Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, when we recessed at six o'clock we were dealing with clause 34. I should like to address myself to that provision, especially that part of it which provides that the court shall hear the evidence of at least two psychiatrists, one of whom shall be appointed by the attorney general. If one of these psychiatrists is to be appointed by the attorney general, who is going to appoint the other one?

Mr. Fulton: Well, the other psychiatrist could be appointed by the court or he may be called by the crown prosecutor simply as an expert witness, whether or not he has been nominated by the attorney general. One of the two psychiatrists must be actually nominated by the attorney general of the province.

Mr. Roberge: If I understand the procedure correctly, one is to be appointed by the attorney general and the services of the other one might be retained by the crown prosecutor. Under our system, the crown prosecutor is nothing more nor less than a representative of the attorney general. If the second one is nominated by the court, then this is done under the authority of the attorney general.

Mr. Fulton: Not if he is appointed by the court or if the accused calls a psychiatrist. Then, the accused's psychiatrist would be one of the two. In the normal case the accused will call psychiatric evidence. If he does not, then the crown has to call two psychiatrists, one of whom has been directly nominated by the crown for the purpose.

Mr. Roberge: As a rule, I would think the accused would not have the means to permit the calling of a psychiatrist. On the other hand the crown prosecutor will call one appointed by the court and the accused would not have anyone to testify on his behalf. In those cases, who is going to pay for the psychiatrist if the accused does not call one?

Mr. Fulton: If the accused does not call one, then the crown has to call a second one and the crown would have to pay for the psychiatrist.

Mr. Roberge: When is the crown going to know that the crown needs another psychiatrist in addition to the one appointed by the attorney general?

Mr. Fulton: Presumably the crown would consult with the defence attorney. If the defence attorney is not going to call anyone then the crown would. Normally, psychiatric consultations of this sort are carried out by two psychiatrists. They need not be called unless the defence does not call one, in which case the crown has to call the second one. If the crown attorney is intelligent and anxious to discharge his duty under the section, he will have retained and instructed a second psychiatrist who will be available on short notice if a second psychiatrist is needed in addition to the one nominated by the attorney general.

Mr. Roberge: I understand the situation and the responsibility of the attorney general. I would venture to suggest that in most cases the defence attorney will say, I am not calling any psychiatrists, so the crown will have to provide two of them and pay for them. Does the minister not think more consideration should be given to that clause? I agree that two psychiatrists should be called, one of whom should be nominated by the attorney general and paid for by the province, but the other one should be appointed at the request of the defence and paid for by the province.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know that that would work very well in practice. This provision has been in the code ever since this section with regard to habitual criminals was enacted. This afternoon I gave figures relating to the number of persons who have been committed under both the habitual criminal section and the sexual psychopath section. The total was 88. In both cases, the committal is made on the evidence of two psychiatrists, one of whom is nominated by the attorney general. That is 88 cases altogether. I have never heard that the provision did not work out satisfactorily.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the minister think that, where the section says "one of whom shall be nominated by the attorney general" the crown has the right to nominate two?

Mr. Fulton: Just before answering that question may I say this, I was guilty of an inaccuracy. The provision with regard to the appointment of psychiatrists does relate only to criminal sexual psychopaths of whom there have been 34 sentenced up to the present time. The hon. member for Essex East asked another question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I simply point out that subsection 2 says "one of whom shall be nominated by the attorney general". The attorney general is not given power to nominate more than one.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, I think that the attorney general does not require power to nominate more than one. The attorney general or the crown can call as much evidence as the court is prepared to hear. Where the section says that the court shall hear the evidence of at least two psychiatrists, certainly the court would hear the evidence of the two who were called by the crown. I am quite satisfied of that.

Miss LaMarsh: May I ask the minister this question. In the 34 cases which have been tried and in which there were convictions, could this situation not very easily occur? In the case where defence counsel and crown counsel did not consult together—and it is not unknown by any means in the criminal law, where defence counsel simply refuse to say whether they are going to call anyone—as a practical matter it would mean that in every case the crown would have to be prepared to put on two psychiatrists; they would not put on one and then wait to see whether one was called by the defence. Otherwise they would fail in their application.

Mr. Fulton: I quite agree. That is what I intended to say before.

Miss LaMarsh: Practically the crown would be ready with two.

Mr. Fulton: Yes; the crown would be ready with two.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): There is no change in the section.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 35—Notice of application.

Mr. Deschatelets: This amendment has to do with the application to have an accused adjudged a dangerous sexual offender. I do not understand why in the amendment this application can be made before the conviction. As the minister knows, with regard to the habitual criminal the application by the crown must be made after the accused is convicted. I do not understand the reason why it can be made before the conviction.

Mr. Fulton: This is to parallel the provision with regard to dangerous sexual offenders. I would think it desirable, if the crown has knowledge of the record of the accused, that it should give notice of intention to make this application even before conviction so that the accused and his counsel will have as much notice as possible of the likelihood of the application for such considerations as that might give rise to in their minds during the hearing of the charge upon which the accused is presently in court.

Mr. Deschatelets: The minister will no doubt appreciate the fact that by this notice being given before the accused is found guilty, it might prejudge the whole trial. After all this man will be charged with an offence. Why do we not wait until he is found guilty?

Mr. Fulton: The notice is not given in open court. If it is a jury trial, it will not be in the knowledge of the jury at the time. A notice is filed with the clerk of the court and served on the other side. There will be no reference to it. The fact that this notice has been given is not relevant and therefore would not be in evidence and no reference could be made to it in evidence on the specific charge for which the accused is on trial.

Mr. Regnier: The French translation of the section is absolutely contrary to the English interpretation. As found at page 13 of the English version, section 262, subsection 4 reads as follows:

(4) Where an application under subsection (1) of section 660 or subsection (1) of section 661 has not been heard before the accused is sentenced for the offence for which he has been convicted, the application shall not be heard by the judge or magistrate who sentenced the accused but may be heard by any other judge or magistrate who might have held or sat in the same court.

(Translation):

Where an application under subsection (1) of section 660 or subsection (1) of section 661 has not been heard before the accused is sentenced for the offence for which he has been convicted, the application shall be heard by the judge or magistrate who sentenced the accused but may be heard by any other judge or magistrate who might have held or sat in the same court.

That is exactly the contrary of what is prescribed in the English version, which states that the application shall not be heard by the judge or magistrate who sentenced the accused.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, before recess, the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere (Mr. Paul) called my attention to this discrepancy. This is obviously an error in translation and it will be corrected in a subsequent translation.

(Text):

For the benefit of my hon. friends whose mother tongue is the English language and having regard to my rather tortured French, I think what I said should be reproduced in both languages. There is an obvious error which was drawn to my attention during the dinner recess. I am informed that such errors, not being differences in the meaning or rendering but rather obviously complete errors of translation, are taken care of in the normal course when they are drawn to the attention of the officials.

Mr. Regnier: Also, if the application is not heard by the judge who has tried the accused, I do not see here any provision for a transcript of the evidence which another judge would need to have in front of him before he could hear the application. I think the accused would also be handicapped if the transcription of the evidence at the trial is not provided to the accused. As has been pointed out previously, these people sometimes simply cannot afford to pay for the transcription of a long trial.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, there is no change here with respect to the application to have a person declared a habitual criminal, and that is what is referred to in the part under discussion. My hon. friend will notice that there is to be seven clear days' notice to the accused specifying the previous convictions and the other circumstances, if any, upon which it is intended to found an application. So a complete notice is served on the accused of the circumstances upon which it is intended to rely in support of the application.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I have not consulted the bill, but the clause the minister has read to the committee provides that the convictions shall be specified in the notice. However, the bill provides for the notice to be served before conviction; at least, it could be served before conviction. Therefore how could the conviction be specified in the notice?

Mr. Fulton: In that case obviously the conviction is not one of the grounds which is alleged in the notice, because it has not yet taken place. Therefore the words that would be relevant there would be, "Specifying the previous convictions and the other circumstances, if any, upon which the crown intends to rely in support of the application."

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 36 to 38 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 39—Review by Minister of Justice.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I understand that when a person is sentenced to preventive detention the Minister of Justice shall, at least once in every year, review the condition, history and circumstances. How will that work? Has the national parole board anything to do with it, or the national parole board under the authority of the Minister of Justice?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the present provision in the law is that the Minister of Justice shall review the case of a person in custody under sentence of preventive detention at least once every three years. We are now reducing that period to once every year. Section 24 of the Parole Act provides that the duties of the minister under this section are exercised by the national parole board. The relevant provision reads as follows:

> The powers, functions and duties of the Minister of Justice under section 666 of the Criminal Code are hereby transferred to the board and a reference in that section to permission to be at large on licence shall be deemed to be a reference to parole granted under this act.

So where the section provides, as will be the case from now on:

> —the Minister of Justice shall, at least once in every year, review the condition, history and circumstance of that person for the purpose of determining whether he should be permitted to be at large on licence—that duty of review is transferred automatically to the national parole board.

On clause 42—Custody for observation.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I have been looking at the Criminal Code and section 710 deals with the rights, amongst others, of adjournment and what the summary conviction court may do. I am wondering how in this case, where the magistrate may send a defendant for observation for a period not exceeding 30 days, this clause can be reconciled with subsection 1 of section 710 of the Criminal Code, which provides of course that there may be no adjournment of a trial of more than eight days.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: I think the answer to that question is that this proposed new subsection starts out with the words:

> Notwithstanding subsection (1),—

The Chairman: Shall we revert now to clause 2, which stood?

On clause 2—Service of process.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member has any suggestion she would care to put forward. I had thought of amending the clause by putting in the words "or other executive officer", but if my hon. friend has another suggestion I would be very glad to hear it.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure of the phraseology in municipal acts outside the province of Ontario, but there the phraseology that is often used is, "head of the municipal authority or statutory officer".

I cannot assist the minister as to whether these words are used outside the province of Ontario, but the words put into this clause might be something in the nature of "head of the municipality", or we might even enumerate "the mayor, secretary, treasurer, clerk of the corporation or person holding equivalent status", or something of that sort. It is a little loose, but it might cover it.

Mr. Fulton: Would the hon. member agree with me that "reeve" would normally cover every case of a municipality that does not have a mayor?

Miss LaMarsh: No, not altogether. There are, of course, the counties or districts where a warden is the head of a municipality, and the definition section of the Criminal Code says that a municipal corporation includes a district, a county, and a number of other designations. I am not very familiar with the section.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Township?

Miss LaMarsh: It includes a city, town, village, county, township, parish or other territorial or local division of a province the inhabitants of which are incorporated. I do not know what the head of a parish might be called.

Mr. Fulton: Would this serve the purpose, in my hon. friend's opinion, in the case of municipal corporation, "the mayor, reeve, warden, secretary, treasurer or clerk of the corporation or the elected head of the municipality as the case may be"?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that a warden should come before a reeve.

Miss LaMarsh: The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich might not agree. It has been called to my attention that the heads of improvement districts are not elected but are appointed.

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, I am not a learned gentleman, but a warden might be just the reeve of his township. He is selected by the reeves and heads of other municipalities. I do not think a warden should figure in this picture at all.

Miss LaMarsh: I suggest he does, because of the interpretation section, which covers a county municipality, and the head of the county municipality is a warden.

Mr. Regnier: Also, the clerk is not an elected head of a municipality; he is just the appointed official.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, before we actually amend this clause I should like to know whether the hon. lady from Niagara Falls can tell us of any difficulty that has occurred previously in respect to the operation of subsection 5 of section 441. That appears in the explanatory note opposite page 6. That section is now repealed and its provisions are included in clause 2 which we are now discussing. I am not aware that there have been any difficulties in respect to the operation of subsection 5 of section 441. If there have been none, I wonder whether we would be doing a useful service in making an amendment.

Miss LaMarsh: I can only say that I assume whoever drafted subsection 6 of section 441 in the code intended that it should cover every municipality in Canada and that if there was an error it was not pointed out at that time. I would suggest that even to a Conservative the progressive nature of correcting must be self-evident, and in the future it may be of some importance. I have no idea when this has ever been used, but I assume that the house intends that if there is a criminal act which is chargeable against a municipal corporation there be some method by which a warrant may be served, otherwise they would necessarily escape criminal action.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not like to disagree with the hon. member for Niagara Falls but for the first time in a long time I am inclined to think there is some merit in the point made by the hon. member for Carleton. In any event there will always be a secretary-treasurer or a clerk of a municipality.

Miss LaMarsh: With respect, as I pointed out earlier while the hon. member for Essex East was not present, there are municipalities which do not have secretary-treasurers or clerks. I can think of a municipality in my own riding which has a secretary and a treasurer but no clerk as such. Its head is a reeve.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, but there is always a secretary-treasurer.

Miss LaMarsh: No, there is a secretary and a treasurer.

Mr. Aiken: Everyone else has had a go at this so perhaps I could make a comment. I think the case would be well settled if we took the hyphen from between the words secretary and treasurer and inserted a comma. I think that if the hyphen were taken out and replaced by a comma it would cover every eventuality.

Mr. Fulton: I was working on the same idea as my hon. friend from Parry Sound-Muskoka. It occurred to me that if an officer is a secretary-treasurer he is also a secretary and a treasurer. So the purpose would be served by taking out the hyphen and replacing it by a comma. But just to be sure, I have worked out this proposal which I would be glad to submit:

> —in the case of a municipal corporation to the mayor, warden, reeve or other chief officer of the municipality or to the secretary, treasurer or clerk of the corporation.

I shall ask my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs if he will move that.

Miss LaMarsh: I just wonder whether the term "chief officer" means anything legally. Under Ontario legislation he is called the head of the corporation. I do not know what it might be called in other provincial legislation. "The chief officer" is a phrase with which I am not familiar in municipal law in any event.

Mr. Winch: Is "executive officer" any better.

Mr. Fulton: I will ask my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs to move:

> That clause 2 be amended by striking out lines 15 and 16 thereof and substituting the following:
> (a) in the case of a municipal corporation to the mayor, warden, reeve or other chief officer of the municipality or to the secretary, treasurer or clerk of the corporation, and

Mr. Churchill: I so move.

Mr. Fulton: Could you substitute, there, Mr. Chairman, the word "corporation" for "municipality" so that it would read "other chief officer of the corporation".

The Chairman: Very well. It reads, "or other chief officer of the corporation". Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Winch: Would not "executive officer" be better than "chief officer"?

Mr. Fulton: No. I think we came to the conclusion that some of them might be elected by the reeves of a township. They might meet together and elect one of their number as a head. He is called a warden. We were not sure that he would be called an executive officer. "Chief officer" seems to cover the situation and if it does not, if there is any uncertainty, then, surely, there will be a secretary, treasurer or clerk.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PURCHASE AND SALE OF SECURITIES BY MINISTER, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-109, to amend the Financial Administration Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—"Securities" defined.

Mr. McMillan: In connection with clause 1, I think the parliamentary secretary was asked some questions the other day. In particular he was asked what some of the securities might be, and what would be the advantage to Canada to be able to buy all securities guaranteed by the government of Canada. It occurs to me that the only securities other than the Canadian bonds would be the C.N.R. bonds.

I should also like to know if "securities" could possibly mean a mortgage, because in the note of explanation it says "and any other security respecting part of the debt of Canada". I should like to know the advantage of buying these securities guaranteed by the government.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the answer to the second question asked by the hon. gentleman is no, it could not include a mortgage. So far as I am aware the government of Canada has not engaged in that type of financing.

[The Chairman.]

The purpose of this particular clause is a rather simple one; it really is to remove an anomaly. The Minister of Finance is entitled to purchase, acquire and hold securities of Canada but not those guaranteed by Canada. This clause would permit him to purchase, acquire and hold the bonds to which the hon. member for Welland referred—C.N.R. bonds—and to buy them at any time to support the market.

Mr. McMillan: Can that not be done by the minister through the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The Bank of Canada has powers under its own act. This clause relates only to the Financial Administration Act. Under this act there is a serious question as to whether the power exists.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Uncollectable debts.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I suppose this involves a practice which the government seeks to follow, one often followed in business, where there exists a whole series of accounts that are uncollectable. Is the parliamentary secretary in a position to give us a rough estimate of the number of these accounts and the total value which would come within the category of $1,000 or under?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): In respect to the first subclause, the change is solely to delete the existing time limitation. In respect to accounts under $500 there is now a time limitation of five years. In respect to accounts between $500 and $1,000 there is a time limitation of ten years. Those that exceed that are covered by an item in the supplementary estimates, as the hon. member for Essex East knows, passed at each session of parliament. The accounts exceeding $1,000, the deletion of which were authorized by the last final supplementary estimates under vote 654, amounted to $960,734, covering 238 items. The accounts which were covered by governor in council authority under the old act under $1,000 which were outstanding for ten years or more numbered 166 and totalled $116,559. Accounts under $500 which were outstanding for five years or more numbered 2,395 with a total value of $276,693.

Perhaps having placed that information on the record I should also deal with items which come under the subsequent subclause. Those are accounts under $25 each outstanding two years or more, numbering 5,028 with a total value of $40,119.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 4 agreed to.

On clause 5.

Mr. Winch: Further to the explanation as it appears in the bill itself, could the parliamentary secretary explain to me what is meant by the suggestion that this clause places the crown in the same position as a private individual.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Basically that is the purpose, so that in the case of an assignment of a crown debt the individual will be in the same position as though there had been an assignment of an ordinary debt by a subject and, as will appear later in the following subsection, an assignment of a chose in action.

As I endeavoured to outline at the resolution stage, when the house was in the committee of the whole, the position which has traditionally been taken by the crown in the past is that the crown is not bound by an assignment of a debt owing by the crown to a subject. Over the years there has been developed a practice whereby the banks, and indeed other persons engaged in the business, have accepted from crown creditors powers of attorney. They arranged their affairs, in many cases, apparently on the basis that such powers of attorney operated essentially in the same way as assignments, although in fact they did not confer on the donee any rights, as against the crown, to be paid in place of the crown creditor at the resolution stage. I outlined the particular case in the exchequer court of the Bank of Nova Scotia in respect to an assignment made by Roy Swail Limited. This case was heard by the president of the exchequer court who decided that the crown was in the same position with respect to the assignment of a debt owing to it as was any subject, provided that the assignment was made in accordance with the laws of assignment of the province in which the assignment was made, and that adequate notice of such assignment was given to the crown.

The purpose of these amendments, which are encompassed by new section 88 with the various letters, is to provide a simple and adequate procedure for the subject so that it is possible to have an assignment proceed, as the president of the exchequer court did decide, and that there may be no prejudice either to the subject or to the crown. The effect of the amendment is to provide for the recognition of the assignment of crown debts arising under contract, but subject to certain rights and conditions which we will discuss later.

It is also proposed to include, as I indicated earlier, provisions whereby the governor in council may authorize the recognition and assignment of other choses in action, subject to the same rules and conditions.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, this is one occasion when I am sorry that I am not a lawyer. Do I understand from what the parliamentary secretary has said that in the assignment of a crown debt there is no differentiation between the crown and the private individual—that there is no superiority or seniority?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. gentleman is confusing two things in relation to this. I think he is perhaps confusing priorities in bankruptcy with assignments. In the first case, although I speak subject to correction, I think the crown does exercise a priority. The question of priority as between the crown and the subject does not exist here. This involves the simple case where the crown owes a contractor some money and the contractor, in order to secure credit for some other purpose, assigns all his rights to that indebtedness from the crown to the bank. This assignment then puts the bank in the status of the original creditor of the crown.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, why should people working for the crown have an advantage over others in that their salaries, wages and other moneys coming to them from the crown are not assignable?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I think this is a case of protection for civil servants. If such assignments were permitted, then we would have the prodigal sons and daughters who had gone out and assigned their emoluments from the crown hoping that the fatted calf would come home. Frequently, for those who have done so, the fatted calf never arrives. Therefore, this is, as I have said, a protection against that sort of foolishness.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, in connection with section 88D—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Did you say section 88D?

Mr. McMillan: Yes, I said section 88D.

The Chairman: Section 88D is in clause 5.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Overpayment comes under clause 6.

The Chairman: I will call the sections of clause 5 one by one.

Clause 5, sections 88A to 88C inclusive agreed to.

On clause 5, section 88D—Notice of assignment.

Mr. McMillan: I wanted to know something about the amount of overpayments. I think this provision will facilitate collection by the comptroller, but has the parliamentary secretary any figures on the amount of overpayments?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think the hon. member is speaking about clause 6 of the bill, which deals with section 95 of the act, rather than section 88D. I will be glad to deal with that question when we come to clause 6.

Mr. McMillan: All right.

Clause 5, section 88D agreed to.

Clause 5, sections 88E and 88F agreed to.

On clause 6—Recovery.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, in the explanation that the parliamentary secretary said a moment ago he would give, will he go into some detail as to clause 6? I ask that question because both he and I are members of the public accounts committee. In that committee we have been dealing with the matter of overpayments and I cannot quite understand how this ties in and just what the exact implications are.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, this is designed to provide an efficient means to recover overpayments made from the consolidated revenue fund with respect to salaries, wages, pay and pay and allowances. The committee will note that by subsection 3 of section 36 of the act the comptroller is authorized to recover any accountable advance or any portion thereof which is not repaid or accounted for out of any moneys payable by Her Majesty to the person to whom the advance was made. It was felt desirable that the comptroller should have similar authority to make recovery for the overpayment of salary and wages.

To follow the procedure laid down in subsection 1 of section 95—I am speaking now of the present section and not of the amendment which is 1a—requires that the opinion of the Minister of Justice be obtained indicating that a debt exists and after such opinion is received the matter must be referred to the treasury board to obtain direction authorizing the set-off of this debt against any moneys payable by Her Majesty. The establishment of overpayment of salary or wages is a matter which I submit to the committee can be very readily determined and it appears unnecessary in such cases that the matter should be referred to the Minister of Justice and also to the treasury board before recovery of such overpayment is effected. Such recovery would not affect the legal remedies of any individual should there not in fact have been overpayment. I should like to emphasize that this preserves for the individual all the equities that may exist at the time the alleged overpayment is made.

[Mr. McMillan.]

Mr. Winch: Is this intended to cover the situation which was brought to our attention by the Auditor General where a person is fully employed in one department but is also working part-time for another and receives payment on that account?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It would cover such a situation if in fact it were held that there was overpayment, but I think that the situations to which the hon member refers are situations where payment was made on the basis of an opinion given by the deputy attorney general of Canada and it would be difficult, of course, in the face of such an opinion, to assert that overpayment had been made. If, however, in fact and in law an overpayment has been made, this provision would then apply.

Mr. McMillan: Has the parliamentary secretary any estimate of the amount of overpayments?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No, I do not have an estimate for the committee. I would not think that the amount was large. This is not a significant matter. I am told that the numbers might be fairly significant but the actual overall total would really be small.

Mr. McMillan: Would this apply to those receiving benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No, this would not apply.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This only applies to those who are in the government service.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is correct.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It would not cover social welfare payments.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INVESTMENT POWERS

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-28, to amend the Trust Companies Act.

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this bill, together with its companion bill which follows immediately and deals with loan companies, parallels in large measure the amendments already made this session to the insurance acts, the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and the Foreign Insurance Companies Act. This bill revises and modernizes the powers of federally incorporated trust companies. I am in the hands of the house, sir, whether the bill should be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce for further study or should proceed to the committee of the whole. Whatever the procedure may be, the house might wish to have a little background information about trust companies generally.

There are just over 50 trust companies operating in Canada at the present time. Ten were incorporated by or under the authority of this parliament and the remainder were incorporated provincially. Looking at the field of trust companies as a whole, the ten federally incorporated companies transact between one fifth and one quarter of the total business of all trust companies in Canada. These ten companies, whose names I shall mention, have capital and reserve funds approximating $40 million and administer trust funds totalling about $1,500 million.

The federally incorporated companies are these, and I will give after each the year of incorporation:

Name	Year of Incorporation
The Canada Permanent Trust Company	1913
The Canada Trust Company	1894
Chartered Trust Company	1905
Commercial Trust Company Limited	1904
The Eastern Trust Company	1893
Guaranty Trust Company of Canada	1925
Investors Trust Company	1957
The Premier Trust Company	1913
Prudential Trust Company Limited	1909
The Sterling Trusts Corporation	1911

Originally, sir, the Trust Companies Act in Canada was enacted in 1914 and it applies to all federally incorporated trust companies but of course has no application to provincially incorporated companies. Consequently, the amendments to the act now proposed by Bill No. S-28 would apply only to the ten companies which I have mentioned and which are federally incorporated.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But not to a trust company which has been incorporated and is not now functioning, like the Standard Trust Company which was given a charter two years ago. I do not believe it is in operation. The amendments would not apply to that company?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): My recollection does not extend, as the hon. gentleman's does, to the Standard Trust Company. This bill would apply to all trust companies federally incorporated.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): To all?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): To all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not only to the ten; that is the point.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If there are others not within my knowledge at the present time, then this bill would have such application.

Since 1914, the federally incorporated companies have been required to file financial statements annually with the Minister of Finance, but there was no provision for licensing or regular inspection or supervision until 1920. Since that year, federal trust companies have been required to operate under a licence from the minister of finance and under the provisions of the department of insurance, under its distinguished deputy head, Mr. Kenneth R. MacGregor.

The investment and lending powers of federal trust companies are specified, as I have indicated, in the Trust Companies Act. It has been the custom of parliament to keep these powers consistent with the corresponding powers of insurance companies, except in so far as differences may be necessary by reason of the special characteristics of trust companies. In view of the amendments recently made to the insurance act, it is now proposed to make similar amendments to the investment and lending powers of trust companies to the extent deemed appropriate. In addition, a few other amendments are proposed, either for clarification or to enable the companies to meet changing conditions. With respect to those, I shall deal in some detail.

Perhaps for clarification of my subsequent remarks, it might be mentioned that the assets of trust companies are divided into three categories as follows: First, unguaranteed trust funds. These are the funds accepted by the company in trust to be administered in accordance with the terms of the trust but carrying no guarantee of security of principal or of interest yield. Then, second, there are the guaranteed trust funds, those funds accepted by the company in trust where the company guarantees the security of the principal and sometimes the interest yield. They consist mainly of deposits made by the public in individual deposit accounts and of funds realized from the sale of guaranteed investment certificates. Third, and finally, there are the company funds. These are funds owned by the shareholders themselves, and they consist principally of the capital, surplus and reserves of the company.

The Trust Companies Act deals separately with the investment and lending powers applicable to each category. Such powers relating to trust funds are found in section 64 and those relating to company funds are found in section 68 to which reference is made in Bill No. S-28.

I should like to outline the more important and detailed amendments proposed in respect of investments and loans, all of such amendments relating to trust funds being found in clause 1 of the bill and those relating to the company's own funds being found in clause 2.

First, may I deal with the limits on mortgage loans. Hon. members are familiar with this situation in view of what transpired recently in connection with insurance companies. At present, companies may invest in and lend on the security of mortgages on real estate but the amount so invested or loaned in any particular case must not exceed 60 per cent of the value of the real estate. What is proposed by this bill is to raise this limit from 60 per cent to 66⅔ per cent. This change would apply to all three categories of funds which I have mentioned and is parallel to the change recently made in respect of insurance companies.

Hon. gentlemen, as they review the bill, may see what appears to be duplication or repetition in the bill. This is attributable to the separate identification of investment powers and lending powers and also to the three separate categories in which the funds of trust companies are divided.

Then, may I outline the second category, real estate for the production of income. Companies may now invest a limited amount of guaranteed trust funds and company funds in real estate for the production of income, either alone or jointly with any other federal trust company or loan company, where the real estate is leased to a corporation having a dividend record meeting the prescribed standard of the act. The maximum amount that may be so invested in any one parcel of real estate is one half of 1 per cent of the aggregate of the book value of the guaranteed trust funds and the company's own funds. It is proposed to raise this limit from one half of 1 per cent to 1 per cent. It is proposed also to permit a company to join with any trust company, loan company or insurance company incorporated in Canada in making such investments. These changes are parallel to changes recently made for insurance companies.

Hon. gentlemen who sat in the banking and commerce committee when considering the insurance bills will remember the discussion there which related to equipment trust certificates. There is a similar provision in this bill. Companies may now invest guaranteed trust funds and company funds in equipment trust certificates issued for the purchase of railway transportation equipment. It is proposed, under this bill, to expand this class to include transportation equipment for use on public highways. As I have said, this parallels a change which was made in respect of insurance companies.

Then, fourth, I would deal with investments and loans which are not specifically authorized under the act. It is proposed that companies be permitted, with respect to company funds only, to make investments and loans not otherwise authorized by the act, subject to a maximum limit on the amount of funds that may be so applied. This would grant to such companies a rather small area of freedom of investment of their own funds similar to that which is now available to insurance companies. The proposed limit on the amount that may be so invested and loaned is 15 per cent of the company's unimpaired paid up capital and reserve. This limit is the same as is prescribed in the loan and trust corporations act of Ontario in similar circumstances, and there are advantages in having the same limit apply to federally incorporated companies.

For a company having the maximum capital and reserve permitted by the act in relation to its guaranteed trust funds, this limit would represent a little over 1 per cent of all the company funds and guaranteed trust funds. This may be compared with a limit of 5 per cent of the assets now permitted for insurance companies. Hon. members may wonder why the difference between 5 per cent for insurance companies and 1 per cent for trust companies. The lower limit for trust companies is considered appropriate, at least until some experience develops with the use of this area of freedom of investment. It is not proposed that such area of freedom would extend in any way the company's power to invest in mortgages or hypothecs on real estate, to invest in real estate or to lend on the security of real estate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In what clause of the bill is that covered?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I believe the particular provision is contained in clause 2, subclause 4.

Then I deal with the limit on investment in common stock. Companies may now invest guaranteed trust funds and company funds in preferred stocks or common stocks of Canadian corporations where the dividend record of the issuing corporation meets a specified standard set in the act. As respects guaranteed trust funds, not more than 15 per cent of the book value may be invested in common stocks and not more than 25 per cent may be invested in, or loaned on the security of, stocks of all kinds, whether common or preferred. As respects company funds, not more than 15 per cent of the book value may be invested in common stocks and the total invested in, or loaned on the security of, stocks of all kinds, whether common or preferred, may not exceed 25 per cent of the company's unimpaired paid up capital and reserve.

The companies have requested an increase in the existing limits on investments in common stocks. Since at the present time, companies have virtually none of their guaranteed trust funds invested in stocks, it is not proposed to raise the limit applicable to those funds. As respects company funds, however, several companies are near the limit and it is proposed to remove the 15 per cent limit on common stocks in that connection but to retain the limit of 25 per cent of unimpaired paid up capital and reserve as the limit on investments in and loans on the security of stocks of all kinds. So in order to maintain consistency with the insurance companies and the loan companies, it is proposed that the amount of the company's own funds invested in common stocks when added to the amount of guaranteed trust funds invested in common stocks shall not exceed 15 per cent of the total of such funds. The effect of this change would be to permit an increase in investments in common stocks with respect to company funds where a company has not used its full powers in guaranteed trust funds and provided that less than 10 per cent of company funds have been invested in preferred stocks.

This is a detailing of the significant changes which are in themselves rather detailed and complex in so far as they affect the investment and lending powers of the companies.

I should like to take just a moment or two in which to deal with two other matters. First, I should like to deal with the power of a federally incorporated trust company to purchase the assets and business of another trust company, whether the latter be a federally incorporated or a provincially incorporated company. Certain of the proposed amendments in this respect are to be found in clause 3 of the bill.

The act at present permits a company to buy 67 per cent or more of the stock of another trust company, subject to approval by the treasury board, where the purchase is made as a prelude to the eventual taking over of the assets and business of the purchased company. The act specifies that at least 67 per cent of the stock of the company to be taken over must be purchased at the outset but it does not clearly specify that in any offer to purchase, the same offer must be extended to all shareholders of the company being purchased. It is proposed to include such a requirement in section 79 in order to prevent discrimination against minority shareholders.

Another amendment to this section would authorize the purchasing company to have a larger board of directors, temporarily, following acquisition of the stock of the other company, than is ordinarily permitted by section 15 which places the maximum number at 30. The temporarily enlarged board could not, however, in any case exceed the aggregate number of directors of both companies at the time of purchase. This amendment is for the purpose of enabling the directors of the other company to become directors of the purchasing company, thus retaining the value of their goodwill, service and connections for the benefit of the purchasing company.

I said earlier there were two things which I wanted to mention. I should have said three. The third and final is the fact that it is considered desirable to include in the act provisions whereby federal trust companies might amalgamate as an alternative to merging by the purchase and sale of assets and business. Federal trust companies have had the power to merge by the purchase and sale of assets and business ever since the Trust Companies Act was enacted in 1914 but they do not at present possess the power to achieve the same end by amalgamation, notwithstanding the advantages of the latter course in some circumstances. For many years the chartered banks similarly enjoyed the power to merge by purchase and sale but they lacked the power to amalgamate until granted such power on revision of the Bank Act in 1954. Canadian insurance companies, on the other hand, have possessed the power to follow this course since 1910. Many provincially incorporated trust companies likewise have had the power for many years to amalgamate under the applicable provincial statutes, thus leaving federally incorporated trust companies at a disadvantage in this respect. Hon. gentlemen will observe that clause 4 of the bill, which would enact a new section 80A, has been designed at the request of federal trust companies to fill this gap and put them in the same position as most other kinds of companies. It might be noted that this clause makes provision for the amalgamation of one federally incorporated trust company with another federally incorporated trust company but makes no provision for the amalgamation of a federally incorporated trust company with a provincially incorporated trust company or with any other kind of company.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have no power.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): We have no power. As I have indicated, the bill contains only 4 clauses and these are the significant amendments. There are a few other points of a technical nature which might be dealt with in the committee. As I indicated to the house this is the type of bill which generally is referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce where there is an opportunity of hearing testimony of the distinguished deputy head, namely the superintendent of insurance. There is opportunity also of the hon. gentleman from Greenwood being present. That hon. gentleman in other days was just as distinguished in the trust company field as he is today as a member of this House of Commons.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I was just going to say, Mr. Speaker, that many of the provisions of this bill are very technical in nature, and I think we should have the advantage in the banking and commerce committee of hearing the officials from the department of insurance. When this bill was brought up for consideration in the other place I believe it was referred to their banking and commerce committee and that they had the officials appear before that committee.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is right.

Mr. McMillan: I think it would be well if we followed the same procedure.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I was most happy to hear the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance conclude his remarks in the same way as he opened them, namely by saying that it was up to the committee whether or not this bill No. S-28 went before the standing committee of the House of Commons on banking and commerce. I think perhaps the best argument as to why it should do so was the lengthy, detailed and technical speech made by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. He made it quite obvious that it should be done. May I just say this having looked at the bill, namely Bill No. S-28. First of all I would ask the house to remember the remarks of the previous speaker who said that this bill does not concern one trust company only; it concerns all trust companies. I would ask hon. members to take a look at the principle of the bill. We find first in the explanatory notes:

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

The main purpose of this bill is to make certain changes in the investment powers of trust companies incorporated by parliament.

Right there is something of a most serious nature. If, understanding the principle of the bill, we look through all the clauses we find on page 3 the provision to enable a company to lend unguaranteed trust money on the security of real estate in amounts up to two thirds of the value of the real estate instead of 60 per cent as at the present.

We find that this bill will enable a company to invest its own funds in mortgages on real estate up to a maximum of two thirds of the value of the real estate instead of 60 per cent. Still dealing with the principle of the bill, lower down on page 3 we find an amendment which would enable a company to lend its own funds on the security of real estate in amounts up to two thirds of the value of the real estate instead of 60 per cent as at present.

What is the final principle of this bill? There is a brand new clause. It is a clause intended to grant trust companies the power to amalgamate and prescribe the procedure to be followed. Just taking the word of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance whose language was so technical and so difficult, I am sure the house will agree, as I do, with the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan), that a bill of this importance, affecting every trust company incorporated by the parliament of Canada, is one which most certainly should be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce. I hope the hon. member will so move on second reading.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on this subject. I am sure we are very grateful to the parliamentary secretary for the explanation he has given with regard to a bill the details of which are such as to defy ready appreciation unless there is an opportunity for pretty close interrogation of the superintendent, which we could undertake if he were to appear before the banking and commerce committee. However, it will not be possible there, I take it, to receive any statement of policy. We will receive an explanation of the bill, or an explanation of what has already gone on.

I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary is in a position to give the house the government's thinking with regard to matters having to do with large corporations, which I think perform a very useful service in our society; I refer to insurance companies, trust companies, banks and the like. I have particular reference to the tendency during recent days for large mergers and large amalgamations.

We have seen this in the case of the banks, which of course are not covered by this bill. We have seen it, of course, in the case of trust companies. All of this raises in one's mind the question of whether or not this is a good thing for the country and whether it is a development which ought to be fully explained so that we will know what are the consequences of this tendency.

I raise this question because I think it is in the minds of many people. Certainly this is true as a result of some of the big bank mergers, and recently some very important trust companies have added to their holdings by amalgamation and other processes. I believe there are now before us considerations concerning an amalgamation or some sort of integration between two of the larger trust companies in the country.

I mention this matter because I think this would be an appropriate time for a statement by the government of its opinion with regard to these developments. The bill, of course, does not deal with the question of purchase of trust companies by foreign corporations. I understood the parliamentary secretary to the minister to say a few moments ago that in the case of the amalgamation of trust companies, treasury board has the power under sections of the act which are not in the bill before us to approve such amalgamations.

In the case of the purchase, for instance, of an insurance company or the acquiring of control of an insurance company by foreign investors or foreign corporations, whatever may be the persuasive influence exercised by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), his authority is not more than a persuasive one; I do not believe he has any power to prevent it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman, of course, is aware of the amendments to the insurance acts which this government introduced in 1957?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was not aware of them. I am aware of them now my hon. friend recalls them to my mind.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): They are of great significance in relation to federally incorporated insurance companies.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That did not have the effect, for instance, of stopping the recent taking over by a United States corporation of a Canadian insurance company.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think that must be the insurance company with which my hon. friend's friend was involved, which company is provincially incorporated.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope my hon. friend is not stooping to political considerations when he says "my friend". I presume that when he says "my friend" he simply means someone who, happily for him, shares my political views. In the case of trust companies, what is the situation? Is it open to any foreign corporation or any group of foreign investors to acquire a dominant interest in a Canadian trust company? If that is the practice, is it thought to be a good practice? I am not saying it is not; I am just looking for the kind of information which I think the public expect us to elicit and which we may not be able to get in the banking and commerce committee unless there is a spokesman there for the ministry itself. These are questions which in the light of recent events I think deserve comment by the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the parliamentary secretary speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are two points with which I wish to deal. It is quite obvious from the attitude of the house that it is the wish that this bill should be referred, as is generally the practice, to the standing committee on banking and commerce, and after second reading I will ask the house leader to so move.

The hon. gentleman from Essex East has raised a matter which might be the subject of perhaps both philosophical and political argument; that is the tendency which does exist in companies, not only Canadian companies but companies throughout the western world to grow bigger, to amalgamate. I would not wish to make any statement of policy in relation to that matter. I do not think that bigness as such is necessarily an evil. I do believe, however, that each case where there is a request for amalgamation ought to be reviewed upon its merits and ought to be decided on the basis of one thing only, and that is whether the public good will be upheld. Bigness in some things may advance the public interest. Bigness in other circumstances may very well result in combines in circumstances which would be against the public good. However, I would certainly not wish to suggest that amalgamation as such is evil.

The hon. gentleman also asked about the freedom of any foreign corporation to acquire federally incorporated Canadian trust companies. This is a matter which I think might be pursued in detail with the superintendent of insurance before the standing committee on banking and commerce. The hon. gentleman raised the question of the insurance companies. Decisive action was taken in the session of 1957 in respect of federally incorporated companies which has had a most salutary effect. Personally I would hope that provincial legislatures would adopt the principles which the federal parliament then adopted.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The parliamentary secretary said that when this bill is discussed before the committee we could pursue the question of the purchase of Canadian trust companies by foreign investors or foreign corporations. But this possibly involves a matter of policy. What is the policy with regard to such attempts by foreign corporations to take over Canadian trust companies? Is there anything in the law now similar to the act of 1957? Are there any restrictions whatsoever?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am personally not aware of any provisions in the Trust Companies Act as it now exists, but the hon. gentleman is, I am sure, in no doubt as to the general policy of this government in its endeavours to Canadianize as far as possible.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have not had an answer to my question, but I shall not pursue the matter.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INVESTMENT POWERS

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-29, to amend the Loan Companies Act.

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): As I indicated when I spoke on the earlier bill, this is a companion measure. It applies the same principles generally as those I had already outlined. In view of the obvious wish of the house that the previous bill should be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce, I shall ask the leader of the house after the second reading of this bill to move that it also be referred to the standing committee.

The house may wish to have a general statement with respect to loan companies. The Loan Companies Act which this bill amends was enacted in 1914 at the same time as the Trust Companies Act. These two acts are in the same general form and contain many identical provisions. They differ only to the extent necessary to recognize differences in the nature of their businesses. In the past, whenever amendments have been made in one act it has always been the policy to make similar amendments to the other.

I think the house would wish me to distinguish between loan companies and small loans companies. It might be mentioned that the essential characteristics of a loan company under the Loan Companies Act is the power to make loans on the security of real property and absence of the power to make loans secured by personal property. On the other hand, the distinguishing characteristics of a small loans company under the Small Loans Act is the power to make loans on personal security and absence of the power to make loans on real property.

The Loan Companies Act applies to all federally incorporated loan companies, of which there are only five at the present time. It has no application to provincially incorporated loan companies numbering about 24.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would a finance company be included among small loans companies?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I should not like to answer the hon. gentleman specifically in relation to that. There are many finance companies which are not small loans companies. We are in a very technical field.

The five federally incorporated companies have assets amounting to about $440 million and transact about twice the volume of business done by provincial companies. The companies to which I am referring are as follows. I shall give the date of the incorporation and the location of the head office in each case:

Name	Year of incorporation	Location of head office
Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation	1899	Toronto
The Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company	1887	Halifax
Gillespie Mortgage Corporation	1955	Vancouver
The Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation	1864	London
International Savings and Mortgage Corporation (formerly International Loan Company)	1920	Winnipeg

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Are not some of those concerns trust companies?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No. These are all loan companies.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thought the first one was.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No. The Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation is the parent company of the Canada Permanent Trust Company. I believe that The Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation owns a subsidiary, the Canada Trust Company. My hon. friends who have dealt with these matters in their law practices in central and western Ontario have greater familiarity than I have with these firms.

Since most of the proposed amendments to the Loan Companies Act are similar to those already described in reference to Bill No. S-28 to amend the Trust Companies Act, it seems unnecessary to repeat the same explanations in reference to Bill No. S-29. Clauses 2, 4, 5 and 6 of Bill No. S-29 are the counterparts of clauses 1, 2, 3 and 4 of Bill No. S-28. Clauses 1 and 3 of Bill No. S-29 are additional proposed amendments respecting the Loan Companies Act and have no counterpart in the bill which has just received second reading.

Clause 1 of this bill extends the definition of a loan company so that the Loan Companies Act will clearly apply to companies which confine their business to the purchase of mortgage loans on real estate as well as to companies that make such loans directly.

Clause 3 relates to section 61 of the act and applies to only two loan companies, each of which owns all of the shares, other than directors' qualifying shares, of a subsidiary trust company. Hon. gentlemen have already referred to those particular trust companies, the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation, which owns the Canada Permanent Trust Company, and the Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation, which owns the Canada Trust Company.

Where a loan company on June 28, 1922 owned 50 per cent or more of the shares of a trust company, the act permits the continued holding of such shares notwithstanding that the holding of common shares of any corporation is otherwise limited to a maximum of 30 per cent of the issued shares of such corporation. The act also permits the loan company to invest in the whole or any portion of additional shares that may be issued by the trust company. It does not, however, permit the loan company to acquire additional shares from other shareholders. The proposed amendment would grant this further power.

and, as I have indicated, the proposal will be to refer it to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary a question. He says that the principles here are the same as apply to the previous bill. Why should a loan company which is a subsidiary of a trust company—there are two cases here—have the same rights as a trust company?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am not sure I understood the hon. gentleman's question. Did he ask me whether a loan company which is a subsidiary of a trust company has the same rights as the trust company?

Mr. Winch: Yes.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think if the hon. gentleman had followed me he would realize that exactly the reverse situation with respect to parents and subsidiaries is the case. The Canada Permanent Mortgage Company owns the Canada Permanent Trust Company; the Huron and Erie Mortgage Company owns the Canada Trust Company. But in each case the respective powers of the parent and subsidiary are covered by the respective acts; the parent by the Loan Companies Act, with which we are now dealing, and the subsidiary by the Trust Companies Act, to which we have just given second reading.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTY TRAFFIC ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING PENALTY FOR VIOLATIONS

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-24, to amend the Government Property Traffic Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the amendments to the Government Property Traffic Act are required in order to bring this act up to date with the penalties of the highway traffic act and also the Criminal Code. Hon. members will note that there really are only three changes, two of them substantive.

Subclause (g) provides for a maximum fine of $500 in substitution of the old maximum of $50. Also provided, as will be noted in the second line of that subclause, is imprisonment for a term of six months, as the maximum imprisonment. In the third line appears the insertion of the word "such" between the words "or" and "fine", so as to make it quite clear that this refers to the preceding clause.

There has been an addition in the fifth line following the word "regulation" of the words:

—except that for the violation of any regulation governing the parking of vehicles the penalty prescribed shall be a fine not exceeding fifty dollars.

Subclause (h) is added reading as follows:

providing for the voluntary payment of fines and for prohibiting persons who have violated any regulation from driving a vehicle on such lands for any period not exceeding one year.

These amendments are long since overdue. The Government Property Traffic Act was passed in 1952. Since that time penalties provided for similar offences under the other acts have become much more severe, such as that provided by section 694 of the Criminal Code as found in chapter 51 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1953-54.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I presume that following second reading of this bill it will be referred to committee of the whole. If that is the case I should certainly like the minister to give us some clear explanation as to what is concerned in these amendments. There is an increase in the penalty from $50 to $500. What type of violation would necessitate an increase in the penalty from $50 to $500?

I do not intend to deal with the section governing parking, but I feel we are entitled to know what the offences are in respect to House of Commons property which necessitate a maximum fine of $500, and sincerely hope that the minister will explain this to the committee.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have the opportunity of inquiring into the details at the committee stage. Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I understood the minister intended to explain that to which I made reference a moment ago. Perhaps he will also explain whether the grounds of the House of Commons are completely within the jurisdiction of the House of Commons and, therefore, in order to change the penalty there must be an amendment passed by parliament. I should like the minister also to explain exactly how charges are laid under this act, before which judge the trial is heard, and to whom the fine is paid.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, I will be very happy to answer the hon. gentleman. This act does not apply solely to the grounds of the House of Commons but to any federal government property in Canada.

[Mr. Walker.]

Mr. Winch: Do I understand by that statement that a specific amendment to an act is required in regard to government property anywhere in Canada?

Mr. Walker: No, just in respect to federal government property.

Prosecutions under this act take place in the regular way before the regular constituted courts in each of the provinces. The necessity for this act results from the fact that provincial acts do not cover the federal property involved.

The purpose of this amendment is to bring the federal regulations in line with other regulations. The hon. member has asked what violations are covered by this act. As an example, I should like to suggest that an individual speeding in federal government property can be charged under this act. If the maximum fine is $50 hon. members will appreciate that there is not much deterrent to individuals who repeatedly violate the regulations. Over the past number of years provincial statutes have been increased in respect of fine to a maximum I believe of $500.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the minister stating that the fines as covered by this amendment are consistent with those in other highway and traffic acts?

Mr. Walker: I thank the hon. member for Essex East for asking that question. The fines covered by this amendment are consistent with the fines imposed under provincial highway traffic acts, in respect to similar offences. The purpose of these amendments is to bring this act in respect to fines and imprisonment into conformity with other acts.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Do the provisions of this act apply in respect to property owned by the municipalities but maintained by the federal government, such as federal parks and highways?

Mr. Walker: I should also like to thank the hon. member for asking that question.

There was perhaps some concern as to whether the national capital commission would be covered by this act. In that connection I should like to state that the national capital commission has its own act and regulations.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, subparagraph (g) provides for a fine not exceeding $500 or a term of imprisonment not exceeding six months for violation of regulations, except in respect to parking. What are these regulations? The minister spoke a few moments ago about the speed of traffic. What kind of regulations are they? I understand that speed can be covered, but are there any other regulations?

Mr. Walker: Everything connected with traffic violations is covered including parking, careless driving and so on. The maximum fine for parking, of course, is specifically set out in this amendment as not exceeding $50, and again that is commensurate with the provincial acts. The regulations are rather long. They are set out in the consolidation of statutory orders and regulations, 1955, and if the hon. member would like to see them at any time they are readily available.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the provision in (h) correspond with any provincial act or regulation?

Mr. Winch: That is the very point I am after.

Mr. Walker: Just a moment. I am answering the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Winch: He did not stand up so I did not think he was asking a question.

Mr. Walker: He stands up. I have not noticed him refusing to stand up. Paragraph (h) is a new provision. If the charge is careless driving or speeding or illegal parking, instead of the person being forced to take time off to come to court and plead guilty or not guilty he has the option under paragraph (h) of voluntarily paying the fine and not standing trial provided he wishes to plead guilty. That is often done. The hon. member for Vancouver East has perhaps had no experience himself but some of us have had the experience of being able to pay the fine into court under some of the regulations, and this is just bringing the situation in conformity with the other acts.

Mr. Winch: I am not concerned about that but rather with the general principle. According to what the minister has said, this provision applies to any federal property in Canada. Is there something in the original act that says the law in the various provinces for the offence shall apply? You certainly cannot take that meaning from this. All the minister has spoken about is parking and I cannot see a fine of $500 for parking. I am a little confused as to what the first clause means.

Mr. Walker: Subsection 1 of section 2 of the act, which is to be found in chapter 324, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, volume V, page 5775, provides as follows:

> The governor in council may make regulations for the control of traffic upon any lands belonging to or occupied by Her Majesty in right of Canada, and in particular, but without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations
> (a) regulating the speed and parking of vehicles and prescribing routes of travel;
> (b) respecting one-way traffic, obstruction of traffic, and pedestrian traffic;
> (c) for directing traffic and erecting signs;
> (d) prohibiting traffic by such vehicles at such times, in such places and in such circumstances as may be prescribed in the regulations...

Mr. Winch: Where do you find anything there which gives you the authority to bring in the amendment before us now providing that there shall be a fine of $500?

Mr. Walker: That is in paragraph (g) of subsection 1 of section 2 of the same act. Having set out the preliminaries involving what the government can regulate, it goes on to prescribe a fine not exceeding $50 or a term of imprisonment not exceeding two months, or both fine and a term of imprisonment, to be imposed upon summary conviction as a penalty for violation of any regulation. In other words, first the government has the power to prescribe regulations for speeding, parking and other infractions of vehicular traffic and, second, it is provided that these offences shall be treated as summary offences and be punishable with a maximum fine of $50 or a term of imprisonment not exceeding two months or a combination of both.

In answer to the hon. member for Essex East, may I say that all we are seeking to do tonight is to substitute for the maximum fine of $50 and maximum imprisonment of two months a maximum fine of $500 and maximum imprisonment of six months. It has been found that the deterrent effect of a $50 fine is not sufficient to keep people within the law and accordingly we are bringing our act up to date and in line with the other acts. Otherwise it would seem to be inequitable that on federal government property the penalty should be less than elsewhere. I would ask the hon. member not to think particularly of parliament hill but to think of government property anywhere in Canada.

Mr. Winch: I am glad to do that, but will the minister tell me of any provincial law with respect to speeding or parking where such penalties are provided? Such penalties may be provided for dangerous driving or impaired driving, but the minister has only mentioned parking and speeding. Can the minister tell me of any place where the fine for speeding or parking is over $50? It is true that it is for dangerous driving, impaired driving or intoxicated driving.

Mr. Walker: The provincial highway traffic acts include the offences which the hon. member has mentioned—

Mr. Winch: Dangerous driving, impaired driving or intoxicated driving.

Mr. Walker: They are separate. This provision does not go that far. I am talking about summary convictions with respect to speeding, parking, careless driving and so on. Under the provincial acts they are punishable in accordance with section 694 of the Criminal Code which provides the penalties for summary convictions. Section 694 provides as follows:

> ...every one who is convicted of an offence punishable on sumary conviction is liable to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for six months or to both.

If the hon. member for Vancouver East will follow me, all we are seeking to do with respect to the act we are amending tonight is to bring it up to date and in line with the penalties prescribed in the Criminal Code for summary convictions. Each of the provinces has its own list of summary convictions and the punishment meted out on summary conviction is provided by the Criminal Code.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, as this legislalation has been in existence for some time it would seem that it has a very good purpose in that the crown in the right of the Dominion of Canada owns large tracts of land. Many areas come to mind such as that at Petawawa. People have occasions to travel over portions of the property there every day and therefore there must be a way of enforcing traffic laws similar to those contained in the traffic acts of the various provinces. I have not had occasion to read the numerous sections of the regulations which, if the volume that the minister held in his hand a moment ago is any indication, are rather numerous, but it seems to me that reference should be made to the travelled portions of these lands if the regulations pertain to traffic. In other words, these provisions would make very little sense if the crimes could be punishable when committed on other than a highway. Under most provincial highway acts, if the same crime were committed in a private driveway or on a person's farm, a person could not be convicted. No doubt the intention of this legislation is to make sure that the same exemption is preserved in so far as these large tracts of land are concerned which the crown owns.

If this bill relates to traffic offences, it seems to me the wording should be such as to limit the offence to the travelled portion of the property. If a person drove negligently on a portion of government property other than the travelled portion and thereby caused damage to another vehicle, there could be confusion as to the laying of a charge. The amending bill before us indicates that most of the provincial highways traffic acts impose rather severe penalties for certain infractions, including the cancellation of the licence. However, if the same offence were committed on crown lands, apparently the most severe penalty would be the revocation of the right to drive on crown property.

If someone visiting Petawawa committed a traffic offence, and there are many miles of road in Petawawa, the only penalty imposed would be a revocation of the right to drive in Petawawa. I think that this amending bill fails to impose any measure of severity because the penalty is restricted to depriving a man of the right to drive on crown property. Subclause (h) says that he shall be deprived of the right to drive a vehicle on such lands for any period not exceeding one year. If it is the intention of this amending bill to bring the penalties into line with the penalties imposed by provincial highway traffic acts, it seems to me that it fails because a person may commit a very grave offence while visiting government property for the first and last time, and therefore the judge has no power beyond depriving him of his right to drive on that portion of federal property. These are the two things that occurred to me as needing explanation.

Mr. Walker: This is a very interesting point that the hon. member for Nickel Belt raises. Since he is an able lawyer himself, I know he will appreciate that $500 seems like a substantial fine. However, it can be as small as the magistrate wants to impose. When you get up to $500, it is generally for repeated offences, and that is the reason the fine has been raised as high as it has.

Of course my hon. friend will appreciate that while on government property, outside of those regulations as to speeding and parking, the provision of section 6 of the traffic regulations would apply. This section reads, in part:

> No person shall operate a vehicle on a highway otherwise than in accordance with the laws of the province and the municipality in which the highway is situated.

We have here a situation where our own particular act which we are amending covers certain offences, and anything that is not covered by that act is covered by the law of the province or municipality in which the offence takes place.

Mr. Godin: I realize the minister intended to give an explanation, but my suggestion is that there seems to be an inequality. If a person commits a traffic offence on Wellington street, he may be fined $400 by the magistrate. If a person commits the very same offence on crown property, he is tried by the same magistrate and may be fined $400. There is equality here. However, if the magistrate decided to cancel the licence of that driver in addition, the man who committed the offence on Wellington street may very well have his licence suspended for six months and he would be prevented from driving any place in the province of Ontario, whereas the person who committed the same offence on crown land would only lose the right to drive on those crown lands.

Mr. Walker: As my friend will appreciate, we are confined to federal lands. We cannot take upon ourselves any jurisdiction for Wellington street. I quite appreciate the point the hon. member is raising.

Mr. Deschatelets: There is a legal saying that nobody should be ignorant of the law. This is a special act covering infractions on federal government property. I would think that something should be done to make people aware of the fact they are on federal property. Some signs should be posted to show that people are liable to prosecution, for speeding infractions, careless driving, and so on. Otherwise, there may be people who would be completely ignorant of the fact that they are liable to prosecution for these offences on federal property.

Mr. Walker: I am glad my hon. friend raised that point. Section 7 of the traffic regulations states:

> The Minister of Public Works, the minister of any department having the control or management of any government property or the commissioner may mark or erect or cause to be marked or erected on any government property, traffic signs or devices
> (a) prescribing rate of speed;
> (b) regulating or prohibiting parking and designating parking areas;
> (c) prescribing load limits for any vehicle or class of vehicles;
> (d) prohibiting or regulating the use of any highway by any vehicle or class of vehicles;
> (e) designating any highway as a one-way highway;

And so on.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the minister, while he has that book before him, what the situation now is on the hill, as we call it. On the hill, only the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have any control whatever. The other night when I was in a taxi, a chap was coming up in front of the parliament buildings at 40 or 50 miles an hour and almost hit us. If the mounted police had caught him and charged him, I presume he would have been tried by a municipal judge. Since he would have been arrested on the hill by the mounted police, would the law of the province of Ontario apply when that man appeared in court?

Mr. Walker: No. When he is charged by the R.C.M.P. officer, the matter is taken before a magistrate and an information is laid. He is tried in the regular court by a magistrate the same as any other citizen who breaches the law on Wellington street. Then, the magistrate has cognizance of this particular act which we are amending tonight. That is why it has been a bit old fashioned and behind the times in providing such low penalties when one compares it with the law which would appertain to Wellington street. In the case which my hon. friend recited of the other night when he was almost run into by a car driving 40 miles an hour, which we so often see come rushing up to the main door, may I say this. That person, if he had been in any trouble before, could have imposed on him a fine up to $500 or as low a fine as the magistrate saw fit to impose if it was the first offence. In that way the penalty is brought in line for that same driver driving 40 miles an hour out on Wellington Street. In other words, we have now brought up to date and correlated the fines or the penalties for the same offence, no matter whether it is committed on Wellington street or on parliament hill. Does that answer the question?

Mr. Lambert: I have a brief word of commendation for the minister for the change that is being made in the act dealing with the voluntary payment of fines. This has been a particularly sore point in Edmonton at the new international airport where people have not been involved in parking regulations. Previously, at the municipal airport they simply received a parking ticket. Under the act as it stood prior to this amendment offenders had to appear in magistrate's court and take time off; somebody had to come in and give evidence. A good deal of time was lost and you were getting parking fines of $10 and more and costs; whereas for a mere city parking infraction the fine might be a ticket for $1. This amendment will remove a very annoying feature of traffic control at international airports particularly where you can easily run afoul of the law, for instance, in running over your meter. As the act stood previously, if you overran the meter, you were obliged to go to court and you could pay a fine of $10 or more. This amendment will now bring the practice in line and make for much more convenience for the public.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister say whether the regulations provide for or whether the governor in council has the power to authorize the payment of fines by instalment in cases in which the magistrate might feel that course was desirable?

Mr. Walker: There is certainly nothing under the act which is being amended tonight, namely the Government Property Traffic Act. That being so, we would then have reference to the provincial law or the municipal law; and if there is such a provision there for payment on the instalment plan, that will be possible.

Mr. Hellyer: That would apply to this act?

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Mr. Winch: Is there a section there which says that although the provincial or municipal police may have no authority on government land the law, when a charge is laid, is the provincial law. That is the point I was trying to get at. Someone says that although the municipal or provincial police have no authority on government land—I am speaking now particularly of land on the hill—because persons are charged and must appear before a magistrate or authority outside this hill, they then come under all the provisions of the provincial law.

Mr. Walker: Yes. The hon. member for Vancouver East is quite right. The procedure in the particular province in which the offence took place or the municipality, whichever happens to govern, would apply in any infringement of the law on any federal government property where this federal Government Property Traffic Act does not provide the penalty.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF ALLOWANCES AND INCOME CEILINGS, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That Bill C-101 intituled "An act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952", now before the house, be amended, in clause 3 of the said bill, by adding the word "and" at the end of subparagraph (ii) and by striking out subparagraph (iv) of paragraph (a) in proposed subsection (4) of section 3 of the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Churchill: The purpose of bringing in this change by way of a resolution is this. It is occasioned by the fact that it might involve a financial obligation on the crown. Consequently we brought it in preceding the consideration of the bill. It strikes out a clause dealing with the widow of a recipient who dies outside of Canada. The clause as it stands in the bill at the moment means that such a widow would have to apply for an allowance within 12 months from the date of the recipient's death. In the standing committee on veterans affairs it was considered that this was an unnecessary restriction to place in the bill. We have agreed with that view and consequently I am suggesting that it be now deleted. The widows of recipients are known to the Department of Veterans Affairs and we would not wish any widow to be deprived of an allowance that was her due simply because she had failed to make application within a period of 12 months.

Mr. Batten: I should like to support this resolution which I think is important but should not require a great deal of discussion. I think that the original paragraph was much too restrictive. One can easily conceive of a situation in which a widow would not be eligible for war veterans' allowance within the first year after the death of her husband and would therefore not apply; but if she were not to apply within the first 12 months she would not be eligible for the allowance. I think this is a much more reasonable regulation and I would support it.

Mr. Herridge: I rise to express briefly our pleasure at the introduction of this resolution which in effect accepts the recommendation of the Canadian Legion before the committee and the recommendation of the committee. While the amendment will affect only a limited number of veterans widows, prior to this time they have suffered, in our opinion, a measure of injustice. The matter has been brought to the attention of the government by hon. members on both sides of the house in the last year or so as a result of their experience of particular cases. The Canadian Legion and other organizations had experience of similar cases which were brought to their attention and as a result they made recommendations before the committee and gave very careful explanations of the reasons for those recommendations.

May I say again that we are very pleased the minister has introduced this resolution which further improves the amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act which we expect to consider very soon.

Resolution reported and concurred in and referred to the committee of the whole on Bill No. C-101.

Motion agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE RATES OF ALLOWANCES AND INCOME CEILINGS, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee of the whole to consider Bill No. C-101, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of making a lengthy address at this stage of the bill. We have given very careful consideration to the whole problem. We had a discussion at the resolution stage on May 16 and debate on second reading on May 31. Since then the bill has received very careful study by the standing committee on veterans affairs and has now come back to the committee of the whole for consideration.

As I pointed out on those other occasions, the main amendment proposed in the bill involves a 20 per cent increase across the board for people receiving war veterans allowance and a larger increase for orphan children. The other amendments, as we come to them one by one, will indicate changes which will improve the administration of the act.

The committee may wish to ask certain questions concerning these various amendments. Hon. members may wish to spend some time discussing some aspects of them, but in view of the fact that the standing committee on veterans affairs undertook an intensive study of the bill and received representations from interested organizations it may be that we will not have to take too much time this evening in considering the bill. This bill will be of considerable benefit to veterans and their dependents, numbering approximately 70,000, who are under the administration of the war veterans allowance board.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say just a few words on the first clause of this bill. The bill was studied very carefully in the standing committee and the various clauses were discussed. With regard to clause 1, I agree with the increase in allowance given to veterans because it brings the allowance they have been receiving more in line with the increase which has been given under another veterans act. As we go through the different clauses I may wish to ask one or two questions, but I have no further general remarks to make on the bill at this stage.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I do not think there will be a very lengthy debate on this committee stage of the bill because we had a thorough debate on second reading and the bill was referred to the standing committee and considered very carefully there. The committee heard representations from the Canadian Legion and the Canadian corps association, and there were written representations from other veterans organizations. The witnesses who represented the veterans organizations were questioned by the members of the committee and gave further explanations of the recommendations contained in their briefs and the reasons for introducing those recommendations.

In addition to that the officials of the department very carefully explained the present circumstances with respect to the administration of the act, the effect of the amendments on the administration and the effect on the veterans and dependents concerned. I might say that the Canadian Legion brief first of all expressed its belief in the value of the standing committee on veterans affairs. I quote from the brief:

> We believe that continuation of the policy of referring legislative changes to veterans affairs committees where we can offer suggestions and information assures the veterans of Canada that the legislation affecting their welfare will receive careful study.

The legion also expressed its appreciation of this legislation by saying:

> We feel that the introduction of Bill C-101, an act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, indicates that the government has been influenced by the recommendations which we have placed before it.

They went on to say:

> We thank the government for introducing these amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act at this session of parliament. We realize that the speech from the throne in November made no mention of this legislation, and we are sure that Canada's veterans, particularly those in receipt of war veterans allowances, will be most pleased with the changes, especially the increases in rates.

They were particularly pleased, I think, because of the result of the amendments to the Pension Act. It was brought out during the debate and in the committee studying the act that there were some 13,000 war veterans allowance recipients who were also pensioners and who received no benefit from the increases under the Pension Act. This legislation, as the minister said, will be of advantage to 70,000 war veterans allowance recipients and will remedy what we considered to be an unintentional injustice suffered by the 13,000 pensioners who are recipients of war veterans allowance.

As we consider the various measures contained in this bill I may wish to bring to the attention of the committee the proposals made by the Canadian Legion. I might say that the committee, after its study of the legislation, directed the attention of the government to the recommendations made by the Canadian Legion and other veterans organizations for further amendments. All I wish to say at this point is that we trust the government will give these veterans organizations' recommendations directed to it by the committee sympathy and favourable consideration.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I realize this is the second veterans pension act we have had before us this session. Of course we in this group support this bill. We have discussed this bill at the resolution stage and the second reading stage, it was referred to the veterans affairs committee and it is now being considered in committee of the whole. Because this is the last opportunity I should like to ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs if consideration has been given to a certain matter and if by any chance the hon. gentleman contemplates any amendment of this act to give recognition to a forgotten group of people. I refer to the merchant seamen who were in the front line of war. Thousands of Canadians died on merchant ships in the front line. They have never been recognized by any public act in Canada. I should like to ask the minister, taking advantage of this discussion on clause 1, which is the only opportunity I have, whether consideration is being given in this measure or any other to those who survived as far as recognition by Canada in the matter of pensions is concerned.

Mr. Weichel: I had no opportunity of taking part in the discussion which took place on the resolution stage of this bill to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act and at this time I do not want to delay the bill. However, as a disabled veteran of the first world war and one who has been in close contact with some of these veterans from the first world war I feel sure this amendment will be of great benefit to the recipients who in many cases have served in both wars.

I am pleased, on looking over the bill, to see some of the changes which are to be made, especially the addition of time taken to travel to England and back again—in my case, 14 days going over and 10 days coming back. In some cases this extension will enable a number of veterans to qualify. I should like to commend the minister and the government on bringing in this fine legislation.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not often commend the government but I should like to do so on this occasion. I think this is a very good bill. I welcome it on behalf of many people in my constituency who will benefit from it. I think it is timely and worth while, and I should like to thank the government for introducing it.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to answer the hon. member for Vancouver East who raised a question concerning merchant seamen. I have given consideration to this problem affecting merchant seamen. It was one of the first questions I raised with my departmental officials when I assumed this porfolio last fall.

Along with others, I have a great deal of admiration for merchant seamen who served in many instances in such perilous conditions during war time. I admit, frankly, that had I been asked to perform some of the duties undertaken by merchant seamen I might have been somewhat reluctant to come forward quickly.

A question with regard to merchant seamen was raised in the standing committee on veterans affairs, and my parliamentary secretary answered the question there. It amounts to this—that although there is a difficulty in bringing merchant seamen under the provisions of the War Veterans Allowance Act as it stands now because of the requirements set out in the act we think, nevertheless, that merchant seamen might be dealt with more properly under the civilian war pensions and allowances act. We are giving consideration to this problem. If this could be done it would obviate the necessity of declaring merchant seamen to be veterans under the definition which appears in the War Veterans Allowance Act. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East and with others who have raised this question that the problem has to be tackled and dealt with. I do not at all disguise my sympathy for the merchant seamen who are not at the present time benefiting under the War Veterans Allowance Act. Let us not forget, however, that those who were disabled have been taken care of.

Mr. Carter: I had not intended to intervene in this debate—

An hon. Member: The old, old story.

Mr. Carter: —because we are anxious to get this legislation through and the hour is getting late, but what the minister has just said has caused me to rise and make a few remarks at this point.

I am grateful to the minister for telling the committee that this matter is under consideration but I would urge him to give consideration to bringing the merchant seamen under the War Veterans Allowance Act rather than under the civilian war pensions and allowances act as he has just suggested, because whatever act you bring these seamen under you will have to grapple with the problem of service and one of the big problems of the merchant navy is that there are so many different groups with so many different kinds of service—service on inland waters, service on coastal waters and service on the high seas. I do not think all of them can qualify, but I want to point out that this particular act which we are considering now, the War

Veterans Allowance Act, was set up for just such cases as these—for people who rendered service to their country in time of need and who are not qualified to receive regular service pensions. They were not wounded, they were not disabled, and perhaps there was some question as to whether they could be classed as veterans. I think this is where we should change our thinking. It is not enough to say that a person is a veteran because he served in a certain way. That, I think, is wrong thinking. Any man is a veteran who volunteered his services to his country in time of war and who risked his life in the service of his country. I will point out that the casualties in the merchant marine were often higher than in the regular service. A man can do no more than give his life. Of those who were spared I have many in my own district who are crippled with arthritis because of the soaking in the water that they underwent for hours, sometimes for days. I have others who are crippled with tuberculosis because they were cramped up in small quarters aboard ships. I have others who are crippled for other reasons traceable to their service in wartime. This act was set up to deal with such cases. If we call these people civilians we are throwing away the value of their service. We are saying to them that because they served in the merchant navy or because they were getting a certain rate of pay they are not veterans. I do not think that has anything to do with the definition of a veteran. A veteran is an individual who serves his country voluntarily in time of need. Surely these people are just as worthy and deserving of benefits under this act as those individuals in the other categories we have brought in.

Mr. Lennard: Nobody is arguing with you.

Mr. Carter: Oh, yes they are. The minister suggested we had to keep away from thinking about bringing these individuals under the War Veterans Allowance Act, not considering them as veterans but as civilians.

Mr. Lennard: And he is right.

Mr. Carter: I do not think he is right. A veteran is not a veteran because he puts on a uniform. Many veterans are drawing benefits under this act who never saw service or took any risk. Why should we decide just because they wore a uniform, they are any more worthy, and should receive the benefits of this legislation, than those individuals who served in the merchant marine? I should like to urge the minister to cast off this kind of thinking and to devise some means of bringing these individuals under the terms of this legislation, which has been set up to look after those individuals who cannot qualify for a pension in any other way.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two in regard to this bill. Not having been in attendance at the committee meeting, this is the first opportunity I have had to do so.

I have received representations from individuals who will be the recipients of this increase, and who, because of the numbers of their families, are currently recipients of provincial welfare. These individuals are concerned that because of this increase they may be deprived of the benefits they are now receiving from provincial welfare. I should like to know whether the minister has considered this situation.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could answer that question. The recipients of mothers' allowances and relief for dependent children paid by provinces or municipalities will not lose benefits as a result of this increase. Those allowances which they are now receiving are not included within the terms of income as set forth in this act, and the fact that they receive such allowances, will not have a bearing on their eligibility to receive benefits under this act. I do have a list of the exempted items from income, which includes mothers' allowances, family allowances, as well as a number of others, and could supply my hon. friend with that list if he desires.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary to deal with the converse situation. I think he will find that mothers' allowance authorities consider the benefits of this act as income for the purposes of determining the allowances payable under provincial legislation, which is reduced when there is an increase in the benefit under this act. I think he will also find that this parliament has no authority in regard to this situation.

Mr. Jones: That is something over which the federal parliament has no control.

Mr. McIlraith: It is a very unhappy situation.

Mr. Jones: Any action taken by the provincial or municipal governments is taken under their own jurisdiction, not ours.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to express my satisfaction with what the minister has said tonight regarding the fact that merchant seamen will not be overlooked. I have been greatly impressed by the words of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo as well as those of the hon. member for Vancouver East. I am quite sure that every hon. member of this house feels that whatever else happens these men must not be unfairly treated. On the other hand, I should not like to argue with what the minister says should be done. I am perfectly content to leave it to him to do what is right. If it is his judgment to look after certain individuals in a certain way, I know that he has given much thought to it and go along with that judgment, knowing that he will do what is right.

Mr. Winch: We should not delay that action too long because there is no legislation covering those individuals now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have only just come into the chamber and have had the chance of saying just a word or two to my friend the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. I understand that he, as many other hon. members, has received representation in respect to merchant seamen. I should at this time like to join my voice with his in his expression of concern for them.

Mr. Chairman, I should also like to say a word or two about the 365 day regulations.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, we have not yet reached that item.

Mr. Pickersgill: Are we not dealing with clause 1?

Mr. Jones: We are considering clause 1 but we will come to that specific item a little later.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, unfortunately I am supposed to attend three committee meetings tomorrow morning and felt that this perhaps was my only chance to say very briefly what I wish to say in regard to this legislation.

I should like to know why we must continue this discrimination in respect to the 365 day provisions, and why we cannot just do away with it altogether. I suggest this is an attempt to keep alive some old sores from the first world war which ought to be forgotten. This measure should be abolished altogether so that those individuals who went overseas during the first world war will be treated in the same way as those individuals who went overseas during the second world war. I think it is very unfortunate that this is not what is being done at the present time.

I should also like to suggest, as has been suggested by other hon. members on this side of the house from Newfoundland, that the Newfoundland forestry corps should be treated as veterans on exactly the same basis as the Canadian forestry corps because, if Newfoundland had been in confederation at that time, they would be treated in that way. I should like to repeat that this is perhaps something which ought to have been done in our day and was not, which is no excuse for the present government not doing it.

We all know that under the Canadian Citizenship Act every Newfoundlander is treated as a born Canadian. The members of the Newfoundland forestry corps should be treated with equality on the same basis as other veterans. These individuals performed exactly the same services but, because they were enlisted in a civilian corps, they are treated differently. I suggest that distinction should not be perpetuated and that there is still a chance during this committee's consideration for the minister to eliminate this distinction.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo put a motion on the order paper which, if I remember correctly, was passed, but I do not believe a return has been made yet, asking for a list of all those awards which have been made to a certain category of Newfoundland veteran. I have a letter I intended to bring with me but did not, which appeared in one of the St. John's newspapers the other day written by an individual who had received an award, indicating thereby that he had been recognized as a veteran, but whose services have never been recognized since confederation. I suggest this problem should also be dealt with under the present legislation.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to note the inclusion of the provisions of clauses 2 and 3 in this bill. However, in view of the time that has lapsed before receiving amendments of this type, I should like to suggest that the war veterans allowance board keep statistics in relation to those individuals who benefit as a result of clauses 2 and 3. I think statistics of that type would be very interesting and could be used as a guide in respect to further amendments.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3.

The Chairman: I understand that the Minister of Trade and Commerce intends to move an amendment to clause 3.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clause 3 be amended by adding the word "and" at the end of paragraph (a) (i), and by striking out subparagraph iv of paragraph (a) in the proposed subsection (4) of section 3 of the War Veterans Allowance Act of 1952.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Mr. Pickersgill: By leave.

Mr. Churchill moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LIMITS OF LIABILITY UNDER SECTION 21

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-108, to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when this bill was being considered at the resolution stage a few days ago two hon. members asked questions, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson). I have answers to the questions which they asked me at that time and before proceeding with my remarks on second reading I should like to answer those questions for them.

At the resolution stage the hon. member for Ottawa West asked for certain information regarding liabilities incurred by the corporation under different sections of the act. I am pleased to inform the hon. member as follows: First of all, under section 13 of the act the corporation's liability amounted to $65,985,482 under policies of insurance outstanding at May 31, 1961. Second, under section 21 of the act the corporation's liabilities under policies of insurance issued and irrevocable commitments given for insurance amounted to $137,959,557 as at May 31, 1961. Third, under section 21A of the act no guarantees have as yet been issued by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, and accordingly no paper has been purchased. For the information of hon. members, may I say that approval in principle has been given to guarantee and purchase negotiable instruments covering export transactions amounting to $48 million. In addition, business amounting to about $100 million is at present being negotiated by exporters and if it develops will require financing under section 21A.

