was quoting from a speech made by Sir John Macdonald, and I continue:

> In the case of a union, this railway must be a national work, and Canada will cheerfully contribute to the utmost extent in order to make that important link without which no political connection can be complete.
> What will be the consequences to this city, prosperous as it is, from that communication? ... Build this road and Halifax will soon become one of the great emporiums of the world. All the great resources of the west will come over the immense railways of Canada to the bosom of your harbour.

Then, what did the Hon. Mr. Galt say on that evening in Halifax? He said:

> If we are united we must have an intercolonial railway. I am an advocate of this great work, and it becomes an absolute necessity if a union of these provinces is to take place at all ... But the railway is not to be looked upon as a question of cost, but as a bond of union, that will unite us in peace and in time of need.

Mr. Chairman, I cite these great utterances from our past, from a memorable night in the history of Canada, because these speeches inhabit the minds and hearts of the people of the maritimes. When we hear, on the eve of the eruption of a new political party in Canada those who have espoused all sorts of government activity come into the house and say, stop all your activities when it comes to the maritimes, stop at the ports, then we say that purity ought to begin at some other place. The railway which linked us, without which there could have been no union and without us there could have been no union, was not built as an economic operation. It was built as a bond of union.

Lest any member of the committee think I am being partisan in my attitude, let me quote from a gentleman who did not adopt our philosophy. I refer to the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier who, on July 30, 1903, while prime minister, moved in this chamber for leave to introduce a bill to provide for the construction of a national transcontinental railway. Hon. members will find in Hansard of that date, column 7671, the following words attributed to him:

> Let me observe that if we have used American ports, it is not because for five months in the year our own ports are icebound. Everybody knows that our ports in winter are just as open as the American harbours. Everybody knows, except Mr. Andrew Carnegie and the bulk of American public opinion, that if we have used American ports and the bonding privilege, it was not because our harbours were icebound in winter, but simply because we had no railways to reach them. In the face of this, are the Canadian parliament and people going to stand on their manhood and place us in such a position that at all times of the year, not only by one railway, but by two or more, we shall have access from January to December to our own harbours, and be able to say to our American neighbours: "Take off your bonding privilege whenever it suits you, we are commercially independent."

Well, that is what the leader of the Liberal party said, the only reason we were not making use of the ports on a twelve months' basis was that we did not have railway connections to them.

The Hon. W. S. Fielding, a distinguished Nova Scotian and later minister of finance, said, as reported at column 8557 of Hansard for August 12, 1903, during the same debate on the bill to provide for the construction of an international transcontinental railway:

> With this road built, instead of being dependent on the Canadian Pacific Railway only, Saint John will have two strings to its bow.
> Not a pound of traffic that goes to St. John now will be taken away, and St. John will stand its chance of getting a fair share of the new traffic to be created by this road. Halifax, with its peerless harbour, will have advantages which it has not hitherto enjoyed. Surely, sir, the time has come after years of deception, humbugging and trickery about the lines to the maritime provinces, that faith should be kept with these people, and that they should have a through line running on Canadian territory from ocean to ocean.

It is interesting to note that in the preamble of chapter 71 of the acts of 1903 which followed that debate, the object of that national transcontinental railway is cited as being to secure the most direct and economical interchange of traffic between eastern Canada and the provinces west of the great lakes—and I stress this—and to develop commerce through Canadian ports.

Finally, I quote from the Statutes of Canada, 1955, chapter 29, section 21. In this act the term "national railways" is defined as a phrase which comprises the Canadian government railways, Canadian national railways and all the companies, not in Canada, mentioned or referred to in the first schedule of the act. Section 21 of that act which is on the statute books of Canada states:

> The board of directors shall so direct, provide and procure that all freight destined for export by sea that is consigned within Canada for carriage to national railways either at point of origin or between that and the sea shall, unless it has been by its shippers specifically routed otherwise, be exported through Canadian seaports.

That is what we want on the east coast. We should like to say that one of the problems on which we in the maritimes are trying to formulate our thoughts and on which we feel we can usefully request federal action concerns the ports, particularly Halifax and Saint John. We have brought into the Canadian confederation two and more of the finest harbours in the world. These harbours are well served by inland and ocean transport lines. Our ports of Halifax and Saint John represent an investment of many millions of dollars on the part of the federal government and its agencies. That investment has been made and continues to increase in order to provide all of Canada with the outlet to the sea on her Atlantic coast which was promised us and which has been promised us through the years.

It is a well known fact that this investment at Halifax and Saint John lies virtually fallow during the season of navigation in the St. Lawrence river. The ports of Halifax and Saint John spring to life only when the winter ice has barred access to the inland waterway routes. It would be ideal to us if a way could be found to keep our waterfronts in Halifax and Saint John busy all year round. It is all the more important that these ports be utilized to the fullest extent possible during the short months in which they are Canada's only ice free outlets on the Atlantic ocean. Instead of this utilization, what have we found in the past? We have found very substantial quantities of cargo imported and exported via United States ports, last year some $450 million worth.

The Minister of Transport will know that I have been in communication with him both by letter and verbally. I readily accept the proposition that the figure of $400 million is greatly distorted by one commodity, namely oil passing through a pipe line from Montreal to Portland, Maine. But even the remaining portion of this business would provide great employment for our people and a marked improvement in the Atlantic provinces' economy. Hundreds of millions of dollars in inland transportation charges and labour costs, and port service charges flow into the United States instead of staying in this country where they could contribute additionally to the prosperity of our people.

I venture the opinion that we in the Atlantic provinces are disturbed at this flow of Canada's foreign trade through other than our own ports. We are not chauvinistic in the maritime provinces. We were two of the original four in confederation. We do not insist that all import and export traffic be routed only through Canadian ports. We do not urge that all traffic move via our harbours. However, we feel that we can insist and urge that companies which derive their prosperity from the Canadian market and from national legislation should make a special effort to ship their import and export cargoes through our Canadian ports. We de not believe we can rely on such slogans as "Ship via Canadian Ports" alone. Every ship that enters or leaves a port in the Atlantic provinces means dollars and jobs for the people of these provinces.

In a recent study prepared by the port of New York authority it was estimated that that great port supported one out of every four of its 13 million people who live in the port area. We do not have similar statistics relating to Halifax and Saint John but, if we had them, no doubt they would not show any marked or significant difference.

Our ports now provide a multitude of jobs in a variety of fields. Men who are actively engaged in ocean, coastal and local water transport derive their livelihood in large part at the expense of our harbours. Thousands who perform services such as stevedoring, cargo checking, marine salvage, dock and waterfront terminal operations are completely dependent on our ports. Government employees such as those in customs, immigration, harbour maintenance and administration, and of most of the firms which supply goods and services to the vessels, all live on the prosperity of our ports. The combined earnings alone of the longshoremen and freight handlers, watchers and checkers at Halifax and Saint John average $10 million annually. If we use the principle of free economic generation by which every dollar earned generates or creates at least $2 of additional income, we have nearly $30 million worth of income from these two ports.

We are therefore hopeful that, when port delegations representing the ports of Halifax and Saint John wait upon the Minister of Transport, as he has graciously agreed to allow them to do on June 26, there will be found a way to recapture part of the great volume of goods now passing in and out of Canada by other than our ports. This would be of assistance not only to the ports of Halifax and Saint John but to the entire economy of the Atlantic provinces and would keep faith with the pledges made to us throughout the years preceding and following confederation.

Mr. Habel: It is not my intention to delay the passing of the first item, Mr. Chairman. However, the fact that the hon. member for Halifax found it possible to speak for nearly 30 minutes about the great politicians of the nineteenth century causes me to have less hesitation about asking a question of a politician of the twentieth century. My question is this. Will the minister inform me whether he has received from the chamber of commerce of Kapuskasing an invitation to visit Kapuskasing and the airport there? If so, can he say whether he expects to be able to find time to go there? I can assure him that he will be well received. Moreover, he can go there in safety with the planes of the Department of Transport. I can assure him that they will find it easy to land there.

Mr. Balcer: I have received an invitation that I was obliged to turn down earlier in the year. However, I certainly look forward greatly to this visit to one of the most interesting parts of Canada. I shall be pleased to get together with my hon. friend.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, I did want to make some remarks as a result of the most amazing speech made by the hon. member for Halifax. I thought we were hearing the voice of Joseph Howe coming back to us again in this chamber; that is, Joseph Howe when he was leading the anti-confederates and before he came to his senses in 1870 and joined the federal cabinet. Evidently the hon. member for Halifax has not yet come to his senses in this regard.

The hon. member for Port Arthur did not in any way suggest that the port of Halifax should be abandoned. What the hon. member for Port Arthur suggested was that we need a complete transportation policy based upon cost and service. I was sitting right next to the hon. member for Port Arthur, so I think I heard him accurately.

Service certainly means service to all Canadians, including those in Halifax. We are asking for a pattern which will allow a place for the port of Halifax, and surely the hon. member would not suggest that we are going to find such a place by holding back the clock, simply by spending money on transportation for coming to the port of Halifax at a cost of $12 a ton over the cost of going to another port. I would say this would be a disservice to Halifax and to all Canadians. If we carried this to its logical conclusion we would end all progress completely. This problem can be approached another way.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, could we pass the first item and carry on with the hon. member's remarks after supper?

Mr. Chevrier: We are quite agreeable to that.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 402 carry?

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the Deputy Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

(Translation):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house joined the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate, His Honour has been pleased to give in Her Majesty's name the royal assent to certain bills.

(Text):

An act to amend the Freight Rates Reduction Act.

An act to amend the Canadian National Railways Act.

An act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1962.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, since the supplementary estimates were tabled today, I wonder whether the committee would agree to taking up the supplementary estimates at the same time as the main estimates are being discussed? Every time we reach an item in the main estimates that corresponds to an item in the supplementary estimates the supplementary estimate could be taken up following the study of the main estimate.

Mr. Chevrier: There is no objection on this side.

Mr. Herridge: Since we wish to co-operate, there will be no objection from this group.

The Deputy Chairman: I gather from the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Kootenay West that unanimous consent is given to consider the main estimates and the supplementary estimates simultaneously.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: The supplementary estimate to vote 402 is vote 583.

583. Departmental administration, further amount required, $47,585.

Mr. Herridge: I have one question to ask the minister with respect to this administrative item. The minister appoints individuals as agents of the Department of Transport, employees of other departments such as the Department of Public Works, who would be engaged in looking after wharves, docks, dredges and things of that sort. What arrangements are made between the minister's department and the other department? Does the Department of Transport stand responsible for any of the actions of its agents appointed in that way, in the performance of their duties?

Mr. Balcer: If an agent is acting in the name of the Department of Transport we would be responsible.

Mr. Pitman: When we were summoned to the other place, I was making a few comments on the remarks made by the hon. member for Halifax. I should like to take two or three moments of the committee's time to complete my remarks because I think they will be germane to this particular item. The committee will recall that the hon. member for Halifax made a gallant plea on behalf of his port. He is to be congratulated for this. However, in making his plea he completely misinterpreted the statement of the hon. member for Port Arthur and of myself. I would suggest this speech should have been made certainly before the building of the St. Lawrence seaway and perhaps it should even have been made at the colonial office in the early 1800's before the St. Lawrence canal was begun. I am sure the hon. member for Halifax realizes that in 1961 no group in the nation can be served if it means holding back progress. The challenge of the 1960's is surely that of the government making sure that progress is not syonymous with economic injustice. What we in this corner want is a national transportation policy which will find a place for Halifax but a proper place for it.

I would ask the hon. member what he would do if, for example, technological development gave us the opportunity to keep the St. Lawrence open all year? Would he suggest that the government ignore it? Would he suggest that they hide it and thus bring about millions of dollars in additional costs for people bringing goods in through the port of Halifax? The hon. member rather sneeringly calls us socialists but in his plea for the survival of Halifax as a major port he gave the most eloquent explanation of socialism that I have heard since I arrived in this house. He called not upon the industrialists or merchants to send their goods through Halifax. He called upon the government to come in and redress the balance. Surely if the normal measuring stick of free enterprise, that of profit, is to be utilized, the hon. member is telling us virtually that by that yardstick goods would go through United States ports and certainly through the St. Lawrence seaway but he wants the government to come in and redress the balance. Evidently that is his idea of what free enterprise actually means.

What he is really saying is that there is no free enterprise and, of course, he is absolutely right. We live in a mixed economy based on subsidies. The coal miners of Cape Breton and the port of Halifax are subsidized. The wheat farmers are subsidized. We in eastern and central Ontario are subsidized by tariffs and so on. What we want is a planned approach which takes the whole business of subsidization out of this ad hoc unplanned political hocus-pocus which it is certainly in today. If it is costing us more to use the port of Halifax, the hon. member suggests that we should try to find some way to increase the cost.

This is the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce speaking. Has he not been talking to his minister during this current session, the minister who has been reading us lectures across the floor that we must cut down the cost of production, that we must lower our costs so as to make our goods competitive throughout the world?

[Mr. Pitman.]

Yet the hon. member suggests that we bring in goods through Halifax and increase the cost of production. This is certainly one of the most amazing contradictions within the bounds of a single department of government that I have heard during the present session. Surely it is exactly this sort of thing which is over-pricing our goods in the markets of the world.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has set up a productivity council to bring down the cost of production. Would the hon. member suggest that if, with regard to an industry to which the council turns its attention, the council decides there should only be 1,500 workers instead of 3,000 the nation should subsidize the other 1,500 workers? I do not think so. The minister is concerned about bringing down the cost of production. We are also concerned about bringing down the cost of production but let us plan it so that we can give some kind of economic justice to all.

The 1960's and the 1970's are going to bring about tremendous disruptions in the labour force. The Minister of Labour has suggested that we are going to have to have flexibility and mobility of labour such as we have never seen before. Yet the hon. member for Halifax, standing firmly on his free enterprise platform, tells us we have to try to keep the port of Halifax operating no matter what happens.

An hon. Member: He never said any such thing.

Mr. Pitman: The hon. member for Halifax used history or misused history to support his argument. When confederation came about there was one promise made and it will be found right in the British North America Act. That promise was to build the intercolonial railway and it has been fulfilled. We could no more promise to keep the port of Halifax operating at full volume than the people of Halifax or of the maritimes generally could guarantee the stage coach route from Toronto to Kingston. But we did do something. We did pledge that the people of the maritimes would never be put at a disadvantage. We did state that the well-being and prosperity of the maritimes would be guaranteed as a result of confederation. I leave it to the hon. member for Halifax to decide whether that pledge has been kept.

Item agreed to.

Marine services—

403. Marine services administration, including agencies, $1,032,610.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I was not a member of the committee that examined the proposed amendments to the Canada

Shipping Act but I wonder whether those amendments contain any decision of the government with respect to a problem about which there has been a fair amount of argument back and forth over the last couple of years. I refer to the question of whether small boats, regardless of the amount of outboard power by which they may be propelled, should require a licence. I believe that up to now boats powered by outboard motors of less than ten horsepower have not required a licence from the department. Is that still the situation, and is it proposed to alter it in the amendments this session?

Mr. Balcer: The limit is still ten horsepower but the amendments will give us authority to make regulations to cover all small boats.

Mr. Benidickson: At the present time the regulations would not permit a change by order in council without reference to parliament. Is that correct?

Mr. Balcer: At the present time we could reduce it by order in council but what we intend to do under the new legislation is to extend the power of regulation and licensing to cover other types of boats such as sailboats and even non-powered vessels.

Mr. Benidickson: What about the minister's intentions with respect to licensing operators? I believe no licence is required at the present time irrespective of the age of the operator provided he is operating a small boat with a motor under ten horsepower.

Mr. Balcer: We have arranged a conference with representatives of the provincial governments for September 6 and these matters will be discussed then. All these matters, including the questions of licensing operators, who will do the licensing, whether there will be a charge and so on, will be discussed at length with the representatives of the provincial governments.

Mr. Benidickson: I take it from what the minister has said that it is fairly obvious that it is his intention to make some rather radical changes both with regard to licensing of small powered boats and possibly operators as well. He referred to a conference on September 6 and the question of who was going to look after these matters. Are representatives of the tourist industry, tourist camp operators and so on, going to attend this conference?

Mr. Balcer: We have a winter conference with representatives of the industry where they express their views and where there is every possibility for them to discuss all matters that might have a bearing on their trade. The department has in mind very much, of course, the development of the tourist industry in Canada and there is no intention at the present time of bringing forward regulations that would more or less put the industry into a strait-jacket. We will discuss the matter with the provinces to ascertain who will issue licences, if licences are to be issued, and who will be responsible for the machinery because, so far as the Department of Transport is concerned we have doubts about the usefulness of setting up a huge machine to handle licensing of small boats. The matter has been discussed with the trade, and we are going to discuss it with the provinces. We will try to find the best formula to assure that there will be a minimum of accidents and problems. At the same time, we do not want to be so strict that we will restrict the trade.

Mr. Benidickson: I hope that if the new legislation is going to give wide open power to the cabinet, the minister will not make recommendations in the early stages, at least, that will be too radical in nature. I think the regulations should take into account the density of the traffic in various parts of Canada. Something that might be required in a heavily populated area where the area of the water is extremely small, would be quite different from what might be justifiable in areas such as northern Ontario where we have a great deal of water and a relatively small population. I would hope that bureaucracy would not run wild in connection with this proposal and start a program of empire building. We do not want to build up a big supervisory staff or to have new regulations that would be completely unnecessary in certain territories where traffic is very light and, perhaps in consequence, the accident rate is almost negligible.

Mr. Balcer: That is precisely the point of view we had taken in our discussions with the trade last winter. We want to make it clear that the department has no intention of setting up a huge machine. We simply want to co-operate with the provincial governments and various bodies to try to avoid as many accidents as possible. We certainly do not want to set up a huge machine, and we do want to encourage the tourists as much as possible.

Mr. Benidickson: I would just urge the minister to go slowly, and sort of feel his way along in connection with these regulations. I think this is true also in the matter of any departure from the historic pattern in respect of the age barrier. I have lived in an area in which we have a lot of lakes, and I have observed that some youngsters can perform a very fine service for their family, as well as contribute to their own amusement, if they are given by those in control of them modest power on their boats. A great number of them, irrespective of their rather tender age, operate small boats more efficiently than some elderly, inexperienced tourists who will come and rent a boat.

As I say, if these children are not given boats of idiotic power, they can perform a useful service for their families during the summer vacation by providing transportation back and forth, and so on. I would hope that some blanket regulation would not be developed under which no one under 12 years of age, or something of that kind, would be allowed to get a licence to operate an outboard motorboat of reasonable power. On the other hand, I must say that I see some very deplorable examples of bad judgment on the part of parents who allow young children to operate outboard motors of 18, 25 and even 50 horsepower. Having regard to the age of the youngsters, this is rather ridiculous. As I have said, however, I hope that the regulation will allow some discretion in this matter.

Item agreed to.

Aids to navigation—

404. Administration, operation and maintenance including fees for membership in the international organizations listed in the details of the estimates, $6,783,790.

Mr. Herridge: I have just a few words to say about this item. I understand it relates to aids to navigation, which is a subject in which I have been interested for some years. I think for five years I urged the department to put markers on the Columbia river between the international boundary and Castlegar. Finally, they were placed there. It took a long time to get this accomplished, but it only took a couple of days' work by a couple of men to install them. These markers were very necessary, and there were some very narrow squeaks before they were installed involving United States tourists coming up in small craft who were unfamiliar with the channels.

I also have been urging that such markers be established on the Columbia between Arrowhead and Revelstoke. I am very glad to know that arrangements are being made to mark the river between Arrowhead and Revelstoke. I mention this at this time because of increasing water traffic from Portland in the United States north as far as Revelstoke on the Columbia river. Last year, there were about 100 craft involved.

Yesterday, I received a letter informing me there will be 10 to 15 craft going to Revelstoke this week end from points south of the border. There were a number of accidents last year between Arrowhead and Revelstoke in which boats lost their propellers on sandbars. In these swift waters, shore markers are usually used and the people steer from one marker to another. I think in this instance it is a Department of Public Works official who acts as agent for the Department of Transport in this area. He has a lot of work to do, so this sort of thing has to take second place. In the meantime, we have these craft going up the river. The last trip made by one United States flotilla between Arrowhead and Revelstoke resulted in four boats losing their propellers and one suffered serious damage to the hull. There are no markers in this somewhat swiftly flowing stream to mark sandbars, logs and that sort of thing.

I suggest in view of the increasing importance of navigation on the Columbia, and because of the interest of more and more United States citizens who are finding out what a marvellous trip it is into the garden of Eden, it would be worth while for the department to have one of its officials in Vancouver make a visit to the district and examine the marking of the river between the international boundary and Castlegar, and between Arrowhead and Revelstoke. Then, as promptly as possible, he should see that these markers are set in place. We have had high water in that district lately, which tends to push these buoys out of place. They should be replaced as soon as the water starts to drop. I made the trip down the river with one captain and there were 11 buoys out of place for over six months. No one had been in there to replace these buoys which had been washed out by the high water. This is necessary in view of the narrow channels.

At any rate, we want to do all we can in the Kootenays to attract the United States tourists because they are coming up there and stopping over at our tourist resorts. They go into Kootenay lake and sometimes transfer their craft over to the Columbia or vice versa. We do urge the minister, therefore, to make certain that his department does all that is possible to make navigation safe. It is not an expensive job at all.

My final word is to suggest that the department should issue a rudimentary chart that could be sold to these people at the customs office at Trail when they come into Canada for use up the river. This chart could show where the markers are, and indicate what a red buoy, blue buoy or black buoy means, green lights, red lights and so on. More and more we are finding people without experience operating these boats in swift waters and in some cases dangerous waters. I make this plea at the request of the chambers of commerce in the district, the tourist resort operators and the local people generally.

Mr. Harkness: I am informed that the director of marine works is going out to the Arrow lakes area later this month with the purpose in mind of trying to get a contract or contracts into operation in order to put up these markers. As far as charts are concerned, I think anything along that line would have to come after the markers were put into position. I do not know what can be done in that regard, particularly in the immediate future. However, knowing that part of the country quite well, knowing the hon. member's great interest in it and also his interest in the development of free enterprise of all kinds, I thought I should perhaps suggest to him that this would seem to me to present a great opportunity for him and some of his friends out there to institute a pilotage system in order to get these United States craft safely up and down this stretch of water.

Mr. Herridge: I might inform the minister that we have instituted a pilotage system, but our pilotage system's main function is to direct these people to the proper stopping places in which many have an interest.

Mr. Chevrier: I observe that the Minister of National Defence has a roving commission tonight.

Mr. Harkness: I have quit roving now.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps he might help me with the matter I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport. It has to do with a dispute which has arisen between two entities over which the minister has jurisdiction. I refer to aids to navigation on the St. Lawrence seaway. The minister will probably recall that the Auditor General of Canada has, I believe, before some committee—whether or not it was the public accounts committee I cannot remember—made a recommendation that aids to navigation on the St. Lawrence seaway should be paid for by the St. Lawrence seaway authority and not by the Department of Transport. I should like to tell the minister that the recommendation of the Auditor General in that regard is totally unwarranted. I respect, of course, the opinion of the Auditor General, but I think I should inform the minister that the Auditor General did not possess the information which he should have had when he made this recommendation. Not only is the recommendation unwarranted but it is wholly erroneous and perhaps I may just take a moment or two in which to say why.

If the St. Lawrence seaway authority were to pay for the aids to navigation on the seaway, then why should not the authority pay for the pilotage or why should it not pay for a number of other matters that arise on the St. Lawrence seaway? I should like to bring this matter to the attention of the minister for what it is worth and I believe it is worth something, although I doubt very much whether the government would take cognizance of anything I have to say. However, I bring the matter forward because I am convinced that it was settled a long time ago.

When these two entities, namely the St. Lawrence seaway authority and the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation started to negotiate on the question of matters that affected tolls, they immediately eliminated the aids to navigation and they said, "This is not a matter for us to determine or to consider; this is a matter for our respective governments". That was the situation in the United States and that was the situation in Canada. When the present government established the international tolls committee, it told the members of it, "here are the things upon which you must base your calculations in order to arrive at the amount of capital expenditure upon the seaway". That was done not under the previous administration but under this administration and I have no fault to find with this at all.

The only thing I want to bring to the attention of the minister is this. Aids to navigation on the seaway were not even considered. The matter did not go to the joint tolls committee because it was taken for granted that they would be looked after by the Department of Transport in the same manner that the Department of Transport looks after all aids to navigation east of Montreal and west of Montreal beyond the St. Lawrence seaway and in all other parts of Canada. I do not want to take an undue length of time in discussing the matter. However, I feel that the recommendation of the Auditor General was not only unfair but unwarranted and that the St. Lawrence seaway authority should not be charged with that item of cost as it was never the intention that it should be charged with it, either in the meetings that took place between the two entities or in the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act which clearly sets out the powers and purposes of the legislation.

Mr. Balcer: Not only do we listen with care to what my friend the hon. member for Laurier says but I might tell him that he has convinced me. I know that this matter was raised in the public accounts committee. My officials have explained the situation before the public accounts committee. We have referred the matter to treasury board and treasury board has told us to carry on looking after the cost of these aids to navigation but to keep them in a separate account, and that is what we are doing.

Canals—

406. Administration, operation and maintenance, $2,398,550.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 406 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Before vote 406 carries, may I ask whether the minister has had time since dinner to give consideration to the constructive suggestion I made to him about the Trent canal?

Mr. Balcer: During the dinner recess I had a most interesting meeting with the truckers and I forgot completely about my hon. friend and his very good suggestion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister say he has forgotten what my suggestion was?

Mr. Balcer: For the moment only.

Mr. Pickersgill: My suggestion was that the Trent canal should be given to Mr. Frost as a sort of consolation prize, in lieu of the $100 million that the Prime Minister has not given to him, although he promised it before the 1957 election, so that Mr. Frost could turn the Trent canal into a provincial park in the same way that the Quebec government would like to turn the Soulanges canal into a provincial park, and thereby relieve the federal treasury of its cost.

Mr. Balcer: I am sure that if we were offering Mr. Frost 13 miles of a certain length of canal, he would not refuse just because he could not get 14 to one.

Mr. Chevrier: You do not know Premier Frost.

Mr. Grills: With regard to the remarks made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, may I say that when he speaks of the Trent canal he is speaking of something that is very close to my home and also very close to my heart. The Trent canal starts at the lovely bay of Quinte in my riding. I am certainly not in accord with him when he suggests giving it away to anyone. I might inform him that it is one of the beauty spots of Canada. It is a real tourist attraction. While there may not be any direct revenue from it, it is a tourist attraction and indirectly that fact should make it worth while, more so now than ever before in the history of Canada. We have many more pleasure craft coming to our land and in our land. There are many more using the Trent canal than there ever were in years gone by. I therefore cannot agree with this idea of giving away this canal that starts in my riding, which is such a lovely place. I would invite the hon. member to come up some time and I will show him one of the very special tourist attractions of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I must express a good deal of astonishment at the expression of the lack of confidence by the hon. member for Hastings South in the government of Ontario.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise the matter of grants paid in lieu of taxes to my municipality of Thorold by the St. Lawrence seaway authority in respect to the Welland canal and Welland canal lands. The St. Lawrence seaway authority took over the operations of the Welland canal on April 1, 1959, and prior to that date the canal municipalities received yearly grants in lieu of taxes from the Department of Finance under the Municipal Grants Act.

My town has an area of 1,390 acres. Of this area, the canal owns 483 acres, 87 of which are leased. The canal actually makes use of 396 acres, nearly 30 per cent of the area of the municipality, and this is over 65 per cent of the taxable area of the town.

The Department of Finance paid grants in lieu of taxes in respect to certain canal buildings. These buildings were greatly depreciated, much more than similar buildings in town, and they had an assessment of around $170,000. The Department of Finance then paid something around 10 per cent of the total taxes of the town until March 31, 1959. For the rest of 1959 and since—that is, for the other nine months of 1959 and since—the St. Lawrence seaway authority has refused to pay any taxes in respect to buildings, and this reduces their taxes down to something around 8 per cent of the total taxes.

It may be argued by the St. Lawrence seaway authority that the town gives no services in return for these grants, but I have seen our police out in force protecting their buildings and I have seen our firemen fighting fires in canal buildings.

I attended a meeting in St. Catharines last year between the municipalities and officials of the St. Lawrence seaway. Mr. Rankin, the chairman of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, was there. He received us very well. One statement which he made was that grants would be arrived at on a different basis, but the amount that the municipalities would receive would vary very little from what they had received in the past.

I suggested to him at that time that this was the thin edge of the wedge in getting out of paying a certain amount of taxes, and he said this was not the case. The point is that ever since the town has not received any grants in lieu of taxes in respect to buildings, and this amounts to about $10,000 a year or 2½ mills.

Since I have been in parliament I have heard two ministers of finance state that crown corporations would pay grants in lieu of taxes on a fair and equitable basis. I understand that in the United Kingdom the government pays grants in lieu of taxes in respect of all crown properties and buildings.

The St. Lawrence seaway authority states that they are not bound by any assessment act, municipal act or the Municipal Grants Act, all of which is probably true. But I do suggest that no matter on what basis grants are paid, the decision is made on a unilateral basis and we would like to know what that basis is.

The amount of $10,000 is considerable for a small municipality, particularly a municipality that has provided services across tax free land of the canal for well over 100 years, as well as providing free services to the canal all this time.

When I was presenting the case of the municipalities here in 1952 I referred to the fact that I had seen an old picture of a hand fire fighting brigade fighting a fire in some canal structures. This picture was 100 years old. In 1951, for instance, our fire brigade fought 22 fires on canal property. I realize there is some history back of all this in connection with the Welland canal and the old Welland canal rehabilitation about which the St. Lawrence seaway authority would not be aware.

The present canal cuts across our natural drainage system and in 1949, as mayor of the town, I applied to the Department of Transport to have the effluent from a sewage disposal plant go into our natural drainage system running along the canal. The department objected at that time to this proposal and offered to pay $100,000 toward the cost of an interceptor sanitary sewer.

At the time of the rehabilitation of the old canal an arrangement was made that the department would forgo contributing this $100,000 and would go ahead and carry out more rehabilitation, which was done. However, at the same time we have been denied the right to build a sewage treatment plant along our natural drainage outlet and will be forced to pay the cost of piping our sewage through an interceptor sewer a distance of eight miles or more.

The town of Thorold in my constituency very reluctantly accepted this arrangement with the department, but they did so thinking that they would from then on be able to draw a grant in lieu of taxes in respect to canal properties. Now these are being considerably reduced and I think it is very unfair. The other canal municipalities are not similarly situated. Thorold is on the brow of a mountain; it contains all the flight locks, and at that particular point there is a concentration of buildings. This condition does not obtain to the same degree in the other municipalities.

Other municipalities are of course affected by the canal because they have duplication of services. Some of these municipalities must maintain firefighting equipment on each side of the canal; they must have two sewage plants, which they would not need if the canal were not there.

I would like to hear from the minister on what basis grants in lieu of taxes should be paid by the St. Lawrence seaway authority. I would like to know whether or not the Department of Finance was wrong in paying the grants previously on buildings; and if they were wrong at that time, why were they paid? I should like to know on what authority these grants are paid, and why they are not being paid now in respect to buildings. As I have said before, we do give protection to their buildings.

One other matter I should like to refer to, has reference to the interruption of street traffic in the city of Welland caused by boat traffic in the canal. The canal goes through the city. There are no locks nearby and for some miles both north and south of the city the canal is a straight sailing level. The boats necessarily traverse the canal at reduced speeds and when they bunch up in groups of three or four some hundreds of yards apart in traversing this area the bridges are sometimes up for 30 minutes or more at a time. This presents a real street traffic problem and affects the economy of the city.

I should like to ask the minister whether he can intercede with the St. Lawrence seaway authority in an effort to see that the boats do not bunch up in this way. I am sure that if the minister was successful in such an attempt his efforts would be very greatly appreciated. I would also like the minister to reply to my question in respect of the reason why the department is not now paying grants in lieu of taxes on buildings.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, if you will permit me I should like to say in regard to the two items referred to by the hon. member for Welland that I should be pleased to provide an answer. However, I point out to the hon. member that these two matters are strictly within the jurisdiction of the St. Lawrence seaway authority. I shall accept the two questions as notice and attempt to provide an answer when we reach our consideration of the estimates on the St. Lawrence seaway.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister could give some consideration to the supplying of uniforms for the workers on canals, including the operators, lockmen and those individuals who work on the walls. I have particular reference to the canal at Sault Ste. Marie where, on the United States side, the employees are all supplied with uniforms while on our side they are provided only with caps, and perhaps shirts. I think there would be a great deal of improvement in the general appearance around these canals and locks were the employees dressed in uniforms.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I feel that is a very good suggestion. The treasury board has ruled that, for the time being, our canal employees will be supplied with caps only, because it would be very costly to provide complete uniforms, particularly in view of the fact that many of them are on rough work, and work with greasy machinery, and would require more than one uniform per man. It has been decided, therefore, at least for the time being, to supply caps only, but I should not like the hon. member to feel that the door has been closed on his suggestion.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I could not allow item 406 pertaining to canals to be carried without saying a few words on a matter of concern to all members. I refer, of course, to the Soulanges canal.

As everybody knows, the province of Quebec conceived a splendid plan to use and develop this canal for another purpose, not only for the benefit of this particular area, but of the whole province.

I should like at this stage to recall briefly that the federal government had once expressed its readiness to sell all the canal property to the Quebec government for the nominal amount of $1. Subsequently the present government was willing to sell to the province of Quebec an area of about 13 miles, reserving however that one-mile stretch that the Quebec government considers most important for its proposed development, namely the Cascades area.

The most surprising point during that discussion was the letter sent to the newspapers under the signature of the hon. member for Vandreuil-Soulanges (Mr. Bourbonnais). Indeed, I mentioned it during the examination of item 1 of the Department of Transport's estimates. In that letter, the hon. member stated that he alone is against this transfer of land to the province of Quebec. Moreover, the hon. member stated that he was to be held fully responsible for the action he has taken.

Now, it seems that further negotiations were carried out between the federal government and the government of the province of Quebec. The item under consideration gives us an opportunity of presenting our arguments in connection with that matter.

Knowing as I do how highly interested the minister is in this matter, I am sure he would have been most disappointed if we had not mentioned that subject, because he will now have an opportunity not only of making his point but also of informing us of all the discussions which may have been going on recently. Moreover, the minister will be able to tell us what happened after the newspapers announced the government's offer to sell that part of the canal which is called Les Cascades.

I would therefore ask the minister to state his arguments in connection with this question. I am sure he will be grateful to me for having made it possible for him to do so and I may have a few questions to ask him afterwards.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words concerning the subject on which the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) has called the minister's attention.

I am not satisfied with the reply the minister gave me this afternoon, and rightly so, because if he remembers well, when I asked him certain questions concerning the Soulanges canal, he told me that all the chambers of commerce of that district had asked him to keep the mile-long section of canal in the neighbourhood of Point des Cascades. I then asked him to name those chambers of commerce but he did not do that; instead, he merely produced this advertisement which was prepared jointly by the Soulanges chamber of commerce, the people who work on the Soulanges canal and others. However, that advertisement did not mention any representations by chambers of commerce. I have here all the representations made by the chambers of commerce, and they all asked the minister to make the transfer at no cost to the government of the province of Quebec, of all the Soulanges canal properties, not with the exception of a one-mile area, but of all the properties, to make possible the carrying out of all the projects that were mentioned, thus giving the people of Soulanges county a source of income which would enable them to prosper as they did before the canal was closed down.

It is therefore obvious that all the chambers of commerce were in favour of the transfer to the province of Quebec of all the properties, for the purpose which the minister knows.

In my opinion the minister should admit that he had no resolution from the citizens of Soulanges except the pamphlet I mentioned.

The minister should also tell us how long he intends to have that advertisement carried before deciding whether or not he will give to the province of Quebec the mile-long section of property he is retaining at present. In my opinion, the house is entitled to know whether the offer will last for a month, six months or a year. The longer this matter is delayed, the more difficult it will be for the government of the province of Quebec to undertake its program.

I do not wish to make any personal remark but the minister doubtless remembers the statement he made during a political meeting held in the county. I understand he said later on that he regretted having made that statement but there is no doubt in the minds of hon. members that it is the member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges who is delaying the transfer.

After all, if this could be really beneficial to the industrialization of the area—and I hope so because it would be in the best interests of the people—it seems logical that such industrialization should take place on the upper side of the canal, in the neighbourhood of Coteau where there are already two railways, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, while on the Cascades side there is no railway at all. There is an excellent road but in addition to a road, in order to promote the industrial development of the area, other means of transportation are required, therefore, I suggest that the ideal location for industrial development is the upper part of the canal.

I should like to ask the minister whether he got a resolution from the chambers of commerce and, if so, whether he would table it now.

Mr. Bourbonnais: The hon. member for Laurier is asking for the tabling of certain documents from the Soulanges chamber of commerce, I must tell him that he knows nothing about the matter, because a few days ago he mentioned there were eight chambers of commerce in Vaudreuil-Soulanges, when actually there are only four; one for the Soulanges area, one for Rigaud, one in Dorion and another on Perrot island. Only two chambers of commerce have submitted resolutions, asking us to transfer the entire Soulanges canal to the province of Quebec for the purpose of setting up a fish-breeding station and a bird sanctuary. And those chambers of commerce were influenced by a small group of politicians in that county who wanted to create obstruction and delay the solution of the Soulanges canal problem.

Mr. Pigeon: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bourbonnais: When the hon. member speaks of industrializing the upper county, the Côteau du Lac district, he just wants to create confusion and misunderstanding, because we have no sites there. If there is to be industrialization there, it should be the sole concern of the people in that community, of the chambers of commerce. It is up to them to promote any industrial development.

Since 1956, the Soulanges chamber of commerce took some steps jointly with the industrial expansion committee and the Soulanges canal employees, and even spent a lot of money on publicity, to attract industries in the Soulanges canal area, no matter where.

The only site belonging to the Department of Transport which may serve industrial ends along the Soulanges canal, is at Cascades Point, about two miles from the seaway.

It is true that there is no means of communication by rail. But at Côteau landing or Côteau station, those properties that are mentioned do not belong to us.

The people of those localities should start something themselves to bring industry into the district. And if the friends of the hon. member for Laurier in Quebec decided to build the roads that were already started in 1959 and 1960, the district would know what it is to be industrialized.

Mr. Pigeon: A follower of Mr. Lesage.

Mr. Bourbonnais: Mr. Chairman, when we offered the province of Quebec 13 miles of the Soulanges canal for camping sites and fish hatcheries which would delight fishermen and so on, the Quebec department of fisheries and game would have immediately accepted our offer if they had been in earnest.

They refused it for one reason only, the fact that those people, like the hon. member for Laurier, often talk through their hat. They made promise after promise. They promised to erect buildings on the premises, that all the fishermen in the province of Quebec would gather there and fish all kinds of fish—perhaps cod, I do not know—but they forgot one thing, namely that the present roads and bridges of Dorion, St. Ann and Perrot island, which were adequate for the people of Montreal island who often go fishing and holidaying in the Soulanges area, are not adequate for present-day traffic. New bridges had been started in 1960, but the Quebec Liberal government has stopped the work. The department of fisheries and game is more concerned with developing parks and fish hatcheries than the provincial government is concerned with solving a major traffic problem at the mouth of the county. That is the reason why the Quebec government has refused our offer. It is an excuse for not fulfilling another fantastic promise they made.

If no reasonable offers are made for the purchase of that part of the canal which we have put on sale, or if they do not involve enough employment opportunities, we will turn over the whole canal to the province of Quebec, and we will see whether the Lesage government was in earnest; we will see whether they can carry out their plans for a fish hatchery and a bird sanctuary.

The famous member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) has been trying to defend the position of the Liberal government of the province of Quebec. But why? He knows nothing of the interests of the people of Soulanges. The only thing we are trying to do is to diversity the economy of the constituency of Soulanges. This is none of their business. They have all the problems they need in Montreal, so let them deal with their own problems before sticking their noses into things they know nothing about.

A diversified economy is a must for Soulanges; to develop Soulanges into a centre for tourists, fishermen and bird lovers will not improve economic conditions, nor will it help the citizens of Soulanges. It may help a few of the friends of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont and of the hon. member for St. Ann who would very much like to go fishing there, but it will not settle the problems of the people I represent.

Anyhow their argument does not hold water as we offered more than 90 per cent of the canal property for purposes now approved by the provincial government. We only want to keep 10 per cent of that land in case some industries would want to establish themselves immediately or within a few years' time, so as to create employment for the residents of the Vaudreuil-Soulanges county.

This country has not only sportsmen but also farmers and workmen who have to leave their home to earn a living elsewhere. If employment could thus be created at home, our people would not need to go away and earn their living in Montreal.

Unfortunately members like the hon. member for Laurier, do not understand those problems; all they want is to confuse the issue.

Mr. Pigeon: You do not know anything about the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, earlier today we had an excellent example of the way the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges is dealing with a question which, to our mind, is a serious one.

First of all, he told us to mind our own business. Then he said we did not know what it was all about. Now, Mr. Chairman, when an hon. member thinks a matter is of general interest, he is not only entitled to deal with it but he also has—notwithstanding the remarks of the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges who, unfortunately, did some bad manoeuvring in this respect—the responsibility of putting things right, as I intend to do.

He said that there was only one chamber of commerce which had passed resolutions. I have here—

Mr. Bourbonnais: On a point of order. The hon. member for Laurier does not quote my words correctly. I said that there were 4 chambers of commerce in Vaudreuil-Soulanges, one in the Soulanges district, one in Vaudreuil, one at Rigaud and one at Ile Perrot, whereas only two chambers of commerce have sent in resolutions requesting transfer of the Soulanges canal. That is always the way the hon. member for Laurier deals with matters concerning us.

Mr. Pigeon: The hon. member for Laurier is not familiar with Quebec. He is a stranger adopted by charity in Quebec.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member is so flustered that we cannot understand what he says.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I come back to what I said earlier—there are seven chambers of commerce in the county of Soulanges that made representations to the minister. I do not want to delay the vote, but I have here some petitions and resolutions. I have one from the chamber of commerce of Soulanges that I mentioned earlier and there is another one from the municipal corporation of the village of Soulanges, and another from the corporation of St. Joseph's parish of Soulanges, and yet another from the corporation of the village of St. Zotique—

Mr. Bourbonnais: On a point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: There is also—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges has risen on a point of order.

Mr. Bourbonnais: The hon. member said that I mentioned one chamber of commerce. He cannot even read the resolution sent in by municipal corporations. He does not even know the difference between—

The Chairman: Order. I shall give the hon. member for Soulanges the opportunity to make corrections if he wishes, but he cannot interrupt the hon. member for Laurier without his consent.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for calling to order the hon. member who, as I said a moment ago, is overexcited over this question which certainly has harmed his chances in his own constituency.

I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that in addition to the chamber of commerce which I mentioned, there were also municipal corporations of the Soulanges county all of which indicated their support of the resolution passed by the Soulanges chamber of commerce recommending that the Department of Transport allow free transfer of all lands and buildings along the Soulanges canal to the government of the province of Quebec in order to facilitate the development of the projects referred to and thus bring to the people of the Soulanges county a source of income that would allow them to prosper as they did before the closing of the canal.

Now all those resolutions passed either by the Soulanges chamber of commerce or by the municipal corporations which I mentioned, support the full and complete transfer of the Soulanges canal to the province of Quebec, not subject to the condition that one mile or two miles be reserved, but unconditionally, so that the province may benefit from it according to the plan submitted.