The hon. member for Ottawa West also made reference to the tabling of orders in council issued under sections 21 and 21A of the act. I am pleased to advise the hon. member that I consider the suggestion he made to be a good and sensible one and therefore when we come to the appropriate section of the bill I will ask one of my colleagues to move the following amendment:

21B. All orders in council made under sections 21 and 21A while parliament is in session shall be laid before parliament during such session within 30 days of the date of their making and, if made while parliament is not in session, shall be laid before parliament within 30 days after the commencement of the next ensuing session.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River also asked two questions at the resolution stage and I am pleased to reply as follows:

1. The current sale of wheat to Poland represents 7.5 million bushels sold on terms of payment providing for 10 per cent on shipment, 30 per cent payable in 24 months, 30 per cent payable in 30 months, and 30 per cent payable in 36 months.

2. With respect to the sale of wheat to China, the Export Credits Insurance Act is not involved.

Those are the answers to the questions which were asked at that time, Mr. Speaker. As I have some remarks with which I should like to introduce second reading of the bill and since it is very close to 10.30 I wonder whether I could call it 10.30?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I might ask the house leader if he could indicate the order of the bills for tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: Any third readings that are ready tomorrow will be taken first followed by second reading of Bill No. C-108, an act to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act. The next item would be Bill No. C-111, an act to amend the Railway Act, followed by the bill to amend the National Energy Board Act. If time permits we will also take the resolution dealing with the Pine Point railway.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister able to indicate what business will take place on Wednesday?

Mr. Churchill: No. I am waiting to confer with people on the other side of the house with regard to that.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to make a suggestion. There are certain Senate amendments that might be very agreeable for Wednesday.

Mr. Speaker: May I remind the house that it is proposed to take a photograph tomorrow evening prior to the commencement of the budget as was forecast the last time when an effort was made to get a picture of the House of Commons in session.

At 10.30 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

APPENDIX

CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING FISCAL MATTERS

Ottawa,
June 16, 1961.

The Honourable Leslie M. Frost, Q.C., M.L.A., Premier of Ontario,
Toronto, Ontario.

My dear Premier:

At the dominion-provincial conference of February 23 and 24, 1961, I presented certain proposals with respect to the financial arrangements which might exist between Canada and the provinces for the five-year period commencing April 1, 1962. The major aspects of these proposals were that we should discontinue the present system of tax rentals in favour of tax collection arrangements, that the federal government would leave considerably more tax room for the provinces by withdrawing substantially in the personal income tax and that a broader system of equalization should be adopted which would give greater weight to fiscal need particularly when considered in conjunction with the proposal to increase substantially the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants and to continue for a further five years the special payment of $8 million per annum to Newfoundland.

The above proposals were discussed at the dominion-provincial conference of February 23-24. Since that time they have been discussed intensively by officials at two meetings of the continuing committee on fiscal and economic matters. The federal government has given very careful consideration to all the points raised and the purpose of my letter is to acquaint you with the conclusions we have reached.

In changing from a tax rental to a tax collection system of agreements, the first question to settle is the type of tax collection agreements which can be adopted to put the new system into effect. Under the system proposed the provinces will levy their own personal income and corporation income taxes. The Department of Justice has given intensive consideration to the possibility of devising agreements which would enable the Department of National Revenue to provide the tax collection service for those provinces which wished it without having to resort to provincial courts. If this could have been achieved, it would have greatly simplified the task of the Department of National Revenue. However, it is the opinion of the Department of Justice that any arrangement which attempted to provide for the enforcement of the provincial taxes otherwise than through the provincial courts would be of doubtful constitutional validity. This means that the only type of tax collection agreement which can be safely entered into between the provinces and Canada is one in which the federal government will act as the agent of the province for the purpose of collecting the tax imposed by the province. The fact that an agency system of agreements must be entered into will complicate the work of the Department of National Revenue and will make it necessary to exercise extreme care in defining the relationship between the federal and provincial taxes.

A second important question has been raised involving the relationship between the federal and provincial taxes on personal income. Two possibilities have been discussed. The first is that the provincial tax might be a percentage of the federal tax. The second is that the provincial tax might be imposed on the basis of taxable income as defined under the Income Tax Act of Canada with a schedule of rates which followed the rate of progression in the federal income tax. The federal government is not prepared to offer tax collection agreements on both of these bases concurrently, partly because of the administrative complexity which would result for the Department of National Revenue, and partly because of the inconvenience it would cause to taxpayers and to employers who are responsible for tax deductions at source. In order that it will be possible to separate the provincial content of all tax deductions at source without installing a complete system of separate accounting for the provincial and federal levies, it is necessary that the percentage relationship between the provincial tax deductions and the federal tax deductions must be constant throughout the year. Since this is the case, it seems to the federal government that a provincial tax levied as a percentage of the federal tax has very clear advantages. We are prepared, therefore, to offer tax collection agreements to provinces in which the personal income tax is levied as a percentage of the federal tax.

There are no similar complications in the case of the corporation income tax and the federal government is prepared, therefore, to enter into tax collection agreements with the provinces for any corporation income tax which is expressed as a flat percentage of taxable income as defined for federal income tax purposes.

Some provinces have enquired as to the possibility of the federal government collecting for the provinces in addition to the income tax, a further flat rate tax which would apply subject to a stated dollar maximum as is the case with the federal old age security tax. The difficulty with this proposal is that the addition of such a tax to the provincial rate structure would destroy the uniform percentage relationship between the provincial and federal tax in all income ranges. The federal government could not, therefore undertake to collect such a special tax without becoming involved in completely separate accounting on an individual basis for the provincial and federal tax. This is a task which the federal government cannot assume because of the unnecessary additional burden it would place on the Department of National Revenue.

Questions have been raised as to whether natural resource revenue should be included in the formula and particularly whether certain elements of that natural resource revenue which have been referred to as non-recurring should be included. As I stated to the dominion provincial conference of February 23-24 in presenting the federal proposals, the reason for including natural resource revenue was to broaden the equalization formula by taking account of the great variation in provincial revenues due to natural resources. In our view, this addition to the equalization formula has greatly improved it from the standpoint of meeting the fiscal need of the provinces. The decision to include 50 per cent of all natural resource revenue as shown in the dominion bureau of statistics publication, "Financial Statistics of Provincial Governments", was taken to avoid uncertainty in the application of the formula. We believe that a thin line separates recurring from non-recurring revenues in the resource field, if indeed there is any line of separation at all. Consequently, to attempt any such separation would, we believe, lay the whole formula open to doubt and dispute. Since we are including only 50 per cent of natural resource revenue, we are not in any event allowing the full weight of either the recurring or non-recurring natural resource revenue to affect the equalization payments. I conclude, therefore, that the proposal to include 50 per cent of natural resource revenue in the equalization formula should stand as an essential part of the federal offer.

Some provinces have asked whether the federal government would be prepared to extend the guarantees offered under the federal proposals. One suggestion was that there should be an additional guarantee that no province would receive less in equalization under the new proposals than it would have received under a projection of the equalization component of the present arrangements. Another suggestion was that what was referred to in my statement to the conference as the (a) guarantee should be extended to provinces above the national average. Under the proposals as presented by the federal government, the provinces will receive the benefit of substantially increased tax room in addition to equalization and the equalization guarantees. The federal withdrawal from the personal income tax is to be raised to 20 per cent by the end of the period compared with the standard rate of 13 per cent for the present year. Having in mind its heavy responsibilities, the federal government cannot provide additional equalization guarantees of the type mentioned above while at the same time offering substantially increased tax room to the provinces.

A further question was raised with respect to the application of the equalization guarantee to those provinces in receipt of the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants. The Atlantic provinces adjustment grants, which it is proposed to increase by $10 million, will be paid separately under the terms of the new legislation. However, in determining the additional equalization to be paid to a province in the form of a guarantee, it is proposed to take account of the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants. This seems a reasonable procedure in view of the fact that the guaranteed equalization already provides for payments to the provinces in excess of their entitlement under the basic equalization formula.

At the conference I stated that the federal government was prepared to consider certain concessions in connection with the taxation of the forest industry if the provinces were willing also to make some concessions. It has been conceded that because the logging profits tax is levied in addition to the corporation income tax, the forest industry bears a greater tax burden than other industries. The possibilities of lessening the burden of taxation on the forest industry have been discussed at the official level. One of the possibilities discussed was that a tax credit shared between a province and Canada, might be granted to the industry. Before this can be done some further technical discussions will be required to reach agreement on the definition of logging income which will be subject to tax and accepted for the purpose of this tax credit. Subject to reaching agreement on this matter of the definition of logging income, the federal government is prepared as a means of relieving the tax burden on the forest industry to offer a tax credit equal to two thirds of the logging tax up to a maximum rate of 10 per cent, provided the province gives a tax credit equal to the remaining one third of such logging tax.

Request has been made for the preparation of a list of federal agencies and corporations which might be subject to provincial sales taxes. We are proceeding with the preparation of such a list and this matter will be resolved before the expiry of the present agreements at March 31st next.

I indicated in my statement to the conference of February 23-24, that the federal government was prepared to continue for the fiscal year 1961-62 the arrangements whereby the provinces receive a half share of the income tax collected from certain public utilities. A number of provinces have indicated that they believe there are strong reasons for continuing this sharing beyond the year 1961-62. We now propose as a concession to these representations to give the assurance that this sharing will be continued throughout the period of the next agreements, that is, for the next five years up to and including the fiscal year 1966-67.

With regard to the progress which is being made with the preparation of legislation to implement the proposed financial arrangements for the period after March 31, 1962, it is our intention to introduce at the current session of parliament legislation which will provide the basis for the proposed new arrangements. The Department of Justice is making good progress with the drafting of this legislation. While the legislation will provide authority for the government of Canada to enter into tax collection agreements with the provinces, there will be a great deal of work involved in drafting the agreements themselves. This can come at a later stage. As soon as the draft legislation has been prepared which will provide the basis of the new arrangements, it will be possible for the Department of Justice to turn their attention to the preparation of model provincial legislation which would complement the draft federal legislation. I understand that it was the wish of some of the provinces that the federal government should assist them in this fashion.

I believe that the above comments deal with the major points which have been raised in connection with the federal proposals and I trust that they give you an adequate account of the progress to date.

I am,

Yours sincerely,
John G. Diefenbaker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 20, 1961

The house met at 11 a.m.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Fourth report of standing committee on public accounts—Mr. Macnaughton.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LAOS—SUGGESTED PROVISION OF CANADIAN AIRCRAFT TO INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has given consideration to the supply of Canadian aircraft to the international commission in Laos in view of the difficulties that our Secretary of State for External Affairs seems to be encountering in securing the necessary facilities and equipment from the United Kingdom and the Soviet union.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition did not give me any notice of this question.

Mr. Pearson: I am sorry.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I realize that it was not by intention that course was followed. The house, of course, will know that yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke at length at the meeting in Geneva. One of the matters particularly dealt with was this question of supplying the necessary aircraft to ensure that the operations of the commission could be carried out effectively. As yet, however, no consideration has been given to the suggestion made in the question. It is a matter that will be given further consideration when the Secretary of State for External Affairs returns. I expect that will be on Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED FINANCIAL IRREGULARITIES RESPECTING FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the continuing disquieting reports concerning alleged kickbacks of public money—this is the kind of thing one could expect in a situation like this—and in fairness to Mr. Courtemanche, would the Prime Minister say whether he has made an inquiry to assure himself that nothing of this kind has been carried on within the jurisdiction of the federal government?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the first act of the present government when it came into power was to ensure that no minister in the cabinet would hold a portfolio while at the same time having a position as a director of any company, whether public or private. That was to prevent the possibility of there being any connection between the award of contracts and the relationship of a minister to a company which might be in receipt of a contract.

I can only say in answer to the hon. member what I said the other day, that at no time did I ever hear directly or indirectly of anything which would have supported the suggestions that were made the other day during the course of the royal commission hearing. I can only say that we took measures we had advocated through the years, that ministers should not be connected in any way with corporations. That was a course we felt was necessary in order to preserve and maintain the integrity not only of ministers but also the administration.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Do I take it from the Prime Minister's answer that in addition to ensuring that a minister is not associated with any private company that might have received kickbacks, the Prime Minister has made an inquiry to make certain there have been no kickbacks of any kind within the jurisdiction of the federal government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have no information whatsoever in that connection that would lead to the inference that is inherent in the question.

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there is no inference in the question; it was asking for information. I want to make it perfectly clear that there is no accusation; the question was merely asking for information.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister, arising out of a question I asked the other day, whether he has yet received the transcript of the evidence of the royal commission in Montreal for which he said he had asked?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the transcript has not yet been received.

[Later:]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I address a question to the Acting Minister of National Revenue and ask him if he is yet in a position to report on the question asked by my colleague the hon. member for Laurier on Saturday, as to whether a federal income tax inspector did, in fact, as alleged, visit the Jean Talon Hospital in Montreal?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Acting Minister of National Revenue): No, I am not. At that time I said it was considered that any personal income tax files were secret and that I would look into the question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister yet looked into the question, and is he able to satisfy the house as to the factual matter of whether a federal income tax inspector was at that hospital?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No. I said I would look into the question at that time.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Percy Vivian (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has any information to give the house on the appointment of members of the royal commission on health.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the appointments to the royal commission have been made by order in council. There will be a press release today setting out the identity of the various members. In view of the question asked, I will give the house that information now.

The commission will be composed of Miss Alice Girard of Montreal, immediate past president of the Canadian nurses' association and chairman of the Canadian section of the international council of nurses; Dr. Arthur Van Wart of Fredericton, past president of the Canadian Medical Association; Dr. David Baltzan of Saskatoon, past president of the Saskatchewan medical association and a member of the central health services committee of Saskatchewan; Dr. C. L. Strachan of London, Ontario, past president of the Canadian section of the international college of dentists; Professor O. J. Firestone of Ottawa, former economic adviser to the Department of Trade and Commerce, and Mr. Wallace McCutcheon of Toronto, who is of course well known both as a businessman and for his work in welfare organizations. I have not the order in council with me at the moment but I will table it tomorrow.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Prime Minister indicate whether there will be a representative of the Canadian Medical Association on the commission? Also, in replying to that question will the Prime Minister indicate if he expects and hopes that there will be a report of the commission before the government decides to call the next federal election?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure the hon. gentleman has some interest in the next federal election, and at some time his anxiety will be satisfied; not, however, in answer to a question couched in the manner of the one asked a moment ago. As far as the commission is concerned I have referred to the various members and I now have the order in council, which I ask to be tabled.

IMMIGRATION

DISCUSSIONS WITH ITALIAN UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Can the minister give the house any information on the results of the discussions she has been having with representatives of the Italian immigration authorities who have recently been visiting Canada?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The under secretary of state for immigration in Italy, Hon. Ferdinando Storchi, has been in Canada for some ten days primarily for the purpose of visiting his countrymen who have migrated to this country to see the conditions under which they are living. We have had two very helpful days of discussion, one a week ago Monday and the other yesterday, in the course of which many questions were answered with respect to Canadian laws not only at federal level but at provincial and municipal levels as well. I think the discussions, which took place in a spirit of great friendliness, were helpful. I know they were helpful to our department and I trust they were helpful also to Mr. Storchi and his colleagues.

SHIPPING

HALIFAX-ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.—REPORTED PROPOSAL TO CANCEL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): On Wednesday last the hon. member for Trinity-Conception asked if the Canadian National proposes to cancel an agreement among shipping companies chartered during the winter months between Halifax and St. John's, Newfoundland. The management of the Canadian National Railways advise that the railway has no charter agreements with steamship companies for service during the winter months between Halifax and St. John's.

This question may arise from negotiations at present under way between the Canadian National and certain steamship companies concerning year round through rates on rail water routes between the Canadian mainland and Newfoundland. An agreement now exists between the railway and these water carriers, inter alia, as to the division of the through rates between the two parties. The Canadian National is now in negotiation with the steamship companies on the matter.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

NUMBER OF PILOTS USED IN VANGUARD AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Last week the hon. member for Laurier asked about a report that T.C.A. intended to use three pilots on its Vanguard service into Chicago and New York instead of two as originally announced.

I am informed that T.C.A. in commencing Vanguard service to these two cities is, in the first instance, operating with an air crew composed of two supervisory pilots in each case. Department of Transport inspectors will also be carried frequently on these flights in the early stages. At a later date after the operational pattern has been well established, the two supervisory pilots will be gradually replaced by regular T.C.A. line pilots. The process of introduction of these line pilots may mean, upon occasion, that during the transitional stage there will be three pilots in the cockpit rather than two, but the basic concept of operating the aircraft with an aircrew of two pilots has not been changed, and ultimately the aircraft will be operated by two line pilots.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENTS TO BOARD OF DIRECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether the government has as yet made the appointments to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways which were authorized by parliament?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the failure of the major powers to reach an agreement banning nuclear tests, and the declaration by the United States that it may resume nuclear testing if an agreement is not obtained, I wonder if the Prime Minister can inform the house whether Canada is opposed to the resumption of nuclear testing even though an agreement is not obtained at an early date.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house knows, Canada has consistently taken the position that nuclear weapon testing should cease. We are, therefore, deeply concerned by the lack of response on the part of the Soviet union to the substantial concessions which the United States and the United Kingdom have made in their latest proposals at the Geneva conference. The western answer to the Soviet aide memoire on nuclear testing and disarmament, which was given to Mr. Kennedy at Vienna, sets out very clearly why the present Soviet proposals are unsatisfactory. The United Kingdom and United States of America reply states that in the absence of progress and an effective controlled nuclear test agreement, governments will be faced with an increasing need to take whatever steps may be necessary to ensure their defence. I think that answers the question of the hon. gentleman.

We have taken a very strong stand in this regard, but the free world will have realized this fact; that however well intentioned people may be toward securing disarmament, our defences must be maintained so long as the Soviet continue their present attitude of refusing a co-operative stand in this regard.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of what the Prime Minister has just said, does this mean that the government of Canada has changed its position as stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that Canada was in favour of a cessation of nuclear tests with or without controls?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that does not mean that the Canadian government has changed its position.

Mr. Hellyer: Of course it has; read the statements and you can tell that.

CRIMINAL CODE

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-110 to amend the Criminal Code.

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few remarks to make at the third reading stage of this bill. I should first like to recommend to the Minister of Justice, as well as other ministers who may be bringing legislation before this house, that an opportunity be given, particularly in regard to such serious matters as these, for more study prior to the introduction and passage of bills.

This bill was only placed before us at 11 o'clock yesterday morning and received second reading early last evening. It contains provisions of great import, and for the first time provides implementation of the McRuer commission's recommendations by the adoption of a definition and provisions dealing with those individuals now to be classed as dangerous sexual offenders. Because this is a matter which has been discussed for some period of time, there has been a body of opinion expressed already in regard to it. However, some of the other provisions which are included in the amendments contained in the bill have not had such careful study by any such persons.

These provisions are most important, although fortunately in Canada the segment of the population to which they apply is very small. The minister gave us the information that fewer than 40 people have been convicted under the prior provision respecting criminal sexual psychopaths. Nevertheless this problem affects 40 people, and for those and the public whom they may have irreparably damaged it is a serious matter and one which requires care and consideration.

The minister indicated that there are other parts of the report which still must necessarily be implemented. In particular he pointed out that research facilities called for by the commission have not yet been established. Unhappily those who will now be classed as dangerous sexual offenders are individuals who respond but little to any sort of training or treatment carried out by psychiatrists and people in the field. I suggest it is therefore necessary, Mr. Speaker, that research facilities be set up at once in order that modern science may have an opportunity to find a way to assist those people who are psychologically ill.

If clinics are to be instituted, then perhaps there should be not just one but a number of small ones. I note that in Le Devoir this morning there is a comment from a meeting of mental hygiene specialists in Vancouver with respect to the bill passed previously dealing with drug addicts. They are complaining that the government did not consult them before bringing in its provisions. In fact they suggest that a number of small clinics for the treatment of drug addicts is much preferable to one large one.

I suggest that the government consult those active in the field who have been studying the problem for some time before launching into a program. It is necessary immediately, now that the legislation has been passed, that the government engage personnel consisting of psychiatrists and other people for the training program, and that they commence a building program for research facilities and begin to allocate money and plans in order that those who may be convicted and incarcerated under preventive detention shall receive some assistance. Otherwise it is sterile to say that we will legislate only to segregate them from the population and forget about them after we have them behind bars.

In addition, there was a change in the legislation with respect to habitual criminals. We are fortunate in Canada in that since we have had this legislation only some 54 have been convicted as such and sent to prison. The same provisions are now to apply to those who are convicted on an application as habitual criminals, and they will be incarcerated for preventive detention. It is necessary as well that they receive psychiatric and psychological training and assistance in order that they may be restored to society. As is indicated by the figures, already there have been some habitual criminals restored as decent citizens, and it is apparent that they are good risks when they go back to the community.

The other important group of sections in the bill which has received second reading were those dealing with the small boats regulations. For the benefit of those who were not present may I say there was some discussion and a point was raised about the difficulty of policing. The regulations referred to are those which have already been in force under the responsibility of the Department of Transport. They are now moved into the Criminal Code. Neither the minister nor the members of this house should forget that the mere legislation is not enough. It is necessary to police it.

The hon. member for Kootenay West raised a most interesting point which found favour with the minister, namely that in order to assist provincial authorities in policing the regulation it may be possible to call upon voluntary associations. The hon. member suggested that perhaps members of boating or yacht clubs would assist. The minister suggested it might be possible to do something along this line with respect to fire wardens or fish and game wardens. I urge upon the minister that this line be followed up because the legislation, without enforcement, is useless.

Briefly then, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the provisions are generally good ones, but they would have benefited from more study. More time should have elapsed between the presentation of the printed bill and the discussion in committee. I hope that before other amendments are brought forward more time will be allowed for study not only by the opposition but by members of the public interested in law enforcement and the code before adoption by this house.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LIMITS OF LIABILITY UNDER SECTION 21

The house resumed from Monday, June 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hees for the second reading of Bill No. C-108, to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act by increasing the resources available for the export financing facilities which I announced in the house last November. This financing makes it possible for Canadian exporters to sell capital equipment on long term credit to foreign buyers.

I should like to describe briefly the operations of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, which is charged with the responsibility of administering the Export Credits Insurance Act. The corporation was originally established to insure Canadian exporters of goods and services against non-payment by foreign buyers. The corporation's annual report for 1960, which was tabled in the house on March 28, 1961 shows that in the 16 years of its insurance operations it insured for its own account and risk a total of $575 million of export sales. The excess of premiums over net losses and expenses is less than one fifth of 1 per cent of export sales insured. Thus as was intended, it has operated on what is practically a break-even basis.

In its insurance operations the Export Credits Insurance Corporation charges premiums related to the risks involved. Rates of premium are established by taking into account the commodity, the credit term, the buyer's country, the volume of the exporter's business, the spread of risk and any other considerations which in the view of the corporation affect the risks underwritten. The average rate of premium for all the short term business insured by the corporation to date is less than three quarters of 1 per cent. As a general rule the maximum credit term for short term business in 180 days. The insurance premium is a flat charge and not on a per annum basis.

Rates for medium term business, that is up to five years, also vary by country and credit term. While premiums for medium term business are also a flat rate charge they work out to about 1.5 per cent per annum on the amount at risk. It should be emphasized that the corporation is not trying to make a profit. On the other hand, neither does it subsidize export sales. The premiums which it charges will in the long run, it is hoped, result in a break-even operation. The maximum liability the corporation may take on for its own account is $200 million. This is under section 14 of the act.

In cases where the board of directors of the corporation is of the opinion that a proposed contract of insurance would impose upon the corporation a liability for a term or an amount in excess of that which the corporation would normally undertake, and if in the opinion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce it is in the national interest that the proposed contract of insurance be entered into, the governor in council may authorize the corporation to issue the insurance policy. In such cases any loss would be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund. Under this section of the act the corporation has insured a total of $360 million of export sales, and there have been no claims.

With the backing of export credits insurance an exporter has no difficulty in getting short term financing from the chartered banks. Even in times when domestic credit has been tight, the Canadian chartered banks have been willing and able to finance short term export business.

To take care of medium term export financing the nine Canadian chartered banks have together established the Export Finance Corporation of Canada, Limited. The Export Finance Corporation has an authorized capital of $50 million, and with this as a base could borrow up to $500 million to finance exports from Canada on medium term credit. This Export Finance Corporation, which recently commenced operations with Mr. H. Duke Scott as general manager, has announced it will finance capital goods transactions involving credit up to five years where the sales are backed by export credits insurance. This is a first class example of co-operation between government and business for the benefit of the Canadian economy as a whole.

Under section 21A of the act the corporation may, when authorized by the governor in council, guarantee the obligations of a foreign buyer and may also purchase or sell the guaranteed obligations and lend money upon the security of guaranteed instruments. It is by using this authority that the government has undertaken to finance export sales of capital goods for periods extending beyond five years at rates of interest approximately equal to those being offered by major competitors. Government financing is, however, available only for capital goods having a high Canadian content—80 per cent or better—and which are intended for use in economically sound projects in creditworthy countries where it is reasonable to expect continuing foreign sales.

The normal procedure would be that the Export Credits Insurance Corporation would guarantee, by endorsement or otherwise, the long term obligations given by a foreign buyer to a Canadian exporter. The corporation would then "purchase" the obligations, thus giving the exporter cash. The exporter gets cash on the barrel head and the foreign buyer in effect gets a long term credit. If a particular lender were interested in holding the obligations for the interest return the corporation could then "sell" the guaranteed obligations to that lender.

The present intention is that the interest rate charged for a long term loan for export financing would be about 1 per cent above the cost to the government of borrowing money. Thus the rate quoted today is in the order of 6 per cent. This rate makes us competitive with other long term lenders such as the export-import bank of Washington.

There is no fixed or statutory limitation to the period of credit which might be approved. The factors that would be taken into account would be the size or value of the project involved; the useful life or operating period of the equipment; the ability of the buying country to pay, and the terms of payment that would be granted by international lenders such as the world bank or by the export-import bank.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we could ask the minister to speak a little more loudly so that we could hear him.

Mr. Speaker: I might also ask hon. members to speak a little more quietly, and the combination of the two might produce the desired result.

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Hees: Section 21B of the act provides that the limitation of liability for both insurance under section 21 and financing under section 21A is $200 million. As at May 31, 1961 insurance in force under section 21 totals $138 million and financing commitments under section 21A total $48 million, making $186 million in all. This leaves only $14 million available for both additional insurance under section 21 and any long term financing under section 21A. As stated in the explanatory note to the bill:

> The purpose of this bill is to provide that the two hundred million dollar limit of liability specified in section 21B of the act, now applicable to both contracts of insurance entered into by the corporation under section 21 and instruments guaranteed by the corporation under section 21A, be made applicable solely to contracts of insurance entered into under section 21. The bill would also provide a separate limit, in the amount of two hundred million dollars, on the liability of importers under outstanding instruments guaranteed by the corporation under section 21A.

Since the government announced the availability of financing for sales of capital goods on long term credit, applications totalling about $250 million have been received. This is a good indication of the potential export volume of capital goods business. A number of projects have been approved by the committee on export finance, and commitments totalling $48 million have been given. Of the remainder, those which are considered to be eligible for financing are under active examination at this moment.

As I stated in my remarks when presenting the resolution in connection with this proposed amendment to the Export Credits Insurance Act, I am delighted to have to ask parliament to increase the funds available for long term financing. This is another example of the steps which this government is taking to encourage Canadian manufacturers and exporters to enter into the export markets of the world and increase their export sales. Backed by export credit insurance and export credit financing, it is up to the exporters to get out and seek orders from buyers who will buy if delivery is prompt, quality and design are good, and the price is right.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his statement. I regret the last sentence or two of it because of a slight historical inaccuracy. It is an inaccuracy that is not too important, and it does not in any way detract from the importance of the legislation and the desirability of the bill. The inaccuracy was quite simple and it was this. The necessity for this bill is due to the failure of the government to listen to question raised by hon. members of the opposition in 1959 when section 21A was added to the bill. What we are doing today is correcting that situation.

However, the amendment is none the less desirable. It is better to be late than never to correct these little omissions, and this was an important omission. I merely wish to correct the minister, because I should not like him to be misled as to what this legislation is, and I should not wish his actions as minister heading up this extremely important department to be influenced by a wrong concept on his part as to the legislation.

The minister is quite right in stressing the importance of this legislation and of the new amendment in relation to the possible export of capital goods. I have always regarded this as a particularly fortunate piece of legislation in the Canadian economy. We have the fact that action was taken one year before the end of the war to bring in this legislation in order to meet what then was the problem in the export market, namely making it possible for our former regular customers to buy our goods through the provisions of the act. Amendments to this act year after year through the intervening 17 years since it was first brought into operation have I think kept the act in a healthy condition and rendered it very useful to our export trade.

The first act was passed in 1944 and was dealt with by the then minister of trade and commerce, the late Hon. J. A. MacKinnon. The first act provided for insurance against the risk of loss arising out of non-payment. As hon. members will recall, it was then basically a matter of payment and exchange control and the uncertainty of exchange all over the world. That act performed its functions. Then in 1945 the then minister of finance introduced a bill amending part of the act to provide for the lending to other government's former customers, of certain sums of money which were very large in relation to the finances as viewed in those days, though perhaps not so large in relation to the figures we hear from finance ministers these days in the House of Commons. However, they were very large then.

Although I have not the reference, I recall many times hearing the hon. member for Greenwood speak about this legislation and some of the benefits that flowed from it. It was interesting that in 1945 two hon. members in the house were rather concerned about what was then this very new legislation because is was advancing and increasing foreign trade and we might forget our home market. It was rather interesting to find that view was asserted by the then hon. member for Davenport, the late Mr. MacNicol. It also seemed to be supported by the hon. member for Rosedale of that day; I refer to Mr. Jackman. I am sure that Mr. Jackman would be the first to agree now that the bill has worked well and that his fears were not in any way justified.

Then in 1948 the bill was again amended in order to meet the changing situation, and the area of insurance was enlarged. Provisions were introduced which enabled the corporation to meet the situation where the liability was in an amount in excess of that which the corporation would normally undertake in relation to any one contract, export, commodity or country. I have references to the hon. member for Greenwood who took an interest in that bill at that time; and I must say that, to his credit, he raised the question of why private insurers were not in this field. It was clear that they were not in it, and I think the need for this legislation has been demonstrated since then.

Then in 1954 there were further amendments to the act. The amendments in 1954 were to increase the capital. The amount of insurance permitted under the ordinary insurance provisions is 10 times the amount of subscribed capital and the amount of the reserve. The capital provision was increased, but in effect the amount of insurance permitted was increased from $100 million to $200 million under the ordinary provisions. That is section 13 of the act.

Incidentally, I may say that at the committee stage I wish to raise a very small point having to do with reserves. The act itself refers to reserves in the financial accounts; two items of reserve are used. What is referred to is the one item only of the reserve, or that is what was intended to be referred to in determining the amount of insurance that could be granted. However, that is a small matter of not too great importance and can be referred to at the committee stage.

Then in 1957 the former government again amended the act and enlarged its scope in relation to the type of goods that could be shipped, and the purposes; that is to say goods for consignment, goods for exhibition and so on. Later in the same year, namely in 1957, after the change of government the new minister of trade and commerce again submitted an amendment increasing the amount of insurance that could be undertaken under the contracts of insurance which the corporation was empowered to enter into under section 21 of the act. That was the section having to do with those types of contracts that the corporation normally would not undertake but which could be undertaken with the approval of the governor in council when certain criteria were met. The former minister of trade and commerce increased the limitation under that section from $100 to $200 million.

Then, again in 1959, the former minister introduced the amendments which provided the right of the corporation to discount paper, to guarantee paper, and it is that 1959 provision that is being amended by the bill before us. That was to meet the new demand in the export markets having to do with financing.

It is interesting to observe the change in the problems of the export trade over the years. Formerly it was a question of the countries to which they were selling being able to obtain exchange with which to pay for the goods. Then it was the other risks related to that point. Then it was the question of enlarging the type of insurance we could grant because of the size of some contracts, notably some of the wheat contracts and related matters. In these cases there were risks that because of their size would be so great that a prudent insurance company would not undertake them in relation to one customer.

Then in the last two years we have had the problem that is relatively new but very, very important. This is the problem of the difficulty of exporters financing their sales contracts and their paper. In any event, as far as I am concerned I hope that whatever governments are in office over the years, particular care will be paid to this legislation to see that it is adapted from year to year to meet the problems of exporters, in the way it has been over the past 17 years. I have no doubt at all in my own mind but that this legislation, in that very difficult conversion period after the war, was of very great assistance in getting our exporters into the markets of the world. I have no doubt at all that this kind of assistance will be required in the trading world of tomorrow to meet the very tough type of competition we will have to meet.

The minister said something this morning with relation to the activities of a privately owned corporation which was incorporated, incidentally, in 1959 if I remember correctly, to enter this field of guaranteeing and discounting export paper. It is somewhat unfortunate that the name of that corporation is remarkably similar to the name of this crown-owned corporation, but since there is a relatively small number of persons dealing with the two corporations perhaps there is not too much difficulty caused by that fact. It would have been a matter of real concern were the corporations of such a nature that a great many persons in the country dealt with them. I hope that the House of Commons will in the future take more care in the granting of names to corporations than it has in the past, because I feel we have been a little careless on this subject over the years, and certainly we have a good example of this in the legislature before us at the moment.

I was not able to hear part of the minister's remarks this morning on the subject of the activities of the private corporation in this field, but I take it I can deal with that subject more closely in the committee stage and perhaps ask the minister to repeat part of his remarks at that time. I take it that the main concern now is for this public corporation to supplement the activities of the private corporation and deal with those types of contracts that cannot receive assistance through the private corporation.

There is one other matter I should like to mention. During the opening part of his remarks on second reading last evening the minister made reference to the contracts of insurance covering the sale of wheat to Poland. Indeed, this legislation has been used as the vehicle for insuring types of sales like the wheat sale to Poland and in former years to Czechoslovakia, I think, and Russia. There may be one or two others. The point I want to make now is this. The very large wheat sale to China apparently does not come under this legislation at all, and the insurance of the payment under those contracts of sale is dealt with separately by the government.

I would hope the government would not develop the practice of only providing part of the insurance and financing provisions that are properly granted to exporters from time to time. I would hope we would not develop a system of having parts of these contracts insured by the government under some other general authority or some other act, and side-tracking this act. As a matter of fact I have always regretted that the sale of wheat was taken away from the Minister of Trade and Commerce and put under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Agriculture. If I recall correctly, I referred to the somewhat truncated functions of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It seemed to me that so many of the functions that were properly those of the Minister of Trade and Commerce had been taken away from him. In my opinion it was not a satisfactory way in which these matters should be dealt with. In any event, it is not for me to plead the cause of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but this does pose real problems in the control parliament is to have over expenditures and risks of this sort. It does seem to me to weaken the efficiency of cabinet handling of the responsibilities in this field of export trade. I would hope that the minister responsible for export trade would be left with that responsibility and fixed with it so that he is answerable for it.

The wheat sale to China is a very important transaction, and in relation to that sale we have no method of obtaining the proper information in the House of Commons. There is no requirement that the related contracts having to do with the insurance and guarantees of payment be tabled, as there is under this legislation. There is no way of getting the information that is ordinarily very important under these types of export contracts for other goods.

For instance, that contract provides for payment in foreign currency. So far as I recall this is the first contract in which we have accepted foreign currency in payment. That is the sort of thing that should be dealt with and examined by the Minister of Trade and Commerce because of the implications that impinge directly on our foreign trade. Whether it is a good thing to do, or is necessary, is another matter. The point is that it is the Minister of Trade and Commerce who should be examining the consequences, in relation to our exports and imports, of taking payments in foreign currency and assessing them.

There is the question of the information which is made available to the house. We have a very elaborate procedure set out in this legislation to guarantee that the house shall have full information; the annual report, the tabling of documents, and so on. If the government takes certain export insurance out of the ambit of this act, as was done in the case of the China wheat agreement, we have no information available to us. I asked a simple question when the minister gave the volume of the Chinese wheat contract sale. I asked him what rate of exchange he had used in computing the figures, because that makes a great difference as all hon. members will realize. I was not given that information, though it is information which is relevant.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the hon. member will not mind my interrupting to point out that he is discussing a matter which comes under another department. Perhaps it is not fair to deal with that question now, particularly as it is not relevant.

Mr. McIlraith: I was not seeking to discuss the merits of the China wheat sale, but rather to discuss this bill which imposes on the Minister of Trade and Commerce, through this corporation, certain responsibilities. I was seeking to illustrate my contention that all government contracts of insurance insuring exporters against loss should be dealt with through this vehicle now before us. That is the point I was seeking to make. I was illustrating the type of information which is obtainable under this legislation but which is not available if the other type of legislation is used. I was not seeking to discuss the China wheat deal on its merits, because to do so would, I agree, be out of order.

There is another point which arises. Under this export credits insurance legislation, orders in council are required to be tabled and as a result we are able to examine the payments made and ascertain any default in payments. Indeed, some orders in council were tabled on June 9 dealing with that very point. There is one in relation to heavy equipment from the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation. There is another having to do with readjustments which had to be made in the method of payment in a certain area.

All that information had to be provided to the House of Commons. In the China wheat deal a very different procedure was followed. We do not get that type of information, and if the rate of exchange drops, if there is a revaluation of sterling, sharp rearrangements may have to be made. Nevertheless members of the House of Commons cannot avail themselves of the provisions of the Export Credits Insurance Act in order to get information about these things. That is the point I wish to stress.

Perhaps I can leave this matter now and content myself with saying that I hope the amendments we are now dealing with, having to do with the financing of certain types of export sales of capital goods, will be of real assistance to exporters. I must say that in 1959 when the provision was first introduced I expected it would be used to a considerable extent. However, I think I am correct in saying that in the first year after the passing of the section there was no paper guaranteed or discounted under that section and that up to date it has amounted to a very small item. I believe there is now considerable activity, though, and it may become of real significance. As I say, I expected in 1959 that it would have been used a great deal right away. Apparently it was not, and if the minister has any explanation to give I should be interested to hear it.

Incidentally, I noticed that last night in referring to the financing under section 21 the minister gave a figure of $48 million. When the resolution was being discussed he indicated a different figure, if I understood him properly, the figure of $58 million. I shall ask him a further question about that when we reach the committee stage of this bill.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I believe the government is to be heartily commended for having introduced this amendment to the Export Credits Insurance Act. I believe this is a means by which we have actively assisted underdeveloped nations to acquire the capital goods they need. I feel the act has also been of benefit to our own national economy in that the production of the goods involved has meant increased employment for the Canadian people.

I should like to hear the minister tell us, either when he closes the debate on second reading or when he opens the discussion at the committee stage, which nations have received these goods and enjoyed the benefit of this legislation, and how much money was involved in the sales to each of the nations concerned. I should also like him to tell us whether importers in all the countries of the world are eligible to obtain the benefits of this legislation and, if not, which countries are deliberately excluded from the list of those importing goods under the terms of this act. I would also appreciate it if the minister could place on the record the main lines of commodities involved, together with the approximate valuation of each of these main lines of commodities and how many companies have taken advantage of this legislation.

It would also be interesting if the minister could give the house some indication of where these companies are located. For example, have any companies in British Columbia taken advantage of this measure? The last question I wish to ask is this. Can the minister tell us whether only capital goods are eligible under the terms of this act, or whether consumer goods can also be exported, payment being insured under this legislation?

We feel that in the main the act has worked to the benefit not only of Canadians but of other people in the world, and again I should like to commend the government for initiating this request for the large increase in the capital needed. The minister has already supplied us with statistics illustrating that the extra money is urgently required.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I rise in order to ask a question. I must admit that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has largely covered the ground I had intended to cover. I should like also to say I was much interested in the thorough and knowledgeable manner in which the hon. member for Ottawa West reviewed this legislation.

My question is this. We all know the activity and energy which the minister has shown since taking over this department, and I think we all know he has been very keen in regard to the question of aid to underdeveloped countries. I should like to ask him whether the restrictive tests, inevitable under this act, as to the capacity for repayment of the purchasing countries, will exercise a very restricting influence on the amounts of credit which will be available for the underdeveloped countries.

I do not intend to weary the house with my views regarding this subject, which I have expressed more than once, but I should like to remind hon. members that there are three arguments for aid. The first is humanitarian, the second is political—that is to say whether we want these countries, and let us say India, to slip into the communist field—and third, which is the argument we are now considering, our own economic interest in the matter. I have no doubt as to the desire of the minister, as I know he has done much already, but I should like to hear not only his detailed answer to the questions asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam but perhaps a broad reply to the whole question.

This is not a matter which interests us now; it has more or less been shoved under the rug, but I am just as convinced as I am that I stand here now that the time will come when hon. members of this house will realize that this is one of the most important questions which will face us.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. McGee in the chair.

On clause 1—Limit of liability under contracts.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I believe the minister is awaiting the arrival of his advisers. Perhaps we could just wait a moment or two, because I understood that the minister intended to reply in detail to the questions which have been asked.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, the list of the countries to which sales were made and insured during the past year appears in the annual report of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation issued December 31, 1960. The list of the countries and the amounts for which sales were insured appear at pages 12 and 13. I will be glad to send the hon. member this copy if he is not in possession of one, as the list is quite lengthy.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, because of public interest in this matter I wonder whether the committee might agree that the table be inserted in Hansard at this stage? I am sure that Hansard readers will be pleased to find it there.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I might say that this document was tabled in the house about six weeks ago. However, I shall be pleased to have this included in Hansard at this stage if the committee so desires.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that this table shall be printed in Hansard at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member also asked how many companies have used the facilities made available by this legislation. I am now in a position to inform him that there were 268 companies. Perhaps I should give the provinces and the number of commitments that were made in each: New Brunswick, 1; Nova Scotia, 1; Quebec, 124; Ontario, 133; Manitoba, 4; Saskatchewan, 1 and British Columbia, 4, making a total of 268.

In regard to the question asked as to whether all countries in the world are eligible for this type of consideration, the answer is yes. That answer will, of course, answer the question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood in respect to whether the provisions of this legislature are available to underdeveloped countries. I also have a list of the commodities and the amounts, cumulative to 1960, and should be very pleased to include this in Hansard at this point with the consent of the committee.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister has said cumulative amounts; does he mean the amounts for which insurance is still outstanding?

Mr. Hees: No, the amounts in the past and to date in respect of these types of commodities.

Mr. McIlraith: That is, since the act came into force?

Mr. Hees: Yes.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that this list be printed at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister whether it would be possible under this legislation to insure contracts which may be made under the arrangement with the Chinese government at Peking, providing the government decided to use this act? Is this act available for that purpose?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I am advised that there is no reason why this legislation could not be used for that purpose. Of course the reason it was impossible to do so, as I explained in my opening remarks, is that there is available at the present time, until this measure is passed, as I hope it will be, only $14 million for use. The Chinese deal would have required much more than that.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in respect to subsequent contracts which may be signed, based on this agreement with the government in Peking, this legislation, as the minister has said, could be used for insurance purposes. I take it if that were done then any orders in council dealing with the matter of insurance on contracts to the government at Peking would be made public?

Mr. Hees: If this legislation is used for insuring future deals the orders in council will then be made public, yes.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, as I understand the Chinese wheat agreement it includes the requirement of keeping available the amount of wheat required over the term required, and that there are specific contracts dealing with precise numbers of bushels to be shipped within precise periods. As I recall the very limited information given in regard to this matter there is only one of the small contracts signed to date, and it would be the payment under these small contracts that would be insured. If I am correct in that recollection, it is then open to the authorities to have the payments on these small contracts insured under this act. Is it the intention of the government to do that?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member will realize, sales of wheat to China do not come under my department but under the Department of Agriculture. As to what will be the policy of handling future deals, this is something that the government as a whole will decide.

Mr. McIlraith: There are two answers to that. I must remind the minister that he is still a member of the government, at least that is the last intimation we have had.

Mr. Hees: I said the government as a whole.

Mr. McIlraith: We do have collective responsibility for the ministers, I think. As far as the committee is concerned the minister must answer for the government. But there is also another point. He is the minister responsible for administering this act. In his capacity as the minister responsible for administering this act I would like him to get information for the committee on whether the contracts dealing with specific shipments of wheat to China will be insured or dealt with under this legislation.

Mr. Hees: I must remind the hon. member that the outstanding wheat deals with China were not carried out by my department but by the wheat board, which now comes under the Department of Agriculture. As to how any future deals will be handled, this is something for the government as a whole to decide. I am afraid I cannot advise the committee how such future deals will be handled.

Mr. McIlraith: I must point out to the minister the arrangement for dealing with this sale of wheat to China. There was what was called a contract by the Minister of Agriculture dealing with the requirement to make available a certain number of bushels, and certain general things of that sort. It was alleged by other hon. members in the house that that was not a contract. Whether it was or not I was never able to find out because it just has not been before the house, and there is no way of finding out. In any event, it did become quite clear that whatever the arrangement was, provisions as to the amount to be shipped and the price to be paid for it came under the smaller contracts that were to be dealt with from time to time; I think the time indicated by the minister was every five months.

My question is addressed to those smaller, specific contracts that have to do with the payment and the quantities. Of course it is at that point that the insurance arises, but surely the government must have taken a decision on the methods of insuring or dealing with the risk involved in a sale of this magnitude, and that must be a decision on government records by now. I ask the minister to get this information, because the committee is entitled to it and it is strictly relevant to the item now before us. I do not see any method by which the minister, with all his genial good nature, can escape that responsibility. It is a simple, direct responsibility, and it is a simple direct request from a member of the committee. It is proper information and it will be welcomed.

Mr. Hees: I acknowledge it is a simple, direct question, but I am afraid I am not in a position to answer it because all the details of the China wheat deal were handled by my colleague the Minister of Agriculture under whom the wheat board operates. I suggest to the hon. member that he satisfy his curiosity —a very understandable curiosity—about those deals by asking the Minister of Agriculture under whom they were carried out. They were not carried out by me or by my department, and I am afraid I am not in a position to answer the questions the hon. member has put to me.

Mr. McIlraith: I am very sorry. I can accept the minister's statement that he is not able to give us this information, but the situation is that I want to satisfy my curiosity about how this deal before us is to be administered before I can pass judgment on the propriety of the clause now before the committee. It is that curiosity that must be satisfied, and it must be satisfied by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Therefore I can only suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he obtain from the government the decision that is relevant to this particular legislation and advise the committee what it was. The other details of the wheat agreement, of course, I am not able to obtain at this time, or under this legislation, but this information I am entitled to obtain.

Mr. Hees: As far as the operation of this act is concerned, the insurance aspects of it will operate exactly the same as the insurance aspects have operated in the past. As regards these new provisions that we are introducing today, I should like to read from the booklet called "Export Credits Insurance Corporation, what it is and how it operates", put out by the Exports Credits Corporation. At page 15 we find the following:

> Financing for exports of capital goods where terms of payment extend beyond five years may be provided.

Then it goes on to say:

> The guiding rules that determine the eligibility of transactions for financing are:
> 1. that the extended credit terms are clearly necessary and justifiable;
> 2. that the transaction in question gives promise of continuing export trade;

3. that the Canadian content is of a higher order, in the range of 80 per cent or better;
4. that there are demonstrable employment and industrial benefits for Canada deriving from the transaction;
5. that the particular export transaction to be financed is substantial in value;
6. that the foreign buyer and the country of purchase have a satisfactory credit standing.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked me a question which I have not yet answered. His question was, are capital goods only eligible under this new legislation. The answer is yes; consumer goods are not covered under this new legislation.

Mr. McIlraith: The excerpt which the minister read from the booklet put out by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation deals with the provisions of section 21A of the act. We are now dealing with clause 1 which amends section 21, which is the insurance provision of the act. This is the clause under which all the wheat sales are insured. I could give the reference to some of the wheat sales, if it is desired, which are insured under section 21, which is the clause now before the committee. I do not think that is necessary. But if the minister will refer to order in council P.C. 1961/311, which was tabled on June 9, 1961, he will find that that insures the sale to Czechoslovakia of 200,000 tons of wheat valued at approximately $17 million. The excerpts the minister read from the booklet of the corporation have reference to the financing operations on capital goods which are governed by clause 2 of the bill before us and which have not yet been reached by the committee.

Mr. Hees: I can give the hon. member for Ottawa West the information he is asking for. Since the act first came into operation there have been total wheat sales of $188,446,819 insured. If he wishes I can give him a breakdown of the countries.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not require that.

Mr. Hees: These are the sales that have been insured since the coming into operation of the act and up to the present day. The sales to China have not yet been insured under this act.

Mr. Pearson: Will this legislation cover insurance of sales contracts for which payment is to be received by the Canadian exporter in a currency other than Canadian dollars?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman. We will insure in any convertible currency. Usually it is in Canadian dollars, United States dollars or sterling, but we will insure in any convertible currency.

Mr. Regier: What efforts are being made to let exporters in the Atlantic and western provinces know of the availability of the benefits of this legislation? The minister mentioned that 268 companies had taken advantage of the legislation. Almost all of them are located in either Quebec or Ontario. Is a sufficient effort being made to let the exporters in the Atlantic and western provinces, and British Columbia in particular, know of the availability of the benefits?

Mr. Hees: I am very glad to be able to answer that question. In order that businessmen in every part of the country should be made familiar with the services which the Department of Trade and Commerce puts at their disposal, we have already held trade and industrial promotion conferences in four of the provinces, three of them in western Canada—British Columbia, Alberta and Manitoba—and one in eastern Canada, in Ontario.

I have advised all the provincial governments that my department is not only willing but is very anxious to go to any province that requests us to do so and to hold one of these trade promotion conferences. A representative of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation is present at each conference. He outlines specifically to the businessmen what services are available through the Export Credits Insurance Corporation both with regard to insuring the sale of goods and with regard to making long term capital available. The representative is there not only to outline what we can do but to answer all questions.

I might say that at all these conferences a great many questions have been directed to the representative of the corporation, the president or the vice president, and a great deal of interest has been shown by the businessmen who have attended. We hope that every province will invite us to hold a conference in the latter part of the year, because we feel the information we are able to give and the information we are able to gain from the businessmen attending is very considerable. I can assure the hon. member that the conference held in Vancouver, where we met the businessmen of his own province of British Columbia, was very well attended and a great deal of interest was shown in the facilities made available by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation.

Mr. Regier: Have any conferences been held in the Atlantic provinces? Are any planned there? It would seem to me that area would perhaps find this type of assistance more beneficial than any other part of Canada.

Mr. Hees: Yes, I have received a request from the premier of Prince Edward Island and am in the process of discussing with that province a conference to be held there. We are hopeful that conferences will be held in the other Atlantic provinces as well. I agree with the hon. member that this kind of information would be most useful to businessmen in the Atlantic provinces, and we are very eager to give it.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister's records would enable him to answer this question, which would throw a great deal of light on the question I asked him earlier. Would the minister's records show how much has been exported to India under this legislation, let us say in the last five years? If it were possible to give it year by year, so much the better. If we could have a significant figure it would be of assistance.

Mr. Hees: My officials believe the figure is approximately $12 million to India to date, but we will check the exact figure and send it to the hon. member for Greenwood as soon as it is available.

Mr. Macdonnell: What period would that figure cover?

Mr. Hees: The period since the act came into force.

Mr. Regier: One last question, Mr. Chairman. Would the minister explain why consumer goods are not eligible under the terms of this legislation? It would appear to me that Canadian employment might be enhanced if consumer goods were also eligible.

Mr. Hees: Consumer goods are sold on short term credits, and these short term credits are handled by the commercial banks.

Mr. McIlraith: Is it not correct to say that consumer goods are eligible under the clause of the bill now before us?

Mr. Regier: Wheat is consumer goods.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the point I was making a moment ago. Consumer goods are insured under clause 1, which is section 21 of the act. The minister's answer had relevance to clause 2 of the bill, which is section 21A of the act and has to do with the discounting of paper. I wish to ask a question to clarify the question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood. In the 1960 annual report of the corporation it is indicated that at the end of the year the total amount of export credits insurance that had been granted in addition to contracts for shipment of goods to India was $503,000, roughly half a million dollars.

Mr. Macdonnell: For what period?

Mr. McIlraith: I take it, as of December 31, 1960.

Mr. Hees: Just for one year.

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, for one year. In connection with announcements in relation to Colombo plan shipments to India or Pakistan some reference was made to making credit available. Was that reference to making credit available under this act?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman. If this legislation is passed it is my understanding that $20 million of capital goods credit will be made available to India.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister could give me a better idea of what he had in mind when outlining the rules governing the application of this act. He mentioned that one of the qualifications was that the deal involved be of a substantial size. I believe those were the words used. Could the minister give us a clear idea what is meant in practice by the words "substantial size"?

Mr. Hees: In the order of a minimum of $2 million.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the point raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West the minister made reference to the $20 million additional credit extended to India under the arrangements made through a consortium to increase aid to India and Pakistan. That is all to the good, as far as it goes, but I wonder how far it goes in the light of the information we have just received about the operation of the legislation. If this additional aid is merely to cover ordinary commercial exports to India then it might not be as significant as we would like. Last year we had only half a million dollars worth of commercial exports to India, and I take it they would have been covered under the existing act.

In the light of what I have said is it not fair to say that this additional $20 million credit may not result in any great additional aid to India? I know the dilemma in this matter. Once you get into the position where most of your transactions with an underdeveloped country take the form of aid under an international scheme like the Colombo plan, that has a bearing on the development of commercial trade with that country because naturally the country would like to get the commodities under an assistance scheme if that can be done. Would it not be correct to say, therefore, that unless there is a very great increase in commercial exports to a country like India, then the $20 million capital goods credit may not mean as much in terms of assistance as all of us would like to see it mean?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that we are very anxious to sell capital goods as well as goods of all other kinds to India and to every other country. If India wishes to buy capital goods from us in the amount of $20 million, or a larger amount, I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that I will be the happiest person in the world. I will take great pleasure in coming to parliament again as soon as possible and asking for more money to enlarge the scope of this act, which I think is one of the most constructive acts we have on the statute books. It helps not only the countries to whom we export but it helps our manufacturing and producing industries in Canada to sell goods around the world.

We, of course, all agree that we want to expand our exports of every kind. It is now up to India to decide what capital goods she would like to buy in Canada, and we shall be very happy indeed to extend long term credits certainly up to $20 million. If it is more than that, or if any country wishes to buy large quantities of goods and it is considered creditworthy, I will have no hesitation in going to the government and coming to parliament and asking for more money in order to finance such transactions.

Mr. Pearson: I agree entirely with what the minister has said about the value of this act. Of course there is no difference between us on that score. I agree that anything that can be done, as is being done now, to improve this act should receive, as it will, general support. All I am suggesting is that this particular form of asistance to India is an assistance in terms of easier credit so that India can purchase goods in Canada.

Mr. Hees: That is right.

Mr. Pearson: It is not, as it was interpreted in some quarters when the announcement was made, another $20 million worth of aid to India. That is the only point I was trying to make.

Mr. Hees: We consider it in that category. It is in effect aid to India. There may be a difference of opinion there.

Mr. McGee: The $2 million limitation on the size of a proposition which is acceptable under this act leads me to ask this question. In the minister's travels to various trade conferences and groups across the country in recent months has he encountered any requests from the business community that this limit of $2 million be lowered in certain cases? It seems to me that a situation could arise in which, following the minister's enthusiastic urgings, people not previously vitally interested in exporting to certain areas might be interested in a trial proposition which may in the future lead to some very interesting increases in exports. I am wondering whether the application of this $2 million limitation would be so stringent as to restrict a proposition of that kind.

Mr. Hees: We have had no requests, I am advised, for long term financing, which is in access of five years, for amounts less than $2 million, to answer the hon. member's question. Smaller transactions are made but they are handled on a shorter term basis, that is up to five years. We handle a great many of those transactions, of course. Here we are talking about long term transactions for relatively large amounts.

Mr. Speakman: I should like to ask the minister whether other commonwealth countries are contemplated in respect of assistance under this special provision. I am thinking particularly of those nations in Africa which are now commonwealth members or dependencies, which are so dependent upon agriculture and are carrying on this agriculture under very primitive conditions. Their requirement is extremely great, and this would be an excellent way to provide for more modern and up-to-date equipment so they could feed themselves far better with the use of more modern methods and equipment.

Mr. Hees: We are very happy to look at any requests from any country whatsoever in order to ascertain whether they meet the criteria under which we are permitted to make these transactions.

Mr. McIlraith: What is new about it is that the technique of calling insuring under this act "aid" is a new use of the language. That is really what bothers a great many people. We have announcements of aid, and mixed with the aid given to these countries and listed with it is the provision of insurance under this legislation. Formerly these countries were using the legislation but it was not called aid. For instance, if you look at the annual report you will see mentioned such countries as Rhodesia and Nyasaland. I am quite sure that was not called aid in this house. You will also see British East Africa and British West Africa, but it was not called aid. The new technique of referring to the provision of insurance under this act as aid is something that is quite new—I think it was adopted for the first time this year—in terminology, and having the amounts which they in fact pay but which are insured under this act added to the totals of what are really gifts to the countries. That is the new thing that has been done that is apparently causing confusion. I thought all hon. members in the house had spotted that when the announcement was made.

Mr. Hees: I have not at any time referred to insurance as aid or short term financing as aid.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister did not do so.

Mr. Hees: However, I have been referring to long term financing as aid.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister did not do so. I must exempt him from that. However, there still is such a thing as cabinet solidarity. I must say that I find it rather perplexing this morning to see the minister not being answerable for his colleague the Minister of Agriculture and now not being answerable for the one who makes these announcements about the aid we are granting to all these countries and which, when you look at it or read the statement, you find is not really what it appears to be.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. McIlraith: On clause 2 there was a question to which I made reference a few minutes ago. Yesterday in moving the motion for second reading the minister said this. I think perhaps I should quote him precisely. In referring to section 21A he made certain references that appear to be in conflict with similar references made at the resolution stage on the same point. Perhaps he could given an explanation.

Mr. Hees: At the time my remarks were written for the resolution stage the $58 million figure was correct. Since that time $10 million have expired, as they were not used.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Orders to be laid before parliament.

Mr. McIlraith: In the opening part of his remarks in moving second reading yesterday the minister was good enough to indicate that he proposed withdrawing clause 3 of the bill and substituting another one.

Mr. Hees: It is in there now.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, the minister says it is in there now?

Mr. Hees: I am as surprised as the hon. member. The change is already incorporated in the bill.

Mr. McIlraith: I see it now.

Mr. Hees: That gives an example of the kind of action you are getting from this government.

Mr. McIlraith: I must apologize to the committee. However, I must explain that last night we were provided with a copy of the bill on first reading and now, since 11 o'clock, we have obtained the copy of the bill for second reading and it contains the clause which I think is wholly desirable. I must say that I find it very difficult being expected to deal with these bills the day after they are first introduced in the house and when they are not printed until the day on which you have to deal with them; it does get a little bit rough. In any event, I commend the minister for putting the changed clause in the bill. I should like an opportunity to read it. I think the committee will see the importance of this clause and will see, when they read it, the desirability of having such contracts as those which are provided under the China wheat agreement brought under this act. The type of order in council that is tabled under section 21 has to do with all these very important transactions relating to major sales of wheat, aircraft, heavy equipment and so on, and they are very important in relation to the members of the House of Commons.

I am still a little confused about this. The copy of the bill with which I was provided after the committee started dealing with it this morning does not contain the new clause 21B.

Mr. Hees: That is right.

Mr. McIlraith: It is therefore not in accordance with the undertaking of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I will ask my colleague the Minister of Transport to read the amendment to clause 3.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I move that clause 3, which relates to section 21B, be deleted and replaced by a new section 21B which reads as follows:

21B. All orders in council made under sections 21 and 21A while parliament is in session shall be laid before parliament during such session within 30 days of the date of their making and, if made while parliament is not in session, shall be laid before parliament within 30 days after the commencement of the next ensuing session.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, am I correct in understanding that all orders in council which have already been passed under sections 21 and 21A have been tabled?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am advised that is correct.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 as amended carry?

Clause as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO RATES ON RAPESEED

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-111, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the house would be agreeable to calling it one o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that I call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Balcer: The purpose of this bill is to apply to rapeseed the railway freight rates applicable to flaxseed under the Crowsnest pass agreement. At the present time subsections 6 and 7 of section 328 of the Railway Act read as follows:

(6) Notwithstanding anything in subsection (5), rates on grain and flour shall, on and from the twenty-seventh day of June, 1925, be governed by the provisions of the agreement made pursuant to chapter 5 of the statutes of Canada 1897, but such rates shall apply to all such traffic moving from all points on all lines of railway west of Fort William to Fort William or Port Arthur over all lines now or hereafter constructed by any company subject to the jurisdiction of parliament.

(7) The board shall not excuse any charge of unjust discrimination, whether practised against shippers, consignees, or localities or of undue or unreasonable preference respecting rates on grain and flour governed by the provisions of chapter 5 of the statutes of Canada 1897 and by the agreement made or entered into pursuant thereto within the territory referred to in subsection (6) on the ground that such discrimination or preference is justified or required by the said act or by the agreement made or entered into pursuant thereto.

Those two subsections set out the principles of the Crowsnest pass freight rate legislation. As the house knows, these rates have been in existence since 1897. At that time rapeseed was not listed, and it was not considered a grain because it was practically unknown, or at any rate it was not grown on the prairies. However, at the present time rapeseed is an important oilseed grain in western Canada. If hon. members would look at the figures they will see that they are very impressive. In 1960, 550,000 acres were seeded to this crop in Saskatchewan, 170,000 acres in Alberta and 36,000 acres in Manitoba.

Under the provisions of subsections 6 and 7 of section 328 of the Railway Act the rates on grain and flour from points west of Fort William and Port Arthur to those ports and to the Pacific coast are required to be governed by the provisions of the Crowsnest pass agreement.

Rapeseed is recognized as a grain within the accepted definition of that term and is classified as a grain under the Canada Grain Act. It has not, however, been recognized as a grain for the purpose of freight rates pursuant to the Crowsnest pass agreement.

On June 10, 1960 the board of transport commissioners rejected an application to have rapeseed classified as a grain under the Crowsnest pass agreement, but the board did not question that rapeseed was, in fact, a grain. Its ruling was based on the fact that rapeseed was not grown as a grain in western Canada at the time the Crowsnest pass agreement was reached. The purpose of the present bill is not to place rapeseed within the terms of the Crowsnest pass agreement but to apply to rapeseed the same rates as are applicable to flaxseed under the Crownest pass agreement.

The amendment provided by the present bill will add a new subsection 8 to section 328 of the Railway Act to provide that the reference to "grain" in subsections 6 and 7 shall include rapeseed, and that the rates applicable to rapeseed shall not exceed those applicable to flaxseed.

I think the effect of this legislation will be to make the growing of rapeseed more attractive to the farmers of western Canada and provide them with the possibility of an interesting return for the rapeseed grown. The great advantage of this will be that rapeseed will take the place, to a greater extent, of other cereals grown on the prairies, and this will have a tendency to reduce the acreage of cereal grains whose disposal is now presenting a considerable problem. The provision and consumption of domestic oil and meal should also assist the Canadian economy in a general way by reducing the volume of imports from other countries. Another effect of this reduction of freight rates on rapeseed will be, I think, to make it possible for this cereal to be sold as animal feed at a price attractive enough to realize a good market for this product.

As a member coming from the province of Quebec I think I have extended my knowledge of the grain situation on the prairies, and I hope my friends from that region have not detected too many bad errors in what I have said. I know the whole situation will be extremely well explained by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp), who has been carrying on a tremendous campaign for the recognition of the importance of this grain ever since he has been in this house. I know this conscientious member will discuss this matter at some length, and

I should like to take the opportunity of congratulating him for his continuous backing of this important legislation. I think the farmers of Canada as a whole should be very proud in knowing that an hon. member who is wholeheartedly in support of a piece of legislation such as this can, by continuous effort, sell his idea to his colleagues in the house and accomplish the passage of that legislation, thereby rendering great service to the country and to his farmer friends on the prairie.

Mr. Speaker, I should also like to point out that later I will have one of my colleagues move an amendment to this bill adding the date upon which this legislation will come into effect. The intention of that amendment is to see that this measure will come into force on the 1st day of August, 1961, which is the beginning of the new crop year. This will give to our farmers in western Canada the opportunity of taking advantage of this piece of legislation.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a question in regard to a remark he made. The minister said rapeseed is used to feed animals, and I should like him to tell me what animals eat rapeseed.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I should like to explain to my hon. friend just what I meant. I received a letter regarding this matter from the edible oil division of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, which, as my hon. friend will know, operates a plant manufacturing products from rapeseed in the form of edible oils. These edible oils are used in the manufacture of animal feed because of the high content of protein which is extremely beneficial to beef cattle. This type of animal feed is manufactured for shipment to eastern Canada and British Columbia. The importance of rapeseed lies in the fact that it contains this extremely beneficial edible oil, and with the increase in consumption and sale of margarine in Canada, the increased production of rapeseed will add to the general economy through the lowering of our imports of this product.

Mr. Lennard: That was not so smart a question to ask after all.

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, after the statement the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer) has just made, I only wish to add a few words in support of the bill now before us. In fact, we have always been in favour of a measure such as this, and we are pleased to support the request of the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Rapp).

[Mr. Balcer.]

Ever since he came to this house, the hon. member has always advocated that freight rates applicable to flaxseed should also apply to rapeseed. We commend him for it and we can say that the tenacity he has shown in introducing this legislation has now produced concrete results.

In rising today to deal with this legislation, I should like to say that we endorse this measure because it will be particularly welcomed by Canadian farmers, and especially western farmers. It will contribute to increase the income of farmers and of rapeseed producers.

I should like to point out to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) in passing that we never opposed bills introduced in the house for the benefit of western farmers. In fact, I am taking part in this debate today to support the bill and to prove in a special way to the Minister of Agriculture, that we are never against bills which are profitable to the western farmers. Both the eastern and the western farmers are in need of measures which will protect their income and especially the family farm.

Those are the only remarks I wanted to make. I wish to congratulate the Minister of Transport for having introduced this bill which we wholeheartedly support.

(Text):

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased that the government has seen fit to introduce this bill, but we think it is long overdue. We feel the result it will have will be equality of treatment, as far as freight rates are concerned, to the producers of rapeseed.

This subject is not new in this house but has been discussed by members of parliament on many occasions in recent years. The former member for Humboldt-Melfort, Mr. Alexander Bryson, pioneered in this field, as hon. members who were here at that time I am sure will recall. I remember that very often when Mr. Bryson raised questions in regard to rape in this house many hon. members snickered because they were not certain just what he was referring to. However, the question of rape or rapeseed has been raised in this house on many occasions, along with requests that freight rates be applied to rapeseed in the same manner as applied to other grain under the Crowsnest pass agreement.

The bill now before the house has been brought in following requisitions made by farm organizations of this country which have recognized the present injustice as well as the growing importance of rapeseed within the agriculture industry. I should also like to say that on many occasions the present member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale—perhaps one day this riding will also include the name of Wadena—has presented a good case for this kind of adjustment in the freight rate regarding rapeseed, and we are pleased at this time that the bill is being given support by all sides of the house. I also want to congratulate the minister on his wide knowledge of this subject and on the informative manner in which he handled the introduction of this bill, and particularly on his comprehensive answer to the question posed by the hon. member for Kootenay West.

During this session the minister has been extending his knowledge into many fields and we appreciate the comprehensiveness of his remarks when he pointed out so well that while this will be of particular benefit to the producers of western Canada, none the less it will be of national benefit as well. It will be a potential benefit to livestock feeders outside the prairie provinces. While it is a small contribution to the over-all problem, it should at least in a minor way reduce our great dependence on imports of commodities from the United States. Therefore on all counts it is a measure which should commend itself to the house at this time.

It is particularly gratifying to me, Mr. Speaker, since it runs against the propaganda directed against the Crowsnest rates in recent years. The enemies of the Crowsnest rates have been attempting to destroy them. Far from being successful, we have an indication today that parliament is going to reaffirm those rates by providing their necessary and justifiable extension to rapeseed. With the passage of this legislation not only the rapeseed producers but western producers generally will take satisfaction from the fact that parliament is reaffirming and strengthening the argument in favour of the Crowsnest rates.

I do not think it would be appropriate for me to have the complete text of my remarks consist of approbation and compliments. I think I should make some constructive suggestions to the minister. The question of rapeseed is very important in many parts of western Canada, including the constituency of the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale. Maybe he could get those three communities to agree to use just the initials from now on; if we could do so we might shorten the duration of the session. This, of course, could apply to the names of a great many constituencies in the house.

Rapeseed is important in the hon. member's riding and in a great many other constituencies. In the important and well known constituency of Assiniboia, where there are producers as efficient as producers in other ridings, we are getting into the production of another grain that in the days ahead may have a real economic importance. I refer to the production of mustard seed. A great many farmers in that particular part of Saskatchewan sowed mustard this spring on a contract basis. Therefore it would be most appropriate if the minister would give the same kind of sympathetic consideration toward extending the rates to mustard seed that apply to rapeseed. I should think it would get the general approval of the house in the same way this bill is getting the approval of hon. members.

Western farmers have been advised to diversify their crops. They have never been short of advice, and they have never minded taking it so long as they could see some economic advantage in accepting it. The production of rapeseed will undoubtedly have increasing importance in the years ahead. I suggest that to further stimulate the diversification of crops on the prairies and to bring about equality of treatment in the freight rates applying to the various grains the minister should give consideration to the suggestion I make, so that the producers of mustard seed in my part of Canada will have the same well deserved advantages under the Crowsnest pass rates now to be enjoyed by the producers of rapeseed.

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted, and it gives me a great deal of pleasure, to support the proposed amendment to the Railway Act to apply to rapeseed the rates applicable to flaxseed by virtue of the Crowsnest pass agreement.

My first words should be to congratulate the Minister of Transport on bringing in this timely and very important bill so far as the western grain producers are concerned. I would also be remiss in my duties were I not anxious to give credit to those who have played such an important role in this historic event for our agricultural industry. I know only too well that had it not been for the keen interest of our Prime Minister in the welfare of agriculture and in particular his keen interest in the rapeseed producers, this legislation would never have come in. If it had not been for the hard working Minister of Agriculture, who has done everything possible to put agriculture on a sound economic basis, and if it had not been for the sympathetic understanding of the cabinet, this historic event would never have occurred.

Much credit must also go to my good friend the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). This learned gentleman, together with the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams), so ably presented the rapeseed case before the board of transport commissioners it is my belief that this actually laid the foundation for having rapeseed classified by the board of transport commissioners as a grain. The decision of the board was unanimous. All these contributions were really important and instrumental in bringing in this bill. I would be remiss if I did not mention also the members from the three western provinces who appeared before the board of transport commissioners as witnesses and were anxious to take the witness stand and give evidence to the effect that rapeseed is a grain.

This is the day for which the rapeseed producers have been waiting for 18 years. This is the day when justice has been rendered after a long and relentless struggle by the western farmers to bring rapeseed under the Crowsnest pass agreement. This is the day when the name of John G. Diefenbaker will be inscribed in the hearts of the western farmers. Whatever else will be said, credit must go to the Prime Minister and the members of the treasury benches because they were the ones who brought about this legislation.

Let me also say, Mr. Speaker, that I would be less than fair were I not also to give credit to the opposition. Ever since I have had the opportunity of speaking in this house as a member of parliament on behalf of the rapeseed producers, of whom I have many in my constituency, the opposition have always supported me wholeheartedly in my presentations and have given me much appreciated assistance. They never disappointed me in this respect.

It would appear as though I knew this in advance, because if one refers to my maiden speech in this house on May 26, 1958 one finds that I expressed the following opinion of the opposition. Let me quote what I said at that time. After congratulating the Prime Minister on his overwhelming victory I said as recorded on page 477 of Hansard:

> My heartiest congratulations go also to the ministers of the cabinet, to members of our party both senior and junior, and to all hon. members of either parties, too, who are here to serve Canada in whatever capacity they may be called upon to do so. We who are conscious of the merits of our democratic system will appreciate very much their constructive contributions so that we can all serve the Canadian people in this parliament to the best of our ability.

It has been very gratifying to me to find that the opposition has not disappointed me in this respect. I know my rapeseed producers in the west would want me to say these things about our cabinet, our Prime Minister and our opposition.

Before I deal with the bill itself I should like to let you, Mr. Speaker, into a well concealed secret. It concerns a person by the name of Mr. Rapeseed, who is a good friend of mine of long standing. He was born and raised in the west. I could almost say that we grew up together in the prairie provinces. My friendship with Mr. Rapeseed is a long and intimate one. When I was elected to this house in 1958 Mr. Rapeseed told me that he was going to come down to Ottawa and sit beside me in the House of Commons. Of course I told him this was impossible; after all, only elected members are allowed to be in the House of Commons. However, he insisted and he assured me that he would remain invisible, thus doing me no harm.

After following me to Ottawa he followed me in the corridors and every place I went, constantly whispering in my ear "Don't forget to mention Mr. Rapeseed". He would come and sit beside me in the house. Every time I rose to speak he would whisper in my ear "Don't forget to mention Mr. Rapeseed". Being a good friend of mine, I had no alternative but to follow his advice. He even followed me into the caucus. Of course, Mr. Speaker, you do not expect that I would reveal anything that occurred in that holy place, except to say that he was very bold and he was very insistent that I mention his name continually. He was with me when I visited the ministers' offices. He would not miss, for anything, my visits to the Prime Minister. He really enjoyed those. He always sat beside me and said "Don't forget to mention Mr. Rapeseed".

On the last of such visits he insisted that I take a picture of the Prime Minister, myself and Mr. Rapeseed. Again, because he was a good friend of mine, I did take a picture. He was bold enough, too, to insist that I take a picture of the Minister of Agriculture, who he said was a very good friend of his of long standing. This picture turned out not too badly. Once he conceived the idea that a picture would serve him well and help him advertise his name, he became so bold as to suggest that pictures of Mr. Rapeseed and myself should be sent to every member of parliament, every member of the Senate and the members of the press gallery. If anyone wants to see a picture of Mr. Rapeseed, together with his biography, I shall be very pleased to show them. I received many replies to this document from the members of the other place, even from Mr. Speaker, who was very pleased to meet Mr. Rapeseed.

But something happened here today. When I came down to the House of Commons he stopped me again and said, "Mr. Rapp, I am very sorry but this is going to be my last trip to the house. I am a native of the prairie provinces, and I must go back to the place where I belong." Then he said, "Of course, times have changed now; I can travel much cheaper on the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways. I shall take advantage of that and go back to my own province."

He asked me what I would like him to say when he gets back to the prairie provinces. I told him that he should help the Canadian grain producers to reduce their acreages of wheat and be a good friend. This is the story of Mr. Rapeseed.

Now, speaking to the bill itself, I find that I have a good deal of material prepared on the subject of rapeseed. In looking over my files and in looking over the many speeches I have made here on the subject, I discovered that there is not one thing I have not said about rapeseed. Since there are so many of my good friends from Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and I am sure some members of the opposition, who would like the opportunity to speak on this subject today, I thought it would be a waste of time to give you some of my old, warmed over speeches on rapeseed to which you have listened during the last three and a half years. I thought I should give other hon. members the opportunity to tell you the story of rapeseed. They are just as interested in the subject as I am, although in my constituency, as the hon. member for Assiniboia said, more rapeseed is grown than in any other place in western Canada.

I know that rapeseed has a great future. It will serve our purpose well, that is to take acreage out of wheat production. There is a tremendous export market available for rapeseed, especially if we take into consideration countries like China and India which produce only 15 million to 18 million acres of rapeseed. These countries cannot even begin to grow enough rapeseed to take care of the requirements of their populations for edible oils. We are now on the list as an exporter of wheat to China. I am looking forward to the time when this country will be able to supply China, India and Japan with much needed edible oilseeds so they will have enough edible fats to meet the needs of their populations. This is where the future of rapeseed lies.

We have never exported less than 90 per cent to 95 per cent of our rapeseed production. Since 1943, when I started producing it, I have never seen a time when we had to store on the farm one pound of rapeseed. We could take it away right from the combine to the elevator and sell it. It is all sold on the export market.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that I do not wish to go into this story of rapeseed now. However, it is my pet subject and if I start talking about rapeseed I might be filibustering the bill. I think I had better leave to other hon. members the story of rapeseed.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this bill along the lines indicated by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska. In doing so, of course, I join with him and others in extending to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken our congratulations on the realization that now confronts the house. I am sure the hon. gentleman will realize the fact that he has not been alone in this effort; he in fact has done so. He has paid tribute, naturally, to his own colleagues who have supported him but, I think quite generously and characteristically of him, he has acknowledged the debt he owes to members of the opposition who have given him support in this matter.

Mr. Ricard: The hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should not wish to be accused of being falsely modest if I did not note that I myself, over the course of the last two or three sessions, gave what I would hope was valuable support to the hon. member. I gave that support on the merits of the question and also because, I, like other hon. members in this house, find that the hon. gentleman is a man who deserves support in good causes.

I have told him privately and I repeat publicly that I will never forget his first speech in this house, when he said he stood in front of the monument of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and said to himself that, as an immigrant, he was proud of the fact that he was privileged to live in a free country in which a man born with his antecedents and in his particular circumstances was able to become a representative of the people in this parliament. That speech and the hon. member's conduct since then have won him many friends in this house. They are happy to support him today.

I was about to remark that when he stood in front of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's monument he possibly confessed some matters that he would not find it convenient to pubicly acknowledge in this house at the present time. I have always suspected that the hon. gentleman, while a member of the Conservative party, really was a misfit in that party. He obviously belongs to the Liberal party. No one could have his qualities and belong to any other party. I am glad that the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot agrees with what I have said.

Mr. Martineau: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Certainly, in this very happy mood; in this pre-election, pre-budget mood.

Mr. Martineau: I should just like to know whether the hon. member had ever heard of rapeseed before the advent to this house of the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman asks me an understandable question. However, if he knew the kind of county from which I come, namely the county of Essex where we grow soya beans, and if he understood the relationship between that oil bearing product and rapeseed, he would not have humiliated himself by asking that question.

What I was going on to say was that this bill now before the house, which was given first reading on June 17, followed the introduction of another bill, namely Bill No. C-90, on May 10 by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale. I have been looking at that bill as I listened to the Minister of Transport explain the provisions of Bill No. C-111. I cannot understand why the government did not accept the bill of the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale. In the first place it was the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale and not the government who took the initiative in this matter. He having taken that initiative, I think he should have been accorded the honour of having his bill accepted and not one put forward in the name of the Minister of Transport.

I am not so sure that Bill No. C-111 is as good a bill as Bill No. C-90, notwithstanding the fact that they both deal with the same principle, namely to apply to rapeseed the freight rates on flaxseed that are applicable under the Crowsnest pass agreement. However, I suppose the government has reasons of its own for wanting to put forward bills which were first of all thought of and thought about by private members. Notwithstanding all of this, the Minister of Transport has recognized the contribution of the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale.

As this is a day when we are trying, before the introduction of the budget, to treat one another with great fairness, I think we ought to recognize the fact that the hon. member for Assiniboia, who comes from western Canada, has put forward a proposal by way of an amendment to include mustard seed. Mustard seed is grown in very considerable quantities in the riding of Assiniboia as well as in other parts of Canada, and there are about the growing of mustard seed potential features that give it much of the hopefulness that attends the growing of rapeseed. I should like to see mustard seed included so as to assist the constituents of the hon. gentleman and the people of Saskatchewan generally. When the hon. member for Assiniboia returns to his constituency I know he will remind his constituents of the great support received this day by him from members of the Liberal party, who sought to join with him in the amendment which he has put forward on behalf of his constituents.

Mr. Argue: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Having said so much about rapeseed and so much about mustard seed, may I say a word about something which might well have been included in this bill, which is found in very considerable quantity in my own county of Essex and, which means so much to the farmers there. Soya beans, about which I have spoken on many occasions in this house with discernment, appreciation, conviction, and understanding are a matter of considerable importance to rapeseed because, as I say, they are both oil bearing. Whatever happens to rapeseed can have important consequences for the growing of soya beans. This bill undoubtedly is going to give an advantage to the rapeseed growers. It is going to give them an advantage in the freight rate structure that prevails in this country. I am sure we all appreciated the observations of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska who said that those of us who come from eastern Canada are not on that account less appreciative of the problems that attend the western farmer; and perforce I would suggest that we may assume that all hon. members of this house are not less interested in the problems of eastern agriculture.

In my own county we are awaiting with great anxiety the further volumes of the report of the MacPherson royal commission. I do not know whether that commission is going to deal with the freight rate structure that attends the very special situations in Canada, but if there is justification by way of an act of parliament to provide the safeguard properly contained in this Bill No. C-111, one could with justification argue that there should be safeguards and measures to protect farmers in other parts of Canada who find they are discriminated against in the existing freight rate structure.

When you consider, Mr. Speaker, that it is cheaper to ship corn from the city of Chicago to the city of Montreal than it is from Windsor to Montreal, you realize of course that we have a legitimate complaint with regard to the freight rates that prevail in our area in so far as they apply, inter alia, to farm products. I would hope that in giving the support we give willingly to the hon. member we can ask him, in the dying days of the life of this government, to persuade the latter to take steps, if they are not provided in the MacPherson report, to deal with the discriminatory freight rate structure that exists in southwestern Ontario, which freight rate structure suffers in comparison with freight rates that prevail in the Toronto area. That great distributing centre has advantages in freight rates that are not available to areas such as Windsor, Sarnia, Chatham, London and the rural districts in that whole area. If there is justification, as I believe there is, for the step we are taking today, there is likewise justification for the royal commission, and if not the royal commission for parliament, to take steps along the lines taken today by the Minister of Transport to relieve freight rate discrimination in my county.

I say to the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale that we are glad to help him in this particular. We also express our congratulations to him. We acknowledge his indebtedness, which he has mentioned today, to those of us in the opposition who have assisted him in this battle over the course of the last three years. We now ask him to use his obvious and undoubted influence with the Prime Minister—his idol; the man about whom he spoke so glowingly and so feelingly today—and to urge this further step upon the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture, who sits there so serenely today listening to us. I am sure that if he brings the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture together he will have no difficulty in persuading the Minister of Transport that not only the rapeseed grower in western Canada but the corn grower and the soybean grower in Essex county deserve similar consideration.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I think it is the practice in this house, when an hon. member has been to some extent concerned as counsel in any matter of litigation, to so declare it to the house at the time he speaks in support of a certain measure. As was mentioned by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale, I had the privilege of appearing as counsel in the case he mentioned before the board of transport commissioners. Leave to appeal having been granted by the Supreme Court of Canada, the case was subsequently appealed and that is how the matter now rests.

In taking this case, of course, my primary consideration was the farmers of western Canada. If the house will bear with me, it is interesting to notice that on the order paper today as item No. 10 there appears a resolution dealing with the Pine Point railway. It was in my capacity as counsel for the associated boards of trade of the area seeking material to present before the commission inquiring into this route that I first became interested in this subject. This ultimately led to a course of action following which I undertook the presentation of the case before the board of transport commissioners.

I am sorry the hon. member for Essex East has left temporarily. I was going to give him some advice. The hon. member mentioned the problems in his area relative to soybeans. The hon. member for Assiniboia mentioned his difficulty with regard to mustard seed. It seems to me they will never have a better opportunity of obtaining advice on these matters. They have been sitting at the feet of the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale who has had this happy consummation of his efforts of the last three or four years. Surely they should have learned from him the way and the means by which they can achieve their objectives.

The persuasive and eloquent logic of the hon. member has led to this result, and I hope the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Essex East have learned from his example how they can best achieve the results they are seeking, that is a better freight rate arrangement in respect of mustard seed and soybean. I am sure the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale will be only too glad to give the assistance, information and method of procedure which he has followed so very successfully.

I am going to deal very briefly with certain aspects of this matter in the hope that my remarks may be of interest to the house and will support, if support be necessary—which does not seem likely—the reasons behind this legislation.

The Crowsnest pass rates originally, as the minister said, were introduced under an agreement and enabling legislation in 1897. The word "grain" was used as indicating the object of the benefits of a lower freight rate, but for some reason grain was not defined. The legislation provided that there should be a reduction by a total of three cents in the then existing rate on grain carried to Fort William-Port Arthur. The three cents was to be arrived at by making two yearly successive decreases in the amount of 1½ cents each year.

Immediately after that legislation was enacted the railways applied this decreased freight rate to wheat, oats, barley and rye. A short time later they added flax. However, flax never received the full three cents decrease; it only received a decrease of 1½ cents. I mention this because hon. members will observe that the bill in question refers to rapeseed being carried at the same rate as flaxseed.

That situation persisted for some time. Ultimately, by means of orders of the board of transport commissioners, by virtue of voluntary actions on the part of the board of transport commissioners, by virtue of the passage of the 1925 amendment to the Railway Act which contains the lineal descendant of the original Crowsnest pass statute of agreement, the lower freight rates were made applicable to all railway lines and to the carriage of this grain both to the western ports and to the eastern ports at the great lakes.

However, the railway companies refused at that time to acknowledge that flax was a grain. Consequently, while flax was carried at the reduced rate to the eastern ports, it was not carried at the reduced rate to the province of British Columbia. In the result, in 1955 the Vancouver board of trade made application to the board of transport commissioners to have flax declared to be a grain within the meaning of the word "grain" in the Railway Act.

This action was ultimately successful and two years later, in 1957, a similar application was made in respect of rapeseed. The application at that time was for a declaration that rapeseed was being carried at a rate which was discriminatory and unfair. In the result the application was dismissed. The proceedings which were undertaken in 1959 stemmed from that. May I say by way of advice to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) that the co-operation and assistance given to myself and to my colleague from Bow River was tremendous. There were 14 members of parliament sufficiently concerned about this matter to attend the hearing prepared to give evidence as witnesses in this application to have rapeseed declared a grain. They tore themselves away even in the sure knowledge that the hon. member for Essex East was speaking that day. In spite of that they went over to the court room for the hearing. This is an example of what happens when you have a group of determined, informed and vigorous members of parliament who are greatly concerned with the welfare of the people they represent and are prepared to go to considerable lengths to support what they think is proper and logical.

In any event, as the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp) has said, the application was dismissed by three to two and an appeal was taken. May I say that there is an issue involved here which makes it much better that this matter should be dealt with by legislation rather than by litigation. If the supreme court had made a declaration in respect of this application that the rates at which the railway companies carried rapeseed should have been the Crowsnest pass rates, that would have been tantamount to a declaration that the rates at which they had been carrying it in the past were illegal and in contravention of the terms of the Railway Act. This might well have led to a mass of litigation by growers and shippers directed against the railway companies with respect to the recovery of what might have been contended to be the excess charge over and above the Crowsnest pass rates. Consequently I think it is right and proper that this bill should contain a provision that it has no retroactive effect. I think that is explanatory of the circumstances of the bill.

Before I resume my seat I should like to give, briefly, some statistical information to illustrate the tremendously important place which this commodity now occupies in our agricultural and economic life. I have here a pamphlet put out by the United States department of agriculture, the foreign agriculture circular dated January, 1961. World production of rapeseed in 1960 is estimated as being approximately four million short tons. General world production over the period of four or five years has been of this order. Our own production for 1960 is estimated at 275,000 short tons, approximately 6½ per cent of the total. In the year before, Canada's production was 89,000 short tons, or approximately 2½ per cent. I think it is significant that we have managed to maintain since 1957 a substantial export balance, so far as rapeseed is concerned, in the light of this information. The figures with regard to Asia are astonishing. Mainland China grows approximately 1,100,000 tons; India grows 1,161,000 tons; Japan grows approximately 300,000 tons, and Pakistan 370,000 tons. These are the figures for last year. Canada, which is the fifth largest producer, has exported a quantity which is greater than the amount exported by all the other countries combined. The last year for which I have comparative statistics is 1959. Total world exports amounted to 216,000 tons of which Canada alone exported 112,000 tons. Exports this year will be even greater.

In the light of these figures I want to say that this bill, which I think will have the effect of increasing the return to farmers by approximately half a cent a pound, will greatly influence our farmers in continuing to produce this commodity efficiently. Rapeseed is a cash crop in the sense that it is not subject to a quota. The farmer gets cash for it at harvest time, when he needs it most. There is usually no difficulty in disposing of the crop. It is a crop which does not give a large net return; its value lies in the fact that it brings a cash return, and this half cent a pound more can make all the difference between a small profit and a small loss.

Consequently, having in mind that there is a great future as far as exports are concerned, as hon. members will realize from the figures I have just given, and having in mind also that the officials of the Department of Agriculture together with private entrepreneurs in western Canada have now established a fairly satisfactory domestic market, I think this bill deserves the support of all members of this house and of all the people of this country.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention to speak on this piece of legislation, but after listening to some of my colleagues, I thought I should put in a few words, first to pay a well deserved tribute to one of those responsible for the production of that fodder seed in Manitoba.

When we discussed the estimates of the Department of Agriculture on March 16, 1961, I mentioned that a businessman from Montreal, Mr. Gattuso, whose industry is dependent on imported products, had thought a few years ago of attempting in western Canada the cultivation of rapeseed. The project proved to be a tremendous success, so much so that, as I said in March, today there are co-operatives producing that seed from which is extracted vegetable oil.

I spoke on that occasion of the importance of research in agriculture and I said that it was an extraordinary feat to have succeeded in growing that seed to such an extent that today the possibility of exporting it was being mentioned.

But I am really amazed that such success did not come about through the efforts of the research council.

It is common knowledge that during and after the war, we had to do without a lot of imports. So, in my opinion, the research division ought to do its utmost so that we may produce in Canada such things as are absolutely necessary to us.

I should have liked, without taking away any of the credit due to the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Rapp), to hear some members give credit to Mr. Gattuso, who is recognized as one of the promoters of this grain production in the west.

I have a word to say about the suggestions submitted by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) asking the same freight advantages for soybean as are provided for flaxseed. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) claimed the same thing for mustard seed. I see no reason for not extending to those other products the benefits which are provided in this bill for rapeseed.

In my remarks on the Department of Agriculture, I pointed out to the minister to what extent the departments of agriculture and trade and commerce are interdependent and how important it was that the national research council direct its effort towards producing in Canada all those things which we are lacking and which we have to buy abroad.

Rapeseed production has been remarkably successful. We are all very happy about it. I trust that the same methods will be applied in the research branch as were used by private individuals and industrialists, so that, in the west as elsewhere in this country, we may enjoy a variety of crops which would benefit all our producers and farmers.

We should not forget that farming ought to be considered on the national scale. There is no provincial boundary when it is a question of farming. We should have a national policy benefiting all farmers and producers in this country.

(Text):

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pride to speak briefly in regard to this bill. I do not think any member of this house would wish to take anything away from the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp), because he has certainly shown the way in this field, and this bill, which is now before us, is the direct result of his efforts.

I feel also that we should congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) for their efforts in this regard. By the passage of this present measure the promise made by the Minister of Agriculture in western Canada early this year will be fulfilled, and we congratulate him for that.

I have been particularly interested in the development and the use of oilseeds since I came to this house, and have worked with the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale toward this end. As a matter of fact, there is an area in my constituency vitally interested in the growing of rapeseed, which we call our French Canadian area. There are quite a number of very fine farmers there now growing rapeseed in substantial quantities, and Alberta is rapidly approaching the time when it will be the major producer of rapeseed in western Canada. For that reason the passage of this bill will be very important to those farmers of western Canada.

We listened this afternoon to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) refer to what the former member for Humboldt-Melfort had to say about rapeseed. I suggest that points out the disadvantage that the farmers of western Canada have been suffering for 20 years. Those individuals have been represented by splinter parties which could never sell this type of legislation to the government of that time. I suggest this bill now being before this house is an indication of the existence of competent, hard-working sincere members, such as the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale, whose efforts are so beneficial to the people of western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I am sure that hon. members listened to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) with a great deal of delight, and I hope that he was speaking on behalf of the Liberal party when he said there would be no opposition to the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale during the next election. I am sure that hon. member appreciates that statement, although I am convinced that no one could be found to successfully stand against him.

Mr. Speaker, if I may just carry on for a moment or two, I should like to deal with one other important principle involved in this piece of legislation. The right hon. Prime Minister of this country is considered the champion of the rights of the farmers of western Canada. I suggest that the presence of this bill in this house is further evidence of that as well as a further indication that the Crowsnest pass freight rates are and will continue to be considered the magna carta of western agriculture.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) put forward the suggestion that we should have a national policy regarding freight rates, and I agree with that suggestion 100 per cent. Over the past two or three years there has been a concerted attack upon these freight rates by individuals resident in several metropolitan areas of eastern Canada. I point out to that hon. member, and all individuals who entertain that belief, that the loss our railways suffer because of the operation of the commuter services in the city of Montreal is far greater than the unproven loss suggested in regard to the existence of the Crowsnest pass freight rates. Recent examinations of the position of the Canadian National Railways have indicated that the revenue has gone down, and that one of the major factors for this decrease has been the decrease in the amount of grain carried under the Crowsnest pass rates. This decrease has also resulted in a reduction in employment for railway workers in western Canada. I am sure this is evidenced by the minority report of the MacPherson commission of the member from the province of Quebec who, I suggest, had a very astute appreciation of the facts placed before him.

I should like to make a few remarks regarding Canada's position in the world in the production of oilseeds. I suggest that Canada leads the world in scientific knowledge and development of rapeseed plants and other oil bearing plants. The Department of Agriculture and the minister should be congratulated for Canada's leadership in this regard. I should like to place on the record a statement made by the president of the edible oil institute of Canada made in a speech in Rome in May of this year. He suggested that western Canada is known for its ability to grow enormous quantities of wheat, but that it is not known that we are also today a large grower of oilseeds. He said he did not want to sound boastful but that it may be of interest to learn that in 1960 oilseeds were our fourth largest field crop and that we were the largest exporters of rapeseed in the world. That is the situation with regard to our position as an exporter of oil bearing seeds.

The president of the edible oil institute of Canada, Mr. Robert E. Merry, also said that we in Canada were leading the world in our scientific investigation of the various fatty acids which are contained in rapeseed and which are of vital importance in regard to its use as an edible oil and other consumer uses. He suggested that they examine their requirements in regard to the fatty acid composition so as to be able to inform us what composition would best suit their requirements, and that we in Canada could then breed a particular kind of rapeseed plant to meet that export market.

It is now generally known, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has so ably put it, that the demand for oil bearing seed and edible oils in the world is increasing tremendously. There does exist an export market and this bill will allow our farmers to maintain and receive a stable portion of that export market.

Mr. Speaker, I could not resume my seat today without saying that we have seen the results of the efforts of the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale, who is a leading example of the kind of Diefenbaker Conservative which the people of western Canada have elected to this house. He has given to his constituents that service and devotion which few of us are able to bring to the House of Commons.

Mr. G. R. Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, as a western farmer and a member representing one of the rapeseed growing areas of Manitoba, it gives me a lot of pleasure to support the action of this government in introducing Bill No. C-111, to amend the Railway Act designating rapeseed as a grain under the terms of the Railway Act. The fact that this important oilseed crop will enjoy the same freight rate as that now prevailing for flax will not only make it a more profitable alternative for wheat but will place farmers in a better competitive position in the export market.

I think this afternoon shows that most all hon. members are aware—and I think the producers of this crop should know—that it was largely through the persistent efforts of one of our western colleagues that the proposed amendment was brought before parliament. The logic of the argument used by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale, not only as a witness before the board of transport commissioners but in pleading his case in this house, left no doubt in the mind of anyone that he was seeking for the producers of rapeseed only that consideration to which they were entitled.

The production of rapeseed in the prairie provinces has developed largely because the farmers in that area have found that it is an acceptable alternative to the growing of wheat. With a substantial export market it has become a very important cash crop. In recent years Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, France and West Germany have provided the most important markets, although at least seven other countries have consistently imported this grain from Canada. As a result, exports of rapeseed have risen roughly from 60 million pounds in 1956 to a high of 284 million pounds in 1958, a further 222 million pounds in 1959 and to 259,625,000 pounds in 1960. I have some interesting comparisons in our export business of rapeseed. In 1958, the Netherlands took 123,154,000 pounds but in 1959 Italy led with 100,939,000 pounds. Over those years these two countries have been a very important market for this product.

It is also interesting to note that rapeseed production in pounds has risen from 13,900,000 pounds in 1953 to 551 million pounds. In my own province of Manitoba in the same period the production was as follows: In 1953 we produced 4,300,000 pounds; in 1960-61, 26 million pounds.

Wide variations in the acreage sown to this crop in the past can be attributed to the price received by the producer. The adjustment in the freight rate to that prevailing for flax, while adding only a fraction of a cent a pound, will help to provide a suitable cash crop with approximately the same amount of earnings as from a similar acreage sown to wheat. This incentive to switch from wheat should help reduce our surplus of that grain. It is another step forward in bringing our farm production in line with our market requirements and in our ability to adjust to changing conditions.

Wheat acreage has remained fairly constant in recent years although there was a sharp reduction amounting to some 3 million acres from the period 1948 to 1952. The reduction has been mostly in those areas that have been able to find suitable alternative crops. The reduction of wheat acreage, however, has been more than paralleled by the increases in yield through better farming methods and improved types of seed. There is every reason to believe that the ultimate has not yet been reached in improved wheat yields. It is therefore going to be necessary to continue to encourage the production of other grains. Rapeseed is one of those grains that fit into this production picture exceedingly well.

This grain has a wide variety of uses and continued research in respect of this important product may well add further to its usefulness in the economy of the nation.

Just briefly, some of the uses are its importance in the making of margarine and cooking oil; its use as a marine engine lubricant. It is now being used experimentally as a component of lubricants for engines of cars and trucks.

The processing plants for this seed are located strategically in the production areas. In Manitoba the plant is at Altona. In Alberta it is at Lethbridge and in Saskatchewan at Saskatoon. I believe that the action of the government in introducing this bill and applying the Crowsnest rates to rapeseed should further reassure the farmers of western Canada, as mentioned by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Horner), that those rates will continue to apply to western grains as long as this government remains in office.

If any further reassurance had been needed, this bill placing rapeseed on the same freight rate basis as flax is this government's answer to those critics who have been implying that changes in the Crowsnest rates were under consideration.

I should like to commend the government for taking action at this time, action that will assure the producers the new rates for the coming year, which should add considerably to the income the farmer may expect from that crop in the fall. At the same time I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale on the services he has rendered the western agricultural community. I am sure that not only will all farmers be pleased with his efforts but the farmers of his own riding, where such a large percentage of the rapeseed is grown, will be able to show their support for his action at the proper time.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): It was not my intention to take part in this debate; I was quite content to leave it to those who have been particularly concerned with the need for this legislation and have a particular knowledge of that need.

First of all, I must say with other members that I heartily support this measure and without any hesitation at all give full credit to the good work done by the hon. member for his constituency which has a trinity of names. I give him full credit for his efforts in this respect. However, Mr. Speaker, I think the remarks of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Horner) were quite uncalled for and distinctly out of tune with the tenor of the debate up to the time he spoke. This is particularly the case after listening to the fair and generous remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), and those made by the distingushed member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who has sponsored this cause quite frequently. I give him credit for that. Although we may differ on occasion, I give him full credit for his work on behalf of the agricultural producers in his constituency and in the rest of Canada. I do feel his remarks were entirely uncalled for, and I presume arose from the youth of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson and his lack of experience and, in my opinion, a certain lack of good taste.

In speaking to this bill, he said, in effect, that in future the people of western Canada should make certain to elect hard-working, competent and sincere members. I rise to take strong exception to a statement like that and to protest what I consider to be a slur on members for western Canada who have been members of various parties. It is a slur on a succession of hard-working, competent and sincere members from the west, whom I have had the pleasure of knowing throughout the years, whether they were Liberals, C.C.F. or of some other stripe.

I suggest that the hon. member for Jasper-Edson has plenty of scope for his talents and his interest in public affairs, and opportunities to serve his constituents by dealing with questions of policy, questions of fact, having some regard for the usual practices and procedures of this house instead of rising and spoiling what otherwise was a very reasonable and fair speech by slurs upon the good names of those who have served western Canada in this parliament in the past but who are not now here to defend themselves.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Rapeseed.

Mr. Argue: Before this clause carries, I should like once again to suggest to the minister that this excellent bill might be further improved by amending it to include mustard seed. As I said earlier, mustard seed is an important crop in western Canada. It is a crop of growing importance. I would suggest that every argument that applies in support of rapeseed being included in this bill also applies to mustard seed. I believe that the producers of western Canada, welcoming this bill as they do, would find it even more acceptable with the inclusion of the very important crop of mustard seed.

I should like, therefore, Mr. Chairman, to move:

That clause 1 be amended by adding in line 8 after the word "rapeseed" the words "mustard seed", and by adding in line 9 after the word "rapeseed" the words "mustard seed".

There have been many times in the past when amendments moved by the opposition have been accepted by the government and incorporated in government bills without any further discussion. There have been other occasions when the minister in charge has said he would accept the principle. Then, he refers it to the drafting officers of the crown to be placed in proper words and the amendment is introduced by his colleague. I am not at all concerned about the details as to whether or not the minister might accept this amendment of mine. I am not concerned about that at all.

I am, however, concerned that this important principle should be embodied in this bill. I would hope that the consultation I have seen going on amongst those young and important occupants of the front benches might lead to a decision that they would be prepared to recommend this measure to the house. I would remind the Minister of Transport that, over the years, he has seen many instances of new ideas being proposed in this house that have finally been accepted. He might find it in order at this time to show that this is a government of action by accepting the amendment without requiring the country to engage in a prolonged campaign or a prolonged debate to bring about an amendment which is fully justified.

The Chairman: Before I put the amendment, I should like to know if any hon. member is willing to argue that this amendment could be accepted, that it is not outside the scope of the bill. It seems quite clear to me, but before making a final decision I shall hear the views of any hon. member who cares to express an opinion.

Mr. Argue: This is a bill to amend the Railway Act and provides an amendment which would include in the interpretation of "grain" the word "rapeseed". I would suggest that this is a comprehensive amendment to the Railway Act which further defines the word "grain", and that the amendment is merely a further refinement of the definition of the word "grain". It is not, as might be suggested, an amendment outside the scope of this bill. After all, I do not believe this is a bill to provide for rapeseed. This is a bill to extend the definition of the word "grain" to include rapeseed and to extend the definition to include a further seed is merely a further refinement of the definition. I would suggest, with all respect, that this is the kind of amendment that is very much in order.

I would suggest that if the government were thinking of moving such an amendment, no one would rise to a point of order. We would all agree that it was in order. I feel, with deference, that this is the kind of amendment to the bill which is not beyond the scope or principle of this bill, and it should be dealt with in the normal way, namely by putting the question to the committee rather than by suggesting that it is beyond the scope of a member to move.

The Chairman: Is the hon. member going to speak to the amendment?

Mr. Baldwin: To the point of order, Mr. Chairman; may I point out that there is a basis which led to the introduction of the amendment to include rapeseed in the definition of the word "grain". This is not just a question of the government coming along and saying arbitrarily that "grain" shall include rapeseed. It was first essential, as part of the process which led up to this amendment, to establish that rapeseed was now recognized amongst the agricultural community in western Canada as a grain; that it was exported in large quantities and, as such, was acceptable, by logic and by import, to come within the scope and receive the benefit of lower freight rates. It may well be that in the course of time the hon. member for Assiniboia may be able to establish that these qualities are attached to the word "mustard" or to the commodity mustard. However, by seeking to introduce an amendment in order to have mustard added to the interpretation of the word "grain" I submit he is introducing something that is entirely alien to the principle of the bill and that, as such, the amendment would be out of order.

The Chairman: The purpose of the bill is very simple. The purpose of the bill, or of the amendment to the Railway Act is to apply to rapeseed the rates applicable to flaxseed. If we add something other than that to the amendment, I think it is clear that we are not relevant. Of course, the rule in committee is much stricter than it is on second reading. I think citation 203 of Beauchesne's which has been quoted several times, especially paragraph 3, would clearly dispose of the amendment. Paragraph 3 reads as follows:

An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.

Otherwise hon. members will realize that they could add to and change the whole structure of freight rates simply by submitting amendments of the same kind as the one which is before the committee. I therefore regret that I am obliged to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Argue: With great deference, Mr. Chairman, I appeal your ruling.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair and the chairman of the committee made the following report:

In committee of the whole, when Bill No. C-111, an act to amend the Railway Act was being considered, the hon. member for Assiniboia moved in amendment to clause 1 thereof as follows:

"That clause 1 be amended by adding in line 8 after the word rapeseed the words mustard seed and by adding in line 9 after the word rapeseed the words mustard seed."

I ruled the proposed amendment out of order in that it was not relevant to the provisions and exceeded the scope of the bill.

Whereupon the hon. member for Assiniboia appealed to the house from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question before the house is an appeal from a ruling given by the chairman of the committee of the whole as follows: when Bill No. C-111, an act to amend the Railway Act was being considered the hon. member for Assiniboia moved in amendment to clause 1 thereof as follows:

"That clause 1 be amended by adding in line 8 after the word rapeseed the words mustard seed and by adding in line 9 after the word rapeseed the words mustard seed."

The chairman ruled the proposed amendment out of order on the grounds that it was not relevant to the provisions and exceeded the scope of the bill.

Whereupon the hon. member for Assiniboia appealed to the house from the decision of the Chair.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

Mr. Brunsden: I was paired with the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai). Had I voted, I would have voted for the chairman's ruling.

And the house having resumed in committee:

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, as I said earlier, I will ask my colleague the Minister of Agriculture to move an amendment, the purpose of which is to set a date for this bill coming into force.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, in view of the remarks of the Minister of Transport concerning the advantages of having a definite date for the coming into force of this bill I should like to move an amendment. I move:

That Bill No. C-111, an act to amend the Railway Act be amended by adding thereto the following clause:

2. This act shall come into force on the first day of August, 1961.

Amendment agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill as amended be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Balcer moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-113, to amend the National Energy Board Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the national energy board has represented to me that as a result of the experience obtained in administering the National Energy Board Act for approximately 18 months, and following the consideration of various informal submissions received from the oil, gas and pipe line industries, it is considered necessary in the public interest to put forward a number of amendments to the act.

I suggest that as each amendment is put forward in committee, I will explain to the committee the need for and the effect of the amendment.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I take it the minister's statement is an indication that no major question of principle is involved in the amendments, and that the amendments deal only with different points arising from the experience of the administration of the act. I have no particular quarrel with the method of dealing with this bill suggested by the minister, although I must say that I feel some of the clauses of the bill involve questions of principle. For instance, the changed definition of gas and oil may involve questions of principle embodied in the present act, as well as that portion dealing with the import of oil and the bringing of the import of oil under the control by order in council instead of by act of parliament. However, perhaps it is preferable to deal with the bill on a clause by clause basis.

I should hope that the chairman, if we deal with the bill in this way, will not be too restrictive in interpreting the rules in respect to relevancy on particular clauses at any time. In view of the attitude taken by the minister I feel there can be no useful purpose served by my extending the debate at this stage.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the creation of the national energy board was an indication of the development and changing circumstances of this country. In my opinion, this was also the beginning of a program of bringing order and regulation into the production and distribution of energy in this country. As I understand the amendments found in this measure they are the result of experience and changing circumstances and, in view of the fact there is no one principle involved, it is satisfactory to hon. members of this group to have the minister explain each amendment to the bill as it is presented to the house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Gas.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, this clause substitutes in section 2 of the act new and more practical definitions of gas and oil and deletes the definition of hydrocarbons, gas and oil. Gas and oil are redefined to bring the definition more closely in conformity with the accepted nomenclature used in the oil and gas industry and in existing provincial and other legislation.

Mr. McIlraith: I do hope the minister's explanations will not all be as sketchy as that one.

Mr. Hees: No, much more detailed.

Mr. McIlraith: The matter deserves a little more detail than that. In any event I wish to ask whether the effect of the dropping of the definition of hydrocarbon from the act and the redefining of the definition of gas and of oil will be that of removing any pipe lines that are now under the control of the energy board from that control?

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Mr. McIlraith: I asked if it had the effect of removing any of the pipe lines from control of the board?

Mr. Hees: No, it has not.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister clarify one point? At the time the national energy board legislation was before the house in 1959, in the subclause dealing with the definitions, there was a reference to a pipe line company then being incorporated, namely Foothills Pipe Lines. Some questions were asked as to what type of controls such a pipe line dealing would come under, whether under the gas section or under the provisions dealing with oil. Can the minister clarify that point for us now?

Mr. Hees: I am advised that for the export of propane or butane there would have to be an export licence because they would be defined as gas.

Mr. McIlraith: The point was never fully cleared up at the time the act was dealt with. Can the minister assure us that the dropping of the definition of hydrocarbon from the act does not in any way lessen the control over pipe lines generally?

Mr. Hees: I am glad to be able to assure the hon. member for Ottawa West that this is so.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Eligibility to be reappointed; retirement.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, this amendment makes it clear that the person who has been appointed as a member of the national energy board is eligible to be reappointed as such for a further term of seven years or less, or in other words a mutually acceptable appointment may be made for a term of less than seven years.

Mr. McIlraith: This clause gives me the opportunity to place on record something that I think ought properly to be placed there. I think the present Minister of Veterans Affairs will recall that at the time the original legislation was passed I raised some questions as to the appointments to be made to the national energy board, particularly the chairman of the board, and expressed the hope that the government would select the proper person for that high and very important position in our economy. I wish to place on record my view, for what it is worth, that the government of the day did make a very competent choice in the particular person it chose for chairman of this board. I think that ought properly to be recorded here because the subject matter over which the board has jurisdiction has such an important effect on the economy that nothing less than a very competent chairman is required in this position. I should like to record my view that the present chairman admirably meets those qualifications and requirements.

Mr. Hees: I appreciate the well justified compliment the hon. member for Ottawa West has paid to the chairman of the national energy board and I feel sure that hon. members, particularly those who have had dealings with the national energy board, will agree, and also members of the oil, gas and power industry of Canada will agree that Mr. McKinnon has done an excellent job in heading up the national energy board. I thank the hon. member for Ottawa West for his kindness in bringing this true matter to the attention of the committee.

Mr. McIlraith: Does clause 2 which is submitted to us provide for reappointment a second time?

Mr. Hees: Yes, it does.

Clause agreed to.

The Chairman: It being five o'clock and in order to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day, or at the next sitting of the house, as the case may be.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of public and private bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to order made on Friday, June 16 last.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING USE OF TRADING STAMPS

Mr. Frank Howard moved the second reading of Bill No. C-34, to amend the Criminal Code (trading stamps).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this particular bill was before the house during last session for a rather lengthy debate. Perhaps it would not be well at this time to go into all the arguments pro and con in an attempt to reinforce or refute them. However, let me say that some years ago the Criminal Code was amended to ban in effect the use and distribution of trading stamps. The Criminal Code now contains a definition of trading stamps, even though it is not in the same words as it was when originally enacted. The section contains a number of loopholes which allow the use of trading stamps in those provinces in which they are not banned by the provincial government, and allow trading stamps to be distributed even though the Criminal Code says this practice is illegal. The amending bill proposes to block these particular loopholes.

Since this matter was last debated in the house there have been a number of actions with regard to trading stamps, some in the courts and others by way of briefs presented to the government. A couple of well known and responsible organizations in this nation, notably the retail merchants association and the Canadian Association of Consumers, have made representations to the government calling for a ban on the use of trading stamps at the federal level. The government indicated tacit approval of the request made by these organizations, but as with so many other things, this government took no action but merely expressed sympathy. This bill before us provides an opportunity for something to be done and provides an opportunity for this government to do what it indicated it wanted to do.

The two organizations I have mentioned, as well as many others, consider that trading stamps are an insidious blight on our economy; that they tend to promote a monopoly and a concentration of power over the economy in the particular field in which trading stamps are used; that there is an air of dishonesty attached to them. These organizations feel that the use of stamps results in higher prices to the consumer. For these reasons, I think this house should give speedy passage to this bill, especially in view of the fact an extensive discussion took place on this subject last year.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I am going to be brief in my references to these trading stamps. There has been a great deal of litigation about this type of thing. The use of trading stamps has been tested by the courts.

In dealing with the merits of the bill I would suggest that there is always a tendency—I say this is just a tendency—for some of us to wish to legislate the morality of the people. As a member from Alberta, I feel that I have enough faith in the individuality of the average Canadian to believe that he will take advantage of the freedom that exists in a democracy. If, as the hon.

member suggested, the use of trading stamps is bad, that they are in themselves practically immoral in the sense that they are an insidious thing in the economy, then I have enough faith in the Canadian people to believe that they will choose the right thing for themselves.

In discussing this subject one should keep in mind that the grocery business, in which trading stamps are used to the greatest extent, is a highly competitive business. Some people have suggested a monopoly exists in this field, but it is highly competitive. I recall reading an article recently to the effect that in certain states in the United States groceries are being sold at cost in order to attract people into the stores to buy other commodities. We only have to go into the chain stores in Canada to find that there is practically everything on the shelves from hardware right down to the various kinds of drugs. It seems to me that, because the grocery business is highly competitive, it will not be long before groceries will be sold at cost in Canada in order to attract people into the stores to buy other commodities.

The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) suggested that the grocery business is a field in which a monopoly exists. I say it is a highly competitive business. We only have to look around in our own province to appreciate the fact that it is a highly competitive business. The old style store we remember as boys, the corner grocery store, has been put out of business. When the corner store was in existence, everybody knew the clerk, and the clerk knew everybody. You went there to buy your groceries, and of course you received service. Today, there are about ten or 15 different chain stores in the city of Calgary. This is true of all cities. As I have said, this is a highly competitive business and it will not be long before the same conditions as prevail in the United States will prevail here and groceries will be sold at cost in order to attract people into the store to buy other commodities.

In so far as this particular amendment is concerned, I may say that the government of Alberta brought together the various companies on a voluntary basis and for a period of time trading stamps were eliminated. Everyone knows when you go to buy a package of cornflakes, you buy something else as well. If you get trading stamps, then indirectly you have to pay for them. If it is wrong to give trading stamps, then I think you have to look at the whole picture. If you buy a package of oatmeal, you find a cup and saucer in the package. What is the difference? In one case you save up the trading stamps and at the end of the month the children stick them in a book, you take them down to the store and get a prize. In the other case, you buy a package of oatmeal and you get a prize. If you are going to introduce a measure to outlaw the one form of attraction to get people into the store, then you have to outlaw the use of prizes in all these fields.

I have never been strongly in favour of legislating in the field of morality. I do not believe you can do that. I believe the people of this country are sufficiently well informed, and have enough individuality, that they will take advantage of the freedom which exists in this country to choose what they want. When you talk about the chain stores having a monopoly, you find that one store offers one kind of stamps and another offers another kind of stamp. In this way you have competition. This is basically my reason for taking a strict view of this legislation. I repeat that if you are going to outlaw the use of premiums in one form, then you have to outlaw them all. As I have said, I have enough confidence in the individuality of the Canadian people to believe that they will choose for themselves. We do not need to legislate to protect the morals of the Canadian people. After all, we are a Christian nation and we live under the free enterprise system. We are not children. We are 21 and we can go into a store and buy where we think we can get the best bargain. I believe the Canadian people will exercise their freedom with the proper discretion.

Mr. G. D. Clancy (Yorkton): The subject matter of this bill has been discussed in the house on several occasions. Arguments have been presented both for and against the use of trading stamps, but in most cases the arguments have been in general terms. It would be interesting to review some of the points that have been made. The opponents of trading stamps make the blanket claim that the principle is basically wrong; that the cost is being passed on directly to the consumer. I think that this charge would be difficult to prove, although we will all admit that the cost will be passed on indirectly to the consumer.

As to the use of trading stamps, the argument used by the firms using them that 2 per cent of their gross revenue will take care of the problem of trading stamps is another point which could be carefully looked into. There is a limit to increased turnover. The discounts on quantity buying reach a definite level. Therefore I think there is no doubt that most consumers realize they are indirectly paying for this form of advertising. However, I think it is also true that they realize they are paying for all forms of advertising that are used. If you take one form of advertising and damn it or pass legislation to ban that form of advertising, then it should follow logically that all advertising should be banned. Whether you are paying for radio, television or newspaper space, the ultimate purpose is exactly the same as the principle behind trading stamps, namely to increase the amount of business you do.

I feel strongly about trading stamps in certain areas of business. For instance, I think of the use of bonuses or the giving of bonus numbers of trading stamps for certain purchases, particularly on, for example, the Saturday sales. If you take any newspaper and look at their Friday afternoon edition, you will see large firms advertising that if you purchase a jar of so and so you get five extra trading stamps. In that case I think the customer should be very wary. They are trying to use the trading stamps in order to move slow moving produce whereas in the normal procedure it would have meant that the price would have been cut to move it. I am certainly in favour of a price reduction rather than a stamp bonus.

Another sector where the stamps hurt in the retail trade is among the small businessmen. In a good many areas the volume that the smaller retailer can hope to achieve will not allow him to charge off at the rate of 2 per cent on his turnover. His turnover is not large enough. Therefore his cost of using this form of advertising grows progressively larger. Therefore he is in the position that he could not possibly use trading stamps without increasing his prices and therefore lessening his competitive position. It is a form of unfair trade practice. On the other hand, as was stated by the hon. member who spoke previously, we live in a free enterprise economy. He also made the point that if you put controls on one segment of business, it ultimately follows that controls must be extended further and further into the activities of the business field.

From reports I know that there are a great many consumers who believe that the trading stamp is a sound idea. They like it and feel that, if perhaps they are not getting something for nothing, they may be getting something for nearly nothing. I think the correct approach to the problem is not one of legislation. I think the correct approach to the problem is to make public the facts and to leave it to the consumer, when given the facts, to form his own opinion whether it benefits him to pay slightly more and receive trading stamps or whether he would prefer to have his trading stamp value in cash as a price reduction.

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the privilege of participating in debate on this subject previously. I believe that today the need for this legislation is not as great as it was previously, although I certainly think that it would still serve a purpose and would be an advantage.

We heard the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) speak in the vein of the moral issue and give his views regarding the ability of bodies such as ours in legislating in these cases. However, this is probably a somewhat different matter, to a degree. In my own case, being what I would term a smaller businessman operating a small retail business, I feel that I have been able to see that. Although not in the business in which the practice of trading stamps has been used to a great degree, nevertheless I have watched this practice come into being and have watched it function, and I think I know a few of the matters in relation to it that are of serious consequence to the people who find themselves in this category in the business world.

As had been said previously, I believe that trading stamps when they were first brought into use were discriminatory as far as the smaller independent businessman was concerned in his relationship to the larger corporate chains. This may be a personal thing as far as the consuming public is concerned. Nevertheless, it was very real. The hon. member for Bow River mentioned the fact that there was a day when we could walk into the small corner grocery store and find that the grocer knew everybody and everybody knew the grocer. He thinks this situation has gone by the times, so to speak, but I do not believe this is the case. I believe that today the consuming public has come to the realization that trading stamps were discriminatory. There is no question that if you are in business and have such a plan presented to you, it is a cost, and you have to pay for it. There is no question about that matter. The next thing is this. Where does this cost come from? There is no question about that matter either. Therefore, as I say, I think this bill would have served an excellent purpose some time ago, perhaps more so than today.

I believe that the consuming public have become aware of this through practice and that they realize today that the small independent man who has been able to weather the storm and stay in business can sell his products more cheaply or at a lower cost than can some of the corporate chains. Anyone who does not believe this statement need only come with me to find proof. I can produce evidence that will show this to be so. In some cases, of course, it is not possible owing possibly to the buying policy. However, the argument with regard to stamps is quite clear in my mind. There is no question but that they add to the cost of the article. The situation cannot be otherwise. Therefore such a measure as this one would eliminate that differential between the small man who feels it would be an impediment to his business and who, as I have said, having weathered some of this storm, finds himself now to be more efficient. They certainly have learned many lessons in efficiency and so on. However, they find themselves in a position to compete in many of the lines in which trading stamps apply.

The hon. member from Bow River also said that in the United States some stores are now selling grocery items at cost in order to bring the consuming public in so they may sell them other commodities upon which they make their profit. I am not taking great issue with the hon. member on this point. This may be so. Perhaps this would act well in reverse; I do not know. I have not yet heard of this particular practice, but I know that the great appeal being made to the consuming public for their dollar has been by big organizations which have had to eliminate a great deal of the personal service hitherto involved in doing business with the general public.

We can go through the discount store organizations, the organizations that use these trading stamps to a great degree, and find that a great many independent merchants are still surviving and doing quite well. I believe the reason for this is that the consuming public is going back slowly but surely to the desire for those services they received in the past. I think the glare and the lights of some of the big corporate outfits may be fading somewhat.

If the thinking of the hon. member for Bow River is correct, some of the arguments we hear in other fields do not apply. For instance, we hear agricultural people saying that if they received the profit on certain food items that the chain stores make, they would have all that was necessary; or even if they received only a percentage of that profit they would have all that was necessary. If the hon. member's thinking is correct, it would certainly eliminate that sort of argument, but I do not believe that is the case.

I certainly believe there is still a substantial margin of profit being made by many of the corporations on the basis of turnover and there is no question in my mind, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, that when these corporations introduce trading stamps to attract business there is only one person who pays, and that is the consumer.

Therefore I agree with the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard)—although he may not have said this today—that there is a degree of deception in the use of trading stamps and I agree that they should be eliminated. As far as I am concerned, the economy of the country and the consuming public would be better served without this type of invitation to the public to spend their money at a given place. I certainly support the elimination of trading stamps.

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of taking up a great deal of the time of this house. I am against controls as far as it is possible to prevent them. I am also a great believer in the principle that everyone should get value for their money. Hence I should like to take an objective view of this matter.

We have two sides to this question. On the one hand we have certain chain stores which adorn their windows with huge signs saying, "We give gold bond stamps", "green stamps", "blue stamps", "red stamps", and goodness knows what other kinds of stamps which are intended to induce customers to go in and buy the products they sell. On the other side we have from coast to coast about 150,000 retail stores both large and small, consumers organizations, trade unions and farm organizations which take serious objection to this method of enticing customers into stores.

I am not going into the question of whether or not a customer gets value for his money when buying from one of these stores offering trading stamps. I hope he does. It has still to be proved that he does not. I say the real measure of proof would be obtained in having an identical article, by the same manufacturer, of the same weight, the same quality and the same grade on sale in the store that does not give stamps. If it is offered at the same price as it is in the store that does give trading stamps, then I say the customer is not, in plain language, "gypped".

However, that does not bother me as much as the jurisdictional aspect of this matter. I have before me a statement made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) dated November 3, 1959. It has relation to this point and perhaps I may be permitted to read a paragraph of the statement:

> We have had the matter of trading stamps under observation continuously since assuming office,—

The statement goes on:

> The result of these studies has been to convince me that an understanding of the nature and effect of trading stamp schemes is necessary to an understanding of where the responsibility and opportunity for controlling them may lie. In the first place,—

Mark this, Mr. Speaker:

> —if a trading stamp scheme in its nature or operation comes within any of the fields which are proper for inclusion in the criminal law, it would be the responsibility of the dominion parliament to enact any necessary legislation to deal with the situation. In so far, however, as such schemes are merely merchandising devices, and relate exclusively to the terms and conditions upon which a customer buys and a merchant sells his goods, then their regulation or prohibition becomes a matter within the field of contract or detailed regulation of trade, which is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures.

I think that is a very important point which has to be decided. Until the courts have decided that I think we are treading on dangerous ground when we ourselves try and control—and this is the intention of this bill—a transaction which between the seller and the buyer is within the field of contract and the exclusive jurisdiction of the province.

I am not saying that the thousands and thousands of people who object to trading stamp schemes are wrong. I think they have some merit in their objections. However, this is a serious matter and somebody must decide whether this parliament or each or all of the provincial legislatures of our dominion have the right to enact legislation banning trading stamps.

We do have provincial legislation on that matter. We have just such legislation in the province of British Columbia. Unfortunately I was not able at short notice to procure information as to the success or failure of this legislation, but I am satisfied it has not been challenged. The province of Alberta also has, or had, legislation prohibiting trading stamps. A charge was made under this legislation several years ago and the magistrates held it was ultra vires. Consequently the provincial government hit upon a scheme for the licensing of retail stores. This, I am informed, has put an end to the practice of various stores offering trading stamps as an inducement to customers. I am also advised that the province of Saskatchewan has legislation which prohibits retailers offering trading stamps as an inducement, and that this act is working successfully.

I can see some point in the proposition which the hon. member for Skeena has to amend the Criminal Code. As the law stands, it is not illegal for stores to offer trading stamps. I should like to refer hon. members to two cases which originated in my own province of Manitoba. These cases started out at magistrate's level, went to the court of appeal and ended up in the Supreme Court of Canada where they were decided on December 19, 1960. These two cases were dealt with as one by the supreme court and they are reported in Canadian Criminal Cases (Annotated) Volume 129, Part 2, page 223 under the heading: "Regina v. Loblaw Groceterias Co. and Regina v. Thomson (Niagara I.G.A. Grocery)". The faces in these two cases were identical. A city police officer by the name of William Hrycyk went into the Loblaw store on Main street, Winnipeg and purchased a tin of sardines for ten cents. He was given a trading stamp. When he took this trading stamp to the manager of the store he was given two cup cakes in return. This same police officer went into the I.G.A. store in the same city and on purchasing a tin of sardines for ten cents he was also given a trading stamp, though of a different colour, and on presenting it at the proper desk he was presented with a safety pin. These two cases were treated as one, and Mr. Justice Kerwin wrote an elaborate judgment which I do not think it will be necessary for me to quote extensively. He held, and the other justices of the supreme court concurred, that under the law as it presently stands the offering of trading stamps by these various stores is not contrary to the provisions of the Criminal Code.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, thousands of Canadians cannot be wrong. Regardless of my personal opinions as to controls I have very strong opinions about a person or a customer getting value for money. I am also a free enterpriser, but the anxiety of so many of these retail merchants leads me to believe that maybe they are hurt by this inducement. I for one would like to find a way of helping them even if it meant certain controls, but I want this to be put into legislation by a body which has undoubted jurisdiction to legislate. I have shown that several provinces are legislating on the matter. I have mentioned the cases which have been dismissed by the supreme court. I have quoted the opinion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) that as we stand in Canada today there is still no definite decision as to whether this is a straight contractual liability or transaction or whether it is an offence against the state.

If this amendment were for the purpose of blocking up that void, if it were intended to bring back the wording of the code as it was before the 1953-54 amendment, I would go along with it but I am still not certain whether we have the jurisdiction to pass an enactment banning trading stamps. Once we ban that we would have to legislate with regard to other schemes which might be devised. Hon. members will have heard of the flower scheme, the scheme by which a customer buys a dozen tins of soup gets an extra tin free; the scheme whereby a pair of nylons is given free with every purchase of ten dollars or more. What about the patronage dividend in certain stores when at the end of the year the total amount spent on purchases is determined and a certain amount of money given back? Until some of these questions have been settled in my mind I should prefer to abstain from supporting this amendment.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, when speaking in regard to this bill on February 4, 1960 I pointed out that the issuing of trading stamps affected approximately 300,000 small businesses and also, conservatively estimated, one million workers. I believe that the allowing of large companies to give out these trading stamps defeats the very purpose of Bill No. C-40, passed by this house on November 30, 1960, which is an act respecting loans to proprietors of small business enterprises for the improvement and modernization of equipment and premises. I should like to say that exhaustive studies and inquiries have been carried out by the government of Alberta in regard to this question, following which legislation was passed, as published in the Alberta Gazette of November 14, 1959. Alberta regulation No. 379/59 appears at page 963 of that issue of the Gazette and reads as follows:

The licensing of trades and businesses act, general regulations respecting licences (ministerial order)

The honourable the minister of industry and development, by virtue of the power vested in him by section 5 of the licensing of trades and businesses act, is pleased to make a regulation amending the general regulations respecting licences in accordance with the schedule hereto.

Alberta regulation 239/57 under the licensing of trades and businesses act, being general regulations respecting licences, is hereby amended by the insertion of new sections 15, 16 and 17 as follows:

15. No business licensed under the licensing of trades and businesses act shall secretly or otherwise give or offer to give any premium, free goods, or use coupons, coupon books, stamps, trading stamps or similar plans for the purpose of furthering the sale of any commodity or service.

16. Opening day offers by a new business for a period of not more than seven days, including date business commenced, shall not be considered a violation of section 15 of this regulation.

17. Nothing in this regulation applies to or affects prices or price discounts.

I say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that the Alberta government carried out a long investigation into this matter, and the courts there ruled that trading stamps should be disallowed.

Mr. Grant Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, I think it is significant that the sponsor of this bill is not in his seat at the moment. I think the only observation I can make in this respect can be made by referring to the old Latin adage well known to lawyers, deminimis non curat lex. In other words, the law does not take cognizance of trifles. Apparently the sponsor of this bill has adopted the same attitude.

My position in respect to this business of trading stamps is similar to that of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams). I think it is a very salutary position to adopt in this house, that one cannot legislate virtue. We have a legacy of obsolete laws which are the results of misguided but well meaning efforts. I think it is very important to maintain a sense of proportion. The business of trading stamps is obviously a passing fad which will break down through its own asininity and complexity. I think the observation of P. T. Barnum is a source of great solace when considering this type of problem. He observed:

It is true that you may fool all the people some of the time; you can even fool some of the people all the time; but you can't fool all of the people all the time.

That fact will ultimately bring about the demise of these trading stamps.

I think this whole trivial issue in respect to trading stamps brings to the fore a matter of considerable principle and substance. In this house we should of course endeavour to reduce the trivial and tentative to essentials, and to try to get at the principle, if there is any, inherent in our discussions.

How can a small independent grocer or operator exist in an age and time of colossal giants such as the cancerous growth of supermarkets which are exploding in all directions? This is similar to the very pertinent problem today; how can we maintain any individuality or any personality in an urbanized, synthesized, synthetic time and place? I think probably the most obvious and the easiest solution to this problem, but one which is doomed to failure in the end, is the bringing in of this legislation in an attempt to control this trend. However, I again say that you cannot legislate virtue, nor can you make things closer to the heart's desire by law. There is a limit to what the law can do.

I think the answer lies along lines of providing something in the way of a unique service which these great impersonal stores and organizations cannot provide. I know of the existence of several little butcher shops down here in the market at Ottawa which all the suburban and ex-urban housewives patronize largely because they have sawdust on the floors and salamis hanging from the ceiling, and if in addition to that they have a large chopping block with a cleaver stuck in it which is only used once or twice a year, so much the better, because they are able to sell their goods for twice as much. I suggest this is good sound psychology and the only way through this element of personality and individuality, and personal contact that the small individual in business can not only survive, but prosper alongside the giants of our society.

This problem is very relevant to the situation down in my own area of Stormont with the new harbour development that we anticipate in the very near future. In fact, I expect construction to start in a matter of the next few weeks, thanks to the consideration, perception and good sense of the Minister of Public Works and of this government.

Another reason why this is a topical problem is because of Upper Canada village, which is to be opened on Saturday, June 24, and which I firmly believe will be the greatest single tourist attraction in this whole country within the next three years.

The problem which exists in Cornwall in my own constituency is that of finding ways of intercepting tourists which come in the thousands into our area. We must decide how we can provide them with genuine acceptable services while at the same time benefiting from their custom, particularly because this area is so destitute as a result of the seaway being on the United States side. How can we salvage something from the ruins, using our own customary enterprise, which the people of Stormont have always possessed?

I shall not go into this controversial problem regarding shopping malls, which I think has real relevance to Cornwall, because I think shopping malls have to be analysed on their merits. In some areas, such as Ottawa, their chief function is to attract the natives back from the suburbs to the centre of the city to prevent the centre from becoming atrophied and decayed. Whereas, in my area we must try to intercept the tourists passing through and to stop them over the noon hour or overnight, if at all possible. In order to do this the establishment of a shopping mall in our area might well be the solution. I hopefully anticipate that many tourists will stop because of the new harbour in order to see the tourist ships coming in there, as well as to see the St. Lawrence seaway and dam and the other new amenities that exist there.

In the east end of Cornwall what we have to do is to try to introduce some of the neat little expresso cafes such as they have in Montreal and even in Toronto today. You see there is a new sophistication, a new cosmopolitanism which has come to this country since the war which is probably one of the few things on the credit side that can be said for the terrible catastrophe of the last war. There has been a great influx of people from many countries and they have brought in a new awareness, a new sophistication and cosmopolitanism.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope the hon. member can convince me that what he is saying is related to trading stamps.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Campbell (Stormont).]

Mr. Speaker: It seems to be in the general direction of trade and mostly tourist trade but I have not heard anything about stamps yet.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): I believe the answer to this trading stamp problem is this unique, personalized little establishment. I think the expresso bar is the answer, certainly in Cornwall anyway, particularly in the east end. Furthermore, a cafe is the most practical, the simplest and cheapest sort of store to provide. If you want a genuine, unique atmosphere, all that is necessary to provide is a red checkered tablecloth, a few tables with empty chianti bottles in the centre with candles stuck in them. When the hot weather comes along you move the whole thing out to the sidewalk under a striped awning. You put a few plants in boxes around it and there you have a unique tourist attraction. Another alternative, another variation of the same thing, if you have no sidewalk in front of your store, as many of the storekeepers in Cornwall do not have, particularly in the east end, a congested area—they probably have a parking lot beside them—obviously is an adaptation of a German beer garden. Cover the area with gravel and then put your hedges around about it and your tables, and have your lanterns glowing in the night. Then serve whatever is at hand, gini if you have nothing better. I am sure in many cases this would be the answer, certainly in our own area, to house the small establishments with limited capital if they do not draw on the amenities provided by our government in the way of the industrial development bank and various other pieces of legislation. Obviously this is one way in which they could cope with those great supermarkets with all their complicated machinery of trading stamps and the like.

This is the answer to trading stamps plus the fact that people will become bored with this really silly performance. They will eventually realize that you cannot get anything for nothing and the stamps will disappear of their own inertia.

Mr. J. S. Speakman (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, this amendment, like so many others introduced by our friends in the corner, is another piecemeal attack on a problem. Of course, the hon. gentlemen would have us believe that this amendment would be the beginning of the destruction of all kinds of advertising, because after all this is what trading stamps are. They are a method used to attract additional trade to a particular business establishment.

As the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) mentioned, if we are going to carry through this amendment we should also ban the putting of cups and saucers in cereals, towels and dishes in soaps, kitchen utensils in boxes of oatmeal, lapel buttons and cutouts in corn flakes.

The hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac (Mr. Webb) mentioned the order in council which was passed in the province of Alberta. For his information I should like to mention that this was not particularly popular with the buying public for the simple reason that it again was a piecemeal attack on what is after all a larger problem.

When we contemplate this type of legislation, Mr. Speaker, perhaps it might be well to have in mind the feeling and the thinking of the women who do the buying and, I might say, thinking of my own wife, doing it extremely well. They get value for their dollar; otherwise they do not spend it.

In speaking on a similar bill last year the hon. member for York-Humber (Miss Aitken) said, as reported at page 744 of Hansard of February 4, 1960:

I can only assume that nobody likes trading and discount stamps except the women who do the buying in this country.

I suggest that he would be a heroic husband who would endeavour to tell his wife that she must not buy at this store or at that establishment because they give trading stamps. He would probably end up by sleeping on the chesterfield or putting himself out at night and keeping the cat in.

Of course, the hon. member who introduced the bill made no mention of the fact that on television last night a gas installation firm in Ottawa offered a free portable 19-inch television set if you let them put a natural gas installation in your house. I presume the hon. member would approve of this because after all it is a rather substantial gimmick to get business. That is what trading stamps are; they are a gimmick to attract business. As has been said by hon. members who preceded me, give these things time and they die a natural death, as have other similar forms of advertisements over many years.

Will you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 7.30 p.m.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, normally 12 months transpire between budgets. Exactly six months ago this evening, I was delivering my last previous budget in this chamber. It was a supplementary to the 1960 budget. Tonight's is the second budget of the present session.

Four years ago tomorrow morning the present government was sworn into office. This is the fifth budget I have had the honour to submit to the house in these four years, not including the financial proposals introduced on December 6, 1957.

The circumstances attending each budget have differed from those associated with the others. Each was aimed to meet the financial and fiscal problems of its time. Tonight's budget is designed to meet Canada's present needs and difficulties. Flexibility has been the keynote of our financial policy in these four years. It will also characterize the approach revealed in tonight's budget.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS 1960-61

In structure my budget speech this evening will depart somewhat from past precedents. I shall begin by placing on the record a brief summary of the government's accounts for the year that ended last March 31. I shall not embark upon any detailed analysis because all the essential facts and figures have been included in the white paper which was tabled and published last Friday.

In my March, 1960 budget statement I recorded my expectation that our revenues for the 1960-61 fiscal year would be $5,892 million, our expenditures $5,880 million, and that the resulting surplus would be $12 million. Last December, in presenting to the house a supplementary budget, I explained that the rate of economic expansion in Europe had shown some hesitation and that the economic outlook in the United States and Canada, which had been most encouraging at the beginning of 1960, had rather unexpectedly reversed itself, resulting in a disappointing slow down during the last three quarters of 1960. This inevitably affected our budgetary position and my revised estimates, after making provision for certain tax changes, were that revenues would be $5,694 million, expenditures $5,980 million and the deficit $286 million.

Our books of accounts for 1960-61 have not yet been closed, but subject to some minor adjustments our revenues for the past year were $5,616 million, our expenditures $5,961 million and our deficit $345 million. In other words our revenues were $78 million and our expenditures $19 million below my December forecast, and the deficit was therefore $59 million greater. As explained in the white paper, the main factor causing the rather large drop in revenues was the timing of the long Easter week end. This year Good Friday fell on March 31 and a considerable proportion of the tax payments due at the month end were in fact not put in the mail until April 3 or 4 and therefore could not be credited to our 1960-61 fiscal year revenues. Our March tax receipts showed an unexpected short-fall of nearly $40 million.

The government's over-all cash position for 1960-61, that is, including non-budgetary as well as budgetary cash receipts and disbursements, resulted in a total cash deficit of $294 million, since our non-budgetary cash receipts exceeded disbursements by $51 million. Thus our budget deficit of $345 million was financed by a net non-budgetary cash surplus of $51 million, a net increase of $223 million in our outstanding unmatured debt, and a reduction of $71 million in our cash balances.

ECONOMIC REVIEW

The white paper also contains a full account of the economic events of 1960. It includes an analysis of the more significant longer term developments in Canada and in the world as a whole as related to the Canadian situation. I commend this analysis to the careful study of hon. members. Tonight I shall not cover the ground in the same detail as in the white paper, but I should like to refer briefly to some of the principal features.

Last year we experienced a number of adjustments in our economy including some related to normal cyclical movements, and others of a temporary, special nature. These took place at a time when other longer term influences were also compelling the Canadian economy to adapt itself to a new world environment. In these circumstances the year 1960 might have been one of serious economic maladjustment and recession. In the event, however, we achieved increases and reached new records in production, incomes, employment and trade, both domestic and foreign. At the same time price levels were more stable than they have been in the last five years.

By now, in mid-1961, we are coming to the end of those adjustments related to special and cyclical factors which, in 1960, were exercising a restraining influence on expansion. Those areas of the Canadian economy where declines took place last year are today showing signs of improvement. Capital investment, which declined in 1960, is expected to rise this year. Activity in housing, which fell off in the early part of 1960, responded well to government measures and other market forces in the latter half of the year and has been moving ahead this year. We may expect not only the housing industry, but other associated activities as well, to benefit from this improvement. The level of economic activity showed little change in the first quarter of this year, but increasing evidence of expansion is now appearing. Latest figures show that total employment has risen materially and the numbers of unemployed have begun to decline even after allowing for the normal seasonal movement. Other sectors where there was continued growth last year are showing further strength this year. In the United States informed observers consider that the recovery is now well under way. Expansion is expected to continue in western Europe and in our other important overseas markets. These welcome developments will make possible further increases in our exports, production, employment and incomes. Thus, an improvement in our situation could be expected to occur even if no further efforts were taken to stimulate our economy.

But this improvement, which could be expected in the ordinary course of events and without further stimulus, would, I believe, be modest, an increase of about 3 per cent in the G.N.P. It would be unlikely to induce the full utilization of our productive resources or to provide substantial improvement in the standard of living of our growing population. It would be unlikely to reduce the scale of unemployment to a more tolerable level.

What are the reasons for this apparent lack of resilience in our economy? Have there been new and abrupt changes in our environment which would explain our situation, or has there been a slow emergence of underlying forces which had their birth in an earlier period? Can we trace these influences to some indigenous development, or must we look beyond our own borders? The answers to each of these questions must, I believe, be a qualified affirmative.

The important longer term developments which are at the root of our present day economic difficulties have been taking place slowly since the end of world war II and to some extent were hidden during the extended period of post-war shortages of goods and capital equipment, a period when inflationary forces were constantly in the ascendant. During this period of shortages and rising prices the economies of western Europe and Japan have been rebuilt with the newest plant and equipment and with a highly skilled labour force, and the underdeveloped countries of the world have tried strenuously to achieve self-sustaining economic growth.

Within the past two or three years direct controls on the movement of goods and capital in the free world have, to a large extent, been dismantled. The pace of scientific and technological development has been rapidly accelerated. The western world has grown more interdependent and the policies of governments and business groups have become more closely linked. In the face of all these changes, the competition in world markets has become much more intense and the need for greater efficiency has been forcefully underlined.

These changes have affected all western countries. But Canada has faced additional special problems. Our largest and most important foreign market, the United States, has experienced an inadequate rate of growth in recent years. This has affected not only our exports but also our general business psychology. Meanwhile, the growth of our own labour force has been unusually rapid and much higher than in other western countries. Our growth in employment has been higher—and I wish to stress this—our growth of employment has actually been higher than in other countries, including the United States; nevertheless we have been unable to absorb into employment all the entrants into our labour force. At the same time, many of those seeking employment have not had the benefit of adequate training to meet the needs of our increasingly specialized and technical industries.

Another special feature of the Canadian situation is that many of our industries have surplus capacity. To some degree this reflects the inadequate rate of growth in the United States market to which I have already referred. In part it also reflects the "lumpy" nature of much of our investment, which for physical and economic reasons must be installed in large units, sufficient to meet prospective as well as current needs. A great deal of the investment in the resource industries was of this type. But surplus capacity in our economy also reflects to some extent the unsustainably high levels of investment which were encouraged by the inflationary atmosphere of the mid-1950's. During this period of excessive pressure on our resources it was inevitable that some speculative investment was undertaken, not only in Canada but all over the world, with expectations of continued rising prices. These expectations proved wrong.

The normal growth of real demand can be expected to overtake capacity in the not too distant future. Meanwhile, the existence of surplus capacity acts as a drag on private investment. It necessitates some transfer of resources out of temporarily overexpanded industries; unfortunately, it also contributes to attitudes and conditions which make such transfers more difficult.

In some quarter the conclusion has been drawn that the disappointing levels of production, unemployment, and our balance of payments deficits, are the reflections of major structural maladjustments and inefficiency pervading our whole economy. We are told that Canada has relied too heavily on the development of her natural resources and that she is lagging in the field of industrial development. It is suggested that efforts be made to force our economy into different channels less dependent on world demand. We are urged to balance our external accounts not by expanding exports but by erecting barriers against imports.

The analysis which supports these proposals is in my judgment basically wrong; consequently the conclusions are also erroneous. Canadian economic development since the second world war has on the whole been sound. Investment has flowed into sectors where an abundance of natural resources gave us a decided natural advantage. It also has flowed into a great variety of manufacturing industries, especially into those related to the fast growing resource industries. It is sometimes suggested that the resource industries have been stimulated in Canada to such an extent that they have expanded at the expense of manufacturing. In this connection, the house should remember that employment in manufacturing industries in Canada, while less than we would like, has been better sustained than in the United States over the past seven years.

This is not to say that we would be complacent about the present state of our economy. Far from it. There is more unemployment and unused capacity in our industries than we can possibly accept. Recent rates of economic growth have been lower than we need to absorb our rapidly growing labour force and the output of our expanding industrial capacity. Some of our industries have been stagnant in the face of strong world competition. Our technological development, the enterprise of our business community, and the skills and training of our people, great as they are, have not kept pace with the needs of a rapidly changing world. The deficit in our balance of payments, while declining, is still too high for our present economic circumstances. These are hard facts which must be faced squarely. This we propose to do.

We do not intend to let events take an unguided course in the hope that these problems will solve themselves. The government has introduced numerous measures during the past four years designed to overcome these and other difficulties. As a consequence our economic situation is very much better than it would otherwise have been. We will pursue this course with energy and determination until these difficulties are fully overcome.

Our objective will be, first and foremost, to provide fuller opportunities for the useful and profitable employment of all Canadians willing and able to work. We shall strive to attain a more rapid rate of stable and balanced growth for all sectors of our economy and all regions of our country. We shall seek to improve the technological efficiency of our industry, to heighten skills and capacities of our workers, and to stimulate the talents and initiative of our entrepreneurs. We shall endeavour to raise the levels of savings and investment by Canadians and reduce the balance of payments deficit. These, sir, are the purposes of this budget.

(Text):

I need not remind hon. members that there is no royal road, no magic which a minister of finance may invoke to achieve these goals. If there were easy solutions they would have been adopted long ago. Nor can these objectives be attained by federal government measures alone. In our free enterprise system we shall need self-discipline and the full co-operation of business, labour and all levels of government—indeed of all our people—if we are to succeed. I shall have more to say about this subject later.

The budget which I bring down this evening is not an ordinary budget. In more than usual measure it is an economic budget. We shall endeavour, through an appropriate mixture of fiscal, financial and commercial policies to create more jobs, to stimulate production, and to improve the general state of our economy. I should like now to discuss the policies and measures which I propose that this house should endorse.

FISCAL POLICY

While budget policy can play an important role in attaining the objectives that I have set out, it cannot accomplish the whole task. What we need, and what I shall be putting before the house this evening, is a balanced combination of both broad and specific economic and fiscal proposals. The government has already initiated during this session a number of constructive programs to encourage economic expansion; small business loans, housing development, urban renewal and rural development, greatly increased aids to technical education and training, measures to promote the expansion of exports, and in other ways. These are all parts of an integrated economic policy.

When there is a substantial degree of slackness in the economy, in the form of excess productive capacity and idle manpower, budget deficits can provide an important stimulus. By means of such a deficit the government, through its expenditures, places in the hands of the public substantially more purchasing power than it withdraws through taxation. If appropriately planned and timed, a substantial deficit can encourage higher levels of output, employment income and savings, without incurring risks of inflation. When employment and incomes have reached satisfactorily high levels and the rate of economic growth is strong, a sound budget and tax structure should generate sufficient revenues not only to cover current expenditures but also to provide funds for the orderly retirement of debt.

The present general pattern of our tax structure is, in my judgment, sound. While particular rates and particular applications of tax legislation need to be adjusted from time to time, our present tax structure is such that, provided we do not embark upon large new types of spending, it will provide a balanced budget and some provision for debt repayments as soon as we re-enter the area of high employment and a renewed period of progressive growth.

There is, however, as hon. members know, a time lag of quite a few months between increases in the rate of growth of output and employment and the increased inflow of tax revenues. While I expect to see a significant and accelerating improvement in output, employment and incomes during the balance of this fiscal year, I cannot anticipate an equivalent increase in tax revenues in the same period. Much of the revenue benefits of economic expansion will not reach the treasury until after the end of this fiscal year.

In the circumstances confronting Canada today, it is appropriate, indeed desirable, that the federal government should, by incurring a sizeable deficit, help to stimulate the economy. This we propose to do. Accordingly, I shall not be introducing any increase in our general level of taxation. Indeed, I shall be proposing some significant tax reductions to accomplish certain specific economic objectives. This contribution in the field of fiscal policy taken together with the financial and other policy measures which have already been introduced or which I shall be announcing tonight, will bring about higher levels of production and employment, and a more satisfactory rate of growth.

CAPITAL, SAVINGS, THE BALANCE OF PAYMENTS AND THE EXCHANGE RATE

In addition to this fiscal contribution the government will be implementing other broad financial measures that will encourage general economic growth, as well as specific measures designed to encourage particular sectors or industries. These general measures are in the interrelated fields of capital flows, the deficit on international account, and the external value of the Canadian dollar.

Over the past five years we have experienced net inflows of foreign capital ranging from $1.1 billion up to $1.5 billion annually. These capital inflows have been matched by deficits on current international account, that is to say, by an excess of imports of goods and services over exports. When the economy was fully employed and expanding rapidly, and when inflationary pressures were active, such capital inflows, and the matching import surpluses of goods and services, were appropriate and beneficial. Under today's conditions they are not only unnecessary, but in some forms they can be harmful. Our excess imports of goods and services must be substantially reduced; our exports must be expanded. There are large quantities of goods and services that we are buying abroad that we can and should be producing at home at economic prices.

It was for these reasons that in my budget of March, 1960 I issued a serious warning to those Canadians, including provincial and municipal governments and business, who, it seemed to me, were over-ready to raise funds abroad, apparently regardless of the exchange risks they were running. In the December budget, as the house will recall, I took action in the field of taxation to remove certain special incentives to borrow abroad which had been built into our tax system in earlier years when there was an obvious need for foreign funds.

The public reactions to these warnings and measures have clearly been in the right direction. The capital inflow has been reduced, the exchange rate on our dollar has been reduced, the surplus imports of goods and services has been reduced; but they have not been reduced enough. Further measures must now be taken.

Accordingly, the government has reached certain policy conclusions relating to the flows of capital and terms of lending within Canada, the import of capital from abroad, the level of the Canadian dollar, and the deficit in our current international transactions. These conclusions may be set out as follows:

(a) The current deficit in our balance of payments is in large measure inappropriate; with so much unused capacity in Canada, we should be exporting substantially more goods and services and importing much less.

(b) An expansion in exports and a reduction in imports should not be brought about by export subsidies, or by higher tariff rates, or quotas, or other forms of government intervention or protection, but rather by encouraging our exchange rate to fall into a more appropriate relationship with our economic situation.

(c) The appropriate method for relieving the exchange rate of undue and unwanted upward pressures is to take every practicable step to ensure that Canadians who might otherwise be raising funds abroad are, in future, satisfied from Canadian financial sources.

(d) Since it will take time to divert demands for funds from foreign sources to Canadian sources, and since it is urgent to obtain relief from the resulting excess of imports of goods and services, the government has decided to use the exchange fund to neutralize, at least in some degree, the effects of the continuing capital inflows.

The house will no doubt wish me to elaborate on these far-reaching decisions.

First, and of most immediate interest, is the decision relating to the adverse balance on goods and services account which has been running well in excess of $1 billion annually. It is the government's aim to reduce this deficit substantially in the near future and ultimately to achieve a position much closer to balance. The improvement should be brought about partly by increased exports and partly by diminished imports. Our purpose is to put Canadian producers in a position where, as a result of these policies, they will soon be selling, at home and abroad, many hundreds of millions of dollars worth of additional Canadian goods and services. This will yield substantial benefits, direct and indirect, in the form of more jobs, more production and more business opportunities for our industries.

These results will be achieved by encouraging our exchange rate to find a level in keeping with our economic circumstances. They are not to be achieved by subsidies, by government controls or restrictions. It has been urged on me from some quarters that there is a need for direct government intervention to deal with our economic problems. I reject this argument. The policy which I am placing before the house tonight is, in terms of real economic incentives, more significant, more powerful, and more pervasive than anything that could be implemented in the way of subsidies and controls. Moreover, it is free from the arbitrary decisions and the bureaucratic delays that always attend incursions by the government into the affairs of private industry.

The high level of our exchange rate has been impairing the competitive position of Canadian suppliers of goods and services in the home market and in foreign markets alike. An appropriate downward adjustment in the value of our dollar will bring them immediate relief and encouragement. On the export side one thinks of wheat and livestock, of petroleum, metals and minerals, of pulp and paper and lumber, and of the growing range of manufactures for which, since currency convertibility was restored, we are finding increasing markets abroad. On the import side our thoughts run first to industries whose growth rates have been less than satisfactory because of the imports that have, in effect, been carried into Canada as a result of a tide of unduly large capital inflows and a consequently unduly high value for our currency; household appliances, motor cars, a variety of consumer goods, and many types of industrial machinery. The exchange rate also affects service industries such as the tourist industry where we have been incurring heavy deficits because Canadians, at the current exchange rate, spend far more abroad than foreign visitors spend in Canada.