Then the hon. member spoke about bridges and roads and spent several minutes dealing with a matter which is purely provincial and outside federal jurisdiction, but he is so mixed up about that business that he wanders away from the subject and talks about things that have nothing to do with that transfer. About this transfer of the Soulanges canal he finally says: "We do not own any land in the upper part of the Soulanges canal".

Mr. Pigeon: You did not understand a thing.

Mr. Chevrier: This proposal is wrong because the C.N.R.—

Mr. Pigeon: You are an ignoramus.

Mr. Chevrier: —and the C.P.R. own considerable land there and everybody knows that those two companies would be very anxious to see that part developed for industrial purposes if possible. And no one knows it better than the minister himself, that if he had requests from industries and passed them along to the C.N.R. or the C.P.R. those two companies would make that land available to those industries to enable them to develop that part of the Soulanges county.

Mr. Bourbonnais: Why don't you look after your own constituency of Laurier?

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry that the hon. member should not appreciate this inference but I wish to tell him and I repeat that as long as we, on this side of the house, believe that it is in the public interest to concern ourselves with a matter, even if it is not related to our constituency, we shall do so without hesitation.

Mr. Bourbonnais: The hon. member for Laurier insists on coming back to a matter about which he knows absolutely nothing. If the two railway companies, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, own land in that area, it is in their interest to set up industrial centres there. We do not have to meddle in the business of a company or of a corporation, and he should be the first to know it.

He talks about the matter of bridges, which he says, comes exclusively under the jurisdiction of the province. Well, I must inform him that the bridges that will be built in the future in the Vaudreuil, Perrot island, and Ste. Anne de Bellevue area, are part of the trans-Canada highway. Yes, he does not know what he is talking about. Last November, plans were prepared, filed and approved, for the trans-Canada highway to run through Dorion, Perrot island and over the Ottawa river at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, towards Montreal. When those bridges are built and the traffic at these points moves more freely or allows a greater volume of circulation, then it will be time to develop parks, recreation areas of all sorts in order to attract tourists, fishermen and campers. But, until these bridges are built, there is no use thinking about it.

I know that the government of the province of Quebec will not go ahead with its plans. I challenge that government—and will do so through the newspapers and any other means at my disposal—to go ahead with its plans on this 13 mile stretch which we have offered them. And since the member for Laurier suggests I am in a fix, I invite him to visit my riding and meet my constituents.

He makes much of some resolutions which he has received from municipal councils, but you will have noticed that those resolutions are always in the same style and are all from the same source. We know that, at the present time, in the province of Quebec, all the small municipalities are crushed under the dictatorship of the Liberal government. They are compelled to do this only because a provincial minister directs them to do so. It is the same resolution, written in the same style, which has been passed by seven or eight municipal corporations and by two chambers of commerce. However, two other chambers of commerce did not choose to do likewise.

There are about 25 municipal corporations in Vaudreuil-Soulanges which are not yet under the dictatorship of the Quebec Liberals.

Therefore, I challenge the hon. member for Laurier and I invite him to come and discuss this matter in Vaudreuil-Soulanges.

Mr. Pigeon: He will not go because he is afraid. He is a stranger in Quebec. He was admitted out of charity.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, the member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont asked me first of all to clear up this matter of the Soulanges canal. Well, I believe I granted his wish this afternoon. Unfortunately, I think he was absent from the house when I explained the situation as far as my department is concerned.

I am asked for how long this offer of land for industrial purposes at Cascades will stand. The offer is for a period of one month and it is already a week since this offer was advertised in Canadian papers. In addition, our trade commissioners throughout the world have been informed. I should also like to inform the hon. member for Laurier that we have already received a couple of offers which we are now considering.

I feel that the stand taken by the federal government is both logical and consistent, moreover it is justifiable. Indeed, I sincerely think the people of Vaudreuil-Soulanges will come to realize that the government has acted in their best interest.

I know it is nice to have a place where people can fish and relax, but there are many other places like that in Quebec. A great number of the lakes which are available to the public—

An hon. Member: There are the Laurentians.

Mr. Balcer: —probably offer advantages which are greater than those of Point des Cascades. At any rate, we did not want to make any trouble. We were willing to do our share. That is why we were ready to give not only thirteen miles of canal but even the canal bed; we were even willing to give properties, buildings, and even a mill. I sincerely feel that with those thirteen miles of property along the canal, the provincial government could have made a very fine park and set up a whole series of scientific stations where the fish habits could have been studied and where all kinds of fish-breeding experiments could have been carried out.

On the one hand, they seemed to insist on having also Point des Cascades, which is indeed a wonderful and large enough location. But on the other hand, many people—I am not saying everybody, I am not denying that municipal corporations passed resolutions asking that everything be handed over to the provincial government—have made representations to the government and, as my hon. friend from Vaudreuil-Soulanges was saying earlier, two or three public bodies have, for some years, been attempting to promote industrial development at Point des Cascades.

All we want is one month, in order to have a chance to advertise the location and see if any industry would be interested to build a plant there. Let us not forget that while parks are fine it is better to try to get industries in a rural place like this which was deeply affected by the closing of the Soulanges canal and the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway.

To date we have received two offers from industries and they are being considered.

But as I was saying a moment ago, the problem of the industrial development of Point des Cascades will be under consideration for a month. And, if after a month we should find that offers made were not too attractive and could not provide enough employment, we shall be delighted to transfer the whole canal to Quebec.

Mr. Chevrier: May I put a question to the minister? The last part of his answer is satisfactory, compared to what he had to say previously. For the first time, I think, we have heard him say that if no serious application has been forthcoming after 30 days, the whole canal would be transferred to the provincial authorities.

I should like to ask this question: is the federal government or the Department of Transport contemplating spending any money to incite industry to come into this area, or even building a wharf?

Mr. Balcer: There is no doubt about it. Besides, if there was ever a government that proved it, ours did. We are trying by every possible means to urge industry and private enterprise to create job opportunities for Canadian citizens. If a serious proposal is made to us to help develop that industrial site, and if the canal and its approaches have to be dug, and wharves have to be built, I am convinced that my colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker), will not hesitate a moment to recommend that the required work be done for the industrial development of that area.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister did not answer the question I put to him several times: what chamber of commerce recommended the conditional transfer of Soulanges canal?

In reply to my question he said there was one. I asked him to name it and he produced a folder, which was not a resolution by a chamber of commerce. Has there been one?

Mr. Balcer: It was the Soulanges chamber of commerce which repeatedly asked the federal government to help it with the industrial development of the federal property of Cascades Point.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister knows that the chamber of commerce of Soulanges sent him a petition requesting the transfer of the whole canal to the government of the province of Quebec. I have it here and so does the minister.

Mr. Bourbonnais: Mr. Chairman, allow me to point out to the hon. member for Laurier that he does not have a petition in his hand, it is a resolution adopted at a regular meeting of the chamber of commerce of Soulanges—there is a difference. Now, I am a member of the chambers of commerce of Soulanges, Ile-Perrot, Dorion and Rigaud. I have attended several of their meetings. As a matter of fact, I have been attending their regular meetings since 1958. There have been talks about the industrialization in the whole constituency. Those people came here as a delegation in 1959 and again this year, to ask that something be done toward industrialization in the Vaudreuil-Soulanges area. This is our first opportunity of initiating a development in the district by offering the Soulanges canal land to industry. In my opinion the Minister of Transport the other day expressed the views shared by the chambers of commerce and the whole population of Soulanges and Vaudreuil—that industry be attracted to my riding by every possible means. But if the member for Laurier does not want to understand, if he wants to continue talking about matters he does not know the first thing about, there is nothing you can do.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, before going on to another item, there is only one point that remains to be clarified. Since the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges and the minister are both present, this is as good an opportunity as any.

In the letter he sent to the newspapers, the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges said that the original offer of the province of Quebec had been accepted at one point by the federal government and that the Minister of Transport had even asked the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges to break the news at a certain meeting.

Now, this is the question I would like to put to the Minister of Transport: What happened at that point to make him change his mind about the offer from Quebec? It was the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges who said so, not I. I do hope that by cross-examining the Minister of Transport and the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges, the truth will finally come out.

Mr. Bourbonnais: It's very simple: at the last general Conservative convention, in Ottawa, the Quebec minister of game and fisheries, his deputy minister, his secretary and all his assistants, as well as the engineer of the Quebec highway division, I believe, asked us to transfer the whole of Soulanges canal to the province of Quebec for the purpose of developing parks, etc.

The Minister of Transport, who lives in Three Rivers and not in my constituency, of course does not understand as well as I do the problems that exist in my area. Besides, it is my duty to know them and to inform the proper authorities accordingly. The hon. members who have made a lot of fuss about this matter have spent the evening discussing a problem they know nothing about, thus making fools of themselves. They want to prove a difference of opinion between the minister and myself.

The Minister of Transport was agreeable to surrendering the whole of the Soulanges canal as was part of the population in my county. It is as simple, as clear and as honest as that. I objected to such action because I am familiar with local problems. I have been studying them for a score of years. I have lived in that part of the country for 40 years. I know what problems they have. When I told the Minister of Transport that we could not let go of the whole canal, but keep part of it for our people, farmers and labourers who have to find work elsewhere, the minister understood immediately and he supported me. Members opposite think it extraordinary for a minister and a member of parliament even if they do not always see eye to eye to finally come to terms. Well, what prompts them to rise is the unity they can see in our party compared to theirs. I ask them to turn to the Lesage cabinet and see what is going on in there.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I would very much like the minister to answer the question I put to him earlier. What happened that made the government change its attitude after having accepted the original offer from the province of Quebec?

My second question is this. When there is an agreement between the province of Quebec and the federal government, to implement a project which is consistent with public interest, since when must the government yield before a member who is opposed to the project and states he is the only one to object?

Mr. Pigeon: He is a good and honest member.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont would like to know what made me change my mind. First, let us recall certain facts during the discussions with the province of Quebec. The province wanted to buy for the nominal price of $1 the whole property of the Soulanges canal to create a fish breeding station there.

[Mr. Bourbonnais.]

I agreed to meet them. On that occasion, my first words were to express my amazement that they wanted all the canal properties for $1, and that they refused to consider any other proposal. I told them that personally, I had no objection to their request but that I found them hard to please. Afterwards, I heard the arguments of my hon. friend for Vaudreuil-Soulanges which seemed most reasonable. In fact, as I said earlier, there is no reason why we should not try to industrialize a certain part of this area which is in need of such development. I felt that was a sound argument, much stronger than any of those put forward by the provincial representatives at that meeting. I was convinced by that sound argument which showed that my hon. friend for Vaudreuil-Soulanges is concerned about the welfare of his constituents. That is why we acted as we did.

(Text):

Mr. Pitman: I should like to ask the minister a short question. No doubt he was very much impressed by the remarks made by the hon. member who spoke about the modernization of the Trent canal system. I wonder whether there are at the moment any plans for its modernization or whether any study is being made at this time.

Mr. Balcer: We have a ten-year rehabilitation program. In connection with this rehabilitation program a certain part is done every year. It all depends on the amount that treasury board allows us to spend every year. For instance, this year we have new locks at Fenelon Falls. Another year we will do another item of modernization. It is a ten-year plan and it is progressing.

(Translation):

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, just one question concerning the Lachine canal. Could the minister say whether, as a result of the St. Lawrence seaway, there has been a serious drop in traffic in the Lachine canal?

There are all kinds of rumors to the effect that the Lachine canal will be closed within a few years, that it will be used as a boulevard or something of the kind. Is the minister in a position to indicate what is planned for the Lachine canal in the near future?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, as my hon. friend knows, the Lachine canal comes under the St. Lawrence seaway authority. On the other hand, I can tell him that as far as I know, there is no question of the Lachine canal being closed and being no longer used by those industries along the canal. As far as I know, there is no question of closing the Lachine canal at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: Is there not a considerable amount of traffic going through the Lachine canal, as was the case in 1960, for instance?

Mr. Balcer: There is considerable traffic into the canal, but it does not go all through the canal. There is a lot of traffic servicing all the industries along the canal, and I think the canal is of great service.

Mr. Chevier: As long as the industries established along the Lachine canal go on at their present rate of activity, I suppose the government will not consider closing such an important canal?

Mr. Balcer: Certainly not, Mr. Chairman.

(Text):

Mr. Peters: From time to time there has been considerable discussion throughout the north with regard to the feasibility of diverting water from the Arctic watershed to the great lakes system. Are any continuing surveys taking place with regard to this matter or are there at the present time under consideration any international or joint United States-Canadian surveys in connection with the diversion of this water?

Mr. Balcer: At the present time our department is making no study or survey.

Item agreed to.

407. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, including payments to provinces or municipalities as contributions towards construction done by those bodies, $1,850,230.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister give a breakdown for this item?

Mr. Balcer: Yes, Mr. Chairman. For 1961-62, the Nova Scotia canals, $32,300; Quebec canals, $362,550; the Rideau canal, $445,250, and the Trent canal, $1,010,130.

Mr. Chevrier: What are the payments, for instance, to municipalities for work done by those bodies? The vote includes:

—payments to provinces or municipalities as contributions towards construction done by those bodies.

What is the meaning of that?

Mr. Balcer: I am informed that this relates to certain work such as a bridge over a canal, where we contribute toward the construction of the bridge by the province instead of building our own bridge.

The Chairman: Shall vote 407 carry?

Item agreed to.

411. Construction or acquisition of ships and equipment, $14,500,000.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, there are two questions I should like to ask the minister in connection with vote No. 411. I notice in this item that two weatherships from the west coast are going to be replaced. One is the Stonetown and the other is the St. Catharines. I believe the St. Catharines which is going to be replaced is the old frigate St. Catharines that rendered very good service during the war.

I am sure the people of St. Catharines would be quite interested to know just what is going to be the final disposition of this ship. During the war the people of St. Catharines raised substantial sums of money each year in order to send special comforts to the sailors on the St. Catharines frigate. I should like to ask the minister whether the ship is going to be scrapped or whether it is going to be sold for other use.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I was very pleased to hear the remarks of my hon. friend. I knew the ship St. Catharines during the war. I served in the same escort group, and I remember that the sailors and officers on that ship were extremely well taken care of by the people of St. Catharines. We were even a little jealous.

I would tell my hon. friend that no decision has been arrived at yet as to what we are going to do with these two ships. Their plates are getting dangerously thin and we are definitely faced with the obligation of replacing them. I imagine they will be turned over to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for disposal, but no decision has yet been arrived at. Most probably, as I say, they will be turned over to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): I should like to say that we have a very active sea cadets organization in St. Catharines, and if the ship is going to be scrapped they would very much like to have the logbook as a souvenir of the frigate St. Catharines of the war years.

I have another question in connection with this item. A substantial number of ships are going to be built by the Department of Transport; I believe there are some 14 altogether. This will run into a sizeable amount of money, which money will be well spent at the present time in the shipbuilding industry. I hope it will be possible to distribute this work across Canada so that all shipyards will get a little bit of it, but I should not like to see the work allocated. I wonder whether the minister could give us any information about this. Are all the ships going to be up for tender, or are some of them going to be allocated?

Mr. Balcer: They will all be built after tenders have been called, but the tenders will not be called for all of them at the same time. I can assure my hon. friend that tenders will be called for all of them.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Will tenders be called for them?

Mr. Balcer: Tenders will be called for them.

The Chairman: Shall vote 411 carry?

Item agreed to.

Railway and steamship services—

414. Newfoundland coastal services—construction or acquisition of passenger-cargo vessels and equipment and harbour facilities, $4,340,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I take it the minister has no additional information to give us about the east coast ferry beyond what he gave before dinner.

I notice the cost is exactly the same this year as it was last year. Could the minister say how many vessels are normally employed on this service at the present time.

Mr. Balcer: Is this vote 415 or 414?

Mr. Pickersgill: Vote 414. In addition to the Carson certain other vessels are used.

Mr. Balcer: I wonder whether my hon. friend would let me take this question as notice.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will be very happy to do so. There is one other question I have in connection with this item. I will be glad if the minister will take them both as notice and answer at his convenience.

It has been the experience, I think, that when the Carson was in regular operation it was able to keep up pretty well with the freight load without very much help from other vessels, but there is always a backlog whenever the Carson is off the run for any length of time. I wonder whether the minister, when he gives the other information, could indicate how well the railway is keeping its freight current, instead of having the backlogs that used to be so serious.

Mr. Balcer: The C.N.R. operate the coastal shipping services for passengers, mail, express and freight. It services 234 ports of call on the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador. At present there are ten railway vessels and four chartered vessels employed on that service.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the whole coastal service; that is not just the service from Port aux Basques?

Mr. Balcer: No, that is the whole C.N.R. service around the coast of Newfoundland. At the present time the flow of traffic is well looked after except during certain periods because of very heavy ice conditions. We will have to provide something more sometime during the next five years.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, could the minister give the committee some information regarding the construction of the new vessels for coastal service? I understood one was to go into service last month but has been delayed, and that there was to be another new one constructed following that.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, the first one is almost ready for service, and will be in service very shortly. In regard to the second vessel, the construction has been awarded to Saint John Drydock Limited with a scheduled delivery date of May, 1961. I have been informed of a slight delay resulting from the strike in the shipyards. Work has resumed now, so delivery will be made in the very near future. As far as the third vessel is concerned, tenders have been called, and tenders will be called very shortly now for the construction of the fourth vessel.

Item agreed to.

415. Construction or acquisition of auto-ferry vessels and equipment as listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended upon individual listed projects $1,545,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I believe this vote is exclusively in respect to the car ferry that is to go into service between Cape Tormentine and Borden. Could the minister inform the committee what date it is expected that this vessel will go into operation?

Mr. Balcer: The delivery date was to be during the autumn of this year but, because of the delay caused by the strike which I mentioned earlier, it has been extended to mid-winter.

Mr. Pickersgill: In that event, there is no assurance that the same terrible conditions will not exist for at least part of next winter that existed up until May of this year. Of course, the minister is not responsible for the ice even though he does have charge of meteorological services, but he will appreciate that the situation was quite deplorable. The minister must also be aware that about the time the ice conditions were the worst, the Abegweit was taken off service and put into drydock for refitting because, it was stated, she would lose her place in the queue. It is obvious that there is not enough shipping capacity to get the people across, and I should like to know whether the minister expects that the new vessels will be put in operation before the causeway is ready.

Mr. Balcer: Yes, a few years before that.

Item agreed to.

Payments to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called the company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport made by the company to the Minister of Finance, to be applied by the company in payment of the deficits, certified by the auditors of the company, arising in the operations in the calendar year 1961—

418. Newfoundland ferry and terminals, $6,585,000.

Mr. Small: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether this is the right item in respect to which I should raise my question, because there is no reference to money beside it. All it says is:

Payments to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called the company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport made by the company to the Minister of Finance, to be applied by the company in payment of the deficits—

There is no reference to an amount beside it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The amounts are listed below.

Mr. Broome: Read down further.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, in respect to vote No. 418, I should like to ask a question following up a question asked previously by an hon. member. I notice there is an increase from $5,410,000 to $6,585,000 in the deficit. Could the minister explain the reason for that increase? How does this deficit work?

Mr. Chevrier: It is red.

Mr. Pickersgill: How does a deficit work?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I may have put the question badly but I should like to know the reason for the increased deficit.

Mr. Pickersgill: The service does not pay.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I can give a brief explanation regarding the increase of $1,175,000 in the deficit for 1961 as compared with 1960. This year there is an increase in maintenance and dock tracks, as well as buildings amounting to $145,500. The cost in regard to the North Sydney-Port aux Basques service is $117,000 and, in regard to the service from North Sydney to other island ports the cost is $28,500. During this year there will be a decrease in the cost of repairs to buildings and equipment on the North Sydney-Port aux Basques service amounting to $70,000. There will be an increase in repairs to floating equipment on the North Sydney to other island port services in the amount of $7,000. The increase in the cost of the operating services in 1961 will total $1,224,500. The increase in the cost of freight handling and switching will amount to $900,000. The increase in wages to crews is $200,000, and the increase in the cost of material and supplies is $35,000. The increase in cost of fuel charges is $50,000; the increase in claims for taxes and various miscellaneous charges is $39,500. There is also an increase in equipment rentals of $18,000, making a total of $1,325,000. That will be reduced by an estimated increase in operating revenues of $150,000. The net increase in operating deficit will be $1,175,000.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the repairs that the minister has referred to have mainly been to docks and other facilities. I should like to know if the ferry, which was referred to a moment ago and the service it provides, is maintained separately from the repair items, or is the whole operation of ferry services and terminal facilities regarded as one main item? I should like to know the relationship between the Canadian National Railways, mentioned as "the company" in this vote, and the facilities which normally would belong to the Department of Transport. Are they maintained separately or combined in one group?

Mr. Chevrier: They are separate in combination.

Mr. Balcer: Our cost is kept separately. The C.N.R. submits these accounts for operating costs, etc., to the Department of Transport for whom it acts as agent.

Mr. Peters: Under this item the minister mentioned terminals at the particular ports. Are they distinguished as Department of Transport terminals? Are they separate from Canadian National facilities? In other words, do the Canadian National Railways use them the same way that other people might use them? Is there a public section in so far as the Department of Transport is concerned with reference to these facilities?

Mr. Balcer: We own all these facilities and the Canadian National operates them. I am told that these installations are for public use. They are used by the C.N.R. which has operated them as our agent.

Mr. Peters: One further question. Is the ferry that is being built for the Department of Transport or is it for the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no ferry being built.

Mr. Balcer: This item deals only with ferry service to Newfoundland. The new ferry that we are building is for Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Carter: What the minister has said has conveyed the impression to my hon. friend that this amount is charged up to the ferry between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. It is my understanding and it has always been so, that this amount covers not only the ferry but all the ships that operate between the mainland and Newfoundland and the coastal services in Newfoundland as well. If I am not right in this I should like the minister to put me straight.

Mr. Balcer: This is for the installations at North Sydney and Port aux Basques and it is used by the ferry service between these two points. This ferry service is run by the C.N.R. These installations can be used by other C.N.R. ships which are doing coastal service along the shores of Newfoundland.

Mr. Carter: That is part of the answer, but the item as it appears here refers to the one ferry, and in the minds of everybody that amount covers the ferry between Newfoundland and the mainland. When you say "ferry" you immediately think of one ship, namely the William Carson; but as I understand it there is more than one ship involved in this, and not only the ferry but the coastal boats as well.

Mr. Balcer: That is right.

Mr. Carter: One other question. Is part of this deficit due to the fact that the ferry is classed as a railway and the rail rates prevail on it as distinct from what we would call freight rates on ships, so that the ferry does not earn the revenue that she would earn if she were not part of the railway?

Mr. Balcer: They have included a through railway charge even on that part of the trip that is covered by the ferry. If the rates were water rates the revenue would be lower and the operating deficit would be greater.

Mr. Carter: That is what I thought. One other question. I do not expect the minister to have the information available now, but, since he is getting some information for my colleague from Bonavista-Twillingate I wonder whether, without too much difficulty, it would be possible to get some comparative figures for last year and the year before of the tonnage carried by this ferry, including passengers, cars and freight.

Mr. Balcer: I can give these figures right now between North Sydney and Port aux Basques. I can give a comparison between 1959 and 1960. The number of crossings in 1959 was 1,126; in 1960, 1,250. Tons of revenue freight carried in 1959 amounted to 246,353; in 1960, 255,535. The number of passengers carried in 1959 was 58,435; in 1960, 67,527. The number of automobiles carried in 1959 was 11,642; in 1960, 15,427; trucks, in 1959, 2,026; in 1960, 2,773; cattle, in 1959, 5,276; in 1960, 4,394; carloadings at terminals, in 1959, 16,144; in 1960, 16,140. There is an increase everywhere except in carloadings at terminals, which are down by only four cars; and in cattle, which are down by almost 900.

Mr. Carter: I thank the minister very much.

Item agreed to.

585. Bell Island-Portugal Cove, Newfoundland ferry service, repairs and improvements to terminal facilities owned by Newfoundland, $97,400.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say precisely what is being done with the terminal facilities there?

Mr. Balcer: Yes. The Department of Public Works have terminal facilities which are being operated there. These are temporary improvements at Portugal Cove on which have been spent $44,375, and on the ferry at Bell Island, $42,300.

Mr. Pickersgill: At Bell Island?

Mr. Balcer: Yes; that is an expenditure of about $87,000.

Item agreed to.

421. Yarmouth, Nova Scotia-Bar Harbor, Maine, U.S.A., ferry service—deficit, 1961, $339,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say whether any consideration is being given to getting another vessel for this service?

Mr. Balcer: Not at the present time. We have made a traffic study and we will review the matter in a couple of years.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is familiar no doubt with the efforts that have been made by the mayor of Yarmouth to persuade the department to acquire a vessel that used to ply somewhere in the Caribbean. I think I asked a question about that on the order paper. I have not turned it up recently, but could the minister say whether this matter was seriously considered at all?

Mr. Balcer: I am told that a year ago the department was approached by the province on the whole question of the service from the south of Nova Scotia to New England. That is what led to the study being made as a result of which we decided that for the time being we will leave things as they are and will review the situation in a couple of years.

Item agreed to.

423. Railway to Great Slave lake—location survey, $550,000.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, this item is for the location survey with respect to a railway to Great Slave lake and the amount is $550,000. I should like to bring one or two matters to the attention of the minister. The minister will remember that in the speech from the throne in 1957, I believe, an announcement was made that a railway to Great Slave lake would be built. We are now in 1961 and there is still no indication that this is going to be done. In the following year again in the speech from the throne there was another announcement respecting the appointment of a royal commission to select the route which would be followed in the construction of the railway, whether it would be via Waterways or via the western route from Dawson Creek and Hines Creek up to Great Slave lake.

After more than three years we now have this vote of $550,000 in the estimates for a location survey and in the supplementary estimates there is another item of $193,908 or an approximate total of $750,000. I think the minister owes it to the committee to give some indication of what is intended under this survey. Who is going to make the survey? Is it going to be done by the owners of Northern Alberta Railways? Is it going to be done by some other body or group who will report to the Department of Transport? How will it be done? Again, will some of this work be given by contract and when does the government intend to begin construction of the railway? Surely parliament is entitled to know whether there is going to be any action because this appears to have been nothing but bait for election purposes since 1957. There has been no real action with reference to the construction of the railway. The minister can shake his head if he wishes. Perhaps he does not like the expression, but there is no doubt that those who live in the area must be tremendously disappointed at the fact that after four years we are only now talking about a location survey.

The first year the matter was mentioned in the speech from the throne we were going to have a railway. Later it became clear that the government had announced the construction of the railway without ascertaining the wishes of the people in the area and that there was some difference of opinion as to which route the line should follow, the eastern or the western route, and a royal commission was established for the purpose of determining that matter. Now that the royal commission has reported we have this location survey. I think the committee is entitled to know the answers to these questions I have put.

Mr. Herridge: Just before the minister speaks, may I say that I had intended to raise questions very similar to those put by the hon. member for Laurier because some of my constituents are particularly interested in the construction of this railway. I hope the minister can answer the questions asked by the hon. member for Laurier and can give us a fairly complete explanation of the situation at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: You will not protest even though it interests your constituents.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, as usual the government is going to carry out its undertaking. We said in the speech from the throne that the railway was going to be built and it is going to be built.

Mr. Chevrier: When?

Mr. Balcer: Perhaps my hon. friend will be patient for a minute. First of all, the hon. member has asked who is doing the survey. The survey is being done by the C.N.R. and it is under way at the present time. It is a little ahead of schedule and it should be completed by next winter.

Mr. Herridge: Next Wednesday?

Mr. Balcer: Next winter.

Mr. Chevrier: Next summer on the ice.

Mr. Balcer: The hon. member for Laurier will probably be disappointed, but I should like to take this opportunity to tell hon. members that at this session there will definitely be a bill for the construction of this railway. At the present time we are carrying on discussions with the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company. The talks between the mining company, the department and the railway are proceeding very well, and I am very pleased to say that before too long I will bring before the house proper legislation for the construction of the railway.

Mr. Chevrier: May I tell the minister I am not at all disappointed by what he has just stated. What I am disappointed about is that it has taken four years to implement the announcement in the speech from the throne in 1957 that the railway was going to be built.

Mr. Balcer: It is a major railway.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to express my incredulity at one statement made by the minister. The minister said that there was definitely going to be a bill this session for the building of this railway. I do not recollect it being included in the list of bills that was given to us at the time the Prime Minister asked us to sit these outrageous hours we have been sitting.

Mr. Lambert: Did you read the speech from the throne?

Mr. Pickersgill: Does this mean that still another bill is being added to the list for this session even though the survey will not be completed until this winter?

Mr. Lambert: Did you read the speech from the throne?

Mr. Pickersgill: I read the speech from the throne but it has very little relation to what has happened this session.

Item agreed to.

427. Railway employees' provident fund—to supplement pension allowances under the intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum allowance payable in the calendar year 1961 $30 per month instead of $20 per month as fixed by the said act, $8,200.

Mr. Creaghan: I should like to take a few moments of the time of the committee to discuss this item. On the face of it, it appears to be an item for $8,200. However, in reality, to the citizens involved, it represents an item more like $6.2 million. Now, one does not have to be an accountant or belong to the Glassco royal commission to understand that statement.

In the first place, this vote makes provision for an increase from $20 to $30 per month in the amount paid by the government to retired railway workers in the maritime provinces and throughout Canada. At the present time there are approximately 4,000 people relying entirely for their income upon these cheques issued by the provident fund. These people live in the maritimes predominantly, but some of them are located in various parts of the country as a result of being transferred while employed by the government railway. The figure I mentioned of $6.2 million is an accurate figure according to reports I have received.

The provident fund is maintained at the present time by deductions at source from all concerned of 1.5 per cent of the salary of approximately 2,000 men employed by the Canadian National Railways. The fund also receives a grant, by statute, of $100,000 from the Canadian National, together with the deficit required which the Canadian National must pay to maintain this fund. Last year the deficit of the provident fund exceeded $6 million. I understand that since 1922, when the Canadian National took over the administration of this fund, the total deficit met by the Canadian National has exceeded $75 million.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, it seems obvious that if the Canadian National, because of its inheritance, has paid the provident fund $75 million since 1922, then it is fair to state that the Canadian National has contributed its share. However, I question whether the government of Canada has contributed its fair share to these railway workers. In 1940, there were 10,000 people in receipt of benefits from this fund or still contributing to the fund. The last figures I have, for 1959 indicated that this figure is now less than 6,000, made up of approximately 2,000 contributors and 4,000 pensioners.

I believe that the time has come for the government to take another look at this matter. Financially, it does not make very much difference, as long as the Canadian National takes care of the deficit because, although it appears that the government of Canada contributes only $8,200, when the government picks up the Canadian National deficit, it means in actual fact that the government is paying $6 million or $7 million annually. As I said a moment ago, I think the time has come for the government to take a very close look at the Intercolonial Railway provident fund. At the present time the people administering the fund are located in Moncton, New Brunswick, and they are entirely Canadian National employees. I suggest that the minister should consider the possibility of transferring the administration of the provident fund under his jurisdiction. Notwithstanding the fact that these employees worked for Canadian National, the pension cheques they receive have "Department of Transport" printed on them, and they are government of Canada cheques. If the government is carrying the load, then the government may as well get the credit for the full amount it pays rather than for the amount of this item.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I suggest also that the statutory increase in the pension payment from $20 to $30 is not sufficient. The amount of $30 was authorized many years ago, and today it is away out of line. There are very few people involved who are in receipt of this minimum pension. All of them gave many, many years of service at a time when railway wages were very low.

The act incorporating the fund was passed in this house in 1907, and it defined employees as employees of Her Majesty. The people for whom I have been speaking, many of whom I represent, are very disappointed over the fact that, notwithstanding an act of parliament which says they are employees of Her Majesty, they were not included in the assistance rendered by the Minister of Finance in 1958 when this house authorized increases in the pensions of retired members of the armed forces, the R.C.M.P. and the civil service. These people feel that they were employees of Her Majesty, and not employees necessarily of the Canadian National.

I hope that after the minister's estimates have been concluded he will give serious thought to my remarks tonight. Perhaps when the railway committee meets sometime later this month, he will be prepared to make a statement on this important subject.

Air services—
Administration branch—
429. Air services administration, $1,852,117.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: I should like to put a few questions to the minister concerning the international air terminal in Montreal in relation to the holders of franchises who have successfully tendered for the lease of the restaurant. I should like the minister to explain the delay of the province of Quebec in granting a beverage licence, a delay which I think was harmful to the reputation of the province of Quebec and of Canada.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I must say I have never really understood the exact reason of that delay. I know there have been certain changes in the management, but it is all hearsay. I do not know just what happened, but the matter was settled overnight, and after a delay of at least three or four months, a licence was granted to the Montreal air terminal.

I do not yet know the reason for the delay.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister should have made no comment rather than say that he believes on the basis of hearsay that there was a delay of four months. I would remind him that when I was on the other side of the house, we tried for years to get a licence from the province of Quebec under the former government, but to no avail. Let me tell you why. The Department of Transport had set aside a location for a beverage room in the old terminal, and for years we made representations to the Duplessis government but never got a licence, because the province of Quebec insisted that the tenant be selected by itself exclusively. That is why we tried for years but to no avail.

I am surprised, to say the least, that the hon. member should ask such a question after barely three months, when things dragged on for years under the former Duplessis administration.

So let the hon. member and his minister not get excited about this. I know what happened at the time.

(Text):

However, I did not rise to discuss that matter. I rose to discuss another matter which was brought up in this house the other evening, namely, a contract that had been given by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to Autair Helicopter Services. It concerns this department and it falls under the heading of "Air Services" because the minister is responsible for air services, is responsible for the air transport board and is responsible for the operation of the Aeronautics Act. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, rising in his place the other evening, told us that the policy followed by his department was the same that had been followed by the former administration. He put on the record a letter which I had written to my former colleague, the Hon. Mr. Prudham, then minister of mines and technical surveys. But the minister never brought to the attention of the house first the statement made by the former minister of transport, namely the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he said in this chamber that he was going to decontrol the policy having to do with air services and he did decontrol it. When we asked him questions in the house why he decontrolled it he said he decontrolled it for the purpose of allowing competition, that it is the policy of the present government to allow competition in this field. If that is the case, why was competition not allowed in the case of the contract (1) for the polar continental shelf project and (2) for the topographical survey in the Arctic regions of Canada?

Then again, the minister referred to the policy which was followed by the previous administration. It is true that I wrote the letter which was put on Hansard to my former colleague, namely the Hon. Mr. Prudham. But the policy on more than one occasion was that, when tariffs were filed, the work was divided among various contractors. Here we have a contract that has been advertised. Tariffs have been filed. However, after the tariffs had been filed, approaches are made by an officer of the department to a certain helicopter company with the object of awarding a contract, when Autair filed a lower tariff with the air transport board and got the contract. I suppose I shall be asked this question: Why do you not prove that and establish it? I have tried to establish it by the questions I have put on the order paper. Some of the statements which I have made and which I am about to make I can establish from the record. Others I cannot establish from the record. However, the Air Industries and Transport Association have been able to establish it. At their convention which took place in Victoria recently they passed a number of resolutions. I should like to quote from the Financial Post of June 3, in connection with this matter. The article is entitled, "Sealed Tender System Urged by Air Transport Companies" and it reads as follows:

> The Canadian aviation industry has asked the government to call for sealed tenders on future air transport contracts.
> They should be opened in the presence of other bidders, the airmen argue.
>
> This was one of the resolutions passed at recent meeting in Victoria of the Air Industries and Transport Association.
>
> The airmen were actually complaining about Autair Helicopter Services, the controversial Montreal-based company which has been in and out of the political headlines since its formation.
> It was claimed that last year Autair was granted a contract to supply helicopter services in the Arctic after it had been given a second chance to bid.

That statement does not come from me. I did make a similar statement in the house some time ago. The minister said it was not true. Here the Air Industries and Transport Association are taking this matter up and saying the same thing. Why are they doing that? They are doing it because they know full well that the company was allowed to submit another tariff after another company had entered into negotiations with the department. Then the article goes on to say this:

> The association has also asked Ottawa not to give contracts to operators who have to lease special equipment from the U.S. if a Canadian operator already has such equipment on hand.
> Autair was again the target, as it leased a large helicopter from the U.S. to handle part of the Arctic contract.

Again I put on the order paper questions having to do with this matter and very little information has been obtained from the minister. Here is the resolution which was passed by the Air Industries and Transport Association. I shall just read the governing clause which is as follows:

> Now, therefore be it resolved, that all government contracts for air transport be requested on a sealed tender basis with a definite closing date and time and that such tenders be opened in the presence of any bidders desiring to attend and also a representative from the air transport board to advise on interpretation of licensing and tariffs.

This is the company which received from the government last year $183,500 for a contract which it had from the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys for the continental shelf project and for topographical work. This was for work done in 1960. The amount of the contract was $183,500. I presume that by now the company has been paid this amount. This amount was paid notwithstanding the charge that was made in the House of Commons that they were not the lowest tenderer.

From the evidence that was adduced at that time it was clearly indicated that again they had been given a second chance to tender. This is the company that also operated in the province of Quebec under the old regime of the late Mr. Duplessis without a licence from the air transport board under the Aeronautics Act. There is no doubt—and I put this on record previously—that when Autair Helicopter Services applied to the air transport board for a licence it was turned down; the air transport board declined the application. However, on appeal being made to the minister, the minister allowed the appeal.

This contract has been given to a company which, notwithstanding all sorts of protestations, has had its insurance cancelled twice and has had no less than eight accidents; indeed it has had more than that number. I should like to put on record, Mr. Chairman, and I now ask permission to table the record of accidents of Autair Helicopter Services on the continental polar shelf contract. They had eight accidents during the years 1959 and 1960. This information is obtained from sessional paper No. 211B tabled in this house on May 16, 1961. I should like permission to table this list of accidents.

The Chairman: I am not too sure as to the intention of the hon. member. He has mentioned that he wanted to table the document.

Mr. Chevrier: What I mean is that I want to have it printed in Hansard.

The Chairman: Does the committee agree that this document be printed in Hansard at this point in the remarks of the hon. member?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Balcer: I have no objection. However, Mr. Chairman, I should like to remind you that this document has already been tabled in the house. It is an answer to a question.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): It is already tabled.

Mr. Chevrier: No; it has not been tabled in the house. It has been made an order for return and therefore it is not on Hansard. I think I am entitled to make a copy of the order for return and to put it on Hansard in order to indicate the number of accidents this company has had in the last two years.

The Chairman: As I understand the question of the hon. member, he wants this to be made part of his speech instead of reading it. I think that is the request the hon. member is making.

Mr. Churchill: I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we want to be careful about the precedents that we establish. I understand this is a document which is already in the possession of the House of Commons. The hon. member wishes it to be recorded in Hansard without reading it. It seems to me that if we adopted this as a practice we would have Hansard filled up with quite a number of documents already in the hands of hon. members. Would it not be better if the hon. member drew our attention to the source of the information and simply summarized the accidents about which he has this information?

Mr. Chevrier: No, Mr. Chairman; I intend to put it on Hansard myself if I am not saved the time of doing so by being allowed to table this statement. I think it will save the time of the committee if the statement were entered in Hansard. If not I shall proceed to put it in Hansard seriatim.

The Chairman: If there is not unanimous consent, the hon. member realizes he will have to read it. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Churchill: No, Mr. Chairman; I think the document should be read.

Mr. Chevrier: Then in connection with starred questions which I have put on the order paper and to which answers were given not in Hansard, but by an order for return, I should now like to put on Hansard the record of accidents of Autair Helicopter Services Limited on the continental polar shelf contract:

(a) CF-KMV—Bell 47G2—ten miles from lake la Bouille, P.Q., on 25th February, 1959—the right ski sank in the snow on landing and the aircraft rolled over. Substantial damage.

(b) CF-KMX—Bell 47G2—lake Gaillard, P.Q., on 7th March, 1959—while attempting take-off, the helicopter nosed over and crashed. Substantial damage.

(c) CF-KMW—Alouette II—Labrieville south, Bersimus 2, P.Q., on 13th May, 1959—on take-off, uncontrollable vibration attributed to ground resonance was set up and the aircraft crashed. Complete write-off.

(d) CF-KMN—Bell 47G—northern Quebec on 10th July, 1959—the helicopter experienced a sudden loss of lift and crashed to the ground. Substantial damage.

(e) CF-KMX—Bell 47G2—Veza lake, P.Q., on 15th January, 1960—while transporting an engine in a net slung beneath the helicopter, the net snagged in fallen trees during an approach to land. The aircraft tipped forward and crashed. Substantial damage.

(f) CF-LME—Bell 47G2—Greening station, P.Q., on 10th March, 1960—the helicopter was parked close to the railway track and the rotor was struck by a passing train. Substantial damage.

(g) CF-IKS—Bell 47G2—near Richmond gulf, P.Q., on 9th April, 1960—the helicopter experienced control difficulties during flight where the seizure of the lateral damper on the manual controls resulted in jamming of the cyclic stick which prevented the pilot from controlling the aircraft, which was forced landed. Substantial damage.

(h) CF-IKR—Bell 47G2—de Gue river, P.Q., on 13th August, 1960—while attempting to land the float equipped aircraft on a small sloping shelf of rock the aircraft toppled into the water. Substantial damage.

Then there is this note:

All involved partial write-off since major components were destroyed.

This is the record of the company to which the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys gave a contract for important helicopter services on the continental polar shelf. I asked what were the accidents in 1961 and I was told there were none. I have it from a reliable source that Bell 47G2A helicopter had an accident in 1961; tail boom extension smashed—

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, it is all very well for the hon. member to talk about a very reliable source when reading a document. If he is going to read a document he should tell the committee what the document is, and if he wants to talk about a very reliable source he should not be afraid to name that source.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not speaking from a document; I have notes and I am making the statement in this committee that I was not given the information I should have been given in answer to this question. I have it on reliable information that there was an accident in 1961.

Mr. Balcer: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, what the hon. member for Laurier is stating in fact is that my department has not given a true answer to one of his questions. He is trying to prove that by saying to the committee, "I know from a very reliable source that the information given by the department was not true; it was not according to the facts." I think in all fairness, and according to the rules of the house, if the hon. member is going to make such a statement the least he could do is name that very reliable source.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know of any rule of the house whereby I am required to name the source.

Mr. Balcer: Then, Mr. Chairman, I suggest—

Mr. Chevrier: Just let me finish. The minister will have an opportunity to reply, and I hope he will give an explanation why it is that this accident of which I am about to give the details was not reported when I asked for the information.

Mr. Balcer: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister going to allow me—

Mr. Balcer: —if the hon. member is speaking to the point of order I am ready to listen to him, but if he is going to carry on from there without speaking to the point of order, I think I have the right to continue.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the point of order on which the minister rose?

Mr. Balcer: The point of order is that if an hon. member puts a question on the order paper or asks it on orders of the day and a minister files an answer, the hon. member has to accept that answer. What the hon. member for Laurier is now saying is, "Well, I have asked a question: were there any accidents reported to the department in 1961?", and he tells the committee that the department said there were no accidents. Then the hon. member says, "I have a very reliable source that says that the information given by the department is not according to the facts; it is not true". I think that is a serious accusation the hon. member is making, and the least he could do is tell the committee what his very reliable source is.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I am not making an accusation against—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: Just a moment. I am not making an accusation against the officers of the Department of Transport. I am making the statement that in 1961 there was an accident experienced by Autair Helicopter Services Limited, and in the information I have, that accident was not reported. Because of that I say that the officers of this department should now take the necessary steps to inquire whether or not it is a fact that Bell 47G2A helicopter had a tail boom extension smashed after being struck by its own main rotor blades, because of the lack of the pilot's experience, on the continental polar shelf project after the contract started, in 1961. That is what I am asking the minister to inquire into, and I am not accusing—

Mr. Balcer: Would the hon. member give the date of this accident?