In all these situations a further reduction in the exchange rate will exercise a positive influence. And, as I have said, it is the government's intention so to redress our balance of payments that many more Canadians will be employed producing substantially more goods and services for the domestic market and to serve our markets abroad.

While decisions regarding the balance of payments and the exchange rate are of importance, there is a further decision which is, in a sense, basic to the others. This decision is a positive one; to encourage the supply of capital from Canadian sources, that is from Canadian savings, to meet Canadian requirements for expansion and modernization. The rate of Canadian savings has not been low. In fact it has been reasonably good. But it could be better. The flow of savings varies in response to other changes in the economic and financial system. And by far the most important influence on the flow of savings is the flow of incomes. Normally the more people earn, the more they save. By increasing the level of employment and the flow of incomes and profits, we shall automatically increase the flow of Canadian savings. The measures which I am proposing tonight will help to achieve these goals.

The objective that Canadian capital requirements be met as far as possible from within Canada, rather than from abroad, is based on economic grounds and with particular concern for our international deficit and the level of the exchange rate. At the same time the government welcomes, as the Canadian people will welcome, the fact that, over a period of time, this decision will result in greater Canadian ownership and control over Canadian industry and Canadian assets. For this purpose, Canadian savings must not only be increased, they must be mobilized and put to work in the most productive directions.

I wish to make it quite clear that we do not intend to penalize or discourage foreign capital that seeks constructive employment in this country. I am not proposing, in respect of capital inflows, any substantive further taxation measures. The interim budget of last December removed the unnecessary tax incentives. Nor am I proposing any restrictions on the movement of capital which have been advocated in certain quarters. Canada, even in present circumstances, derives great benefit from certain kinds of capital from abroad. This government remains firmly committed against direct controls on capital.

CAPITAL INFLOW AND INTEREST RATES

Since our aim is to reduce substantially and fairly quickly our excess of imports, visible and invisible, over our exports, it follows that we must aim at replacing, from Canadian sources, an equivalent amount of funds that would otherwise have been raised abroad. We have been giving most careful thought to ways and means of supplying these funds from Canadian sources. This is a field in which there are no quick or easy answers. The degree of success we can achieve will depend in part on the co-operation of our financial institutions.

Capital is not a homogeneous commodity; each borrower has his own peculiar needs and each lender his own preferences. However, despite the infinite variety of capital transactions, we can see our way toward certain broad measures that must be taken.

To begin with, interest rates in Canada are out of line with those in the United States and some of the European capital-exporting countries. We should like to see these spreads narrowed. When Canada was in need of large and increasing supplies of capital from abroad, and when we could welcome the net inflow of goods and services that these capital imports generated, it was natural that our interest rates should be appreciably higher than those in the main capital markets from which we were attracting funds.

But today the situation is very different. We have no reason, in present circumstances, to be offering high interest rates in order to attract capital from abroad. On the contrary, the capital that is thus attracted simply pushes up our exchange rate and pushes up our trade deficit.

High interest rates are a double drag, at times like these, on our economic activity and expansion. Such rates traditionally are recognized as having some effect in restricting or postponing decisions to borrow and expand industrial operations and also the activities of governments and public bodies. And, much more important, with our floating rate of exchange, relatively high interest rates actually cause us to develop an import surplus of goods and services with adverse effects on employment.

Statistics indicating trends of interest rates in recent years in Canada and abroad are to be found in the white paper. These support the view that Canadian interest rates have grown out of harmony with those abroad and with our changing economic circumstances. An important step in the right direction was taken earlier this month; I refer to the reduction by the chartered banks of their prime rate on commercial loans. Further moves of this sort will be welcomed and encouraged by the government.

I am confident that the spreads between interest rates of various types in Canada and abroad can be reduced and brought into proper relationships, but I would not wish hon. members to expect that this can be accomplished by some simple or quick formula. It would be folly, for example, to attempt drastically and artificially to force interest rates down by irresponsible increases in the money supply. Such a device would be not only unsound but before long would prove to be self-defeating. We attach high importance to a climate of confidence and understanding in our financial markets. What is required is a judicious and well co-ordinated combination of fiscal, monetary and general economic measures, the elements of which vary in accordance with the needs of the times.

While the level and structure of Canadian interest rates is an important influence on our balance of payments and our exchange rate, it is clear that much of the capital that comes in from abroad is not directly responsive to interest rates. For instance, last year more than $600 million of capital flowed in under the broad heading of "direct investment". Part of this inflow can contribute immediately and directly to the Canadian economy; not only does it create new jobs and new industrial opportunities in this country but it often carries with it new industrial technology and assured access to markets abroad. On the other hand, another part of this very large total constitutes the least desirable type of inflow; it involves the purchase by people abroad of established Canadian businesses. Many of these take-overs of Canadian firms do little or nothing for our economy and, at the time of purchase, they involve an upward pressure on the Canadian exchange rate and a consequent drag on Canadian production and employment. I shall have more to say on this subject later in connection with an important expansion in the activities and the role of the industrial development bank.

Some of the capital inflow originates in Canada with borrowers who seek funds abroad, not only in response to lower interest costs but for purely institutional reasons. Access to the New York capital market is almost a matter of habit; it is often simpler to raise money there than to search out equivalent possibilities in Canada. Certain aspects of our capital markets have not been adequately developed in Canada. This does not reflect in any way upon the sound and progressive financial institutions in our country, which have been rendering an excellent service under present arrangements. But it does suggest that we must improve our institutional framework.

I have already held fruitful discussions with certain Canadian financial institutions looking toward a decline in interest rates and a reduction of the inflow of types of capital that can be met from Canadian sources. I intend to have further discussions along these lines in the near future.

DEBT MANAGEMENT

While the government will be calling for the co-operation of Canadian financial institutions in achieving our objectives regarding the supply and application of Canadian savings, we shall at the same time be taking certain positive steps ourselves. In this connection I have three important announcements to make relating to debt management.

I need not remind the house that the federal government and its agencies are by far the largest factor in the financial markets of this country. Their influence is particularly great in times such as these, when the private sector reduces its demand for capital and the federal government incurs substantial deficits as a measure to stimulate production and employment. The proper management of its financial affairs is therefore one of the most constructive contributions the federal government can make to the smooth functioning of Canadian capital markets.

Accordingly I wish to announce that in order to avoid congestion in the "long end" of the capital market, which is the part of the financial market upon which the provinces, municipalities and private business depend for much of their capital needs, I intend to confine new federal market issues for at least the next several months to the "short end" of the market.

The sale of new issues is not the only channel by which the impact of government financing is transmitted to the market. There are sizeable holdings of outstanding securities in government accounts; sales and purchases by these accounts have the same market effect as the issue of new securities or the redemption of old. One of the most important of these accounts, both in terms of size and in terms of volume of purchases and sales, is the unemployment insurance fund. The holdings of this fund have come to be regarded in some quarters as a threat to stability in the long end of the market. The government has therefore decided to remove any such threat.

The entire portfolio of the unemployment insurance fund will in due course be taken over by the treasury at book values, and in exchange the fund will acquire interest bearing but non-marketable bonds which may be redeemed by the government as required on 30 days' notice. The direct government of Canada bonds presently held by the fund will then be cancelled, and the government guaranteed bonds will in due course be traded to the Bank of Canada in exchange for equivalent government bonds which will thereupon be cancelled. This will remove the overhang of about $245 million mid and long term bonds which, as I have said, has had a psychologically disturbing effect on the market.

The third announcement I wish to make in the field of debt management concerns the establishment of a purchase fund for the orderly retirement of government debt. As hon. members know, there is at present a fund known as the securities investment account, which is used from time to time to purchase government of Canada securities, particularly those close to maturity. This fund has served a useful purpose in our management of the public debt. We have not, however, had at our disposal the regular flow of funds which is necessary for any steady retirement of debt. The experience of other governments and of private corporations suggests that the existence of such a fund through which purchases of securities are made can have a steadying effect on the market. Over a period of time it should contribute to a reduction of interest costs.

It has therefore been decided to establish a purchase fund to assist in the management of the public debt. Its initial size will be $100 million, to be used over the next twelve months for the purchase in the market of government of Canada mid and long term securities. Details, concerning the operation of the fund will be announced later.

The combination of the policies I have just outlined combined with others to be described later this evening and the indications I gave earlier concerning budget balance will have, I am confident, a salutary effect on the financial markets of this country. They represent a determined effort on our part to exert strong pressure on the level of interest rates and the exchange rate, in order to bring them more in line with our own requirements and with conditions prevailing in the world about us. The improvement in our capital markets which will flow from these measures will be of direct benefit to the provinces, municipalities, business and other borrowers.

THE INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

The next link in the financial chain that the government is forging relates to the industrial development bank. The scale of the bank's lending to small and medium sized businesses has been expanding rapidly. In its last fiscal year the bank made 740 loans amounting to $38 million, as compared with 221 totalling $17 million five years earlier. In its current fiscal year which began last October loan approvals have been more than 60 per cent greater than the record rate achieved in the same period a year ago.

The number of branch offices has been increased from four to 13 over the past five years, and further branches will be opened in the near future as suitable staff can be recruited and trained. This expansion has been very desirable and has had the full support of the government.

The predominant business of the bank has been, and will continue to be, the making of term loans to small and medium sized enterprises. However, the bank also has authority to purchase a portion of the equity in an enterprise with a view to resale to the owner or to others at a later date, and to enter into underwriting agreements. These powers will be put to increasingly active use.

In order to encourage continuing growth of the bank's operations, the government has decided to provide it with additional financing capacity, and wider responsibilities. For these purposes I shall be placing a bill before the house in the very near future. Without going into detail at this time, I may say that the bill will make provision for important changes. The types of businesses which the bank may assist will be enlarged. At present it is permitted to provide accommodation to certain specified classes of industry. These include manufacturing and processing, logging and construction, air transport and some service activities. In the future it is intended that all business enterprises in Canada shall be eligible. The bank would, of course, not expect to make loans where funds are available on reasonable terms from other sources and, in particular, where special provision has already been made by parliament, as in the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act. It is intended that the financial resources available to the bank should be substantially increased. These resources are now $160 million; it is intended that they should be increased to about $400 million.

In facilitating the growth of the industrial development bank, the government has in mind several important objectives. The expanded operations of the bank will provide for greater employment. They will also assist in the development of a stronger, more productive and more flexible economy in the future. The bank was formed in order to meet a special need in the Canadian financial structure. This gap exists because, while smaller and medium sized businesses have usually had access to short term credit from the chartered banks, and to long term mortgage credit from other institutions, their operations have not been of a size to enable them to sell securities in the market. To fill this gap the bank has supplied term loans for plant and equipment and also provides technical engineering, accounting and managerial advice where needed. Financial and other assistance of this kind will now be available for many businesses not previously included under the bank's operations.

While the primary purpose of the I.D.B. is to help in financing the establishment of new and the expansion of existing small and medium sized businesses, it has become increasingly apparent that it can also play a useful part in assisting with the problems arising from financial consolidation and changes in ownership.

In these days there are often pressures on the smaller firms from both domestic and foreign sources. If our economy is to grow and prosper we must help them to withstand these pressures. I have in mind, for example, the problems that face Canadian family firms. Often such a firm plays a central role in one of our smaller Canadian towns. In the life of such a firm, occasions sometimes arise when infusion of new management together with new capital becomes desirable. In the past this infusion has not infrequently come from abroad; and while foreign capital may be both desirable and helpful, I am sure that we would all be happier if such a firm had the opportunity to obtain the necessary capital and management in Canada. The I.D.B. has already assisted in situations of this sort, and it is the government's desire that activity in this field be expanded.

Similarly, problems sometimes arise where the owner of a firm is facing or anticipating difficulties in connection with estate taxes. In such a situation the owner may feel driven to dispose of a firm, or a controlling interest in it, and often the most ready purchaser may be located outside of Canada. On such occasions the I.D.B. may have a constructive role to play. The I.D.B. has the power, as I have explained, not only to make term loans but also to purchase shares with a view to resale and to enter into underwriting agreements.

The existence of these powers, and of the willingness of the bank to use them, should be made more widely known. It must, of course, always operate with good business judgment. But within this framework I am confident that the industrial development bank will make an increasing contribution to solving problems of the types I have described, to increasing Canadian productivity and improving our competitive position, and to helping retain in Canada the ownership and control of Canadian businesses.

OTHER FINANCIAL MEASURES: A ROYAL COMMISSION

I should like at this point to comment on other important steps in the financial field which the government has announced in the recent past or will take in the near future.

I should like to remind the house of certain recent measures in the financial field that are designedly in harmony with the objectives I have announced tonight and, in particular, the objectives of lowering interest rates and ensuring that, as far as practicable, Canadian demands for capital should be met from Canadian sources.

First, I am glad to say that after a naturally slow beginning, the Small Businesses Loans Act is being put to increasingly good use. The latest figures show that guaranteed bank loans under this legislation are now being made at an annual rate of approximately $100 million to a wide variety of Canadian business enterprises.

Second, I should like to refer briefly to the arrangements which we are making for a secondary market in mortgages. As my colleague the Minister of Public Works has explained, there is no intention of dumping on the market large quantities of mortgages now held by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. If and when the government is in need of funds there are more effective and cheaper means of meeting our requirements. On the contrary, it is our intention to feed out to the market fairly limited quantities, in a manner designed to encourage an active market in insured mortgages. Such a market will give an element of liquidity to these instruments, and as such will harmonize with our general program of broadening and deepening Canadian capital markets and of bringing interest rates in Canada more in line with those abroad.

I now turn to the future. It has become almost trite to say that the economic environment of the sixties will be different from that of the fifties. In no field, as far as Canada is concerned, is this statement more true than in the field of financial relationships, domestic and international. In tonight's budget, as on other occasions, the government has reached decisions on certain reforms and certain improvements that should be introduced. We have, however, become aware of the need for a broader, fuller survey than is possible under the pressures of day to day government decisions.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Major Canadian financial institutions have developed over the years an enviable reputation for soundness, prudence and adaptability. Canada has been well served by them. In recent years there have been important changes in the institutions themselves and in the markets in which they function. Even greater changes may be in store as the Canadian economy matures and becomes more complex. So important are these institutions and markets to the smooth functioning of business and government that a careful review of them is necessary from time to time.

The last major study was made by the MacMillan commission in 1933. The Canada of that day was a much less mature country than the Canada of today, and the world in which she found herself was vastly different. Having in mind the length of time which has elapsed since this last review of our financial framework, and having in mind also the fact that the Bank Act must undergo its regular decennial review in 1964, the government has decided to appoint a royal commission to examine Canada's financial structure and institutions. The terms of reference and membership of the commission will be announced in due course.

Meanwhile, I say that the terms of reference will be broad, covering all aspects of money, banking, credit and finance. The financing of the Canadian economy will be one of the major areas of study. Such broad topics as the pattern and behaviour of interest rates, consumer credit and instalment financing, and the management of the public debt, will be included in the terms of reference. The commission will be asked to study existing financial institutions, such as the chartered banks, the Bank of Canada, and other institutions that perform banking and credit functions, and the various acts of parliament which govern their activities. The commission will also be asked to consider ways and means of encouraging the development of savings institutions. It would be our intention that the report of the commission should be available well in advance of the decennial review of the Bank Act.

EXCHANGE OPERATIONS

I now return to the exchange rate. As I have said it is the government's intention that our import surplus of goods and services, which has been running in recent years well over a billion dollars annually, should be reduced substantially, and that this should be brought about through an appropriate adjustment of the exchange rate rather than by direct government controls or subsidies, quotas or tariffs.

No one can say today what the appropriate level of our exchange rate would be when our balance of payments is in a position better suited to our present economic circumstances. But the rate will certainly be lower than it has been of late, and it may well be appropriate for it to move to a significant discount. It will be government policy to facilitate such a movement.

Accordingly the exchange fund will be prepared, as and when necessary, to add substantial amounts to its holdings of United States dollars through purchases in the exchange market. This would have the effect of increasing the foreign exchange reserves available to Canada to be used in case of need. As many competent observers have pointed out, these reserves have not grown over the past decade in line with Canada's international transactions. Once an exchange rate more closely in line with Canada's economic position is achieved, the government will use the resources of the exchange fund to ensure that the rate is kept within a range appropriate to Canada's changing economic situation. The value of our currency must, of course, ultimately depend upon our pursuit of appropriate economic policies.

It has been suggested in certain quarters in this country that any reduction in our exchange rate is inflationary. I do not think that we are in any serious danger of inflation under present circumstances, with so much unused capacity in our economy. A decline in the exchange rate will mean modest price advances for some of the goods we obtain from abroad as well as some of our export commodities. I am confident, however, that if under present conditions of unused economic capacity there is any effect on consumer prices and the cost of living, these will be minimal.

At this point I should like to issue a word of warning. A downward adjustment in the value of our dollar will open up new opportunities for Canadian industry both in our home market and abroad. The fiscal and financial measures which I have proposed or shall be proposing later in this speech should place Canadian industry in a better position to take advantage of these opportunities. But it would be a sad mistake if Canadians should thereby assume that nothing else needs to be done. Goods and services do not sell themselves. The world has become highly competitive for every type of goods and services which we produce. We must be prepared to intensify our efforts to compete in this new situation. We must work hard; all of us, not only the worker, but the entrepreneur and the business manager as well.

It is well known that adjustments in the exchange rate do not yield advantages that last forever. Recent history is full of examples where such adjustments have proven to be an asset which has been dissipated before the fruits have been harvested. If industry should seek to obtain unwarranted price increases, or labour should seek wage adjustments not justified by improvements in productivity, the opportunity will certainly be lost. It would surely be the height of folly if these new opportunities were to be lost because of lack of self-discipline or failure to achieve effective co-operation between management and labour were to result in higher costs and prices and a deterioration in our competitive position. I have in mind that our competitors abroad, particularly in western Europe, have succeeded in achieving a degree of labour-management co-operation which we in North America have yet to attain. We will need a much fuller measure of such co-operation and self-discipline in respect of profits, prices and wages if we are to take full advantage of the new opportunities which will become available.

International financial policy has been the subject of recent consideration both in the international monetary fund and also in the new balance of payments subcommittee of the organization for economic co-operation and development. I believe I can say that, in both bodies, there is a good degree of understanding of the Canadian situation.

These two groups have been paying close attention to the problems associated with massive short term international capital movements; as the house will recall, both the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom have recently called public attention to the problems that are involved. Over the years Canada's difficulties in deciding upon and pursuing an effective exchange rate policy have been entirely bound up with the problems of capital movements. If we can achieve a better international understanding of these problems, and devise new international techniques for dealing with them, we shall all benefit.

In summary, therefore, our objective is to achieve an exchange rate for the Canadian dollar which will contribute to a better balance in our current account position and to substantially higher rates of domestic production and employment. We will strive to attain this goal through a combination of financial and general economic policies which will encourage Canadians to meet their capital requirements more fully from domestic sources.

Experience over the past few years suggests that there is sufficient resiliency in Canadian industry, whether producing for export markets or for the domestic market, to bring about the necessary adjustments in our foreign trade balance. This judgment is, I think, supported by the fact that although we are running a very heavy deficit in invisible transactions, we have been able, with variations from year to year, to move from a peak commodity deficit of $728 million in 1956 to less than $150 million in 1960. For the coming year we can foresee a possible surplus on external commodity account which, we believe, should be substantially enlarged through the policies we are pursuing.

We have the material means—the manpower, the resources and the industrial capacity—to obtain these results within a reasonable period of time. But the responsibility for attaining them does not rest with government alone. Indeed, they can only be reached if there is a maximum effort on the part of every segment of the Canadian community, from business and labour. We will have to produce the right goods at the right prices in competition with energetic and competent suppliers from every continent. I urge Canadian producers, encouraged and assisted by the policy measures which I am proposing in this budget, to respond fully to this compelling challenge. In this way we will attain expanded levels of efficient production and create new opportunities for the profitable employment of our growing labour force.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE AND COMMERCIAL POLICY

I now turn to consider the main developments in our external trade relations. In perhaps no other field of our economic life are events moving more quickly or dramatically. With new regional trade groupings either established or in the process of being created, Canada is confronted with fresh challenges and the need to adjust to them. In the face of these developments, and against the background of the recent slow down in our rate of economic growth, the government has been urged from various quarters to alter radically and immediately our traditional commercial policy. In some quarters it has been advocated that we should move toward economic self-sufficiency supported by a highly restrictive trade policy. Others would have us alter our course sharply in the opposite direction by merging Canadian industry and agriculture in some regional economic grouping. In these circumstances it would seem timely to examine afresh the major tenets of our commercial policy objectives.

Let me say at the outset that I reject categorically these extreme positions which are being urged upon us. These are counsels of fear and even despair. Attempts to isolate ourselves from the trading world through the imposition of trade barriers would do irreparable damage to the Canadian economy.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

It would mean a loss of markets and the stagnation of our most efficient export industries. Standards of living of the Canadian people would decline and our economy would atrophy. It would mean running counter to the whole trend of international economic policy in the major trading countries. It would lead to regional disunity at home and a weakened voice at international council tables.

Nor can I see any gain for Canada in abandoning our present broad trade relationships in favour of joining a regional trade grouping. We shall, of course, have to adapt to changes in the world around us and be alert and flexible in meeting new challenges and opportunities as they arise. For the present at least the situation is much too unsettled to consider seriously a sharp reorientation in our policies along these lines.

Today our foreign trade and other economic ties link us to all parts of the world. With the attainment of convertibility and the removal of quota discrimination against our goods, there are increasing opportunities to extend our markets in many directions. I find it hard to see how, in our particular circumstances, a discriminatory alignment with individual countries or regional groups can help us to diversify and expand our foreign commerce, or fail to do damage to our trade relations with countries against whom we would be turning our backs. Nor have I been convinced that a sweeping elimination of our tariffs in relation to any existing trade grouping can be reconciled with a healthy secondary industry or the balanced growth of the Canadian economy.

I do not believe that the economic problems which confront Canada today require a drastic redirection of our trading relationships; or that these problems cannot be overcome by a vigorous pursuit of our present trading policies judiciously adjusted to meet changing world conditions.

What then are the commercial policies we intend to pursue? Our broad objectives in the trade field have been stated in unequivocal terms on earlier occasions. They are clear.

1. To achieve expansion, diversification, better balance and greater stability in our over-all trade and in our trade with commonwealth and other countries.

2. To support and promote a regime of law and order in international trade; to respect our international commitments; and to stand ready to defend our rights and interest.

3. To recognize the legitimate needs of Canadian producers; to safeguard them against unfair trading practices; and to promote the balanced growth of all sectors of Canadian industry and agriculture.

These have been the guiding principles and objectives in our foreign trade relations since this government took office four years ago. I believe that they are the right policies to pursue today.

Looking back I believe that we can derive considerable encouragement from the success we have had in moving toward these aims. Our exports in 1960 were the highest in our history. The deficit in our external commodity trade for the year 1960 was less than one quarter of the peak level of 1956. Imports are no higher than four years ago and, speaking broadly, our domestic industries are supplying a higher proportion of a growing domestic market. Our trade with individual countries is in better balance and we have enjoyed a gratifying measure of diversification in our export trade both in terms of products and destination.

Looking ahead I am confident that a continued and vigorous pursuit of these objectives will lead to further successes despite the difficulties and uncertainties that exist in several important areas of world trade. As the very high levels of business investment of recent years bear increasing fruit in the form of increased export and import-displacing production, we can look to increasing surpluses in our external commodity trade accounts and reduced deficits in our current account balance of payments.

The movement to a better trade and payments balance will be substantially enhanced as we achieve an external value of the Canadian dollar more appropriate to our present economic situation.

We live in a country rich in many resources, natural and industrial, a country capable of producing many products in great quantity and at competitive prices. Our high standard of living has always depended in large measure upon our ability to sell in world markets the products in which we excel in exchange for those in which other nations have special advantages. It is self-evident that a country which depends on foreign trade for one quarter of its national income must seek to maintain the widest possible system of world trade and payments, a code of international practice to govern that system, and a reasonably diverse balance of interest among external markets.

For very good reasons, therefore, we have consistently supported the general agreement on tariffs and trade and the international monetary fund, and we shall continue to do so. This, of course, is not to say that we shall pursue a blind or inflexible adherence to the specific tariff bindings incorporated in the GATT agreements where the circumstances confronting particular Canadian industries require that they should be modified. The GATT makes provision for the renegotiation and modification of bound rates of duty and we have found it convenient from time to time to make use of this flexibility. In most cases these changes to bring our tariff up to date and adjust it to the changing needs of Canadian industry have followed comprehensive investigations and reports by the tariff board.

In the past several years we have introduced modernized tariffs for basic iron and steel, pipes and tubes, fresh fruit and vegetables, a large part of the textile schedule, as well as for other products. This evening I shall be proposing further changes affecting textile products, nails and several other items. We regard this task of modernizing the tariff as a continuing process and we have recently enlarged the tariff board to permit it to undertake more tasks and to handle its work more expeditiously. In every case where the tariff items in question were bound under the GATT agreements we have entered into negotiations with the interested countries and reached agreements satisfactory to both sides. We have endeavoured through this system of selective tariff adjustments to allocate the available protection to those products and industries which would improve the over-all efficiency of the economy and maximize production and employment in Canada. This, of course, has meant tariff decreases for some items to offset increases for others with no over-all increase in the incidence of protection.

We have pursued Canada's trade interests in the commonwealth through the commonwealth trade and economic conference and other commonwealth meetings, as well as through direct discussions with the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries. We maintained a close contact with the previous United States administration in economic affairs and have already established an intimate and friendly working relationship with the new administration. We had a particularly valuable meeting of the joint ministerial committee on trade and economic affairs in March in Washington followed by visits to Ottawa of the United States secretaries of agriculture and the interior and then the visit of President Kennedy.

An important part of our success in achieving greater diversity and a better geographical distribution of our export trade has been associated with a substantial increase in our exports to the United Kingdom and continental Europe in recent years. Naturally we are intensely interested in the nature and direction of the regional trading arrangements in which these countries are participating.

The six continental countries comprising the European economic community have agreed upon a common external tariff to be established in stages over the next ten years or so. In accordance with the GATT rules governing customs unions, these countries have had to renegotiate their previously bound tariff rates in order to maintain the balance of their trading arrangements with other members of the GATT. This renegotiation has now been substantially completed in the current tariff conference at Geneva. I can now report that as far as Canada is concerned good progress has been made in these renegotiations although discussions on certain important agricultural and other products are still continuing.

In mid-May the countries participating in the tariff conference decided that the renegotiations with the Six had proceeded far enough that a date could be set for the opening of the fresh round of general tariff negotiations in Geneva which were first proposed by the present secretary of the United States treasury and have thus become known as the Dillon negotiations. The general negotiations began on May 29th. Canada is participating in these negotiations. It is our hope that they will result in the further reduction of tariff barriers against Canadian exports. In particular, one would like to see the reduction of the tariffs of such powerful industrial areas as the United States and the European economic community where present levels of protection on many products are still, in our view, inappropriately high.

In earlier years when the countries of western Europe were reconstructing their war-torn economies, Canada extended to them the full benefits of tariff concessions and generous access to our markets despite the fact that these countries were applying discriminatory trade restrictions against our exports in order to conserve their limited exchange reserve. Restrictions and discriminations have now largely disappeared, at least in the industrial sector. Now that these countries have regained their economic and financial strength we would like to see the remaining restrictions removed, including the restraints in the agricultural sector. We would also regard it as especially appropriate for those countries which are in a strong competitive position to take advantage of their favourable trade and payments position to reduce their tariffs and provide fuller opportunities for an expansion of world trade.

The United Kingdom government is increasingly concerned about the dangers it sees in remaining outside the European economic community of the Six, and is actively engaged in seeking a basis upon which it could join this grouping. The United Kingdom has not yet taken a decision but has indicated that should a decision be taken to negotiate with the Six there would have to be arrangements to take into account the essential trading interests of commonwealth countries. For our part we have made it very clear that vital Canadian trade interests would be affected by such a move. Other commonwealth countries have expressed similar concern.

The Canadian government has kept in continuous contact with these developments in Europe. The time has now come when full consultations on a ministerial level are required. The United Kingdom has proposed that the secretary of state for commonwealth relations should come to Canada for this purpose and arrangements are being made for such a visit in the near future. The effectiveness of this consultation will depend, of course, on the extent to which the United Kingdom is able, in advance, to provide us with specific information. While such consultations on a bilateral basis are clearly essential the Canadian government is urging that there should also be full opportunity for joint consultations among all commonwealth countries.

A very high proportion of Canadian exports to the United Kingdom enters that market free of duty, many with the benefit of tariff preferences, some without. Free entry is accorded not only to industrial materials but to agricultural products and nearly all manufactured goods as well. This is of great importance for the volume, diversity, and geographical distribution of our exports.

Moreover, this historic right of commonwealth free access to the United Kingdom market for agricultural products, industrial material and most manufactured goods is the keystone of the commonwealth trading system. Not only for economic reasons, but for political reasons as well, we would not wish to see this system abandoned.

We shall take every opportunity to ensure that the Canadian position is fully understood and our interests protected. We shall follow vigilantly the course of any discussions between the United Kingdom and the Six. Whatever may be the outcome we shall seek to preserve the most favourable terms of access to both these markets, and will pursue whatever policies may be required to achieve this end.

The new organization for economic co-operation and development may well have an important role to play at an appropriate stage in the further consideration of arrangements between the two trading groups in Europe. The house is well aware that the Canadian government has played a full and constructive part in the creation of the O.E.C.D., and we were pleased that Canada was the first country to ratify the new convention. We look to it for increasingly close co-operation in all aspects of economic policy.

We do not believe the O.E.C.D. should detract from the strength and importance of the more broadly based organizations in world trade and international finance; the general agreement on tariffs and trade, the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction and development. Moreover we do not forget that many important trading countries are not members of the O.E.C.D., for example Australia, India and Japan.

Canada's trade with Japan last year reached record heights in both directions. Japan is our third largest market, and our second largest for wheat. Japan is a very efficient producer of a wide range of manufactured products and can make these available in our market at very low prices. The Japanese, however, accept the principle that the growth of their exports of products which compete with our own production should be orderly and that they should avoid market disruption. Their method of applying this principle is through the maintenance of voluntary export restraints. We believe that this system is working reasonably well to permit an orderly expansion of two-way trade with Japan, while at the same time avoiding excessive penetration in sensitive sectors of our markets. Hon. members will recall the statement I made to the house on May 19 outlining the Japanese voluntary controls for 1961.

Other low cost producers, notably Hong Kong, have thus far not been willing or able to apply a similar system, and there have been some rapid increases in imports of a number of textile products. As I reported to the house on May 23, we are urgently seeking an equitable solution to this problem in co-operation with the United Kingdom and the United States. Failing this we shall, of course, have to adopt other methods in defence of the legitimate interests of Canadian producers.

The problem of market disruption or fear of market disruption, particularly in the field of textiles, is widespread throughout the industrial countries. The real difficulties for countries such as Canada and the United States which do not impose import restrictions are unduly aggravated by the maintenance of severe restrictions by many other countries, particularly in western Europe. We are now engaged with the United States and other countries in a co-operative international effort to achieve a more equitable sharing of the impact of the international movement of textiles.

TARIFF BOARD REPORTS AND OTHER TARIFF CHANGES

The rates of duty on most items of significance in the Canadian tariff are, as hon. members well know, bound against increase under our GATT agreements, and have been since 1947. This does not remove all possibility of change, but it does make upward adjustments difficult. A necessary preliminary is to renegotiate under GATT any bindings which are affected by the proposed changes. If tariff increases are proposed, it becomes necessary to find acceptable compensation to offer in exchange. This is no longer easy, as the Canadian tariff has been combed repeatedly for concessions to offer during the successive rounds of negotiations in which Canada has participated.

For that reason I am particularly glad to be able to announce tonight that we have substantially concluded renegotiations which will permit us to implement in this budget the recommendations which were made by the tariff board in the three reports on textiles which it submitted last year. These three reports covered hosiery and knitted goods; narrow fabrics and lace; and wool clothing and manufactures. We are also implementing the recommendations made by the board in its earlier report on record changers, and subject to a modification to which I shall refer later, the recommendations contained in the board's most recent report on nails.

The details of all the proposed changes arising from these tariff board reports are set out in the resolutions which I shall table tonight. In regard to them there are only two comments of a general nature which I wish to make at this time. The first is that if parliament approves these resolutions, the government will be in the position of having implemented, without major change, every tariff board report submitted from the day we assumed office right up to date. My second comment is that such departures from the tariff board's recommendations as have been made or are now proposed will provide, on balance, somewhat more protection for struggling sectors of the Canadian textile industry than they would otherwise have had.

When hon. members examine tonight's resolutions in detail, they will discover four departures from the recommendations made by the tariff board in the various reports on textiles to which I have referred. Two of these departures relate to the items covering hosiery and knitted goods. The tariff board recommended that the most favoured nation tariff on the main knitted goods item be reduced from 35 per cent to 32½ per cent ad valorem, and that the specific component of the compound duty on non-woollen hosiery be reduced from 75 cents per dozen pairs to 60 cents per dozen pairs. However, after reviewing the position of the Canadian hosiery and knit goods industry, the government decided that it would not be desirable to introduce these tariff reductions at this time.

The third departure relates to tapes, ribbons and other narrow fabrics of man-made fibres, which are now classified under several different items at various rates of duty. The board suggested a new item to cover them at rates of B.P. 22½ per cent and M.F.N. 25 per cent. As a concession to the industry, particularly that sector engaged in the production of synthetic tapes and other narrow fabrics now classified under item 562a at higher rates of duty, I propose rates of B.P. 25 per cent and M.F.N. 27½ per cent.

The fourth departure involves a downward modification in a rate recommended by the board. This was introduced in the course of negotiations in order to meet a special problem in our trade with Italy. It involves applying a ceiling of 37½ per cent to the compound duty which the board proposed in respect of travel rugs, so as to avoid an unduly high rate on certain low priced rugs imported from Italy.

The next tariff board report to be considered relates to nails. The board recommended changes in two of the three nail items. These involved a reduction in the ad valorem M.F.N. duty applicable to tacks and small nails, and an increase in the specific M.F.N. duty on large nails, accompanied in the latter case by a smaller increase in the B.P. rate. Thus the board's recommendations, if adopted without change, would result in a small increase in the margin of preference in the one case, and a reduction in the other. The former would constitute a breach of the "no new preference rule" of the GATT. Accordingly we have decided to adopt the board's recommendations regarding the M.F.N. rates of duty, and in each case to introduce a corresponding alteration in the B.P. rate, so as to maintain each of the present margins of preference without change.

Thus far I have referred only to amendments arising from tariff board reports. These comprise the bulk of the tariff changes to be proposed at this time. There are others, and in most cases these too have been the subject of negotiations. They involve negotiated upward adjustments in the rates of duty on eviscerated chicken, paper twine, lawn rollers, hoes, forks and rakes, power lawn mowers, and filmed T.V. commercials. At the same time balance has been maintained in the over-all level of our GATT commitments and in the over-all level of the Canadian tariff by offering equivalent concessions on certain other items. These include pineapple juice, parts and engines for power lawn mowers, parts for cement block-making machinery, and motorcycles. The rate on live poultry is being equalized with that of the United States. It is expected that the effect of the proposed changes, both the increases and the decreases, will be to promote additional production and more jobs in Canada. It is hoped also that the proposed introduction of a minimum duty of five cents per pound on eviscerated chicken will materially assist the Canadian broiler industry, which has long complained of inequities between the Canadian and United States tariffs on its products.

There is also a miscellaneous group of other tariff changes to be found in the resolutions. These involve adjustments and clarifications which are not of general interest but nevertheless are important to those directly concerned. They include cabs on combines. I shall, of course, be glad to provide the house with a full explanation of these changes in the committee of ways and means.

I might add that at the committee stage I hope to be in a position to introduce a supplementary resolution relating to sodium hypochlorite laundry bleach. This product was reclassified in consequence of a recent supreme court decision. However it would seem appropriate to restore and maintain the former rates of duty pending a report by the tariff board on this and other products included in the chemical reference. Accordingly we have initiated negotiations on the matter under the "special circumstances" clause of the GATT, and I expect that these negotiations will be completed in the very near future.

As I mentioned earlier, a general round of tariff negotiations is now in progress in Geneva under the auspices of the general agreements on tariffs and trades and is expected to continue for several months. A number of the requests that I have received for reductions in Canadian tariffs are still under consideration in connection with these negotiations.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

During the past year we have held three dominion-provincial conferences for the purpose of reaching agreement with the provinces on the form of the financial arrangements which should exist after the expiry of the present federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements on March 31, 1962. At the first of these conferences held July 25-27, 1960, the provincial premiers presented their views. I might add that the financial substance of their proposals could hardly be described as modest since in aggregate they would have resulted in additional federal costs in excess of $2 billion per annum. Despite their rather startling character, these provincial financial proposals were carefully studied and at the conference held October 26-28, 1960, the Prime Minister made certain suggestions.

It had become evident that the tax rental system had certain major defects. It placed the whole responsibility for levying these taxes on the federal government. The provinces took no responsibility for imposing the taxes upon which they depend for revenues nor had they any freedom whatever to amend tax rates in accordance with their current needs. Defects such as these are undesirable at any time, but in a period of rapidly increasing provincial demands and heavy federal responsibilities their effects have been particularly serious. The federal suggestion made at the October conference was that the provinces might consider again imposing their own taxes in the fields of personal income tax, corporation income tax, and succession duties. To facilitate this, the federal government was prepared to recommend to parliament that federal tax rates in the three shared tax fields be reduced at the termination of the present agreements by the existing standard rates. Under the present arrangements which refer to three standard taxes, the provinces receive 13 per cent of personal income tax collections, 9 per cent of the taxable income of corporations, and 50 per cent of succession duties or estate tax, and these standard rates are referred to in abbreviated form as the 13-9-50 formula. Coupled with this suggestion was provision for the continuation of equalization payments to the provinces.

On the basis of the discussion of these suggestions and further intensive consideration, the federal government advanced certain proposals at the dominion-provincial conference of February 23-24 this year. The Prime Minister's statement to the conference was tabled as an appendix to Hansard of February 28. It is not my intention therefore to review these proposals in detail at this time except in so far as they have immediate budgetary implications. The main proposals were that the tax rental system be discontinued, that the provinces should impose their own taxes, and that a fairer and more realistic system of equalization be introduced. At the same time the federal government undertook to reduce its income tax rates to a larger extent than was suggested at the October conference. In addition, the federal government is prepared to collect income taxes for any province which wishes to enter into an agreement to this end. In short, it was proposed that the provinces would reassume their constitutional rights and responsibilities to impose and vary their tax levies as they saw fit.

I have mentioned that the proposal made was that a fairer and more realistic system of equalization be introduced. It has always been the contention of this government that equalization payments to the provinces are absolutely essential. Without such payments it would be quite impossible for some of the less wealthy provinces to provide a reasonable standard of services without resorting to taxation far in excess of the national average. There is no question that to preserve reasonable equality in the provision of services across this country we must provide for some equalization of revenues. The proposed new arrangements have therefore been buttressed by an improved system of equalization and special payments which is more realistic and gives greater weight to fiscal need.

In the first place, the special fiscal circumstances of the Atlantic provinces have been recognized anew by the proposal to increase the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants by 40 per cent or from $25 million to $35 million for each of the five years of the new period. Second, it is proposed that the additional grant of $8 million per annum to Newfoundland be continued for a further five years. Third, it is proposed that the equalization formula be broadened to include, in addition to the yield of the three standard taxes, 50 per cent of the three year average of natural resource revenue and that the basis of equalization be changed from the average yield in the two provinces with the highest per capita yield to the national average. Variations as between provinces in resource revenues are a major factor in the financial position of the provinces and the inclusion of this factor in the equalization formula greatly improves the position of the less wealthy provinces. Equalization based on standard tax yields in the top two provinces led in some instances to larger payments than could be defended on the basis of fiscal need. The use of a national average formula as a basis for equalization payments will give adequate recognition to the principle of fiscal need without placing unnecessary demands on the federal treasury.

One further aspect of the federal proposals merits special reference at this time. From 1947 to 1957 under agreements, and since then from year to year without an agreement, the federal government has paid to the provinces half of the federal income tax collected in respect of income derived form the distribution to or generation for distribution to the public of electrical energy, gas or steam by corporations whose main business is such distribution or generation. At the conference we proposed to continue these arrangements for another year. In compliance with the representations of the provinces it is now proposed that this sharing be continued throughout the next five years, that is, sir, during the period of the proposed arrangements. From a federal revenue standpoint, this proposal to continue sharing with the provinces on an equal basis the corporation tax from this source is equivalent to a reduction in federal tax. Under the arrangements now proposed, the provinces will be in a position to complement this federal action by policies which could benefit the industry and the consumers.

The government wishes to spare the provinces the expense of setting up separate tax collection machinery and to contribute as much as possible to simplicity, convenience and uniformity in the tax system. It therefore offered to collect on behalf of the provinces the provincially imposed personal income taxes and corporation income taxes free of charge provided the provincial tax base was identical with the federal tax base at all times. This offer could not be extended to the estate tax since the provinces do not have the constitutional power to levy an estate tax on the federal basis. The federal offer in this instance therefore was that any province not levying succession duties would receive half the yield of the federal estate tax while an abatement of 50 per cent of the federal estate tax would be granted as at present to provinces levying their own succession duties.

The federal offer to collect the provincial taxes free of charge obviously leaves the provinces with freedom and flexibility to impose their own rates of tax, a freedom they were denied under the rental system. At the same time it encourages them not to complicate the task of the taxpayer. At a later date, after the necessary legislation has been put before parliament and approved, it will be possible to work out the precise terms of tax collection agreements with those provinces which wish to avail themselves of the federal offer.

The proposal to return to the provinces the responsibility of levying taxes on the income of individuals and corporations was accompanied by a promise that the federal government would ask parliament to provide for reductions in the federal rates of tax. In the case of the corporation tax, the federal reduction is to equal the abatement of 9 per cent of taxable income now granted. In the case of the personal income tax, the reduction is to increase by one percentage point each year from 16 per cent of the level of federal tax which would otherwise prevail in the first year, to 20 per cent in the last year. The provincial share of the yield from the personal income tax will thus rise by the final year of the agreement to exactly double the level of 10 per cent in effect when the present government came into office in 1957. The provinces will of course be quite free under this system to reap higher yields by imposing higher rates of tax if they choose to do so.

I have spoken of the advantages to the provinces of the freedom and flexibility which the new arrangements can bring. From the federal standpoint there are also great advantages. It will mean that the federal government will no longer have to impose rates of tax high enough to meet the demands of provincial expenditure. The federal budget will no longer be inflated by what are essentially taxes for provincial purposes. It will mean very substantial reductions in the rates of federal tax.

I should like at this point, if I have the permission of the house, to insert in Hansard a table showing the amount of the federal contributions to or for the benefit of the provinces for the last five years together with the estimated amount for the year 1961-62.

Mr. Speaker: As the minister advised, he has three tables which he wishes to have inserted. Perhaps the house will give its consent to the inclusion of all three without his having to mention the other two.

TABLE 1

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO OR FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE PROVINCES

TOTAL	689.3	837.3	1,037.9	1,264.2	1,316.5	1,470.1

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The total of these payments and abatements has risen from $689.3 million in 1956-57 to $1,470.1 million in 1961-62, or more than double. Included in this total is an estimated amount of $298.8 million for tax rentals in 1961-62. This amount includes $13.5 million for rental or succession duties which will not be eliminated under the proposed collection agreements, but even allowing for this and assuming a modest growth in tax yields, the change to a tax collection system will remove more than $300 million from the federal budget next year which will be the first year of the new five year period. I am accordingly submitting proposals tonight to reduce federal taxes effective January 1, 1962, by $300 million per annum.

INCOME TAX

I shall proceed now with tax changes. I have already referred to the principal considerations of policy which motivate this budget. The general levels of taxes are not being altered at this time. I am bringing forward some important amendments, however. Aside from the reductions of income taxes connected with our undertakings to the provinces, with which I have already dealt, I am providing for tax reductions to the extent of about $100 million in a full year. I am also proposing several new measures pertaining to the structure of the tax laws. The various amendments are intended to improve the conditions of industry, to provide additional employment and to contribute to the general welfare. Some of them will further the efficiency and the equity of the tax system.

Reduction of the exchange rate will provide new and significant price advantages to goods made in Canada in comparison with those made in other countries. More than any other policy that could be adopted, a lower exchange rate will be of signal assistance to all of our producers, both in primary and in secondary industries, to those who export as well as to those who sell at home. It is for Canadian industry now to make the most of the new opportunity which is theirs. As I have already explained, the benefits of a lower exchange rate take the form of price differentials and they tend in time to disappear. Thus these benefits are at a maximum during a limited period of time.

Many of our industries are at present competing in fields in which large portions of domestic needs are being supplied by imported goods. Frequently the Canadian manufacturer is capable of extending his market greatly with improved efficiency, with lower costs of production and with more competitive prices. This is as true of markets abroad as of those at home.

It is of the utmost importance that Canadian manufacturers should extend their markets. More than anything else, the government is concerned about employment. To secure a maximum increase in employment it is desirable, I should say essential, that every industry, every business and every labour organization should give renewed thought to the increase of productivity, the improvement of efficiency and the competitiveness of costs and prices. This is the constructive and effective way to deal with the problem of employment in our free enterprise economy.

Many of our major industries are well equipped, up to date and fully competitive with those of other countries. Huge capital investments have been directed to this end. Other industries are not at present as well able to compete for business at home and abroad. Probably every enterprise in the country is capable of doing more than at present and of doing it better.

Frequently, the most difficult aspect for an individual business to undertake unaided is the financing of expensive new capital installations, including machinery, equipment and buildings. The government has decided to give help at this point by introducing an allowance for re-equipment and modernization.

This special incentive will take the form of a 50 per cent increase in the first year in the rates of capital cost allowance applicable to new assets acquired for use in Canada from tonight until March 31, 1963. This special allowance will be available in respect of all depreciable assets which are eligible for depreciation by the diminishing balance method. A business will be permitted at its own option to take advantage of this substantial tax concession to the extent that its investment during a taxation year on new depreciable assets for use in Canada is in excess of its expenditure on such assets in its last complete fiscal period that ended before tonight, or in excess of the average of its expenditures in that period and its two immediately preceding fiscal periods.

The purpose of this latter limitation is to provide the desirable incentive at a minimum cost. As any businessman would do, I am trying in this case to obtain a maximum result in return for treasury dollars. By applying the re-equipment and modernization allowance only to expenditures in excess of those in a recent base period, I am attempting to establish a rule by which to make this valuable concession available to those who are genuinely increasing the level of their investment in new depreciable assets but not to that large total of depreciable assets most of which would have been acquired in any event.

As far as new companies and new operations are concerned, it has been decided that the same formula should apply as in other cases. A new company, for example, will be able to claim the special allowance with respect to the whole of its investment in new depreciable assets for use in Canada since it has made no comparable investments in former years. On the other hand, the Department of National Revenue will be empowered to withhold the re-equipment and modernization allowance in cases where existing operations are split up into new ones merely for tax-defeating purposes. Capital cost allowances will continue as before to be limited in total by the cost of acquisition. They are not to exceed 100 per cent.

Hon. members are familiar with the new program which was inaugurated in the supplementary budget of December 20, 1960. Double depreciation for the first year or its equivalent in a later year was offered with respect to capital investments for products which are new to Canada as a whole or to designated areas of surplus manpower. As is usual with such matters, interested persons took some time to consider the possibilities in relation to their own affairs and their own plans. Following a time lag that was not unexpected, an increasing display of interest is being shown on the part of potential manufacturers of new products. Since the announcement of the regulations covering the plan, close to 300 inquiries had been received by the Department of Trade and Commerce by the end of May. Furthermore, interest in the program has increased in recent weeks as reflected by the fact that the number of applications received by the Department of Trade and Commerce doubled in May, compared with March and April combined.

Applications for accelerated depreciation have been made by firms producing a wide variety of products. These include chemicals, steel, textiles, electronics, plastics, foods and other products. Thus, a representative cross section of Canadian secondary industry is seeking to take advantage of accelerated capital cost allowances under the December program. Some firms are establishing new plants, while others are enlarging their present facilities in order to make new products and thus diversify their output. These enquiries and applications have been made by firms located in many regions of Canada. The value of the assets covered by these applications exceeds $27 million. We anticipate that a steady increase will occur in the number of applications as businessmen develop a better understanding of the program.

Considering the fact that this program has been in effect a limited period of time, the government is pleased with its acceptance to date. The new projects resulting from the program will create additional employment in the industries supplying the new plants and facilities. Further, there will also be additional jobs for those working in the new plants. Another benefit is that new products are likely to be introduced which should make a useful contribution to further diversification of our secondary industries.

It is not intended to modify or amend this double depreciation program. Rather it is intended that the new re-equipment and modernization allowance can be claimed in addition by those who qualify for double depreciation in either the new product or the new designated area categories.

In the conditions that exist today, scientific research is to be assigned a top priority of urgency and importance. It must play an increasing and indispensable part in all sections of industry and in many aspects of every day life. Much has been done in the laboratories maintained by the government, both in basic and applied research and in development. In addition, the federal government has given greatly enlarged assistance to universities and private industry to stimulate scientific research and it will be giving more. If Canada is to maintain its due place in the world, advances must be made in these fields of science. I am proposing to extend the deductions now allowed to taxpayers in respect of expenditures on scientific research undertaken in Canada. These are already extensive but it now seems appropriate to take further steps in this direction as part of the government's program to assist Canadian business to be efficient and up to date.

Canadian industries, particularly the subsidiaries of foreign companies, are too dependent on research done abroad. The government believes that more industrial research should be done right here in Canada. The measures being introduced tonight are designed to stimulate industrial research in our own country.

The Income Tax Act now provides that expenditures of a capital nature made on scientific research in Canada may be fully written off in three years. I am proposing that henceforth taxpayers be allowed if they wish to deduct such expenditures in full in the year incurred.

The act now provides that amounts deducted under the provision dealing with scientific research shall be limited to 5 per cent of the taxpayer's previous year's taxable income unless the research program has been approved by the Minister of National Revenue with the advice of the national research council. Although in practice approval is normally given, I believe that a modification of this requirement will give encouragement and certainty to taxpayers who are planning to increase their scientific research programs. I am accordingly recommending removal of this limitation with respect to expenditures so far as it affects current expenditures.

Finally, I am proposing that taxpayers be permitted a deduction from income in respect of expenditures on scientific research made at one stage removed, that is, in respect of amounts paid to a foundation established for the purpose of expending all its resources on scientific research in Canada.

I turn now to some rather different problems that have attracted an increasing amount of interest and concern. It has been concluded that the next major step in the private pension field should be to use the resources of government to encourage and assist the more widespread expansion of private pension plans on a secure basis. It is desirable that those who have been employed throughout their working years should be able to retire without fear of want. Having in mind the extensive provision now available to meet these needs through private pension plans it is important to ensure that such plans are generally available and adequate. To these ends, action is required at the appropriate government levels to fulfil two objectives, namely to protect the solvency of private pension plans and to help promote the portability of pensions. The house will recall that on May 9 and on May 24, 1960, I drew attention to the fact that federal jurisdiction in this field is limited. While there is a confined area within which the federal government has powers there are wider areas of provincial jurisdiction.

By the portability of a pension is meant the ability of a worker to accumulate a pension throughout his working lifetime even though he may change from one pensionable employment to another, perhaps on successive occasions. The government is concerned about persons who have worked with more than one employer but who on retirement can receive pensions based only on their service under the pension plan of their last employer. The income after retirement of those affected is a matter of great importance. In addition, the inability to carry pension rights away from a job, that is to say the absence of portability, may deter workers from transferring to more productive jobs. The portability of pensions may serve in a very constructive way as a stimulus to the productivity of the whole economy, by providing the individual worker with a wider range of free choice in seeking employment. In due course a contribution will be made by this means to increased employment.

In addition to these problems there is another which, fortunately, has seldom confronted us in recent years, namely the solvency of pension funds. The most important single requirement of a private pension plan is quite obviously that the requisite funds should be on hand when needed to pay the pensions. The insolvency of a pension fund could just as well prove to be disastrous to an employee who had spent all his working life with one employer as to another who changed his employment frequently.

The expansion of pension plans in the last 25 years has been phenomenal. In 1959 there were over 10,000 such plans in Canada of which 90 per cent were handled by insurance companies or the annuities branch of the Department of Labour. The remainder were trusteed plans where the contributions are deposited with a selected trustee for investment. Although constituting only 10 per cent of the number of plans, the trusteed plans in 1959 covered almost 1 million employees or 61 per cent of all employees under pension plans and their assets represented 64 per cent of the total.

As hon. members are aware, these pension plans are accorded valuable income tax concessions provided they are registered for this purpose with the Department of National Revenue. In general, tax deferral is granted during the period of accumulation and the pension benefits are taxed as personal income as and when they are received.

I doubt very much whether it is as well known as it should be that the federal government does not supervise or control the solvency of private pension funds; neither do the province, aside from establishing certain statutory responsibilities of trustees which pertain to only a small portion of this problem. These observations do not, of course, apply to pension plans whose detailed benefits are covered by a contract with an insurance company which guarantees the amount of pension to be paid in return for the contributions made by the employer and employees. There is, however, no governmental supervision to ensure that the assets of other plans are being accumulated at an appropriate rate to meet the future liabilities of those plans. Among these other plans I include both trusteed plans and those plans where an insurance company enters into a deposit administration contract and simply receives contributions on deposit without entering into a contract to pay specific amounts of annuity.

I should make clear at once that there is no necessity and no intention to cast doubts upon the vast majority of private pension plans which are efficiently and conscientiously administered by insurance companies and by personal or corporate trustees. What is projected is a degree of supervision of trusteed pension plans, in the public interest, comparable in some respects with the supervision traditionally exercised over insurance companies. Many people may be surprised to learn that no such supervision has existed in the past.

I warmly welcome the growing indications of provincial interest in this field. The governments of both Ontario and Saskatchewan have recently given evidence of their concern. The government of Ontario has indicated its desire to discuss this question with the other provincial governments and the federal government during the coming months. This interest of these provinces is particularly important because of the constitutional aspect of the problems.

This government shares the view that a joint federal-provincial approach should be made. To this end the government intends to arrange consultations with any interested provinces to give further definition to such a program and thus to provide encouragement for the more widespread establishment of pension plans. Accordingly, I am announcing at this time that the federal government has decided to seek the co-operation of the provinces in a program to deal with the solvency and portability of private pension plans.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Two years too late.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Better two than 22.

In the March, 1960 budget I announced the intention of the government to introduce legislation to incorporate a new approach to the taxation of employees' profit sharing plans. Hon. members will recall that a bill dealing with the taxation of deferred profit sharing plans was given first reading only. This course was followed in order to give full opportunity to all interested citizens and organizations to study this complex issue.

The interest shown in the proposals introduced for study last year has been most gratifying. The briefs, letters and comments I have received have been of great assistance in preparing the legislation which I am now proposing. The substance of last year's draft bill will be brought forward, with several alterations and improvements, into this year's bill to amend the Income Tax Act. The legislation will provide that an employee will not be subject to income tax on amounts contributed to a profit sharing plan on his behalf by his employer until actually received as proceeds from the plan. As I stated last year, the improved facilities provided for employees' profit sharing plans will constitute an important piece of social legislation and provide fresh opportunities for labour and management to work out new forms of co-operation amongst themselves.

If parliament approves the recommendation for deferred profit sharing plans it will greatly increase the number of cases where an employee may receive a lump sum payment representing accumulated earnings which have not borne tax. If a taxpayer becomes a non-resident before receiving these payments there is at present no provision for levying a tax. This incentive to become a non-resident for a short time in order to gain a tax advantage should be removed. I am proposing that lump sum payments which represent deferred remuneration earned in Canada be regarded as income earned in Canada. This will apply only to lump sum payments. On the other hand, pensions paid to former Canadians who have become residents of other countries will continue to be free of Canadian tax.

There will be several amendments to the personal income tax designed to give relief. Last year this house approved a proposal to increase substantially the maximum amount of medical expenses for which a deduction may be claimed in arriving at taxable income. I believe that the amounts now deductible are sufficiently high to give full relief to most taxpayers who have incurred extraordinary medical expenses, but I am impressed with the intolerably heavy burden being borne by a small number of taxpayers whose expenses are in excess of the present limits. A single motor accident, for example, may cause a taxpayer more extraordinary medical expense in one year than another taxpayer would incur in a lifetime. Since the whole purpose of the deduction for medical expenses is to give relief to those taxpayers whose ability to pay income tax has been reduced by extraordinary expenses, it seems both logical and fair to remove the limits entirely, and I am so recommending. I am also proposing that the cost of an instrument which assists those who have suffered from cancer of the throat, an electronic larynx, be classed as a medical expense.

An intensive review is being made by the United States tax authorities of the treatment for tax purposes of contributions by residents of the United States to charitable institutions in other countries. During the past year there have been expressions of concern by Canadian universities and by their graduates and other supporters in the United States that the existing system might be changed to their detriment as a result of this review. In the past donations made through a United States corporation to a charitable institution in another country have been treated as deductible for purposes of taxes in the United States. There has never been a corresponding privilege in our income tax law, although there are, of course, residents of Canada who make contributions to universities and other charitable organizations in the United States. Because of the particularly close relations between Canada and the United States it is desirable and feasible to permit some exceptions to the general rule which denies a deduction in respect of donations to charitable organizations located outside Canada. Thus our income tax convention with the United States provides some limited exceptions and our estate tax convention with the United States recently approved by the house, contains a more general provision for ignoring the border as far as charitable organizations are concerned. We have accordingly notified the United States authorities that whenever they are ready, Canada is prepared to enter into negotiations to amend the provision of the income tax convention that deals with charitable donations. In the meantime, it is understood that the United States authorities are aware of the close relations between universities in one country and their graduates and friends residing in the other and are anxious to maintain and foster these traditional relationships.

In the 1960 budget speech I drew attention to another matter which was marked for special study during the year. This was the problem of the taxation of corporation surpluses and the designation of surplus under section 28(2) of the act. I appreciate the many carefully considered observations and suggestions that have been submitted in answer to my request. With the assistance of these submissions members of the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue have been engaged in a comprehensive study of these provisions of the income tax law. This study has not yet advanced to the stage where

I can place specific proposals before parliament. This subject will continue to receive close attention during the coming year.

I am proposing a comprehensive overhaul of the definition of a personal corporation and the rules for taxing shareholders of such corporations. A personal corporation is one used to hold the investments of the individual and persons related to him. All the income of such a corporation is deemed to be distributed to its shareholders each year. It has become apparent that this legislation contains some anomalies and some provisions which are lacking in clarity. I have reached the conclusion that the time has come for a revision of this complicated piece of legislation. Some of the proposed changes will be relieving. For example, I am proposing amendments concerning the right to carry forward losses and the option to compute tax in a special way on the recapture of capital cost allowances. These are introduced in response to requests that income received through a personal corporation should be granted the same tax treatment as income received directly. Other changes will be designed to prevent personal corporations being used to split income with members of a taxpayer's family and to thwart devices for postponing tax on income from investments.

Hon. members are aware of the many ways in which the income tax law provides incentives to taxpayers to develop our natural resources. At present, in addition to corporations whose principal business is mining or producing petroleum or natural gas, corporations whose principal business is processing mineral ores and metals recovered therefrom are allowed to deduct expenses incurred in exploring and drilling for minerals, oil and gas. I am proposing to extend these incentives by permitting companies whose principal business is fabricating metals to deduct such exploration expenses. In future, therefore, these companies will have a greater incentive to search for their own supplies of raw materials.

Other amendments proposed for natural resource industries will permit a mining, petroleum or natural gas company to deduct preproduction expenses incurred by a former subsidiary.

Our income tax law must be continually reviewed and adjusted not only to provide appropriate encouragement to the legitimate needs of taxpayers but also to achieve equity among them. The government has become increasingly concerned over the evidence of abuse by some taxpayers of the provisions for the deduction of amounts expended for the purpose of gaining income from a business. The question is to what extent amounts spent by a firm for the entertainment of its customers and the travelling expenses of its employees are really required in order to gain income. Since ours is a free enterprise economy, our income tax law assumes that the businessman is the best judge of the extent to which he should incur expenses of this nature, and naturally the government has been reluctant to recommend, and parliament to impose, rules that would restrict him unduly in this respect. However, the government has no intention of allowing so-called "expense account living" to thrive and I am consequently serving notice that in future the allowance of expenses of this nature will be subject to more intensive scrutiny. I am hopeful that more stringent legislation will not prove to be necessary.

One of the most important factors affecting the income tax status of a person, either individual or corporate, is the determination of his country of residence. I am proposing that a corporation incorporated in Canada which is carrying on business in this country be deemed to be resident here. I am also proposing that the provision deeming an individual who is a member of the military or public services on duty outside of Canada to be a resident shall extend to his wife and dependent children so that they will have the same tax status.

Finally, I am proposing that volunteer firemen be relieved of income tax on amounts up to $300 per year paid to them to cover expenses they incur while engaged in fire-fighting duties.

SALES AND EXCISE TAXES

I am proposing a number of changes in commodity taxes. The first of these concerns the structure of the tax on cigarettes imposed under the Excise Act. This tax is levied at the rate of $4 per thousand for cigarettes weighing not more than 2½ pounds per thousand. If cigarettes weigh more than this limit the tax is $5 per thousand. I am recommending that this dividing point where the higher rate of tax commences to apply be raised so that in future cigarettes may be manufactured weighing as much as three pounds per thousand before becoming subject to the higher rate of tax. This will permit manufacturers to increase the amount of tobacco in each cigarette without becoming liable for a higher tax. I am assured that this will lead to a signifiant increase in the amount of tobacco used in the cigarette industry. This will bring substantial benefits to Canadian tobacco growers. In order to give all cigarette manufacturers time to make any necessary modifications in their equipment to take advantage of this change the amendment will not become effective until January 1, 1962.

With the exception of the taxes on tobacco products and wines, most of the taxes imposed under the Excise Tax Act are on an ad valorem basis. A tax in this form at the rate of 10 per cent or 15 per cent amounts to a very small amount per article where the taxable items are manufactured or imported at a very low price per unit. I have reached the conclusion that greater uniformity in the amount of tax on a number of items is desirable, especially as between imported and Canadian manufactured commodities. For this reason I am proposing that the present 15 per cent ad valorem excise tax on electronic tubes for radios, television sets and record playing devices be modified to provide that the tax shall in no case be less than 10 cents per tube. Similarly I am proposing that the 15 per cent ad valorem tax on radios shall bear a minimum of $2 per radio and the 10 per cent ad valorem tax on mechanical lighters shall be not less than 10 cents.

Turning to the sales tax, I am proposing several technical changes for clarification and also a number of exemptions from tax. These new exemptions, which are intended to recognize new products and technological changes, include laminated timber for bridges purchased by municipalities, self-propelled forage wagons for farm use, a new kind of casing used for seismic tests in oil and gas exploration and propane tanks for use with furnaces.

In addition to taxes on commodities, the Excise Tax Act contains a provision for imposing a 10 per cent tax on insurance premiums when insurance is placed with non-authorized insurers. There appears to be an increasing tendency on the part of non-resident corporations carrying on business in Canada, and also Canadian corporations which are controlled outside of Canada, to arrange their fire and casualty insurance in respect of risks in Canada either with insurers which are not authorized to transact the business of insurance in Canada or with insurers that are so authorized but through agents or brokers located outside Canada. Undoubtedly these practices stem from a desire to make all insurance arrangements at the head office of the corporation or at the head office of the parent corporation, as the case may be, rather than from any lack of adequate insurance facilities in Canada.

Since the practices referred to result in loss of insurance business that would otherwise be transacted in Canada and some loss in tax revenue otherwise payable to Canada, it is proposed as a first step to amend the provision of the Excise Tax Act which at present imposes a tax of 10 per cent of premiums paid by Canadian residents to unauthorized insurers in respect of insurance of property in Canada. The amendment will extend the tax to make it apply to all classes of insurance, whether of property or not, subject to certain exceptions. The exceptions proposed will be marine risks, as at present, life insurance, personal accident and sickness insurance and, to the extent that such insurance is not available in Canada, insurance against nuclear risks. The practice of arranging insurance of risks in Canada through non-resident agents and brokers is currently being studied and further steps, if found necessary, may be taken to curb this undesirable practice.

ESTATE TAX

I am not proposing any amendments to the Estate Tax Act this year. This act, originally passed in 1958 and amended last year, appears on the whole to be working satisfactorily. There have been a few representations suggesting changes, and these have been given careful study, but I believe that more experience with the law as it stands would be desirable before further amendments are made.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

Last August the government appointed Professor V. W. Bladen as a commissioner to inquire into the problems of the Canadian automotive industry. May I now, on behalf of the Prime Minister, and with the consent of the house, table copies of his report in French and English.

The most complex of the recommendations are those relating to the tariff rates on vehicles, and parts and components for assembly into vehicles. Hon. members will recall that the structure of our present automotive tariff schedule, which took shape a quarter of a century ago when Canada was a large exporter of vehicles, presents the following features. The rate against complete vehicles is 17½ per cent when imported from countries eligible for most favoured nation tariff rates, but free when imported from British countries. Most parts may also be imported free from British countries, although little use has been made of this provision. When parts are imported from M.F.N. countries they are subject to duties ranging from 17½ per cent to 25 per cent; but many of these parts may nevertheless be imported duty free, even from M.F.N. countries, if they are not made in Canada and if the Canadian manufacturer uses them in producing vehicles that attain specified levels of commonwealth content.

Professor Bladen proposes that we should build upon, but substantially develop and modify, this system. The essential features of his proposals in the tariff field are as follows. A tariff of 10 per cent should be imposed against imports of both parts and vehicles from British sources, while present tariff rates against vehicles and parts from M.F.N. countries, ranging from 17½ per cent to 25 per cent, would remain in effect. However, a manufacturer could, under this system, "earn" free entry not only of parts but also of vehicles by achieving or arranging a sufficiently high volume of production in Canada; this production, which could be of completed vehicles or of parts, might be sold in Canada or abroad. For example, exports of particular parts or vehicles from Canada to other countries would earn, for a manufacturer, free entry for other parts or vehicles. Thus, it is argued, the Canadian industry would be more effectively integrated with industry abroad, and the economies of longer runs and greater output would be available here. The objectives would be higher production and more jobs in the Canadian automotive industry, combined with lower prices for Canadian consumers. These goals involve the general expansion, not restriction, of trade in motor vehicles and parts.

The government warmly approves these objectives, and it is grateful to Professor Bladen for the constructive and imaginative suggestions that are embodied in his report. Nevertheless, his recommendations relating to tariffs are complex and sweeping, and would require extensive readjustments in the industry. It is essential that those concerned, both management and unions, should have an opportunity to assess not merely the objectives but the desirability and practicability of the means by which these objectives are to be obtained. Accordingly the government, in releasing this report tonight, urges careful study of the tariff proposals by all those Canadian groups concerned: the vehicle manufacturers, the parts manufacturers, the labour unions, the municipalities, others who gave evidence before the Bladen commission, and the general public.

If, when the views of such groups have been received and analysed, it was decided to take action in the field of tariffs along the lines of the Bladen report, or along some similar lines, the government would fully respect Canada's commercial obligations and would thus protect Canada's trading interests. The government is fully aware of its various obligations under the GATT, including the undertakings most recently given to the United Kingdom at the time of the commonwealth trade and economic conference in 1958 to bind free entry for these items under the GATT. However, as I have already indicated, the consultations or renegotiations with governments abroad would not be undertaken unless and until the government had reached decisions to proceed in the national interest, taking into account the views of interested parties in Canada.

I proceed now to the recommendation that relates to valuation for purposes of the sales tax. According to the present law, sales tax on imported vehicles is levied on the price in the country of export plus Canadian tariff, if any. On the other hand, on vehicles of domestic manufacture it is levied on the price paid by dealers. As a result of his studies Professor Bladen has concluded that this system discriminates in favour of imported vehicles. In effect he recommends that imported vehicles should be valued on the basis of the selling price to the dealer. Along with the tariff recommendations, the government proposes to give careful study to this recommendation which touches upon a basic principle of the Excise Tax Act.

Professor Bladen's report contains a secondary and much less important recommendation which also relates to valuation. It is proposed that a "notional" valuation should be established, for tax purposes, as if there were a wholesale intermediary between the manufacturer and retailer. This recommendation also will be carefully studied.

Finally I come to the recommendation of far-reaching importance relating to the excise tax on passenger cars. This tax, which is now 7½ per cent, constitutes according to Professor Bladen, a serious drag on sales of automobiles in Canada. He anticipates that the abolition of this tax will increase sales of automobiles substantially, and enlarge employment and production in the Canadian industry. Accordingly he recommends that this tax be abolished.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear. We have been pushing this for years.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am glad to announce that the government has decided to implement this recommendation. This tax will be repealed effective midnight tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: At last.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A refund of the 7½ per cent excise tax will be given to authorized dealers and distributors in respect of tax already paid on stocks of new cars on hand.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A victory for the opposition.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I seem to hear a voice that says, "A victory for the opposition".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I recognize a voice which belonged to a former government that raised this tax, not lowered it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The former government cut it 15 per cent.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This will relieve them of any loss resulting from the tax decrease. Dealers will apply for the refund through the automobile manufacturer. I expect, of course, that automobile producers and dealers will pass on to the consumers this tax saving in full.

After taking into account the increase in production which is expected to result, I estimate that the elimination of the 7½ per cent excise tax will result in a net loss in revenue for a full year in the order of $66 million. For the current fiscal year the loss in revenue, including refunds to dealers, will be about $55 million.

THE 1961-62 BALANCE OF WAYS AND MEANS

I return now to a reassessment of our budgetary prospects for the current year in the light of the fiscal proposals and economic policies which I have put before the house.

In the opening sections of my speech this evening I said that in the absence of any changes in the current economic outlook or of any additional stimulus we might anticipate this year an increase of about 3 per cent in our levels of economic activity.

As a result of the policy statements and legislative proposals I have now made I would expect a significant improvement in our economic prospects. It is difficult, however, to be precise in forecasting the exact degree or timing of this acceleration, since it depends to a considerable extent on the co-operation and vigour of business and labour and of the financial markets and investment institutions.

To the extent that our expansion is accelerated there will be an increase in revenues, although, as I said earlier, the time lag in revenue receipts means that a considerable amount of the benefits of economic acceleration will not reach the treasury until after the end of this fiscal year. There will also be some reductions in expenditures as, for example, in unemployment assistance and unemployment insurance expenditures, and perhaps in the deficits of the C.N.R. and other crown companies.

As the expansion of output, employment and incomes accelerates, taxation revenues will in due course increase still more rapidly. On the basis of the present situation and anticipated trends it is not unreasonable to expect that the current flows of revenue and expenditures will be approaching a balance by the end of 1962. Indeed, as our economy reaches high levels of employment, it is essential that the budget should achieve a balance, and that provision should be made for an orderly retirement of debt.

I estimate that the effect of the income tax changes proposed, not including the reduction in personal and corporation income taxes which are part of the proposed fiscal arrangements with the provinces, will be about $35 million in a full year and $10 million in 1961-62. The effect of the proposed changes in sales and excise taxes will be $66 million in a full year and $55 million in 1961-62. The total tax reductions therefore will be about $100 million in a full year and $65 million in this fiscal year. As I have already indicated, the other federal tax reductions effective January 1, 1962 will amount to $300 million per annum.

With the stimulus imparted by these budget proposals to the levels of economic activity I would expect a general rise in our tax revenues between now and next March 31 to offset the particular tax reductions I have proposed. Assuming some consequential reductions in expenditures I would anticipate a budgetary deficit of the order of $650 million. May I remind hon. members that in as large and as complex an operation as our national government any forecast of revenues or expenditures is inevitably subject to variations. One per cent of our revenues or expenditures is approximately $60 million. Hence it would be more realistic to say that our prospective deficit is in the $600 million to $700 million range. I estimate that our non-budgetary cash requirements, excluding the exchange fund, will be about $330 million. Thus our over-all cash requirements will be of the order of $1,000 million.

For the record, Mr. Speaker, may I have the consent of the house to insert here two tables indicating our revenues, expenditures and cash requirements for the past year and for the current year.

RELATIONS WITH THE BANK OF CANADA

It is necessary, in the light of recent events, that I say something tonight about relations between the government and the Bank of Canada. What I have to say relates in part to the past and in part to the future.

Let me begin with the past. On June 14, when I explained to the house the reasons why the government had been compelled to ask for the resignation of the governor of the bank, I said that Mr. Coyne's continuation in office "would stand in the way of the implementation of a comprehensive, sound and responsible economic program designed to raise the levels of employment and production in Canada". Such a program is contained in the budget that I have presented tonight.

No doubt there are some proposals in this budget with which Mr. Coyne may find it possible to agree. It is in the basic elements that the differences lie. This budget is built, as hon. members will have observed, on four foundation stones.

Mr. Pickersgill: Rolling stones.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had better look out that they do not roll over him.

Each sustains an element of economic policy which is central and indispensable. Yet not one of the four is compatible with statements, many times reiterated in various and sometimes extreme forms, by Mr. Coyne.

First, the government believes that Canada is, and for her prosperity must remain, a law-abiding member of the international financial and commercial community. The financial and commercial proposals that I am laying before the house tonight accord not only with Canadian interests, but also with Canadian international obligations. Mr. Coyne's speeches, on the other hand, exude ultra-protectionism and isolationism. The purposes and policies which they represent could not be carried out within the framework of the international institutions of which Canada is and must be a member. When he speaks of "living within our means" he really invites us to "live unto ourselves", in a private restrictionist world of our own. As a member of the government of one of the great trading nations of the world, I categorically reject any such invitation; the policies involved would be as damaging to our domestic prosperity as they would be to our international influence.

Mr. Pickersgill: Poor old R.B.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Poor old Bonavista-Twillingate.

Second, the government believes that flexibility in our structure of interest rates can often be, and is indeed in times like the present, of importance to the pace of economic expansion, and the level of employment, particularly through its influence on the balance of international payments; and the government also believes that the Bank of Canada has an important role to play in this connection. Mr. Coyne, on the other hand, in his last annual report and in many other statements, argues that interest rates have little influence on economic development and that the central bank has, in any case, little influence on interest rates and the balance of payments.

Third, the government believes that the exchange rate, like rates of interest, should be flexible and should move with the times; while a premium over the U.S. dollar may well have been appropriate and helpful to Canada's economic position some years ago, today a discount will be appropriate and helpful to agriculture and fisheries, to primary and secondary industry, to our exporters, our tourist industry, and to the community at large. Further, the government believes that monetary policy and interest rates in Canada have an important role to play in relation to a flexible exchange rate. Mr. Coyne, on the other hand, in frequent speeches and most recently before the Senate committee on manpower and employment on April 26, reserved his most extreme strictures for proposals for "depreciation of the international exchange value of the Canadian dollar" and for use of monetary policy in this connection.

Fourth, the government believes that, in times like the present, a substantial budget deficit can promote economic expansion, with more jobs and better living standards for many thousands of Canadians; and such a fiscal policy will be the more effective if it is accompanied by appropriate flexibility of interest rates and exchange rates. Mr. Coyne, on the other hand, has been preaching all across the country a far more austere and rigid doctrine. Government fiscal policies in general, and government deficits in particular, have received more of his broadside attacks than any other element in our economy.

Mr. Coyne has publicly and repeatedly rejected all the four foundation stones of this budget. Moreover, at both my meetings with the governor on March 18 and again on May 30, after I had told him of the harm done by his public speeches, he asserted firmly and emphatically that he took back nothing he had said in those speeches, that he had been right in what he had said, and withdrew nothing. How then could the government invite him to consider and support it? How could the government ask him to co-operate in its implementation? I can think of nothing more cynical or more insulting than to approach the governor of the Bank of Canada with a request that he should approve and implement policies with which he is known to be in fundamental disagreement. Accordingly, rather than allow Mr. Coyne to continue to stand in the way of constructive and expansionist measures of a kind which he had publicly opposed, the government asked him to resign. This budget and Mr. Coyne were simply not compatible.