Mr. Chevrier: I will have to give it to the minister later, just as the minister has not always at his finger tips all the information we request. But that is the point I am bringing to the attention of the minister. I think the minister should inquire whether or not that is the case, and if it is not the case and if I am wrong, I will rise in this house and apologize to the house for the statement which I have made.

I now move on to another part of the information that was given in connection with this matter. Incidentally, Mr. Chairman, I advised the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys long before I rose to discuss this matter that I intended to deal with it this evening. I spoke to him personally in the corridor, and I sent a message to his office.

It seems to me that part of this is not the responsibility of the Minister of Transport, but a great part of it is. That part which has to do with the air transport board falls under his jurisdiction, while that part which has to do with the giving of the contract is not his responsibility. I suggest that is why it is difficult to deal with a matter of this kind, two departments being involved. As the minister knows, in this case there are two departments involved.

It is well known that this firm is one which was very close to the late Premier Duplessis, and is equally close to the present federal government. Because of the statement which I have made I do not think the contract should have been given to that company under the circumstances it was given, by the filing of tariffs without the submission of tenders. I asked last year that this matter be investigated, but nothing was done. I have asked the minister again this year to make sure, before the contract was started upon, that the equipment which the minister listed to have been in possession of the contractor, was in his possession before he started to do the work on the continental polar shelf. From what was reported at the air industry transport association it appears that all the equipment which was required was not in the possession of that contractor and, in fact, that some of the equipment had to be obtained in the United States. That is why the resolution was passed at the air industry transport association protesting against allowing the equipment to be brought in from the United States under those circumstances. That resolution reads as follows:

> Therefore be it resolved that the air transport board and the Department of Transport and the Department of National Revenue refuse to permit foreign-owned equipment to be imported under any lease or other short term device unless such suitable fixed or rotary wing aircraft cannot be procured from another Canadian operator at lease or charter rates and conditions considered fair and equitable by the air transport boar.
> Be it further resolved, that in the allocation of government contracts priority be given to those operators equipped and qualified to perform the contract on which the tender is being submitted.

Mr. Chairman, I protest again the manner in which this operator was given the contract; that is, by the filing of tariffs on a second occasion.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Winch: If my memory serves me correctly this is the fifth time the hon. member for Laurier has raised this matter in one form or another. I am becoming a little confused. I should like to ask the hon. member for Laurier whether he is implying or alleging that in some way or another there exists mismanagement, there is patronage, there is collusion and there is inefficiency. Just exactly what is it that the hon. member is trying to prove?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I suppose it does not matter very much how often I have raised this matter. I believe I am entitled to raise it a thousand times if I should want to. However, it is not the fifth time I have raised it but the third time.

I am complaining about the manner in which the contract was awarded. I am complaining about the fact that this company was refused a licence in the first instance by the air transport board. I am complaining about the fact that this company had its insurance cancelled twice, and I am complaining about the fact that it has had eight accidents of a serious nature, and that under the circumstances it should not have been entrusted with a contract of this kind in respect to the continental polar shelf.

Mr. Creaghan: May I ask the hon. member a question? In regard to the accidents which he has stated have taken place, could he explain to this committee where there has been any loss of life or any cost to the taxpayers?

Mr. Chevrier: There has been no loss of life but the accidents have entailed substantial damage in each case.

Mr. Creaghan: To whom?

Mr. Chevrier: To the aircraft; the helicopter.

An hon. Member: What are you worried about?

Mr. Chevrier: I did not hear the question.

An hon. Member: Are you worried about the company?

Mr. Chevrier: I am worried about the fact that accidents of this kind are taking place up in the Arctic. I am worried about them because, if something is not done, one of these days someone will get killed and it will be too late.

The Chairman: Shall vote 429 carry?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in this problem because I have listened to the hon. member's statement regarding it on a number of occasions. He has convinced me that there is something wrong involved, and I am surprised that he should let the subject drop each time he makes his complaints. The situation reminds me of one in which two individuals continually insult each other until they reach the stage of blows, at which time one sits down. I feel if what the hon. member for Laurier has said can be established by fact there is something seriously wrong with the licensing procedure of the department. I feel the charges which have been made by that hon. member are serious and, if untrue, should be answered by the minister. If the situation to which the hon. member has referred does exist, the minister should inform this committee what his department intends to do to correct that situation. I think the charges have been made with some justification because I have checked to the extent of meeting one of the officials of the company and have been informed that another tender was made. I suggest this is not a game that we are playing, and that at least some of the charges are accurate. Because of that, I feel the minister is obliged to inform this committee what is being done to terminate this problem. As the hon. member for Laurier pointed out, this awarding of the contract happened on two occasions under similar circumstances.

In view of the complexity of this problem, I am sure the minister wishes to reply, and I should, therefore, like to call it ten o'clock.

An hon. Member: You mean 10.30.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire what the business will be tomorrow and Saturday?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will commence with the estimates of the Department of Justice. I should remind the house that we have already devoted three days to considering the estimates of that department. Following that we will deal with the estimates of the Department of Fisheries and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. On the completion of those estimates we will then carry on with the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Our objective this week is the completion of our consideration of the estimates of the Department of Transport, the Department of Justice, the Department of Fisheries and the Department of Forestry.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister give any indication as to the business for Monday?

Mr. Churchill: Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

At 10.30 o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

Supply—Items Passed

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

A—Department—

402. Departmental administration, $3,395,700.

Marine services—

422. Maritime Freight Rates Act—payment to the railway companies operating in the select territory designated by the act, of the difference occurring on account of the application of the act, between the tariff tolls and normal tolls under approved tariffs (estimated and certified to the Minister of Transport by the Canadian National Railway Company and approved by auditors of the said company respecting the eastern lines of the Canadian National Railways and in the case of the other railways by the board of transport commissioners for Canada) on all traffic moved during the calendar year 1961, $14,750,000.

423. Railway to Great Slave lake—location survey, $550,000.

424. Repairs and expenses in connection with the operation and maintenance of official railway cars under the jurisdiction of the department, $62,200.

425. Degaussing Canadian government ships and Canadian-owned merchant ships, of 1,000 gross tons and over, of Canadian registry, or of United Kingdom registry if subject to re-transfer to Canadian registry under special inter-governmental arrangement, $190,000.

Pensions and other benefits—

426. Amount required to pay pensions at the rate of $300 per annum to former pilots: Raoul Lachance; Jules Lamarre; Wilhelm Langlois; Auguste Santerre, $1,200.

427. Railway employees' provident fund—to supplement pension allowances under the intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act so as to make the minimum allowance payable in the calendar year 1961 $30 per month instead of $20 per month as fixed by the said act, $8,200.

428. Supplemental pension allowances to former employees of Newfoundland railways, steamships and telecommunications services transferred to Canadian National Railways, $105,000.

A—Department—

583. Departmental administration—further amount required, $47,585.

Marine services—

Marine regulations including pilotage and marine reporting services—

584. Administration, operation and maintenance—to extend the purposes of vote 412 of the main estimates for 1961-62 to include the grants detailed in these estimates, $2,488.

Railway and steamship services—

585. Bell Island-Portugal Cove, Newfoundland ferry service—repairs and improvements to terminal facilities owned by Newfoundland, $97,400.

586. Railway to Great Slave lake—location survey—further amount required, $193,908.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 9, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that the Clerk of the house has received from the chief electoral officer the certificate of the election and return of John R. Matheson, Esquire, for the electoral district of Leeds.

TRADE

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET—MISSION TO DISCUSS ENTRY BY U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government been advised of the date of arrival of the commonwealth mission which is coming to Canada to prepare for Britain's entry into the common market, and is the government in a position to state what is Canada's attitude?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has asked me a question identical to that of which the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot has given notice.

The government is aware that the United Kingdom government is considering how best to arrange for effective consultation with other commonwealth governments on the subject of the European common market and the United Kingdom joining that market. I might say that I have made it clear to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, and he has agreed, that there should be consultation before any move in that direction is taken by the government of the United Kingdom.

There has been continuing consultation at the level of officials. The most recent discussion in this series took place in London two weeks ago during the meeting of senior economic advisers of the commonwealth countries. As to consultation on a ministerial level between the United Kingdom and Canada, to which the hon. gentleman made reference, nothing definite has yet been arranged.

I might say in that connection that while consultation on a bilateral basis would be helpful in order to take account of the special interests of individual countries, I believe that instead of limiting consultation to separate meetings among interested commonwealth countries, the best means would be collective consultation among all interested commonwealth countries. I envisage bilateral consultation, official and ministerial, but because of the potential consequences of United Kingdom membership in the common market, I believe that the fullest consideration should be given to collective ministerial discussion and also, if necessary, to a meeting of the prime ministers.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister made such a direct suggestion to the United Kingdom prime minister for collective consultation among the commonwealth countries?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of course, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman does not expect an answer to that question. The content of discussions that take place as between commonwealth prime ministers has not in the past been the subject of revelation in the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I could ask this additional supplementary question in view of the courteous but evasive answer of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was not my intention to be evasive.

Mr. Chevrier: Is Canada itself considering becoming associated with the common market?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the content of that question has been the subject of supplementary questions for the last several days. I believe the Minister of Finance has dealt with that question on more than one occasion.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could also ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Does the Prime Minister feel it is wrong to disclose a direct suggestion to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, but at the same time right to make such a suggestion indirectly by a public statement in this house?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, even though the hon. gentleman has had a close relationship with those who have occupied the position I now hold, I do not intend through a question on orders of the day to take advice from the hon. gentleman as to the course to be followed.

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce perhaps I might ask this question of the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister inform the house when talks will take place between Canada and the United Kingdom with regard to the uranium contract? These talks were to take place on June 12.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the talks will commence next week.

REPORTED EXCHANGE OF LEAD FOR SURPLUS U.S. GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of a news report that the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada has undertaken to exchange Canadian lead for 10 million bushels of surplus United States grain. I wonder if the minister would have any comment to make on this report; whether he is aware that this has happened, and whether he thinks it will have any effect on Canada's own grain marketing policy.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): As the hon. member probably knows there is in public law 480 of the United States a section which allows companies to exchange by barter certain products against commodities which are surplus in the United States. After representations by the Canadian government some four years ago, the government of the United States has been slowing down operations of this type; I understand that now they have come to an almost complete standstill. Renewed representations have been made since the change of administration in the United States, and we have been assured that there will be a decided slowdown in any form of barter, almost the elimination of this practice.

I am not aware of the present arrangement suggested by the question of the hon. member, but I will look into it.

Mr. Argue: Will the minister report back to the house?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, I will take the question as notice.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN DELIVERY QUOTAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister prepared to tell the house what progress is being made by the Canadian wheat board in providing increased quotas for western grain?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I reported to the house several days ago that we have made fairly good progress. We had a splendid series of days between May 8 and May 11. I have the figures for June 8. The house will recall that the last time I reported the big effort was to get all the points from 2 bushels into 3 bushels. I am now able to report that in Manitoba, where on May 29, a little over a week ago, we had 121 points on 3 bushels, now there are none. In Saskatchewan a little over a week ago, on May 29, we had 190 points on 3 bushels and now there are 4, so that all through the west at the present time there are only 4 points on 3 bushels. The number of points on 4 bushels is now 762, the number on 5 bushels is 589, and the number on 6 bushels is 639.

I can say at this time that the situation in relation to Alberta is much better than it was last year, but in Manitoba and Saskatchewan it is still not as good as it was last year. However, tremendous efforts are being made by the grain handling companies on the prairies, the railways and the terminals, and they have now produced a situation where some 1,600 cars a day—and that is not far off 3 million bushels a day—are moving into the terminals. The eastern farmers have built up a demand for oats, so we gave a supplementary quota of 5 bushels per acre in order to try to get this supply into the elevators to make sure eastern farmers were supplied. This of course means that less wheat will be moved, to the extent of oats delivered. I should like to point out in conclusion that this year the producer marketings of grain is much higher than it has been for a long time at this time of year.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question. I wonder whether the minister could tell the house this, since the end of the crop year is just some seven or eight weeks away. Does he still confidently expect that quotas and marketing opportunities will reach 7 bushels an acre?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I gave an answer to this question three or four days ago, to the effect that the advisory committee of the Canadian wheat board had unanimously recommended that the first job of the Canadian wheat board was to sell grain. That means that if we get a market for oats in eastern Canada or for any other type of cash crop, this would get preference and be moved out. However, I still think it is physically possible in most cases to reach the 7 bushels. If there is some place that does not meet it, it is because we have given higher priority to the total number of bushels of all grain that the western farmer is allowed to sell.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question inasmuch as it similarly involves cash flowing into the hands of the western farmers at this time. In reply to a question that I asked yesterday the minister indicated that the close-out of the 1959-60 wheat pool would be about a month later than last year. I wonder whether he could indicate to the house the reason for the delay this year. I believe the close-out was May 20 last year, and that the minister said yesterday it would be nearer to June 20 this year.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am not just certain of the exact date of the close-out of the pool last year. However, I suggest to the hon. member that I have kept members of the wheat board fairly busy getting around the world selling wheat this year, and it has had some results.

Mr. Benidickson: The farmers need a little bit of cash, too.

FLOODS

CRESTON, B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO EFFECT OF COLUMBIA RIVER DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. L. McFarlane (Kootenay East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the very serious situation, which became more serious last night, faced by Creston and other Kootenay communities arising out of the present flood conditions on the Kootenay river, can the Minister of Justice advise the house whether implementation of the Columbia river treaty will provide any measure of flood control on the lower Kootenay river?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes, and this is one of the reasons we are so anxious to see the Columbia river treaty go ahead.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister inform the house whether General McNaughton's proposal for the Columbia development would not also provide the same flood control?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure exactly what the hon. member means by that very general reference. General McNaughton was associated with us in an advisory capacity throughout the negotiations.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—REPORTED DANGER OF COLLAPSE OF GENEVA CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wonder whether the minister has a further statement to make to the house on this morning's news report that the 14-nation cease fire conference on Laos is very near collapse.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that is not an accurate statement of the situation. As I understand it, the conference is not meeting today. An attempt is being made, of course, to reach agreement concerning the recent military action in Laos. Two of the princes from Laos are expected in Geneva. Whether that will lead to any constructive result I am not in a position to say. The conference is in difficulties, but it is too soon to say that it is near collapse. We are very hopeful that it will carry on.

Mr. Cardin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has it been decided when the conference will resume? I understand it was called off for a few days. Has there been any date set for the resumption of the conference?

Mr. Green: The sittings are determined by the two co-chairmen. Yesterday there was no agreement on sitting. The head of the British delegation, Mr. Malcolm MacDonald, issued a press release explaining why he was not agreeing to a sitting being held yesterday. These decisions are made from day to day.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL AND TORONTO—REPORTED CENTRALIZATION OF OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Revenue or to his parliamentary secretary.

Is the minister aware of a statement made by Mr. Robert L. Dunsmore to the effect that the C.B.C. should gradually proceed to carry out its centralization plans with regard to its offices and studios in Montreal and Toronto?

If, so, could the minister tell us whether the C.B.C. has come to a final decision as to the site of its offices and studios in Montreal between Amherst, Dorchester, Papineau and Craig streets?

If there is no one to reply in their place, could a minister take this question as notice?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice.

PUBLICATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the Prime Minister how soon the government expects to take the house and the country into its confidence with respect to the recommendations of the O'Leary commission.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will do that just now by saying to the hon. gentleman, in due course. As soon as we are in a position to do that, it will be done.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

POORMAN RESERVE, SASK.—STATEMENT ON ROAD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) asked a question supplementary to starred question No. 389. He wished to know if there was a road across the Poorman Indian reserve which is used by the public, and whether it is competent for the band to close the road against the public should it so desire.

In reply to the first part of the question I wish to say that there is a road across the reserve which is used mainly by the Indians, although members of the public on occasion use the road, particularly those visiting the reserve on legitimate business.

The question as to whether the band is competent to close the road against public use is a matter which involves a legal opinion, and I am therefore not in a position to reply.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE AGAINST REDUCTION OR LOSS OF BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Pitman (Peterborough): In view of the serious depletion of the unemployment insurance fund, can the Minister of Labour assure this house there is no danger that benefits will be either cut off or lowered? Will the minister also give us an assurance that some form of legislation can be expected soon to deal with the situation?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I have nothing to add to what I said in answer to a question by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate the other day.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Can the minister give us an assurance that there will be an amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act brought before parliament at this session?

Mr. Starr: When the government has evolved a policy with respect to this matter it will be announced in the usual manner.

Mr. Chevrier: When will that be?

Mr. Starr: When it is decided.

Mr. Pitman: I do not think the question I put to the minister was the same as the question asked by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I am asking whether there is any danger that there will be any cut off in benefits or any lowering of benefits. That is the main point of this question.

Mr. Starr: That is a hypothetical question.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Surely the Minister of Labour can give his assurance to the people—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. members know that they cannot discuss the answers they obtain.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister aware that by the answer he has just given to my question he has repudiated the statement previously made in this house that there will be a bill this session?

Mr. Argue: And in the speech from the throne.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

173. Bankruptcy Act administration, $118,770.

Mr. Herridge: When these estimates were last before the committee I had my little say on this item, but during recent days I had a gentleman visit me from Montreal, a Mr. A. G. Heakes. I am raising a question of which I am sure the minister has some knowledge. I have talked to Mr. Heakes and I have read a number of documents and letters, and he had hundreds of them. I simply lacked the time to go through the documents properly and read them and all the material that he had with him so that I could understand all aspects of this case. However, this gentleman does suffer from a sense of injustice and, from the material I had the opportunity to read and partly digest, I am of the opinion that Mr. Heakes has grounds for complaint. For that reason I promised him that I would raise this matter on the minister's estimates. I am going to bring the case briefly to the attention of the committee, because it is lengthy and most complicated.

In August, 1954, the Imperial Oil Company breached a contract with Mr. Heakes, and it was this breach of contract which forced Mr. Heakes into bankruptcy. He made a proposal to his creditors, as provided in the act. On February 7, 1955 Mr. Heakes submitted a proposal to his creditors to pay 100 cents on the dollar in four payments of 5 per cent and 20 per cent every four months over a 12-month period. A creditors' meeting was called for March 8, 1955. According to Mr. Heakes this meeting was never held. Then on May 31, 1955, Mr. Heakes made an amended proposal to the creditors offering full and final payment from the proceeds of actions to be taken against Imperial Oil, the Royal Bank and so on. It was a rather complicated arrangement, and I am not going to go into the details.

On November 22, 1955 this proposal was ratified by Chief Justice W. B. Scott in the superior court with the condition, endorsed in his own handwriting, that the actions must be started and served within 20 days from the date of ratification. On December 12, 1955 writs and declarations were served. In January, 1956, owing to worry over this business, Mr. Heakes apparently suffered a complete physical and nervous collapse and was hospitalized for several months.

In November, 1957 the corporation of professional engineers of Quebec began an investigation of the dispute of Mr. Heakes with the engineer of the Imperial Oil Company, Quebec marketing division. On January 25, 1958, approximately, Mr. Heakes says that a formal trial of this action was held before the full council of the corporation of professional engineers, following a report of the investigation by the committee on professional conduct of the corporation of professional engineers of Quebec whose chairman was Mr. Yvon Tassé, now Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works. Then Mr. Heakes' premises were broken into and his evidence was stolen.

On January 1, 1958 he laid charges against the thief and there were postponements awaiting the verdict of the corporation of engineers. On February 4, 1958 there was another development with respect to this offence. He wired the trustee to this effect:

Receipt for documents urgently required for police.

On March 28, 1958 a verdict was issued by the corporation of professional engineers completely upholding Mr. Heakes in his complaint against the Imperial Oil Company. Mr. Heakes has a copy of this verdict.

On April 9, 1958 hearing of the charge against thief was called on the day before the date set by the judge and on court subpoenas. The charge was dismissed because no one was there. On June 9, 1958 the trustee obtained an ex parte cancellation of the proposal alleging he did not know where to find Mr. Heakes and that Mr. Heakes had failed to make payments required by the proposal. On September 4, 1959 Mr. Heakes met Mr. Guy Favreau, assistant deputy minister of justice, through the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he spent the entire day with Mr. Favreau checking over this matter. On March 14, 1960 this gentleman was employed for a short time by the royal commission on transportation and submitted a report.

I have looked at a great deal of detail with respect to the sequence of events in this case which would not assist the committee in any way if I were to read it. After reading the documents I must say I am of the opinion that this gentleman has grounds for complaint. From what I have read it appears to me that the trustee has not properly performed his duties under the Bankruptcy Act, and that the registrar in question has been somewhat delinquent.

Is the trustee in bankruptcy an employee of the government? Is he directly responsible to the government for his actions when acting as trustee? Will the minister consider a further investigation of this case? Can he give us from his knowledge of the case, which I understand is quite extensive—and this applies to other members of the cabinet—some explanation why this gentleman, who is in very serious financial circumstances and, from what I have read of the case, unfairly so, has been unable to obtain justice and get the matter satisfactorily settled?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I rise also to speak to the case which the hon. member for Kootenay West has already mentioned. I have no doubt that the gentleman in question has importuned many members of this house in the past. From the résumé of his file which I have seen I would say that he has had considerable consideration given to him both by the Minister of Justice and by other members of the cabinet. It is this very fact, Mr. Chairman, that leads me to believe that in the government's checking into this file on the matter they have come across some evidence indicating that there is some truth to support the allegations made by Mr. Heakes.

Like the hon. member for Kootenay West, I undertook to at least raise this matter in the house. It would appear, Mr. Chairman, that one of the greatest responsibilities of any department, and particularly of the Department of Justice, is to uphold that greatest of legal principles that not only must justice be done but it must appear to be done. If for seven or eight years a man has been pursuing his remedy in and out of the courts and in this parliament, the supreme court of this country, with diligence and with documentary evidence, then it would appear that he is motivated by a real sense of having suffered an injustice.

I am not particularly familiar with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, but I have noted that under the subsections of section 3 the superintendent of bankruptcy, who is charged under that section with supervision of the administration of the assets to which the act applies, is empowered to make a complete investigation of any particular matter. Neither the material which Mr. Heakes has provided me nor that to which I have had recourse indicates that in fact such an investigation has ever taken place.

I would ask the minister, who I am sure is much more familiar with the file than I, whether consideration has yet been given or will be given in the department to having a full scale investigation made by the superintendent of bankruptcy with respect to the actions of the trustee acting on behalf of the creditors in this matter. So far as I am able to ascertain, the legal effect of this is that Mr. Heakes is insolvent but he is not bankrupt under the act and is in no position to be discharged. This means, then, that he is in a period of hiatus, is incapable of starting his own business again, and will always remain a credit risk. It means that a man of his capabilities will always remain incapable of getting a job or of keeping one or of starting his own business.

The government has already shown a great deal of consideration with regard to this matter. Both the ministry, representatives of the Prime Minister's office and other persons have indicated their extreme sympathy. It would appear, therefore, that in the special circumstances this matter might be resolved by going further than sympathy and having an actual judicial investigation, which is permitted under the act. The Bankruptcy Act often works to the disadvantage of honest people in the community. This may be one of those cases, and I have another I should like to put before the minister for consideration at such time as the Bankruptcy Act may be amended.

As all hon. members know, the Bankruptcy Act was instituted in order that an individual might be assisted who, usually without fault, goes into such debt that he is incapable of discharging his obligations now or at any time in the future because his liabilities so greatly outweigh his assets. The act was instituted to aid the honest man who has done his best and is unable now and in the future to meet his obligations. However, because of the provisions of the act there are those who are able to take advantage of them to the prejudice of the public and beyond the purpose intended by the legislation.

May I for one minute refer to a case which came to my attention in practice before I was a member of the house. A widow who owned a very small cottage enlisted the aid of a man who held himself out to be a painting contractor. He had a truck and all the necessary equipment. She hired him to strip the paint from her dwelling house. He did this by means of a blow torch, and because of his negligence he burned down the house.

She then brought an action against him in the supreme court of Ontario and was successful in obtaining a judgment. The painter and his wife jointly owned their home, and they put a mortgage on it in order to pay part of their solicitor's fees and also in order to lodge an appeal. The appeal was a frivolous one, but many months went by before the appeal was heard. The judgment of the trial court was confirmed and the day following the defendant, against whom judgment had been given in the amount of $10,000 and costs, went into bankruptcy. The only debt he owed over and above his normal debts, such as mortgages on his home, one of which had been placed there for the purpose of proceeding with this litigation, and small telephone accounts and so on that everyone has at any given time, was the judgment in question.

There is no way in which such a person can be denied his rights under the Bankruptcy Act. In fact the only thing that can be done is to apply to the court when the applicant comes before it for discharge and, according to the case law, only in the rarest instance will discharge be delayed for more than a month or so.

These circumstances indicate that an individual who has been grossly wronged may be left without any recourse at all in law while the person who has been the wrongdoer is able to escape and, after a hiatus of a few months, become a discharged bankrupt and enter again into exactly the same sort of business and thus prey upon the public again without in fact having lost anything. In effect this means that the law, by permitting an individual in such circumstances to go into bankruptcy, is in fact discriminating against the person who has been wronged.

So far as I am aware, Mr. Chairman, there is no provision in the Bankruptcy Act which sets out which individuals may have recourse to it. It is appreciated that it cannot be so rigidly drawn as to say what cases may come under it and what may not. However, I submit for the consideration of the minister and his department that where the Bankruptcy Act is resorted to for the purpose really of defrauding members of the public, there should be provision that an individual in the circumstances of this widow who was wronged may apply to the court in the first instance, so that the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act will not apply and so that a person who is a judgment debtor will be required to work for some months or some years in an attempt to satisfy the judgment, or will be required to show just cause to the court why he will never be able to satisfy the judgment. Further, there should be provision that an individual shall not be discharged in order to enter into the same business so long as such a judgment remains unsatisfied.

These matters are perhaps not of the type with which I should take up the time of the committee, but they are instances where the Bankruptcy Act, intended for a particular purpose, has been used in the one case against the interests of a wronged individual and in the other case against the interests of a bankrupt person.

In support of what the hon. member for Kootenay West has said, I urge upon the minister that in the case of Mr. Heakes consideration be given to a full scale investigation by the superintendent. As to the second case I mentioned, I urge that consideration be given by the department along the lines I suggested, particularly with respect to an application being made to a court by a judgment debtor, to prevent the operation of the Bankruptcy Act for a judgment creditor.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad this matter has been raised. I do not intend to speak on the Heakes case, as I have no information about it, but I sincerely hope that a very careful study will be made. I hope action will be taken soon to correct the vicious practice which has developed with regard to proceedings under the Bankruptcy Act. I can say very definitely that a most vicious practice has developed in British Columbia, particularly in the city of Vancouver, a practice that involves certain companies engaged in the construction industry.

There are in Vancouver a few completely irresponsible individuals whom I might almost call legal crooks. What they do is form a company and put in bids on construction work, particularly plumbing and heating. They undercut the bids of honest and responsible contractors, and they do so knowing full well that they cannot do the job for the price. The result is that they go into bankruptcy. Evidence is readily available in Vancouver that at the same time they go into bankruptcy they organize a new company; exactly the same individuals organize a new company and repeat the process all over again. When I was in Vancouver recently I was told that by devious means the new company on occasion gets hold of the very same material and stock of the company which went into bankruptcy, and then they repeat the process over and over again. I have been told about one company which has done this four times.

I think this is an abuse of legitimate business. I was told by those in the construction industry in British Columbia who are operating in an honest, decent legitimate manner that their very existence is being threatened by these people who are allowed to go into bankruptcy and then, within as short a space of time as a week, and in one case of which I have knowledge the very next day, start over again and follow the same procedure.

If there does not now exist legislation or regulations which can be strictly enforced to halt this practice and protect the legitimate operators in the contracting business, the department should investigate the matter and introduce the required policies and measures. When it is found that individuals are repeatedly following this practice there should be some provision preventing them from going back into business until they have demonstrated their honesty and integrity.

Because cases of this nature have been brought to my attention with increasing frequency during the past year, and particularly in recent weeks, I feel this is a developing threat that will endanger legitimate business. I urge the minister to comment on this subject and advise the committee whether it is possible for the department to take remedial action.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I was also made aware of the facts in the case referred to by the hon. members for Kootenay West and Niagara Falls, but because much has been said about the matter I do not intend to pursue it further.

I direct the attention of the minister to the details of this vote under the subheading "Professional and special services" in which the amount of $52,000 is requested for the coming year. The same amount was voted last year in the main and supplementary estimates No. 4. The reason given last spring for the increase of $50,000 was that an investigation was proceeding in several parts of the country into the conduct of trustees.

Because of the interest expressed in the case referred to this morning and because of the number of other cases of which hon. members have knowledge, I should like the minister to make a progress report on the investigation that is now being carried out and to describe what course may be followed in the future.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps I could start with the last inquiry first and then lead back to the case of Mr. Heakes.

With respect to the investigation of irregularities under the Bankruptcy Act, let me say there have been four prosecutions. Four individual trustees have been prosecuted, charges have been laid against a fifth and an investigation is under way in respect to a sixth which will lead either to charges or cancellation of licence. It has not been finally determined what is the appropriate course to be followed.

With respect to the progress report, I should point out to the committee that although I have referred to charges or investigations with respect to only six individuals, in the case particularly of two of them they were trustees engaged in a very large volume of business. They had hundreds if not thousands of files under their control which they were administering, somewhere in the neighbourhood of 400 or more estates each and every one of those files had to be examined. In those two cases particularly a considerable number of charges were laid. It has been necessary for us to retain the services of accountants as well as lawyers to check the files and make the examination necessary to support the charges, and also to advise or assist in an interim capacity to carry on the administration of the estates which, of course, could not be left dormant or arrested simply because the original trustee was under investigation.

With respect to the problems raised by the hon. member for Niagara Falls and the hon. member for Vancouver East, I am aware of the sort of difficulty they have referred to. The problem is not so difficult of solution in the case of an individual, but it is difficult in the case of a corporation. That is the problem of effectively preventing persons who may have formed a corporation which goes bankrupt from forming another corporation and continuing with the same type of business. While the problem is difficult because of the nature of corporate law I am not saying it is impossible of solution.

The general study of the Bankruptcy Act has been going forward concurrently with the investigation of individual trustees and the two together will, we hope, put us in a position where we can make an intelligent and valuable revision of the Bankruptcy Act in the not too distant future. The points that have been mentioned here will be specifically borne in mind in the course of that revision.

Turning now to the Heakes case, I should say at once we have here a most difficult case in connection with an individual for whom I have a great deal of sympathy. The case has been exhaustively investigated by myself and at least one of my colleagues. It has also been exhaustively studied by senior officials in the government service. I have had a lengthy interview with Mr. Heakes. I referred him to the then assistant deputy minister of justice, who had several lengthy interviews with him. In the course of these interviews the position was fully explained to Mr. Heakes with every regard for the difficult position in which he found himself. Furthermore, I know that at least one of my colleagues has given assistance of a personal nature to Mr. Heakes during the period when he has found himself in difficulty, so it may be said that Mr. Heakes has not found an unsympathetic attitude on the part of the government and its officials.

In summary, however—and Mr. Heakes has been advised of this—the remedy for his difficulty lies in his own hands. We have indicated that we are prepared to do everything we can by way of offering advice to him to assist in this matter, but that unless and until he seeks to apply the remedies that are open to him nothing in fact can be done in order to improve his position.

Our investigation has established that at the time the proposal was made there was some confusion as to whether it was the original or amended proposal which was approved by the court. Our investigation also established that there was some error on the part of the trustee who applied later on to have the proposal annulled. But the action of the trustee, so far as I can determine—and at this point I am satisfied of this on the report of my advisors—was in error and not of the nature of fraud or bad intent.

This having been ascertained, it was suggested to Mr. Heakes that he should apply to the bankruptcy court either for an order reinstating the proposal or, in effect, for an order for a new proposal to be set up. Either course would have the result that his affairs could be dealt with in bankruptcy court and he would then be in a position to prosecute certain other actions which he feels he has and which, as I understand it, form the only possible assets that he might realize.

Mr. Heakes has consistently taken the position that it is not his responsibility to take this action on his own behalf, that it is somehow or other the responsibility of the Department of Justice and the government to fight his case from now on. He appears to feel that because there was involved a trustee in bankruptcy who may have been guilty of some error, as I have said, it shifts the responsibility to the Department of Justice.

Here is where I should reply to the question asked me by the hon. member for Kootenay West. Trusties in bankruptcy are not officials of the government. They are appointed under the Bankruptcy Act. They are not paid by the government. They are not paid servants. Their remuneration is derived from fees out of the estates they administer. Moreover, they are not subject to detailed control in respect of their operations or to direction by the minister or the superintendent of bankruptcy. They are, however, subject to ultimate supervision as to the propriety of their conduct, but in effect the only control we can exercise is to remove them, cancel their licences or refuse to renew their licences if they are guilty of improper conduct.

As I say, nothing has been brought to my attention, from the full investigation in this case that we have made, to suggest that there was any improper conduct on the part of this particular trustee. But even if there had been improper conduct the only thing that I could and should then do would be to remove that trustee. This would not in any way alter the situation in which Mr. Heakes finds himself and in which, as I say, there are several courses open by means of which to pursue his case and bring about an adjustment of it. However, so far he has steadfastly declined to do so, taking the position that it is the responsibility of this department to conduct his case. We, of course, have no such authority or jurisdiction. I am not aware of any way in which, even with the best of intentions, I as Minister of Justice can go into court on behalf of an individual, particularly when the individual has it within his own power to do that for himself.

I have said that Mr. Heakes has had a most sympathetic hearing by members of the government themselves and by officials in the government service. I also know for a fact that he has been offered help from other quarters. When it became established that it was necessary for him to pursue his remedies in the courts we were concerned, because sometimes that is slightly cold advice to offer to a person who goes through this sort of misfortune which leaves him without the means of effectively pursuing his remedies. But I know for a fact that Mr. Heakes has been offered assistance by friends in this regard; that is to say, they have said they would be prepared to assist him with respect to litigation if he desired to retain competent counsel and pursue that litigation. However, Mr. Heakes has apparently felt that assistance should take other forms, and that any litigation is the responsibility of the government.

I can only repeat my words expressing the sympathy I have for Mr. Heakes, and also repeat to the committee my assurance and my firm belief that everything has been done that possibly could be done for Mr. Heakes in the way of advice, consideration and study of his case, and that future action lies in his own hands.

I should also say that when these matters or facts were established as the result of our investigation, we wrote to the trustee concerned and suggested that in the event of Mr. Heakes retaining another lawyer, the trustee should accord him all possible co-operation in obtaining an extension of time in which to appeal from judgment of the bankruptcy court. The trustee replied on December 22, 1959 to the effect that he would defer his own application for discharge as trustee for as long as would be necessary to give Mr. Heakes appropriate time in which to retain counsel. There was no obligation on the trustee to do this, but he said that under the circumstances, as there had been an error here, he would maintain the status quo so as to facilitate the making of any application that Mr. Heakes might wish to make. That was in December, 1959, and no application has yet been made.

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to make one or two comments on this matter. I was very much interested to hear what the Minister of Justice has said to us. I am glad to know that the situation was not as black as the hon. member for Kootenay West naturally thought it was.

I also want to make one comment, and to ask a question of the minister, who referred to irregularities in the case of certain trustees. I thought perhaps it would be worth while, and it is certainly a matter of interest to me, to know more about this. I think he said there had been six cases of irregularities. I should like to know what percentage that is. I like to believe that most people we meet in our daily lives are honest. Of course, as long as there are dishonest crooks who are clever enough they will defeat any legislation from time to time. Finally, I want to ask one further question of the minister and it is this. A great deal of course, depends on the quality of those who are appointed trustees. Those who are more familiar than I am with the operations of the act will, I am sure, endorse that statement.

I have just been looking at the section which provides for the appointment of trustees. I should like to read one paragraph of it, and then I should like to ask the minister whether in fact this case and other cases in his general experience have raised any question as to whether the appointment of trustees in bankruptcy should be somewhat more restricted than it has been in the past. I should like him, if he would, to tell us in a general way the kind of people who have been appointed. Having said that, I should just like to read the subsections which cover the matter. I am reading from section 5, subsection 2 under the general heading of "Licensing of trustees":

(2) The superintendent shall make an investigation into the character and qualifications of any applicant for licence as the superintendent deems advisable or expedient and shall report to the minister the result of the investigation, together with his recommendation for or against the granting of the application and his reasons therefor.

Then subsection 3:

(3) The minister, as soon as he has received a report from the superintendent as to the character and qualifications of an applicant for a licence, may, if he considers it will be of public advantage so to do, authorize the issue of a licence, which shall specify the bankruptcy district or districts or any part thereof in which the licensee is entitled to act.

My point is this. The whole question of the administration of the act has been raised. My experience, such as it was, would lead me to believe that the cases of honesty outnumber those of dishonesty many times over. If the minister would care to say a little more about this matter, I feel that he could reassure us on this point and also on whether, in fact, there is any ground, in his opinion, for having a tightening up with respect to the appointment of trustees or demanding higher qualifications even than those we have specified in the past.

Mr. Fulton: The situation with regard to the appointment and qualifications of trustees naturally gives anyone in my position some concern because they are in a trust capacity. I am glad to be able to assure my hon. friend from Greenwood that the number of apparently dishonest trustees, or the number of trustees who are guilty of irregularities, is far outweighed by the number of honest and reliable trustees in connection with whose administration no question ever arises. It is, however, the unfortunate fact that in the case of two of the six trustees, although they are but a very small percentage of the total number of trustees, the size of their business was such that the number of estates under their control represented a substantial percentage of the total bankruptcy estates in that area.

I have worked out with the superintendent and other officials of my department, as a result of discussions, what I believe is an improved method of investigating the qualifications of applicants for licence as trustees, and that system is now functioning quite smoothly. I am not going to say that no mistake will ever be made, but I think we have done what can reasonably be done to eliminate the possibility of appointing as trustee a man whose character would indicate that he should not be appointed to a position of trust.

As to his technical qualifications it is sometimes more difficult to make a judgment, and there may be room for error there. A perfectly honest man may just not be competent to do the job, and of course difficulties could arise there. However, in so far as it is possible to do so under the scheme of the present Bankruptcy Act, with respect to appointments and renewals of appointments I think we have a system which is an improvement over the one previously in effect. I think we have a fairly good system of ascertaining that we shall not be appointing anyone unless he is a proper person to appoint in the capacity of trustee.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for his remarks on this case. I should like to ask him this one question, because on a number of occasions I have heard the actions of trustees criticized very severely. In order to make certain that a trustee is a person of integrity plus competence, what would the minister think of the suggestion that persons should make application for the position of trustee to an appropriate court or judge? The applicants would then be passed upon by a judge or competent court as to their integrity and competence.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, my reply is that I think the courts would have to rely upon precisely the same means we now use to make our investigations. The courts themselves have no investigative staff, and I think they would simply turn to the same agencies that we employ to make the same sort of examination.

I cannot see any particular advantage in that proposal. However, I think there is an advantage in a related proposal, namely that with respect to their activities we might be able to work out a scheme whereby there was more supervision by the courts.

Mr. Herridge: I think that is a very good suggestion.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and other benefits—

174. Gratuities to the widows or other dependents of judges who die while in office, $15,000.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, would the minister tell us how many widows or other dependents are involved in this vote?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, a quick count —and I may be a few out as a result, because I have done this very quickly, just going down the column—indicates that there are 171 widows.

Item agreed to.

B—Penitentiaries—

175. Administration of the office of the commissioner of penitentiaries, $696,650.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, this is the first item in the penitentiaries branch and I undertook to the committee to make a short statement by way of a progress report in introducing this item. In discussing the situation with respect to penitentiaries and correctional reform I should perhaps start by saying that it has been the government's intention during the last few years to achieve two major steps forward in the transformation of Canada's penal system into an up-to-date and effective correctional program.

The first of these has been to arouse in the people of Canada themselves an interest in this long neglected branch of government, and to make Canadians aware of their responsibilities in this aspect of the continuing fight against crime. I think all hon. members of this house will have become aware that national interest in and support for the program of reform in our penitentiary system is at an all-time high, and I take this opportunity of thanking all those who have lent their support in fostering this enthusiasm.

The second objective has been a great deal more concrete and equally important. This has been the implementation of the plans and reforms which have been designed during the past few years. Our reforms are not complete, but in reporting to this committee which is asked to vote the money I am happy to be able to outline a series of positive achievements in terms of new penitentiaries, new methods, programs and activities; new ideas actually carried into effect. In other words, plans and preparations are now being matched by performance.

To be more specific, during the last year it has been our objective to develop for the inmates of all our federal institutions a program of training directed positively toward the goal of reforming and rehabilitating as many as possible of the inmates who are in our charge. The corollary of this is of course to make them fit upon discharge to take their places in our free society as law abiding citizens.

A second objective has been to develop a highly trained and competent staff to man our institutions and administer the positive programs of inmate training which have been authorized. Our third objective has been to provide suitable physical institutions where those sensible and progressive programs of training can be carried on effectively by that trained staff.

I think the most effective method of illustrating the progress made during the last year or two in achieving these objectives is by the simple process of comparison between the present and the past. I believe that the two pictures are more persuasive than anything else I could say in favour of continuing support for a dynamic program of penal reform.

Some 15 months ago 6,200 inmates were confined in federal penitentiaries. All but 400 of these were incarcerated in maximum security institutions across the country. Some of these maximum security institutions can only be described as out-dated fortresses maintained by an armed garrison, with innumerable locks and iron bars, with necessarily limited opportunities for effective training programs, which were carried out in an atmosphere of repression.

In these institutions the inmates were locked in their cells for the greater part of the 24 hours each day, only being allowed to exercise for brief periods, with virtually no provision for rehabilitative training as members of society, and where far too much of the time was spent in unrewarding and unproductive procedures.

The remaining 400, the fortunate few, were housed in the newly opened medium security institution at Joyceville, Ontario, and in the new minimum security institutions at William Head in British Columbia and Valleyfield in Quebec, which we had designed and opened even though we were still much occupied with this planning stage. A few months later Springhill institution in Nova Scotia was opened, which gave some further relief to this depressing picture. This was the situation as we had inherited it and as we had modified it during the first two and one half years while we were primarily engaged in studying and developing our plans.

Today, two of these eight maximum security institutions have been transformed to medium security. At Collins Bay penitentiary in Ontario and at the federal training centre in Quebec, the armed and unyielding accoutrements of maximum security have given way to newer and more effective methods of reform.

In the space of one year the number of inmates kept under medium security conditions has increased from 200 to almost 1,600, or an increase of 800 per cent, and the 200 kept in minimum security has increased by almost 100 per cent, thanks to the coming into operation of the new Springhill institution. At the present, therefore, the federal penitentiary system consists of six maximum security, four medium security and four minimum security institutions.

During the coming months it is intended to place the emphasis upon the development of minimum security institutions. The committee will have gathered from my previous remarks that the pressure for medium security institutions has in some measure been relieved, and our greatest need is for institutions in which the benefits of minimum security conditions can be brought to bear upon those inmates who have responded to our new rehabilitation methods. The necessary provision has now been made so that, across the country, we shall be opening five correctional work camps, each designed to provide accommodation and training for 80 inmates. These camps will be located at Agassiz, B.C.; Petawawa and Bracebridge, Ontario; Gatineau Park, Quebec, and at another site in Quebec which has not yet been finally selected but with respect to which discussions are now under way.

I would like to assure the house that none of the men held in these institutions will be engaged upon work which would deprive other Canadians of employment. None of the projects which they undertake would be commenced within ten years if they had to be paid for out of tax moneys at the current rates of civilian pay.

In addition to these work camps, five minimum security farm camps will be established, one at each of the five institutions which operate farms. The institutions involved are Dorchester penitentiary in New Brunswick, St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary in Quebec, Collin's Bay penitentiary in Ontario, Manitoba penitentiary and Saskatchewan penitentiary at Prince Albert.

When these steps become fully effective and when, as we expect, we have transformed one other maximum security institution into a medium security penitentiary, our inmate population will, by the end of 1961, be allocated as follows: 3,500 in maximum security, 2,000 in medium security and 1,100 in minimum security conditions.

I would like to add at this time a word about drug addiction. It is the intention of the government, as will have been seen from the debates on the narcotics bill, to build in the lower mainland of British Columbia a drug addiction treatment centre in which will be confined those persons who are drug addicts and who have been sentenced to penitentiaries for criminal offences. This institution should be ready for occupancy within about two years, and in it we shall try to provide treatment and training for addicts which will assist them to overcome the drug habit. We will also have achieved what to me is an essential reform, in the segregation of the drug addict from the remainder of our inmate population.

Let me now turn to the equally important problem of supplying our penitentiaries with a skilled and dedicated staff. When the correctional planning committee investigated the staff situation it was found that an unfortunate degree of stagnation existed. Moreover, although there had been a staff college in existence since 1948, the available facilities did not permit more than 21 officers to be on a course at one time. This has led to the unfortunate state of affairs that up to this time less than half of our penitentiary officers have received formal training at the hands of the college.

This has now been changed. With respect to staff generally, a system has been worked out under which a full career will be available in the correctional system as a whole. After recruiting and training, emphasis will be upon opportunities for transfers and promotions, not only within institutions but to a much greater extent than before between institutions and regions and between the field and headquarters, so that not only will our present staff be encouraged but a young man joining the service may also have the prospect before him of rising to the very summit.

Just since last September, for instance, eight of Canada's penitentiaries have received new wardens by either transfer or new appointment between institutions; a number of new appointments from within the service will be made when the new camps are opened; all of which opens further opportunities for transfer and promotion to junior officers now in the service. At the present time 14 officers are changing their institutions to take over the position of assistant warden at other institutions. During the coming summer 12 officers will leave their present institutions to become superintendents of administration and supply officers at the new correctional work camps and farm camps.

The revised Penitentiary Act to which the house gave first reading yesterday will, when adopted, put the seal of approval on the new staff and regional organization system.

In order to benefit further from the opportunities thus opened, the staff college at Kingston is to be very considerably enlarged so as to accommodate twice as many trainees as at present. A regional staff college for French speaking officers from Quebec is in course of being established on the St. Vincent de Paul reserve. A director of staff training has been appointed at headquarters in Ottawa. His task will be to co-ordinate staff training at all levels of the service.

In accord with our advanced theories of penal reform, special emphasis has been placed upon building up our professional and semi-professional counselling staff. At the moment we have 75 positions for supervisors of classification, psychologists, classification officers and assistant classification officers.

One item which might seem small but whose effect on morale may be considerable is that the formidable military type uniforms of the penitentiary staff are to be replaced by a uniform cut in a civilian pattern made of a smart blue material. It is expected that by the end of 1962 this style of uniform will be available to all officers who serve in medium security institutions. All the uniforms will be made in the institutions themselves.

Finally, I should also mention some of the actual programs which are being put into effect in Canadian penitentiaries. Within the last four months a program of evening activity for inmates has been established in every one of our institutions except St. Vincent de Paul. Unfortunately, in that institution conditions caused by overcrowding render such programs impossible. We are moving as rapidly as possible to meet that situation and put St. Vincent on the same basis as all our other institutions.

Formerly an inmate's day ended at 4.30 in the afternoon when he was locked in his cell, where he remained until seven o'clock next morning. Now, however, his day is extended to 9.30 or ten o'clock in the evening, and in the intervening hours he is encouraged to take part in group activities, sports and study opportunities. In many of our institutions citizens from local communities come into the penitentiary and bring with them their knowledge of special arts and skills.

A prison system which has not solved the problem of prison labour cannot be said to be operating institutions of correction and reform. There is little chance of effecting the rehabilitation in society of an inmate who upon his release is unwilling, unable or unfit to accept employment. In most cases it is only by instilling in the inmate the habit of plain, hard work that any lasting value will be obtained from the expense of imprisoning and training him.

As a part of the replanning of the penitentiary system arising out of the correctional planning committee's report, a special report was prepared on industrial expansion in the present institutions. The objectives were to organize factories with modern methods of production similar to those the inmate would meet in commercial industry, and thus train him for competitive employment and reduce the prospect of his repeating as a criminal. This work, involving a total of approximately 2,000 inmates across Canada, would be done only for the government and tax-supported institutions, and would be sufficiently diversified to have no appreciable effect on any private industry.

To enlist the co-operation of labour and industry on an advisory basis concerning policy, preliminary discussions have taken place during recent months with industrial executives in Toronto and with Mr. Claude Jodoin, president of the Canadian Labour Congress. Reactions have been sympathetic to these proposals, and further discussions are being carried on.

In order to have continuing assistance from industry and labour I propose incorporating into the new draft of the Penitentiary Act a section establishing an advisory committee on penitentiary industry of up to nine members, consisting of representatives chosen from the fields of industry, labour, government and the general public, to advise the commissioner concerning industrial operations to be carried on by inmate labour in connection with the service.

Not only is the inmate encouraged to extend his education and professional training; he is also encouraged to keep in closer contact with his family and those friends who the warden feels will be a good influence upon him in the future. Letter writing restrictions have been substantially lifted, and visits by the family are being given a less clinical treatment. I should mention further that at a number of our institutions we have been able to start a program under which, during the season of certain religious festivals such as Easter and Christmas, relatives of the inmates come to the institution to take part in religious services with inmates and remain there afterward for a social hour in surroundings of complete informality and lack of restraint. During the Easter period just past some 70 relatives attended the Protestant religious services in these circumstances, and an equal number attended the Roman Catholic services.

As one example of the success of these new methods, I might mention the small group of inmates at Kingston penitentiary who during last summer attended night classes at Queen's University to study advanced techniques in the printer's trade. These men mingled freely with other students and were accepted readily by them. Again, you probably heard, Mr. Chairman, of the 14 inmates of the William Head institution who graduated from a public speaking course. Their graduation celebration was held at Victoria, and the function was attended by the mayor of the city and his wife as well as by other civic officials.

I believe that all of Canada—indeed I know that much of the free world—is aware of and interested in our correctional reform program. I have given here a necessarily very much condensed report on progress. While we in the Department of Justice and all the staff of the penitentiaries service are pleased to have been able to record this substantial degree of progress, we realize that much remains to be done. However, I have felt that in asking for continued support for our program by way of these appropriations I should outline to the committee some of the progress made, so the house and the country will know that the money is being put to effective use.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I am sure all the members of the committee have followed closely and with great interest the statement the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) has just made concerning the reform of Canada's penitentiaries.

One of the first aims of such a reform is naturally to facilitate the rehabilitation of the inmates. This rehabilitation process starts within the institution itself but it must keep on after the prisoner has been released. That is one of the objectives the minister mentioned. According to him, we must first arouse in the people of Canada an interest in this reform of our penal institutions and, second, put into practice most of the recommendations contained in the Fauteux report, if not all of them.

In fact, when the Fauteux committee was set up, a few years ago, it was undoubtedly entrusted with the task of making a special study of the situation in the penitentiaries. It completed its task and submitted its report to the government. And now this government is trying to put those recommendations into practice.

In my opinion, one of the most interesting aspects of this question of penitentiaries about which I should like to say a few words, is the inmate's situation when he is freed, and during the period of time between his imprisonment and his full release.

The inmate goes through the various stages the minister mentioned. First, there is the period of maximum security, that is when he is confined to a penitentiary, then the period of medium security and finally that of minimum security, just before his release.

All those stages are most important for the inmates but it is also quite important that the public should know what the inmates go through during those stages.

It is important also that the public be aware of the treatment given to inmates during the medium security period, and more especially during the minimum security period. In fact, it is essential that the public be familiar with the situation of inmates in general after their release, and I believe this is a point that members of the committee should emphasize.

Mr. Chairman, I have here an item published in Le Devoir of November 16, 1960, reporting a statement of the Minister of Justice regarding appointments made, especially at the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary. I am pleased to point out in particular the appointments of Majors Martineau, Surprenant and Desgroseillers, because I had the opportunity of knowing them when I served in the Canadian army. I am convinced that they are worthy of the confidence placed in them and that they will prove equal to their task.

But such was not the purpose of my remarks. I want to stress the importance of the part to be played not by officers and employees of the penitentiaries, but by society in the rehabilitation of inmates.

Mr. Chairman, I now quote from the article I referred to a moment ago:

> We are informed that despite all the good intentions of officials in correctional institutions and their efforts to better prepare inmates to return to a normal and decent life, the apathy of the public and particularly of employers in relation to former inmates remains the greatest obstacle to rehabilitation.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure this article is completely true. We can never repeat often enough to the public at large, and more particularly to employers, that they must try to understand the inmate, a person who through some accident, some misfortune or because he was led into it, has committed a crime but remains an unfortunate human being who would be glad to start a new life in society.

However, if on being released from the penitentiary or from the common prison, the inmate is left to walk the streets, with nothing to do, chances are that he will meet those criminals who traffic in goof balls. In other words, he is bound to get mixed up with bad friends.

Some system must be evolved in order that an inmate will not be left in idleness after his release.

Not only must we reform the penitentiary system as we are doing, but more important, we must reform the individual in society, by understanding the unfortunate situation of the inmate and by contributing to his rehabilitation.

(Text):

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I am certain we are all grateful to the Minister of Justice for giving us a preliminary outline of the changes that have taken place in the past two years with regard to policy and administration in the realm of penal reform. Even without the statement of the minister I was convinced that there must have been changes made in the past two years. The evidence is very clear. I have not had nearly as many letters smuggled out to me in the last year as previously. As a matter of fact I have not had one in the last three or four months, so I am convinced that things have been improved.

Mr. Peters: You may get a couple yet.

Mr. Winch: The hon. member for Timiskaming says I may get a couple yet. If so, I will look into them as I have done in the case of all letters of this kind that have come to me.

I was most interested in what the minister said as to the changes he anticipates in the next two years as a result of the new policies and new construction. If I remember his figures correctly, this will bring us to the point where a little more than half the inmates in our penitentiaries will be under minimum or medium security control. I think this is as it should be, and the success of the program up to now has demonstrated the correctness of the policy being followed. From the information I have gathered through talking to officials and reading newspapers, I understand that comparatively few inmates in minimum and medium security penitentiaries are abusing the privileges they obtain there.

The extension of this principle brings to mind another phase involving a new policy about which I should like to make a few remarks and ask the minister for his comments. It comes to mind particularly because of the information the minister gave a few moments ago that he is recommending to the house the acceptance of the principle of an advisory board on penitentiary matters. He said that the members of the board will be drawn from many fields of activity, and referred particularly to industry and labour. This ties in with something I had in mind about which I should like to speak very briefly.

In the last eight or nine months I have been most interested in reading articles about a new policy that is being tried in some places and which, as far as I can ascertain, is working successfully. It does not apply to those who have to be kept under maximum security control, but applies particularly to those under minimum control and perhaps to some extent to those under medium control. It involves inmates who have been sentenced to penitentiary for breaking the law but whose crimes do not involve violence or vicious or malicious actions. The purpose of the policy is to try to keep them in closer touch with society and to aid in their rehabilitation by taking a new approach.

The idea is that after careful study, analysis and scrutiny, those in whom it is felt confidence can be placed should be given the opportunity of working at their own trades under close supervision, of course, outside the walls of the penitentiary. It is my understanding that this policy has been tried, and that in the light of the evidence up to the present time it has proved successful. The person is definitely still a penitentiary inmate. He leaves in the morning, goes to his place of employment and has to return at night. He has to serve his full sentence. Part of the money he earns goes toward his upkeep in the institution to relieve the burden on the taxpayers, and the balance goes for the upkeep of his family so they will be maintained by his own personal work and will not need to become welfare and relief recipients.

I recognize all the difficulties in such a policy, but it must be noted that it is being tried elsewhere and it does seem to have something to recommend it. I am wondering whether any consideration has been given to extending the study of penal reform referred to by the minister into this realm. If consideration has not been given to this idea yet, I believe it is something that might well be studied by the advisory committee which the minister says will be appointed as a result of changes he is recommending in the Penitentiary Act.

I must admit that the articles I have read on the matter intrigue me very much, and if the idea is practicable and applicable it might be a step forward that would assist in certain cases in the rehabilitation of those whom we want to ensure are rehabilitated as quickly as possible and in a proper manner. I would be most interested if the minister would comment on the feasibility and practicability of that suggestion.

Though it is only a small point, I should also like the minister to tell us what new employment has been given to those inmates whose former employment was taken away from them because of a change in policy made by the Post Office Department. In visiting the penitentiaries I have always been most interested in seeing how many were employed in repairing damaged postal boxes. Because of a certain unfortunate situation that arose early this year a change in policy had to be made, and the work is now being done by private firms. I am interested in knowing to what kind of work these men have now been assigned.

There is one other small matter which I should like to raise at this time. Can the minister give us any information as to what is being done or can be done with regard to those who, for the protection of society, are serving sentences in penitentiaries but whose natures are such that of necessity they must be kept in solitary confinement at all times? I can think of two in British Columbia who must be kept in such solitary confinement; one of them whose absolutely uncontrolled violence means that he is dangerous to everybody, and the other whose sex perversion is of such a nature that even in the penitentiary he must be kept in solitary confinement at all times. I cannot help but wonder, if that situation prevails in the penitentiary and men of this type have to be kept in solitary confinement for the entire duration of their sentence, what will be the position when they come out of the penitentiary? This question may be out of order on this item, but unfortunately I was not able to be here when the other items of the minister's estimates were being considered.

May I also add a word in connection with those who have been in a penitentiary. I have drawn this matter to the minister's attention every year during the consideration of his estimates. What further consideration is being given not only to the training and psychological rehabilitation of penitentiary inmates, but also to their follow up upon release? I can assure the minister that outside of pension cases and grievances of that nature that come to my attention as a member of the House of Commons, the most appeals I receive are from those who have been released from the penitentiary with $15 or $20 at a time when we have a serious unemployment situation. These men cannot get jobs, so what can they do?

I do feel that since the taxpayers' dollars have been spent in making these people pay for their crimes, in trying to rehabilitate them by driving out their antisocial attitudes and giving them a new social conscience, then some provision should be made for assistance of a practical nature when these men are released in order to guarantee that they do not return to crime.

I would appreciate it very much if the minister would comment on some of the matters which I have raised.

[Mr. Winch.]

Mr. Deschatelets: I should like to make a few remarks at this time, and I shall try to complete them before the luncheon recess. My comments have to do with the application of sections 60, 61 and 62 of the Criminal Code, dealing with habitual criminals. Hon. members know that when an accused has been convicted of three different charges, each punishable by five years or more in the penitentiary, the crown may charge him with being an habitual criminal. Then, if the crown proves its case, this man may be confined to the penitentiary for an indefinite term. I do not like these provisions in the Criminal Code; I have never liked them. I was wondering if we should not take a second look at them.

I should like the minister, if it is possible, to let us know the number of inmates presently in our penitentiaries who have been convicted of being habitual criminals and are held, au bon plaisir. I should like to know also for how many years they have been detained. I believe that for the morale of the inmates, a definite term should be established. If a man is sent to the penitentiary for 15, 20 or 25 years, at least there is some limit to his detention.

During the past number of years we have been taking a second look at questions relating to reform and rehabilitation. I do not believe these particular sections of the Criminal Code are in line with our thinking on reform and rehabilitation. I hope the minister will be able to give us a few comments.

Mr. Fulton: I should say, first, that I appreciate very much the remarks of the hon. member for Megantic, with which I thoroughly agree. I have stated on a number of occasions that we might have the best designed program in the world, the best institutions, administered by the best staffs, but this would come to nothing if on release the inmate is unable to find employment. I appreciate the approach of my hon. friend, and I hope his remarks will register with the public and with potential employers.

In so far as the comments of the hon. member for Vancouver East are concerned, he asked me first to consider the possibility of providing what might be called extramural work for inmates as a further step in the program leading toward their ultimate rehabilitation into society. I might tell him that at present we are doing this ourselves, although on what I think might be fairly described as a very limited scale, in connection with pre-release. There are cases in which we arrange for suitable inmates to work outside the walls during the day and return to the institution at night. It is our intention to enlarge this program, but it is definitely part of our program of reform.

My hon. friend will appreciate, however, that you cannot make all these reforms at once. We have in mind the establishment of a pre-release hostel to which selected inmates might be sent, and from which they would go to work in industry in the community—possibly the same job as they may be continuing after their release; that is definitely in our mind.

I should say, of course, that to a certain extent the parole system itself is a step in this direction because an inmate, instead of serving his full sentence in the institution may, if he is regarded by the parole board as suitable, be released from the institution to serve the balance of his sentence outside in employment under the supervision of the parole board. It is, therefore, in a sense quite properly part of the concept which the hon. member for Vancouver East put before us.

I see it is one o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and perhaps I could conclude my reply after lunch.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Fulton: Just before one o'clock I was replying to the observations that had been made and the questions that had been raised on the first item of the penitentiaries branch, and I had just answered the first matter raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East. His second point related to the position of those who are in solitary confinement or, as it is technically called, disassociation. I think the best answer I can give to my hon. friend is to refer him to a reply I gave to a question asked by the hon. member for Skeena. I refer to starred question No. 172 which was made an order for return. The return was forwarded by me to the office of the Clerk on April 5 and, according to the note I have, was tabled on April 11 of this year. It dealt with the situation in the British Columbia penitentiary. I understand that is the institution in which my hon. friend is primarily interested. It contains full particulars with regard to those who have been held in disassociation there.

As the hon. member noted, two inmates there are held virtually permanently in solitary confinement for the reason that he knows. When I was in British Columbia two years ago, I think it was, I went personally to inspect the conditions under which these men are held. One, as is noted, is there of his own volition; that is the man who has a sexual disorder. The other man is there not of his own volition, it is true, but he simply could not be allowed to be left with the other inmates. No one with whom I have discussed the matter, including one or two members opposite and members on this side who have been there, disagrees with us that it is proper to keep this man in disassociation because of his violent and uncontrollable criminal tendencies. I should inform the committee that these men who are held permanently under these circumstances have their cases reviewed once a month. Every month their cases are reviewed to see whether there is any change in their circumstances, their outlook or their medical or other conditions which would warrant reconsideration of the decision that has been made. The next point—

Mr. Winch: Before the minister leaves the point with which he has been dealing, may I ask him this question. Are they not actually to some degree insane? My point is this. Although you have to hold them in that way, are they going to be released on society? If they are of that type, can they be put somewhere else?

Mr. Fulton: One of them is undergoing life imprisonment and I think the other is an habitual criminal. I will check that matter. They are examined not only from the point of view of seeing whether they should be continued on in the circumstances in which they are now but also whether there has been any change that would warrant a program being instituted looking toward their ultimate release. So far we have not been able to see any signs of the latter. One is on a 20-year sentence and the other is in there on an indeterminate sentence.

With regard to their mental condition may I say this. I think I have mentioned previously that there is perhaps an unsatisfactory gap in the relationship here between our institutions and the provincial institutions to which persons who are certifiable might be committed. It could perhaps be argued that these men should be in a mental institution rather than in a penitentiary. I would not oppose that point of view at all. However, I just note that we have made efforts to get them into a mental institution and, perhaps understandably, the authorities in the mental institution did not want that kind of responsibility and so we have had discussions, but generally when we have tried to transfer them we have not been successful. Rather than transfer the men over there, have them transferred back six months later and have them shuttle back and forth, it seems to me to be more humane, although not a desirable situation, to do the best we can for them within our institutions. The third point—

Mr. Peters: Before the minister leaves this matter may I ask him this question. Has any consideration been given to operating on these particular men in order to make them at least acceptable in society? I understand that in California in particular brain operations are being done, that part of the motor lobe is removed, and that these operations have been fairly successful. I am just wondering about cases in which the length of time has been considerable and it looks as though it will be indefinite. In the one case I would think it would not be too difficult to get a voluntary release in order to allow that kind of operation to be performed. Is any consideration being given to this matter?

Mr. Fulton: Under our law as it stands at the present time we certainly could not perform that operation or any other type of operation on an inmate without his consent. So far our medical reports do not indicate that there is any type of operation that could be performed that would have any desirable result; indeed, it might have an entirely undesirable result. We keep them under medical supervision, and if at any time it were suggested to us that their condition could be improved, we would be prepared to consider that. But as I say, we could not perform any operation without the consent of the inmate himself.

The third point raised was with regard to the situation of an individual inmate on his release, from the point of view of whether he has a little bit of cash in his pocket or other assistance so that he can last out perhaps the first few difficult days or weeks without being compelled to return to his former associations, undesirable haunts, and so on.

This has been a problem that has concerned us very much, and as a result of the report of the correctional planning committee we made a submission to treasury board, which has now been approved, regarding the earnings of inmates in our penitentiaries. The result has been that in the case of the average inmate, when he leaves the penitentiary he should in future be discharged with between $80 and $100 in his possession, as against the sum at the present time of around $15 to $20.

I recognize that is not a great deal of money, but it is certainly a substantial increase and should tide him over a week or two anyway. In conjunction with the stepped-up program on which we are now successfully working, with the parole board and private after-care agencies, we hope this little insurance in his pocket, plus the assistance given by the voluntary agency or the parole board, will serve the purpose of getting him rehabilitated into employment and back into useful life in society.

As my hon. friend will recall also, we put through a change last year, I think it was, with respect to the rights of inmates to continue to receive unemployment insurance after having served a term in our penitentiaries. They are not now disqualified from receiving unemployment insurance benefits. These measures together will, we hope, go some way toward solving the problems that have been mentioned.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont raised the question as to how many habitual criminals are in our institutions. This question and related questions might better have been answered when the parole board estimates were before the committee, because the parole board keeps all the tables with regard to this matter. However, my present information is that we have 36 inmates in our institutions who have been sentenced as habitual criminals.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, it was not necessary for those of us who heard the Minister of Justice piloting the amendments to the Criminal Code on capital punishment through this house to be told that he is a man of sympathy and understanding, nor that he took great pains in what he was doing. But even if we had not known that, we learned it today. I have listened to the minister's remarks about penitentiary reform with deep interest and with the feeling that he was taking it as one of the most serious, perhaps the most serious, of his duties. We should all be thankful to the minister for what he has done and is doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have perhaps a somewhat unexpected and unusual way of praising the minister for bringing us so far along this road, because it so happens that I have a filial connection with the report of what I believe was the first penitentiaries commission. This commission reported in 1914 and my father, the late G. M. Macdonnell, was its chairman. That report went a very short way along the road which the minister has taken us infinitely further along.

Perhaps the committee would allow me for just a moment to refer to two or three of the things upon which that commission reported and which would seem far removed from these enlightened days. The commission was set up to inquire into the affairs of the Kingston penitentiary and also, in broad terms, to report on the subject of the conduct and administration of penitentiaries.

Their report into the affairs of the Kingston penitentiary does not make pleasant reading and I shall not take up any of the time of the committee in reading from it. There is just one item to which I would refer. Although it is harsh it has almost an element of ironic humour in it, that when a man was recommended for flogging, as he often was by the sentencing judge on entering the penitentiary, he was flogged on entry and he was also flogged just before he went out. It seems to me there is a bitter irony in flogging a man just before he leaves, because he would certainly not have a very pleasant attitude toward the society which had dealt with him in this way.

The minister had another advantage which I am sure he will not mind my mentioning. That is that he has in his family, in the person of his wife, a trained social worker and I am quite sure that her views also are represented in this legislation.

I would just like to refer to the fact that the commission with which I have, as I say, a filial interest did recommend against flogging; it did recommend schools and hospitals, which apparently were considered quite unnecessary before that day, in penitentiaries; it did recommend that penitentiaries should be operated with a view to encouraging the inhabitants in the habits of order, industry and a better appreciation of the duties of citizenship, and it did recommend that the hosing of convicts and their confinement in a dark cell or dungeon, and shackling them with ball and chain, be abolished.

One other thing was recommended. This was in regard to the employment of prison guards. More regard was to be paid to the character and education of guards with the view that the officials should exercise the best possible influence over the prisoners. There was another recommendation; that in the place of the prison uniform which was worn, a suit and cap of one-tone material, blue or grey, should be adopted.

Perhaps the committee will forgive this little personal excursion. I thought it might be of some interest to other hon. members as well as to myself. It also enables me to say again how far we have come from those rather primitive days and how much we owe to the Minister of Justice for what he has done and is doing.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to prolong the debate on this item, especially since we will be dealing some time next week or the week after with the Penitentiary Act and we will then have ample opportunity to raise the points we wish to raise.

I should like to ask one question of the minister with relation to the consultations that were held by him with the attorneys general of the provinces with regard to changing the jurisdiction as between penitentiaries and county prisons.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend from Megantic refers to the meeting held in 1958, the occasion of which was to discuss the implementation of the Fauteux committee's report, in which it was obvious there were a number of recommendations which were of mutual federal and provincial concern.

At that time we indicated to the attorneys general of the provinces our readiness to accept in principle the Fauteux committee's recommendation, that we should accept responsibility for the treatment of all prisoners sentenced to terms of over six months. It was as a result of the discussions at that meeting and the conclusions arrived at unanimously that the correctional planning committee was set up, which recommended to us the detailed methods by which we should implement the various recommendations that were then put before us.

Although we agreed in principle at that time on the acceptance of this recommendation to assume responsibility for these additional prisoners, it was made clear to the attorneys general that there was a great deal to be done in the existing federal penitentiary system both from the point of view of reorganizing our system and with regard to improving our own standards before we should be in a position to assume the actual responsibility.

With respect to the first, we have been and are still faced with the problem of overcrowding in our institutions and it would not be reasonable, before we got that under control, to accept responsibility for another 5,000 inmates. In respect to the second, it was recognized in the Robichaud report and the MacDonald committee report, as my hon. friend pointed out, that there are many changes which should be made in our own penal system before we can stand up and say that we have a penal system in operation which is as good as we can make it, or as good as, or better than any in the provinces.

We are anxious to take over this new field when it becomes possible to do so and we are all agreed this should be done in order to provide a better system for prisoners in Canada as a whole, but when the correctional planning committee went into the details of the matter and when we received its report indicating the size of our own problem of reorganization and reform it became only necessary and fair that I should write to the provinces within the last eight or ten months to indicate that I did not expect we should be in a position to go ahead for the next two or three years. We are pressing on as fast as we can and I hope the report I gave today indicates that substantial progress has been made. I hope that within the next few years we shall be in a position to say to the provinces: we are ready to go ahead and take over the responsibility which was agreed by all that we should assume.

Mr. Winch: I have one or two comments to make on this item prompted by the statements which have been made by the Minister of Justice. The minister said he hoped that within two years the first of the institutions for the treatment of those addicted to narcotics would be open and that perhaps more would have been opened. Can the minister give us any information on the principles guiding him in the location of the treatment centres. Are they to be built within the grounds of the present penitentiaries? I sincerely hope not, because I think that would be psychologically incorrect.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to be able to advise the hon. member that we announced yesterday, I think, that the new drug treatment centre will be located in the Matsqui area which, as he will appreciate, is well removed physically from the British Columbia penitentiary reserve.

I understand that a statement appears in the Vancouver press today by one who, I am advised, is a prominent doctor in this field, somewhat preemptorily dismissing our program as being too big, too costly and the location too far from Vancouver. This seems a somewhat preemptory dismissal of the new program. We have not even got the plans fully prepared ourselves. We have simply chosen the location. We know what our approach is to be, and we are prepared to discuss it with experts and draw up our detailed plans accordingly. The location is sufficiently far away to enable us to have a good degree of control of the persons who will go to visit there and, as a result, we should be able to control this great problem of the smuggling in of narcotics. On the other hand it is not so far away that the specialized staff, both the permanent and visiting staff needed to service such institutions, will be discouraged. It is 45 minutes from the centre of Vancouver and I know of many persons who spend more time than that struggling to and from work. We think this is a good location. With respect to the size of the institution, its detailed planning and the number of inmates who should be there, we are prepared to be flexible. I am convinced that most people will not accord it the preemptory dismissal which I am informed this doctor has done.

Mr. Winch: We shall take care of him.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Peters: I have listened carefully to the discussion so far, because this is not a field with which I am familiar. I appreciate the forward looking developments which are taking place in our penal institutions, but there are still several questions which I think could profitably be discussed even by an amateur like myself.

In my own limited experience of the working of penitentiaries I have been unfavourably impressed by the number of officers employed in them whose previous experience has been of a military nature. It has often occurred to me that it is not necessary to have persons of this type placed in positions of responsibility in penal institutions. As a result of their military training they are usually not persons inclined to encourage discussion and co-operation; instead, they are inclined to seek direct and complete obedience which is a concept not usually acceptable to the general public—and, of course, prisoners in penitentiaries are still part of the general public. I often have the impression that military discipline only infuriates people and deters them from co-operating. I may not be altogether fair in saying this, but it seems to me that the answers to some of the questions I have put to people with military minds have not been altogether acceptable to me, reflecting, as they did, a type of thinking which was distasteful to me when I was in the service and which still is, now that I am outside it. It seems to me we should give a great deal more consideration to employing people trained in the sociological field rather than those with a background of military training. While it may be all right to give some officers from the armed services jobs in these penitentiaries, I think we should be careful of putting too many of them in this particular field.

I wish to raise another question, one which relates to medical care. It has been brought to my attention that medical care in some of our penitentiaries by no means reaches the standard it should. Looking in the details of the estimates on page 252 I note that for all the penitentiaries we have one medical officer grade II, three medical officers grade I, seven part-time physicians and eight part-time psychiatrists. On the other hand, there are 18 chaplains and one part-time chaplain. It looks as though we look after the spiritual needs of the prisoners much better than we do their medical needs. One particular case at Kingston penitentiary was brought to my attention. The man's sister asked me to go and see him and I did. I received the courtesies that I am sure all hon. members would receive from the staff at the penitentiary if they should happen to go there. I was struck by the fact that this individual was seen much more often by psychiatrists than by physicians and the reports of the psychiatrists were given more credence than those of the physicians. It seems to me that in an institution as large as Kingston much greater attention should be paid to medical care.

Probably we can all take a lesson from the hon. member for York-Scarborough. He has visited many penitentiaries. A little while ago he said that he had shown interest in a number of them and had gone to visit them. Maybe we should show more interest in these institutions because many things are happening in them that to me are just not right. I have on my desk a return to an order of the house which indicates that a number of people were strapped, and it gives the offences for which they were strapped and the number of strokes they received. In most instances it was because they had talked roughly to an officer. I have a number of returns. I have information on a case that happened in the west. In this case the guard insists he was asked and pratically forced to resign because he raised the question that medical attention was not available to a man who died in solitary confinement. This man had been in solitary confinement previously and at the time of his death was in solitary confinement, with no medical attention available to him. He was completely alone. Of course, I do not know what might have occurred if he had had the medical attention which is normally available in an institution. In this particular case I am told that not even trained nurses were available or anyone who could give first aid, nor was there anyone available who had male nurse training.

It would seem to me that in an institution as large as Kingston, where there are well over 1,000 people, one doctor should be available at all times in the hospital. This means there would have to be three doctors on call. This is not unreasonable. I am sure we would expect this in a little town of 1,000 people. A doctor should be available there at all times. I do not know whether the minister wishes to comment on this particular case. I have read it. It concerns John Bathford, I believe.

The case we are discussing brought to mind the case of Waslychen. I think the minister should comment on this particular case. It is only an indication that all is not as we have been told. No doubt improvements have been made, but improvements remain to be made. There is no reason why we should assume that everything is as it should be. The implications in this particular case bear out what I have said about other cases that have come to my personal attention. This one has been discussed for two or three years. It is a British Columbia case and I do not wish to get involved in it. I have read it. It is the kind of case that warrants an answer. The gentleman should be charged with malicious intent, or something else, because the charges he makes are serious. I do not think it should be just left in the air. It should be answered and then some improvement made in the situation which would prevent it happening again, or it should be shown that the individual is not correct in the charges he makes. This case has been widely aired on the radio. I have read copies of the radio scripts and articles in the newspapers. It is a very well-known case.

I should like to bring another problem to the attention of the minister. This is an old one. I should like to read from the prisoners' own magazine entitled C.B. Diamond, dated October-November, 1959, Kingston penitentiary. I turn to page 24 of the magazine where we find the following:

Canada v. Russia

Prison systems and visits

The Russian system:

(The following is an excerpt from an article which appeared in Life magazine and was written by Judge Samuel Leibowitz, a prominent American jurist after a recent trip through the Soviet union.)

One other feature impressed me rather profoundly while I was inspecting Krukovd (the name of the prison). During my unconducted tour I strolled into a building which contained a series of small bedrooms. I glanced into one. A man and woman were sitting on a bed, engrossed in conversation.

"You don't have regular visiting rooms?" I (Mr. Leibowitz) asked the general. I was thinking of the many iron-cage interview rooms I have seen in the U.S., where a prisoner is permitted 30 minutes conversation with his wife perhaps once a month through a screen and under the eyes of guards.

Mr. Fulton: Can the hon. member tell me the date of this article?

Mr. Peters: October-November, 1959.

Mr. Fulton: Thank you.

Mr. Peters: I continue:

General Bochkov looked at me in surprise. "No," he said. "Our method is what you see here. This is a prisoner being visited by his wife, who will live with him several days. She was brought here at government expense and can come once a month, as long as his conduct is good. It is one of the reasons, I think, why we have so few efforts at escape.

Your prison methods in America disregard a prisoner's sexual and emotional life. It is part of your vengeful attitude. You feel it is none of your concern what happens to his marriage, to his wife, to the normal sex drive, to the most powerful instinct he has.

Don't think we don't know what goes on under your system. In your country a prisoner's marriage often disintegrates, robbing him of a central motive for reform. At best he is torn by doubts about his wife's virtue during the years they are separated and he may very likely be plunged into despair by learning that legally or otherwise she has forsaken him. And homosexuality, of course, is one of the biggest headaches of the wardens in your institutions."

The Canadian system: (As practised at Collin's bay Penitentiary).

The iron-cage system is not used at Collin's bay. There is no physical barrier between visitors and inmates, but the rules demand that there be absolutely no physical contact. No handshake between a father or brother... No wifely kiss... No kiss between mother and son... Nothing. The rules are strictly observed here. The other day I was visiting with my parents at the same time as another inmate was being visited by his wife. The half-hour period that we are allowed once a month came to an end and this man's wife leaned over to kiss him goodbye. It was a visible struggle for him to turn away as he must do, or else lose his visiting privileges. The disappointment in his wife's eyes also was plain. She did not understand why. She was hurt and the visit most certainly left her feeling depressed. That made the inmate feel even worse than if she had not come to see him. He felt so helpless; not able to comfort his wife when she needed it most.

One-half of an hour a month, that is all that is allowed for an inmate to try to keep his family together. And then just with conversation.

The article goes on to talk about the children coming. When I was at Kingston one could talk to one of the prisoners, but I had no desire to have a private conversation with one of them. One is aware of the fact that the guard is within hearing distance, and I do know that this must put a strain on the families. Unless something has happened in the past to make the present system at Kingston necessary, I think we should be developing a much more humane method of operation. I have referred to this prisoner's view of what he would like to see done and from my experience I am certainly in complete agreement with him. I can see no reason why we cannot find a much better method of dealing with this problem. It will be solved to some extent, of course, when we get away from enclosed prisons to the open-door type. As long as the prison building at Kingston remains where it is, it seems to me that we will always attempt to make use of it but in doing so we are actually making use of something that belongs in the decades of past centuries because of the nature of the building and the type of prison it is.

I have known people who have come out of Kingston penitentiary to resume civilian life, if that is what you call it, expecting to resume their married life only to experience a strained relationships not because of the wife's infidelity but because of the husband suspecting infidelity. The present system does nothing to make the return of the prisoner to civilian life that much easier.

This prisoner to whom I have referred suggests a different system and has quoted Judge Samuel Liebowitz as saying that it is not an unreasonable one. There should be no reason why arrangements could not be made at Kingston penitentiary so that wives and families could spend some time alone with their husbands and fathers. I may be wrong because of my inexperience in this field and the fact that I have not taken the interest I probably should have but it seems to me that something should be done that would be much more satisfactory than the present cold-blooded system.

I asked the guard the other day what his point was in listening to the conversation and he said he had no particular reasons except that it was his job to do so. He said he was supposed to listen to the conversation. I had no objection to him listening to my conversation but if I were in that prison and my wife came to visit me I think I would object violently to him listening to our conservation. I think we should move quickly to do something about these problems that are inherent in the very type of building at Kingston. This massive rock pile at Kingston is probably only good for the use to which it is being put. We should be working very hard to eliminate that prison.

While it is true that there are prisoners of the type to which the minister refers who may be put into solitary confinement possibly at their own request, it seems to me that we have failed to find a better way of solving the problem. I should like to refer to the answer to question 172 asked by the hon. member for Skeena on April 11, 1961. It has been mentioned that there are two prisoners who have been in solitary confinement for six years, 200 days and four years, 197 days, respectively but there are many who are in confinement for disciplinary reasons or under regulation 69, whatever that may be. For example, I note from the figures given here that various prisoners have been in solitary confinement for 208 days, 70 days, 128 days, 104 days, 244 days, 263 days, 109 days, and so on. There are many of these cases where prisoners are in solitary confinement for a considerable length of time and it seems to me that this is rather an archaic way of dealing with the problem. They might as well be punished by being placed in stocks in front of the town hall.

Obviously this system has not worked with many of these men. Men have not only been confined just for 21 days but many have been confined for close to a year, and the result has not been satisfactory. Such punishment can be inflicted as often as you want to inflict it and probably it is not too much of a hardship on these men. It seems to me that a great deal remains to be done and it behooves members of parliament to become more interested in the matter.

It has always seemed to me that to be too interested in our penitentiaries has been regarded as a nasty business. It might be very nice to look the other way but when you make inquiries and offer suggestions and are given the brush-off it obviously behooves you to do something about it. The whole matter needs to be investigated further from the point of view of the institution and it needs more study on the part of members because their knowledge is not sufficient to understand the needs of the institution.

I have referred to the matter of prisoners in Kingston who have wives and young children and I see absolutely no reason why a prisoner could not be put in a room with his wife and children in order to talk to them privately. They cannot get out the door because it is bolted. What do you expect they are going to do? The children are not going to run away. They could be held as hostages. It seems to me that the present method is archaic.

I do not know whether we have advanced enough socially in this country to use the Russian system. Certainly the Americans have been using it for many years in the more advanced states. There are also some states that are much more in the dark ages than we are. However, there are some states that use this visiting technique. Cottages are provided and the family can come and stay for the week end. How much better it is for people who are going back into society to have a close relationship with that society particularly after they have been confined for a number of years. Otherwise it seems to me we are asking for trouble when we throw them out into society. They go back to families who have grown away from them and they do not know them any more. We are not doing them any favour and this in turn in reflected in their attitude to society.

The matter of medical attention is one that I think we should consider. It may be quite true that prisoners are probably just as good at swinging the lead as army people. This may be one of the reasons why they are not dealt with too favourably. A number of people in the penitentiaries division were army officers and they deal with these matters in that light. It does seem to me that, medically speaking, the penitentiaries are much understaffed. Possibly they are overstaffed in a psychiatric and psychological sense. In any event, it seems to me that something should be done to correct the situation.

I would think that part of the problem could be met simply by having doctors come to the penitentiaries as consultants. In that way there would at least be some assurance of impartiality. If there is only one doctor in Kingston penitentiary and he is dealing with 1,400 or 1,500 people, I am quite sure there are some who would say that the doctor is no good, that the doctor is a quack and not competent because the same thing occurs in every little town. You may even disagree with your wife on this matter. She may go to one doctor and you may go to another. You have faith in your doctor and she has faith in hers. However, it seems to me that with such a large number of inmates in our prisons there should be some opportunity for them to have some choice. When cases such as the Waslychen case are brought to the attention of the minister, I think there is need to give consideration to the situation which I in my limited experience have also found to exist. I hope the minister will give some consideration to the problems of the prisoners themselves in connection with this matter of being able to visit with their families.

Mr. Macdonnell: I rise, Mr. Chairman, merely for the purpose of putting in what lawyers call a caveat to the remarks made by the hon. member for Timiskaming. I should like to say that I think we all give him credit for the fact that he has interested himself, as he has, in this matter and has made a study of it. I am sure his representations will be considered on their merits by the minister and his staff. The point upon which I do wish to put in a caveat is this: The member seems to wash out, as unsuitable for positions on the penitentiary staff, military officers. I should like to differ with him there. In my opinion, a regimental officer who has shared the toils and dangers of battle with his men is much more competent to deal in a humane and understanding way with the ordinary, run of the mill citizens we come across both inside and outside penitentiaries.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Timiskaming has, unfortunately, concerned himself primarily with situations and circumstances going back as far as five years. I think if he would concern himself more with what the situation is today, he would not have such a gloomy, pessimistic view of the situation in our penitentiaries as he seems to have.

In so far as the case in British Columbia is concerned, he is talking about events that took place in 1958, and he is not even talking accurately about them. The inmate in question who died was seen every day by the orderly from the prison hospital, and every two or three days by the prison medical doctor. It is quite true that this case and others brought to my attention, after having been investigated by members of the correctional planning committee the chairman of which is now the commissioner for penitentiaries, led me to the conclusion there was an unsatisfactory situation in the British Columbia penitentiary. Action was taken to remedy the situation in the prison hospital and to have medical service available. I am only sorry that the hon. member, who professes such a desire to visit our penitentiaries and obtain up to date information, has not visited British Columbia to satisfy himself as to the present circumstances.

It might interest the hon. member also to know that we have a substantial provision in the main estimates this year for commencing the construction of a 50 bed hospital at Kingston penitentiary. It is quite true that we will probably never be able to have as many doctors serving the penitentiaries as we might think ideal in order to provide adequate medical service. I am satisfied, however, that if my hon. friend will visit any one of our institutions he will find the situation has improved appreciably over what it was in the past.

We are embarking upon a new system which we have instituted in at least two of our penitentiaries, that is arranging contracts with clinics to provide service instead of relying exclusively on the employment of one doctor to whom we can rarely pay a salary under the appropriations authorized here. No first class man is prepared to give his whole time to the penitentiary. Under the contract system, we are getting very good service, and that is the system which we have instituted in British Columbia, starting about a year ago.

In so far as conditions prevailing with respect to visitors to institutions are concerned, I was interested to note that my hon. friend again was reading from a publication dated October or November, 1959, going back about two years. I am not saying that the situation in every one of our institutions is satisfactory today, but it is certainly vastly improved over what it was two or three years ago. My hon. friend went on to refer to the situation in Kingston, where he is dealing with an overcrowded maximum security institution. I have never hesitated to admit that conditions at Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul, particularly these two institutions, are unsatisfactory because of the gross overcrowding there.

My hon. friend has picked out, as he is entitled to do if he wants, one of our overcrowded, maximum security institutions where certain security difficulties are necessarily encountered and impose limitations on doing the things we would like to do to improve visiting facilities. If he were to go to some of our medium security institutions or other maximum security institutions, he would see a decided change. I mentioned in my introductory remarks a new approach to visiting and letter writing, as well as the fact that inmates spend time out of their cells in communal activities. Visiting privileges are but one part of the new approach to our penitentiaries program. Naturally enough, we have been making the most progress in those institutions where the physical set-up enables this to be done. As soon as we can get other new institutions in Ontario to relieve the overcrowded situation in Kingston, then there will be some progress because of the physical facilities available. The raising of the limitation on the number of visits authorized per inmate at Kingston would mean that some inmates would have frequent visitors, while others would have none. We have to ration them, unfortunately, because of the limitation of physical accommodation we have for visitors.