Let it not be thought that this incompatibility was just another instance of the age-old battle which, so the historians tell us, has from time to time been waged between the bankers and the politicians, with the bankers attempting to "crucify mankind upon a cross of gold" and the politicians seeking to remedy every economic malady with a dose of inflation. It is nothing of the kind. Long before the government decided that it would have to ask for Mr. Coyne's resignation, leading Canadian bankers, were criticizing the policies and activities of the governor of the bank. These criticisms by presidents or general managers of the following chartered banks were made in prepared public speeches at their annual meetings last winter or subsequently: the Canadian Bank of Commerce, the Imperial Bank, the Bank of Montreal, the Bank of Nova Scotia, the Royal Bank of Canada, and the Toronto-Dominion Bank. The policies and activities about which the senior officers of these banks expressed their concern related to the level of Canadian interest rates, the level of the Canadian exchange rate, or to the manner in which central banking operations had been carried on. How could the government ask Mr. Coyne to share in the implementation of programs and policies in fields where he had already provoked an unprecedented round of protests from so many of our leading financial institutions?

When speaking in the house on June 14 I indicated that Mr. Coyne did not command the confidence of his board of directors or of the government. It is also clear that he has not been able to enlist the confidence of the financial community. This has emerged from their public statements. It has also emerged from their inability to interpret his activities in the purely monetary sphere. To my deep regret he has been unable to achieve any real meeting of minds with those with whom he should be in constant and confident contact. In these circumstances it became impossible for the government to rely on him to give the type of leadership which is expected at all times from the governor of a central bank and which will be particularly needed in the months ahead.

I am quite aware that without consulting the governor I am tonight proposing policies, including those affecting interest rates, which extend into the area of influence and authority of the central bank. It was necessary to do so on this occasion only because Mr. Coyne refused to make way for a successor with whom, had he been appointed in time, I could and would have consulted. I make this explanation tonight, not only for the benefit of the many people, at home and abroad, who are naturally and properly concerned about the status and stature of our central bank, but also for the benefit of those who are naturally and properly concerned about the status and stature of the new governor.

It is the intention of the government that the position and prestige of the Bank of Canada should be restored. Let it be recalled that the first governor, who graced that office for 20 years, was appointed by a government headed by the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. It is the intention of this government to restore the active and intimate cooperation between the bank and the government, the bank and the public, which was maintained so effectively and continuously in earlier years.

It will remain the duty of successive governments and successive ministers of finance to protect the bank and its governor from the transient and irresponsible pressures to which those who manage our money supply will, in the nature of things, be subjected from time to time. But this does not and cannot mean that any government can continue to stand idly by when a governor is espousing policies which, in its best judgment, are not in conformity with the public interest and when he is also stating opinions that are in fundamental conflict with government policies outside the field of central banking. In such a situation it would always be the duty of the government to ask the governor to resign and, in the almost incredible event that he should refuse, to submit the matter to the ultimate high court of parliament.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Speaker, I said at the outset that in more than usual measure this is an economic budget. In that respect it is a logical sequel to the supplementary budget of last December. It proposes through an appropriate blending of fiscal, financial and commercial policies to impart an impetus to the economy, to enlarge production, to employ unused productive capacity, to stimulate growth, to increase trade, and thus to expand employment opportunities for our people. It seeks to raise the levels of savings and investment by Canadians and to make better use of Canadian capital in the development of our resources. It aims to achieve a more dynamic pace of growth and a balanced development for all regions of our country and all sectors of our economy. It offers credit, incentives and research aid to assist industry to gird itself to meet the challenge of new and vigorous competition. It brings a flexible program of action to bear upon the needs of this time and to serve the nation's long term interest. It challenges all people to hard work and self-discipline. It appeals for co-operation between business and labour.

It contemplates a large deficit and proposes to use that deficit as a means of stimulating the economy. It offers, notwithstanding, a reduction of $100 million in taxation where the reduction is most needed and can be fruitful in stimulating productive effort. It reminds the country that three years ago we faced the prospect of an even larger deficit during a recession when inflation also threatened, and that the country achieved recovery in that year.

(Translation):

Canada becomes an ever more mature nation, both politically and economically. Her growth in this past year has experienced a slackening and a pause, but there has been growth. From that experience she can draw renewed confidence, strength and fitness for the tasks and challenges ahead. These recent toils and trials Canada will transform to new triumphs.

RESOLUTIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide among other things:

1. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years the maximum annual rate at which a taxpayer carrying on business in Canada may deduct expenditures of a capital nature made by him in Canada in respect of scientific research shall be increased from 33⅓ per cent to 100 per cent.

2. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years the requirement that the amount deductible on account of expenditures in respect of scientific research shall not exceed 5 per cent of the taxable income of the taxpayer in the preceding year unless the research program has been approved be removed with respect to expenditures which are not of a capital nature.

3. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years a non-profit corporation constituted exclusively for promoting or carrying on scientific research in Canada that expends all amounts received by it on such research shall be exempt from tax and amounts contributed to it shall be deductible as current expenditures in respect of scientific research.

4. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years a corporation constituted exclusively for charitable purposes be permitted to include donations to Her Majesty in right of Canada, or a province or a Canadian municipality, in the amount such a corporation must expend each year in order to qualify for exemption from income tax.

5. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years the present maximum limits on the amount deductible in computing taxable income on account of medical expenses be repealed.

6. That amounts paid on and after January 1, 1961 for or in respect of a laryngeal speaking aid be included in the medical expenses that are deductible in computing taxable income.

7. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years an amount paid by an individual in the year on account of legal expenses incurred to collect salary or wages owing to him by an employer be deductible in computing income.

8. That for the 1958 and subsequent taxation years an amount not exceeding $300 received by an individual in the year from a municipality as an allowance for expenses incurred while carrying out the duties of a volunteer fireman be not included in computing income.

9. That provision be made in respect of a new class of profit sharing plans under which

(a) amounts allocated by the trustee shall not be included in the income of an individual who is a beneficiary under the plan until the year in which they are received,

(b) no tax shall be payable by the trustee under the plan on the taxable income of the trust, and

(c) an employer may deduct in computing income for the year an amount which when added to his contribution, if any, under a registered pension fund or plan does not exceed $1500 per employee.

10. That after June 20, 1961 any payment by a resident of Canada which is

(a) a lump sum payment out of or pursuant to a superannuation or pension fund or plan,

(b) a payment upon retirement of an employee in recognition of long service,

(c) a payment to an employee or former employee in respect of loss of office or employment,

(d) a payment under a profit sharing plan (to the extent that the amount thereof would be included in computing the payee's income for the year if the payee were a resident of Canada), made to an individual who is a non-resident of Canada and who during the five years preceding the year of payment was a resident of, or employed in Canada, for a period or periods the aggregate of which was 36 months or more, shall be deemed to be income for the year from duties performed by him in Canada but nothing in this paragraph shall apply to a payment which can be established to be one of a series of payments to be continued at regular intervals during the life of the recipient.

11. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years where an individual residing outside of Canada is deemed to be resident in Canada because he is an officer or servant of Canada or a province his wife residing with him (if she was previously resident in Canada) or his dependent child shall also be deemed to be resident in Canada.

12. That for the 1962 and subsequent taxation years a corporation incorporated in Canada that is carrying on business in Canada shall be deemed to be resident in Canada.

13. That for the 1961 and subsequent taxation years the deduction from income allowed to a corporation whose principal business is mining or producing petroleum or natural gas or processing mineral ores or metals recovered from mineral ores, in respect of expenses incurred in searching for minerals in Canada or exploring or drilling for petroleum or natural gas in Canada be extended to a corporation whose principal business is fabricating metals.

14. That with respect to the taxation years of a personal corporation commencing on or after September 1, 1961 the manner of taxing shareholders of a personal corporation and the definition of a personal corporation be revised and in particular

(a) that carrying on active business shall not disqualify a corporation from being a personal corporation unless the income from carrying on a business exceeds 50 per cent of the income of the corporation,

(b) that a personal corporation may include a corporation controlled by any group of individuals resident in Canada all the members of which are related persons,

(c) that a corporation controlled by one or more trusts or estates shall be a personal corporation if it otherwise qualifies,

(d) that the income of a personal corporation for a year shall be deemed to have been distributed to its shareholders in proportion to their shareholdings instead of in proportion to amounts transferred to the corporation,

(e) that where a taxpayer has transferred property to a personal corporation and he does not receive by way of dividends on shares in the corporation, or by way of interest on amounts owing to him by the corporation, an amount at least equal to 5 per cent per annum of the value of the property or unpaid balance, any amount deemed to have been received as a dividend by his spouse or child shall be deemed to have been received as income from property transferred from the taxpayer to the extent of the difference between the said 5 per cent and the amount he actually received.

(f) that losses incurred in the previous five years that were not previously deductible shall be deductible in computing the amount of income of a personal corporation that is deemed to have been distributed to its shareholders in a year, and

(g) that where an amount is included in the income of a personal corporation as a recapture of capital cost allowance by virtue of section 20 of the act a shareholder may elect to pay a special reduced tax on his portion of the recaptured capital cost allowance in the same manner as if he had received the recaptured amount directly.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

15. That rates of income tax be reduced and related changes made in order to implement certain fiscal arrangements with the provinces commencing April 1, 1962 and that the act be amended as may be necessary to implement an offer of the government of Canada to enter into agreements for the collection of income taxes imposed by the provinces and in particular

(a) that the income tax otherwise payable by an individual in respect of income earned in a province of Canada be reduced by

(i) 16% for the 1962 taxation year

(ii) 17% for the 1963 taxation year

(iii) 18% for the 1964 taxation year

(iv) 19% for the 1965 taxation year

(v) 20% for the 1966 taxation year,

(b) that the rate of tax on the taxable income earned in a province of Canada by a corporation other than a non-resident-owned investment corporation or a corporation specified in schedule D to the Financial Administration Act that is an agent of Her Majesty be reduced by 9 percentage points in respect of taxable income earned after December 31, 1961 and before January 1, 1967.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide among other things:

1. That the excise tax of 7½ per cent on automobiles adapted or adaptable for passenger use be repealed.

2. That the excise tax of 15 per cent on radio broadcasting receiving sets be changed to two dollars or 15 per cent per set, whichever is the greater.

3. That the excise tax of 15 per cent on tubes for phonographs, record-playing devices, radio broadcasting receiving sets, television receiving sets or any combination of the foregoing be changed to ten cents or 15 per cent per tube, whichever is the greater, and restricted to tubes the sale price of which does not exceed five dollars per tube, but without affecting picture tubes for television receiving sets the excise tax on which shall continue to be 15 per cent.

4. That the excise tax of 10 per cent on devices commonly or commercially known as lighters be changed to ten cents or 10 per cent per lighter, whichever is the greater.

5. That laminated timber for bridges and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax when sold or imported by municipalities for their own use and not for resale.

6. That additives for fuel oil for heating and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax.

7. That blowers used in warm air systems for heating buildings and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax.

8. That thermostats for use with permanent heating systems for the heating of buildings and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax.

9. That propane bulk tanks for use with furnaces for the heating of buildings and directly connected to such furnaces and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax.

10. That the exemption from sales tax for "Ducts for warm air systems for heating "Building Materials" in schedule III, be comin their manufacture" be changed to read "Ducts for warm air and ventilation systems for buildings, but not including materials used in their manufacture".

11. That precast concrete piles and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax.

12. That the exemption for "doors" and the exemption for "Door and window screens", now appearing under the heading "Building Materials" in schedule III, be combined and changed to read "Doors for buildings and door and window screens", and the exemption for "Prepared roofings", now appearing under the heading of "Building Materials" in schedule III, be changed to read "Prepared roofings for buildings".

13. That prepared dry concrete mixes and materials used in the manufacture thereof be exempt from sales tax.

14. That the exemption from sales tax for feeds "for fur-bearing animals whose pelts have commercial value" be amended by deleting the words "whose pelts have commercial value".

15. That the exemption from sales tax for "Preparations, chemicals or poisons for pest control purposes in agriculture or horticulture, and materials for use exclusively in the manufacture thereof", be changed to read "Preparations, chemicals or poisons (other than pharmaceuticals) for pest control purposes in agriculture or horticulture, and materials for use exclusively in the manufacture thereof".

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) begins, may I have, for the record, the consent of the house to table the royal commission's report?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, we have always known that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) abhors brevity but I think he exceeded himself tonight, because this is perhaps the longest budget speech on record. There is very little other than the massive amount of time involved which justifies the massive amount of words contained in this document. I think, after the stirring discussions and speculation concerning the budget during the last ten days there will be many who will wonder what this was all about, particularly when the minister, who has presented himself by his record in a role that he is not accustomed to, in the eyes of most of us, in these new robes described himself as an expansionist.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Finance has read, as so many of us have, Mr. J. K. Galbraith's book "The Liberal Hour". In view of the fact that he referred to himself last week as an expansionist, I had the feeling that he had perhaps read it. However, after hearing the phony hesitations in his budget proposals today, at this time of our sick economy, I rather doubt it. I should like to point out to the Minister of Finance that in that book Mr. Galbraith says that unction even buttressed by pomposity is no substitute for good evidence. I think as this debate proceeds we will discover who is an expansionist and who is not.

We end up with a great expansion program which is going to cost this government $100 million in income taxes through income tax reductions. That is the extent of tax reductions which are normally expected in a budget proposal. The minister says that more than anything else the government is concerned with employment. He was in charge of the treasury last year and has been in charge of it for the past four years, yet there was no statement last year that more than anything else the government was concerned about employment and unemployment.

I wish to quote from what the minister said a year ago when he was concentrating with great glee, from the point of view of economic planning most unfortunately, on the target of a balanced budget. In his speeches from January to June, 1960, which I have read, we find the following which is typical of the philosophy of his economic program in so far as the federal government is concerned. The big enemy was inflation. He did not foresee the difficulties that the unemployed were going to be in and have been in to the extent of 700,000 during the past winter. They are still in that difficulty. We received a statement today that there are 38,000 more unemployed than there were a year ago when we had our last budget from the Minister of Finance. This is what he said:

> The lesson we should draw from experience is that in a period of economic expansion—

That is what he was planning for on March 31, and how wrong he was. I continue:

> —such as we are now enjoying in Canada we must all avoid doing those things which are likely to encourage a forced or excessive growth in spending. If we fail to act in this way we will be faced with the distortions and instabilities which cause economic recessions.

At the very time that he made that statement in January there were, according to the bureau of statistics, 504,000 out of work and seeking work. He did not change his views very rapidly with the change of the economic conditions. He held the same views almost six months later. This can be seen by looking at a speech he made in St. John's, Newfoundland, on June 29, 1960. He said:

> The position we have now reached, with its sound prospect of a fully balanced budget—

This is not what he said tonight. He went on:

> —represents the fruits of carefully designed policies; it is not something that just happened.

This is the way he was planning it. I do not know who he was listening to at that time, but I want to say that before he prepared his budget in March of last year the Canadian Press, an independent organization, had this dispatch on March 8 under the byline of Alan Donnelly. He saw the split between the economic views of the opposition, the needs that were felt on the part of the opposition, that should be satisfied at that time through fiscal measures as against the attitude of those on the government benches that all was well. Mr. Donnelly's opening statement in the article was written three weeks before the budget. He stated that a basic split had developed between government and opposition as to whether the Canadian economy is growing fast enough.

But that was not the view of the Minister of Finance. He had concentrated on one thing and one thing alone, namely a balanced budget. When I heard him say in the house the other day that he was now an expansionist, I knew very well that he had not been an expansionist in his four years on the treasury benches. He has not that reputation in the business community. In fact, they almost universally felt that he had—and in their opinion fortunately—taken over some of the reins in connection with guiding economic policy which in their opinion was unduly led for political purposes by the Prime Minister. There was much rejoicing in the fall of 1959 and much praise was given to the minister and he preened himself on it, that he was now the strong man in connection with financial policy. It was not for expansionist ideas that he was getting the praise at that time. Therefore when I heard the minister last week describe himself as an expansionist tonight I was prepared to say that this budget represents Fleming's flip-flop. I think events prove that he still has to convince the country that he is living up to his word that his chief concern is employment when he is prepared to recommend changes in his financial resolutions which involve a sacrifice for the treasury in tax reductions of only $100 million. Still we are beginning to learn now why we have such a late budget.

We have known we have not been able to get policies advanced, except following unusual delay, because of the naked divisions with respect to economic policies on the part of this cabinet. We have it divided into Jeremiahs and Pollyannas, but unfortunately they do not stay in the same camp. I have great sympathy for the chairman of the cabinet in attempting to achieve government solidarity on those vital decisions which must be made. What we have here tonight is a report of a deficit between $600 million and $700 million. This is another form of insurance. The minister gives himself that leeway. He is getting a little frightened of his own forecasting as is indeed the country, because he gives himself a margin for which he normally does not ask. It is very much like his decision last year when estimating the gross national product to remove the traditional stipulations that the gross national product forecast would be based on stable prices, nothing untoward abroad and reasonable production in agriculture. But the minister has been wrong three years in a succession in estimating the G.N.P., upon which many economic plans are made. He was wrong three years ago to the extent of 50 per cent. He was 50 per cent wrong with respect to the increase. He was wrong two years ago to the same extent and in his white paper which was presented the other day we find the situation is getting worse. He was two thirds wrong. The increase was only one third of what he estimated last year might be the case. So we have an unplanned deficit of this proportion, by accident, by miscalculation or perhaps simply by arithmetical errors which have come from the minister in the past.

The minister had some pious words in connection with what might be done in the bond market for the provinces and municipalities. He will give them a short term chance, he said, to get into the market on long terms. But what does this mean when it is stacked up against cash needs on the part of the federal government of $980 million compared with the $210 million which was in the minister's forecast last year?

The minister never makes any apology with respect to these very widespread miscalculations in his basic estimates. He always has somebody else to blame. It is never himself; it is never the government. I recall that in 1958 it was the Liberals who were to blame. In 1959 his miscalculations and difficulties were due to the United States. In the following year they were due to Europe; and, then of course prior to the presentation of this tremendous miscalculation and budget they are due to Mr. Coyne. Much more will be said about that in the course of this debate.

Again tonight the minister has informed us that we have a massive program to deal with the unemployed. That was his aim, he said, last December. In his baby budget he said that they had also proposed a number of major projects. He then referred to the Columbia power development, which this government has muffed. He referred to the Winnipeg flood control, and what progress has been made there to get jobs in these six or seven months. He referred to the Great Slave railway, and we have only received the resolution on that. It has never been dealt with.

These are some of the massive developments of a dynamic nature that were referred to tonight that we would hope are being pushed for the benefit of the unemployed.

The minister had some words to say very early in respect of housing. Well, the depth of the slough into which this industry got, at a time when we needed the employment in that industry was due, according to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker), to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). The Minister of Public Works said in connection with mortgage lending that the tap was turned off at the behest of the minister. According to a press release the Minister of Public Works washed his hands of the situation when he said that the direct lending policy was restricted for fiscal reasons. In other words, the reason was the aim for a balanced budget; that was the sole target of the Minister of Finance and not unemployment about which he has spoken tonight.

I wish to deal with this question of just how expansionist the minister has been. I have examined the budget which I call the Mark I budget. Most of us looked at it yesterday, and compared it with the Mark II budget presented by the Minister of Finance. I find that in almost all items it is not the governor of the bank who seems to be restrictionist but it is the Minister of Finance whose program seems to fall short of the recommendations for expansion contained in the Mark I budget. I can substantiate this position very easily, but will not do so now. To the extent that the recommendations in this Mark I budget have been acted upon, it is certainly very obvious that in these respects the Minister of Finance seems to be reaping what he did not sow.

Last week the Minister of Finance told us that the governor of the Bank of Canada had not seen tonight's budget. It is quite clear when one reads so many of the items contained in this budget that if the governor did not see the minister's budget, then the Minister of Finance did see the proposals made by Mr. Coyne. Time after time, they seemed to be very close to the proposals that were in our hands yesterday. The public will judge who is expansionist and who is restrictionist.

I did notice one particular item in which there was quite a differentiation. I refer to the minister's proposal which he outlined in these words, in effect, that it is desirable to provide income tax law incentives to taxpayers who develop our natural resources. He was prepared to extend benefits under the depletion allowance program to these industries. This, of course, was the most obvious conflict with the proposals of Mr. Coyne because Mr. Coyne said, in connection with his Canadian program, depletion allowances permitted in the field of mining and oil should be re-examined. These allowances are not related to the amount of capital invested and employed in the enterprise. He goes on to say that the granting of depletion allowances to large foreign companies or their subsidiaries enables them to take out of Canada tax free profits many times as large as any capital they put into Canada in the first place, in addition to normal profits subject to normal tax. It is here we perhaps have as radical a clash as any when we find similar proposals in the Mark I and Mark II budgets.

There are many items in the budget which of course will be welcome. I think particularly of the largest item of tax sacrifice, the reduction of the 7½ per cent excise tax on automobiles. Perhaps to that extent, we can call this resolution the Essex East resolution. Here again, the government did not go as far as Mr. Coyne recommended for the automobile industry in what I call the Mark I budget. In addition to that, it now appears clear why we have not received the Bladen report until now. I want to say to all members of the government that, while there was much rejoicing with respect to the reduction of this tax on automobiles, and while the Minister of Finance is taking off the 7½ per cent tax at the federal level, his friend in Queen's Park, the premier of Ontario, is going to impose a tax in August that will take away half of this benefit.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Because of the policies of this government.

Mr. Grafftey: Do not forget Lesage.

Mr. Benidickson: In the light of the lavish publicity last week it would appear that the government, which has done very little in this field for four years, is trying to show the public, I think unconvincingly, that at long last it is going to start to be a ball of fire in economic matters. Unfortunately, I think most of us are persuaded that it has not been the economic charts that have stirred this government into action but it has been the unfavourable political polls. These have had a greater effect upon something more being done this year than was done last year.

An hon. Member: What about the by-elections?

Mr. Benidickson: The Liberal party got a larger percentage of the votes than did the Conservative party in those by-elections.

In conclusion, I suggest that the minister has not gone very far in this much heralded flip-flop. There has not been much progress revealed in so far as increased production and the provision of jobs is concerned. There was a flip-flop or deathbed repentance on the part of the Bennett leadership, and we found then that this did not get very much accord. The flop is more remembered in so far as that period of five years is concerned, than the flip which was so radical in 1935.

On motion of Mr. Benidickson the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: The business of the house for tomorrow will be Bill No. C-113 relating to the national energy board which bill is in committee of the whole house, followed by the estimates of the departments of public works, forestry and transport.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it the intention to have budget debate on Thursday and Friday and estimates on Saturday?

Mr. Churchill: Certainly on Thursday.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister indicate the business, if possible, for the rest of the week?

Mr. Churchill: I am waiting to consult with the gentlemen on the other side of the house. I have been waiting for two days to do that in order to determine what their wishes are with respect to completing the business of this session.

It being forty three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

WINTER WORK EMPLOYEES, CAPE BRETON HIGHLANDS NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 252—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. How many men were furnished with winter work in the Cape Breton Highlands national park from each of districts 7A, 7B, 15, and 8 respectively of Victoria county?

2. How many men from each district were married at the time they were employed?

Answer by: Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. District 7A, 36; District 7B, 77; District 15, 17; District 8, 4.

2. District 7A, 34; District 7B, 70; District 15, 16; District 8, 4.

BUDGET PAPERS

presented by the Honourable Donald M. Fleming, M.P.,

for the information of Parliament in connection with the Budget of 1961-1962

FOREWORD

The purpose of these Papers is twofold:

1. to present a general economic review of 1960, bringing together in one place and in convenient form some of the more comprehensive indicators of economic conditions prepared by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the Bank of Canada and other Government Agencies, together with brief comments;

2. to present a preliminary review of the Government Accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1961.

PART I

ECONOMIC REVIEW OF 1960

The tables in this Budget Paper are based upon estimates provided by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the Bank of Canada and other Government Agencies. Some of the figures appear for the first time; others have been published elsewhere. All 1960 estimates are preliminary and subject to revision.

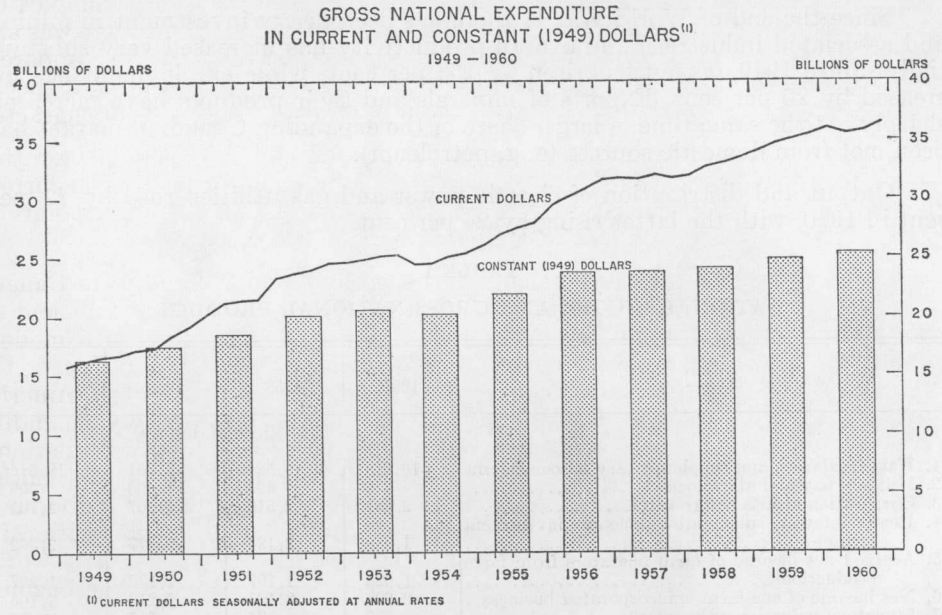
ECONOMIC REVIEW OF 1960

The year 1960 was, for the Canadian economy, one of special complexity. A high level of economic activity was continued; on the other hand there was also a high level of unused capacity, human and material. It is already apparent that there was an unusual conjuncture of economic forces, some of a special nature, others recognizably "cyclical", and still others of longer-term character.

It seems desirable that this year's "Economic Review" should be rather more extensive than those of past years. Since a broader perspective on current developments is particularly necessary, this Review pauses at many points to look back over past years and to compare trends in other countries.

Many of the broad developments in the world which affected us in Canada in 1960 have been widely discussed. A brief recital of them is sufficient to recall them and their impact upon the economy: the rebuilding with modern plant and equipment of the industrialized countries of Europe and Japan; the efforts of the underdeveloped countries of Asia, Africa and South America to achieve a sufficient rate of economic growth to support their rapidly expanding populations; the long-awaited dismantling of direct controls on the international movement of goods and capital; the rapid acceleration in the pace of scientific and technological advance, with all that that implies for nations and individuals, for economies and occupations; the emergence of more intense competition for markets and materials; the growing interdependence of the western world, expressing itself in closer integration of the policies of governments and business groups.

It is against such a broad and developing background that the following Review is presented.



THE NATIONAL ACCOUNTS

National Income and Product

Economic expansion in Canada in 1960 experienced a number of adjustments including: the aftermath of the United States steel strike which led to declines in United States economic activity and in purchases from Canada; an inventory readjustment within Canada (and in the United States); and a lower level of housing starts. At the same time, exports to overseas countries rose sharply in response to strong demand. These developments all affected the rate of production throughout the year, and thus the levels of employment, income, savings and investment, and imports. The adjustments were of a temporary character, but happened to coincide with certain long-run economic developments within the Canadian economy. These were: a rapid growth in the labour force, the appearance of temporary excess capacity in certain raw material producing industries, and the continuation of further changes in industrial technology. These developments occurred at a time when competition, both domestic and foreign, was becoming more intense.

Gross National Product in Canada rose to $36.0 billion in 1960, 3.2 per cent above the level of 1959. Two-thirds of this gain represented an increase in actual production; the increase in prices moderated and was largely confined to certain services and to capital goods.

As between the four quarters of the year, the first quarter showed some improvement; thereafter the economy hesitated until the latter part of the year when elements of increase more than offset those of decline. The rate of Gross National Product at the year-end was $36.4 billion, about 1 per cent above the average for 1960 as a whole.

As between the various sectors of the economy, it is apparent that the output of the service-producing industries rose slightly more than that of the goods-producing industries in 1960. Indeed, all of the major service industries showed some further growth. The volume of trade, both retail and wholesale, continued to expand. The steady growth in the sales volume of food stores, along with a moderate increase in other lines, more than offset a slight decline in the volume of sales of motor vehicles (new and old) and their accessories and supplies, and a substantial reduction in sales by lumber and building material dealers, associated with the fall-off in housing activity. Activity in the transportation industries rose in spite of declines in railways and urban and interurban transit systems. Substantial increases took place in air transport, trucking, shipping and through-put of pipelines. These developments in transportation reflect gradual changes in the structure of the industry. Economic activity in the communication industries continued to expand significantly, along with finance, insurance and real estate. There was some decrease in the volume of personal services. However, all other service groups continued to grow including government service at the provincial and municipal levels, business, recreational and community services.

Economic conditions in the goods-producing sector were more varied, although there was a gain on balance. A larger and higher quality grain crop more than offset the decline in livestock and poultry production and the total volume of agricultural output rose by more than 3 per cent over 1959. The substantial increase in production in forestry largely reflected the recovery which followed the prolonged strike of 1959.

For the year 1960 as a whole, output in mining was 1 per cent higher than 1959, although during the year the trend was slightly downward. The amount of exports, investment and profits attributable to mining all increased. The production of fuels and non-metals rose, while quarrying and metal mining declined. A 10 per cent drop in the output of iron ore, reflecting adjustments in United States demand following the steel strike, was a major contributing factor.

Since the end of World War II there has been heavy investment in mining and associated industries, and overall productivity has increased very substantially. Since 1949, output has risen by 153 per cent, while employment has increased by 20 per cent. Exports of minerals and their products have increased sharply. At the same time, a larger share of the expanding Canadian market has been met from domestic sources (e. g. petroleum).

Output and distribution of electric power and gas utilities rose by 11 per cent in 1960, with the latter rising by 24 per cent.

The movements in manufacturing production were diverse both within various sectors as well as within the year. In total, the volume of manufacturing output declined by 0.3 per cent for the year, with non-durables rising by 1.4 per cent and durables falling by 2.4 per cent. Total manufacturing production reached a peak in January, 1960, and then declined. From this peak, manufacturing production of durable goods fell by about 10 per cent to mid-year and then recovered partially. The decline in non-durables during the same period was more modest, amounting to about 3 per cent. Some renewed strength in the fourth quarter of 1960 brought production of non-durable goods close to the levels of the early part of the year.

In terms of the average for the year, most of the non-durable industrial groups showed an increase in output. Tobacco products, foods and beverages, printing and publishing, paper products and petroleum products recorded small gains. Production of miscellaneous manufactures and chemical products rose substantially. It is of special interest that the products of these two groups also showed sharp gains in export sales. The production of leather products, rubber products, clothing and textiles declined.

With the exception of non-ferrous metal products, all the durable manufactures group declined in terms of changes in yearly averages. However, there was a 7 per cent increase in production of motor vehicles which eased the decline in the transportation equipment group. Sales of new passenger vehicles rose, both for domestic and foreign-produced automobiles.

Construction activity in total was down 5 per cent for the year, although it was rising in the last half of the year. There was little change in non-residential building, while the volume of residential building fell by 17 per cent. Private investment construction was 9 per cent lower in 1960 and public investment construction was 2 per cent higher.

It is useful to set the movements during the year 1960 against the background of longer-run changes in the structure of the economy, as revealed by changes in the composition of Gross Domestic Product. The following table shows percentage shares by industry for selected years from 1926.

GROSS DOMESTIC PRODUCT AT FACTOR COST: PERCENTAGE DISTRIBUTION [1]

Industry	1926–1928	1936–1938	1947–1949	1953–1954	1957–1959

NOTE: Detail will not necessarily add to 100.0 due to rounding.

[1] It should be remembered that the table depicts percentage shares so that, against a background of rising economic activity, a smaller share may represent increasing production.

Small changes over short periods of time are difficult to interpret, but over longer periods some rather broad movements can be observed. Over the entire period, the relative contribution to total production attributable to agriculture has declined substantially while other industries have generally increased or remained fairly stable. Despite the relative decline in agriculture, its actual volume of output has been rising as a result of substantial capital investment and the application of newer techniques developed through extensive research. At the same time, the agricultural labour force has declined, so that output per farm worker has risen by about 75 per cent from 1947–1949 to 1957–1959.

The shares of manufacturing, mining, construction, trade and public administration and defence rose from 1926–1928 to the immediate postwar period, and have remained relatively stable or increased slightly in the past ten years.

The Budget—Appendix

The shifts in industrial structure and the accompanying changes in investment, output and productivity are reflected in changes in the per capita Gross National Product. In current dollar terms, the per capita G.N.P. in Canada more than trebled from 1929 to 1957–1959, as it did in the United States. It is interesting to note that the increase in Canada since the end of World War II has been considerably more rapid than in the United States, as shown in the following table (Canadian G.N.P. has been expressed in U.S. dollars for purposes of comparison):

Turning to developments in the labour force, during 1960 average employment rose by 100,000 persons, or 1.7 per cent. This gain was more than accounted for by an increase of 117,000 in non-agricultural employment. The rise in employment was accompanied by a slightly shorter work week in manufacturing. Total output per man hour probably showed a slight increase for the year. At the same time that employment was rising by 1.7 per cent, the labour force jumped by 2.8 per cent, or 175,000 persons, and the average number of unemployed during the year increased by 75,000 to equal 7 per cent of the labour force. In 1960, women accounted for the major part of the increase in the labour force, as job opportunities in the expanding service industries attracted an increasing percentage of the female population.

The extraordinary gains made in recent years in the civilian labour force call for comment. These gains have been extraordinary, not only in relation to previous periods of Canadian history, but also in contrast to more modest increases in other industrialized countries.

The sharp gains in the Canadian labour force have been brought about by three main factors: the high birthrate since the mid-1940's; large-scale immigration in the postwar period; and rising rates of participation in the labour force by women, especially married women. The last factor is largely a reflection of the ability of married women to carry on their household duties in fewer hours due to major technological advances in the home, and of the increasing opportunities for women in the service industries where demands have been steadily growing. Immigration has not been as important in the past two years as it was earlier in the 1950's. More important to the present growth of the labour force are the large numbers of young Canadians, born in the mid-1940's and now seeking employment.

We turn now to the income flow in 1960. National income increased by 2.6 per cent, slightly less than the growth in Gross National Product. Labour income, investment income and farm income all rose more than national income, while corporation profits and unincorporated business income declined from 1959 levels.

Labour income reached $18.5 billion in 1960, 4.2 per cent higher than the previous year. The number of paid workers was 2.3 per cent higher; average hourly earnings in manufacturing were about 3 per cent higher and the average work week was fractionally shorter. Most of the increase in employment was among females in the relatively lower paid service industries and occupations. The rise in consumer prices was of the order of 1 per cent, and on a per capita basis there was a slight rise in real disposable income.

Preliminary estimates of corporation profits (after dividends paid abroad) amounted to $2,735 million, down by 6 per cent from 1959. During 1960, corporation profits fell from the first to the second quarter and for the remainder of the year were more or less stable. For the year as a whole, profits were lower in manufacturing, trade and in the transportation, communication and storage group. Within manufacturing, profits declined in iron and steel, wood products, electrical apparatus and supplies and the non-metallic minerals industries. There were moderate gains in the paper products and petroleum and coal products groups. Despite an increase in the value of trade, profits declined, as selling prices remained relatively stable while costs edged up. There were substantial gains in profits in the mining, quarrying and oil wells group, as exports increased and the exchange value of the U.S. dollar rose. There were also gains in the profits of financial services and of public utilities.

Rent, interest and miscellaneous investment income was 4 per cent higher than in 1959. Net rental income showed some decline as increased expenses more than offset some gain in gross rents.

Accrued net income of farm operators rose to $1,207 million, 7 per cent above 1959, while the numbers engaged in farming declined by 2 per cent. The number of people engaged in farming in 1960 was 37 per cent below the level of 1949 and the volume of farm output was 21 per cent higher.

Farm production increased in the year, the value of the grain crop rising by 11 per cent, more than offsetting some decline in the value of animal production. Farm cash income (excluding supplementary payments totalling $77 million) was about the same as in 1959. In contrast to 1959 when farm inventories were drawn down, there was a modest gain in holdings.

Net income of "other unincorporated business" declined by 5 per cent, with small increases in a number of industries failing to offset significant drops in construction and trade profits.

The Budget—Appendix

National Expenditure

For 1960 as a whole and despite the adverse pressures referred to earlier, the economy was sustained by increases in demand by consumers, government and purchasers abroad. New investment in business fell slightly, outlays for new housing declined more, and the level of total inventories, including farm stocks, was almost unchanged. These rather broad movements obscure important developments within the year, which will be discussed presently.

The flow of incomes to individuals was increased during the year as a result of increases in wages, farm incomes, investment incomes and transfer payments from government, all of which provided support for higher consumer spending. Government spending on current goods and services and on capital investments also rose, while Canada's exports of goods and services once more rose to record levels. The value of housebuilding activity fell sharply during the first half of the year, although this trend was reversed by year-end when housing starts began to rise sharply in response to various governmental measures introduced in the latter part of the year. There was a slight decline in business investment in plant and equipment. All told, the combination of domestic and foreign demands for Canadian goods rose by $1.2 billion, which was met, on balance, from Canadian production. This is indicated by the fact that total imports of goods and services were almost unchanged from 1959. As a result, the proportion of total demand filled by imports was at about the lowest level of the past decade.

During 1960, the increases and decreases in total production were reflected by changes in purchases for final use and in the levels of inventory holdings. In the early part of the year, final purchases slowed down but inventory stocks were being built up rapidly so that G.N.P. rose. During the second quarter, final purchases declined, particularly for export and housing, and the inventory buildup was smaller so that total economic activity declined. By the third quarter of the year, final purchases were rising again, but part of this increased demand was met by drawing down inventories so that the rise in current economic activity was not as great as it might otherwise have been. By the final quarter of the year, both final purchases and inventory holdings were rising and Gross National Product rose by 1.7 per cent. Erratic patterns of purchasing throughout 1960 took place in all major sectors except government which rose steadily throughout the year and provided consistent additional strength to the economy.

Turning to particular sectors, consumer spending rose by 4.1 per cent for 1960 as a whole, the real increase being about 3 per cent. The gain in population was 2.1 per cent in 1960 so that the "average" consumer increased his real spending on goods and services by nearly 1 per cent. Spending on goods rose by 3.4 per cent, with most of the gain taking place in non-durables. The major gains in non-durable spending were in food, tobacco and alcoholic beverages, clothing, electricity and gas. In the durable goods sector there were declines in net purchases of second-hand cars and in purchases of furniture, household appliances and radios, the changes in the latter groups being related in part to lower levels of housing completions. On the other hand, as a result of a year-end spurt, purchases of new cars rose by 7 per cent. In 1960, the sales of British and European cars increased by 20 per cent and sales of North American models rose by 5 per cent, so that the overseas share of the Canadian car market continued to increase. However, in the last months of 1960, the increasing overseas share of total Canadian car sales appears to have slowed down, and in December, 1960, was below the proportion achieved one year earlier.

Spending on services continued its long-term rise, gaining 5.3 per cent over 1959. The largest gain was in hospital and medical care, which rose by 9 per cent. There were also substantial increases in payments for shelter, household operation (e.g. electricity, gas, repairs), recreation and personal care and service. Payments for user-operated transportation were almost unchanged.

[2] The book value of inventories is deflated to remove the effect of price changes and the derived "physical" change is then valued at average prices of the current period to obtain the value of physical change. The difference between this value of physical change and the change in book value is called the inventory valuation adjustment (see line 7, Table 1).

[3] Minor adjustments have been made to the figures of current receipts and payments shown in Table 35 and in "The Canadian Balance of International Payments, 1957 to 1960", Dominion Bureau of Statistics, to achieve consistency with the other component series.

In this connection, purchases of gas, oil, grease, and automobile parts were also unchanged, so that total operating costs of private automobiles did not rise in 1960, despite a larger number of vehicles on the road. This may be attributable in part to the increasing use of smaller cars.

Prices of consumer goods increased by 0.6 per cent in 1960, with non-durable items (mainly food) rising by 0.8 per cent and durable goods prices declining by 0.4 per cent. Thus, the volume of durable goods purchases was slightly higher than the fractional gain shown by the value figures. Prices of services, especially medical costs, rose, the average increase being 2.2 per cent, thereby continuing a long-term trend. From 1949 to 1960 prices of services rose by 53 per cent while prices of goods rose 19 per cent.

Expenditure on goods and services by all levels of government rose in 1960 by $300 million, or 4.7 per cent above 1959 to a level of $6,716 million. Of this total, capital expenditures amounted to $1,588 million, increasing by $65 million over the previous year. The gain in total expenditures on goods and services by governments was more than accounted for by provincial and municipal governments, which increased their purchases by $393 million. There was a decline in spending on goods and services by the federal government of some $93 million, all of it occurring in the non-defence area. Defence expenditures were virtually unchanged from the year before.

As previously noted, business fixed capital formation declined for the year 1960 as a whole by 4.1 per cent or $282 million and about 6 per cent in volume.

The value of new housing activity declined in 1960 to $1,476 million from $1,734 million in 1959. Housing starts fell by 23 per cent to 109,000 units in 1960 from 141,000 units in 1959. There was a good deal of evidence to indicate that the decline reflected, in part, a less pressing demand for accommodation resulting from the very large increase in the supply of housing achieved in previous years. The declines took place during the early part of the year, since by April housing starts had begun to improve moderately. In the fourth quarter of the year, starts were back to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 131,000 units, and this improvement has carried forward into 1961. The improvement in housing in the last half of 1960 was associated with a greater availability of mortgage credit, as N.H.A. rates became more attractive to the lending institutions (other than the chartered banks which are not authorized to lend at rates in excess of 6 per cent) and as C.M.H.C. increased its direct lending. At the same time, a further liberalization of the N.H.A. regulations made it possible to acquire houses with smaller down payments and to obtain mortgage money for longer maturity periods.

The number of housing units actually completed declined less than the number of new starts, the comparative statistics are: 124,000 units in 1960 and 146,000 units in 1959. Completions in 1960 were below the level of the two previous record years but above the level of 1957.

Outlays for private non-residential construction amounted to $2,567 million, fractionally below the level of 1959. The price "deflator" rose by more than 2 per cent so that the implied decline in volume was about 3 per cent. There were some offsetting increases and declines. Construction outlays were slightly lower in manufacturing, trade and some business services and higher in mining, quarrying and oil wells.

Investment in new machinery and equipment was unchanged from 1960, amounting to $2,569 million. Actually, this figure has only been exceeded in the extraordinary years of 1956 and 1957. The 1960 level was 9 per cent below such levels. The absence of any change in the total level of new investment in machinery and equipment concealed a significant increase in investment in manufacturing and an offsetting decline in investment in utilities. Those affected were mainly electric power and railways, the latter reflecting the near-completion of the dieselization programme.

The accumulation of inventories in the economy in 1960 totalled $316 million, or very close to the 1959 total of $297 million.

However, changes during the course of the year were substantial, with large accumulations in the first half of the year being followed by a liquidation in the third quarter and a modest increase in the last quarter of the year. While the annual figures show virtually no net effect on production, the movements described were very large; from plus $752 million in the first quarter, adding to current production, to minus $132 million in the third quarter, depressing current production. The "swing" in inventories thus totalled $884 million, or equivalent to about 2½ per cent of the Gross National Product.

The buildup of manufacturing inventories in the first half of the year took place while shipments were declining and stock-sales ratios rising. The most significant increases took place in holdings of finished goods. This acted as a dampener on manufacturing production later in the year when increasing demands were met out of inventories rather than by means of new production. The liquidation of inventories in the last half of 1960 began with raw materials and goods in process, but in the final months of the year stocks of finished goods were also worked down. Although total liquidation of manufacturing stocks lessened in the final quarter of 1960, there was actually a heavier drawing down of durable goods inventories, particularly in the iron and steel industry, and an accumulation of some non-durable goods.

The shifts in inventories in 1960, while of major significance to the pace of total economic activity, were far less than in previous postwar periods. The shifts from the high point of accumulation to the low point of liquidation for non-farm business inventories are shown below, in relation to the level of Gross National Product.

The more moderate shift in inventories in 1960 reflects, in the main, changes in the basic economic environment. As compared with earlier periods, supplies were ample in 1960 and deliveries were quick. Businessmen did not expect significant price changes and were not tempted to speculate against price increases. There has been a greater concern for costs, and high inventory holdings impose additional interest costs and other costs on business. Finally, newer techniques of inventory control have made it easier to operate with lower levels of inventory stocks.

Exports of goods and services reached $6,957 million in 1960, setting a new record, about 4 per cent above 1959. Imports of goods and services were little changed from 1959, and totalled $8,148 million. The balance of payments deficit amounted to $1,191 million (on a national accounts basis), $248 million or 17 per cent below the 1959 deficit of $1,439 million.

Looking at Canada's foreign trade over a longer period, from 1950 to 1960 when world trade was expanding rapidly, Canadian exports and imports of goods each increased by about three-fourths. From 1953 to 1960, Canadian exports and imports of goods each rose by nearly one-third. From 1956 to 1960 a different picture emerges: exports of goods continued to rise by 12 per cent while imports of goods were almost unchanged. Thus, the import of goods by Canada in relation to the Gross National Product was 17.4 per cent in 1950, 16.8 per cent in 1953, 18.2 per cent in 1956 and only 15.4 per cent in 1960.

Likewise, the proportion of the total supply of Canadian goods and services (including imports), met by imported goods and services, was lower in 1960 than in earlier periods. For the four years 1950, 1953, 1956 and 1960 the percentages were respectively: 20.0; 18.9; 20.1; and 18.5.

Personal Income* and Its Disposition

Personal income rose to $27,442 million in 1960. All components, with the exception of non-farm unincorporated business income, showed increases, with the largest percentage increase coming from government transfer payments. The gain in personal income, 4.3 per cent above 1959, was greater than that of national income, which increased 2.6 per cent. One reason for this was the 13 per cent rise in government transfer payments to persons which do not appear in national income. Another reason was the enhanced flow of interest and dividend payments to persons which, along with net rental incomes, rose 5 per cent. Total corporation profits, which appear in national income and not in personal income, declined by 6 per cent. The increase in transfer payments consisted of a number of items including: higher family allowances and old age security payments resulting from a larger population; higher payments to farmers including the special payment to western grain producers; a larger flow of unemployment insurance benefits; increased provincial payments to hospitals under the Dominion-Provincial Hospitalization Scheme and in the form of grants; and higher provincial grants to universities and other non-profit organizations.

Personal direct tax yields increased by 13.2 per cent over 1959 to a total of $2,358 million. Personal income tax payments at the federal and provincial levels rose by 13.4 per cent, reflecting higher levels of personal income and a higher average rate of tax in 1960. In 1959, the new rates of federal taxation were applicable only to the latter half of the year, while in 1960 the new rates applied to the full year. Succession duty payments increased by 21.5 per cent, while miscellaneous taxes, including premiums under the hospital insurance scheme and licence fees for private automobiles, rose by 6.7 per cent.

After deducting direct taxes from personal income, the residual, personal disposable income, amounted to $25,084 million, 3.5 per cent above 1959.

* It should be noted that incomes of "persons" in the personal account include those of non-profit organizations and unincorporated businesses as well as of individuals.

DISPOSITION OF PERSONAL INCOME[(1)]

Personal saving*, or disposable income less consumer spending, totalled $1,675 million in 1960 compared with $1,754 million in 1959. Personal saving as a percentage of disposable income was 6.7 per cent in 1960 and 7.2 per cent in 1959.

The ratio of personal saving to disposable income in Canada over the period 1949 to 1960 averaged 6.7 per cent. Over the same period in the United States

* Personal saving is represented by changes in assets and liabilities of persons and includes, for example, changes in liquid assets (cash, bonds and stocks), life insurance, consumer and mortgage debt and the value of inventory changes of unincorporated business and farmers.

the ratio was 7.2 per cent. This is of considerable interest, since over these twelve years the average per capita personal disposable income in the United States was $1,642 U.S., while in Canada it was $1,172 Canadian. That is to say, on an average income almost 30 per cent below his United States counterpart, the "average" Canadian saved nearly the same proportion of his income.

Source and Disposition of Saving

Total saving in 1960 amounted to $5,834 million, about 2 per cent below the level of 1959. Business saving rose about 1 per cent offsetting for the most part the small decline in net personal saving to which reference was made above. On a national accounts basis, the combined deficit (i.e., negative saving) of all levels of government increased from $536 million in 1959 to $809 million in 1960. Almost five-sixths of the increase in the deficit was accounted for by provincial and municipal governments, their combined deficit rising from $174 million in 1959 to $398 million in 1960. The federal government deficit (on a national accounts basis) increased from $362 million to $411 million.

The accompanying tables on source and disposition of saving outline the major sources of saving in the economy, although the tables are not designed to show the flows of saving between sectors. For example, while the largest element in total saving in 1960 was accounted for by business saving, this was less than business investment, so that business as a whole would have been a net borrower. The government surplus or deficit is measured on a national accounts basis which is described in a subsequent section. It should be noted that government expenditure includes outlays of a capital nature. In terms of the sector accounts, a government surplus represents national saving and a government deficit represents dissaving.

The table dealing with the disposition of national saving shows the use of these savings both in terms of business capital investment (including inventories) and in net foreign investment.

Business saving rose from $5,062 million to $5,121 million from 1959 to 1960 despite a 6 per cent decline in corporation profits. The decline in profits was partially offset by a decline in income tax liabilities, whereas dividend payments remained stable. Undistributed corporation profits were about $100 million lower in 1960 than in the preceding year, but depreciation and similar allowances of the entire business sector grew by $148 million, so that business gross saving increased.

Changes in total saving are naturally and closely related to changes in total income, which in its turn is a reflection of the total value of production. Table 18 lists year-to-year changes in the Gross National Product and in total savings. The accompanying chart traces quarterly movements of total national saving from 1950.

Investment and Capital Expenditure

Private and public capital expenditure totalled $8,200 million in 1960, 2.6 per cent below the level of 1959. The decline was more than accounted for by reduced activity in housing which was lower by $263 million or 15 per cent. On balance, all other investment increased by $46 million. Capital expenditure was 22.8 per cent of the Gross National Product, below the levels of the period of extraordinary resource development in 1956 and 1957, but about the same as earlier years in the decade.

During the past decade, capital investment in Canada both public and private has continued at high levels. Indeed, the ratio of investment to Gross National Product has remained well over 20 per cent, one of the highest rates in the western world. This investment includes a wide variety of projects: resource development, manufacturing plant, transportation and communication facilities, fuel and power projects, trade, finance and commercial services, housing, hospitals, schools and government departmental expenditures.

The lower level of capital investment and smaller share of the G. N. P. in 1960 compared with 1956 and 1957 reflect, in the main, the completion of major resource developments. By nature, much of this type of investment requires a "bunching" of investment outlays. It is not physically possible, or economically feasible, to install small yearly increments in a project such as, for example, a hydro-electric power development. Once completed, these investments serve major needs for a number of years until the accumulation of gradually rising demands, both at home and abroad, impels a further expansion of facilities. Since the completion of the latest round of expansion in some major basic industries, there has been a shift to other types of capital including housing, social capital (e. g., schools, hospitals), government outlays (e. g., roads, highways, sewers, airports, docks and other engineering works) and service industries. These outlays have offset to a considerable extent the declines in investment which have taken place in industries such as mining and power. The following percentage distribution of capital investment shows the picture over the past five years.

Turning to 1960, new investment in agriculture, fishing and forestry rose modestly over 1959. In mining, quarrying and oil wells there was a sharp 12 per cent gain over the preceding year although both the level of new investment and its share of total investment were well below 1957.

Manufacturing investment in 1960 rose by 4 per cent over 1959; new construction declined by $24 million but investment in new machinery and equipment rose sharply by $72 million, or nearly 10 per cent. There were significant increases in iron and steel products, paper products and chemical products, where export sales grew rapidly in 1960, and smaller increases in food and beverages, rubber products, textile products, and non-ferrous metal products. There were declines in investment in a number of manufacturing industries including wood products, printing and publishing, transportation equipment, non-metallic mineral products and products of petroleum and coal.

New investment in utilities declined about 5 per cent in 1960. This group is defined as electric power, gas and waterworks, and transportation, storage and communication. Investments in this area are often huge and show sharper changes over the years compared with many other industries. There were declines in investment in electric power, gas distribution, railway transport (reflecting the near-completion of the dieselization programme and of rail lines to certain mining areas) and telegraphs, water and motor transport, and grain elevators. On the other hand, there were increases in urban transit, telephones, broadcasting, and in the group comprising air transport, warehousing, oil and gas pipelines and toll highways and bridges. The latter group showed a substantial increase of $42 million, and reflects the changing forms of transportation in Canada.

New investment in trade declined by $15 million, about 4 per cent. In the finance field, there was a decline of $18 million, more than accounted for by smaller outlays of real estate companies engaged in developing, owning and leasing properties.

In the service field, investment in commercial services declined by $13 million, but institutional services increased their outlays by $40 million, most of it in schools. Outlays for hospitals totalled $153 million, about $1 million higher than in 1959*. Almost all capital outlays for schools and a substantial share of outlays on hospitals are included under government expenditure on goods and services. Capital outlays by government departments rose to $1,277 million, 3 per cent above 1959. All of the gain took place at the provincial and municipal level; federal department outlays declined by $26 million.

* According to the Outlook for Private and Public Investment, 1961, capital outlays for hospitals are to rise by $112 million this year.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE CAPITAL EXPENDITURE

Revenue and Expenditure of all Governments

On the National Accounts basis, the combined deficit of all levels of government in 1960 was $809 million,* compared with $536 million in 1959. An increase in revenue during 1960 was more than offset by a larger increase in expenditures at all levels of government. The major portion of the increase in the deficit for 1960 occurred at the provincial and municipal levels since the deficit of the federal government was only moderately higher in 1960 than in 1959.

To obtain a comparison, on a National Accounts basis, between government expenditures and the Gross National Expenditure, it is necessary to limit the comparison to government expenditures on goods and services (as distinct from transfer payments), since these are the only government outlays included in the Gross National Expenditure account. In 1960, expenditures on goods and services by the combined levels of government represented 18.7 per cent of Gross National Expenditure compared with a proportion of 18.4 per cent in 1959. In 1949, before the Korean war and the related rearmament programme, this proportion was 13 per cent. Largely as a result of the buildup in defence expenditures the proportion rose to approximately 18 per cent in 1952. In the years from 1952 to 1960, the rise in government expenditures on goods and services has been very slightly in excess of the growth in Gross National Expenditure.

Within the total, however, there have been considerable changes as between the shares attributable to different levels of government. As is evident from the table below, provincial and municipal government expenditures on goods and services have increased as a proportion of Gross National Expenditure, while the share of federal government expenditures is now lower than in 1952.

* The following section discusses only those government transactions relevant to the National Accounts. As a result, the figures used may not agree with those shown in other Public Accounts. Table 26 indicates the reconciliation between federal deficit or surplus for purposes of the National Accounts and the comparable figures appearing in the Public Accounts. In particular, federal corporate income taxes have been adjusted to an accrual basis. In 1959 this adjustment increased revenues by $101 million and in 1960 decreased revenues by $223 million.

Government expenditures on goods and services as recorded in the Gross National Expenditure account include expenditures not only on current administrative costs but also on construction and on machinery and equipment. These items are in the nature of capital investment, but are not treated as investment expenditures. Expenditures of this type made by all levels of government during the period from 1958 to 1960 are set out in the following table.

The expenditures on other construction cited in this table cover a great variety of projects. Final data are not yet available giving a detailed analysis of government outlays on new construction for either 1959 or 1960. While total expenditures for this purpose in 1960 were somewhat higher than in 1958, the general pattern of expenditure on various categories of construction can be illustrated by means of detailed data for 1958 in the table below.

account, it is necessary to take into account certain other government outlays. After making this adjustment to the statistics, it appears that in 1960 the total of all government expenditures increased by $917 million, or 8 per cent, to an amount of $12,106 million. It should be noted that in terms of the impact of the government sector on the economy, this figure constitutes gross government expenditures since, in addition to direct expenditures on goods and services, it includes government outlays on transfers to persons, interest on the public debt, subsidies and transfers to other levels of government. These payments may in turn be used by the recipients for expenditures on goods and services. The table below indicates the percentage distribution of total government expenditures among these items in 1959 and 1960.

One of the outstanding features in the government sector over the past decade has been the very large growth in transfer payments to persons. These expenditures have not only increased in absolute terms but also as a proportion of total government outlays. While in 1953 transfer payments represented 22 per cent of all government expenditures, by 1960 the proportion had risen to almost 26 per cent. The sharpest growth in transfer payments has taken place in the years since 1956. This has been the result, at the federal level, of the increase in benefits payable such as family allowances, old age security and unemployment insurance and, at the combined provincial and municipal levels, of the growth of payments by the provinces under federal-provincial hospital insurance arrangements. In relative terms, the growth at the provincial-municipal level has been, as the following table indicates, rather larger than that at the federal level.

EMPLOYMENT AND EARNINGS

Before examining the changes in employment in 1960 it may be helpful to review some of the trends in the labour market which have been observable in recent years. In the past decade a significant change has been taking place in the demand for labour in the Canadian economy, reflecting the various changes in the demand for products and services that have characterized the economy. In particular, the demand for services has steadily increased to the point where the service sector has become the largest employer in the country. In 1949, the goods-producing industries provided employment for 59 per cent of the employed population. By 1960 this proportion had declined to 48 per cent. A similar trend has been taking place in the United States.

Considering these changes in more detail, total employment in the goods-producing sector of the Canadian economy fell by 3 per cent during the period 1949 to 1960. This was the result of a 37 per cent decline in agricultural employment and, to a lesser extent, to a decrease in the number of persons engaged in fishing. In both these primary industries, as a result of increased investment in capital equipment, the decline in employment has been accompanied by increased output. Excluding these two primary industries, the number of people in the goods-producing sector rose by about 18 per cent between 1949 and 1960. In 1949, the goods-producing sector employed two-thirds of all working males and about one-third of all employed females. In 1960, the comparable proportions were 57 per cent and 24 per cent.

THE LABOUR FORCE[1]

[1] ADJUSTED FOR SEASONAL VARIATION

These trends in employment in goods-producing industries have been significant and therefore a comparison of trends in employment in manufacturing industries in both Canada and the United States which appeared in a presentation to the Senate Committee on Manpower and Employment is of considerable interest. The comparison was made between the first half of 1953 and the first half of 1960. Over this period there were small declines in the indexes of manufacturing employment in both countries but the decline in the United States was about double that in Canada.* In durable goods manufacturing there was a slightly larger decline in employment in Canada than in the United States. This difference arose from a much greater decline in employment in the aircraft, shipbuilding and railroad equipment industries in Canada and was probably related to defence procurement patterns and to timing differences in railroad dieselization programmes in the two countries. In other areas of decline, such as motor vehicles and parts, saw and planing mills and agricultural implements, the fall in employment was much more pronounced in the United States. In the primary iron and steel industry, employment increased in Canada compared with a decline in the United States, and in fabricated and structural steel there was a greater increase in Canada than in the United States.

On the other hand, employment in non-durable goods increased in Canada in contrast to a decline in the United States. This pattern appeared in the manufacture of meat products, beverages, tobacco, and in the petroleum refining industry. Employment in pulp and paper mills increased in both countries, but more rapidly in Canada. There were declines in employment in the manufacture of textile mill products in both countries, the decline in the United States being very much greater.

Turning to longer term developments in the service sector in Canada, all sections of the service industry have become increasingly important as a source of job opportunities as demands for services have increased. In 1960, employment in the service sector was 56 per cent higher than in 1949 and accounted for 52 per cent of total employment. It should be noted that services include business (e. g., accountancy), community (e. g., teaching), personal (e. g., hairdressing), and government service, as well as trade, financial and similar services, and transportation, communication and storage.

Accompanying this trend, there has been a greater participation by women in the labour market since the greater growth in the service sector has, in the main, provided job opportunities particularly suited to women. In 1949, the participation rate (that is, the proportion of any group who work or seek work) of women in the labour force was 24 per cent and in 1953 was still unchanged. By 1960, however, the rate had risen to 28 per cent, and the rise was most notable for married women in the 25-64 age group. In the 45-64 age group, the female participation rate rose remarkably from 17 per cent to 28 per cent from 1953 to 1960. By contrast, the participation rate for men in 1949 was 85 per cent while in 1960 the rate had fallen to 81 per cent. The decline in the male participation rate was concentrated among the very young and the very old, probably reflecting in the first instance greater school attendance and in the second instance, earlier retirements.

In 1960, the total number of men with jobs was 13 per cent higher than in 1949 while total employment for women increased by 49 per cent. In more detail, there was a decline of 3 per cent in male employment in the goods-producing sector (including agriculture) and no change in the number of females. On the other hand, employment in the service industries was 45 per cent higher for men and 76 per cent higher for women.

The continuation of this trend is evident when averages for the year 1960 are compared with those of 1959. The average number of persons with jobs in 1960 rose by 100,000 or 1.7 per cent. The increase in employment in 1960 was entirely due to increased opportunities for work in the service sector. The service sector provided an additional 157,000 jobs in 1960 which more than offset a decline in goods-producing employment of 57,000 persons.

* In Canada the index of manufacturing employment measures employment in establishments having fifteen or more employees. Estimates of employment in all manufacturing establishments in Canada, including those employing less than fifteen workers, suggest that, over the period, total employment in manufacturing may have increased.

In the goods-producing sector in 1960, employment declined in agriculture, manufacturing, construction and public utilities, these reductions being only partially offset by small gains in the numbers employed in forestry, fishing and mining. It should be noted that even though employment declined in agriculture, manufacturing and public utilities, output increased. In the service sector, all groups except transportation, communication and storage added to the number of their employees. The greatest increase occurred in the sections of the service industry comprising business, community, personal and government services, where employment rose by 115,000 persons or 8.5 per cent.

Although employment in 1960 increased by 100,000, there was an even larger increase in the labour force. The increase was 175,000 or 2.8 per cent. This compares with increases of 1.6 per cent in 1959 and of 2.1 per cent in 1958. This more rapid increase in the labour force in 1960 was largely a matter of an increase in the participation rate of women. In 1960, it is estimated that the number of women in the labour market rose by 6.7 per cent while the increase in the number of men was only 1.5 per cent. In earlier years of the decade, immigration had been an important element in the growth of the labour force. In 1960, net immigration fell to about 30,000 persons, compared with an annual average of just over 100,000 for the decade.

The larger growth in the labour force as compared with the growth in employment was reflected in an increase in unemployment. For 1960 as a whole, an average of 448,000 persons were out of work, as compared with 373,000 in 1959 and 432,000 in 1958. Considering the sexes separately, there were 388,000 men without work in 1960 compared with 326,000 in 1959. At the same time, there were some 60,000 women unemployed as compared with 47,000 in the preceding year. The total unemployment ratio rose to an average of 7.0 per cent in 1960 compared with 6.0 per cent in 1959 and 7.1 per cent in 1958. The unemployment ratio for men rose from 7.0 per cent in 1959 to 8.2 per cent in 1960, while that for women rose to 3.6 per cent as compared with 3.0 per cent in the previous year.

A survey of registered applicants for employment with the National Employment Service carried out for the Senate Committee on Manpower and Employment revealed some significant characteristics of this group. It showed that there was a concentration of men seeking work in manufacturing and construction activity. The majority of women on the other hand sought employment in offices, stores and restaurants, though a sizeable number of women registered for jobs had been employed in manufacturing. The survey further revealed that 40 per cent of the total number of persons registered for employment possessed no specialized training or qualifications. That is to say, a substantial proportion of Canada's unemployed at the present time are unskilled or only semi-skilled. Employment opportunities for such people are necessarily limited in an economy increasingly calling for skilled workers. In this connection, it is apparent that in the decade of the 1950's Canada relied to a considerable degree on immigrants to meet her growing needs for skilled manpower. Over the period 1953–1959, net immigration accounted for 110,000 craft and technical workers. By comparison, the number of graduates from publicly-operated high school and post-high school technical courses in Canada accounted for only 21,000 technical workers. Of course, in addition to those graduates from Canadian technical schools, a considerable amount of technical training was received "on the job".

The same survey also pointed to the special problems of the 14 to 19 year-olds in the labour market. Such young people represented about 10 per cent of the total numbers registered for employment. Although the participation rate in the labour force for this group has declined during the past ten years, the ratio of unemployment of this group has been double the ratio for all age groups. For example, the participation rate for young people of both sexes between the ages of 14 and 19 fell from 47 per cent in 1949 to 38 per cent in 1960 while the unemployment ratio rose from 5.9 per cent in 1949 to 13.0 per cent in 1960. The unemployment ratio in 1960 was 16.3 per cent for males and 8.6 per cent for females.

It is apparent that the lack of adequate education or training among the unemployed in this lower age group provides an explanation of their difficulty in obtaining employment. Only 18.5 per cent of the total had completed high school or better, 47.2 per cent had had some high school education while as many as 34.3 per cent had finished only their primary school education, or even less. Similarly, only 11.5 per cent of the group were fully trained or qualified occupationally, 33.7 per cent were partially trained or qualified while 54.8 per cent had no technical training or qualifications whatsoever. Both academically and technically the girls in the group had higher educational levels than the boys.

Total labour income in 1960 increased by 4.2 per cent, compared with an increase of 7.5 per cent in 1959. Higher rates of pay and higher average levels of employment in 1960 contributed to the rise in total payments for salaries and wages. The number of paid workers in 1960 was 2.3 per cent higher than in 1959. The comparable increase in 1959 was 3.7 per cent. In manufacturing, average hourly earnings rose by 3.5 per cent, about the same as in 1959, while the average number of hours worked per week declined by nearly one per cent as compared with a rise of slightly more than one per cent in 1959. Per capita annual earnings in 1960 showed an increase of $70.00 or 1.9 per cent, compared with an increase of $133.00 or 3.7 per cent in 1959. After allowing for a small increase in the cost of living in 1960, there was a slight gain in real earnings per capita.

All regions and all major industrial groups, except mining and construction, shared in the increase in total salary and wage payments. In the service sector, in line with improved employment opportunities, the growth in labour income as a whole was greater than in the goods-producing industries. Wages and salaries paid out in trade, transportation, storage and communication, government, finance and related groups rose by 5.7 per cent in 1960 compared with a gain of 8.1 per cent in 1959, and accounted for about three-quarters of the increase in total wage and salary payments. Earnings in the goods-producing industries rose by 1.9 per cent compared with 6.5 per cent in the previous year. Wages and salaries in the primary industries rose by 3.8 per cent, in manufacturing by 1.9 per cent and in public utilities by 3.4 per cent. Total wages and salaries in construction were at the same level as in 1959.

PRICE TRENDS

Prices of goods and services produced in Canada rose in the aggregate about 1½ per cent in 1960, compared with 1959. This was the smallest year-to-year increase in prices since 1955 and compares with an average annual price rise of nearly 2½ per cent from the years 1954 to 1960. The increase, 1959 to 1960, was mild for consumer goods and for exports and imports. The gains were somewhat larger for services, capital goods and government expenditure.

[1] Price indexes of these sectors are measured mainly by elements entering into costs (materials and labour purchased) rather than final selling prices, and generally it has not been possible to allow for changes in productivity. Over short periods of time, these cost indexes are not likely to vary to any extent from indexes of actual selling prices. Over longer periods, it may be that these cost deflators overstate price increases.

The consumer price index for 1960 averaged 128.0 compared with 126.5 in 1959, an increase of 1.2 per cent. The increase in consumer prices in 1960 compares with increases of 1.1 per cent in 1959 and 2.6 per cent in 1958.

The consumer price index fell in the first quarter of 1960 from 127.5 in January to 126.9 in March. In April the index came back to the January level where it remained, with minor fluctuations, until August when it rose to 127.9. Thereafter, successive monthly increases associated mainly with seasonal movements in food prices raised the index to 129.6 for November and December.

The moderate increase in the consumer price index for 1960 was mainly due to an increase in the services component. The index for total services rose 2.2 per cent while the index for total goods increased less than one per cent. An important element in the rise in the service index was a 2.5 per cent increase in health care and a 1.9 per cent increase in shelter costs. Prices of durable goods declined slightly, and all other components of the commodities index showed only minor increases.

In recent years, consumer prices in Canada have risen less than in most industrialized countries of the world.

In Canada, most of the increase in consumer prices which occurred since the war took place in the early post-war period when removal of wartime controls and subsidies and the special situation of the Korean war caused prices to rise rapidly. Since that time, the period of the most rapid increases occurred about the time of the inflationary resource boom of the mid 1950's.

The trend of consumer prices in 1960 with its greater increases for services than for commodities is typical of developments over the past ten years. The recently revised consumer price index, which provides additional information on the various classifications, shows that between 1949 and 1960 the cost of living increased by 28 per cent. The index for commodities, however, was up only 19 per cent with most component groups showing about the same rate of increase. The index for services, on the other hand, showed an increase of 53 per cent. Excluding shelter, the cost of other services rose by 59 per cent over the ten-year period.

The changes in prices over the last decade can be seen in the following table.

Although services represent only about one-quarter of total consumer spending, the much more rapid increase in service prices has accounted for nearly one-half of the total rise in consumer prices since 1949.

Since 1949, the greatest increases in Canadian prices have taken place in services and in capital outlays. The increase in service costs is due in part to the increasing demand for services and in part to the difficulties involved in raising technological productivity in many service industries. The increase in the prices of capital goods has also reflected conditions of strong demand. To a lesser degree, as has been noted, the price statistics probably overstate the extent of price increase for capital goods.

By contrast, there have been lesser increases in wholesale prices since 1949, and an actual decline in the total index from the peak in 1951. In contrast to retail prices, the wholesale price index is influenced much more by the movements in world commodity prices and much less by elements of service. Movements in wholesale prices over the past decade have reflected the greater availability of raw materials and industrial commodities. The general index of wholesale prices has been unchanged since the beginning of 1959.

BALANCE OF INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

Canada's international trade in 1960 reflected the divergent trends in economic activity in North America and other parts of the world. The industrial countries outside North America enjoyed a vigorous rate of economic growth in 1960 and Canadian exports to the United Kingdom, western Europe, Japan and some other overseas countries increased sharply. Exports to the United States declined.

Total Canadian merchandise exports rose by nearly 5 per cent in 1960. On the other hand, merchandise imports declined fractionally compared with an increase of about 10 per cent in the preceding year. Consequently, the trade deficit in 1960 of $148 million was scarcely one-third as large as the $423 million deficit incurred in 1959. This improvement in the balance arising from commodity trade was more than sufficient to offset a further increase in the deficit on non-merchandise transactions which rose from $1,071 million in 1959 to $1,122 million in 1960. As a result, the total current account deficit declined from $1,494 million in 1959 to $1,270 million in 1960, a decline of $224 million, or 15 per cent.

The value of merchandise exports in 1960 amounted to $5,400 million as compared with $5,149 million in the previous year. Increases in commodity exports occurred in most of the major categories, with agricultural products constituting the principal exception. In agriculture, declines were fairly general. The most significant gains occurred in exports of copper, aluminum, newsprint, nickel, lumber and chemicals. Considerable increases also took place in exports of asbestos, crude petroleum, rolling mill products, non-farm machinery, woodpulp, oil seeds and zinc. There were sizeable declines in exports of uranium, farm implements, wheat and other grains and in fishery products.

Turning to consider a rather longer period of recent history, it is clear that considerable changes in Canada's export trade have occurred over the last seven years. Since 1953, exports from Canada's resource industries have increased substantially and the capacity of these industries to meet the growing world demand has greatly expanded. The expansion of exports of the other fabricated products industries was on a somewhat smaller scale, though the expansion in chemical exports was impressive. Exports of farm products were unusually high during the period 1951–53. Since then they have been somewhat lower (but higher than in the immediate postwar period). The value of total domestic exports rose by 28 per cent during this period. Considerable diversification in export trade has taken place and is illustrated by the rising importance of a number of export commodities. The table which follows shows the changes among the important commodities.

The value of merchandise imports in 1960 was $5,548 million, fractionally below the $5,572 million value in 1959. This is in sharp contrast with the strong growth in imports which has been characteristic of the past decade as a whole. The relative stability in total merchandise imports between 1959 and 1960 also contrasts with the increase in the Gross National Product; the ratio of imports of goods to G.N.P. was among the lowest in the postwar period. In general, increases and decreases in all categories of imports were small. The largest declines occurred in imports of petroleum products, machinery and rolling-mill products. The greatest increases took place in aircraft and automobile and parts.

As indicated above, there were some significant changes in Canada's pattern of trade in 1960. Exports to the United States declined by $150 million, nearly 5 per cent, while sales to all other countries grew by $401 million, or 20 per cent. On the other hand, imports were slightly lower, both from the United States and from all other countries taken as a group.

Canada's trade with countries other than the United States also displayed a changing pattern. Sales to the United Kingdom rose by $143 million while imports from that country were $9 million lower. Exports to other Commonwealth countries grew by $53 million, and imports by $20 million.

A major increase occurred in exports to western Europe where shipments increased by $144 million, or by one-third. Exports to "All Other Countries" rose by $57 million of which $38 million was to Japan. Imports from "All Other Countries" declined by $41 million.

As a result of these developments, there was an increase in the trade deficit with the United States, an increase in the trade surplus with the Commonwealth, including the United Kingdom, and the re-emergence of a substantial trade surplus with all other countries.

The proportion of total Canadian exports going to the United States declined in 1960 while all other areas increased their share. The proportions of total imports coming from the United States and the United Kingdom were almost unchanged from 1959. The rest of the sterling area and other O.E.E.C. countries increased their share of the Canadian market while the share of "All Other Countries" declined.

As mentioned earlier, the deficit on non-merchandise transactions totalled $1,122 million in 1960. This was an increase of $51 million, or 4.8 per cent, and was the smallest relative increase recorded since 1952. Over the last eight years, the average annual increase has been about 20 per cent.

All major components of the non-merchandise account, except gold production available for export, shared in the growth of the deficit on non-merchandise trade. Larger deficits occurred in freight and shipping services and migrants' funds and inheritances resulting from a decline in receipts combined with an increase in payments on such accounts. There was a greater growth in payments than in receipts for foreign travel and in the "miscellaneous" account (which includes payments for a variety of business services). There was also a greater reduction in receipts than in payments on income account arising out of the remittance of interest and dividends. All of these changes contributed to the further growth in the deficit on non-merchandise trade.

BALANCE ON NON-MERCHANDISE TRANSACTIONS

Examining the non-merchandise items in more detail, the deficit on income account in 1960 amounted to $480 million, or 43 per cent of the total deficit on non-merchandise transactions. Interest receipts from abroad rose, but dividend receipts declined. Payments of interest abroad were higher due mainly to sizeable net sales of provincial, municipal and corporate bonds in the United States in 1959 and the first half of 1960. On the other hand, dividend payments abroad declined.

The deficit arising from government transactions other than official contributions rose by a substantial amount. This was the result of a decline in external receipts, due partly to a lower level of United States government defence expenditures in Canada, and to an increase in external payments, mainly attributable to larger Canadian defence expenditures abroad. Official contributions declined, due mainly to the absence in 1960 of relief wheat shipments to countries in South-East Asia which were sizeable in the two previous years.

Canada's international balance of payments includes very substantial capital transfers of many kinds and moving in both directions. Net capital transfers, including changes in private and official holdings of foreign exchange, are necessarily equal to the balance on current account. In recent years, the net capital movement has been strongly inward. Such balance has been achieved in recent years with relatively little change in official holdings of foreign exchange, largely through the fluctuations in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar in response to changes in the supply of and demand for currencies entering into Canada's external transactions.

The large net inflows of capital from abroad have been associated with the high rate of capital investment in Canada and reflect the favourable investment opportunities in this country, certain relative tax advantages, as well as comparative interest rates prevailing in Canada and abroad.

During the past five years, these inflows have varied between $1.1 billion and $1.5 billion annually. Although there have at times been large inflows of short-term capital, the major inflow has been of a long-term nature. Some of the long-term capital represents portfolio investment by foreigners, in the form of stocks and bonds and presumably reflects favourable rates of return, current and prospective, on this type of investment. The other important form of long-term capital inflow has been represented by direct investment in foreign-controlled enterprises. Direct investment may take the form of the establishment of new enterprises and part of the new plant facilities may be imported from abroad. Alternatively, it may be in the form of the acquisition of existing Canadian enterprises, thus freeing the financial resources of the previous owners. In many instances, direct investments are undertaken to provide commodities for general export or for the direct use of the non-resident parent company and thus lead to increased exports in subsequent years. In other cases, they are designed to exploit the domestic Canadian market and thus displace imports.