Mr. Peters: We are not really disagreeing with each other. I said I was only aware of and concerned with Kingston. However, I believe the minister is unfair in his treatment of this other matter when he says I am raising a matter that is three years old. I was reading from a copy of an interview that took place at 6.10 p.m. on Wednesday, March 15, 1961. A question was asked about it by the hon. member for Skeena on the 17th, and the minister's reply does not appear to me to be valid at all. This condition has existed for three years and charges have been made and are still being made about it.

The minister also referred to the fact that in this particular hospital in British Columbia there were nurses. In a broadcast by Jack Webster during the program called "City Mike", on April 6, 1960, this statement was made:

> The male nurses at the pen are not registered nurses. They are graduates of Essondale nursing hospital—psychiatric nurses. They do hold first aid certificates.

I am also aware of the fact that the doctors should be allowed to operate their own practice. It was for this reason I suggested that doctors should be on a 24-hour basis, having three doctors rather than one so that one doctor would be in attendance at all times and yet these doctors would still be able to operate their own practice to supplement their income. It is true that a good doctor is not going to work for the penitentiaries branch at $7,000 per annum when he can make $18,000 to $20,000 in private practice. We are aware of these things, but this does not mean that we can justify the circumstances and nothing should be done about them.

I am aware of the improvement that has been made at Joyceville, but it would take a great many of these little prisons to equal one Kingston penitentiary in which there are 1,200 or 1,500 inmates. It takes a great many of these little institutions like that at Joyceville and at the new farm that is going in there at Kingston to make up the number of people who are in Kingston penitentiary. As to the matter that was raised and the problem involved in it, maybe the minister did not understand. I did not intend to go into it. I did not want to do so and I am not going to do it now. I think some of the members from British Columbia have been much more interested in it than have I.

However, there is an implication with regard to one of the guards, a man who had served with the minister in the armed services or who had served under him, a man who has had service in many parts of the world under several of the officers who are now members of the House of Commons, and I presume they personally know whether or not he is honest. The implication is that he has been fired or at least has been forced to resign, or says he has been forced to resign, because he went to the minister, went over the heads of the penitentiary branch and particularly the officials in British Columbia. He says that this is why he had to resign.

What the minister indicates is this, and I do not disagree because what he says is borne out by all the information that I have. The minister indicates that he had an investigation into the hospital, that he was unsatisfied with the situation existing and that he corrected this situation. However, we still have this gentleman who appears still to want to work in the penitentiary department and who says he was fired or was forced to resign. He points out some of the disciplinary action that was taken against him because he went to the minister.

I also should like to say that this argument fits in very much with the argument that I was making against the military people who sometimes are involved. I have no disagreement with what was said by the hon. member for Greenwood. I agree that the training in many cases is the best training that could possibly be given. In other cases there is a tendency to follow the book and not to give any consideration to the exceptions that sometimes make up the rule. It is for these reasons that I mentioned this particular case. The minister himself is going to have to justify to himself—because he knows much more about it than does anyone else—if this is so, the reason why this happened.

I am concerned only for this reason. It would mean that if anybody wanted to make any suggestion or wanted to bring to the attention of the minister any malpractice that was taking place he would be immediately, as Mr. Bathford indicates punished in the same way and his dismissal or his resignation would be sought in the same manner. If this is true, I think the minister will agree with me that it would eliminate part of the protection or control that the whole system would have by having a co-operative staff. I may be tempering all this on something else. I could point out that this happened in a local provincial jail where the situation was very much the same and where eventually an investigation in Ontario into the situation resulted in the firing of a warden and the top executives in that prison. However, it did not get back the jobs of the people who brought this matter to the attention of the attorney general in the first place. Those people are no longer members of the staff of the penitentiary. Although what they said was justified and the results for which they asked came about, they sacrificed themselves as employees in order to accomplish it.

Mr. Fulton: It is perhaps unfortunate that the hon. member does not put on the record all the other information he has available in connection with this case. It was also given earlier in this House of Commons in answer to questions by the hon. member for Skeena. It is true that the guard in question was one of those who brought to the attention of the authorities and ultimately to my attention directly, through a member of my staff, what he regarded as the unsatisfactory situation with respect to the hospital and medical facilities in British Columbia penitentiary. As I have indicated, that situation was investigated and effective steps were taken to improve the situation. The penitentiary officer in question was not proceeded against or adversely reported upon in any way as a result of the fact that he had brought this information to my attention. In the course of the reorganization of our penitentiary service as a whole the then warden of British Columbia penitentiary was transferred to Saskatchewan penitentiary. When the new warden arrived in British Columbia, in the course of his review of the personnel serving under him, he recommended that an annual salary increase, which had been withheld from the guard in question, should in fact be authorized and be made retroactive. That was the treatment this guard received and it is far from being treatment prejudiced to his situation. The new warden indeed preferred him and went out of his way to recommend that a retroactive adjustment in his favour should be made and that was accomplished and instituted by the new commissioner.

This is far from being suggestive of the fact that the guard was being prejudiced and persecuted because of the initiative he had taken. Some time later however, he himself submitted his resignation. His resignation was accepted and forwarded. He came forward himself later and said that he wanted the opportunity of stating his reasons. He was invited to state his reasons and was informed that, as the regulations provided, they would be forwarded to the commissioner. Afterwards he wrote a letter saying that, under the circumstances, he had decided that he did not wish to submit any reasons for his resignation.

I think it is unfortunate that my hon. friend did not put that information on the record because it is all in his possession. It indicates the very contrary of what he has been trying to establish, namely that this guard was prejudiced and persecuted because he brought information to my attention.

Mr. Peters: If I had this information—and it is quite possible that it is here—it is because I borrowed a file from someone else. It is therefore possible that the information is here.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Skeena has all the information. I have discussed the matter with him personally.

Mr. Peters: I may have it but the information that I have had an opportunity of looking at is mainly a copy of the script of a broadcast made on March 15 of this year. I think I indicated accurately what was in that particular broadcast. If there is other information available in connection with the matter, certainly the minister has now given it and it is perfectly acceptable to me.

Mr. Hicks: I have a question that I should like to ask the minister about the new correctional work camp at Agassiz. I am wondering when it is proposed to have this started and when some of the occupants will be there.

Mr. Fulton: We expect to be able to move the trailers which are going to serve as the accommodation in there on June 15. As soon as they are established in there the first 20 inmates will be moved in.

Item agreed to.

177. Construction, improvements and equipment, $5,850,865.

Mr. Roberge: This is an item of $5,850,865 plus a supplementary vote of $900,000, that we are going to be asked to vote. Will the minister indicate the percentage of the work done by inmates and of the work done by outsiders? With regard to the latter, is some effort being made to hire unemployed persons through the national employment service?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I could not, without a good deal of research at any rate, break down into percentages the amount of work that is being done by inmates and the amount being done by contract of the total work represented in this vote. I can say without hesitation, however, that the great majority of it is being done by contract. Generally speaking, wherever work is being done within an institution, within the building already there, it is done with inmate labour. In some cases where work is done on the reserve, with respect even to new buildings, some of it is done by inmates. However, generally speaking, where new construction is concerned it is done by contract. I would say that the great bulk of the work, 80 per cent anyway, represented in this item is contract work.

Mr. McFarlane: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity to wish the minister well in his program. I fully realize that he has a problem which is serious all over the country at the present time and I should like to congratulate him on the progress that has been made.

I should also like to answer the hon. member for Timiskaming. I think if these people want to stay with their families, all they have to do is keep out of trouble.

The hon. member said there are not enough medical practitioners in the penitentiaries. There are many places in British Columbia with 1,500 or 2,000 inhabitants which have no medical practitioners at all, and I think they should be given consideration.

I should like to review under this item the request I have made in the past. First I should like to refer to my remarks in 1958 when I asked for the establishment of a minimum security prison or institution in the Fernie area. I said:

> The establishment in Fernie of a penitentiary would have the effect of bringing people into the area and providing the personnel of the penitentiary with an attractive community in which to reside.

The minister's reply at that time was as follows:

> We will have to survey the whole available field and, in fairness, I think I must say that when we make a decision it will have to be made in accordance with what seems to be the best program of building that we can devise.

In 1959 I also raised the same question on the floor of the house and at that time I said:

> —I should like to add my recommendation to those already made for proposed construction of penitentiaries in western Canada.

In fact, we will be very pleased to receive anything that is available. I said at that time:

> At the moment I am not very interested in the type of construction, but I am interested in the location. We have already established a precedent in the establishment and construction of a penitentiary at Springhill.

The minister replied:

When we get the committee's report we shall be able to come to some final conclusion. As I have assured my hon. friend and others who have written me on behalf of Fernie on previous occasions, the suitability of that location will be most carefully investigated.

In 1960 also I raised this same matter and asked approximately the same question. I said:

Ever since being elected to this house in March, 1958 I have been quite interested in the construction of penitentiaries in western Canada. We have placed our views before the department with regard to the need for penitentiaries in British Columbia. We have requested also that serious consideration be given to locating a penitentiary in the city of Fernie.

At that time the minister replied:

—I would remind the committee that we are designing a national system of correctional institutions. The program we are developing will be nation wide and the new institutions, wherever and whenever built, have to fit in with the national plan.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, we have the request for penitentiaries in other places. I notice that since the trouble with the mines at Springhill—and the situation is very similar in my own constituency—there has been a development in the penitentiary system. I have here an editorial headed:

Good old Elliot Lake.

This editorial appeared in the Fernie Free Press on July 7, 1960:

In another part of this issue will be found a news story from Elliot Lake, Ontario, which is threatened with the closure of some uranium mines. It reads in part: "Plans for a $2 million prison farm and a provincial park development to bolster the economy of this slump-threatened centre were announced—

We have this progress in other places, and we have the same situation in Fernie. I believe that some action should be taken. It has been a year and a half now since the committee submitted its report on this matter; it was submitted a year ago last January. I feel that our committee did a wonderful job on this report and some action should now be forthcoming.

I have not seen the press report myself and I cannot quote it, but I understand the minister made a statement concerning the system of minimum security prisons and forestry camps running from Ontario through to Prince Albert, Saskatchewan. We have seen the same thing in British Columbia; minimum security institutions and forestry camps have spread as far as the lower mainland in the Okanagan.

I realize the terrific problem the minister has on his hands at the present time, but I feel that now is the time to make a change in this policy. I do not feel this is a time when we should centralize any further. I believe in decentralization all over our provinces.

I have the support of the residents and business people of New Westminster, who have requested that the penitentiary be removed from that area. Yet at this time I find an item in the estimates for an amount pretty close to three quarters of a million dollars—I have not looked at the supplementary estimates—in connection with the penitentiary in New Westminster, in spite of the recommendation that this penitentiary be moved out of that area.

There are several other matters that I think we should discuss at this time. I think we should bring this type of departmental work to various sections of the country. It is apparent to me that we have worked from the east to the west, and we have worked from the west to the east, and those of us who are in the middle are kind of left holding the bag. I am very hopeful that sooner or later the department will realize that British Columbia does not stop at the Okanagan, that the rest of Canada does not stop at Prince Albert, and those of us in the intervening areas should receive some consideration.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I rise to disagree and agree with the hon. member for Kootenay East. I cannot agree with his rather unsympathetic approach to the suggestions made by my colleague, the hon. member for Timiskaming, or his unsympathetic attitude toward the rehabilitation of those unfortunate persons who find themselves in penitentiaries. When I think about these unfortunate people I always say to myself that they are not entirely responsible for their own unfortunate circumstances but are a product of the society in which we live, in many instances. I say, again, under such circumstances no man is an island unto himself.

I do hope that the hon. member for Kootenay East will reread the speech of the hon. member for Timiskaming and, after having slept on it, will be in a little more generous mood toward these unfortunate people.

However, having disagreed with the hon. member on his philosophy of rehabilitation of inmates of penal institutions, I do wish to say that I heartily agree with him and support his request for the consideration of Fernie as a suitable location for the building of a penitentiary. I have some knowledge of the local circumstances. I have received letters from local organizations and local persons and I know that he has stated the case very well indeed. I wish to express my complete support for his effort to put forward the case for the suitability of Fernie as the location, particularly in view of the economic circumstances which exist in that city, and I hope that because of his great influence with the minister his plea will not be in vain.

Mr. Fulton: I think I should reply to the hon. member for Kootenay East whose interest in and concern about this matter are well known to me. I am sorry that I cannot say at the moment just where in western Canada the new institution will be built but I can say that the interest of the communities out there will be satisfied by an answer which I hope to give this fall. Our plans are advancing rapidly and I am sure that by the time we come to prepare our main estimates this fall, in October or November, I shall be able to include an appropriation for the purpose of purchasing a site for the new institution in western Canada. This will necessarily involve us in making a decision as to where it should be.

We have been aware that the lack of a definite statement is causing concern and uncertainty in those communities which are interested. On the other hand, I hope that members of the committee and the communities themselves will realize that under the scheme of government financing we do not get the money to make such purchases long before the facilities are needed; we have to wait until we are very close to making a purchase before we ask treasury board to approve an item in the estimates in that respect. I would point out that it would also be very dangerous and undesirable if, say, two years before we are going to make a purchase we announce that we planned to build in a certain area. This would have a very definite effect on land values in that area. I know that when the time comes to make a decision in this case I shall make 199 enemies and only one friend, but that is something which falls to the lot of all ministers from time to time. In the meantime, I want to pay tribute to my hon. friend for the skilful and kindly yet persistent way in which he has drawn the interest and facilities of his area to my attention.

Mr. McFarlane: I should like to express my appreciation to the minister for his explanation of this problem. I realize the difficulty he has and I am sure my constituents feel very much as I do, namely that when the difficulty is finally solved the minister will have found the right answer.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—

Headquarters administration and national police services—

378. Operation and maintenance, $7,904,906.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Herridge: This is an important item which involves, in all, a sum of nearly $56 million—

Mr. Fulton: I think this is the start of the R.C.M.P. items. I did indicate I would be prepared to make a statement at this point. It will not be of any great length, so the hon. member for Kootenay West will not have to defer his remarks very long if he will be good enough to allow me to make it now.

At the outset of our consideration of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police estimates for the present fiscal year, I should like to take the opportunity to say a few words to this committee about one of the activities or functions of the force which has recently been the subject of some comment. I refer to the security work which has been the responsibility of the force for many years and which has been performed unobtrusively, efficiently and with the least possible interference with the private lives of Canadian citizens.

It is, I am certain, obvious to all members of this committee, as it is to the public of Canada, that a security and intelligence service is necessary in order to preserve national security in the present world situation. This is not something which gives either the government or the members of the R.C.M.P. any pleasure or satisfaction, but it is, in our view, a fact arising from the situation in the world today, and as a result the task of carrying out this work is imposed upon the R.C.M.P. They have not asked for it. They do not particularly relish it, but I do venture to say that they carry it out in a manner which is most satisfactory to the Canadian public. It is not the kind of work which can be carried out without giving rise to misgivings and occasional unpleasant situations, but I think I should remind the committee that one or to unpleasant incidents will attract attention out of all proportion to the relation they bear to the total amount of activity in which the security force is engaged. Of the many thousands of inquiries made it is only a fraction of 1 per cent that gives rise to these difficulties and the publicity which occasionally occurs. I should like also to mention that in the security field the function of the R.C.M.P. is to gather facts and not to pass judgment on those facts. That responsibility rests elsewhere, primarily with the government. Others are responsible for judging the facts and deciding what should be done in view of the facts so reported.

Some of the things I have said are perhaps a little obvious but in view of the comments

I have seen, which suggest a misunderstanding, it might not hurt to repeat them. Obviously a security and intelligence service which does not keep its information secret, confidential and withheld from unauthorized persons is not fulfilling its responsibility. We get criticism on two counts. The R.C.M.P. are criticized because they keep their information confidential and refuse to disclose it. On the other hand there have been criticisms because, it is said, the fact that they are making these investigations known, whereas it should have been kept secret. Any security service must maintain its information absolutely confidential, for the use only of those who are authorized to receive it. It would be unfortunate indeed if the security program were to involve unnecessary interference with the private lives of Canadian citizens. Not only would this be undesirable from the individual's point of view, but it would injure the security program itself by reducing public support for the program, a support that is so necessary.

I am satisfied that I do not need to spend any time reminding members of this committee that there is a need for a security and intelligence service to protect the interest of Canada and Canadians against the efforts of those who are our opponents and who resort to espionage and subversive efforts to pursue and gain their own end. It is because of this that we have a security service. I know also that all hon. members are concerned that our security program should not cause any undue or unnecessary inconvenience to any Canadian citizen. I share this concern and I assure the committee that this matter is receiving and will continue to receive my personal attention as it does that of the commissioner and of all responsible officers of the R.C.M. police.

As I said, we know we cannot give 100 per cent satisfaction in this field. We know that we shall never have the Utopia in which this kind of activity on our part is unnecessary and which will not give rise to occasional concern. We know that the job is necessary. It is being done efficiently and we anticipate that it will have the over-all support of the Canadian people so long as we are scrupulous, as we are, to see that it is carried out with the minimum possible interference with the private lives and concerns of individuals; in other words, as far as it is humanly possible to ensure it, no individual is going to be unjustly prejudiced as a result of the application of this policy on the one hand. On the other it is a responsibility which neither the R.C.M. police, which has always accepted its responsibilities, nor the government, which has the over-all responsibility for the national interests, can avoid.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad indeed that the minister opened the study of this item by saying a few words on security. As a matter of fact, this is the topic that I was concerned with and I should like to make a few remarks on it. There is no doubt that the task of security work is very important indeed, and there is also no doubt in my mind that even if the members of the R.C.M. Police who are engaged in this work are doing their utmost to discharge their duties efficiently, there is room for improvement. This is evidenced, I think, by at least three things. The first one that comes to my mind is, of course, the Biernacki case in Montreal. I do not want to deal with it because it is before the courts.

The other case that comes to mind is in the province of Quebec also and arose in Laval University where two students were under inquiry. The third thing which prompts me to say there is room for improvement is the annual report of the R.C.M. police for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960.

This report shows that only two members of the force were sent on cipher training courses; only nine took language training courses, which would surely be needed for comprehensive security work; three were taking full-time university training last year, and only one graduated in law in 1959-60. Two were studying for an arts degree and 12 members of the force were taking a 1-year non-degree university course.

According to the report, it is a fact that 54 members of the R.C.M. Police were undertaking or about to complete their training in security and intelligence. These figures appear on pages 43 and 44 of the report.

I am also informed, Mr. Chairman, and I have no reason to believe that my information is not correct, that at the present time the basic schooling requirement for entrance into the R.C.M. police is only grade 10. I would think that a much higher grade should be required, especially for the members of the force engaged in security work. I am sure the minister will agree with me that to carry on detective work in this field of security requires a vast knowledge of political theory in order to investigate security matters and also to conduct investigations. Of course, I do not know exactly what kind of course is envisaged in security and intelligence work and I hope the minister will give us some details on that.

I should like to put some questions to the minister which he might answer a little later on. How many constables in the security division have only the minimum entrance requirement of grade 10? How many N.C.O.'s or commissioned officers have only grade 10 education or instruction? At the same time the minister might explain to us why only nine members of the force took language training. Why are only three studying for a full law degree and only two for an arts degree? The minister might also tell the committee, perhaps not in a detailed way, how much it would cost to require every security investigator to have a degree in political and sociological sciences.

I mentioned the case of the two students in Laval University who were investigated. The minister might tell the committee if some matters other than communism are grounds for investigation. I would mention especially some groups in Canada that are advocating that the United States take over Canada, or those who are advocating the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada. Are these also the subject of investigation?

These are the remarks that I wanted to put on the record at this time. In answering I hope the minister will let us know what kind of courses are required for security and intelligence investigators and why only those that I have mentioned are studying for degrees in law and the arts?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the minister's remarks with respect to the question of security investigations and I shall deal with that question a little later on. However, before doing so, I wish to express my sincere appreciation of the history, of the traditions, of the record and of the services performed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, sometimes under very difficult circumstances. I must say the force has quite an unusual and difficult service to perform in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. I have known a number of the inspectors, officers, N.C.O.'s and men in the force, and have known some for a number of years. I must say they are most patient and most careful in the exercise of their duties, very frustrating and difficult duties at times, to make certain that they carry them out in accord with their traditions and our usual practices.

I am particularly impressed with the community work undertaken by members of the force in the district which I know best, namely the Kootenays. It usually takes the form of three types of activity. First, there is their interest, which is very much appreciated in the smaller communities, in community activities and organizations. I have had a number of people comment on this and I know all these small communities quite well indeed. I think this is a very good example of the excellent training and discipline the force receives because when you have one, two or three members of the force in an isolated detachment it is very easy, human beings being what they are, not to do more than is required in the line of duty.

The second type of activity is co-operation with local organizations in the recognition of days of national importance. This has been very much appreciated, particularly with respect to remembrance day because in a number of the larger places they put themselves out to help to make the day successful in the proper sense of the word.

Third, there is the work of a number of corporals and constables in connection with youth groups which I think is of particular importance. I am thinking of members of three or four detachments in my constituency who are interested in church work, in scouts and other youth groups, and I find that this is a most valuable activity on the part of members of the force. In the small communities, particularly where the population is not large, these men have an influence out of all proportion to their numbers compared with the personal influence a person can exercise in a very large centre. I have talked to a number of young people in these places and I can say that this work on their part, which is quite beyond the call of their normal duties, is appreciated by the parents and particularly by the boys in question who, because of this contact with members of the force, have a respect for them as representatives of the state interested in the preservation of the rights and privileges that we should all enjoy.

Having said that, I must say that I have been asked to deal with a matter this afternoon that has concerned quite a number of people. I have had a lady visit me as the representative of the council of students at Laval University and have had persons converse with me from Queen's University and from the University of Toronto. This matter has to do with some aspects of the activities of the security section of the force which have been brought to the attention of the public recently through the press. I refer to the same circumstances that were mentioned by the previous speaker.

If I understood the minister correctly, the security force does its best to perform its duties without trespassing upon the rights of citizens, and I think this is generally true. But the parliament of Canada is the place to raise any question that arises when, in the opinion of some persons, there has been a transgression of their human rights and fundamental freedoms. I have promised a number of persons to raise this matter on these estimates, which is the appropriate time.

I want to refer first of all to an article that appeared in La Presse of Montreal on Tuesday, May 23. I had the article translated by the bureau of translation so I presume it is accurate. It is entitled "Sequel to an Article from Le Carabin; If You Do Not Like the Atom Bomb, Beware the R.C.M.P." The article is written by Jean David. I am going to read it and comment on it as I do so because, as the previous speaker said, I think it indicates clearly that possibly there is some need for improvement and for greater care under particular circumstances. I am quite sure that no member of the house would question the necessity for security forces or that their work is necessary. What we are concerned about is that the security force should carry on according to the traditions of the force and according to the accepted understanding of the rights and privileges of the citizens of this country. I read:

Is a person suspect because he is against nuclear armaments? "We must protect life and property", is the answer you will get from a Mr. Berlinguette. This man is said to be the chief of the counter-espionage section of the Quebec detachment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

That is the answer Mr. Berlinguette gave to two Laval students who came to inquire about an investigation being made of them. An R.C.M.P. constable by the name of Plourde had called them "communists" in the presence of a female student whom he was asking to do espionage for the Mounted Police.

I might say that I asked the young lady who came from Quebec city to visit me if this was correct and she said the student council would vouch that this was an accurate report of the circumstances of the case. I come to the next paragraph headed "Origin of the Affair". It reads as follows:

The affair began with the publication of two pages of articles against nuclear weapons in Le Carabin, a students' newspaper at Laval, edition of April 20. The action was taken by the Laval section of the intervarsity campaign for nuclear disarmament. Miss Helene Senecal and Mr. Edward Smith set the pages and wrote a preamble. Among the various texts compiled by the two students are a quotation by Nikita Khrushchev himself, but also testimonies from persons as Catholic as Pope Pius XII and John F. Kennedy. What is more laughable in the context is the inclusion of a short poem by Ezra Pound, who is well known for his fascist sympathies.

One week after this issue of the Carabin appeared, an officer of the Mounted Police by the name of Plourde approached Miss Jacqueline Cyr, a student in pedagogy and guidance as a "friend of the family". Officer Plourde told the girl that he was making an investigation of communism at Laval. When she asked him what was the matter, Plourde talked to her about the intervarsity campaign for nuclear disarmament. He thrust under her nose, the two pages from the Carabin produced by Helene Senecal and Edward Smith.

If that report is accurate it does indicate that there is need for some improvement because it is quite obvious that this officer or constable was not carrying out security work in the proper manner. I continue:

Officer Plourde then asked Miss Cyr to join the group and report to him on the activities of the section. He appealed to her patriotism, pointing out that her co-operation would be greatly appreciated by the R.C.M.P. Jacqueline Cyr did not agree to join the game, and what is more, she expressed her support for the I.V.C.N.D., and also attacked Plourde and his methods. Previously, Officer Plourde had questioned her at length about the two persons who were responsible for the pages in the Carabin. She had objected to that interrogation. As he left her, Plourde did not conceal his exasperation.

Meanwhile, a Mr. Jean Marc Bourdet was ostentatiously making an investigation of the two students. Bourdet introduced himself as a counter-espionage agent. The mounted police told the students that they did not know that man and also repeated it to us. Irritated by these methods, Helene Senecal and Edward Smith decided to take the bull by the horns. They telephoned the R.C.M.P. and demanded explanations. An officer replied that the R.C.M.P. would get in touch with them. They waited. A week passed. Despite the fact that it was examination time, they telephoned again. Once again an attempt was made to brush them off, but they insisted. Finally they were told that it was not a question that could be settled over the telephone and were asked to report to the headquarters. An appointment was made for them.

Therefore on May 8, between two examinations, the two students proceeded to No. 1 Grande Allée east. Miss Senecal asked to speak to the chief of the counter-espionage section. The receptionist replied, "Counter-espionage? We don't have that here." Miss Senecal then replied that they had an appointment with someone in any case. The receptionist asked them to be seated.

This is a report of the interview.

After a few minutes a man came down from the first floor and took them up to his office. On the door were the words "Criminal Investigations". The man never revealed his name or position. However, Helene Senecal deciphered the name Berlinguette which was on a plaque; she could only see the tops of the letters and she had to read them upside down. (Actually, after several calls to the mounted police, Quebec detachment and Montreal detachment, we managed to confirm that there is an officer by that name and that his initials are J. F. We have never been able to learn the initials of officer Plourde, but we were assured that an officer by that name is with the Quebec detachment).

Then followed a strange dialogue. Let us introduce the actors. We have told all we know about officer J. F. Berlinguette. Edward Smith is a young American from Lynn, Massachusetts; he has just completed his 2nd year in social work at Laval. Helene Senecal is the daughter of a well known lawyer on St. James street. After studies at Marianopolis, she went last September to the faculty of social science at Laval.

Officer Berlinguette first congratulated the two students for having come to see him in connection with this affair before he called them. But in a few minutes he told them that he did not know at all what they were talking about.

Berlinguette admitted moreover that Plourde got in touch with Miss Cyr, but cast doubt on the girl's evidence. He denied that Plourde asked Jacqueline Cyr to do spying. Each time he was pressed by the two students, Berlinguette answered something like this: "That little girl got excited and it is very easy to alter the facts." He repeated such a phrase several times.

At one moment the officer told the students that he knew perfectly well they were not communists, that the I.V.C.N.D. is not a communist organization and added that the mounted police is interested only in "communist infiltration". But although he insisted and repeated that the two students were not the subject of any investigation, he forgot himself later and gave to understand that he knew Smith was an American. Smith asked him how he knew. Berlinguette told him that there are not many English-speaking students at Laval and that he knows them all.

At another moment he said that he had investigated the persons responsible for the two pages in question "because I had orders to investigate". From whom? It is not known.

Later this man who had said a few minutes earlier that there had not been any investigation declared this time with regard to Miss Cyr, "The next time an investigation is made, we will try to find someone more reliable than that".

That is, to spy on her fellow students.

The two young people then pointed out that the premier of Saskatchewan, Mr. Tommy Douglas, had attacked the mounted police the day before for an investigation it allegedly made of the national committee against the dangers of radioactivity. Berlinguette did not conceal the slight importance he attaches to the C.C.F. leader and suggested that by such a statement he had a political objective in mind. With regard to the national committee against dangers of radioactivity Berlinguette first maintained that the R.C.M.P. has never made an investigation of that organization (it is known that, for example, one of the directors of the Montreal section is Father Jacques Cousineau, S.J.). A few minutes later Berlinguette went on to say that if the R.C.M.P. made an investigation of the committee in question it was not because of its communist activities, but because there exists "a danger of communist infiltration in such organizations".

In reply to the students who attacked the methods of the R.C.M.P., officer Berlinguette said, "We must protect life and property." And he went on, "Who knows how many members of the clergy are communists? Who knows how many people in the Conservative party, in the Liberal party are communists."

You will note, Mr. Chairman, he did not mention this little group over here. I mention this report to indicate the ridiculous nature of these comments by a person engaged in security work.

He even added, "We know very well that Jean Lesage is not a communist, but who is to say that there are not some people in his party who are communists?"

Berlinguette also had this to say to Helene Senecal and Edward Smith concerning their fellow students in the I.V.C.N.D. whose ideas the young people said they knew: "But what do you know about that? You did not know them until one or two years ago. What did they do before? Where do they come from?"

The two young people then asked Berlinguette if the R.C.M.P., by such an "investigation" did not wish simply to discredit an organization such as the I.V.C.N.D., by sowing seeds of doubt. Berlinguette did not refute that statement, even though he admitted that there was nothing communistic about the organization. But he stressed the idea of "communist infiltration", and repeated one of his favourite phrases "We must protect life and property".

[Mr. Herridge.]

Closing word: Officer Berlinguette told the two young people, "We have no apologies to make to you."

The interview lasted about three quarters of an hour.

I place this report on record in full to indicate support for the previous hon. member who suggested that some of these people have not the qualifications required to carry out this sort of work with discretion and without offence to people. As I said, I have discussed this question very carefully with the representatives of the students council of Laval University, with a number of people. Members of the faculty of universities and students in a number of cities are concerned. A great number of people are concerned and aroused by this newspaper report which, apparently, is news right across Canada. I am very pleased to know that people are sensitive when they believe the rights of any Canadian citizen in any part of Canada have been trespassed upon.

The previous speaker made some reference to the educational qualifications of the men engaged in this security work. Like him, I have done a bit of research with respect to the report of March 31, 1960. I want to make a few comments in connection with this security work. In my opinion, in so far as security matters are concerned, the job of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is to report the facts about an individual or a movement, not to express an opinion. Does this not in itself require a sophisticated evaluation of words and actions on the part of the person concerned. Then, how can a sophisticated evaluation be made by a person with little or no education in political theory and philosophy? This point was raised by the previous speaker when he said that, according to reports, it appears that entrance into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police requires a grade 10 education.

Now, a man can perform excellent service with a grade 10 education, but in this particular type of work I suggest that a higher educational qualification is required. A constable, I understand, could be given these tasks in connection with security work with a grade 10 education, although I understand that there are many of the investigators who have a better educational minimum than that. According to the latest Royal Canadian Mounted Police report, only three members of the force were taking full time legal training; only two were taking full time arts; only 12 were taking non-degree courses in specific subjects. According to the same report, only nine members of the force were taking languages. I am told, and I have received information in correspondence from persons connected with universities, that many university people are under the impression that the force is somewhat unsympathetic toward intellectuals in general. I do not necessarily agree with that, but that is an opinion that has been expressed on a number of occasions. The force regards them for some reason or another with some measure of distrust. Under these circumstances, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police investigate nuclear disarmament groups which do nothing more than support proposals put forward in this house by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In my opinion it is unlikely a communist would openly join such a movement as the ban the bomb movement or other movements of that type. These movements are supported by persons who are seriously concerned with the international situation, with the dangers of nuclear warfare. These movements, on that account, are supported by idealistic young men and women in the universities who, I think, should be given credit for being concerned with these very important questions.

Who are the persons connected with these disarmament movements and ban the bomb movements? They include Mr. Justice Thorson of the Exchequer Court of Canada; Major-General W. H. S. Macklin; Major Harry Pope, M.C., also mentioned in dispatches twice; Rabbi Feinberg; Dr. Hugh Keenleyside, chairman of the British Columbia hydro; Rev. Abbe O'Neil of Laval University; Dr. Jules Gilbert, director general of the Quebec hospital insurance service; Premier Douglas of Saskatchewan; those splendid women who are working in the Voice of Women; church leaders across Canada, a good many church groups and so on; in other words a cross-section of some of the brightest, and the most respected elements in Canadian society.

A good number of people consider that these activities carried on in this way in connection with groups of this sort, and to which I take exception, according to the reports that we have received from these people are inspired by some persons to create a fear of the social disapproval that could occur to those people who join these movements and to prevent people joining and supporting the ban the bomb movements, the Voice of Women and other organizations of that kind, through fear of loss of prestige.

In conclusion, personally and on behalf of the members of this group, on behalf of those persons who have visited me and who have written to me and on behalf of the good Canadians who are associated with these organizations, I wish to protest strongly against this type of activity by the security police, particularly when carried on in this way which shows a lack of training, a lack of discretion and a lack of understanding of the rights and privileges that all Canadians should enjoy. It is completely out of place in a democratic country that professes great respect for the preservation of human rights and fundamental freedoms; and no one is keener on the preservation of those rights than is the Prime Minister.

I contend that we can maintain freedom only by being careful at all times and by making certain that all those who are responsible to the people of Canada practise the principles which we preach and in which we believe.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: I should like to say only a few words on this item.

It is common knowledge that there are a few communist cells that are very active at present in Canada. Everybody knows also that there are many communists, among others Tim Buck, who is the communist leader in Canada and a very active man.

I should like very much to learn from the minister how many investigations were made by the R.C.M.P. last year with regard to communist activity in Canada, as well as the number of communists in our country.

(Text):

Mr. Deschatelets: I should like to make only a few brief remarks for the purpose of trying to increase the efficiency of the R.C.M.P. in the great north. I am told that the provincial government as well as some other departments of the federal government are now using a very efficient machine called the autoboggan in the north for transportation instead of dog teams. When the investigation is to be made in the north I am told that constables in the far regions of the Arctic are obliged to fly dog teams to particular centres to be investigated and then, of course, they are obliged to fly them back after the investigation is completed. I am told, moreover, that some officials here in Ottawa at the headquarters of the R.C.M.P. are planning to increase their dog teams and especially dog breeding. Since other federal departments are now using the autoboggan, I should like the officials of the department to examine this situation in order to improve the efficiency of the force as well as to save money for the taxpayer.

I have in my hand the report of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. At page 45 I note this paragraph:

> During the past year there was an increase of 4 sleigh dogs making a total of 269 for use in the north.

I am told that it costs at least $300 a year to feed one of these dogs. Without going any further, I should like to ask the officials of the department to examine this question in order to improve the efficiency of the force in the great north.

Mr. Martel: I should like to make a few brief remarks before the first item of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is voted and especially to make a suggestion. I will not take very much of the time of the committee. I am referring here to the new regulations that have come into force in recent years with regard to pleasure boats. If I am correctly informed, pleasure boats of a certain capacity require inspection of some kind of control or supervision of their use by the R.C.M.P. In the north country or in the smaller places a difficulty arises, especially in the province of Quebec and possibly also in the province of Ontario where there are fewer R.C.M.P. officers than there are in the western provinces, for instance, where they act in both capacities, as a provincial force and as a federal force. It arises as a result of the fact that some people using pleasure boats are not following the regulations. This matter has been brought to my attention.

In a few instances in my riding some of the pleasure boat users—some of them may be young fellows or maybe we can call them water devils, young fellows who have no experience—use them in a very dangerous manner. I feel that an arrangement should be made between the R.C.M.P. and the local police, either provincial or even municipal. In certain cases this matter could be handled by the local police. The offenders assert that this matter comes under federal jurisdiction. Once they are in the middle of the river they use their boats in an objectionable manner. Some of them even take away the muffler from the motor and make more noise, sometimes within the limits of a city or a small village. They use their boats and they make the claim that once they are on the river water they come under federal jurisdiction. I should like to make the suggestion that the R.C.M.P. make an arrangement with the local police. I understand that they cannot have officers all over the place for the purpose of checking this situation. I believe the minister has stated in speeches outside the house that we are not a police state. I appreciate this, of course. My object in making this point is not to have the R.C.M.P. prosecute everybody who uses a pleasure boat.

I should like to give an example in support of my argument. In my area of Amos we have only a few R.C.M.P. officers, and this also applies to all northern detachments, probably more particularly in Quebec and Ontario where the R.C.M.P. look after federal matters only. These R.C.M.P. officers do their very best in this regard in my area, but in my district they have had numerous other duties to perform, more particularly in recent times. I am sure that in such large areas they cannot be everywhere at once, but perhaps consideration could be given to having these R.C.M.P. officers work with the local municipal police force in enforcing the act. Perhaps this is already in the act but these people are not aware of it. I should like to make this suggestion to the minister.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, whilst the Minister of Justice is making notes and preparing to answer all the comments and questions of various hon. members I hope he will also consider taking a note of something about which I should like to say a few words.

I believe the Minister of Justice owes it to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada to give as concise but as full a report as he possibly can on the story and activity that broke across Canada just over a year ago, I think it was, when as a result of lengthy investigations by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in co-operation with the F.B.I. and the Hong Kong authorities we learned about the conspiracy in connection with the illegal entry into Canada of a great number of Chinese.

If my memory is correct, the Minister of Justice stated once or twice that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had never said how many Chinese they thought were illegally in Canada. Be that as it may, somehow or other the impression got abroad—and it was really played up in the newspapers of Canada—that there were some 11,000 Chinese illegally in Canada. This, without any doubt whatsoever, cast a cloud of suspicion, and I think an unwarranted cloud of suspicion, on the entire Chinese-Canadian community. I know the Minister of Justice would be one of the first to admit that as a race Chinese-Canadians are excellent citizens. It is unfortunate that because of the publicity at the time I have mentioned the majority of these people should have come under suspicion because of the actions of the minority and because of the actions of a group of conspirators bringing into Canada, and through Canada, I understand, into the United States also, persons who were not entitled to be in this country.

As I have said, it is approximately a year ago that this information was made public and since it became such a greatly publicized story across this country. I presume that the investigation has now been carried out, but to the best of my knowledge there has never been any statement made or any information given as to the result of that investigation.

I do know, of course, from reading the newspapers that a few of these people—and I think it is a very few—have been prosecuted. But what is the situation now? Is there any information as to how many are illegally in Canada? What is being done about them? Are they going to be allowed to stay? I suppose that may be a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. How far has the department got in this matter? Have they got anywhere, or are they going to get anywhere in finding the master minds behind this conspiracy? Has the ring been completely broken up?

I believe we should have as much information as possible on this matter. I think it is only fair that we should ask for the results, as far as they can be made public, of this now lengthy investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in order that justice may be done to the vast majority of excellent Chinese-Canadians who are in this country legally, who are not involved in any way in this matter and are, as I said, good citizens.

I believe this is an important matter and I raise it because, as the Minister of Justice knows, we have a very large community of Chinese-Canadians in the city of Vancouver. In the constituency of Vancouver Centre and bordering on my own constituency I believe we have one of the largest concentrations of Chinese people in any country of the world outside China. I have in my own constituency quite a large number of Chinese-Canadians. They are excellent citizens, excellent businessmen, and they take an interest in the country and in community work. They do very well in business.

I believe that as far as possible this cloud which was cast upon these people should be dispelled. I know this cloud of suspicion was not cast upon them deliberately or purposely, but nevertheless it was cast on these people because of the situation of which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police became cognizant. That cloud should be dispelled by making public as much factual information as is possible and permissible, and making known the results of the investigation to date. We should be told the situation as it is now, and if the Minister of Justice can tell us, we should know what the situation is contemplated to be in the future. I sincerely hope that the minister, who is in charge of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, will give us the fullest possible factual report on this matter.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to say anything against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, because I really believe it is the best police corps in the world. I know that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force is responsible for bringing to Ottawa a great many people who want to see what the mounted police of Canada look like.

There is only one question I wish to ask. I know that in the ranks of the R.C.M.P. there are quite a number of bilingual officers, officers who speak both English and French. In Ottawa, especially during the summer months, thousands of people come to see the parliament buildings and the mounties and try to get information from them. I wonder whether it would be possible to employ mounted police around the buildings of parliament who are bilingual, instead of employing those who speak only one language. I think this would be helpful. Those persons who wish to speak either French or English have a right to be answered in that language, especially around the buildings of parliament. After all, the two languages are supposed to be official, at least in the federal field.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, several comments have been made by hon. members regarding the number of Royal Canadian Mounted Police officers who are receiving university education and training in language courses, and so on. These comments have been made, generally speaking, in the context of criticism of the methods, if not indeed of the policy, of the police in connection with security inquiries; and by the hon. member for Kootenay West, specifically in relation to the inquiry into certain activities at Laval University.

With respect to the university training program I should point out that the figures shown in this year's estimates as to the number taking that course do not relate to intelligence training as such. We have a proper proportion of persons in the security and intelligence division who have university training. Indeed, we have 20 in the headquarters research group alone who are university graduates. In addition to the provision for university training listed in the estimates, tuition fees are being paid to enable three members of the force to attend the university full-time, for six to attend university extension courses and 12 to attend the one year non-degree course and another 12 members to attend the university full-time in the faculties of law, arts, commerce and business administration. In addition we have one officer on each one of the national defence courses. These are not shown in the estimates because there is no charge made between government departments for them. It must also be borne in mind that although the minimum educational requirement on enlistment in the R.C.M.P. is grade 10 it by no means follows that we have no members joining who have higher qualifications than those of grade 10.

We have our fair proportion of university as well as high school and other graduates of standing considerably in advance of grade 10.

It may be interesting to know that the commissioner has for more than a year had a committee set up to examine this question of university training for members of the force from the point of view or whether, as is the case in some cities in the United States especially, police training courses should be university courses or whether on the other hand the desirable method is to send members of the force into the university. There are chairs in some of the United States universities, I am informed, in police training, particularly courses in criminology, scientific detection and so on. We are studying this. We have not just waited until there has been an outburst in the house. This is a matter of continuing concern, not only the question of the standard of education for recruits but the training which should be offered to members of the force after they have enlisted.

Apart from the university training and the training in the national defence college which members of the forces are receiving there is also, of course, the Canadian police college which is run by the R.C.M.P., to which our own members go and at which members of police forces across Canada and from some other countries also study. I am glad to say that we have the services there of a large number of university professors. So the training of members of the R.C.M.P. does not cease when they join the force. Not only are they trained in police methods but they are trained in research and in individual thinking on subjects not immediately connected with police work.

With respect to this difficult question of inquiries carried out by the security and intelligence branch, I am afraid I cannot at all accept as accurate all the facts contained in the newspaper report from which the hon. member read. I have not had the opportunity to study that particular report and I am not therefore able, even if I should attempt to do so at this stage, to refute it point by point. I must say I am not able to accept as accurate all which was contained therein. However, I do not mean to deny that there was some questioning of the students there. However, I have never heard it said that it was an infraction of a person's rights if he was asked a question. This is a new concept to me. I endeavoured to indicate in the brief statement I made on opening the R.C.M. Police estimates that we do have a communist threat in Canada. I am not stating anything new when I say that. It is our responsibility, then, to keep a constant check on the size, extent and efficiency of the progress being made by the communists.

[Mr. Fulton.]

It is an unfortunate fact that it is a tactic of communism to infiltrate perfectly respectable organizations. I think that most citizens, apart from an understandable irritation when they are questioned or hear of questioning, would appreciate and would be happy that the R.C.M.P., who have the responsibility in this field, are keeping a watch on these activities and endeavouring to ascertain whether and, if so, to what extent, there may have been communist infiltration into perfectly respectable organizations. Let there be no doubt about it, the respectability of the organization or the subject matter with which the organization is concerned is no guarantee against efforts to infiltrate. Thus I really do not think that any apology is necessary for the fact that inquiries have been made. Indeed, I am convinced that an apology would be necessary if we shut our eyes and said: this organization will never be the subject of communist interest so we shall not bother to inquire into it.

The R.C.M.P. is a most admirable force, but not even the R.C.M.P. can get information without asking questions. They are not mind readers. Sometimes I wish they were. I wish they were supermen so that they might know what people are thinking and would not have to ask questions at all. But since they do need to ask questions, they ask them as tactfully as they can and in a manner as convenient as possible to the person from whom they seek to get information.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fulton: Just before five o'clock, Mr. Chairman—I was asked how many communists there are in Canada. I am not able to answer that question, since it would involve the kind of information which should not come from our own records, but Tim Buck, the leader of the communist party in Canada has said there are 3,000 card carrying members of the community party of Canada.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the former having precedence.

TRANSPORT ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR APPLICATION BY TRUCKERS TO MINISTER ON AGREED CHARGES

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-33, to amend the Transport Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to move the second reading of Bill No. C-33, to amend the Transport Act. The proposed amendment is a simple one in its form but is of tremendous importance to the trucking industry and its 90,000 or more employees. It is designed to bring a measure of fairness and justice to the industry by providing for them the same right of appeal under the Transport Act to the Minister of Transport as other carriers have.

This is a position that has been taken by the Conservative party as a matter of principle for some time. When he was in the opposition the Prime Minister spoke very strongly in favour of the amendment that is now being proposed. In saying this I am not saying that other parties are opposed to it. I know there have been many members of all parties who have been favourable to this amendment, and this is really the first opportunity that has conveniently arisen in the house to give consideration to it. I may say that it will also be the first time that recognition of the trucking industry has been given in federal legislation, and I believe that as such it will be an acknowledgement of the great contribution made by this industry and its employees in the field of transportation in Canada and to the welfare of Canadians generally.

The rights of appeal referred to are those in connection with agreed charges of the railway. I want to emphasize in this amendment there is no intention to place the trucking industry in any special or privileged position; nor is it the intention in any way to hamper the railways. It is simply to provide the same rights of appeal under the act as all other carriers have. I would draw to the attention of the house that at the present time the act reads:

> Where an agreed charge has been in effect for at least three months
> (a) any carrier or association of carriers, by water or rail, or
> (b) any association or other body representative of the shippers of any locality may complain to the minister that the agreed charge is unjustly discriminatory against a carrier—

And so forth.

The trucking industry, of course, is not covered under that right of appeal. I believe they are the ones most seriously affected under this particular provision, because an agreed charge can have the effect, and often does, of eliminating whole segments of the trucking industry from the competitive field of transportation. I believe it only fair and reasonable that they should have the right to appeal when such a case arises.

Agreed charges do not have to be compensatory to the railroad. Section 32 of the Transport Act says:

> Notwithstanding anything in the Railway Act or in this act, a carrier may make such charges for the transport from one point in Canada to another point in Canada of goods of a shipper as are agreed between the carrier and the shipper.

In other words, it is whatever agreement is arrived at between the carrier and the shipper, and that becomes the rate that is then in force. As I say, that can and does often have the effect of eliminating segments of the trucking industry. Many of the agreed charges specify that 100 per cent of the commodities shipped must go by rail; that truck transport cannot be used at all. Others specify that 95 per cent must go by rail, and so on. I am sure the house will agree that this is a very extraordinary method of rate making and agreement and is one that can have a serious effect on the trucking industry and, by the same token, have a serious effect on the competitive aspects of our transportation system.

This amendment then proposes that any association or other body representative of the motor vehicle operators in Canada or of a province thereof be given the same rights under the act to apply to the minister that other carriers have.

To follow this through I would draw to the attention of the house subsection 4 of section 33 of the Transport Act, which in its language, in my opinion makes it very plain that the trucking industry should be included in this right of appeal because of the very wording of the section. I think it will show quite clearly that it was meant and should have been meant to apply to the trucking industry. The subsection reads:

> If the board, after a hearing, finds that the agreed charge is undesirable in the public interest on the ground that it is unjustly discriminatory against any person complaining against it or places his business or any other form of transportation services at an unfair disadvantage or on any other ground, the board may make an order varying or cancelling the agreed charge or such other order as in the circumstances it considers proper.

Now, I think by the words in this clause stating that where it believes any other form of transportation service is at an unfair disadvantage it was intended that it should have the right to appeal under this act.

I am sure the house will want to give speedy consideration to this measure. I do not think I need to go any further into the history of the act. I have spoken on it on many occasions in the house and I have spoken to many hon. members individually. I know there is wide support for the measure and it is my hope that we shall be able to proceed with it through the committee stage today.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I am happy once again to find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. In a matter under discussion in this house, whether it be legislation, estimates or resolutions, it is so easy to find oneself in disagreement with members on the other side of the house. Therefore, I think it is comforting from time to time to see that members do agree either individually or when speaking on behalf of their parties to a bill which comes up in this manner.

In so far as this bill to amend the Transport Act is concerned there is not the slightest difficulty on this side of the house. We will support the bill. Lest anyone from the other side rises to say that when this matter was under discussion under a previous administration a different attitude was taken from that taken by myself at this time perhaps I should give a short explanation.

In the first place I think I should say, and agree with the hon. member who has just spoken, that it is a fact beyond doubt that the trucking industry has made a tremendous contribution to our transportation systems in Canada. That was proven when there was a railway strike some years ago. The trucking industry showed then without any doubt what it was able to accomplish, together with the air industry, in transporting goods from one end of the country to the other. Therefore, on that general statement there can be little or no difference of opinion. The trucking industry is of tremendous importance to the economy of Canada. It has contributed a great deal in the field of transportation.

If one looks at the bill it strikes one at first blush that perhaps there is no necessity for including the amendment which my hon. friend has put forward. But if there is any doubt in the mind of the house or particularly in the mind of the trucking industry, then I see no reason why this amendment should not be included in the act. The section reads:

> Where an agreed charge has been in effect for at least three months.
> (a) any carrier, or association of carriers, by water or rail,
> (b) any association or other body representative of the shippers of any locality,
> may complain to the minister—

It would seem to one at first blush that perhaps this in itself is sufficient to meet the requirements of the hon. member. He thinks it is not and I take it that the trucking industry thinks it is not. If that is the case, I see no reason why the language should not be clarified by adding paragraph (c) which would read as follows:

> (c) any association or other body representative of the motor vehicle operators of Canada or of a province thereof—

They could then complain to the minister in the circumstances set out in the balance of the section.

I come now to a discussion of the matter which took place when I was not a member of the house, not that that makes any difference. At that time my successor, the hon. Mr. Marler, had for consideration in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines certain amendments to section 33. At that time a motion was moved by Mr. Langlois and seconded by Mr. Cavers that section 33 be deleted and replaced by a new section including subsection 1 as it now reads in Bill No. C-33 with, of course, certain other additions. Perhaps I might put that subsection on the record. It reads as follows:

> 33 (1) Where an agreed charge has been in effect for a least three months.
> (a) any carrier or association of carriers, by water or rail, or
> (b) any association or other body representative of the shippers of any locality
> may complain to the minister that the agreed charge is unjustly discriminatory against a carrier or a shipper or places his business at an unfair disadvantage, and the minister may, if he is satisfied that in the public interest the complaint should be investigated, refer the complaint to the board for investigation.

I will not read the rest of the amendment which was proposed by Mr. Langlois and seconded by Mr. Cavers. At a later time in the hearings the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) moved an amendment to section 33 to this effect, that after the words "association of carriers by water or rail" the words "or any association of motor vehicle transport operators" be added. That amendment was defeated. Now the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) brings in another amendment which I think goes further than that of the Secretary of State for External Affairs because it covers a broader field and is, I think, more explanatory.

I do not think I need to explain away the attitude taken by the committee at that time other than to say this. There was a long discussion of the bill, and while this amendment was of importance perhaps the committee did not realize at the time just what the meaning was or again it may well be that the committee thought that the words found in paragraph (b), "any association or other body representative of the shippers of any locality" were sufficiently broad and wide to cover the motor vehicle operators of Canada. Whether or not that is the case I do not know because I was not there. In any event, I have no hesitation in saying that while it may be that the language is sufficient to cover the industry, if the industry feels and if the house feels that it is not sufficiently broad I cannot see any reason why the broader language should not be accepted. Having said that, I do not think I need add anything further except to say that we on this side of the house will support the bill as proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak briefly on only one point with relation to the bill. The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) raised a point as to the necessity of the wording in the amendment. I support the amendment because I think this wording is an absolute necessity. The matter has been before the board on occasion and the board has ruled that these carriers do not come under the act. For that reason I think it is absolutely necessary that this wording should be included. Certainly there must be an appeal because the trucking business has grown throughout Canada to such an extent that when an agreed rate is fixed that industry should have the right to make representations where the rate would tend to discriminate against the industry as a whole.

As mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne), it could be that an agreed charge would require total carriage by rail to the exclusion of trucks everywhere, and to my mind this is wrong and discriminatory. On these two grounds I would recommend that the amendment be passed.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in almost the same position as the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). When we in this group first read the amendment and checked it against the original section we were definitely of the opinion that the present wording was sufficient to meet what the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) has in mind. I think it is easily understood why that was our opinion. As hon. members know, the wording in the existing section is that any association or other body representative of the shippers of any locality may complain. Logically we took that to mean that the trucking industry was a shipper. What else can the trucking industry be if it is not a shipper just the same as the railways and water carriers are? We do not see why that is not the correct interpretation but if it is felt that it is necessary to make it absolutely clear that the trucking industry is a shipper and is entitled to the same right to complain if it feels that it is being unjustly discriminated against, then most certainly we have no objection to what is sought to be done through the medium of the bill.

It must be recognized, of course, that this amendment will in no way whatsoever solve the problems or resolve the complexities of the transportation industry in Canada which is made up of the truckers, the water carriers, the railroads and the air carriers. It is almost inevitable that there will be competition between them. If I may say so, it does seem a little amusing and paradoxical that those who so heartily and enthusiastically endorse competition do not like it when it happens to affect a particular individual or company or industry in which they are interested. Whether it is just or unjust, it is still competition. However, irrespective of that, we have the rather amazing and paradoxical situation that when the competition gets tough they want to eliminate the competition. I say that as long as we do have this system it does seem obvious that discriminatory action should not be permitted in order to maintain this transportation industry.

As has already been pointed out, the trucking industry is an important and integral part of the transportation industry of our country. I should like to add to the words of the hon. member for Laurier by saying that the people of this country would have been in a most difficult position on more than one occasion if it had not been for the trucking industry. I refer not only to a situation which occurs during a rail strike but also to situations which arise as the result of the abandonment of lines by the railways or a curtailment of service. This has happened in British Columbia on the Kettle valley line. We would be in a difficult position there if it were not for the trucking industry. There is a daily movement by means of refrigerated trucks of the vegetables, hard and soft fruits for which the consumers are waiting.

We say, therefore, that basically we see no objection to this amendment. I have already said that, irrespective of the economics of the situation, if there is one phase of the transportation industry which is subjected to unjust discrimination based on the completely unfair competition of a rate which may have been set at an unprofitable level, then surely that segment of the industry has a right to object. As I say, Mr. Speaker, in view of these circumstances this amending bill which has been moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway will most certainly receive the endorsation and support of this group.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the present bill is similar to bills introduced in previous sessions by the hon. member. On previous occasions the attitude of the government has been that we should wait for the report of the royal commission on transportation before we acquiesced to the passage of the bill or before taking a definite attitude toward the bill. At the moment we have received the first part of the MacPherson commission report, and I am expressing the opinion of the government at the moment when I say that this bill will not interfere with any of the recommendations that commission has brought forward so far. I am very pleased to say, in the name of the government, that we intend to ask every member in this house to support this bill.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that it is a bit unusual, but I should like to say, first of all, that this bill is a recognition of the great services the trucking industry has rendered to the Canadian people on a day to day basis. This bill, to some people, might not represent a tremendous change. On the other hand, as the hon. member said earlier, it represents the first time that the trucking industry has been recognized in a federal statute. I want to congratulate the hon. member upon his presentation of the bill and for the keen interest he has always taken in transportation questions, both here in the house and in the various committees.

The other day the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) paid tribute to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway for the deep knowledge he exhibited of the very complicated question of freight rates. There is no doubt that freight rates have become exceedingly complicated with the passage of time, and anyone who discusses these matters with a profound knowledge must have worked tremendously hard to digest all this information. I want to congratulate the hon. member upon the very clear explanation he made in presenting his bill and the recognition he has brought to the trucking industry of Canada.

Yesterday, I had the privilege of meeting, with the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and two of my colleagues, a group representing the trucking association of Canada. We discussed, for about an hour and a half, the various problems of the trucking industry and I must say it was an extremely interesting meeting. We might not, at all times, have seen eye to eye on the various problems they were bringing before us, but I can assure the house that the representations they made to us will receive most serious consideration. I appeal to the whole house to support this bill. I should like to say also, in the name of the government, that if the mover of this bill desires, and the house is willing, the government will consent to all three stages of the bill being passed today.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to say anything in opposition to this bill but I do feel I should say something about it, perhaps merely to give the hon. member a difficult time in deciding whether or not this bill will go through today. There is only a half hour more to go. I am not unmindful of his lack of co-operation in connection with some other private bills. It might be advisable to show him that co-operation is necessary and is advantageous. It might be wise, in order to do so, to make my comments a little more extensive than the size of the bill would justify or dictate.

Mr. Brunsden: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is introducing extraneous matters which have nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will say that I agree. However, I thought that the hon. member had just completed these extraneous matters.

Mr. Peters: I have just completed them, Mr. Speaker. We are in agreement with this bill. We do not intend to pursue a course that I outlined might be contemplated. However, it is surprising that the government see fit to accept these modifications in this way and that we are not now presented with a complete modification of the Transport Act itself. I presume—and I agree with the minister and sympathize with him—that this procedure is not going to be possible until the final report of the commission making studies in this field is completed. Therefore, because the trucking industry has grown in prominence and its needs are not being met according to the interests of the trucking industry itself and because they will be better served through this amendment, I am in agreement with the course the minister has suggested and would be willing to give the bill three readings today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Complaints.

(Translation):

Mr. Martel: Mr. Chairman, I just have a few remarks to make on the bill now before the committee. First I should like to associate myself with the hon. members who spoke before me to commend the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Browne) for introducing this measure.

I hope this amendment to the Transport Act will be completely satisfactory to the trucking industry in Canada.

Indeed, I know that representations to the same effect were made last year by the Quebec trucking association. Last fall, I had occasion to accompany a delegation which paid a visit to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) to submit a brief. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway was also invited to accompany the delegation. I must say, incidentally, that he is quite popular among the truckers of the province of Quebec who had the opportunity to meet him and to tell him they fully supported Bill No. C-33 which we are on the point of passing.

It gives me pleasure to say that I entirely support this measure. My only reservation would be that it should in no way interfere with the rights of the provinces. At any rate, paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of section 33, which is the amendment put forward by the member for Vancouver-Kingsway, contains these words:

—or of a province thereof.

Therefore, representations may be made both to the Minister of Transport and to the board of transport commissioners, either by the provinces or by the various trucking associations interested in protesting those agreed charges which have so often been discussed in the past. I hope this measure will ensure fair treatment to the trucking industry.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING USE OF TRADING STAMPS

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-34, an act to amend the Criminal Code (Trading stamps).—Mr. Howard.

An hon. Member: Stand.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that this bill be allowed to stand. It is rather unusual for a member of the government to ask that the bill of an opposition member be allowed to stand. However, in view of the circumstances I am doing so. The hon. member who is the sponsor of this bill is at the present time on an official delegation in Washington. For this reason I would ask permission of the house for this bill to stand.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order stands.

EXCHEQUER COURT

EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION TO INCLUDE DIVORCE

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-35, respecting the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I had not thought that this bill would be discussed today. We were rather hopeful that, before it was reached, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) would have given some indication that this was an acceptable procedure to which the government was giving some consideration. In introducing this bill may I say that it is one that has been suggested by other people before I came to parliament and that since my arrival it has been presented by me several times. It is a bill which would, in a manner, solve the problem confronting the House of Commons, the Senate and the people of the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. It would provide a court procedure by means of which to handle divorce actions from both the province of Newfoundland and the province of Quebec.

In connection with the use of the petition method where the petitioner petitions the federal government for a divorce one of the problems we face at the present time is this. Although there is not any question that the parliament of Canada is the highest federal court, we as a federal court have not the machinery, the rules or the regulations by means of which to handle in a satisfactory manner actions of this type. At the present time the Senate is serving this function and a review takes place in the House of Commons. Over the years this method has been proved to be a highly unsatisfactory one. The reason for suggesting the exchequer court that has a correlation between the lower fact that the exchequer court is a federal court. It has an advantage that we are not suggesting in this bill be used. However, it has an advantage that the exchequer court can move from place to place and therefore it could at any time be closer to the petitioners—at that time I suppose they would be the plaintiffs—than is the adjudicating body under the present system. It also is a court that has correlation between the lower superior courts and the Supreme Court of Canada, something that makes it possible that the one court can inquire into those abuses that sometimes take place. At the present time we find that one of the abuses is perjury. This is indicated by some of the evidence and declarations that are made before the members of the committee. There are also false statements made in some of the divorce petitions. These matters are brought to the attention of the house and the Minister of Justice by members of the committee.

This has been found to be unsatisfactory because the Minister of Justice does not act in the position of proctor for the Senate and the House of Commons. The minister has to operate within his own limited jurisdiction as the Attorney General of Canada, and for this reason this method has been found to be highly unsatisfactory.

The exchequer court has the advantage that its jurisdiction can be extended. Judges of the exchequer court could be empowered to handle cases sent to them from this parliament. It is not necessary to have a higher court than the exchequer court. It is well recognized that at the present time the exchequer court handles financial problems in the main. It handles appeals in financial cases. Its jurisdiction in the main is in the field of finance, but we believe that two or three judges could be attached to the exchequer court and a clause put in the appropriate act which would empower exchequer court judges, for a particular, specified length of time, to meet only in the city of Ottawa and hear divorce actions.

They should not have the right to hear divorce actions in the provinces of Quebec or Newfoundland. The ultimate aim, of course, is for the provincial governments to assume jurisdiction over divorce. However, we know there are reasons why the province of Quebec does not want to set up divorce courts. Other provinces have other reasons. The province of Ontario set up divorce courts by petitioning the federal government for the right to do so not too long ago.

The province of Quebec does not want divorce courts, and we can understand why that is so. Within our federal jurisdiction we have the divorce act of 1930 governing divorce procedures. This act was given to Canada through the British North America Act and is included as one of the commitments in that act for which the federal government has responsibility. Therefore if these provinces do not wish to assume the responsibility of having their own divorce courts, we have the obligation to do something about it. It seems to me there could be little objection to a federal court being established for this purpose. The matter of divorce thus could be handled in a much more satisfactory manner. Divorce actions should be included in the jurisdiction of the exchequer court. Hon. members will be familiar with the statements made by the Minister of Justice only recently. The minister said he would consider having the exchequer court assume this responsibility.

It should be borne in mind that this would not solve all the problems that have been raised over the past year or two. If the exchequer court were given jurisdiction over divorce this would not mean that court would have the right to award custody of children, which is at the present and will remain the sole responsibility of the provincial government. The exchequer court would not have the right to decide the question of alimony or maintenance for the children. If this jurisdiction were given to the exchequer court it would not carry with it the right to interfere with the licensing of agencies that are concerned at the present time and will continue to be concerned with divorce procedures. These changes cannot and will not be eliminated by any intervention on the part of the federal government in the field of changing the jurisdiction of divorce for the provinces of Newfoundland and Quebec.

Another problem that will remain is a matter which affects provincial governments entirely. I refer to the matter of the licensing of bailiffs and other officials who are involved in divorce actions. The Senate has made changes in its procedure. It has a set of rules under which it operates. These rules are similar to those under which the courts operate. The Senate has set up the grounds for divorce in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland and it has now stipulated that there must be an affidavit of sorts signed by the party concerned and returned to the Senate indicating that the respondent and the corespondent have been notified of the action against them, and have been notified of their right to a hearing in the action.

However, this procedure just does not work and it will not work even if the act is changed so that jurisdiction is given to the exchequer court. I say this will not work because in the province of Quebec we find that many of these petitions contain false statements. Petitions contain evidence that a bailiff has gone to a particular house, a particular party has made a statement and the bailiff has received from him a signature to a statement saying that he is the party involved; it is his name that is being used either as that of the respondent or corespondent. Yet when we write letters to these people and later have a tracer put on them we find that in many cases there is no such address. In fact, in 30 cases out of 240 divorce actions we found there were no such addresses in the city of Montreal. We found that the addresses physically just did not exist. Yet we have a bailiff swearing a document to the effect that the address does exist, and producing a signature which he testifies is the signature of the person whose name appears as that of either the corespondent or respondent. When tracers are carried out by the post office, they confirm that these addresses do not exist and, as I have said, we have had 30 such instances where the address has been false.

This is another of the malpractices that flows from the problem of split jurisdiction under which we operate and under which it appears we may operate for sometime to come. There are advantages in establishing this jurisdiction in the exchequer court. This method would have more advantages than any we have investigated to date.

As I have said, the ideal and the final solution to the problem would be for these provinces to come to parliament and ask by petition to be given the right to set up their own divorce courts and handle divorce actions in their own way. In this way they would be able to assume the responsibility for the custody of the children, for the maintenance of those children, for alimony payments and for the legal operation of the court.

The exchequer court has some of the powers necessary for the judicial operation of a divorce court. There are officers attached to the exchequer court who are in a position to take affidavits and make investigations. It is not unreasonable to expect that if this action is taken by the house—perhaps not today but some time in the near future—the exchequer court would have the power to ask for and to use the services of the Queen's proctor. The Queen's proctor would be able to do the job which the hon. member for Skeena and myself have been trying to do in our own very limited way. I refer to investigating the offences that are taking place under the procedure which is now in effect. The hon. member and myself have done this in all the cases that have passed through the Senate to date.

We have written to every corespondent and every respondent. Hon. members of the house would be very interested in seeing some of the replies we have received. Our reason for writing to these people is only to see whether they knew they had been named in the particular case; whether they knew they were being divorced, on the one hand, or knew, on the other hand, that they were involved in the divorce and adultery charges that had been made.

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. member permit a question? We have listened to this debate over many hours, over many years. Exactly what does he want?

An hon. Member: What is your question?

Mr. Peters: I do not know what the question is. I could probably answer it by saying that if we had not been in such a hurry with the previous bill we should not be discussing this at all this afternoon. We are offering a solution to this particular problem of divorce which has plagued Canada since the passing of the British North America Act. I am sure that if Sir John A. Macdonald had known the problems which were going to arise he would not have placed upon the federal government the responsibility for divorce as it exists at present. He would have given it to the provinces in the first place. However, this responsibility does now rest upon the dominion government under the terms of that act and we are suggesting that the least objectionable way of discharging it would be to delegate it to the exchequer court. I have sat in on the procedures being used at the present time and I am sure many of the legal people involved have cause to wonder at the system which we adopt. Some hon. gentlemen, with the best of intentions, will get up and ask questions which bear no relation to the establishment of the adultery charge which should be the only ground for the divorce as at present constituted. I am sure many of the lawyers would be happy to see the whole question brought within the jurisdiction of a court which would function and operate in the manner of a court.

If we brought these cases into the exchequer court we would enable those who seek fundamental justice to have the right of appeal. Appeals could be taken to the supreme court and at least one of the difficulties now being experienced would be eliminated. We in parliament have no right to marry people. If we were to act as an appeal court—if we looked back over one of these cases and found that the evidence was a lie and that we had been completely deceived, and then decided that the petition should be rescinded instead of granted—we should in effect, be remarrying people who had been divorced, and that would be an impossibility.

It is almost six o'clock. I think there should be more time to discuss this important matter but we are not too concerned, because the minister has said he is giving consideration to it. I really believe that the Minister of Justice should bring in this bill rather than myself. The measure does not establish a divorce court which would operate in the province of Quebec. It does no more than make available to the citizens of Quebec a proper court procedure which is not available to them at the present time.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I wish the hon. member had proceeded with his argument. It was most interesting, and in another three or four minutes he might have succeeded in convincing members of the house that they should support this bill. In the limited time I have available may I say that I have every sympathy with the objectives he has in mind in commending this bill. I have sat on the committee which deals with these divorce cases. I think there are other things we could more usefully be employed in doing, and I do not like the methods used in it. However, may I put one or two suggestions to the hon. member, and when the bill again comes forward for discussion he may be able to make use of some of them.

The exchequer court is composed of judges who deal with a specialized type of work—patent, copyright and similar matters arising out of legislation in this field—cases where the crown is involved. They have built up specialized skill and knowledge and I should hardly think that the learned judges of the exchequer court would be the proper people to whom we should allocate responsibility for settling these divorce cases. May I also point out that there is no provision for appeal in respect of divorce cases from decisions of the exchequer court as now constituted. People who resorted to it and wished to appeal would have no machinery available to them.

Third, may I say I do not like the limited ground for divorce which the hon. member has set out in this bill, a ground confined to adultery, having in mind the wider grounds which are now generally accepted and which form the basis of the United Kingdom law.

May I call it six o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps the leader of the house would tell us the business for tomorrow and next week.

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow I think the house would like to complete the estimates of the Department of Justice in the morning before one o'clock. We spent two days on those estimates last year and already this year we have spent four days. However, the estimates of the Department of Justice will be taken first tomorrow followed by those of the Department of Fisheries and the Department of Forestry.

On Monday and Tuesday we shall consider legislation and unless some unexpected circumstance arises we shall take the items in the following order: the first on Monday will be Bill No. C-98, an act to amend the Canada Shipping Act; the second item will be Bill No. C-100 to provide for the control of narcotic drugs; the third will be Bill No. C-105, an act respecting penitentiaries; the fourth will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Agriculture dealing with the Farm Credit Act, the fifth item will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce dealing with the Export Credits Insurance Act and the sixth the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance dealing with the Financial Administration Act.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister in a position to tell us what estimates we shall be taking next week?

Mr. Churchill: Not today. Perhaps I shall be able to inform the house tomorrow with regard to that. There are certain departments we have not touched yet—the Department of National Defence, defence production, health and welfare, public works and some others. I shall try to give the house some advance notice tomorrow with regard to the estimates that will be taken up next week.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

MIDLAND SUPERIOR EXPRESS—C.N.R. INTEREST

Question No. 217—Mr. Fisher:

1. What percentage, if any, of the voting capital stock in Midland Superior Express Limited was owned by Canadian National Railways as at December 31, 1960?
2. To what extent has the Canadian National's option to purchase a further interest in Midland Superior Express Limited been exercised since December 31, 1960?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

1. 49 per cent.
2. Nil.

C.N.R.—HOLDING COMPANIES ACQUIRED

Question No. 219—Mr. Fisher:

1. Where are the head offices and places of business located for the following companies described as included in the Canadian National Railways system on page 27 of the 1960 annual Canadian National Railways report: Montalta Holdings Limited, Wacos Holdings Limited?
2. What is the nature of the business carried on by these two companies, and how do they fit into the operations of the Canadian National Railways system?
3. By what means did the C.N.R. acquire ownership of these two companies?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Calgary, Alberta, in both cases.

2. Montalta Holdings Limited owns a truck terminal at Montreal and rents it to Midland Superior Express Limited.

Wacos Holdings Limited owns truck terminals and rents them as follows:

At Calgary, rented to Midland Superior Express Ltd.

At Edmonton, rented to Midland Superior Express Ltd.

At Toronto, rented to Midland Superior Express Ltd.

At Saskatoon, rented to Empire Freightways Limited.

3. Cash purchase.

C.N.R. COMPANIES OFFERED FOR SALE

Question No. 220—Mr. Fisher:

1. To what extent, if any, have offers of sale of certain other companies, as described on page 9 of the Canadian National Railways 1960 annual report, been accepted since the end of the year?
2. What are the names of any of these companies whose offers of sale may have been accepted by Canadian National?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. No purchases have been made since December 31, 1960.

2. See answer to No. 1.

AREA MANAGER, C.N.R., SASKATOON

Question No. 248—Mr. Fisher:

1. Has the Canadian National Railways an area manager in Saskatoon?
2. If so, what is his name and date of appointment?
3. What experience has this man in railroading per se, and what experience in other fields, either outside or ancillary to transportation?

Answer by: Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport):

The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Yes.

2. Mr. Alfred Skinner, appointed January 1, 1961.

3. Management regard him as an experienced and competent officer. His service dates from 1919.

TRAINING OF UNEMPLOYED PERSONS

Question No. 249—Mr. Pitman:

1. How many municipalities in Ontario have initiated programs for training unemployed persons under schedule M of Bill C-49?
2. What are the names of these municipalities?
3. What courses have been given at each municipality?
4. What has been the total number of unemployed enrolled in each course?
5. What is the total number of unemployed who have completed these courses to date?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1. Five since April 1, 1960.

2. Brantford, Cornwall, Toronto, St. Catharines, Windsor.

3. Brantford, commercial, machine shop, welding, electronics.

Cornwall, commercial, machine shop, welding.

St. Catharines, commercial, mechanical drafting, electricity, machine shop, radio and T.V. service, welding.

Toronto, appliance servicing, drafting, gas and arc welding, diesel mechanics, oil burner servicing, radio and T.V. repair, small engines, welding, barbering.

Windsor, commercial, arc welding.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION OF CONSERVATIVE GOVERNMENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Motions.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Is this the point, Mr. Speaker, at which I suggest that the flag of the House of Commons be lowered to half mast to designate a day of mourning because of the election of a Conservative government four years ago?

TRADE

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF ADDITIONAL SALE TO POLAND

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, further to my announcement on June 6 concerning the sale of wheat to Poland, I should like now to inform the house that an additional contract for 100,000 tons of wheat has been signed between the Canadian wheat board and the Polish national trade organization Rolimpex.

The government has authorized export credits insurance to facilitate this sale, the terms being the same as in the first agreement. Shipment of this wheat is to take place during the current crop year. This contract brings the total amount of wheat sold to Poland this year to 7.5 million bushels.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric Stefanson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of the announcement he made this morning respecting an additional sale of wheat to Poland. When the minister announced the last sale to Poland he indicated the wheat would be shipped through the St. Lawrence seaway and eastern ports. Will this new sale of wheat to Poland also be handled through eastern ports so as to benefit farmers in Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him if he has seen the editorial appearing in this morning's Globe and Mail entitled "A Knife for Mr. Gordon", which concludes with the following sentence:

> If the government wants to remove Mr. Gordon it should do so openly, accept the full responsibility, and give the public its reasons. To use backbenchers to do the dirty work is unworthy of national leaders.

Has the Prime Minister any comment to make on this editorial?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have always followed the course of not making comments on editorials, and this occasion will be no exception.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister not think that this is a disgraceful manner in which to proceed—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the question is argumentative, to say the least.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I have the right to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes, but may I suggest to the hon. member that I was doubtful as to the propriety of his first question, and the hon. gentleman's second question is certainly out of order because it is argumentative.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I point out to Your Honour, in the first place, that with all respect to what you have said I think it is quite in order to ask the Prime Minister a question based on an editorial. Your Honour saw fit to allow the question. The supplementary question was not going to proceed on that basis. I now propose to ask Your Honour if I am not in order in asking the Prime Minister whether it is the practice to use backbenchers to do the work which the government should do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is the exact question I understood the hon. member intended to put. Let me say that the original question was based on an editorial commenting on debates in the house. The hon. member knows that questions of this kind are not usually put on orders of the day. The hon. gentleman's second question was certainly argumentative, in that it sought to discuss the conduct of members in the house. In this respect I think it was clearly out of order.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): If I may speak to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is correct to say that questions based on editorials are not in order. It is not in order to refer to editorial comment in the house. I would submit with great deference, however, that it is in order to ask the government about an important question of policy relating to the government's attitude toward the appointment of the president of the Canadian National Railways or his continuation in office. I think it is very pertinent, because the question has been raised on frequent occasions and there has been much public comment and speculation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have not ruled that all questions pertaining to the appointment of the president of the Canadian National Railways would be out of order. I have merely indicated that the questions put by the hon. member for Laurier were, in my view, clearly out of order. If the hon. member for Assiniboia has a question to put on the subject he may proceed to do so, but I suggest that discussing the point of order in order to emphasize or underline an argument would not be a regular course to follow.

Mr. Argue: May I then ask the government if it will announce at an early date its policy toward the president of the Canadian National Railways, and whether his term of service will be extended for a particular period.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, let me say immediately, with respect to the suggestion of the hon. member for Laurier to the effect that something disgraceful had taken place, that the question the hon. gentleman asked qualifies fully for the descriptive word he used. Now, with regard to the question—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a question of privilege. The Prime Minister is allowed to get away with a reply to the question but I am not allowed to ask him the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: That is exactly what is happening in the house. If Your Honour wishes to deal with the matter in this fashion it is all right with us, but I think I should point out that if it is unfair for me to put the question to the Prime Minister—

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I objected to the use of the word "disgraceful".

Mr. Chevrier: —it is equally unfair for the Prime Minister to use the words which he did use a moment ago.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Laurier may be right in some respects, but certainly not in implying that the Chair was being unfair. The hon. member has enough experience to realize that the Speaker cannot stop in advance questions which are irregular. Also, it is not easy for the Chair to prevent a few words being said which are not in order. I think the hon. member for Laurier realizes that the questioner gets away with an irregular question more often than the minister who is called upon to reply does with an irregular answer.

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid it is the other way around.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I immediately say this on the question of privilege. There was no objection to the question. The use of the word "disgraceful" as a part of the question was what I objected to and to which I made reference.

Mr. Chevrier: I object to the language used as applying to me.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As far as the question is concerned, the hon. member will realize that the board of directors legislation has now been passed and it has received royal assent. The board of directors will be appointed and will convene, and naturally will give consideration to those things that are requisite to be brought before them in their position as directors of the Canadian National Railways. We waited for the passing of the legislation and now have it approved.

I wish to add, also, that in so far as the suggestion in the editorial is concerned, namely that there was any use of backbenchers, that was a most unjustified allegation.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I rise—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: I rise on a point of order. If it is not in order for the hon. member for Laurier to base a question on an editorial in the Globe and Mail, neither is it in order for the Prime Minister to base a reply on the editorial. The rules must be dealt with in an impartial manner, and when a rule applies to an opposition member I take it that it also applies even to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would make very clear that I support the hon.

gentleman in what he has stated, that editorials should not be read in the house; but the implication in the reading of that editorial required—

Mr. Argue: It was not read.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —a reply, even though much shorter and more succinct than the circumstances might demand. The question the hon. member asked was a proper one, and one that I am sure is of general interest. Now that the legislation in respect of the board of directors has received approval, the appointments will be made and this problem will no longer be one that will require the asking of questions.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether it was not competent for the board of directors of the C.N.R. to deal with this matter, if they so desired, before legislation enlarging the board was passed?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker I wish to ask a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the views as to the president of the Canadian National Railways and his competence, as expressed by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) and the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Small) on June 8 in this house, correctly represent the views of the government in this matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think this matter has been sufficiently dealt with. It started on the wrong foot and it has created enough complication up to now. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. McIlraith: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask upon what ground the question I put is out of order?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think an answer has been given on the point. The hon. member is trying to have the Prime Minister comment on a debate which has taken place in this house, because the hon. member quoted the opinions expressed by some hon. members in the discussion of the estimates of the Department of Transport. I think the question which was put by the hon. member for Assiniboia was exactly on the same point. An answer was given, and I think the hon. member for Ottawa West will realize that he is indirectly trying to create a debate on the issue.

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker. May I state what I was trying to say? I was trying to find out government policy on this matter of public importance which is the direct responsibility of the government. I was very careful not to ask for comment on the speeches made in the house. I was careful to phrase my question in such a form as to ask if they represented the policy of the government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have expressed my view on the question which has been put and on the answer given. It seems obvious that questions, generally speaking, which invite the government to express policy are not proper on orders of the day because they may involve, as the hon. member will realize, a wide scope of discussion. I think the question should be left at this point, because it will turn into a debate.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Laurier seems to be competing with the Chair. I have already indicated that I thought this matter had been sufficiently dealt with, and I do not see how it would be in accordance with that view if I allowed a further question.

Mr. Chevrier: Would Your Honour allow the question and then rule upon it? My supplementary question is this. Does the Prime Minister realize that here we are on June 10—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chevrier: I knew my question would be allowed if I prefaced it in that manner.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would not want the hon. member to prejudge the case, because I have not heard the question yet.

Mr. Chevrier: Having regard to the date at which we have arrived and our consideration of the affairs of the C.N.R., does the Prime Minister not think that long before this date the annual report and accounts of the Canadian National Railways should have been dealt with by the special committee on railways, air lines and shipping?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must indicate that I shall allow the Prime Minister to reply, but I think the question was argumentative and one can expect the answer to be in the same vein.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not wish to deal with this matter unduly, but this has to do with the business of the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I agree that it has to do with the business of the house, but the question has been put in a form which would suggest an argumentative reply. It was a discussion on the conduct of the house; it put forward an argument.

Mr. Chevrier: I say to you respectfully that it was not discussing the conduct of the house. It was discussing the affairs of the C.N.R., and I should like to know why the affairs of the Canadian National Railways have not been fully discussed in the committee on railways, air lines and shipping owned and operated by the government. I should appreciate it if the Prime Minister would give the reason for this long delay.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, all through the piece in the last few months there have been nothing but howls and screams on behalf of members of the opposition that there have been too many committees meeting and that this is taking up too much of their time. Now they will immediately be accommodated, I am sure. They have gone through the estimates of the Department of Transport as meticulously and carefully as the opposition are capable of within their limitations. Having done that, I am sure the committee will meet at the earliest possible date, and that the desire for discussion and consideration of the report will be entirely met.

I thank the hon. member, too, for the reference regarding the 10th of June, because I know that is the reason he feels so badly today.

AGRICULTURE

SASKATCHEWAN—R.C.A.F. ASSISTANCE IN COMBATING GRASSHOPPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question of more urgency to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister outline how the federal government is answering the request received from the province of Saskatchewan for assistance in the battle against the grasshoppers now threatening the western crops?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday evening I received an urgent request from the Saskatchewan minister of agriculture for assistance in getting grasshopper poison out to Saskatchewan, as they had run short of it. In response to this request I authorized the Royal Canadian Air Force to assist in combating the infestation in Saskatchewan by airlifting the badly needed supply of insecticides from Toronto to Regina. This emergency airlift commenced on Friday, June 9, in the afternoon and will continue until an adequate supply of insecticide is available to overcome the threat. It is anticipated that the airlift necessary to do this will be completed some time today.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the minister tell us whether any of the planes of the department will be used for actual spraying work?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Speaker, I have had no request in that regard. I do not think the planes we have are adaptable to that purpose. As the hon. member knows, small, light aircraft specially equipped with spraying equipment are used for that operation.

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Could the minister give me some assurance that the infestation will stop at the Alberta border?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—REQUEST FOR RE-EXAMINATION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister? Has the Prime Minister seen in the Toronto Daily Star of June 9, 1961, the joint letter written by six leading law professors recommending postponement of the passage of the bill in respect to capital murder in order to provide an opportunity for an independent examination of its provisions by a body of judges and practising and academic lawyers specialized in criminal law?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, my question is—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I will allow the hon. member to ask his question, but I should indicate to him that its basis is improper in view of the fact that it deals with legislation which has not gone through all stages.

Mr. Deschatelets: My question is, in light of this very important development, does the Prime Minister not think the provisions of this bill should be re-examined?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons has completed its consideration of this bill. In any event, the answer would have been in the negative.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. There are a number of people in Canada now under death sentence, and I should like to know whether these sentences will be stayed until such time as a review and decision can be made under the terms of this act which we are now contemplating.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is also in the negative. In so far as discussion respecting the exercise of clemency is concerned, that is a matter which cannot properly be brought before this house.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

SUDBURY, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF ARMOURIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. There is a rumour that an amount of $800,000 included in the estimates of the Department of National Defence has been earmarked for the construction of a new armoury in Sudbury, and tenders will be called early in 1962. Can the minister give the house some information regarding this project?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the rumour is incorrect, but I suggest that a better time to raise matters of this kind would be when the estimates of the department are under consideration.

Mr. Badanai: I have a supplementary question. Has the minister given any consideration to the re-establishment of an armoury at Fort William?

Mr. Harkness: The matter of building new armouries at Fort William and Sudbury has been under consideration, but no decision has been reached.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—STATEMENT ON REPORTED CENTRALIZATION OF OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for St. Ann asked whether I was aware of certain comments of the chairman of the board of directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with respect to the search for a suitable location in the city of Montreal where C.B.C. operations will be consolidated. I did notice this report, and I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that a final decision has not been taken with respect to the location described in the question, as both the city and the corporation have decided to study one or more additional locations before deciding on the matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can report on any new developments in the situation in Laos.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as a result of intensive consultations yesterday the prospects for the conference resuming its work now appear to be better. I understand that Lord Home will be going to Geneva tomorrow to discuss the situation with Mr. Gromyko, the Soviet co-chairman, who has indicated that with good will on both sides an effective cease fire can be established throughout Laos.

In Vientiane, at Canadian initiative, the commission has expressed to the Laotian parties its serious concern at the turn of events in Ban Padong. The commission has stated that it intends to visit a number of trouble spots and report to the co-chairmen. It is expected that Ban Padong will be one of these, and arrangements are now being worked out with the local authorities.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CAPE BRETON—METHOD OF PROVIDING FUNDS FOR SPECIAL PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys whether he can tell the house in what fashion the house is to be asked to approve the $1½ million special vote that he announced some days ago to provide for additional employment in Cape Breton.

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, the same answer applies that I made the day before yesterday. The matter is under study, and when the study is completed an announcement will be made.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister did not quite understand my question. Perhaps I could put it to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. I am not asking about the projects, but I am asking about the method by which the house is to be asked to approve the $1½ million. Can the parliamentary secretary say what method is to be used?

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to do so this morning.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

TORONTO—REPORTED EXPOSURE OF CHILDREN TO RADIOACTIVE CONTAMINATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the recent exposure of Toronto children to radioactive contamination, can the minister say whether the source of these radioactive materials has now been determined? Will he also state what action has been taken to ensure that all owners and users of radioactive materials take every precaution to ensure that these materials do not endanger public safety?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this problem is of such importance that a full report should be made to the House of Commons as early as possible next week. An investigation is now under way, and I require a little more time in order to get full information.

Mr. Argue: In a very brief way, could the minister tell the house at this time the policy with regard to these materials, which have brought about a situation of this kind?