Such cases are strikingly illustrated in the example of petroleum, natural gas and mineral production where a large share of foreign direct investment has been placed. Exports of crude petroleum and iron-ore have increased dramatically since 1953. Imports of petroleum products have declined over this period while the growth of iron-ore imports has not been as large as the growth in Canadian consumption. Other mining products developed by external capital such as copper, nickel, aluminum and asbestos have also registered sharp increases in exports.

Portfolio investment from abroad is of a financial nature and is not connected directly with any compensating inflows of goods and services. Most short-term capital movements are also of a financial nature. The normal method by which the net inflow of financial capital is translated into a real movement of goods and services is through the operation of the exchange rate. Movements in the exchange rate may, under certain circumstances, induce changes in the flows of capital. Considered by themselves, however, inflows of financial capital tend to raise or maintain the exchange value of the Canadian currency. The high level of the Canadian dollar tends, in turn, to reduce the export and to increase the import of goods and services by an amount equivalent to the net inflow of capital.

Inflows of direct investment funds, on the other hand, sometimes take the form of the direct provision of goods and services. For example, a direct foreign investment in a mining property may involve the importation of machinery and technical services. To the extent that this occurs, the additional imports matching the capital imports come in without involving the exchange market or the exchange rate. But more frequently, the inflow of direct investment is not directly tied to the importation of goods and services, and the importation of a corresponding amount of goods and services takes place indirectly, as in the case of the inflow of other financial capital, through the mechanism of the exchange rate.

The net inflow of long-term capital, in the form of direct investment, portfolio stocks and bonds and official loans and other long-term investments, amounted to about $875 million in 1960, compared with $1,088 million in 1959.

Within the total of long-term capital, there was a change in composition in 1960. For the first time since 1956, when Canadian provincial, municipal and corporate new security issues sold abroad reached very large proportions, direct investment re-emerged as the principal source of long-term capital inflows. Net inflows for direct investment showed a substantial increase while net inflows from security transactions were less than one-third the average inflow for the preceding four years. Consequently, direct investment in 1960 accounted for about 69 per cent of the total long-term movement compared with 43 per cent in 1959 and about 37 per cent in the preceding three years.

About 85 per cent of the net long-term capital inflow during 1960 came from the United States compared with 79 per cent in 1959. The United Kingdom's share fell from 9 per cent to 7 per cent; withdrawals of portfolio capital more than offset an increase in direct investment inflows. The share originating in other overseas countries also fell, from 12 per cent to 8 per cent, with direct investment being higher and inflows from security transactions lower.

The movement of foreign capital into Canada for direct investment in foreign-controlled enterprises during 1960 totalled $690 million, $140 million higher than in 1959 and $100 million above the largest figure recorded previously. The petroleum and natural gas industry attracted the largest part of the net inflow for direct investment, probably more than one-third. Direct investment in mining concerns, especially iron-ore projects and ancillary facilities, showed an even greater growth, and also accounted for nearly one-third of total direct investment inflows. The largest part of the movement occurred in the early part of the year.

The net capital import through security transactions amounted to $218 million in 1960. This movement was much smaller than in the years 1956 to 1959 (when it ranged between $610 million and $763 million) but was larger than in all but two of the ten preceding years. As between the various types of security transactions, there were substantial reductions both in the sale of new Canadian issues to non-residents and in the net sale abroad of outstanding Canadian stocks and bonds. At the same time, the redemptions of foreign-held Canadian securities were somewhat below the level in 1959. As with direct investment, the largest part of the net inward movement in security transactions occurred early in the year. In the final quarter of the year, the movement was outward.

A large part of the smaller increase in portfolio investment was accounted for by a sharp drop in net sales to non-residents of new provincial government issues, which fell from $293 million in 1959 to $55 million in 1960. Total funds raised by provincial governments in both years, including bank loans, were almost unchanged, but in 1960 a far greater proportion was raised in Canada. This development may be attributable in part to the ability of the provinces to borrow at declining rates of interest in Canada during the first three quarters of 1960, at a time when United States interest rates were comparatively stable. In part, the heavier borrowing in Canada may have reflected a greater concern on the part of borrowers as to the exchange risks on foreign borrowings. The budget speeches of the Minister of Finance in March and December, 1960, stressed to borrowers the risks involved in undertaking commitments expressed in foreign currencies.

The inflow of long-term capital into Canada for 1960 was less than it had been in 1959, and fell during the course of the year. This decline in capital inflow relaxed the upward pressure on the exchange value of the Canadian dollar. The general downward movement in the exchange rate was to some extent offset by shorter-term capital movements particularly in the fourth quarter.

A sharp rise in holdings by foreigners of Canadian dollar balances and short-term paper occurred in the latter half of the year with increases of $45 million and $75 million in the third and fourth quarters respectively; the inflow for the year as a whole was $115 million. Larger holdings by residents of the United States and overseas countries other than the United Kingdom accounted for most of the increase. In 1960, non-resident holdings of Canadian treasury bills rose by $56 million. In explanation, it may be noted that in the latter half of 1960 treasury bill yields in Canada were considerably above those of the United States even after providing for the cost of exchange "hedging". Incidentally, the holdings of Canadian dollars and short-term paper by foreigners have risen in each of the past three years and now total over $600 million, including $120 million of treasury bills.

The inflow of "all other" capital movements in 1960 totalled $264 million, an amount considerably smaller than in 1959. However, $204 million of this inflow occurred in the fourth quarter, representing a movement of almost record proportions.

It may be assumed that the sharp inflow of short-term capital in the fourth quarter of 1960 was associated with the existence of more attractive short-term interest rates in Canada relative to the United States, and with relatively less attractive rates in London. Some short-term capital may have entered Canada from countries suffering political disturbances. The role of expectations is difficult to gauge, but shifts in expectations about movements in the rate were probably a factor in the fourth quarter.

To complete the description of capital movements in 1960, there was a capital outflow of $3 million representing Canada's foreign exchange subscription to international financial organizations and capital inflows of $32 million resulting from repayments on intergovernmental loans. There was also a slight reduction in official holdings of gold and foreign exchange of $39 million. At December 31, 1960, Canada's official exchange reserves amounted to U.S. $1,829 million compared with U.S. $1,869 million at the end of 1959.

The exchange value of the Canadian dollar declined generally throughout 1960 apart from an increase at mid-year. In December it reached its lowest point since March, 1956. The average rate of exchange for the United States dollar, in terms of the Canadian dollar, at its low point in March, 1960 was 94.94. In December, 1960 it rose to a high of 99.81 and closed the year at 99.66. For 1960 as a whole, the average noon rate was 96.97 compared with 95.90 in 1959.

FINANCIAL DEVELOPMENTS

The financial environment in the western world is considerably different now from what it was a decade ago. To begin with, there has been a gradual reduction in the degree of financial liquidity accumulated during and just after World War II. At the same time, demands for capital by the underdeveloped countries of the world have continued to grow. The heavy capital requirements involved in replacing the social and industrial structure of western Europe had scarcely begun to diminish when the impetus of European integration took its place. A somewhat tardy recognition of the dangers of inflation related to the period of post-war material shortages invoked a rediscovery of monetary policy as an effective economic weapon. More recently, the removal of some of the barriers to the international movement of capital among the more industrialized countries of the western world has encouraged an increasing flow of funds across political boundaries to take advantage of investment opportunities wherever they might be found.

For a variety of reasons, these among them, interest rates in western countries have tended to rise: the spread between rates in different countries has narrowed, through a process of "evening up" rather than "evening down". The following table illustrates this development:

The growing interdependence of world capital markets has made it increasingly difficult for individual countries to pursue completely independent fiscal and monetary policies, devised to suit purely internal domestic situations. For countries with fixed exchange rates the decline (as in the case of the U.S.) or accretion (as in the case of Germany) of exchange reserves requires the adaptation of national policies to the international environment.

In the case of Canada, our floating exchange rate cushions the pressure of external forces, but does not permit us to avoid adjusting our economy to the rest of the world. Movements in capital still take place in response to investment opportunities revealed in part in interest rate differentials, although they may display their force more through movements in the exchange rate than through changes in the level of exchange reserves.

LONG-TERM GOVERNMENT BOND YIELDS

Turning now to developments in Canada in 1960, the total effective demand for new capital by all categories of borrowers, measured by the amounts they were able to raise through the banking system and on the capital markets, was down sharply from the level of 1959. The one important exception to this generalization concerned the provincial governments, which in total raised slightly more capital in 1960 than in 1959. The following table, while not complete in its coverage of all borrowing and lending of Canadians, does give a general outline of the activity which took place in the capital markets in 1960 as compared with 1959. It should be noted that the "sources of funds" include all net new issues of securities both in Canadian and foreign currencies, as well as the net change in bank loans to provincial and municipal governments, instalment finance companies, grain dealers, and in general loans and insured mortgage loans.

Funds raised by private borrowers in 1960, particularly those of business and industry, registered the greatest proportionate decreases from 1959. The slowing down of the rate of economic activity caused corporations to revise their investment plans downward and, after mid-year, to reduce inventories, while the total amount of business savings was somewhat higher in 1960 than in 1959.

While the total funds raised in 1960 from all sources declined from the level of the previous year, the volume of securities denominated in foreign currency

Considering net new issues of securities in Canadian currency, it is evident from the table below that the net amount of new issues of bonds sold by the federal government, including the net disinvestment in government securities by various government accounts, was considerably lower in 1960 than in 1959. Securities issued in Canada by provincial and, to a lesser extent, municipal governments were, however, at a markedly higher level in 1960 than they were in 1959.

The increases in net new issues in Canada by provincial and municipal governments were offset by the decreases already noted in net foreign issues, so that the total of new security issues by these levels of government was considerably lower in 1960 than in 1959. Similarly, the increase in domestic corporate issues was offset by a slight decrease in the issue of corporate bonds denominated in foreign currency. More significant, however, was the sharp drop in new corporate stock offerings in 1960. The net amount of $222 million issued during the year was just over one-half the 1959 figure of $404 million. Consequently, total funds raised in the Canadian securities market by corporations decreased from $493 million in 1959 to $471 million in 1960. Moreover, almost all of these funds were obtained in the first half of 1960. Since there was a net redemption of corporate bonds in the latter half of the year, the net funds raised in the market by corporations between July and December amounted to only $62 million.

Excluding the net disinvestment in government securities by government accounts, the federal government made net new issues of direct and guaranteed securities (including C.N.R.'s) in the Canadian market in the amount of $613 million, as compared with net issues of $817 million in 1959. Taking into account the net redemption of federal securities denominated in foreign currency, the net amount of new issues in 1960 increased the total of government direct and guaranteed securities outstanding to $17,747 million at December 31, 1961. Of this total, an amount of $16,881 million was held outside government accounts.

The total of federal government securities held outside government accounts increased from December 31, 1957 to December 31, 1960 by $3,083 million. Of this amount, somewhat more than one-half represents debt assumed by the federal government as the counterpart of loans, investments and debt guarantees made to various Crown corporations for commercial and quasi-commercial operations, particularly in the fields of transportation and housing. Reflecting this increase in assets, the net debt of the federal government (i.e., the difference between total liabilities and total assets) increased from March 31, 1957 to March 31, 1961 by only $1,434 million, to a level of $12,442 million.

To supplement the analysis of the demands on the Canadian capital market in 1960, the following table indicates changes in the volume of financing by various categories of borrowers through the medium of bank loans, excluding

The figures in this table are not exactly comparable with those in Table 43, due to the inclusion, as already noted, of a residual adjustment in that table. It will be noted that the increase in bank loans during 1960 was less than half that in 1959. However, the provincial governments, which had on balance repaid loans in 1959, borrowed $89 million net in 1960 from the banking system.

From the above table it is apparent that, of the increase in bank loans during 1960, about one-third occurred in the business category, with increases in loans under $5 million being partially offset by decreases in loans in excess of this figure. Loans to public utilities and transportation increased, but much of this increase represented loans at the end of 1960 to major provincial utilities commissions in anticipation of the issue of bonds after the beginning of 1961. While loans to merchants and other businesses continued to increase during 1960, the net new demand for funds by these borrowers was less than in 1959. Loans to most categories of industry decreased during the year. The increase in personal loans and insured residential mortgage loans which occurred in 1960 was almost wholly the result of a rise in personal unsecured loans, since there were equal offsetting movements in personal secured loans and home improvement loans. The chartered banks made only a negligible contribution to the funds supplied for residential mortgages in 1960. Loans to provincial governments were considerably greater in 1960 than in 1959, particularly in the latter half of the year, when demands on the long-term Canadian capital market by provincial governments as a group were smaller than normal, and when there was a net redemption of foreign-pay provincial securities. The increase shown under "other" loans was made up of increases in loans to farmers, grain dealers and institutions, partially offset by decreases in loans to instalment finance and small loan companies.

National income increased less in 1960 than in 1959. The rate of total saving declined, and the general public* increased its holdings of financial assets in 1960 by only $2,304 million as compared with $3,270 million in 1959. During 1960, there was a marked change in the relative liquidity of the financial assets acquired by the public. The following table indicates the net changes in public holdings of financial assets, segregated by the relative liquidity of these assets.

* General public is defined to include all holders other than Bank of Canada, chartered banks and government accounts. It includes, for example, corporations, financial institutions other than chartered banks, provincial and municipal government accounts and non-residents, as well as resident persons.

NOTE: Figures may not add due to rounding.

During the first half of 1960, the increase in financial assets was more than accounted for by increases in public holdings of federal government and other bonds and of corporate stocks, since there was a net decrease during this period in more liquid holdings. This situation was reversed in the latter half of the year, mainly as a result of the usual heavy purchases of Canada Savings Bonds in the fourth quarter, but also due to an increase in holdings of currency and bank deposits.

Broadly corresponding to the increases in deposits with chartered banks during 1960, there was an increase in total bank assets. Assets at December 31, 1960, totalled $12,800 million as compared with $12,047 million at the end of 1959, an increase of $753 million. Of this increase, $582 million occurred in the final quarter of 1960. As will be seen from Table 48, a rise in bank holdings of Government of Canada bonds and of general loans accounted for most of the total increase in assets. A comparison of year-end totals of liquid assets conceals a sharp movement during the year: there was a large increase in bank liquidity in the early part of the fourth quarter of 1960 partially offset by a decline during November and December as the banks transformed liquid assets into assets of higher yields.

During the first three quarters of 1960, interest rates declined reflecting the generally lower demands on the capital market, and a parallel movement in interest rates in the U.S. After reaching a low point towards the end of the third quarter, rates rose fairly rapidly during the final quarter. The level at the end of 1960 was, however, below that a year earlier.

As usual, movements in the yields of three-month treasury bills during 1960 were considerably sharper than those of other interest rates. From a high of 5.14 per cent early in January, 1960, the three-month yield declined to 1.68 per cent late in September. In the subsequent nine-week period it increased rapidly, reaching a level of 3.95 per cent by the end of November, after which the rate dropped to 3.25 per cent by the end of December. The level has been generally maintained into 1961, and at March 30, 1961, the yield was 3.21 per cent. In addition to these major movements, however, there were during 1960 considerably more short-term swings in the three-month yield than in 1959.

While following the same general pattern, the changes in medium and long-term yields were more moderate. Medium-term yields decreased steadily until the end of September. During the final quarter of the year, this decline was reversed, but the yields at the end of the year were lower than in December, 1959. The yields on Government of Canada 2-3/4 per cent bonds due June 15, 1967-68, declined from 5.37 per cent at the end of 1959 to 4.09 per cent in September, then rose to 4.74 per cent in December. The yield on long-term maturities followed a similar but less pronounced movement. Government of Canada 3-3/4 per cent bonds of January 15, 1975-78, yielded 5.60 per cent at the end of 1959, 4.84 per cent in September, 1960 and 5.41 per cent at year-end.

Provincial, municipal and industrial bond yields followed a pattern during 1960 similar to that of other interest rates. The prime commercial lending rate of the chartered banks, which rose from 5-1/2 per cent to 5-3/4 per cent in April, 1959, remained at this level throughout the whole of 1960. Similarly, the interest rate on savings deposits in the chartered banks remained at 2-3/4 per cent throughout the year.

During the first half of 1960, interest rates in the United States declined, responding to factors similar to those in Canada. However, rates did not rise as much in the United States during the latter part of 1960. Consequently, the spread between Canadian and United States interest rates, which had narrowed slightly in the early part of 1960, widened considerably during the remainder of the year. For medium and long-term yields, the spread at the end of 1960 was almost half again as great as it was at the end of 1959. In the case of treasury bills, while the sharper fluctuations in Canadian rates brought them below comparable yields in the United States at several points during 1960, the spread at the end of the year had again widened until it was greater than that on medium-term yields, although less than the differential on long yields.

REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS

1. INTRODUCTION

A preliminary review of the accounts of the Government of Canada for the fiscal year 1960–61 is presented in this Part. The Government's fiscal year ended on March 31, but the books must remain open for some time after that date to take into account all payments up to and including April 30, originating in and properly chargeable to, the fiscal year 1960–61 and to record various adjusting and closing entries. Consequently the figures in this Part are preliminary and subject to revision, and the final figures when they become available next July or August may differ to some extent from those given in the following pages.

2. HIGHLIGHTS OF GOVERNMENTAL FINANCIAL OPERATIONS DURING 1960–61

The financial operations of the Government for the fiscal year 1960–61 are summarized in the following table which indicates how the budgetary and non-budgetary transactions, including changes in unmatured debt, affected the Government's cash balances. More detailed explanations of these transactions are given in subsequent sections of this Part.

Budgetary transactions

The revenues and expenditures as forecast in the budget speech of March 31, 1960 and revised on December 20, 1960 and the actual figures as now estimated are shown in the following table:

(in millions of dollars)

Fiscal Year 1960–61	Budget forecast March 31, 1960	Revised forecast December 20, 1960	Actual (preliminary)	Increase or decrease (−) compared with December 20, 1960 forecast

Expenditures	−5,880.0	−5,980.0	−5,961.1	−18.9	−0.3
Surplus or deficit (−)	12.0	−286.0	−345.5	59.5

Revenues

The revenues of the government for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1961, amounted to $5,616 million. This is $78 million or about one and two-fifths per cent less than the total of $5,694 million forecast in the supplementary budget of December 20, 1960, and $326 million or 6 per cent more than the total of $5,290 million collected in 1959–60.

The sharp drop in revenues from the December forecast was due largely to an unexpected drop in March receipts. This was caused chiefly by the incidence of the Easter week-end. This year March 31 was Good Friday, and a considerable proportion of tax payments that are usually received on or before the last day of the month were in fact not mailed until April 3 or 4 and therefore could not be credited to the 1960–61 fiscal year receipts. As a result, the March revenues were about $40 million below normal and the 1960–61 budgetary deficit was increased by the same amount.

Of the increase of $326 million over 1959-60 revenues, $264 million was due to tax revenue and $62 million to non-tax revenue. Higher income tax collections accounted for nearly all of the increase in tax revenue. Personal income tax receipts were $145 million more than in the preceding year, reflecting the higher level of incomes during the year and the yield for a full year of the increase in tax rates that became effective July 1, 1959. Corporation income tax collections were $134 million higher, notwithstanding the fact that 1960 profits were lower than in 1959, reflecting the collection in the fiscal year of substantial amounts for taxes on 1959 profits and also the effect for a full year of the rate increase effective January 1, 1959.

The increase of $62 million in non-tax revenue was due principally to an increase of $44 million in return on investments.

Expenditures

Government expenditures amounted to $5,961 million and were three-tenths of one per cent less than forecast on December 20, 1960, and $258 million or about 5 per cent more than total expenditures in 1959–60.

Expenditures for defence again constituted the largest item, amounting to $1,539 million or 26 per cent of the total expenditures, compared with $1,532 million or 27 per cent in 1959-60.

Civil or non-defence expenditures amounted to $4,422 million, an increase of $251 million over the corresponding total for the previous fiscal year. There were increases of $69 million in expenditures of the Department of National Health and Welfare (including an increase of $39 million in the government's contribution under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act), $38 million in expenditures of the Department of Agriculture (due to $41 million for payments to western grain producers), $41 million in expenditures of the Department of Transport (including $24 million for the increase in the deficit of the Canadian National Railways), and $39 million in the expenditures of the Department of Finance (including $19 million for increased payments to the provinces and $14 million for higher public debt charges).

More detailed explanations of budgetary revenues by source and expenditures by classification and department are given in Section 3 of this Part.

Deficit

On the basis of these preliminary figures the deficit for the fiscal year was $345 million compared with the deficit of $286 million as forecast on December 20, 1960, and the deficit of $413 million in 1959-60.

Non-budgetary transactions

A net amount of $51 million was available during the fiscal year from non-budgetary transactions. Non-budgetary disbursements and charges totalled $639 million. Sums totalling $483 million were required for loans, investments and working capital advances, and $156 million for other non-budgetary purposes. On the other hand, a total of $690 million was available from various non-budgetary receipts and credits. Of this amount, $204 million was available from the repayment of loans, investments and working capital advances, $391 million from the net receipts from various government annuity, insurance and pension accounts, and $95 million from other non-budgetary sources.

Old age security fund

During 1960-61 pension payments from the old age security fund totalled $592 million and tax receipts credited to the fund amounted to $603 million. The excess of $11 million of receipts over payments was applied to reduce the temporary loans made by the Minister of Finance to the fund. These loans amounted to $28 million as at March 31, 1960, and to $17 million as at March 31, 1961.

The transactions in the account during 1960–61 compared with those for the previous fiscal year were as follows:

	Fiscal year ended March 31
	1961 (preliminary)	1960
	(in millions of dollars)
Pension payments	592	575
Tax receipts	603	547
Excess of receipts over payments applied to the repayment of temporary loans from the Minister of Finance, or excess of payments over receipts (−) covered by temporary loans from the Minister of Finance	11	−28
Temporary loans outstanding at the fiscal year-end	17	28

Debt transactions

During 1960-61 the government issued securities amounting to $2,531 million (excluding the refunding of treasury bills which mature weekly) and redeemed or converted issues in the amount of $2,353 million, resulting in an increase of $178 million in unmatured debt. As other liabilities increased by $437 million the government's gross public debt increased by $615 million to $21,601 million at March 31, 1961. During the same period the government's net assets increased by $262 million to $9,159 million. As a result, the government's net debt at March 31, 1961, was $12,442 million compared with $12,089 million at March 31, 1960. The increase of $353 million reflected the budgetary deficit of $345 million plus an adjustment of $8 million in respect of prior years' transactions.

Cash position

Receiver General balances were $71 million less at the end of the fiscal year than they were at the beginning. The budgetary deficit of $345 million was financed by the net amount of $51 million available from non-budgetary transactions, the increase of $223 million in unmatured debt outstanding in the hands of the public (after taking into account transactions in the securities investment account and the sinking fund account) and the decrease of $71 million in cash balances.

3. THE BUDGETARY ACCOUNTS

Total revenues amounting to $5,616 million for 1960-61 were $326 million more than the total for the previous year. Total expenditures were $5,961 million, an increase of $258 million over the total for 1959-60. The deficit for the fiscal year was $345 million compared with $413 million for the previous year.

(1) TAX REVENUES

Tax on personal incomes

The personal income tax was again in 1960-61 the largest source of government revenue. The yield (excluding the old age security tax) was $1,711 million or 31 per cent of all revenue. The increase of $144 million or 9 per cent over the 1959-60 collections was due partly to the higher level of incomes during the year and partly to the increase in rates which took effect on July 1, 1959. The 1959-60 receipts did not include a full year's return at the increased rates.

In addition the tax on personal incomes levied under the Old Age Security Act yielded $229 million. This revenue was credited to the old age security fund.

Corporation income tax

The corporation income tax (excluding the old age security tax) yielded $1,277 million and was the second largest source of revenue. The 1960-61 collections showed an increase of $134 million over the previous year despite the fact that 1960 profits were lower than in 1959. The increase in collections was due to the fact that substantial amounts were collected in 1960–61 on account of 1959 profits and also to the increase in rates effective January 1, 1959. The 1959–60 collections did not reflect a full year's return at the higher rate.

In addition the tax on the income of corporations levied under the Old Age Security Act yielded $104 million and was credited to the old age security fund.

Taxes on dividends, interest, etc. going abroad

Revenue included in this category is derived from taxes withheld on payments of interest, dividends, rents, royalties, alimony and income from estates and trusts made to non-residents. The 1960–61 collections were $88 million, an increase of $15 million over the previous year's total.

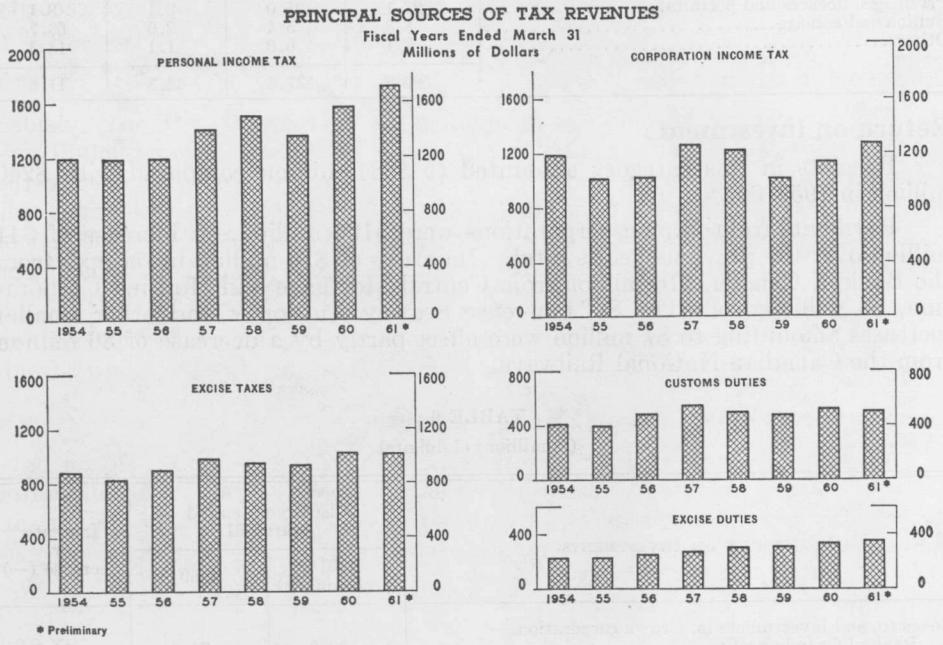
Excise taxes

Included under this heading are the revenues from the general sales tax and other special excise taxes.

From a revenue standpoint the most important tax levied under the Excise Tax Act is the sales tax. Receipts from this tax (excluding the old age security tax) were $12 million or 2 per cent lower than the previous year. This decline is believed to be due to the fact that some remittances of tax, which would normally have been received on March 31, were delayed until April because March 31 fell in the Easter holiday week-end.

The tax on sales, levied under the Old Age Security Act, yielded $270 million, approximately the same as in 1959-60. This revenue was credited to the old age security fund.

Other excise taxes yielded a total of $291 million, compared with $288 million in 1959-60. The increase of $3 million was due mainly to an increase of $8 million in receipts from the tax on tobacco products offset partly by decreases in other categories.



Customs import duties

Customs import duties yielded $499 million in 1960–61 compared with $526 million in 1959–60, a decrease of $27 million.

Excise duties

Excise duties are levied only on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products. (Additional taxes on tobacco products are levied under the Excise Tax Act referred to above.)

Collections in 1960–61 were $345 million, an increase of $10 million over the 1959–60 total. Gross receipts in 1960–61 from the taxes on alcoholic beverages were $200 million and from the taxes on tobacco products were $150 million, compared with $193 million and $146 million respectively in the previous year.

Estate tax

The revenue from this source amounted to $85 million, a decrease of $3 million from the 1959–60 total.

Other taxes

Revenue under this heading amounted to less than $50 thousand in 1960–61, approximately the same as in 1959–60.

(2) NON-TAX REVENUES

Non-tax revenues for 1960–61 were $600 million, $62 million or 12 per cent more than the 1959–60 total of $538 million.

Return on investments

Receipts in this category amounted to $284 million compared with $240 million in 1959–60.

Payments from Crown corporations were $194 million, an increase of $41 million over the previous year's total. Increases of $16 million in receipts from the Bank of Canada, $16 million from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, $8 million from The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and other smaller increases amounting to $7 million were offset partly by a decrease of $6 million from the Canadian National Railways.

(1) Less than $50,000.

Other loans and investments yielded $90 million compared with $87 million in 1959–60. The main items of note were an increase of $7 million in the profits of the exchange fund account and a decrease of $4 million in interest on Receiver General deposits with the chartered banks.

Post office

Gross post office receipts totalled $202 million in 1960-61 but authorized disbursements from revenue for salaries and rent allowances at semi-staff and revenue offices, commissions at sub-offices, transit charges on Canadian mail forwarded through or delivered in foreign countries, etc., amounting to $28 million brought net revenue to $174 million. Last year gross receipts were $194 million and authorized disbursements totalled $26 million.

As costs of operating the Post Office Department during 1960–61 (excluding the $28 million charged to revenue) were $178 million, net expenditure exceeded net revenue by $4 million. However, in making the comparison, it is to be noted that the total shown for post office revenue does not reflect any payment for the franking privileges covering parliamentary and departmental mail or for certain miscellaneous services provided for other government departments and agencies, nor does the total shown for operating expenses reflect any charges for premises occupied by the Post Office Department or for certain accounting and miscellaneous services provided by other departments.

Refunds of previous years' expenditures

Refunds in 1960-61 of expenditures made in prior years totalled $40 million compared with the 1959–60 total of $41 million. These refunds included $22 million received by the Department of National Defence of which $9 million was in respect of contracts with the United States Government for the supply of engines, aircraft and other defence equipment under an arrangement that when Canada places contracts with the Government of the United States, payments of the estimated costs are made to the United States Treasury and if these estimated costs are revised, or if there are reductions in the contracts, the United States Government refunds the overpayments. Also included were $5 million received by the Department of Transport, mainly in respect of the Canso Causeway and $4 million received by the Department of Finance, of which $3 million was a repayment by the Province of Ontario in connection with succession duty payments under the tax-rental agreements. In addition, the unexpended balance of parliamentary grants as at March 31, 1960, amounting to $4 million, was refunded by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Services and service fees

Collections for services and service fees by various government departments were $35 million, $4 million more than was collected in 1959–60.

Revenue in this category included $10 million received by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, mainly for police services to provinces and municipalities; $10 million received by the Department of Transport, mainly for wharfage and other canal and marine service fees, steamship inspection, air-ground radio at airports, and government telegraph and telephone services; and $6 million received by the Department of Trade and Commerce, mainly for services in connection with the inspection, weighing, storage and elevation of grain and for electricity, gas and weights and measures inspection services.

Proceeds from sales

Receipts from this source were $24 million compared with $22 million in the previous year.

These receipts included $9 million from Crown Assets Disposal Corporation representing amounts realized from the disposal of surplus Crown assets (after deducting certain agency fees and transfers), $4 million under agreements of sale of Crown assets and $5 million from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation representing the proceeds from the sale of wartime housing properties and including amounts available as the result of the reversal of the provision for depreciation set aside by the corporation in previous years on properties that have now been sold.

Privileges, licences and permits

Revenue of $27 million was received during the fiscal year on account of privileges, licences and permits, $2 million more than was received in 1959–60.

Included in this revenue was $13 million collected by the Department of Transport, mainly on account of aircraft landing fees, rentals of hangar accommodation and other miscellaneous rental charges, and $4 million collected by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, mainly in connection with oil leases in the Northwest Territories.

Bullion and coinage

Revenues of $8 million under this heading were derived from the operations of the Royal Canadian Mint and included a net gain of $7 million on coinage. Gold refining, storage and handling charges and gain in gold refining amounted to $1 million (of which half was in respect of handling charges).

Other non-tax revenues

Revenue in this category amounted to $7 million in 1960–61, $1 million more than the 1959–60 total.

B. Expenditures

Budgetary expenditures for 1960–61 amounted to $5,961 million, an increase of $258 million over the 1959–60 total of $5,703 million.

1. The unshaded areas of the columns in the chart for health, welfare and social security represent pension payments out of the old age security fund not charged to budgetary expenditures in the year in which they were paid.
2. Does not include those payments made to provincial and municipal governments for specific purposes.
* Preliminary

Defence expenditures

Defence expenditures which consist of expenditures of the Departments of National Defence and Defence Production were again the largest category of government budgetary expenditures. The total of $1,539 million for 1960–61 was approximately 26 per cent of the aggregate budgetary expenditures of the government for that year and was $7 million more than the total of $1,532 million for 1959–60. In 1959–60 civil defence expenditures were shown as a separate classification under defence expenditures whereas in 1960–61 they have been included in relevant departmental expenditures. For purposes of comparison the 1959–60 amounts have been adjusted accordingly.

National Defence

Expenditures of the Department of National Defence were $1,519 million. In 1959–60 expenditures were $1,515 million.

Expenditures for army, naval and air services totalled $1,398 million, $13 million more than the 1959–60 total. The increase of $21 million in the outlay for air services was offset in part by decreases of $7 million and $1 million in the outlays for naval services and army services respectively.

Direct charges to mutual aid in 1960–61 of $15 million compared with $18 million for 1959–60 and consisted of procurement of equipment for mutual aid and Canada's share of NATO military budgets and infra-structure costs.

Expenditures for defence research and development were $44 million compared with $39 million in 1959–60.

The government's contribution to the Canadian forces superannuation account of an amount equal to $1\frac{2}{3}$ times the contributions by permanent services personnel was $41 million, a decrease of $11 million from the total for the previous year.

Administration and general costs were $20 million in 1960–61, approximately the same as the 1959–60 total.

Defence Production

The total expenditure of $20 million for the Department of Defence Production was $3 million more than in 1959–60, due mainly to increased administration and general costs. Outlays of $3 million in connection with the government program instituted in 1959–60 of supporting selected defence development programs in order to sustain technological capability in Canadian industry were $1 million more than in 1959–60. Expenditures of $2 million for the programs under which assistance for the establishment of production capacity and capital assistance is given to private contractors, Crown plants operated on a management-fee basis and Crown corporations undertaking contracts essential to the defence program were approximately $1 million less than expenditures in the previous fiscal year.

Cash outlays

Section 11 of the National Defence Act provides that materiel, not immediately required for the use of the Canadian defence forces or the Defence Research Board, may be sold to such countries and upon such terms as the Governor in Council may determine. The proceeds of such sales in 1960–61 amounting to $6 million were credited to a special account to be used for the procurement of materiel. Cash outlays from this account during 1960–61 were $3 million leaving a balance of $7 million at March 31, 1961.

The Department of Defence Production also makes cash disbursements for the procurement of materials for use in the manufacture of defence equipment which are not recorded as budgetary expenditures. For purposes of accounting and control, these amounts are charged to the defence production revolving fund and are treated as assets on the books of the government until they are billed to the Department of National Defence or sold to defence contractors for use in the manufacture of defence equipment. As a result of the transactions during 1960–61 proceeds from sales exceeded purchases by $5 million and the assets of the fund were reduced by an equivalent amount leaving a balance of $16 million in the account at March 31, 1961.

The Budget—Appendix

The following table summarizes the cash outlays for defence for the past two fiscal years:

Payments of $41 million to western grain producers for which there was no comparable charge in 1959–60, and increases of $6 million for assistance re storage costs of grain and $3 million in outlays for rehabilitation and reclamation projects were offset partly by decreases of $3 million in contributions in respect of unharvested crops, $5 million in freight assistance on western feed grains, $3 million in the deficit of the prairie farm emergency fund and $4 million in the net operating loss of the agricultural stabilization board.

In 1960–61 expenditures in respect of the assistance re storage costs of grain and the Board of Grain Commissioners and payments in connection with the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act were transferred to this department from the Department of Trade and Commerce under the authority of the Transfer of Duties Act. On August 1, 1960 Royal Assent was given to an act creating the Department of Forestry, comprising former divisions of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources relating to forestry. For purposes of comparison adjustments have been made for these items in the preceding table.

The 1960–61 net operating loss of the agricultural stabilization board was $53 million compared with $57 million in 1959–60.

Under the authority of Vote 576 of Appropriation Act No. 6, 1960, amounts totalling $41 million were paid to western grain producers as a higher return for wheat used for human consumption in Canada, and distributed on the basis of $1.00 per cultivated acre up to a maximum of 200 acres per farm in accordance with regulations of the Governor in Council. There was no expenditure for this purpose in 1959–60.

Advances of $9 million made by the Minister of Finance to the prairie farm emergency fund to cover the year's deficit were charged to budgetary expenditures. The comparable amount in 1959–60 was $13 million.

Atomic Energy

Expenditures of the Atomic Energy Control Board and payments to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited totalled $39 million compared with $30 million in 1959–60, an increase of $9 million.

Administration expenses of the Atomic Energy Control Board and grants for research and investigations with respect to atomic energy totalled $1 million, approximately the same as for the previous fiscal year.

During the year under review $38 million was paid to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited for its research program, $9 million more than in the previous year. Of the total, $23 million was for current operations and maintenance and $15 million for the construction and acquisition of buildings, land, works and equipment including $11 million for the construction of the nuclear power demonstration reactor.

In addition, loans in the amount of $2 million were made to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited during the year. This brought the total of advances covered, or to be covered, by obligations or shares of the company to $61 million at March 31, 1961.

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation

Payments of $67 million were made by the government to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation during 1960–61, an increase of $3 million over the total for 1959–60. However, it must be noted, that, of the $64 million paid to the corporation in 1959–60, $4 million was refunded to the government in 1960–61.

Grants for radio broadcasting and television services increased by $3 million over the corresponding total for 1959–60, while expenditures for the international shortwave broadcasting service remained at approximately $2 million.

In addition, during the fiscal year 1960–61 loans totalling $3 million were made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for working capital requirements.

Citizenship and Immigration

Expenditures of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration were $61 million in 1960–61, an increase of $6 million over the total for 1959–60.

Outlays for the Indian affairs branch increased by $5 million during 1960–61, due principally to increases of $3 million in expenditures for Indian education and $1 million for Indian welfare. Expenditures of the immigration branch were approximately $1 million more than the comparable figure for the previous fiscal year.

External Affairs

Expenditures of the Department of External Affairs totalled $103 million in 1960–61, an increase of $6 million over the previous year.

The principal changes in expenditure were increases of $10 million in contributions to international organizations, $2 million in costs of representation abroad and $1 million in administration and general, offset partly by a decrease of $7 million in assistance to other countries.

Contributions to international organizations increased by $10 million during the year due mainly to outlays of $6 million for the purchase and transfer of wheat flour to assist in the establishment of strategic stock piles of food supplies in member states of NATO, $2 million representing Canada's contribution to the United Nations Fund for the Congo and Canada's assessment for the United Nations Congo Ad Hoc Account, 1960, and $1 million for Canada's assessment towards the financing of the United Nations emergency force. There were no expenditures for these items in 1959–60.

In 1960–61 expenditures of the International Economic and Technical Co-operation Branch were transferred to this department from the Department of Trade and Commerce under authority of the Transfer of Duties Act. The expenditures for 1960–61 and 1959–60 fiscal years are included in administration and general costs in the following table.

Finance

Expenditures of the Department of Finance amounted to $1,460 million in 1960–61 an increase of $40 million over the corresponding total of $1,420 million in 1959–60.

Increases of $19 million in tax-sharing, subsidy and other payments to provinces, $14 million in public debt charges, $6 million in the government's share of medical-surgical insurance premiums for its own employees (there was no comparable amount in 1959–60), $3 million in administration and general costs, $2 million in grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal property and $2 million in the administrative costs of the Office of the Comptroller of the Treasury were offset partly by the decrease of $7 million in payments to the Canadian Universities Foundation, for the purpose of making grants to institutions of higher learning, due to the Province of Quebec levying a special tax instead of accepting a grant through the Foundation.

Public debt charges

In 1960–61 public debt charges were again the second largest item of budgetary expenditure. These charges, which consist of interest on public debt, the annual amortization of bond discounts and commissions, the cost of issuing new loans and other costs incurred in servicing the public debt, amounted to $797 million in 1960–61 or 13 percent of all budgetary expenditure compared with $783 million or 14 per cent in 1959–60.

Interest on public debt was $756 million in 1960–61, an increase of $21 million over the 1959–60 total of $735 million. Interest of $611 million on unmatured debt was $11 million higher due mainly to an increase in unmatured debt; interest of $145 million on other liabilities was $10 million higher due mainly to increases of $5 million in respect of the Canadian forces superannuation account, $4 million in respect of the public service superannuation account and $1 million in respect of the government annuities account.

Other public debt charges amounted to $41 million compared with $48 million in 1959–60. The decrease of $7 million was due mainly to reductions of $6 million in the costs of annual amortization of bond discounts and commissions and $1 million in the cost of issuing new loans.

When considering the magnitude of these public debt charges and the burden they place upon the public treasury, it must be borne in mind that a substantial portion of the debt is attributable to, or is invested in, productive or earning assets. Therefore, in calculating the net burden of the government's annual interest charges, the income derived from loans, investments and other productive assets must be taken into account. For 1960–61 this income was $284 million as shown in the non-tax revenue section under the heading "Return on investments". This amount deducted from the gross total of $756 million for interest as shown in the above table leaves a net amount of $472 million compared with a net of $496 million in 1959–60. Measured as a percentage of the net debt the burden of the net annual interest charges was 3.79 per cent in 1960–61 compared with 4.10 per cent in 1959–60.

Tax-sharing, subsidy and other payments to provinces

Payments to the provinces during 1960–61 for statutory subsidies, payments under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, the transitional and additional grants to Newfoundland, and the transfer of a portion of income tax receipts from certain public utility companies amounted to $538 million compared with $519 million in 1959–60.

Charges to budgetary expenditures in 1960–61 under the federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements, including adjustments made on account of previous years, were $19 million more than in 1959–60. The increase was due to higher personal income tax collections for the 1960 taxation year and to adjustments necessitated in the final calculation of the tax-sharing arrangements payments for 1959–60 which were required to be made by December 31, 1960.

Payments of $505 million to the provinces under the federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements in 1960–61 were adjusted by deducting a total of $1 million from the tax-sharing entitlements of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, making a net disbursement to the provinces of $504 million. These deductions represented recovery of one-fifth of the overpayments made to those provinces under the 1952 tax-rental agreements on account of an over-estimation of their population as revealed by the 1956 census. By Memoranda of Agreement with the provinces concerned, the 1952 tax-rental agreements were amended to authorize the recovery of the overpayments in equal monthly deductions from the tax-sharing payments to those provinces over the five-year life of the new arrangements.

Statutory subsidies at $21 million in 1960–61 were unchanged from the previous year.

A summary of payments, by provinces, during 1960–61 is given in the following table:

The amount of public utility tax receipts transferred to the Provinces in 1960–61 was $4 million, representing a decrease of $1 million from the 1959–60 total. The 1960–61 payment represents the transferable portion of the income tax received from corporations whose main business was the distribution to, or the generation for distribution to, the public of electrical energy, gas or steam for the taxation year 1958. The payment was authorized by Vote 115 of Appropriation Act No. 6, 1960.

Fisheries

Expenditures of the Department of Fisheries amounted to $19 million in 1960–61, $1 million less than in 1959–60.

Forestry

On August 1, 1960 Royal Assent was given to an act creating the Department of Forestry, comprising former divisions of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources relating to forestry. Expenditures were $10 million for 1960–61. The following table shows the total expenditures for 1960–61 with the corresponding expenditures of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources for 1959–60.

Labour

Expenditures of the Department of Labour amounted to $122 million during 1960–61, an increase of $19 million over the 1959–60 total of $103 million. Increases of $9 million in the government's contribution to the unemployment insurance fund, $6 million in administration and general expenditures of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and $2 million in payments to provinces for assistance to municipalities for winter work projects were the main factors contributing to this increase.

Payments to provinces and in respect of Indian bands by the Government of Canada during 1960–61 of amounts not exceeding one-half of the cost of labour incurred on winter work projects were $9 million compared with $7 million in 1959–60.

Unemployment Insurance Act administration and government's contribution

Expenditures in 1960–61 relating to the Act (excluding the government's payment as an employer which is included in the expenditures of the Department of Finance) amounted to $97 million compared with $82 million in 1959–60.

Unemployment insurance benefit payments are not charged to budgetary expenditures but are paid from the unemployment insurance fund which is financed by equal contributions from employees and employers, by interest earned on investments, and by the government's contribution of an amount equal to one-fifth of the combined employee-employer contributions. Further information in regard to the Unemployment Insurance Commission is given in section 4 under the liability category "Annuity, insurance and pension accounts".

The government's contribution to the fund for 1960–61 was $55 million and administrative costs were $42 million; the corresponding amounts for 1959–60 were $46 million and $36 million respectively. The increase in the government's contribution was due partly to a full year's effect of the increase in rates of employee-employer contributions effective September 27, 1959.

Mines and Technical Surveys

Expenditures of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys totalled $59 million for 1960–61, an increase of $5 million over the total for 1959–60.

Increases of $2 million in expenditures for surveys and mapping, $2 million in expenditures of the Dominion Coal Board, $1 million in expenses of the geological survey of Canada and $1 million in administrative and general costs were offset partly by a decrease of $1 million in payments under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

National Health and Welfare

Expenditures for the Department of National Health and Welfare during 1960–61 amounted to $887 million, an increase of $69 million over the total for the previous fiscal year.

Outlays for the national health branch totalled $270 million in 1960–61, reflecting an increase of $43 million over the previous year's total due mainly to increases of $39 million in government contributions under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, $2 million in general health grants to provinces and $2 million in expenditures for Indian and northern health services.

During 1960–61 expenditures of the welfare branch increased by $27 million over the comparable figure for 1959–60, due mainly to increases of $15 million in payments for family allowances and $11 million for unemployment assistance.

Hospital insurance and diagnostic services

The Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, Statutes of 1957, authorized contributions by Canada in respect of programs administered by the provinces, providing hospital insurance and laboratory and other services in aid of diagnosis. Payments for 1960–61 amounted to $189 million compared with $150 million in 1959–60. The increase of $39 million was due partly to the fact that during the previous fiscal year seven provinces had participated in the plan for a full fiscal year and two provinces for a partial year, whereas in the current fiscal year all provinces and territories participated under the agreements for a full year with the exception of the Yukon Territory and the Province of Quebec whose dates of entry under the plan were July 1, 1960 and January 1, 1961 respectively.

The effective date of each agreement is as follows:—July 1, 1958 for Newfoundland, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia; January 1, 1959 for Nova Scotia and Ontario; July 1, 1959 for New Brunswick; October 1, 1959 for Prince Edward Island; April 1, 1960 for the Northwest Territories; July 1, 1960 for the Yukon Territory; and January 1, 1961 for Quebec.

Family allowances

Family allowances are payable in respect of all children under sixteen years of age, resident in Canada, with minor exceptions such as in the case of children of immigrants who must reside in Canada a year before an allowance is payable. The monthly allowance is $6 if the child is under 10 years and $8 in the age group 10 to 15. Children of immigrants receive family assistance of $5 per month during their first year of residence in Canada from the Department of Citizenship and Immigration if during that period they are under sixteen years of age.

Family allowance payments in 1960–61 amounted to $506 million and represented 8 per cent of total expenditures. The increase of $15 million over the previous year reflected the increase in the number of children in the eligible age groups.

Old age assistance, disabled persons allowances, blind persons allowances and unemployment assistance

Under the Old Age Assistance Act, the federal government reimburses the provinces by paying 50 per cent of the lesser of $55 monthly or the amount of assistance given by the provinces in the form of monthly pensions to eligible persons in need who are in the age group 65 to 69. (Under the Old Age Security Act, all persons 70 years and over who satisfy the residence requirements of the Act may receive a pension of $55 per month from the federal government out of the old age security fund.) Similarly, the federal government reimburses the provinces under the Blind Persons Act for allowances of not more than $55 per month to blind persons in need 18 years of age or over by paying 75 per cent of the total payments, and under the Disabled Persons Act by paying 50 per cent of not more than $55 per month for allowances to disabled persons in need 18 years of age or over. In 1960–61 payments of $16 million in respect of disabled persons allowances, $4 million for blind persons allowances and $31 million for old age assistance were approximately the same as in 1959–60.

Under the Unemployment Assistance Act the federal government contributes up to 50 per cent of the cost of unemployment assistance paid by the provinces, subject to certain deductions as set out in the Act. All provinces have signed agreements with the federal government. There was an increase of $11 million in these contributions over those for the previous year.

National Research Council

Expenditures of the National Research Council amounted to $35 million in 1960–61, $3 million higher than for 1959–60. Increases of $1 million in scholarships and grants in aid of research, $1 million in construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, and $1 million in administration and general expenses were the main factors contributing to this increase.

Increases of $3 million in expenditures of the taxation division and $2 million in outlays of the customs and excise divisions were responsible for the increase.

Northern Affairs and National Resources

Expenditures of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources in the fiscal year 1960–61 were $74 million, approximately the same as the total for 1959–60.

Decreases of $1 million in expenditures of the northern administration branch and $2 million in outlays of the national parks branch were offset by the increase of $3 million in contributions to the provinces to assist in the development of roads leading to resources.

On August 1, 1960 Royal Assent was given to an act creating the Department of Forestry, comprising former divisions of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources relating to forestry. For purposes of comparison adjustments have been made for these items in the following table.

Post Office

Gross expenditures of the Post Office Department for 1960–61 were $207 million, an increase of $15 million over the 1959–60 outlay of $192 million.

Remuneration of postmasters and staffs at revenue and semi-staff offices, commissions at sub-offices and certain other authorized disbursements are paid from revenue. These payments, included in the total of $207 million, amounted to $28 million in 1960–61, an increase of $2 million over the comparable total for 1959–60.

Decreases of $12 million in public buildings—construction and services, and $7 million in development engineering services were offset partly by the increase of $1 million in payments to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in respect of defence housing administration, housing research and the clearance, replanning, rehabilitation and modernization of blighted or substandard areas and reimbursement of losses sustained as a result of the operation of federal-provincial housing projects.

The decline of $12 million in outlays for public buildings—construction and services during 1960–61 was due mainly to a reduction of $8 million in expenditures for the acquisition, construction and improvement of public buildings in Ottawa and $9 million in other centres in Canada offset partly by an increase of $4 million for similar expenditures in localities outside of Canada.

The decrease of $7 million in the expenditures of the development engineering services was due mainly to decreases of $4 million in contributions to provinces under the terms of the Trans-Canada Highway Act and $3 million in costs of construction of the Trans-Canada highway through national parks.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police

Expenditures for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police amounted to $56 million for 1960–61, $4 million more than the total spent in 1959–60.

Payments as shown in the table represent gross expenditures; payments received from the provinces for police services amounting to $10 million were credited to revenue.

Increased expenditures of $1 million for the land, air and training divisions, $1 million for higher costs of headquarters administration and national police services and the increase of $1 million in the government's contribution to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police superannuation account, were the main factors contributing to the overall increase of $4 million in departmental expenditures.

Effective April 1, 1960, by an Act of Parliament, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police pension account was renamed the Royal Canadian Mounted Police superannuation account. Under the new Act the government's contribution is based on the total amount paid into the account by contributors during the preceding quarter while under the old Act the government's contribution was based on the total amount paid into the account by contributors during the previous fiscal year. Consequently, the government contributed to the fund in 1960–61 an amount based on payments by contributors during 1959–60 and an amount based on payments by contributors for the period April to December, 1960, inclusive.

Trade and Commerce

Expenditures of the Department of Trade and Commerce totalled $22 million for 1960–61, an increase of $4 million over the previous year.

The more significant factors responsible for this increase were increases of $2 million in expenditures of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, $1 million in outlays for the trade commissioner service and $1 million for administration and general.

In 1960–61 under the authority of the Transfer of Duties Act, expenditures in respect of assistance re storage costs of grain, Board of Grain Commissioners and Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act were transferred to the Department of Agriculture and expenditures of the international economic and technical co-operation branch were transferred to the Department of External Affairs. For purposes of comparison the 1959-60 amounts covering these items have been reported under the respective departments.

Transport

Expenditures of the Department of Transport amounted to $338 million in 1960–61, an increase of $41 million over the total of $297 million in 1959–60.

The increase of $11 million in outlays for air services was attributable primarily to expanded services for aviation and consisted for the most part of increases of $6 million in outlays of the civil aviation branch and $3 million in costs of the meteorological branch.

Canal services expenditures increased by $1 million in 1960–61 while outlays for marine services declined by $10 million due to a decrease in expenditures for construction or acquisition of marine service steamers.

Expenditures for railway and steamship services increased by $15 million due to an increase of $13 million in payments under the Freight Rates Reduction Act and the increase of nearly $3 million in construction and acquisition of auto-ferries.

The payment in respect of the Canadian National Railway deficit for the calendar year 1960 was $67 million, $24 million more than for 1959 and the payment in respect of the Trans-Canada Air Lines deficit for the calendar year 1960 was $3 million. In 1959 the air lines had a small surplus. Non-active advances to the National Harbours Board were $1 million less than in the previous fiscal year.

Veterans Affairs

Expenditures of the Department of Veterans Affairs amounted to $292 million in 1960–61, an increase of $4 million over the 1959–60 total.

Increases of $2 million in outlays for treatment and welfare services, $2 million in war veterans allowances and other benefits and $1 million in pensions for disability or death were the main factors responsible for the increase.

A. CHANGES IN PRINCIPAL LIABILITY CLASSIFICATIONS DURING 1960–61

The gross liabilities of the government increased by $615 million during the fiscal year. The main changes were increases of $388 million in annuity, insurance and pension account balances, $178 million in unmatured debt and $50 million in current and demand liabilities.

Current and demand liabilities

This category consists of obligations of the government payable currently or on demand. The principal changes were increases of $16 million in accrued interest, $13 million in interest due and outstanding, $12 million in matured debt, $10 million in the revaluation adjustment of the Canadian dollar balance in the international monetary fund and $6 million in outstanding treasury cheques and a decrease of $9 million in accounts payable.

Unemployment insurance fund

There was a decrease of $3 million in the uninvested funds of the Unemployment Insurance Commission on deposit with the government. During the year there was a decrease of $110 million in the unemployment insurance fund. The balance at March 31, 1961, including loans from the Minister of Finance amounting to $67 million was $267 million compared with $377 million at

March 31, 1960. Expenditures from the fund were $518 million consisting mainly of benefit payments of $510 million, losses of $7 million on sales of investments and a small amount of interest on loans from the Minister of Finance. Receipts were $408 million, consisting of contributions by employers and employees of $276 million, government contributions of $55 million, income of $10 million from investments, and loans from the Minister of Finance of $67 million. Benefit payments were $95 million higher than the $415 million paid out in 1959–60.

Government annuities account

The government annuities account increased by $42 million during the year reflecting the amount by which premium receipts of $48 million and interest of $44 million credited to the account by the government exceeded payments of $50 million to annuitants and beneficiaries.

Public service superannuation account

The increase of $238 million in the public service superannuation account was due mainly to a credit of $138 million (to bring the balance in the account into line with an actuarial evaluation as at December 31, 1957 as calculated by the Department of Insurance), the government's contribution of $41 million (equal to the estimated current and prior service payments of individuals in 1959–60), and interest of $51 million credited to the account. The remainder of the increase was due to the excess of employees' current and prior service contributions of $48 million and miscellaneous receipts of $2 million over benefit payments of $42 million.

Canadian forces superannuation account

The Canadian forces superannuation account increased by $102 million. The increase reflected the government's contribution of $41 million which is made at the rate of one and two-thirds times the current and prior service contributions, interest of $43 million credited to the account, and contributions of $32 million by permanent services personnel for current and prior years' service less benefit payments of $14 million from the account.

Old age security fund

Under the Old Age Security Act pensions of $55 per month are paid, without a means test, from the old age security fund to all eligible persons seventy years of age or over. Payments from the fund during 1960–61, were $592 million while credits to the fund from the 3 per cent tax on personal incomes (maximum tax $90), the 3 per cent tax on corporation profits and the 3 per cent sales tax totalled $603 million leaving a net credit of $11 million. In 1959–60 payments were $575 million, receipts were $547 million and the deficit in the fund covered by temporary loans from the Minister of Finance was $28 million.

In the Budget Speech of April 9, 1959, the Minister stated that, since provision was being made for the necessary revenues (by increases in the old age security tax rates) to bring the fund into balance over the next two or three years, he did not propose to treat the 1959–60 deficit as a budgetary charge in that year but to carry it forward to 1960–61.

In accordance therewith the $11 million excess of receipts over payments in 1960–61 was applied to reduce the temporary loans made in 1959–60 leaving a balance of $17 million in the temporary loan account as at March 31, 1961.

Undisbursed balances of appropriations to special accounts

This category records the undisbursed balances of appropriations to special accounts for which moneys have been appropriated by Parliament and from which disbursements may be made for authorized purposes in periods subsequent to that in which the appropriation was made. There was a net increase of $8 million in this category during the year bringing the balance at March 31, 1961 to $105 million.

In 1960–61 an amount of $50 million was credited to the Colombo plan fund and charged to budgetary expenditure and disbursements charged to the account were $45 million. The balance at March 31, 1961 was $68 million.

The increase of $1 million in the national capital fund represented the amount by which the $3 million credited to the fund and charged to budgetary expenditure exceeded disbursements from the fund.

The increase of $3 million in the railway grade crossing fund represented the amount by which the credit of $15 million to the fund and charged to budgetary expenditure exceeded disbursements from the fund.

Deferred credits

Recorded in this category are the amounts of deferred interest on loans and advances to certain Crown corporations and national governments and other deferred payments due the government. These are contra accounts to corresponding items under "Cash in blocked currencies", "Loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations", "Loans to national governments", and "Other loans and investments".

Balances receivable under agreements of sale of Crown assets are set up as contra accounts to corresponding items under "Other loans and investments". The net decrease of $4 million during the year was due to payments received on outstanding agreements.

The government's equity in the agency account of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation is a contra account to a corresponding item under "Other loans and investments". The balance at March 31, 1961 was $5 million, approximately the same as at March 31, 1960.

There was no change during the year in deferred interest of $44 million on loans made under the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, and of $19 million on loans made to The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority. These are contra accounts to corresponding items under "Loans to national governments" and "Loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations" respectively.

Suspense accounts

These consist of balances where some uncertainty as to disposition exists.

The replacement of materiel account, established by section 11 of the National Defence Act, is credited with amounts realized from the sale of materiel that has not been declared surplus to requirements but has been authorized by the Governor in Council to be sold to other countries. The account is debited with disbursements representing amounts paid for the procurement of replacement materiel. During 1960–61 credits exceeded disbursements by $3 million.

The unclaimed cheques account is credited with the amount of treasury cheques (except those drawn on open accounts) which remain undelivered for certain specified periods subsequent to date of issue, pending claims therefor.

Unmatured debt

The unmatured debt of Canada at the close of the 1960–61 fiscal year amounted to $16,068 million, an increase of $178 million over the previous fiscal year total of $15,890 million. Debt payable in Canada increased by $250 million offset in part by decreases of debt payable in London of $20 million and in New York of $52 million. The decrease in debt payable in London and New York was due to the cancellation under authority of Order in Council P.C. 1961–460 dated March 30, 1961 of a portion of the loans that were being held for the retirement of unmatured debt.

The details of the various loan issues, redemptions and conversions resulting in the net increase are described more fully in section 6, "The Public Debt".

In the year under review, unmatured debt obligations payable in London have been stated in Canadian dollars converted at the rate of $2.80 for the pound sterling and that payable in New York at par for the U.S. dollar.

B. Changes in Principal Asset Classifications during 1960–61

The total assets increased during 1960–61 by $262 million. The principal changes were increases of $183 million in loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations, $138 million in the unamortized portion of the actuarial deficiency in the public service superannuation account, $88 million in other loans and investments, $64 million in advances to the exchange fund account and decreases of $91 million in current assets, $69 million in sinking fund and other investments, $36 million in loans to national governments and $20 million in deferred charges.

Current assets

The total of this category at March 31, 1961 was $771 million compared with $862 million at March 31, 1960. The main items of note were decreases of $71 million in cash in current and special deposits, $25 million in departmental working capital advances and revolving funds and an increase of $24 million in the securities investment account.

The decrease of $25 million in departmental working capital advances and revolving funds was due to decreases of $31 million in the agricultural commodities stabilization account and $5 million in the defence production revolving fund offset partly by increases of $3 million in miscellaneous departmental imprest and advance accounts and $8 million in other accounts.

Advances to the exchange fund account

Advances during the year to the exchange fund account to finance the purchase of gold and foreign exchange amounted to $388 million and repayments were $324 million, increasing outstanding advances to $2,024 million at March 31, 1961.

Sinking fund and other investments held for retirement of unmatured debt

There was a decrease of $69 million in this category during the year bringing the balance to $17 million at March 31, 1961. The decrease was due to the cancellation under authority of Order in Council P.C. 1961–460 dated March 30, 1961, of a portion of the bonds held for the retirement of unmatured debt.

Advances to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, to be covered by obligations or shares of the company, were $61 million at March 31, 1961, an increase of $2 million during the year.

Loans during the year to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation amounted to $235 million, of which $222 million was for direct loans by the corporation and $13 million in respect of loans for federal-provincial housing projects. Repayments totalled $43 million, of which $38 million was in respect of direct loans, $2 million in respect of loans for federal-provincial housing projects and $3 million in respect of loans for housing projects. The net increase of $192 million for the year brought the total loans to $1,511 million at March 31, 1961.

Loans to the Farm Credit Corporation amounted to $40 million and investment in the capital of the corporation amounted to $1 million during the year. Repayments by the corporation of $1 million, brought the outstanding advances to $156 million at March 31, 1961.

Advances to The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority during the year were $24 million bringing the total loans to $321 million. In addition, deferred interest on these loans was $19 million at the year-end, unchanged from the total at March 31, 1960. A contra item for this deferred interest is included in the liability category "Deferred credits".

In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1961, the government advanced to the Canadian National Railway Company $108 million for capital purposes and retirement of debt in the hands of the public. Of this amount $4 million was advanced for the company's purchase fund which is operated under the terms of Canadian National Railway Company bonds, guaranteed by the Government of Canada, issued on May 15, 1959, December 15, 1959, January 1, 1960 and October 1, 1960 and $1 million was advanced to the company under the Refunding Act, 1955 for the refunding of various trust certificates. During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1961, repayment of current and prior years' advances totalled $225 million, of which $221 million was from the proceeds of the sale of Canadian National Railway Company bonds dated October 1, 1960.

In addition, to assist the company to finance further capital expenditure during the fiscal year, the government purchased $21 million of four per cent preferred stock of the Canadian National Railway Company. This stock is issued under the authority of the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1952, in an amount equal to three per cent of the gross revenue of the company.

Further, in the year ended March 31, 1961, the government provided the company with temporary loans of $56 million in respect of its 1960 income deficit. This amount plus temporary loans of $14 million made on the same account in the previous fiscal year, less a repayment of $3 million representing advances not required by the company brought the total loans on account of the 1960 deficit to $67 million which was charged to budgetary expenditure in 1960–61. Also, in 1960–61, an accounting adjustment was made transferring to net debt $8 million in respect of the company's 1958 income deficit, under authority of Vote 565 of Appropriation Act No. 6, 1960.

In addition, temporary loans of $2 million were made in February 1961 to the company in respect of its 1961 income deficit.

In summary, the total amount made available to the company during the year was $184 million and repayments amounted to $300 million. The amount of advances to the company outstanding at March 31, 1961 was thus reduced by $116 million.

At March 31, 1960, temporary loans of $4 million were outstanding to the Trans-Canada Air Lines in respect of its 1960 income deficit. During 1960–61 further advances totalling $2 million were made for this purpose. The total amount of $6 million was repaid or credited during the year. However, the government made advances of $5 million on account of the air line's 1961 income deficit and this amount was outstanding at March 31, 1961.

Other changes in this category included increases of $9 million in advances to the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, $11 million in loans to the National Harbours Board, $8 million in loans to the National Capital Commission and $5 million in advances to the Northern Canada Power Commission.

Loans to national governments

These loans totalled $1,378 million at March 31, 1961, a decrease of $36 million during the fiscal year.

The United Kingdom government repaid $17 million on the $1,185 million loan made under the $1,250 million credit authorized by the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, reducing the principal outstanding at March 31, 1961 to $1,047 million.

Repayments of advances under Part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act to certain foreign countries to assist them in purchasing goods and services in Canada amounted to $15 million during 1960–61 reducing the balance at March 31, 1961 to $253 million.

Special loans to Colombo Plan countries to finance the purchase of wheat and flour from Canada were $32 million at March 31, 1961, $3 million less than the balance at March 31, 1960.

Miscellaneous loans and advances to foreign governments totalled $3 million at March 31, 1961, about $1 million less than the previous year-end balance.

Other loans and investments

There was an increase of $88 million in this category during the year bringing the balance at March 31, 1961 to $1,023 million.

Canada's subscription to the capital of international organizations increased by $26 million during the year due mainly to revaluation adjustments of $15 million in the Canadian dollar balance in the international monetary fund and a subscription of $9 million made by Canada to the international development association in accordance with section 4 of the International Development Association Act which was assented to on July 7, 1960.

Loans to provincial governments decreased by $4 million and overpayments to certain provinces arising out of the 1952 tax-rental agreements decreased by $1 million during the year.

Advances under the Veterans Land Act increased by $11 million. The reserve for conditional benefits under the Act decreased by $3 million and consequently the total increase in this account was $14 million.

Miscellaneous loans and advances increased by $53 million during the year due mainly to loans of $67 million to the Unemployment Insurance Commission which were outstanding at March 31, 1961 (there were no loans outstanding at March 31, 1960) offset partly by a decrease of $11 million in loans to the old age security fund.

Securities held in trust

This category records the security holdings of various deposit and trust, and annuity, insurance and pension accounts. Bonds and certified cheques held in connection with contractors' securities included in the deposit and trust category are also recorded under this heading. The balance at March 31, 1961 was $34 million, $4 million higher than the previous year-end balance.

Deferred charges

In this category are recorded the residual balances of discounts, commissions, redemption bonuses and conversion premiums on loan flotations that have not been charged to expenditures. There was a decrease of $20 million in this category during the year, bringing the balance at March 31, 1961 to $131 million.

Costs of new loans issued during 1960-61 and charged to the account were $34 million, of which $11 million was in respect of treasury bill discounts which will be charged to interest on public debt in 1961-62. Credits to the account amounted to $54 million of which $39 million was charged to annual amortization costs and $15 million, representing discount on treasury bills sold in 1959-60, was charged to interest on public debt in the 1960-61 budgetary expenditure accounts.

Unamortized portion of actuarial deficiencies

This category records the unamortized portions of the actuarial deficiencies in the public service and the Canadian forces superannuation accounts which have been set up as deferred charges to be written off to budgetary expenditure upon parliamentary approval.

During the year, $138 million was credited to the public service superannuation account in accordance with an actuarial evaluation as at December 31, 1957 and an equivalent amount was set up in this account as a contra item.

The deficiency in the Canadian forces superannuation account was based on the actuarial valuation made as at March 31, 1958.

Suspense accounts

The only item in this category is the cheque adjustment suspense account which reflects unadjusted balances resulting from the reconciliation of payments for redemption of paid cheques with the amount of those cheques as subsequently determined in adjustment of the outstanding cheque account.

Capital assets

Assets of the government such as land, buildings, works and equipment, etc., that are charged to budgetary expenditure at the time of acquisition or construction, are included in this category and are shown on the statement of assets and liabilities at a nominal value of $1.

Inactive loans and investments

Loans and investments which are not currently revenue-producing or realizable are recorded in this category. Included are the loan of $49 million to China under the Export Credits Insurance Act, loans of $24 million and $7 million made to Roumania and Greece in 1919-20 and 1920-21 and advances of $15 million in respect of the implementation of guarantees (Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited).

Reserve for losses on realization of assets

There was no change in this reserve during the year. The balance at March 31, 1961 remained at $546 million.

C. Increase in Net Debt

At March 31, 1961 the net debt of Canada amounted to $12,442 million compared with $12,089 million at March 31, 1960.

The budgetary deficit of $345 million for the fiscal year 1960-61 plus an accounting adjustment of $8 million in respect of prior years' transactions in connection with the Canadian National Railways 1958 deficit resulted in an increase of $353 million in the net debt of Canada during the fiscal year.

5. THE CASH POSITION

The government's cash position is affected not only by the budgetary transactions but also by changes in the government's outstanding unmatured debt and other non-budgetary transactions. In 1960–61, although there was a budgetary deficit of $345 million the government's bank balances decreased by only $71 million during the same period. This decrease was the net result of the budgetary deficit being offset by an increase of $223 million in outstanding unmatured debt (after taking into account transactions in the securities investment and sinking fund accounts) and the net receipts of $51 million from other non-budgetary transactions.

Non-budgetary receipts and disbursements relate to transactions which result in increases or decreases in the government's assets and liabilities and do not appear in what might be called the government's income account for the fiscal year nor do they enter into the calculation of the annual budgetary surplus or deficit. However, in considering the full scope of the government's financial operations and in measuring their effect on the government's cash position and their impact on the economy, non-budgetary as well as budgetary transactions must be taken into account.

The increases or decreases in the government's assets and liabilities have been described in detail in the section entitled "Statement of Assets and Liabilities of Canada". On the assets side the non-budgetary transactions consist, for the most part, of loans and advances to, and repayments by, Crown corporations and other government agencies and funds (including the old age security fund), national, provincial and municipal governments, international organizations, veterans and other borrowers. On the liabilities side they relate mainly to receipts and payments in connection with the many deposit and trust accounts, and annuity, insurance and pension funds held or administered by the government.

The following statement summarizes both the budgetary and non-budgetary transactions for 1960-61 and indicates how they affect the government's cash position. For purposes of comparison the corresponding figures for 1959-60 are also shown.

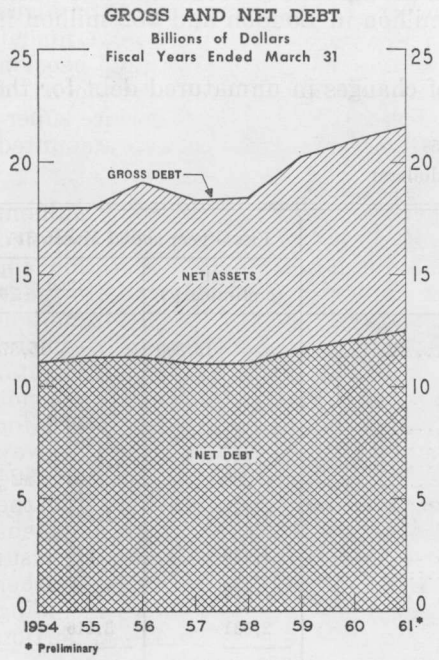
5. Net decrease (−) in Receiver General bank balances (3+4)	−71.2	−41.5

As the table shows, non-budgetary receipts and credits for 1960–61 (excluding unmatured debt transactions) totalled $690 million while non-budgetary disbursements and charges (also excluding unmatured debt transactions) amounted to $639 million, resulting in a net receipt of $51 million from non-budgetary transactions. As there was a budgetary deficit of $345 million, $294 million required financing by an increase in unmatured debt or a decrease in cash balances. In 1959–60 there was a net receipt of $38 million from non-budgetary transactions and for the same period there was a budgetary deficit of $413 million resulting in $375 million having to be financed by an increase in unmatured debt or a decrease in cash balances.

Non-budgetary receipts and credits, as already indicated, totalled $690 million in 1960–61. Repayments of loans, investments and working capital advances were $204 million and included $30 million in respect of the agricultural commodities stabilization account, $116 million from the Canadian National Railways, $11 million in respect of temporary loans to the old age security fund, $17 million from the United Kingdom government on account of the Financial Agreement Act, 1946 and $15 million from other national governments on loans made under Part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act. Net government annuities account receipts were $42 million and net insurance and pension accounts receipts were $349 million (including an accounting adjustment of $138 million with respect to the actuarial deficiency in the public service superannuation account). Net receipts and credits in various other accounts amounted to $95 million.



Non-budgetary disbursements and charges amounted to $639 million. Loans, investments and working capital advances were $483 million and included $9 million to the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation for investment in various cable projects, $192 million to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the purpose of making housing loans, $40 million to the Farm Credit Corporation for the purpose of making loans to farmers, $64 million to the exchange fund account, $8 million to the National Capital Commission for the purpose of acquiring land in the national capital area not required for immediate use, $11 million to the National Harbours Board for construction and capital expenditures, $24 million to The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority for costs in connection with the construction of the seaway, $24 million in respect of subscriptions to the international monetary fund and the international development association, and $67 million to the Unemployment Insurance Commission to finance the requirements of the unemployment insurance fund not otherwise financed by the sale of the fund's investments. Other non-budgetary disbursements and charges amounted to $156 million, including an accounting adjustment of $138 million in respect of the unamortized portion of the actuarial deficiency in the public service superannuation account.

In summary, as budgetary and non-budgetary transactions during 1960–61 required financing in the amount of $294 million, and unmatured debt outstanding in the hands of the public (after taking into account transactions in the securities investment and sinking fund accounts) increased by $223 million, cash balances on deposit with the banks decreased by $71 million.

6. THE PUBLIC DEBT

Gross and net debt

During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1961, the gross public debt increased by $615 million to $21,601 million. This increase was made up of increases of $178 million in unmatured debt and $437 million in other liabilities. During the year the government's recorded net assets increased by $262 million. The net debt increased by $353 million to $12,442 million, reflecting the budgetary deficit of $345 million plus an adjustment of $8 million in respect of prior years' transactions.

Unmatured debt

The total unmatured debt of Canada at March 31, 1961 was $16,068 million. This was $178 million more than the total at the end of the previous fiscal year. During the fiscal year the government's holdings of its own securities in the sinking fund and in the securities investment account showed a net decrease of $45 million. The net increase in the amount of outstanding unmatured debt in the hands of the public was $223 million.

Summary of security issues and maturities or redemptions during the year

During the year ended March 31, 1961, the government issued securities payable in Canadian dollars in the principal amount of $2,531 million (excluding the refunding of treasury bills which mature weekly), redeemed or converted issues payable in Canada in the amount of $2,181 million and cancelled issues (under authority of Orders in Council P.C. 1961–116 dated January 30, 1961 and P.C. 1961–460 dated March 30, 1961) in the amount of $172 million of which $100 million was payable in Canada, $20 million in London and $52 million in New York.

The following is a summarized table of changes in unmatured debt for the last two years:

(1) Of the public offering, $75,880,000 was sold at the above price. An additional amount of $44,120,000 was offered at competitive tender resulting in an average price to the government of 100.23. Bonds are exchangeable, on or before December 31, 1962, into an equal par value of 5¼% non-callable bonds due April 1, 1976.

(2) Of the public offering, $74,875,000 was sold at the above price. An additional amount of $5,125,000 was offered at competitive tender resulting in an average price to the government of 98.25.

(4) In exchange for $121,030,000 5½% non-callable bonds due October 1, 1960 and $221,000 5½% non-callable bonds due October 1, 1962.