Mr. Churchill: I think my earlier suggestion was a sound one. A full report will be made next week.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION FOR ACREAGE PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister inform the house whether the government will be putting an item in the estimates this year to provide for a payment of $1 an acre for up to 200 acres to western producers?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Headquarters administration and national police services—

378. Operation and maintenance, $7,904,906.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, yesterday I had just commenced answering the general inquiries that had been made on this first item and I had not quite completed my remarks. As a matter of courtesy to those hon. members—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am having some difficulty hearing the minister. I wonder whether we could have quiet in the committee, please.

Mr. Fulton: As a matter of courtesy to those hon. members who made comments or suggestions I think I should complete my reply. In connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West on the standards of training and qualifications of members of the security and intelligence branch, and dealing specifically with the comments as to language training, I might say that we have a number of personnel in that division who are well qualified indeed so far as a knowledge of foreign languages is concerned. At any time that we required further training from this point of view we would not hesitate to send our personnel on the necessary courses.

I might also point out that in addition to actual academic training we have in our force constables and N.C.O.'s from every ethnic group in Canada with the exception of the Eskimo group, and we are now trying to get a qualified Eskimo who might be available to join the force. I should point out that at the present time we have a number of special constables in the force who are Eskimos. Let me emphasize again that we have members and N.C.O.'s from every other ethnic group in Canada.

It might interest hon. members if I were to put on the record a list of the ethnic and language groups from which our members are drawn and the totals in each group. In the totals I show here I would emphasize that these members speak fluently the language in question: German, 169; Ukrainian, 202; Russian, 46; Polish, 70; Czech, 18; Hungarian, 12; Yugoslav, 7; Bulgarian, 1; Rumanian, 2; Croatian 1; Slovakian, 5; Latvian, 1; Lithuanian, 5; Greek, 2; Italian, 24; Spanish, 3; Dutch, 22; Flemish, 2; Yiddish, 4; Swedish 13; Norwegian, 21; Danish, 15; Icelandic, 14; Finnish, 4; Japanese 2; Chinese, 2; Eskimo, 1; Cree, 1; Gaelic, 5; Swahili, the language used in the Congo and Kenya, 2; Arabic 1. In so far as Eskimo is concerned, I point out that we have one member who speaks this language fluently, although he is not himself an Eskimo, and we have a number who have a knowledge of the language, but we would not qualify them as fluent.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont raised a question with regard to dog teams in the territories. I can assure him that it is not the normal practice to fly dog teams around the territories. Such circumstances would only arise very rarely. Normally the patrols would be undertaken from the detachment where the dog teams are kept. It would only be if the incident which required investigation took place in a very remote area that the dog teams would be flown to another point from which the patrol by dog team would actually start. We have, in fact, eight snowmobiles stationed at various points throughout the territories. Some years ago we did make an experiment with an auto-toboggan. The one with which the experiment was then conducted was found not to be suitable.

Now, with regard to the question concerning the increase in the number of dogs, I think the hon. member has misconstrued the circumstances. We are not undertaking an overall increase, certainly no substantial increase in the number of dogs. There is a program under way, however, for breeding a new type of husky, a Siberian husky, which research has shown to be more amenable, more easily trained and a less dangerous animal than the present type of sled dog in use throughout the territories. There have been some very unpleasant attacks upon persons by sled dogs, not so much by our dogs—because I think we have them under pretty good control at all times—but these attacks on humans have been made by the type of husky which has been in use up there. We believe we should first establish the use of the new type dogs ourselves, and then encourage their use throughout the whole of the territories.

The hon. member for Chapleau raised the very difficult problem of the enforcement of the pleasure boat regulations. This is a work that is of increasing concern and difficulty to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. At the moment there are an estimated three quarters of a million pleasure boats in Canada, and this total is rising rapidly. The problem of enforcement of the small boat regulations is becoming acute, and one which requires a great deal of planning. We are concerned lest our planning and the recruiting of our establishment cannot keep pace with the increasing demands that are made upon us.

In this connection I might point out that our difficulty in this is a summertime problem. It is difficult indeed, as hon. members will understand, to persuade treasury board that we should be allowed the increase in our establishment necessary to take care of the volume of work which this entails in the summer, because if that were done then there would be the problem of whether or not we had more men than we needed at other times. We have not really been able to get any special establishment for this work. I may point out that with the limited establishment we have now we made 41,000 separate checks last year, and the information collected in these investigations resulted in 607 convictions.

We do feel that this is a problem for which the public of Canada should not expect the sole responsibility to be assumed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The use of motorboats and pleasure boats has reached a point where it may well be equated with the use of motor vehicles on the highway. Instead of driving cars for pleasure or touring, people frequently drive their boats or there is a combination of the two, the boats being towed on trailers behind the cars and put in the lakes and then the boats are used for tourism. Just as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police could hardly be thought, indeed is not thought, to be responsible for checking the extra summer traffic on the highways, it is our view that we should not be held exclusively responsible for checking the extra summer traffic on our waterways which is brought about by the influx of tourists.

We feel quite strongly it is only proper that we should suggest the provinces, and indeed the municipalities, might assume extra responsibility in this direction. I think hon. members will be interested to know that some of the regulations with regard to small boats are to be moved out of the regulations under the Canada Shipping Act and incorporated in amendments to the Criminal Code which I will be introducing later. We feel this is quite proper because not only is the traffic in small boats assuming such proportions that the provisions regarding safe driving should really become part of the criminal law, but this will have the additional result that, being part of the criminal law, it will no longer be the sole responsibility of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to enforce these laws.

The hon. member for Hull raised questions about bilingual personnel on parliament hill. In view of the number of persons who come from all over Canada and, naturally, from the province of Quebec, to visit the hill, it is most desirable that we should have bilingual personnel here. I must say that we agree entirely with the hon. gentleman, and follow this policy within the limits of the resources at our disposal in having bilingual personnel stationed on parliament hill, especially during the summer months.

Mr. Winch: Will any statement be made on the question of the Chinese immigration inquiry which I raised yesterday?

Mr. Fulton: I think the proper approach to this problem is that policy statements with respect to the Chinese immigration inquiry should be made by my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I think I should go no further at this point than to say that when the minister announced the inquiry and the steps that had been taken to date and would be taken in the subsequent period, she said that she counted particularly, in what is described colloquially but somewhat inaccurately as the amnesty program, on the co-operation of the Chinese community to clear those who might be referred to as innocent passengers in this traffic and to establish who are the ringleaders in organized criminal activity. Unfortunately we have not found that co-operation forthcoming to the extent that we had hoped and to the extent that I believe we were entitled to expect.

My friend the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, in speaking on the introduction of my estimates some two or three weeks ago, made a statement in this regard. As he is a Canadian of Chinese origin it came particularly appropriately from him. The hon. gentleman in his statement outlined his consideration and study of the matter, and expressed regret that the degree of co-operation that might have been expected had not been forthcoming.

I can only say that while we have had some prosecutions and have achieved some success in obtaining evidence that established clearly the culpability of some of those who are quite prominent in the racketeering that was going on, we have not made all the progress that we had hoped for and it may be some time before we can record substantial progress. The matter is causing a very great deal of concern, and it has been the subject of discussion between my colleague and myself from the point of view of whether or not the time has arrived—and there are many considerations that argue that it has—when perhaps a new approach, taking advantage of some of the other provisions of the law which so far we have not invoked, might be warranted.

Mr. Winch: Can the minister give a progress report on the R.C.M.P. investigation? A statement on the subject from the minister would give an assurance that I am certain would be welcomed by the Canadian Chinese community.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I have to say, with regret, that I am not in a position to give an authoritative and final statement because, as I have indicated, we are unfortunately not receiving the co-operation which we expected and to which I think we are entitled, when one considers that one of the main objects of our inquiry is to clear up this situation once and for all and to establish and regularize the position of those Chinese who may be in Canada on the basis of irregular entry but with respect to whom, as my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration said, there is no intention of prosecuting or pushing out of Canada when they themselves were only innocent passengers in this traffic. I hope that in the course of the reasonable future we might be able to bring some finality to the matter and at that time one could make a statement, but at the present time because of the stone wall of refusal to give information which is clearly within the knowledge of those concerned we have not been able to make the progress we would like to have made.

As I said, this is a matter of concern and discussion between my colleague and myself as to whether we should invoke some of the other provisions of the law which are available but which so far we have not relied upon, in order to obtain this information that we must have in the interests of the Chinese community itself.

Mr. Kennedy: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak about a matter—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman is going to speak on another subject I wonder if he would permit me to ask one question on the matter the minister has discussed. I should like to be assured by the minister that the government has no thought of receding from the solemn assurance given in this house by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to the Chinese community at the last session of parliament.

Mr. Fulton: Well, Mr. Chairman, there has been no change. Any change would have to be announced by my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Pickersgill: The question I ask is whether the government is contemplating withdrawing the assurance that was given.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know to what assurance my hon. friend refers. There were several aspects to the assurance, as I recall it, and I am not in a position to make a categorical reply to that question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will recall the assurance for the assistance of the minister. The assurance, and it was a very precise one, was that no one would be deported from Canada merely because he had given information that was not exact if he was in fact a relative of someone living in this country.

Mr. Fulton: I do not recall the statement of my colleague sufficiently clearly to be certain that my hon. friend has accurately summarized it. The intent of my colleague's statement was to make clear that persons who with respect to themselves or their immediate relatives may have given misinformation in order to bring themselves or their relatives here to Canada, not for the purpose of profit, would not be pushed around or prosecuted. I do, however, recall my colleague saying that in order to establish these and all the other facts it would be necessary for us to have the co-operation of these people and truthful statements from them. It is the lack of co-operation that concerns us at the present time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should not like to think, and I am sure the minister does not intend it to be thought, that he is seeking to secure co-operation by holding a kind of veiled threat over these people that the word of the government given in this house is going to be withdrawn.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the word of the government, of course, stands. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that when the government makes statements with respect to situations such as this, based on an assumption that co-operation will be forthcoming, it is entitled to review the situation from time to time and to state its position in accordance with the developments so long as that position is stated clearly.

Mr. Kennedy: Mr. Chairman, I wish to bring to the attention of the minister the matter of the enforcement of federal statutes as applied to harness racing. This sport is vigorously pursued, at least in the province of Nova Scotia, and at the present time the personnel of the nearby R.C.M.P. detachments who are specially trained are required to attend these races while they are in progress to enforce the statutes. This duty is in addition to their normal detachment duties. It can readily be seen that because races are often held on holidays and on other special occasions this imposes an additional burden, over and above normal duties, on a few constables.

I wonder whether the minister would look into the matter and see if the establishments of the nearby detachments could be increased so that the tour of duty of all personnel would be less onerous. I understand that these constables receive no extra remuneration for the additional hours they are required to serve.

While I am on my feet may I also tell the minister that the R.C.M.P. are performing a splendid service in my area not only in law enforcement but also in the contribution they make in the various communities.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I rise briefly to refer to a matter about which I spoke yesterday. Apparently radio and television reports created interest in the complaints made yesterday in this committee by one or two hon. members in respect to the activities of the security section of the R.C.M.P. My telephone has been ringing constantly this morning, and I have already had phone calls or visits from students at Ottawa universities. I listened very carefully to what they had to say, and these very fine young people were very concerned about things that were happening in their universities.

I was recently informed that a student at an Ottawa university was approached by a young R.C.M.P. constable and asked whether he or she knew of any students with communist leanings or radical tendencies. This student was asked to report on the activities of certain persons who were interested in the ban the bomb movement—I think that is the common term for it—and those who were interested in the activities of the C.C.F.-New Party club. Now, what do you think of that?

Mr. Pugh: That is a logical conclusion.

Mr. Herridge: One of those students who visited me was particularly concerned about this question and is a member of a well known Ottawa family that has lived here a long time. This constable, in a rather aggressive way, tried to persuade this student to act as an informer on fellow students. It was brought to the attention of the constable that there are members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police attending these universities, and he was asked "Why not use them?" His reply was to the effect, "Well, they are busy in other directions"; they wanted to get one of the students to do this. These students were asked to inform from time to time upon the activities of the persons in these groups to the constable in question. I am glad to say that they rejected this suggestion with scorn, because I think it is the wrong way to go about this sort of thing.

I rise again on their behalf to protest most vigorously these attempts to make informers, cads and stoolpigeons of our students in universities. I say this is the wrong way to go about it. It is not a proper thing to do, to ask a young student, regardless of the motive, to spy and inform on fellow students while going to university.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend has of course used a great many sensational words in his remarks, and I can only regret that the hon. member, who usually has such a high sense of responsibility, should make these statements without giving me an opportunity to examine the matter to see whether there in any justification for what he says. These anonymous, unestablished, unidentified complaints which are blown up and puffed up in a sensational manner so often result in unfair criticism, and I am surprised that the hon. member should have made these remarks without any consultation with me or any effort to establish whether there was in fact any basis or justification for them.

I am not denying that there is concern, or may be concern, on the part of the members of the security and intelligence service of the R.C.M. Police about activities on university campuses. Nor can one deny that it is an avowed objective of communism to infiltrate universities. It is an avowed objective of Canadian communists to do exactly that. It is an avowed objective of Canadian communism to infiltrate a number of organizations whose purposes, though perfectly innocent and proper, they could subvert to their own ends if they were able to infiltrate them successfully and obtain control.

We would be negligent and open to criticism if we turned a blind eye to this situation and said "We are going to be embarrassed and criticized if we make any inquiries about this matter, so we had better let the activity carry on without any attempt to check it to see to what extent, if any, this infiltration has become effective and successful."

My hon. friend knows that although his party has itself openly disavowed the suggestion that there has been any infiltration of communism into it, there have been repeated attempts by the communists to identify themselves with the movement of which he is a member. We detest this, but it is a communist objective.

I am not in a position to do so, nor am I going to succumb to the temptation or persuasion to say that with respect to this, that or any other activity which we know the communists are attempting to infiltrate we will call our efforts off and cancel our inquiries simply because some people say, and say quite rightly, "This is an obviously innocent and desirable group of persons and it is wrong for you to be taking this interest in what goes on".

I said yesterday that we are not concerned about or suspicious of the motives or the genuine, conscientious purposes of the people who have formed these associations, or students generally at university. But when we know that communists, as a matter of policy, are attempting to infiltrate these associations, then it becomes the responsibility of the security force to keep a check on them and to establish the extent to which that objective is being realized.

I am sorry it does not seem possible to make this sort of effort without giving rise to some criticism. I do not maintain that our men are perfect, that they will never make mistakes or perhaps ask the wrong questions; but I do ask that there should be some measure of understanding with respect to our security and intelligence efforts regarding communism in Canada. I ask for understanding of the task which is imposed upon our security forces.

Particularly I do suggest that where there may be a feeling on the part of any individual that an improper approach was made, or where word is received by members of parliament or others that improper approaches were made to them, these matters should be brought to my attention, because I am as anxious as anyone else that the work in this field, difficult enough as it is, should not be made more difficult by blunders. We are always anxious to improve our methods and do what we can to carry them out without offence to the public, but this responsibility is imposed upon us and we have to discharge it.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, the minister knows that I do not raise a question unless I am convinced there is some substance in it. I questioned these people very closely and took down their words very carefully. I am objecting to the wrong approach in this matter. Hon. members know that people do not like their names being used in matters of this kind, but I will go into this question further and see whether I can assist the minister to make certain there is a proper approach to this question.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I would appreciate that co-operation. I have never maintained and never will maintain that we do not make mistakes, and we are anxious to know where mistakes have been made so that we may profit by them.

Mr. Wratten: Mr. Chairman, this may be a small matter to raise in this committee, but I think it affects the prestige and the respect which the R.C.M. Police have across this country. I refer to the fact that they are now acting as meter maids at Malton airport. As I understand it, it costs some $2,000 a year to train an R.C.M.P. constable. Surely we can find some men who are over 50 or 55 years of age, who cannot find employment in other fields, who could very well carry out the work of supervising parking, checking cars and so on, at this airport. Chief constables all over the country are trying to get out of having their men check the parking and carry out the tagging of cars, because they lose the respect of the public. Yet here we have members of a force which is recognized as second to none in the world acting as meter maids at Malton airport. I think it is a mistake and I hope it will be rectified.

Mr. Fulton: In reply, Mr. Chairman, the situation is that at the request of the Department of Transport, and for very good reason in view of the increasing traffic through our airports, the R.C.M. Police within recent months have assumed responsibility for policing Department of Transport airports.

It is true that in the take-over period we have had to put a number of men on the airports to acquaint themselves with all the responsibilities that policing airports involve, and during this period it is true that a minimum number of these men are actually doing some of the traffic control and parking enforcement. Ultimately, however, the intention is to have simply one of our uniformed men in charge of that work and responsible for it. The work that my hon. friend has referred to, namely the actual checking of cars, putting tags on them and checking parking meters, will be carried out by the corps of commissionaires, with one of our uniformed men supervising that work as part of our responsibility for policing the airports of Canada. It is the intention that our men shall not continue to do this type of work, for the reason the hon. member has stated.

Mr. Wratten: I understand there were older men doing this job but that they were let out when the R.C.M.P. took over. Are these men to be given back their jobs?

Mr. Fulton: The intention is to have the corps of commissionaires made responsible for the physical work of checking the parking and parking meters.

Mr. Baldwin: I should like to comment briefly on a practice which was prevalent at one time but which is now not so common. I refer to the procedure in connection with the prosecution of cases before the inferior courts, where the cases are not of such magnitude as to justify the province in providing counsel.

What often happens in the more remote areas or in the area of a detachment where there are only one or two men is this. When a complaint is made there will be an investigation by the N.C.O. or by a constable. Subsequently the same man may well serve the summons, and when the case comes before the magistrate the same N.C.O. or the same constable will appear and act as counsel in the sense that he examines witnesses for the crown and cross-examines witnesses for the defence.

That is all right, but what I think is wrong is the situation where, having done that, the same constable or N.C.O. goes into the witness box and gives evidence. As I say, I think that practice is not very common today; I have noticed a considerable lessening of the number of cases in which that procedure occurs, and it may well be that instructions have gone out to this effect.

The minister, as a member of the legal profession, will bear with me when I say that when a member of the legal profession acting as counsel takes off his gown and steps into the box to give evidence, it must only be in extraordinary circumstances that he does so. Bearing in mind that it is in the inferior courts where the majority of the people of this country make their first contact with the administration of justice, I do not think the practice to which I have referred makes a good impression. I realize that it is not as prevalent as it was, but I hope instructions can be given so that it is eliminated altogether except when it is essential that the practice be followed.

Having said that, I should like to add a word of tribute. For the last 35 years I have been daily engaged in actions in which I have acted for the defence. I have fought the good fight against the R.C.M.P. in a great many cases, and I hope I shall continue to do so. I may say that in my own district we have a situation where one officer and I think 39 N.C.O.'s and other ranks are responsible for an area of 70,000 square miles containing 75,000 people. They carry on a great deal of work for the province, and they act as police for many of the smaller municipalities. When one relates the number of men employed to the population in the area and compares that number with the number of policemen required in the larger centres and the metropolitan areas, it is obvious that they are doing a tremendous job. I make this comment having in mind that my contacts with the R.C.M.P. have always been as counsel for the defence, and it cannot be said I am prejudiced.

Bearing in mind that the force does this good work, may I point out that the construction of improved highways through our country is leading to a situation where more men may be required for patrol. There have been a number of fatal accidents in the last two or three years and, unfortunately, this good road, this symbol of civilization, goes hand in hand with a great deal of slaughter of people in traffic accidents. I hope some consideration may be given to providing extra men where required for highway patrol duty on the new highways which are being built.

One final point. I have known many members of the force in the old days, and I know the pension conditions which prevail for members of the force who retired many years ago. I hope some consideration may be given to increasing those pensions, many of which were fixed in days when conditions differed a great deal, in order to bring them into line with the inflated costs of the present day.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member for Colchester-Hants asked me about the enforcement of race track betting laws, and drew attention to the number of extra hours members of the force responsible for this work in his area have to put in. This is a constant problem as far as we are concerned, and I would appreciate the support of all hon. members in endeavouring to get sufficient personnel to solve it effectively. We find it is not always easy to get agreement to our requests for increases in establishments. This is a matter of which we are aware, however, and I am constantly trying to get sufficient personnel to enable us to do all the jobs which we have to do, efficiently and without placing an undue burden on our personnel. But the day that happens and we find ourselves with an adequate establishment to do everything we are called upon to do, I think we shall see ourselves translated to another world. In the meantime I shall do my best to obtain the establishment we need.

The question raised by the hon. member for Peace River regarding personnel being on occasion both prosecutors and witnesses is an important and difficult one. I can tell the hon. member without equivocation that this is never undertaken as a matter of policy. As far as the mounted police are concerned as a federal force, we are opposed to it.

However, in eight of the ten provinces we are acting as a force under contract to the province. Conditions vary from province to province, and the situation is that in some regions arrangements are not made for the services of crown prosecutors. As a result we find a situation where the police are responsible both for conducting the prosecution and for giving evidence. Every effort is made to avoid putting the officer conducting the case in the position of having to enter the witness box and give evidence in the same case, but every now and then, because of the problem of personnel, it may be that the constable who has to give evidence is the only one available to conduct the case. It may be that his colleague has been required for other duty.

We do not like this situation. We are in constant communication with the provinces urging them to make crown prosecutors available so these circumstances shall not arise. In Manitoba we have a generally happy situation in this respect. In Saskatchewan the situation is not at all the same; it is not at all happy, because we have been unable to persuade the Saskatchewan government that they should provide crown prosecutors. In British Columbia the situation varies. There are detachments where occasionally the same member of the force has to give evidence and conduct the case. We try to avoid the situation whenever we can, and we shall continue to bring pressure on the provinces for their assistance in solving this difficulty by providing adequate numbers of crown prosecutors.

Mr. Peters: I wish to say something on this question of security. It seems to me that the minister has done just about what his department has done in this field. I have always been interested in this matter of security because I have felt that the activities of the department in this regard cover a multitude of sins. I feel that when we are discussing the department's activities regarding the communist threat, in one way or another, we must keep two or three things in mind. First, communism in Canada is not illegal. Second, anyone who does admit publicly that he is a communist obviously is not in a position to be a threat as a spy.

I think the department uses this communist threat as an excuse and cover up for a multitude of sins committed in relation to security rights of individuals. I think the attitude of many members of that force in dealing with this communist business is expressed quite well in an article which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of June 7, 1961 under the heading "Below the Hill". The subject matter of this article is similar to that raised in a question asked a few moments ago regarding members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on duty at airports. I should like to quote the article, which reads as follows:

Mrs. Nora McAuley, 1309 Woodside Drive, is the latest victim of that gobbledygook and high-handed officialese so prevalent at the new Uplands air terminal. Her husband was flying to the north country Monday so Mrs. McAuley and her three young children drove with him to the terminal to wave goodbye. As they stopped in front of the rotunda, a commissionaire told Mr. McAuley that he couldn't help his wife getting the children out of the car "because you can't park here." When explanations failed, Mr. McAuley, who had little time to catch his plane, went to get the baggage weighed. His wife and the kids decided to drive away without saying goodbye.

But oh no. The commissionaire had by this time summoned a mountie who demanded to know what Mrs. McAuley was doing at the airport. She told him. Who was her husband, the mountie demanded. Her husband was her husband, said Mrs. McAuley. Let me see your driver's licence, demanded the mountie. More questions. Mrs. McAuley tried to explain that she was leaving anyway. More questions. At last she broke into tears.

"Oh, all right," said the law. "You can go now."

That describes the type of thing that happens in the security field, only it is much more serious. The minister explained yesterday the educational advantages which were being given to some members of the R.C.M. Police. I should be very surprised to find that many of these individuals involved in the political investigation field are qualified to make any assessment of any information obtained. I understand that spying is a very complicated business, and that there are only a few individuals who are efficient in detecting spying activities.

Much of this political security work is being carried out in universities and in the mining communities of northern Ontario. There are probably more special officers of the R.C.M.P. security section per capita in those areas than anywhere else. Those individuals are questioning people, many of whom reply that they are communists but who actually are no more communistic than the majority of the members of this House of Commons. These people are individuals who at one time were workers in organizations like the "Wobblies" who came in contact with individuals who suggested that anyone who joined a union or labour organization was a communist. Many of these people have belonged to these organizations for 30 or 40 years and have no objection to being called communists because they do not have the faintest notion of the political implications.

It seems to me if the department wishes to increase its strength in this field in order to become an overweighted monster, it can do so through the activities which are now taking place. I suggest that if we are so violently opposed to communism, we should outlaw it and attempt to eliminate it in this country. I do not believe we should be successful in that way, because this would create an increase in communism in this country.

I suggest that communism is absolutely no threat as a political philosophy at the present time, nor will it be a threat as long as Canadians have an opportunity to improve their standard of living and continue to enjoy the benefits they are now enjoying. I suggest that communism is a threat only in countries such as those in South America, where the people are oppressed and suffer conditions of poverty, and are not able to even hope to change their situation under the forms of government which now exist. I suggest those are the countries and conditions in which communism flourishes.

I have had some experience with communist organization, having been involved in the mining field for some years. At one time the workers were represented by an organization considered to be communistic. I personally joined another organization which fought with that other organization for a considerable length of time. We know that the people who are interested in promoting communism in unions follow a certain pattern. I suggest it is possible, after considerable study, to recognize the line which will be followed by those people, and to know in advance the changes which will be made. I suggest that these facts are well known to the officials of the minister's department.

Surely, therefore, it is not necessary to continue this type of activity in towns like Kirkland Lake, Timmins and Sudbury, where every time an individual purchases a new antenna for a radio the local R.C.M.P. undercover agent travels around the neighbourhood asking such questions as "Why is the individual putting up such a high tower?" "What kind of short wave radio receiver does the individual have?" "What do the neighbours think he might be listening to?" and many other similar silly questions. I suggest if the officer wishes to find the answers to these questions he would be much more likely to accomplish his purposes by directing them to the individual himself or the individual who sold him the radio and antenna in the first place. I suggest that the individual is perhaps listening to police calls, or short-wave broadcasts in a language with which he is more familiar than that which is used by the local radio stations. I suggest these things do happen, and accomplish nothing in the way of security in this country, but only make a lot of people angry, including myself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Peters: You may go ahead and laugh but I suggest that many members of this house have been investigated by this security group at one time or another.

Mr. Fulton: We cannot help but laugh when you talk such nonsense as you have been talking in regard to radio aerials.

Mr. Peters: The minister may know a great deal about the activities of his department, but I do not think he knows as much as he thinks he does. I suggest many things are happening in his department of which he is completely unaware. As an example, he may have noticed an individual sitting in the member's gallery for quite some time; he is not here now. I suggest he is not aware of all the activities of that individual. However, I do not think much can be gained by this exchange of pleasantries between the minister and myself.

I am interested in the situation which exists in this field, and feel that nothing will be accomplished or changed unless we make some comment about it. I have not as yet seen any indication as to how many people are involved in the work of this particular section, nor have I heard any indication as to what has been done in relation to the supposed situation which exists. Surely the minister should present a résumé of the extent of communism in Canada today. In some ridings communist candidates have run in the elections and, as a result, the number of supporters is known. We know the number is very limited. On several occasions I have had a communist candidate run against me, and on those occasions I was aware of the number of supporters he had. I suggest that if we are going to accomplish anything in this field we must publicize the dangers involved in communism and the rate of its growth in Canada. In that way perhaps something could be done to prevent it spreading.

It is quite easy for people to get up and say that unions have communists in their ranks. Sometimes this is true, but most of the unions in this country have methods of weeding out the communists once they find out who they are. Most unions have clauses in their membership forms that prevent communists from holding any office.

These things are not said by the department. The minister does not go around and say that the unions are taking whatever steps they can to eliminate the problem. A few minutes ago he mentioned my own political party. In our membership form that every member must sign there is a clause which states that he is not a member of any other political party. This does not really mean that we do not want a Conservative to join the C.C.F. It does not mean that we do not want a Liberal to join the C.C.F. What it really means is that if a communist gets into our organization and we find out about it, we want to be able to throw him out.

We do this occasionally. I do not think the Conservatives throw them out, or the Liberals either for that matter. We do, and we use this method of doing it. When the minister says there have been communists in our party, that is true. There have been communists in the C.C.F. party, but we have publicly thrown them out on a number of occasions.

The unions also have fought the communists and thrown them out of their organizations. In the mining area around Timmins, where I have been connected with union activities, we have spent a great deal of our own money to do this. We have spent a great deal of time and effort in this regard. But the point is that nothing is ever said about the work these organizations do to get rid of communists. The menace, if you wish to call it that, is contained. No; it is much easier to get up and say, as some of the ministers have said, "Let us destroy the ban the bomb organization because there may be some communists in it".

Mr. Grafftey: Who said that? Be specific and responsible. Who said it?

An hon. Member: He could not be either.

Mr. Grafftey: Who said it? Don't just stand there. That is a serious charge.

Mr. Peters: Stand up and ask a question if you wish to do so.

Mr. Pugh: I will ask a question. Would the hon. member name the ministers who said "We will destroy the ban the bomb movement"?

Mr. Peters: Maybe I should not have said "destroy". I am referring to the discussion that has taken place in the house, for instance, in relation to the statement made by the Minister of National Defence to the reserve services in Winnipeg. I refer both to what was said there and the answers that have been given to questions about the matter.

Mr. Thrasher: It has no relation to the argument going on today.

Mr. Peters: It has to this extent. If there is a communist subversive movement which is dangerous to Canada in connection with this organization I am sure the branch would have taken a look at it, just as they have in the case of many other organizations. All I am saying is that much more could be done if the department were willing to help these organizations rid themselves of any communist influence. It does not seem to me that they are doing this as long as these matters are kept under cover. This branch is quite likely to grow in numbers because if you appoint one person to check on somebody's politics you have to assign two people to watch the first man to see that he is doing what he was supposed to do and is doing it in the proper manner. If this branch is not open to scrutiny, it can grow considerably.

In the mines we always knew that there were men working with us who were in fact employees of the management. We knew this and nobody seemed to care. If a man could pick up an extra $10 or $20 doing this kind of work then it was all the better for him. Nobody was particularly worried about it. Those miners who were communists admitted that they were, and quite often when they said they were communists they did not have the faintest idea what communism meant. In this regard I have known one or two cases of people who, after having been in Canada for 20 or 30 years, went back to their homelands and then moved heaven and earth to try to get back to Canada because they found they were more rebellious under the regime in their home country than they were under the regime in this country. They were really malcontents rather than people having any particular political philosophy.

I think some change of attitude should take place with regard to the security branch. It is all right for the branch to grow and do its work under cover, but I think the minister should occasionally make a report as to the dangers, because communism is a very different form of politics from any to which we are accustomed. As I understand the communist philosophy, the object is to establish an international organization that will control the world on an international basis. This is completely foreign to any other political philosophy of which I am aware. For this reason I think the minister and the department could assist the Canadian people considerably if they would stop creating a bogey as to this matter and really present the facts as they are. As long as people are kept in the dark it will be very difficult to find out what is going on, and this will lead to abuses and placing more emphasis on the situation than it really deserves.

I agree that the minister has a responsibility in this regard in that he has to exercise considerable discretion, but I think he will agree with me that the people who gather this information must be highly trained and skilled and be completely versed in the political aspect of their duties. I suggest that more education along this line is required than many of these men now have. It may be that this information should not be assessed by the R.C.M.P., as the minister says, and that in the security field the function of the R.C.M.P. is to gather facts and not to pass judgment on those facts. That responsibility rests elsewhere, primarily with the government.

This is the crux of the whole matter, Mr. Chairman. If the information obtained is not factual, if it is the pipe dream of some constable who thinks he has discovered a real hot spy ring because somebody has erected an abnormally high radio antenna, the facts will then be presented in such a manner as to convey an altogether wrong impression to people in the government. It is for this reason that I think more discretion should be exercised. Frankly, I think more information should be given as to what the threat is in Canada, how to fight it properly and in what manner the general public can be of assistance. The electors of Canada can solve the problem and eliminate whatever threat the communist party may pose in a political sense and so far as the rights that Canadians now enjoy are concerned. It seems to me that as long as communism is legal we are going to have to admit that not everyone who says he supports the communist party is a dangerous person, but may be simply supporting a particular political party.

There is some difference between these people and those who are operating in what we would call the spying field, obtaining information for the use of other countries. I suggest, as a result of my limited experience in this field, that most of the people who talk about communism have not the faintest notion what it is. Communism has been a bogey that has been thrown out. I am reminded of the story we used to have in primary school about crying wolf too often, and then nobody will listen.

Mr. Fulton: May I attempt to deal with some of the things that have been said, because if they go unanswered the impression may be created that there is no answer. The hon. member, if he reflects and will follow me, I believe will agree that he has indulged in so many exaggerations on the one hand, and inconsistencies on the other, that it is difficult to know what accusations he is trying to make.

The hon. member started out by saying there is no communist threat in Canada; that this was all nonsense; that we were really making too much out of this security and intelligence work. A little later he was saying that there is a communist threat and that the greatest credit should be given to the unions and to his own party for their work in finding out the communists and throwing them out of their movement.

It is difficult to know, therefore, what point of view the hon. member presents. If communists are persons whom we should ignore; if we should do nothing about checking on them, then I find it difficult to understand why he gives so much credit to the unions and his own party when they find communists within their ranks and throw them out. I happen to agree with the unions, and with the point of view of his party, when they say communists should not be allowed to infiltrate. I hope, therefore, that this last position of the hon. member is his true position; that he will agree that communism is a threat, and that Canada is entitled, indeed has an obligation, to protect herself against that threat and find out the extent and effectiveness of the threat.

Now, let me emphasize that in respect of security and intelligence, Canada runs no espionage service. Canada runs only a counterintelligence service. The work of the security and intelligence branch in Canada is exclusively confined to counter-intelligence. I doubt if any reasonable Canadian would deny that Canada is entitled to protect herself against espionage and, therefore, is entitled to take such proper measures as can be taken to determine the extent of the threat of espionage and of subversive movements within our midst.

In case there should be any doubt as to whether these communists are a threat, let me refer my hon. friend and the committee to the recent case in the United Kingdom. Canadian passports came to light in that case, and it took our highly competent, highly equipped and well staffed laboratory three days of intensive study to determine whether or not they were forgeries. I am advised that the proper expression would be that the whole documents were counterfeit. I do not want to give any misinformation here, and what I wish to say is that the Canadian passports had been so skilfully counterfeited that unless they were submitted to the crime detection laboratory for examination, no one could detect that they were counterfeit.

I could cite a number of other cases, but I should like to emphasize that these passports were in the possession of persons who were convicted of espionage in circumstances which establish that there was a highly organized and, up to that time, successful espionage ring. These and other circumstances known to us, some of which have been made public and some of which should not be made public, are sufficient proof if proof were wanted that there is an organized subversive effort going on in Canada, which is part of an international plan of espionage.

As I say, I give full credit to organizations such as the hon. member's own party with respect to their detection and ejection of communists from their movement. I have given the same credit to the unions. I would say that this portion of his remarks simply establishes the necessity for the security and intelligence work which is being carried out. The hon. member did, unfortunately, indulge in some exaggeration which created a completely wrong impression. Let us take, for instance, the suggestion he made that in a town like Timmins or Kirkland Lake the Royal Canadian Mounted Police investigated every case where an aerial was put up. This is what my hon. friend said, and he criticized us because he said we were doing such ridiculous things, going around making inquiries of the neighbours and at the store where the aerial was purchased. The reason we laughed was that the hon. member was talking nonsense.

Let me discuss what may happen. I would doubt very much whether such investigations were made in the course of security and intelligence work. I do not deny that there may have been some. Certainly I admit that such investigations are made from time to time. However, it must be remembered that we are responsible for investigations carried out on behalf of the Department of Transport under their act and regulations. These regulations state that a person must have a licence before he can operate a transmitting station. If we see an unusually high aerial being erected, this may well be used for the purpose of transmission. It is not related at all to security and intelligence, but a routine inquiry might have been made under the responsibility we have to ensure that there are no unlicensed transmitting sets being installed and operated in Canada.

The danger of an unbalanced view being taken of these things does not rest, by any means, upon the administration alone. I suggest that my hon. friend has clearly illustrated that there is an unbalanced and unduly suspicious mind in other quarters, as well as undue prejudice against the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, particularly the security and intelligence branch. It is true there are some people, you know, who epitomize that well known expression of seeing a communist under every bed. This is, of course, stupid and exaggerated. There are, on the other hand, people who see a Royal Canadian Mounted policeman under every bed, and I suggest this is equally stupid and exaggerated thinking.

My hon. friend has suggested that the minister and the department are trying to create an overweight monster. I can assure my hon. friend, speaking personally, that my efforts are all the other way. Sometimes I have not been completely successful, and I have taken steps to deal with it. Certainly I have no desire to create or to be any overweight monster, and I have exerted every effort to ensure that security or intelligence work would not get out of hand. As I said earlier, we will not be able to carry out this or any other branch of police work without occasionally making mistakes. I think I am entitled to ask, however, that mistakes or alleged mistakes be drawn to our attention first, so we can investigate them to ascertain whether there is anything that should be done to improve our methods.

I am sure the hon. member will agree, if he considers and analyses what he has said, that there have been inconsistencies in his complaints because of the credit he gives to those who take steps to eject communists from their own organizations, and he will agree that in fact there is a communist threat. He will agree that the government of Canada, through its security forces, have as much, indeed greater, responsibility than his own party and the labour unions to find out where the communists are, what they are doing and prevent them from doing harm, to the extent that that is possible.

Mr. Peters: With respect to the difference of opinion concerning the subjects dealt with in my remarks, let me say that it was not my intention in the first portion of my comments to indicate that there was a threat. I was relating my remarks to what the minister said yesterday. When asked how many communists there are in Canada the minister said, using Tim Buck's own figure, there are 3,000. If we multiplied that number by one hundred there would be no political problem—

Mr. Broome: The hon. member must be crazy.

Mr. Peters: Well, if there were 300,000 communists how would that affect federal elections in Canada? I appreciate the minister's position. I feel that he made an honest assessment of the situation. My remarks related to the figure of 3,000 communists to which he referred. I do not think that is any threat in a political sense. I do not feel that the communists are going to form the government of Canada tomorrow or in the immediate future. With respect to antennae, I did not say that every time one went up—

Mr. Fulton: Unfortunately my hon. friend did say that. That is why I felt it necessary to correct him.

Mr. Peters: I did not intend to say that, and if I did I should correct that statement. The hon. member for Timmins brought a case to my attention. He lives next door to a fellow who put up a fairly high antenna and an investigation was made. In a community the size of Timmins there would be only a limited number of retail outlets selling long and short wave equipment. It would not have been difficult to inquire from the purchase source about the type of equipment bought, and an investigation would not have been necessary. I have no quarrel with the minister's remarks.

Mr. Fulton: I wish to deal with one other matter, Mr. Chairman, because I feel the record should be set straight. I refer to the incident at the airport in Ottawa. I am advised that because of the point at which this vehicle was parked it was necessary to make an effort to move it. The vehicle could not be permitted to remain there because it was obstructing traffic. I am also advised that our member spoke politely to the lady in question, and upon being informed that she was ill he quickly withdrew and the vehicle was moved. I am also informed that the husband of the lady in question has indicated that he is perfectly satisfied with the approach, attitude and conduct of our member.

Mr. Peters: I raised it because of what was stated in a newspaper article. I had an almost identical experience myself.

Mr. Fulton: My point is that if my hon. friend had made inquiries of me or the commissioner he would have received a full explanation. It is well known that newspapers sometimes publish things they do not themselves check because they make good news at the time. Newspapers are interested in circulation, and reporters are busy and do not always have time to check the stories before they publish them. I do not wish to suggest that members of parliament are not also busy, but one might expect that they would be a little more inclined to check stories before repeating them.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring this discussion back down to the level of the common, ordinary man and speak about something that is of vital interest in my riding. I see that the hour for the luncheon recess is approaching. Like other hon. members of the committee I have been sitting here for hours listening to wrangling about communism and other irrelevant matters at a time when we should have been discussing estimates pertaining to the R.C.M.P. and the functions they perform.

I compliment the R.C.M.P. on the splendid work they are doing. My remarks are intended to be constructive, and I offer them for the purpose of assisting and helping the R.C.M.P. I represent the Macleod riding in western Canada which is the cradle of the cattle ranching industry and especially all along the foothills area of the Rockies. The deployment of R.C.M.P. personnel in small nuclei in communities such as Fort Macleod, Claresholm, High River and others is a pattern which may fit in with the requirements of other parts of the country, but it does not meet the requirements of this area in terms of the proper administration of police work.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Kindt: I will when I am through. My time is just about up.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kindt: I suggest, sir, that we call it one o'clock. When we resume and I have completed my remarks I shall be pleased to answer any questions the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate might wish to raise.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was just going to ask, Mr. Chairman, whether the hon. member was bringing the discussion down to the level of the bull.

Mr. Kindt: No, I was bringing it down to the level of the tail end of a codfish and applying it to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Spencer: Mr. Chairman, before this item carries—

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I called it one o'clock.

The Chairman: It is not one o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not one o'clock yet.

Mr. Kindt: I wish to continue my remarks when we resume.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no; not more of the same.

The Chairman: I see that it is one o'clock now.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, in resuming my remarks which were under way just before the lunch hour I shall only say a few additional words. As I have mentioned, these remarks are made in the spirit of being helpful.

Before the luncheon adjournment I had been talking about police protection in the area which I represent. I had mentioned—and if I did not, I intended to do so—that there are police detachments at Fort Macleod, Claresholm and High River. I live in the area south of High River and northwest of Nanton. This area is out in the country.

The people of this area have been asking me for the past two years why there is not adequate police protection in the area. The distance between Claresholm and High River is about 50 miles, and if police protection is required, say at Connemara or Nanton, the police detachment, which is some 30 miles or more away at Claresholm, must be notified.

To give an illustration of the point I am attempting to make, at Connemara thieves broke into the United Grain Growers elevator about a month and a half ago. The theft took place during the night when the agent was not on duty, and when he returned to duty the next morning he found that the place had been broken into. He phoned the police detachment at Claresholm, but because of the pressure of other duties I suppose, or for some other reason, they did not get there until three o'clock in the afternoon. I could illustrate this point by mentioning other situations. All I am trying to say is that I think if the deployment of the men of the police force was examined, a better coverage of police protection could be provided in a given area without employing additional personnel.

I am asking the Department of Justice and the police force to re-examine this matter. In this particular area, as I mentioned this morning, there is a long stretch of foothill country running from away west and southwest of High River up as far as Banff, and then in the other direction clear down to the United States boundary line. In that area there is a large cattle ranching industry. The cattle ranchers who are living in the area are the most law-abiding citizens in Canada, but the odd thief comes around and butchers an animal.

What I wish to say is that if we had a little better coverage and if the police force that is now in that area were re-examined from the point of view of deployment, I think the people would be more satisfied because they would be given better police protection.

There are a few criticisms of this deployment that I might just as well mention. Some people say they never see a policeman out in the country; they are always going up and down the roads, two in a car. I have brought this to the attention of the Minister of Justice previously and nothing has happened. These people are criticizing the deployment of police personnel in relation to the amount of coverage which they would normally expect the police force to give.

It is quite possible that in terms of training and so on, it is necessary at times for two policemen to ride in a car, but as a general, day after day practice, it has opened the door to a certain amount of criticism by local people. For this reason I should like the department to re-examine this particular aspect of the work of the police force.

There is another problem which I have raised before. At Waterton lakes there is a very large tourist trade in the summertime. People visit this area from the United States and other parts of Canada; in fact, they come in from all parts of the continent and the world. I think it would be one of the finest advertisements for Canada if the police there were to wear scarlet uniforms.