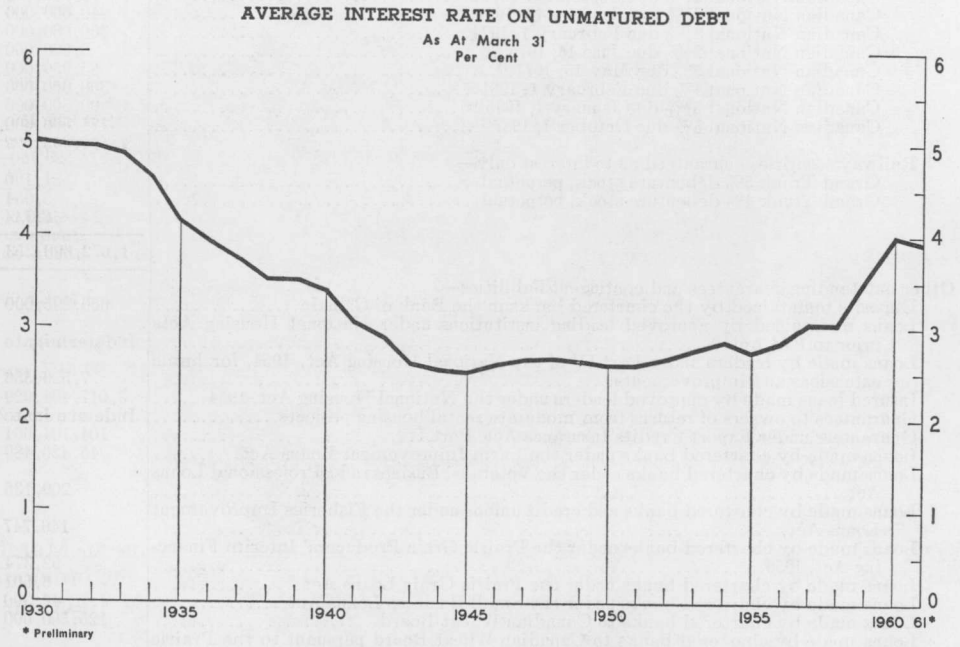
(5) Sold to Bank of Canada in exchange for an equal par value of $50,000,000 of treasury bills due June 2, 1961 and $50,000,000 of 3% bonds due December 1, 1961.

(6) In exchange for an equal par value of 5½% non-callable bonds due April 1, 1963.

Interest rates

The average interest rate on the government's unmatured debt at March 31, 1961 was 3.91 per cent compared with 3.98 per cent at the end of the previous fiscal year, reflecting lower treasury bill yields offset partly by a fractional increase in interest rates of marketable bonds.

The yield on the three-month treasury bills at tender on March 31, 1960 was 3.01 per cent. After declining to 1.68 per cent in September 1960, the yield had risen by December 1, 1960 to a high for the fiscal year of 3.95 per cent and was 3.21 per cent at tender on March 29, 1961.



The yield on six-month treasury bills was 3.23 per cent at tender on March 31, 1960. Six-month yields declined during the first half of the year to a level of 1.99 per cent in September and then rose to a level of 4.07 per cent on December 1, 1960. At tender on March 29, 1961 the rate was 3.37 per cent. The yield on one-year treasury bills issued on June 1, 1960 was 3.39 per cent.

The following table shows the high and low yields together with the yield on the last issue of three-month bills for the fiscal years ended March 31, 1957 to 1961 inclusive, and for six-month bills for the fiscal years 1959–60 and 1960–61:

Indirect debt or contingent liabilities

In addition to the direct debt set out in the statement of assets and liabilities the government has assumed certain indirect or contingent obligations. These consist of securities of the Canadian National Railways, guaranteed as to principal and interest or as to interest only, and a number of miscellaneous guarantees, the chief of which are the guarantee of insured loans made by chartered banks and other approved lending institutions under the National Housing Act, 1954, deposits maintained by the chartered banks in the Bank of Canada, bank advances to the Canadian Wheat Board, advances under the Export Credits Insurance Act and bank loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

The Budget—Appendix

The government's liability under its guarantee of insured loans under the National Housing Act, 1954 was $3,025 million at December 31, 1960 compared with $2,678 million at December 31, 1959.

The house met at 11 a.m.

GRAIN

WHEAT—FINAL PAYMENT ON 1959-60 POOL

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I should like to make a report to the house on the final accounting of the 1959-60 pool account for wheat. The 1959-60 pool account for wheat was closed as at May 26, 1961. The final accounting has been completed, and I am therefore in a position to advise the house of the operating results of this pool.

Producers delivered 377.4 million bushels to the 1959-60 pool. The 1959-60 pool closed with a surplus of $83,800,885, which included the interim payment of $37,744,417 paid to producers during February and March last. The final distribution to producers, therefore, will amount to $45,297,017, after allowing for the Prairie Farm Assistance Act levy and the cost of issuing final payment cheques, and after crediting the amount with estimated additional interest earnings.

On producers' deliveries of 377,444,166 bushels the average final payment is 12.017 cents per bushel. This compares with an average final payment on the 1958-59 pool account of 9.2425 cents per bushel.

Final payments for the principal grades of wheat delivered to the 1959-60 pool are as follows:

Red spring wheat grades

	Final payment (cents per bushel)
No. 1 Manitoba Northern ..	8.809
No. 2 Manitoba Northern ..	8.674
No. 3 Manitoba Northern ..	9.592
No. 4 Manitoba Northern ..	12.174
No. 5 wheat	20.997
No. 6 wheat	25.700
Feed wheat	30.429

Hon. members will note that when the interim payment and the initial payment are added to the final payment the spread between No. 1 and No. 6 is now just 21 cents a bushel.

Amber Durum grades

	Final payment (cents per bushel)
No. 1 C. W. Amber Durum ..	18.133
No. 2 C. W. Amber Durum ..	18.358
No. 3 C. W. Amber Durum ..	20.383
Extra No. 4 C. W. Amber Durum	23.353
No. 4 C. W. Amber Durum ..	22.888
No. 5 C. W. Amber Durum ..	20.997
No. 6 C. W. Amber Durum ..	25.700

The Canadian wheat board expects to commence issuing the final payment cheques during the last week in June.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the farmers and businessmen generally in western Canada will welcome the announcement that the final payments for wheat are now being made. It is unfortunate that this year the announcement of the final payment is exactly one month later than last year. That is to be regretted. I hope, therefore, that the cheques will be distributed as quickly as possible.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, not being competent—

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Herridge: —to comment with knowledge upon the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture with respect to the report on the full account for wheat, I shall direct the attention of the hon. member for Assiniboia to this statement and report, and ask him to comment in the usual way through the facilities of the Canadian Press.

REFERENCE OF WHEAT BOARD AND GRAIN COMMISSION REPORTS TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the supplementary report of the Canadian wheat board was received on Monday and the necessary orders in council were passed on Tuesday, I move:

That the annual report of the Canadian wheat board for the crop year ended July 31, 1960 which was tabled on March 3, 1961 and the report of the board of grain commissioners for 1960 which was tabled on April 12, 1961 and the supplementary report of the Canadian wheat board on the 1959-60 pool account for wheat, oats and barley tabled today, be referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. minister leave to present this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, as this is a debatable question I should like to point out that the interesting proposal made by the Minister of Agriculture this morning in suggesting that this report be referred to the proper standing committee of this house is of course fully in accordance with our practice. He is to be commended for recognizing the rights of parliament in this matter. It is regrettable, however, that the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot use this debate as a means of introducing something which is quite irrelevant; that is, the conduct of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I bring to the attention of the house a matter suggested by this procedure which is of vital importance to this country at this time. The practice which the Minister of Agriculture has resorted to, namely of referring the report of the wheat board to the parliamentary committee, particularly when there is no statutory obligation to do so, is a recognition by the minister, who on so many other accounts I have criticized and who today I applaud and warmly congratulate, of the fundamental rights of parliament and through parliament, the rights of the people of this country. The practice which the government has followed in this particular is a practice which the government should follow in all particulars, first of all in the Department of Agriculture—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am dealing with the Department of Agriculture. There are other reports of that department which—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are other reports that—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are other reports—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that the only question involved is whether this particular report should be referred to the standing committee. It would be out of order for him to introduce other extraneous and controversial matters which are not now relevant to this issue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I was saying that other reports of the Department of Agriculture likewise—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does Your Honour take the position—and I ask this question for enlightenment—that I have no right to mention other reports of the Department of Agriculture or of the government of Canada, such as the report of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, I take the position that it would be irrelevant to mention any other reports.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on this motion. I am not able to go as far as my hon. friend from Essex East has gone in commending the Minister of Agriculture. I am not able to do so because I assume the Minister of Agriculture, acting as a responsible member of the government and representing the collective decision of the government under our system of responsible government, is making this motion in pursuance of a decision made by the government.

Now, sir, the consideration of this report is going to take the time of members of the standing committee on agriculture, and take them away from the business of the house at a time when there is exceedingly important business before it, namely a budget that is alleged to be expansionist. Before we send a matter of this kind to the committee we should consider very carefully the proper use of our time in parliament. I am sure you will agree, sir, that this might well be done because in certain circumstances I would feel, in view of all the other demands upon our time, that perhaps it was inappropriate at this time and at this stage of the session to be taking this matter before the committee until other more urgent matters are taken there.

There is a very much more urgent matter, sir, the determination of which would affect my judgment on this particular measure. Because it would affect my judgment on this particular measure, and because I assume this is still a free parliament where there is freedom of expression of one's views as to the attitude one should take with respect to any motion and all the considerations that may enter into one's mind in determining that attitude, I say, sir, we should not be sending this report to the committee until after the report of the Bank of Canada is sent to the appropriate committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—ANNOUNCEMENT OF FIRST AUCTION SALE OF MORTGAGES

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this is a very prosaic statement after all this by-play. As I announced in the house on May 19, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation offered mortgages to approved lenders and investment dealers at auction in the form of 30 parcels, each covering different geographical areas and each valued at approximately $500,000. The tenders on this issue closed on Monday June 19, at 11 a.m., and I should like to announce to the house the results of this first sale of mortgages at auction.

The mortgages offered all carried an interest rate of 6¾ per cent with approximately 25 years to run. The average accepted tender across the board was at a premium, at 101.17, and in this connection I might explain that the bidders for these mortgages are all professional buyers of securities who know it costs about one point to put an investment of this kind on their books. Hon. members will therefore understand that, when this cost is deducted from the bid price, the tenders are at about par.

Of the 30 parcels offered for sale, there were five on which no bids were received. On the remaining 25 parcels, worth approximately $12½ million, the total bids amounted to $31 million. Allotments of the $12½ million have already been made to the successful bidders. In this first auction bids were received from chartered banks, life insurance and trust companies and investment dealers, a fairly representative cross section of those who can be expected to develop a secondary market in mortgages.

The results of the auction are such as to encourage a second offering to the growing mortgage market. In order that dealers may have time to dispose of the first issue, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation undertook not to make a second offering before the 18th of August, and it is likely that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will make its second offering about that time.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I assume that there was some degree of co-operation between the minister and the Minister of Finance at appropriate periods. It is fortunate that this sale was completed before the budget came down. I wonder whether the minister would say first of all how many 6¾ per cent mortgages there are to be sold, and how many are likely to be offered in this fiscal year?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, that will all be a matter for the judgment of the corporation as time goes on. I would be very happy to ascertain for the hon. member for Nipissing the particulars of how many 6¾ per cent mortgages are held at the present time. As to how we will sell them and the allotments, that depends a great deal on conditions at the time.

Mr. Garland: Will there be mortgages bearing less interest than 6¾ per cent offered for sale in this fiscal year?

Mr. Walker: I am glad the hon. member asked that question. Not at this time; the next auction will also be 6¾ per cent mortgages.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister is to be congratulated on the successful and very remunerative sale of the mortgages that were sold. However, I do feel that his announcement that no bids were received on five of the 30 parcels of these mortgages is a sad reflection on the investment houses of Canada. All of us are aware that there is much idle investment capital available in Canada at the present time, and the fact that not even a single bid was received is, I believe, a reflection on the business community of Canada and on their lack of confidence in the government.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, on the contrary it is a reflection indicating the good judgment of the government—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

STARRED QUESTIONS

BILL OF RIGHTS—DISTRIBUTION TO PUBLIC

Question No. 359—Mr. Tardif:

1. Have copies of the bill of rights been printed for distribution to the public?
2. If so, is anything except the bill itself included in the printing?
3. How many copies have been prepared?
4. On what basis are they being distributed?
5. Has the bill of rights been inscribed on calfskin?
6. If so, was anything else inscribed with the text of the bill itself?
7. What was the cost of preparing this document, and what is its purpose?

Hon. Noel Dorion (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the answer to all parts of this question is as follows: Twenty thousand copies of the bill of rights in English and 7,000 copies in French, suitable for framing and mounting on a wall, have been printed. Of these, 15,000 English and 5,000 French, bore, in addition to the bill itself, the coat of arms of Canada and an extract from the Prime Minister's statement in the House of Commons on July 1, 1960, summarizing the effect of the bill of rights, together with a reproduction of the Prime Minister's signature. These were printed on parchment paper. Only the original in English and the original in French were prepared on calfskin, from which the parchment copies were reproduced.

The cost of preparing the calfskin originals was $887.16 paid to the artist; and their purpose, as indicated, was as basic art work for the reproduction of illuminated copies of the bill of rights for sale and distribution to the public. The sale price will be $1 per copy for the illuminated reproduction printed on parchment. The plain copy of the bill of rights, not illuminated and printed on plain paper, will be sold for 25 cents per copy.

C.B.C. SPONSORSHIP, PUBLIC AFFAIRS INSTITUTE

Question No. 402—Mr. Pigeon:

What has been the cost to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of the sponsorship of the annual meeting of the Canadian institute on public affairs for each year since the said institute was established?

(Translation):

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): The C.B.C. advises me as follows:

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has never sponsored the annual meeting of that institute. The C.B.C. has paid to the Canadian institute on public affairs, since its establishment, certain amounts for broadcasting rights, participation, research, etc. Those amounts have been appropriated on a pro rata basis to radio and television.

MIECZYSLAW WILK

Question No. 404—Mr. McMillan:

1. Was Mr. Mieczyslaw Wilk a landed immigrant?
2. If so, on what date was he landed?
3. Did Mr. Wilk apply for the admission to Canada of the wife he had married by proxy?
4. If so, was his wife within the category of persons admissible under the existing immigration regulations?
5. If not, for what reason?
6. Is Mrs. Wilk a prohibited person under the Immigration Act?
7. Was the application for her admission refused for other than merely technical reasons?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer is as follows:

1. Yes.

2. January 5, 1959.

3. Yes.

[Mr. Dorion.]

4, 5, 6 and 7. Section 20(c) of the immigration regulations provides for the inclusion, within the categories of persons admissible to Canada, of the wife or fiancée—including the proxy wife—of a person who is a citizen by birth or naturalization of any country of Europe and who has been legally admitted to Canada for permanent residence.

Mr. Wilk's application for his proxy wife, therefore, came within the general provisions of this regulation. However, because of the limited examination facilities available to the department in respect of applications on behalf of residents in Poland, it is not possible to deal with all applications falling within the admissible categories set out in regulation 20(c). In accordance with policies established in 1956 and still in effect, the actual processing of applications is therefore generally limited to applications submitted by Canadian citizens.

Since Mr. Wilk, at the time of application, had not been in Canada long enough to acquire Canadian citizenship, he was advised that it was not possible to proceed further with his application at the present time; but that, if he wished to renew it at a later date, it would then be given further consideration.

Since, for the foregoing reasons, Mr. Wilk's application could not be proceeded with, medical and other aspects of Mrs. Wilk's examination for admission to Canada were not completed. It is not therefore possible to state whether or not Mrs. Wilk is a prohibited person within the meaning of the Immigration Act.

OKANAGAN HELICOPTERS LTD.—D.E.W. AND PINE TREE LINE CONTRACTS

Question No. 409—Mr. Bourbonnais:

1. What is the value of the contract awarded to Okanagan Helicopters Ltd., as of now on the D.E.W. line?
2. What is the value of the contract awarded to Okanagan as of now on the Pine Tree line?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the value of the contract being carried out as of now on the D.E.W. line by Okanagan Helicopters Ltd. is $264,960.

With respect to part 2, the value of the contract being carried out by Okanagan Helicopters Ltd. as of now on the Pine Tree line is $742,900, with Okanagan Helicopters Ltd. being the prime contractor and Wheeler Airlines (1960) Ltd. being its subcontractor for the provision of required fixed wing air transportation services in the amount of $103,500, included in the total figure which I have just given.

Both these contracts cover the period July 1, 1960, to June 30, 1961.

SUPPLEMENTARY ASSISTANCE TO OLD AGE PENSIONERS, B.C.

Question No. 413—Mr. Howard:

1. Has the government made any offer to the government of British Columbia to share the cost of supplementary allowances paid to recipients of the old age pension?

2. If so: (a) on what date was any such offer made? (b) what portion of the said supplementary allowances was offered? (c) was the offer accepted by the government of the province of British Columbia, and have any such payments been made; and, if so, what are the details?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer is as follows.

1. The federal government has always been prepared to share, under section 8 of the unemployment assistance agreement, in additional relief payments to recipients of old age security pensions as well as to recipients of old age assistance, blind persons allowances and disabled persons allowances. To be shareable, such payments have to be made on the basis of an individual assessment of need which takes the requirements as well as the income of an applicant into consideration. British Columbia began making payments on this basis, effective September 1960, and these are being shared by the federal government.

2. (a) The answer I have already given covers this point.

(b) The unemployment assistance agreement under which the payments are being made authorizes the federal government to reimburse the province to the extent of 50 per cent of its assistance payments.

(c) The province has been gradually transferring recipients from its supplementary allowance program under which eligibility was based on a means test, to its supplementary social allowance program which is based on a needs test. This progressive transfer is reflected in an increase in shareable amounts in the claims submitted each month. Provincial supplementary social allowance payments to old age security recipients included in reimbursement claims were $92,041 in September, $119,975 in October and $147,561 in November, the last month for which complete figures are available. The number of persons assisted in each of these months was 5,557; 7,170 and 8,774 respectively. It is anticipated that the number of persons covered by this program will increase for some months because of the continuing transfer of persons from supplementary allowances. If the above figures for old age security recipients are added to the figures for recipients of the three above mentioned assistance programs, the total federal and provincial payments for the months of September, October and November 1960 are $117,736, $155,718 and $192,182 and the numbers assisted are 7,033; 9,175 and 11,275.

Total federal payments to the province for the four programs for the three months in question were $247,079.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—PAYMENT OF FEES TO R.A.C. HENRY

Question No. 415—Mr. Pigeon:

1. What amount has been paid by way of fees to Mr. R. A. C. Henry, Montreal, consulting engineer, for his services in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway, between August 1, 1952, and September 30, 1954?

2. What amount did he receive annually, and for each working day?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to parts 1 and 2 is that order in council P.C. 4041 of 13 September, 1952, authorized payment of a retaining fee of $2,000 per annum and $100 per day to Mr. R. A. C. Henry for his services as consulting engineer, St. Lawrence seaway project. Remuneration was paid as follows:

For the period from 1 August, 1952 to 31 July, 1953	$20,450
For the period from 1 August, 1953 to 31 July, 1954	22,050
For the period from 1 August, 1954 to 30 September, 1954	2,100
Total	$44,600

OKANAGAN HELICOPTERS—DEFENCE PRODUCTION CONTRACTS

Question No. 416—Mr. Bourbonnais:

1. What is the value of contracts directly held by Okanagan Helicopters Ltd., with the Defence Production Department?

2. Were the contracts awarded to Okanagan this year alone through public tenders?

3. What is the total value of contracts awarded to Okanagan since its incorporation by the Defence Production Department?

4. When Okanagan was awarded the army establishment contract, did it possess and have available for the contract the Sikorsky-58 as required by specifications?

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the answer is as follows:

1. $1,033,500.
2. No.
3. $6,605,797.89.
4. No.

BANK OF CANADA—SUGGESTED RESIGNATION OF GOVERNOR

Question No. 417—Mr. Caron:

Did the Minister of Finance at any time receive from Mr. John Bassett, publisher of the Toronto Telegram, a suggestion that the government should seek the resignation of the governor of the Bank of Canada?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer is, not in any formal sense. I understand that the Toronto Telegram believes and has said that it would be, in its view, in the public interest that the governor should resign. I have no doubt that this also reflects the views of the publisher.

REQUESTS TO BANK OF CANADA TO INCREASE MONEY SUPPLY

Question No. 418—Mr. McMillan:

1. Did the Minister of Finance ask the governor of the Bank of Canada to increase the money supply on any occasions since June 21, 1957?
2. If so, on what occasions?
3. Did the governor refuse to accede to any such request?
4. If so, which ones?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the communications between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance have always been regarded as privileged.

REQUESTS TO BANK OF CANADA FOR INTEREST REDUCTION

Question No. 419—Mr. McMillan:

1. Did the Minister of Finance ask the governor of the Bank of Canada to take steps to reduce interest rates on any occasion since June 21, 1957?
2. If so, on what occasions?
3. Did the governor refuse to accede to any such requests?
4. If so, which ones?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is the same as that given to the previous one.

BANK OF CANADA PENSION PLAN

Question No. 420—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Has the Bank of Canada a contributory pension plan for its staff?
2. When was this plan established?
3. Is any contribution made to the pension plan from the federal treasury?
4. Is Mr. J. E. Coyne a contributor to the pension plan?
5. If so, when did he begin to contribute, and what percentage of his salary has he contributed in each year since that date?
6. Is there any statutory authority for the supervision of the pension fund of the Bank of Canada by the Minister of Finance or any other minister, and, if so, what is the authority?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course some of this information is not in the possession of the government, but I will endeavour to obtain from the Bank of Canada such information in order to give a complete answer.

Mr. Speaker: Question stands.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BANK OF CANADA—FISCAL POLICIES AND PENSIONS

Motion No. 146—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the government or any member thereof and the governor of the Bank of Canada since January 1, 1960, relating to fiscal policies of the government and the Bank of Canada and to the matter of pension arrangements for the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, communications passing between the government and the governor of the Bank of Canada have always been regarded as privileged and confidential. That status of such communications was confirmed by the governor at various times, as late as last March. The fact that this week the governor has broken that confidence by releasing a memorandum in what must be regarded as a serious impropriety is no reason why the government or parliament should follow him in that impropriety. It would be intolerable and indeed impossible to carry on public business on any basis except that exchanges of views between the government and its advisers are given and received in strict confidence.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I regard much of what the minister has said as irrelevant because—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has probably not recalled that the motion is not debatable. It is in order for the minister to state an objection to the motion. The minister's objection was perhaps rather longer than usual, but it is not a debatable motion.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I think the statement made by the minister involves the privileges of the house.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I can satisfy Your Honour very briefly that it does involve the privileges of the house. In his statement last week the minister has chosen to make remarks about these communications before any of them have been released by Mr. Coyne. Since the minister has chosen to make those statements, it seems to me the house is entitled to be in possession of the documents.

Mr. Speaker: The house has a decision to make as to whether or not it wishes to order the production of the documents. In view of the explanation of the minister does the hon. member wish to drop or proceed with the motion?

Mr. Howard: In view of the explanation of the minister there is even more reason to put the motion.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Howard), which was negatived on the following division:

BANK OF CANADA—RESIGNATION OF GOVERNOR

Motion No. 147—Mr. Benidickson:

For a copy of any letters or documents, memoranda, etc., written to or received from, since July 1, 1960, the governor of the Bank of Canada referring to a possibility of his resignation from his position in the Bank of Canada as governor.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my observations in respect to the last motion apply to this motion as well.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, in respect to this motion a very obvious matter of privilege arises of which I should like to speak.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I fail to see how any matter of privilege arises, but if the hon. member has a matter of privilege perhaps he will state it.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I think the matter of privilege is very obvious in this instance, because this motion differs very pointedly from the last, as the relative subject has reference to the resignation of this officer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member indicate how a matter of privilege arises out of the proposal of a motion?

Division

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, it arises because parliament by statute, in this case, regarding the matter of resignation, has authority under the Bank of Canada Act—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The matter before this house is a motion which calls for a decision by this house as to whether or not it will call for the production of the papers mentioned. There is no question of privilege arising out of this normal procedure involving a decision to be made by the house as to whether it will call for production of the documents specified.

Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members. Is it agreed that the members are in?

NUCLEAR ENERGY

RESUMPTION OF TESTS—CANADIAN POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the view expressed in this house on four occasions by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on nuclear testing, namely "Our position is very clear; we are against nuclear tests, period", and as he added on July 15 last, "with or without an international control", still represents the policy of the Canadian government.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question yesterday.

PUBLICATIONS

ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT—REPRESENTATIONS BY U.S. GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister inform the house whether there is any foundation for a report in the press that the government of the United States has been in touch with the government of Canada respecting the findings of the royal commission on publications?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre I would say that on June 19 the government of the United States communicated with the Canadian government in regard to two of the recommendations contained in the royal commission report and asked for the opportunity of consultation with regard thereto.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): May I ask the Minister of Finance a question supplementary to the one just asked by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. In view of the economic philosophy advanced in certain portions of the minister's budget speech last night to assist the development of more Canadian owned industry, why was there no mention of the royal commission report on publications?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure that the hon. member's question is one asking for factual information. It would seem to me to be more appropriate to raise it in the budget debate.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REPORT OF DR. CLARK—OMISSION OF REFERENCE IN BUDGET SPEECH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Was it as a result of the minister's failure to complete consideration of the Clark report that no mention was made of it in the budget speech last night?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member seems to be advancing an opinion in the form of a question. I suggest that hon. members bring these matters before the house when the budget debate is on.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN EAST COAST AND MAINLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the widespread interest in the province, will the minister advise the house whether he will be in a position to present the report on the study of a ferry service to the east coast of Newfoundland before the end of June, 1961.

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated before, this matter is under very active consideration and I hope to be able to make a further statement some time in the summer.

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF MEMORANDUM FROM GOVERNOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he has yet come to any conclusion in the consideration he said he would give to the question of whether the memorandum of economic policies of the governor of the Bank of Canada of last February should be tabled?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the observations I made this morning are a complete answer to the question put forward by the hon. gentleman. I refer to my comments on the nature of communications passing between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Now that this document has become public, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether he would object to any hon. member of this house tabling it?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it is not for any one member of the house to say whether a document ought or ought not to be tabled. This is a matter for the house, but the hon. member seems to have a copy of it. At the moment I fail to see what purpose would be served by tabling a document which when it was sent by the governor of the Bank of Canada to the Minister of Finance last February was a confidential communication—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is now a public document.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and has never ceased to be that so far as any understanding on my part or on the part of the government is concerned. The disclosure of that document was a very serious impropriety on the part of the governor of the Bank of Canada, and the hon. member is now asking that a document that came into his hands and the hands of other members of the house as the result of an act of impropriety on the part of the governor of the Bank of Canada should be made part of the records of this house. I do not think the house wishes to be a party to breaking down the confidential nature of communications in this manner.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the long answer given by the Minister of Finance, may I ask him whether he does not think there was a good precedent in the act of the Prime Minister in tabling a confidential, secret government report?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I just rise on a question of privilege and simply say that the hon. gentleman makes a statement which is completely false.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister says I made a statement that was completely false. Does Your Honour regard that as a proper parliamentary term?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In any event, I say the records of this house show that the Prime Minister did table a document which was confidential and intended only for the scrutiny of members of the government of the day.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege affecting every hon. member of this house, and arising out of the proceedings that have just taken place. My question of privilege is that there is a precedent in this house for the tabling of documents submitted as confidential reports to another government, and that precedent was created by the Prime Minister on the 20th of January, 1958, in the most outrageous act ever performed in this parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Another picayune observation.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The discussion appears to me to be completely out of order. It is a reflection on a decision taken by the house. The question which initiated the discussion was also out of order, because the tabling of a document is by leave of the house, not by leave of the Minister of Finance. I appreciate that the question was whether he had any objection, but it seems to me that as this is a matter for the house and, as a decision has been taken, it is improper to debate the matter. In any event, the tabling of that document would be a matter for decision of the house.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question not related to the document which has just been discussed. Have there been letters between him and the governor of the Bank of Canada relating to the subject of resignation other than those that have been made public by the governor of the bank?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not aware of any, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to table a document which has been distributed to the press and to members of the house, namely the statement of the governor of the Bank of Canada of February 16, 1961.

Mr. Grafftey: He still thinks he is a minister.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that the hon. member is following a sound precedent, but in any event if a document that is not a public document or one required to be tabled by public law is to be tabled, it will have to be by leave of the house. Pending any other conclusion on this point, I shall ask the house whether it gives leave to the hon. member to table the document. Those in favour will say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: I hear some protests and therefore—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The document which I have tabled and in connection with which I thought I had obtained leave—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —is a document that has been issued to the public of Canada, has been referred to in our debates during the past few days, and has been distributed by the governor of the Bank of Canada. The governor of the Bank of Canada, according to the Minister of Finance—and he has good authority for his statement in view of the Bank of Canada Act—is responsible to parliament. As the governor has issued this statement and made it public, then surely, if it has been referred to in committees of the house as it was yesterday, if it has been referred to in debates in this house, in the light of the reluctance of the Minister of Finance to table it himself, a private member, in respect of a matter involving the authority of parliament in relation to the governor, has the right to table a document which has now become public.

If this contention is not accepted we are put in the absurd position of seeing this statement which vitally concerns our discussions printed in extenso by the newspapers, as it has been, while at the same time we are denied something which is open to the press, television and radio services of our country. We would be denied access to this document in the official manner which our practice provides. In respect for the Minister of Finance it was proper that we should ask him first of all to table this statement, but since he is reluctant to do so notwithstanding the fact that it is a public document and as the governor is responsible to parliament I submit to you, sir, with great respect and much confidence in this view, that we have the right to table this document and we do not have to ask the house for leave to do so in view of this situation. If we are denied this right, which you have appropriately placed before the house by way of direction, Mr. Speaker, let the record be clear that we were denied that right as the result of action taken by an intransigent government.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, we have listened to the hon. gentleman make a statement which he himself knew was ridiculous when he made it. Indeed, when he makes such statements I study him very carefully, not by way of example but simply to observe the manner in which he makes these presentations. He seems to have forgotten that he is not on the treasury benches any longer, that four years ago today an event took place that he should not yet have forgotten.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You allowed the hon. member to go on.

Mr. Speaker: I take it the Prime Minister is speaking to the question of privilege, and I suggest that he address his remarks to that point. It may be no question of privilege at all, but it was put forward as a question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would simply point out this, if I might do so shortly, and follow a course that the hon. gentleman never follows. What he has done has simply constituted a breach of the privileges of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Cite your authorities.

Mr. Speaker: I see no question of privilege in what the hon. member for Essex East has put forward as a question of privilege. I had some doubts about the right to submit the document at all but I am clear that the house controls what goes on the table. Unless it has prescribed that documents be laid on the table by act of parliament—as certain documents are laid on the table in the ordinary course of events—when hon. members wish to place a document on the table, it is by leave of the house. That leave has not been given.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the effect of your ruling in this case is that any member of the house can prevent the tabling of any document proposed by any member of the government?

Mr. Speaker: No, that is not the effect of my ruling. It is not unanimous consent that is required, in my view. It is a matter for the house to decide in the usual way by a majority.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, there is another aspect of this problem. You have said that I must have leave to table this document. Your Honour, of course, is aware that under revised procedures many documents now are automatically tabled without any leave being sought of this house. In order that I would not be in contempt of parliament I would ask you if I will have the right now or at adjournment to table this document by handing it to the Clerk, as government members continually do without any resort to parliament at all.

Mr. Speaker: The question is a rather important one, of course, because if it were open to any hon. member without leave to place documents on the table of the house and make them parliamentary papers, there would be no control by the house. The citation in Beauchesne's fourth edition with regard to tabling papers is No. 209, which states as follows:

> Papers are laid before the house in pursuance of > (1) Provisions of an act of parliament;
> (2) An order of the house;
> (3) An address to the crown;
> (4) The command of the crown;
> (5) Standing orders of the house.

There are, of course, other instances in which the house asks for possession of papers.

For example, where they are referred to in debate and are quoted, an hon. member may insist that the documents be brought before the house. There is a citation on that point. However, that is not the issue today and I think I need not trouble the house with that point, but it will be found in Bourinot's fourth edition at page 245.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance this question in view of the act of the Minister of Agriculture this morning when he moved to refer the report of the Canadian wheat board to the committee on agriculture. In view of the action taken by his colleague will the minister not agree to table the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada and have it referred to the banking and commerce committee?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, do you intend to allow the time of the house to be taken up with this daily question? The answer remains the same as it has been now for days and days.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister does not want to follow the example of his colleague.

NATIONAL REVENUE

MONTREAL—VISIT BY INSPECTOR TO JEAN TALON HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Minister of National Revenue if he has been able to find out yet whether in fact an inspector of the income tax department did make an investigation at the Jean Talon hospital in Montreal?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that any matters of this sort have always been considered completely secret, and that it would be against good public practice to discuss the tax affairs of any particular taxpayer.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not ask the minister about the affairs of any particular individual. I merely asked whether it was a fact that a tax inspector had conducted an investigation at that hospital, and I was very careful not to talk about any individual file. Surely the question of fact could be determined.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member might be correct in making sure that his question was understood, but not in complaining about or debating the answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister answer the question?

[Mr. Speaker.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO SUMMER RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Now that the budget has been presented, is he in a position to inform members of the house whether it is the intention of the government to ask parliament to recess during the months of July and August?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, after discussion between the house leader and representatives of the opposition and the third party, I will be able to speak with some degree of authority, namely the authority of representatives of all parties in the house.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

The house, resumed from Tuesday, June 20, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-113, to amend the National Energy Board Act—Mr. Hees—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

The Chairman: When we adjourned yesterday we were considering clause 3.

On clause 3—Review of orders.

Mr. Hees: The amendment contained in clause 3 defines more specifically the powers of the board to change, alter or vary orders, certificates or licences issued by it. In exercising its functions the board differentiates between orders, certificates and licences. The amendment also provides expressly that no assignment or transfer of such a certificate or licence is effective until approved by the board and the governor in council, and that in approving any such assignment or transfer the board, with the approval of the governor in council, may attach such terms and conditions as it considers appropriate in the circumstances. This amendment would become important only if on proclamation, pursuant to section 87, imports and exports of oil were made subject to licence. The amendment itself removes from section 20 the present requirement that the board would have to hold a public hearing in every case involving the issuing—

Mr. McIlraith: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I am wondering whether the minister is not referring to clause 4 of the bill. Clause 3 is now before the committee, and it relates to section 17 of the act.

Mr. Hees: That is quite right. I have gone on to section 4. I am sorry but I did not notice that.

The Chairman: We are on clause 3.

Mr. McIlraith: Since this clause relates to rather extensive power and authority in the board to change, alter or vary a certificate or licence issued by it, perhaps this is an opportunity for me to make a remark I desired to make.

As to the wording of the clause itself, I have no particular comment. I think the section in the bill being amended required some clarification. However, I wanted to take this opportunity to point out what I think is one weakness, not only in connection with this clause but in connection with the bill generally, and it is this. The bill was introduced in the house the day before yesterday and the printed copies were available yesterday. At this stage of the session I am prepared to go ahead on that basis, but it seems to me that since these amending clauses are nearly all administrative or having to do with the administrative powers of the board, they are of such a nature that there should have been an opportunity between first reading and second reading for their circulation to the industry.

Those mainly concerned in the industry with this type of administrative problem are the oil and gas firms which have their offices and places of business mainly in Toronto, Calgary and Edmonton. This bill can only be available in their offices today. I just want to place on record my regret that it was found necessary to proceed in this way. If there is any explanation as to why the bill itself was not introduced in the house some days or weeks ago so that there could be a delay between first reading and second reading, I wish the minister would give such explanation.

Mr. Hees: It was a slip up which I very much regret, Mr. Chairman. I quite agree with the hon. member that it would have been most desirable to have a longer period elapse between first reading and second reading. I am sorry that procedure has not been possible. I can assure him that steps are now being taken to see that this kind of thing does not happen in the future on bills in general.

Mr. McIlraith: In the meantime the difficulty is that legislation, once imbedded in the statutes, has a habit of staying there unamended for some time. There may be items in the clauses that were never intended by the government or would never have been permitted to pass by the opposition had they known about them. The amendments are of a nature that do not involve great questions of principle but may involve some inconvenience to the industry. I raise the point now and I hope in the future the minister will take more care in these matters to see that some better practice is followed.

It is interesting that the rules of the United Kingdom parliament at one time I believe, required the lapse of ten days between first and second reading of a bill. I think that rule has long since disappeared. Probably it is not desirable that it be a rule of the house, but it is certainly a desirable practice in legislation of this type, where the subject matter with which we are dealing involves somewhat complex matters of administration on the part of the national energy board rather than great matters of principle.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I might just add that the principle underlying these amendments was discussed with the responsible ministers of the following provinces; British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Quebec. In the province of Ontario the minister was not available and discussions were held with the deputy minister. Those are the provinces really affected by the National Energy Board Act and, as I say, the principle underlying these amendments—

Mr. McIlraith: Some of the sections.

Mr. Hees: —has been discussed with responsible people in those provinces.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I support in general the remarks made by the hon. member for Ottawa West. The minister has just mentioned that in this case there was a discussion with ministers of the provinces directly concerned and the deputy minister of Ontario, and they generally expressed agreement with the amendments to this measure. Is that correct?

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Mr. McIlraith: Is it not fair to say the discussion would only be in connection with those amendments that affect provincial rights? Some of these clauses would be of no concern at all to provincial attorneys general.

Mr. Hees: That is correct. I was referring to the clauses affecting provincial rights.

Mr. Herridge: Those are the clauses which would be of particular concern to them and possibly to some hon. members of the house without an explanation?

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 4—Public hearings.

Mr. Hees: This amendment would become important only if by proclamation pursuant to section 87 imports and exports of oil were made subject to licence. The amendment itself removes from section 20 the present requirement that the board would have to hold a public hearing in every case involving the issue, cancellation or suspension of a licence for the importation or exportation of oil.

Oil, unlike gas, is not generally traded on a long term basis, and in the event that it did become necessary to licence the import or export of oil, the licence would be for a maximum period of one year and would probably be for a term of six months. There would undoubtedly be a large number of applications, and it would be virtually impossible for the board to hold a public hearing in each case.

The board informs me that it would be its intention to hold public hearings from time to time to give the industry an opportunity to make representations in regard to any regulation or formula which might be adopted to determine the method of computing the amount of crude oil or products which an applicant for an import or export licence would be entitled to. I also remind the committee that the governor in council would have to approve any licence to import or export crude oil or products.

Mr. McIlraith: I recognize that the practice would be, in the event of the import of oil, for licences to be granted only for a short term, although there is nothing in the act that I can see which prevents the national energy board, if it so desires, granting a licence for a very long term. There is no statutory protection on that point. However, I think it is reasonable that within the industry such licences, if granted, would be for a short term. Since they are for a short term, the method of public hearings is not feasible and would appear in many instances to be unreasonable in relation to the problem confronting the board with respect to possible oil import licences.

However, there are two problems that concern me. This amendment is made necessary by the reference to section 87 of the act, and would only become of real significance in the event that the governor in council took action under section 87 to bring the import of oil under the provisions of the act.

That raises, of course, the old point that was a point of real difference at the time the act itself was before the House of Commons. I refer to the argument that the governor in council should never have been given the power to take that arbitrary action. The authority to bring the import of oil under control in a nation that has wide trade interests, as this nation has, and a nation that is so dependent on trade, as this nation is, is a right which should never have been granted to the government without some need being demonstrated for the government to have that power. The need has not been demonstrated.

While I do not want to open up the whole argument again, I for one persist in my view that this arbitrary authority should never have been given to the government, and that any government seeking to take such drastic action in respect of a commodity of such importance in our trade field should be required to come to parliament and have parliament take the action.

The amendment of this section, bearing in mind that the amendment can only have significance if the government has taken action under section 87 to bring the import of oil under control, raises in my mind at once the question, has the government in mind bringing the import of oil under control? I should like the minister to address himself to that point.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to add to what I said in this house when I spoke on the national oil policy on February 1. At that time I said I hoped the aims of this act—that is, the aims of the national oil policy—could be accomplished by voluntary action, but if this could not be done, then if necessary section 87 would be proclaimed.

I think the hon. member and all hon. members would agree that the purpose of the national oil policy, which is to materially increase the use of Canadian oil in Canada, is a worthy objective. I feel sure that we are all at one in our desire to see that objective reached. We hope it can be reached on a voluntary basis, but I think the hon. member would agree that if it cannot, it would then be necessary to bring in controls under section 87.

Mr. McIlraith: Could the minister advise the committee whether there has been any result, under the oil policy as announced on February 1, that would indicate the oil policy targets are less likely to be achieved than the minister indicated in that statement?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Chairman, there is no such indication. I am very hopeful that the objectives of the national oil policy will be achieved.

Mr. Herridge: I quite realize the necessity for this amendment owing to the short term nature of some of these licences for the export and import of these commodities. Is it correct to say that the governor in council has to approve any licence for the import or export of crude oil or oil products? Is that a protection, and is it necessary in the first instance because of government policy in relation to changing economic circumstances?

Mr. Hees: Yes, the governor in council has to approve all licences to export or import gas or oil or power.

Mr. McIlraith: I have one further question to ask on this clause. I note that the hearings required to be public hearings have to do with the export of gas or power and the import of gas. There is nothing said about the import of power. The Columbia river project has now reached a certain stage. I do not want to develop a discussion on that matter now, because the subject is not before the committee, but arising out of that project is there any prospect of an exchange of power which would make it desirable for us to import power, though I realize that the project basically involves the export of power?

Mr. Hees: I am advised there is no restriction on the import of power, and we cannot see any contingency which might arise where any restriction on the import of power would be necessary.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Application for certificate; material to be filed.

Mr. Hees: This amendment is for the purpose of requiring additional technical information to be filed with any application for a certificate to construct a pipe line where the board considers such additional information to be necessary. I can assure the committee that the board will not ask for any additional information which is not necessary, but from time to time some additional information is necessary.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Further plans.

Mr. Hees: This amendment requires a company in any case where, for example, a certificate issued to the company relates to equipment for other works connected with a pipe line, to file with the board such further or other plans, specifications and drawings in addition to the plan, profile and book of reference now required under section 29 as the board may from time to time require. This is much the same as the requirement outlined in the previous clause, which provides that the board may from time to time ask for additional information as it may see fit.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister inform the committee what type of equipment is under consideration in an amendment such as this?

Mr. Hees: Compressor stations, meter stations, pumping stations.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—Terms and conditions of certificates.

Mr. Hees: The effect of this amendment is to remove from section 46 as it now stands the words "construction, ownership and operation" so that with the removal of these restrictive words the section will permit the board to issue a certificate upon such terms or conditions as it may consider necessary or desirable to give effect to the purposes and provisions of the act.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8—Exempting orders.

Mr. Hees: The effect of the proposed amendment is twofold. First, section 25 prevents construction or operation of a pipe line other than by a special act company. Section 26 prohibits operation of a pipe line without a certificate, together with leave to open, both of which are granted by the board. Section 27 prevents the commencement of construction of a pipe line, or a part thereof, until a certificate has been issued and certain technical data have been filed. Section 28 requires a certain type of map to be filed upon a certificate application, and section 29 provides for further technical data and information to be filed. Therefore the board's power to exempt pipe lines or parts of pipe lines from any or all of the provisions of the above sections is extended and made more clear.

The second effect relates to international power lines. Section 40 of the act prohibits construction of an international power line without a certificate from the board. Section 41 requires the filing of certain technical information respecting international power lines, and section 43 prohibits operation of an international power line without first obtaining a certificate. The proposed amendment would give the board power to exempt small international power lines, not exceeding 5,000 kilowatts in transfer capacity, from the provisions of sections 40, 41 and 43. The amendment would permit, for example, a small utility located in one province to build a pipe line of less than 25 miles in length to obtain a gas supply from another province or from across the border in the United States without the necessity of going to the expense of obtaining a special act.

Such an amendment is desirable in order that small power lines carrying relatively inconsequential amounts of power across the international boundary line may be exempted from complying with the aforementioned sections.

Mr. McIlraith: The proposed new section 49(1)(b) changes the test applicable to power lines, that is lines that may be exempted, from one of length to one of capacity. I think I am right in my understanding of this, but I want to be clear that the power to exempt is limited to the construction and operation of the power line and has no relation whatever to the licence to export power.

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Mr. Herridge: I have read the clause carefully and listened to the explanation given by the minister. I take it that it is correct to say, with respect to the international power lines, that this is purely to meet certain incidental needs and circumstances, that it has no effect upon our policy with regard to the commercial export power.

Mr. Hees: That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 9—Extended meaning of "oil".

Mr. Hees: Section 59 presently permits the board, subject to such exceptions or conditions as it may prescribe, to require a company operating an oil pipe line to transmit all oil delivered to it for transmission. The effect of this amendment is to extend the board's authority to the transmission of liquefied gases such as propane and butane where they are being transmitted, as is sometimes the case, through an oil line.

Mr. McIlraith: I take it this is merely due to the practice now developing where certain liquefied gases are now being produced in the oil areas, and under the existing legislation there is no authority to compel a pipe line company to act as a common carrier, though the whole concept is that an oil pipe line is a common carrier; and these liquefied gases are of such nature that they are not bought by a pipe line company, as in the case of gas, in the sense in which that word is presently used, with regard to their transport as a commodity by the common carrier.

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. Churchill: I think there are only four more clauses still to be considered. I notice it is nearly one o'clock, but we might finish in five minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McIlraith: I shall have something to say on clause 10, but I would have no objection to our continuing.

On clause 10—Tolls for transmission of gas.

Mr. Hees: I should like to explain this clause. By deleting the words "from any place within a province to any place outside the province", the application of the section is extended to the intraprovincial transmission of gas by a company to which the act applies, where the gas transmitted through its pipe line is the property of the company. This has the effect of enabling the national energy board to fix tolls for the transmission of all gas through a pipe line subject to federal jurisdiction where such gas is owned by the pipe line company, regardless of the origin or destination of the gas.

I think the house will appreciate the fact that once gas is injected in a pipe line it becomes indistinguishable as to origin or destination. We have one pipe line company which at the present time picks up gas in Alberta and British Columbia and delivers gas at points in British Columbia for consumption in that province, and exports the balance of the gas at the international boundary. As the section stands now it would be impossible for the board to segregate the gas produced and sold in British Columbia and fix tolls on the balance. There is also the implication that some other authority would have the right to fix tolls on the gas produced and sold in British Columbia, or alternatively that no tolls could be fixed for the transportation of gas produced and sold in British Columbia. This is an impossible situation.

By deleting the words "such proportion as the board may fix" of the differential between the amount paid for the gas and the amount for which the gas is sold, recognition is given to the impracticability of devising any general formula for the equitable determination of the portion of the difference that is to be deemed a toll. The amendment would have the effect of permitting the board to rely upon the differential between the cost to the company of the gas and the amount for which the gas is sold as the toll in the case of a company that owns the gas being transmitted. The use of this differential is considered appropriate in this case inasmuch as recognized public utility practice requires that gas transmission companies calculate their earnings as a return on the amount of investment in useful facilities employed in providing the transmission service. There is no profit permitted on the actual purchase and sale of the gas. The costs associated with the purchasing and selling of gas are expenses.

The amendment would also substitute for the phrase "the amount paid by the company for the gas" the phrase "the costs to the company of the gas", to make it clear that any amount charged to the company for bringing the gas to the point where it enters the company's pipe line, for example an amount charged by a provincially incorporated gathering system, shall be a part of the cost to the company of the gas and, therefore, excluded from the amount of the deemed toll, subject to the jurisdiction of the board.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, section 61 of the act which is being replaced reads as follows:

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I could dispense with reading that section.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: At the time the original act was before the house in 1959 it was clear that very few members understood just exactly what the section meant. I must confess that I was among those. I cannot speak for the minister at that time, but I certainly have my doubts as to what it means. Indeed, the hon. member for Vancouver East is reported in Hansard at page 4210 of June 1, 1959 as having asked the following question after reading the section into the record:

What in the name of heaven does that mean?

I think that question aptly describes section 61 of the act, and I am pleased to see that it is being replaced by something which is intelligible as to form. The new section will read as follows:

Where the gas transmitted—

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I could also dispense with reading that section.

The Chairman: Yes. Quote.

Mr. McIlraith: I have a couple of questions which I should like to ask at this time. The approach to the problem, of taking the cost to the company of the gas when it is put into the lines and the price at which it is sold, is undoubtedly a better approach than dealing with the differential between the cost price and selling price, as was done in the act. I am sure it is now clear that the board has jurisdiction in respect to gas transmitted within a province through a pipe line which is wholly under the jurisdiction of this parliament. I share the view of the minister that this is quite within the constitutional authority of parliament, and I am glad to see that approach taken to the problem.

There is one other implication in this clause which has not been dealt with by the minister. Anyone reading the explanatory notes will understand that the new clause bases the fixing of the differential between the cost and selling price of the gas, or the carrying charge, on the formula of permitting the gas transmission company to calculate its earnings on the return on investment in facilities used in providing the transmission service. It will be noted that the test now is based on the earnings as a return on investment, and I believe that is different from what the Borden commission recommended, which was that the test should be based on the earnings of the company's equity in the pipe line. I wonder whether the minister could explain why the Borden commission's recommendation was not followed in regard to that point.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, there is no necessity for me to repeat the comments made by the hon. member for Ottawa West. However, I do intend to ask two questions. This is the section which would be of particular interest to provincial governments, and in respect of which discussions were held during which it received approval.

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Mr. Herridge: Second, as to the other amendment which deals with the profit permitted on the actual purchase and sale of the gas in relation to transmission, is it correct to say that this amendment more securely prevents, shall I say, individuals engaged in this business from acting as middlemen and making a profit on the transmission of gas over and above the profit allowed on the investment in the pipe line.

Mr. Hees: Yes, that is correct. With regard to the questions of the hon. member for Ottawa West, I should like to say that I am not too familiar with the thinking of the members of the Borden commission. However, I am advised by the chairman of the national energy board that the method adopted in this measure is according to normal practice. I cannot say anything further in this regard.

Mr. McIlraith: As I understand that method it is in accordance with the normal practice of gas public utility accounting procedures.

Mr. Hees: That is correct.

Mr. McIlraith: As I understand it, the Borden commission made a different recommendation in respect to the method of fixing tolls. I may be wrong in that statement.

Mr. Hees: No, that is quite correct.

Clauses 10 and 11 agreed to.

On clause 12—Leave to construct highways, etc., across or along pipe lines.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, the amendment contained in clause 12 appears to clarify the situation with respect to the authority of the board. There are two points which I should like to raise concerning this clause. I think I can do so very briefly, but perhaps the minister intends to make a statement in this regard.

Mr. Hees: No.

Mr. McIlraith: The first point I should like to touch upon has reference to a private bill which was put before this house earlier this session by the hon. member for Middlesex West, which was Bill No. C-5, to amend the National Energy Board Act (drainage works). The debate in respect to that bill appears in Hansard of Tuesday, December 13, 1960, at page 762. The hon. member for Middlesex West dealt with the drainage problem which exists in southwestern Ontario. He sought to have the matter of jurisdiction in respect to Ontario's drainage authority made applicable to the pipe line companies operating under this board. It is interesting to note that he sought to have provincial jurisdiction made applicable to such federal public works. As I understand the effect of that proposal, it would enable the referees under the Ontario drainage legislation to fix costs of certain drainage works against these pipe line companies.

The government did not express its view in respect to that private bill and I should like the minister now to do so, because it relates directly to the point raised by this clause. Perhaps the minister can inform the committee why the government did not adopt the recommendations of the hon. member for Middlesex West.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I am advised that the board has sufficient power under section 77 of the act to carry out what the hon. member for Middlesex West requested.

Mr. McIlraith: As I understand the situation, those farmers affected by these drainage works did not have the right to apply to the board to have the charges fixed, as they could apply to the drainage referees.

Mr. Hees: I am advised that the owners of the utilities—the farmers or whoever owns the land—may apply.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, clause 12 reads in part as follows:

> No highway, private road, railway, irrigation ditch . . . shall, except by leave of the board, be carried across, along, upon or under any pipe line.

I find the meaning of the word "along", as used in that context, very obscure. I do not know whether it means adjacent to, abutting, or travelling along for some distance in a parallel direction. I only hope that as questions arise which may affect safety within a building or with respect to other public works of the nature described in this clause adjacent to a pipe line of relatively high pressure, a larger pipe line, cognizance will be taken by the board of safety requirements, and that if there is necessity for clarification of the meaning of the word "along" in this context they will come back to the house so the requirements of safety regulations, which will become more acute as time goes on, will be made paramount, rather than have any hesitation about the matter.

Mr. Hees: That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 13 agreed to.

On clause 14—"Oil or gas" substituted for "gas".

Mr. McIlraith: I take it that the use of the expression "oil or gas" is merely consequential on the change of the definition clause in this bill and has no other implications?

Mr. Hees: That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to say that this has been the longest five minutes I have ever spent in my life. I stuck it out only out of regard for the minister.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Harbours and rivers engineering services—

357. Remedial works where damages are caused by, or endanger, navigation or federal government structures, $800,000.

Mr. Bourget: I wonder whether the minister is going to reply to the remarks that were made by the hon. member for Hull on the question of remedial works and whether discussion should take place between the federal government and the provincial governments with regard to the responsibility for such remedial works.

Mr. Walker: I would be very happy to do so. On previous occasions, both verbally and by correspondence, I have tried to enlighten the hon. member for Hull on this matter. Because of the mood of the house today I will go no further than to say that I have tried to do so. Apparently I have failed and so I shall make one more effort. Incidentally, I am not referring to the hon. member for Levis.

The history of this matter is that back in the thirties there was an unemployment relief vote whereby funds were provided to carry out work which was not necessarily a federal responsibility. This included protection works. Subsequently, when the vote was discontinued, a general vote respecting protection works was instituted, but by 1954 there were so many demands on this vote that it would have cost the government hundreds of millions of dollars to meet these requests which were not a federal responsibility.

In 1954 the wording of the vote was changed. It was changed, incidentally, by the administration in which the hon. member for Levis was the distinguished parliamentary assistant to the then minister of public works. The hon. member will recall that the vote was changed to provide funds for work which the federal government should carry out.

There are two principles involved. The first is that the British North America Act places property and civil rights under the jurisdiction of the provinces, and the shoreline of every lake, river and creek comes under the property category. It includes water lots, and it may be of interest to point out that in the construction of our various wharves and other projects we are obliged to obtain from the province the administration and control of the shore line and water lot property for the life of the project. There can be no argument, in so far as erosion is concerned, as to the shore lines of our many waters in Canada not being a provincial responsibility. As a matter of fact, there seems to be no question about that.

The second principle involved relates to navigation and here we have a responsibility. The control of navigation was retained by the federal government at the time of confederation and the law in that connection has not been changed up to the present time. As a result, therefore, we have the Navigable Waters Protection Act which is administered by the Department of Transport and the Department of Public Works. The Department of Transport administers that portion dealing with hazards to navigation and is particularly concerned with ship channels. Derelicts or wrecks of ships constitute examples of such hazards.

The Department of Public Works administers that portion of the act relating to the construction of projects under, across or over navigable waters. From this federal responsibility with respect to commercial navigation channels we get a connection between maintaining that channel, which we do through the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and even by dredging, and the damage that shipping does the nearby shore line.

There is doubt, of course, that erosion caused by shipping is legally a federal responsibility but it has been assumed as such and I think that the responsibility possibly exists. However, erosion from flooding or from natural causes cannot be included in this category and in accordance with the British North America Act that remains the responsibility of lower levels of government.

Shore erosion is also often caused by man-made structures such as docks, wharves and bridges which disturb the natural flow and change the course of the water thus causing erosion. Those responsible for the construction of such projects should be held responsible for the damage thus caused through erosion. The federal government accept this principle and is prepared to repair damage done under these circumstances. This explains why the vote relating to protection works is confined to the expenditure of money for erosion where it is caused by commercial navigation or where there is a federal structure involved. Much as I should like to extend that limit to please different members on both sides of the house, the frightful cost to the federal government in assuming a responsibility that is not a responsibility of the federal government would be so great as to make it a burden which no federal government could possibly bear.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 357 carry?

Mr. Bourget: I am not going to pursue the discussion on that particular item. I know the difficulties that are probably going to be faced if we enlarge the vote. As the minister will recall, and also the deputy minister because he was at the public accounts committee, even the Auditor General questioned the propriety of certain expenditures that have been made; I do not remember exactly whether it was in 1958 or 1959. That shows that even the Auditor General is not too sure of the wording of vote 357. I am therefore wondering whether the minister would not have a look at it and find out whether the wording could not be changed.

The Chairman: Shall vote 357 carry?

Mr. Bourget: Before it carries, I should like the minister, if he would be kind enough to do so, to supply me with a list of the remedial works that were performed last year and those which are expected to be performed this year. I do not ask for that information now. It can be given later.

Mr. Walker: I shall be very glad to do that and send it to the hon. member.

Item agreed to.

Dredging—

359. Maintenance and operation of plant and contract and day labour works, $4,090,205.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to take the opportunity to rise again as we are now proceeding in another day. I placed some restraint on myself last Saturday at the minister's request and willingly so. But on this vote for dredging I just want briefly to bring to the minister's attention the fact that the dredging of channels in the Arrow lakes is somewhat of a different nature from what it has been in the past. Since the passenger steamers are now off the lakes, the channels will have to be longer and straighter or I should say there will have to be longer tangents in the channel—I refer to straight tangents—because of the length of these booms that are towed there. From this time on there will be approximately from 600,000 to 1 million feet of logs a day going from the upper to the lower Arrow lakes proceeding to the pulp mill near Castlegar. It requires a long and deep channel. I am just suggesting to the minister that, whatever happens on the Columbia, we have at least a five year period that has to be taken care of. I hope to goodness it does not happen. However, this is a very important industry. I suggest that some attention should be paid to this matter by one of the engineers. I suggest that it would be a good idea to get in touch with the officials of the company and those in charge of operating tugs and towing services. They have a fairly good idea of what is required. When the steamers were running the department had excellent relations with the captains on the sternwheelers and as a result of that co-operation were able to do the maximum amount of work to the greatest advantage with the minimum of money. I have been asked to raise this matter and to direct the minister's attention to it because of the changing circumstances.

The other thing I have been asked to bring to the minister's attention is the necessity for a wider channel for vessels going into the Arrowhead dock because of the large ice floes that come down the Columbia river in the spring which make it very difficult on some occasions for the passenger vessel proceeding from Nakusp to Arrowhead to get into the dock. The channel now is quite satisfactory except that it is too narrow. In addition to that, it requires widening because there are millions of pieces of logs towed from the north arm of the Arrow lakes and at that point they make a right angle turn; and no tug with a long tow behind it can make a right angle turn and have the logs or the tow, as anyone knows, follow it exactly. I suggest that some consideration should be given to that matter in consultation with the persons interested in the forest industry, the towing of logs and so on.

[Mr. Walker.]

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Last Thursday, Mr. Chairman, the honourable or perhaps I should say the Ontario member for Laurier stated that the 27 foot dredged channel at Cornwall enabled this government to construct port facilities in their proposed location. Does he not realize that access to this dock will be at the 21 foot level or 21 foot depth and that at least 80,000 or 90,000 cubic yards of river bottom would have to be dredged in order to provide 27 foot access and a 900 foot radius turning basin? The cost of this will be approximately $1 per cubic yard for soil and anywhere from $12 to $25 per cubic yard for rock. Clearly then, this channel to which the hon. member was referring makes very little difference.

This 27 foot dredged channel to which he was referring is the famous Chevrier seaway which ends in an 80 foot high blank wall. Everyone in Cornwall knows that the only time to have built a Canadian seaway was when the seaway itself was being built, especially in view of the present disappointing volume of seaway traffic. He also pleaded that the new industrial complex adjacent to the Eisenhower and Snell locks in northern New York state was not due to the St. Lawrence seaway being located on the United States side but was due to cheap hydro power in New York. Surely when the seaway was being constructed, this was the time for the then minister of transport, who did all the seaway dealings for the federal Liberal government of that time, to extract concessions from Ontario hydro. This was the time to make deals to extract concessions. Why did not the former member for Stormont and his Liberal provincial colleagues in Ontario protect the interests of their area in the way that Ontario hydro itself is looking out for all of Ontario and putting its electricity on the provincial bridge?

Mr. McIlraith: What is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): I should like to quote one sentence from the remarks of the hon. member as found in Hansard of June 15, 1961, at page 6414—

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member is in order in speaking about the subject with which he is dealing at the present time. I think it comes under transport and not under public works.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Not at all; I am laying a groundwork.

Mr. Bourget: I am not asking the hon. member. I am asking the chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Stormont got off to a good start when he was dealing strictly with dredging as it related to the St. Lawrence seaway. But very shortly afterwards he was straying from the item under consideration which is a very particular item at this stage of the consideration of these estimates namely, "Dredging—Maintenance and operation of plant and contract and day labour works". It has to do with public works, harbours and rivers engineering services. I would ask the hon. member to co-operate with the Chair, if he will, and develop whatever subject he is putting forward on this particular item, so as to relate it very closely to the major consideration or topic which is dredging.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Chairman, I am endeavouring to lay a groundwork. I am endeavouring to set out certain damages that have been caused in our area by certain previous construction and how this can be rectified by appropriate dredging. This is merely a groundwork for this contention that I am endeavouring to promote. I referred to Hansard in which the hon. member is reported to have stated as follows:

> —in the old days the traffic on the St. Lawrence canal at Cornwall was tremendous and, in fact, it was responsible in large part for the progress and development of that community.

He also cited certain figures. In 1955, the loaded tonnage on the Cornwall canal was 1,001 and the unloaded tonnage was 323,273 whereas in 1959, there was no loaded tonnage and the unloaded tonnage was down to 181,950. I completely agree with this comment of the hon. member, namely that the previous prosperity of Cornwall was due largely and initially to Cornwall canal traffic. But he states that this decline in traffic was due to the competition of air lines and roads. May I say that it is due to the fact that the Cornwall canal which flowed by our door for 100 years is now a backwater which also ends in a blank wall. I should like also to ask the hon. member for Laurier how much of the $800,000 spent on the seaway went to Cornwall people and how much went to Montreal and Toronto contractors.

The Deputy Chairman: Order; I am sorry I have to interrupt the hon. gentleman again but the subject he is discussing would have been applicable to item 352. My recollection is that the hon. gentleman perhaps was not present when that item was being discussed. However, that is the situation, and I would ask him to relate his remarks to the item under discussion or I shall have to give the floor to some other member.

Mr. Walker: Everything is so peaceful and happy here today that I should like to suggest the hon. member will have an opportunity to discuss this subject on the budget. I believe one can talk on any subject during that debate. This is the fourth day these estimates have been under discussion, and I believe the chairman is correct in his recollection that we have passed this item. I am just being selfish at the moment because I am trying to get these estimates completed. However, I would not want to deny the hon. member an opportunity of discussing the subject at an appropriate time. I know what he is talking about, but the item has been passed.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): I was occupied with business for my constituents on this particular occasion, and the business was of a personal and confidential nature. I shall be glad to take advantage of the opportunity of discussing this matter again and discussing it thoroughly as it deserves.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the Chair should apologize and I do so now for making a reference to the absence of the hon. member. I am sure he was quite justifiably absent on constituency business. I am emphasizing that I apologize.

Item agreed to.

360. Construction or acquisition of plant and equipment, $2,676,000.

Mr. Howard: The details of this item show an amount for construction or acquisition of plant and equipment allocated to British Columbia and the Yukon Territories, the amount being about $1,100,000 as compared with $1,500,000 last year. I was wondering whether the minister would mind refreshing our memories as to the purpose for which this money will be required.

Mr. Walker: Most of the item is for the dredge, Fort Langley, that was launched about a month ago.

Mr. Robichaud: There is an item of $600,000 for construction equipment in the province of New Brunswick. Could the minister give us some details in respect of that item?

Mr. Walker: Yes, I will be glad to do that. It is broken down into two principal items, one to complete the replacement of dredge No. 4 and the attendant launch, $150,000; second, the replacement of the tug Canso, at an estimated cost of $450,000.

Mr. Batten: Will the minister give me a breakdown of the $513,000 referred to on page 484, giving just the main headings?

Mr. Walker: The first item is to complete the replacement of the tug Peel, $375,000; second, a new drill tower, compressor and pneumatic drill equipment for drill boat No. 400, $48,000; new 300 cubic yard steel dump scows, $80,000, and then there is the conversion of dredge No. 400 to diesel power and a new crane.

Item agreed to.

Development engineering services—

362. Canada's share of the cost of international and interprovincial bridges, as detailed in the estimates, $1,395,000.

Mr. McIlraith: I wanted to ask the minister about one of the items included in this vote which is for Canada's share of the cost of international and interprovincial bridges as detailed in the estimates. One of the details is an item of $300,000 towards the cost of the Ottawa-Hull bridge. My recollection at the time of the announcement of the undertaking of that project was that the work would be more advanced than that this season, although I have not the announcement here with me today. Would the minister advise the committee as to whether or not that work is proceeding on schedule, and just when it will be completed?

Mr. Walker: My friend, the hon. member for Ottawa West, will be glad to know that the matter is proceeding on schedule. We have the liaison groups working nicely together. We have the consultants appointed by each of the provinces and by the dominion, and we expect to call tenders about a year from now.

Mr. Bourget: Can the minister tell us if the Department of Public Works is doing the boring itself or are the borings being made by the consulting engineers?

Mr. Walker: Well, pending the appointment of the consultants, and so we could get some idea for the purpose of making an estimate of the over-all cost to negotiate with the provinces, we did a few borings ourselves. I can assure the hon. member that we are going to leave this work entirely to the consultants.

Mr. Stewart (Charlotte): May I ask the minister if any expenditure has been made under this vote in respect of the Campobello-Lubec bridge?

Mr. Walker: No, no expenses to date.

Mr. Robichaud: I should like to have some information from the minister. I notice that a good portion of this item 362 is to cover a share of the cost of the Campbellton-Cross Point bridge. I know that $765,000 has been set aside for this purpose. I wonder if the minister could advise this committee of the name of the contractor for the substructure of this bridge and the amount of the contract. I should like to know also if the work has been completed and what amount has been paid to the contractor to date, as well as whether any claims for extras have been made. If so, what decision has been reached in connection with such extras? In other words, I should like to have from the minister a complete report as to the standing of this project.

Mr. Walker: In reply to the hon. member for Gloucester I would say this bridge was commenced in 1958. At the moment, we call it the Campbellton-Cross Point bridge. It is an interprovincial bridge extending between Campbellton, New Brunswick and Cross Point, Quebec. The department retained the consulting firms of Langevin, Letendre and Monti and Paul Pelletier to prepare the design and supervise the construction of the bridge. The total crossing is 4,180 feet long; the Quebec causeway portion is 960 feet; the New Brunswick causeway portion is 620 feet, and the bridge spans 2,600 feet. There are ten river piers on the main span. Tenders for the substructure were received on November 18, 1958. Ten bids were received, the lowest being that of Belle Construction Limited of Ile Maligne, Quebec, in the amount of $1,261,592.70. The balance of the bids ranged from this figure up to $1,681,746. Belle Construction Limited, the low tenderer, had not previously done work for this department. However, enquiries of the province of Quebec and private organizations for which they had done work brought favourable reports as to their technical and financial capacities. The contract was awarded to Belle Construction Limited on December 12, 1958.

On March 30, 1960, construction of the substructure was completed, except for minor works. The contractor submitted a claim for payment of $1,343,216.45 over and above his contract amount. In the departmental review of the claim, there were a group of items pertaining to additional work required to be undertaken by the contractor as a result of changes made in the design. These changes were made at our specific request. On these items, the audit services division of the comptroller of the treasury carried out a cost audit of the contractor's books to establish the actual amount assessed against the items approved by the department. This totalled $150,913.61.

The second part of the claim had to do with the fact that the contractor had to carry out the work throughout the winter of 1959-60, whereas he had originally contemplated completing it before the severe portion of the winter season set in. The total amount claimed by the contractor for this portion was $561,033.64. The audit services division, on examination of the contractor's books, assessed the items claimed as being $453,815.32. In reviewing this claim, the department took the stand that our contract provided for the work to be done and it was the responsibility of the contractor to complete the work before the winter season set in. However, the department did acknowledge that, as a result of certain design changes, the original period for completion of the contract would have to be extended. The extension period was not in itself, however, sufficient to require the contractor to work throughout the winter season and he had, by his own operations, to a large degree created the condition requiring this winter work. On the basis of this, the department felt it should share in these costs proportionately to the additional time resulting from the changes in design. On this basis, it recommended payment of $170,180. The total amount recommended by the department was $321,094.36 against the claim of $1,343,216.45. This recommendation was passed by the treasury board.

The contractor was, as might be expected, dissatisfied with the amounts recommended by the department and placed the matter in the hands of his solicitors who advised they would not accept. The department re-examined its proposal at great length and on many occasions but did not feel that any change should be made. On the advice of the Department of Justice, the department advised the solicitors that the department's offer was firm and, if not accepted, the contractor could take court action. The contractor has now accepted the department's decision and payment on the basis outlined above is being made.

So, to sum it all up, the original contract price, without any changes by us, was $1,261,592.70 which was the lowest of ten bids, the highest being $1,681,000. The changes that we caused were assessed at $150,913.61 for the first part, as well as increased quantities at $34,924.94, and for the second part $170,180 so that the total settlement for the bridge is $1,617,612.00 The amount claimed was $1,343,216.45 and this claim was settled at $321,094.36. The hon. member for Gloucester asked whether this sum had all been paid. No, it has not. There is still a hold-back.

Mr. Robichaud: I wonder if the minister could also advise this committee if the department has received any claims from suppliers for materials they supplied in connection with this bridge, or work performed and, if so, what action has been taken by the department to protect such suppliers?

Mr. Walker: Yes, there have been claims made by some suppliers with the result that we have held back the sum of $100,000.

Mr. Robichaud: Can the minister tell the house what is the total amount of the claims received by the department in respect of materials or services not paid for? While the officials are looking for that information, could the minister tell us by whom were the borings at this bridge carried out? Was this work done by employees of the department or by an outside firm?

Mr. Walker: I understand the borings were done by an outside firm in this instance. This was before my time, but it was done by the same consultants as I referred to in my statement. They arranged for the borings.

Mr. Robichaud: Could the minister tell the committee what steps were taken by the department and his officials to assure themselves that the borings were satisfactory? I understand that one of the main reasons given for the claim by the contractor was that the borings were not complete. We have heard in this house in the past a good deal said to the effect that there has been negligence in doing borings for certain federal bridges. Is this not one case where the department may have failed to assure itself that the borings which had been done on the Restigouche river for the Campbellton-Cross Point bridge were really complete?

Mr. Walker: It appeared initially that the borings were adequate but it was decided that further boring should be carried out to confirm them. After this had been done it was found that the situation which was believed to exist in fact did exist but that there were some differences.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, can the minister give us any figures regarding the amount of claims that have been made in respect to materials and supplies not paid for.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, I have only just sent for that information but shall be glad to give it to the hon. member when it arrives.

Mr. Bourget: Was there anything additional claimed as a result of the fact that additional borings had to be made?

Mr. Walker: Oh, yes, that is part of the claim.

364. Toward an investigation to determine the feasibility of constructing a proposed causeway across Northumberland strait, including the opening of a test quarry, $50,000.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I intended to ask the minister to give us some indication as to that which has been discovered through the surveys made last year, as well as what is expected in the way of work to be done this year, but I saw another hon. member who has perhaps more interest in this subject than I because he lives in the area arise at the same time as myself. I shall, therefore, defer my remarks with the hope that through the questions asked by that hon. member I shall receive the information I desire.

Mr. Phillips: Mr. Chairman, I should like to express regret on the part of the people of Prince Edward Island because of the fact that the report in respect of the feasibility study on the Northumberland causeway is not available during the discussion of these estimates. The minister expressed the hope on an earlier occasion that this report would be made available at the time of our discussion of his estimates, and I wonder whether he can now give this committee any idea as to when he expects the report to be presented.

Mr. Walker: No. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate some months ago asked me whether I would have the report available during the discussion on my estimates, and in answer to that hon. member I stated that I expected that report would be available. However, it is not available. I had hopes until the last minute that the report would be available during the discussion of these estimates but I am afraid it is not. I expect the report to be made in two parts and I should like to bring both parts into the house at the same time.

As I said earlier this is a tremendous project which has never been attempted before. There is nothing in existence to make reference to, everything must be done from scratch. Because of the enormity of the task it is taking quite some time. That is the best I can say in this regard at this moment. I have attempted to make prognostications before to my sorrow and shall not attempt doing so again.

In answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Gloucester in respect to the claims which have been made, I can now state that they amount to $104,000. On the admission of even the suppliers themselves some of the claims are slightly exaggerated. We are holding back, not $100,000 as I said before, but $250,000.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, could the minister state whether all the dealings were made with Belle Construction Limited or were some made with its subsidiary, Belle Construction (New Brunswick) Limited?

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Walker: Belle Construction Limited is the only company of which we have any record.

Mr. Robichaud: Could the minister tell us whether he or his department had any information to the effect that at the time the contract was awarded a company had been formed in New Brunswick named Belle Construction (New Brunswick) Limited, and whether the names of the directors of that company had been supplied?

Mr. Walker: No, Mr. Chairman, we had no knowledge of that.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, I was shocked by the answer given by the minister to the hon. member for Prince in respect to the feasibility study of the causeway between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. This study was promised two years ago, and only one or two months ago I asked the minister—

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): It was your party that promised it.

Mr. Bourget: We started it but it seems to me that the Conservative government is unable to continue with it. The report as to the feasibility of this causeway was promised as long ago as 1959. A few months ago I asked the minister whether he would be able to give us the report before the consideration of his estimates and he answered in the affirmative. Now, two months later, he tells us he cannot give us this report because it is not available.

Surely after four years of study and the expenditure of over $700,000 we should have some idea of what can be done. I suggest the four hon. members from Prince Edward Island should insist on something being done, and should get after the government and the minister so that the people of Prince Edward Island can receive an answer to their request for a causeway. Surely we are entitled as members of parliament to know what is to become of this project. If we are to be asked to accept only that information which has been presented to this date I am afraid this causeway will become known as the forgotten causeway, at least until after the next election. I know that during some election campaigns the Conservative party called itself the party of the causeway. I suggest we can now call the Tory party the pauseway party and the causeway itself, the forgotten causeway. I suggest it is incumbent upon the minister to inform this committee what has been done in this regard; what the national research branch is presently doing, and when we can expect to receive this report. Surely it is reasonable to ask that question after four years of study and the expenditure of $700,000.

Mr. Walker: Thank you. The hon. member for Prince and his three confreres from Prince Edward Island have been doing their duty toward Prince Edward Island by importuning me week in and week out to get results. Much as I should like to oblige them, I am a lawyer by profession and not an engineer, and must, therefore, rely upon the reports which I receive in due course from the engineers.

I should like to put the hon. member for Levis at ease by saying that we have been engaged in this project for three years, although he suggests four, which means we have another year. We do not intend to use that further year but will present this report in the near future.

I must state that the project was initiated originally by the late administration in which the hon. member was the parliamentary secretary to the then minister of public works. During the period they had the matter under investigation they did not get any further than an examination of the rock.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, as my friend the hon. member for Ottawa East suggests, that administration did not spend $700,000 in this regard.

Mr. Walker: That administration did not spend anything.

Mr. Bourget: We were asked by the then premier of Prince Edward Island to make a study, and we started immediately to do so. We did not wait three years. The minister cannot say that we did nothing in the three previous years because we had not been asked to do anything at that time. If the Liberal party was in office the appropriate minister would at least have the honesty to inform the people of Prince Edward Island that this project was either economically feasible, or was not economically feasible. I suggest that is the answer which the people of Prince Edward Island expect from the federal government.

Mr. Howard: Before the item carries may I ask the minister a question which will not be strictly relevant. I hope you will forgive me, Mr. Chairman, because there is a connection. Has the minister, his department or his predecessor, received any representation asking for federal government participation in the building of a causeway, a tunnel or some other similar form of connection between Vancouver island and the mainland on the west coast? If any such requests or representations have been received, can the minister indicate what has happened to them?

Mr. Walker: At one time there was local representation for a tunnel but the water was so deep as to make the whole plan appear to be impracticable.

(Translation):

Mr. Latour: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether he can enlighten me with regard to the Sir George Perley bridge linking Hawkesbury and Grenville across the Ottawa river.

I understand that alterations are to be made to this bridge as a result of the work being carried out by Quebec hydro; indeed it is said that the bridge will be raised about 12 feet. I should like to know whether the work on this bridge will be carried out by Quebec hydro, and what will be the impact of this bridge in relation to the Ottawa river waterway.

(Text):

Mr. Walker: Yes, work will have to be done. My understanding is that the cost of it will be borne by hydro.

(Translation):

Mr. Latour: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I asked another question. I asked what would be the impact of that bridge in view of the proposed Ottawa river waterway scheme. I also asked whether the work would be carried out by Quebec hydro. The reply given to me was not complete enough. The reason why I insist on a satisfactory reply is that for two years, I have been trying to get information from officials of the department, and I must say I have been unable to get a satisfactory reply. I therefore insist on being given a satisfactory answer.