I also suggest that the town police of Fort Macleod, where the old fort is situated, should be required to wear scarlet uniforms. This police force is paid for by the town of Fort Macleod and they police the town. The old fort has been resurrected there and people visit it by the thousands during the summertime. It is a replica of the original fort which the Royal Northwest Mounted Police established in 1874. I think that if any place in western Canada is appropriate for the wearing of scarlet uniforms by the police, it is the museum and fort at Fort Macleod.

Many tourists visit the fort. They do not see the scarlet uniform, and of course it is always a subject for questioning. One of the arguments used by those who oppose this suggestion is, "Well, it is the summertime; it is uncomfortable to wear the scarlet uniform. It is costly. You would not expect them to wear it on duty". They now call it a dress suit. Let me say that the traditional uniform has a particular place in the memory of the people of western Canada. The Royal Northwest Mounted Police policed that country for years and wore this same uniform so it is a bit late for anyone to begin arguing that it is uncomfortable to wear in the summer. Another argument against it is that it is warm. Well, it is not particularly warm at Waterton lakes, and even at Fort Macleod it is only warm for a few hours during the heat of the day. The scarlet uniform is worn by officers of the R.C.M.P. outside the parliament buildings. Advantage is being taken of it there for the benefit of the tourist trade. I am not asking for anything new. I am asking for something which the people out there have asked me to ask for, and I should like the minister to give this request his earnest and affirmative consideration.

I want to pay a compliment to the police officers operating in my area. The quality of the personnel who have been selected to work in that part of the country is very high. I think they are out to do a good job. Perhaps some of the weaknesses of the R.C.M.P. are the responsibility of the upper echelon. I would ask them not to be so resistant to the suggestions which are made, and to re-examine some of the things they are doing with a view to improving the effectiveness of the force in different parts of the dominion and particularly in the constituency which I represent.

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is part of Waterton lakes in his constituency?

Mr. Kindt: Yes, the Waterton lakes west of the fifth meridian are in my constituency. I might add that the hon. member for Lethbridge has the townsites and I have the fishing area. He has the problems and I have the pleasure.

Mr. Winch: There is one matter which I should like to raise and upon which I should like to hear a comment by the minister. I am asking the commissioner of the R.C.M. Police, through the Minister of Justice, if he can give us any information on R.C.M.P. planning as a result of the experience gained during Tocsin 61. On this civil defence exercise two backbenchers, one from the Liberal party, and myself, were privileged to be present. I am speaking only in relation to the R.C.M.P. phase of that exercise. With the exception of the room where the cabinet or the privy council met, the member who represented the Liberal party and myself were allowed to move everywhere we wished and to ask all the questions we wished. I found it most interesting, especially as far as the R.C.M. Police are concerned.

I am certain that the commissioner will remember that in the course of this realistic simulation of the bombing of Canada, he received, in his underground shelter during the course of that exercise, a message from the commissioner of the Ontario provincial police saying that half his men had become casualties and calling for assistance from the R.C.M.P. But the situation was that the R.C.M.P. had themselves lost two thirds of their number through casualties. The commissioner will remember that I was at his desk at that time. I give this as an indication of the situation which developed during this exercise, and on the basis of this situation I ask the minister to tell us what plans are being prepared to carry on the work and the responsibility of the R.C.M.P. should such a situation become a reality.

I admit this is a strange way in which to introduce this question, but the commissioner was there, together with his two assistants, and so was I. The exercise was designed to be a realistic study of survival possibilities and the situation which I have described is the one with which the commissioner found himself faced at his table at that underground point at Petawawa when the message came to him.

Mr. Broome: Before the minister answers that question I should like to ask another one. Can he give us any information about the use by the R.C.M.P. of writs of assistance? Can he tell us whether their use is restricted to certain divisions of the R.C.M.P. or whether all officers carry such documents with them. I recall, several years ago, reading an editorial which appeared in a British Columbia newspaper regarding an incident where an R.C.M.P. officer suspecting, after finding a stolen car, that the person who stole it was in a certain house, forced his way into that house and checked everyone in it.

I am concerned about these writs of assistance. I think bureaucracy can look after itself, but ordinary citizens need protection against the arbitrary use of such powers and that is why I am asking this question, although, of course, we all know that the police do need power in order to carry out their responsibilities. I think that the use of such instruments and powers should be very closely watched by those individuals who are in charge of the R.C.M. Police and the other forces which use these instruments and powers. I have the greatest respect and admiration for the R.C.M. Police and think that it is a magnificent body doing wonderful work. However, it is composed of individuals who are human and fallible, and unfortunate incidents do occur.

Finally, the last question I wish to ask is this. Where forcible entry is made and damage is done, and when no conviction is obtained, what recourse do individuals have to recover the cost of damages which have been incurred?

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, as the last surviving ex-member of the R.C.M.P. in this house I should like to say a word or two about the force. We very often hear that the mounted police force is not the outfit it used to be. I do not think it is. I think it gets better year by year. Since I retired after 23 years service, some three years ago I have seen many changes made for the betterment of the force. I should like to refer in particular to the present commissioner, who is certainly one of the finest members ever produced by the force. I say that advisedly because he is a man who has come up through the ranks. His success in this regard is an indication to each recruit who joins the mounted police force that the highest positions are open to him if he combines his ambition with the necessary toil.

I recently had the privilege of witnessing a passing out parade at Rockcliffe. The excellent condition and the look of high morale on the faces of those individuals, particularly at this time when so much emphasis is being placed on physical fitness in this country, should be an inspiration to any young Canadian entertaining the idea of joining this force. I think the condition of those young men, who have completed their training, should be an inspiration to all the young people of this country who seek a high degree of physical fitness, and I suggest the high standard of the force should be emulated by all training establishments and schools across this country. I think the force generally, and those individuals in charge of it from the minister down to the fine N.C.O.'s, should be commended for the excellent work that is being done.

An efficient force of this kind operated and controlled by the government cannot be expected to maintain this excellent work without money. I know from experience that those in charge of this force must have adequate financial resources in order to implement the projects which they have very carefully thought out, and I know they have pared their expenses to the bone before asking for the appropriation. I know that those who make up the estimates give meticulous care to make sure that the taxpayers' money will not be wasted and, when they ask for expenditures, they are not subject to Parkinson's law but are asking for money which is absolutely essential. When the minister submits his full request for appropriation for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police I should like to appeal to all members of this committee to give unanimous support to the request for an appropriation to underwrite the costs of this important and well-carried out work. This department gives the taxpayer 100 cents for his dollar.

Mr. Spencer: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief. I should again like to bring a matter to the minister's attention, which perhaps has been brought to his attention on numerous previous occasions, regarding the posting of officers of the mounted police force to various ports of entry to this country. My concern is, of course, in regard to the port of Windsor. However, I think the matter is of some concern to other hon. members of this committee.

As all hon. members will appreciate, the mounted police force is a world renowned organization and is particularly symbolic of Canada. When individuals hear, read or see a mounted policeman their thoughts are immediately directed toward this country. I believe that fact is emphasized by a reference which appears in the latest report of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, to which I should like to briefly refer. The following statement appears at page 88 of that report, and reads as follows:

A popular and successful promotion program was undertaken in co-operation with the Department of External Affairs at the request of the Boy Scouts of America Association. The association sponsored a special educational program during March under the theme "Canada, Land of the Mountie", and the travel bureau contributed by providing 400,000 copies of its folder, Canada—Vacations Unlimited.

I think that emphasizes the fact that in our advertising abroad, in an effort to increase tourists and visitors, Canada is depicted as the land of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

In so far as the posting of officers to the port of Windsor is concerned, I should like very briefly to indicate the great number of people who enter Canada at Windsor. I think it is beyond contradiction to say that Windsor is, in point of numbers at least, the most important point of entry to Canada. I have figures in this regard covering the first five months of this year.

Canada customs report that there were 1,035,159 automobiles which crossed the border into Windsor during this five-month period. That is the greatest number of automobiles to enter Canada at this port during that period in the past six years. In so far as individuals are concerned, a consolidation of the monthly reports indicates that 3,952,256 —nearly four million—entered Canada at Windsor during the period January to May of this year. This is the largest number of passengers entering Canada at one point during the past six years.

I should also like to remind the hon. members of this committee of the pleasure boat traffic in the area. This traffic, which was reported for the first time this year in the May report, has increased startlingly. There were 709 permits issued for craft arriving as compared with 484 a year ago. This represents an increase of 46 per cent. There were 2,511 passengers on these pleasure craft, which represents an increase of 817 persons, or 42 per cent.

I know that on a previous occasion the minister referred to the report of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the period ending March 31, 1958, where an explanation is given of the reluctance, shall I say, to accede to the request which has been made on previous occasions, and to which I now intend to refer. I have read the explanation but to me it is not convincing. I was motivated to some extent in bringing this matter before the minister and the committee again by the revelation made by the hon. member for Brantford as to the additional uses to which the mounted police are being put. To me that indicates that there have been increases in the establishment of the force and that the time has arrived when not only consideration should be given to this matter but the posting of these officers at the principal, important ports of entry should now be put into effect.

With over four million people entering Canada in a five-month period at the port of Windsor where they are subjected to customs and immigration inspection, it is only to be expected that some incidents will arise possibly requiring the intervention of a police officer. Therefore I am not requesting the posting of these men simply for show purposes but also for their utilitarian value. I think they might forestall some of these incidents and they would be useful at these ports not only for customs and immigration purposes but in order to satisfy the expectations of the millions of visitors who come to Canada hoping to see representatives of this police force.

We have a detachment of the force at Windsor which I believe is primarily engaged in undercover activities, shall I say, with respect to commercial smuggling and the narcotic problem. The officers are available and I would hope that the minister would review the situation and, having in mind the growing importance of this suggestion, see his way clear to accede to this request.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were the original law enforcement body in western Canada. As one among a number of hon. members who knew the prairies in the earlier days, let me say that I appreciate fully the part that the force played. Reference has been made to the situation with regard to customs examination and also the wearing of scarlet uniforms, but originally the role of the force was to bring law and order to western Canada.

I should like to say to the minister, and through him to the commissioner, that in our part of the country we have the highest regard for the force and for its leadership. It is very easy to talk about scarlet uniforms or about entry into Canada through the customs ports. I suggest sincerely that these matters are not really germane to the role of the force. I do not believe the R.C.M.P. should be relegated to the role of undercover men. I believe the force should be preserved for their own particular role and that role in my opinion is the one they filled originally when the force was created late in the last century, to preserve law and order, which they have done in a magnificent way.

Mr. Fulton: I will deal with the questions that have been raised since I replied just before lunch. The hon. member for Macleod drew to the attention of the committee the fact that he has requested of us on a number of occasions that we make some changes in the points at which men are stationed. I must point out to him that the question of the organization and location of detachments is under constant review at headquarters. It is also under constant review at the headquarters in each province and, of course, where we operate as the provincial police force under contract it is under constant review by the attorney general of the province. Under these latter circumstances the primary responsibility in determining where detachments will be located and how they will be manned is that of the attorney general of the province.

It is just not possible for us to comply with every request that is made. From the police point of view such a request is looked at first having in mind efficiency of administration and policing. It is also a matter on which we are bound to consult with the attorney general where we are operating as the provincial force under contract as in Alberta. I can only suggest that probably in this case the proper place to start is with the attorney general of the province to get his view and/or recommendation on the change.

With regard to the wearing of the scarlet tunic by members of the detachment in Macleod, I must point out that they are doing the work of a municipal force under contract with the municipality. They are there as a municipal police force to do police work and not to be in their red tunics as a tourist or historic attraction. I am advised that we have had no request from the municipality of Macleod, with whom, as I say, we have a contract, for a change in the uniform or for our men to wear scarlet tunics in the summer or at any other time. On ceremonial occasions they will, of course, appear in their scarlet tunics, but on all other occasions and during all other times they are there because they are doing the work of a municipal police force under contract, and will be wearing their working uniform.

The situation on parliament hill is quite different. Here they are not doing the work of a straight police detachment. They are in no way similar to the detachment stationed at Macleod under contract. While I have to give this answer now and do not hesitate to give it, I hope it will not be taken as meaning that we are inflexible. Should the situation change at any time or should other considerations be laid before us, we will consider every request in that light but they must be considered first from the point of view of the efficient discharge of the function which the police are there to discharge.

The hon. member for Vancouver East asked me about the record as revealed by exercise Tocsin in 1961. He drew to our attention that for exercise purposes it was reported that two thirds of the members of the force were wiped out or rendered ineffective. The hon. member must realize, of course, that for exercise purposes Tocsin was designed to produce the maximum damage in Canada because it was desired to exercise all regional headquarters as well as the central government headquarters. I am not saying that under no circumstances would there be attacks as heavy and effective as this was represented to be for exercise purposes, but I am simply saying that for the purpose of the exercise the narrative assumed very heavy and very effective attacks on practically every part of Canada. Under these circumstances there is no question but that the casualties would have been of the order which operationally the commissioner assumed as a result of the reports that came in.

The only answer we have and the only answer we can see—and we are planning on this basis now bearing this possibility in mind—is the establishment of auxiliaries and reserves in the larger centres. Then, in the event of damage from hostilities we would have a force in reserve that could quickly be sent in to take the place of the casualties. We cannot maintain these auxiliaries and reserves as an actual part of the strength of the force in advance of hostilities but arrangements must be made in advance so that we can call them up immediately to take the place of the casualties and to undertake some of the extra work which will fall upon the force in any event in time of war.

The hon. member for Vancouver South asked me about the number of men who would be in possession of writs of assistance. The answer to that is, a very limited number of senior personnel are in possession of writs of assistance and these personnel are confined to the drug squads and the personnel enforcing the Customs and Excise Act. A writ of assistance would not be used in connection with a search for a stolen motor car unless it was suspected the car had been used in connection with a drug or customs and excise offence. I can only tell the hon. member, therefore, that in so far as a search for a stolen vehicle is concerned, there must have been some error in the report which came to him. I should like to know the details, however, in case something did go wrong or something was used in a manner in which it should not have been used. If the hon. member would give me the details he has, then I could satisfy him as to whether or not his report is correct and satisfy myself as to action which should be taken if a mistake has been made.

I should point out also that there are a certain number of search warrants placed in the hands of our personnel by the attorneys general of the provinces in which we act as a provincial police force. However, in so far as writs of assistance are concerned, they are confined to senior personnel and even then they are limited to the personnel doing work in connection with narcotics and customs and excise offences.

If damage is done in the course of the execution of a writ or a search, the policy is that where the damage done in the exercise of a writ under a federal statute is minor, it is paid for on the spot. If the damage is major, it is referred to the Department of Justice for submission to the treasury board for payment of the damage or at least that portion of it for which we could be said to be responsible. If damage is done in the course of the execution of a writ when we are acting as a provincial police force, then the policy regarding payment for the damage is decided by the provincial attorney general.

I am very appreciative of the remarks of the hon. member for Athabasca, recognizing that he had service in this force and recognizing the authority with which he speaks. Every effort will be made to continue to maintain the high standard of recruitment, performance and public relations which has come to be the hallmark of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The hon. member for Essex West renewed a request for the stationing of a member of the force at the port of entry at Windsor. He did refer to the fact that the figure of the mounted policeman in his scarlet tunic has become an established and accepted national symbol. In my opinion it is extremely significant that the figure of a policeman should occupy this place of affection in the public mind in what is certainly not a police state. This is a mark not only of the respect in which the force is held but of the recognition by the public that in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police we have a force with respect to whom there is no danger of their attempting to become the master of the public instead of their servants.

From one point of view, therefore, the temptation is always on those administering the force, and on the minister responsible, to do what we can to put men at strategic points in the scarlet tunic. However, we have always to remember what I said a moment ago. This force will not be respected if it does not approach every problem from the point of view of the efficient discharge of the duties for which it is responsible; that is their role, and not the mere "cashing in", as it were, on the traditions of the force and the respect in which the force is held.

At Windsor, we have a detachment of 17 uniformed members and two civil servants. We also have a 50-foot boat of the marine division with a crew of four. These men, of course, are engaged entirely upon federal work, primarily investigations under the Customs Act and the Immigration Act. I suppose that Windsor, being a city made up of normal Canadians, there is a certain amount of income tax work as well. In so far as the marine division is concerned, and indeed the regular members of the force, they have also the enforcement of the small boat regulations. I am advised that we have never been requested by the customs or immigration departments to have members stationed at the actual port of entry. The responsibility at ports of entry, of course, is principally that of the customs and excise branch and the immigration service. They do all the port of entry work and we, in turn, make all the investigations which they request of us and which may arise out of the work they do. I do suggest for consideration of hon. members this thought, that whether or not we were to have men in the red tunic or just in ordinary working dress of the police, would it in fact be wise to have a policeman stationed at your port of entry? I cannot think of any other country, the United States or elsewhere—I may be wrong—where a person going through the port of entry is met by a police officer. It is always the customs officer or the immigration officer.

One of my colleagues reminds me that there may be some countries where one sees police at the borders, but these are not the countries operating under our system of government. I do raise the question of whether it would be wise for us to station a police officer in a port of entry. My own view would be that there are many considerations which argue against it. As long as you have police, as we have at Windsor and other ports of entry, who are available close at hand to make investigations or undertake enforcement work should the work of a police officer be necessary, I think that is all we should do. We should not embark on a policy of actually stationing them in the vicinity, or rather in the building through which immigrants are passing.

I thank the hon. member for Medicine Hat and all hon. members for the indication of their support for these estimates.

Mr. Winch: There is one further question I should like to ask the Minister of Justice. This is a subject which has concerned a great many members of the House of Commons. Could the Minister of Justice explain the jurisdiction and responsibility of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on parliament hill? I raise this question because of an incident which occurred. I realize that inside the House of Commons the responsibility is that of our own security police. We never see the mounted police inside the House of Commons building itself, except during visits by President Kennedy or other distinguished guests. However, we do find the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on the grounds of parliament hill. Beyond the grounds we take it that the responsibility is that of the Ottawa police itself.

The reason I raised the matter is this. There has filtered through to a great many members of the House of Commons news of an incident of not so many days ago where an employee in the House of Commons had his car parked within the House of Commons area. After we adjourned at 10:30 p.m. at night, on going down to enter his car, he found somebody trying to break into it. He chased the man but could not catch him. However, he had a good description of him. He naturally came back to the R.C.M.P. in the grounds and, according to the information that I know has been given to a great many members in this house, he was told, "Get in touch with the Ontario police".

The incident happened inside the House of Commons grounds. So although within a few minutes of the time of the incident he could describe the man who had escaped and who had been trying to get into his car, he was told by the R.C.M.P. "That is a matter for the Ontario police and the Ottawa municipal police". As a result of that occurrence which is known to a great many members, I ask this question. Just what is the jurisdiction, authority and responsibility of the R.C.M.P. as distinguished from that of our security police who are most magnificent and who are doing a wonderful job in the House of Commons inside the building, the R.C.M.P. in the grounds and the Ottawa and municipal police outside the gates? From discussions I have had about this matter I am certain that we would appreciate any information we can get upon this point.

Mr. Fulton: It sometimes puzzles me a great deal indeed that matters of this sort are reserved for the estimates and then one is expected to discuss the matter in detail without ever having heard of the case. As I have tried to indicate, I would greatly appreciate it if, at any time an hon. member has a ground for complaint or a ground for being disturbed or concerned, he would bring the matter to my attention either directly or through my office or through my department or take it up with the commissioner. He would find us fully prepared to believe that our men are human and can make mistakes and anxious to rectify those mistakes or any situation which gave rise to those mistakes.

But I am unable to give a full answer on this particular matter because I have not heard of it previously. If it was a matter of such great concern to members or to the staff or personnel of the house, I regret that it has not been taken up with one of the persons who has the prime responsibility in the matter such as myself. However, that situation does not alter the fact that, having now heard about it, I shall most certainly look into it. I shall be grateful if the hon. member will give me the particulars such as the date and so on. If the situation as described does in fact exist, I would say that one of the members of the force—inadvertently, I hope—has made an error in his approach. I think that we should under circumstances such as were outlined, and at all times, be prepared in the force to give every assistance within our power, including taking details and reporting to the superiors in the force itself and establishing ourselves any liaison that may be necessary with other police forces. I can only express regret if that was not done in the situation described by my hon. friend.

With regard to the situation generally I would say this. On parliament hill, on government of Canada property, the R.C.M.P. are responsible for the enforcement of the Government Property Traffic Act and of course, here as everywhere else, for the enforcement of all other federal statutes. The Government Property Traffic Act is the authority under which the parking regulations on parliament hill are enacted, although these regulations are worked out in conjunction with the Speakers of the two houses. The authority of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, however, extends only to the outside precincts such as the driveways and parliament hill outside the parliament buildings themselves. Inside the authority rests with the protective staff who operate directly under Mr. Speaker.

I understand that the Ontario provincial police take the position that, in the case of any crime committed under the Criminal Code, even on parliament hill, they reserve the right or the residual authority under the constitutional position that the responsibility for the enforcement of the Criminal Code within the province rests with the attorney general. I do not think that any real point of difficulty has ever arisen. Certainly if a man were detected in the commission of a crime we would not take the absurd position that we have to send out for the Ontario provincial police, nor would they expect us to do so. We would act immediately and then turn over the offender or the information to the Ontario provincial police or the Ottawa police. This is why, if the circumstances are as they have been outlined, I regret that attitude was not taken. I think we would be expected to take the particulars at once and hand them over to the Ontario provincial police for their assistance so that co-operatively we might work together in the apprehension of any offender.

That is, however, the general situation. But with regard to the commission of crimes, even in this area—I refer to crimes under the Criminal Code—the Ontario provincial police say they have the right and that they prefer that, having done everything we are required to do at the moment, we turn the information over to them for the ultimate enforcement of the law.

Mr. Winch: Is it correct that you have one room in the east block to which the R.C.M.P. officer can take somebody he picks up on the hill? Have you one room in the east block with bars?

Mr. Fulton: We have a member stationed at the east block inside the south entrance. He is on duty during the daylight hours. I do not believe we have any room in that building.

Mr. Winch: Is that a jail?

Mr. Fulton: No. We have no jail on parliament hill unless, of course, my hon. friend regards this chamber as a jail.

Mr. Winch: No. I asked that question because I saw a man picked up. I do not know why he was picked up. He was taken away by the police and I think he was put in one room in the east block. Is there one room in the east block where you put anybody who is picked up?

Mr. Fulton: I have never heard of one. This is perhaps another example of the situation I have mentioned. When my hon. friend hears of these extraordinary and unusual circumstances I wish he would bring them to my attention at the time. Then I should be able to give him an answer. I know of no room. The commissioner here knows of no room. I have been in and out of that building a score of times and I have seen no room. I have seen a corporal on duty there. They have a little hallway that they use but there is no jail on parliament hill.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Justice. The committee will now proceed to consideration of the estimates of the Department of Fisheries, vote No. 134. This item will be found on page 29 of the blue book, and the details on page 209.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

134. Industrial development service, $806,750.

Mr. Robichaud: I have just one question to ask the minister. In view of the situation of the lobster fishermen in district No. 7 this spring, where fishing only started in some cases around June 1 and where a full month was lost, would the minister advise the committee whether he has received any requests either for an extension of the present season beyond July 1 or for a month's extra fishing later in the fall?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, there have been numerous requests directly from fishermen, and some have been conveyed to me by hon. members. Perhaps I may make a brief statement on the general situation.

There have been requests brought to my attention for an extension in district No. 4. These requests were made not only by fishermen but by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg and the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare. The situation was very carefully reviewed and it was found that in this district, which has had an open season for quite a long period of time, the catch was about the average of the last few years. Therefore the request was denied.

The hon. members from Halifax and Antigonish-Guysborough conveyed requests to me from fishermen in that area, and there have been many other direct requests for an extension of the lobster fishing season in district No. 5, which would normally close on June 20. I am recommending that the season in this district be extended to June 30.

With regard to district No. 7B and district No. 9, the season in district No. 7B has already been extended five days, to July 5. It is too early yet to determine whether or not we should further extend the season. Requests have been received for its extension, but it is too early yet to make a determination because this will be dependent on two conditions; one is extent of the catch during the remainder of this month, and the other is what the water temperatures will be and in what condition the lobsters themselves will be when July 5, or whatever date is applicable, arrives. Dependent on those two conditions, near the closing date we will make a determination as to whether or not it will be possible, if necessary, to extend the season.

We have received a few requests, from individuals only as far as I know, that instead of extending the seasons in these districts at this time of year they should be closed at the normal time and a short season opened in the fall. This refers to districts where the season is not normally open in the fall.

This does not seem to have general support. I would not be inclined to recommend the opening of a fall season in these districts, because it is my understanding that this was tried on one occasion in the past in similar circumstances—this was quite a few years ago—and as a result, or at least in part as a result, the catches for the following years in the districts were not good. Therefore on balance I think the suggestion of a fall season would be of no general benefit to the fishermen concerned.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, the minister has mentioned that there has already been an extension for district 7B until July 5. Will the minister give some consideration to extending the season in this district to July 8, if the water temperature is appropriate and the quality of the lobster is still good, because it will give the fishermen the full benefit of a week in July; otherwise they would have to stop in the middle of the week.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): It is too early to make a determination in this matter, but certainly as these requests come in they will be given very careful and close consideration.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would also give the assurance that he will give consideration to district 6B in Cape Breton. I have talked over this matter with the minister several times. I hope he will give this district consideration along the lines he has mentioned, because of the lateness of the fishermen getting away due to the ice conditions.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that I neglected to mention district No. 6B. The situation there is also under close observation. We have received requests from that area, some directly and some of which were brought to my attention by the hon. member who has just spoken and the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond.

135. Field services administration, $1,060,400.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the minister to conditions in the waters just outside the port of Vancouver. Just today I received a letter which says, among other things, that the debris in Howe sound covers an area of acres and acres; that one has to pick one's way through this debris and in spite of doing this hulls are dented and scratched, propellers are ruined and cooling systems are plugged.

In the Vancouver press there has appeared a news story that scows were unloading sawdust in the waters outside the port of Vancouver because sawdust burners were no longer used and this was supposedly a good way of getting rid of this debris. I think the regional office in Vancouver should get busy and tighten up on these regulations. We have put teeth in the Fisheries Act and this sort of thing has got to be stopped. It is the function of this department to stop it.

This sort of condition about which you read in the newspapers and about which people write to you is, I think, shameful, not only in regard to spoiling perhaps the finest boating ground in North America, but it also affects the matter of conservation. These matters were dealt with by the minister when he presented the amendments to the Fisheries Act and this house voted to give the department power to clear up situations of this kind. I think conditions are getting worse out there and the department has got to take action, and drastic action. I would like some report as to what the department is going to do.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): In as far as any responsibility of this department is concerned, I will have this matter brought to the attention of my officials to make sure that everything that should be done is being done. However, I should like to point out that I think in this case, althought I am not sure of the details, the responsibility probably lies with the Department of Transport and I will bring this matter to the attention of that department.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, is there any development work being done to repopulate and increase the fishing potentiality in the interprovincial waters of lake Timiskaming?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): This responsibility in the case of the lake referred to lies with the government of Ontario. However, I will be glad to see that the hon. member's observation is passed on to the proper authority.

Mr. Peters: In this case half the lake belongs to the province of Ontario. I have raised this matter because the responsibility of Ontario is limited. There must be co-operation with the province of Quebec in any type of development that might take place.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, the same remarks apply to the province of Quebec. The federal government does not have direct responsibility in the waters of Ontario or Quebec for the type of matter about which the hon. member speaks. It is a matter of liaison between those two governments.

Mr. Legere: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this item dealing with conservation and development. I have attempted to look at this problem objectively and I have sought advice from people connected with the fishing industry as primary producers, buyers, processors and exporters. Today we live in a technical world. Science has advanced by leaps and bounds, and in this advance the fishing industry has been swept along. New and better methods have been devised to catch fish of all species. Where once the location of dense concentrations of fish was a matter of chance, the science of electronics today minimizes this element and pinpoints with 100 per cent proficiency the concentration of fish, so much so that mother nature is waging a losing battle in order to maintain a proper balance.

Lobster, the basis of that great Nova Scotia industry, has not fared any better in its attempt for survival. Assuredly the lobster remains the prey of its natural enemy. This has been its battle down through the ages. Seagulls continue to delight in the appetizing lobster egg that floats for seven days on the surface of the ocean where it drifts aimlessly. The codfish and his colleagues devour their share of these eggs. It has never been determined what percentage of eggs laid by the female lobster do develop into mature lobsters. Even when the surviving floating eggs sink to the bottom and become baby lobsters, fish of all species delight in swallowing them whole. So, as may be seen, the fight for survival goes on.

But this fight is made more difficult because man has jumped into the fray and, over the period of years, devised ingenious methods of trapping lobsters. Before the birth of electronic devices and with the assistance of the Department of Fisheries regulations for protection, it appeared that the lobster population was holding its own in count, in size, and quality. But now depth sounders, fishscopes—and what have we not in electronic devices—have turned the tide of battle in favour of the fishermen.

Perusal of fisheries statistics reveals, with weather conditions similar in nature in various years, that the catch remains almost at a constant level. But the same statistics fail to take into account that more fishermen have turned to lobster fishing and that each individual fisherman must use an increased number of traps in order to maintain his catch average. This necessarily results in a smaller take-home pay cheque and it also means a depletion of lobster grounds heretofore never fished by the fishermen. Boats wander farther out to sea in search of lobsters and this successfully, because electronics permit them to find shoals never before fished. Years long gone by it was a common occurrence for offshore fishermen to land 50 to 60 pounds of oversized lobster, that is, lobsters over five inches in carapace measurement and ranging from five to 11 pounds. Today this is of rare occurrence. And in this process of depleting the stock of the oversized lobsters, one can readily understand and appreciate how this necessarily curtails productivity. It has been determined that an oversized female lobster bears as many as 100,000 eggs.

Different and varied proposals have been advanced in order to lend mother nature a helping hand in halting this depletion of lobster population. Season dates have been jockeyed around to the point where it now appears that nothing further can be done to satisfy nature's requirements and, in the meantime, safeguard the fishermen's best interest. Lobster hatcheries have been advocated, but past experience shows them not to have been too successful. I am of the firm belief that we should let mother nature perform her time-honoured duties and that we should curtail man's illegal encroachments. Patrol service should be stepped up. The consumption of undersized lobsters today is alarming and although man realizes fully that market lobsters are wholly dependent on the preservation of the baby population it seems that the temptation for this forbidden fruit is too great. A more adequate program of protection seems here the only solution. This would greatly assist mother nature in her preservation schedule. But in order to lend the greatest possible assistance to mother nature, I would urge the Minister of Fisheries to take a long and searching look at the feasibility of henceforth returning to the Atlantic waters lobsters over five inches in carapace measurement. I would also strongly urge that all female lobsters bearing eggs be purchased by the federal government to become its property, and be sufficiently marked so as to permit the fisherman to return them with certainty to the water and make it more difficult for him to offer them for sale. A conservation effort of this kind would not be costly and it would be of greater value than all the hatchery schemes which might be evolved. From the very start it would prevent the too great depletion of the lobster population presently being brought about by man's ambitions, yet of his necessity.

I was amazed the other day to hear a statement in the House of Commons that the sale of fish is declining. What amazed me most was that the onus for the decline was being placed on the shoulders of the Department of Fisheries. I cannot go along with this assertion for the simple reason that I believe the responsibility for increasing the sale of fish in Canada must be shared by the primary producer, the buyer, the processor, the wholesaler, the retailer and the one who prepares the fish. In the case of the primary producer there is still room for improvement. These are facts which I can bear out from my personal observation and I am sure hon. members who live close to the sea will agree with me if they have gone down to the wharves and watched the boats coming in with their fish. I am sure many of them will have detected, though, fortunately, it is only in a minority of cases, the uncleanness of the fish which are aboard certain boats. In one case I noticed, a tub was filled with water to wash the fish, the fish were dressed in that tub, washed in the same water and finally left there until the boat reached shore to sell that fish. Assuredly this practice does not lend itself to the production of the best tasting fish products.

The buyers of fish products also have problems. If the primary producer does not practice care in dealing with the product, he is not able to offer the cleanest and best fish possible. I have noticed, as I am sure many other hon. members from ridings with fishing industries have, that fish is often left to lie on wharves where flies can get at them, and where the sun glares down. I have known of instances where fish have been allowed to sit in the back of trucks for a whole day before being processed at night.

Mr. Pugh: That does not happen in British Columbia.

Mr. Legere: I suggest the processors and wholesalers must depend a great deal on primary producers in order to offer for sale the best product available. If they do not receive the best fish under the best possible conditions, they can not in turn sell the product.

I should also like to state that no matter how well the fish is finally prepared for sale, how sanitary the conditions under which it has been stored and processed, if the cook is not able to cook it properly, the efforts of those involved in bringing this fish to market are lost. In this nation, which should be a leader in the processing and cooking of fish, we have fallen down miserably, and I, therefore, cannot place this blame upon the Department of Fisheries. I am aware of the very noble efforts of the Department of Fisheries directed toward teaching fishermen to use the most efficient methods possible to handle their product. I am also aware of the efforts of the Department of Fisheries in setting up test kitchens to encourage the elegant art of fish cuisine but I am sure hon. members will not have to search far to find an example of ill-prepared food.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago I asked the minister a question. In reply he informed me that the pollution of water by sawdust and debris in Howe sound came within the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport. In checking the Fisheries Act, which has just recently been before this house, I find that the Department of Fisheries is given power in regard to obstruction or pollution of waters frequented by fish. Returning to my original point, I should like to state that the director of the department at Vancouver should take more effective action than has been taken to date to clean up this pollution of the waters around the city of Vancouver. I do not think the responsibility in this regard falls on the Department of Transport, but rests entirely upon the shoulders of the officials of the Department of Fisheries. I should like the minister to explain why he stated that this subject is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I did not make myself sufficiently clear when I replied to the hon. member. What I did intend to imply was that I would look into the matter, as far as it is my responsibility to do so. I suggested that the Department of Fisheries had a responsibility in respect of pollution of waters which is deleterious to fish. I did not intend to suggest that it was not the Department of Fisheries' responsibility in that respect, and that as far as it is a responsibility of the department, everything possible will be done to correct the situation. I did say, however, that the Department of Transport also had a certain responsibility in regard to pollution of navigable waters, and that would include Howe sound. I will certainly collaborate with my colleague to see that the matter is looked into and corrected as far as possible.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, before this item carries I should like to say a word or two about salmon fishing regulations. We all agree that conservation is not only wise but absolutely essential, particularly in regard to the salmon industry. However, when regulations are adopted for the conservation of our resources we should see that they are not applied in such a way as to discriminate between one fisherman and another, particularly in the same area.

I have received a number of complaints from individuals who live in my riding regarding the method of applying these salmon fishing regulations. There are two regulations in respect of which I have received complaints. Firstly, individuals have complained about an arbitrary line which is drawn across the bay from a point on one side to a point on the other side because inside that line fishermen are compelled to take up their nets over the week end, while fishermen fishing outside the line are not obliged to do so. Their nets are left to fish over the week end. The result of this situation is that in one settlement a fisherman who has laid claim to berths which lie on one side of the line has to take up his nets over the week end while another person from the same settlement who has laid claim to a berth on the other side of the line is allowed to leave his nets to fish over the week end. I understand this arbitrary line was drawn in such a way because the water on one side was calm, and there was no hardship involved in taking up the nets, while the water on the other side is rough to the point that fishermen very seldom are able to comply with that regulation. I should like to point out to the minister that even in the places where the water is relatively calm it does not necessarily follow that fishermen can comply with the regulations because, in certain areas, such as Hermitage bay, there are very strong tidal currents which carry the nets well down underneath the surface where fishermen cannot untie them and take them up.

Fishermen also complain about having to tie up the nets because they chafe over the week ends, and collect all types of floating debris, with the result that after being tied up for two or three days they must be taken in and cleaned. Consequently the fishing season is shortened because of this situation.

Many fishermen have suggested that these regulations do not represent the most effective method of conserving the salmon fisheries, but result only in the fact that a smaller number of fishermen get a greater number of fish. The reduction in the total catch is not very significant.

The other complaint I have received is about the size of the mesh of the nets. Only a few days ago I realized that the present salmon regulations are practically the same as were put in force by the Newfoundland government before Newfoundland became part of Canada. I believe the history goes back even further than that. What the people complain about is that an arbitrary point has been chosen along the coast-line and east of that point the fishermen can use five-inch mesh nets and therefore catch larger salmon while west of that point they are compelled to use 4½-inch mesh nets and as a result they catch smaller fish.

The trouble is that these regulations have never been strictly enforced. I think they were perhaps developed in the old days of responsible government by somebody who had not thought the problem out too carefully and once it was realized how silly the regulations were the authorities never bothered to enforce them. If the arbitrary point were a headland perhaps there might be some justification for it but to pick an arbitrary point at the end of an arm and say that the fish on one side of that point are big fish and the fish on the other side are small fish just does not make sense.

Because these regulations have never been enforced the people west of that point have always used five-inch mesh nets. The commission of government never enforced the regulations strictly and the fishermen continued to use the five-inch mesh nets which they have learned from experience are the only ones that will fish well in that area. Now that the regulation is being strictly enforced possibly for the first time, I believe, these people do not have the smaller size mesh nets and cannot afford to scrap the ones they have. That raises a problem and I would therefore ask the minister to give consideration to the position in which these fishermen find themselves so that something may be worked out in order that they will be able to prosecute the salmon fishery.

The point they complain about is this. While they are compelled to set nets with a 4½-inch mesh, any person can set a cod net or a pollock net of larger size and catch salmon in it or they can set cod traps, as many of them do, and still catch salmon. There is no regulation compelling them to limit the mesh of their cod or pollock nets or cod traps to 4½ inches. They know from experience that as many fish are caught in this way as are caught in salmon nets.

Therefore the total effect of the regulation is practically nil so far as the conservation of salmon is concerned which is their primary objective. As I said at the beginning, we are not against conservation but we certainly would like the minister to take a look at the regulations and try to have them applied in a way that will not discriminate between one fisherman and another, particularly fishermen in the same area.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, first I wish to say that I neglected to say the last time I was on my feet that I will certainly take under consideration the observations made by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare. With regard to the points raised by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, I wish to assure him that the salmon regulations for Newfoundland are under an intensive review by the department at the present time. As he indicated, these regulations were taken over holus-bolus under the Fisheries Act and are regulations that were designed and brought into effect at various times over the years in a piecemeal way. We are reviewing them at the present time to try to make them as reasonable as possible.

With regard to the question of an arbitrary line on one side of which salmon nets have to be lifted on the week end, that is also included in what I have just said, but I want to point out that the purpose of the week-end lift in theory anyway is to allow the escape of salmon for purposes of reproduction and so that the salmon migrating on the week ends will reach their destination successfully. There are many features about this matter which perhaps do not meet the objective and, as I said, this question is also being reviewed. If the regulations are having the result that the hon. member has outlined, this does not make sense, of course. I have no doubt that may be the case at least in part and I assure him that the matter is being carefully reviewed at the present time.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a brief word regarding sport salmon fishing in Newfoundland and conservation and the regulations applied thereto. As everybody knows, sport salmon fishing is a very great tourist attraction in Newfoundland, and it does appear to me as well as to many others that over the last few years sufficient protection has not been given to the industry with the result that the industry is not being conserved in the way it should be.

I know it is impossible for the department to place a river guardian at every bend of every river but I believe it is necessary to increase the protection now being given with regard to the enforcement of the salmon regulations, particularly on the west coast of Newfoundland. I suggest to the minister that a survey be made of the protection now being provided with a view to improving the service and maintaining a protection service on every river that will stop some of the illegal fishing now being carried on.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, we have also realized the necessity of having greater protection on our fishing streams generally in the maritimes and especially in Newfoundland. We are making an effort to have an increase in next year's estimates for this purpose so that a greater degree of protection can be given on these various streams.

The whole question of the conservation of the Atlantic salmon is a complicated one because in some cases there is a division of interest between the sport fishermen on the one hand and the commercial fishermen on the other and in addition the salmon have no regard for provincial boundaries. Many of the fish that migrate to Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia pass by Newfoundland and for that reason there has been established a committee of the senior officials of the fisheries departments of the Atlantic provinces and our own officials to try to correlate the regulations in all these areas so that the proper degree of conservation will be achieved with the result, we hope, that not only will the Atlantic salmon population be maintained but will even be increased both for sport fishing and for commercial fishing.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

Item agreed to.

142. Newfoundland bait service, $534,700.

Mr. Carter: I just have one question on this item, Mr. Chairman. Some time ago I received a letter from the fishermen of Burgeo stating that the price of bait at the government depot had been raised by half a cent a pound. My question to the minister is, is this a general increase in the price of bait or is this a special case? If so, was there some special reason for it?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I am sorry, I am not aware of the rise in the price. I shall have to look into the matter. I do not see any reason why there should be a rise in one particular area. I am certain there has not been a general increase, so there must have been some particular reason for this but I have not the information at the moment.

Mr. Carter: The general price has been 2½ cents a pound and it has risen to 3 cents in this particular case. So far as they know, the other fishermen were still getting it for 2½ cents a pound, and they wondered why there had been an increase.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I have not an answer for the hon. member at the moment.

While I am on my feet, I should point out that the supplementary estimate related to this item is to provide for repairs for the Arctica which is used in the Newfoundland bait service.

In so far as the other supplementary estimates that are being called are concerned, they apply almost entirely to lapses in items for last year. They include such things as a residence for a fisheries officer at the Magdalen Islands, the provision for the building of the Cape Freels, a protection vessel for Newfoundland. It so happens that, partly as the result of a strike in the shipyard, some of last year's vote lapsed before the end of last year. I just wanted to make this general explanation.

Mr. Batten: Would the minister tell us how many bait units are to be supplied to Newfoundland in the coming year and whether or not he has been able, up to this time, to decide on the location of these units?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): The number is eight. The ones that are provided for in this year's estimates have not been allocated as yet.

Mr. Batten: There are some areas in Newfoundland in which no bait unit has been established, but there are private firms operating in the areas that are willing to buy bait and provide it to the fishermen without profit on the actual transaction. My question to the minister is this: Is it true that the department will not sell bait to firms of this type at the same price as which bait is provided to one of the department's depots?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): It depends on the supply of bait. I should like to point out, too, that commercial firms in this category are entitled to the bait assistance subsidy which is used more extensively in the maritimes than it is in Newfoundland, although it is being used in Newfoundland. There is an application in at the moment, but I have forgotten from what place, for one of these subsidies to be paid under the circumstances to which the hon. member refers.

Item agreed to.

148. Destruction of dogfish and other predators, $150,000.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): My remarks, Mr. Chairman, will be directed to great lakes fishing. I should like to ask the minister what progress is being made in the control of the lamprey eel. The lamprey eel came into the great lakes about 20 years ago and has multiplied tremendously. It has been a big factor in the destruction of lake trout in Georgian bay and also in lake Erie.

I should like the minister to explain what progress is being made in controlling this cannibal fish, and at the same time perhaps he could comment on the smelts. This is also a salt water fish which came into the lakes a few years ago. While it has some commercial value, the fishermen are becoming quite concerned about it because it is spreading so rapidly they are afraid it will eliminate some of the better class of fish from the great lakes.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): At an earlier date in my estimates, Mr. Chairman, I did make a statement regarding the progress in lamprey control in the great lakes. I can say that it is very encouraging. The scientists have been able to discover a specific poison for the lamprey which kills the lamprey but does not injure other forms of life. This is being used extensively at the present time. It is a little early yet to assess properly the success we are meeting with this program. However, by next year we should be able to say categorically or nearly so whether or not this is going to be successful, as we hope it will. Then, there is the general question of restoring the balance of life in the lakes after the lamprey are controlled. I think that is all I need to say at this moment.