(Text):

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

(Translation):

Mr. Latour: I beg your pardon, Mr. Chairman, but I would appreciate an answer to those questions.

(Text):

Mr. Robichaud: I think the hon. member should realize that he is two days late.

Mr. Walker: It is the hon. member's turn.

(Translation):

The hon. member is quite right. Would he be good enough to come to my office so we can discuss this matter? For the time being, it has been decided that the whole cost would be borne by hydro.

Item agreed to.

366. Roads and bridges—maintenance and operation including authority to make recoverable advances in amounts not exceeding in the aggregate the amount of the operating expenses of the New Westminster bridge, $300,735.

Mr. Howard: Can the minister indicate which bridge this has reference to and specifically what operation is done on it?

Mr. Walker: The hon. member is speaking now of the railway bridge used by the C.N.R.?

Mr. Howard: I do not know what I am speaking of. I ask the minister to indicate which bridge this relates to?

Mr. Walker: I am sorry, I did not appreciate the hon. member's question. It is the former railway and highway bridge which we took over from the province of British Columbia.

Item agreed to.

Trans-Canada highway—

368. Construction through national parks, $7,476,000.

Mr. Mitchell: Probably I could take up this matter under item 369. Maybe it should have been taken up earlier in the estimates under item 344, but I was absent in another committee. I wish to bring to the minister's attention something that he probably does not know about. I do not attach any blame to him or to his officials for what has happened. A few years ago in Sudbury tenders were called under the previous government and a federal building was constructed. Between the time the construction was undertaken and completed the government changed but previous to that the cornerstone was laid by the late Right Hon. C. D. Howe. The granite cornerstone, or whatever it consisted of, was engraved to the effect that this stone was laid by so and so. As members of the committee know, in the cutting of the stone the letters are outlined by some type of durable paint which makes them readable. After the building had been completed the stone was removed. I took the trouble to ask why. I was told that it was not properly laid. When the stone was replaced the lettering, or the painting of the letters, was removed and I now defy anybody to read what is on that cornerstone. This is probably a small matter to bring to the attention of the minister but at the same time it was a small thing to ask anyone to remove the lettering. I should like to ask the minister to look into this and to have the lettering restored to its original readable condition, particularly since the gentleman who laid the stone is no longer with us.

Mr. Walker: I shall be happy to look into it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to say a few words on this item with respect to the trans-Canada highway because of its construction through national parks. I do so at the request of a number of persons in my constituency. Since in certain circumstances the trans-Canada highway is not an all-winter road, the suggestion is that consideration be given to making a second trans-Canada route along the southern provincial highway of British Columbia. The southern provincial highway will provide service through a better type of terrain for maintenance purposes. There is less snowfall. It would serve directly a much larger local population and provide several roads for access to United States roads. In this connection I wish to mention an editorial which appeared in the Trail Daily Times of January 16, which deals with the question of the trans-Canada highway being closed because of slides and things of that sort and yet at the same time there was transportation through the southern provincial highway. In one paragraph this editorial writer says:

> What are the lessons here?
> Well, if Mr. Gaglardi and other members of the provincial cabinet are C.B.C.-T.V. fans, they must have learned several from their television screens on Saturday.
> That afternoon, the C.B.C. carried a feature about long-distance road users operating between Vancouver and Calgary and beyond. Asked why his trucks invariably travelled from Vancouver through Everett, the Snoqualmie pass, Wenatchee, Spokane, and back into Canada through Kingsgate, the proprietor of the haulage firm was quite specific:
> "The mileage is greater, it is true.
> But we are able to make much better time in spite of the greater distance.
> The trans-Canada highway isn't opened in the winter all the way from Vancouver to Alberta.
> Anyway, the American highways are so much better."
> His comments on the state of the trans-Canada to one side, the trucker made no reference whatsoever to highway No. 3, and the C.B.C. interviewer didn't ask him about the southern trans-provincial either.
> Probably neither of them liked to think about the Rossland to Cascade section just before lunch.

That is being changed this year.

> But the first lesson came when the C.B.C. showed the long distance truck stopping every two hours in the United States so that its crew could eat, and then taking on 150 gallons of fuel in Spokane.

I know this is not an immediate question but I have been asked to raise it because in British Columbia we believe that when the trans-Canada highway is completed—I am not suggesting that we should undertake more than two things at once—consideration should be given to making the southern trans-provincial route a second route as part of the trans-Canada highway.

There is another matter I wish to raise in connection with the new highway bridge over the Columbia river just west of Revelstoke. On my way to the house I was taken there by an engineer. I was informed that the bridge is nearly completed and will have cost close to $3 million. I was shown the elevations placed on the bridge by engineers which indicate that if the high Arrow dam is built the water will come within three or four feet of the deck. There will be no opportunity for large chunks of ice to pass under the bridge and when the level of the water behind the dam is at its peak, which will be for several months during the high water period, there will be no opportunity for logs and forest debris to pass under the bridge and no opportunity for navigation whatsoever on what have been navigable waters for many years.

I was asked to bring this matter to the attention of the minister. As a matter of fact, I had a question on the order paper which was passed as an order for return. I should like to ask the minister whether consideration has been given to this problem in the event of the building of the high Arrow dam. The engineer who took me to the site said that it was not possible to raise the bridge because it is a suspension bridge. I know nothing about that. He also referred to the C.P.R. bridge and the present highway bridge, all of which would have to be renewed. Incidentally, I have a photograph taken from the air by a friend of mine who is interested in the project and chartered a small plane in order to do so. I will send it to the minister as it may be of interest to him and his deputy.

I should like the minister to inform the committee whether this problem has been given consideration and, if it is correct that the about to be completed trans-Canada highway bridge, to which the federal government has made a contribution of 50 per cent, I presume, will be unusable should the high Arrow dam be built, what will have to be done to correct the situation.

Mr. Walker: We are collecting some information for the hon. member for Kootenay West but it is not ready yet. I must say, however, that the building of a second trans-Canada highway is a matter of policy for the government and it has not been given any consideration. As I have stated before, the Prime Minister feels that the first trans-Canada highway should be completed before we consider anything along that line. The first trans-Canada highway is a very expensive project. Therefore the answer to the hon. member's question whether we have given thought to a second trans-Canada highway must be in the negative. We have not.

Mr. Herridge: I did not hear the minister's last remarks. The bridge in question is on the present trans-Canada highway. I quite agree with the suggestion that we should complete the one job first, but I was asked to raise this matter.

Mr. Walker: Quite so. With respect to the hon. member's question about the bridge in question on the trans-Canada highway, I understand he has a question on the order paper dealing with it. However, the answer will not be ready for a few days.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I must exhibit some disagreement with my confrere from Kootenay West and I hope that his persuasive voice and gentle manner will not influence the minister too much in the matter of a second trans-Canada highway. We always look upon the southern part of British Columbia, as other provinces perhaps look upon their southern portions close to the border, as getting the gravy with respect to all public services while those of us in the north limp along on what is left over.

On a number of occasions I have raised the question of the development of a second trans-Canada highway and in general terms have suggested the route that should be followed. I wish the minister would pay a great deal of attention to the area between Prince Rupert, Prince George and Jasper as being the route that should be followed in the building of a second trans-Canada highway. While the hon. member for Kootenay West may be somewhat upset about this, I am sure such a route will be much more acceptable and beneficial to the population in the northern part of the province than would an additional so-called trans-Canada highway in the southern part.

All jocularity aside, this is a very serious matter and one of prime concern to the people living in the northern part of British Columbia as I am sure it also is to those living in the northern parts of other provinces. As far as east-west travel is concerned, we are somewhat restricted because of a lack of roads. The minister knows our provincial minister of highways fairly well, I believe, as he is in touch with him regularly and he must be aware that that gentleman constantly gloats about the amount of money being spent on highways in our province each year and every day in the year. The fact still remains, however, that highway 16 in the northern part of British Columbia is not a decent highway. The fact still remains that there is no direct road connection east and west between Prince George and Jasper in Alberta, and it would appear to be a sensible approach to develop a highway through this part of the province under an arrangement similar to that existing now with respect to the trans-Canada highway.

I disagree with the member for Kootenay West, the Prime Minister and others who say that we should complete the present trans-Canada highway before we start another one. In this regard I would make a brief reference, as I did earlier, to the report of proceedings under the Trans-Canada Highway Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960. The report indicates that Saskatchewan has fully completed its section of the trans-Canada highway. The province of Alberta has only four miles of paving to complete before finishing its section. Manitoba has but eight miles remaining to be finished and, as I said earlier, British Columbia has some 152 miles to complete. I do not know whether the Hillsborough bridge in Prince Edward Island has been completed but in any event Prince Edward Island is another province which has nearly completed the building of its section of the highway.

I point out that in the three prairie provinces there are only 12 miles of the trans-Canada highway remaining to be completed while in British Columbia there are some 152 miles. Other provinces have greater mileages to complete, relatively speaking, compared with the mileages they had to build initially. So far as the four western provinces are concerned, when we start to think in terms of a trans-Canada highway, I think we can take steps to start on that second trans-Canada highway right now without waiting for the first trans-Canada highway to be completed from one end of the country to the other. This completion date gets moved ahead every two or three years and is now the end of December, 1963, I believe. In all probability, if past experience is any guide, this 1963 date will be extended when we get close to that period of time. This will mean that some parts of Canada, for a variety of reasons, will find that they will have to limp along continually or limp along until such period of time as the first trans-Canada highway is completed and will have to work on their own with their own finances in developing in the northern part of the province a system of roads which may later on become part of a second trans-Canada highway after the first one is completed. This may require relocation. It may require roads at present being built to fall into disuse by reason of another route being chosen and it could easily result in an extra expenditure of money both from the provincial treasury and the federal treasury if we wait until the last mile of the present trans-Canada highway is completed, and until we can drive from one end of the country to the other.

So far as I am concerned and so far as the people of my constituency are concerned and, I am sure the people in the constituencies in that general northern part of the four western provinces of Canada, a start can and should be made on the development of a second trans-Canada highway tomorrow or as soon as possible or as soon as arrangements can be worked out with the various provincial governments. I think that all that would be necessary, to start it at least, would be an approach made to the provincial governments by the Department of Public Works or the federal government saying that they are interested and want to work out an arrangement somewhat similar to that which exists with regard to the present trans-Canada highway.

I think this will not be looked upon with too much favour by those individuals, organizations and groups, especially those in my own constituency with whom I am familiar, who have campaigned, pressed, petitioned and written letters about the start of a second trans-Canada highway and who now have it underlined that they will have to wait until the last province completes the last mile of the highway before we will even think about starting on a second one.

I should like to make a comment or two, if I may, about the formula for financing the building of such highways. At the present time it is on a 50-50 basis plus an additional 40 per cent of 10 per cent of the mileage in a province. As I have mentioned on other occasions, such a formula which moves on the assumption that conditions are equal as between each province and every part of Canada and therefore the financial participation should be equal is an incorrect one, in my opinion. For instance, I think that a new formula, once developed, should take into account the difference in construction costs between various parts of the country. I think everyone will know, for argument's sake, that in British Columbia which is a very mountainous region, with a great deal of rock work, some tunnels to build, bridges and the like, construction costs in many cases run in the neighbourhood of $1 million a mile. This is a rather fantastic amount of money to be considering when you are concerned with three or four hundred miles of road through mountainous country of that nature.

I am quite sure that, by comparison, the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba do not have road building costs that are nearly as great as are those experienced in British Columbia. Yet the formula implies or has implicit in it the feeling that road building costs are equal. I believe that some move should be made to adjust the formula now, just as it was adjusted on one occasion earlier, to take into account different road building costs and geographic factors so that those provinces which have high road building costs will not thereby be penalized, as it were, in the building and construction of the trans-Canada highway and of the second trans-Canada highway.

I also think that in the formula itself some consideration should be given to reflecting the relative financial positions of the various provinces and their ability to find money at the provincial level with which to finance the building of highways. Let us consider Newfoundland, for instance. I pick this province because it is at one end of the country and British Columbia is at the other end. Each has substantially the same number of miles to build on the present trans-Canada highway, Newfoundland having 554 miles and British Columbia 568 miles.

So far as the financial position of Newfoundland is concerned compared with that of British Columbia—and this is not said in a derogatory way; I think it is a fact and that members from Newfoundland have mentioned this matter on other occasions, and I am sure they will agree with me now—it is extremely difficult for Newfoundland, because of its economic conditions and financial position, to finance the building of highways in that province to the same extent as, say, the province of Ontario, a rich industrial province or the province of Alberta or British Columbia. I think this fact must be reflected in that formula also.

We take into account the differences in economic conditions of the maritime provinces, for argument's sake. We take that into account in other matters by special grants. Reference was made to those grants last evening by the Minister of Finance in the introduction of what he has called the budget and for which I have other names. However, the budget took into account the fact that there is a different economic situation existing in the Atlantic provinces and that therefore some special financial consideration should be given to those provinces in the way of grants. I do not see why we do not have that same attitude or feeling reflected when it comes to participating financially with provinces in the building of highways. I think the formula should be adjusted accordingly so that a higher ratio of money will go to those provinces which are in a less fortunate economic position and will thereby have a tendency to balance out the differences financially between the various provinces.

There may also be other factors that it would be necessary to consider and to have reflected in such a formula. I think those two factors of road building costs and the ability to pay are the most important ones. One may deal with the question of mileage, for argument's sake, or the relative mileage as between Prince Edward Island with 71 miles and Ontario with some 1,400 miles, I believe or 1,453 miles and say that perhaps this factor also should be reflected in the amount of money that is contributed by the federal government.

These are matters which I am sure could be worked out on a formula basis after the economics have been studied. I am sure a mutually satisfactory agreement could be reached with the various provinces in regard to such a formula that would reflect the factors I have mentioned, such as the rocky country compared with the prairies, the relative economic position of a province like Nova Scotia compared with Ontario, and so on, in order that equitability is reached throughout.

I only mention these matters—I have mentioned them before—because I hope they will be given consideration. I understand from what the minister has said that he agrees with the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Kootenay West that a start should not be made on the second trans-Canada highway until the first one is completed. I disagree with this entirely and so do all the people I represent.

The minister holds the view, in agreement with the Prime Minister that no move should be made toward building a second trans-Canada highway until the first one is completed, and I know this pretty well ties the hands of the minister in making any definite reply with respect to the approach to the provinces with respect to the formula and the like. However, if the minister would like to hold out some hope—and I know that members of the government have great propensities in this direction—of a change of attitude with respect to this construction policy of not starting on the second highway until the first one has been completed, at least it will be helpful to hon. members of the committee and to the people I represent. Perhaps this ray of hope will be enough to make them a bit more patient than they are likely to be if the policy of not starting on the second one until the first one is completed is carried through to the time when the last shovelful of asphalt is put in place and the last ribbon is severed.

I appreciate that the Department of Public Works is only partially involved in this question by virtue of the machinery of the department for building the trans-Canada highway being also involved in some way with building the so-called roads to resources. I think in these matters, also, a straight 50-50 participation is not—

Mr. Speakman: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, item 368 deals with construction of the trans-Canada highway through national parks paid for in whole by the federal government. The hon. member has now been speaking for 25 minutes and has never touched on the building of the highway through national parks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howard: If I may speak to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would point out to my hon. friend that I am sorry he wants to restrict hon. members of this committee in expressing the views of their constituents. However, I think one should look upon this—

An hon. Member: It would not matter if you were not so long winded.

Mr. Howard: —considering the standard practice in committee, that even though there is a statutory item to be voted, hon. members may discuss the operation of that statutory item under the vote which has some association with it. This has been the case every time I have spoken about the trans-Canada highway and the need for a second trans-Canada highway in the committee dealing with the estimates of the Department of Public Works. I have always done this under this particular item covering the building of the trans-Canada highway through national parks.

I think it would be an unfortunate situation, so far as the point of order is concerned, if you, sir, were to agree with it and rule that we do not now have an opportunity of dealing with the building and financing policy of the present trans-Canada highway merely because it is a statutory vote. This would mean the only time we would be able to deal in a more formal way with this question would be when the act itself is occasionally amended.

I do not want to offend the sensibility of my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin too much, who I am sure also has an interest in a second trans-Canada highway and perhaps will participate in this debate and mention something about it. I had intended to go briefly into the question of the roads to resources, but as the hon. member for Wetaskiwin has drawn to my attention that my time is running out perhaps this would be a good place to end. I hope the minister will have something to say in reply to my remarks.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I want to explain briefly, in view of the remarks made by the hon. member for Skeena, that there is no conflict of policy between us. It is just a little difference in the time element with respect to the two projects. When I suggested the southern trans-provincial highway I was considering this a portion of the No. 1 trans-Canada highway; simply a winter detour of the No. 1 trans-Canada highway between the Crowsnest and Vancouver.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to comment upon the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West, who said that the bridge he described was not built with adequate clearance. It is a far cry for the hon. member from Greenwood to be poking his nose into a bridge in British Columbia, but I think we are all interested in the efficiency of work done.

I am quite sure that when the minister inquires into this matter he will provide a satisfactory answer, but I do suggest we should know what the answer is so that we will not be left with the impression, which could be created by the remarks of the hon. member, that this work was not done efficiently.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena I am in this position. It is a matter of government policy and I am not in a position to discuss the suggestion of the hon. member at this time. He will appreciate that.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I desire to make some very brief remarks on this item and I rise merely for the purpose of making a suggestion. The item itself reads "Construction through national parks." I want to suggest for consideration in the future a possible extension of this item.

It seems to me that here in the national capital we do not have proper access roads from the major centres of population in the United States. I want to make the suggestion, for consideration, that the Canadian government is going to have to construct, I hope within a reasonably short time, jointly with the provinces—largely at the expense of the federal government—a highway to one of the major international bridges on the United States side.

I merely put forward the suggestion at this time. It would seem to me that an extension of this item would be the appropriate place to put it forward. It could be put forward, probably, under national capital items.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to remark briefly on the desirability of completing the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland and to again express the hope that the minister will look with favour upon the federal government making it its business to pay for the cost of completing the trans-Canada highway in the province of Newfoundland.

Mention has been made of the possibility of a second trans-Canada highway. I should like the minister to look beyond the immediate needs—and among the immediate needs is the completion of the trans-Canada highway on the island of Newfoundland—to the possibility of constructing roads in Labrador. A vast new area is being opened up there. A road up the coast of Labrador as well as through the interior is highly desirable and would serve the purpose of opening up new territory. Eventually, when the second trans-Canada highway is built, a road through Labrador, perhaps through a tunnel under the straits of Belle Isle and then down the coast of the northern peninsula of Newfoundland, might be kept in mind by the government as a great new project worthy of consideration.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a word to the hon. member for Skeena's remarks about the development of a second trans-Canada highway. It seems to me—

The Chairman: I shall not stop the hon. member immediately, but I must warn him that in my view this subject should have been discussed under the first item of the estimates of the department.

Mr. Peters: I shall not abuse this opportunity to make a few observations. I have in the past spoken often in this house in favour of a second trans-Canada highway. I am particularly interested, as are my constituents, in having one go through what we consider to be northern Ontario where the old trans-Canada highway went for a number of years. It is a vast area, and the government has now completed No. 17 highway around the head of the lakes. We still have in our part of northern Ontario the old No. 11 route. The amount of traffic passing along that route is considerable and there are still vast resources to be opened up. This, in our opinion, would best be served by the extension and expansion of the trans-Canada highway program.

The government has seen fit to call this the trans-Canada northern route, though I think this is probably a technical designation given to that part of the highway for the sake of the tourist industry. But the need for this route is apparent. I believe the minister could improve the employment picture in that area if he would work to bring that section, which, previously, was the only trans-Canada route, up to the standard generally set for this great highway. I hope the minister will give some consideration to the maintenance of this particular section of the highway.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I could—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: I can assure the hon. member for Wetaskiwin and others that I shall leave no room for doubt as to whether or not I am in order. I should like to deal with the particular parks through which the highway can go. The latter remarks of my friend from Kootenay West will provide me with an opportunity of protecting him against my constituents if they hear of the matter.

There are 140 miles of highway listed to be built through the national parks, as may be seen from page 4 of the annual report, with a passable mileage of 105 miles and a paved mileage of 80 miles leaving an unpaved mileage, in some parts unpassable, of some 60 miles. Could the minister give us some indication of the progress being made through the various parks and tell us when it is expected that this phase of the construction of the highway will be completed with respect to each of the parks mentioned?

Mr. Walker: We expect to have the grading done by the end of this season.

Mr. Howard: So the total 140 miles will be either paved or graded. When is it expected that the paving will be completed?

Mr. Walker: In due course, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Howard: The minister seems to have been overcome by his assumed gentle attitude in the committee.

Mr. Walker: The best estimate we can make at the present time would be about two years. But that may not be accurate. The hon. member for Skeena will appreciate the tremendous difficulties there.

Mr. Howard: Yes, I do and I appreciate also that the latter answer, even though it is an estimate, is much better than the "in due course" type of answer which the minister gave a moment before.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I want to seize this opportunity of our having reached this item to renew my request to the minister last week, for an exercise and recreation room for the members of parliament and the House of Commons' staff.

May I tell him—though he is, of course, aware of it—that some changes are being made inside the west block. Last week the minister was kind enough to tell us that a place for exercising would be set up on the top floor. Now, I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if it would not be advisable to consider also bowling alleys, either in the west block or elsewhere, but near the centre block.

I think I speak in this regard on behalf of about 100 members, some ministers included and of the House of Commons' staff. As a matter of fact, the minister knows that, during the past year, about 100 members and their wives, secretaries, messengers, the sergeant-at-arms, the assistant clerk, etc., were members of the bowling league. Such exercise is, to my mind, sound and healthful, without being too much of a strain for people of our age. Moreover, it is a very popular game. If the minister watches television, he knows that, in the United States as in Canada, bowling matches are a matter of great interest.

I believe that the cost of these alleys would soon be paid off. I am aware that each bowling alley costs about $5,000, and that eight bowling alleys, representing an expense of $40,000, would be enough to accommodate 200 people a week. I am sure that if bowling alleys were set up, the minister might count on at least 200 players who would form a league. That league alone would bring in sufficient returns to pay off the interest for the money spent, and even the capital. As it is now, about a hundred civil servants go downtown at the noon hour to bowl, and do not hesitate to walk ten minutes, in summer or winter, to practise a game which the majority of sports minded people certainly appreciate.

We know that the bowling alleys now at our disposal are so obsolete that several bowlers decided to retire from the league. Therefore, if the minister does not give us bowling alleys, we will not be able to find a sufficient number of bowling fans to play the game next year, as the other bowling alleys are too far away from the parliament buildings.

I therefore repeat my request to the minister that he consider having bowling alleys set up which would make all civil servants and others most happy. I am taking this opportunity of challenging the Minister of Public Works. I am sure he will be a member of the league.

An hon. Member: Why not the Postmaster General?

Another hon. Member: He would be like a bull in a china shop.

Mr. Denis: It is healthy exercise. Mens sana in corpore sano: a sound mind in a sound body. I think the minister could very well use $50,000, out of the million and a half we are asked to vote, to provide a bowling alley. In any event, the money would be refunded through contributions. I feel sure that not only the hon. members and their wives, but also the staff of the house would be grateful to the minister.

(Text):

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, I should first like to emphasize and point out to hon. members of this committee the fact that the hon. member for St. Denis is the champion bowler of the House of Commons, as a result of which we give serious consideration to his comments. I should like to remind that hon. member that there does exist a plan called the 5BX for physical fitness developed by the Royal Canadian Air Force, which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate uses, although perhaps he is not a good advertisement in regard to the results which can be obtained.

It is nice to hear suggestions from the hon. member, and I should like to assure him that, as far as I can ascertain, no space exists for such an alley in the reconstruction program of the west block. We always do take seriously the advice and suggestion of that hon. member, whether they are in respect of horses, post offices or physical fitness. However, I think he will agree that $50,000 is a considerable amount of money to be expended on a project of this kind, even if we had the space.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the observations made by the minister I should like to remind him that at least 200 people would make use of such a bowling alley for at least six months each year and that they could be charged 50 cents per week, which would amount to $2,400. In arriving at that figure I have not given consideration to the amount which could be derived through fees charged to those individuals who wished to bowl without belonging to a league. I suggest in this way the $50,000 cost of construction could be recaptured within a very short period of time.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, as another alternative I would suggest that perhaps a swimming pool could be constructed where the minister could go to cool off on those occasions when he becomes heated.

I should like to take advantage of the opportunity provided by the discussion on these estimates of asking the minister whether he has made any commitments or intends to make any in respect to a joint study with the United States regarding the Richelieu-Champlain waterway. As the minister is aware, Canadian parliamentarians recently visited Washington to confer with their United States colleagues. While I was not in attendance at the committee which considered this matter I understand that the reason for its consideration was because those United States colleagues felt that a Richelieu-Champlain waterway could be an alternative to the proposed Hudson river waterway. I should like to bring this project to the minister's attention and ask him to give it serious consideration.

Mr. Walker: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I shall.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a thought to that expressed by the hon. member for St. Denis in respect to the construction of a bowling alley, a swimming pool or some type of facility for other sports. If the minister is having difficulty in finding available space I should like to remind him of the existence of a room on the other side of this building which is approximately the same size as this chamber which could very effectively be used as a bowling alley or a swimming pool. I am sure the hon. gentlemen who occupy that space at this time could then find better work elsewhere.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I wish to refer to a matter of general public importance relating to municipal road closings in the province of Ontario. I suggest this subject falls within the discussion of the minister's estimates because there is a land registry within the Department of Public Works in connection with land requirements.

Briefly I should like to state that road closing by-laws in the province of Ontario require the approval of the governor in council if federal government land is involved. For many years applications for approval which have been made under this by-law have been approved only after the receipt of a letter from the Department of Transport stating that it had no interest in the area involved. Until this time the provincial government authorities have been satisfied to accept such a letter from the department. Last fall, in September I believe, a decision was reached by the administrative section of the Ontario municipal affairs department as a result of which a general certificate from the federal government stating that no crown lands are involved is required. This change is of concern to me because, by reason of this ruling, which I think is ridiculous on the part of the provincial government department, the approval in respect to approximately 15 road closings for subdivision development plans in the district of Muskoka is being held up. I suggest there are perhaps many other such delays experienced by other communities in the province of Ontario.

I understand the land registrar and the Clerk of the Privy Council have been attempting to organize federal departments so that such certificates could be provided. It is my understanding that the land registry of the Department of Public Works is not prepared to circularize the other departments so that their files could be searched in a speculative manner. This is the only way that certificates could be issued as to whether crown lands are involved.

This situation has reached a stalemate because the provincial authorities will not approve road closings until they receive certificates from the federal government, but the federal authorities are not prepared to issue these certificates.

I hope the minister can bring this impasse to an end either by informing the provincial department of municipal affairs that these certificates cannot be provided, or by instituting the system of providing certificates so that those individuals who are waiting for approval can be relieved.

(Translation):

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I endorse the suggestions made a moment ago by the hon. members for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) and Trinity (Mr. Hellyer). After all, I think in heeding those suggestions, the minister would render great service not only to hon. members but to the whole nation, because for some time now, members on the opposition side have been stressing the need for physical exercise. They probably remember the Latin saying: Mens sana in corpore sano. I think if given an opportunity to get a bit of exercise, they might build up a healthier body and perhaps their mind would also improve.

Perhaps I have a preference, and would give prior support to the suggestion of the hon. member for Trinity, who wants a swimming pool. I would ask the minister to make an effort, indeed a very strong effort before the next elections, in order that the few Liberal members who will be re-elected to the house may find a proper place to drown their sorrow.

Mr. Denis: The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) does not seem to know what a swimming pool is for. A pool is used to wash up. Perhaps the hon. member needs it.

It may be, of course, that Conservative members would rather keep a stiff body and do without physical exercise, and get themselves painted over like some of their friends in the province of Quebec. There is nothing like a whitewashing to make one look white, but it does not clean a reputation.

Instead of indulging in petty politics and insulting people some hon. members should recognize that sports have a place in life and that those who practise sports are not necessarily people who think along the lines of the Union Nationale. I therefore humbly suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet has missed a fine opportunity to hold his tongue.

(Text):

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I should like to recall to the minister a suggestion I have made from year to year regarding Sussex street drive. The government has a great interest in Sussex street. I think the Dominion of Canada owns almost all the property on the north side. I understood from time to time that the south side north of the car tracks was to be reserved for buildings in the future, including public buildings owned by the government. The situation at the present time is this. I am not sure that anything has been done at all to take over—I may be wrong in this—any part of the property lying north of the tracks. That is, the south side of Sussex street drive. On the other hand, many applications are coming into city hall at the present time for permits to construct substantial buildings on this property. If these permits are granted it will be too late. Once these new buildings have been erected by individuals it will be too late to start a program to acquire the valuable property which will face government property on the other side, such as the national research council, embassies, and so forth, as well as the new bridge.

There is no better site in the city of Ottawa than the south side of Sussex drive facing the research council and the new bridge.

Mr. Walker: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend but when the national capital commission item comes up Mr. Hay will be here and I shall be able to discuss the matter to which the hon. member is referring.

Mr. Richard: I would bring up this matter under the national capital commission item if it were a national capital commission matter, but these properties are not to be acquired unless the minister is ready to tell me that the national capital commission wishes to acquire them for its own purposes. If the property was required for public buildings no doubt it would be acquired, as properties were acquired across the street, some of them by the Department of Public Works.

I should like to know whether the government has any plans at all to acquire any of the property and to erect public buildings on it in the future. It would be too late if that were put off too long; probably it is too late now. We may find that in the future the government would like to put up some public buildings facing the river, the national research council and the embassies, but by then it may be too late. It is only recently that new buildings have been erected on that site by individuals. I do not blame this government particularly. Action in this matter has been lagging for many years. It is a decision that the department should make.

Mr. Pitman: I should like to ask the minister one question on this item. Is any of the money under this item being used to plan shelters against nuclear attack? Either we are serious about this emergency measures organization or we are not. If we are serious, then it is about time we started doing something. As it is now, it is left to the individual to erect his own shelter. It may cost him $700 to put up some kind of a shelter in his own home. I do not think very many people have done so; in fact very few—

Mr. Walker: Again I hope the hon. member will not think I am being impolite. This is an item having to do with the acquisition of land. It has nothing to do with shelters which the hon. member refers to. Under this item we certainly have nothing that could be contemplated in so far as the erection of shelters is concerned. This item deals only with the acquisition of land.

Mr. Pitman: On this very point, I am wondering whether the minister has any plans for the acquisition of land because the facilities I am suggesting should be built in the centre of cities, which might be related to—

The Chairman: The minister has indicated that he has no responsibility for shelters and if there is nothing provided in this item for shelters the hon. member will agree with me that it would be irrelevant; or if what he is discussing is relevant, then any subject would be.

(Translation):

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be very brief, but I have a suggestion to make to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) with a view to helping all present members of this house and those who will be replaced by others in the future, as well as the general public.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, there is a most unfortunate situation regarding the possibility for voters to meet their member of parliament in their constituency. This is why I do not think I am out of order in raising this matter under the item under discussion and in asking the minister whether he would consider the advisability of assigning an office in a federal public building to the member for the constituency. It seems to me that such a policy would be quite normal, since the building costs of federal buildings are paid by the Canadian people and federal members are at the people's service.

I feel that it would be appropriate for the federal government to put some accommodation in a federal public building at the disposal of the member of parliament so that the latter may serve his constituents more efficiently.

In addition, the Department of Public Works should provide a private secretary whose salary—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but, in my opinion, the point on which he is speaking now, namely the provision of offices for members of parliament, could have been dealt with under the first item of the Department of Public Works, but I doubt very much that his present remarks are relevant to item 369 which we are considering now, especially when he asks that a staff be provided for members of parliament. I feel that this last question would come under the estimates of the house rather than under those of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, with your permission I would point out that item 369 covers advance planning of projects, including acquisition of sites, etc., but mainly project planning, and since the matter was raised a moment ago—

The Chairman: The hon. member will surely understand that the project planning mentioned here means more than theoretical planning, because all the projects the hon. member for St. Mary could think up would be relevant to this item, if I would let him continue.

(Text):

Mr. Howard: I wonder whether the—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Beauce.

(Translation):

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask a question of the minister on this item "advance planning of projects, including acquisiton of sites". Could the minister tell me if the funds we are called upon to vote under this item provide for the construction of a federal building in Beauceville?

(Text):

Mr. Walker: Yes, we have a site now.

(Translation):

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, I understand that the department bought the land or site for the construction of a federal building. Will the construction of that building start soon?

(Text):

Mr. Walker: We propose construction in 1962 and 1963.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I am not clear as to just what the purpose is of this vote for advance planning of projects including acquisition of sites. Taking the wording of the item, do I understand that the vote is for the acquisition of sites for various projects of the Department of Public Works on behalf of the federal government? For argument's sake, let us say you needed a site for a federal building. Is that what this vote has reference to?

Mr. Walker: The object of this particular item is so that when we do not have something voted in the estimates we are still able to acquire sites and to make plans and as a result we do have something tangible when we put an item in the estimates the following year. Does that answer the question?

Mr. Howard: That is generally what I wanted to know. Following upon the comments of the hon. member for Peterborough, I wonder whether any sites have been acquired or if it is planned to acquire any sites for the purpose of bomb shelters or radiation fall-out shelters?

Mr. Walker: The answer is no, we have not.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Chairman, on the basis of what has transpired I think that what I was saying was very much in order. Just because there is nothing in the item covering the point certainly does not mean that you cannot speak about the point. There is nothing in the item regarding bowling alleys but two or three members have spoken on the matter of bowling alleys.

The Chairman: I agree with the hon. member that it is very difficult to keep hon. members relevant to the item being discussed. I have indicated before that items which would be the responsibility of the department but which are not covered by a specific item can be discussed on item 1. With respect to the problem that the hon. member would like to discuss, it seems to me that it would be the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Part of the responsibility for shelters or problems relating to radiation falls on the Department of National Health and Welfare and otherwise it seems to me the responsibility would be that of the Department of National Defence. I agree that it is not easy for the Chair to keep everybody in order but sometimes the Chair has to intervene and it happened that I did so on this particular point.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, with relation to this particular matter and following along that line, it may well be that some phase of the responsibility is that of another department. The Department of Public Works deals with every other department in acquiring sites for certain types of buildings. They have dealings with the R.C.M.P., the Department of Finance, the Post Office Department and so on. The planning and acquisition of sites is done by the Department of Public Works. I gathered from the minister that this vote is used to plan for the future and so that they can make sure that a site will have been acquired when they get around to putting an item in the estimates in order to proceed with a certain project.

Mr. Chambers: On a point of order—

The Chairman: I think the hon. member for Skeena was pursuing the point of order. I will hear him a little further and I will then hear the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Howard: The minister indicated that this item had to do with work for the future. Surely we are entitled to say that some of that planning for the future should be with regard to a particular type of project. Under this item I am quite sure that I should be able to deal with the necessity of acquiring a site in the community of Prince Rupert for the construction of a new federal building. This is in the books and I am quite sure we can talk about the need to do that on this item. Certainly in such an important matter as fall-out shelters where the very lives of people are involved we should be able to talk about it if the matter means anything at all to the government.

Mr. Chambers: On the point of order, may I suggest that this matter would be more appropriately dealt with under item 315 and 316 having to do with the emergency measures organization which has responsibility in this field.

Mr. Regnier: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Peters: Could I point out, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. I have indicated my views. I have listened carefully to the hon. member for Skeena, and while it may be that the services of the Department of Public Works could be used in the acquisition of sites for the purpose indicated the decision would surely be made by another department. That is why it would not be relevant to discuss this matter under this item. I suggest that the items mentioned by the parliamentary secretary would be the appropriate items under which it could be discussed.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that this matter could properly be discussed under items 373 and 374 because Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is making loans for shelters. I intend to speak on this matter myself when we reach those items.

The Chairman: The hon. member will appreciate that the Chair is called upon to make a ruling whether the matter can be discussed under this item. When we come to the other items we will see whether any problem arises.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, it is urgent that the Department of Public Works enlarge the Joliette post office because the staff is cramped for room. Therefore, it would serve the general interest of the Joliette population to have this building enlarged. Besides, the Minister of Public Works wrote me some time ago to inform me that this possibility was under consideration. I would ask him to act as soon as possible to ensure that the population of Joliette, as well as the devoted staff of the post office, do not suffer unduly.

I should like also to endorse the suggestion of the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) as regards exercise rooms, as well as those of other hon. members who made similar suggestions, like the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis).

Mr. Roberge: Before taking up the matter I intend to discuss, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) for having supported our suggestions, unlike the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin).

Mr. Pigeon: You misunderstood what my colleague from Montmagny-L'Islet said.

Mr. Fortin: I support it because it would do you good.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I refrained from interrupting my hon. colleague and I trust he will extend me the same courtesy.

I should like to ask the minister if his department is considering building small post offices in the county of Megantic next year.

(Text):

Mr. Walker: The hon. member will appreciate that this is not the proper item but I will answer the question anyway. St. Ferdinand is in the hon. member's riding and we are planning to build that post office this coming winter.

Mr. Roberge: Has the site been chosen yet?

Mr. Walker: The site has not been chosen yet.

Mr. Roberge: Can the minister say why the site has not been chosen yet? I understand there was some discussion about it last year.

Mr. Walker: The item under which this matter comes has been passed and the officials have gone back to their offices. If the hon. member will agree, I will be very happy to write him on the subject.

Mr. Pitman: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, you allowed the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to speak about the advance planning of a post office where the decision is that of the Post Office Department. You have denied me the right to speak on this matter of advance planning of projects which will include a project which will have a great deal to do with the security of millions of Canadians. I must appeal this ruling. It would seem to me that nearly all of these advanced projects will be in the jurisdiction of some other minister. But the point is that the minister is responsible for the kind of projects which I am suggesting, not under the National Housing Act but under the kind of advanced project which this country must have if we are to have any kind of security in large cities.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that as the matter stands today, a man's survival depends on whether he has money and I do not think that is what we want. I am appealing to this minister, with his energy and his ingenuity, to do something in this area in order to show the people of Canada that this emergency measures organization has some importance. As the situation stands today, nobody is the least bit interested simply because they know that probably they will be at work when the bombs start to fall.

The Chairman: Order. I have allowed the hon. member to speak as long as did the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Walker: Just to clear up that matter, because I appreciate that also, may I say that this is a planning vote for projects within the purview of the Department of Public Works and, as the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence has said, the matter under discussion by the hon. member for Peterborough is one which is dealt with under the privy council vote.

(Translation):

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, I had a supplementary question to put to the minister.

I understood him to say a while ago that the site of the federal building, at Beauceville, had been selected; will he indicate whether the department has bought the site, the price that was paid and from whom the site was bought?

(Text):

Mr. Walker: No.

Mr. Howard: May I ask the minister whether under this vote and the departmental officials and staff who operate under it, would not be the machinery used to plan and acquire sites for such bomb shelters and radiation fall-out shelters? Would this be where it would be had?

Mr. Walker: The answer is no.

Mr. Howard: It would not?

The Chairman: Shall vote 369 carry?

Mr. Howard: Can the minister tell me whether or not his department would be involved in any way with the building of such shelters and sites for federal purposes?

Mr. Walker: If we were instructed by another department and they put up the money, we would be involved. Does that answer the question?

Mr. Howard: Yes. I take it that the original answer "no" was not really correct but that you would be involved, if requested by another department and the money was provided, and that this would perhaps be the machinery you would use to plan it and acquire the necessary sites.

Mr. Walker: The answer "no" was the correct answer.

The Chairman: Shall vote 369 carry?

Mr. Regier: I wonder whether I might ask the minister whether this particular vote which reads "Advance planning of projects including acquisition of sites" includes the possible purchase of a site to protect the reeve of Burnaby, the mayor of the city of Port Coquitlam, the reeve of the district of Coquitlam, the mayor of the city of Port Moody and also the mayor of Fraser Mills in case of emergency. Are there are any plans to protect these very important people? Are there any plans to acquire a site where these people might take refuge in case of a possible nuclear war?

Mr. Walker: That is a question vraiment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Peters: In relation to these votes may I say that maybe everybody else is satisfied but I am not satisfied. I am not satisfied with the whole presentation of this particular section of the department. We have asked a number of questions. Obviously this advance planning of projects means this. In every municipality in this country where the federal government anticipates any type of public building they are continually on the lookout and certainly must be on the lookout for a reasonable, economical site. They must have some kind of schedule or some system by means of which they are going to acquire sites for government buildings in the future. This must mean that the government, when they find that there is a site available in a place where they are thinking of constructing a federal building, will buy that site even though it means holding it for four or five years. This procedure is not unreasonable because in almost all the towns that I know of the federal government at some time or other in the last 10 years, 15 years or 20 years have bought some land which they have held for just that purpose.

It seems to me if we do not get from the department any better answers than we get when we ask these questions and if the rest of the items in this particular general section are as vague and as incomplete as is this one, we are not going to find out anything about the matter and there is close to $6 million about which we have no understanding at all. Maybe it is impossible to change this situation at this time. However, I would strongly recommend to the minister that he have his department break that figure down. I have looked at the details, and the details are even more vague and even more misleading than are the items in the estimates themselves. If some hon. members have not read them they might look, for example, at page 490. Less is said there except in a financial way than was said on the front page. The heading is "Advance planning of projects including acquisition of sites" and "Advance planning of projects and acquisition of sites" is repeated with the figure (13). Then there is given the amount this year and the amount last year. Then it goes on: "Fiscal year, 1959-60, expenditure, $1,390,066." and so on. It is a financial statement, but it does not say anything at all.

I think the request we have been making is a legitimate one. I am quite sure the minister does not disagree with what we are saying, namely that we should be in a position to acquire sites when there appears to be any use for them. I think the hon. member for Peterborough is not incorrect in thinking that in some of the major towns it is much easier to buy land or to acquire sites on availability than it is on need and that sometimes there is a considerable difference in price. Just let us take an example. If we wanted to do what I suggested the other day, namely to acquire sites on Wellington street for government buildings, how much better it would have been for us to buy the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company site before they built that big building on it. It may be that we might be interested in using that big building, but it seems to me that if we were planning ahead and wanted any site on that street, obviously the time to buy them would be before they built a big building that may not suit the needs of the government if the government decides it wants that site. I think this has been the argument that has been made by two or three members here this afternoon. I only suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the details on these items are vague and maybe they should be vague. I have no objection to the fact that $1,500,000 is available for the buying of sites, but I really think the committee has a right to know what type of sites the minister might be interested in buying and the type of procedure he uses in the acquiring of those sites.

[Mr. Peters.]

The Chairman: Shall vote 369 carry?

Mr. Regier: No. I do not agree at all. In the light of the minister's reluctance to supply adequate information to this committee I would move:

That vote No. 369 be reduced to one dollar.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Regier) negatived: Yeas, 4; nays, 44.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall vote 369 carry?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister could explain to the committee what particular sites are expected to be acquired this coming year for which he is now asking for $1½ million. What advance planning is being done?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member will appreciate, this is a planning vote and only applies to Department of Public Works projects. It only applies to projects which are initiated by the Department of Public Works and has nothing to do with projects which are planned by other departments.

To state at the present time what plans the Department of Public Works has in connection with the future might not be in the best interests of the department because somebody might start and buy up the sites we contemplate buying. I think my hon. friend will appreciate, from his business experience, that sometimes it is not a good thing to indicate in advance the different sites the government is considering buying.

Mr. Howard: I do know that it is becoming a practice of this government to become more secretive about things as time goes on. Could the minister tell the committee what sites were acquired during the last fiscal year?

Mr. Walker: I would be very happy to show the hon. member how the money has been spent in the past. I can give the hon. member lists in this connection; we have them all here. On the other hand, I could ask permission of the committee to table them for the last year, for instance. Would that meet the request of the hon. member?

Mr. Howard: Yes. Is it a very extensive list?

Mr. Walker: Yes, there are two pages of detailed items. Mr. Chairman, may I have permission to table it?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Has the minister leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: Put it in Hansard.

The Chairman: It depends upon the length of the document. If the committee is agreeable to having it printed in Hansard at this point, I have no objection. The minister has asked for permission to table the document.

An hon. Member: Include it in Hansard.

The Chairman: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, it will now be in the record of Hansard, I assume, just as if the minister had read the document. I wonder whether it would be possible to obtain a copy of it in order that we may at this stage ask additional questions, if necessary, about some of the items contained therein? Otherwise I think it perhaps leaves us in the position of looking at Hansard tomorrow, seeing the table and saying, "I would have liked to know something more about this". I am sure other hon. members of the committee agree with what I have said. It only puts us in a more awkward position, even though it is acceptable.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Walker: This is our only copy, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Walker: Just a minute now. I know there is a game going on among the C.C.F. members this afternoon. They are trying to get me to say some hasty words about something or other, or to blow my top, but I can assure them they can go on ad infinitum. I am going to be here anyway until the end of June. I find this all very pleasant, very pleasing and very instructive. I can assure all the hon. members who are taking turns to speak one after the other on complete irrelevancies that I appreciate it; I am enjoying it; it is very, very helpful to me; it has given me a wonderful experience in self-control, and whatever bets are up I can assure the hon. member that the person who says I am going to blow my top will lose the bet. This is an unique experience.

I must say, in fairness to some of the hon. members of the C.C.F. group, that I do not think they are all engaged in this, what I suppose is a lottery. Perhaps they had their chance to pick either yes or no, "will he, or won't he"? But whatever the bets are, let me assure them that the person who picked "yes" is going to lose.

Perhaps that will resolve this matter once and for all. If there is not a lottery going on and if the information that I have been given is wrong, then may I suggest to the hon. members of the C.C.F. group, for whom I have a certain amount of respect, that they are not increasing my respect for them, the respect of hon. members of this house, or the respect of the public generally, as was indicated by the recent Gallup poll, by asking such irrelevant and fatuous questions. There is, after all, a limit—

Mr. Peters: Some of us will be blowing our tops if you keep that up.

Mr. Walker: I expect you to do so; you started it. I am enjoying it, but do not feel we are not on to your game. If you are doing this in the interests of the public, that is another matter. I suggest that in your self-interest also you should consider the plan you have adopted here and which you have been engaged in now for four days. Had it not been for the C.C.F. group the estimates of the Department of Public Works would have been passed on the second day.

I think it should be pointed out to the public, and I hope that due note will be taken of this, that the hon. member for Skeena, who probably knows less than any other hon. member of the house on almost every subject, has talked more on every subject. I say that with the best of good will to the hon. member and hope that "while the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return".

I suggest to the hon. member for Skeena that it is a game, but it gets a little tiresome for hon. members of the committee. I am enjoying it because I am the subject of it all. Will the hon. member—I know he will not, otherwise I would not ask him—take cognizance of this? Some time he should go home at night and look at himself in the mirror and say to himself, "Am I as big a—", and I leave him to fill in the word, as he appears to pretty nearly all the Canadian public.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, words come to my mind which I applied on another occasion to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Veterans Affairs about certain accusations they made. I will not repeat those words now, but they could apply equally well to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Walker: I suggest to my hon. friend, don't get angry; just answer in the way I have asked the question. I say this for the benefit of the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard: For all his flowery phrases, soft tones and protestations, what the minister is asking the committee to do is to give him a blank cheque so that he can squander millions of dollars without having to account for them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: We are trying to find out precisely for what purpose this money is required. That is the simple question we ask. When the minister makes these accusations, not in a decent way, I might say, about playing games and about making bets about what the minister might or might not do, he is not enhancing his position in my estimation, and I might add it was never very high anyway. All he is doing is attempting, by way of that, to cast slanders and slurs on individuals, myself particularly, in the hope that he will not have to answer questions concerning why he should want particular sums of money. Surely to heaven this is an attempt, though by means of a gentle approach, to hide from parliament information which it is desired that parliament should have. Any hon. member has a right to ask why a certain expenditure is required, and so on. No one complains about it. When hon. gentlemen who support the minister spend time in this house on miniature throne speech debates on a variety of bills and items no one complains about it. It is the right of the individual to express his opinions and to ask questions.

Mr. Walker: May I ask the hon. member a question? Just say yes or no, and if you say no I shall sit down.

Mr. Howard: Well, just sit down. That is the best approach. All I am attempting to do is to elicit information and I am not getting it. We are getting a request for a blank cheque. The minister, in reply to one question, asked that a certain document be tabled in Hansard. I understand that the chairman is not going to allow it to be printed in Hansard but that it will be merely left on the table. Is that what is going to happen?

The Chairman: I wanted the committee to express its views as to whether it should be printed at this point. I had understood that the document was more extensive than it is. If it is the wish of the committee that it be printed at this point I will do it. I did not object. I did not rule on the point.

Mr. Walker: In reply to the hon. member—

The Chairman: Is the minister asking that the document be printed at this point?

Mr. Walker: No. There is no object in it. It is irrelevant. We are talking about this year's estimates and with regard to this planning vote we are talking about the future. We should not need a planning vote if we had planned, now, what we were going to do in the future. Therefore, the hon. member for Skeena—and one can understand him asking the question—when he asks what our future plans are during the years in which these opportunities occur to purchase sites, I must say to him that we cannot foretell the future. All I was saying with respect to last year was said in an attempt to indicate what we did last year. That was for the benefit of the hon. member for Skeena. I do not think there is anyone else in the committee who would ask such a question or who would be interested in seeing this particular piece of paper. The planning vote is a future vote for the future acquisition of sites as they turn up, because it is too late when the opportunity comes to purchase a site to then get a vote; parliament might have adjourned. Surely that is a sufficient explanation. I am sure it would be for anyone except the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Peters: I am involved in this, too, because I asked these questions. I should like to say this, that I would be pleased to know that the minister went over and stood in front of a mirror, looked at the minister and said: "I won't get mad, I won't get mad". General Young used to tell me that if it looked like he was getting mad he would sit down and tell himself "I won't get mad" and he would not get mad.

Mr. Walker: I apologize. I should have included the hon. member for Timiskaming, the two of you.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am not objecting to this. I think it is a good thing. Let me tell the minister one thing. If we had had bets on whether the minister was going to get mad or not we would have brought the hon. member for Port Arthur here, and he would have made the minister mad at any time and we would have won our bet. But he is not here and we have no bets.

Let me thank the minister for two things. One is that in this particular vote we are discussing two things which were not clear to me and I do not think they were clear to any other member of the committee. One was that in this particular vote when they set "general" as a heading they should have said "general" for public works only. We have, for the last two or three days, been discussing votes which did not necessarily affect the Department of Public Works only but departments for which the Department of Public Works was acting as an agent. Now the minister, after he had been asked three or four questions, got up and said that this sum is only for public works buildings and buildings which come within the jurisdiction of the department. We thank him for that information. This draws attention to the fact that if the wording in the heading itself were a little broader this question would have been eliminated.

We are not interested in delaying the estimates of the Minister of Public Works. We appreciate that he has been as courteous in giving answers this year as he has. I do not think this can be said with regard to some years in the past. We appreciate this new attitude. We may have developed a sudden interest in some of these things, because we have many different interests. One of them is the acquisition of these sites by the government.

This brings me to the second point. The minister says his department wished to be in a position to be able to buy sites advantageously, avoiding competition with real estate agents or others who might have heard of rumoured projects in a particular area. We are in complete agreement with that, and if the hon. gentleman had got up and said that in the first place, I certainly would have raised no question about it. I think this is really what the hon. member for Peterborough had in mind. In Peterborough there may be a site available in the near future. We have a project for the future about which we are all thinking in the back of our minds, and I agree it might be advantageous to pick up a site if one were to become available at a reasonable price.

Item agreed to.

371. Miscellaneous works not otherwise provided for, including expenditures on works on other than federal property: a maximum of $15,000 may be expended in respect of any one work and, with the approval of treasury board, that maximum may be increased to $25,000, $2,450,000.

Mr. Robichaud: I have a question to ask on item No. 371 which I think the minister may now be in a position to answer. Part of this item concerns miscellaneous work not otherwise provided for. Last Thursday I asked the minister if it was the intention of the department to carry out the project at Ferguson Gulley. This involves the dredging of a sandbar to allow the fishermen to get to the fishing grounds. I wonder if the minister is now in a position to tell me if it is the intention of the department to carry out this project at the earliest date.

Mr. Walker: I regret to have to say to the hon. member that the dredging of which he speaks does not come under this vote. I will be happy to get the information for the hon. member and give it to him either in a letter or in the house, whichever he prefers.

Mr. Herridge: I have one question to ask the minister, and I think this is the proper item. Some years ago, on occasions, the department of public works would make a grant to a city or a small town toward the cost of ornamental lights on the street directly in front of a public building. I think this was done usually by order in council on the recommendation of treasury board. Would the minister inform the committee if this practice is still continued?

Mr. Walker: Certainly the practice has not been continued, but it would come under this vote if it were. It has been discontinued, but the hon. member is right in asking the question under this vote.

Mr. Tardif: Mr. Chairman, in respect to vote No. 371 regarding miscellaneous works not otherwise provided for, the amount provided is $2,450,000. Could I ask the minister how that amount is arrived at and whether there is a list of works not provided for?

Mr. Walker: In reply to the hon. member for Russell may I say that some of the projects included in that item are small post offices, small wharves, as well as a substantial provision which we have found over the years is necessary to cover unexpected damage resulting from severe storms.

Mr. Tardif: Then there is a list or tabulation amounting to $2,450,000?

Mr. Walker: Yes, that is right.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—

373. Expenses incurred in constructing and supervising construction of married quarters, rental housing, schools and related services on behalf of the Department of National Defence, $540,000.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I may ask the minister a few questions in connection with this item. Could the minister tell us, apart from the parcel of mortgages which were offered for sale this month, the dollar value of the mortgages sold in 1960 and the dollar value of the mortgages sold in 1961, up to May 31? Perhaps we could proceed in this way asking these questions and receiving answers as we go along in order to facilitate the minister.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, what was that question again?

Mr. Garland: Apart from the offering of mortgages for sale in this particular month could the minister tell us—

Mr. Walker: Would the hon. gentleman wait just a moment until the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation experts arrive? I ask the hon. member to do so because I always consider his questions very sincerely, particularly in regard to housing.

The Chairman: Does the hon. member for Nipissing not consider his question more appropriate under vote No. 601, because it seems to me that vote 373 has specific reference to the construction of married quarters?

Mr. Garland: I am in the hands of the chairman.

The Chairman: I just asked the hon. member whether he thought it would be more convenient to discuss this subject under vote No. 601.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I think it has been the commonly accepted practice during the discussion of the first item of a division to allow hon. members to refer to over-all policy, and I believe that practice would be desirable at this time, unless the minister objects.

The Chairman: The first item concerns the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and its operations, and it seemed to me that vote No. 373 had reference to a specific subject.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, I was under the impression that the first item of the estimates of the Department of Public Works, which includes this vote in respect to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the national capital commission, was the item under which discussions of a general nature should be carried on. At that time questions in respect to housing were raised which we tried our best to answer. I do not want to curtail the debate, but my respectful suggestion is, we should follow the practice of last year, by which special subjects are dealt with during the discussion on the vote concerned.

The Chairman: The only reason I made my earlier suggestion was because it seemed to me that this item concerned a specific subject.

Mr. Garland: I shall be glad to follow the suggestion of the chairman.

(Translation):

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should have dealt with this a little earlier, but there is one suggestion I should like to make before we go on to the problems relating to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The Department of Public Works is certainly the department which has the most frequent contacts with the people. It is the department which is probably most often approached by hon. members who wish to discuss problems of local interest. I think the suggestion I have to make to the minister is of some value, and I am sure it will meet with the approval—

The Chairman: Order. Has the hon. member understood the ruling I made a moment ago to the effect that problems generally related to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation should be discussed under item 374, in view of the fact that item 373 deals with a very special case.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, my suggestion has nothing to do with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I wanted to bring it forward before we started on item 373, and the floor was given to the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland).

The Chairman: If it has no connection with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, it would certainly have no connection with item 373.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I rose when item 372 was called, and at that time, the hon. member for Nipissing rose and asked for the floor and started to discuss Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Nipissing rose when item 373 was called.

Mr. Fortin: But when you called 372, Mr. Chairman, I rose to ask for the floor.

The Chairman: Well, if the remarks of the hon. member have to do with item 372, I might ask the committee whether the hon. member is allowed to raise his point.

Mr. Fortin: I will come back to it later, Mr. Chairman—

(Text):

The Chairman: It appears that the hon. gentleman wishes to discuss item 372 and that the committee is agreeable to his reverting to that item.

(Translation):

Mr. Fortin: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I said at the beginning that my suggestion should have been made earlier. Now, since item 372 is the last departmental estimate before those of the corporations I would like to make my suggestion at this stage, since I could not do so earlier. It does not directly concern item 372, I admit. The suggestion I intended to make to the Minister of Public Works was that, because of the ever increasing importance of his department, I believe, he should consider the possibility of appointing, for the benefit of the 70 French speaking members of parliament, another deputy minister, and a French speaking one.

(Text):

Item agreed to.

374. Additional amount for housing research and community planning as contemplated by part V of the National Housing Act, 1954, and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $585,900, $1,649,000.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, I suggested that perhaps we could proceed with dispatch by asking questions and receiving answers as we go along.

In respect to the sale of mortgages, apart from the mortgages that were sold recently amounting to $15 million, could the minister tell us the dollar value of the mortgages sold by C.M.H.C. during 1960 and 1961 to the last available date, which I presume is May 31?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, none were sold in 1960 and the only group sold in 1961 was that completed yesterday amounting to $12,500,000.

Mr. Garland: I thank the minister. The minister earlier today in his announcement to the house indicated that 30 parcels of mortgages were offered for sale of which five were not sold because there were no bids received. Could the minister explain why there were no bids received?

Mr. Walker: It is very difficult for us to tell why people do not bid but let me inform the hon. member that there were no bids received in connection with certain areas. As my hon. friend will appreciate, because he is interested in mortgages and knows that sometimes approved lenders discriminate against certain areas, it would not be in the interests of those areas, would it, for me to disclose them? The hon. member will appreciate that. What I am always trying to do with approved lenders is to get them into different areas. Last year, when we had a shortage of funds for direct lending, I was always, on behalf of hon. members from the west and from other areas which are somewhat far distant, trying to get the approved lenders to invest in those areas. I do not think it would be appropriate, and I think my hon. friend will agree with me, to insist that we disclose the particular areas in which there were no bids on the mortgages held in those areas.

Mr. Garland: I agree with what the minister has just said and his reasoning is quite logical. But it is fair to assume that it was because of the area—

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Mr. Garland: —in which mortgages were located that no bids were received? Will the minister tell us what formula or basis is used in putting those parcels and packages together? Are they all one builder or are they all in one area? Could the minister say a word on this?

Mr. Walker: Each of the parcels was for an amortization term of 25 years. One parcel would be for Quebec, the different places in Quebec where money is lent. Another parcel would be for Nova Scotia, including Halifax and the other places where loans are made. There was a different grouping according to territories for each of the parcels.

Mr. Garland: By "territories" does the minister mean by provinces?

Mr. Walker: Not necessarily, more by areas within each province.

Mr. Garland: Can the minister say whether Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation allowed the bidders to inspect those properties before the bids were made?

Mr. Walker: They had time to do so if they wished. They knew the location of the properties and had they wished to inspect them they could have done so.

Mr. Garland: I make this suggestion to be helpful. Could some encouragement be offered or could it be suggested that they do have the opportunity? I am not sure that it was known to all the bidders that they did have the opportunity of inspecting. My reason for mentioning this is quite simple. I am very much in favour of the establishment of an effective secondary mortgage market. I should not like to see anything done which might in any way stand in the way of its success. It seems to me that if it were known to the bidders that they did have the opportunity to make an actual inspection of the properties concerned it might be useful.

Mr. Walker: What the hon. member has just said is certainly something that we should take into consideration. I should also say that we have had no requests from any of the bidders.

Mr. Garland: Am I to assume from the minister's answer that no inspection was made?

Mr. Walker: No, I cannot say whether or not any inspection has been made. As I say, so far as the knowledge of the president is concerned, we know of no requests.

Mr. Garland: Can the minister tell us the amount of direct lending done by the corporation in 1960 and also the amount of mortgage payments received so that we might have an appreciation of the net lending?

Mr. Walker: We will look that up for the hon. member.

Mr. Garland: May we have the number and the dollar value of the foreclosures in 1960 and also the same figures for 1961, up to the latest available date, whatever that might be?

Mr. Walker: We will be glad to supply the information, Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

Mr. Campeau: Mr. Chairman, first of all, I wish to thank the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) for the new grant of over a million dollars he has kindly made to the Jeanne Mance housing development in the constituency of St. James. This grant will greatly help the city of Montreal to complete that project which I would say is of prime importance from a social point of view. As a matter of fact, the Jeanne Mance housing development has had remarkable success. All apartments are now occupied and while opposition members offered some criticism, there is now a long list of applications for that development. In fact, hundreds and even thousands of applicants are on the waiting list.

I also want to congratulate all those who contributed to the success of the project, namely the personnel of C.M.H.C., the staff of the Jeanne Mance housing development, and particularly the present manager, Mr. Leopold Roger.

Mr. Chairman, that waiting list of applicants for homes in the Jeanne Mance project shows the urgency of implementing the studies on urban redevelopment made by the city of Montreal, thanks to federal subsidies. In fact, two of those studies have now been completed, one concerning slum clearance and the construction of low rental housing in the eastern part of the city, the other concerning the general slum conditions throughout the city.

I know that the reports on those studies have been produced, and it is urgent, indeed, to implement them, especially with respect to the slum clearance project which is required for the C.B.C. project in Montreal east. The implementation of those reports is urgent, because there is some concern, at present, as a result of the delay and procrastination involved in the carrying out of that project.

Mr. Chairman, I also want to congratulate the Minister of Public Works who recently invited municipalities to take better advantage of the National Housing Act for studies involving slum clearance and town planning.

Town development across the country fully justifies the invitation extended by the minister urging municipalities to make use of such financial assistance as C.M.H.C. can provide for effective town planning projects.

Mr. Chairman, I want to point out to the minister that federal assistance to urban redevelopment is too strictly limited to housing. In my opinion, such subsidies should be provided within a larger frame so as to help municipalities in general town planning, the emphasis being on housing.

Cities are becoming more and more important in Canada. It has been proved that, in a period of one year, two cities the size of Ottawa are being created in this country and it seems that the tendency toward more and larger cities will be on the increase as years go by. I am sure we should take into consideration the attitude adopted in the United States toward urban development. You have an example there. They have reached a point where President Kennedy is considering having a municipal representative in his cabinet.

Mr. Chairman, one must remember—and I speak here as a representative from a city riding—that a Department of Agriculture was created some generations ago because agriculture was of vital concern at that time. It has probably remained so, although there is no doubt that urban development and the difficulties encountered by the cities in their expansion plans have taken a national importance. For those reasons, it is surely desirable to enlarge the scope of the National Housing Act so as to promote town planning, redevelopment of the older cities, and the development of new cities all across Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the minister's attention to another point, which concerns co-operative housing.

It seems that under the National Housing Act assistance has been provided for people whose yearly income is less than $3,500. That would cover subsidized housing, such as the Jeanne Mance project.

There is also the financial assistance which, thanks to direct guaranteed loans of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, is given to those whose salary is over $5,000. Therefore, there is a sort of no man's land between those who earn less than $3,500 and those who earn more than $5,000, where the National Housing Act does not provide any practical assistance.

As a matter of fact, I recently had the opportunity of studying a co-operative housing project in the north of Montreal, where this difficulty was encountered, in spite of substantial help from authorities of the city of Montreal. There was under the National Housing Act, no means of helping people with an income between $3,500 and $5,000 to enjoy low rental housing, and such an income represents the salary of the great majority of people in the larger cities like Montreal. In the United States, the housing legislation provides that whoever participates in a co-operative development may deduct from his income tax a certain part of the capital and interest he is paying for his house, or his accommodation. I believe this provision should be examined and similar legislation enacted in Canada, so that co-operatives might overcome this impediment in our National Housing Act.

We would then be able to help our citizens whose income is over $3,500 and under $5,000.

(Text):

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased that since last year Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been making an amount of $500 available by way of additional loan for the construction of fall-out shelters. I think it is important to have statistics as to how many loans have been made in connection with fall-out shelters, how many dwellings have been provided with such shelters and what is the total amount of loans made for this purpose. If people are not interested in building shelters voluntarily with the assistance of a government agency, probably it might be advisable for the government to make provision for the construction of a shelter in every home for which they provide a mortgage. I think it is very important to know whether the voluntary scheme is working.

Mr. Walker: I will take that under consideration. I should like to reply to the hon. member for Nipissing by giving these figures. In 1960 C.M.H.C. direct loans numbered 15,404, with a total lending value of $161,089,000. Repayments on principal only amounted to $35.7 million. In reply to the other question as to the number of foreclosures, may I say that for approved lenders the number in 1960 was 31 and claims paid amounted to $328,879. In 1961 the number was 86 and claims paid amounted to $734,552.

Mr. Regnier: 1961?

Mr. Walker: Yes, and the number of claims pending in 1961 is 103. With respect to direct loans made by C.M.H.C., the number of foreclosures in 1960 was 97 and the claims paid amounted to $1,058,785. In 1961 the number was 91 and the claims paid amounted to $996,770. There are 46 claims pending.

Mr. Garland: To follow along the same line, with respect to the Elliot Lake area can the minister give a comparison of how many foreclosures were made in 1960 and how many in the comparable period in 1961 together with the dollar value?

Mr. Walker: Perhaps we could pass this item now and come back to that later. I will get that information but it takes a little digging up.

Mr. Garland: Thank you very much. Can the minister say whether there has been any change in thinking on the part of the government with respect to the compulsory insurance aspect of N.H.A. loans?

Mr. Walker: These things are always under consideration but there has been no decision to change our policy because we feel that from the point of view of contingent liabilities the fund is not excessive. Does that answer the question?

Mr. Garland: Can the minister tell us the total amount in that fund as of the last date for which figures are available?

Mr. Walker: We will get that information.

Mr. Garland: I have one further question. I have no wish to delay the committee but I wonder whether the minister can give us a report today on the progress that has been made on the urban military housing development at North Bay?

Mr. Walker: While we are looking up the information with respect to that question I will give the information concerning Elliot Lake. With respect to C.M.H.C. loans the number of claims paid from the mortgage insurance fund is seven and in the case of approved lenders the number is 72, making a total of 79. Mortgage insurance fund claims in process number one for C.M.H.C. and 94 in the case of approved lenders.

Mr. Garland: Was the figure of 79 for 1960 or 1961?

Mr. Walker: That was as of June 6, 1961, our latest figure.

Mr. Regier: I should like to call to the minister's attention the old request of the lower mainland regional planning board located in New Westminster. They applied to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for a grant to aid in the cost of a survey of housing on the lower mainland. I know that the matter is in the process of negotiation and that no firm decision has yet been reached. However, I should like to endorse this request because I believe that the attitude taken a year or two ago that this matter was the sole responsibility of the local municipalities involved was possibly adopted in haste. I understand that the department and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are reconsidering this request at the present time and I hope that the decision will be that the federal government through C.M.H.C. will assume certain responsibility in this regard. This has to do with the particular item mentioned in the vote.

I wish also to refer to another matter, namely the offering by the minister of mortgages. When he replied to the hon. member for Nipissing I noticed that he waved his hand at what he thought were the western members in this chamber and he appeared to indicate at least that the five blocks on which no bids had been received were out in western Canada. I hope the minister will clear this matter up.

Mr. Walker: If I did so—and I know the hon. member will want me to clear this matter up—that would be a false impression, as they were from all over Canada.

Mr. Regier: I had intended to assure the minister that the economic prospects of western Canada exceed those of any other areas of Canada. I did not hope that he was indicating that these areas from which he had received no bids were out in western Canada. However, before I continue my remarks, I should like to ask the minister this question. Were not all of the offerings that he placed on the market insured as to repayment of principal? If the minister would answer that question I would be willing to continue my remarks.

Mr. Walker: Yes, Mr. Chairman; they are all insured.

Mr. Regier: In that case, I completely fail to appreciate how the managers of investment funds of Canada failed to submit a bid on any of the five packages to which the minister referred on motions this afternoon. As I understand it—and I hope the minister will immediately interrupt me if I am wrong —these mortgages carry an interest rate of 6¾ per cent and are insured as to repayment of principal and interest. Yet not a single bid was received. Here was an offering to the investment houses of Canada of $12½ million worth of paper that had an insured interest rate of 6¾ per cent. Not only was the interest insured but the basic principal also was insured. However, earlier today the minister informed the House of Commons that not a single bid had been received.

To me this is a horrible indictment of the managers of investment capital available in our nation today. I read the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada as released as recently as Monday last. In it he refers to the resources and the lending capacity of Canadian banks. In addition to the resources available to and the liquidity of the banks of Canada today there are the insurance companies, trust companies, mortgage companies and many other like organizations. We in our group have often called upon the government to assume responsibility for the direction of investment capital. Under the Income Tax Act Canadian corporations, by way of depreciation, depletion allowances and the like, have been able to have at their command hundreds of millions if not in fact billions of dollars for re-investment purposes in the past. Yet if you look at the economic forecasts and the investment picture of the future, you find they are holding back; they are sitting tight. Our banks, insurance companies, trust companies, mortgage companies—our Canadian corporations—are sitting back.

I do not know whether they lack confidence in the administration of our country or whether they are anticipating the day when they can invest their money and get even more than 6¾ per cent. However, I think they ought to be thoroughly condemned for refusing to submit a single bid on insured mortgage paper offered by C.M.H.C. which is, in my opinion, as completely valid as is the dollar in your pocket or as is a Canadian savings bond. It is a mortgage insured as to repayment of basic principal and interest at 6¾ per cent. Yet the minister is obliged to report the sad fact this afternoon that not a single bid was received on this offering of five of the 30 packages that he offered.

I congratulated him, as he will recall, on the successful sale of the 25 packages. However, he was obliged to report to the house, not a single bid had been received on the offer of five of the 30 packages. In other words, there was offered $12½ million worth of paper insured both as to basic principal repayment and as to return of the interest of 6¾ per cent and not a single offer had been received.

Mr. Walker: If I am not correct, I do not want to correct the hon. member. But the figure is $15 million. There were many bids on parcels totalling $12,500,000. There was only $2,500,000 worth of parcels where there was no bid. There is a big market for this sort of thing.

Mr. Regier: I thank the minister for his correction and he is absolutely right. These deals were offered in packages of half a million dollars each and half a million times five is only $2,500,000. However, be that as it may, I do not believe the minister will deny the fact that there was offered on the money market of Canada $2,500,000 worth of paper which had the guarantee of the federal government as to repayment of basic principal and also interest at the rate of 6¾ per cent and not one single offer was received. I think this underlines our old contention that the day has arrived when the federal government must assume some responsibility for what happens to available investment capital in our nation. When these people are going—

Mr. Chambers: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that we are now dealing with the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The criticisms the hon. member is making are of the financial community of Canada and might more properly be made in the budget debate which we will be having very shortly. They do not apply directly to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, if I may speak to the point of order, I believe it was agreed we would discuss this item under this particular vote. I should like to appeal to the parliamentary secretary to abide by an earlier decision of the committee in this regard. I have just about concluded my remarks in any event.

I do feel that the government of Canada ought to consider the implications of this event. I say this in all seriousness. I do not even suggest that the financial community of Canada has lost confidence in the government of Canada. I mention it only as a possibility. However, if these people are determined that they are going to sit back —and as the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada which was released on Monday last indicates very clearly, there is a quantity of available investment money in Canada—holding out for higher profits or a higher interest rate than 6¾ per cent, I think it is up to the government of the day to tell these people that they will either react in a responsible manner in the national interest or the government will have to move in, assume responsibility and determine the direction of the flow of available capital, and will also have something to say about the level of earnings that available capital ought to receive.

Mr. Beech: Mr. Chairman, I want to take this opportunity of commending the minister and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the splendid job they are doing in the field of housing. I also express my personal appreciation for the very great consideration that has been given to the problems I have placed before them.

The question I wish to ask the minister arises from a letter addressed to him by the metropolitan Toronto housing authority in relation to the possibility of securing a fixed rate of interest for projects built by municipalities or non-profit companies for housing elderly persons.

This is an annual appeal which I have made for the last four years. I am hoping the minister will give this request serious consideration, because it does help these people in planning these projects. It takes one to two years to plan these projects, and after the planning is all completed the interest rate is raised and they have to start all over again. I would ask the minister to give serious consideration to arranging a fixed rate of interest on these projects, the same as is available at the present time under the Veterans' Land Act, farmers loan legislation and other acts.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister is in a position to comment on the urban military housing development that I mentioned.

Mr. Walker: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The North Bay military housing project will probably be built on several individual sites. One site, for 200 units, has already been optioned and planning has started. Other sites are now being looked at. The total housing requirement is 575 units.

In answer to the other question asked by the hon. member for Nipissing, the mortgage insurance fund as of May 31, 1961, amounted to $82,113,390, against loans in excess of $4 billion.

Mr. Garland: I wonder whether the minister, with the aid of his officials, is in a position to indicate when tenders are likely to be called for this housing development at North Bay.

Mr. Walker: It will be the fall of this year. We cannot ascertain the exact month at this time.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, there is one aspect of housing in which I have a particular interest. I should like to make a brief comment on it. I refer to housing in so far as Indian people are concerned.

The National Housing Act was amended in 1956 to provide that the corporation may make loans to Indians as defined in the Indian Act for the purposes of housing projects on reserves. I have been given to understand that not one single loan has been made. The reason for that is that not one single application has been made for such a loan.

This matter of home building is of extreme importance to native Indian people. I do not know whether this failure to apply for loans arises because they are not generally familiar with the fact that an Indian can apply to the corporation for a loan, or from the fact that Indian lands are not mortgageable for any purpose whatsoever; they are lands held in trust.

I am inclined to think that the latter reason is the correct one, that is, it is impossible to make loans to an Indian person for home building purposes because he cannot mortgage his land as security for the loan. There are a couple of means which might be used to overcome this difficulty and which I think the corporation should consider, or the governor in council should consider because the amendment to the act says these loans are subject to and in accordance with regulations of the governor general.

Perhaps some way may be found to overcome this particular difficulty and assist Indians to have the same opportunities as non-Indians in so far as borrowing money for home building purposes is concerned. Mr. Chairman, before I get into that question I wonder whether I may call it six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that the committee call it six o'clock.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, is there any chance of passing the last four items? This is the fourth day we have been on the estimates of the Department of Public Works, and there are other departments still to be considered.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I think it should be called six o'clock. The national capital commission, for instance, is an extremely important matter and will perhaps require extensive discussion.

Mr. Walker: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member will look in the mirror tonight.

Mr. Howard: That would be more pleasant than looking at my hon. friend.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the leader of the house could indicate what the government proposes to take up for the succeeding days of this week, or perhaps he would confirm what he has already indicated to the house, namely that there will be the budget debate on Thursday and Friday and estimates on Saturday.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, when I made the forecast for this week I thought we might have the budget debate on Thursday and Friday, but it was only a forecast. I will inform the house tomorrow what the business will be for Friday, and similarly for Saturday. At the moment I anticipate we will have estimates on Saturday. I have been waiting since Monday for a conference of the three parties in order to make certain decisions concerning the winding up of the session. I would like to confer with the other parties before specifically naming various items for discussion. As far as tomorrow is concerned, it will be devoted to the budget debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is not able to say definitely whether the budget debate will go on on Friday?

Mr. Churchill: I am not under any obligation to announce the business except from day to day. I think that tomorrow we will make decisions with regard to other days.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest to the minister that that is not an attitude conducive to co-operation.

Mr. Churchill: We had a great example of co-operation just at six o'clock tonight from the one hon. member who held up the house again, I think for about the sixth time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister any complaint to make about my friends?

Mr. Churchill: I am not making any complaint about the members of the official opposition nor with regard to most of the members of the corner group.

Mr. Howard: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Veterans Affairs—the leader of the house—

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Howard: It is fine with me that it is six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, but this merely indicates that hon. members opposite wish to permit the Minister of Veterans Affairs to make slanderous accusations such as he has just made.

It being five minutes past six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

357. Remedial works where damages are caused by, or endanger, navigation or federal government structures, $800,000.
